Some fault has been found with the cost of distribution of farm implements. Beyond any question it is inordinately high—much higher in some years than in others. In some years only a small number of implements are sold, but the same organization for distribution has to be maintained, whether the bulk of sales be great or small. I do not believe anyone will suggest that agricultural implement agents throughout Canada are reaping excessive profits. As a matter of fact many of them find it very hard to make a living, and from time to time some have to go out of business. But I do wish to say that the service given farmers by the agricultural implement companies is something the farmer absolutely must have, and something which is given every day at I believe a reasonable cost. Depots for repair parts are maintained throughout Canada at points where implements are sold, and at those depots a full stock of repair parts is kept. On many occasions they are kept at considerable expense to the companies. In addition to that, other services are given the farmers, and I do not think we can overestimate the value of services which from time to time are rendered.

I should like to refer to one or two more of the findings of the committee. Finding No. 2 refers to the backlog of unpurchased requirements which the farmers had been unable to buy during the years of the depression. It states that the normal requirements of agriculture amount to over $51,000,000, but that in addition there is a backlog of some $200,000,000 which the companies should enjoy in the next few years. A perusal of the evidence will show that not one of the representatives of the companies would agree with such an estimate; they all made the statement that it would be unwise for them to base their production program or their price structure upon any such estimate. The experience of the past year has proven this to be correct. Not only was the $51,000,000 of normal requirements not taken up in full, but none of the $200,000,000 was purchased. I agree fully with the hon. member for The Battlefords, who stated that there is little hope that the normal estimated requirement of $51,000,000 would be purchased in 1938. The average purchases of farm implements in the last sixteen years have amounted to about $41,000,000, as will be found on page 1215 of the evidence.

Findings No. 9 and No. 10 are in the same category and to a certain extent refer to the same subject. Finding No. 9 reads:

> That the unfavourable factors affecting the financial returns of the farm implement companies in the period 1930 to 1935 have been largely eliminated and therefore the companies can look forward to a period of relative prosperity in the industry.

I do not think anyone who is at all acquainted with the position of agriculture to-day will say that the buying power of the farmer has returned to normal. The experience of the past year has shown that it has not. It would be a very optimistic man who would say that this buying power will return to normal in 1938.

Finding No. 10, which refers to bad debt losses, states:

> That, particularly, the abnormal bad debt losses resulting from the depression have been largely absorbed by the implement companies and that this item of cost should not appear in the next few years.

What has happened during the past year? The reserves which the companies had set aside for bad debt losses were absorbed early in the year. Many of the accounts that had been considered collectable had to be written off during 1937, particularly accounts in the drought areas. This state of affairs was brought about by conditions over which no one could have any control.

Finding No. 16 recommends that cream separators should be placed on the free list. Very strong representations were made by the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) against such action being taken, and his argument was well supported by facts and figures. However, I cannot help but think that it would have carried more weight had he stood four-square on a policy of protection instead of stating that he was neither a protectionist nor a free trader, that he believed in tariff for revenue. I was just wondering what action he will take should this report be concurred in. If it is concurred in, it would seem to me that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will be obliged to remove the duty from cream separators. I was disappointed that the hon. member did not move an amendment to have the matter of the duty on cream separators referred to the tariff board.

I find the following statement on page 1278 of the evidence:

> The information so submitted together with the evidence given by the officers of the De Laval company in connection with the importation by this company of cream separators from Sweden clearly establishes that it is apparently uneconomic to manufacture cream separators in Canada.

I agree entirely with the statements which were made by the hon. member for Brantford City and the hon. member for Renfrew South, that there was not sufficient evidence produced before the committee to warrant any such statement as that. As stated by the hon. member for Renfrew South, the only apparent reason why other countries are able to manufacture cream separators cheaper than Canada is that lower wages are paid in those countries. There can be no doubt that if the manufacture of cream separators were discontinued in Canada, and Canadian dairymen had to rely upon foreign manufacturers for their machines, they would be placed in a most unfavourable position. I shall refer to this matter again before I conclude.

There is another phase of the cream separator question which has not been discussed in this house at any length, if at all, to which I should like to refer for a minute. Because of the preference granted to cream separators under the Ottawa agreements, one or two cream separator companies in Great Britain have been able to establish a fair volume of Canadian business. This fact has not been referred to in any speech to which I have listened, nor was it mentioned in the evidence given before the committee. This volume of business is considerable. I should like to refer particularly to R. A. Lister and Company, Limited, of England, the oldest and largest manufacturer of cream separators in the British Empire. This company did some business in Canada prior to the war, but their factory was taken over by the government during the war and up to the time of the Ottawa agreements they had done little or no business in Canada.

I have here a statement by a representative of this concern, of which I shall read only certain paragraphs which I believe would be of particular interest to hon. members. The first paragraph refers to what I have just stated, that this company had done business in Canada prior to the war but had lost it during the war. The statement goes on to say that despite terrific efforts on their part after the war to rehabilitate their separator business, including the purchase of a plant in Hamilton, Ontario, it was not until the ratification of the Ottawa agreements and the granting of a preference in 1931 on British machines coming into Canada that they were able to make the headway which they firmly felt their previous efforts justified. It is interesting to note that they have secured some fifty per cent of the New Zealand trade. I quote:

> Prior to the passing of the preference in Canada, they were asked whether they were prepared to take full advantage of the concession which would be afforded to them as one of the manufacturers affected in the empire. They immediately intimated that for their part they would not only be prepared to do their utmost to take advantage of it, but would do their best to ensure that for every $100 worth of separators which they exported to Canada, they would take at least $100 worth of Canadian produce in payment. As a result, they entered into a contract with the Cockshutt Plow, and Frost and Wood companies for the distribution of their separators in Canada, and undertook to take on the distribution of certain of their products, suitable to the British market, in Great Britain. As a result of this agreement they have purchased approximately twice the value of Canadian products as compared with the value of cream separators which they have exported to Canada—this, despite the fact that the sales of Lister cream separators in the dominion have been increasing steadily and materially year by year during the past five years—and at the present time, they have similar negotiations in hand with a view to materially increasing the value of this two-way trade in the interests of both Canada and Great Britain, but if, having done all the spade work, development work, and just as the business is becoming of material importance, (grown as it has in turnover some eight to ten times), they are to have it undermined by the taking away of the incentive and encouragement afforded them by the preference aforementioned, the insurmountable difficulties with which they will be confronted will be appreciated. It is contended (1) that they are not only making available to the dairy farmers of Canada a high grade machine but that they are helping several hundred industrial workers to find sound employment in Canada; (2) that by distributing their products through an agricultural machinery manufacturers' organization they are helping the manufacturer to reduce his selling price in Canada. They are possibly among his three largest clients in the world to-day.

The arrangements come to were the most practical and sound interpretations of the Ottawa agreement which could be effected, and it is believed that this reciprocal business not only expresses the written word but the spirit of the Ottawa agreement in its highest sense, and that without any question of doubt it is within the best interests of the Dominion of Canada and the United Kingdom.

The import figures of cream separators imported into the United Kingdom speak for themselves. They are as follows: 1932, 2; 1933, 535; 1934, 950; 1935, 1,355; 1936, 1,994; 1937, 3,163.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that if this duty is removed as the recommendation suggests, it will be a violation of the intent of the Ottawa agreement, and I suggest, as the hon. member for Renfrew South has done, to the Minister of Finance and to the government, that before any action is taken on this question it be referred to the tariff board or to some other independent organization.

I find that my time is pretty well exhausted. I do wish, however, to make one other statement before concluding. It is not my intention to discuss the conclusions and recommendations of the commission at greater length. The experience of the past year has proved that they have had varying degrees of truth and of value. The whole discussion revolves around one question: How can agriculture be furnished with its implements of production at prices which it can afford to pay? Certainly not by driving Canadian manufacturers entirely out of business. With this everyone appears to agree. Even the report itself does not suggest that prices should have been lowered when the duty was lowered. You may search it from beginning to end without finding any such intimation. It was left to the chairman to make the suggestion that the duty on agricultural implements should be removed entirely. Such a conclusion was not reached in the report.

In my judgment the remedy for the inequality in prices is twofold. First, steps must be taken to increase the purchasing power of the farmer. This, however, is not the proper time or place to discuss methods of bringing about such a condition. Second, everything possible should be done to preserve the Canadian market for the Canadian manufacturer of farm implements and to see that as large a proportion as possible of the implements in use on Canadian farms are of Canadian production.

This is not a new doctrine. Properly applied, it has done more in the past to reduce prices than any other action that could have been taken. It has worked well in the past, and I believe it is still efficacious. I repeat, it would be a calamity if our Canadian factories were forced to close because of undue competition with the mass production and cheap labour of other countries, and if the Canadian farmer were forced to rely on other countries for his implements of production. Then, indeed, no Canadian authority would have any control whatever over prices.

I should like to quote to the house what a great Liberal and a great Canadian said about this matter. Speaking in the House of Commons in the year 1904, and referring to foreign manufacturers, this is what he said, in part:

> They are not worrying about the good of the people of Canada. They send goods here with the hope and expectation that they will crush out the need of Canadian industry. If Canadian industry is crushed out, what would happen? The end of cheapness would come and the beginning of dearness would be at hand. Artificial cheapness obtained to-day under such conditions at the expense of dearness at a very near day in the future is not a system of which we could approve, or that any of us on either side of the house could encourage.

These are the words of none other than the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, one of the greatest Liberal ministers of finance that this country has ever had, and the truth of his statement is more than ever apparent under present conditions.

The hon. member for Renfrew South gave a good example in his address when he told the house that Sweden had raised the price of cream separators in New Zealand, where there are no manufacturers of that article; at the same time lowering the price of those sent to the Dominion of Canada because of the competition that was experienced with Canadian manufacturers.

I repeat, it is to be hoped that the Canadian farmer will never be forced to rely on foreign manufacturers for his implements of production. If the Canadian market could be reserved one hundred per cent for the Canadian manufacturer it would result in a lower cost of production because of increased volume, and at the same time would provide increased employment in the factories engaged not only in the manufacture of implements but as well in the manufacture of materials, and in industries which are allied to the farm implement industry. In that way, Mr. Speaker, I believe that we could to a certain extent help to alleviate the unemployment that exists to-day, as well as provide better markets for farm products in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house asks for concurrence in the report of the special committee appointed at the last session of parliament to continue an inquiry into the high prices of agricultural implements with particular reference to the increase in prices in 1936. This committee was named to continue an investigation that had been started the previous session before the committee of agriculture and colonization. Looking over the list of members of this house who made up that special committee I find that every group in the house was represented on it. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Senn) made reference to the fact that the report of the committee was not unanimous.

Mr. HAYHURST: Were any members of that special committee from the province of Alberta?

Mr. WEIR: Yes, I think so.

Mr. HAYHURST: No, not from Alberta.

Mr. WEIR: Every group was represented; I do not know that every province was represented.

Mr. HAYHURST: Alberta is a vital province so far as agriculture is concerned, and there should have been at least two representatives from that province on the special committee.

Mr. WEIR: My hon. friend can deal with that when he rises to speak, but I repeat, every group at least in the house was represented on the committee and thus had a voice in its deliberations. As far as I recall there was no dissenting voice in the recommendations that were brought in by the committee.

Mr. THORSON: May I interject that all the groups were asked to select their own representatives?

Mr. WEIR: Yes. May I say, by way of explanation as to why this inquiry was continued before a special committee rather than before the agriculture committee to which it was referred the year previously, that the agriculture committee consists of sixty members. It is a very large committee and one which in my own personal judgment, was not as satisfactory a committee as it might have been to which to refer an inquiry of this kind. I think even the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) agreed with that observation. Indeed he went further and said that the inquiry, he thought, should go before the tariff board. It was for this reason, then, that the reference was made to a smaller special committee. Last year it will be recalled that due to the desire to prorogue parliament early on account of the coronation the report of the committee was not dealt with, nor was any motion made for concurrence in it.

May I here say a word as to the general approach made to this inquiry? I do not believe any committee of this house ever approached a problem with greater earnestness and stronger determination to find the essential facts regarding any industry or any matter that was ever inquired into. The approach was made in the spirit of desiring to establish the essential facts; regardless of what those facts might disclose the committee was prepared to base its findings thereon. With an approach of that kind I am sure that both the committee appointed in 1936 and the one which operated last year were able to secure much additional information, through the good-will that was created right from the beginning, than otherwise might have been the case.

May I also in passing extend a word of appreciation to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) who as chairman of the committee had more to do with directing its proceedings than any other person. At the same time may I express a word of appreciation of the very valuable services rendered by the auditor and the counsel who acted for both committees. I doubt if any committee of this house was ever served by abler people who were more willing to give of their time and energy than these gentlemen did, at the remuneration which they received.

There is one phase of this matter upon which I should like to make an observation. When this committee was established, or shortly after it got under way, it was found that a similar inquiry was taking place in the United States before their trade and industry commission. I think it is regrettable that we have not the report of that commission before us at this time, when we are dealing with the report of our own committee.

Coming now to the consideration of the report which is before us, I think everyone is agreed that the prosperity of the agricultural implement industry is tied up with the prosperity of the farming industry. One needs only to look at the figures of purchases of farm implements over a period of years to recognize that that is so. It shows that the high of farm implement purchases was in 1920, when it stood at $82,000,000; it was $70,000,000 in 1929; it was down to a low of $8,000,000 in 1933. The effect of this lack of purchases was immediately reflected in the financial results to the farm implement companies. It is only fair to point out that these companies sustained losses between 1930 and 1935. It cannot be established, however, that these losses were due to the prices of farm implements being too low; rather they were the result of the failure of farmers to purchase implements. This immediately brings up another aspect of the question, to which the hon. member for Haldimand has referred, namely that on account of lack of purchasing power there has developed a tremendous backlog of farm implement requirements on the part of the farmers. That backlog was estimated at $200,000,000, as against normal requirements of $51,000,000. My hon. friend from Haldimand doubted if that figure would be reached for some time. May I say to him in passing, although of course this observation is localized, that he would be surprised at the purchases of agricultural implements in districts in western Canada where crop conditions have made them possible. I believe that with a return to reasonably normal conditions we shall be astonished at the purchase of implements, in western Canada particularly.

Having regard to the figures, one must immediately recognize the importance of the price increases. According to the bureau of statistics, and we know this from our own knowledge of the industry, the farm implement factories are mostly situated in eastern Canada. The record shows that there are twenty-six in Ontario and four in Quebec. Approximately seventy-five per cent of their business is done in western Canada. Of those companies, the two principal ones are the Massey-Harris and the International Harvester Company. Both do quite an extensive export business, that of the Massey-Harris Company being a particularly important factor.

So far as the committee was able to find, speaking from my reading of the report and from listening to the proceedings at many meetings of the committee, I think it is fair to state that the implement companies of Canada are not selling their farm implements to foreign countries at a lesser price than that at which they are sold to Canadian consumers. However we are concerned only with the Canadian business. Admitting for the moment that these companies did sustain losses through the period of the depression, taking the ten year period from 1926 to 1935 two companies showed reasonable profits on their capital. The auditor's report showed that the International Harvester Company had an earning of 7·7 per cent on its capital, and that the John Deere Company had an earning of something over five per cent before income tax and allowance for profits retained in the parent companies due to customs regulations. The companies did not admit these figures, but they admitted a return about one per cent less. The Massey-Harris Company, it is true, sustained a loss of some fifteen million dollars. The other company, Cockshutt Plow, had a profit of about $20,000 during this period. So it cannot be said that the companies were not making at that time reasonable earnings; they are surely fair earnings particularly during a time of depression. So far as the Massey-Harris Company is concerned it was shown in the evidence presented to the committee that they had a distribution ratio considerably out of line with the other companies; it was thirty-three per cent on net sales, contrasted with an average of twenty-two per cent for the other companies. Surely the farmers of this country have reason to expect a better showing than that, and are entitled to more uniform distribution costs ratio.

As I have said, in spite of the earnings of these companies during the depression, they made good earnings over the ten year period. The argument used in support of the increase in prices was the substantial losses which they had sustained immediately previous to 1935, coupled with, as they claim, increased production costs. Reviewing the increased costs that have taken place, the evidence and the committee's report would indicate that they are not justified in making that claim. I have before me one of the tables, taken from the report, which deals with the cost of raw materials from 1913 down to 1935. Referring more particularly to the years 1930 to 1935, it includes such items as pig iron, bought scrap, steel, lumber, fuel oil, coal, coke, and cotton duck. In only two items in that list was there a price increase between 1930 and 1935. Steel, it is true, increased from $2.37 per hundredweight to $2.40; coke, from $6.33 to $11.07. In all the other items in the list the prices are either the same or lower. Then take the cost of labour. As regards the Massey-Harris Company the rate of wages in 1934 was 45¾ cents per hour, and in 1936, 45 cents. There is a slight increase in the wages paid by the John Deere Company; apart from that the wage rate is practically the same. On the basis of their costs of raw materials and labour there is no justification for the increase in price which took place in 1936.

The companies themselves, when being cross-examined by counsel for the committee, admitted that they could not justify their price increases by increase in the cost of production as regards raw materials, or any of the other items which enter into it, prior to 1936.

There is another thing I should like to interject here, and that is with respect to the argument so often advanced, by farmers particularly, on the basis of a comparison of prices of farm implements to-day with what they were in 1913, prior to the war. Farmers immediately asked: "Why are implements so much dearer to-day than they were prior to the war? Why is not the factor of mass production playing a part in the production of farm implements and their cost?" The implement companies' reply of course was that the factor of mass production had been in operation before the war as far as the ordinary farm implement is concerned and thus could not be a factor to-day. They referred to the tractor and made a comparison with what has taken place in respect to the automobile. It is true that to-day we have a very much better tractor than we had before the war, and at a lower cost. But as far as the ordinary farm implement is concerned that is not the case. Even with the possibility of my remarks being misconstrued I think we have a better type of farm implement to-day than we had in 1913 as far as the large machines are concerned, but I doubt very much whether our ordinary horse-drawn implement is substantially better than it was in 1913, either for efficiency or for durability. The large power unit to-day is unquestionably improved, and the farmer is therefore probably getting greater value for the dollars expended for his large type power machine than he did formerly. But in my judgment the price of the ordinary horse-drawn implement, which most farmers have to buy, and which the large majority will continue to have to buy for a long time to come, is considerably out of line with what it was about 1913 and prior to the war.

For the information particularly of the people in the country I want to refer to some price changes that have taken place since that time. The International Harvester Company were very valuable witnesses before the committee. Their costs were well detailed and complete, and in each branch of their costs they had an all-inclusive factor. I shall refer briefly to the years between 1913 and 1936.

The information is set out in the following table, taken from the evidence given before the committee:

Changes in the costs of producing an 8-foot International binder between 1913 and 1936

Repairs 75 per cent higher and are sold for cash.

It is hard to understand how some of these differences in cost can be accounted for. The differences in different years are very substantial. In addition to what this table discloses, the repairs which the farmer has to buy for his implements are now approximately seventy-five per cent higher than the figures used for the actual implement. And these repairs are sold for cash, so that there cannot be much loss in collections in respect of repairs. This table shows that between the laid-down cost and the manufacturing cost there was a difference in 1913 of $74 and in 1936 of $125. These in-between costs may be necessary; the fact nevertheless remains that this is a terrible burden of expense to be added for the cost of distribution. I propose to deal with that in a little different way in a moment. Other hon. members have dealt with different features of the report, concerning which I do not propose to burden the house this afternoon.

I wish however to say a word with respect to the credit policy of these implement companies. It is generally known that they have a credit and a cash system of doing business. Taking again the information supplied by the International Harvester Company, the credit sales of this company amounted to thirty-five per cent of the total sales between 1926 and 1935. On their credit sales alone it cost them 8·44 per cent to collect, and they lost 12·92 per cent uncollected. In other words, their credit sales alone, being thirty-five per cent of their business, cost them for collection alone, 21·36 per cent. Surely this is an abnormally high figure and one in regard to which this country should hope for some relief. I do not know how that loss and expense can be overcome, but I suggest to the implement companies that that is one item as to which some relief must be brought about, and that they give consideration and attention to the question of some sort of finance organization such as is used by the automobile companies.

With respect to general distribution costs the evidence clearly shows that they have a very expensive system. Farmers have become accustomed to the system already built up, and it may be necessary that it be maintained in part, having particular regard to our crop hazards and the necessity of having repairs and service carried out without loss of time. However, it should be pointed out that this is an exceptionally heavy burden to be added to the cost of farm implements, which in the final analysis the farmer has to pay. Taking the figures to which I referred a moment ago, they indicate that the difference, including freight but excluding agents' commissions, between the factory cost and the Regina cash price to the farmer is forty-four per cent. In other words, I point out here that if some other agency, such as a cooperative or something of that sort, could go to the factory door, purchase for cash and take delivery of say one hundred dollars' worth of farm implements, using the calculations made with respect to an eight-foot binder of the International Harvester Company, they could be bought for $56. I realize, of course, that such an organization would have to do its own retail selling, its financing and servicing and take care of its losses, so it could not be expected that this whole saving would be secured. At the same time this indicates the very great spread that exists between the cost at the factory door and the cost to the farmer. It is not fair to state that this entire saving could be made, but it does indicate one point where some measure of relief should be attempted. Surely this is one place where farmers' organizations could do something which would be of advantage to them.

Much has been said during this debate with regard to the effect of the tariff on the prices of farm implements, and it has been pointed out that under the United States trade agreement the tariff was reduced but that the prices of implements increased. That is true, but it is also true that the price increases in the country where the implements are most extensively manufactured were due not to the tariff but to an entirely different reason. Those increases were due to the heavy purchases of raw materials for war purposes and so on, and also to the increased cost of labour. These things had their immediate reflection in the cost of farm implements in the United States. The Massey-Harris company admitted to the committee that its increased price in 1936 could not be justified because of the increased cost of raw material in this country or the increased cost of labour. Just here I should like to point out that the United States companies, International Harvester and John Deere, stated that the increased prices at that time on the implements imported into Canada would have been greater if the duty had not been lowered. Again it should be noted that when the duty was lowered by the budget of 1936 there was a definite reduction in price on imported implements almost equal to the tariff reduction, indicating that the tariff is a factor in governing prices.

I should like to refer to one specific incident which I think illustrates the situation in connection with the whole line of farm implements. The diesel tractor selling in Regina for $4,600 was immediately reduced to $3,720 when the 25 per cent duty was removed. Therefore it is beyond question that the tariff is a price-governing factor. If it is not then let us eliminate it and allow free competition to play its part. I should like to point out here in this same connection, because I think it is worthy of note, that information coming to my attention indicates that at least one implement company, and a United States company at that, did not increase its prices this year, stating that it was not necessary for them to do so. They are selling their implements at approximately ten per cent less than other implement companies. This also indicates that the tariff is a price-governing factor.

Now, coming more closely to home and attempting to secure a picture of the actual condition in Canada from a competitive point of view. In this country we have approximately thirty-six companies manufacturing implements, while in the United States there are some six hundred companies manufacturing similar implements. Before the committee we had evidence which would indicate that the companies work in pretty close harmony. I am not going to state that a combine exists, but I think it is safe to say that there is close cooperation between the companies with respect to general policy. We have the illustration that when a price change is made by one implement company it is immediately followed by changes on the part of all other implement companies, and undoubtedly the International Harvester Company dominates the whole field. As further evidence in this regard perhaps it is not unfair to point out that this year, I presume following the action taken by the International Harvester Company, the companies have all changed the entire basis of their price lists and have brought out new lists. Every implement company that I was able to check has adopted practically the same sort of price list, in practically the same language. So if there is not a working arrangement between the companies certainly they all work very closely together.

The very nature of the industry tends towards monopoly, and because of the monopolistic character of the industry I believe we need every possible competitive factor in order to keep price relationships on a reasonable basis. Therefore it would be my suggestion to the house that if we are to allow the fullest possible play of competition with respect to farm implements the best thing we can do is remove the duty entirely. Like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the question that immediately came to my mind when this report was presented and concurrence was moved was what was going to be done with the report and what action the government might take. We have listened to arguments from all sides of the house as well as comments from interested parties outside the house. So far as I have been able to ascertain very few suggestions have been advanced as to what action might be taken. I refer particularly to the secretary of the United Farmers of Manitoba, to whom reference has been made on several occasions and who has taken an interest in this matter. He suggested that something had to be done, and asked what the government was going to do. At the same time that gentleman, for whom I have the highest personal regard, offered no suggestions. He is secretary of a farm organization which, to my mind, has a great opportunity to encourage the development of cooperative organizations which could bring about a greater saving in the price of farm implements than any other policy which might be adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is the hon. member suggesting that the onus is on a farmers' organization to make suggestions?

Mr. WEIR: I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers themselves through cooperatives might very properly do a good deal in bringing about a reduction in the cost of distribution of farm implements.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is it not true that the United Farmers of Manitoba, at their annual convention later, suggested the setting up of cooperatives to handle the distribution of farm implements?

Mr. WEIR: My reply to that question is simply that I believe true cooperation has to start with the rank and file of the people most vitally concerned. I doubt very much if cooperatives can be set up by government institutions or other outside bodies. The cooperative principle has to be inculcated in the minds of the people themselves. If our farm people wish to establish cooperative organizations, they are the best equipped people to do so.

Earlier in my observations I referred to credit sales. I do not know what can be done, but I do submit something should be done with respect to the financing of credit sales to farmers. Present credit arrangements are costly, and if some means could be evolved by which a finance corporation, similar to the kind operated by the automobile companies, could be established, it would be a step in the right direction.

I believe it has been established from the evidence in the inquiry that the price increases in 1936 were not justified. What are we going to do? What can the government do? That is the challenge which has been put up to the government and to this house. I think three things might be considered. A similar inquiry is taking place in the United States, one which will be much more extensive, complete and far reaching than the inquiry conducted in this country. Should that inquiry disclose abuses in the farm implement industry, either in manufacturing or in distribution, then I would say the government of Canada should not hesitate to use every means at its command to remedy them.

May I refer again to the substantial increase in freight rates. Hon. members will note that those rates have almost doubled since 1913. The farm implement manufacturing companies are situated in eastern Canada, but seventy-five per cent of their sales are in western Canada, necessitating a long freight haul and a heavy burden of freight cost. Possibly the government might take some action with respect to reduced rates, and thus effect a saving in the cost of distribution.

And lastly, because of the monopolistic character of the industry, and also because the tariff is being belittled as a price-governing factor, the government should remove the duty and thus allow the freest competition possible so far as prices are concerned.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the speech the other evening by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the debate on the motion before the house has assumed far greater significance than might otherwise have attended the discussion of the report of a special committee of the house. The minister's statement was of the type usually described as provocative—possibly the most provocative statement made this session; certainly the most provocative from a responsible minister of the crown. In other words, it could do no other than generate heat rather than light, exasperate rather than stimulate, confuse issues rather than clarify them; and like most such utterances it was not distinguished by careful candour in the use of figures, or any seeming care to avoid the creation of false impressions.

It is not my purpose to attack the minister, or to criticize those views of his which he is so fond of ambiguously describing as Liberal principles. But when we have statements made in this house, inaccurate in themselves, that can have no effect other than to strike one more blow upon the wedge that is being driven between the various sections of the country, which will cause tempers to rise and substitute ill will and resentment for the spirit of mutual understanding and cooperation in the solution of a common problem, I feel it is incumbent upon me as a member of the house, in the interests of the country as a whole, to attempt to remove false impressions which have been created, and to restore this debate to an unprejudiced and analytical examination of this committee's report.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That will be a welcome change.

Mr. MASSEY: We have just listened to a speech by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir), a speech which when placed in juxtaposition to that of the Minister of Agriculture, delivered last Friday, is in sharp and pleasing contrast. I am sure in his remarks he was speaking in what he believed to be the fullest interests of those whom he so ably represents, the worthy farmers of this dominion. He spoke with consideration for all factors, and tempered his speech as he spoke. I am sure his speech will not be considered provocative.

It is scarcely necessary, Mr. Speaker, for me to repeat the statement I have made many times, in and outside the house that I and my family have no financial interest whatsoever in the Massey-Harris Company. I am however interested in the workers in that and any other industrial company, and as a Canadian I have a wider concern, a concern for the unity of Canada and the damage that may be done to it by utterances such as those we heard from the Minister of Agriculture on Friday evening last.

We are all Canadians. We may be industrial workers; we may be farmers. It is true we may have our sectional interests, but our primary interest should be the interest of Canada; and we may well deplore efforts to pit one section of the country against another, and to play upon sectional emotions and class emotions for the doubtful benefit and under the doubtful dictates of political expediency. It is just the type of debate in which we are now engaged, which if we are not careful may stir up as nothing else can, sectional antagonisms which can do no good and which on the contrary may do irreparable harm to the country.

I admit at the outset of my remarks, as every Canadian must admit, that we are still a fundamentally agrarian country. Our basic industry is farming, and we have every reason to be proud of our agriculture and our farming, contributing as it does, and in the way it does, fifty per cent of the value of our primary products.

The Canadian farmer has made and is making a contribution to Canada which is inestimable, and making those contributions in the face of great hazards; for not only does he have local, national and international economic conditions to combat, but further he is always harassed by weather, pests and other uncontrollable uncertainties which may be described as acts of God. It is natural to him to wish to purchase at the lowest price and to sell at the highest price. One can fully understand his point of view on the costs of essentials, among which of course are numbered farm implements. One can subscribe fully to the ideal which should have motivated the farm implements committee, the report of which is now under debate, when its desire was supposed to be primarily to assist the farmer. Such a desire is of course highly laudable in itself.

But there are two factors in the case which must be considered. On the one hand there is the farmer, and on the other hand there is the farmer's fellow-Canadian, the industrial worker. It seems to me, not only from the minister's speech last Friday but also from the speeches of some of those who have supported the report, that there has been demonstrated a lack of perspective of the whole situation, as well as a lack of definition. On what foundation are the findings of this committee based? Was this committee a onesided or lopsided one? Is there anything in the report which indicates the case of the industrial worker was considered on its merits at all? What of his job, which provides his means of livelihood, when his expenses are so heavy and when the uncertainties of his position these days are a constant source of echinated worry? Was there thought given by the committee to his part in the case? Was there consideration given to the fact that on the average he spends over $400 a year for the product of the Canadian farmer? Was there any thought given to the fact that the Canadian market is the Canadian farmer's only sure market, and should be protected with the greatest care and used and cherished not only for the sake of protecting the job of the industrial worker but for the sake of the protection of the farmer himself?

Time and time again ridiculous statements have been made in this house to the effect that the Canadian farmer receives little or no protection. This hypocrisy was reduced in great part by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) who made a most able and capable speech from the Liberal benches as reported at page 1347 of Hansard. He referred to the direct protection which the farmer receives. But will those who are so keen to see what little protection is to-day afforded to industry reduced or removed altogether, continue to be blind to the irreducible fact that the protection of the industrial worker is the farmer's surest protection, for it protects his only secure market, that is, the home market. Every man thrown out of a job by the closing down of any industry represents on the average a loss to the Canadian farmer of a market worth $409.25 per year. Thus those who advocate the annihilation of the Canadian implement industry are recommending that the farmer jeopardize a home market running into millions of dollars.

Then, further, for years the implement industry has borne the brunt of vicious attacks in this house. Why it should be that this one industry should constantly be made the butt of flamboyant political speeches in this chamber and demagogic political harangues in the hustings, seems to be unexplainable except on the skinny basis of political expediency. What about all the other industries that supply the farmer with essentials? But, no, it seems to be the popular thing among some hon. members in this house, and certain claptrap politicians outside of it, to play upon the emotions and sensitivities of the farmer and attempt to portray the implement manufacturer as the arch-villian of the piece. Farm implements are only one of the multiple prime essentials which the farmer requires, and their cost represents a small part of his total budget. It has been stated by those who have made a thorough investigation of this question that the average western farmer spends for farm implements only three cents of every dollar he spends. Before the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) rises to his feet, let me say that this figure has been challenged.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who is your authority?

Mr. MASSEY: It came from the hon member's part of the world.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): When the hon. member quotes an authority, surely he should tell us who it is when we ask for it.

Mr. MASSEY: I will quote the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), who sits behind the hon. gentleman and supports his party.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am afraid he will not accept your authority.

Mr. MASSEY: He knows the Liberal point of view. Double it, if the hon. member wants to; make it six cents, make it anything you want to.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): I obtained it from a newspaper called the Nor'West Farmer.

Mr. MASSEY: That was also the source of my information and I have quoted it over and over again in this chamber.

Mr. DONNELLY: Who wrote the article?

Mr. MASSEY: That figure has been accepted by those who are concerned directly with the industry, and by those in different universities, agricultural colleges, and other such places. However, I am willing to double the figure.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Why use that one?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is entitled to ask a question of the hon. member who is speaking, only with his permission.

Mr. THORSON: It is closer to ten cents.

Mr. MASSEY: We will call it six cents.

Mr. THORSON: It is closer to ten cents.

Mr. MASSEY: We will call it six cents.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That does not change what it really is.

Mr. MASSEY: Make it six cents, make it ten cents or even twenty cents if it makes the hon. member any happier.

Why should this one industry be constantly called upon to defend itself before parliamentary committees, to have the tariff on its products raised and lowered, lowered and raised? It has now been recommended that the tariff should be removed altogether. Before some hon. member rises to say it, I will say that in times when the prices for farm products are low, the farmer must reduce his cost of production to the minimum. With that statement I agree. What saving in production cost would be achieved by the farmer if the 7½ per cent duty on farm implements was eliminated and there was a corresponding reduction of 7½ per cent in the price of imported farm implements? I have in my hand a table, which with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place upon Hansard. This is a most interesting table which shows beyond argument, even that of the hon. member for Melfort, that the average saving to the western farmer with a half-section of land and a tractor would amount to $3.68 per year if the duty on farm implements were eliminated and if this elimination were accompanied by a similar reduction in selling price, and if the farmer purchased only imported machines. Three "ifs" and an "only"! Each of these assumptions is of doubtful value and highly questionable. The table is as follows:

Equipment on half section prairie (tractor) farm showing duty that would be paid if the implements were imported, basis for duty purposes being dealer's price f.o.b. Chicago less 25 per cent.

	Dealers' prices f.o.b. Chicago	Less 25 per cent for duty purposes	Duty 1938 at 7½ per cent	Length of life of implement	Burden of duty per year

			Total per year		$3.68

*These are Canadian made implements—prices given for nearest comparable American implement.

Mark you, with these questionable assumptions, those who advocate the elimination of the duty on farm implements, those who erroneously believe that this elimination would mean a reduction of 7½ per cent in the list price of imported machines, are subscribing to the throwing out of work of thousands of industrial workers. All this for a highly speculative saving to the farmer of $3.68 per year. This amount of $3.68 per year represents a saving to the average farmer of one-fifth of a cent per bushel in the cost of the production of wheat. Hon. members had best sift down the evidence and the facts before making reckless and unguarded statements based upon inadequate information or lack of knowledge of that for which they are asking.

Let me deal now directly with the minister's speech made last Friday evening. I shall deal first with certain figures given by the minister and later with some of his general statements. In the time at my disposal I can deal only with a few of the figures used by the minister. For example at page 2422 of Hansard we find these words:

. . . but I would direct attention to the fact that the cost of labour entering into the construction of an International Harvester binder in 1913 was valued at $11.97. In 1936 it was $22.62. The difference in the cost of labour as between 1913 and 1936 was only $10.65, but the increase in the price of the binder was $113.98

The fact of the matter is that the labour on a binder referred to by the minister includes only productive labour. The addition of non-productive labour would practically double the the amount. Instead of there being an increase of $10.65 in the labour cost between 1913 and 1936, it would be closer to $22.

Mr. GARDINER: That is all in the next item.

Mr. MASSEY: I am coming to that.

Mr. GARDINER: You have to take all the figures.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, where are the rest of the figures?

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member will permit me, as I understand it, the labour item to which he is referring is included under overhead or burden, which is an extra amount. I dealt with overhead and burden in my remarks.

Mr. MASSEY: On page 2423 of Hansard the minister is reported as follows:

So I repeat that after having given consideration to these three items—

Namely labour, material and freight.

—we find that the cost of the binder was increased by $113.98, not by only $44.43.

Of course that statement is highly misleading, for two reasons. In the first place, the terminology is incorrect. The minister refers to the cost of the binder having increased by $113.98, when he should have said the selling price had increased.

Mr. GARDINER: The cost to the farmer.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, the list price. Second, the minister used the figure $44.43 as the increase in cost occasioned by the increase in material, labour and freight. This cost includes only a fraction of the total cost; the minister gave only a part of the story when he compared costs in 1913 with those in 1936. The minister's figuring is simply hopelessly incorrect. His figures are 125 per cent wrong, as I shall show in just a minute. I ask him not to get so excited and keep his seat. The increase in cost to the manufacturer between 1913 and 1936, based on the figures given in the table on page 1230 of the report, would be as follows:

Increase in cost, material	$25 50
Increase in cost, labour	10 65
Increase in cost, factory burden	15 97
Increase in experimental charges	2 21
	$54 33

To this of course must be added:

Increase in freight	$ 8 28
Increase in commissions paid	14 50
Increase in cost of distribution—(based on figures 22·13 per cent)	21 35
Total	$98 46

In other words, the minister claims that the increase in cost to the manufacturer in 1936 over the cost in 1913 was $44.33, when actually it was $98.46. These figures are taken directly from the committee's report. The minister used only three of the elements and neglected four others. The three he used totalled $44.33, and the four he did not use totalled $54.03. Thus as I said the minister was 125% out in his figure.

Mr. GARDINER: If I may correct the hon. gentleman, if he will just read the next portion of my speech he will find that I included the very items he is now including. They were all in, every item that he has touched upon.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, but not grouped together. I will read it; it gets worse as we go along. On page 2423, just following what I have quoted, the minister said:

In other words, the price of a binder could be reduced by $69.55, to sell at $211.45 without affecting increases in labour, material or freight costs, still leaving the same mark-up as in 1913.

Now the selling price of the International Harvester Company binder, which the minister says in 1936 was $281, carried the same mark-up over factory cost—note that—as did the binder of 1913, which sold for $170. This will be seen from the following table deduced from the figures given on page 332 of the committee's report, and I would ask that this be put on Hansard in tabular form.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand the hon. gentleman is speaking of percentage of mark-up.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister need not worry so much or often. I know he is quite convinced that he is wrong now.

Mr. GARDINER: I was using dollars.

Mr. MASSEY: Certainly—for a reason. My figures are taken from page 332 of the committee's report.

			1913		1936	Increase
Retail price			$170 00		$281 00	$111 00
Freight	$17 80			$26 08
Commission	31 00			45 50		22 78
		48 80			71 58
			121 20		209 42	88 22
Cost at factory			75 83		130 16	54 33
Mark-up			45 37		79 26	33 89
Per cent of cost			59·8		60·8

The minister used figures that were infinitely more impressive to make his case. He used dollars, and the figure is, of course, greater in one case than in the other because the selling price of the machine was greater. But the percentage remained the same. Thus while the selling price has been raised from $170 in 1913 to $281 in 1936, an increase of $111, the increase in cost to the company was, as I stated, $98.46. So obviously the price of a binder could not have been reduced, as the minister stated, by $69.55 without a loss to the company in round figures of $29.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh yes, it could.

Mr. MASSEY: The figures are there in the report. If the minister wishes to disregard the report—he has done so already, and I was suspicious that he would—he can do so. But my figures are taken from the report itself.

Mr. GARDINER: I took all the figures from the report, at page 1230.

Mr. MASSEY: Again at page 2423 of Hansard the minister says:

> Therefore a binder could have been reduced in 1936 by $36.32 without the companies having to adjust any of the items of cost submitted in the table which appears on page 1230.

Mr. GARDINER: And still have the same mark-up.

Mr. MASSEY: Certainly, in dollars, but not in percentage.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the dollars that count when you run a farm.

Mr. MASSEY: It is not the dollar that controls in this argument.

The statement of the minister I have just read is just as inaccurate as his previous statement.

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend got his dollars by running a farm he would know that it is the dollars that count.

Mr. MASSEY: I fully understand that, but trying to compare dollars in this instance is fatuous. It is an argumentative statement on the one side which, given to someone who does not understand these matters, sounds evil. I have demonstrated to the minister perfectly clearly from the report itself that he is using dollars instead of percentages. If he were an agent selling these machines on commission, would he sell a $50 machine for the same commission as a $1,000 machine? Certainly not; it is percentage that controls. The same principle holds in both cases, as the minister knows.

Further, in the same paragraph on page 2423 the minister says:

> If overhead costs were maintained at the 1913 level, a binder could be sold for $52 less without reducing any of the other costs and still leave the mark-up of 1913.

Surely the minister knows, and if he does not, every other hon. member knows, that overhead expenses in a manufacturing concern cannot be maintained to-day at the 1913 level. This is so obvious that it need not be elaborated further.

The conclusion of the minister's reasoning in this part of his speech is so preposterous and so damaging and so far removed from the facts presented to and accepted by the committee that I wish to deal with it in detail and plan to do so. His conclusion is found on page 2423 and reads as follows:

> I contend that a binder could have been sold at a lower price, and my contention is backed up by an examination of the cost basis in any one of the years with which I have dealt.

Now let it be remembered that the minister came to this conclusion following a review of the comparisons of mark-up by taking factory cost, freight and commission, and deducting the total of these three from the selling price in each year, and while so doing neglected the important items of factory burden, increase in experimental charges, increase in commissions paid, and increase in cost of distribution.

Mr. GARDINER: I must object. I am sure my hon. friend does not want to misrepresent me. The figures he has just quoted included all five items, and if he will read my speech he will find that I included them.

Mr. MASSEY: I have read the speech with the utmost care, and the minister's statement is very distinct. I am not going to take up my time now by reading it.

Mr. GARDINER: It includes even freight and cost of distribution.

Mr. MASSEY: I am sure the hon. gentleman will remember that when he made his extraordinarily provocative speech the other night he said he would permit one question if it were short. I did not interrupt again, and then he spoke for an hour. I am sure the minister is adding to my case the more he interrupts me, and I am delighted to have back-chat with him across the floor, but I do need all the time at my disposal. If I misquote him, of course, he has a perfect right to interrupt.

Mr. GARDINER: That is just what I got through doing.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not want to be regarded as discourteous in any way, Mr. Speaker, and I try to yield to every member in a courteous manner, but I need all my time and if the hon. member will permit me to proceed I should appreciate it.

There are two points which must be considered before making any statement such as the minister made in this connection. First, the cost figures, as pointed out on the table printed on page 332 of the report of the special committee, include a fixed overhead each year of 150 per cent on direct labour. These costs, of course, based upon such an overhead figure, are not actual costs for any of the years specified unless it happened that the actual overhead that year was 150 per cent of productive labour. There would be several instances reported over the period covered by the table when the overhead would be much higher than 150 per cent, and many times 150 per cent, whereas it is doubtful if in any of the years the overhead would be less. Thus, on the minister's reasoning, whenever the overhead exceeded 150 per cent the company would necessarily have to absorb a loss. Then, second, as I have just stated, no consideration has been given in the figures quoted by the minister to the cost of distribution and reported in an exhibit on page 20 of the report of the special committee, which shows that distribution expenses vary each year from 13·63 per cent of sales to 37½ per cent of sales. Using the percentages quoted in the report for the International Harvester Company of 22·13 per cent of net sales, which is fair, having in mind the fluctuations from year to year already pointed out, a decidedly different complexion is given to the figures quoted by the minister.

For example, let us take the year 1932, when the factory costs are recorded at $164.55, to which of course must be added freight of $25.12 and commissions of $46.50, or a total cost before distribution of $236.17. The selling price of a binder in 1932 was $273, so that a profit before distribution expense of $36.83 was shown for that year. Now, applying the percentage of 22·13 per cent of net sales, distribution expenses applicable to the binder in 1932 would be $50.12. As the profit before distribution expense was $36.83, this figure of course at once reflects a loss on the sale of each binder in 1932 amounting to $13.29. But if we look at exhibit A, section one of the report, page 20, we shall find that distribution expenses in 1932 were not 22·13 per cent of sales, but 32 per cent of sales, so that the figure used in arriving at the loss of $13.29 is low. Using the actual figure of 32 per cent the loss would be increased to $35.65 on each binder sold.

Are we justified in assuming, as the minister has assumed, that the mark-up for 1932 of $36.83 was profitable to the company and they should have been satisfied to continue operations upon that basis? Let us see what the minister suggests. He assumes first that the International Harvester Company was satisfied with the mark-up of $36.83 in 1932, and that the company profited with this mark-up, and so gleefully he looks at the mark-up of 1936, which amounts to $79.26, and assumes that here is implied an exorbitant return to the company at the expense of the farmer. He is still dealing with dollars and not in percentages. Of course such is not the case. The mark-up of $36.83 represents a loss on every binder sold of $35.65. And thus, with a mark-up of $79.26 as is shown for 1936, the company was attempting to offset the loss of $35.65 and to make a small profit on the sale of a binder, to the amount of $6.78. And, as the retail price was $281, this represented a profit to the company of 2·4 per cent. Will the minister now say that there was an exorbitant profit? Mark, Mr. Speaker, that I have arrived at the profit of 2·4 per cent from the figures presented to the committee, accepted by it, and available to the minister before he made his speech. Thus it is that one cannot help but be led to the opinion that the minister, in arriving at some of the extraordinary conclusions at which he arrived, simply failed to take stock of the facts as presented to the committee and essentially disregarded its report.

Time will not permit me to deal further with the figures used by the minister, but perhaps what I have shown the house thus far may demonstrate that in the speech which the minister made to the house he certainly arrived at some extraordinary conclusions, based on figures which are hopelessly in error, and did not follow the evidence submitted to the committee.

Let me turn to some of the general statements made and conclusions reached by the minister. On page 2424 he quoted from page 1256 of the implement committee's report:

> In the case of farmers purchasing on the terms set out on Table 1, it is shown that the credit expense expressed as an annual interest rate ranges from 24·7 per cent on the unpaid balance in the case of a 6-foot heavy mower to 42·5 per cent in the case of a W-30 tractor. In Table 5 the credit expense expressed as an annual interest rate ranges from 22·4 per cent on the unpaid balance in the case of a 6-foot heavy mower to 34·9 per cent in the case of a 7-foot single disc.

If the minister had gone further he would have told the house in his speech that evidence given before the committee definitely dispelled this misleading statement, which is based upon an erroneous interpretation of the commercial practice of giving a cash discount. To illustrate, if a merchant grants a two per cent cash discount for payment within one month, no intelligent person would say that he was charging a rate of interest of twenty-four per cent per annum if he was not paid cash. Further, let it be stated that, in deference to the views expressed by the committee, the "term policy" of most of the farm implement companies has been revised and may be regarded to-day as the most favourable basis of any industry dealing along similar lines. It is now confined to an interest charge of six per cent and a finance charge of one-fourth of one per cent for every three months, or approximately two per cent per annum. Of course the minister did not mention. On page 2426 the minister makes this statement:

> I think, after having considered these points, we would be justified in concluding that the credit business does carry itself.

In answer to that statement, it is obvious that the minister disregards the fact that from 1929 down to the present day one company, taking only one of the principal Canadian companies, has incurred losses on the credit business amounting to $4,100,000. Need anything be said further to explode the statement I just quoted?

Again, on page 2426 the minister stated:

> Surely the people have a right to expect, when the argument is used constantly by industry, that up-to-date machinery must be placed in the hands of those who are carrying on the industry in order that they may be able to compete with other countries, that this up-to-date machinery which is placed in the factories would produce our implements at lower costs of production. If so, the lower costs of production should result in lower prices to the consumer.

Now, an examination of the records of any of the implement companies will show that modern machines, such as combines and tractors and tractor drawn machinery—not old machines, horse-drawn machinery, old from the point of view of years, such as the binder as selected by the committee; I admit it was agreed by the implement companies that the binder should be taken, and that was a gesture on their part which was far-reaching in some of its effects—but dealing with the implements which in the minister's part of the world are principally used, they are being manufactured with increasing efficiency, resulting in materially decreased prices.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to ask the hon. member if he knows how many farmers in Canada use combines.

Mr. MASSEY: I have not the figure in front of me.

Mr. GARDINER: A very small percentage.

Mr. MASSEY: We will leave the combine out, if the minister wishes. I am sure, however, that as a result of the activities of the implement companies many more farmers are going to use combines.

[Mr. Massey.]

Mr. GARDINER: Only in a small area of Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: That is very questionable. They can be used in Ontario. That is not a small area.

Mr. GARDINER: They never will.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, that is a matter of opinion. Certainly not the big machine. The small combine can be used. They are using it now. Take the 12-foot combine, which sold in 1930 at $1,875, and which is being replaced to-day with an 8-foot machine which sells for $900. It is half the price of the machine it replaces and does all the work that a 12-foot machine would do.

Mr. GOLDING: Where are they using combines in Ontario now?

Mr. LAWSON: That has nothing to do with the speech. Let the hon. member go on.

Mr. MASSEY: I do wish to be tolerant, but the hon. member knows well that while the combine is not in extensive use in Ontario, many are convinced that it will be used there,—and it will be.

Mr. SENN: It is being used.

Mr. MASSEY: The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) says that it is used. I do not want to discredit the word of the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding), but I think I would rather take the word of the hon. member for Haldimand on farming matters. However, I will go on. It is far beyond the point, and I am sure the hon. member will permit me to continue my speech.

In 1927 a 20-30 tractor with steel wheels sold in Winnipeg at $1,440, while this year a far more efficient and high powered tractor sells at $1,178. The minister was content to make no reference to anything of that sort.

