BEULAH POYNTER'S TRESSES

One of the first things that one notices about Miss Beulah Poynter, is her remarkable head of golden hair. It is unusually abundant, these great flowing tresses and they are unusually golden. They who are skeptically inclined, may view them with the most searching inspection for like Viola's beauty they are God's handiwork. Like most sensible women, Miss Poynter sees no excuse for tampering with nature's designs. While her work has not called for her to have anything but her natural hair, she believes that if a role should require it, it is easier and more proper to have recourse to a wig.

"They make them so well now," she said to an interviewer, "and in such infinite variety that a woman can change from a brunette beauty with raven tresses to a bald headed old man, in a few seconds, if she chooses to do so."

"The extreme abundance of my hair and its light, silky texture gives me considerable trouble in caring for it," she continued, "but since it is a source of pleasure to my friends, and more or less a professional asset, I am modestly proud of it, and take the very best care I can of it."

In playing Dora in "A Doll's House," it was particularly opportune as the girls of Norway are noted for their flaxen tresses. In "A Kentucky Romance," it serves the purpose of a contrast for the girls of the south, where the four acts are laid, generally have dark hair. On the stage, one cannot afford to overlook the aid of contrast even in small things.
