Sir ARCHIBALD MAC-SARCASM's Speech.

F 41

" Mr. CHAIRMAN,

s

e

n

0

.

r

r

n

19

br

h

y

T HE principle and the form of your prefent confultation are both very acceptable to me, and I hope, it will terminate in bringing us all to aft as one man, that we may invigorate the measures of the state, and pursue, with undeviate spirit and firmness, the sum total of all the political views of a good subject, I mean, PRIVATE GOOD. For public good is nothing but an aggregate quantity of private good, the public being a continuous body compounded of private men.

Sir, a pernicious practice has of late been predominate among the Great, of refigning their tenures under the crown at pleafure. It is contrary to the fpirit of the Feudal Law, and if the example fhould defcend to the fervile part of life, our hirelings may rebel in like manner at a time, when we are not pecunious enough to emancipate them. It fhews you, Sir, that there was no relevant reafon for abolifhing the Feudal Law, under which there was a regular gradation from the perfect flavery of a vaffal, through the contracted liberty of his Laird, to the perfect, abfolute liberty or power of his prince.

G