Again at page 2426 the minister said:

> Instead of a man as head of an individually developed, owned and controlled factory being satisfied with a reasonable earning on his invested capital, we have organizations financed on a basis which, in order to pay what appear to be reasonable profits on invested capital, must have twenty, thirty or forty per cent on the materials, labour, overhead, sales, distribution and freight costs.

I would point out that such a statement as that is so far removed from facts that it is hard to understand how it could be made by a responsible minister of the crown. Let me take the case of the largest Canadian company in the industry. Instead of extracting in profits—or extorting, as the minister would imply by that veiled reference—some twenty or thirty or forty per cent or some other astronomical figure drawn from the ether, that company has paid no dividend whatsoever since 1930, and shows the following record of losses:

In the last twenty years of operation, ending in 1935, a loss of 3.7 per cent.

In the last fifteen years of operation, ending in 1935, a loss of 3·89 per cent.

In the last ten years of operation, ending in 1935, a loss of 5·9 per cent.

In the last six years of operation ending in 1935 a loss of 12·26 per cent.

Need the house be given anything further to show conclusively the recklessness of such a statement as that of the minister, which could be designed to do but one thing, to create a false impression in the minds of those who hear?

Mr. GARDINER: That is a loss on the capital set-up?

Mr. MASSEY: Loss on the capital set-up is what I was giving the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: Read the next paragraph of my speech.

Mr. MASSEY: I would read the whole speech if it were worth repeating. Does the minister cherish the sound of his own speech so much that he likes to hear it re-echo through these halls and feel his ears glow once more, like a young man fresh from his first triumph?

On page 2427 we find the minister saying:

> Distribution costs must come down. The agricultural industry of this country cannot pay them in the prices of implements.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. MASSEY: Does my hon. friend realize what he is asking for?

An hon. MEMBER: The farmer cannot pay the prices.

Mr. MASSEY: He would rather have the machines break down and stand in the wheat and not cut any more crop? That is what the hon. member is asking. That is why I say that no consideration has been given to the two sides of this question; just the one side. The minister neglects entirely the fact that distribution cost includes service cost, service upon which the farmer rightly insists. Of course the cost of distribution would be greatly lessened if the service given to the farmer were decreased or made less efficient. But how vital it is that at all seasons of the year a highly efficient service organization be maintained by every company that sells implements. The minister himself, as a farmer, well knows how important it is to be able to get prompt service in case of an emergency occasioned by a breakdown or accident.

Also, if there were fewer firms competing for the total volume of business, total distribution costs would be less. Let me give the minister an example from Ontario. As the result of the succession of reductions in the rates of duty in the past three years from twenty-five to twelve per cent and finally to seven and a half per cent, a number of American companies, who heretofore have played little or no part in the Ontario business, have now entered the market to compete against the established Canadian companies. These companies, in order to hold their position in the Ontario market against the newcomers, have been obliged to increase substantially their sales and distribution expenses. What does this mean? Of course it means increased cost of distribution; the Canadian companies are perforce spending more money in order to hold the business which they heretofore enjoyed. On the one hand, then, the minister cries out for reduced duties to permit companies from the United States and other countries to come into Canada and compete against the Canadian companies, but on the other hand and in the same voice he makes the statement that distribution costs must come down. What an anomaly! Surely the minister is not blind to the fact that distribution costs go up under keen competition and come down if there is less competition. Does the minister not know what brought into being the Massey-Harris Company in 1891? It was almost bitter competition, with very heavy distribution costs as the result.

Mr. GARDINER: Competition under high protection.

Mr. MASSEY: High protection had nothing to do with it.

Mr. GARDINER: Forcing a merger of the two concerns.

Mr. MASSEY: As the minister well knows, it was the high distribution costs, each company trying to outsell the other in a market where there was room for only one, with the result that the farmer was paying through the nose as a result of the bitter competition. Now the minister wants wide-open competition, wants foreign machines brought in, on which there will be no service, no parts available; a breakdown meaning perhaps the loss of a crop. Will any large outside company develop machines for the Canadian market only? Will any foreign company come into this country and endeavour to develop exactly what the Canadian farmer wants? This is a relatively small market compared with other markets of the world. Let it be remembered that a reasonable protective tariff is the farmer's surest protection against increased prices due to increased distribution costs.

On page 2427 the minister is reported as saying:

> One only has to follow closely the evidence before the committee to realize that not only does the law of supply and demand not operate in setting the price of farm implements, but the industry does not think it should. If the law of supply and demand operates when the demand is down, the price will be low.

The minister is a farmer, and I am not. The minister is obviously not an economist, neither am I. But I do know that the implement industry feels that prices should be based on costs, not on the law of supply and demand. If one were to follow the minister's reasoning and permit the law of supply and demand to operate, when the demand was up prices should go high. And further, if this were the case, it would mean that when the farmers were buying little they would pay low prices, but when consumption was great and they were buying heavily they would pay higher prices; which would of course create a highly unsatisfactory state of affairs from the point of view of the farmer, and be wholly illogical from every point of view.

On page 2428 the minister reminds us that the cost of a binder in 1914 was $167 whereas in 1921 the price had increased to $326. What would be amusing, if it were not so damaging in its implication, is what was said by the minister in regard to what happened when the duty was reduced by two and a half per cent in 1922, and the price of the binder was reduced by $60. He of course implies at once that following the reduction in duty the price of the binder was reduced.

Mr. GARDINER: It was.

Mr. MASSEY: I hoped the minister would say that. That price was reduced eight months before the reduction in duty!

Mr. GARDINER: Just about the same time.

Mr. MASSEY: No, no—eight months before. The minister carefully avoided stating that the reduction in the price of the binder was made not as a result of the reduction in duty, which came six months later, but as a result of the sharp decrease in material prices, and also lower rates for labour. The $60 reduction had no connection whatsoever with the two and a half per cent reduction in duty.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, it had some.

Mr. MASSEY: The reduction in price was made before the reduction in the tariff.

Mr. GARDINER: But the discussions took place before the reduction.

Mr. MASSEY: Really I do not think one could be accused of discourtesy in neglecting to respond to that kind of interruption. The cost of material entering into the binder had dropped $31.61, and labour costs were down $9.09, a total reduction in cost, including overhead, of $53.64. Now let the minister, free of partisanship, survey what has happened to implement prices under tariffs. Let him not throw out to this country statements that leave an erroneous impression. He has had the facts before him in the report of the implement committee. Let him come to his conclusions from the evidence submitted under oath rather than temporize with figures that tell only part of the story.

Then, Mr. Speaker, on page 2428 of Hansard the minister says:

> For that reason I repeat the statement that high protection, by inducing competitors to enter a field already provided with sufficient industry, forces prices down to that point where industry cannot pay, and therefore compels price fixing in order that it may remain in business and regain profits.

Again I suggest to the minister that he re-read the report and see if he will reiterate that statement; for in so far as the implement industry is concerned, the facts are quite the opposite. There are four large manufacturers of farm implements in Canada, two Canadian companies and two United States companies, the latter having established factories here under protection in order to avoid the payment of duty and loss of the market. Under the protective tariff these four companies would share the bulk of the Canadian business, and it would be unlikely that newcomers would wish to attempt to break into the market and make the necessary capital expenditures to compete against those already in the field. This, as I have stated, at once means a reduction in distribution costs. But under the present tariff the number of firms competing for the total business available has increased, with the result that the expense of distribution has gone up, and with it the cost to the ultimate consumer, the farmer. That is the answer to the policy of my hon. friend's government. Remove the duty altogether and distribution costs will go up even higher.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. MASSEY: I have given the story over and over again, and still the hon. member wants to know why. Here is one of the strong reasons that prices always tend to increase as the duty decreases, and a protective tariff tends towards lower farm implement prices.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. What was the cost of distribution in 1935 or 1936?

Mr. MASSEY: I have not the figure immediately before me, but the hon. member can read it in Hansard.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I understood the hon. member to say that it was about 32 per cent. Does he not think the best way of competing would be to reduce that cost to ten per cent?

Mr. MASSEY: And give less service to the farmer? Surely it is not necessary to go over all the points at issue again; the hon. member can read them in my speech. I said the cost of distribution was 32·13 per cent in 1932, and that the average for all years from 1926 to 1935 was 22·13 per cent.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must tell the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MASSEY: I am almost through, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. MASSEY: Thank you, your honour. As I was just stating when my hon. friend interrupted, here is one of the strong reasons why prices always tend to increase as the duty decreases, and a protective tariff tends to lower the prices of farm implements.

Lastly—and I appreciate very much your courtesy, Mr. Speaker, and that of the house, in permitting me to continue—at page 2429 we find the minister stating:

> Agriculture, which is the greatest primary industry of Canada, refuses to be bled any longer by half a dozen manufacturing plants which give as their only real reason the fact that they are employing 4,159 men.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSEY: Who says "hear, hear?" Let him go back to his constituency and say it.

Mr. WARD: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSEY: Oh, our friend from Dauphin. Is there any hon. member who comes from a centre where manufacturing is carried on, or who has any real interest in the welfare of the industrial worker, who will say hear, hear?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSEY: I wish we could have those names so that they might be placed upon Hansard. I notice the complete silence of my hon. friend from Renfrew South (Mr. McCann); I notice the complete silence of my hon. friend from Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. McCANN: I was not paying any attention to you at all.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if I interrupted my hon. friend, but it is so hard to tell when he is paying attention and when he is not. In this instance I thought he was. Having sat for some time in this house no doubt he has become imbued with the sort of apathy that comes from the government benches, so that he may be suffering from a slight attack of amnesia.

Mr. McCANN: When it is worth while I am a good listener.

Mr. MASSEY: During the whole course of his amazing and provocative speech the minister made no statement quite so staggering, it seems to me, as the one I have just quoted. The implications of it are so far-reaching and so obviously a play upon sectionalism, pitting one group against another. It is the kind of statement, Mr. Speaker, that can do but one thing; that is, to promote ill will and hard feelings, without possibly doing any good. The minister states that the implement industry in Canada employs only 4,159 men. That statement, of course, is no more accurate than many other statements he made.

Mr. GARDINER: Again I must rise to a point of order. The hon. member will find at page 1244 of the report the figures for 1935, the last year for which the complete figures are given. Those are the figures with which I was dealing, and I took the official figures from the report.

Mr. MASSEY: Quite; those were the numbers directly employed in the industry, but does the minister imagine that these are all who are employed by that industry? Are these 4,159 men all those who are employed in the farm implement industry? If the industry were wiped out to-day would there be only 4,159 men lose their jobs? Is that all. Is that what the minister says?

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, it might be.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, it might be; quite. There are many times that number employed and the minister knows it. The industry as a whole should be considered, providing as it does a livelihood for persons gainfully employed totalling many times that number.

An hon. MEMBER: How many?

Mr. MASSEY: Does it matter? There is a principle at stake. Does it matter whether the number is 25,000 or 40,000 or 12,000? Does it matter?

Mr. DONNELLY: How many does it involve?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MASSEY: It is quite all right, Mr. Speaker; I do not mind. Even taking a figure as ridiculously low as that used by the minister, I wonder if he thinks the jobs of 4,159 men, particularly in these times, are worth protecting?

Mr. THORSON: They will not lose their jobs.

Mr. MASSEY: And now we have a lawyer who says these men will not lose their jobs. Is the minister prepared to rise in his place and say that the Canadian farmer is no longer prepared to play the noble part he has always played in the development not only of his vital primary industry but of Canada as a whole? That is the question at stake. Apparently I have greater faith in the Canadian farmer than some of my noisy friends, and more than the minister; for I do not feel that there is a farmer in Canada who, if the facts of the matter were fairly placed before him, would be willing to jeopardize the jobs of his fellow Canadians, the industrial workers, for a saving of a few cents in the farm budget. And now let this be noted, Mr. Speaker, that if the 7½ per cent duty on farm implements were removed; if a similar reduction were made in the price of imported machines; if the farmer purchased only imported machines; since of every $100 the farmer spends a maximum of $6 goes for the purchase of implements and repairs, the farmer's budget would be affected by a maximum of 45 cents for every $100 he spends. In other words, Mr. Speaker, are the jobs of 4,159 men to be reckoned on a 45 cent basis? Is any Canadian going to regard his fellow Canadians in that light? That is what the minister says in his speech, and there can be no other interpretation placed upon it. As one who represents a constituency—

Mr. GARDINER: I must correct the hon. gentleman again; he says it is quite proper for me to rise in my place to make corrections. If he turns to page 2429 of Hansard he will find that I said:

—but I suggest that the figures I have submitted to the house, which will carry us back into the years when twice as many men were engaged in the agricultural implement industry, will bear me out when I say that every time better conditions under which to produce have been brought to bear upon the agricultural industry, the implement industry has prospered.

In other words, I was advocating a policy that would bring about the employment of twice as many men.

Mr. MASSEY: I simply state to the minister that that is far from the interpretation that has been placed upon his remarks. Public opinion in many centres across Canada have been stirred by his utterances. For example, in my hand I have a clipping from the Globe and Mail which expresses its opinion in this matter in no uncertain terms. The statement appears in an editorial.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not write the editorial.

Mr. MASSEY: I rather thought the minister had not. Had he written it himself it would have been as accurate a description of his own opinion of his own speech as some of the figures he used. As one who represents a constituency in which there reside some 16,000 families dependent upon industry for their livelihood, and as a Canadian, I protest with all the vehemence of which I am capable against this statement made by the minister.

I deplore, Mr. Speaker, the advantage that a few have taken of what is called protection. Protection is designed for the benefit not of industry but of the industrial worker; not of farming, but of the farmer. And this country has been developed because all sections of it have worked together, farmer and industrial worker alike.

I am not one of those from the east who cries out against the financial burden that has been placed upon those of us who live in the east as the result of having to be of direct assistance to the west. It should be a privilege to have a share in carrying the other fellow's burden. The other day in this chamber we voted about $22,300,000 for relief, and other such purposes, in the dried out areas of Saskatchewan. The vast proportion of that money will be paid out of the pockets of the industrial east; but I ask this house, did any member from the eastern part of Canada rise in his place in protest against this payment? Not one of us. Why? Because we know, all of us, of the plight of the prairie farmer, and we are proud to be able to help him.

The policy that the late government put into practice is a policy that has been a policy of the Conservative party for generations. Protection has been a vital factor in the development of Canadian industry—not high protection, not unreasonable rates of duty, not embargoes, and not a lot of other things, but reasonable protection. Where would industry be to-day had it not had protection? And without those industries protection made possible there would have been no Canada as we know it, east or west. When every country in the world, without a single exception, is endeavouring to safeguard its domestic market, we in Canada are asked to reverse the whole process, to put our trust in markets everywhere —Europe, Asia, Africa—but not at home, not in the development of our own country and the prosperity of our own people.

Mr. Speaker, it is not the 7½ per cent alone on implements which is at stake in this debate. We are debating a principle, and tied up with that principle is not only the future welfare of this dominion, but the unity of Canada as well. I deplore such utterances as have been made in this house and in this debate—yes, and deplore them in the sacred name of Canadian unity.

Let me repeat in conclusion what I said in the beginning: We are all Canadians. We may be industrial workers and we may be farmers. We may have our sectional interests, it is true, but our primary interest lies in Canada. So I say, may we forget our sectional differences! May we forget parochialism, and together, each one doing his part to help the other, in unity of spirit, in unity of purpose and in unity of design, let us march forward to the development of a greater Canada.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, three factors enter into the selling prices of industrial products. With one of those factors, namely wages, I now propose to deal. The year 1926 is generally taken as the base year in a study of Canadian industry. In the five years of depression, from 1931 to 1935, wages paid in Canadian industry declined by 16·8 per cent. That was a relatively small decline. If we measure it, however, by the adjustment necessary owing to the change in the cost of living, it will be found that there were actually more wages paid per average year between 1931 and 1935 than in the pivotal year of 1926.

Mr. BENNETT: In terms of 1926.

Mr. DEACHMAN: It is a comparison of the actual wages in this period.

Mr. BENNETT: But in terms of 1926.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yes. If we take the wages, add them to the cost of raw material, and deduct the total from the value of products produced, we have an item which I could designate by no better term than the word "balance," and that balance remains to the manufacturer. Out of it he must pay overhead and interest on borrowed money, and from it he must take his profits.

In 1926 that balance amounted to $838,-800,000. For the five years of the depression it averaged $746,300,000. But when I make the necessary adjustment, due to the altered cost of living and express it in terms of purchasing power, the average becomes $918,-600,000. In other words, on the average, expressed in terms of purchasing power, the manufacturers of Canada received almost ten per cent more than they did in the base year 1926. Labour therefore got its share during the period of depression; those who were employed got their share. But of course I admit at once that there were a large number unemployed. The fact remains, however, that labour got its share, practically undisturbed. Industry got its share because in purchasing power it had more money and more value than it had in 1926. Let us consider the position of the farmer.

An hon. MEMBER: What did industry pay in taxes during the same period?

Mr. DEACHMAN: What does the farmer pay in taxes from the sale of his products? With what is he to pay taxes? That is the point I shall next consider.

In 1926 the gross farm income of the dominion amounted to $1,088,000,000. The average for the five years of depression, which I am sure the hon. member who has just spoken will be pleased to hear, amounted to $689,000,000. In other words, the manufacturer got more, but the farmer got an average of $399,000,000 less, or almost $2,000,000,000 less in the five year period than the comparative position would have been if he had received the standard which prevailed in 1926.

I appeal to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey).

An hon. MEMBER: Useless.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Useless? No, I do not agree with that. I admit I cannot appeal to his economic sense, but I can appeal to his sympathy. He told us he was strongly in favour of giving justice, a square deal and a fair wage to the worker in Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: And the same for the farmer.

Mr. DEACHMAN: All right, my friend. But the conditions which we had in that period did not produce justice for the farmer, because the manufacturer got an increase, the labourer got an increase and, on the basis of the story I have presented—which is accurate —the farmer got approximately $2,000,000,000 less.

Mr. BENNETT: The drought had something to do with that.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Part of that was an act of God. Sometimes I have heard that an act of God is anything which happens for which a lawyer cannot collect a fee.

During that period there was a decline by $2,000,000,000 in what the farmer received. Now, cut that in two, if you will, for the drought, or for any other disaster which may have happened. A great deal of the decline in the value of what the farmer received was due to the restriction of markets and to the raising of tariffs not only here but abroad. But if you cut it in two, then I suppose you may cut it in two again—and then what have you left? You have the decline in earnings expressed in terms of purchasing power, after being divided by four, of $500,000,000. The hon. member for Greenwood who, I am sorry to say, has been compelled to leave the chamber—

Mr. MASSEY: Here he is.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I thought the hon. member had gone to revise his speech.

Mr. MASSEY: It needs no revising.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The hon. member gave us some advice—and I am always glad to have it. He said there was danger of driving a wedge between one section of Canada and another. Can anything in the world prevent the driving of a wedge between agriculture and manufacturing, between agriculture and labour, if we are going to accept the dogma in this country that labour must have its share—

Mr. MASSEY: Is the hon. member asking a question, and does he want an answer?

Mr. DEACHMAN: I will answer it myself; but for the benefit of the hon. member—

Mr. SPENCE: You may not do it accurately.

Mr. DEACHMAN: —we have a position in which labour gets its share, in which the manufacturer gets his share, with a larger amount in a period of depression than he did in a time of prosperity, while the farmer has to accept $400,000,000 less throughout the year. It is creating a cleavage engendered by fundamental circumstances. What ought to be the attitude of this house? What ought to be the attitude of the hon. member for Greenwood? He should revise his speech; he should present a speech to us which would be a plea to the house and the country to consider the adoption of measures which would improve the condition of the farmer.

Mr. MASSEY: That speech is up in my office prepared and ready for delivery at the proper time.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I shall welcome it when it comes, if it contains anything worth welcoming. My hon. friend is interested in the workers provided they are not on the farm. According to the statement made by him this afternoon, he is more interested in the 4,159 workers—

Mr. MASSEY: Oh, no.

Mr. DEACHMAN: —in the agricultural implement industry than he is in those who work on the farm.

Mr. MASSEY: I rise to a point of order. I have a high regard for the ability of the hon. member who is speaking, but he must not misstate or misinterpret my remarks. I read an excerpt from the speech of the minister made on Friday evening. The minister referred to those 4,159 workers, and I asked if the jobs of those men were to be jeopardized when it meant a saving to the farmer of only forty-five cents a year.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I am coming to that point. If I have offended my hon. friend and have misstated him in any way, I shall be glad to withdraw. But the fact remains that the average earnings of a worker in the Dominion of Canada reflect the conditions which exist. He has been able to get his share, while the worker on the farm, according to unquestioned and reliable authority, has not got his share. In part, that is the result of the fact that he is compelled to pay the prices he has to pay because of protection.

My hon. friend says that this represents only $3.68; that that is the share which the agricultural implement people got out of this. But they are not the only ones who are sitting up late at night watching the farmer when he comes home; there must be at least a hundred of them. If the agricultural implement people get only $3.68 and there are a hundred others doing the same thing, if the average net earnings of the farmer are $362 per annum, they have taken $6 more than the farmer earned. That is the situation.

My hon. friend made a plea for unity. Unity is impossible under these conditions. He has admitted that Canada is fundamentally an agrarian country. Agriculture is our basic industry and you cannot restore prosperity when conditions are such as are recorded by these facts. In five years there has been a crash in income of $2,000,000,000 in the case of the farmer. I want to say something else. Let us consider the situation of the farmer as it is to-day. I have offered to cut this in four and put the figure at $500,000,000. The estimate has been made that there is a backlog of $200,000,000 made up of the unfilled requirements of farmers for agricultural implements. In addition to that, it is estimated that it would require at least another $200,000,000 to restore the buildings, fences and equipment of the farms of Canada to their proper condition. The farmer has not been able to cultivate his land properly, and there is a further estimate that it would require at least $100,000,000 to bring the land up to the normal standard which existed in 1926.

When industry is in that condition, what can be done? If what the agricultural implement companies took from us was an isolated case, then it would not be so important. But protection is a national policy so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned. It has been accepted and we have carried it on year after year. That ring has tightened around the farmer until he is ready to do almost anything to break through. I submit there are worse cases than the exploitation of the farmer by the agricultural implement people. There are other instances where the duty is higher. The farmer sees this ring around him tightening all the time, restricting his export market by restricting his imports, raising his costs of production when he has been in such dire straits for the last few years. Is it any wonder that he wants to escape? He wants to get away from these conditions and the agricultural implement industry offers a chance to break through. That is why he is out after it.

Mr. FRASER: Would they be willing to give up their protection?

Mr. DEACHMAN: I am glad the hon. member mentioned that. My hon. friend is a strong advocate of protection for the farmer. We have had protection for the farmer; it has been increased since about 1926. That was a case of luring the ducks over to the guns and shooting them when they had lost their power of flight. It was offered to the farmers to see if they could not be bribed by protection on a few articles on which protection could be applied, so that it might be more generously applied to articles which the manufacturers produced. I think the farmers of all people should regard with some measure of suspicion those manufacturers who come and suggest that the remedy for the conditions which now exist lies in protection for the farmer. My hon. friend wants to know how it works. In 1926, before there was much protection for the farmer, the gross income of agriculture was 22·1 per cent of the national income. In 1936 it was down to 16·8 per cent. That is gross income, while the net agricultural income in 1936 amounted to only approximately eight per cent of the national income of Canada. I think even my hon. friend will be willing to agree with me when I suggest that if the farmer thought he could get anything from a higher tariff on agricultural products, in fact he got a good deal less than nothing.

Mr. FRASER: He is still asking for it.

Mr. DEACHMAN: He is still asking for it!

Mr. FRASER: And still getting it.

Mr. DEACHMAN: And still getting it. I suppose my hon. friend views with rejoicing the fact that some farmers come and ask for it. But can you expect anything else when everything that is produced by the manufacturer carries a high tariff, when the manufacturers themselves appeal to the tariff board for a reduction in the duties on raw materials and ask that there shall be incorporated in the description of the tariff items in which they are interested a phrase reading something like this, "Free when imported by a manufacturer for use in his own factories?" When you find things like that in the tariff, do you wonder that the farmer, driven to extremities by conditions which exist, sometimes thinks he can step in and get a few of the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table? If the manufacturers are so fond of protection, is it not surprising that they sometimes ask for drawbacks. They tell us that tariffs do not increase the price. The hon. member for Greenwood told us that this afternoon, that tariffs do not increase the price of agricultural implements; yet I pick up a copy of the auditor general's report and here are some of the items I find.

Canadian Canners Limited received $150,000 in drawbacks. The Ford Motor Car Company, which tells us every few days that tariffs do not increase the price, although the tariff board found that the tariff accounted for an extra price of $18,000,000 for motor cars, received $1,286,000 in drawbacks. General Motors received $761,000. And here is a delectable item: The Massey-Harris Company received $34,583 in drawbacks, because they accepted the gospel that tariffs do increase the price of commodities which they import, but apparently they do not increase the price of the commodities which the farmer wants to import.

Mr. FRASER: These drawbacks were on export business.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Why did they want the drawbacks on exports? When they had to meet the open competition of the world they wanted a drawback, but when they sold within the sheltered market of Canada they thought they could charge it up to the farmer and they did not ask for a drawback.

Mr. FRASER: Maybe they have to compete with cheap foreign labour abroad.

Mr. DEACHMAN: If the manufacturers want to stand up to the test, will they ask that the duties on these articles they import be retained? By their very action they have denied the gospel they support. They pretend to accept it when they want to apply it to others but not when it is applied to themselves. May I suggest to my hon. friend who is keenly interested in this problem that he should make a statement in the house and defend the cause of protection?

Mr. FRASER: I have spoken.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I have not had the pleasure of hearing him defend it. When I had the pleasure of hearing him he was on a different tack. It was during the election.

The whole problem before us is this, and I submit it to the hon. member for Greenwood and to all others in that part of the house, especially to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn). The position of agriculture in the Dominion of Canada is a very serious one. It is one which requires the careful attention of every thoughtful man in this dominion, whether he be a manufacturer or whatever his business, and I would like to suggest that not only in parliament but among the members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association there ought to be some consideration for the interests of the farmer because the burden is becoming too great to bear.

There is this basic fundamental problem before the people of Canada to-day, and unless you can solve your agricultural problem you will have more difficulties in this dominion in the next ten years than you have ever faced before. It was a great Englishman and a great imperialist, Lord Rosebery who once remarked, "There is not a crofter's cabin in the Hebrides nor a close in the darkest quarter of Glasgow that is not a matter of imperial concern." There is not a farmer in the dominion, no matter how poor he may be, but ought to receive from this house the most careful and thoughtful attention in order that the problems he faces may be settled, and settled honestly.

I have submitted facts which show that under the conditions which obtained between 1931 and 1935 the labourer received his share, and the manufacturer received his share. They got theirs with interest, and the entire burden of the depression was borne first by the farmer, who suffered the greatest losses, and then by the other basic industries of the dominion. Unity? We ask for unity, but can you have unity without justice? Can you maintain in the dominion a condition in which to some companies are issued letters of marque, permitting them to exploit other people if they care to do so?

The hon. member for Haldimand told us to-day that he was quite willing to trust the manufacturers if the tariffs were raised high and the goods of other countries were kept out. But in the period from 1931 to 1935 he had the very condition existing for which to-day he prayed, and the figures I have given prove that, given the opportunity, and with every factor on their side, the workers and the manufacturers together said: We shall keep our share, and the farmer can take his chances so far as we are concerned. I submit to the house that under those conditions we cannot trust them, and the best way to control the situation is to remove the privilege which the manufacturers hold and let them meet open competition just as the farmers of the dominion have to meet it. Only as we do that; only as we approach that ideal, can we hope to solve the problem of agriculture in this dominion. That at least will help, and I know of nothing else that will.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. G. CLARK (York-Sunbury): With respect to the interesting and valuable report presented by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston), I should like to make some observations. I have been connected since my youth with the farm implement business, and I can well recall many years ago having visited Brockville, which is I believe in the constituency of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), to buy farm machinery from a manufacturer then located there. It has been my experience that since that time there has been an advance of two hundred per cent in the dealer's cost of certain types of implements then made there.

Having dealt with the International Harvester Company for forty years, I know that company to be a reliable, enterprising, strong, well managed concern, a good company with which to do business; but in all my experience of advances, the one put into effect on November 1 last seems the one impossible to justify, the one most uncalled for. It appears that it must have been planned for in the early summer, when the tendency, especially in the United States, was towards advances, but the present recession had come before the large advances were actually put into effect. This recession not only applied to certain materials entering into the manufacture of the implements but also to the prices of the products of the customers of the implement companies. I should like to mention some of the advances put into effect by the International Harvester Company on implements in general use by farmers, as applying to the east:

	Advance on November 1, 1937	Present (1938) price
Binder, 5 ft.	$18 50	$267 00
Mower, 5 ft.	10 00	115 50
Rake, 10 ft.	4 25	59 75
Manure spreader, No. 4 A	15 50	204 50
Fertilizer drill, 11 disc.	17 00	190 00
One-row potato planter, with fertilizer attachment	16 25	168 25
Potato digger, No. 4	25 50	200 00
Potato digger, No. 6.	27 50	204 00

It was stated in a letter quoted by the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) with regard to a cream separator concern, that it made a reduction in 1933 because of the low price of farm products. If the same consideration had been given generally to that idea, certainly the manufacturers in Canada would not this year have made such marked advances in the prices of farm implements. At the present time a large number of farmers in New Brunswick have, as their surplus crop to dispose of, potatoes. Potatoes are selling now for fifty cents per barrel of 165 pounds. That, I suppose, would be the equivalent of wheat at twenty-five cents a bushel, and we can well understand that if wheat in the west was only twenty-five cents a bushel there would be more demands from the west than there are now. We find that on planters with fertilizer attachment the advance put into effect on November 1 is $16.25, so it will take thirty-two barrels of potatoes to pay the increase alone in the price over last year. If a farmer wants to buy a digger, the increased cost of which is $27.50, it will take fifty-five barrels of potatoes to pay the increase, or 400 barrels of potatoes, 165 pounds to the barrel, to pay for that digger alone, an equivalent in cost of production to, say 800 bushels of wheat. That is just for a horse or tractor drawn digger; it does not include the power.

I am uncertain as to whether the duty has any effect in this case, because the present duty on the principal farm implements is only 7½ per cent. My suggestion is that the government should send a representative to the large manufacturers and ask that the last advance be cancelled and that the prices be restored at least to what they were last year; for it can surely be shown that the drastic advance was not justified and will result in a materially lessened sale as well as being a hardship to many farmers throughout our dominion. I quite agree that the potential market for farm implements is great, and that if prices of farm implements were reduced and prices of certain farm products advanced the demand for implements would be very large. Let me give a little instance. In one part of New Brunswick a good salesman made a survey last season. He brought in the names of some fifty-five farmers who wanted to buy mowing machines, but they felt that on account of the low prices of farm produce and other difficulties they would have to postpone the purchase. The result was that not ten per cent of those farmers made purchases last season. Apply that to other lines and extend it throughout Canada, and it will be seen that a proper relation of prices of farm implements to that of farm produce would bring about an enormous demand for the manufacturers to supply. It would be to their interest now to reduce prices at least to what they were last year, and so win the good will of parliament and the people of this dominion.

Mr. F. D. MacKENZIE (Neepawa): In my opinion the chairman and the committee which brought in this report are to be congratulated upon the fine piece of work they have done. They have completed a thorough job and brought in a unanimous report embodying thirty-six conclusions and recommendations which the house should speedily pass for governmental action. The committee was composed of members of every group in the house, and the report was unanimous; why then should there be any delay in implementing the recommendations? The House of Commons appointed this select special committee on February 1, 1937, to continue and complete the inquiry begun the year before by the standing committee on agriculture. The report was presented to parliament on April 7, 1937, and the understanding then was that the house would be asked to express an opinion at the present session.

While the inquiry was national in scope, the problem is peculiarly acute in western Canada, and the position of western agriculture is emphasized in the report, although full consideration was given to the whole country.

Some trouble apparently arises from the fact that nearly all the Canadian companies manufacturing farm implements are located in the province of Ontario, so to the other difficulties under which western Canadian and maritime farmers suffer is added the cost of freight, and there have been indeed many other difficulties to which it can be added.

As regards the condition of agriculture in the last decade, let me quote from page 1217 of the report:

> It needs little argument to support the general statement that the economic condition of agriculture since 1929 has been extremely bad. Almost every factor that could possibly affect the position of the farmer has operated to his disadvantage during that period. In western Canada the coincidence of poor crops over a long period and of abnormally low prices for farm products, combined with unfavourable world and local conditions, made the farmer's position a particularly unfavourable one. While industry attempted to restrict its losses by decreased production, entailing the laying off of employees, the reduction of expenses, and by the maintenance of prices for its product, the farmer, by virtue of being forced to market his products at prices largely determined by agencies other than himself, has had very little control of the financial results of his industry.

Note these phrases: "Coincidence of poor crops over a long period and of abnormally low prices for farm products." This combination of factors would be disastrous enough alone, but note what accompanied them. Those factors, "combined with unfavourable world and local conditions," as we are told, could not fail to make "the farmer's position a particularly unfavourable one."

We know that both dominion and provincial governments stepped in and spent large sums of money by way of relief to keep the farmer in business, and large sums to stabilize agricultural conditions in parts of Canada. And, to quote again, the committee felt, or hoped:

> . . . that it is quite fair and proper to point out to the farm implement manufacturers that these governments are spending such sums in order to keep the farmers, who constitute the customers of the farm implement industry, on their farms, and to stabilize and improve their condition. It is therefore not too much to expect the farm implement companies, who will indirectly benefit thereby, to make a substantial contribution toward the same end, and that this contribution should consist of supplying the farmers of Canada with the implements of production at the lowest possible price . . .

That was indeed a pious hope of the committee, but apparently one of those hopes deferred that make the heart sick. Was that expressed hope of the committee well founded? Did the wish fall on receptive ears? Was the hope fulfilled by the future actions of the farm implement manufacturers? Let events occurring since that time be the answer. This report was brought to the house on April 7, 1937, and before that summer was over the farm implement manufacturers further advanced their prices by 7·8 per cent. That is how they answered the hope of the committee.

The committee also studied the financial structure and results of the principal implement companies from 1926 to 1935. They delved exhaustively into costs, prices and distribution of implements and repairs and parts over a large range. These matters are all set out and analyzed in many instructive charts, which well repay study. On the matter of repairs the finding is significant and well worth quoting. It is found on page 1275:

> It should be kept in mind that the use of "repairs" is the "poor man's" method of keeping his implements in good condition when his financial position will not permit him to purchase a new machine, and that every effort should be made by the companies to keep the price of these repair parts as low as possible. This, in the opinion of the committee, the companies have signally failed to do.

Surely no comment is needed on that.

The committee also looked into the matter of tariffs, and made some pertinent statements on this subject. Here is one on page 1288:

The committee is of the opinion after considering all of the evidence submitted that a reduction in tariff undoubtedly should, and actually does, in the long run, operate to reduce to the lowest competitive figure the ultimate price to the consumer.

Again at page 1291 we find this summing up of the portion of the report dealing with the effects of tariffs and trade barriers:

To sum up, therefore, the committee is of the opinion that the reduction on tariffs should find its full effect in a comparative reduction in price levels unless the element of true competition is lacking. If this element is lacking it nullifies to some extent the natural effect of such reduction.

They go much further than that in the case of one implement, the cream separator. They recommend without reservation, in paragraph 16 appearing on page 1295, that cream separators be placed on the free list. On Tuesday, March 15, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) dealt exhaustively and exclusively with the question of cream separators and made out what I considered, and other hon. members agreed, was an unanswerable case for cream separators being placed on the free list. The complete case for making cream separators duty free is embodied, I submit, in that speech.

Then in paragraph 17 we find this:

That reduction in the tariff should and does, in the long run, tend to lower the price level to the farmer, depending on the extent of free price competition in the industry.

In view of the findings of the committee; in view of all the information upon which those findings were based, and above all in view of the action of the implement manufacturers in impudently flouting the government and the committee by increasing prices in 1936, with a further increase of 7·8 per cent last summer, after this report was presented to parliament, which increase means a new and unjustifiable levy of around $4,000,000 on the farmers of the prairies alone for the benefit of the makers of the tools they use, I cannot see why these implements should not be placed on the free list, and why resolution No. 17 should not read in that way.

In closing, may I quote short extracts from two letters received within the last few days, which set forth the considered opinion of the thinking farmers in this country:

The report of the special committee of last year, they feel, is a call to action which ought not to be ignored, and there seems to be no action in sight just now. They view this with extreme disappointment. That a widespread injustice should not only be permitted to continue but actually be allowed to increase creates a very grave situation.

Then, from the other letter:

We are very much concerned about this situation. The implement people appear determined to over-ride the conclusions and recommendations of last year's committee and to press still more extortionate prices in 1938. We think this is a challenge to Canadian democracy and we are looking for unified action on the part of the representatives of rural Canada.

As I see it, Mr. Speaker, that is the situation. Action is called for here, definite, effective and undelayed. That action should be, on the part of the government, to wipe out all duties on all farm implements.

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the discussion of the report of the special committee appointed to investigate prices of farm implements, my first thought is to avail myself of this opportunity to extend my congratulations to Mr. Graham, the solicitor, and Mr. Macdonald, the chartered accountant, upon their untiring efforts and effective work, which greatly facilitated the investigation.

The point that interests me most in respect to this matter is the present extremely high price of farm implements, especially when compared with the past and prevailing prices of the products which the farmer must sell in order to pay for the implements required to operate his farm. The object of this investigation was not to set the farmer against the implement manufacturer or vice versa, but, through a complete survey of the entire question relative to the manufacture, transportation and distribution of farm implements, to ascertain whether or not the increase made early in 1936 in the prices of this type of farm equipment was justified, and, if not, what action within the scope of governmental jurisdiction might be undertaken to assist in reducing the cost of these implements. I am aware that power is not vested in governments to state at what prices produce or equipment or goods must be sold within or without the boundaries of our country. In fact, I am not one of those who believes in regimentation or government control of agriculture, industry or business. Yet governments have control of fiscal policy, which is an instrument that may be used to promote the best interests of the greatest number of people.

I now come to a point which must not be forgotten. I refer to the necessity of maintaining the lowest possible price for all implements used in the production of natural wealth by means of agriculture, mining and forestry. The prosperity of this dominion depends to a large extent upon the development of our natural resources. Huge quantities of implements and machinery are required for this purpose, and in my opinion it is the duty of the government to see that everything possible is done to prevent exploitation of the producers of natural wealth through extremely high implement and machine prices.

The argument has been heard in recent debates on this question that the cost of farm implements represents a very minor expense to the farmer. I take strong exception to this assumption. The cost of the ordinary group of farm implements to be found on the average Ontario farm—and in this connection I am referring to the horse-drawn type of implement, thereby eliminating tractor or power machines—would amount to approximately $1,800. During his lifetime the average farmer will wear out two outfits. Add to this the high cost of repairs, and I am confident hon. members will agree with me that this represents a major item of expense to the farmer. In support of that contention I might say that on my farm I am using my third plough, my second binder and my second mower, so I feel that this statement is quite within the bounds of reason and truth. If we take the net income of the average farmer in the province of Ontario as given to this house by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), amounting to $365 a year, if my memory serves me correctly, it is not hard to figure out how long a farmer spends during his lifetime working to pay for these implements.

I come to another point which I desire to bring to the attention of the house. If during the period when the sale of implements almost reached the vanishing point, due to the greatly diminished purchasing power of the farmer, the implement companies had substantially reduced the prices of farm implements, this would have stimulated the purchase of these implements, which would have resulted in greater profits for the implement manufacturers and increased employment for those engaged in the implement industry.

In connection with credit or time sales there seemed to be ample justification for the implement companies to provide for an increase in the percentage of the cash or down payment, as it is commonly called; yet, in my opinion an exorbitant rate of interest is charged the farmers for the balance of the time payments. Furthermore, in recent years this cost has been materially increased. Let us take what might be described as staple implements on an Ontario farm, namely a binder, a disc drill, a mower, a ten foot rake and a four section harrow. The per annum rate of interest prevailing in connection with time payments on these machines for 140 to 180 days will amount to at least 16 per cent, a rate of interest which, I am sure the house will agree, is much too high.

In order to determine the true position of the farmer with respect to an exchange of the product of his labour for the implements required to operate his farm, I shall place on record approximate figures covering this point for the years 1913, 1926 and 1936. For this purpose I am using two typical implements used on an Ontario farm.

Mr. BENNETT: Are they in the evidence?

Mr. McNEVIN (Victoria): Yes; they are a six foot mower and a 13-run single disc drill. As regards farm produce, for the purpose suggested I am using two items produced extensively in Ontario, namely butcher cattle and butter fat, based on the market price at Toronto.

In 1913, 1,008 pounds of butcher cattle were required to purchase a six foot mower, while in 1926 1,600 pounds were required, and in 1936, 2,373 pounds. In connection with the disc drill we find that in 1913, 1,391 pounds of butcher cattle were required to purchase the drill, while in 1926, 2,464 pounds were required, and in 1936, 3,407 pounds.

Then, covering the same point, and using butter for the purchase of these two machines, we find that in 1913, 205 pounds of butter fat were required to purchase a six foot mower, while in 1926, 244 pounds were required, and in 1936, 423 pounds. In connection with the drill we find that in 1913, 267 pounds of butter fat were required to make the purchase, while in 1926, 376 pounds were required, and in 1936, 608 pounds.

I come now to the recommendations of the committee with respect to placing cream separators on the free list. In this connection may I say that during the debate some objections have been made with respect to the amount of time given by the committee to representatives of companies manufacturing cream separators to present their views. I am of opinion that sufficient time was allowed to cover the important points, in addition to the information secured by correspondence with the interested companies.

I shall now proceed to give comparative figures in connection with cream separators, on approximately the same basis as that used a few minutes ago with respect to typical farm implements. We find that in 1913, the proceeds from the sale of 320 pounds of butter fat were required to purchase a No. 16 De Laval cream separator, while in 1926, 250 pounds were required and in 1936, 430 pounds.

In connection with costs in the production of cream separators I understand the costs of the De Laval Company consist largely of materials purchased from the parent company in the United States or Sweden. According to information filed with the committee this item amounted to $50 for the No. 16 separator. The labour cost on each separator in the Canadian plant amounts to only $1.64. Therefore this company cannot do a very great deal of manufacturing in Canada in connection with the production of cream separators. The Canadian plant is in reality only an assembly plant. I would not be surprised to find that as a result of this situation substantial profits are retained by the parent company in either or both of the countries referred to, thus affecting the profit of the local company.

In view of these circumstances there seems to be ample justification for the attitude taken by the committee in recommending that cream separators be placed upon the free list. During the afternoon and formerly in this debate much has been said with respect to cooperation and unity in Canada. No one is more anxious than I am to promote sentiment of that kind. But let us consider what the farmer, the farmer's wife, son or daughter who turned a cream separator from 1931 until the first of this year received by way of an hourly wage. What did they receive for the labour expended in that operation? The answer is, far below a living wage. I am free to admit that in the months of January, February and March of 1938 butter fat did reach a substantial and profitable price. In my remarks I do not desire in any way to speak disparagingly of any citizens of the dominion or with respect, particularly, to those of the city of Toronto. But what did we find? We found that when butter reached thirty-eight or forty cents a pound, the women of that city banded themselves together to force down the price. I maintain that if we are going to develop unity in Canada, we are fully justified under such circumstances in rising in our places in the house and defending the rights and needs of those engaged in butter fat production in this province of Ontario.

In view of the foregoing facts it is not surprising that agriculture enjoyed prosperous times in 1926, because there existed at that time a reasonable balance of value between the farmers' sales of produce and their purchases of machinery and other commodities. I am sure the house will agree that the prosperity in the period referred to was not confined to the agricultural population, but was enjoyed to the same extent by all citizens of the dominion.

In order to determine whether the suggested increase in price early in 1936 was justified, or not, I shall make an analysis of the total costs in manufacturing implements in Canada in the years 1934 and 1935. We shall divide the costs into three classifications, namely, material, labour, and burden, based on 100 per cent of the net sales realization. In 1934, the cost of material amounted to 40·22 per cent, the cost of labour, 11·1 per cent, and the cost of burden—which means all other items entering into the cost of the implement—to 35·82 per cent making a total for that year of 87·05 per cent of the net sales realization.

In 1935 the cost of material amounted to 37·08 per cent; the cost of labour, 9·92 per cent, and the cost of burden, 19·75 per cent, or a total of 66·75 per cent of the net sales realization. A comparison of the costs for the above-mentioned periods fully demonstrates that the suggestion of the implement companies to increase prices may be described as absolutely unwarranted.

Mr. Speaker, a discussion of this question would not be complete without reference to the budget of 1936 when the duty on farm implements was reduced to its present level of approximately 7½ per cent. One cannot recall the discussion which took place in the house at that time without remembering the fear and apprehension which prevailed in the minds of some of the hon. members to my immediate left. May I direct attention to some of the remarks made at that time by the hon. member for Greenwood, whose family has had a long and distinguished connection with the agricultural implement industry in several important countries throught the world. The hon. member is reported at page 2539 of Hansard of 1936 as follows:

> The reduction of the duty on farm implements to 7½ per cent does one thing and one thing only; it spells disaster to the implement industry of Canada. This means that the jobs of 18,000 men are threatened by the introduction of this tariff.

The hon. member is also reported on the same page as having stated that his chief interest was not in the implement industry, but in the men employed in that industry and their jobs.

Let me refer now to the Labour Gazette to determine what has been the net result with regard to employment in the agricultural implement industry and manufacturing conditions generally in Canada. The Labour Gazette of March, 1938, contains a table at page 306 giving a comparison in the numbers employed in the manufacturing industries from 1933 on, taking the average of 1926 as 100. The figures for February 1 of the different years for manufacturing are as follows:

1935	90·1
1936	98·5
1938	110·3

These figures show that conditions have improved in the period referred to. I want to state emphatically that while I am deeply interested in the welfare of those engaged in our agricultural industry, I am also greatly interested in the welfare and jobs of those employed by the implement companies or by any other industry in Canada. In order to present to the house a true picture, perhaps I should give the figures with reference to employment in the agricultural implement industry. These figures are for the same periods as those given for industry generally, and are as follows:

1936	65·5
1938	76·9

Let me now direct the attention of the house to some figures in connection with production in the implement factories in Canada. In 1935 this industry produced $13,692,476 worth of implements. In 1936 this figure was increased to $15,957,460, which represented the highest production since 1930. It is generally admitted by all companies that operations in the year 1936 were more profitable than in the previous year. May I turn now to the exact number of persons employed in the agricultural implement industry. My figures are taken from the dominion bureau of statistics. In 1935 the total number of salaried employees and wage earners was 4,989, their wages and salaries amounting to $5,325,620. In 1936 the number of salaried employees and wage earners was 5,508, an increase of 519. The salaries and wages for this year amounted to $6,041,620, an increase of $716,000 or 13 per cent more than the amount distributed for this purpose in 1935.

[Mr. McNevin.]

During this period imports of agricultural machinery increased from $5,493,428 in 1935 to $9,373,876 in 1936. Slight gains were recorded in several items, but the chief advance was in connection with tractors and parts, where the increase was from $3,347,598 to $6,507,788. I may be subject to correction, but my understanding is that the rate of duty for these items remained practically the same as heretofore. In giving these figures I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not attributing a lack of sincerity on the part of the hon. member for Greenwood. I have the highest regard for his honesty of purpose and integrity; yet this comparison of the results obtained in the last two years has proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that the fears and apprehensions which so greatly disturbed his mind two years ago were without foundation.

One further point; it is true that certain specialized lines of agricultural production enjoy a measure of protection, but these branches represent limited areas of cultivation outside which we find the major farm operations such as beef and pork production, many lines of dairy production and, last but not least, the wheat growers. These latter classes, which are outside the specialized lines, do not at the present time nor will they for many years to come benefit by the placing of protective duties against the importation of similar commodities into this country. It is in this latter group that we find the vast majority of those who are demanding cheaper implements. In my opinion, the result of this investigation has proven that their demands are fair and reasonable. In considering the prevailing rate of duty on farm implements, I am not going to argue that a 7½ per cent duty constitute a high tariff or that the removal of this tariff would solve the entire problem of high implement prices. In fact, I am in favour of reducing the rate of duty on the raw materials which enter into the manufacture of implements to correspond with the reduction in the duty on the finished implements.

We are dealing with complex problems in this parliament, but in my opinion the placing of increased purchasing power in the hands of our farm population is paramount among them. If this can be accomplished, many lesser difficulties will disappear. Too wide a margin has existed between the price of farm products and the price of farm implements. As a means to assist in correcting this discrepancy I support the opinions recorded in the conclusions and recommendations of the special committee, whose report we are dealing with at this time.

In conclusion, may I point out what I believe is the weakest point in connection with this entire question? I refer to the non-existence of a strong active farm organization in the Dominion of Canada, whose representatives could have sat down around a common table in 1936 with the representatives of the implement companies and discussed this question on its merits before the increased prices were put into effect. If action of this kind had been possible, I do not believe the unjustified increase in price would have been authorized. I think more could have been accomplished by this method than can be accomplished by discussing the problem in this house. The farmers would then be in a position to bargain collectively on a basis similar to that used by organized labour.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to make a speech, but I am going to state a few facts and draw my own conclusions.

