What Sergeant Found.

Sergeant Thomas Bolton testified he had been called to the above number by neighbors, who heard Mrs. Gillan scream, and fall to the floor as her husband knocked her down. When he arrived on the scene one woman was holding Gillan back, while another was hathing wounds on the wife's head. Blood was found on the bed and floor, Sergeant Bolton said. Blood was found on the bed and floor, Sergeant Bolton said.

One of the women residing in part of the house gave evidence that she heard Mrs. Gillan fall to the floor when struck by her husband, and then she rushed into the room and interfered. At this point in the evidence Mrs. Gillan arose to her feet and indignantly informed the woman who had interfered on her behalf, that she was not telling the truth. As she insisted on interrupting Magistrate Graydon ordered that she be removed from the courtroom.

One London mailcarrier had a liquor circular for every house on his beat, and every other carrier had large bundles. One member of The Advertiser staff received six circulars asking for his custom. Every postman had his load and did not appreciate being the messenger boy for the booze men.

Tons of It Circulated.

"We have slugged tons of that stuff since last September, and we are not sorry that it will be over soon," said one postman. "But if the election comes on, it will be just as bad."

"The booze men are not going to be caught," said another mail-carrier. "They will probably send another lot of circulars in a few days, so that every house will have a price list, and all the information possible. It must cost thousands of dollars."

It is understood that there are about thirty dealers doing business in London from Montreal, Detroit, and Port Huron principally. Each has a mailing list covering practically every house in the city. Each will mail circulars, so it can readily be seen that the householder will not be overlooked in the next few days.

In the meantime, the letter-carrier is picking up quite a burden.
