He went on to say that, in his opinion, the war now should not last very long, because the British warships, outnumbering those of the German fleet by nearly two to one, would be able to prevent Germany getting in food supplies.

All night, following the announcement, the commanding officer of the military division was on the qui vive, expecting every moment to receive word from Ottawa to mobilize the militia units. No such word came, but the consensus of opinion is that it must come before long, probably some time today.

When it does come, the response will be immediate. Already regiments all over the division have offered their services through officers, and the only doubt existing in the minds of any of them is as to whether they may be passed over. Certain it is that all will not be wanted or accepted, and those who are left behind will count themselves the unlucky ones.
