

Cosby to Quit TV Show For Teaching Career

NEW YORK (AP) — Bill Cosby said on the David Frost Show taped Wednesday night for showing Jan. 4 that he will give up his television series to return to school to become a teacher.

Cosby said he would enter the University of Massachusetts at Springfield, Mass., to obtain his master's degree.

Cosby, who plays a high school basketball coach on his NBC series, has said for a number of years that he would become a teacher when he reached his early 30s. He is 32.

The popular comedy star was in New York to tape a special, but was not immediately available to comment on the Frost interview.

Cosby told Frost he had wanted to become a school teacher since he was 20 years old, but first the navy and then the need to make money stood in the way.

"I will work to pay the rent, but my real work is education," he said, indicating he would continue to appear on television.

Cosby first gained fame on I Spy and won three successive Emmy awards for his portrayal of a spy masquerading as a trainer to a tennis player, played by Robert Culp.

His present show began in September, 1968, and is produced by Cosby's own company, Jemmins Productions.
