THE SMILING DOLLY.

I whispered to my Dolly, And told her not to tell (She's a really lovely Dolly— Her name is Rosabel).

"Rosy," I said, "stop smiling. For I've been dreadful bad! You mustn't look so pleasant, As if you felt real glad!"

"I took mamma's new earrings— I did, now, Rosabel— And I never even asked her— Now, Rosy, don't you tell!"

"You see I'll try to find it Before I let her know; She'd feel so very sorry To think I'd acted so."

Still Rosabel kept smiling; And I just cried and cried— And while I searched all over, Her eyes were opened wide.

"Oh, Rosy, where I drop it I can't imagine, dear!" And still she kept on smiling— I thought it very queer.

I had wheeled her 'round the garden In her gig till I was lame; Yet when I told her my trouble, She smiled on, just the same!

Her hair 'dawned down her shoulders Like silk all made of gold. I kissed her, then I shook her, Oh, dear! how I did could!

"You're really naughty, Rosy, To look so merry when I cry. When my mamma's in trouble I never laugh; not I!"

And still she kept on smiling. The queer, prying child! I shook her well and told her Her conduct drove me wild.

When—only think I that car ring Full out of Rosy's hair!— I saw I had dropped the darling. I must have dropped it there.

She doubled when I saw it, And almost hid her head. Again, I whispered softly, And this is what I said:

"You precious, precious Rosy! Now, I'll go tell mamma! How I was—so sorry! And oh, how good you are!"

"For, Rosy, I hadn't lost it— You know it all the while. You knew I'd taken it over, And that's what made you smile."

CHAPTER I.

A HUMAN MYSTERY.

Time: eight o'clock the last day of May, 1871. Place: 97 Anderson street, Boston; city and number correct, street name fictitious for reasons to be explained hereafter.

Three human beings packed from collar to toe in the most crowded of the city's tenements, and yet each of them was a man without a peer in the city.

The first of these was a man of middle age, with a face that was a study in itself. He was a man of the world, and his eyes were full of the knowledge of life.

The second was a young man, with a face that was a study in itself. He was a man of the world, and his eyes were full of the knowledge of life.

The third was a young woman, with a face that was a study in itself. She was a man of the world, and her eyes were full of the knowledge of life.

The fourth was a young woman, with a face that was a study in itself. She was a man of the world, and her eyes were full of the knowledge of life.

The fifth was a young woman, with a face that was a study in itself. She was a man of the world, and her eyes were full of the knowledge of life.

The sixth was a young woman, with a face that was a study in itself. She was a man of the world, and her eyes were full of the knowledge of life.
