Between Britain and Argentina.

Canadian Press.

LONDON, Oct. 24.—A curious result of wireless tests between Great Britain and Argentina on a short wave length wave, was disclosed by William Marconi speaking at Central Hall, Westminster, last night. He said that his engineer Captain Pound, was using a 15 metre wave length, and one fifth of a kilowatt at the transmitting end, which is about the average length used by amateurs in their experiments, had found it not only possible, but easy, to communicate from Chelmsford, about 25 miles northeast of London, with Argentina during the daylight hours, while experiments were unsuccessful in the hours of darkness. Henceforth, it was pointed out, enthusiasts would not have to stay up all night to communicate with friends in other countries.

Sir Oliver Lodge, paying tribute to Marconi, complimented him on his new discovery that a long wave preferred the darkness while a short wave preferred the darkness while a short wave preferred light.
