His shoulders began slowly to shake,

of Clara.
The silent enjoyment of the joke lasted

The silent enjoyment of the joke lasted until the roof of a square white house, standing under the brow of a range of hills, and flanked by the gables of a huge barn, came in sight. Then he spoke again for the first time.

"There's the Farm," he said, with a jerk of his whip, and the horses, at the welcome sight, redoubled their speed, climbing the last ascent eagerly, with outstretched necks and straining muscles. The house was one of those generous, roomy, old-fashioned structures, white-painted and shuttered, with wide, square rooms within, that marked the abode of the well-to-do farmer all through New England half a century ago. They are rarer in New Hampshire than in Maine and Massachusetts, the stony soil keeping a tight-fisted on the hard-earned dollars, and frowning on all accumulation of wealth whether in "ever since he was that high. I rememhard-earned dollars, and frowning on all accumulation of wealth, whether in crops or capital. But this old homestead seemed to have been reared in a favor-ed spot; the pastures about it were smilingly green, with only a scanty sprinkling of the native rock, while the sprinkling of the native rock, while the ploughed fields showed a richer soil than they had yet passed in their drive. On the rising slope behind stood clumps of sugar-maples, and dark pine-woods shut in the enclosure on either side. Only one house, a farm of more modest pretensions, was in sight.

The green painted door stood open, showing a wide, low-ceiled hall running through the house, and on the broad stone step stood Mrs. Wheeler and her daughter, a shy, pretty country girl of rosy-checked eighteen. The former was was an old college chum of our young doctor—it comes sort of natural to call him so yet, though he's gettin' well along now. He never said nothin' to show, now. He never said nothin' to show, and I s'posed you come along with Mrs. Amory to look after the little girl, who was sort of ailin', he said. Thinks I, It'll be handy to have him in the house if Kekie should have a rheumaticky turn, or if I should be laid up with one of my sufferin' spells-and I never asked a question!"

Clara suggested that, in spite of her sex, she might be useful in these emer-

"Well, I declare, I don't know why not—and so that is the little giri? Pretty dear! she doesn't look very rugged. The mother is as handsome as a pictur'—is it long since she buried her husband?" this in a confidential aside to Clara, as they ascended the broad, low-stepped staircase to her rooms. A hair-cloth sofa stood on the landing, and on either side were great square, sunny rooms, with high, black wooden mantels, and with high, black wooden mantels, and many-paned windows, letting in a glorious view of the wide, billowy landscape, and the blue range beyond.

"Yes; it is a very pretty country." said Mrs. Wheeler, throwing the shutters wide open and looking out complacently on their broad acres. "Some folks say the Lord has prospered us beyond our neighbors. The farm does lie in a rich streak of land, I know, but that isn't all there is to it. Some of our own folks has farms right alongside—Zekle's has farms right alongside—Zekle's brother Charles, in that yeller house you passed on the road—but they never made out to get along very well!" She threw a sharp glance at her daughter who stood bashfully in the corner, and paused for breath stood bashfully in the corner, and paused for breath.

"You have known Dr. Stephen Forbes a long time, I believe?" said Gladys, with the winning sweetnes of tone that never failed to captivate all who came near her. "He spoke of you all very warmly, and said he was here years ago."

"Oh, he!" said Mrs. Wheeler. with a short laugh, expressive of unspeakable appreciation. "Yes, he came here fust, years ago. He was walkin through the mountains with a lot of young doctorshe wasn't so fleshy then to look at as he is now. He stopped here for a fortnight, and it seemed as if he couldn't make enough of the place. Know him! Oh! we're not likely to forget him here, I tell you, though we don't see him very often. He don't seem to change much between whiles, though, if he does look older."

"Then he has been here lately?"
"Bless you, only last week! He fetched a lot of rugs and things;" Mrs. Wheeler indicated the Turkish rugs spread here and there over the straw matting which Gladys had already noticed with wan-

'Well, Dr. Stephen, says I, 'I'll do my very best by 'em, as I would by any friends of yours, and they must take us as they find us. We're plain folks, but we're hearty, and I hope they'll feel at home.' But here I am talkin' you to death, and you fit to drop, I daresay!" drop, I daresay!" And the good dame bustled do wnstairs, carrying the pretty Nancy in her train.

