WANDERLUST

A WEE little scamp, with the heart of a tramp, was scolded one day by his mother. He wasn't jes bad, but but the troublesome lad was constantly teasin' his brother.

When his maw threw a fit—well, it rubbed him a bit, and he pouted an' fretted all day. 'Twas just the same story. Said he, "They'll be sorry, 'cause now I'm fer runnin' away.'

The thought of it thrilled him. The wanderlust filled him with craving to hie down the road. He packed up a lunch that—while hiking he'd munch, and a broomstick completed his load. "Gee, maw's gonna miss me," thought he, "She can't kiss me tonight when I crawl inta bea." He planned to run far, where all naways are, but he sat on the curbstone, instead.

A thinkin' an thinkin', with eyes kinda blinkin', he jumped at the first supper call. The runaway threat was the kind all kids get—and his folks never knew it at all.
