CHARLES O'MALLEY.
LONDON.
Twenty hours after my arrival in England, I found London. Obedient to my instructions, I lost not a moment in my preparations to deliver my despatches. Having dressed myself in the full uniform of my corps, I drove to the Horse-Guards. It was now more or less, and I learned that His Royal Highness had gone to dinner at Carlton House. In a few words which I spoke with the aid of a servant, I discovered that no information of the fall of Ciudad Rodrigo had yet reached England. The greatest anxiety prevailed as to the events of the Peninsula, from which no despatches had been received for several weeks past.

To Carlton House I accordingly bent my steps, without any precise determination how I should proceed when there, not knowing how far etiquette might be an obstacle to the accomplishment of my mission. The news of which I was the bearer, was, however, of too important a character to permit me to hesitate, and I presented myself to the aid-de-camp in waiting, simply stating that I was entrusted with important letters to His Royal Highness, the purpose of which did not admit of delay. "They have not gone to dinner yet," said the aid-de-camp, "and if you will permit me to deliver the letters—"

"Mind your despatches," said I, somewhat proudly, and in no wise disposed to cede to another the honour of personally delivering them into the hands of the duke. "Then you had better present yourself at the levee to-morrow morning," replied he carelessly, while he turned into one of the window recesses, and resumed the conversation with one of the gentlemen in waiting. I stood for some moments uncertain and undecided; reluctant on the one part to relinquish my claim to the best of despatches, and equally unwilling to defer their delivery till the following day.

Adopting the former alternative, I took my papers from my satchel, and was about to place them in the hands of the aid-de-camp, when the folding doors at the end of the apartment suddenly flew open, and a large and handsome man, with a high bold forehead, and piercing eyes, entered the room, and, without any previous notice, seized me by the arm, and, bowing respectfully as he passed, he led me to a plain blue coat, buttoned to the collar, and his only decoration, a brilliant star upon the breast. There was that, however, of high birth and bearing about him, that left no doubt upon my mind he was of the blood royal.

As the aid-de-camp to whom I had been speaking opened the door for him to enter, I could hear some words in a low voice, in which the phrases "letters of importance," and "your Royal Highness," occurred. The individual addressed, turned suddenly about and casting a rapid glance around the room, without deigning a word in reply, walked straight up to where I was standing. "Despatches," said he, shortly, taking, as he spoke, the packet from my hand.

"For His Royal Highness, the commander-in-chief," said I, bowing respectfully, and in obedience to his presence I was about to place them in his hands, when he caught the first lines of the despatch, broke into an exclamation of "Ah! peculiar news!—When did you arrive?" "An hour since, sir," I answered. "And those letters are from—"

"General Pakenham, your Royal Highness?" "How glorious, how splendidly done!" muttered he to himself, as he ran his eyes rapidly over the letter. "Are you Captain O'Malley, whose name is mentioned here so favourably?" "I am, sir," I answered. "I loved deeply in reply." "You are most highly spoken of, and it will give me sincere pleasure to recommend you to the notice of the Prince Regent. But stay a moment. So saying, hurriedly he passed from the room, leaving me overwhelmed at the suddenness of the incident, and at a moment when I was surrounded by different persons in waiting, who had hitherto no other idea, but that my despatches were from Honous or Knightbridge, and an officer covered with decorations, and whose slightly foreign accent bespoke the Hanoverian, "his Royal Highness requests you to accompany me to the drawing-room, as he spoke, and I found myself in a most splendidly lit up apartment; the walls covered with pictures, and the ceiling embellished into panels, resplendent with the richest gold. A group of persons in court dresses were conversing in a low tone as we entered, but suddenly ceased, and saluting my conduct in a respectful manner, they retired, leaving me alone with the Duke of York, who, in a friendly and confidential manner, made way for us to pass on. The folding doors again opened as we approached, and we found ourselves in a long gallery, whose sumptuous furniture and elegant decorations, shone beneath the rich tints of a massive lustre of rubicund glass, diffusing a glow resembling the most gorgeous sunset. Here also some persons in handsome uniform were conversing, one of whom accosted my companion by the title of "Baron," nodding familiarly as he muttered a few words in German; he passed forward, and the next moment the doors were thrown suddenly wide, and we entered the drawing-room.

confusion in my mind to permit of my impressions being the most accurate or most collected. The splendour of the scene, the rank, but, even more, the talents of the individuals who were seated around me, had all their full effect upon me; and although I found, from the tone of the conversation about me, no momentary doubt of my inferiority, yet, by a delicate and courteous interest in the scene of which I had lately partaken, they took away the awkwardness which, in some degree, was inseparable from the novelty of my position among them.

Conversing about the Peninsula with a degree of knowledge which I could in no wise comprehend from my not engaged in the war, they appeared perfectly acquainted with all the details of the campaign; and I heard on every side of me anecdotes and stories which I scarcely believed were known by the present and the past. The prince himself, the grace and charm of whose narrative talents have never been excelled was particularly conspicuous, and I could not help feeling struck with his admirable imitations of voice and manner; the most accomplished actor could not have personated the cunning calculating spirit of the Scot, or the rolling reclusiveness of the Irishman, with more truth and ease. But far above all this shone the person I have already alluded to as speaking to His Royal Highness in the name of the duke; combining the happiest conversational eloquence with a quick, ready, and brilliant fancy. He threw from him in an easy and careless profusion of brilliant resources, a shower of profound and elegant maxims, now illustrating a really difficult subject by one happy touch, as the flash of lightning will light up the whole surface of the dark landscape beneath it.

"I thank you most sincerely, sir, for your compliment in thinking of me; but my wish is, to join my regiment at the expiration of my leave." "Why, I thought they told me you wanted to spend some time in Ireland?" "Ah! that alters the case; as then probably, you'd like to leave us at once. I see how it is; you've been staying here against your will all this while. Then don't say a word. I'll make your excuses; and I'll be glad to see you again, if you can't let me employ you on service. Here, Gordon, let Capt O'Malley have the despatches for Sir Henry Howard at Cork." As he said this, he turned towards me with an affected air of indifference, and continued—"I expect, Captain O'Malley, that you will deliver the despatches intrusted to your charge, in the name of the duke, in an hour. The instructions for your journey will be sent to your hotel. And now, my dear friend, I beg to bid you adieu, and to wish you, God bless you, a safe and happy journey to you. These letters will pay your expenses, and the occasion there is, I have ordered the oysters, were viewed with unusual impatience by the anxious editor.

"I am not able, were I even disposed, to record more particularly the details of that most brilliant evening of my life. On every side of me I heard the names of those whose fame as statesmen, or whose reputation as men of letters, was ringing through out Europe; they were then not too in the easy indifference of ordinary life, but displaying with the same ease and fluency the talents of the statesman, and the eloquence, which had won for them elsewhere their high and exalted position. The muscular understanding and powerful intellect of "Tory" was, with the brilliant and dazzling conceptions of Sheridan. The easy bonhomie and English heartiness of Fox contrasted with the cutting sarcasm and the glittering epigrams of Burke. The calm and collected demeanour of Pitt, and the high and exalted position of the Duke of Devonshire, were viewed with unusual impatience by the anxious editor.
