Help wanted to repair Greece's environment

A lack of environmental controls during post-war development has left a few damaged regions in the midst of Greece's pristine expanses. While popular support exists for environmental issues, in practical terms Greece continues to lag behind some of its fellow European Union (EU) member states in environmental protection. Current controls typically reflect minimum requirements stipulated by the EU. The total market for environmental equipment is estimated at US$260 million (1998) of which almost 60% is imported.

Overview

Greece produces close to 5.5 million tons of solid waste each year. Legislation governing waste treatment and