I visited a farm twenty-two miles west of Fort William, and I saw a separator which had done its work and was being cleaned up for duty again. I saw five gallons of cream in a can, and I asked the farmer how much he would get for it. He said, "Eighty cents." I was appalled. Five gallons of cream for eighty cents! And as I sit in this house and listen to the minister trying to induce the youth of Canada to take up farm life, I wish he would take a peek into that can of cream —five gallons for eighty cents. Those who have been brought up on a farm know what work that means. It meant many a tired hand. It meant getting up early in the morning; it meant the care of cattle, long hours of work. I do not say that is an argument against the price of separators, but I do say it is an inducement to protect not the seller of the separator but rather the man who buys it. I know something of organized labour, and I know it is pretty well able to take care of itself, but those who work on the farm have not been able to take care of themselves. The man in the factory works eight hours a day and gets at least forty cents an hour, but the young man on the farm could hardly make a living if he worked only eight hours a day. He works more like ten or twelve hours a day and more, and he does not get forty cents an hour. It would take many a can of milk to show enough profit to buy a pair of overalls for the farmer or a new hat for his wife.

We are told that the farmers in the west, as I view them in southern Saskatchewan, should be induced to go into mixed farming, but I would ask those who urge the farmers to do that to take a peek at that five gallons of cream for eighty cents.

Mr. EDWARDS: Eighty cents a gallon?

Mr. McIVOR: No. Who should be protected—the manufacturer who makes the machine or the man who uses it? I congratulate the committee most earnestly upon the encouragement it gives to our farmers in recommending that cream separators and other implements be put on the free list.

Mr. E. O. BERTRAND (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on this motion for concurrence in the report of the special committee that has been considering the high price of farm implements. So many have spoken already in this debate that it is difficult to avoid touching on some things which have already been discussed, but I noticed this afternoon that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) stated that during the period from 1890 to 1935 the implement manufacturers in Canada had merely made a profit of 3¼ per cent on the stock issued by these companies during that period.

To put before the house what the position of the implement manufacturer is, may I be permitted to state that one company merged with other manufacturers in 1891 with a capital of approximately $3,500,000, plus $1,000,000 added later, about 1911, and what has been the result for this company? In the period from 1891 to 1912 the following profits were made, and I am giving these figures because I want to show, in answer to what was put on the record by the hon. member for Haldimand, that in some periods the farm implement manufacturers have been fortunate enough to make large profits. The company in question paid cash dividends to the amount of $11,212,349; stock dividends to the amount of $8,500,000; a rest account was created of $6,500,000, and a special contingency account set up of $1,680,000. In addition, there were unallocated profits of $1,062,000, or a total of $28,959,349 on an investment of $3,500,000, plus $1,000,000 invested later. All that was made in a period of about twenty-one years, and when we are considering the whole situation in regard to the high prices of farm implements I think this should be noted and drawn to the attention of the government.

May I also observe that these immense profits were made during a period when farm implements were selling at comparatively low prices. In 1912, for instance, a six-foot mower, Eastern, was selling at $43.50; a six-foot binder, Eastern, $102; a six-foot hay loader, Eastern, $60; fifteen-disc seed drill, Eastern, $69. In 1937 the same machines had increased in price as follows: Six-foot mower, Eastern, $96.50; six-foot binder, Eastern, $225; six-foot hay loader, Eastern, $122; fifteen-disc seed drill, Eastern, $166. It will be noted that these priecs indicate an increase in the selling price running from 100 to 125 per cent over prices in 1912. In spite of that the farm implement companies again increased their prices on some lines of implements on November 1, 1937, the increase to take effect in 1938. Let us see how these increases compare with the prices of the commodities produced by the farmers. The index price, based on 100 in 1926, of all farm products in 1913 was 64. In 1930 it had risen to 86, and in 1937 the figure was 85. So 1937 shows a reduction of one point as compared with 1930, and an increase of thirty-three per cent over the index figure of 1913. How can the farmer stand an increase of 100 to 125 per cent in the price of farm machinery if he receives an increase of only thirty-three per cent in the price of his own products in the same given period.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) said this afternoon that one of the problems facing the government was not so much to reduce the tariff on farm implements or to take other steps to reduce the price of farm implements, but rather to increase the purchasing power of the farmer. May I say at this juncture that the hon. member for Greenwood is simply suggesting that the increased buying power of the farmer should be used to enable him to buy machinery produced on a protected basis. But how can that be done? The farmer in this country has a surplus of products which has to be sold on the markets of the world and in competition with the products of other countries. Consequently, on the one hand he is compelled to sell on a world-wide competition, while on the other those on the opposite side of the house would require him to buy on a protected market the implements necessary to his production.

Let me point out that from 1930 to 1936 many farmers had to write down their invested capital, and the amount of money which was borrowed by them had also to be reduced in many instances in order to enable them to stay on their farms. Might not the manufacturer of agricultural implements be asked to write down his capital investment correspondingly during a period of crisis, or be asked at least to arrange that profits should be paid only upon the real capital investment and not upon stock issued during periods of expansion? He might be enabled thereby to reduce the price of machinery.

The hon. member for Greenwood also said that the farmers of Canada have played a noble part in the development of our country and that they will gladly pay a few dollars more to help their fellow citizens who are working men. I do not doubt that they have done so in the past; indeed I am sure they have done it, and I am quite positive they are willing to play the game again in the future, but not to give larger profits to manufacturers of implements or any other products upon an unreasonable capital set-up. Consequently, I would ask the government to take means through the tariff structure not only to bring back these companies to reason but also by suitable measures to restore and secure to the farmer the ability to obtain his implements of production at the lowest possible prices. Canada will be prosperous if its farmers are prosperous.

In concluding these very brief remarks, I take pleasure as representative of an agricultural county, in supporting the report of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston), and in asking the government to take whatever steps are practicable to secure in future for the farmer his implements of production at the lowest prices possible.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): The debate on this subject is taking considerable time, but I feel that I should say a few words upon some of the questions which have been discussed.

As regards the remarks of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), some hon. members interjected that no one would sell cream at eighty cents a can. In many parts of western Canada cream has been sold at seventy-five cents a can, and eggs at five cents a dozen, so that it has been extremely difficult for the farmer to live, especially during the depression years. It is certainly true that the farmer is kept solvent not by his gross but by his net income. If the prices of farm machinery must be just and equitable, so should the prices of the farmers' production.

The speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was excellent in spots, and delivered with his usual force and precision. But I should like to remind him that it takes time for any policy or the benefits of that policy to develop, and the report shows that when benefits are being obtained from a policy it frequently happens that the policy is changed or at any rate the underlying conditions are changed. Three years have now elapsed since the commencement of the agricultural investigation by the original committee; practically two years have gone by since the special committee first began to investigate the price of farm implements, and conditions have certainly changed during that time. I should like to read a little piece from the Manchester Guardian with regard to conditions on the North American continent since September, 1937:

> The severe slump in American business activity, which started in September of last year, wiped out the gains of a three-year industrial recovery within the brief period of four months Many vague reasons have been put forward to explain this unparalleled decline, but it has now become evident that it was primarily due to (a) sharply rising costs and price disparities.

These have been largely discussed in the reports given by various members of the committee.

There is no doubt that inventories of farm implements have been increasing especially when the purchasing power of the farmers has been so low.

> (c) Labour troubles.

That applies especially to the United States. And in both countries:

> The downward trend was temporarily checked in January, and many administration experts confidently predicted that the depression had run its course. But the lull proved short-lived, and by the beginning of February trade indices showed signs of renewed recession. Some industries, such as utilities, building, and retail trade, whose business had held up extremely well, fell back rather sharply. . . .
> The most serious obstacle to any recovery is to be found in the inventory situation. There is no doubt that the over-rapid piling up of inventories at the beginning of last year, as a protection against inflationary price advances and labour troubles, created a most unhealthy industrial boom, which people mistook for real prosperity. Although good progress has been made in the reduction of these excessive stocks, they are still out of line with current consumption in many industries.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) spoke at length upon the cream separator industry. I should like to touch upon this subject, because it affects so many people in my constituency. One of the most important sources of revenue for the farmers not only in Alberta but all over Canada is the cream cheque. While it may be true that large dairy farmers who are milking quite a number of cows with the intention of selling the cream after separation may not regard the price of a separator as high, many of our farmers are dependent upon a few cows, and the cost of a separator means much to them, especially when their cream cheques do not amount to more than $150 anually and, as I suggested at the beginning of my remarks, when the price of cream becomes at times so low. These farmers usually raise large families and depend upon them for assistance around their farms. The cream cheques of these farmers are too small to enable them to pay high prices for their cream separators.

There is no doubt that tariffs increase the prices of home manufactured articles, or why would the manufacturers fear the competition in the dairying industry of the Viking and other imported separators. In the investigation it was found that prices of implements frequently rise because of the increase in the cost of raw material, which may be brought about by rearmament or other factors. But it is equally evident to the committee that excessive inventories and excessive capitalization increase the prices of articles within the country. It seems to me that if the tariff were lower, Viking and other makes of separators could be delivered in this country at a reduced price. We in the west realize that the country must have revenue to carry on its development and at the same time assist in creating local markets for our products. Hon. members realize that the consumer eventually pays the duty, and that wherever the consumer lives, whether in the east or the west, he is indirectly contributing to the revenue of the government. No objection can be taken to a tariff that affords industries indigenous to Canada reasonable protection against competition from low wage countries. It is strange to hear some members of the Liberal party advocating a higher tariff and others a lower tariff. Certain provinces gain by the tariff; others lose by it. This inequality should be offset by some form of compensation for those which lose by the tariff. Canada's national tariff policy is costing the prairie provinces much more than it should, because the price increase occasioned by duties is a burden that western people find it hard to bear. It is both short-sighted and inaccurate to say that the prairie provinces have brought their present troubles on themselves by their own action, and that it is up to the west to work out its own solution. I should like to quote from an article which I wrote myself some time ago on the national policy of Canada:

Canada is admittedly a difficult country to govern, as its geographical configuration suggests. What pleases one part of Canada frequently displeases another part. Tariffs are difficult to adjust with any degree of satisfaction all around. When the national policy was brought down in the budget of 1879 it was made abundantly clear that it was designed, as its name implies, to confer benefits upon the varied interests of the entire dominion. The government of the day denied in the strongest terms that it was intended to confer special advantages upon any one section of the country. On the contrary it was calculated to strengthen, revive and create manufacturing industries in all the provinces of the dominion, thereby establishing, it was declared, a larger home market for agricultural products in each and all of the provinces. Such were the motives and purposes of the national policy. But what do we find? To-day western Canada is suffering for want of local markets.

In pre-depression days the purchasing power of the prairie provinces contributed substantially to the industrial employment and general prosperity of eastern Canada. In fact, it was only with the development of the west that eastern Canada began to prosper. In the west there has been overemphasis in the past on wheat production. Less work is expended for the amount of returns in large scale wheat production than in any other branch of farming. Consequently, when mixed farming became general, western people took a deeper interest in the price of farm implements, such as the cream separator, used in this work. It is all very well to talk about raising the prices of farm machinery because you have to increase the wages of the employees, but when these men enjoy life through higher wages the farmers should be able to enjoy life because of the better demand and better prices for their products. So, if it is necessary to raise the price of machinery, some measure of justice should be done the farmers by raising their prices. These prices must bear some relation to costs. So long as manufacturers' prices are falling they can regard prices for their products with equanimity. Naturally manufacturers' costs do fall with the introduction of more efficient labour-saving devices. This enables them to sell at a lower price with a sufficient margin of profit, thus benefiting the consumer. Our farmers are mostly small scale producers who cannot employ large labour-saving machinery in order to reduce their costs to a minimum. Their standard of living is lowered because of these things, and they cannot purchase the machinery which the manufacturers produce.

[Mr. Hayhurst.]

It was stated by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) that all groups in the house had sufficient representation on the committee, especially the special committee. But I am very sorry to say that the members of the committee were not selected for their representation of agricultural areas. I should like to commend all the members of the committee for their long-suffering patience in hearing the tremendous amount of evidence submitted. But, on looking over the names of those forming the special committee, I find an unusual situation in regard to representation by provinces. We find one member from Nova Scotia, two from New Brunswick, three from Manitoba, three from Quebec, six from Ontario, seven from Saskatchewan, three from British Columbia, and none from Alberta or Prince Edward Island. Looking at the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon), if the Liberals wanted to put on the committee a Liberal from Alberta they might have chosen him. This all seems strange when we consider that Alberta is one of the largest mixed farming areas in all Canada. It seems to me that that province should have received more recognition in regard to the committee personnel.

It is well known that many Liberals advocate the raising of prices by means of tariffs, and many propose to lower prices by lowering tariffs. The choice offered to the free and enlightened elector is twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee. In that regard I should like to read a short extract from a speech delivered in the session of 1937 by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in regard to this question as we have observed it this afternoon, when we saw certain members of the same party sniping at each other as to what is best in the interests of the farmers in regard to tariff policy on farm implements. It is strange that after we have an expert committee investigating, and experts giving their views to this committee, we are no further advanced, because evidently they have not persuaded any hon. member whether he should vote for high or low tariffs, or whether the agricultural implement companies are dealing justly with the farmer. Speaking towards the end of last session the right hon. leader of the opposition said, as reported at page 2924 of Hansard for 1937:

In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, in taking my seat I can only congratulate the government upon this masterly demonstration of their ability to hold under their banners troops who are marching to different objectives; who in times past marched shoulder to shoulder in a battalion to accomplish the defeat of a common enemy; and who, that victory having been won, find it no longer pleasant to reflect upon that past, and instead of fighting shoulder to shoulder, are now fighting back to back, not for the purpose of destroying protection but for the purpose of rendering some assistance to a downtrodden country. And in the meantime the consumer who is not a member of the league can but hope some day to join it.

Every effort is made to rivet the attention of the public on tariffs, while crisis succeeds crisis and the mortgagee grips the land with ever greater tenacity. Political democracy is beginning to perceive that its very life depends upon winning economic democracy. The equitable distribution of opportunities, income and property within our nation will not only ensure internal peace and progress but, by the diminished pressure of the need for external markets for our goods and capital by reason of the increased volume of home consumption, will abate the perils of international conflict. The productivity of brains in industry and agriculture has hitherto found lucrative vent in supplying the growing needs of a rapidly increasing population, but the disastrous collapse of industry and employment since 1929 has made it evident that full recovery demands higher wages and more leisure for labour together with an expansion of public expenditure on works and services calculated to reduce the profits of capital.

I trust that something good will come out of the discussion which has taken place in the house with regard to this investigation into the prices of farm machinery, and that these prices to the farmer will be reduced to conform to the prices of the products which the farmer has to sell. Because there is no just relationship between the prices at which the farmer has to sell and the prices he has to pay for manufactured articles, a great deal of unrest has developed in Canada. That is not good for the country. A better situation can be brought about only when the farmers, who are the back-bone of the country, live in a certain state of economic independence.

Mr. G. W. McDONALD (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have read and studied the report of the special committee appointed by the house to investigate the prices of farm implements, and I agree with the recommendations of that committee. It is quite true that the committee was composed of men inclined to be sympathetic to the best interests of farmers; but no fault should be found with that, because if the house would legislate and do more in the interests of the farmers there would not be very much wrong with the implement industry. That industry would be prosperous, because, as the farmers of this country become prosperous, there is no doubt that the number of men employed in the manufacture of implements will be very greatly increased.

Abuses creep into every business and industry as time goes by, and I am quite sure there are some in the farm implement business. For some thirty-five years I have been engaged in the retail end of that business. I do not pretend to know anything of what it costs to make an implement; but I do know something about the retail side of the business, which has to do with the cost of distribution, because in the price of all farm machinery a certain amount is allowed for agents' commission. Sometimes, when the companies find competition pretty keen, they perhaps employ too many salesmen, and in the set-up of the implement companies I think there is one weakness. They have two separate departments, a sales department and a collecting department, and the one has little or no sympathy with the other. The salesmen are instructed by the company to go out and sell as much as they can, which is a very natural thing to do. Then, in the fall of the year, if conditions happen to be bad, they put on more collectors, and those collectors are out to get every possible cent. Some of the makers of farm implements in this country are not running their own business at the present time; they find themselves in financial difficulties. To-day one of the biggest manufacturers of farm implements is in the hands of one of the great financial houses of Canada. These people know little or nothing about the troubles of the farmer, and they are going to collect every cent possible; that is their business.

I believe that in the early days of this business some of the companies did make money. I know the United States companies doing business in this country are pretty well financed; they are pretty strong and are able to stand a few years of depression. On the other hand, I believe some of the Canadian companies are not in a very good financial position. They may have made good profits in the past; there may be too much water in their set-up at present—I know nothing about that—but they are in difficulties to-day, and I am not sure that the removal of the 7½ per cent protection which they now enjoy is going to improve the situation very much or reduce the price to the farmer. I am just a little afraid that it will not do all that the house is expecting it to do. However, since abuses have crept into the industry, and since this is about the only weapon the house has available, I shall have to support the recommendation of the committee if they advise the abolition of that protection.

That is particularly true with regard to cream separators. My good friend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) was not in error when he said that five gallon cans of cream were sold for eighty cents. I saw them being sold for that amount, at a time when manufacturers of cream separators in this country were enjoying the very highest protection, though the farmers were getting the lowest revenue they had received in years. Such conditions cannot continue, and if this committee recommends something that appears a little drastic it is not to be wondered at.

The complaint has been made that the cost of repairs is too high. It is true that repair parts cost more than the parts which go to make the complete machine, but there is no doubt that repair parts should be somewhat higher. It takes an army of men to look after these repair parts. I think I am not exaggerating when I say that in the city of Winnipeg to-day there is between $500,000 and $1,000,000 worth of repair parts, and it costs a great deal of money to carry them. The best machine in the world is no good if it is standing broken down in a field of wheat, and there is no repair part within fifty or a hundred miles. These parts must be kept at the shops of the agents if they are to be of any service to the farmers. That costs money; it means express charges, and there must be a man on hand who knows his business. They change these machines so often that it almost requires an expert to get the right parts.

Someone has suggested that the machines should be standardized. Apply that to any other business in this country and see what you get. For example, try to apply it to ladies' wearing apparel and see how far you can go. If the machines were standardized and every company could make the same kind of wheel or boxing or gear, there would be no competition. What would be lost in quality might be saved in price, but that does not help you on a harvest day when a machine is broken down and you cannot get it to give service. It costs money to carry all the repair parts.

Someone has said that distribution charges are too high. They may be. But I wish to point out that no one knows to-day how many binders, how many threshing machines, how many tractors or how many machines of other kinds will be needed to harvest Canada's crops this year. If those crops are heavy a great deal of machinery will be required. That stuff cannot be made in July and August; if we wait until that time it will be too late. The warehouses must be filled with goods ahead of time. The machinery must be placed at strategic points throughout the country if it is going to be of any use to save the crops which it is hoped we will harvest, in view of sufficient moisture in the western provinces.

In 1915 I was in the implement business, and as part of my business I supplied binder twine. I do not know where the crop of that year came from. I thought it was a short one, but I do know that we sold more twine in that year than we had sold in any year before. We could not get the twine in Canada. I was agent for the International Harvester Company. I would telephone our office at Brandon, and every second day the express car on the train of the Great Northern, which ran through Boissevain to Brandon, would bring us 10,000 pounds of twine. Had it not been for that supply we would not have harvested the crops. There was at the time no company in Canada which could supply the twine in sufficient quantities. We happened to be on a branch line where we had good service with St. Paul and Minneapolis, and we succeeded in getting our twine every second night.

As I have said before, no one knows what the crop in Canada this year will be. If we are to harvest it and save it, we must have machinery stored at certain points where the harvest is likely to be heavy. It costs money to do that. I have made these statements in favour of the implement companies. Possibly, if the committee had sat down with the different farm implement manufacturers and asked them about their problems, some better arrangement might have been reached.

In 1931, when I saw the price of farm produce going down to a point where I knew the farmer could not pay high prices for farm implements, I wrote the International Harvester Company and the John Deere Company, for which I acted as agent, and pointed out that if they wished to keep the good will of the farmer the best thing for them to do was to reduce their prices by at least 25 per cent. I gave as a reason that the farmer would not be able to buy unless a big cut was made in the price of implements. He was not receiving prices which would permit him to pay high prices. However, they both wrote the same kind of reply in which they stated that they were confronted with the high price of labour and materials in the implements they had to sell.

I know it would not be wise to accept and I know that no manufacturing company would accept, as a long term policy, one which stipulated that it should sell goods below cost of production. But I must point out to the house that the crop harvested in 1930 cost just as much to grow as crops for which the farmers received $1.25, $1.50 or $1.75 a bushel. For the 1930 and later crop they had to take a dollar, seventy-five cents and sometimes as low as twenty-five cents a bushel at points where freight rates were high. As is pointed out in the report, in order to retain the good will of the farmer I believe the manufacturers of farm implements should not have advanced their prices.

May I point out, however, that manufacturers of farm implements are not the only big business men who have made mistakes. The pulp and paper industry of Canada is suffering to-day because it got into the hands of big financiers, with a resulting over-production. Our flour milling industry is able to produce three or four times as much flour as it can sell. If any Canadian industry becomes prosperous, the financial interests are only too quick to get hold of it. They buy at the most reasonable prices, turn around and sell to the country at twice the price, and then slip out of business. That has been done in many instances. It may have been done in the past with the farm implement business; I think it was, to some extent.

There are certain factors which enter into costs. The statement has been made that the implement manufacturers are not making better machines to-day than they did some years ago. I say that is not so. The farm implement people to-day have made just as much progress in the perfection of their products as have the automobile manufacturers. We know the advances which have been made in the automotive industry, and I know we have better implements to-day than we ever had. The people who make farm implements are really the farmers' best friends, except that, like everybody else, they may be selfish in that they would like to see the farmer prosperous because they know, when he is prosperous, they will prosper with him.

I believe the committee is within its rights in recommending that the makers of farm implements should take into consideration the fact that the farmer is their only customer, and a time when he is not making money is not the proper time for them to advance prices. They should be willing to take their losses along with the farmers; no doubt some of them have done so.

If I understood the hon. member for Greenwood correctly, I understood him to say that in the new finance plan the makers of farm implements were charging only two per cent per annum.

Mr. MASSEY: I said six per cent, and then one-quarter of one per cent for three months, which is two per cent per annum, making a total of eight per cent.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): In the west it is seven per cent. In addition to that, on an eight-foot binder there is a penalty charge of $11. If a farmer buys a binder on the 1st of August he has to pay for it on October 1. In the meantime he has to pay forty per cent for it when he gets it; there is a penalty charge of $11, plus a seven per cent per annum charge. I can see quite plainly where the makers of farm implements have overcome the hardships of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. When a man buys a machine to-day, a price, which is not the cash price, is set. There is a penalty included in it. If he desires credit for one month, three months, twelve months or two years, he must pay the interest for that period as computed, and add it in the note. It becomes part of the principal of the note, and in that way when these companies appear before a board of review, or when a farmer seeks to take protection under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, they are not going to have their interest cut off, as it has been in the past.

No matter what we do in this house, these men will try to protect themselves. That is only human nature; we would all do it if we had the chance. I am not speaking for the makers of farm implements, because I know nothing about their business. I do know, however, that they perform a good service for the farmers, and I should like to see the farmers and the manufacturers of implements working in harmony. I will support any measure the house may see fit to suggest to protect the interests of the farmers, because in Canada I believe their interests must come first.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, in what I have to say I do not wish to be unfair to the farming community, or to have anything I may say interpreted as being unfair. I fully appreciate the need for the price of farm implements being as low as possible. I think the farmer would be the last person to wish to sacrifice the welfare of the industrial worker.

On March 2, 1936, a resolution was passed in these words:

> That in the opinion of this house an immediate inquiry should be made by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization into the causes underlying the high price of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices for the year 1936.

The duty of the committee was to make a report in the interests of all the people of Canada. They were not to report on this matter only as to the interests of one class. In spite of all that has been said from time to time, the home market is the most valuable market to the farmer. Every endeavour should be made to encourage and increase it. Industrial workers at work create the most important part of the home market. If we increase this market, the cost of distribution will be lowered, the value of farm products will be increased due to the increased demand, the farmer will make more money and the industrial worker will be able to pay the farmer a fair price.

To my mind the recommendations and conclusions of the committee excite the political imagination of the farmer. To a large extent they have not been based upon the evidence submitted. These recommendations and conclusions were not arrived at in the interest of all the people of Canada. This report has had the effect of prejudicing the interests of the farmer in the mind of the industrial worker. It is so obviously one-sided and unfair and if adopted, will have a far-reaching, prejudicial effect upon the people of Canada. Some of the speeches made in the house by certain hon. members during this debate have had the effect of inflaming the minds of the farmers against the industrial worker. Fairness should be exercised and the evidence understood to a greater degree. The present day problems of industry should be better appreciated by the farmers, just as industry should appreciate the difficulties of the farmer.

A report such as this has the effect of creating an impression of unfair treatment in the minds of those engaged in industry. It is so obviously one-sided; it is so plain that it is not complete. The prejudices and antagonisms created against the farmer by this report extend to the workers in all industry, not only to those in the agricultural implement industry. All secondary industry appreciates fully the injustice it has suffered and the false position in which it has been put. Such a report is not even in the interests of the farmer and I protest on his behalf. There are 12,000 workers employed in the agricultural implement industry in Canada and there should be many thousands more. There are more than 12,000 workers employed in producing the raw and fabricated materials entering into the finished product. I protest on behalf of all of those engaged in the industry.

A report such as this gives an entirely wrong impression to the farmer. In times such as these we should do everything to ensure that causes of sectional discord are not created. The first requisite of a report of this kind should be fairness. Let us examine a few of the conclusions in the report. Time will not permit me to consider them all, but I should like to comment on a few. The first conclusion and recommendation of the committee states:

> That the prosperity of the farm implement industry is directly dependent on the prosperity of agriculture.

That is true. Is it not also true that to no small degree the prosperity of agriculture is dependent upon the prosperity of those engaged in the agricultural implement industry in Canada? Efforts should be made to increase the numbers of those employed in the industry. In all fairness why was that not stated in the report? The second conclusion and recommendation reads:

> That, during the recent depression, a backlog of requirements estimated at $200,000,000 has accumulated and will have to be satisfied by the implement companies during the next few years, together with normal annual requirements of agriculture, estimated at $51,700,000.

The figure of $200,000,000 is a matter of conjecture, while I have no doubt that the figure of $51,700,000, representing the annual requirements of the farmers, is a little high. The bureau of statistics places the average annual purchases of farmers during the last sixteen years at around $41,000,000. What a wonderful opportunity there is for the future of this industry if it is given a chance! What an opportunity there will be to decrease costs through increased production! What a wonderful opportunity there will be for the employment of workers! What an opportunity there will be to provide work for the rising generation, the youth of our country! If the above figures are true, there will be possibly $30,000,000 every year to be paid out in wages. I have no reason to believe that the figures are not absolutely so. How much less need there would be for public works for relief! The policy of the government would take advantage of this improvement in industry. What a home market for the farmer would be created! What a decrease there would be in government grants in aid for relief. Yet in the next conclusion no mention is made of the advantage of this prospective work for the workers in this country. The report simply states a fact with respect to the farmer; it does not give all the facts, nor does it suggest how important this might be to the rest of the workers, and what an increased market would be created for the farmer. The third conclusion and recommendation states:

That, as a result, the price level of farm implements during the next few years is of the greatest importance to agriculture.

In all fairness they should have added:

That the utilization as far as possible of Canadian labour for the satisfying of these requirements would be of tremendous benefit to the farmer by increasing the ability of the industrial worker to consume farm products, and that a lower price level could be obtained by increasing the production of farm implements in Canadian factories by Canadian labour.

No. 15 reads:

That the interest of the farm implement industry and of labour engaged therein is best served by a full recognition of the fact that the prosperity of the industry and the increased and more permanent employment of labour depend on the relative and actual prosperity of the farmer and that all will benefit by lower retail prices, thus encouraging the manufacture and sale of farm implements.

These benefits will not accrue unless the implements are Canadian made. Again they should have said:

That the prosperity of the industry and the increased and more permanent employment of Canadian labour depend on the relative and actual prosperity of the farmer and that all will benefit from the sale of Canadian made farm implements, therefore there should be an endeavour made to increase the employment of Canadian workmen by the purchase by the farmer of Canadian made implements.

In No. 17, the committee states:

That reduction in the tariff should and does, in the long run, tend to lower the price level to the farmer, depending on the extent of free price competition in the industry.

That is not generally so, and the fact is that after the tariff was reduced in 1936 the prices of farm implements increased. The manufacturers did not increase the price when an increase in tariff was granted some years ago. The manufacturers did agree not to increase the price of implements if an adequate tariff were granted them. Realizing that an increased market would tend to reduce the cost to the farmer, it would have been fairer for the committee to have said:

The deduction in tariff does not in the long run tend to lower the price level and militates against the Canadian worker in industry, and that the best interests of all concerned, including a reduction in price levels to the farmer, would be best served by maintaining an even tariff which would increase employment in the industry and also increase Canadian competition.

In Nos. 19 and 20 the committee makes certain recommendations with respect to the Customs Act and regulations of the Department of National Revenue. In all fairness they should have added a clause to this effect:

The customs tariff should be regulated to prevent any unfair competition to Canadian workmen, thereby increasing the wage return to industrial workers which in turn would increase the consumption by them of agricultural products, to the benefit of the farmer and the whole community.

In No. 25 the committee state:

That in order to assist the farm implement companies to satisfy the requirements of agriculture in the matter of farm implements in the next few years, the committee is of the opinion that the duty on materials entering into the manufacture of farm implements should be removed or that the farm implement companies should be granted a drawback of any duties paid on materials entering into the manufacture of farm implements.

I do not think the committee realized the far-reaching effect which such a course of action would have upon employment in Canadian industry. There would be disadvantages which, from a national point of view, would in all probability outbalance any small advantage in price which would ensue. If they had realized this, they would, in all fairness to the people of Canada have stated instead that the duty on materials entering into the manufacture of farm implements with respect to those materials which can be produced by Canadian workmen should not be subjected to a drawback of duties, thereby encouraging the production of those materials and increasing the number of workers in such production, but that drawbacks should be allowed on those materials only which cannot be produced in Canada by Canadian workmen.

In conclusion No. 33 the committee stated:

The committee is of the opinion that the cost of distribution of farm implements is unnecessarily high and constitutes an important factor in the price to the consumer.

And in conclusion No. 34 the committee finds:

That the companies themselves should make every effort to reduce these costs, or farmers should be encouraged to organize for the cooperative distribution and servicing of farm implements.

The Canadian companies, on account of the reduction of tariffs, have had to increase their sales force in order to retain their business against new United States competition.

The committee should have added:

The cost of distribution and servicing in the agricultural implement business will be reduced by increased Canadian production and co-operation by the farmer in purchasing Canadian implements so far as possible.

These are only some of the conclusions and recommendations, Mr. Speaker, which should have been included in the report of the committee.

The impression seems to be abroad that there is a monopoly in the agricultural implement business in Canada. There was not before the tariffs were reduced. Then the increasing demand, and consequent increased production of Canadian implements was on the way to decrease the cost of production and distribution, and would have lowered the price to the farmer. The reduction in tariffs has taken away a large part of the market from the Canadian manufacturer; it has increased his overhead and distribution costs, and increased the price of implements in this country. This has placed the buyer in the clutches of the great United States industry—and this may be a great monopoly. The government of Canada has no control over this monopoly, whereas it had control over the Canadian industry. This reduction of tariffs has had no beneficial effect on either the industry or the consumer. It allows this monopoly to charge all that the traffic will bear and to cut-throat the Canadian industry when necessary.

With regard to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on the 29th of April last, I quote from Hansard at page 2422:

Mr. Gardiner: I have been operating binders since 1901, and this machine does the job just about as efficiently as the binder he is using in 1938—

That was in reply to a suggestion from an hon. member.

—and in most cases it lasted longer.

I should like to ask the minister how he knows that the 1938 binder will not last longer than the 1901 binder. In the first place, I would point out that nobody is in a position to judge how long the 1938 binder will last. An impartial committee of agricultural engineers, however, stated that the binder contained an increased quality value of 70 per cent over the 1910-1914 machines. This is just one of the misleading statements of the minister.

I should like to state, however, that regardless of these facts the farmers of Canada insist upon having machines with the latest modern devices, because they recognize their value, and it would be absolutely impossible to-day to supply a binder similar to that built in 1901 or even in 1931 and stay in business at all. It is interesting here to note that in 1938 one of the principal Canadian companies is offering binders of the 1937 model at lower prices than those of 1938, and yet they are finding it more difficult to sell these cheaper 1937 models than the more up to date and more expensive 1938 models. The 1901 machine cannot be compared with that of 1938, with any satisfaction at all.

As reported at page 2424 of Hansard the minister stated:

I repeat again that I have found the implement—

Presumably the 1913 implement.

—served the purpose just as well in the preceding years as it serves the purpose at the present time.

This opinion is not borne out by the facts, as could be proven to the satisfaction of anyone who would compare the 1913 line of implements with the 1937 line. I assert again that it would be impossible for any company, whatever its organization, to sell a 1913 line of implements to the farmers of Canada in competition with those built to-day. I am informed that to all those acquainted with these matters it is a well known fact that the up-to-date farm implements used to-day require far fewer spare parts than those of days gone by, and that their work is not subject to the enormous break-downs which existed in those earlier days, a condition which is brought about through more careful manufacture, through the use of high-grade materials, through the enclosing of running parts in oil baths, and so forth.

The reference made by the minister at page 2429 of Hansard to the numbers employed in the manufacturing plants as being 4,159 men is not accurate. The industry as a whole should be considered, and while it alone provides a livelihood for persons gainfully employed in Canada, totalling nearly 12,000—not 4,159—it must also be remembered that raw and partly fabricated purchased materials used in implements provide employment in this country for as many more, so that the industry as a whole would provide employment for a whole community of more than 25,000 workers. The minister loses sight of the contribution made to Canada by one company. In the ten years, 1926 to 1935, $107,627,026 was spent in materials, wages, expenses, freight, duties, taxes, and so forth, by one company. The various governments in the dominion received revenues by means of duties, taxes, and so on, of $2,943,534.

Sales in Canada for the period were $78,663,000; therefore $28,974,000 more was spent in Canada than was received from the farmers in Canada. There was $1.37 disbursed for every dollar received in this country. Remarks such as have been made do not reflect that credit is given to that company for its contribution to Canada through the development of export trade, which brings home moneys for the benefit of the Canadian people. The effect has been to distribute profits from the export trade to the Canadian people as a whole.

I come now to a statement showing the expenditure of the average industrial family on Canadian farm products, which amounts to $409.35 a year, and with the permission of the house I should like to place this on Hansard:

In these days, when many foreign markets are closing their doors against our agricultural products, is it not to the undoubted advantage of every Canadian farmer to keep alive an industry which employs thousands upon thousands of men, each one of whom is an important and permanent consumer of his products?

As reported on page 2427 of Hansard the minister stated:

> It may be necessary to find ways and means of preventing the industry from so organizing as to drain the last dollar of our basic industry to pay for a business set-up—

And so forth. This certainly does not appear to be the case in so far as the implement industry is concerned. In the first place, one would be inclined to infer that the purchase of implements was a major portion of the farmer's total expenditure, whereas in reality it varies from three to six cents out of every farmer's dollar. The minister goes on to say that the cost ought to come down if agriculture is to continue to be practised in that part of Canada which depends upon machinery for its continuance. I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that that modern equipment has enabled the farmer to reduce the cost of preparing the seed bed, seeding, harvesting and threshing by nine cents per bushel, whereas the increased costs of implements since 1929 represents less than one cent per bushel. It would seem evident that if agriculture is to continue to be practised, as the minister says, the solution lies along the more common use of up-to-date, modern equipment.

There are many more statements in the speech which call for denial as incorrect, but time will not permit me. There are many inaccuracies, which have been pointed out so ably by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey).

There have been many arguments advanced for the reduction of the tariff on agricultural implements, and a great many arguments against the reduction. The fact has not been refuted by any hon. member that farmers in Canada buy their implements at a lower price than that paid by farmers in any other part of the world. Prices have increased since this reduction of duty took place. The duty on farm implements coming into this country is negligible and amounts to about 7½ per cent, while the duty on farm products is, as a general rule, much higher. The duties on the following farm products are:

Eggs, 10 cents per dozen and 3 per cent over 50 per cent.
Vegetables, 15 per cent, plus 3 per cent over 18 per cent.
Fruit, 15 per cent, plus 3 per cent over 18 per cent.
Cheese, 7 cents, plus 3 per cent over 45 per cent.
Milk and cream, 22½ cents plus 3 per cent over 26 per cent.
Wheat, 12 cents, plus 3 per cent over 10 per cent.
Barley, 22½ cents, plus 3 per cent over 35 per cent.
Oats, 9 cents, plus 3 per cent over 18 per cent.
Beef, 6 cents, plus 3 per cent over 60 per cent.
Mutton, 6 cents, plus 3 per cent over 60 per cent.
Lamb, 6 cents plus three per cent over 60 per cent.
Pork, 2½ cents, plus 3 per cent over 20 per cent.
Cattle, 2 cents.
Sheep, $2 per head.

As regards agricultural products, I do not quarrel with the farmer with respect to the duty it has been found necessary to impose for his protection on agricultural products. In the election of 1935 some candidates made a political football of agricultural implement prices. They promised their constituents that they would reduce the duty on implements, leaving the implication that as a result there would be a widespread reduction in price. Now the minister has to make good, in view of the pending election in Saskatchewan. For years past the same implication has been made, that a reduction in the tariffs on farm implements would reduce the price to the farmer. During the session of 1936 the committee on the price of agricultural implements investigated, and continued its work in 1937. No doubt, the discussion which took place and the evidence received and debated were good for the souls of the members of this committee. The conclusions of the committee are extremely interesting. Learning of the committee's conclusions, no doubt their constituents feel that a real effort has been made by their members to have the tariffs reduced on agricultural implements and that they would soon have reduced prices—implements practically free. The executives of these industries were placed under a strain due to apprehensions with respect to tariffs; the life of their industry was at stake, and they were no doubt wondering just how much more kicking around the old football would stand.

Reams of evidence were taken; thousands upon thousands of dollars were expended, not only in the taking of the evidence but by the companies involved in the giving of the evidence, and hours and days of time were spent in the investigation, while, strange as it may seem, during the greater part of the time that the investigation was taking place, the price of farm implements was actually lower in Canada than in any other country in the world. And yet we talk about the foolishness of looking for the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. I think the pot of gold was political. I suppose this investigation had to come as a result of promises made to the farmer electorate. The agricultural implement industry has been a political football for years.

A lowering of the cost of agricultural implements to the farmers can be accomplished by lowering the wages of the industrial worker, and I protest with all the strength I have against any such action being taken.

What effect has the kicking around of the political football, the manufacture of agricultural implements, had on the industry? It has reduced a tariff which was all too low to begin with; it has set up barriers with respect to class, worker against farmer, capital against labour, farmer against capital. It has not reduced the price of implements. It has made the industrial worker, industrial shareholder and those in charge who have to guide the destinies of these concerns, so disgusted at the unfairness of a political investigation as to want to pull up their stakes and move out of the country, and thousands of our best workers have had to move out. It has increased the imports of agricultural implements. For the twelve months ended January 31, 1936, the imports amounted to $5,190,351. By January, 1937, they had increased to $9,152,522 for the twelve months. By January 31, 1938, imports had increased to $16,967,900 for the twelve months.

The labour content of these imports was lost to the workmen of Canada, not only workmen in these manufacturing plants but Canadian workmen in other Canadian manufacturing plants producing material for these plants. And this is not all; the labour of farmers and of other Canadian workmen producing Canadian articles for the consumption of these workmen in the implement manufacturing plants was not needed. It is estimated that in the production of agricultural machinery from the iron in the ground or the wood on the tree to the finished product, the labour cost is over 85 per cent of the total value.

The loss to Canadian workmen by the importation, in the year 1937 alone, of agricultural machinery valued at almost $17,000,000 if this machinery had been produced in Canada, would amount to over $14,000,000 in wages. A further foreign obligation was created by the purchase. Customs duties on inadequate tariffs were collected to be spent on relief. Canada might have taken 10,000 workmen and their families, or thirty or forty thousand people, off the relief rolls. Wealth might have been created instead of throwing this money out of the window. The morale of the workman and his family might have been maintained. Instead of something being done by the government in this regard, the government proposes to spend millions under a bill for public works relief, collecting duties on imported goods and spending it on relief.

As to price, the more Canadian production, the more competition and the cheaper the product. The industry had great hopes that the searching inquiry might have brought about a clearer understanding and closer co-operation with the farmer. It has been disappointed. The best regulator of prices is competition. No one can say that a volume of business of $17,000,000 is not real competition. Make the protection protect the manufacturer in Canada, and this competition and our laws will take care of the price. We have set up machinery, namely, the tariff board, for the investigation of various industries. Confidence has been established between industry, workers, executives and the tariff board. Information which industry considers confidential is so treated by the tariff board. The only way by which we can have conciliation, confidence and trust between government and industry, and, most important of all, industrial workers, and increased continuity of employment in industry, is by utilizing the expert machinery of the tariff board in conjunction with the experts of the bureau of statistics.

I maintain that the agricultural implement industry must be relieved of being made a political football. This football has had the stuffing kicked out of it; it has been kicked from pillar to post, and if we do not watch out it will burst, just like any other old football. These inquiries into prices which we have been having cannot but add to the cost of the articles produced. Anyone with common sense knows that a reduction in the selling price of any manufactured article can take place only by a change for the better with respect to certain principal factors entering into the cost. These factors are: A reduction of wages; increased production; reduction of overhead; improved methods; factory economy; improved equipment; reduction of service and distribution costs; reduction of taxation; reduction of the prices of raw material, and reduction of profits. The justification for all these items which enter into the selling price of the product can easily be determined by the permanent experts of the Dominion of Canada. The fair price of these articles cannot be determined by what the farmer thinks he can afford to pay for them, or by what his representative in parliament tells him he should have to pay for them; it must be determined by the actual cost, which is made up of these items.

The only hope for prosperity for the farmer is from demand for his goods. He must not forget that the greater part of the demand for his goods comes from having prosperous industrial workers in his own country, in the home market. If he consumes as much as he can of the goods which can be manufactured in Canada, he will not only increase the demand for his own product but be helping to create a future demand for the labour of those boys of his who cannot or do not wish to stay on the farm.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) stated that the farmers of Canada generally expect this recommendation to be carried out. I do not think that statement is true. I have a high opinion of the farmers of Canada, but they are being misled. The political football is the trouble. It is my opinion that if they thoroughly understood the facts as to the present condition of the implement industry, they would not expect this recommendation to be carried out. Again, the hon. member urges that this course would be in the interests of agriculture and of the whole of Canada. In my opinion it is not in the interest of the industrial worker who works, or who has invested his savings, in the industry, or the farmer who has invested his savings in the industry. Neither is it in the interests of the farmer. The industrial worker is just as much a factor in the production of farm produce as the farmer. His efficiency is just as important as that of the farmer. Certainly the industrial worker in agricultural machinery is as important as is the highly mechanized farmer in the production of coarse grain.

The investigation promised to the farmer has been carried out. What about the promise to the industrial worker that he should have a square deal; that the investigation of tariffs with regard to him would be kept out of politics? The promise of this government was to refer all these questions to the tariff board. Why was the question of tariffs on agricultural implements not referred to that body? I submit the reason was to serve the political expediency of this government. However, now that the report has been made; now that the inflammatory speech of the minister has served the purpose of the approaching election in the west; now that it has been broadcast through the prairies, perhaps the government will be fair enough, before taking further action, to refer the report to the tariff board. I deprecate the fact that a minister of the crown should so distort the evidence as to leave in the mind of the public the impression that the farmer is a victim being bled to death by the octopus and its thousands of suckers and the horde of eastern industrial workers. His speech was timed for the election in Saskatchewan. It certainly was not for the good of Canada as a whole. Political oppression in this business has not helped either the buyer or the seller. As the evidence shows, the lot of the companies, and consequently of the workers, has not been a happy one. The minister may be a good farmer; but his speech shows either that he is not qualified to analyse the statistics and evidence in a business investigation of the implement industry, or that he is only willing to do so from a political standpoint. The industry is not rotten to the core, as he tried to make it appear. How can we have a united Canada when a minister of the crown uses his office to play to the west in a narrow, partisan spirit, setting it against the east? Speaking for the Liberal party, the minister said, as reported at page 2429 of Hansard:

> The Liberal party with its policies is the friend of industry in Canada. . . .

I ask industry to examine the policies as enunciated in the report and the minister's inflammatory speech, which constitutes an attack not only on the implement worker but on all industrial workers. Liberal policies are putting more workers on relief to-day, and will keep them there, at no benefit to the farmer, but to his detriment. The report and the speech do not indicate any great friendship to industry in this country or to the industrial worker.

Just before recess the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) said that the industrial worker between 1931 and 1935 received his share; that the entire burden of the depression was borne by the farmer. This is quite untrue, as everyone knows. The industrial workers bore their full share of the depression, and more. The farmer could always get something to eat, but a great many industrial workers sometimes could not. He also said that the workers and manufacturers together said, "We will keep our share and the farmer can take his chances so far as we are concerned. The farmers cannot trust them, and the best way to control the situation is to remove the privilege which the manufacturers hold and let them meet open competition, just as the farmers in the dominion have to meet it." But I want to say that the industrial worker just wants a fair chance, which the country is able to give. I have pointed out that privileges, as the hon. member calls them, have been extended to the farmers by way of protection, and the industrial workers are glad to see that they have it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have only a very little more to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The farmers have also had other privileges with respect to their products extended to them by empire and foreign countries under the trade treaties. That is as far as this country can go in that regard. It is not the fault of the industrial workers if the world price of certain farm products is too low. Some other method of assistance is necessary with respect to this problem. The dog in the manger attitude of suggesting taking away the livelihood of industrial workers because the farming community is in difficulties does not make for national unity, and it is a pity that such sentiments should be expressed. The prosperity of this country depends to an equal, if not greater, degree upon the prosperity of the secondary producer, the worker in the secondary industry, and upon team work between the primary and the secondary producer. We cannot have unity by attacking one section of the community, and in this case the attack is on the industrial worker.

In a spirit of all fairness I urge that this parliament recommend that this report be referred, lock, stock and barrel, to the tariff board in an effort to free industry and the workers in industry once and for all from political persecution.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): I should like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to advance as fairly as possible the attitude of the farmers of my constituency with respect to this question, but before discussing that point I should like to answer one or two arguments which have been advanced by those opposed to the report.

A determined effort has been made to minimize the importance of this problem. I realize perfectly well that no farmer would be misled by any of the fallacious arguments that have been advanced in the house, but in order that hon. members who are not farmers might have a true picture of the problem I should like to place on record some of the figures and evidence given before the committee. In advancing the argument that "Oh, well, the problem does not amount to anything anyway; it is a trivial matter," one hon. member went so far as to quote from an article which appeared three years ago in the Nor'West Farmer, stating that less than three per cent of the money spent by the farmer is spent on agricultural implements. If that hon. member had taken the trouble to read the evidence given before the committee, he would have found that the article in question was absolutely in error. In connection with one item the article was just over $200,000,000 in error. Anyone who has followed the proceedings of that committee could not be misled by such a quotation. It seems to me, however, a matter of great regret that an unreliable article, containing an unreliable conclusion such as this, should find its way into Hansard.

What are the actual figures? By referring to page 1215 of the proceedings of the special committee it will be found that according to the last census the farmers of this country had something over $650,000,000 of their hard earned money invested in farm machinery. Since there are just over 700,000 farmers in Canada, this means that the average investment in farm machinery per farmer across the dominion is between $800 and $900. It is a well known fact that farm machinery requires replacement much oftener than anything else in which the farmer invests his money. His house, his barn, his fences are much more lasting than his farm machinery. I think it is quite fair and within reason to suggest that farm machinery must be replaced at least twice as often as any other permanent equipment in which the farmer invests his money. If that conclusion is correct, it means that the actual investment of the farmer in machinery is closer to 24 per cent, or, in other words, nearly one-quarter of his total capital investment. That being so, this is no small problem to our farmers.

I must apologize for bringing this matter up again, but I think it is important. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) to some extent discounted its importance, but I do not agree with that. During the years of the depression, from 1930 onward, the farmers of this country were unable to buy the implements they required, or even pay for the repairs which were necessary. As a result, a deficiency or a backlog, as it has been termed, which is conservatively estimated at $200,000,000, has been built up during the years. If one considers also the fact that the normal purchases of farm machinery by Canadian farmers amount to $50,000,000 annually, one will see that during the next five years, if the condition of the farmers continues to improve, they will be buying close to $500,000,000 worth of farm machinery. Is it not an important problem to them in connection with what they must pay for that machinery?

The next argument advanced was that we are persecuting the manufacturers of farm machinery by holding an inquiry such as the one recently concluded. Personally I do not understand such an attitude. Here we have an industry subsidized by parliament to the extent of more than the total wage content of the goods they are producing; yet it is suggested that we are persecuting these companies if we ask for an accounting, if we ask what they are doing with the subsidy, the protection or the benefit we are giving to them. I submit that an inquiry such as this is not persecution, but that it should take place periodically in regard to all subsidized industries in Canada.

Mr. FRASER: Would the hon. member agree to a similar inquiry into his jam manufacturers and the canners?

