Fourth Prince and Duke of Wagram Descended From One of Napoleon's Most Brilliant Generals—Rich and Powerful Prince With Interesting Connection

(Copyright, 1911, by the Brentwood Company)
Alexandre Berthier who has just succeeded his father as fourth Prince of Wagram, has in his veins the Wittelsbach blood of the reigning house of Bavaria mingled with that of the Rothschilds. His mother belonged to that great Jewish financial dynasty, having been Bertha Rothschild of Frankfurt, and abandoned Judaism for Christianity on wedding the late Prince of Wagram.
The first Prince of Wagram was Alexandre Berthier, the most famous of all the generals of the first Emperor Napoleon. The emperor secured for his favorite Berthier a royal bride, in the person of Duchess Marie of Bavaria, of that illustrious branch of the Wittelsbachs to which the late Empress of Austria, the late Duchess d'Alencon, and the famous oculist, Duke Charles Theodore of Bavaria, belonged. Berthier, whose father had been ennobled by King Louis XV. in 1768, and which hailed from Versailles, was the hero of the battle of Wagram, and a leading actor in most of Napoleon's victories. In fact, Napoleon was wont to remark, in speaking afterwards of the battle of Waterloo, "All if I had only been defeated by Wellington."
Berthier, however, had killed himself just three days before the battle of Waterloo took place. His was a tragic end. On the overthrow of Napoleon in 1814, and his exile to Elba, Berthier, who had been created by Napoleon prince and Duke of Wagram and sovereign prince of Neuchatel, allowed himself to be persuaded by his wife, and by her royal relatives at Munich, to abandon the cause of the emperor, and to make his peace with Louis XVIII., who bestowed upon him the highest honors. Napoleon resented this more bitterly than anything else in connection with his overthrow. When he quitted Elba a year later, and resumed for one hundred days the possession of his throne in Paris, Berthier, who was in Bavaria at the time, felt unable to resist the longing to rejoin his old friend and master, and sent a message to ask whether he would receive him. While Napoleon gladly welcomed all his other former officers, without reproaching them for their desertion, not even Marshal Ney, he sent back an intimation to Berthier that he would only consent to receive him if he would appear before him arrayed in the uniform of the rank, and with the insignia of the Order bestowed upon him by Louis XVIII. On receiving this message at Bamberg, Berthier was so overcome with remorse, that leaving his wife and children, he threw himself out of one of the windows of the castle, killing himself instantly by the rocks over a hundred feet below.
Thanks to the influence of the widowed duchess's royal relatives, her husband's titles of Prince and Duke of Wagram were confirmed as French peerages, upon her boy Alexandre, though of course there was no question of his being constituted sovereign Prince of Neuchatel, a principality which was handed over to the King of Prussia, and which now belongs to the Swiss Republic.
Marshal Berthier's son and namesake, Alexandre, second Prince and Duke of Wagram, on growing up, married Zenaide Clary, niece of Queen Desree of Sweden, and also of the emperor of King Joseph Bonaparte, who lived so many years at Bordentown, N. J.
The third duke and prince who has just been laid to his rest was the son of this union. Until a few years before his death, the duke was in receipt of an annuity from the French government, amounting to almost $50,000 a year, bestowed upon his grandfather by Napoleon I. in recognition of his victories. But now the annuity, like all those others that figure on the "Grand Livre de France," as bestowed by Napoleon, have been commuted.
The new duke and Prince of Wagram is the Chateau of Grobois, in the Department of the Seine-et-Oise, within forty minutes by motor from Paris. It is a mistake to assert that the place was a gift by Napoleon, and there is no truth in the story, according to which it was given to the marshal for assuming the blame when Napoleon accidentally shot the eye of Marshal Massena, Duc de Rivoli, at a battle in the forest of Fontainebleau. Massena, who was perfectly sound to whom he owed the injury, had the presence of mind to immediately turn upon his comrade, Marshal Berthier, and hit him in the latter for "infernal carelessness," while Berthier, taking the cue, instantly acknowledged that he was at fault, and expressed his deep contrition. Napoleon having the incredible impudence to also abuse him for his stupidity.
The fact of the matter is that Grobois, a grand old place, built of brick and stone in 1690 by Samuel Bernard, and surrounded by a superb park, full of majestic trees, was confiscated by the Revolutionary Government in 1793, put up for auction, and purchased by the Dictator Barras. Barras sold it to General Moreau. When the latter was arrested in connection with his alleged complicity in the Capetian conspiracy against the life of Napoleon, he eventually retired to Grobois, the condition of his leaving the country, he transferred his Grobois property to his mother-in-law, Mme. Helyet, who sold it to Fouché, Duke of Otrante, and minister of police. It was from him that Marshal Berthier purchased it for a sum of $ million francs, although it is worth today at least five times that amount. It is full of the most interesting relics of the first Emperor, and of the Napoleonic era, including some loot brought back from the Kremlin at Moscow by Marshal Berthier on the occasion of the disastrous retreat in 1812.
The new Duke and Prince of Wagram is unmarried, very rich, about twenty-eight years of age, and is a first lieutenant of the 11th Regiment of infantry. He has two sisters; one of them married to Prince Jacques de Broglie, son of that Prince Armand de Broglie who was Marie Say, heiress of the French sugar king; while a brother of Jacques de Broglie is that Prince Robert de Broglie whose unsavory performances in the United States contributed so much to bring discredit upon his historic name.
Another sister of the new Prince of Wagram is the wife of Joseph de La Tour d'Auvergne-Lauraguais, whose right to the name of La Tour d'Auvergne, and to the title of Prince, are open to very serious question, and are contested by leading genealogists and experts.
In connection with the announcement of the death of the late Prince of Wagram, and the succession of his only son, the sole male survivor of the house of Berthier in the direct male line, it may be mentioned that the wonderful sale of medieval gold and silver plate, which has just taken place at Paris, attracting collectors from all parts of the universe, and creating great stir in the art world, was not, as has been alleged, the Rothschilds' collection of plate, but that of the late Prince of Wagram. The collection disposed of at Paris, consisted of 199 pieces, brought in the neighborhood of three million francs, and constituted only a free-

