BUT why, if legislation is necessary and proper, should the principles laid down in this discourse lead to an entire prohibition of the traffic? I may now answer this question in a very summary way:—because society has a right to protect itself from one of the greatest—if not the very greatest, evils ever inflicted on humanity; because society should not protect such an evil by acts of legislation, or make that legal which good men are seeking to remove by moral means: because society should not attempt to regulate an evil, but should seek to remove it; because society has a right to make use of all proper means to prevent or remove an evil; and because, if necessary, in doing this, it has a right to render property embarked in a particular business, worthless, or to destroy it.—Rev. A. Burnes.
