HELEN MOIR

—OR—
LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.
CHAPTER XXIII.

"You!—you Frank Oakley!" returned Mangles, in astonishment.

"Ah, you find me not a bit like what I was when you knew me—thin, spare, seedy, out at elbows; fast going to the dogs, and well helped on the road by you."

"I know, Squire, you were helped on the road there by somebody."

"By more than one," cried the Squire; "but Mangles here was one of the chiefs of the pack. Mangles, you know."

"Well—yes, I did win of you sometimes; I daresay," returned Mangles.

"If you do! Come, that won't do. It was by cheating you did it, Mangles, and if I had been to your tender mercies, I would by this time have been in a worse plight than even you are now, in this filthy den. But there stands the man who let me out of your clutches. Weggate, you know."

"Have you come to give me anything?" asked Mangles sharply. "You never answered my three or four last letters."

"How could you expect it?" retorted the Squire. "What claim had you on the man you well-nigh ruined; whom you would absolutely have ruined, had you not been thwarted? How had you actually the face to apply to me?"

"Necessity makes a man do much," said Mangles; "had this man not failed me, else, I would not have needed to apply to you or any man. But look at it. Do you think that hand can touch the one to pocket the balls? Worse than that, I haven't a leg to stand upon, the power has come from both of them, and here am I jaded here without a rap to keep my life in."

"Your own blame, Mangles, entirely your own blame," said the Squire, with ruthless severity. "Had you led a sober, honest, industrious life, you would never have come to this."

"Do you ever," based on the other in a rage. "Have you hunted me up to mock me by telling me that? If such is your game, you had better take yourself off very quickly. I'm in no humor to be laughed at."

"Don't be so hot, Mangles. Take things a little more easily," counseled the Squire. "Then, in truth, the stifling heat and horrid smell of this den are enough to make you irritable. Does not this rusty old window open in some way?"

"The window in question, which consisted of some nine panes or rather square panes, for most of them were broken and stuffed with rags—was disarranged, and firm and immovable in its socket. The Squire could not, therefore, open it, as he intended; but with the end of his stick poked out a quantity of the rags, and let in some of the purer light and sweeter air of the exterior."