The Evening Chit-Chat
By BUTH CAMERON

YOU are angry, "Hurt," you call it. As a matter of fact, that way of expressing it is merely a graceful fiction of implying that the blame of your disgruntled state of mind belongs with someone else.
And in the absence of the friend who has angered, or rather "hurt" you, you are going over in your mind your side of the case.
You mentally rehearse what you would like to say to her:
"I had a headache when I got up and yet I worked hard all day," you justify yourself. "And then everything went wrong. There I walked away down to the dressmakers in the broiling sun and she disappointed me, and then just as I was trying to get a little nap, that woman from the church called to ask if I wouldn't give something for the next supper, and to cap the climax, that meat for dinner was had and I had to walk way down to the market for more and the man was rude to me. So when she called me up, I was just as tired and nervous as I could be and my head was simply splitting. And to have her say that she thought I ought to do something more on that committee, was just the last straw. When you think of what I've done already. And now she thinks I ought to say I'm sorry I spoke out as I did. Goodness, I think it's she that ought to be sorry. And I thought she was fond of me. If she knew all I've been through with today and all I've done on that old committee, I guess she'd be sorry, too."
Such is your natural train of thought.
From it you emerge more "hurt" than ever and more determined not to say you are sorry, but instead to extort such an admission from her.
I know, you see, I've travelled on the same train.
But later, my faithful notes from which that train departs, another one goes out at the same moment. Very few people take it, so if you do, you will have a novel experience.
It is the train of thought that leads into the land of the other side of the question.
That is, instead of trying to marshal all the conditions that make you excusable, at this time you are, to try to marshal all the conditions that make your friend excusable.
You are to say to yourself, "She is really much more tired than I am. She works under a terrible strain all the time in that hurried, noisy, hot office. Besides, this is just the last week before her vacation and she is at the end of her rope. And then she has had that anxiety about her mother the last few months. So I suppose she thought she was being perfectly reasonable and when I snapped out so, she felt that I was unjust. And then she didn't know how tired I was and that I had a headache and anyway she may have had a terrible hard day herself. So I suppose she has some reason for thinking I ought to say I'm sorry."
Although your grievance has a very different aspect when you emerge from this train of thought, hasn't it?
And yet the facts haven't changed a bit—only your way of looking at them and for them.
Which train will you take, my friend?
Yes, it certainly requires more courage and altruism and more of a sense of justice and fairness, than the average person has to climb into that second train. But surely you are glad of an opportunity to prove that you have all that?
