As he got the oar in position he says, "You'll see the Paris crew don't monopolize all the rowing talent of St. John." He gave several strokes, but the boat instead of going ahead began to turn round.

Napper, who had been trying to dodge the showers of water which Tapper was throwing on him with every stroke, exclaimed, "She must be aground." "No she aint," says Tapper, "it's you leaning on the side. Sit over and you'll see how she'll go." He shifted cargo, but no use. Rapper says, "I've seen them stick an oar out the hind part. Suppose we try it?" "All right," says Tapper, "put her out." The oar was fixed, but after turning several times they struck the beach. Tapper, so to speak, rested on his oar and remarkeed, "Boys, it's a delightful day!" They had a small jug of "delight" in the locker, and after delighting themselves by a few long pulls and strong pulls, they concluded to try the boat again.

After several manœuvres like the fore-going, plentifully sprinkled with "delight" they spied a native sitting on a leg by the boat house quietly enjoying the scene.

seeing the boat putting out, he though the might get a chance over to see how the animal was gotting along. As he reached the shore he noticed the peculiar antics of the sportamen, and concluded that if they got to the island they would have to hire him and pay him will for it. So he seated himself on the log and quietly mused on the frailities of man. He was on the point of offering his services free, for the "delight" was too much for his tranquility, when Tapper, seeing him, exclaimed, "There's a rough looking specimen of a native. What's the use of me working? Suppose we get him to take us across?

They accordingly hailed Joe, who, after long bantering, decided to go for two dollars, but this conclusion was only reached after he had viewed the island several times through the bottom of a several times though the bottom of a several times through the properties are all that are left of the holocaus; that is a chicker reacted after the favorite precipition of your sister Jane. They set sail and without mishap-reached the island. All the way over Joe was planning a surprise for them, for he did not like the thought of being called a "mough looking successioners" by a man a "rough looking specimen" by a man that could not row a boat.

When they landed, Tapper says, "You fellows better go to work fishing, and I'll start a fire and get a lunch ready." So at it they went. While Joe got the luggage out, Tapper went to the centre of the island to choose a good place for the luggage he found a large sausage. "Well," says he, "that's an odd looking cowning ber, but I think I'll sweeten it for them." So he soon dug a hole in it, and taking a No. 12 Ely sporting cartridge from his pocket quietly inserted it in the hole, taking care to cover it all but the cap. After the boat was unloaded he took a piece of cord, which he had that morning got off a bundle of codish, and tied the boat to an alder. There she swung and all was peace and delight.

Tapper had his fire on and taking a dimer kettle, one of those with two or three decks, he placed the "cowcumber" and some eggs in the next, and putting the cover on, lit his pipe to await developments.

He didn't have long to wait. With a roar like a little earthquake, sticks, sahes, sees, like a first earth was a possible and the form of the cover on of the same part of the contempt of all right cover on, lit his pipe to await developments.

A smile of quie contentment broke over his rugged countenance, and if anything under the sountenance, and if anything under the starry dome, enjoyed the jubilee it was Joe Sprague's steer. Soon the rope parted, and away dirited the boat, while the steer chewed on.

But to return to Tapper, they got no fish, Napper fell in, and was nearly drowned, while Rapper had got fast to an eel and lost nearly all his tackle.

One of our St. John citizens, whom we will for the present call Tapper, having two of his friends from Boston visiting him, thought that he could celebrate the 2lst and give his guests a pleasant day's outing in no better way than by visiting the lakes at Harvey Station and enjoy the trut fishing.

By the way, it would be as well to name the guests; whom, if you please, and whether they do or not, we will call Napper and Rapper.

They arrived at Harvey by the noon train and one of our merchants kindly set his boat at their disposal. They ac-

When Mr. and Mrs. Callboard returned from their wedding journey, they settled right down to housekeeping. Hap-pier doves never nestled in a flat, and Mrs. Callboard determined to make home happy for Charley from the start. No future misunderstandings should arise in their domestic arrangements, if her wistheir domestic arrangements, if her wis-dom and tact could prevent.

When they sat down to their first meal Nellie helped him to an opaque slab of something about an inch thick, that fell on the table with a dull sickening thud on the table with a dull sickening thud, "There is some home-made bread like your mother used to make, Charlie dear," she said sweetly. He didn't have long to wait. With a roar like a little earthquake, sticks, ashes, eggs, bits of tin, etc., went shooting skyward and soaring majestically above all the rest was the "cowoumber." As it glided through the blamp summer air, it flapped its wings, so Joe said, and putting its thumb to its nose winked at Tapper.

All rushed to the scene at once. When Joe arrived there was Tapper standing with a stick poking it at the remains of an egg. His hair was on end, and a wild light in his eyes. When he recovered consciousness, he ejaculated, amid gasps, "Mighty me! I didn't think it was loaded."

As their kettle was spoiled, they could not make any coffee, so they sat down to a frugal meal of biscuit, choese and "clut of the island to fish by Joe's direction. Now Joe's steer had a decided penchant for salt, in fact he was notorious for this quality as he had at one time gone into a back shop up a pair of stairs and at ea half-barrel of fish, salt and all, and when found was quietly amusing himself sucking the tail of a codfish.

When Tapper and his party invaded the island, the steer was calmly browsing on the alders that skirted the shores, and the rest revised under liberal management."

When Tapper and his party invaded the island, the steer was calmly browsing on the alders that skirted the shores, and seeing the boat rocking on the waves, he waited till-the party had gone before investigating. Moving quietly along, his nose in the air, and one car set back to