Mr. CLEAVER: I have a great personal regard for the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser), and I am quite prepared to debate with him any other problem which may come before the house. But I have a message which I wish to deliver on behalf of my constituents in regard to the question now before the house, and I must say that I decline to be side-tracked.

The farmers in my constituency have often reminded me, and if I read my history aright I believe it to be true, that the whole theory of protecting and subsidizing industries in this country was introduced and given to the Canadian people on the theory that infant industries required subsidies in order to become established in their early days. A great many of the farmers in my county are commencing to wonder when this lusty child is really going to grow up.

By referring to the report one finds that with respect to the industry in Canada 75 per cent of the business in connection with selling farm machinery is done by four large companies. The International Harvester Company do 33 per cent of the business; the Massey-Harris Company, 19·2 per cent; Deere and Company, 12·2 per cent, and the Cockshutt Plow Company Limited and Frost and Wood, 11·6 per cent. In other words, these four large companies are doing 75 per cent of the total business.

I should like to place on record as fairly as possible some figures showing the profits of these companies through the years. Time would not permit me to show the financial statements of profits of all of them, so for the purpose I have chosen the largest company, namely the International Harvester Company. Referring to the proceedings of the committee one finds that the International Harvester Company of Canada was incorporated in 1903, with an authorized paid up capital of $1,000,000, which was held by the United States parent company. What profits did that company make during the first ten years of its operations? On a capitalization of $1,000,000 the company made profits totalling $3,500,000, or an average annual profit during the whole of the ten years of 35 per cent. I do not need to make any comment as to whether or not that profit is a fair and reasonable one. The facts speak for themselves.

Then, during the next seven year period, from 1913 to 1919 inclusive, the company earned profits of 7·2 millions of dollars, or an average annual profit over the whole period of 18 per cent. Hon. members wishing to have those figures before them will find them at page 1224 of the report of the committee. It is obvious that a state of affairs whereby there was an average profit of 35 per cent in the first ten years and an average of 18 per cent in the next seven years could not be permitted to continue. The companies would either have to reduce the selling price of their goods or increase their capitalization, in order to conceal the profits. What did this company do?

We find that in 1917 the practice of the company of making temporary borrowings during its heavy financing season was discontinued, and instead the capitalization of the company was increased not once or twice, but ten times. The following year, in 1918, the capitalization was again increased from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. Notwithstanding these heavy increases in capitalization, the average yearly net profits over the whole period from 1913 to 1919 again held at 18 per cent. Once again no comment from me is necessary as to the fairness or adequacy of those profits.

For the period between 1920 and 1925 the company ran into rather serious times, and profits were materially reduced. The auditor for the committee stated that during this period a dividend of $3,000,000 was paid in 1921, and that in addition to this there was a definite retention of profits in the United States of America by the parent company estimated at over $4,000,000. There is some difference of opinion as to the actual profits earned for this period, but it would appear to be in the neighbourhood of five per cent.

Coming to the last period taken up by the committee, namely, that between 1926 and 1935, admitted profits were earned of $24,500,000 by the one company, operating in Canada. In addition to this the auditors for the committee stated there was a retention of profits by the parent company amounting to approximately $17,000,000, making a total profit, for the period 1926 to 1935, of $41,500,000. I omitted to state that during the latter years the capitalization of the company was again increased, and in 1935 it stood at approximately $27,000,000. Imagine the capitalization of one company at $27,000,000, and it still being an infant company asking for protection! The company claimed that added to this capitalization there should be about $12,000,000 for machines produced in the United States plant and simply distributed by the Canadian company. To me it would make very little difference as to whether we considered the increased capitalization, plus the retained profits, or whether we disregarded both. But in order to be fair to the company I have added both of these to my computation.

If I read the statement correctly, the result is that the total profit earned in Canada by this one company, over the ten year period above referred to, from 1926 to 1935, would be $41,500,000. If we compute this on a capitalization claimed by the company, it shows a net profit over the period of just over ten per cent. On the other hand, if you wish to disregard entirely the profits retained by the parent company—and I urge that these should not be disregarded—the profits of the International Harvester Company in Canada over the last ten year period, ending in 1935, was 7·7 per cent. Did any farmer make any such profit during that period?

There is another matter I should like to discuss which I suggest shows conclusively the truth of the contention of the auditors to the effect that millions of dollars were retained by the parent company, and were not shown in the statement of the Canadian company, although actually earned by that company. In this regard it is only fair to say that the companies were not to blame, and certainly the farmers were not to blame. But some overzealous officials of the Department of National Revenue followed the dumping clause, or the value for duty clause, in the customs regulations somewhat too religiously. As a result we find a very startling state of affairs, one which is almost unbelievable. On account of our own tariff regulations we were compelling the head office of the International Harvester Company to keep in the United States profits actually earned in Canada. How was that done? It was done in this way: The company found that they must bill machines built in the United States to the Canadian subsidiary at a price higher than they were billing the same machines to the United States plants. If they did not bill at that exorbitant price they were charged a dumping duty by our Department of National Revenue.

At this point I should like to read into the record a few of the questions put to and the answers made by the manager of the International Harvester Company. I read the following from page 417 of the proceedings of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization for the year 1936. Mr. Morrison was being examined in the following manner:

Q. Take a $300 machine, a machine that you would invoice to the American selling company at $300, at what amount would you invoice that same machine to the Canadian company? Have you the answer?

A. Yes. The price to the United States distributing company would be $300.

Q. Yes?

A. The price to the Canadian company would be $346.

Q. Yes. Well then, I suggest to you that the question I put to you a few minutes ago is correct; that on account of our tariff regulations you found it more profitable to make your profits in the parent company than to make them over here; you charged the Canadian company $46 more for that one machine than you charged the American selling company for the same machine?

A. You realize, Mr. Cleaver, that the price that we charged the Canadian company was one that we were compelled to price at.

Q. I realize that. I am not saying that you were wrong in doing it. I am saying that our silly tariff regulations encouraged you to do it?

A. The profits of the Canadian company, of course, are affected by the higher price that they had to pay for these implements than if they had been purchased at the same price as the United States distributor paid.

Q. Now, we have the figure on this one type of implement, let us have the figure on another type—a tractor. Take a tractor that would sell to your American company for $1,000; what would you charge the Canadian company for that same tractor during the period when there was the full twenty-five per cent spread. Just recall your evidence of yesterday.

A. Yes. I want to give you the figures. I will give you an illustration, Mr. Cleaver, based on a tractor that would be priced to a dealer in the United States at $1,000.

Q. Yes.

A. The American distributing company would pay $750 for that tractor, the Canadian company would pay $950.

Q. So that the Canadian company was charged $200 more money for exactly the same tractor than you charged the American selling company?

A. That is correct.

Q. And once again I suggest to you you found it profitable to keep your profits in the United States and never to let the Canadian company make them?

A. I don't like the inference that might be taken from that statement that we found it profitable. It sounds like we had elected to do that.

Q. I am not suggesting that.

A. The way it turns out.

Q. Then shall we say necessary?

A. That is better, and that is the reason I have not subscribed to your statement.

That accounts for the fact that the auditor of the committee said that millions of dollars of profits were retained with the parent company of the International Harvester Company and did not show in the operating statement of the Hamilton company. I contend that we should keep this in mind when dealing with the set-up of this company and considering the profits which they have made.

The question then arises as to whether a reduction in tariff will operate to reduce the price of implements to the Canadian farmer. I should like to read a letter written by the International Harvester Company, the same company with which I have been dealing, to all its agents with respect to prices after the tariff reduction had taken place. This letter is dated Hamilton, May 8, 1936, and reads:

Subject: Price reduction on account of changes in duty

Changes in the tariff which became effective May 2, 1936, reduced the duty from 12½ per cent to 7½ per cent on most of the items in our general line which we import into Canada. Goods which are manufactured in Canada are, of course, in no way affected by this change.

We have on hand in Canada a stock of imported goods which represents a considerable part of our 1936 requirements. This stock was brought in at the higher rates of duty previously in force. Regardless of this fact it gives us great pleasure to pass the saving made by the duty reduction along to our customers.

You will, therefore, effective immediately, reduce prices, both wholesale and suggested retail in accordance with the attached list.

We suggest that this information be given to your dealers at once, using the first three paragraphs of this letter as the letter to your dealers.

Then followed a list of something over 100 implements. The argument has been advanced that implements are selling in the United States at practically the same prices as in Canada. The further argument is advanced that the amount of tariff protection is not being taken advantage of by the Canadian companies. I should like to refer to a report to be found at page 1266 of the report of the committee, containing particulars of some ten implements which were considered by it. In this report will be found particulars with reference to an eight foot binder, a five foot mower oil bath, a seventeen tooth spring-tooth harrow, a manure spreader and so on. Of the thirteen implements referred to in that list, in one instance the price is the same in Canada as in the United States; in two instances the prices are a little lower in Canada, and for the other ten implements taking one of each kind, the total selling price in the United States is $1,410.19 as compared with $1,560.55 in Canada, an increase of 10·5 per cent.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Who gave that evidence?

Mr. CLEAVER: If the hon. member wants to look over the tabulation, he will find it at page 1266 of the report. If he would like particulars of any individual machine, I shall be glad to give them now.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Who gave the evidence?

Mr. CLEAVER: There are something over a thousand pages of evidence, and I think the hon. member as a solicitor will realize that it would take some little time to look it up. If he is interested in having it, I shall be glad to give it to him privately. The difference between the United States and Canadian selling prices is 10·5 per cent for ten implements, and our duty is 7½ per cent plus an excise tax of three per cent. I wonder if that is just a coincidence, or is it cause and effect?

The argument has also been advanced that the companies are not making money; that they are suffering losses. I think the financial statement of the International Harvester Company that I have attempted to give since its incorporation rather answers that argument. There is one further piece of evidence that I should like to read into the record. At page 1230 of the report will be found complete particulars of the break-down in the cost of an eight foot binder, retailing to a farmer in Regina at $281. If you reduce that figure by the cost of freight amounting to $26.08, you have a net laid-down price of $254.92. That machine costs the International Harvester Company $22.62 for labour, a total of $71.06 for material, and for all overhead, $36.48. These are the company's own figures; they are not mine. In other words, the total cost to the company of that eight foot binder is $130.16. This is the binder that is sold to the farmer for $254.92. There is a mark-up of $124.86, or 95 per cent, on a machine costing the company $130.16. Are the companies making any money? Do they need the protection upon which they are insisting? I am not attempting to answer these questions; I simply give the house the figures and let the members judge for themselves.

There is one other matter to which I should like to call attention. On this particular machine the difference between the Canadian and United States selling prices is $31.40, whereas the total wage content is only $22.62. The tariff protection, even at the present low rate, is considerably higher than the total wage content of the machine. That makes me wonder whether all the speeches adverse to this report which have been given in the house have been made by hon. members who are really interested in labour. I wonder whether they have not been partly interested in capital?

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member cannot impute motives to any other hon. member, and I suggest that he withdraw that statement.

Mr. CLEAVER: If the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) takes offence at what I have said, I withdraw unreservedly. But I did hear a dozen hon. members on the other side give as the basis of their argument the fact that they were sponsoring labour. I am suggesting that labour is not getting any of the benefits of the tariff protection which we have been giving to these companies.

Mr. MASSEY: Again, if the hon. member will permit me, I do not think there are dozens of members on this side of the house who have spoken on the subject.

Mr. CLEAVER: Perhaps they spoke so long that it seemed like that.

Mr. MASSEY: The hon. member's views on that are about as accurate as some of his other views.

Mr. CLEAVER: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the committee upon the way in which it has performed the very important duty allotted to it, and I would urge with all the force at my command that its recommendations, especially recommendations Nos. 16 and 28, be carried out.

In regard to the recommendation in regard to cream separators I have just one word to say. Cream separators have a tariff protection of 25 per cent. A good many cream separators are being imported from Sweden. These cream separators are bought in Sweden at $13.05. That includes labour costs, material cost, overhead, profit, everything. They are shipped to Canada and laid down here at a total cost, including transportation charges, duty and excise, of $17.65, as will be found at page 1240 of the committee's report, and they are sold to the Canadian farmer at $44.85. Should this house be a party to any such exorbitant charge as a spread of 160 per cent on a cream separator. I submit that every justification has been brought forward in the evidence for the entire removal of the duty on cream separators.

As to the 7½ per cent duty on implements I want to be entirely fair, and if the house feels that the committee has been prejudiced and that a judicial tribunal should deal with the question I would be quite content that it should be referred to the tariff board for hearing, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence would abundantly justify the entire removal of the duty.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee of inquiry on prices of farm implements shows that the average purchases of farm implements were largest in 1928 and 1929. The decline between 1930 and 1935 is chiefly due to the depression which hit this country. However, prices of farm implements were too high, even during the depression. On account of high protection, farm implement companies made unreasonable profits, at the expense of the farmer. Such a situation constituted, I dare say, real exploitation, and called for the utmost optimism, enterprise and industry.

It is a fact that the farmer, who could not sell his products, had to pay $263, $273 and $278 for a binder. Several companies were even asking as much as $281. No matter what the companies have to say about the cost of labour, of raw materials and of transportation, and about commissions to agents, they cannot justify themselves in the eyes of the people. They were responsible for the aggravation of the plight of agriculture.

What I said about binders also applies to cream separators. The farmer paid $107.58 for a certain type of cream separator made by the International Harvester Company and costing $41.72 at the factory. However, the trifling sum of $2.47 must be deducted for transportation.

It may be objected that most of these implements were sold on time. For the information of the house, I wish to place on Hansard the following table showing price increases in the case of sales on time:

	Eastern Canada		Western Canada
	1 yr. p.c.	2 yrs. p.c.	1 yr. p.c.	2 yrs. p.c.
International Harvester Co.. ..	6·52	8·11	7·51	9·75
Massey-Harris Co. ..	6·82	8·79	6·16	9·93
Cockshutt Plow Co..	4·92	7·61	6·57	11·23
Frost & Wood.. ..	4·77	7·49	....	....
Deere & Co..	....	....	8·57	11·06

May I now quote prices of other essential farm implements. A hay rake sold for as much as from $52 to $62. The farmer paid from $171 to $204 for a manure spreader, while he had to pay $100 to $120 for a 5-foot binder. These figures are taken from tables published in the report of the special committee, No. 20.

Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed to continue for another five minutes, I will conclude, with the consent of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot proceed except with the unanimous consent of the house. If he desires to speak for five more minutes, I am entirely in the hands of the house.

Mr. LACOMBE: The figures I have quoted are found in the tables published in No. 20 of the report of the special committee of inquiry. Therefore, I feel it my duty to draw the attention of the house upon part of the recommendations of the report which seem particularly appropriate to me:

It is the opinion of the committee that the cost of cream separators to the consumers should be reduced and with that end in view recommends that this item be placed on the free list.

Reduction in the tariff should, and does, in the long run, tend to lower the price level to the farmer, depending on the extent of free price competition in the industry.

The provisions of the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff Act affecting the importation of farm implements should be clarified and simplified.

The cost of credit to the farmer purchasing farm implements on time is excessive and the companies should take immediate steps to reduce these credit charges.

The profits to the farm implement companies on the sale of replacement parts is excessive and the price of these to the consumer should be materially reduced.

The increases announced by the companies in January, 1936, were not justified by an increase in manufacturing or distribution costs or by the financial results of the companies in so far as these were affected by the price level of farm implements.

Over the period 1891 to 1936 retail prices of farm implements have been maintained at too high a level as shown by the financial returns to the companies engaged in the industry, during that period.

I do not propose to add anything more to my remarks, Mr. Speaker. But whether one likes it or not, no practical solution to the important problem of farm implements can be found in theories and speech-making. Ideas remain fruitless if not followed by action. The excessive prices set by farm implement manufacturers are responsible for the long delayed economic recovery. In many instances during the last few years, the returns from a year's harvest proved insufficient to meet the cost of a binder, a mower, a cream separator, nay, even a plough. So what has taken place? Moral failure succeeded to economic misfortune. The discouraged farmer, who had found his greatest joy in hard work, left for the city to join the ranks of the unemployed on relief.

Let not the farm implement manufacturers ever forget that their duty in the first instance is to co-operate with the farmer. Are they not themselves dependent upon farming activities for their living? Do they realize that? If they do not, sufficient power rests with the Government of this country to bring them to reason. They will undoubtedly exercise it, in accordance with the evidence of Mr. J. K. MacKenzie, as reported on page 1288 of the minutes of proceedings and reports, No. 20, of the investigating committee.

The evidence of Mr. J. K. MacKenzie, representing the Caterpillar Tractor Company, shows that as a result of the removal of the duty on tractors valued at over $1,400 in January, 1936, the prices of its tractors to the Canadian purchasers were reduced by the amount thus saved to the company in duty. The reduction in price was $880 in the case of one particular tractor.

Mr. Speaker, should the manufacturers feel inclined to retaliate or to resort to combines, the Government would still be in a position to apply the law as contained in the Revised Statutes of Canada and thereby overcome their obstinacy.

On motion of Mr. Wood the debate was adjourned.

It being seven minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 6, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE

TRIBUTES BY THE PRIME MINISTER AND THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of this house and the people of Canada generally will have learned with deep regret of the passing at an early hour this morning of His Grace the Duke of Devonshire, who held the high office of governor general of this country from 1916 to 1921.

The Duke of Devonshire inherited and honourably maintained an ancient family tradition of public service. Before coming to Canada he had already, as a young man, sat in the House of Commons for almost two decades and had occupied important posts in the British ministry. Nor did his active participation in the public life of the old land cease with his term as governor general. From 1922 to 1924 he served as secretary of state for the colonies, which portfolio he held at the time of the imperial conference of 1923.

But it is his years as governor general of Canada which are uppermost in our thoughts to-day. Those who were responsible for the conduct of public affairs during the Duke of Devonshire's term of office realized how much his English traits of composure, of balance and sound common sense contributed to the steadiness of national life in those critical years. In his person the Duke of Devonshire was kindly and friendly, deeply and genuinely interested in the well being of his fellows in all walks of life. Many who knew him even but slightly will recall his quiet, unremitting and generous support of worthy causes and his interest in all that pertained to Canada's social, cultural and economic activities. In his official capacity the Duke of Devonshire discharged his duties with constant regard to British tradition and British constitutional practice.

The people of Canada will recall the charming and delightful personality of the Duchess of Devonshire and the manner in which, along with the members of their lovely family, she shared the interests and labours of her husband. To Her Grace and to the members of the family in their bereavement I should like to extend on behalf of the members of this House of Commons and of the people of Canada the expression of our very sincere sympathy.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of those who constitute the official opposition I desire to associate myself with the observations of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

The Duke of Devonshire came to Canada at a very difficult time. The war had been in progress for some years, and conditions were certainly anything but satisfactory from the standpoint of the allied cause. It was my privilege to see much of him, after I had left this house, because of his active participation in the work of the Red Cross society. Perhaps he could be best characterized as possessing common sense to a very singular degree. His balanced judgment, his calm approach to the problems of the country and that sterling common sense which always manifested itself enabled him to deal with very complex problems, not only of administration but also of policy, affecting not only the Red Cross society but also other organizations that had to do with the life of our country at that time, notably the Patriotic Fund.

The Duke of Devonshire was the first head of his great family to undertake the service of the crown overseas. It was an experiment for the head of that great Whig family, one of the most powerful of all the illustrious families of England. How successful that experiment was and how well he discharged his duties is a matter of history. He was interested in everything that had to do with the welfare of this country. I think one of the most powerful addresses I ever heard made by a public man was an address he made at a time when the fortunes of the war were running very strongly against us. That magnificent courage which is a distinguishing characteristic of men of his race was never more manifest than on that occasion, and I shall carry with me always the memory of that occasion. He seemed to be an apathetic gentleman, but in point of fact he was most observant and had a very keen interest in everything that was going on around about him. I remember his indicating that he thought one of the greatest compliments ever paid to him was by the stock men of the west, who found him possessed of such wide knowledge with respect to live stock that they wondered if they could not secure his services as a judge after his term of office had expired here as governor general. He had a very great appreciation of the compliment thus paid to his knowledge of live stock, of farming and of everything that had to do with agriculture. His wide training in public life, to which the Prime Minister has referred, enabled him not only to discharge the constitutional duties of governor general with great acceptance, but to be of the utmost assistance to those who were responsible for government at that time. I know that the prime minister from 1911 until 1921 would, if he were present, pay high tribute to the assistance the governor general gave to him in the discharge of his very onerous duties.

Her Grace the Duchess of Devonshire, a daughter of the distinguished Lord Lansdowne, who had been governor general of Canada, seemed almost intuitively to know this country and its peoples. Her charm and remarkable understanding and intelligence were manifest on all occasions, so that I can say frankly that everyone felt at home in her company. The family, when they were all here, were an aggregation of young men and women such as one would find in any well conducted home.

Our sympathy goes out to the Duchess of Devonshire and to her family in the great sorrow they have experienced. Although the Duke of Devonshire during the last few years had not been able actively to participate in public life, his interest in Canada after his recovery from a stroke was always manifest, and I fancy there are very few Canadians who came in contact with him who have not been invited to partake of his generous hospitality, whether in his home in London or at his great estates in Derbyshire and Yorkshire. Every Canadian was always welcome; the latch-string was always down. He will be greatly missed by all Canadians who knew him, and it must be a matter of profound satisfaction to those associated with him, and to his family, that he was able to make so great a contribution to the public service of the empire at a period of great stress and strain.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will on behalf of this house express our sincere sympathy to the Duchess of Devonshire and the surviving family of our former governor general in their bereavement.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT PRESENTED APRIL 8, 1937.

The house resumed from Thursday, May 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) for concurrence in the second report of the special committee appointed to investigate farm implement prices, presented to the house on the 8th of April, 1937.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to hon. members who have given expression to their opinions and their interpretations of the report of the special committee on farm implement prices. After paying strict attention to their contributions I have come to the conclusion that there are only two sides to every question—the side I take, and the wrong side. I sometimes marvel at the ability of some hon. members to bring out the phases of a particular argument which go to prove anything they wish to prove, and at their attempts to leave an impression favourable to the cause they desire to support.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), in high-sounding phrases, endeavoured to pose as a man attempting to clarify the national air from the creation of false impressions, and his statement with respect to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has tended only to strike one more blow upon the wedge being driven between certain sections of the country. Having regard to the record of the party with which the hon. member is associated, he should be the last to emphasize this particular virtue, because I am satisfied that the party to which he belongs has made the greatest contribution towards driving that wedge between the agrarian and the industrial interests.

The hope of Canada lies in a great national party, a party whose principles are liberty of thought, liberty of conscience and liberty of action. There is always more or less of a conflict, under our constitution, between the local and the larger interest, and it is the duty of those who happen to be responsible for the smaller interests to bring the needs of those smaller communities respectfully to the seat of government, so that the different interests may be woven together into a great national fabric which will serve as an instrument to be used for the well-being of the nation as a whole. It must be understood by all that people in different communities cannot be expected to hold exactly the same viewpoints.

I do not propose to enlarge upon the arguments which have been placed before the house by the special committee, because I believe the ground has been pretty well covered. Any figures I may have accumulated have already been given, and I refuse to repeat what has already been said. The fact still remains, however, that no matter what arguments have been put forth, since 1930 neither the implement manufacturer nor the farmer has received a reasonable profit.

I believe there is a solution of our difficulties, and it does not lie in extremes. I wish to go on record as taking what I believe to be the middle-of-the-road course, one which will give adequate protection to industry without jeopardizing the interests of the consumer. My belief is that freer trade is the best form of protection, because after all our interests must be those of the great masses of the people. The working man must be protected; he must have a larger market in which to sell the product of his labours. There must be low cost production so that there may be an outlet for the product of the working man; goods and services must be available at prices which will not too greatly reduce the purchasing power of the consumer and which will encourage the sale of more goods and produce more opportunities for labour.

When I speak of industry I include all the forces contributing to it. Capital, labour, and the consumer, all play a part in our economic life. There should be harmony among all these classes so as to encourage a reasonably fair exchange of services. Many arguments going back into ancient history have been made in an endeavour to produce evidence to bear out what hon. members have attempted to prove. I feel that perhaps the most futile of all performances is a bemoaning of the past, its mistakes, its missteps, its missed opportunities. We cannot recapture the past, even if we try. Let the dead past bury its dead, and let us live for the future.

I believe we are at the beginning of a new era; we must face conditions as they are. We must accept the facts. It is always wise to look at the past and to examine the experiences we have had so that we may plan more accurately for the future. I believe legislation in the national interest and capable of application could be brought down in this connection. We have disadvantages to overcome, but on the other hand we enjoy many natural advantages. As people living on that section of God's earth situated north of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, around the great lakes, we can develop an economic structure by taking a middle-of-the-road course, honestly facing the surmountable difficulties which are blended in with the natural advantages that we enjoy. We can make this country one in which people may have an opportunity to give expression to their choice of whatever particular type of life they wish to pursue.

True, while this is primarily an agricultural country, there are many of our population who are not natural farmers and who find an outlet for their energies in industrial fields. I feel that we should provide an opportunity for these people. In this new era into which we have entered, notwithstanding what our opinions may or may not have been in the past, there are certain conditions which we have to face. There is a tendency to-day toward balanced economics. One of the difficulties that must be surmounted in industrial life in Canada is the fact that our geographical conditions are such that we have an added expense in freight rates on account of having a long haul over a practically barren country. This is particularly true with respect to agricultural implements. This in itself adds to the cost to the western consumer of many of the products he uses from the industrial east.

A report from the Canadian National Railways shows that we deliver freight on that line for practically ·97 of a cent per ton mile. The fact is that there is 1,000 miles of territory along this line in which very little business is done in agricultural implements. This does add to the cost to the consumer.

One of the advantages enjoyed in the United States is the fairly even distribution of farm implements over the whole country. The Canadian manufacturer has to pay freight on this 1,000 mile haul, which extra cost must necessarily be charged to the consumer of his product. I take the view that that has a tendency to increase the cost of Canadian-made machinery to the Canadian farmer. I might note that all this extra cost is not charged against the western consumer; a certain percentage is charged to the Ontario farmer. On a binder weighing approximately one ton there would be an additional freight charge of $10 due to its having to be hauled 1,000 miles through northern Ontario. This should be taken into consideration in making any comparison with United States prices.

A comparison of prices from 1913 to 1925 is hardly fair, because part of the increase in price is due to the fact that some of the equipment was not included in the implements sold in the earlier years. I remember several years ago when a sheaf carrier was not considered in the standard price of a binder. Pole trucks were not used at that time and their cost was not included. We have to look at the situation as we have to face it to-day. There is also the matter of Alemite greasing, but in my view the advantages of this added equipment are more apparent than real. However, it adds around $13 to the price of a binder. We farmers have demanded that it be included and we must pay the price. The same thing applies to the oil bath mower, which adds another $16.50 to the cost. All these things should be taken into consideration when making comparisons. I am prepared to listen to any arguments advanced in favour of this added equipment, but I am a little doubtful as to the value of these things as far as service is concerned. Nevertheless they are the style, we demand them and we get them. As a practical farmer I happen to have in my barn to-day a binder that has cut thirty crops. It never had a pole truck or Alemite greasing but I expect that it will cut a few more crops, or at least I am hoping it will. I submit that some of these older implements had the ability to do the work just as well as those being sold to-day.

I believe that the industrialists in the Dominion of Canada have an opportunity to manufacture goods for the citizens of this country, but their place in the economic life of Canada is such that they must provide the goods and give a service to society that will compare with the purchasing power of the consumer. It is noticeable down through the history of industrial life in Canada that when the prices of farm products are in close relationship to the prices of manufactured goods, that is when we have enjoyed the greatest measure of prosperity. I should like to draw attention to a chart which goes back to 1917. It shows that the periods in which we enjoyed the greatest measure of prosperity were the periods when the prices of farm products exceeded those of manufactured goods. From 1917 to 1920 agriculture and industry enjoyed an unprecedented measure of prosperity. From 1921 to 1926 there was a considerable slump and during this period the prices of manufactured goods were considerably above those of farm products. From 1927 to 1929 the ratio of farm product prices increased and we again enjoyed a measure of industrial progress. From 1930 to 1936 the prices of manufactured goods were higher than the prices of farm products and we all know the condition of affairs that existed in that period. From 1932 there has been a gradual increase in the purchasing power of the farmer and the accompanying impetus to trade bears out the argument I have made. Prosperity of industry is dependent upon the prosperity of agriculture. I do not think anyone denies this.

I often wonder why there are not more steps taken to improve this condition of affairs and to keep the country from getting into the slough of economic despondency as often as it does. The argument of extremes has been used; we have heard the argument of exclusionists and of those who hold the opposite view. But these arguments of extremists remind me of the farmer who attempted to hook on to his loaded wagon with a long chain at the end of the wagon tongue. When he endeavoured to pull his load he found that when he tried to turn a corner he eventually landed in the ditch. It seems to me that many of the arguments that have been advanced here were simply a hope that by going to the extreme the wished-for results would be obtained. I do not believe anything will be gained by taking that attitude.

I submit that we should take the middle-of-the-road course and I contend that that is the course taken by this government. They have reduced the tariff whenever it was thought wise so to do. They have acted in a manner that they believed was in the national interest. This process must be slow. I believe this government has gone a long way and the figures prove that it has been successful. Since 1937 the purchasing power of the farmer has been coming up closer to the prices paid for manufactured goods. If we can continue this condition of affairs, there is no question that prosperity will be the result.

I have every reason to believe in the good judgment of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I believe he will follow what has always been the policy of Liberalism and see that no harm is done to industry. The functions of government will be used for the furtherance of industry and the continued development and welfare of the people at large. I hope and trust that we will come to the point when we shall have stability in tariffs. The tariff is an instrument which we have always had, and it could be used for revenue purposes. The protection that a tariff for revenue gives incidentally is justified, but when it comes to applying the tariff to the point of exclusion I do not think there is any justification for it.

In passing let me say that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made, in my opinion, a splendid contribution to the national life of this country during his term of office. During the election campaign of 1930 he used some rather strong phrases, which I am not going to repeat now, to the effect that he would protect the markets of the Canadian people, and I can remember after that campaign how some of my good Conservative friends naturally drew my attention to the election results, and my answer was, "Well, I hope and believe that Mr. Bennett will give us an application of those principles which he has been advocating." I am prepared to give him credit for honesty of conviction; for he did apply high protection, and he was successful at least in showing the Canadian people that that is not the road to recovery. I believe, furthermore, that he convinced many even of his own party of that truth, because they are not talking protection so much to-day. I think the right hon. gentleman contributed to giving the death blow to exclusionist protection at least.

The attitude I am taking may not suit either side, but I do not know that I have a right to take sides. I am trying to give expression to my own views. I had occasion last year to travel through the west and I visited many of my colleagues on their farms. I found them all extremely fine hosts. I had heard down in Ontario that many of the difficulties of the west arose from the fact that the average farmer there did not farm properly but simply mined the soil. I am prepared to say for our western farmers, and my opinion may have some value because I have always lived on the farm, that the west is manned by the finest group of farmers that I think you could find in any section of this country, and I say that advisedly. I believe they are doing everything possible, with conditions as they are, to better themselves and to meet the situation as they find it to-day. Unfortunately there has been a national calamity which has made it very difficult in some respects for our western farmers, but they are facing the future with a courage that I think is wonderful; I doubt whether we farmers in Ontario could stand the adversity which our fellow-farmers in the west are facing so courageously.

I have mentioned that that industry has certain surmountable difficulties in connection with freight rates, but against that the western farmer has the advantage of cheap land. It is marvellous to see the amount of energy they can accumulate with the modern agricultural implements they have to-day. Their land works much easier then ours does in the east, and they have the advantage of cheap land. We ask them to take that natural advantage and blend it with some of the disadvantages they have, and perhaps we can share some of the advantages we have and blend them with their disadvantages. We need the west, and we want the west to prosper, because after all the west is the great market for many of the products of the east.

I am going to take this opportunity to give the results of a little survey I made of what I saw on my trip to the west last year. I quietly took the opportunity to go to the various country stores to see what I could find that was representative of the town of Paris and the city of Brantford which I have the honour to represent in this house. In almost any community of any size I saw in glaring print "Massey-Harris implements" and "Cockshutt implements." Travelling through the country where there was road-building I would come across road-building machinery, and almost invariably it was from Adams Limited at Paris. On the way out I noticed that the sleepers were equipped with blankets from Slingsby Manufacturing Co., Ltd., Brantford, and even the men were wearing suitings and overcoats made by Slingsby's.

I have already spoken of the hospitality of my western hosts. As I went into some of their lovely homes I noticed that where they had waxed the hardwood floors, nine times out of ten they were using Johnson's wax, made in the city of Brantford. If they could afford to put a carpet on the floor you would see if you turned it up, that it was a Harding carpet, made in the city of Brantford. I did see some buildings painted, but I saw a lot more that needed paint. Those that looked fresh with paint I noticed were using paint from Scarfe & Co., Ltd., in the city of Brantford.

I went on from Winnipeg to Vancouver. I happened to be standing on the street in Vancouver when I met the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen), and I drew his attention to a truck body that went by, which was made by the Canada Carriage Co., Ltd., in Brantford.

I went up the inlet to a place called Ocean Falls, a narrow inlet where the only means of communication is by water. There I stood on a wharf which is used by a company manufacturing pulp and paper. They were using pulp machinery made by Waterous Limited of Brantford.

I went on to Prince Rupert, and going through a hardware store I saw they were selling products of the Crown Electric Company of Brantford. In Winnipeg I ran across a Harold Sanderson refrigerator made in Paris. Everywhere I went there were evidences that Penman's underwear, made in the town of Paris, was being widely sold in the west.

I must not overlook the fact that a large proportion of the farmers were using good judgment by buying Brantford binder twine. We are very proud of the Brantford Cordage Company, which has been able to exist in the city of Brantford without any measure of protection. As I went into the homes I would see the Locomotive washer, which is made in the city of Brantford, and looking through the jewellery stores I would see jewellery boxes made by E. A. Gunther of the city of Brantford. Last but not least—I have already mentioned the generous hospitality of our western friends—in our travels through the country, as we stopped at some inn or lunchroom, naturally the ladies always chose a Dinner sandwich and Crispy Crunch made by the Paterson Biscuit Works of Brantford, which was founded by a predecessor of mine who represented that constituency as minister of customs in the Laurier government previous to 1911.

What I wish to draw attention to is that it ill becomes us in the east to speak at all disparagingly about the west or even about their opinions. I hope I am charitable enough to recognize that what they say is worth listening to, even if we do not agree in every sense of the word. We will take all these various viewpoints and bring them here to the foot of the government, as good Liberals should do. If we are to be national we must welcome various viewpoints. It is only by bringing those various points of view before the government that we shall be able to effect a compromise, which is the only possible basis of solution of our problems. If each one insists on enforcing the will of one particular section of the country, nothing is surer than that the wedge of which the hon. member for Greenwood spoke will bring about disaster.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): The fact that the subject of this debate has been before the house off and on for so much of this session—

Mr. SPENCE: Three months.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): —indicates its importance to the people of the country as a whole and to certain large sections of the country in particular. The people all over Canada from ocean to ocean are interested in many things which have been dealt with in the investigation the report of which, Mr. Speaker, is before you to-day, and in which concurrence is being asked. Many speakers, from nearly every province in Canada, have taken part in the discussion so far, indicating the very real importance to their people of the matter which is being considered.

Weird and wonderful arguments about many matters are sometimes heard in this chamber, but I think it has remained for some hon. members to bring the strangest arguments to bear on the matter now before the house. Before proceeding with what I have to say on the subject I should like to draw attention to some of the utterances yesterday of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey).

Among other things on which he spent time was to assure us that he and his family had no connection with one of the great implement houses of this country. I am glad to see that the hon. member is in the chamber. It was unnecessary for him to assure us that he is not interested in that great company whose name he bears and which is a credit to those who founded it and carried it on for so many years. But we have been told many times that he was not connected with it, and I do not know why it should be necessary that he should repeat the statement. No one is attacking the men who built that company and who lent it their name. Probably, however, he was interested in the company at the time that its control got into financial hands and out of the hands of the manufacturers of implements, at the time the stock of the company went on the market at a very high price and soared still higher until people lost millions of dollars—largely I believe, through the control of the company getting into financial hands rather than into the hands of engineers and producers of implements. That is something which is very regrettable, but at this late date I do not see how it can be avoided or why any explanations need be made about it. It is true that much blame has been attached to this company along with other companies manufacturing implements. It is unfortunate if the blame for methods of manufacturing and distribution of implements should be attached undeservedly to those who originally built the company rather than to the stockbroking and stock jobbing methods which were used in connection with it and which caused great loss to many investors in Canada.

The hon. member for Greenwood lamented the fact that the committee did not pay particular attention to the interests of those working for the company—not alone for that company but for the implement industry in Canada. Well, it has always interested me to see the concern so many of my friends opposite exhibit for the one or two or three per cent of those who are producing goods to sell to the fifty or sixty or eighty per cent of the Canadian people. It seems to be the thought of some of those who have taken part in this debate that the committee was set up really to find out how to get more from the users of the goods and give it to those who happen to be engaged in working in the industry turning out the goods. They have forgotten that after all the consumer is the most important unit in enterprise, that if it was not for the consumer there would be no need of making such goods at all. So I think the committee was quite right if it is a fact that they paid particular attention to the interests of the buyer rather than to the seller.

Again, my hon. friend complains that for many years the implement industry has "borne the brunt of vicious attacks" in this house. I have heard none such during this or any other of the few sessions that I have attended parliament, and certainly I heard no vicious attacks on the industry in the committee. I do not understand why the hon. member for Greenwood, along with one or two other of my friends, perhaps—on this side of the house and other places, have tried to make the house believe that these companies were being viciously attacked. I sat in at almost every session of the committee last year and the year before. I observed the attitude that the men representing the companies adopted in the committee, and the satisfaction they expressed at the courteous and cordial manner in which they were treated. There was no need of using force or coercion to get them to answer the questions that were put; they were willingly there and willingly answered the questions asked by the committee. There was no hint of persecution of any kind. There was no "claptrap" about "politicians inside or outside." It was not the policy of any hon. member of the committee or any "claptrap politician" outside it to "play upon the emotions and sensitivities of the farmer and attempt to portray the implement manufacturer as the arch-villain of the piece," as the hon. member for Greenwood has charged.

There are one or two other remarks made by the hon. member to which I should like to draw attention. He said:

> It has been stated by those who have made a thorough investigation of this question that the average western farmer spends for farm implements only three cents of every dollar he spends.

On the same page of Hansard, 2573, I find a list purporting to give the "equipment on half section prairie farm showing the duty that would be paid if the implements were imported." Among the implements are a 1-2 furrow tractor plow. Well, a grain farmer would not get very far with a 1-2 furrow plow unless a man was going to do breaking with it. Then the next item is 1 set drag harrows. The statement gives dealers' prices f.o.b. Chicago; 25 per cent for duty purposes is deducted, and 7½ per cent is taken for duty purposes at the present time; the length of life of each implement is given, and the burden of duty per year is calculated upon that basis, a basis that gives the cost for implements on a half section prairie farm of $757, in addition to the power equipment, of course, that is used. If all these figures are taken, I would say that they might be figured out correctly but they would not be an accurate reflection of what the equipment would really cost. In the first place the duty on implements was not 25 per cent, and it is not 7½ per cent to-day,—it is 10½ per cent now with all the profits and the costs that have to be added to that and had to be added to the 25 per cent and 3 per cent in previous days. The dealers' prices at Chicago may or may not be current at the moment, but it is a sure thing that no cost of duty to the farmer can be figured out very accurately on this basis.

I might make just as ridiculous a statement as was made by the hon. member for Greenwood if I were to say, what would be literally true, that many farmers in Saskatchewan, some in Manitoba, and quite a number in Alberta, have paid out in single years a larger sum of money to companies representing duty paid on the implements or repairs which they were buying, than the gross total amount their crops came to in those years. Of course that statement might be true but it would not be a fair picture, because I would be taking years when there were no returns whatever on the crop, and therefore the statement would not be reasonable as an argument. Nevertheless, it is true that many farmers have had that experience. One other matter my hon. friend emphasized a good deal in trying to controvert the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) two or three nights ago was in reference to the drop in the price of binders in 1922 before the duty was reduced. Everyone knows that the dominion election in 1921, particularly in the west, was fought largely on the high cost of farm implements. Some sixty or sixty-five members of a new party came from that part of the country to the House of Commons determined to obtain reductions in the price of implements, and before the government of the day had an opportunity to bring down a budget in deference to the sentiments of the country the industry at that time reduced its prices. It is true that there were reductions in materials, but this is one of the marvellous things I find—that, whereas reductions in materials and labour amounted to about $39, there was a reduction of $60 in the price of the binder between 1921 and 1922. In addition to the $39 reduction in materials and labour there was a reduction of $14 representing burden.

I wish later on to contrast the action at that time, in reducing the price of the binder because of the reduced burden, with what has been done in recent years when prices have been increased very materially.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I am sure that he wants to make an accurate statement. The price reduction was made in October, 1921, and the reduction in duty of 2½ per cent was made on May 24, 1922, a matter of eight months. I was in error when I said six.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The figures that I have in my hand are those of the International Harvester Company of Canada, Limited, and I believe they are probably correct: "Schedule of manufacturing costs, 8 foot binder, using an average burden, 1913, and 1919 to 1936 with sales realization comparable thereto."

The reduction made in October would not be of much value in that year, but 1922 is shown to be the year when the reduction was made. I do not propose to follow that further except to say that it was not the first time that the industry in Canada did make reductions in deference to public sentiment. In 1893 similar reductions were made after a campaign carried on by many people against the comparatively high prices that then prevailed. As one who attended every sitting of the committee which I possibly could, I would say that it is not a single thing alone that has caused an increase in the price of late years or has caused the high prices that have worried the farmers and others in the country. My hon. friend from Greenwood (Mr. Massey) in dealing with the industry said something about the lack of consideration for the workers. He said, referring to the industrial worker:

> What of his job, which provides his means of livelihood, when his expenses are so heavy and when the uncertainties of his position these days are a constant source of echinated worry?

I confess I had to look up the dictionary for the meaning of the word "echinated." I thank the hon. gentleman for introducing it to the house.

An hon. MEMBER: What does it mean?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Someone asks what it means. It is descriptive of the problem we are investigating at the moment. It is a "prickly" question bristling with difficulties, and sometimes those who touch the bristles are liable to be jabbed by them. The point I wish to make, while thanking my hon. friend for this addition to the knowledge and culture of the house by his use of that very descriptive word, is with reference to what he said about the difficult position of the worker in the industry, the weight of his expenses and so on. That is one of the complaints I make against all artificial costs and burdens that are laid upon industry in Canada. In the long run the worker does not benefit, and as a net result of all these various burdens placed one on top of the other, constantly pyramiding, there is danger some day of the whole structure falling down. If that table standing there on four legs is tinkered with, if someone says that this corner is too low and therefore puts a piece under this leg, raising it to that extent, we all know what will happen. When you raise that leg for the benefit of the owner of industry, someone else will want to raise the leg next to it for the benefit of the workers in industry and that will leave your table lopsided. Some bright mind will then undertake to raise it at the other end, putting a piece under a third leg for the benefit of the financiers and transportation interests, and finally the consumers insist that they should have their corner raised too, and that is sometimes attempted. The result is that your table is raised equally all around, and you can see what that means; the level over all is the same as before. But in the meantime you have added a heavy cost to industry and that additional burden must be levied ultimately against many with small incomes, those in receipt of small fixed payments of various kinds, and who cannot benefit from the adjustments made.

Among the factors which the committee was told contributed to the increase at the present time were materials, labour, factory burden, freights, commissions, time sales, collections, bad debts and the lack of volume. There is another one that they should have added and that is the matter of financing, because unquestionably when any industry gets into the hands of financiers, the money men, who think that wealth consists of money and papers, then it is going to add to the burden of running that industry in many ways which often bring it to the brink of failure. I should like to look at some of the arguments advanced in the committee with respect to various materials, and I notice that there were some curious anomalies. In connection with paint, which is an important item, the price of flax seed went down and the price of linseed oil went up. Undoubtedly that added to the cost of machinery. In connection with lumber, we are told that Canadian white pine and British Columbia fir in 1913 stood at 100 a thousand, I presume. By 1936, white pine was 149 and British Columbia fir 113. But in 1935, a little before the time when the increase in implement prices was put into effect, British Columbia fir stood at 93 instead of 100 as it was in 1913 and as against 108 in 1930. So that these figures do not show any upward trend. Pig iron, taken at 100 in 1913, was in 1935 up to 111.

Mr. BENNETT: The year 1913 is not fair.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No, it is too much in favour of the industry, I imagine; 1913 was before the war. If, however, there is any other reason to indicate that it is not fair I shall be glad to take some other year. In 1924 when we were nearly normal, pig iron was 143 as against 111 in 1935, and in 1930 it was 120. Steel bars in 1924 stood at 151; in 1930, 113; and in 1935, 109. Coal shows a little reduction. In 1924 it was 227; in 1930, 218; and in 1935, 190. Linseed oil was 93 in 1932 and 121 in 1935; as against 199 in 1924. Oak lumber was down from $167 in 1924 to $107 in 1935. Freight on implements was 153·9 in 1931 and the same in 1935. A look at wages will give us some interesting figures:

Blacksmiths	236	174
Machinists	228	173
Pattern makers	238·8	186·3
Moulders	204·7	163·3
Painters	195·8	162·5
Labourers	191·8	169·2

Apparently those are on a percentage basis. So unquestionably it was not the price of materials or the cost of labour that brought about the increase at that time, and that is borne out by the evidence of Mr. Morrison. Some people have been afraid that the worker in industry was getting less out of it than he did in previous years, due to technological improvements and so on. At page 57 of the evidence taken last year it is shown that the ratio of materials to labour in prime costs during the years 1913 to 1921 compared as four is to one; that is, materials were four and labour one. For the past ten years the figures have been 76·57 to 23·40, or slightly over three to one. In other words the position of the worker when employed had improved comparatively in that time.

One of the great increases that I find—and I believe it is related to the cost of financing and also to the reduction in sales—is in connection with the factory burden. The Hamilton plant of the International Harvester Company I think is run efficiently, but the factory burden as compared with productive labour was 118 per cent in 1913. In 1929 it was up to 136 per cent. For the fiscal year ending 1932 it reached the figure of 526·80 per cent. In 1935 it was down to 196 per cent, and was still on the way down when this investigation was being held. Somewhat the same situation exists in regard to the Massey-Harris Company, although there the figures are not quite so extreme. I know the books were kept in a little different manner, but approximately the same result is shown. In 1930 the factory burden was 267 per cent in relation to direct labour. For the next few years the figures were as follows:

	Per cent to direct labour
1931	476
1932	474
1933	384

I have in my hand the answers given by Mr. Morrison, in which he admitted that material cost was coming down. I shall not take time to read his answers, because I think that is generally admitted. The same is true of wages, as compared with other years. As between 1926 and 1936, when the last investigation was held, materials had decreased from 66·1 per cent to 58·2 per cent. Wages showed the following figures: For 1926 an average of 52 cents per hour; for 1935 an average of 49 cents per hour, a decrease of 3 cents per hour or about six per cent. If my memory serves me aright these are the figures of the Massey-Harris Company. The submission was made by the company at that time that by keeping together a skeleton force composed of foremen, straw bosses and men a little above the general rank and file, the cost was greater than it otherwise would have been. Possibly the difference should have been charged to overhead, but in any case the skeleton organization was being kept together in that way, and no doubt that was quite proper. Nevertheless the fact remains that during that period wages dropped by about three cents per hour, or approximately six per cent. It was admitted quite freely that labour and material costs and budens were coming down, but the argument was advanced that selling prices had to be increased because burdens particularly had been so high from 1930 to 1934, the period during which we had 476 per cent as the burden cost of the Massey-Harris Company and 526 per cent as the extreme cost of the International Harvester Company, and it was during those years that money was being lost by the company.

A good deal has been said from time to time with regard to the number of men employed in this industry. I recall quite well that when duties were low several years ago this industry employed a good many thousand men. The figure of employment for 1936 was higher than that for 1935, and in 1936 the number of workers in the Massey-Harris shops was 1,721. The total in 1935, including factory executives, engineers, factory workers, general executives and office personnel at head office and branches was 2,061. When one looks back a few years and remembers the seven or eight thousand men at one time employed by this company, one realizes not only the loss that has ensued to the men who remained on the payroll but the greater loss suffered by the men who were dropped from the payroll, who once worked for the company but who lost their employment because these machines were not being sold.

Mr. GOLDING: They employed nearly twelve thousand at one time.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, and that dropped to two thousand only a couple of years ago. The general manager of the company was asked whether or not he and his company were under any disadvantage as compared with their principal competitor in Canada, and his answer was that he did not think they were under any disability. Neither in wages nor in material was that Canadian company under any disadvantage as compared with their rivals. I have before me figures showing the wages paid from 1926 on, in the different lines of work. I am not going to read those figures, because time is passing quickly, but I do say that Canadian manufacturers are not at any disadvantage in relation to competitors either in this country or in the United States, for the simple reason that wages are somewhat lower in this country. Another United States company which recently established a branch factory in Canada, the John Deere Company, furnished figures with regard to wages paid at the Welland plant. In 1935 the average was 39·2 cents; in 1936 it was 44·5 cents. The company also furnished information as to comparable wage rates at their plant in Wisconsin, indicating that in 1935 the average was 43·1 cents per hour, or nearly 14 cents more than the Canadian average, and in 1936, 57·6 cents per hour or 13·1 cents higher than the rate they were paying in Ontario. Yet the claim is being made that they must get that or this protection in this country because of the higher wages they have to pay, and the higher cost of material. One rather interesting admission was made by the vice-president of the American International Harvester Company, the president of the Canadian organization. The questions and answers on the point are as follows:

Q. I thought that from your long intimate experience you might be able to assist the committee by telling us whether it was lower in the United States or higher in Canada?

