Mr. Beatty on the Belvedere.

So far as his extra-parliamentary critics were concerned Mr. Beatty, M.P. for West Toronto, had his peace until he came to the conclusion that silence had ceased to be a virtue.

The Manifesto to his constituents is a strong and sweeping denial of the charge of hoodlumism so freely made against him, and it is only fair to admit that he makes out a good case in favor of the contention that the entire transaction was in the nature of an ordinary railway deal, such as has often been made in both Toronto and Ottawa.

Mr. Beatty is saved upon his fellow Tory and wicked partner, Mr. Woodworth, whose statements he unequivocally denies. In Toronto, at least, Mr. Beatty's word will carry more weight than Mr. Woodworth's, and those who accept the former's denial will be constrained to conclude that acceptance with a regret that so good a man should have had such wicked partners. Mr. Beatty's moral training and religious bent should have sufficed to protect him from compromising association with men of sin.

He does not require to be told that had company in chambers, and that neither man nor woman who is seen in such company can expect to be regarded as Cesar's wife ought to be.

Through Mr. Beatty does not say so in his proclamation, it is on the cards that he will again be a candidate for West Toronto, with his party's endorsement if he may, without it he must.

No More Gas Wars.

Such is the word we get from New York, that all eyes are turned to the success of electric lighting as a thing established beyond doubt, and the gas men are showing their colors accordingly. Instead of fighting the electric light, and crying it down, they are now trying to get hold of it. And, as gas men are mostly men of wealth, they are ready at any time to pick up electric stock wherever it is for sale. But they are doing more than this; they are to a large extent turning their own investments from gas to electricity; or, rather, they are adding the latter to their business, without letting go of the former.

The Toronto case with regard to the future of electric lighting there is a revolution of opinion among the foremost gas men of the country. After this will be their policy. They apply their capital freely to the development of the electric light, while still holding on to the gas. In other words, they will have two strings to their bow, and will be prepared to make money on either.

More than ever, when reform elevates him, does the honorable man remember his friends, because he can now efficiently reciprocate past services.

The post prophetic is not for an era but for all time. Therefore, boys, take off your coats and hustle for an "honorable man"—several of them will be in the market for a long time to come. Remember his friends who will depend upon the way said friends work the concession lines. We shall see history repeat itself, but we cannot guess who will get the shabby.

Stand Firm Under.

Just of late Irish landlords, not a few, are showing themselves disposed, not merely to make reductions of rent, but to sell out to their tenants for good. Land to rent in Ireland is a troublesome kind of property, and who knows but that some day its value (to the landlord) may disappear altogether. But if the land is turned into cash, then the holder has a sure thing, and may invest anywhere to suit himself. Fifty per cent. income from some sure and quiet source may to many a landlord appear better than a nominal hundred pounds, liable to be intercepted by Lord Langens and moonlighters. "Stand firm under" appears to express pretty truly the idea which is uppermost in the mind of many an Irish landlord to-day.

Some Irish landlords there are, however, who can find no such ready resort to their difficulties. These are they whose possessions were mortgaged long ago on old time values, as figures far above what can be obtained to-day. Suppose the lands sold now there would not be enough to pay the creditors, while, as for the owners, nominally so called, there would be nothing left for them at all. The creditors in such cases are mostly London money-lenders, who have long ago paid themselves, through the execution of exorbitant interest, principal and interest, and now besides. When settling-day comes, the claims of these poor, old-time money-lenders will not be very tenderly dealt with. "Stand firm under" is the motto for them, with regard to claims of landlords and mortgagees of Irish land.

With all their admirable qualities, the people of the south of us are far away behind in the matter of moral reform, that is to say they are struggling toward an objective moral point that we reached long ago, not that they are quite so moral as we are, in both the abstract and the concrete, outside of the circle of their great cities, which are greater than ours are. Instance the struggle their moral reformers are making for the closure of bar rooms on Sunday. This provision passed that point long ago, under the Crofton act, which

ROBBING WORKMEN.

A Society is Now Formed to Prevent It.

Joseph Howard writes from New York to the Boston Globe: "I have many good words to spend for the Women's Protective Union, which undertakes to collect money due working girls. I don't indorse all the union dues, and some of the methods are not nice, but for what it does well it should be praised."

The trouble which working girls experience and the personal danger they risk when they attempt to collect their long-owed wages is illustrated in the case of a dressmaker, to whom was due $2.50 for a week's hard work. The girl had been sent home with a dress, on which she was to collect $2. It appears there was some old trouble between the woman who received the dress and the boss dressmaker, and the former refused to give back the dress to the girl, or pay the $2 demanded. So the poor girl, weary of waiting, and with a sick father depending on her for support, she could not see her father, and she applied to the union.

The dressmaker was sent for, but she said that she was not making any more dresses, and she was not making any more dresses, and she was not making any more dresses.

In a few days thereafter the father, pale and trembling, and his daughter with her hair matted and her face haggard, appeared at the office of the union, and told the story of the girl's case. The union, and the girls who were with her, went to her home, and found her in a state of despair. She had been sent for, but she said that she was not making any more dresses, and she was not making any more dresses, and she was not making any more dresses.

There is as much as in negro society here almost as in white society. The better educated and better bred have little to do with the ignorant, and with those whose blood they do not think so pure as theirs. They have their balls and their parties, their literary societies and their social clubs, and they enjoy life in much the same way as their Caucasian brethren.

The negro form of the servants of Washington, and colored girls, and so on, are everywhere, and they make the best of their situation, and they are not to be despised. They are everywhere, and they make the best of their situation, and they are not to be despised.

Some of these little stores are in tumble-down buildings, and they are everywhere, and they make the best of their situation, and they are not to be despised.
