Long before World War II, the government of Caribbean Trinidad banned bamboo drum bands in order to stop bloody street fights between competing drummers. For a while there was comparative quiet, but with the war and the arrival of U.S. forces came a deluge of 50-gallon oil drums, and some inventive fellows discovered a way to make them into musical instruments. They divided the heads into pie-shaped segments, peened them until each segment gave out a separate musical note when struck with padded sticks. For "bass booms" the drums were left full length, for baritones they were chopped in half, for the "tenor pans" they were sliced thin. Then half a dozen Trinidadians foregathered, added maracas and woodblock players, and they had a "steel band." Trinidad alone now supports some 200 such bands, and the demand for the music has erupted throughout the Caribbean. A fine sample on LP is now available: The Bruce Force Steel Band of Antigua, B.W.I. (Cook).

The sounds are balmy as a West Indian zephyr, satisfying in tune, and played with carefree spirit. The rhythms are intricately Afro-Cuban, e.g., meringue, samba, mambo, although they eventually fall into a predictable pattern. High points: a gimp-gaited calypso about a cricket upset ("Who taught you to bowl, Australia?"), and another that laments some aspects of the latest white man's invasion, a number called "Brown-Skinned Gal".

Oh! I'll tell you a story of Lili,

How she met a nice blue-eyed baby,
But today she stands as a mother.
Over five months, friends, she ain't seen the father.