A. It would be away lower.

Q. The retail prices of comparable implements?

A. I should say that they would be lower in the United States than in Canada. I gave you that before.

Q. Would you suggest by what percentage, over a long range viewpoint?

A. I could not answer that. I could not answer it when you asked me it before, and I cannot answer it now.

That evidence is to be found at page 456 of the last inquiry. Unquestionably prices would be lower, according to Mr. Morrison's information.

One of the important points we have to keep in mind is that during the years of so-called depression an immense amount of purchases were required and should have been made, but could not be carried through because of lack of purchasing power of the customer. This condition was not confined to the wheat growers of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba. I am not asking for consideration on farm implements and separators only for the western farmers. The man in the east who has to buy a cream separator or an implement has as much right to consideration as the man in the west. Sometimes the eastern farmers suffer more because of the fact that they carry on a more diversified form of farming. They have to carry a wider variety of implements than do the farmers of western Canada, where the same implements can be used over a greater acreage. Eastern farmers were not able to buy those implements during the years when butter, dairy products generally, animal products and poultry products were selling at very low prices. They had to do without repairs which were required, and as a result there was a backlog, as it is described, which accumulated until the years 1935 and 1936, at which time it was estimated that implements to the value of at least $197,000,000 would have to be purchased at the earliest possible date.

It was at that time that the implement companies, having in mind the burden of past years, their lack of sales and their financial costs, finally decided they were going to raise the prices. They made that decision at a time when it looked as though many farmers would have to go on the market for requirements of new machinery, and repairs to old. It is because the implement companies took action at that time, when material, labour, interest and other charges were going down, and because they chose that time to increase their prices, that much resentment has been aroused in the minds of those who have to buy their goods.

There is one interesting point to which I should like to draw attention before my time is exhausted. A former general manager of the Massey-Harris Company, Mr. T. A. Russell, as reported at page 465 of the evidence of 1936, was asked about the question of distribution, and in summarizing the items entering into the high cost of implements I believe the following observations by Mr. Russell are very significant. He is reported at page 465 as follows:

> It seems a perfect tragedy on a morning in collection time to see eight men starting out with eight automobiles who have got to be paid by somebody, to collect accounts.

Someone has to pay for the collection of the money. Mr. Russell stated that on one occasion, when he was new in the business, he approached a competitor, a man who had been in the business all his life, and asked if it was possible for them to join in a certain amount of cooperation, particularly with respect to collections. Apparently he failed in that direction, and made no further effort. He said he would be glad to discuss the matter further. I am hopeful that as a result of the inquiry steps will be taken by the implement companies to help themselves through cooperation, or in other ways.

I am not going to spend much time on some other factors which have hindered and made more difficult the position of the implement companies and their efforts to solve their own problems. In this category would come customs duties and regulations, fixed values for duty purposes, excise taxes, sales taxes and other burdens which have entered into their costs. Some time ago in the house I referred to the apparently irregular manner in which values were fixed for duty purposes as against one implement company and another, and pointed out that the condition led to discrimination and the retention of profits in the United States which should have been shown as having been earned in Canada. That condition has caused a loss to the revenues of Canada, and has also caused loss to the people buying goods so affected. The point has been considered, however, and at this time I shall not enlarge upon it.

I should like to emphasize that when in 1935 and 1936 reductions in tariffs were made on imported implements, those reductions were largely passed on to the customers; there is no argument about that. According to the evidence of the general manager of the Massey-Harris Company and the president of the International Harvester Company of Canada most of those reductions—not quite all—were passed on to the purchasers. A rather significant point in connection with the reduction of values was raised by Mr. Morrison of the International Harvester Company. Counsel was asking him about changes which had been made. The questions and answers are as follows:

> Q. Tell me this, Mr. Morrison: who would institute these changes, what would give rise to these different changes that you have related to us; action on the part of the company or action on the part of the Department of National Revenue; or, could you tell us?
> A. I do not believe I can give you an answer very definitely in regard to that. The change that was made in January, 1917, was the result of a visit which some of the Harvester men made to Ottawa to discuss the matter with the proper officials.
> Q. Can you recall what happened with respect to the change that was made on May 7, 1935?
> A. That was the result of representations made to the officials where this change was solicited.

Q. And the one in January of 1936?
A. I do not know what prompted that change.
Q. It was not solicited by your company?
A. I am not sure.
Q. You simply do not know?
A. That is it.

Mr. Morton: It was on the basis of representations which we had made at one time or another to the department.

I read these lines in order that the house and country may be more insistent that when changes are made by the department of revenue they be made in such a way that one may know what he should pay for goods brought into the country, and at what prices goods should be valued, according to their cost.

In the few minutes I have left I should like to draw attention to some of the recommendations in the final report and summing up of the committee, which I believe are most important. Recommendation No. 7 is as follows:

That farmers have a right to expect the price level of farm implements to be based on the most efficient and economical manufacturing and distribution cost.

I believe everyone will agree that that is a reasonable claim, because if farmers can not produce and market in the most economical and efficient manner the goods they have to offer, through the use of these implements, then we must lose our place in the markets of the world. It would be nonsense to talk about using the surplus products at home, because there are not enough people in Canada to use the great volume of products available. The resources of Canada, while extensive, are not greatly diversified. They consist of a few in large quantities, rather than many in smaller quantites. We have minerals and timber and farm lands upon which to get grain and other products, but if we are going to retain our hold on the markets of the world the goods that we sell must be produced and marketed most efficiently. In order to attain that efficiency the farmer has a right to insist that the goods he buys shall be sold and distributed in the same efficient manner.

Recommendation No. 14 of the report of the committee reads.

That the relative increase in the cost of labour has been one of the important elements in the increase of prices occurring between 1913 and 1936.

That is a statement rather than a recommendation. While that is true, I would point out that artificial increases in the cost of living have made the real wages received by the worker in industry less than his apparent wages. This is true with the exception of the period 1930 to 1935, when on account of the low prices of farm products and foodstuffs his real wages were higher than his apparent wages. While that is so, probably only one man is employed to-day in the implement industry as compared with five or six employed formerly. It would be far better to have 10,000 men working at wages comparable to what they were in 1913 or 1926 than to have 2,000 men working at wages that are apparently higher. Even if they were higher in fact, the results would not be as beneficial with a smaller number of men actually at work.

This decrease in employment has not been due to technological improvements, as is demonstrated by the automobile industry in Detroit. With every improvement in machinery in that industry there have been more hours of labour required at higher wages. The workers in that industry receive the highest remuneration.

Recommendation No. 16 reads:

That it is the opinion of the committee that the cost of cream separators to the consumers should be reduced and with that end in view recommends that this item be placed on the free list.

If nothing else is done at the moment, that is one thing that should be done in order to give our farmers, who are in a most difficult position, a chance to reduce the cost of producing their farm wealth.

Recommendation No. 17 reads:

That reduction in the tariff should and does, in the long run, tend to lower the price level to the farmer, depending on the extent of free price competition in the industry.

Even without much free price competition in the industry in Canada it is evident that the reduction in the tariff has resulted to some degree in reduced prices for goods imported.

Recommendation 19 reads:

That the provisions of the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff Act affecting the importation of farm implements should be clarified and simplified.

Recommendation 20 reads:

That regulations of the Department of National Revenue, under the above provisions, have resulted in the inequality of treatment of importers of a like class and that the whole matter should be the subject of survey by the minister of that department.

I am glad to be able to say that that principle has already been accepted and that an investigation is now under way.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I have only a few more paragraphs. I thank the house for its courtesy in letting me finish and I assure hon. members that I shall not take up many minutes of their time.

Recommendation 21 reads:

That these regulations have resulted directly and indirectly in the retention in the United States of profits arising out of the operations in Canada of certain United States companies and that these profits have been subjected to income tax in the United States instead of in Canada.

No. 23 reads:

That recent reductions in tariff and other trade barriers resulted in the Canadian companies lowering their prices on certain farm implements imported from the United States, but the United States companies manufacturing a full general line in the United States and marketing these in Canada, did not lower their prices generally on importations other than those affected by the price reductions of the Canadian companies, indicating the lack of free price competition in the industry.

That is an indication of what I suggested at the outset, that when men of money rather than engineers have charge of producing factories we are likely to find this condition of affairs. We are likely to have competition in many ways but no competition in price or in selling.

Recommendation 25 reads:

That in order to assist the farm implement companies to satisfy the requirements of agriculture in the matter of farm implements in the next few years, the committee is of the opinion that the duty on materials entering into the manufacture of farm implements should be removed or that the farm implement companies should be granted a drawback of any duties paid on materials entering into the manufacture of farm implements.

I do not think any one will deny that if a reduction is made in the duty on farm implements, in all fairness this should be done.

No. 26 reads:

That the last recommendation is made on the assumption that any saving to the companies resulting therefrom should be passed on to the purchaser of farm implements in the retail price.

No 27 reads:

That the cost of credit to the farmer purchasing farm implements on time is excessive and the companies should take immediate steps to reduce these credit charges.

Recommendation No. 28 reads as follows:

That the profits to the farm implement companies on the sale of replacement parts is excessive and the price of these to the consumer should be materially reduced.

The cost of repair parts has been one of the worst factors facing the farmer in the past few years. Many were not able to buy new implements and they found the cost of repair parts very high. These are a few of the recommendations that I should like to emphasize.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

It might be found necessary to set up a board such as the board of railway commissioners, or some other authority constantly to check wages, prices and other costs of the companies engaged in this industry and be ready to take necessary steps to see that the farmers are able to meet their needs with implements that are produced, distributed and sold in the most efficient manner. Such a board should see to it that the waste and high costs at present prevailing were in large measure eliminated.

Mr. J. J. DUFFUS (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate for the purpose of correcting certain statements that have been made in this chamber in connection with the report submitted by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston): I desire at this time to convey to him and the members of the committee my congratulations upon the great amount of time and labour they have given to this subject. I have either listened to or read in Hansard most of the speeches that have been delivered during this debate, and was present in the committee when some of the evidence was given. To say the least, I submit respectfully that some of the speeches and some of the reports are at variance with the facts so far as one of the industries in my constituency is concerned, namely, the De Laval Company Limited, manufacturers of the finest cream separators in the world.

I desire to refer to remarks made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) on March 15 of this year. I do not wish to imply that my hon. friend was not sincere when he made his observations; having a very high regard for his integrity, but I do think he was labouring under a misapprehension. At page 1352 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

. . . the De Laval Company is not a manufacturing plant; it is simply an assembly plant. The cream separator end of the business is a very small proportion of its total business.

And further:

The amount paid to Canadian labour is only a small fraction of the cost of the cream separators assembled at the De Laval plant. For example, out of a total factory cost of $59.65 per separator, only $1.69 is paid to direct Canadian labour.

That information was obtained from page 1238 of the report of the committee, which says:

The committee points out that over the ten-year period, the labour cost on its separator made in Peterborough, Ontario, only amounted to $1.69.

The period referred to is from 1926-1935. That was prior to the time the company began to manufacture separators in Peterborough. In other words, they were brought in from the United States, and that item of $1.69 was only for the work of balancing the bowl after the machine had arrived at their Peterborough plant. I have read the evidence, Mr. Speaker, and cannot find where the De Laval Company gave any similar information. Let it be distinctly understood that I hold no brief for the De Laval Company or any other company, but if an hon. member makes erroneous statements about any industry in the constituency which I have the honour to represent I claim it is my duty to correct them. Indeed, I hold that the same applies to agriculturists, workers, business men, returned soldiers, people on relief, or any other class of citizens about whom misstatements may be made. I submit it is my prerogative as their representative to protect their interests.

I am very familiar, Mr. Speaker, with this industry, the De Laval Company Limited, manufacturers of cream separators in the city of Peterborough, and may say that I am very proud of it. When first elected alderman to the city council of Peterborough some years ago, this was the first industry I assisted in inducing to locate in that great industrial centre. To give the house some idea of the magnitude of the company, there are sixteen acres of ground occupied by the company, located at the corner of No. 7 highway and Park street south, and it would be worth the while of hon. members to visit that factory if they have the opportunity. Originally this plot was a cornfield. Quite naturally the crop was developed from corn to ensilage, to cows and to milk and its products and the equipment necessary in the processing of them, such as milking machines, cream separators, pasteurizers, churns, and many other accessories required in that business.

The De Laval Company in Peterborough is the largest and best equipped factory manufacturing milk handling equipment in the British empire. More than 14,000 square feet are embraced in its factory buildings, one wing alone of the factory being 600 feet long. The manufacturing operations include all processes, including foundry work and castings. Over one-half mile of railway enters the property, serving the shipping warehouses and incoming materials. The factory also includes steel working equipment, plating equipment, electric welding and many other processes required in converting the raw metals into the finished separator.

The employees of this company are of a very high standard. There are 246 factory workers, and 126 of an office and sales force, or a total of 372 employees dependent on this industry, and as well there are 2,500 representatives throughout Canada.

Contrary to the implications contained in the remarks of the hon. member for Selkirk, the manufacture of cream separators comprises about one-third of the total business of this company. What is more, and very significant, the Canadian content, including material, labour and so forth, amounts to 51·58 per cent of the total construction of their cream separators, as follows: Parts purchased from other Canadian factories, 12·59 per cent; Canadian labour, 22·57 per cent; Canadian supplies and expense materials, 14·23 per cent; Canadian duties, 1·51 per cent.

May I point out, as hon. members have been referring to an increase in the price of farm implements during the past year, that the De Laval Company has not increased the price of its separator during the past two years.

There are very many important and essential manufacturing industries in Canada whose product does not contain 51·58 per cent of Canadian content, and no hon. member of this house would knowingly be guilty of misrepresenting or deprecating their importance. Far from being assemblers only of separators, this company performs as many as five hundred operations on a single separator. The parts on which operations are performed in Peterborough number fifty-nine. Included in these fifty-nine items are some of which several of each are used in the manufacture of each machine. I should like to give a list of the parts used in the manufacture of De Laval separators in its Canadian plant in the city of Peterborough and the number of operations on each:

Casting for disc washer, 3; cap for disc washer, 10; body for faucet, 8; plug for faucet, 12; bowl nut, 12; latch for supply can bracket, 3; latch for can, 4; worm wheel, 20; intermediate disc, 6; top disc complete, 16; driving dog bushing, 6; tubular shaft complete, 29; wrench for bowl nut, 6; speed indicator complete, 7; supply can bracket, 6; pin for latch, 3; supply can spider, 14; neck piece, 16; outer gear guard, 8; crank handle complete, 3; collar for ratchet crank, 11; crank arm complete, 15; gear shaft, 4; gear, 10; bottom screw, 10; stool, 13; pail shelf and bracket, 9; bushing for pail shelf, 4; shell for cream cover, 5; spout for cream cover, 6; skim milk cover complete, 4; shell for S.M. cover, 5; spout for S.M. cover, 6; cream cover complete, 4; float complete, 9; supply can, 12; leg for supply can, 5; faucet complete, 6; bowl shell, 17; cup for regulating cover, 6; regulating cover, complete, 6; rod for disc washer, 10; tube for disc washer, 6; disc washer, 10; wire handle, 5; cream cover complete, 4; shell for regulating cover, 6; P.S. hub cap, 3; retaining collar (C.S.), 7; retaining collar (G.S.), 6; pinion and shaft, 9; nut, 8; W.S. spindle, 20; dust cap, 5; top bearing spring, 8; bezel, 4; frame, 18.

I hope the information given to the house will convince the most skeptical hon. member that the De Laval company is absolutely a manufacturing industry and not merely an assembling plant.

Seventy of the splendid employees of this company are specifically engaged in the manufacture of cream separators, thus maintaining and keeping off relief about 265 Canadian citizens.

In addition, this firm has $42,060 invested in new, up-to-date machinery and equipment for turning out its machines on a highly satisfactory basis to the Canadian farmer. Moreover, it carries in stock at all times over $100,000 worth of spare parts for satisfactorily servicing these machines in the hands of the Canadian farmer. A significant fact is that the company can readily supply all parts for all types and models of its machines manufactured and delivered to the consumers by them during the past thirty years. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a service vastly different from that given by many firms, which do not pretend to assist the farmer by making it possible for him to retain his machinery on a satisfactory and economical basis over such a long period of time. I should point out that thousands of Canadian farmers have found on their hands obsolete and orphan machines constituting a complete loss, as a result of buying from sources from which no reliable and continuous service has been given.

May I also draw the attention of the house to the fact that obsolescence in service parts and supplies amounts to $10,000 annually, and in addition, thousands of dollars' worth of jigs, tools, dies and so forth.

Permit me to say that those who gave evidence before the committee on behalf of the De Laval Company were not given a fair opportunity to obtain and give correct information in that they were called by telephone and asked to present themselves at once. This did not give them time to equip themselves with full and detailed information with which to appear before the committee. Surely, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me that they were thus placed at a great disadvantage in obtaining and submitting the correct information. Furthermore, I believe that the method followed was more in the nature of an inquisition than a fact producing procedure.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): I might point out to my hon. friend that a considerable time before the De Laval people were called before the committee they had been supplied with a questionnaire. If they had not prepared themselves surely that was not the fault of the committee.

Mr. DUFFUS: Shall I submit, Mr. Speaker, that at any rate they were under a misapprehension. It is true that in the evidence given by Captain Cutmore, of the De Laval company, he submitted an item of $4.30 for direct labour. He was right in his contention in this regard, as he understood the question, but what he understood was meant was, the labour applied direct to the parts while they were being manufactured and assembled. The answer he gave did not include such items as supervision, clerical, receiving and stores, shipping and trucking, inspection, cleaning, small tools, casting preparations, sundry labour, bonuses, watchman, foreman, gateman, experimental engineers, draftsmen, and additional obscure expenses such as power, water, fuel, fuel oil, taxes, insurance, maintenance, interest, etc. In other words, these were not and should have been included in factory cost set-up, just as much as the labour in manufacturing the parts from which the separator is made.

I would strongly recommend for the consideration of the government and the house that the duty be removed entirely from all imported parts used for repairs by the farmer in the field. This would greatly reduce the cost of repairing and reconditioning his machines, and result in a substantial saving to him. Indeed I would go further and just as strongly recommend, for the consideration of the government and the house, that all imported parts and material required for the manufacturing of all farm machinery and equipment be admitted duty free. This would very materially reduce the farmer's production costs, which is most essential in increasing his prosperity.

I am wholly in favour of the recommendation of the committee that some agency of government should carefully analyse and correlate the evidence as it appears in the records of the committee, and in addition should obtain the results, when available, of the inquiry now proceeding in the United States, and in due course present a report on both matters to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), a copy of such report to be filed with the records of the committee.

Mr. LEADER: Before the hon. member sits down I should like to ask him a question. I hated to interrupt him when he was dealing with the splendid factory they have at Peterborough, and its efficiency, but in the evidence we received from the De Laval people they told us that they were importing from Sweden cream separators under 500 pounds capacity. I should like to know if they are still doing that.

Mr. DUFFUS: I believe there is a demand for a small separator of that type, and that some are being imported from Sweden and distributed to their customers.

Mr. H. W. WINKLER (Lisgar): So much has been said on the subject of the motion of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) for concurrence in the report of the special committee that it is difficult to break new ground. I had thought at first that western members would be the only ones concerned, but I am glad to see that there has been an expression of opinion from nearly all parts of the country. That is as it should be, for nowadays agricultural implements play an indispensable part in farm operations, no matter how small. Per improved area, figures as to the investment in agricultural machinery show that the prairie provinces have the lowest price relationship of all.

In a bulletin based on census figures, entitled New Machinery and Repairs in Relation to Farm Expenses, by Ian McArthur, the province of British Columbia leads with an investment of $18.28 per improved acre; Nova Scotia follows with $12.50, Ontario with $11.45, Prince Edward Island with $10.60, New Brunswick with $9.96, Alberta with $6.55, Manitoba, $6.44, Saskatchewan, $5.53. In the same bulletin four figures are given as to the cost of farm machinery in proportion to farm expense. Nova Scotia is lowest with 5·56 per cent, Quebec has 5·8 per cent, Ontario 5·9 per cent, and Saskatchewan 11 per cent. Those are the only four figures supplied.

In the same bulletin is given the accepted figure for the average life of farm machinery. This is placed at fifteen years. I would contend however from personal experience and from the experience of western farmers with whom I have spoken that while this may be a fair figure for farms east of the great lakes, it is not so for the prairie provinces.

Just as the cost of machinery in proportion to farm expense is proportionally twice as high on the prairies, so I would say the average life of an agricultural machine would be half of what it is in the east. Dragged over a much larger field area, machines wear out that much faster.

In regard to the value of implements and farm machinery in the three prairie provinces, I am taking the figures supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the year 1936. The value of farm implements and machinery in Manitoba that year was $35,828,300; in Saskatchewan, $119,321,100; in Alberta, $80,039,700. The total for the three provinces was $235,189,100. Assuming implements last fifteen years, then one-fifteenth of that amount, or $15,678,000, would have been spent in replacement in the year 1936 had that been a normal year.

On page 2424 of Hansard of April 29, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), referring to the write-up in price of a binder as a representative implement between 1913 and 1936, and deducting from the 1936 figure the uncontrollable increase, concluded there still was a nineteen per cent increase in price. Nineteen per cent of the normal replacement cost of $15,678,000 would be $2,978,000, which would be a very conservative estimate of the cost of the write-up to the farmers of the prairie provinces in 1936. If the average life of an implement were ten years instead of fifteen, and I maintain this is still a conservative estimate, the annual burden on western farmers would be close to four and a half million dollars, or about twenty-one dollars average per farm.

The heart of the difficulty lies in the fact that since 1932 the cost of manufacturing agricultural implements has gone down while the price to the farmer has gone up. In the case of a binder this difference has been $27. Reference has been made to the tariff on agricultural implements being placed at 25 per cent by the late administration, and to a reduction by the present government, first to 12½ per cent and then to 7½ per cent. Reference has also been made to the increase in prices by the implement companies on three occasions within the same period. We have seen taunting articles in the press referring to this situation and pointing out that the Liberals claimed that a reduction in tariff would mean a reduction in price, whereas exactly the opposite occurred. Within the last few days I have been speaking with a member of this house who heard that some of the western members were going to ask for a complete wiping out of the remaining 7½ per cent tariff. He thought that it would not have the desired effect any more than did the previous tariff reductions, first of 12½ per cent and then of 5 per cent. We were going about it the wrong way, he thought. If what we wanted was lower prices, he thought we should try raising the tariff. If that be true, then I say that we have excellent grounds for suspecting the existence of a combine in view of what has happened already. If it be so, then that settles the matter. This government should, in my opinion, take steps to find out at once whether it is so. There is a Liberal policy to deal effectively with such a situation.

Mr. H. J. PLAXTON (Trinity) In rising to take part in this debate I wish to state at the beginning that although I represent an urban constituency I have served my apprenticeship on a farm as a hired man. The experience and knowledge which I gained in that field of employment have influenced me greatly, and I say in all sincerity that there are very few members in this house who are any more sympathetic to farmers' problems than I am. I have the honour to represent the constituency of Trinity in the city of Toronto, and those residing in that area, thousands of whom are wage earners, sent me here to protect and further their interests to the best of my ability. That I believe I have done, but still I would be derelict in my duty were I not to speak on this question.

As is true of most problems there are two or three sides from which this subject can be argued. My purpose is to present the case of the wage earner, who is directly or indirectly identified with the manufacturing of farm implements in Canada. May I say I am interested only in the practical aspects of this problem and not in theories. I am interested in the things that I can see, not in a maze of statistics and the erroneous conclusions which they very often support. I am interested more in the welfare and happiness of my constituents. I am interested in the numbers that are unemployed and on relief. I am interested in the equity in homes, representing in many cases life savings, homes that have been foreclosed during the past few years.

In my opinion the blight of the recent depression fell upon the homes of the working men of the country just as well as on the farms, and I intend to oppose any move which proposes to cast another blight upon the homes of literally hundreds in my constituency. Let me express this obvious truism at the outset. Agriculture as an industry is, I submit, no longer confined to the farm alone. I claim and will prove that hundreds, if not thousands of wage earners in Toronto, and particularly many of my own constituents who are engaged in the manufacturing of farm implements, contribute just as much to the production of wheat in Canada as does the farmer himself. In the early days of the opening up of the west farming was largely a matter of manual labour. The harvest train took thousands of men from the east to the western plains to assist in the harvesting of the crop. Modern machinery has changed all that. To-day the work of the farm is shared between factory and field. Many of the men who used to be on the western plains or in the fields of eastern Ontario in harvest gangs or threshing crews, or who plowed the straight furrow behind the walking plow, are now in the ranks of the farm implement industry, which now enables the farmer to do work not only at a minimum of cost, but with a minimum of effort, assisted only sometimes by the members of his immediate family.

To-day, in my judgment, the artisans in the farm implement plants of Toronto and Brantford, are farmers just as much as their colleagues in the field, and great has been their contribution to the primary industry of the dominion—agriculture. During the last five or six years development on development has taken place, each one making a tremendous contribution to the major problem of reducing the cost of producing a bushel of wheat. Take the one way disc seeder, which replaced three machines, the plow, the cultivator and the drill. Then there is the modern rubber-tired tractor, light in weight, economical in fuel, high in speed, which replaces to-day the hundreds of horses and the men who were required to look after them in the past. Then there is perhaps the greatest development of all, the small eight-foot binder, driven directly by the power shaft from the tractor, enabling one man alone to harvest and thresh a crop, aided perhaps by his boy, who drives up to the combine when the grain compartment has been filled, empties it, and delivers it to the elevator.

It is interesting to note in this connection, that, according to figures which have been checked by the agricultural colleges in this country, the farmer using this type of equipment reduces his cost of operations in preparing his seed bed, seeding, harvesting and threshing, over the older methods, from fourteen cents a bushel down to five cents, or a saving of nine cents. Here, I submit, is a record of which this industry can be proud, an economy which overshadows almost to the point of eclipse the price increases which have taken place since 1936, owing to the mounting costs of raw materials and labour, of which we have heard so much in this house, and which, to use the figures which the hon. member for Lake Centre quoted on March 11, amount to $4,000,000. Considering this sum in relation to the average yearly wheat production in Canada, it amounts to approximately only one cent a bushel.

Much has been heard of the privation and hardship which the farmers have undergone in Canada, all of which is tragically and abundantly true. But what about the hardships and privations of the farmer's counterpart, who, during the years of depression, sought his livelihood in the farm implement plants of the country? What about the tragedy of long periods of unemployment, low wages, shorter hours, loss of homes, and in many cases relief? Truly, the farm implement workers have suffered along with the farmers, and the toll they have paid to the depression has been no less than the farmer's. Had it not been for the splendid artisanship of these men, their ability to produce quality goods which have set up a demand for Canadian implement products in every agricultural country in the world, their plight would have been more serious and their weekly pay envelopes less well filled than they are at the present time. Just as Canadian farm implements pioneered the plains with the early settlers, so did they break new ground in many foreign countries. The word "Canada," whether painted on the frame or cast into the implements which were built here, made this country's name a household word in the agricultural countries of both hemispheres.

With what handicaps have these men had to contend? The upward surge of national self-sufficiency and the urge towards a more balanced economy have resulted in nation after nation endeavouring to develop and foster its own agricultural implement industry under the cover of tariffs. In the case of Australia that tariff now is around 45 per cent; in New Zealand it is over 37 per cent, and even in the Argentine, a country in which there exist none of the raw materials necessary for such an industry, the tariff is 10 per cent. Other countries such as Germany, France, Hungary and Denmark have gone still further by either totally prohibiting the importation of farm implements or restricting their entry through quota systems. Is it to be wondered that the workingmen in these great plants are literally dismayed, as I am, when they hear proposals that the already extremely low tariff of 7½ per cent, which protects their livelihood in this country, should be removed; particularly when they are conscious of the fact that, with the exception of the United States to which our implement prices are comparable, the machines which they produce in the Toronto and Brantford plants are placed in the hands of the farmers of this country at prices well below those at which they are sold in any foreign country?

In this connection permit me to give the following comparison of the selling prices of some typical machines:

	Winnipeg	Great Britain	South Africa	New Zealand	Argentina
Oil bath mower	$116 84	$150 13	$147 50	$144 00	$167 86
Six-foot binder and truck	288 72	343 96	359 38	324 00	338 80
Ten-foot rake	62 22	94 84	75 00	....	98 56
Tandem disc harrow	135 06	186 46	....	184 00	....
Hammer mill	190 06	248 73	275 00	....	267 96
Drag harrow	19 74	....	25 00	29 00	27 72
Lever harrow	56 92	65 57	....	78 00	....
Eight-foot one-way disc	331 51	368 43	417 50	....	437 05

Unsatisfactory as the income of the farmer still is, the prices of his products have risen substantially since the lowest point of the depression in 1932. Was it unreasonable, therefore, that his colleagues in the farm implement industry, faced with rising costs of living, should have sought in 1936 and 1937 wage increases which, modest as they were, naturally were reflected in the cost of the goods produced? From the point of view of the balanced economy of this nation is it not a great blessing that the men who previously worked in the fields of Canada and who were released from that occupation through the adoption of modern, up to date machinery, have found jobs in the factories which produce this equipment? If these factories had not existed in Canada these men would have been obliged to swell the ranks of the unemployed.

In evaluating this industry correction must be made of a statement made in this house by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), namely that the implement industry in Canada employed only 4,159 men. In this connection I must add that the minister took these figures from the 1937 report of the special committee, and these figures indicated the employment as of the year 1935. The fact is that one company alone has more than 3,500 men actually on its payroll in Canada to-day, and it is estimated that the total number of wage and salary earners in the implement industry is in the neighbourhood of 11,500. This does not take into consideration the vast army of men who sell the products of these companies on a straight commission basis, and whose number, it is estimated, exceed the 11,500 I have just mentioned. Then back of these men is the great army of workers who produce or sell the manufactured parts and the raw materials, such as the steel, lumber, paint, pig iron and coal, that go to make up these implements.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, permit me to make this final observation. In these days when there has been no more urgent demand or need for a unified Canada I plead for a discontinuance of any ill-considered propaganda which can only serve to promote differences and discontent. I further plead for unity between all sections of Canada; between the country and the city; between the farmer in the field and the worker in the factory. I plead for unity for the common good of the Canadian people, who owe their allegiance to one country and one flag.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like first to refer to the address delivered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on Friday evening last. I think his speech merits the commendation of all those who believe in the cause of agriculture and its struggle for a fair deal, something it has never had under federal policies. It is true that at times—pretty generally under Liberal governments—agriculture has received better treatment. Liberal governments and lower tariffs are synonymous terms, and we must give credit to the present government for the extent to which they have gone in an effort to relieve agriculture, for which I speak more particularly, of the burden which it has of late been carrying.

Before proceeding with my general remarks I should like to make reference to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir). I am sure he did not intend to do an injustice to any individual or any organization, but he referred to a letter which had been distributed among the members of this house, coming from the secretary of the United Farmers of Manitoba. May I quote what the hon. member said:

> "He suggested that something had to be done, and asked what the government was going to do. At the same time that gentleman, for whom I have the highest personal regard, offered no suggestions. He is secretary of a farm organization which, to my mind, has a great opportunity to encourage the development of cooperative organizations which could bring about a greater saving in the price of farm implements than any other policy which might be adopted."

[Mr. Plaxton.]

With that I entirely agree, but I want to remind the hon. member that the policy and motto of the united farm movement of Manitoba has always been one of organization, cooperation and legislation. Proof of that is to be found in the resolution passed at the last annual convention of the United Farmers of Manitoba at which I was present. May I read two clauses of a resolution dealing with the farm implement situation:

> That we specifically direct our protest to the Manitoba representatives in the House of Commons, urging them to use all their power to bring about effective action on these problems.

I should like to point out here—and I believe I am not unfair in my statement—that the hon. member for Macdonald and myself would perhaps never have been heard of outside the boundaries of our own province had it not been for the united farm movement. We are a product of that movement.

Mr. WEIR: The hon. member is not suggesting I was critical of the united farm movement, is he?

Mr. WARD: No, not at all, but I just wish to make the matter clear. We are a product of that movement. The fourth paragraph of the same resolution states:

> That we direct the board of our organization to give careful thought to the suggestion that failing action reducing implement costs farmers should be encouraged to organize for the cooperative distribution and servicing of farm implements.

The point I wish to make is that we are here very largely because there was a farm movement in Manitoba. The secretary of our farm organization in talking to members of this house points out that it is our duty to direct the attention of the government of the day to those matters, and to urge upon them to bring about, through the medium of federal policies, whatever relief is possible.

I should like to say a word with respect to the speech of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), one short paragraph of which is as follows:

> We are all Canadians. We may be industrial workers; we may be farmers. It is true we may have our sectional interests, but our primary interest should be the interest of Canada; and we may well deplore efforts to pit one section of the country against another, and to play upon sectional emotions and class emotions for the doubtful benefit and under the doubtful dictates of political expediency.

This is the thirteenth session in which it has been my privilege to be a member of this house. I am sure I have never listened to anything which could do more to disunite the country than the speech of the hon. member. He might better have directed his attention to the protected interests, who have, ever since confederation, urged upon governments in Canada that they must be given bonuses, the result being a direct tax upon the farmers in the form of higher priced goods.

Later in his speech the hon. member said:

> Time and time again ridiculous statements have been made in this house to the effect that the Canadian farmer receives little or no protection. This hypocrisy was reduced in great part by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) who made a most able and capable speech from the Liberal benches.

I wish to say to the hon. member that we regard the hon. member for Brantford as one of the most beloved and highly respected members of the Liberal party. He is moderate in all his statements, and has a keen appreciation of the general requirements of a member of the house. He understands, as most hon. members do, the need for compromise. It is not a matter of hypocrisy; it is a matter of fighting for the existence of the under privileged farmer.

Later in his speech the hon. member for Greenwood stated:

> Mark you, with these questionable assumptions, those who advocate the elimination of the duty on farm implements, those who erroneously believe that this elimination would mean a reduction of 7½ per cent in the list price of imported machines, are subscribing to the throwing out of work of thousands of industrial workers.

In that statement the hon. member ignores entirely all political history. As was so well stated by the Minister of Agriculture, political history shows that every time tariffs have been reduced in Canada we have increased employment in our industries and at the same time encouraged agriculture. I do not believe there is an example on record where a reduced tariff has reduced employment.

At this point may I make reference to the oft repeated statement that in order to create employment in Canada we must or can provide it only through the raising of tariffs. Even if that were true, the fact remains that for each thousand dollars worth of Canadian production three times as many employees are needed in agriculture as in other industries. Is it any wonder then that between 1930 and 1935, when we had extremely high tariffs, unemployment increased by leaps and bounds? It could not be otherwise. Under the present administration, however, the unemployment situation has improved, and at this point I wish to give credit to the administration for that improvement. The government has created markets for Canadian produce to a degree which would not have been possible under the conditions existing prior to the time the present government took office. The hon. member went on to say:

> All this for a highly speculative saving to the farmer of $3.68 per year.

Of course, that statement is so ridiculous it scarcely merits attention. Taking my own farm as an average, I should like to place some information before the house. I farm three hundred acres of land, and upon figuring the cost of machinery on that farm I have found that its value at time of purchase was a little over $4,000. To be fair I have taken $1,000 off that. I am sure the average farm in Manitoba to-day has at least $3,000 worth of machinery on it. That $3,000 worth of machinery at 7½ per cent duty gives annual tariff cost of $22.50, or the amount of duty which would be saved if the proposed reductions were made. In addition to that we must add the cost of servicing and repairing machinery. On my own farm I again know that those costs are never less than $100. I cannot remember a year when servicing and repairing costs were less than $100 per annum. This means that we have to add another $100 to the duty cost, bringing the saving up to about $30 if made free. In that figure I am not adding any of the profit imposts which go on and on and on, until the machine reaches the farmer.

The other day I read a statement to the effect that the average yearly income of a farmer in Canada was less than $400. If it is as low as that, it is a crime. Let us say that the farmer spends of that amount $300 in the purchase of goods for his family. I believe it is fair to say that he pays at least 50 per cent more because of duty on textiles, boots and shoes and other goods necessary to his production than he would pay if he could buy those goods at world prices. That would add another $150 to his costs; so that perhaps the duty paid by the average farmer in Manitoba is not less than $200 a year. The sum of $200 is the price we pay to the industrialists of Canada. The average farmer in Manitoba pays at least $200 in duties each year in indirect taxation to the protected industries in the dominion.

When the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) spoke the other day, he gave what I thought was a peculiar reason for the setting up of the committee which last year investigated the high price of farm implements. He said the committee was set up because of propaganda on the part of Liberal candidates during the campaign of 1935. That is so far-fetched that it scarcely merits attention. I am sure hon. members know full well that the demand for a committee was brought about by the increase in the price of implements which took place on January 1, 1936, coincident with the coming into effect of the Canada-United States trade agreement, through which the tariff was reduced from 25 per cent, where it was placed by the previous government, to 12½ per cent. This was later on reduced by another five per cent by the budget of that year. The result was exactly the opposite of what was expected. This gave rise to a feeling among the farmers that prior to that date the implement people had gotten together and arrived at a gentleman's agreement or other arrangement to cease the dog fight in price competition. They were perfectly safe in doing this because we do not import implements from any other country than the United States. Apparently the implement people did get together and decide upon a standard price level. I think this was quite evident by the committee records. This left them free to sell their implements at high prices with all fear of competition eliminated. There was no doubt whatever in my mind, at the conclusion of the deliberations in the committee, that such an agreement did exist because prices were found to be similar on both sides of the international boundary.

All members of the committee, without thought of party or without any effort to make political capital, cooperated to the full in an effort to ferret out the facts, and the recommendations of the committee, which have been placed before the house by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) who was the chairman, form the basis of this debate. I feel that the present and quite unjustifiable high prices of farm machinery are a serious handicap to the farmer in his effort to retread his position of near insolvency or to attain something in the nature of economic success. I think a question we could properly ask is, are present implement prices necessary to retain the solvency of the industry? I went to some trouble to obtain the annual reports of one large implement company and several other related companies.

In 1937 the Massey-Harris Company made a clear, net profit of more than $1,000,000, after all necessities were taken care of. That does not look like the doleful picture given to us last year by the implement companies when they told us of the dire possibilities that faced the industry in the next few years. The annual report of the Canadian General Electric Company shows that in 1937 they made a clear, net profit of $2,431,000. That does not look as though they were suffering from the depression. The annual statement of the Steel Company of Canada shows that in 1937 they made a clear profit of $4,180,098 as against $2,188,000 in 1936. That does not indicate they are suffering from the depression. The statement of that huge octopus, Canadian Industries Limited, shows a clear profit for 1937 of $7,601,000, an increase of $1,300,000 over 1936. Do these figures show that these companies are suffering from the depression? Do they show a necessity for the high prices now being charged for metal products?

To return to the report that has been presented, it has been dealt with quite fully by speakers on both sides of the house and I shall not weary hon. members much further in that regard. I should like to have one particular statement placed in Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must read the statement. It is not customary to allow statements to be placed on Hansard without their being read. It is only with the leave of the house that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is allowed to table documents during his budget speech.

Mr. WARD: I shall be glad to read it, but it has been given to the house before. I should like to have it accompany my remarks to-day. The house has heard this statement read before, and I ask permission to have it placed on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. DUNNING: What is the table?

Mr. WARD: It is a table from the report.

Mr. DUNNING: Is it already on Hansard?

Mr. WARD: It is already on Hansard. I should like here to point to one item only. In 1936 this company was able to sell an eight-foot binder at a clear profit of $79.26 after all costs had been taken care of. Surely that is a sufficient profit to enable the company to carry on successfully and reduce implement prices.

At the conclusion of last session I made an extensive trip through the United States for the purpose of investigating the prices charged for farm implements and the methods of distribution. I visited many large industrial centres as well as other smaller towns and cities. I found that their method of distribution was almost identical with that in use in Canada. I found also that the prices of implements compared favourably with those charged in Canada. I called on many farmers and I found them using the same adjectives when referring to the implement manufacturers as are used by the farmers on this side. I found that on January 1, 1936, they, too, suffered an increase of ten per cent in the prices of implements, which was coincident with the rise in prices in Canada. I say they suffered because they are struggling for existence the same as the Canadian farmers.

I found that the prices charged for binders, plows, seed drills, cultivators and manure spreaders were the Canadian prices, less the freight, the 7½ per cent duty and a few other incidental charges. For example, a seven foot binder was selling for $246 in Iowa when the same binder sold for $298 in Saskatchewan. Prices of other implements were in proportion. Something has been said about the implement people getting together in August, 1935. Reference to the report of the committee will show that the officials of two of the large companies admitted that they did get together for the purpose of considering matters of common interest. But what would be of more interest to the industry than the elimination of competition? Of course they did not admit they had arranged a standard price scale which would apply to both countries; but the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and I am inclined to believe, and I hope the house will appreciate this, that this meeting in August, 1935, was in anticipation of a possible change of government in Canada, in which event certain tariff changes were almost certain to be made. They were on safe ground in this, that implements are perhaps the only commodity manufactured on this continent where a general agreement or cartel could be successfully put into operation, because we do not import implements from any country except the United States and the United States imports none except from Canada.

From inquiries I made in the United States last year, if there had been complete free trade in implements entering Canada, a binder would have sold for about twenty-five or twenty-six dollars less than it sold for last year, and even that amount would have been a great benefit to the farmer who finds himself in need of a binder but has great difficulty in making both ends meet. A saving of twenty-five dollars would have meant a great deal to him.

I should also like to remind my Ontario farm friends that we in the west pay out in freight nine cents out of every dollar expended in the purchase of farm implements, and that in itself is sufficient to make or unmake the farmer.

I would also remind the house of another condition in the west from which we suffer. We are marooned in the heart of a great continent, far removed from tide-water, with a long rail haul and high freight rates, and freight rates have been increased about 50 per cent in the last few years. If, in addition to long rail haul and the high freight rates, we have the cost of maintaining the industrialists of eastern Canada, it becomes a very heavy burden indeed. We have to compete in the open markets of the world when we sell our products. We compete with the Argentine, where labour is practically all native or peon, working for a few cents a day, and where I understand the farms are located pretty much on the great rivers that traverse that South American country, and a great deal of the grain is delivered on flat bottom boats which carry it to tide-water at a low rate. In any event there would be only a short rail haul. We have also to compete with Russia, with its state labour. We have to compete with the outside world in everything we sell. We sell in the lowest market, in the open markets of the world, but when we buy our implements and other necessities we must buy in the most highly protected market of the world. This makes it very, very difficult for the people of western Canada particularly to carry on under such trade arrangements.

I might remind the house that when we sell our wheat we must pay the freight to tide-water, and the average freight rate on wheat from prairie points is eighteen cents a bushel. There was a time for several years from 1931 to 1933, inclusive, when the price of wheat in western Canada averaged forty to fifty cents a bushel, and to have to deduct eighteen cents from that amount for freight alone it was an extremely serious matter for the farmer.

I should like to say further, in my condemnation of the system of bonusing the industrialists, that perhaps we have built up a false state of society; perhaps we have, through the bonus system, raised the cost of living in our cities to the point where it is necessary to maintain a very high price level for manufactured goods. I spend some of my weekends motoring through good old Ontario. I do so for the purpose of information. I like Ontario and its people and the countryside, but it grieves me very much when I see the dilapidated farm homes and the number of abandoned farms. Then I drive into one of your industrial centres, small or large, and there I see an almost vulgar display of wealth, in the form of luxurious homes, housing perhaps the owners of these factories, with their yachts on the St. Lawrence river or lake Ontario, and two or three cars, simply living in the lap of luxury while the whole countryside around them, the very market for their products, going down and down and down. I made a trip through Huron county not so long ago. And I do not wonder that the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) makes the speeches he does in the house. On one road I counted five farms one after the other with good buildings, brick or stone houses, big barns, but nobody living on any one of those farms. Why? They had all moved into the cities because of the unnatural conditions created there through the bonus system. What the end will be here in Ontario I do not know, but I think it may be even worse for us in the west.

I am not surprised at what has happened politically in Alberta in recent years. Do not forget that in Alberta the freight rate alone on wheat—my Alberta friends will correct me if I am wrong—averages nineteen cents a bushel from points in central Alberta to the head of the lakes. How could they carry on under those circumstances and pay the prices they have to pay for the goods they have to buy? I believe the Canadian farmer is the most industrious and intelligent man to be found in any part of the whole world, and if he is given an even break, if he is given the privilege of buying in the same market in which he sells, if he is given the privilege to buy at world prices, he will be able to compete with any country in the world. But the dice are loaded against him. Under present conditions he cannot compete in the markets of the world. How can he, when he has to pay around 50 or 60 per cent more for his goods than he would have to pay if it were not for the tariff? I have before me an invoice of goods imported into Canada within the last few days. It covers a shipment of cotton underwear, and what could be more universal than that? The tariff has been reduced considerably on cotton underwear since the present government has come into office; but I find that on this shipment of goods, the price was raised by the time it reached the ultimate consumer, by reason of duty, excise tax, sales tax and the profit added, by something around 65 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no. The sales tax must have been included.

Mr. WARD: I am very glad the minister has raised that point, because in my computation I took the price paid for the goods, the original cost plus the duty; I added to that the excise tax; I added the sales tax; then I added the profit taken between the custom house and the consumer, and it amounted to about 65 per cent of the original cost.

After all, the duty does not end at the boundary; it just nicely begins there. That is the point which I believe we have been missing, quite innocently, but the impost goes on until it reaches the consumer. If I am in business and I invest $1,000 in goods in the United States and I have to invest $200 more when they reach the boundary, I am going to add my profit to the $1,200 and not to the $1,000 only. So the impost continues, as I have said, until it reaches the consumer; we must get that point clear in our minds. That is why the country is going down as it is, while our cities build up. I am astonished that our leading statesmen are not more alarmed at what is happening in this regard. One cannot go around the country and see barn doors falling off, gates hanging on one hinge, buildings which have not been painted for the last fifteen years, and half the farm, if it is occupied at all, seeded down to grass because the farmer cannot afford to operate it, without realizing that we cannot have such conditions and maintain a healthy country society. Perhaps by reason of the bonus system, we have built up a false social structure in our large industrial centres. What I should like to see is the creation of conditions in this country which would make it so attractive to our young people that they would want to live on farms. We must find some means of attracting our people to the farms in greater numbers.

I might remark here that until recently we in the west regarded ourselves as being in the heart of a great continent, but within the last few years we have been brought a little closer to tide-water through the port of Churchill. Very little, however, has been done to encourage trade through that port. I am sorry the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), who represents that constituency, is not in the house, because I should like to suggest to him that the establishment of a bonded warehouse at Churchill would do a great deal to encourage trade through that port. Many heavy commodities like binder twine, plate glass, barbed wire, rolling mill products and china, of which we import a great deal, could come in through that port at a great saving to the west. It is a thousand miles closer than Montreal to the centre of consumption in the west, and I believe it could be used by the producers of those commodities in countries like Holland, Belgium, France and Great Britain, which export them to Canada. The farmer needs his binder twine in April and May, in any event not later than June and July, and not in August and September, when ships come into Churchill. The hardware man wants his glass in March and April, not in the fall. There are many commodities which could be brought into Churchill if we had a bonded warehouse there. I think in that way we could do something to encourage the importation of goods required in the west.

I have under my hand a statement of the freight rates actually paid at the present time, showing the savings that could be effected if we could use Churchill to a greater extent than we are doing to-day. For example, the freight on a carload of poultry from Dauphin, which is a central point in Manitoba, to Churchill, would cost $262. That same carload shipped to Montreal would cost $457 at present freight rates. To ship a carload of eggs from Dauphin to Montreal costs $394; it would cost $264 if routed via Churchill. Remember that Churchill is the same distance from the markets of Europe as is Montreal. I could mention many other commodities. Take cattle; the freight rate on a carload from Dauphin to Montreal is $191, whereas the rate to Churchill is $102, or a saving of $89. That is a considerable amount when one does not get very much for the cattle anyway. I sincerely hope the government will give serious consideration to the suggestion to establish a bonded warehouse in Churchill.

In the course of this debate reference was made to the help given to the west by eastern Canada. I want to assure eastern members—although, thank God, I do not live in the dried-out area—that there is no one more grateful than I have been for the very generous assistance given to the west by the people of eastern Canada, in contributing, as they did, more than a hundred carloads of fruit and vegetables last year to the dried-out area, and we are also grateful to parliament for the money voted to assist the people in those localities. But I took the trouble the other day to get from the statistical branch the value of agricultural production of the three prairie provinces in the last twenty years, and I received these staggering figures. We produced agricultural products in the three prairie provinces to the value of $70,115,000,000. We may very properly ask, What has become of that seventy billions? You will find, if you go around Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford and all the other industrial centres of eastern Canada, a great deal of it. It is very difficult for us to calculate just how much of that seventy billions of dollars has gone to the upbuilding of Toronto. I believe that if it had not been for the west Toronto would be a little straggling city of not more than two hundred to two hundred and fifty thousand, and Hamilton would be no more than a good sized town, because seventy-five per cent of the products of these cities have gone west of the great lakes.

