The writer goes on to say that British colonies pass thru well-defined stages of development. They gradually overcome the main difficulties in the way of development, and discover their common economic and political interests, by means of which they are drawn closer together, generally to the point of actual consolidation. The struggle to achieve this progress must the point of actual consolidation. The struggle to achieve this progress must necessarily call into existence a strong "national" sentiment; the "precarious nature of their young industries inevitably leads to protection against powerful and highly-organized rivals.

We have seen this in the case of Canwe have seen this in the case of Canada, in its relations with the United States. This national sentiment, The Times' writer thinks, may, unless guided wisely, grow into separatist feeling. The more the colony approaches the status of a nation, the proaches the status of a nation, the greater the difficulty of problems. the first place, present offers of preference to the United Kingdom must

The abandomment of preferential schemes within the empire must necessarily accentuate the separatist, 'national' tendencies of the different colonies. Imperialists will have received a serious check, and all those in the colonies who argue that nothing is to be expected from the Mother Country, or that a preferential system will ruin the young industries of the colonies, will be strengthened. But it is quite impossible for the colonies to achieve in isolation the economic progress they designed and one after another will necessarily accessingly argument the recessarily accessing the possibilition for the best known breeders and dealers in Canada. If the farms are of the usual extent, the farmer need not trouble himself much about any sew age, except that of his own house. Sanitation is provided for by sunlight, air, and the absorptive power of the soil, and all that is necessary is to see that the sewage does not pollute the well. In the cities elaborate provisions are made for these needs, and for sanitation of all kinds.

The exhibit is infinitely superior to previous displays in both quality and quantity in the extination of Supt. Charles Kelly, who is in charge of the cattle, hogs and sheep. The finest tribute to the skill and energy of Canadian cattle breeders, however, is that paid by the large number of foreigners who are attending the Fair to inspire the soil, and all that is necessary is to see that the sewage does not pollute the well. The judging of the horses at the Exhibition was continued on Thursday in both rings, before the grand stand and in the disposed of. In the lightweight class, G. disposed of. In the lightweight class, G. Pepper's Myopia was first. Pepper's horses were also third and fourth, while Crow & Murray's Sweet Lavender was a good second. In the special hunters' class, Hume Blake's Huron and Major C. M. Nelles' Stilletto were entered, but the judges sent them both out of the ring, because the riders were not the owners. The regulations required that the hunters competing should be ridden by their owners. The judges acted quite properly in excluding these two horses for that reason. James Morton, coachman for George Gooderham, was easily the best performing professional coachman.
