It states that Cheshire has no parfrom the grass during its conversion

When grass is cut in the usual way and spread over the ground to dry, the art of the haymaker consists in drving water and san alike out of the grass, and then the out of the grass, and then the woody fibre is all the nourishment the hay is capable of affording. If miled cows thrive better and give more milk by feeding in the meadows than on hay, there should be some nutriment in the sap and julces of the grass; and if so, hay must be an improverishing diet, calculated only to sustain life, but not to keep up the daily supply of dairy produce. When the grass, instead of being stacked dry in a rick, is put into an air-tight receptacle, it is clear that not only must fermentation be restricted and made slower in its action, but that its chemical influences must be more perfected, and the changes in the nature of the food produced more thercughly completed. The ensilage should, consequently, be better or worse than natural grass according as those ultimate chemical conditions are suitable or unsuitable for the production of flesh, fat, or milk in the animals fed upon it. Briefly, the main distinctive changes appear to be the fermation of alcohol, acetic acid, and maltose. The effect of the former should be to stimulate the organic system and te retard the decomposition of the vegetable food in the stemach of the animals fed upon it. Be Kind. As stars upon the tranquil sea
In mimic glory shine,
So words of kindness in the heart
Reflect the source divine;
Oh then be kind, who'er thou art,
That breathest mortal breath,
And it shall brighten all thy life,
And sweeten even death.
