Some New Dishes for Hot Days

The entertainer who gives frequent parties should vary the too familiar chicken with others made of ham, clams, salmon (fresh or canned), of lobster, crab, and shad roe, from time to time.

Green peas simmered with a sprig of fresh green mint in the water, for flavor, make a pretty as well as an appetizing accompaniment,

Or serve the dainty with a thick cream sauce, to which peas are added. If there is one feature more than another of her little refreshment spread on which the modern entertainer expends her ingenuity, it is the question of frozen delicacies.

The block or rectangular mold of vanilla, chocolate or "Neapolitan," which was considered good form ten years ago, is now a thing of the remote past.

Combinations, delicate, delicious, for which each season brings fresh inspiration, are the suggestion of the moment.

Cafe parfait, itself so delicious, is now rendered more so by the addition of crystallized mint leaves. Serve in glasses, as usual, with the leaves (each broken in two or three pieces) sprinkled over the top.

When vanilla cream is served it is likely to have chopped marshmallows and crystallized fruits, minced fine, frozen in it. Each portion will be topped off with whipped cream and perhaps decorated with candied cherries. The marshmallows should be slightly softened in the oven heat first.

Among the delicious combinations of cold bonnes-bouches is Oriental cup. For it fill the lower part of grape-fruit glasses with a salpicon of diced fruits dressed with sugar and rum or sherry, according to taste. Above these, at one side of the cup (to half fill the remaining space), put a spoonful of vanilla ice cream, and at the other one of raspberry water ice. Top off the whole with a tablespoon of whipped cream, decorate with crystallized fruit, minced fine, or with candied cherries.

CHAPTER XIV.

Evelyn, ferried across the harbor by a boat's crew from the warship, boarded the Estremadura in almost regal state.

The vessel's cabin accommodation was poor, but the English girl was given of its best. Not every day does a small West African trader receive a passenger under the escort of a peer of the realm and a contain in the Powel New Its and a captain in the Royal Navy. It was an interesting moment when Rosa-mund Laing, accompanied by Figuero, off at once, but the lady, when it was too late to retreat, affected a blank indifference to Evelyn's presence that showed how conscious she was of it. She seldom appeared on deck, ate each meal in the seclusion of her cabin, and spoke no word, even to Lord Fairholme. On arriving at Lagos she hurried from the ship, and Evelyn breathed a sigh of relief as she watched her enemy go ashore. She did not carry her dislike of Mrs.

Laing to the point of imagining her to be in active co-operation with the plot-ters against British supremacy in that quarter of the world. It was far more probable that a rich woman who drew some part of her revenues from factories on the coast might be combining busi-ness with the desire to obtain news of Warden at first hand. At any rate, the girl fondly hoped they might never meet again, and she trusted to the strength of her own story, supplemented by a letter from Captain Mortimer to the Governor to place, her beyond the reach of misrepresentation.

But her troubles, instead of diminishng, became even more pronounced when she called at Government House. Both she and Lord Fairholme were entirely ignorant of local conditions. Neither of them knew that Lagos, though the chief West African port, and practically the only safe harbor on the Guinea Coast, was the capital of an administration quite separate from that of North and of South Nigeria. To reach Old Calabar, the headquarters of Warden's service, they must take a long journey down the coast and penetrate some forty miles into coast and penetrate some forty miles into the Niger delta. Captain Mortimer, in all probability, thought she was aware of this vital distinction, but, at the outset, keep their shape better if they are not Evelyn almost felt that she had undertaken a useless task.

Her manifest distress at an unpleas-ing discovery won her the sympathy of the deputy Governor of Lagos, his chief having crossed from the island to the mainland only the day before. But sympathy could not altogether cloak a skepticism that was galling in the extreme. He was fully acquainted with the position of affairs in the sister protections to be side. tectorate, he said. He appreciated Captain Mortimer's motives acquaint the Government of Nigeria with curious circumstances which or might not be connected with certain might or might not be tribal uneasiness in the Benue River districts, but the fact remained that all was now in that region.

"Owing to Captain Warden's unfortunate disappearance," he went on, "another commissioner visited Oku. He Dear Miss Grey: I am a young man found matters there in a fairly settled state. No. They misreed the motives of the Nigeria administration in curtailing Captain Warden's furlough—that is all. There undoubtedly were rumors of some border disturbances. The people in that region hinted that the Oku men were arranging what they term a Long Ju-ju, There was also a trading activity on the part of our neighbors that gave rise to unpleasant suspicions. To be forewarned is to be forearmed, and His Excellency the Governor regarded Cuptain Warden unfavorable symptoms have and Oku is now as quiet as Old Calabar, or Lagos itself."

"I am glad of it." she said earnestly. "It is far from my wish to figure as messenger of strife. May I revert to more personal matter? den has succeeded in crossing the Sahara, when and where may I reasonably expect to hear of him?"
