

In conclusion, I may state that as a result of more than fifteen years of experience, devoted exclusively to the study (under exceptionally favorable conditions) of diseases of the nervous system, and of which these functional cases formed a large quota, I am convinced that for the true prophylaxis of acute insanity we must look to the general hospital, and that this result will be best accomplished here by the formation of neuropathic wards, especially equipped for the purpose.