HUNTING SWORD-FISH.

What Was Idle Sport Has Beccme Prefitable Business.

Norwich, Conn., Aug. 14.—The rare and thrilling sport and lucrative business, too, along the coast just now is that of killing sword-fish. To chase and harpoon sword-fish was, until less than half a dozen years ago, the sport exclusively of summer idlers at the seashore watering places; but since the world has learned to like the flesh of these armed pirates of the ocean, many 'longshore tishermen have found it flesh of these armed pirates of the ocean, many longshore tishermen have found it profitable to hunt them for the New England markets. New York alone either has not tested this fish for food or else rejects it, and it is said that not a sword-fish finds its way to metropolitan tables. In New England, however, it is esteemed to be second in merit only to bluefish, and a thick, savory, white, juey sword-fish steek is rated far more highly than a halibut steak. The fish are hunted in deep waters, about 20 or 25 miles southeast of Block Island, along the inner edge of the Gulf Stream. To these westers a little fleet of sword-fisher-25 miles southeast of Block Island, along it he inner edge of the Gulf Stream. To these waters a little fleet of sword-fishermen, smacks and sailboats bound away from the gray old port of Stonington, in the southern part of this county, once or twice a week, and return a few days later, their decks piled with the long, rakish bodies of from 15 to 40 sword-fish, each weighing from 250 to 400 pounds. The biggest fellows taken off this coast sometimes weigh 600 pounds, and rarely one is taken that weighs 800. Most of the fish are shipped direct to Boston, and one day this week not less than sixty-four fish, weighing that weighs 890. Most of the fish are shipped direct to Boston, and one day this week not less than sixty-fourfish, weighing from 250 to 400 pounds, were sent to that market from New London alone. Block Island also sends out a sword-fish fleet, which makes handsome catches, and Captain Frank Dodge, of the island, has successfully used a steam yacht in hunting them this week. He took twenty-seven big fellows on his first trip.

There is plenty of peril as well as hot excitement in taking one of the giants, since, mad with pain and rage, it often turns upon the harpoone, who goes out from his yessel in a rowboat to deal the finishing stroke to one that has been harpooned, after it has exhausted itself in furious rushes about the sea, and not infrequently it drives its sharp, slender sword through the craft and sometimes impales the boatman, A few days ago a sword-fish; emashed a Stonington rowboat belonging to the Mattie and Lena vessel, and barely missed piercing the body of its owner, who leaped swiftly astern. Several Block Island fishermen have felt the thrust of a sword-fish's weapon in their limbs, and owner, who leaped swiftly astern. Several Block Island fishermen have felt the thrust of a sword-fish's weapon in their limbs, and no longer ago than last summer a 400-pounder drove his sword through an islander's frail craft and pinned him by a thrust through his hips to his boat's side. Three years ago an islander was killed in the rush of one of the fish. The sword was driven up through the bottom of his craft, and it pierced the man's abdomen. Nevertheless, it is fine sport to the Southern Connecticut resorts and hunt the big fellows, and the city guests at Block Island are not cent until they have participated in a sword-fish hunt. Sword-fish are the natural guerillas of the sea. They are teady to attack anything that swims, even seafowl affoat; they glide stealthily upon their prey, their back fin alone showing above the surface of the ocean, and in the best of the ocean, and the stating blows, both above and below water, exactly as a trooper brandishes his or a covey of birds in a few seconds, and of the ocean was the reddened with the blood of their victims. It is the black bass, they slaughter more game than they can hope to devour, and after they have completed a conquest they
