"I—I don't know I wasn't looking," says Paula, rather confusedly. "Ain't you going to bed, Alice?"

"I think I will," says Alice, and she rises and comes toward the other two and looks down at Paula with a keen and yet thoughtful glance. "Is Sir Herrick coming here tomorrow?" she

"I-I don't know," she says, trying to speak carelessly. "He may, perhaps."
Alice draws her Indian shawl more closely round her and smiles curiously, "Good-night," she says. "Don't sit up too late, it is very late already, and you'll be quite pale tomorrow," and, taking a candle, she goes out. Bob fills another pipe and lights it, and Paula draws closer to him and lays her cheek on his knee, and there is silence for a few minutes. Shall she tell him tonight or shall she
