MARRYING AN HEIRESS.

The twilight, stealing softly through the heavy silk window draperies of the library at Abbott Court, became transformed into a sort of crimson duskiness—the clear, low burning fire glimmered, like coral, all agiow—and the two ruddy sparks that betoken the whereabouts of the two gentlemen and their cigars, shone steadily from the cushions and chairs on either side of the solitary dollar in his purse and rejoiced in spirit!

The lessons commenced the very next day—but at about the third one, Mrs. Audley's blue ribbons and plump face once more made their appearance.

"Now I'm going to be politely dismissed," thought our hero, with a cold chill at his heart! But no such ill-fortune awaited him. the cushions and chairs on either side of awaited him. the hearth. Dinner was just over-the clock in the hall had chimed seven-and Mr. Abbott and his distant cousin and adopted son were alone together.

'My dear Gerald, you must be crazy,' said the elder gentleman in a tone of great, though repressed irritation. "My dear Mr. Abbott, I never was more sane in my life !" "But just look at the advantages of the thing! I tell you she is young and pretty,

"Pshaw—nonsense: and Berkeley and I have both sat our hearts upon it!"
"Mr. Abbott, I would rather walk up to a cannon's mouth than have a wife thrust at me in that sort of way—it is repellant to every manly feeling of nature."
"I only ask you to see her, Gerald—she is coming to New York in a week, and—" dewed spots, taking down various memoranda from the advertising columns of the newspaper.

"Among all these 'wants' I should think I might manage to satisfy one or two at least," he exclaimed gayly to himself as he rose. "At all events, I am ready and willing to work."

"Jones & Cobb," the first place, looked dubtously over their four-spectacled glasses at the young applicant; "they could not think of employing a young man who could not bring solid references from his last place."

"Solomon & Co.," the next on the list, "wanted no raw hands," and politely motioned Gerald to the door.

"Parker & Swiff," a gift enterprise establishment, required a deposit of $100—an item Gerald did not happen to possess.

"Markham & Markham's" light and easy place, turned out to be that of a heavy porter; and the "splendid opportunity to realize a fortune," in which Gerald had unsciously built many hopes, was to peddle from door to door a newly-invented variety of blacking.

Footsore and weary, the young man residence in the satisfy one or two dates of the wanted to the door.

"Brit I have, sir," said Gerald, and back again. "Surely you have never——"

"To tell you the truth, Mr. Selwyn," said the resy matron, "my sister Adele is anxious to perfect herself in German, and I told her I was sure you wouldn't object to her joining the class—"

"Hurrah! Won't it be jolly for Aunt Adele to study with us!" bawled Harold.

"Harold, be still!" said his mother, despairingly. "Tom, if that chair should alip, you would fall headlong into the fire!"

"I shall be happy to have the lady join our class," said Mr. Selwyn, picturing to himself a spectacled old maid devoted to inky fingers and "belles lettres."

"It would be quite satisfactory, madam," said Gerald, bowing.
"Very well—I'll call Adele."

And Adele came—no spectacled maiden lady, but a beautiful little damsel of eighteen, with golden brown curls, eyes of the most limpid hazel and lips like twin cherries.

"And I shall take particular pains to leave town in a week!"

The elder gentleman fired up instantaneously.

"Gerald, I forbid you taking any such foolish step, at the peril of being turned out of my house!"

Gerald colored high. "Mr. Abbott, you have been very kind to me for years, I feel that I owe you almost a son's duty and allegiance—but in this matter I cannot be dictated to."

"Take your choice, sir," ejaculatedjMr. Abbott, who had now wrought himself into a passion; "either leave my house and protection, or comply with my wishes about this young lady; I give you until to morrow morning to think it over."

Gerald was silent; he could not trust himself to speak—and it was a relief to him when Mr. Abbott rose, and left the room.

The next morning, when the coffee and newspaper was brought in, no Gerald made his appearance, only a note instead thanking his benefactor for the uninterrupted kindness of years, and announcing his intention, for the future, to depend on his own exertions for a livelihood, rather than to contract a marriage, so opposed to all his wishes and predilections!

Mr. Abbott read the note through, with a contemptuous "humph!" then tore it in little pieces.

"Gerald laughed, he could not help it: and thus melted away all the formality of their first meeting!

Adele was the most charming pupil in the world—ready to learn, quick to comprehend, and invaluable in repressing the noisy spirits of the three boys, who one and all idolized "Anut Adele," and would even commit the sacrifice of keeping still for five consecutive minutes to oblige her.

So the lessons went on, for two or three weeks, and one night Gerald Selwyn, walking home by the dusky glimmer of the winter twilight, checked himself suddenly in the middle of the street.

"It's dangerous," he muttered, between his set teeth. "By Jove, it's as danger winter twilight, checked himself suddenly in the word—ready to eleave most on, for two or three weeks, and one night Gerald Selwyn, walking home by the dusky glimmer of the winter t

Tommy, Raymond and Harold were duly introduced, and their mother at once explained the difficulty of obtaining sufficient attention at the school they had been attending, and her many perplexities as to the best mode of teaching their young ideas how to shoot.

"They are such and rebals that the governess can do nothing with them, and really, Mr. Selwyn, I sometimes think they will grow up as ignorant as three young savages! A dele advised me to advertise for a tutor, an excellent idea, I'm sure—and—and as for terms—"

She hesitated and looked piteously at the tutor, unaware that Master Raymos was surreptitiously drawing all the hair pins out of her chignon.
