REGARDING WINDOW DRAPERIES.

Have we of this generation better taste than people had a generation ago? Or does it just seem better taste because it is our taste?

There are many directions in which it seems to me that we, the people, as a whole, commit fewer offences against the laws of beauty and taste, but there is one matter in which I am sure we do better, and that is in our choice of window draperies.

Do you remember the heavy lace curtains that were the ideal of a generation ago? We didn't all have them in our parlors, to be sure, but the rich had them. The poor had cheap imitations, and the class between hoped to have the real thing someday when its ship came in.

And weren't they the most hideous, futile, dusty, unlovely things for which the heart of woman ever longed, or the labor of man was ever spent?

I am a great student of window draperies. By their curtains you shall know them is one of my firm tenets. I think there is nothing else about a house as seen from the outside that so surely indexes those who dwell within as the window draperies. And it is a great joy to me to see how the public taste is improving on this point.

To Be Pitted, not Blamed.

Recently I walked down one of the finest streets in one of our big cities, taking special note of the window draperies. I saw but three samples of the heavy lace curtains, and two of these were in houses whose general appearance was one which indicated that the occupants were probably using the same curtains they had 20 years ago and were therefore more to be pitied than blamed.

For the rest, there were many types of curtains, mostly of the sheer soft materials that fall in beautiful lines, do not shut out the sun, and give themselves readily to washing. A few had lace motifs in them but these were exceptions. Most of the upstairs curtains were muslin, many of them with the simple little ruffle edging.

And all this on a street where the homes must cost from 20 to 50 thousand dollars!

Taste More Important Than Cost.

I spoke of the window drapery as indexing the character of the dwell-which red and blue were made the predominant colors.

Enduring Fashions.
Of all these curtains the only ones that were costly were the yellow silk with the green overhangings. The blue gingham cost 20 cents a yard. There are some old fashions that I cannot believe we shall ever accept back. One is the skirt that almost touches the ground and makes walking an effort and gathers to itself a rich harvest of dust and germs. The other is the heavy, ugly, light absorbing lace curtain.

Nurse Gives Her Life in Devotion to Duty.

MADLINE ST. JOHN, CARING FOR PNEUMONIA PATIENTS, IS FATALLY STRICKEN.

Funeral services were held to-day in the chapel of St. John's Hospital, Long Island City, for Miss Madeline St. John, a nurse of the Hospital. Requiem Mass was celebrated by Father Higgins, chaplain of the Hospital.

Miss St. John had been one of the most efficient nurses at the hospital and was in charge of patients suffering from pneumonia. She was very successful in caring for them, and the hospital physicians say the recovery of a number of desperate cases was due entirely to her devotion to them. A week ago she was stricken with pneumonia. From the first the surgeons and physicians were fearful of the outcome, owing to her condition, produced by her long and faithful vigilance with the patients under her care. The best and most expert attention at the disposition of the hospital, was given her, but she succumbed.

Before she died Miss St. John requested that she be buried in the hospital and that her body lie in state in the parlors of the hospital. The services to-day were attended by the Sisters of St. Joseph in charge of the hospital, nurses and members of the medical and surgical staff.

Miss St. John was 24 years old. She was born in St. John's Newfoundland, and came to St. John's Hospital Training School a year and a half ago. Her mother, Mrs. Ellen St. John, accompanied her and lives at Forty-sixth street, Corona. She is survived by a sister in Manhattan and a brother in Chicago.—Brooklyn Standard.

The Father of the English Novel.

Henry Fielding, son of Lieutenant-General Edmund Fielding—called Sir Walter Scott, "The Father of the English Novel," was born at Shropshire Park, near Glastonbury, on April 22, 1707, and after an education at Eton—where Fox and Lytton were among his friends—he went to Leyden University, and remained there for two years, when his father's poverty compelled him to return to London. In his own words, he had to turn "either hackney writer or hackney coachman," so choosing the former alternative, he began to write comedies and farces; his first comedy,

"Love in Several Masques," was produced at Drury Lane Theatre in 1728, and from that time onwards he produced a constant succession of dramatic pieces—in 1733 composing no fewer than six. In 1735 he married Miss Charlotte Cradock, a Salisbury lady, noted for her beauty, and about the same time he inherited a Dorsetshire estate of £200 a year; but his improvidence soon wasted his small fortune. He took a little theatre in the Haymarket, but in 1737 the passing of the Licensing Act put a stop to Fielding's play writing and theatrical management, since the licences for his comedies were refused. He then resumed his legal studies, entering the Middle Temple was called to the Bar in 1740. In 1742 he made his debut as a novelist, when his first novel "Joseph Andrews"—originally intended as a parody on Richardson's "Pamela," appeared at this time, his wife, to whom he was passionately attached, died. He was limited, but he struggled to make a living by journalism. He married Mary Daniel, who had nursed his first wife, who had taken care of him. In 1748 the interest of Lord Middlesex and Westminster, 1754, Fielding resolved, under recourse under his complete diseases, to seek the warm waters of Portugal, and died at October 8th, following.
