"Never make people laugh. If you vice to a young and ambitious me of parliament is quoted in Ralph Nevill's "Mayfair and Montmartre," Michael Dane writes in the continental edition of the London Mail. It is advice which every young man who wants to make himself a great figure in the world must take to heart, and act upon.

When I read that instruction thought at once of a man whom I was He was a member of parliament. Al-though few realized the fact, there were in the heart of him some flaming enthusiasms, some determination ing entitusiasms, some determinations to right wrongs, and to make for the following generations a better world than his own pampered youth had known. He was a man who might have made this world a better, saper and cleaner place to live in—but com-paratively early in life he had made the mistake of displaying himself as

That man was the late Spencer Leigh Hughes. There will always live in my mind the memory of one talk I had with him when, putting aside the cap and bells of the jester, he spoke of the things which lay near his heart, Maltby spent several days of last and I realized the nature of the man work in St John on business and who was usually so thoroughly disguised. He had vision and-which is tive mind. But he had shown him self to the world as a jester, and the world, which will never forgive a jester who turns from his jesting to serious affairs, compelled him to remain a jester to the end.

The world has so deep, so insatiable a need for laughter that it believes it cannot spare any of its clowns. It is compassed about with serious people, and it has a cranky belief that serious people are alone to be trusted with its serious work. But once a man has revealed his possession of a trace of the spirit of the clown it will not allow him thenceforward to appear as anything else.

You have only to look round the life of today to see how violently true this is. There is W. W. Jacobs. He began to write funny stories, and Canada, in the cities, towns, villages the world will take none but funny stories from him. In the "Monkey's Paw" he showed that he could equa Pink Pills have not been used and if not surpass Edgar Allan Poe in grimly tragic writing, but the world trom one end of the country to the other people sound their praise. Use for Old Boot Soles. Many devices have been suggested for the utilization of old army boot soles, the chief being concerned with fuel production. But a periodical, the Fertilizer, propeses to use them for stimulating the growth of beans and peas. The plan suggested is that of carbonizing part of the leather into lamp black and extracting sulphate of ammonia from the residue. It sounds rather like putting one's foot in one's mouth; but even that is a way of making both ends meet.—London Chronicle.
