It cannot be the players of to-day take greater chances of injury than the old-timers. The game is not enough faster than it used to be to make all the difference. There are those who contend the game is not so fast in some respects as it was 20 years ago, and that the players take no such chances to win. Without take no such chances to win. Without granting that contention, it is certain the players of those days were a hardlot. It may be the statements of the wise men are true that Americans are not as sturdy a race physically as they used to be. It may be that the fact a team carries so many substifact a team carries so many substitutes encourages players to give way to injuries and sickness which formerly would not have necessitated a restYet many players are too seriously injured to play even if no substitute was available. It is claimed for the New
