Everything points to the fact that the present session of Parliament will soon face real difficulties in seeking a proper course of action.

Britain's entire press devotes columns to-day to the attempt to set forth reasonable views on the mooted question. There is virtual agreement that the Government now faces the alternative of statesmanlike conciliation or the application of strongarm methods.

There are no two ways of going about the Irish question, the press virtually agrees. The Government witually agrees. The Government must adopt either conciliation or force, as the two cannot reasonably be combined. In as much as the Government has adopted the policy of conciliation dating from the time it took up the convention plan, it is possible that this may be continued successfully or otherwise.

It is almost with a sense of despair that editorial writers attack the quesion and they truly reflect the official mental attitude.

The Evening Standard last night said: "We believe the whole failure of English rule in Ireland is comvirtually agrees. The Government must adopt either conciliation or f English rule in Ireland is comprised in the failure to make such rule intelligible to Irishmen. They simply don't understand the sudden transitions as during and after last year's rebellion, from tolerance of lawlessness to the direct rigors of martial law, and from dull ferocity of repression to sentimental talk about heart union. They continually see cold-blooded hypocrisy; there is nothing but bewilderment of thought."
