ment to a ball. I think it was the Bullier and think I was rather confused; yet I know Manuil glowered when I waltzed with Louise and I know Bibi did some strange and beautiful tripping and posturing that brought rounds of applause. I recollect, too, that at the end of the dance Bibi ploked up her brown cloak and hat, and walking straight to Arthur, said, in English:

"You must go home."

With a wild woop he sprang upon her like a demon, and whirled her into a mad walts. But the girl gripped his srm with her strong little hand and insisted: "You shall go home."

Somehow, through all the tobacce smoke and confusion I saw Arthur and I can never forget how he looked His fait hair was damp and lying over his forehead is tipsy disorder, his cravat was untied, his eyes expressionless and bloodshot. Laughing and shaking a handkerchief high over his head, he cang in ohorus with a crowd of girls:

And he strongled up, yonly to fall back shivering again.

"I wish," said Bibi, in English, "that I were the sort of a woman to straighten out this poor fellow's life."

"And why not, Ribi." I asked.

"Nonsense." she nawwered, "he needs some good in fluence—a mosher's, or wife's.

"He has no mother," said I; he has told me that."

"I'm not be owned he's not a very satis factory son," I ventured to remark, looking at Arthur's limp, recumient figure.

"Bah!" repiled Bibi, "you judge him with no understanding. There's somethins in him make up not like the rast of us. He dresn't run into excess firm maile aforethought. There's an instinct that shall give place.
