her before, to the voeffect of my happy, and yielf with.

with my and I me, and I men followed for it. I afterwards, f the embarplunged, by

I em-

I employed the whole night in forming different projects, but could not determine upon-any; and whilst I was dreffing myself the next morning, I saw Mrs. Bonneuil enter, who came from my aunt to know how I was. An air of impatience, which I expressed on being so frequently disturbed, and some fighs that escaped me, occasioned her to tell me, that I was more uneafy than disordered, and that if I was willing to open myself to her, I should find her a discreet confidant; that I could not be unacquainted with her friendship for me, and she desired nothing so much as to prove her zeal; she said that she possessed the confidence of her mistres; that the knew all her defigns concerning - Vol. I. me.