THE WAY OF THE SEA

With a Foreword by FRANK T. BULLEN

SECOND EDITION

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Illustrated. 6s.

"We have rarely read a book in which the reader received so vivid an impression of the fury and ruthlessness of Nature. . . . It is a very remarkable achievement."—The Spectator.

"Each piece in the book is a gem, a picture, realistic and alluring of 'The snarling sea,' untamed and untameable, cruel, treacherous and unappeasable in its might. It is not often we get work of this kind, and when we do we are bound to make much of it."—Daily Telegraph.

"In descriptions of the North Atlantic surging round the rugged coast of Newfoundland it is magnificent. In dealing with the fisher-folk there are frequent touches of humour and pathos. The chapter 'Concerning Billy Luff' is a gem of purest ray serene."—Punch.

"There is real merit in his work, and genuine observation of a phase of life but little known and very remote."—Athenæum.

"It is unquestionably a powerfully written book."—T.P.'s Weekly.

"We have nothing but praise for his vigorous work, with its intimate knowledge of the wayward sea, its sense of tragedy, its feeling for character, and its appreciation of romance."—Daily Mail.

"'The Way of the Sea' deserves its praise, strong as it is given by Mr. Bullen in his preface. . . . It certainly is admirably moving and striking in its picture of the terrible Newfoundland coast, and the unspeakable human appeal of its inhabitants. The account of Billy Luff's death—so unlike the maudlin child-pathos of most writers—is something to be remembered. And through all the tales there blows the bitter sea-wind of Newfoundland."—St. James's Gazette.

"Mr. Norman Duncan gives strength, and an original power—a voice and not an echo. There is no weak pathos or sentiment, but a sense of the greatness of high and tragic issues in the common ways of men."—Daily News.

"Norman Duncan's book is remarkable in many ways, and shows a fine talent, from which we may expect many fine things in the future."—Manchester Guardian.
