THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES

On Sunday evening, October 14 for a few short minutes all London turned out to pay tribute to their Royal Highnesses, Princess Elizabeth, Duchess of Edinburgh and the Duke of Edinburgh. To many, just a glimpse now and again they could catch. To those nearer, they stood in awe, many with tears gently rolling down their cheeks. If you should ask them why, the answer would be I don't know. Perhaps they were thinking "Truly she is a daughter to be proud of, so beautifully composed, so confident about her father's business." As we gazed at her the feeling that truly when the time comes for her to take over the leadership she will do so with all the love and respect of her people the world over, wherever they may be. By her side stood His Highness the Duke of Edinburgh encouraging and giving her all the support possible. As they continue on their journey throughout Canada and to Washington we wish them God speed, a happy visit and a safe return to their home.

Women Big Force In Stabilizing Prices

(Courtesy London Free Press)

Canadian women do not want price controls again "if they can be avoided," Mrs. Clifton Graban, Ottawa, provincial president of the Canadian Association of Consumers, said here last night at a meeting of the London branch at the Y.M.-Y.W.C.A. She spoke on the topic, "Inflation—What Can Canadian Women Do About It?"

"We supported controls during a period of war, and I am sure would do so again if war should break out," she told the group of price-conscious women, adding that Canadians dislike regimentation as a permanent policy. As a further argument, she said that imposition of controls would require outlays of money and manpower urgently needed now for the defence program.

"What, then, is the answer to Canada's No. One problem? Indirect controls or some measure of selective controls," Mrs. Graban declared. In this connection, she listed credit restriction controls.

Historic Cases On High Court Docket

Washington, Oct. 5 — Several precedent-shattering civil rights cases being fought by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People are on the docket for the 1951-52 term of the United States Supreme Court, which opened on October 1st.

High in the public interest are the two suits making a frontal attack on racial segregation at the elementary and high school levels—the Clarendon County, S.C. case, and the Topeka, Kans. case.

A petition for appeal of a lower court decision upholding enforcement of a Kansas statute permitting segregation in elementary schools was filed this week by NAACP attorneys. The NAACP asked the high court to review the case on the grounds that (1) the importance of the problem is increased by the fact that many more people are affected by elementary school segregation than by segregation in graduate and professional schools; (2) that the lower court, even in upholding the statute, had found segregation harmful, and that should have been followed; and (3) that the statute is unreasonable on its face in that it applies only to elementary schools, and that there is no difference in terms of ability of students based on color.

NAACP attorneys appealing this case are Charles Bledsoe, Charles Scott and John Scott of Topeko, and Robert L. Carter, Jack Greenberg and Thurgood Marshall of the national office legal staff.

In the South Carolina case, segregation in elementary and high schools was upheld by a special three-judge federal court, with U.S. District Judge J. Waties Waring entering a vigorous dissent.

Also to be considered by the Supreme Court is the appeal of the NAACP for equalization of teachers' salaries in Jackson, Mississippi, and suits for admission of qualified Negro students to the Universities of Florida and Tennessee.

has been chosen, and building plans are being made.

Early in 1949, a People's Educational Association was formed on a voluntary basis with the object of stimulating the already considerable demands for adult education, particularly in courses of university extramural standard. Four African local organizers were posted, after an initial training in the United Kingdom, to Accra, Sekondi, Kumasi, and Tamale, respectively.

UN experts said that the success of institutions of higher education in the non-self-governing territories will be measured largely by the extent to which they provided training for responsible citizenship, take account of the demands of changing society and government, and satisfy the urgent needs of the various territories for highly trained personnel to carry out the projected development programs.
