Three Remedies for the Nagging Wife. Can a Cultured Girl Find Happiness With a Man Who Lacks Polish?-Shall He Marry for a Good Business Opportunity?

Dear Dorothy Dix-Several years ago I married an old maid. are well mated as to tastes in books, amusements, etc., and she is an excellent housekeeper and cook. We have most of the luxuries of life and

But my wife has a very peculiar disposition. She daily finds fault with her neighbors, her friends and her enemies, and is constantly reminding me of my shortcomings and of my past mistakes. It is most harassing, and they were alone, "yesterday I made thee a proposal for the healing of this breach between us, and it was and when I try to reason have out of this health about the following the state of the latest the l and when I try to reason her out of this habit she gets furious, and I have to take my curtain lecture in silence.

The worst feature of this nagging is that it grows on her as she grows older, and I am at my wits' end to know how to break the spell and change her disposition. I have dignity and cannot stand these petty family squabbles, and I shall be deeply grateful to you for any suggestions about how HENPECKED HUSBAND.

I fear that it is only in story books that people change their dispositions and the selfish become unselfish, the mean become kind, gentle and tender, and high-tempered turn meek and patient. In real life that miracle is seldom, if ever, wrought, because most of us are so self-conceited that we will never admit to a fault, so we have no chance of improving ourselves.

Of course, the perpetual fault-finder is suffering from a case of exaggerated ego, and it is an affliction that is common to both sexes. There are many men who knock everything their wives do, and probably just as many women who live with their little hammers in their hands. At the bottom of their trouble is the fixed conviction that they are the wisest people in the world and absolutely infallible, and that they know how to do everything better than anybody else.

The only cure for this is to reduce the swelling in their heads, and this is a well-nigh impossible thing to do.

Still if I were a man who had drawn one of these naggers in the matrimonial lottery, I should try three remedies on her. First, I would make a little memorandum of every time she found fault with me and put down the exact terms of criticism she used. Then I would wait for the psychological moment in which she was calm and at peace with me, and I would present my little document

The chances are that she would be surprised and horrified, for the agger seldom realizes what she says. And I would follow up this by telling er how unhappy she made me, how she wounded me, and how she was killing my love for her. I would appeal to her affection for me and to her sense of fair play, and remind her that she also had weaknesses and flaws that I was too much of a gentleman to be continually throwing in her face. urthermore, I would impress on her that the only way that two imperfect, ltering creatures can get along together is by mutual forbearance

If that plan also went blah, I would deliver an ultimatum to the lady, and tell her that unless she could treat you with the same civility that she does a stranger, I would become a stranger to her ind that I had listened to my last curtain lecture. Believe me, broher, few women desire to give up a good husband and a good home, and the fear of losing them will silence the most eloquent tongue. Also the domestic bullies, like every other bully, are cowards and you can always call their bluff.

ifhe "Taming of the Shrew" is still good reading for henpecked hus-T; and furnishes much food for thought. DOROTHY DIX.

Dear Miss Dix-Can a girl who is cultured and refined be happy with good man who lacks polish? I care a great deal for a young man who is nxious for me to marry him, but I am hesitating because of that ques-

He is good and kind and honest, but would his sometimes incorrect beech and his occasional social blunders get on my nerves if we were mared? Of course, I cannot correct his mistakes now, but do you think he buld resent it if I corrected them after marriage? Please tell me my ance for happiness in such a case?

I should say it depended altogether on how broadminded you arc, M. L. F., whether such a marriage would be a success or a

Undoubtedly every woman is supersensitive about the appearance that er husband makes in public. Also every woman yearns to be married to a an of the world who knows how to wear his clothes and say just the right ning, and who can overawe head waiters and hand a woman into a taxi vithout chucking her in as if she were a sack of potatoes. And every wonan writhes when her husband mispronounces words and is short on gramar and steps on other women's feet and doesn't know which spoon to use. But, after all, these are not the important things. Kind hearts are tore than fine manners and many a man who makes love like a matinee iero neglects and starves a woman after he has got her.

So, if you love a man who has not had advantages of education and association, marry him only if you have enough vision to see his good points instead of his failings, and if you have philosophy enough to laugh over them, instead of blushing over them.

But if you marry him, don't try to teach him table etiquette or correct his grammar. Take him "as is," as the shipping manitests say. No man marries to get a critic on the hearth, or desires a schoolma'am for a wife. If your husband has it in him to learn, he will pick things up by himself.

And remember that some of the most polished men in the world were

Dear Dorothy Dix-I want to ask your advice about what to do under shellfire. I am a single man of thirty-one and have met a woman who is about forty-one, but who has never married. She is always talking to me about how much money she could make if she had an active young fellow like me for a partner. But she says we would have to get married, as that is the only way she would be sure I would be honest with her. This woman s always bragging about what a great and wonderful family she comes com until she bores me to death. I do not want to marry her, but it looks like a good business opening for me. What do you think?

Fly, son, fly, while the flying is good. The highest board a man ever pays is when he marries for a home. If you marry this woman, you will be nothing but an errand boy who will have to work for his board and clothes for an employer, who bosses his every move inside and outside of working hours. Asad from amazement had passed quickly to admiration and a sort of contrition, into which presently there contrition, into which presently there crept a poisonous tinge of jealousy to see Sakr-el-Bahr prevail where he himself alone must utterly have failed. This jealousy spread all-pervadingly, like an oil stain. Since I have given thee such crowning proof of my loyalty, it is my hope and trust that I alty, it is my hope and trust that I may be restored to the place I had lost in thy confidence, and that this being so, thou wilt accede now to that proposal of mine concerning the Frankish woman yonder."

CHAPTER XXVIII. The Messenger.

The Messenger.

For the rest of the day she kept the cabin, chafing with anxiety to know what was toward, and the more racked by it because Sakr-el-Bahr refrained through all those hours from coming to her. At last, towards evening, unable longer to contain herself, she went forth again, and, as it chanced, she did so at an untimely moment.

The sun had set, and the evening prayer was being recited aboard the galeasse, her crew all prostrate. Perceiving this, she drew back again instinctively, and remained screened by the curtain until the prayer was ended. Then, putting it aside but mit.

Then, putting it aside, but without stepping past the Nubians, who were on guard, she saw that on her left Asad-ed-Din, with Marzak, Biskaine and one or two other officers, was again occupying the divan under the awning. Her eyes sought Sakr-el-Bahr, and presently they beheld him coming up the gangway with his long, swinging stride, in the wake of the boatswain's way with his long, swinging stride, in the wake of the boatswain's mates, who were doling out the meager evening meal to the slaves. Suddenly he halted by Lionel, who occupied a seat at the head of his oar, immediately next to the gangway. He addressed him harshly in the lingua franca, which Lionel did not understand, and his words rang clearly and were heard—as he did not understand, and his words rang clearly and were heard—as he intended that they should be—by
