GOOD-WILL TOWARDS MEN

Another Christmas has come and the year 1944 hurries swiftly to its close. We would that a happy world might shout in exultation Peace on Earth, but we dare not. For war clouds darken the skies in far off Manchuria, and while the statesmen of the world fervently cry Peace, Peace, the nations fashion dreadful engines of war. And hat good will which was proclaimed on the first Christmas morn nineteen hundred and more years ago is still largely of the stuff that dreams are made of, save when the hand of misfortune strikes and catastrophe levels the barriers of race and class and creed. Such a time is the present. Perhaps in no period in the history of the nation has there been a greater need for good will than now.

The pity of it is that only a major catastrophe seems to be able to arouse us to consideration of the plight of our fellowmen or to stir us to a contemplation of the conditions under which they exist. Today saddened millions face a future full of uncertainty and doubt, and for them Christmas merely serves to emphasize misfortune. They are honest. They have committed no crime. They are anxious to work. An economic cataclysm has engulfed them and swept away everything they possess except the hope of change.

Who is responsible? What are the causes?

There are a thousand answers; one as good as another. But somehow the thought persists that at least one of the fundamental reasons has been the disregard of a declaration and an injunction:

Peace on Earth, Good Will Towards Men.
