developing, though not very rapidly. It appears from a lecture by Professor Ayrton, delivered at the Royal Institution on the 15th ult., that on the Portrush Railway to the Giant's Causeway, in Ireland, a tram-car driven by electricity runs steadily at ten miles an hour, and but that the speed is limited by an act of Parliament, could easily do twenty-five miles. 'We took six tons the other day,' writes the chairman, up an incline of one in thirty five.' A heavy tram-car has been tried on the tramway to Acton, and worked admirably, drawing an omnibus holding fortysix people, at six miles an hour, for an outlay of six shillings and eighteen pence a day, against twenty-eight shillings required for the necessary horse power. The tram car is driven by Faure accumulators placed under the seat, as is also an electric launch, which now does fifteen miles an hour, with tide upon the Thames. Professor Ayrton also shows an electric launch, which now does fifteen miles an hour, with tide upon the Thames.
