CHAPTER XVII.

EVANGELINE ST. CLAIR.

"Tell me how it happened that I was not killed! Who saved me?" There were no persons in the room at this moment excepting the physician, Major Grant, and the woman who owned the cottage.

This woman was slightly deaf, and did not understand the question, and Doctor Lake did not know the name of the gentleman who had called for him in such haste. So Major Grant came forward, and bowing low, replied:

"I had the pleasure of saving you from probable death. My name is Grant—Mr. Grant of New York State."

"New York? Mr. Grant! It seems to me now that I once knew a Mr. Grant from New York; but I cannot remember; everything seems confused! Where am I now?"

Doctor Lake now came forward, and requested the gentleman to leave the room, and the lady to remain perfectly calm, as the patient seemed to be growing delirious.

"I forgot to thank that noble-hearted man for his kindness in saving my life, but he will come again, and then I shall tell him how deep my gratitude is," dreamily murmured the fair patient, over whose face a brilliant flush was stealing.

"It is the reaction coming on, and the most perfect quiet must be preserved. You will attend to her, I suppose?" said the doctor, addressing the woman.

"Yes, I suppose so, unless they can get a more experienced nurse," was the reply.

Major Grant, who was nervously awaiting the coming of the physician, contained only three rooms below heard the above conversation, and muttered to himself:

"She attend to that beautiful girl! Not a moment's delay! I will hire a competent nurse. Why, I wouldn't trust the child in her care on any consideration."

The doctor and the woman entered the kitchen, and softly closed the door behind them.

Major Grant asked:

"Have you learned her name? Her friends may be anxious about her."

Doctor Lake replied:

"I asked the girl where I should send word to her friends, and she answered: 'My name is Evangeline St. Clair, and I have no friends.' She seemed to be asleep now, and as I have patients in the city to whom I must attend, I would like it if you could take me back again."

"But you will ride out here again to-day? I feel anxious that everything should be done."

"Certainly, sir. I will attend to this case, which promises to be quite a serious one; and I will assure you that I will manage it with all the skill I can command."

"We will go now, if you please, Mrs. Sales. As you are not much skilled."

DOCTORS FAILED TO HELP HER

after assuring himself that there has been no palming.

"I say there are four," maintains the broker. "Will you give a guinea to the unemployed fund if I'm wrong?" "No, I won't; can't afford it."

"All right," says the broker, pocketing the coins; "it's off, then." This is naturally too much for the curiosity of the jobber.

"Well, go on; what's the trick?" he says.

The three coins are again produced and carefully arranged. "I say there are four," repeats the broker. "Will you give a guinea to the unemployed if I'm wrong?"

"Well, ye-es," promises the jobber, after again making sure his eyes do not deceive him.

"Then give it," concludes the broker; "of course I'm wrong."
