Moose Hunting.

Peculiarities of the Animal—Exciting Moments—Calling the Game.

All through northern Maine and Canada, hunters and guides are now busy in the woods calling the moose and thus endeavoring to lure it to its doom. The protection accorded to the animal in recent years has increased its numbers, and the signs of moose in the woods are more plentiful now than at any time in the last ten years, although in Maine the animals have gone deeper into the woods, so that a hunter must go far to get a good specimen. The season began in New Brunswick and eastern Quebec on Sept. 15th, in the western Quebec on Oct. 1st, and in Maine on Oct. 15th. Maine allows only six weeks for moose hunting, or until Dec. 1st, and only bulls having at least two horns to their horns may be killed. Few fine specimens have yet been brought in, the hunters who go into the woods for the big bulls not returning usually until near the end of the season. The later a moose is killed the better its condition, and the veteran hunters are now in a hurry to get the one animal allowed by law.

The beautiful dark coloring so much admired in the heads and skins of the moose becomes more appreciated with the advance of the winter season. This fact, so well known to old moose hunters, is the more remarkable, as almost every woodland neighbor of the forest is provided with a natural disguise in winter in the shape of a perceptible whitening of its hair or fur, which renders it comparatively indistinguishable from the surrounding snow. The caribou turns nearly white in winter, while the wolverine, the ermine and the hare become the color of snow. But the moose is the monarch of the forest, and needs no disguise. Its fawn head of grey that inhabits those northern regions.

While the glossy black of winter in the color of the bull moose is highly prized in the trophies of the chase, it is unwise for the hunter to tolerate the selection of his game until to late in the season, for then he may find that the best heads have been lost. There are some times when a head in November, generally December, and sometimes even January, is more valuable than a head in the summer. The older hunters are usually the first to shed their antlers. Some of the enormous horns shed by veteran bulls are occasionally picked up by hunters and others, who often are mounted by expert taxidermists with good effect upon heads from which other sets had been cast.

The life history of the moose is interesting. When the snow has left the ground entirely bare late in April or early in May, the moose migrate from their winter haunts and approach the marshes, ponds and rivers, where they search for their summer food. They are usually the first to shed their antlers there. Their favorite diet is the water lily on which they browse as soon as it makes its appearance on the surface of the water and dragging up the plant by its roots, and frequently keeping the head for a minute and more at a time under the water. When they cannot obtain the water lily they feed upon the rushes.

About this time, or a little later, the females go apart, seeking the most impenetrable thickets near or bordering on the water, and there bring forth their young. Antlers two years old never produce more than one at a birth. Those of three years old and upwards almost always produce two, and occasionally, though rarely, three. The young animals take to the water early in the season, and are never far from it. The season advances the moose frequent water more and more, often remaining in it for hours at a time in the heat of midsummer, not only to enjoy its cooling effect, but also to escape the plague of flies, from which they are great sufferers. There are huge insects that burrow deep into the flesh of the moose to lay their eggs. A heavy thunderstorm seems to attract them.

ford the arms of enjoyment to the moose. They swim back and forth during its continuance, apparently in a high state of delight. The female during her visits to the water hides her young with great care, to protect them from the voracity of the old males, who are unnatural parents and would destroy them. The mother generally selects a stump of large bushes, or a square thicket, which, from its density, prevents the male from reaching them. The horns of the bull begin to sprout in April and grow rapidly. Generally by September they have lost their mossy covering, or, in other words, are out of the velvet. At this period the males are frequently fat and generally fierce and savage, ready to attack man or anything else that stands in their way. In the course of a few weeks they grow thin and poor because of their continual coming and their constant fighting, and the fact that at this time they also refuse food. At this period the loud bellow of the male is frequently heard and distinguished by one having at a distance of two or three miles, in the stillness of the night. The bulls make another noise, which from the nature of its sound, the hunters call chopping. It is produced by rubbing together and separating the jaws in a peculiar manner. This, as the name implies, resembles the sound of an axe used at a great distance.

The call of a cow, which the hunter imitates usually through a horn or trumpet made of birch bark, is a series of grunts or groans, winding up with a prolonged, diastal, and rather unearthly roar, which in calm weather can be heard distinctly two or three miles away. One peculiarity of the moose is that he can go straight to the point where the call proceeds, even after a considerable time has elapsed, and without a repetition of the sound to guide him. Thus, after calling unsuccessfully all evening, hunters have known a moose to come straight to the place on the following morning from a distance of nearly two miles. From late September till the early part of November is the season for moose calling, and the full of thorn is the best time, for the bulls seldom come up to the call before sunset, and if the night be dark the hunter fails to see the game that has come to his call sufficiently well to be able to take aim. Most of the success in hunting moose by the call is had in the half hour between sundown and dark. Later than that, even with good moonlight, one cannot make sure of a bull. A still, frosty evening is best, for then there is less opportunity for a good scent. Many a moose is lost by his crossing the tracks of the hunter in his approach. For this reason, hunters are usually in a hurry to get from a canoe, paddled up and concealed in a little island or point on a lake or river. Sitting in a spot like this for the greater part of a high noon, they hear a severe tax upon the patience of the hunter, who may repeat his call at intervals of a quarter of an hour or so, and get no response but the more diastal roar of his diastal call, repeated here and there through the woods.

On the other hand, there is nothing more exciting than to hear a moose slowly approaching through the woods. The hunter is usually kept on the tip of his toes, expecting for half an hour, or even longer. The stillness after sunset is so profound that the slightest movement is distinctly audible. The sportsman hardly breathes, and when at last the animal comes out on the lake or opening within range, it is a grand moment if he has not delayed his coming till it is too late to see him. Sometimes the moose answers to the call much more readily than at other times. A young bull has been brought up by the sound of tearing the birch bark off a tree to make a horn. He heard the noise and came up doubtless taking it for the notes sometimes made by a moose in tearing bark from a tree with his horns.

The most successful callers of moose are Indians, and it is an education to hear their low, half-suppressed call which is sometimes needed to bring a wary old bull within range. These low calls, uttered when the moose is pausing, uncertain whether to come or go, close to the caller, yet not within shot, require the greatest skill. A call note and all is lost. The old bulls are migratory at this season, and fight desperately, and sometimes to the death. Instances are on record in which rival lovers, lured from different directions by the call of a cow moose or the hunter's counterfeits, have charged so violently upon each other that their horns have become interlocked and they have died without getting free.

—THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

The man who likes to make trouble for people with mathematical minds has handed in this one about how a man became his own grandfather. I married a widow who had a daughter. My father visited our house frequently, fell in love and married my step-daughter. Thus my father became my son-in-law, and my step-daughter my mother, because she was my father's wife. My step-daughter had a son. He was of course my brother, and at the same time my grandchild, for he was the son of my daughter. My wife was my grandmother because she was my mother's mother. I was my wife's husband and grandchild at the same time, and as the husband of a person's grandmother is his grandfather, I was my own grandfather.
