His first intelligible words, uttered in broken English, were:
"Vat time ees cet?"
"Ten-thirty," said Steingall.

"Ah, cre nom d'un nom! I haf to go, queek!"
"Where to?" 'No mattaire. I tank you all tomorrow.

tomorrow, an' make ze complete explanation," he said.
"I must trouble you tonight. please," insisted Steingall quietly. "You don't understand what has occurred while you were fastened up here. You know Mr.
Henry R. Hunter?"
"Yes, yes. I know heem."
"Well, he was stabbed while alighting from an automobile, outside, this hotel from an automobile outside this hotel shortly before eight o'clock, and I imagine he was coming to see you."

"Stabbed! Did zey keel heem?"
"Yes. Now, tell me who 'they' were."
Monsieur Jean de Courtois was taken instantly and violently ill. He dropped back on his bed, from which he had risen valiantly in his eagerness to be stirring, and faintly proclaimed his inability to green what the detective was saving grasp what the detective was saying.
"Ah, Grand Dieu!" he murmured. "I am eel; fetch a doctaire. My brain, eet ees, vat you say, etourdi."

The Frenchman shut his eyes and which would sweep aside all

"Don't you understand that your friend, Mr. Hunter, the journalist who was helping you in the matter of Lady far. Hermione Grandison's marriage, has been murdered?"

The other men in the room caught a new quality in Steingall's voice. Contempt, disgust, utter disdain of a type of rascal whom he would prefer to deal with most fittingly by kicking him, were revealed in each syllable; but Jean de revealed in each syllable; but Jean de Courtois was apparently deaf to the mean opinion his conduct was inducing among those who had extricated him from a disagreeable if not actually dangerous predicament. He squirmed convulsively, and half sobbed his inability to realize the true nature of anything that had happened either to climself or to any other person.

"Very well," said the detective, "if you are so unoroughly knocked out I'll see that you are kept quiet for the rest of the evening."

British and Cerman royal houses, the windly arrange that two trustworthy men shall undress this ill-used gentleman. He may be given anything to eat or drink that he requires, but if he shows signs of delirium, such as a desire to go out, or write letters, or use the telephone, he must be stopped, forcibly if necessary. Should he become violent, ring up the nearest police station house. I'll send a doctor to him in a few minutes."

De Courtois revived slightly under the stimulus of these emphatic directions.

"I haf not done ze wrong," he pro-"I haf not done ze wrong," he pro-tested. "Eet ees me who suffare, and I do not permeet dis interference wid my leebairty."

"You see," said Steingall coolly. "His mind is wandering already. Just phone for a couple of attendants, will you, and I'll give them instructions. I take full responsibility, of course."

"But, monsieur—" cried the Frenchfing words was electrical. Monsieur de Courtois's angry demeanor suddenly changed to that of a sufferer almost as seriously injured as Steingall made out. He collapsed utterly, and never lifted his head even when most drastic measures were enjoined on a couple of sturdy negroes as to the care that must be devoted to the invalid.

Steingall was established, outspalen.

Steingall was astonishingly outspoken to Curtis and Devar while they were walking to the elevator. walking to the elevator.
"I am surprised that that miserable whelp escaped with his life," he said. "Usually, in cases of this sort, the rascal who betrays his friends receives short shrift from those who make use of him He knows too much for their safety, and

Curtis smiled, too. He grasped the detective's unspoken thought. Steingall had as good as said that the message bore put Curtis's counter-charge against Count Vassilan and the Earl of Valletort of conspiring with de Courtois himself to defeat, Lady Hermione's marriage project. Vassilan and the Earl of Valletort of conspiring with de Courtois himself to defeat Lady Hermione's marriage project. Indeed, before replacing the silp of paper on the table, the detective produced a notebook, and entered therein particulars which would secure proof of the Marconigram's origin if necessary.

The maid hurried in with the milk, and Steingall, who had covered more ground emong the Frenchman's correspondence hat the others gave him credit for, now teted as nurse. With some difficulty he inceeded in persuading the stricken man in the bed to relax his firmly closed jaws and endeavor to swallow the fluid. It was a tedium business, but progress became nore rapid when de Courtois realized that an ewas in the hands of those who meant well by him. It was noticeable, too, as his senses returned and the panic glare eff his eyes, that his expression changed from one of abject fear to a lowering look of suspicious uncertainty. He peered at fittening all and the hotel clerk many times, but gave Curtis and Devar only a perfunctory glance. Oddly enough, the fact that the two latter were in evening dress teemed to reassure him, and it became evident later that the presence of the clerk led him to regard these strangers as guests in the hotel, who had been attracted to his room by the mere accident of propinquity.

It was noticeable, too, as guests in the hotel, who had been attracted to his room by the mere accident of the first intelligible words, uttered in the fact that the presence of the clerk led him to regard these strangers as guests in the hotel, who had been attracted to his room by the mere accident of the first intelligible words and there difficulty intelligible words and there are a contending. "Helio!" muttered the detective to Curtis, "they've found you! Now we must use our brains to get you out of this."

They escaped the journalists by closing the door of the office on them. Then the clerk was summoned, and solved the first difficulty by revealing a back stairs exit by way of the basement. An attendant was sent to Curtis's room, to pack a grip with some clothes and linen, and, by adroit manoeuvring, the whole party got "Where to?"

"No mattaire. I tank you all tomorrow. I explain eferyting den. Now I go."

"You had better stay where you are, Monsieur de Courtois," spid Steingall in French. "Milord Valletort and Count Vassilan have arrived. I have seen them, and nothing more can be done with respect to their affair tonight. I am the chief of the New York detective bureau, and I want you to tell me how you came to be in the state in which you were found."

But de Courtois was regaining his wits rapidly, and the clarifying of his senses rendered him obviously unwilling to give any information as to the cause of his own plight. Nor would he speak French. For some reason, probably because of a permissible vagueness in statements couched in a foreign tongue, he insisted on using English.

"Eef you haf seen my frien's you tell me vare I fin' dem. I come your office tomorrow, an' make ze complete explanation," he said.

Steingall insisted on interviewing Lady Hermione that night. He pointed out, reasonably enough, that she might possess a good deal of valuable information concerning Count Ladislas Vassilan; if, as Curtis believed was the case, she had already retired to rest, she must be elucidated by knowledge of his previous career.