"Why, you didn't suppose these were indigenous to New Hampshire soil, did you?" said Clara, pointing to the rugs, as their mistress closed the door. "I noticed them the moment we came in, and, when I spied these books, I had no further doubts as to the source from which they came." She pointed to a little what-not in the corner, covered with books in suspiciously new bindings. Gladys bent to examine them, opening at the fly-leaf of the first she took up, on which "Stephen Forbes" was written in the well-known hand: Froude "Carlye," Emerson's "Nature," Miss Woolson's "Anne," Mrs. Browning, the last "No Name" novel, Longiellow, Philip Gilbert Hamerton's "Painter's Camp."

"Just the books, old and new, that we have left out of our box of summer reading," commented Clara, "and a pretty good selection for a busy doctor! What a treat I shall have here in lazy reading! Well, Gladys, I will leave you and Amy to your toilet, and go to my own quarters across the hall. Isn't it a charming old country abode?"

Downstairs it seemed quite as attract ters across the hair. Isn't it a charming old country abode?"

Downstairs it seemed quite as attractive to the city-bred eyes. There was a homely "settin'-room," as Mrs. Wheeler termed it, on one side of the front door, the great open fireplace full of suggestions of winter comfort. Hardy flowers preceded in at the windows and a tall old-peeped in at the windows, and a tall, old-fashioned clock ticked away the sunny hours in the corner. Out of it opened the great kitchen, with heavy rafters overhead, dresser and corner cupboards, and the brick oven before which Mrs. Wheeler seemed to be forever officiating as priest-ess. The little parlor on the other side ess. The little parlor on the other side of the hall was less attractive, as it contained the family aspirations in the direction of modern furniture—a Brussels carpet, a parlor organ and a Franklin stove. Then came the dining-room, consecrated to the use of the guests, and beyond a cool perspective of milk-room and pantry, with yellow-painted floors. Outside, a little vine-wreathed "stoop" afforded a snug retreat for hammocks or lounging chairs, and an enchanting peep of the far-away snow-capped mountains closed the view.

there's no one left but father and Nancy and me. George and James are in Vermont, stock-raising, and nothin' would do for Ben but goin' out west. Cerinthy and Susan are married, and Ezra-well, he's to Brunswick at college. You tell 'em about Ezra, father."

"He was always a great hand for books," began Mr. Wheeler, in the slow, ponderous tones which contrasted amusingly with his wife's rapid utterance, "ever since he was that high. I remember when Dr. Stephen fust came here "ever since he was that high. I remember when Dr. Stephen fust came here on his student tramp; the little fellow set there in the corner on the settle, porin' away over sonthin' he'd got hold of, and never stirred when the other boys got round to hear the gentleman talk. Presently the doctor went up to him and put his hand on his shoulder, and asked, in that hearty fashion of his—jes' as he speaks now—'What book have you there, my boy?' "Plutarch's Lives," sir, says Ezra, never lookin' up, 'and it's jes' splendid!' There warn't any very good schoolin' for the boys then, without they quit home altogether, and I couldn't showing a wide, low-ceiled hall running through the house, and on the broad stone step stood Mrs. Wheeler and her daughter, a shy, pretty country girl of rosy-cheeked eighteen. The former was of the lank, sallow type common among New England farmers' wives; she spoke in a plaintive monotone, somewhat amusingly in contrast with her rapid movements and the volubility of her utterance, as she welcomed them with awkward kindliness, "Well, I never!" she ejaculated, in response to her husband's introduction to Dr. Martyn, "I never though but you was an old college chum of our young doctor—it cemes sort of matural to call him so yet, though he's gettin' well along though I donno as he'd have got along, though I donno as he'd have got young doctor. Ses he, 'I do believe in a boy follerin' out his own tastes,' ses he and most of us needs a little push to start off with. He's shouldered up Ezra all through, and it wouldn't be any great of a surprise to me if I saw the lad a Bowdoin professor before I died- He's the stuff they make 'em of. Oh, yes, marm, you've come to the right place to hear about the young doctor if he's a friend of yourn—no mistake about that!" [To be Continued.]