Mr. DUNNING: Where are these members from Hamilton?

Mr. HAYHURST: There would be no Brampton at all!

Mr. WARD: I do not know. The greenhouses might still be there. However, I think we must realize that the farmer has not had a square deal so far as fiscal matters are concerned. No less a person than the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), speaking in Saskatoon on June 20, 1930, made this statement:

> There is only one way we can get the moneys of England for Canadian wheat, rather than Russia and the Argentine and how is that? By providing our wheat cheaper than the others. Is that not so? And how are we going to do it? This is what we are promising at any rate to do.

Well, we did have cheaper wheat during the term of office of the right hon. gentleman. We had the cheapest wheat that this country and the world had known in several hundreds of years.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member that he has exceeded his time.

Mr. WARD: I should like to continue for just a few moments.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. WARD: I believe the right hon. gentleman was right. If we have to produce our wheat as cheap as, or as he stated, cheaper than other countries—and I think there is no one in the house in a better position to know than the right hon. gentleman; we know he never was wrong—how in the name of common sense are we going to do it while buying in a market where the values of the articles which go into production are enhanced forty, fifty and sixty per cent by reason of tariffs? It is not possible. I hope, before the budget comes down, the finance minister will be able to see his way clear to remove all duties from farm implements. That may not have so great an effect as we expect; it may not reduce the price so much as we would like, but I am sure it will be something. I hope he will wipe out the duties on farm implements, and also on cream separators. I hope he will go a long, long way—as far as he has ever gone before—in reduction of tariffs. I should like to see him make the same strides in reducing duties that he did in 1930. It was a great gesture, if nothing else, to the farmers of this country. I hope before the budget comes down, he will see his way clear to give serious consideration to this matter. He is an ex-farmer himself.

Mr. DUNNING: I object to the "ex"; I still pay the bills on the farm.

Mr. WARD: I am pleased to know that the minister is still directly engaged in agriculture; that makes it all the better, and I am much more hopeful now that we shall get something substantial in the coming budget.

On motion of Mr. Motherwell the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company—Mr. Damude—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Expropriation.

Mr. BENNETT: There is only one comment that might be made on this section. It states:

> The company may expropriate and take any lands—

I think it should say "in Canada," to make it clear, because this bridge we are talking about is a bridge that crosses the whole stream. Here we are conferring powers upon the company as a whole, whereas our power clearly is limited to Canada. The same thing applies to other sections as well, but I do not propose to devote further time to this bill. I have served the purpose that I had in mind; I have secured the information that I desired and it has been placed upon Hansard as indicating my view. The action that was taken, by deleting the words at the end of section 8, makes clear, in part at least, what I think should be done. Certainly I do think it will be found necessary to reconsider the whole situation with respect to these matters, because it must be clearly apparent to every thoughtful man that we cannot impose tolls in the United States, on their part of the bridge. Our railway commission cannot do that; that must be reasonably clear. It must be equally clear that we cannot confer any powers of expropriation upon a company to exercise such powers of eminent domain in another country.

As I say, I am not going to do more than merely indicate these views, without taking time to press them.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Tolls.

Mr. BENNETT: I must put myself on record at once in connection with this section. Just imagine, sir, this parliament being asked to say:

> Subject to the provisions of the Railway Act the company may charge tolls for the use of the said bridge, approaches and facilities, and may regulate the tolls to be charged.

The mere statement of it in itself carries a refutation. Our railway commission cannot regulate the tolls for the use of that bridge from the middle of the stream into the United States or from the United States to the middle of the stream, as it can for that part of the bridge which is in Canada. We have no power to regulate tolls in another country, and as the section reads that is what it means.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 11 carry?

Mr. BENNETT: On division.

Section agreed to, on division.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—May receive grants.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this section was amended by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: On the copy I have this section is deleted, and the next section is 14.

Mr. BENNETT: It is still in my copy of the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: In the reprinted bill I have there is a section 13.

Mr. BENNETT: I know objection was taken to this, in regard to bonuses and so on, and it may be that the committee struck it out. There was objection to the company receiving grants and bonuses, and the chairman says this section is marked "expunged" in his copy. If the government of Ontario is going to build the bridge, the government might not want this section in the act.

Mr. HOWE: If it is to be built by private financing it may be that the government will be required to supplement that financing. Under the circumstances I see no objection to this section.

Mr. BENNETT: I know it was struck out in part; I cannot say as to the whole section. It was struck out in part, I assume, because of these words at the end of the section.

> . . . or as subventions for services and may dispose thereof and may alienate such of the said property as is not required for the purposes of the company in carrying out the provisions of this act.

The first part of the section, enabling the company to receive grants, bonuses or gifts, is not an unusual provision with respect to any company.

Mr. DUNNING: What position are we in now, Mr. Chairman? We have a bill from the committee from which, according to the authenticated records, this section has been struck out. There must be a proper way of having that reconsidered, if the committee so desires.

The CHAIRMAN: My information is that this committee can restore this section if it so desires.

Mr. BENNETT: Upon notice. I had to give notice the other day. A private bill requires notice of one day of proposed amendments. I suppose if it were struck out by the committee it should be regarded as being out of the bill.

Mr. HOWE: I think we all agree that there is no harm in the first part and no purpose in the second part. If I could obtain unanimous consent I would move that the part of the section after the word "guarantee" in the thirty-eighth line be deleted, and the balance remain.

Mr. BENNETT: Would not the motion be in the first instance that section 13 as printed be restored to the bill, with the exception of the words following the word "guarantee" in the thirty-eighth line? It does not appear why this section should be struck out; there is no reason why they should not receive gifts if they wish to do so. They should have the capacity to receive them.

Mr. DUNNING: It would require unanimous consent to waive the notice.

Mr. HOWE: I so move.

Motion agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 14—Amalgamation with other companies or authorities.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot help thinking, Mr. Chairman, that if the Minister of Transport would give the same attention to section 14 as he has given to the section which was eliminated he would find it a little difficult to understand. It is a most extraordinary clause. As the matter now stands, all through the bill this company has been called "the company," and it is given power to fix tolls and do everything else under the control of Canadian authorities. It is now proposed to give it power to amalgamate with any other company in Canada or the United States. Then it is proposed that the amalgamated companies shall still be subject to the control of Canadian law. I only point out that if that is so, nobody will ever be able to get very far with it. Those opposed to the bill would perhaps be doing the best thing in the world by simply saying, "Pass it; and pass it quickly."

Section agreed to.

Section 15 agreed to.

On section 16—Borrowing powers of amalgamated company.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee amended section 16.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the amendment to section 16?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment carried by the committee to section 16 was this:

(2) In any amalgamation under this section with other companies or authority the Canadian shareholders or members of such authority shall not be less than one-half.

Mr. BENNETT: That is contained in section 14, as reprinted, subsection (2).

The CHAIRMAN: The copy I have shows the amendment on section 16.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is already in section 14, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section as amended carry?

Mr. BENNETT: Which one?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 16.

Mr. BENNETT: Sixteen? Is that amendment made to section 16, too?

Mr. HOWE: No; I think we already passed the amendment under section 14; section 16 should be passed as it stands.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. If the minister will look at section 16 as it stands, he will see the absurdity of what is being undertaken. The governor in council is to allow the new or amalgamated company, which includes a company in the United States of America, to borrow up to $4,000,000. We have already authorized the company incorporated under the legislation to borrow $4,000,000. Surely the minister does not ask any one of us with reasonable intelligence to become a party to this section? I shall not waste time about it. I said at the start that I would content myself with pointing out these facts.

Just look at section 16:

Subject to the approval of the governor in council, the said new or amalgamated company may from time to time borrow—

Up to $4,000,000. We have just authorized the company, which was one of the amalgamated companies, to borrow up to $4,000,000. What is more, how can the governor in council deal with the affairs of a company which is in the United States? The amalgamated company may be in the United States; it says distinctly that this is so. However, I am merely stating my objection.

Mr. HOWE: I think the position is clear. We, the Canadian government, must start the ball rolling by establishing a Canadian company. Similarly, in the United States an American company must be established to obtain rights in that country. This bill permits the two companies to amalgamate, and any act of theirs must be subject to the approval of the Dominion of Canada and, I assume, also subject to the approval of the United States. I believe the last four or five international bridge bills which have passed the house have a similar section, and it seems to me it operates entirely satisfactorily.

Mr. BENNETT: It will not operate in that way if any lawyer worth while deals with it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 16 carry?

Mr. BENNETT: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 17 agreed to.

On section 18—Retirement of corporate obligations.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the statement made in the letter read the other day, it seems to me section 18 should be somewhat different. I draw the minister's attention to that fact. However, I shall not waste the time of the committee; I am merely pointing it out.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 18 carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Section agreed to, on division.

Section 19 agreed to, on division.

On section 20—Consent of Niagara parks commission.

Mr. BENNETT: It is extremely doubtful whether there is power to enact that section. If it is declared work for the general advantage of Canada, as Mr. Edwards pointed out in his opinion it is within the exclusive jurisdiction of this parliament. We, only, have to deal with it. The section refers to obtaining the consent of the Niagara parks commission. We have the power, I suppose, and ask that they give their authority—if that is what it means.

Section agreed to.

Sections 21, 22 and 23 agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: The preamble has not been passed.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

LORD'S DAY ACT

PENALTY FOR DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS PERMITTING VIOLATION OF THE ACT—NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house disagrees to their amendment to Bill No. 13, "An Act to amend the Lord's Day Act" for the following reasons:

1. The amendment penalizes the corporation while the object of the bill was to impose the penalty for breach of the Lord's Day Act on any person being a director, officer, superintendent or employee of a corporation.

2. The amendment will be ineffective inasmuch as it does not raise the minimum penalty imposed by the present statute.

3. The imposition of fines without imprisonment have no practical effect in offences against such a law as the Lord's Day Act.

And that the Clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

COMPANIES' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

REPEAL OF CHAPTER 36 OF THE STATUTES OF 1932-33, 23-24 GEORGE V

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bertrand (Laurier) for the second reading of Bill No. 26, to repeal the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if this house were to agree to the second reading of this bill the result would be in principle to agree to repeal a statute now on the statute books. I do not think the house would desire in any casual or offhand manner to eliminate from the statute books a piece of legislation which may have wide importance, at least in the minds of some people, without there first being a detailed study of the matter by one of the standing committees of the house. If it is in order to do so, I would move that this bill be not now read a second time but that it be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce for consideration and report.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The general rule is that a bill cannot be referred until after it has been given second reading, although there are special circumstances where it can be done.

Mr. DUNNING: The clerk informs me that the correct motion is that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. I am inclined to the view that if the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act is to be repealed, certain provisions therein will have to be considered in relation to the general provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. For this reason I would prefer that the whole matter be studied before final action is taken by the house.

Mr. BENNETT: The question as to whether or not this legislation should be repealed is one of great importance as it affects the ability or capacity of companies to make compromises, having regard especially to the position of preferred shareholders. It was not enacted until such time as the privy council had rendered a decision in Royal Bank versus Larue. The matter was subsequently referred to the Supreme Court of Canada which held that it was within our competence to enact. I have been advised that this legislation has been extremely useful to many people. It has enabled arrangements to be made without the necessity of receivership or bankruptcy proceedings. The motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that the subject matter of the bill be considered by a standing committee, is, I think, highly desirable. It does not pledge the house to accept any principle with respect to the legislation, but it affords an opportunity to study the whole question, namely whether the legislation is useful for the purpose for which it was enacted.

Motion (Mr. Dunning) agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSED APPLICATION OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES ON GRAIN WESTWARD AS WELL AS EASTWARD

The house resumed from Friday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 18, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I moved the adjournment of the debate on this motion on March 11. Nearly two months have passed, and I regret that a bill as important as this one has taken so long to reach this stage. I trust that the house will facilitate the passage of this bill. I would suggest that the government take it over and have the railway commission deal with it accordingly.

On three occasions, twice during the former parliament and once in 1936, I moved resolutions that, had they met with the approval of the house, would have meant reductions in the domestic freight rates, similar to what is being provided for by this bill. On one occasion I secured from the then Minister of Railways and Canals, the Hon. Doctor Manion, a promise that he would recommend to the board of railway commissioners the bringing into force of an agreement between the provinces and the railways to provide for a reduction in domestic rates going westward. This agreement came into force on March 10, 1937, to cover movements from points on the prairies to the Fraser valley and the British Columbia coast. This was covered by tariff item 145, C.R.C. 154. It effected a reduction in the domestic rate from Edmonton and Calgary to Vancouver from 41½ cents to 30 cents per 100 pounds. However, this arrangement lasted only a few months.

Mr. BENNETT: Why was it discontinued?

Mr. PERLEY: I think the submission was made by the railway companies to the board of railway commissioners that the rates were not profitable, and the previous rates were restored. On the occasions I have mentioned, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who introduced this bill, did not support my resolution. However, he continued to introduce a bill each year calling for a reduction in freight rates. The argument which has been advanced against his bills is that their passage would upset the whole freight rate structure. That argument has always been presented when any attempt has been made to obtain a reduction in domestic rates. This bill is similar in principle to my resolution and I propose to support it.

As I stated a moment ago, this bill deals with a special class of freight, and its acceptance would not upset the freight rate structure. The poultrymen, the dairymen and the stockmen of British Columbia would benefit materially if it were accepted, and the grain growers on the prairies would also be assisted by having access to an increased market in British Columbia for coarse grains. Many different organizations in western Canada, particularly farm organizations, have passed from time to time resolutions which have been presented to parliament asking for a reduction in domestic rates.

It is not necessary to-night to burden the house with comparisons of rates. The hon. member who sponsors this bill has covered that matter quite well. He has dealt with rates in both eastern and western Canada, and I think the figures he placed on Hansard make out a good case for his bill. However, I should like to direct attention to the rates which apply from Indian Head, Saskatchewan, near to my home town, to Vancouver. The domestic rate is 52½ cents, and the export rate 27 cents per 100 pounds. I claim that is an unjust rate and the producers have cause for complaint.

The hon. member, when speaking to his bill, mentioned that some three and a half million bushels or more did go from the prairie provinces to British Columbia under these present rates and that the consumers in British Columbia paid nearly $450,000 more in freight rates than they would have done had the rates prevailed that he is asking for in his bill.

I wish to deal briefly with the question of corn. Corn is imported into British Columbia and is used there for feed purposes by the poultry producers and dairymen. It is estimated that corn equal to about 1,500 cars of barley is imported into British Columbia each year. That is a very considerable market if we had it for coarse grains, and I think we can prove that coarse grains are equal in food value to corn. Experiments have been carried on at different experimental stations to ascertain the feed value of corn and barley, and in practically every instance barley has been proven equal to if not better than corn for feeding hogs, beef and dairy cattle and poultry. So, if the western producers could get a market there for their coarse grains, barley and oats, there would not be any loss to the British Columbia producers so far as feed value is concerned.

Parliament, I admit, is not a rate fixing body. I remember that in the former parliament we were always confronted with the argument that we must not do anything to upset the whole freight rate structure, but I claim that the rate I have cited to-night from the central part of Saskatchewan to Vancouver is discriminatory and unjust in its present application.

For the information of members of the house who were not in the former parliament I want to quote from a decision given by the board of railway commissioners in 1922. The late Hon. Frank Oliver, in giving a dissenting judgment to the decision given by the board of railway commissioners in that year, said:

> There should not be any differential at all, especially on coarse grains and low grade wheat going to British Columbia.

I think that is a pretty fair argument. I have already mentioned that we might get a market in British Columbia for some 1,500 carloads of barley alone, and at thirty cents per 100 pounds that would mean $220,000 for the railway company taking it through the mountains into British Columbia. I may point out that the railway companies do not derive any great revenue from the freight on corn. Corn comes in by vessels, and while it is distributed by the railways to the interior, the rail haul is short and does not provide a great revenue for the railway companies. On different occasions the railway companies have said they were willing to assist, and I think we should give them an opportunity to do so.

Prior to 1897 we had a rate on grains to Fort William from the province of Saskatchewan and western points of about two cents less than the present rate. For example, the freight from Indian Head to Fort William was seventeen cents per 100 pounds. At the present time we are paying nineteen cents, and the farmers cannot understand why in this day and age, with all the improved transportation facilities that we have, with large engines hauling twice the number of cars, of twice the capacity, and the same crew operating the train, they have to pay more than they did twenty or thirty years ago. I think the farmers of western Canada are justified in feeling that way about it. If we had the rate reduced to what it was prior to the Crowsnest rates, it would mean a saving to the farmers of the west of about three or four million dollars in freight on their wheat alone, and I think we should have that low rate restored.

I shall not take up very much more time, but before closing I would say that freight rates are of such importance that they should be considered with respect to other commodities than grain. I think we should have a considerable reduction in the freight rate on implements going west, particularly in the carload rates. We have heard a great deal in the house within the last day or two with respect to the prices paid by the western farmer for farm implements, and I heard the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) say this afternoon that he had used a binder on his farm for thirty years. When one considers the increase in the price of binders, it would not bother him very much if he had to buy only one in thirty years; but if we had a reduction in the freight rate on implements going into western Canada it would be of great value to our farmers, and I think our time could have been better spent within the last day or two if we had been discussing something along that line.

I would also mention the freight rate on coal. I think there should be an adjustment in that rate, particularly from point to point in the western provinces.

Bill No. 31, which has been presented to the house, is now before a special committee. Certain sections of that bill dealing with rates are objectionable, particularly the one dealing with agreed charges. I consider that dangerous, and I hope, when the bill comes back to the house, that provision will have been struck out. I know the farmers of western Canada are anxious that no measure should pass the house containing a provision which would make it possible in any shape or form to establish a monopoly in rates in any commodity. They are anxious that no bill should come into effect that would mean an increase in either the outgoing rates from the prairie provinces or the incoming rates, and I hope, when that bill returns to the house, it will have been so amended that such a thing is not likely to happen. In due course I trust we shall also get a very substantial reduction in the rates on grain, implements and coal.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the hon. member who has introduced this bill will see fit this year not to withdraw it, as he did on former occasions. It is true the bill did not get very far in other sessions, and was finally withdrawn by the hon. member, but I would suggest that this year he endeavour to have the government take over the measure and push it through. I understand that during the campaign in 1935 he assured the electors in the province of British Columbia that if there were a change of government and his party came into power, there would be no difficulty in having the government accept his bill or bring in a similar measure.

Mr. REID: It is not true.

Mr. PERLEY: In conclusion, I wish to say that I am heartily in accord with the hon. member's bill. I regret that he did not see fit to support me when I was introducing resolutions that would provide for practically the same thing as his bill. However, on this occasion I am supporting him, and I hope the bill goes through in good time this session.

Mr. McIVOR: What effect will this change in rate have on rates to Fort William? I was just wondering whether the Minister of Transport would assure us that the rates to Fort William will be reduced accordingly.

Mr. HOWE: I think I can promise that.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to say just a few words in support of this bill. I congratulate the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) upon sticking to this matter so tenaciously over the years. I am quite satisfied that in this respect the province of British Columbia has a grievance and that this grievance should be rectified. There is an argument in favour of this bill which I have not yet heard brought forward in this chamber. My hon. friends across the way, with a few exceptions—that is with the exception of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and one or two others—are, I believe, low tariff Liberals.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, that reference to myself is entirely inaccurate. My hon. friend well konws it too.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not hear the point of order.

Mr. DUNNING: The point of order is that the reference to myself is entirely inaccurate. I ask my hon. friend to take my word for it, and withdraw.

Mr. MacINNIS: In what respect, I would like to know, is it inaccurate?

Mr. DUNNING: Entirely opposed to the truth.

[Mr. Perley.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I must take it that all hon. members on the other side are low tariff Liberals.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the Minister of Finance will admit that there was a little ground, anyway, for my confusion in the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: Not so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MacINNIS: To get back to the point, this discrimination in railway freight rates acts in the same way as an increase in the tariff would, on commodities hauled to Vancouver which are affected by the discriminatory rate. As there is no discrimination between grains used for domestic purposes on the eastern haul, I do not see why there should be any difference in rates regarding the western haul. Even if there were ground for some difference the difference is altogether too great, that is a domestic freight rate of 41½ cents as against an export rate of twenty cents. I cannot find anyone who can make a case for discrimination of that kind. The province of British Columbia is well suited to the production of certain commodities as far as its limited agricultural area is concerned—poultry products and the like—and if the freight rate were equalized and the domestic rate brought down to the export rate, we could produce poultry products much cheaper than we can do now.

There is hardly anything which can be said on this matter that the hon. member for New Westminster has not already said, and I just wish, with these words, to give my support to the bill.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I, too, wish to support the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). It is my firm conviction that a gross abuse has developed, perhaps quite without the cognizance of a great many hon. members. There appears to me to be a situation under which the three prairie provinces are suffering which, when the full extent of it is understood and appreciated, will be astonishing. It has seemed to me that the freight rate structure, especially the local domestic structure, is such as to render industrial development in the western provinces almost impossible. I shall have more to say concerning this matter at a future time when it is more in order. At the present time I support the hon. member's bill and urge him to go forward with it.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): This parliament is a legislative body, and I have always contended that as far as possible we in our capacity as members of this house should refrain from becoming an administrative body. There are few hon. members, I care not in what part of the house they sit, who can discuss the subject of freight rates with any degree of understanding in so far as the dominion is concerned. I know very little about it, and I think the same is true of many other hon. members. In previous years I have invariably contended so far as a bill of this kind is concerned that, while there may be a good deal of merit in the contentions of the hon. member who sponsors it, the principle is one which I cannot support. The proper principle to follow is that this parliament should not be a rate fixing body. The moment we start fixing freight rates I do not know where we are going to start and where we are going to end. I would far sooner leave the matter to a body properly constituted and created for that particular purpose. I do not know whether the railway commission are making a good job or a bad job of fixing freight rates.

Mr. REID: The trouble is they are not.

Mr. HEAPS: If they are not, the proper course is to change the personnel of the commission and not to let us as members of parliament become involved in creating a rate structure of which we know very little. There may be a hardship involved in what the hon. member has stated, and nobody yet so far as I know has explained the reason for this differential between export and local rates. It is quite possible that the export rate is far too low, and I have been wondering whether, if the export rate were raised to the level of the domestic rate, that would satisfy hon. members from British Columbia. The fact that the export rate was reduced to a very low level, perhaps, for competitive purposes, may not be altogether a good reason for bringing the domestic rate down, although there may be some grounds for it. My contention, which I have previously maintained in the house, is that as a member with very little knowledge of the freight rate structure I am not, if I can possibly avoid it, going to be a party to fixing freight rates in any part of the dominion. On the other hand, if perhaps there is fault to be found with the composition of the railway commission or if they are not doing their job properly, the remedy is, not to attack the freight rate structure but to attack the railway commission and change its membership.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): This bill has been before parliament each year since 1933, and, I believe, almost everything that requires to be said on the subject has been said. I can only reiterate what I have said each time when the bill has been discussed, namely, that the consideration of freight rates, being a highly technical matter, is one for the board of railway commissioners and not for parliament. I think parliament has acted on freight rates only twice since the board of railway commissioners was established. On both those occasions parliament acted because a change was to be effected in a statutory rate and the change could be effected only by statute. The Crowsnest pass rates were established in 1897. The rates were changed in the early years of the war, having been an intolerable burden on the railways under the stress of those days, and after the war parliament acted again to restore the Crowsnest rates. We all start from the position that the Crowsnest rates are adequate, representing a fair return to the railways for a given service. That, of course, is entirely erroneous. If we could restore the other conditions of 1897, rates of pay, prices of equipment and supplies, and other conditions which obtained at that time, such rates would no doubt be profitable. The board of railway commissioners have made a statement in that regard, and I think it well to remind the house of it. In its judgment of October 14, 1924, in the Crowsnest pass case, the board said:

> The Canadian Pacific railway rates, as contracted for by the agreement of 1897, while then fair and reasonable under then traffic conditions, are not adequate to present conditions of traffic, and do not furnish an adequate return for the service concerned, and are not fair and reasonable, representing as they do but 35 per cent to 60 per cent of rates found adequate under present traffic conditions.

That is the situation in which grain is moved to-day, at a rate which the board of railway commissioners have found represents only from 35 to 60 per cent of an adequate return.

There is no objection to moving grain for export at that rate. The railways have not protested and no one has protested. Why? To move grain for export in competition with other countries of the world more favourably situated as to geography, it is necessary to be able to move it at an extremely low rate; and that being recognized, the railways are willing to do their share. I have no doubt they accept the fact that, as this is necessary to the national economy, it is a desirable movement for the railways.

We come now to the domestic rate, which is a movement within the country. I think it has always been accepted; I know it has always been accepted since railroading began, that there is a difference between the export movement, which is highly competitive with other countries, and the domestic movement of grain within the country. We find a differential existing in all of the large consuming centres of Canada as between the export rate and the domestic rate. The board of railway commissioners have examined the domestic rates for movements to British Columbia and have found them to be fair and reasonable; nevertheless the railways have, by agreement, introduced, voluntarily and without compulsion on the part of the board, a lower rate to move feed grains, that is, the lower grades of wheat, and coarse grains, destined for consumption in British Columbia. Again, they did that in the national interest. The agricultural industry of British Columbia is a matter of interest to all Canada, and the railways agreed to transport feed grains to that consuming population at a rate greatly reduced below the domestic rate. Having done that, they have made, I believe, a sincere attempt to satisfy the requirements of that area. As a matter of fact, this arrangement was made in settlement of the demand of the western provinces that the Crowsnest rate should apply on domestic grains. The offer was made by the railways, and accepted by the provinces, and I think we can regard it, remembering the circumstances of the arrangement, only as an agreement binding on both parties. However, the fact that this subject has been repeatedly brought up in parliament indicates that there may be a grievance, or if there is no real grievance, that a great many people believe they have one.

One thing that has been particularly stressed in the presentation of the case by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) is that the rate on mill feeds moving into British Columbia should be carried at the same rate as that which applies on the movement of feed grains. The hon. member gave the house a rather erroneous impression of the rate at which these mill feeds move. He gave the house the impression that they now move at the domestic rate from mill to consumer. This, of course, is not the fact, as those hon. gentlemen who are familiar with milling in transit rates must be aware. The mill feeds move from the farm to the mill on the domestic rate for that particular haul, and then the flour and by-products move through to destination on the balance of the through rate. The balance of the through rate is, in some instances, lower than the feed grain rate; in some instances it is higher. In discussing the matter with the railways, I have expressed to them the opinion that the grievance or supposed grievance of the people of British Columbia is a matter that should receive consideration with a view toward removing the possible grievance.

FOREIGN POLICY

INQUIRY AS TO COMPREHENSIVE STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): On April 1, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) told the house that for two months he had been trying to have an item in External Affairs taken up so that he might have a chance again this year to place before the house a comprehensive statement with regard to foreign policy. That was on April 1—I don't know whether it was April Fool's day or not—but apparently for three months the Prime Minister has been endeavouring to get foreign policy before the house. An item was introduced the other day, but there was no discussion. I should like to ask the government when we may expect that statement.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): In the absence of the Prime Minister I should not like to give a definite answer. My hon. friend knows that the occasions have not been very numerous on which the Prime Minister could have had an opportunity to make that statement, but he told me to-day that he intends to make it in the course of next week, if he has an opportunity to do so.

LIVE STOCK ACT

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND PACKERS' ASSOCIATION AS TO REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Might I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) if he would be good enough to lay on the table the file of his department containing correspondence between himself or the officials of the department in the live stock branch and Mr. Todd, of the packers' association, or any of the heads of the packing companies, regarding regulations appertaining to the administration of the Live Stock Act with respect to the marketing of live stock in the stockyards or in packing plants, and as to grading and such like. I am asking the minister to lay the file on the table, since I do not wish to put the department to the trouble and expense of having a copy made by way of a return. There is no doubt that it must be a file of considerable dimensions, and if it were laid on the table one could look it over while it was in the custody of the clerk and at the same time avoid the trouble of having a great deal of correspondence copied. Perhaps that could be done prior to the consideration of the estimates having to do with the live stock branch.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I shall try to have that done.

UNEMPLOYMENT

VANCOUVER SITUATION DUE TO CONCENTRATION OF SINGLE HOMELESS UNEMPLOYED MEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): In the absence of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), there is a matter I should like to draw to the attention of the other members of the government. During the discussion of the unemployment and agricultural assistance bill I had occasion to direct attention to the serious situation in the city of Vancouver owing to a large number of homeless single unemployed men congregating there. Within the last two days I have had two telegrams, one since I came into the house this evening from the secretary of the single unemployed men, pointing out that four thousand men were at the limit of their resources and asking that the government take immediate action to take care of the situation. The other telegram was from the secretary of the United Church presbytery of Vancouver representing fifty-nine congregations, also drawing attention to the dangerous situation resulting from the concentration of single unemployed men in Vancouver since the closing of the camps.

In the absence of the Minister of Labour I wonder if the other members of the government who are present would draw the matter to his attention and urge that some action be taken before any trouble develops.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

International Institute of Agriculture, $12,000.

Mr. SENN: When the committee rose the other evening this item was under consideration. I had asked the minister just what publications were issued by this branch; to whom those publications were sent, and what their nature was. The minister had partly finished his reply when the committee rose, and I should like him to complete it now.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I was just in the midst of reading the list of publications subscribed for, and I think I had reached No. 3, the Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Economics and Sociology; International Bulletin of Plant Protection; Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Science and Practice; Bulletin Mensuel de Renseignements Economiques et Sociaux; Bulletin Mensuel de Renseignements Techniques; Moniteur International de la Protection des Plantes; Monthly Crop Report and Agricultural Statistics; Bulletin Mensuel de la Statistique Agricole et Commerciale. There are ten of them in all.

A sufficient number of each is obtained to satisfy the needs of government libraries, agricultural libraries, professors in agricultural colleges, provincial ministers and deputy ministers of agriculture and heads of branches and divisions of the dominion Department of Agriculture. None of these is distributed to the press, but the copies stored in the main library of the Department of Agriculture are always available to any publicity organization which may need to consult them. Besides these periodicals, the main library of the Department of Agriculture receives copies of every publication, either memoirs, bulletins, or leaflets, issued by the International Institute of Agriculture. These are also available to the public interested.

Mr. SENN: I understand that most of the bulletins are of a scientific nature, and no doubt would be of very little interest to agriculture generally or to the trade. But there is one set of bulletins that, I believe, refer to monthly crop reports and statistics as to agricultural production and surpluses throughout the world. I wonder if those bulletins are available to agriculture, and particularly to the trade, and if arrangements are made so that they may be made available to people dealing in different classes of farm products.

Mr. GARDINER: All information of that kind which would be valuable to agriculture here and to those engaged in business having to do with agriculture is incorporated in our own statistical publications and sent out in the usual way.

Item agreed to.

Marketing services—Marketing services administration, $50,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, I have been seeking an opportunity, and here it is, to draw attention to some egregiously false information which was contained in a cable dispatch from London last summer with regard to the grading of apples. In this matter I certainly am not critical of the minister; rather do I seek his assistance, for the cable that I am going to read takes in vain the name of his director of marketing. It is a serious criticism of the trade commissioners of Canada and also a criticism of that portion of the fruit branch which has to do with inspection, upon which we in British Columbia rely to such a considerable extent and which we trust so well, because of their assistance in enabling the shippers and the producers to pay more and more attention to quality. The cable in question came from Mr. Grant Dexter, London correspondent of the Winnipeg Free Press, and was dated July 15. It reads as follows:

Dean A. M. Shaw, chief of the marketing section of the Canadian Department of Agriculture, and a group of senior officials of this department are finding plenty of reasons why Canada's exports are not growing as rapidly as desired. The conclusions are based on a two weeks intensive study of the British market. Out of their investigations here it is safe to predict will come a severe overhauling of the Canadian government's export grading regulations, and a tightening up of their enforcement. The inquiry has revealed that many Canadian products are not being shipped to Britain in the way required by this market. Tests made of shipments of canned goods and fresh fruits, notably apples, proved conclusively that inferior products are being sent here under Canadian top grades.

Canada's finest, upon examination, turned out all too often to be wretched goods which could not possibly qualify for high grades if the Canadian inspection service were adequate. Boxes of apples, with good fruit on top and bad underneath, occurred too frequently under close inspection of these officials to bring real satisfaction with the efficiency existing in the federal inspection service.

[Mr. Senn.]

Naturally that caused considerable stir in British Columbia. I can tell the story I wish to tell most quickly by reading an exchange of letters which took place. On August 12, I wrote the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) as follows:

I have just returned to the Okanagan after a short absence, and I find a stormy atmosphere consequent on some allegations, as to the quality of our fruit in the United Kingdom market, by Grant Dexter.

I am in fairly close touch with the situation at both ends, and if this condition prevails, it must have come about fairly recently.

The industry is taking the matter up with the Department of Agriculture and with Mr. Shaw, but I want you to tell me what your trade commissioners have to say, for if things have gone bad recently, they would have certainly reported it to you, and they can also bear out, or disagree with, my opinion that our stuff has, in recent years, reached the British market in very good condition. So, at least, I have been informed over there on frequent occasions, and it was certainly so considered at the time of the 1932 conference.

It is a very, very, serious statement and one which I think the government must take notice of. I enclose one of the many references to the matter in the valley papers.

The minister replied through his private secretary, and enclosed a copy of a letter which had arrived from the Canadian government fruit trade commissioner in London. I shall read one or two paragraphs of the letter from London, which is dated August 20, 1937:

In the first place there were no Canadian boxed apples on the market during the whole period of the delegation's visit to this country and therefore it was impossible for any member to make the inspections reported and there is not the slightest trace of truth in the published statements—"boxes of apples with good fruit on top and bad underneath, occurred too frequently under the close inspection of these officials." It is presumed that Mr. Dexter obtained information by interview, but I find it hard to believe that any member of the delegation made such a statement, it is really an accusation of deliberate fraudulent packing. Further, I know of no importer of repute in the United Kingdom who would have made such a statement to the member of the delegation responsible for reporting upon the fruit situation. I have been concerned with the Canadian fruit industry for many years and innumerable opportunities have occurred to examine boxed apples in the packing house and in the markets of the United Kingdom and Canada, and I can state with emphasis that my experience has been quite the reverse to that as reported by Mr. Grant Dexter.

I would say that there is not an atom of truth in the report on boxed apples as published by the Winnipeg Free Press and further there is no justification whatsoever for such a statement.

I have discussed this matter with Mr. F. Hudd—

He is Canadian trade commissioner for Canada in London.

—and he has had several conversations with Mr. Grant Dexter. I understand that Mr. Dexter realizes the error in his cabled dispatch and it occurred to me the best manner in which the matter could be settled was for Mr. Dexter to withdraw his dispatch.

At the same time the Minister of Trade and Commerce sent me a copy of a letter he had written to the Winnipeg Free Press, dated August 31, as follows:

Inasmuch as the dispatch from Mr. Grant Dexter published in the Winnipeg Free Press under date of July 15th was definitely inaccurate and could hardly fail to injure our export trade in the commodities mentioned, I feel it is only proper that you make some adequate correction.

I enclose for your information a copy of a letter which has been received from Mr. W. B. Cornell, Canadian Fruit Commissioner.

In a subsequent letter the Minister of Trade and Commerce sent me a copy of the second Grant Dexter cable. The cable is dated at London, August 19, and is headed "Bad fruit not sent from B.C." The text is as follows:

Cables and letters received here indicate that the British Columbia apple growers have drawn an unintended and unwarranted conclusion from your correspondent's dispatch of June 15 regarding inquiries by Dean Shaw and his associates into the quality of Canadian foodstuffs exported to this market.

The apples referred to as being found good on top and bad underneath did not come from British Columbia. It was never suggested that they did.

I pause there to draw attention to the fact that not only were there no boxed apples in London at that time, but the boxed apples which reach London during the course of the year are 90 to 95 per cent British Columbia apples. The cable continues:

The apples and canned goods named by your correspondent were only examples of the food products shipped to this market and opened under the eyes of the Canadian officials which proved deficient in quality but all the Canadian apples shipped here did not come from British Columbia. Other products could have been cited.

Tightening of the expert grading regulations and an intensive educational campaign among Canadian exporters is regarded as certain at the next session of the dominion parliament when full details of the departmental inquiries here will doubtless be given official form.

Regarding British Columbia apples, careful inquiry among the trade fails to uncover any complaints as to quality or packing.

The reply received from the Winnipeg Free Press by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, dated September 3, is as follows:

I beg to acknowledge your letter of August 31st, calling attention to the dispatch from Grant Dexter which appeared in the Free Press July 15th. Since then we have published a further dispatch from Mr. Dexter which expands the brief extract from it mentioned in the letter from Mr. Gornall. I think it has been made amply clear that there should be no unfavourable reflection upon boxed apples from British Columbia sold in the British market, and this forms in my judgment the "adequate correction" which you suggest.

I then wrote the Minister of Trade and Commerce on September 18. I first referred to the fact that he had sent me a copy of Grant Dexter's cable and Mr. Ferguson's letter, and then continued as follows:

The cable maintains the original assertion in a slightly modified form, that "food products shipped to this market and opened under the eyes of the Canadian officials" are "deficient in quality" and I hope that you will go over the head of the managing editor and obtain an honest retraction of a journalistic libel, published as prominently as the original falsehood.

I can assure you that the matter is by no means dead here, nor in the other fruit growing parts of Canada. The public has been told by a widely read journal that "boxes of apples, with good fruit on top and bad underneath, occurred too frequently under the close inspection of these officials." The statement is emphatically denied by the Fruit Trade Commissioner in Great Britain, and the evasive later comments of the correspondent read strangely but they are approved by the managing director.

The journalist is fond of telling us that all he wants is news, accurate news, and that he has as high a regard for ethics as has any other professional man. If the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press endorses that constantly reiterated view, he cannot fail to give proper denial to this falsehood.

The correspondence ends with the reply to that letter from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The letter, which is dated September 29, 1937, reads:

While I am inclined to agree with the thoughts expressed in your letter of September 18, I do not believe any good purpose could be served by going into this matter further with the Free Press. Possibly if you cared to ventilate this in the house it would do much more good.

I do so. I appeal to the minister for his assistance. This is an absolutely false statement. I assume that this man is a Canadian and that he has the confidence of the Winnipeg Free Press. I am ready to concede to the members of the press every desire to follow the ethics of their profession, just as I as an engineer try to follow the ethics of mine. Undoubtedly at times journalists will be in error as I have been in error as an engineer. But over the course of years that I have been connected with the fruit industry the Winnipeg Free Press has never been ready to give accurate or reasonably fair information with regard to the fruit industry, even in this country. For its special representative in London, presumably sent there because it has confidence in him, to send back such a cable as that, merely means that he is doing damage to a Canadian industry.

Mr. GARDINER: I only wish to state that Mr. Shaw, the director of marketing in the department, made a denial at the same time with regard to boxed apples from British Columbia.

Mr. STIRLING: That is very little to get from the minister.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the matter I have in mind could be raised just as well on this item as later on. I would direct the attention of the committee and the minister to the need for a more intensive advertising of our farm products, not only abroad but in Canada. I am informed that the Department of Fisheries has increased the consumption of fish in Canada by some 14 or 15 per cent by means of an advertising campaign. One farm commodity that has fallen in price to a considerable extent during recent years is eggs. I have before me a statement issued by the bureau of statistics which shows that the per capita consumption of eggs in Canada has decreased in a rather spectacular manner during the last ten or eleven years. I should like to quote the per capita consumption for different years:

Year	Eggs
1927	356
1928	361
1929	296
1930	299
1931	297
1932	287
1933	272
1934	267

Perhaps the minister has the figure for 1937, but I was not able to obtain it. From 1927 to 1937 the per capita consumption of eggs in Canada decreased by eight dozen. It seems to me that this condition could be remedied to some extent. I do not know whether egg substitutes have anything to do with the matter, but I do know that the depressed conditions under which the majority of our people have had to live during recent years must have had something to do with the decrease. However, the fact is that when everything was very cheap, the per capita consumption was very low. Economic conditions improved to some extent in 1936, but the decline in egg consumption still continued.

We all know that throughout the farming communities of Canada eggs are not merely a side line but, like the cream can, they help to pay for the groceries on the average farm. Anything that can be done to increase the demand for eggs, either by export or by way of home consumption, would be of great help to the agricultural communities generally. Eggs contain probably the highest food value of any food and increased consumption would improve the physique of our younger people and the health generally of all the people of Canada.

Setting aside the question of purchasing power which is bound to enter into a discussion of this kind, I feel confident that even with the purchasing power which now exists, if the department carried out a plan somewhat similar to that of the Department of Fisheries, the consumption of eggs could be easily increased. This item deals with marketing services administration, and I considered it was the proper place to bring this matter to the attention of the committee. Could the minister tell us if anything along this particular line is being done?

Mr. GARDINER: The activities in connection with advertising have been speeded up since the department was reorganized and the marketing branch established. The statement which first appeared in the press with regard to the consumption of eggs was not an accurate interpretation of the statistics. Just about that time they were changing the form in which the statistics were given out. This misinterpretation was corrected later on.

Mr. COLDWELL: The figures I quoted are from the bureau of statistics.

Mr. GARDINER: The first statement was issued by the bureau of statistics and there was a misinterpretation of the figures. The decrease of eight dozen per person is much more than what actually occurred, although there was a decrease. I have not before me the correction which was made of that particular figure. We have speeded up the advertising of different farm products within Canada. The Department of Agriculture has the responsibility for the advertising campaign within Canada. We have spent some money on this during the past year and intend to spend what is provided in these estimates for the different purposes during the coming year.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with marketing in England. I have in my hand a report of an interview with the Hon. T. C. Davis of Regina in connection with his trip to England to be present at the coronation. He refers to the wonderful experience he had, and in conclusion the report reads:

> The speaker also dealt briefly with Britain's rearmament program and the fact British people were inclined to slight Canada's goods because Canadians were not making any contribution towards the defence of the country which is her greatest market, Britain.

That is a startling statement to be made by the attorney general of one of our provinces who had just returned from the coronation. I do not know what foundation he had for that statement, but perhaps the minister would say something regarding its accuracy.

Mr. GARDINER: I was not, of course, at the coronation with Mr. Davis, and I do not know what basis he might have had for any statement he might have made. Again, this is a press report of what he is presumed to have said, and I would hesitate to comment upon it in the committee at this time.

Mr. SENN: I have in my hand a report entitled, The British Market and the Canadian Farmer. It is the report made by a committee which, I understand, was sent to Great Britain to study the marketing there of Canadian farm products, and was headed, I believe, by the director of marketing services, Mr. Shaw. It is a very interesting report indeed. It was released, I think, in the fall of 1937, and there is some story to the effect that it had been released for only a very few days when further distribution of the publication was suppressed. I do not know if that is entirely correct or not, but the report does to a certain extent undoubtedly condemn the work which was done by trade commissioners in Great Britain in days gone by.

When I first understood that the Department of Agriculture was to be reorganized, I made a statement in the house to the effect that the minister had employed very capable men indeed to head these different services. I am not personally familiar with Mr. Shaw; but I know he enjoys in the west a good reputation as an agriculturist, and I would ask the minister to tell the committee just what his particular qualifications are from the standpoint of the marketing of farm products. That is my first question.

My second question is, Who is responsible for the committee going to Great Britain to make the investigation? I notice that the report contains a number of recommendations, and I believe the minister has already taken steps to see that some of them are put into effect. I was present at a meeting of the council of agriculture in the Chateau Laurier some little time ago, where the minister made an address, and made certain representations as to what the Department of Agriculture intended to do to implement this report and assist in the marketing of farm products. There are a number of recommendations, however, in regard to which I do not know whether the minister intends to carry them out or not.

The first recommendation which the minister mentioned, I think, was that we should have a national mark on our products, and I am fully in accord with that recommendation.

I also understood the minister to state that an agricultural commissioner was to be sent to Great Britain for the purpose of returning information to the Department of Agriculture in Canada and perhaps to other people as well. I would ask him to tell us if that appointment has been made, and, if so, who the gentleman is, what his qualifications are, and what his instructions are. It seems to me there might be difficulty between such a representative of the Department of Agriculture and representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce who are acting over there in a similar capacity. If the minister would let the committee know just what this gentleman's duties will be, I think it would be of interest to all of us.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, as has just been stated, a committee representative of agriculture went to Great Britain last summer and made certain investigations into the marketing of Canadian farm products in Great Britain, and later made a report upon what they found in the old country. That report, as has been indicated, was published last fall. More than five thousand copies of the report were printed, and copies of that report were sent to the press throughout Canada and to certain farm organizations, with the intention of having a general distribution made up to the number of copies which had been printed. Practically the whole publication, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 4,800 or 5,000 copies, was distributed. At that time attention was called particularly to the press report which went out covering the report itself, and some exception was taken to statements in the press report summarizing the report itself. As a result of some of these complaints I suggested that the report as then published be not sent out to the general public. The early part of the report consisted of recommendations to the department and, to an extent, to other departments as well.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister say where those objections came from?

Mr. GARDINER: They came through the press, to begin with. They appeared in two or three different newspapers throughout Canada.

Mr. SENN: Were no representations made by particular interests?

Mr. GARDINER: Not to my knowledge, no; but these complaints which came in drew the matter to my attention, and I brought it to the attention of the government at the time, and suggested that the report which was to a considerable extent a recommendation to the different departments of government be not sent out to the public in that form, but that it be reprinted in a form which would indicate the action of the government rather than the recommendations to the government. The report was reprinted in that form and is being circulated to all those who made application for it.

I think I can best answer the next part of the question submitted by my hon. friend by reading from the reprinted issue of that publication. It states the policy as announced at the meeting to which the hon. member referred, in these terms:

With the winding up of the schemes operating under the "Natural Products Marketing Act" completed, the dominion Department of Agriculture has given careful consideration to the recommendations set forth in the report of its investigating committee and has decided upon a policy in relation to the market in the United Kingdom.

Under that policy the department proposes:

A. To see that Canada sets her own house in order by cooperating with provincial departments to have production improved and developed in most favourable locations and by ensuring, as far as possible, that no merchandise unsuitable to that market be exported to the United Kingdom and that what is exported be improved in quality, packaging and labelling.

B. To cooperate with producers, exporters, brokers and the trade in the United Kingdom in maintaining, until the product reaches the consumer, the standard of Canadian agricultural products in conformity with the grades, packaging and labelling provided by Canadian regulations.

C. To advise, cooperate with and assist all government, producer and merchandising agencies in placing Canadian foodstuffs effectively before the British housewife.

I shall now develop these main recommendations in greater detail: A. A number of products are already in such a condition that the full story can be told about them—i.e., cheese, bacon and breakfast foods. A great deal of work is required with others, in particular canned goods and poultry.

1. We propose that definite steps be taken to see that the fullest information about the character of the United Kingdom market be given to the producer.

All possible means should be employed to this end;—e.g., through provincial departments of agriculture, at conventions, by special meetings, by carefully prepared articles in the agricultural press, by the issue of special booklets, and by any other useful method. The aim of all this should be to show the producer the severity and type of the competition he must meet, the particular requirements of the market, the necessity for meeting these requirements, the need for paying particular attention to such matters as labelling, and, in short, the necessity for doing his part in proving to the housewife and to the trade in the United Kingdom that the words "Canadian Product" always mean a reliable, quality product. We also feel that at every step the producer should be kept fully informed of what is being done to increase the demand for his product on the British market.

2. We have had ample evidence that the grading of certain Canadian products has continued to improve. The matter is of such importance, however, that we feel it vital to stress the necessity of further careful attention to grading, particularly in regard to fostering, as far as possible, a standard, to all graders in every part of the dominion.

3. The only proper basis on which the two main policies, (B) and (C), as outlined, can be carried out is by emphasizing the consistently high quality of Canadian products. Publicity for an inferior article is not only worth nothing, but is definitely harmful to all good products. We have considered very carefully whether it is advisable to prohibit entirely the export to the United Kingdom of all low-grade products. Such a prohibition, we feel, would entail a severe hardship upon individual producers, as there is a low price market in Great Britain which may be invaluable to the producer who, for instance, owing to unfavourable climatic conditions, has a large amount of low quality products.

It is essential, however, that more and more of our products should be of high quality so that agencies placing it on the market can maintain it in high favour. We therefore intend to advocate:

(a) The adoption of a national mark for Canada's high grade agricultural products shipped to the United Kingdom.

(b) That the use of this mark be made compulsory on specified products provided they attain the requisite standard; that this mark be made the focal point of any publicity and advertising campaign; by this means the mark would assume a definite and valuable significance.

(c) That the right to use this mark where it is not compulsory, be accorded only to producers under licence, provided that their products attain to the required standard to be laid down by the dominion Department of Agriculture.

(d) That, with proper safeguards, the right to use the mark be accorded to United Kingdom importers or blenders who import Canadian products in bulk and package or blend them themselves.

(e) That this mark be either an emblem or label, so designed, either by shape, colour or wording, or a combination of these, that it can be readily identified by the British housewife.

(f) That sub-standard products have a distinctive mark.

Mr. SENN: That is a change from the original copy, is it not?

Mr. GARDINER: The last paragraph, (f), is slightly changed from the original copy, that is from the recommendation. This is the policy as laid down. These are not the recommendations. It is based on the recommendations.

Mr. SENN: Are copies of the revised report available?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; I think they are now.

Mr. SENN: Will they be circulated?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; they are being circulated to anyone who makes application for them.

