The Foster Brother:

The Orphan of the Wreck.

CHAPTER XI.

TILLEY'S REVELATIONS, AND WHAT THE

ter to understand the events now to be narrated.

The large west Indian trading ship Yarrow had just come safe to her moorings at the quay of Greenock, and her crew, with noisy glee, were making all safe preparatory to stepping ashore after their long voyage, when, amid the bustle and confusion, an elderly seaman, with long iron-grey hair and a kindly face, came up from below, leading by the hand a young negro girl poorly clad, who cast a shy and timid look on the scene around—the forest of masts, the quay thronged with people, and the crowded houses standing along the shore.

He led her to the gangway, and there came to a stand.

"Now, Milley, my lass, I can do no more for you," he said, as he looked sadly and anxiously at the ebony face before him. "I don't rightly know the whereasbouts of the part for which you have to steer, but I know you have a longish land voyage afore you, and you'll find it no easy matter to keep of the right track."

"Heaben bless you, Massa Jack. You been good, good to Milhey," replied the girl, the tears standing in her large round eyes.

"Not a bit on't, my poor lass," replied eyes.

"Not a bit on't, my poor lass," replied the tar, as he pressed the hand he held. "I've done no more to you than I was bound to do. I've a gal of my own, as is nigh about your age, and I thought what if she had been in your case, and had no one to look after her; so I took the convoy of you through the voyage, and didn't allow none o' my mates to harm you—that's all. And now, as I said afore, we have to part company, and I hope with all my soul as how you'll get safe to the end of your voyage."

"Oh, tank you, Massa—tank you bery much. Milley not afraid. Milley find the way somehow to missus, and den I I be all right and happy."

"Hope you will, my lass—hope you will. You've had uncommon luck as yet, and it looks to me as if Providence had you is tow. Now look here, I've got a crown piece—the only shot in the locker till I get my pay—take it, it will help you on the road so far, and when it's done maybe you'll meet in with good Christian people to help you along."

"What dis for?" asked Millie, eyeing with wonder the large silver coin which Jack put into he hand.

"To hww sations and a berth at night." eyes.

"What dis for?" asked Millie, eyeing with wonder the large silver coin which Jack put into he hand.

"To buy rations and a berth at night as long as lasts," was the answer. "Get it changed for coppers at the first shop you come to, and do your best to spin it out. There, good-bye, my lass, good-bye, it changed for coppers at the first shop you come to, and do your best to spin it out. There, good-bye, my lass, goodbye."

"Good-bye, Massa Jack," returned the girl, and, with an impulsive gesture, she raised his tawny hand to her thick lips and bestowed several rapid fervent kisses. Then, with a sob and eloquent glance of thanks, she passed along the gangway and reached the quay, where, without again looking back, sought her way throught the crowd, shrinking timidly from the marked observation to which her color made her subject.

The honest warm-hearted sailor stood looking after her with moistened eyes, till her figure was lost in the crowd. Then, passing the back of his hand across his eyes, to clear their dimness, he dived hastily below, muttering—

"Poor thing. I've heerd it said as how the blackiemoors haven't the Christian feelings o' us white people, and haven' to be anything but slaves—but I don't know, I see no difference, only in their skin. Their hearts seem as good as whites, and I feel as I'd like to know that Milley got safe to the missus she loves so dearly. Anyhow, I'll miss she company, and it will be a while afore I get used to want her, for it did my heart good to take eare on her and have her beside me."

The appearance of this young negrogirl in the ship had been the great sensational event of the voyage. It was on the third or fourth day after they sailed from Kingston that she was discovered lurking in the hold, and, when dragged on deck and asked how she had come there, and for what purpose she tremblingly besought them to allow her to remain, and take her to Scotland, where her mistress had gone. As to allowing her to remain, there was no choice, for she could not now be put ashore, though the circumstance gave the captain no little annoyance, and all the more that he saw among the crew mideations of fur from Milley's presence.

It was then that old Jack Cousland stepped forward, and, touching his fore-lock, said he would take care of her in the ship, and this charge in the fold.

It was then that old Jack Cousland stepped forward, and, touching his forelock, said he would take care of her in the ship, and this charge he had-faithfully attended to; and now, the vessel having come into harbour, his task was ended, and they parted with such feelings as we have described.

Ten days later, Stephen Gibson was sauntering to and fro under the shade of row of trees, which, with the low hedge in which they were set, separated his garden and the grounds round his residence from the public road which intersected that part of Glenfask.

And as he sauntered thus, his eye fell on a dark and dingy figure coming slowly onward on the dirty road. The extreme darkness of this advancing form caused him to regard it with attention, and as it drew near he saw that it was an negrogiff. Such a being from another clime in that remote Aberdeenshire glem was such a rarity that Stephen could not forbear remaining where he was till she should go past.

Mr. Henry Maudsley says: "The full bear remaining where he was till she should go past.

Mr. Henry Maudsley says: "The full and healthy development of all the lower natural forces are indispensably pre-requisite to the existence of a sound and vigorous mind." Just so. Humanity requires the full equivalent of vital force in order for the free and potent manifestations of the mind. When we consider that Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites supplies the deficiency to unhealthy blood, restores the nervous elements, and produces healthy action to the various organs and forces of the body necessary to sound mind, we wonder at the imbecility everywhere apparent.—As a deficiency of healthy blood, or a direct loss of this fluid, are causes of the senses, and also of the nervous system generally, we can safely calculate on the disappearance of such unpleasant and dangerous disturbances as the condition of the blood improves.

Armers and stock raisers have frequity told us that they have seen very good results from giving Sheridan's Cavalry Condition Powders to cows and swine before and ster they drop their young. The powders put them in good condition, and give them strength to care and provide for their sucklings.
