BY SPECIAL WARRANT OF APPOINTMENT

Then he went out, and making his way to Regent Street, went into a jeweller's and bought a ring. The jeweller was an amiable long-suffering individual, used to the whims and vagaries of fashionable ladies; but this customer of his tried his patience sorely. Cyril was worse than ten ladies and more difficult to please.

At any rate,' he concluded, 'I am bound in honour to keep her confidance, so here goes with No. 2!' and he tore the letter and envelope into fragments as he had done the first.

Unsatisfactory as it was, he felt that he could trust Cicely Stanhore, and that the mystery of the midnight visitor would be cleared up.

What does a man do when he is in love and in London, and his mistress, with whom he is longing to be, is miles away?

Cyril wished someone would

He went back to the hotel, and amused himself for a little while in ordering his dinner and looking at the papers. But he found the papers qu te stale and uninteresting compared with the thoughts which mastered im; and when the dinner came, he d scovered that he was too restless and unsettled to care for it,

With this in his pocket he wandered about London, thinking of Leola -wondering what she was doing at that moment-torturing himself by imagining all kinds of harm and evil to her, harm and evil which he, of course, could ward off if he were near.

Then he went back to his hotel, and ordered tea; but no sooner had it been put on the table then he thought he would call on Mr. Ford, and hurried off to his offices

Of course they were closed, and he came back to order tea again.

The waiter thought that he was either out of his mind or that he was a criminal fleeing from justice. The rest of the evening Cyril smoked and As he stood on the step Cyril heard read the papers-that is, pretended the heavy chain put in its place again, to do the latter, for all he read on the

Now, though he had only half expected one, he at once, with the un reasonableness characteristic of the passionate lover, felt aggrieved, and looking at the Bradshaw determined to go back to Lorme.

Then he thought of the appointment he had with Mr. Sturge, and the still more important appointment with Mrs. Thompson, and reluctantly resolved to remain until the next But not another day to solve the greatest mystery in the kingdom,' he said. 'If she, my darling, were here,' he mused, longingly, as he stared out of the window on the wet London streets, 'how happy we should be! Where wouldn't we go! What a delicious, delighted day we would snatch! But she is there, miles away, wondering where I am. This comes of anonymous letters! Oh, Cicely, why couldn't you speak right out!'

The day passed, as the longest day will, and before seven o'clock Cyril As there was not much need for disguise now, he drove straight to the door and knocked boldly. There was no answer. He knocked again and again and again; the cabman lounging over the top of the cab, and enjoying his fare's discomfiture, as cahmen seldom do.

Ten minutes passed in this way, and then Cyril, with an impatient groan, concluded that Mrs. Thompson had not returned. What should he do? Wait. He Ilt a cigar, and tramped round the streets-the cab discreetly waited at a public house meanwhile-and then, after the lapse of half an hour, he came back and knocked again. Still no answer. But presently a window of the next house was opened, and a man looked down wrathfully at Cyril, demanding what he was knock-
