A Portentous Session.

The session of the Imperial Parliawill directly challenge the Government on the fiscal question by movough-going free traders on the Ministerial benches may go into the Opposition lobby in suffcient numbers to wipe out Balfour's majority. Even if the Government is not defeated, it may be that it will owe its life to the Irish Nationalists. The Irish party under the brilliant leadership of Mr. Redmond, has regained the position it held before the eclipse of Parnell. It stands chance. It cares nothing for the fiscal problem except in so far as it profits by the troubles which the tariff question has brought down on the head of the ministry. It will support the Government if the Government concedes its demands. It will support the Liberals if the Liberals will go the Government "one better." Not even on the home rule issue has there been such a tangle of party lines, such a riot of faction. There are protectionist Conservatives, who will stand by Chamberlain; free food Conservatives, who oppose Chamberlain but will support Balfour's programme of retaliation; free trade Conservatives, who forswear both Chamberlain and Balfour: Liberal Imperialists, who take their leadership from Rosebery; Campbell-Bannerman Liberals; and the Nationalists, who are for Ireland first, last and all the time. If it is true, as political philosophers say, that the success of the British parliamentary the laws of the new comsystem has been owing to the absence of faction and the existence of party, the present state of affairs is not comforting. Among purely democratic not in this class—an illustration of the evils of faction is found in France, where the Chamber of Deputies is split into half a dozen or more political groups. Stable government is impossible, and cabinets, which can only be formed by a compromise of antagonistic principles, such as the present alliance of the Socialists and Moderate Republicans, are liable to be upset at any moment by a similar process-by the combination of two or more groups having nothing in common. In Great Britain there is the prospect that when and several presented themselves as the fiscal question is finally disposed of, the old party lines will form again.

British Army Reform.

The report on the British military system by the royal commission under the chairmanship of Lord Esher is a smashing document, which will gladden the hearts of the reformers and restore public confidence by showearnest. "The war office has no thinking department" is one of the palpable hits by the commission. It advises revolution in methods extending to every branch of the service. The one great achievement in the South African war, for which the war office can take credit, was the transportation of for itself. The latter holds the baltime without a break-down in the system. This feat could not be paralleled by any other power, and is a grand evidence of Great Britain's maritime supremacy. The fatal weakness of the British military organization was revealed in the unpreparedness for a campaign caused by the deficiency of the intelligence department. The strength and resources of the Boers were absurdly under-estimated; there were no adequate war maps; and as the report points out, a disastrous gap lady. existed between the political negotiations leading up to the war and the military preparations for it. The commissioners formulate a scheme by which the cabinet and the war office will be co-ordinated in an army council, which will include the I'rime Minal and two military officers, two nomi- to the aid of the sugar factories, probably a representative of the col- there having been run at a loss. The office of commander-in-chief will be port on the military forces and their efficiency. The army as well as the war office is to be reorganized. The army as well as the crop late in the fall is bound to interreport strikes at the present system fere with other necessary work. These root and branch, and is a complete reasons account for the short supply, and for the determination of the revindication of the critics who have been assailing the Government since the supply is not forthcoming this year.

In an interesting letter in the Toronto Globe, Mr. Buriss Gahan, who has been in Australia for two years. describes the operation of woman suffthe unique feature of the result was which won almost a third of the seats in the House of Representatives, the remainder being divided equally between the Ministerialists and the free trade Opposition. The two facts may or may not be related as cause and effect. It was predicted that the wives and daughters of workingmen would vote and the women of other classes hold aloof, but the reports are that all classes swarmed to the polls. Women were eligible for membership in the Senate or the House of Representatives candidates, but failed of election. The only safe deduction that can be drawn from the experiment, and it is one favorable to female suffrage, is that women showed a general disposition to hand leg." avail themselves of the privilege of voting. This is an answer to the charge that women would not be sufficiently interested to poll their votes if they had the opportunity. It may be, however, that the novelty of the thing appealed to the feminine nature, and that one election is not a conclusive test. The limited experiments in the Western States have not thrown much light on the question. The political situation in Australia is very much complicated by the result of the election. The Ministerialists are for protection and preferential trade; the Opposition for free trade or a revenue tariff, and the labor party is ance of power in both Houses and is in a position to dictate to either party.

Now, in fancy, comes my mother, As she used to, years agone, To survey her darling dreamers, Ere she left them till the dawn;

Oh! I see her bending o'er me,
As I list to this refrain,
Which is played upon the shingles
By the patter of the rain.

With her wings and waving hair, And her bright-eyed, cherub brother-

A serene, angelic pair!

That subdued, subduing strain
Which is played upon the shingles
By the patter of the rain.
