THE TELL-TALE DIAMOND.

A LEAF FROM A DETECTITE'S LIFE. On the night of January 10th, 18-, the Clifton Bank was entered by burglars, who made good their escape with $30,000

I repaired to the bank and sought the president, to whom I presented my cre-TRIBUNE (postage pre-paid) at $6.20, or $5, postage paid at office of delivery. tleman readily acquiesced, and together we passed into the main office, where several spruce-looking young men were scratching away as unconcernedly as if they had not been engaged in an animated discussion of the robbery only a minute before. I glanced at them sharply, but saw nothing suspicious in their looks, and concluded it would be a mere waste of time to question them. I examined the lock of the door open ing upon the street, and found it had not been tampered with, although the first arrival had found the door ajar. I next turned my attention to a door ppening upon the rear, and found it securely locked, in which condition it had been, so the president assured me, since the night before. our janitor the other."

"Can either of these gentlemen be sum-

"Yes, both, if need be. Here, Warden, run around to Mr. N——, and tell him that I wish to see him on business of imwhen a sudden thought struck me, and I called him back.

'You' need not trouble Mr. N., but if the jantor can be found ask him to step down for a minute." In less than two minutes the clerk re-turned with the janitor—a broad shoul-dered Irishman, whose answers to my questions were given in such a straight-forward manner that I exonerated him forward manner that I exonerated infifrom all blame.

"You lock up after the clerks have gone home, do you not?" I inquired, looking the man in the cyes.
"Yis, sometimes I does and sometimes I doesn't."
"When do you not?"

"When do you not?"
"Whin Mr. N— works late at nights, which has been the case much of late."
"Did you lock up last night?"
"Yis, sir, and fwat's more, tried ivery inre afterwards."

"At what time did you lock that door?"
and I pointed toward the front entrance.

"Well, as near as I can recollect, half-fasten them as well?"

"Yis, ivery wan of thim."

"Very good, sir; you may go now, if you like," and I turned to the president.

"Now, then, Mr. J——, with your permission I will investigate matters below stairs."

The old gentleman conducted me to the vault below. The heavy iron door of the large vault in which the bank's funds were stored stood wide open, and the vault presented a scene of confusion not unfamiliar to my eyes. Books and papers lay upon the floor in every direction, where they had been thrown after gratilying the curiosity of the burglars.

I stooped to pick up a crumpled document that lay at my feet, and as I did so the sparkle of a gem, heretofore concealed by the paper, caught my eye.

With a quick motion of the hand I picked the stone from the floor, and held it concealed in the palm of my hand, while I perused the document more for the purpose of concealing the exultation I felt at having gained so important a clue than for any other reason.

Having glanced at several other papers similar to the one I had at first picked up, I began a thorough search of the vault, which proved fruitless; but the diamond in my possession was sufficient foundation on which to weave a network of circumstantial evidence.

Having no further business at the bank,

I took my departure and went direct to a celebrated jeweler's establishment in So-The proprietor of the store knew me, and initutively guessing my business, con ducted me to his private office.

"Well, Tracy, what's up? he inquired, when we were seated.

"Nothing unusual," I replied. "You have probably heard of the Clifton bank robbery I presume."

"The Clifton bank? Ah! yes I did hear come one remarking about it. There some one remarking about it. There is no account of it in the morning pa-"No, I believe not. The affair was not

"No, I believe not. The affair was not discovered in time for the reporter to get hold of it. Well, sir, the bank has been robbed to the tune of thirty thousand dollars, and I am engaged on the case." "Hum, indeed! hope you'll catch the rascals, old boy. Dreadful state of things to exist in a small city like this," and the little man twisted uneasily in his chair. "Not so bad as you imagine. Be calm my friend; the parties that robbed the Clifton bank will not be likely to pay you a visit soon."
"Ah! I hope your surmises are correct,

"An I I nope your surmises are correct, but pray tell me your reasons for thinking as you do."
"Certainly. In the first place the bank robbery is the work of one man, and he is not a professional burglar. In the second place that man cares more for greenbacks than he does for gold orna-DANIEL & BOYD.

Second place that man cares more for greenbacks than he does for gold ornaments, and would not plunder your place for all there is in it. In fact this very same party owned a diamond, but threw it away rather than carry it around with him. It is very pretty, is it not?" and I held the stone up to him.

The jeweler took it, examined it closely, and returned it to me with the remark: "It is, as you remark, a very pretty stone, and I might add, very valuable for a gem of its size. That is your clue, I presume."

la tray, which he placed on a table and began to examine the labels attached.

"Some of these rings have been in our possession a number of days. Ah! here is one received this morning. 'January 11th—diamond setting—E. Baker.'"

And he read the inscription.

I took the ring from his hand and examined it. It was a finely chased ring of virgin gold, with the stone missing. I fitted the diamond in the setting and passed it to my friend.

"By Jove, Tracy, that is the very ring you are in search of! Now let me see." And he went nearer the light.

"Yes, there can be no doubt about it. The stone fits into the setting nicely, and, now that I think of it, it is of the same size and quality ordered."

"What name did you say the party

"Baker—Emily Baker."
"Emily Baker! then it was a lady?"
"I presume so; at all events she looked and acted like one."
"When is she to call for the ring?" "To-morrow afternoon."
"I must see her when she calls, and in order that I may play my cards to better advantage, I shall enter your service as clerk. What do you say?"
"I am perfectly willing, but take care what you do, old boy; there may possibly be some mistake."

"That is very true, and if such be the case, you may rest assured that I shall discover it in time. Did I understand you to say that you had promised to have the ring ready to-morrow after-Spices, Mustard, Gream of Tartar noon?"
"No sir, I said nothing of the kind.
She said she would call for it to-morrow,
and I nodded assent.
"Then lay the ring aside and leave the

than I had anticipated, and was nowise elevated or thrown off my guard, for I knew I had a general sharper to deal with whom it would be difficult to outstreet.

I had thus far met with better succe with whom it would be difficult to outwit.

During the day I visited several places where "ye little of faro" was in full blast, and picked up several items of interest, all of which tended to convince me that I was on the right scent.

Early next morning I repaired to my friend's establishment and was assigned a position behind the counter, where, it is needless to say, I felt ill at ease; but years of training and patient study had enabled me to act almost any role to perfection, and it was not long before the
f. eling of une: siners wore off.

The day dragged slowly along, for trade was not very brisk, and the salesmen had but little to do beside reading the papers and yawning to each other across the cases.

Four o'clock! Would the owner of the ring ever come? I asked myself the the question a hundred times, and was on the point of doing so again when the door slowly opened and a heavily veiled figure glided in, approached the counter, and inquired in a somewhat hesitating voice:

out the tray containing the articles left for repairs.

"Emily Baker." I mused, picking up several rings and examining them. "It does not appear to be among these. Ah! I recollect what has become of it," and I replaced the tray and took from the glass case a small box, removed the lid and exposed the ring to view.

"Is that your ring, madam?"

"It is. Why has it not been attended to?"

"Simply because the original stone has been recovered; and presuming that you would prefer that to any other, we have waited until we could hear from you."

"The original has been recovered! I do not understand you," and her voice sounded strangely masculine. "Pray tell me where it was found?"

"Certainly. It was found where you lost it—in the vault of the Clifton Bank!" and I reached across the coun.er and with the quickness of thought tore the veil from the face of no less a personage than the cashier of the Clifton Bank!

He saw that it was all up with him, and

When on trial he confessed that he had stolen the bank's funds to liquidate gambling debts, and having missed the stone of his ring a short time after the robbery, and fearing that it might lead to his detection, had attempted to have it replaced as we have shown.
