THE TAX ON BACHELORS.

CHAPTER III. conversation was interrupted by that young lady, who came forward to meet them, with both forward to meet them, with both hands extended and her gown trailing behind her in a way that diggusted Tom beyond measure. He had read of women who wore trailing gowns but it had never been his musfortune to see one until now and to his fastidious mind it seemed shockingly untidy, and an untidy woman was, in his opinion the most pitiable spectacle imaginable. most refined and most benevolent family in the state. "Will this dress de to wear?" akked Daisy of Tom when the reception had been planned by Mrs. De Quincy and endorsed by Mrs, Ridgway. "I want to please you," the added, "since it will be the first time-we shall appear in society "If you will pardon me for saying so," replied Tom coldly, "I do not

"I presume you know that we are engaged to be married ?" "Tom has told me. I'll offer congratulations when we are alone." "I believe he means to kiss me," of his intentions," replied poor Tom. "Shall you allow that?" "I will asswer when I am sure of his intentions," replied poor "Tom. "He thinks you could not make up you mind to do it," said Daisy, turning to Mr. Parkhurst. "He doesn't know how we behaved when you were in Wheatlands, does he? I tseems ever so nice to see you again, dear Mr. Parkhurst, "I thought you were going to give ""Thought you were going to give ""Thou corret, where we can talk over old times." in the corner, where we can takk over old times." "I hought you were going to give your exclusive attention to Tom?" "I have changed my mind. Tom has a squint that makes my eyes ache, and his ears are ever so much too large. I think I shall like him better if I see very little of him. It is quite necessary, you know, that we should avoid becoming too antagonistic, for we mus spend a great deal of time together." Daisy's voice was soft and sweet, but very clear. Tom was quite aure that several of the callers who had happened in had heard her allusion to his sensitive concerning these time that he had begun to believe deficis, and his friends had humore ed his sensitiveness for so long a time that he had begun to believe that no one noticed them but him, self.
