CHARACTER BUILDING

Character is difficult to define. It is intangible. It cannot be weighed or measured and growth cannot be estimated by written examinations or intelligence tests. It is simply the sum of all that makes a person different from other persons. It will include social adjustment and the common courtesies that are accepted and expected in our society.

There are the traits of unselfishness, forgiveness and love. The individual will have to develop truthfulness and a sensitivity to the needs of others. And he will have to learn that failure is a step toward success, but success can only be obtained through persistent attempts. Children must learn to participate and yet be good listeners. They must learn to contribute ideas and yet not be aggressive. Character building cannot be done in one lesson, or in one year, but the foundation must be laid in the very young child.

We must not assume that a young child can be trained according to adult concepts of character, yet if these concepts of ours are to become part of the adult personality then the foundation cannot be started too soon. For the child it will mean faith, hope, love, patience and love. Character is important. Adults understand and appreciate that, but it means nothing to the young child.

It is because the child is too immature to understand the value of a worthy character that he has so little interest or even time to think about so many things we are attempting to develop.

It is by our patience, love, persistence, and ourselves as living examples, that children develop worthwhile personalities.

This development continues throughout life. It must be taught in the home, in the school and Sunday School if it is to become effective.

The world of tomorrow lies in the future powers of the children of today.