B. The dominion Department of Agriculture intends to follow, in relation to other products the practices pursued in relation to cheese and bacon which have met with good results in recent years.

C. The dominion Department of Agriculture does not conduct advertising campaigns in Great Britain, and never has. Advertising is conducted under the direction of a publicity committee presided over by the Canadian high commissioner in London. The marketing service of the dominion Department of Agriculture will cooperate in every possible way with the publicity committee or any producer or merchandising agency interested in promoting the sale of farm products in the United Kingdom.

The dominion Department of Agriculture will appoint an agricultural commissioner in London to direct the services of those following our commodities and to report back to producers from the United Kingdm, Ireland and Europe. This official will also provide the department continuously with information regarding agricultural developments in those countries."

With regard to the next part of the question, which had to do with the extent to which these undertakings have been carried into effect up to date, I can read into Hansard the next page of this report.

1. An agricultural commissioner, to be stationed in London, England, has been appointed. He is to be responsible for directing the services of those who are employed, or may be employed, by the dominion Department of Agriculture in Great Britain, Ireland and Europe. He will further observe agricultural developments within these countries which may be of special interest to Canada, and report such developments to the dominion Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is that?

Mr. GARDINER: The gentleman appointed is Mr. Allen, of the university of Saskatchewan at Saskatoon. He was previously in eastern Canada. To give his full record, may I say that he was born in England; came to Canada as a young man; homesteaded in the province of Saskatchewan somewhere in the vicinity of the town of Kindersley; enlisted during the war; went overseas, and served in the army during that time. Following that, he worked on farms in western Canada, attended the agricultural college, and is a graduate of the university of Saskatchewan. Later on he took advanced studies in Cornell university, giving special attention to production and marketing, and served in the state of New York for a time following that before returning to the university of Saskatchewan as head of the economics work of the college of agriculture associated with the university of Saskatchewan. He was obtained from there, and is taking up his duties in London on the first of May. He has gone to England.

Mr. STIRLING: Will he cover all Canadian products in England?

Mr. GARDINER: As this statement indicates, he is in charge of all of the activities of the Department of Agriculture that are represented in Britain. We have men who check the cargoes that come in at the different ports. We have men who check the grades of products. He will have charge of all officials of the department—there are some six or seven of them over there at the present time—and any others who may be appointed for the purpose of carying on activities having to do with agriculture.

Mr. PERLEY: What is his salary?

Mr. GARDINER: It is $5,280. It is the same salary as the trade commissioner receives; that is, it starts at $5,280 and advances. It is on the same basis as that of the trade commissioner.

Mr. PERLEY: And his expenses, of course?

Mr. GARDINER: He has an expense account allowed on the same basis as a trade commissioner.

2. A standardization trade mark has been adopted. This will be used as a national mark on certain grades of commodities produced, manufactured, packaged or processed in Canada under authority of acts administered by the dominion Department of Agriculture.

The mark which has been adopted is the head of a Royal Canadian mounted policeman, got out in a form which will suit the different packaging that is used in connection with farm products.

3. Arrangements have been completed to have a definite quantity of fresh killed beef forwarded weekly to the London market. This will consist of high quality beef, shipped in sides, the object being to demonstrate the possibility of placing fresh Canadian beef on the London market. The intention is to compete directly with the home killed beef rather than the chilled and frozen products of other countries.

4. The seed of a particularly promising new variety of tomato has been purchased. It has been distributed among canners throughout Canada who have undertaken to have the crop produced and processed under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture. This particular variety is very promising, and it is hoped that it may be the means of improving our product on the British market.

It was found by this committee on their investigation in England that the type of tomato we were growing in Canada did not compare favourably with the type of tomato which was being received previously from Spain. During the time the Spanish war has been in progress we have had a great opportunity to place our tomatoes before the British people, and it was thought that by improving the tomato itself and getting a superior type, more solid, and with less juice, we could better suit the British market and better establish ourselves there.

Mr. BENNETT: A tomato that does not break up in cooking.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

5. A comprehensive study of processing and handling of export bacon is under way. This is under the direction of the National Research Council in cooperation with the dominion Department of Agriculture.

And, I may say, the Department of Transport as well.

Such questions as flavour, colour, keeping qualities, processing, packaging, stowing, etc., are being approached from a scientific angle in an effort to improve and standardize this product.

6. Most of the recommendations made in regard to poultry are already embodied in new regulations. Several trial shipments of fresh eggs have been successfully made to the British market and it would appear from the results to date that there is a definite possibility of establishing a regular trade in fresh eggs.

This is a new venture, undertaken in the first instance by one of the packing companies in cooperation with the government of Quebec a few months ago, and our department has undertaken to assist in promoting it.

Mr. BENNETT: How is the assistance given?

Mr. GARDINER: By the assembling and servicing of them and seeing that they are up to standard, and also by getting them forwarded under certain conditions.

Mr. BENNETT: We do not pay any part of the transport?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. BENNETT: I should think there would be difficulty in competing against the Dutch.

Mr. GARDINER: We have very favourable reports on shipments that have gone forward in comparison with the fresh eggs of Great Britain itself.

Mr. SENN: The best quality is being sent.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and in small cartons, easily handled.

7. Several of the recommendations made in regard to fruit and vegetables are also embodied in regulations already worked out and in operation.

8. A satisfactory method of marking Canadian cheddar cheese has always been regarded as extremely difficult.

One of the difficulties experienced there was that customers very seldom knew that they were actually buying Canadian cheese. Most of the products from the other dominions are so marked that anyone can take home a part of the product and know where it came from. There was always some difficulty in the marking of Canadian cheese by reason of the manner in which it is put up.

This difficulty has recently been solved and it is now possible to use a mark which is not only permanent and distinctive but entirely practical.

That is being put into effect in connection with the manufacture of cheese from now on.

Mr. BROOKS: What is the mark?

Mr. GARDINER: "Canada" stencilled in so that it shows at all times on the wrapping of the cheese.

Mr. PERLEY: How is the bacon marked?

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to complete the reading of this first.

9. Transportation as it applies to the handling of perishable products at Canadian docks is under investigation.

This is the difficulty that has always existed. Danish bacon is shipped in special boats built for the purpose and is loaded in a special way. Argentine beef is handled similarly. There the beef goes into cold storage at the wharf and is kept at a constant temperature as it crosses the wharf to the boat. It is at the same temperature in the boat, never varying more than one degree from the time it is put into cold storage until the time it reaches the market. We have no such service and with our present volume we could not have it. We have this experience, too, that much of our bacon is produced in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, some of it being cured there, put into cold storage or refrigerator cars, and the temperature is not the same at the top and the bottom of the car. There is a variation in the car itself. When the product reaches the dock, it is sometimes left for a time on the dock subject to heat, especially during the months of July and August, and is finally raised and put in the hold of a boat. In other words, it is subject to changes of temperature. The Transport department, the research council and the Department of Agriculture as well as the Department of Trade and Commerce are co-operating at the present time in conducting an investigation into ways and means of providing facilities at our docks from which bacon is being shipped, so that the bacon can be transferred from warehouse, or the car in which it is shipped to Montreal, to the boat without undergoing this great difference in temperature, which it experiences particularly in the two months to which I have referred. I am informed that the greater part of the difficulty, most of the complaint with regard to the quality of our bacon, has to do with shipments sent forward in July and August, largely because of that variation in temperature which takes place at different points.

The Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the national research council has the matter under consideration. This problem is one of great national importance, a satisfactory solution of which will have a very definite bearing upon the future development of Canada's trade in perishable products with Great Britain.

10. Assistance rendered by the department during the autumn of 1937 was largely instrumental in placing a herd of over 150 head of carefully selected Canadian dairy cows (Holstein-Friesian) on a farm in the county of Chester, the very heart of one of the best dairy districts in England. This herd has naturally received wide publicity and as a direct result several orders for cattle of similar type have already been received.

It is very important that this work should be forwarded at this particular time. I understand it is the intention in Britain for the first time to carry on an active campaign against tuberculosis among the cattle in that country; and while that check is being made on dairy cattle in Great Britain, it is most important that the country which perhaps has advanced, certainly as far as any other country in the world and it may be further than any other in the direction of ridding its herds of tuberculosis, should be kept prominently before the British people as a place from which new herds can be obtained or cattle to replenish herds can be shipped to Great Britain at the lowest possible cost.

Mr. SENN: I have listened with a good deal of interest and attention to what the minister has had to say and to his explanation of what is intended and what is going to be required of the commissioner when he goes to the other side and takes up his duties over there. I asked the minister, however, whether any of the commissioner's activities were going to interfere with those of the representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce, or exactly how the activities of the two departments would be kept distinct and separate so that there would not be overlapping and consequent difficulties. He has told us that the commissioner will have many duties to perform in the collecting of data. No doubt he will have to build up an organization because he will not be able to do all the work himself. The minister has told us what the salary of one gentleman, the commissioner, is going to be. Is there any provision in these estimates for a staff apart from the supervision of the work of the people already over there.

Mr. GARDINER: Under the general marketing vote for this division of the department we can make appointments to clerical positions, such as a secretary for the commissioner, and also other appointments under the provisions of the vote itself for any assistance he may require; but at the present time his staff is composed of about six men, I think, who have been in England representing the department for many years. I think the first appointment was made in 1912, and from that time down to the present additions have been made to the number. No new appointments were made by the present government until we appointed this last representative. He really takes the place of Mr. Wilson, who previously occupied a similar position in the department, and who a few years ago was transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Trade and Commerce. He is still in the employ of the latter department in London.

Mr. SENN: In the same capacity?

Mr. GARDINER: Not in the same capacity; he is under the Department of Trade and Commerce in another capacity, but he is advising in connection with matters concerning the sale of farm products. We are not undertaking the sale of farm products, but we are following those products through to the consumer. We are carrying on investigations as to the quality and grade of the product. We shall do that very much in the manner that investigations were made last year; that is, probably an individual will go and purchase a commodity from time to time and check it to find out whether the standard is being maintained. The mark which a few moments ago I indicated had been adopted will be on all the highest standard products, and we shall attempt to see that these products reach the housewife in England on the standard required by our regulations in this country. There is no reason why there should be any conflict of activity at all as between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I think I can assure the committee and the hon. member that there will be none.

Mr. SENN: The minister was just speaking about the high quality that would be required in connection with goods sent to the United Kingdom, and he also made the statement that there might be some sub-standard products shipped to that market. The first recommendation he read states that no merchandise unsuitable to this market should be exported, and that what was exported should be improved in quality, packaging and labelling. Then, on another page he read a statement to the effect that they had considered whether or not it was wise entirely to prohibit the export of low grade products to the United Kingdom, and further on the report states that at the moment they are not prepared to make any such recommendation.

Then, when we come to the question of the mark, this is the question I want to ask the minister. He has made a change from the recommendation in this report, which reads as follows:

> That for the export of sub-standard products the word "empire" be substituted for the word "Canada" or that regulations be made limiting the size of type that may be used to show their Canadian origin.

It seems to me that is treading on rather dangerous ground.

Mr. GARDINER: That is why we changed it.

Mr. SENN: I know the minister has changed it to some extent, but I should like to know just how sub-standard products are going to be marked, if they are to be marked at all; or are they to go into the British market without any distinguishing features about them? If so, will the consumers know they are Canadian products and judge Canadian products accordingly? It seems to me most dangerous to have our first-class products marked Canadian and to send to the old country other Canadian products which may destroy the reputation which otherwise might be built up. I should like to know just how these products are going to be marked, if they are going to bear any distinguishing Canadian mark, and I want to warn the minister that I am afraid it is a dangerous practice to follow.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to direct the attention of the hon. member and the committee to the fact that the publication from which quotations are being read is the report of a committee. Most of the members of that committee were not employees of the government at all. One was the president of a live stock association; another was a canner in the province of Ontario, and others were men not in the employ of the department.

Mr. SENN: There were some pretty good men on that committee.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there were very good men on the committee. This is just like the report of any committee or commission that might be appointed by the government. The government is not bound by what is in the report, which is made to the government and the people of Canada to indicate what this committee thought with regard to the whole matter. The publication now being put out contains all the information in the report that might be considered of value to the people of Canada in assisting them to produce and market their products properly. In addition, it contains that part of the recommendations which has been adopted by the government and made a part of the government policy.

Mr. BENNETT: Does it contain all the recommendations?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not followed them all.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the new report contain all the recommendations?

Mr. GARDINER: The new report contains all the recommendations in connection with everything we have done.

Mr. BENNETT: But not those recommendations which were not acted upon?

Mr. GARDINER: This report does not contain all the recommendations. Where they made some special recommendation with regard to a particular product that recommendation does appear, but the body of the recommendations at the beginning of the report is not published in this new edition. The policy which is to be followed by the government is published. The hon. member for Haldimand quoted paragraph (f) of the report:

That for the export of sub-standard products the word "empire" be substituted for the word "Canada" or that regulation be made limiting the size of type that may be used to show their Canadian origin.

When we gave consideration to that recommendation the thought which came to me and to the officials of the department was exactly the thought which came to my hon. friend, that this would not be fair to other parts of the empire. Probably it would not be fair to ourselves to have those products marked in that way. I think this was suggested by the committee because they found that there were many products being sold on the British market as empire products, and they suggested sending over this second standard of our products as empire articles, but we did not think that would be fair either to the other parts of the empire or to ourselves. We realize, however, that certain Canadian products of what might be called the second standard, or a lower standard, are demanded by certain customers in the old country who probably cannot afford the highest quality.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that apparent on the cartons themselves?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be apparent in this way, that only the higher standards will bear the mark to which I have been referring. Our trade mark will appear only on the high standards, and the lower grades will have marked on them the actual grade of the commodity.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, none will be marked grade 1 except those bearing this trade mark?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; grade 1 will be those bearing the trade mark.

Mr. SENN: Just in that regard I should like to ask the minister about our exports of bacon. We send three different grades of bacon to Great Britain, and within each of those three grades there are three classes. Is the minister now telling us that only the highest grade of bacon, averaging from fifty-five to sixty-five pounds, will be marked as Canadian, and that none of the other grades will bear that mark? Just what is the policy of the department in regard to bacon? That is really the most important commodity we ship to the British market, and it is a product in connection with which the grades and quality and reputation should be very carefully guarded. Perhaps I shall have something to say about bacon at a later date, but I think it is important to know just how our bacon is being marked, whether only the highest grade will be marked as Canadian bacon, whether some latitude will be allowed, or how far down the grades are going to be marked as Canadian.

Mr. GARDINER: It took some little time to get a mark which might be considered national, and distinctive from any other, and one which at the same time has not already been employed or registered by others. For that reason we were not successful until within the last ten days in satisfying all concerned as to what the mark ought to be. That mark has now been adopted and is in course of being registered. Registration may be completed, but, if so, such completion has been effected only within the last few days. For that reason we have not worked out a definite policy with regard to the different products. If bacon is adopted as one of those products to which this particular standard should apply, then the standard mark will appear only on the best grade of bacon sent over.

Mr. STEVENS: The point to which the minister has referred is of tremendous importance, because in this class of goods bacon constitutes the largest single item for export. Under grade A are included fifty to fifty-five pounds, fifty-five to sixty pounds, sixty to sixty-five pounds and sixty-five to seventy pounds. We also have bacons made from selects, bacons, butchers, lights and heavies. There are five classes of hogs which go into the making of bacons for grade A. This should not be allowed. I would impress strongly upon the minister that if a mark is to be adopted or applied to bacon it should be applied only to the best Canadian bacon made from the best class of hog, and only to the most uniform type; because it has been demonstrated clearly that our best bacon will compete successfully with the Danish bacon, which is the highest class product on the British market.

I noted a few words from the report quoted by the minister a few moments ago, a report the circulation of which I believe was unfortunate. The words were to the effect that there is a market for a low grade quality. That is precisely the argument which was advanced by the leading packers; they argued in favour of the inclusion of these varieties of hogs in the processing of Canadian bacon. They said there was a market and a demand for a little lower grade of bacon.

Thanks to the policy followed by the Department of Agriculture over a number of years in stimulating the production of improved types, I think we are now in a position to get an abundance of selects and bacon hogs, out of which could be processed not only the quantity required for the British market, but sufficient to take care of a substantial portion of the Canadian demand. If a mark is adopted, it should be applied only to bacon which will compete with the Danish product. The other grades, if sold, should be sold as second grades, because unquestionably the price obtained on the British market for our bacon affects the price and production of hogs in Canada. It is vital to the farmer that great care be taken in connection with the marking of our bacon.

Is the mark obligatory? Is there any regulation or any law by which the department may force an exporter to use the mark, or what is the regulation? Is it just a voluntary mark which may or may not be accepted? Before I resume my seat I should like to add one further word of commendation for the action taken by the Department of Agriculture, as indicated in the second sheet read by the minister. Many things were indicated there which I believe should be done, and I must commend the minister for having adopted the suggestions. But I should like to add this further word, that in the first report a good deal of gratuitous criticism was directed against the Department of Trade and Commerce, the department which really dealt with the selection of products in Canada. Now that the minister has taken the course indicated in the list of adopted recommendations, much of that will be removed. I must say, however, that it was most unfair to lay the blame upon or to imply that the blame must be placed at the door of the Department of Trade and Commerce and its officials in London, because it should not be placed there.

I can say from experience that the Department of Trade and Commerce marketing agencies in their reports to Canada have for years drawn attention to these matters, and have sought to have improvements made in many of the recommendations included in the report. It is to my mind highly desirable that action be taken along the lines indicated by the minister. It would be unfortunate if there should develop a conflict of interest between the two departments, but certainly the main thing is to have something done. If it can be done now and in this way, then progress will have been made, and such progress should be commended and supported. But it would be unfair to allow the inference to remain that officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and particularly Mr. Wilson, had in the slightest degree been derelict in their duties overseas. I say that because I consider Mr. Wilson, who was formerly an official of the Department of Agriculture and was taken into the Department of Trade and Commerce while I presided over it, discharged his duties in an exemplary manner, and did splendid work for the marketing of Canadian products.

The great difficulty was in connection with the grading before the product left Canada. The adoption of the recommendations indicated by the minister will, I believe, be a distinct step forward in that respect. May I now repeat my question: Is the use of the mark to be made obligatory or voluntary? If it is voluntary, what steps have been taken to secure its use? I say that because if it is not generally used it is not going to be of much value, and particular care should be taken in connection with its use in relation to bacon.

Mr. GARDINER: The regulations in connection with the use of the mark have not yet been drafted. It is just now being registered. But the regulations as drafted will make it obligatory upon any of those possessing or producing products of the types involved to apply the mark to the higher grades. Otherwise they will not appear on the market as higher grades.

Mr. STEVENS: There is power under the present law for that?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I understand so.

Mr. STIRLING: Will it apply only to certain products?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be applied only to certain products to which it may properly be applied. As we go along we may be able to apply it to others.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it contemplated to apply it to boxed fruit?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no decision on any of those matters yet. I should not like to make a definite statement because they all have to be given consideration. But, as was indicated by the hon. member for Kootenay East, if it is applied to bacon, as he stated, it will apply only to top grades.

Mr. STEVENS: That is one of my quarrels with that particular export. In my opinion grade A should include bacon made only from selects, but instead of that it includes bacon made from five different grades of hogs. That is absolutely wrong, and I think it is a distinct detriment to the producer through lowering the price of hogs in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: The question raised is quite controversial. It is very difficult for a layman to determine when bacon is select and when it is one of the lower grades when the hog is still running around. Much of the grading that is done in Canada is done while the hog is still running around. I think I am right when I say that grading in Denmark is all done on the rail after the hog has been killed. It is much easier to determine whether or not a hog is select when you see it hanging up. A hog graded while still alive might be classed as select, and yet, when converted into bacon, it might be of a lower grade. It is difficult to say that the bacon from a hog which had been graded as select when it was still alive will be of that particular grade.

The figures indicate that there has been rapid progress in this country toward rail grading. The first criticism I had after coming into the department came from those who were opposed to this type of grading. They had heard a report somewhere that we were about to pass legislation enforcing rail grading. Their objection was that in a country like Denmark, where all the hogs are owned by a cooperative of the producers, where they are fed according to the regulations of the cooperative, where they are housed according to the regulations of the cooperative, where they are selected and, I believe, actually killed and marketed by the cooperative, it is easy to maintain a standard and to carry on rail grading without the producer himself suffering any disadvantage.

The first objection to enforcing rail grading in Canada at the present time is based upon the wide distribution of our people from one ocean to the other, the different conditions under which feeding is carried on, and more particularly the fact that if we are going to have this type of grading, all hogs will have to be slaughtered in a slaughter-house or abattoir. The producers maintain that they would rather take their chances on grading when the hog is running around the yard. I am not in a position to state definitely that we can adhere as closely to regulations with regard to selects as they are able to do in a country like Denmark. However, we are advancing rapidly toward the rail grading of hogs. They are all graded in that manner in the maritimes. I was looking up some statistics the other day, which I am sorry I have not with me to-night, and I was surprised at the rapid increase in the last three years in rail grading. If we continue at this rate we shall soon reach the point where we can have something of the kind suggested.

Mr. STEVENS: I should not like the committee to get the impression that I am agitating for rail grading and doing away with the present system. I was complaining that there was included in grade A these different weights to which I have referred. Whether they are rail graded or graded on the hoof makes no difference if you ensure that there will be in grade A only that weight of side which is considered to be the best for the British market. I referred to the five different grades of hogs to indicate the wide variety of sides that were included in grade A. This lack of uniformity is largely responsible for the ten to fourteen shillings difference in price in what is received for our bacon and Danish bacon. It is against that practice that I have been speaking this evening.

Mr. PERLEY: Has any progress been made in having the packers adopt a uniform system of processing in order to produce a uniform quality of bacon? A select hog may go into one packer and come out a certain grade, while a similar hog may go to another packer who is not using the same system of processing, and it comes out a different grade altogether. The minister stated that certain interests had agreed on this trade mark. Just who were those interests?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to state the concerns to which this trade mark was submitted. It had to be examined in relation to the trade marks of the different concerns that had already registered trade marks with the proper authorities. It was finally determined by council that this was the proper mark to indicate to people outside as well as in Canada that we considered it a quality product and one that could be depended upon.

In connection with processing, I think it will be admitted that each of the larger packing houses, as well as some of the smaller ones, maintain that they have the best process. They contend that they have been successful in producing a taste, if nothing else, for their bacon, which is preferred by a great many people. I doubt if we would succeed in attempting to have them all use exactly the same process, and I doubt very much if anything would be accomplished by doing that. The companies have a cooperative arrangement by which they exchange certain information as to the best methods of protecting themselves against deterioration of their products. I do not think there is any necessity for the government to do anything in the way of enforcing this, because it is recognized already by the companies that it is to their advantage to do so.

Mr. HAYHURST: Could the minister give us the results of the investigation carried on by the Department of Agriculture to determine the grade of hog most suitable for rail grading and most likely to meet successfully the competition of Denmark?

Mr. GARDINER: All I say with regard to that is that any one travelling across Canada will realize that we have a national type of hog. The long Yorkshire type has been in this country for a number of years and it has been pretty well standardized all across Canada. The Yorkshire type is the prevailing type at our shows and it will be found in almost any farm yard. The department feels that it would be a mistake at the present time to discourage the farmers from continuing with that common type.

Mr. SENN: I should like to say one word more about this mark. It seems to me that this is one of the most important departures we have had for some time. It is particularly important in regard to the shipment of our bacon to the old country. Perhaps we get more benefit from the Ottawa agreement in the sale of our bacon in the old country than in the sale of any other product, and as an hon. member said a moment ago, it is regrettable that our bacon at the present time sells for so much less in the British market than bacon from any other country except perhaps the Balkan states. The report I have in my hand, which we have been discussing, gives two or three reasons why our price should be and is lower, and, among others, the fact that there are so many different grades of bacon going from Canada overseas. But, in addition, there is another statement made on page 33 of the report which is very important. It says:

> Some of the larger wholesalers have made very definite representation in regard to the large volume of box cuts being shipped from Canada.

Further down it says:

> 37,107,089 pounds were shipped as hams, and 24,015,918 pounds were shipped as box cuts.

And again:

> Wholesalers put forth the argument that the large quantities of Canadian cuts have a depressing influence on the price of Canadian Wiltshires.

I wonder if the mark is going to be put on hams and box cuts. That particular type of meat would be classed as No. 1; it seems to have a depressing influence on the price of our bacon in Great Britain, and the price we receive there undoubtedly settles, to some extent at least, the price of hogs in Canada.

So I think every effort should be made to see that we get the very highest price possible over there because it means money in the pockets of our farmers; but if we continue to send over these box cuts and picnic hams in ever increasing quantities, I do not know just what the result is going to be.

An answer to a question that was asked here by the member for York East (Mr. McGregor) shows that in 1935, 17,000,000 pounds of box cuts went over there; in 1936, 30,000,000 pounds; and in 1937, 35,000,000 pounds, in addition to a large increase in the volume of hams sent over there. While our export of Wiltshires is increasing as well, it is not increasing so rapidly as our shipment of these other cuts which are said to have a depressing influence on the market. I think the minister would be wise to see that steps are taken to have Wiltshire sides shipped in as large a volume as possible to the mother country. After all, I believe we have nearly enough select hogs produced in Canada to supply our trade with the mother country if they were all used for that purpose, and I believe they could all be used for that purpose. It is true perhaps that some of our own people would like the very best bacon that could be produced, but on the other hand I think nine out of ten would not know the difference between bacon produced from a bacon hog and bacon produced from a select hog. I am sure I would not myself. I think we should take the same steps which are being taken by Denmark and other countries to see that only the very highest quality is sent over there, and in as large a volume as possible. I would ask the minister if any steps are being taken to see that this is being done.

I would ask the minister one other question, which he might answer at the same time. If the mark is used, it will have to be very carefully guarded to see that nobody uses it on a product that should not be graded as No. 1. Is it the intention of the department to see that all goods which are shipped to the old country are graded by government graders, because it seems to me that is the only way in which we can carefully guard the mark to see that it is not improperly used?

Mr. GARDINER: Practically all the products that go to the old country now are graded by government graders, and it will be the intention to improve on any grading that is now being done.

Mr. SENN: They are graded only by sample, I understand, at the present time, are they not?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be impossible to grade every package that goes over or anything of that kind. That is the very reason why we have placed the commissioner in England, the very reason why we want this work supervised. We expect to check the product that goes to England much more carefully than we have done up to date, in connection with the grading and packaging and everything that has to do with it. If the mark is applied to bacon—and I would hope it will be—it will be done for the purpose of ensuring that as large a percentage as possible of the shipment of bacon to Great Britain will be of the very highest quality. That will be the objective of the department in everything that is done in connection with it, and I can assure the hon. member that it will be the objective in connection with all our farm products, including bacon, going to Great Britain.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has stated that he has not finally decided what products will come under this mounted policeman's head. I hope that he will give the matter a great deal of consideration before he includes boxed fruit under it. I wonder if he would see fit to consult the industry, or at least to seek their opinion, before he makes his decision. I make that suggestion for this reason: For a considerable number of years now, boxed fruit of that description has been graded efficiently, I think. The shippers largely have their own brands which are established in the British and northern European markets, and it appears to me that it would be of assistance to the minister in arriving at his decision if he would first seek the opinion of these established shippers of boxed fruit.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no doubt that the shippers of all products which are being shipped will be consulted very fully before any decision is reached.

Mr. HAYHURST: In reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Haldimand, the quality of the hogs raised in western Canada must naturally vary, and if we had a market for only our very best quality in Great Britain we should have to find a market for our other products. I know that in London the best hams are the Cumberland hams. That is a different type of pig from the Yorkshire, and I do not know whether there are any Cumberland hogs raised in this country. However, we know that changing economic conditions have made it very difficult for importing nations to import only the highest quality of goods, and I believe it is important not only to grade the goods but to have an efficient sales force over there with a proper sentiment towards the English purchaser, and in sympathy with the British market. The commissioner would do more good by meeting these people who sell these products in the Smithfield market. I am speaking now as a person brought up in the old country, and I am looking at the matter from the point of view of marketing goods through personal services, because I believe that if the sales force is of the right type a good many of our difficulties would be ironed out. As a western farmer I realize what a tremendous quantity of hogs are sold at times that are probably slightly under the highest grade, and therefore we must develop a market for all types besides the very highest type of Wiltshire bacon.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister inform the committee what is the total cost of the report?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact amount here. The cost was not very high; indeed it was low. The other day a question in regard to the matter was placed on the order paper, but I am not sure that it has been answered yet.

Mr. HAYHURST: When was this report first sent out?

Mr. GARDINER: I think it was on December 8.

Mr. THOMPSON: There is a matter which I wish to call to the attention of the committee, and I think it may well be done in connection with this marketing act. It has to do with our dairy business. I wish to call the attention of the committee to an extract from a speech made by the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: I wonder if the hon. member would allow that to come up under dairying, if it has to do with dairying.

Mr. THOMPSON: It has something to do with marketing as well as with dairying.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a dairy vote. But it is all right.

Mr. THOMPSON: The minister made this statement as reported on page 162 of Hansard:

> The cheese producers of Ontario, with the assistance of the Minister of Agriculture of the Ontario government of that time, cooperating with the dominion government, sent their secretary over to England to advance the sale of cheese in that market.

I wish to point out just what have been the results of the cooperation between the department of agriculture of Ontario and the Department of Agriculture of the dominion.

The minister said further in that same address that in 1900 Canada produced 220,000,000 pounds of cheese and that in 1935 the production had fallen to 100,000,000 pounds; that in 1907 Canada sold to Great Britain 190,000,000 pounds but that in 1935 the amount sold had fallen to 52,000,000 pounds; and that in 1907 New Zealand had sold 27,000,000 pounds to Great Brtiain but in 1935 they had increased that amount to 197,000,000 pounds. These figures are correct. But the minister said that when he saw those conditions he went over to England to examine into the marketing of Canadian cheese in the old country. When he arrived there, he said, Canadian cheese was not being advertised; he saw New Zealand cheese and Australian mutton and butter advertised, but no advertising of Canadian cheese. I might call his attention to the fact that in 1934 the Ontario government robbed Canada of the greatest advertising agency we had by closing Ontario House in London, where our goods were being advertised.

The impression that was left on the house by the remarks of the minister was that New Zealand had crowded Canada out of the British market. That is not so. New Zealand never crowded Canada out of the British market; Canada herself receded from that market. Great Britain bought our cheese and paid us a premium for all that we could supply her. The amount of cheese we sold in Great Britain was the amount of high quality cheese that we could produce. There was a sale for it there if we could produce it. We must take into consideration the different conditions. One thing the minister did not tell us was that, while our cheese sales to Great Britain had diminished to that extent, the production of dairy products in Canada had increased very rapidly; that our milk production was rapidly increasing and was being consumed in other lines.

New Zealand has a population of about 1,600,000, almost entirely rural. One of her principal exports is cheese. Canada has a population of 11,200,000 with over fifty per cent of them residing in the urban centres, non-producers of agricultural products. While New Zealand's principal export is cheese, Canada makes cheese only out of her surplus milk. No cheese factories will be found around our large centres as cream, whole milk, butter and ice cream are required to supply the demand. One has to go into backward places removed from the great industrial centres before one finds a cheese factory. In fact, as I heard one prominent dairyman say the other day, in Canada cheese was always looked upon as a poor relation of the dairy business; it got what was left over. That is a fact. We are large consumers of whole milk. We are one of the largest consumers of butter in the world. We consume large quantities of cream, and people are using more cream than they ever did before; one might instance the ice cream trade. When all those demands are supplied we make our surplus into cheese, and Great Britain has been paying us a premium on it. We have had no trouble in selling it; there was a ready market for it there. Fifty per cent of all the milk produced in Canada is going into butter; we are making into cheese only eight per cent of the milk we produce. To indicate the extent of the increase in the consumption of butter, we are making to-day in Canada 69,000,000 pounds more butter annually than we were making ten years ago and consuming practically all of it ourselves; in fact, this year we have imported large quantities of butter to supply our own local demands. Of all the dairy products produced in Canada, 93½ per cent are consumed by the Canadian people; we export only 6½ per cent.

Let us consider the difference in the manner in which New Zealand cheese and Canadian cheese are handled on the British market. New Zealand sends her cheese in consignments, in large shiploads. It is put into cold storage in London, Liverpool, Glasgow and other large cities; she has her agents there selling that cheese on commission, and they are advertising it.

Mr. POOLE: Government agents?

Mr. THOMPSON: Yes. Cheese is being handled there cooperatively by the New Zealand government and they are selling that cheese on commission; they are out advertising it. But Canadian cheese is sold by cable in Canada before it leaves this country. Our cheese is not sold in Great Britain except by retail; it is sold in this country before it leaves our shores, and it goes into the hands of the trade in that way. Great Britain as I have said, pays us a premium on that cheese.

What I wish to call to the attention of the committee is that the cooperation which has been taking place between the Ontario department of agriculture and the dominion Department of Agriculture has not been in the best interests of the dairy business, because they have been directing their efforts to the selling end of the business, the cheese being sold on its merits, and have neglected the producing end of it. Those of us who are connected with the dairy business know full well that we have individual cows which are producing from twenty to twenty-five thousand pounds of milk a year. We have many dairy herds which are producing individually between ten and fifteen thousand pounds of milk. But the average dairy cow in the Dominion of Canada produces less than five thousand pounds. While we cannot all have these high producing cows, there is far too much difference between the possible and the actual. That is where the quantity comes in. Then there is the quality to be considered.

Let me now refer to the report that has already been discussed to-night. I want to show what these men have to say with regard to cheese. On page 42 I find the following:

> Canada's success in marketing cheese in the United Kingdom depends upon the quality of the product, and every possible effort should be made to improve the quality still further. . . . Continued effort should be put into the endeavour to improve the quality of cheese. . . .

This report is correct. Our goods were sold on their quality and a premium was paid for them. Our problem was to produce goods of that high quality and there was a ready market for them. In 1934, when the present Ontario government came into office, they found an organization known as the Eastern Ontario Dairymen's Association which had been in operation for sixty years and had built up that great dairy business of eastern Ontario, where the largest percentage of high grade cheese has always been manufactured. They were getting a provincial grant of $1,500 at that time, but the then provincial minister of agriculture, Mr. Duncan Marshall, saw fit to withdraw it. A deputation from the dairymen's association, comprising some of the outstanding dairymen in the province, waited on him, and he assured them that in future the farmers would have to pay their own shot; that there was no more government money to be put into the industry. That was that. What he did was this: We had at that time a few small organizations known as cheese producers' associations, and they got behind an effort to organize one in every county. There had been some of them before that. They organized a cheese producers' association for the province of Ontario, so that they had a central organization for Ontario and smaller county organizations. These are organizations of producers which can do splendid work in the dairy business. I have no fault to find with them in any way; but they were badly led; their activities have not been directed along the proper channels. They have been directing their efforts towards selling a product that was sold on its merits, and have neglected the producing and quality.

After the grant was withdrawn and the association which had built up a great industry was put out of business, the Ontario department passed an act permitting the Cheese Producers' Association of Ontario to assess five cents per 100 pounds against all cheese sold in the province. In 1936 this association collected directly from the farmers $22,000. Last year they collected $38,671, and the Department of Agriculture of the dominion made them a further grant of $5,000. They employed a secretary at Belleville to whom they paid $3,000 and expenses, and they sent a man to England, giving him $5,000 and expenses. This man at Belleville bought a few thousand boxes of cheese and shipped them to England, and the man there peddled them around London. That was one of their activities. The other one was this—they held a convention.

Before I go into that, I would call attention to a statement made by the minister, and I think it was a very timely one. He drew the attention of the committee to the small quantity of cheese being consumed by the Canadian people. Let me put on record the per capita consumption of cheese in a number of countries: Switzerland, 23 pounds; Holland, 14¾ pounds; France, 13½ pounds; Denmark, 13¼ pounds; Italy, 12 pounds; Germany 11½ pounds; Britain, 9½ pounds Scandinavia, 7 pounds; New Zealand, 4¾ pounds; United States, 4¼ pounds; Canada, 3¾ pounds. We have Canada and New Zealand, two of the largest producers of cheese, with the smallest per capita consumption. I know nothing of New Zealand; but so far as Canada is concerned, I think this small consumption is our own fault. With a slight increase in the home consumption of cheese and we would have little to export. What is the trouble? We are great consumers of butter. Go into any hotel or restaurant and the waiter will put a piece of butter on your plate, and if you use it, give you another piece. They replenish your supply. Did you ever see them put a piece of cheese on your plate? If you asked them for a piece they would give you a small, little sample which you could put into your mouth all at once. If we used cheese on the table as we use butter, we would double the consumption. The people are not eating cheese, because they cannot eat what they do not get. Quite a large sum of public money has been expended in a way which in my humble opinion has not been in the best interests of the dairy business. I have before me the auditor's report for the cheese producers' association of Ontario. As I have already told the committee, they were engaged in two activities. One was buying cheese in Canada and sending a man over there to sell it, trying to break up a cheese buying and selling organization of which this country is justly proud and which New Zealand would like to have.

The CHAIRMAN: It is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 9, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE FREDERICK CRONYN BETTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, parliament was just about to reassemble at the beginning of this session when members of the social credit group were called upon to mourn the loss of one of their number who had entered the House of Commons for his first time at the general elections of 1935. Within a few weeks thereafter we on the government side sustained a similar loss in the passing of one of our younger members who had been returned to parliament also for the first time at the last general elections. To-day, immediately opposite, on the side of the official opposition, there is a vacant seat which was occupied during this session by one of the younger members of the Conservative party who, too, became a member of this House of Commons for the first time at the general elections of 1935. We are thus reminded that death is no more a respecter of political parties than of persons.

On Tuesday last it was known that Major F. C. Betts, the member for London, in pursuit of a favourite recreation, had left Ottawa to go to one of the nearby streams or lakes, to enjoy a day's fishing. When he did not return to keep the engagements he had previously made there began to be concern as to the circumstances which might have occasioned his prolonged absence. Much anxiety was felt as to what fate might have befallen him. Nevertheless, at the time of adjournment on Friday evening last all had hoped that he would somewhere be found in safety and brought back to his family and to the service of his country, in parliament and elsewhere.

Unfortunately the anxieties of those who feared that Major Betts had met his death by accidental drowning were only too completely realized on Saturday morning when his body was found in the Blanche river, a short distance from where he had parked his car some days previously. The remains have been taken to London, and to-morrow members of all political parties will assemble at the funeral service to be held in the late member's native city in order to pay their last tribute of respect to his memory.

I shall leave it to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) to speak more particularly of the loss which he personally and members of his party have sustained in the passing of one who was so closely identified with their interests. I should like, however, to say on behalf of hon. members of all parties how greatly shocked we were to learn that one so prominent in his party, one whose career was so well known, and who possessed so much of opportunity and capacity for public service should have come to the end of his days practically at the beginning of his parliamentary life.

It is generally known that Major Betts served with real distinction during the period of the great war. At the early age of twenty, he enlisted in the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery, and during the war was twice wounded. In his chosen profession of law, his attainments had received marked and well-merited recognition from his associates. He was an ex-President of the Middlesex Law Association and at the time of his death was a member of the council of the Canadian Bar Association.

During the years 1928 and 1929, Major Betts served as a member of the London county council. From the part he took in discussions in this house hon. members will recall his wide range of interest in public questions. Though in the Commons but a short time he showed clearly his desire and ability to debate the different subjects which were of concern to parliament. He was one of the most active members of his party.

Personally and on behalf of my colleagues and all hon. members on this side I should like to extend to my right hon. friend and to those who sit around him the expression of our sincere sympathy in the loss which the Conservative party and he as its leader have sustained in the passing of one who so loyally supported the party, its principles, and its leader.

I should like to say, on behalf of all hon. members of this house, how very deeply we feel for the young widow and infant daughter who have been so greatly bereaved, as also for other members of the family who have suffered so great a loss under circumstances peculiarly poignant.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the tragic circumstances to which the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) has referred make it unnecessary for me to do more than thank him very earnestly and sincerely for the kind terms in which he has extended the sympathy of himself and his colleagues to those of us associated together here as the official opposition.

It is a little difficult to do more than express sorrow on an occasion such as this, when one whom we have known so closely and intimately has left us under circumstances so very, very sad. The late Major Betts bore an historic name in the city of London, and early developed those characteristics which he had inherited. You might say that his life divided itself sharply into four divisions. He was a student in the schools of his own city and at Ridley College, St. Catharines, where he made for himself a distinct place. Then, while only twenty, he enlisted in the service of his country and within a few months was in France, where he gave such an excellent account of himself that promotions followed rapidly. Twice wounded, the later wound being rather serious, he returned to his home and was demobilized early in 1919, having been actively in service until the end of hostilities.

Then came the third division of his life, that in which he served his profession as a lawyer. He was admitted to the practice of law at Osgoode Hall, as was to be expected from one with his antecedents. He took an active interest in the profession, becoming president of the bar of Middlesex and later being elected to the council of the Canadian Bar Association. Then, as might have been expected, he embarked upon the fourth branch of his activities, that of public service. He served in the city council of London and in 1935 became a candidate for his party, and after a strenuous campaign was elected to the House of Commons. I recall being in London just before that election. I had met Major Betts only once before, I think, but I was struck with the thoroughness with which he was conducting his activities. He had visited the factories; he had ascertained the conditions under which work was being carried on; he had come in contact with the works people in all these factories and had familiarized himself with the products of his city in every branch of industrial activity. I then concluded, from what I saw, that in all probability he would be returned.

When he came here he immediately went to work, which is not what new members always do. So far as he could he made himself master of every matter that he took in hand. He was particularly interested in problems concerning returned soldiers and those that had to do with the militia with which he was associated, being on the reserve of officers. I recall very vividly discussing with him the question of his activities. I pointed out to him, as I have to many younger men, that there is only one way by which you may attain success either in the practise of law or in public life, and that is by work; and whether or not he found it easy, undoubtedly it was his duty to endeavour to express himself on every question that he thought of sufficient interest to warrant his intervention in the debate. He found it a little difficult at first, but confidence came, and I think my hon. friends opposite will agree that he was attaining that measure of confidence which enabled him to speak with a measure of certainty and conviction with respect to the many problems in which he interested himself.

It hardly seems possible that, not yet forty-two years of age, one who had escaped gas, bombs, shells and shrapnel, and attacks by sea, land and air, should lose his life under the circumstances to which the right hon. the Prime Minister has referred. Yet so it is, and it is a striking illustration of what a man of old said: Death hath so many doors to let out life. He is gone out of one of the most unexpected doors, having safely passed all the others to which I have referred, except that he was wounded in passing. He passed by those doors in a foreign land, across leagues of sea, only to lose his life within a few miles of these parliament buildings while engaged in a little harmless recreation. Death indeed hath many doors to let out life.

I think it must be a matter of satisfaction to all of us that men of his training interest themselves in public life, and I trust that his example may be followed by many, in this new country which so much requires the services of those of his type, who are prepared to place themselves at the disposal of their country whenever the opportunity offers, whether in offering their lives as a willing sacrifice, or their time for the promotion of the welfare of their fellow citizens in days of peace.

All these things have to do with a public career, but there was the private side to the life of Major Betts that we cannot overlook. He had but recently been married, and had a young daughter not yet six months of age. I think those of us who may have seen him night after night, between ten and eleven o'clock, busily engaged in writing, realized that he was writing a note to the loved ones at home. He never wearied of speaking of his wonderful wife and child, and I read in the press that small photographs of them were found upon his person after his death. Those of us who had the privilege of meeting his mother when she came to Ottawa at the opening of this house, when her son took his seat, will realize something of what her sorrow must be, that one who had escaped death in so many forms had to meet his end under the tragic circumstances to which we have referred. Indeed we who knew him as a comrade, as a colleague, had become so accustomed to his cheery ways that usually he was referred to in no other terms except the word "Freddie." He made for himself so secure a place in the hearts of all who are here that it is impossible to contemplate as a reality the fact of his leaving us. We think of it only as something that is not yet real, that one to whom we were speaking but yesterday, so it seems, has gone from us, and that he shall return no more to this house, neither shall his place know him any more. These words from the book of Job fittingly express the situation.

We would indeed be a poor people, Mr. Speaker, poorer than we are, if in the midst of all this sorrow and sadness we had not the firm hope and conviction that after all, although death has so many doors to let out life, it is in reality the gate to life eternal. With this thought we shall cherish the memory of a dear friend, a devoted colleague, one who had endeared himself to us in so many ways by so many little acts of kindness that his memory will live with us until the end.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members of this group I desire to join in the expression on the part of this house of keen regret at the untimely passing of one of our number, and our sincerest sympathy for those who have been bereaved in such a tragic manner.

Some of us gained a closer acquaintance with Major Betts than otherwise might have been possible in the ordinary associations of this house. This was because of the warm-hearted comradeship that he invariably expressed towards his fellow ex-service men. In this way we learned to appreciate his manly qualities, his unfailing courtesy, and his very definite and keen interest in the welfare of his former comrades-in-arms. We shall miss him. Ex-service men within and without this house mourn his sudden death and salute the memory of one who proved himself, in the highest sense of the phrase, an officer and a gentleman.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I desire to express through you the sincere sympathy of this group with the members of the house for their great loss and with the members of this good man's family in their bereavement.

I was impressed with the words of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in which he showed so clearly how full had been the life of this man, and pointed out how strange it was that he should die as he did. One cannot escape the thought that it occurred as it was designed to occur, and that the great poet who said "there is a divinity which shapes our ends" was expressing what has been and will continue to be a truth so long as the world endures. Therefore perhaps it is well that we should look upon the bright side of this untimely event. It is well perhaps that we should look to the dawn that arises rather than to the sunset which is fading.

Tennyson said at one time that there must be other greater work for the Duke of Wellington to do than that which he did when he fought at Waterloo. There must be other greater work for Major Betts to do than the great work which he has already done, even although that work was sufficient to fill completely a most valuable life.

I rejoice over this man's life because of two things which have impressed themselves upon my mind through my knowledge of him in this house. The first was what he did in the service of his country, and I think there is nothing greater that a man can do. Greater love hath no man than this, that he offer to lay down his life for his friends. He did his work there well.

In this house he fought consistently for the interests of the returned men. As the days go by it will become increasingly evident to all the members of this house and the people outside that we in Canada, much as we have done, have left far more undone that we ought to have done for the returned men. It therefore is a misfortune to lose a man who has been so active for the returned men.

I feel also that it is a great privilege to die in harness. This Major Betts has done.

I think the last time there was a debate in this house in which he could be interested, he took part, and took part well.

While I regret greatly that he has passed, there is cause for satisfaction in the fact that the misfortune has associated with it so many things which can ameliorate the suffering which all must feel.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I cannot refrain from adding a few perhaps intimate but none the less sincere remarks to those the house has just heard from the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), and the leader of the social credit party (Mr. Blackmore). Because of these eloquently worded tributes I am reluctant to add anything, and yet with the sincere appreciation I hold of Major Betts' military record—he served with the twelfth battery, C.F.A.—I should feel I was derelict in my duty if I did not add a humble and sincere word.

The returned soldiers of the house numbered just under two score—thirty-nine in all—but to-day we are thirty-eight. This is the first break which has occurred in our ranks. I attended the same school, Princess avenue in London, as Major Betts, or "Freddie," as many of us affectionately knew him, and when I recall the many months of keen suffering that he endured following the termination of the war, and remember that by a high measure of courage he recovered and became an extremely valuable member of this house, I feel that as one who was a comrade-in-arms, and who represents a constituency adjoining his own—in fact, over a score of divisions in my riding of Middlesex East pierce into the very heart of the city of London—I could do no less, and I can do no more, than in this house to pay him this humble tribute.

May I not add on behalf of every returned soldier in the house a last deep measure of sincerest sympathy to his young and charming wife, his grand old mother, and all relatives. After all, he fought a good fight; and there is always the incomparable consolation expressed in those lines of the great Athenean orator, Pericles.

They shall not grow old, as we that are left grow old;
Age shall not weary them, nor the years condemn.
At the going down of the sun and in the morning
We will remember them.

Mr. ARTHUR J. LAPOINTE (Matapédia-Matane) (Translation): On behalf of my French-Canadian fellow war veterans, I wish to join the distinguished gentlemen who have just spoken, in voicing my deepest sorrow for the death, which happened so suddenly and in such tragic circumstances, of our lamented colleague the hon. member for London, Mr. F. C. Betts.

While attending meetings of war veterans who were members of this house, it happened quite frequently that I sat next to him and on such occasions, overlooking our differences of opinion in the political field, we often had very friendly conversations. I was thus in a position to appreciate his warm-heartedness, his great courtesy, his kindly spirit and his good breeding.

The hon. member for London will be sadly missed in this parliament.

I wish to tender my heartfelt sympathy to his sorrowful wife, to every member of his family and to the hon. members of this house who belong to the Conservative party.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): On behalf of the members of the House of Commons committee on civil service, I extend our most profound sympathy to the family of the late Major Betts and to his friends and colleagues of the Conservative party. He was a barrister of note, a gallant soldier, a parliamentarian of great experience acquired in a rather short time; he was a very able debater, and a sportsman. The floor of the house is not always a dividing line between members of opposite political affiliations; and sometimes, during the heat of a debate, I was at times the recipient of very gracious notes from the hand of the late member for London. He was a good friend; he was of genial disposition, and his passing is deeply regretted by all. On the evening before his death I happened to meet him. He took his wallet from his pocket and showed me an heirloom, containing the picture of his infant daughter in the arms of her mother. I have told the members of the House of Commons committee on the civil service that they were the finest group in the house. The late Major Betts was one of them.

GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

REPORT TABLED BY THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I lay on the table two copies of the report of the royal grain inquiry commission. The report is now being printed and will be ready for distribution in about a week.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT PRESENTED APRIL 8, 1937

The house resumed from Friday, May 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) for concurrence in the second report of the special committee appointed to investigate farm implement prices, presented to the house on the 8th of April, 1937.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): With our hearts and minds so filled with sorrow and sadness on behalf of the departed and the bereaved, it is not an easy matter to take up parliamentary business and resume the debate. However, difficult as it may be, it is my duty to start and I intend to carry on.

This debate has continued over two years and in the main, I think, has been reasonably moderate and fair. At least I think that has been the desire of all of us. But during the discussion a new feature seems to have been interjected into the farm implement situation. It will be recalled that following the advent of this government to power in October, 1935, in two weeks' time we found the Prime Minister and his staff of advisers entrained on their way to Washington to negotiate a trade agreement with our neighbours to the south. That was a natural and normal thing to do, and we expected it, although I must congratulate them on the speed with which they undertook the work. Among the tariff changes which they brought back was the reduction of farm implement duties from twenty-five per cent to ten per cent. That was an indication that our government was desirous of easing the burden of high-priced farm implements on the farmers of Canada. The new trade treaty incorporating this reduction was to come into force on the first of January following, that is January 1, 1937. Unfortunately the farm implement people apparently coincided, though maybe not deliberately, their action in raising their prices on exactly the same date. In discussing the matter they disclaimed, I believe, any intention to be thwarting the desires of the government to lighten this burden on the farmers of Canada. They said that the increase had been arranged previously and they were just carrying out what their intention had been. I am prepared to accept that for the moment, and would accept it entirely were it not for the fact that the same thing happened in the year following. When the budget was brought down in 1936, the government found it desirable further to reduce farm implement duties by 2½ per cent, which brought the duty down to 7½ per cent plus the 3 per cent excise. Following that, and in the middle of the drought of last summer, our farm implement manufacturer friends again put up the price to the farmers. That, Mr. Speaker, looks like going a little too far, and it made it very difficult to accept the explanation of their first move of that nature. To say the least it was unfortunate, and if it were not done deliberately it showed very foolish business ethics to choose their time so inopportunely to raise prices.

It is not difficult for those of us who live in the west to visualize what were the conditions when that action was taken. There was drought such as we have never seen or heard of; heat 112 and 114 degrees in the shade for days on end. It was quite evident that very little crop would be harvested by thousands, and many farmers did not at the time care much what the increased price was put at, because they were not going to have anything to reap that year. But imagine the terrible callousness of head office business men whose first duty, one would think, would be to serve their customers fairly and opportunely, in sticking up the price at that distressing time!

We have been discussing ever since what we are going to do about it. As a matter of fact it was this attitude of the farm implement people which resulted in this inquiry being instituted, initiated by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) and authorized by the government. The hon. member for Lake Centre, whose name is on the motion, now asks for concurrence in the report of the committee. The committee has not made, in my opinion, any extreme or unwarranted recommendations. The hon. member for Lake Centre, believing that present conditions warranted such action, has recommended that the entire duty be taken off farm implements. Our friends on the other side, especially the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), think this is pretty harsh and unfair, and so perhaps we are justified in going back for a moment to see to what extent the farm implement business has been sheltered and nurtured through all the years.

In 1909 the United States had a standing offer of free farm implements to all who would reciprocate. That offer stood for several years but no action was taken. The government of Canada had decided that they were not ready for free farm implements, and therefore we had no free access at that time to that country. Then came 1911 with the reciprocity agreement, but again there were no free farm implements, which showed that the government of that day was not desirous of ruining the industry, as we are sometimes charged with. There was a small reduction in farm implements in the agreement of 1911, but that was not carried into effect. I do not think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) would claim that he had anything to do with that agreement in 1911, although I believe he makes some claim in connection with the present agreement of 1935—except do it. At any rate, we will admit that he has had something to do with it. Well, here we have later the farm implement men being given the offer of free implements to the United States in 1913 and throughout the intervening years, twenty-five years to be exact. That shows that every government has been exceedingly considerate of the manufacturers of farm implements in Canada, and for that matter of other manufacturers as well, though our discussion to-day is confined to farm implements. I take the ground, therefore, that we have not been harsh, no government has been harsh towards the farm implement manufacturers.

At this particular time, it seems to me that if we are to have representative government in Canada along the lines of the greatest good to the greatest number, we should consider the situation as it exists. We have approximately 700,000 farmers in Canada most of whom have indicated clearly their desire to have the tariff burden which now rests upon them lightened; on the other hand the implement manufacturers in Canada can be numbered perhaps on the fingers of one hand, and their desire lies the other way. Truly enough, there is the labour situation to be considered; but I would point out that there is a labour situation among the farmers themselves. There is a large number of farm labourers who must be taken into account, and there are also the families of the farmers. To put it briefly, there are on the one hand 700,000 farmers, and on the other just a few manufacturers—700,000 to a handful. Which of these shall be served? Whether the farm implement manufacturers intended to flout the desire of the government for a reduction in the price of farm implements I do not know, but in the meantime our farm implement companies have had access not only to our own markets, but free access to the United States market since 1913. That is not generally known throughout the country.

I received certain figures to-day from an appropriate source indicating that in 1928 and 1929 the sales of Canadian farm implements to the United States amounted to more than $3,000,000 per annum. Later on in the midst of the depression they dropped to a few hundred thousand, but they are coming back now rapidly. So that while the farm implement men have been denying the farmers of Canada the benefit of lower prices that usually follow lowered duties, the United States government has been giving the Canadian manufacturer free access to that country. No one will deny, I submit, that the farm implement manufacturers of this country have been well taken care of over a long period of time, some seventy years, during which they have been nurtured and protected; and now the farmers are at the point where they cannot carry this additional burden any longer. A good many of the farmers on the prairie are on relief—while elsewhere they have felt the pinch of protective tariffs for years. The time has come when we should know whether it is the implement manufacturers who are running the show in Canada or the government.

A week ago last Friday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) issued a clarion call—not a battle cry, I think, but a clarion call—in connection with the government's desire, as evidenced by reductions in duty, for a lower price of farm implements, or at any rate a price not accentuated by reason of tariffs. If we are not to get it by means of tariff reductions, then we must get it somehow. That was the philosophy of the minister's statement, and we thought it was a really good speech; it was something that needed saying. I congratulate the minister on that speech to this house and to the people of Canada. It is not, as some of us may foolishly and fondly suppose, committing the government to any tariff policy. No one announces tariff schedules in advance. The Minister of Finance himself does not do so, nor does the Prime Minister. Quite often tariff decisions are not made, with respect to controversial questions, until just about the last minute; so that these tariff matters are still open. I should judge from the speech of the Minister of Agriculture, however, that the interpretation thereof is that the government is considering the matter very carefully and is evidently on the point of some important decision with respect to it. What that is we shall not know at once, nor can we know until the budget is brought down.

If the emboldened attitude of the farm implement manufacturers continues, are we to have another increase in the tariff when they think it is desirable—another increase next year? I think something should be done, and while I do not like the word "showdown" I submit that we might as well face the issue now, because it is quite obvious that the government's desires and wishes in this matter have been, either deliberately or otherwise, frustrated and thwarted by the action of the implement manufacturers of Canada. What are we to do? Suppose the textile report is followed by some appropriate tariff reduction, and that, in turn, is followed by increases in textile prices; what would we think of it? Well, in order to avoid that possibility we had better deal with the question of farm implements appropriately this session.

I do not know that I care to talk very much longer to-day on this subject, but I would call the attention of the government to one thing, and that is the duty of carrying out their intent of lessening this long existing burden on the farmers, because no doubt their desire has been thwarted. It is up to the government now, it seems to me, to take action. We do not expect them to do so to-day. The first thing is to carry this motion and thereafter, the session continuing, the budget will be brought down in due course. I do not like to advocate extreme measures in connection with this matter. Agreement cannot be arrived at on a controversial question like this, where there is such disparity of interest between the beneficiaries of protection and the victims thereof, without a large measure of mutual conciliation, and, possibly, compensation. To go at it hammer and tongs, forcing people to do this or the other, leaving a sore in the minds of our manufacturers, especially at this time in the disturbed history of our country and under the conditions prevailing abroad, would I feel be a mistake. I respectfully suggest to the government that instead of adopting the views expressed in the report and substantially lowering the tariff on these implements, or eliminating the duty altogether, they suspend the operation of the present duty on farm implements for say two or three years. The effect of that would be to give our farm implement friends an opportunity of reconsidering their foolish business methods which have been in vogue the last year or more by challenging, whether they intended to do so or not, the policy of this government in reducing these farm implement duties. It will also give the farmers an opportunity to catch their breath and recover in some measure from the depression of the last few years. I submit that alternative to the government until something better is in sight. Possibly at some other time, it may be when the budget is brought down, I shall have some further observations to make on the subject.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. BRUNELLE (Champlain) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the question under discussion is of deep interest to the farmers. They need government assistance, and I am happy to note that this government desires to help them as much as possible. The report of the committee appointed to investigate the prices of farm implements, which we are now discussing, has established the existence of certain abuses on the part of the manufacturers and recommends a further reduction in customs' duties on farm implements.

I wish to take a few moments of the time of the house to express my approval of this report which, from beginning to end, is favourable to the farmers.

The present discussion will indicate to the entire country that this government is not satisfied with merely praising the farmers of Canada, but really wants to help them. The attitude of the political parties on that point is being clearly defined. The supporters of the government are all stating their approval of the report and of the committee's recommendations tending to the reduction of farm implement prices, while the members of the opposition, from first to last, at least those who have taken part in the present debate, are opposing them.

The situation is clear. On the one hand we have the interests of the powerful, of the financiers, of the manufacturers, and the Conservatives are upholding them. On the other hand, there is at stake the welfare and interest of the weak, of the poor, of those who lack organization and money, the interests of the class which is admittedly the most important, because it is at the root of all national progress, in a word the interests of agriculture, and the Liberal party is upholding them.

It is in 1878 that Sir John A. Macdonald inaugurated a policy of protection for Canadian industries. This policy, it was said, was intended to aid only infant industries. Ever since, the buyer and consumer of Canada has been paying a bonus to the Canadian manufacturers. Ever since, the cost of living has been higher in Canada than in the United States. An automobile selling in Canada for $1,350 can be bought in the United States for $1,000. A radio costing $75 in Canada sells for about $25 in the United States, and so on. Farm implement prices have always been from 10 to 20 per cent lower in the United States.

All that is the result of the tariff policy initiated in 1878 for the protection of infant industries. After sixty years of existence

Canadian industries should be old enough to be weaned. It is now the farmer's turn to come into his own, to be able to pay what he owes and to buy at prices proportionate to those which he obtains for his products.

The Conservative opposition assume the defence of the manufacturers. They are constantly speaking of the inalienable rights of the powerful, of the rich, of the manufacturers, of the trusts—of vested rights. In order to give a plausible appearance to their love for the powerful, opposition members state that they are seeking to protect the workers employed in industry. The farm implement industry employs four to five thousand workers. I also am anxious for the welfare of these four or five thousand workers, but I am specially concerned about the welfare of the five million Canadians living on the land.

Farmers are sometimes called the monarchs of all they survey. They should be the monarchs of the land, but they are not. They have been dethroned in the course of the last few years, in many cases; they have lost their independence to become, to a great extent, the slaves of their creditors, of the powerful, of the manufacturers including the manufacturers of farm implements. I am not so much concerned in knowing whether the lowering of the tariff will have much or little effect on farm implement prices than I am in doing well what is to be done, in order to have the satisfaction that comes of the performance of one's duty.

On page 1295, we find recommendation No. 23, which reads as follows:

That recent reductions in tariff and other trade barriers resulted in the Canadian companies lowering their prices on certain farm implements imported from the United States, but the United States companies manufacturing a full general line in the United States and marketing these in Canada, did not lower their prices generally on importations other than those affected by the price reductions of the Canadian companies, indicating the lack of free price competition in the industry.

Now let us examine, in the light of statistics, whether it is the farmer or the manufacturer who is worthy of sympathy and assistance. Here is a page in the history of the International Harvester Company and the Massey Harris Company, based on their financial results, as shown on page 1224 of the report:

Financial history of the International Harvester Company of Canada Limited, from 1903 to 1935 inclusive:

In the period from inception to 1912 it earned $3,500,000, paid interest on all advances from the parent company and, if the policy of later years was followed at that time, earned in addition an undetermined amount of profits retained in the hands of the parent company. This was on a capitalization of $1,000,000.

In the period from 1913 to 1919 inclusive, it earned $3,000,000 plus a profit retained in the United States estimated at $4,200,000 and, in addition, paid interest on all advances from the parent company. This on a capitalization of $1,000,000 up to 1917; a capitalization of $10,000,000 in 1917 and a capitalization of $15,000,000 in 1918 and 1919.

In the years 1920 to 1925 inclusive, it made profits of $800,000 after absorbing the heavy losses of 1921 and 1922; received a surplus of $287,556 from the International Plow Works of Canada Limited and earned for the parent company a profit, retained in the United States and not shown in the operating results of the Canadian company, estimated at not less than $4,000,000. In these years it paid no interest on the advances received from the parent company and the capitalization was maintained at $15,000,000, increased by surplus, reserves and moneys owing to the parent company, to an average of $30,000,000 per annum.

A dividend of $3,000,000 was taken in 1921 by the parent company.

In 1926 to 1935, it earned on a different basis to the foregoing at least $24,500,000 on an adjusted capitalization claimed to be about $39,000,000.

Now as to the Massey-Harris Company Limited.

The company had its inception in 1891 with the merging of the Massey and Harris interests; the paid up capital of the company at its inception being approximately $3,500,000 of which $300,000 was paid in cash and the remainder was given in exchange for the assets of the constituent firms in the merger.

In the period from 1891 to 1912 this original capitalization of $3,500,000 plus $1,000,000 additional cash capital received in 1911, enabled the company to return the following values to its stockholders—

I will not quote the particulars, Mr. Speaker, but those returns amounted to $28,953,349.

During the years 1913 to 1921 inclusive, cash dividends were paid to a total amount of approximately $9,142,000. Stock dividends were declared in 1916, 1918 and 1920 to the extent of $11,044,200. Of these, however, nearly $9,000,000 represented profits in the period ended in 1912.

The period from 1922 to 1925 showed no appreciable change in the position of the company. It paid no considerable amounts in dividends and earned no large profits.

The loss for the period 1926 to 1935 inclusive, will be found stated in another section of this report as over $15,000,000.

The dividends paid during the same period were as follows:

Dividends paid on Preference Stock:

Fiscal year ending in—
1926	7%		$ 846,293
1927	7%		846,293
1928	7%		846,293
1929	7%	½ year	423,147
	5%	½ year	302,247
1930	5%		604,495
			$3,868,768

Dividends paid on no par value Common shares:
Fiscal year ending in—
1929	$1,269,440
1930	1,637,016
	$2,906,456
	$6,775,224

Mr. Speaker, I need not comment upon that for the figures speak for themselves.

I had not intended to take part in this debate, but my concern for the farmers of my constituency compels me to do so. I am sincerely convinced that we can never do too much on behalf of the farmers. If it can truthfully be said that agriculture is the foundation of our country's prosperity let us be careful lest that foundation should collapse, let us maintain it strong and firm. It is unfortunate, in my opinion, that the farmers should not be better organized and more united, for that is a cause of weakness. I admire the farmers and I am concerned about the welfare, for I believe that in their own way, the Quebec farmers have been heroes in the past, on account of the hardships they had to suffer and the sacrifices they were compelled to make; but their descendants, instead of reaping the benefit of those sacrifices and hardships, are now facing almost insuperable difficulties. I admire the farmers of my province, and I am concerned about their welfare because they are courageous, industrious and serious-minded. I admire them for the reason that if fascism, communism, socialism and other similar doctrines ever really threatened to overrun our country, the last shot fired against them would come from the people of my province.

I will vote in favour of the report and the recommendations of the committee on farm implement prices, because I think it is an indisputable fact that the prosperity of the farm implement industry is directly based upon the prosperity of farming. Consequently, they must cooperate in such a manner that the farmer, when he has to sell his produce at the lowest prices, should not be forced to buy his farm implements at high prices; in other words, whenever the prices of farm products fall there should be a similar reduction in the prices of farm implements, and vice versa.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this debate it was not my intention to take part in it, but since that time some remarks have been made which I believe should not be permitted to go unanswered.

In the speech he delivered on Thursday, May 5, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) is reported at page 2583 of Hansard to have said:

> It is not the 7½ per cent alone on implements which is at stake in this debate. We are debating a principle, and tied up with that principle is not only the future welfare of this dominion, but the unity of Canada as well. I deplore such utterances as have been made in this house and in this debate—yes, and deplore them in the sacred name of Canadian unity.

When the sacred name of Canadian unity is thrown into the balance in an attempt to justify the exploitation of one part of the country for the benefit of another part, I cannot sit in my seat and remain silent. There has been too much in the way of attempting to use patriotism and the like to justify exploitation and to persuade others to undergo exploitation. In my opinion that is one of the reasons for the disunity in Canada at the present time.

For an example of this sort of thing—before the election in 1911 a trade agreement was made with the United States which to-day most people will admit would have been to the great advantage of Canada as a whole. One of the reasons why people in Ontario and western Canada were persuaded to turn down the agreement was a campaign of patriotism and an appeal to Canadian loyalty. The hon. member for Greenwood referred to the noble part the Canadian farmers had always been willing to play in the building up of industries in Canada, and the implication seems to be that the Canadian farmer should go on submitting to the payment of taxes to corporations on everything he buys in order that the manufacturing industry of Canada may prosper.

If it could be shown that the manufacturing industry passed on to Canadian workers the benefits it received from Canadian farmers, there might be something in that argument. I do not think there would be much in it, because I doubt very much whether a government has a right to say to over half the population engaged in the basic industry of a country: "We will give certain people the right to tax you, to make things worse for you and your children, in order that a certain other branch of the population may be better off." That has been referred to in times past as the New Feudalism, the right to private taxation given to certain industries and private corporations. But does it actually have that effect of benefiting labour? The hon. member for Greenwood actually said that he was speaking not in favour of the implement industry or of the farming industry, but in favour of the workers and the people engaged in farming industry. The thing that strikes me in regard to that contention, Mr. Speaker, is this: Does a high tariff increase the number of people engaged in the implement industry? Exports of farm implements in 1933 were valued at $1,324,776, while the imports amounted to $2,208,028. In 1936 our exports of farm implements were worth $6,344,000, and our imports $6,182,000. I ask those who make such a plea on behalf of those engaged in the farm implement industry, is it not much better to have trade flowing so that you manufacture and export $6,344,000 worth of farm implements rather than $1,324,000 worth? And our imports did not go up proportionally as fast. Can anyone, in view of these figures, place much reliance on the suggestion that the tariff should be maintained because it helps workmen engaged in the farm implement industry?

Furthermore, if you are going to have unity in this country it must be based upon justice as between different parts of the country and as between the different industries of the country. You cannot have unity based upon such things as were revealed in the textile investigation. One company engaged in the textile industry was permitted to charge high prices and pay itself roughly 98 per cent interest on the investment, in its common shares over a period of twenty-nine years, while the labouring people were paid lower wages than were paid in the United States and they themselves were paying more for the things they had to buy than they should have had otherwise to pay. That is giving the right of exploitation, of private taxation, and it is not conducive to unity or a sense of satisfaction on the part of the people of Canada. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I think if one had at heart the unity of this country he would say that those suffering the most, those lowest in the scale of economic well-being should be the first to be assisted.

In a speech in this house on February 1 the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) gave some figures in regard to the average earnings of the Ontario farmers. At first I intended to go into the earnings of farmers throughout Canada as a whole, but I realized that this might not be a fair comparison because of the drought in the west during the past few years, so I thought we might safely rely upon the figures of the hon. member in regard to the earnings of Ontario farmers as illustrating the general position of the farmer in Canada. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in his remarks he gave figures, which appealed to me, at least, as being fair, indicating that the average farmer in Ontario earned $362 net a year, and that was after allowing wages of only $155 to his son or daughter—not a high amount, since most farmers have at least one son or daughter working for them. Is not the farming industry then the one worst off and the one most entitled to consideration?

I have heard speakers discuss in this house, and I have worried over it myself, the situation that has arisen in this country under which even when you have increasing trade and increasing industrial activity you still have large numbers in the cities unemployed and on relief. I suggest to you that this is the result of our attitude towards our different industries. I suggest that the reason we have not even more unemployed and even more people on relief in the cities is that the people in the country who would like to go to the cities and engage in industry realize that if they did go they would not be able to get work and would have to go on relief. But I suggest that if you keep on putting manufacturing industry in a preferred position, as compared to agriculture, even if you increase the number engaged in industry by fifty per cent within the next six months and take those people from the relief rolls of the cities and towns, the same number will flock in from the country to take their places and attempt to find jobs.

I submit that you have to attack this problem in a fundamental way. You have to make the basic, most important industry in this dominion—agriculture—the attractive industry, or at least as attractive as other industries. You have to make it so attractive that those engaged in it will not be always looking for an opportunity to go to the cities and towns in order to get into manufacturing industry. If you do not do that, no matter how much you develop industry you will attract more and more people from the farms to take the places of those absorbed in industry, and you will have no permanent solution of the problem of unemployment and relief. On the other hand, if the agricultural industry is treated properly and made more desirable, the people presently engaged in it will remain so engaged; others will be attracted to it, and you will be decreasing the number unemployed and on relief. Then, as people remain and more go on the farms, the demand for the goods produced by manufacturing industry will be increased. That, I suggest, is a fundamental approach to this problem, but the attitude of the Conservative opposition in this house is designed all the time to throw the thing more and more out of balance, to make things more desirable in manufacturing industry and less desirable in the basic industry of agriculture.

We have heard a great deal about labourers in industry, but there are labourers in agriculture also. I think any one who knows anything will realize that labour in the farming industry is not treated from the standpoint of hours of work, holidays or rate of pay, as well as labour in industry. That is not the fault of the farmer; he could not possibly pay any more than he does, but why is it that those who profess to be so much concerned about the labouring man never raise their voices in this house on behalf of the working man on the farm or the farmer's son working on his father's farm? They always speak on behalf of the labouring man in the city, the labouring man in industry. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the labouring man on the farm is just as important, and that he also should have defenders in this house. After all, agriculture is a very important branch of industry in this country. For example, from 1931 to 1934 inclusive the average number of men engaged in industry was 523,972. What are the figures in regard to those engaged in agriculture? Including members of families actively engaged in farm work we had 1,621,000 people employed in agriculture, or three times as many as were engaged in industry. So I say that if we are going to lay a permanent foundation for unity in this dominion we must make things better for that million and a half who have to make their living on the farms. After we have done that we can and should concern ourselves about those others who are not so badly off. For I should like to make it quite plain that I am not against making things better for the worker in industry. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said the other night, a policy of lower tariffs alone would make things better for the industrial workers.

I have cited the figures indicating that the value of farm implements exported in 1936 was much higher than in 1933. We had the experience of more men employed in the farm implement industry after the tariff reductions of 1924 and 1925. In this connection there is also another feature which I should like to draw to your attention; it is a matter which I have always had a good deal of difficulty in understanding. It is why those engaged in manufacturing farm implements in this country need tariff protection at home when they can ship their products abroad and compete in the foreign market where they have no tariff protection. Here they have an advantage in that they do not have to pay so much in the way of freight rates, and if they can ship their goods abroad and compete in these foreign countries why should they require protection in Canada? Let me refer again to the figures I mentioned a moment ago. In 1936 the implement industry actually exported goods to a higher value than the implements that were imported in the same year. I will recall the figures again. In 1936 the agricultural implement industry of this country exported $6,344,000 worth of agricultural implements, and there were imported in competition with that only $6,182,000 worth. In other words, there was a favourable balance of $162,000, which we shipped out and sold in competition with the implement manufacturers of the world. Where, then, is the justification in forcing the farmers to subsidize the farm implement industry and pay more for their implements when that industry can compete with outside industry in the markets of the world?

There is another aspect of the matter that should be considered—and I am trying to cover the ground rapidly and deal with the principles involved as I see them. We have well established in the economic set-up of this country the idea of drawbacks, the idea that there shall be a refund of the tariff paid upon the raw materials that went into the finished product which is shipped out to compete in the markets of the world. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is there any industry in this country that has to compete more with the low paid labour of the whole world than the agricultural industry? Agriculture has to compete with the low paid worker in Africa, in Egypt, everywhere. His tools, his implements are raw materials of the farmer. He has to sell his products in the markets of the world in competition with the people of all other nations, no matter how low paid their labour may be, and one of his raw materials is certainly farm implements, the means whereby he produces his products. Implements are one of the things he uses to produce his wheat, his butter, and so forth. If industry which asks for protection insists on getting drawbacks on the scale it does when it sells its products in the markets of the world, is not the farmer, who is made of flesh and blood and must live, just as much, at least, entitled to a square deal? Is he not entitled to drawback—a refund—on the basis of the excess he pays for his implements on account of the tariff policy protecting industry? When we hear of the sacred name of Canadian unity, it is time our people began to see that we should base that unity on a fair deal to all parts and all classes of Canada.

Recently a prominent man in this country, making a submission to the royal commission investigating dominion and provincial relations, said that because of the difference in economic conditions as between one province and another some of the provinces could not afford certain social services while others could; that it was not fair to ask the richer to contribute to the social services of the poorer and therefore the best and fairest thing was to leave social services on a provincial basis. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if Canada is not a nation? Do we not say to the individual Canadian: You must contribute to the national exchequer? In time of war did we not say to him: You must go and fight for Canada? Then when he needs help in the way of social services, are we to say to him: No, you are not a Canadian; you are an Ontario man or a Saskatchewan man? Are we to say that when it comes to upholding Canada, a matter of giving perhaps one's life for one's country, he is a Canadian, and that it is an obligation to Canada as a whole, but that when it comes to the state helping him in his hour of need, there shall be first-class Canadians and second-class Canadians, to be helped or not depending upon what part of Canada they live in? It is that sort of thing that is helping to break up Canada and make people feel there is not a real Canadian spirit, a real spirit of justice and fair play among Canadians as a whole, as there should be.

The fundamental question before us to-day is this: Are we at last going to do justice to the basic industry of this country, or are we going to permit it to continue to be exploited on behalf of one particular industry?

There are one or two other remarks that were made with which I should like to deal; I cannot deal with all of them. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) said, at page 2580 of Hansard:

> But I do know that the implement industry feels that prices should be based on costs, not on the law of supply and demand.

And the hon. member suggested that he was favourable to that idea, that the prices of the things the farmer has to buy, one of his raw materials, his farm implements, should be based not on the law of supply and demand, but on the cost of production in Canada, knowing at the same time that the selling price of the products the farmer has to sell will be based to a preponderant extent upon supply and demand in world markets. Is he prepared at the same time to say that the selling price of the things the farmer produces shall be based on the farmer's cost of production? I just wonder if the Conservative opposition in this house is going to say: We are going to treat the farmer differently from the manufacturing industry. Is it going to say that the manufacturing industry will be permitted to get together by open or secret agreement and charge prices based on their cost of production, while the farmer shall be exposed to getting what he can in the markets of the world? Or is it their policy to say to the farmer: We are going to reimburse you the cost of production on your apples, your cheese, your butter, your wheat, on your oats your hay and your barley? We should hear what their policy is. If they are going to talk about the needs of industry, let us have one and the same policy for the farmer and for industry. If you are going to say that the price of farm implements should be based on the cost of production and a reasonable profit, then those who talk about the unity of Canada should be saying that the farmer should be treated in exactly the same way. If they do not do the one, they should not do the other. If they are not willing to do both, let them stop talking about the unity of Canada.

There is another thing I should like to say in conclusion. The Crowsnest pass freight rates have been dealt with in this house. This solemn agreement made with the railways provided that, amongst other items, no higher than a certain rate should be charged on goods hauled to the west. That agreement was abrogated by act of this parliament. The Crowsnest rate on farm implements should be restored at once.

I hope democracy is a real thing in this house. The last convention of our party held in 1919, came out, as I understand it, for the free importation of farm implements, one of the raw materials of the farmer. We have been again returned to power by the people of this country. We must let the peoples' will prevail. Special pleading for special interests should no longer prevail in this matter to the slightest degree in this House of Commons. The expressed will of the people who voted for a low tariff policy should be given effect to by legislation. There should be no more argument, no more delay, no more procrastination, with people still enjoying special privileges given by high tariff. The tariff should go down, and the tariff on farm implements especially should go down, or even be wiped out altogether. We are told by the Conservative party, that they had an agreement with the farm implement industry that if the Conservative government would give them the right to charge their prices under the protection of a high tariff, they would not raise such prices; and we have been told that they have kept that agreement. We also know that the cost of producing farm implements in 1936 was less than in 1932. We know further that since this government got into power, the manufacturers, instead of lowering the price have twice raised the price of their implements, and done it the second time in the face of a finding of a committee of this House of Commons that the first raise in price was not justified. We know that, and yet we say that taking off the tariff will under present conditions effect a reduction in price. If that is not the case; if the implement industries of the North American continent have things so organized that they can raise their prices when their costs come down, and can do just as they please with the people of Canada, then I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the sooner we know it the better. The sooner we take the tariff off and see whether that alone will work to lower prices, the better. If it does not work, I suggest we should then put the efforts—the full power—of this government and the finances of this country behind the development of a cooperative movement to manufacture and supply the farmers with farm implements at cost. If the embattled farm implement industries of this country, which have built themselves up under protection given by the Canadian people, have now got to the point where they are ready to challenge the people and their representatives in parliament, and to do as they please with regard to the needs of such a basic industry as agriculture, it is time for this parliament and this government to take up the challenge and show the implement industry and anybody else who may be looking on that parliament is supreme, and that if we cannot get justice in one way for the farming industry we will get it in another.

I beseech the house to pass this report. I suggest that the government go further and take the duty off agricultural implements. I further suggest that they reduce freight rates to the Crowsnest Pass level. They should then watch things very closely, and if prices do not come down at least to a figure comparable to prices in 1932, when costs were lower, other decisive action should be taken to see that justice is done to that fundamental industry which is now so depressed in this country, the farming industry.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. W. F. RICKARD (Durham): I had not intended to speak on this motion, nor do I now intend to take up very much time, but, as a farmer who uses farm implements first hand, I feel that I should make a few observations.

I was much interested in listening to and reading the speeches of some hon. members. I listened to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), and noticed that he made a definite point of the services which implement companies render to the farmer. Well, as a farmer I always thought that I had to pay for the services I received from agents of implement companies. Every time that the agent of the Massey-Harris or any other company comes to my place to repair a machine I pay for that service out of my own pocket and, I think, very dearly. It is true that services are rendered in connection with new machinery, such as delivering it and setting it up and keeping it in shape for a short period, but all that is charged up to the cost of the implement. Services and repairs, particularly the latter, are altogether too expensive. If a farmer has to buy repairs to-day for a binder, or for that matter any other machine, he might far better buy a new one.

We realize to-day that to farm successfully and to compete in the markets of the world we must have good implements. But I agree with the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) that it is very doubtful whether all these latest improvements, such as alemite greasing, oil bath mowers and pole trucks, which add to the cost of the implement, are worth the extra expense. Of course if we demand these things we have to pay for them. But certainly there is too much difference between what the farmer has to pay for his equipment and what he receives for his products. Some will say, let the government do something to increase the price of what the farmer has to sell. But I believe I am speaking for the farmers of my constituency when I say that the prices of farm produce during the past two or three years—that is for the farmer who has anything to sell—have been fairly good, much better than they were in the period from 1930 to 1935. True, the price of cattle has been lower this year than last, but 6 or 6½ cents a pound is not a bad price, unless the speculator paid too much when he bought his cattle and put them in the stable in the fall. Hogs have fetched a good price and grain a fair price. But the operating expenses of the farm to-day are too great. Taxes and all overhead expenses are too high.

As in the case of improved farm implements, we have demanded these improvements and we have set a standard of living which seems altogether too high. It is all very fine if we can keep up with it and pay our way, but I do not believe we can.

I am not a free trader, and certainly I am not a high protectionist. I believe that the middle course is the proper road to take. However I do not think that the implement companies, in the face of the reduction of the tariff on farm implements, had any justification for raising their price, notwithstanding what has been said about the increased cost of raw material. Had these companies shown any tendency to meet the needs and requirements of the farmer I would have favoured giving them the benefit of the doubt, but as it is I should like to see the duty taken completely off the importation of repairs for farm implements and, unless we get better cooperation from these companies, taken altogether off farm implements. It seems to me that implement companies are creating a monopoly in order to get more for their machines. If on the other hand they would try to reduce the price, and thus sell more implements—for to-day there is scarcely a farmer who does not need new implements—they would increase employment for thousands of men who are dependent on industry for a living and enable them to buy more farm produce.

In my riding we have no farm implement company, but there are several other very important industries. We have a fertilizer plant which makes fertilizer for the farmers' use, and to-day it is doing a bigger business than it has done in years.

There must be a common understanding between capital and labour and between industry and agriculture if we are to retain our democracy. Farmers should do what they can to cooperate with the manufacturing companies, and the men working in those industries should strive to cooperate with the farmers. I say again that if these companies persist in maintaining high prices for their implements we shall have to go as far as we can to stop that sort of thing. It has always happened that when prices of farm produce are in close relationship to the prices of manufactured goods we have the greatest measure of prosperity, and that is invariably under a Liberal government. I believe that, under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) we shall go a very long way in that direction. I am not in favour of appointing any more commissions to investigate these things. As a government let us take action ourselves.

Before I sit down let me congratulate the mover of this report, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) upon having brought it before the house.

Mr. J. D. MacRAE (Glengarry): The people of the constituency I represent are largely employed in farming, and the question of farm implement prices is of keen interest to me. The west reckons its purchasing power in bushels of wheat, western Ontario its purchasing power in pounds of beef, but the farmers of Glengarry county are largely engaged in dairying, therefore their purchasing power depends on the price they receive for a hundred pounds of milk.

During the years 1930-35 milk manufactured into butter and cheese was making a return to the farmer of sixty to sixty-five cents per hundred pounds. At that price it was impossible for them to replace their worn-out machinery. It was amazing, in travelling through the country, to see the number of machines that were held together with hay wire. In 1913 a farmer could purchase a binder for $137, and he received at that time about one dollar per hundred pounds for milk delivered at the factory door. This made the purchase price, in terms of pounds of milk, 13,700. In 1938 a six-foot binder suitable for use in Ontario can be purchased for $263. Milk is now yielding about a dollar per hundred pounds. So that it will take 26,300 pounds of milk to purchase that binder. The purchase of other farm implements is on a similar scale. As was pointed out to the committee, the price of the binder at factory was $123 and the retail price $263, leaving a spread of distribution costs of $140, which seemed to me to be excessive. If the farm implement companies would agree to eliminate much of the high pressure salesmanship and try to reduce distributing costs, it would greatly benefit the country.

I am fully convinced that if we had a fair exchange of commodities in our production it would do much to solve the difficulties in the economic situation which we are now experiencing. If this condition could be brought about we would not need to consider the social credit theories of Alberta. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) suggested that as this committee brought in its report two years ago its findings do not apply to present conditions. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) intimated that he had severed his connections with the implement business six years ago, and therefore he can no longer speak with authority on the production side of the question. Much as I admire his fluency of speech I cannot admire his train of thought.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I am greatly tempted to make a speech in reply to the many observations that have been made in this house on this report, but I shall refrain from doing so, and shall endeavour in a very few sentences to bring to the attention of my fellow members and my fellow citizens some of the reasons why I feel that we should not engage in the form of sectional warfare in which we have been engaged in the last few days.

I confess that there is no matter in which, since I went west forty years ago, I have had a more sustained interest than the price of farm implements. The real story of farm implements is almost romantic. If we carry our minds back to the days of the prophets of old, the ox as he trod out the corn was not to be muzzled; if we remember the tale of the gleaner as recorded in the book of Ruth, and the crude instruments of which we now have the evidence in our museums, we can understand the extent to which the farmer of this country is dependent upon the manufacturer.

It does seem to me very strange that in this house we should be constantly apologizing for the manufacturer. Sometimes I find it difficult to understand that state of mind. Who is the manufacturer in Canada? I hold in my hand the book supplied by the Department of Trade and Commerce to every member of this chamber, and when I turn to pages 46 and 47 I find the value of agricultural production, and turning to page 94 I find the value of our manufacturing production. I find that in 1936 the total value, in all provinces, of agricultural capital, including live stock, implements, machinery, lands and buildings, was placed at $4,628,375,000, in round figures. Turning to manufacturing production I find it estimated thus in 1935: Capital, $4,698,991,000, with nearly 25,500 establishments employing 582,000 persons, with half a billion paid out in salaries and wages, and almost a billion and a half paid out in the cost of materials, with a gross value of products amounting to nearly three billions.

Why, then, should we be so apologetic when we speak of the manufacturing industry of Canada? Why should my fellow Canadians be so apologetic on the one hand and critical on the other of the industrial life of the country? For my own part I am proud of it, as I think most Canadians are. We go about the dominion speaking of what we have been doing and of what we have accomplished. I realize, of course, that the manufacturing business in Canada became very great during the war for reasons that need not now be discussed, and I realize that our plants attained a measure of efficiency and effectiveness that they had not before known. The real question that we have to face in connection with agricultural implements is not limited to implements alone. The flail—and I daresay there are members of this house who have never seen a flail—the sickle and the cradle have given place to the binder and the combine; and the application of high mechanical skill has developed the mowing machine, the rake, the tractor, the caterpillar tractor, the power-drawn harrow and ploughs and implements that are used for the purposes of cultivation not only in this country but in every other country in the world, whether it be in the cotton fields in the south of this continent or in our wheat fields, or our corn fields, or our potato fields. Whether it be in any of these fields there is usually some special implement or instrument that is utilized for a specific purpose.

I make these observations by way of introduction; for, as I have said, the temptation to engage in a partisan discussion of the situation is very great. I do not propose to take part in such a discussion; for I do not believe that the men to whom reference has been made are endeavouring to exploit the Canadian farmer. I have under my hand one of the last reports of an implement company, the Massey-Harris Company; I find that one of the directors is a member of this house, Mr. W. H. Moore; and I find that others who are members of that board of directors are men who, I am sure, have a high sense of their obligation to every part of our population. Does any hon. member believe that these men are endeavouring to exploit the farmers of the country for selfish purposes? I think not. If I were engaged in a partisan discussion I could point out how strange it is to have the suggestion made that prices could be fixed by this government or by this parliament, which, as the privy council has decided, has no jurisdiction over price-fixing except in times of emergency; or that we should exercise control over the capitalization of companies, when all the companies to which reference might be made are companies which attained their powers in those halcyon days between 1920 and 1930?

I want to ask my fellow members one question: Is it desirable that Canada should have an agricultural implement industry? That is the first question which I suggest should be answered. In Russia when they first outlined their five-year plan they concentrated their efforts upon being able to produce implements of production. I have lived long enough in this country to see it suffer because we had not refined material with which to meet our own requirements, notwithstanding that we were sending out in ingot form the raw material that we required in refined form. I could give instances now, if it were desirable, in which Canadians had reason to apply for the use and purpose of a certain type of refined material which we, owing to our great production of electrical energy, sent from this country in ingot form; but owing to the prior claims of other purchasers in another land we were not able to secure a supply for our wants.

Sometimes it has been said that instruments of production should be placed upon the free list, and that Canada is not interested in the development of an industry for the production of instruments or implements of production. Nothing could be more injurious to this country than that we should be without an agricultural implement industry. When the great war came upon us a great implement factory in Great Britain was taken over by the state and used for the production of munitions of war, and the export business of that organization vanished. We in this country I think would, almost by common consent, answer in the affirmative the question, shall we have an agricultural implement business in Canada? True we have had such an industry here since 1847. We have had an industry here which developed from very small beginnings. Those who are familiar with the romantic story of the development of the industry in the United States, of the efforts of McCormick, need not be ashamed of the efforts made by our pioneers, who were not machinists in the large sense of the term, or trained engineers, but who established the industry in this country. Necessity was the motivating power behind them, and they worked out in a small way just what, for instance, MacKay did in Australia. There they have still preserved the little area in which MacKay began the production of agricultural implements for that great commonwealth, the industry having now grown to a very great business. They have their implement business; they realized that it was essential that they should have it. Disturbances in transport, something always to be considered; the necessity for the preservation of neutrality, always important; the utilization of an implement factory for war purposes, always a possibility: these factors alone, apart from every other consideration, necessitate that the Canadian people should have in this country an agricultural implement industry.

Then if my fellow members answer that question with me in the affirmative, they realize that at the present time we have four large industries engaged in the production of agricultural implements. Our ploughs have a reputation in the Argentine second to none in the world. Our machinery produced in Germany and France is second to none. And even in the United States of America one of our factories has a very efficient production service. Our implements or instruments of production are well and favourably known. Under these circumstances, having had an industry for many years, and agreeing, as I trust my fellow members do, that we should have such an industry, there must be a condition attached to it, or conditions. What are the conditions? The conditions are two: (1) that the quality of the implements thus produced should be as good as it is possible to produce anywhere in the world; (2) that the price should bear a just relation to the cost of production. Are there any other conditions that one would suggest with respect to a matter of kind, once you have concluded that you should have the industry?

The next question, then, that we would have to answer, dealing with this matter purely as a business transaction, is, how can we accomplish this end? By what means can we ensure to Canadians a domestic implement business in all its branches, ensuring not only the industry but the quality and the reasonable cost of the product? Well, various means have been suggested from time to time in the world's history as to how that might be accomplished. But every nation in the world has had recourse to one device to accomplish that end. Great Britain was the last to adopt it, because by reason of her established trade and her banking and finance facilities in London, Great Britain had been able to bring to her shores vast quantities of raw material which could be fabricated at very low prices. Those of my fellow members who have read the life of John Morley will remember with what resentment he contemplated the possibility of there being any interference with the contractual rights of those who employed labour at any price they saw fit, of any age and for any hours of toil. That state of things is past.

The device or method, then, that we and every other nation of the world have adopted to accomplish that end is the tariff. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) said the other day that you could not contemplate this country now without tariffs. Tariffs in Canada owe their continuance to two facts which cannot lightly be overlooked. One is our geographical position. Whether you or I like it or not we are, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) remarked the other day, part of the North American continent. On the North American continent we have 125,000,000 people who have by mass production carried industry to a point of effectiveness and efficiency unknown in the world before. There has been nothing like it in labour-saving devices, in the methods utilized by the genius of inventors to carry forward their undertakings. And the other fact is that with a small population we are endeavouring to develop a vast area in which we have provided facilities for transport, by sea and land, to an extent that really menaces the economic safety of our country. In other words, we were over-ambitious; we contemplated a vast population which has not materialized, and eleven millions of people are carrying a burden which can be borne only if we maintain some form of industrial activity.

As part of the second reason I have given—and it might be regarded as a third—you have the consideration which I trust will always be in the mind of every hon. member, namely the shifting of our population. So long as you had in Canada a population the major part of which was rural, you had a situation which was not very difficult to deal with. But to-day we have a population the major part of which is to be found in cities and towns. That has created for all governments—and I trust hon. members will agree with me as I proceed, because I am trying to keep away from controversy—a problem of great magnitude. Think of it: over one-half of the population of this dominion has gone to the cities and towns. That became apparent for the first time when the census was taken in 1931. It has been greatly accentuated since that time. Our population in cities and towns has grown and grown. People are going from the country to the towns and cities, in the west chiefly because of crop failures and in eastern communities for other reasons which need not here be discussed; and the result is that to-day, in this early period in our history as a dominion—only now, be it noted, something like seventy-one years, which is but nothing in the life of a country—the major part of our population is in cities and towns.

Any student of history knows what the result of that is. A man does not need to be a trained economist to recognize the seriousness of the result of that condition. What has it done? It has placed upon the cities and towns the necessity of providing some form of industrial life, unless that population is to be maintained on relief by the state. That is the real fact of it.

Now, the necessity for some form of tariff being admitted—

Mr. TUCKER: We do not admit it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member says, "we do not admit it"; I had hoped that in view of the statement made by the Minister of Labour the other evening we would be a unit on that point. It is true that in the United States with respect to raw materials high tariffs have been very largely replaced by free entry, and it is true that in this country the free items are very much more numerous than the average man realizes, as he will learn if he will study the tariff. The tariff as a structure was designed to encourage the development of the country, and to provide us with facilities whereby, in a moment of stress and strain, we might be able to maintain our position.

I know there are very acute differences of opinion as to the extent to which a tariff should be imposed. But I cannot think there are many members of the house who are realists who will not admit that the tariff is no longer a question of discretion on the part of governments; it is a necessity. Then, if that be so—and I submit it must be so—is not our only question the consideration of what shall be the extent of the tariff? Is that not the only question? And if that is the question to consider, what factors enter into it? I suggest to hon. members that in a country with a population so sparse, inhabiting an area so vast, and with an urban population so great relatively to the rural population, subject to the conditions I have imposed as to quality and price, the tariff should be such as to give to the Canadian producer in factory and mill the business of his own country. I have never hesitated for a moment to say that I apply that principle also to agriculture.

The hon. member who spoke a moment ago was hardly familiar with the tariff history of the country. I trust I am not becoming controversial when I say that we encountered much criticism because we endeavoured to see that the farmers in and about the great cities, whether growing fruit or market garden truck, should be protected from the climatic advantages which belonged to their competitors in another country.

Mr. TUCKER: Anyone will throw a sprat to catch a whale.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but this was not a sprat to catch a whale.

Mr. TUCKER: For all the benefit it did agriculture, it was.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Rosthern must excuse me if I decline to enter into a controversial discussion with him, because I am going to continue my observations on the basis I commenced them. But I shall have much pleasure in entering into that phase of the matter on another occasion.

Let us proceed farther. Is it right to suggest that the Canadian manufacturer should have the major part of the market in this country on condition (a) that his quality is right and (b) that his price is fair? The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) agrees with that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): I agree if the price is right.

Mr. BENNETT: I followed the hon. member, and I wish to be fair. He has said that he agrees with that view if the price is right, and the quality is also right.

We now come to a consideration of these two factors. I have already dealt with quality; nothing further need be said about that. It is admitted by even the most censorious. I now proceed to the question of price. I have said that I have been forty years in western Canada. In civil life I was a member of the bar, a solicitor as well as a barrister, and I can recall that as a youth, when I went there first, in the old office I saw accounts sent from the United States by implement firms to collect from those who had shifted residence from the United States to Canada. I can remember, too, being struck by the notes signed for Deere and McCormick machinery, and things of that kind, and I frequently talked with them about the situation. I do not mind saying that I frequently talked with the representatives of the manufacturers because to me, coming from eastern Canada, it was a little difficult to understand just what these high interest rates meant—so much per cent per month, and matters of that sort. Well, I slowly learned what was involved, namely the tremendous losses sustained by the manufacturers. Just as they pointed out, these people had left their country and gone to another, taking with them their implements which were not paid for in full; and there were the difficulties that came about by reason of servicing, parts and matters of that kind, together with the many uncertainties connected with the business on account of uncertain crops.

But I saw a lessening of the conditions imposed in those notes. I remember that the late president of the Massey-Harris Company, Sir Lyman Jones, came to western Canada on one occasion to look over the various agencies of the company and discuss this very problem with them. He was most anxious that farmers should get their implements at the lowest possible price consistent with a fair return upon the capital. And I remember asking the present High Commissioner for Canada in London, Mr. Vincent Massey, who was president of the Massey-Harris Company, in order that I might make the statement publicly, whether or not the Massey-Harris Company had ever sold implements abroad for less than they were sold in this country. He made an investigation and assured me that I might say publicly, as I did on more than one occasion, that they had not charged for their implements abroad a lower price than they had charged in Canada. That was something I was anxious to know; I was proud to have him make that statement and, as I say, I repeated it publicly on many occasions.

What is a fair price? I wonder if we would think it fair to have someone say to us here that he thought fifty cents a bushel was a good price for the wheat of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I wonder if we would regard it as fair for someone to come to a professional man and attempt to fix his fee. I heard a story of one of the most eminent United States surgeons who, having operated upon a distinguished and rich patient, had a cheque sent to him for a very large sum of money. He sent it back; he said "Our patients do not fix our compensation." They may discuss it, but the charge is made by the man who has something to give or sell, or a service to render.

Although there is a permanent board to deal with these matters, it was suggested that a committee of the House of Commons should deal with this question. I ask my fellow Canadians, is that fair? Each of us, while exercising the utmost care in the world, cannot help being actuated by some political or personal concern. We are the representatives of parties, and unconsciously we find our minds warped or, shall I say, just a little given to supporting a particular view; and with that state of mind we have a committee that is going to investigate a situation or a condition and then make a recommendation as to the correctness or otherwise of these prices. Is that quite right? Is that quite fair? I pointed out that it was suggested in part of the report that the farmer was being exploited. I said I thought on reflection that one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke the other evening would hardly think his deskmate, Mr. Moore, who is a director of the Massey-Harris Company, was endeavouring to exploit anybody. From what the house knows of his interest in the farmers, does it think he is endeavouring to exploit them? Yet he is a director of this enterprise.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I wonder whether it is quite fair to refer to a member of this house by name, and put anyone who chooses to criticize a certain policy in the position of criticizing the personal qualifications of a member of the house? We have had the report of the textile commission which shows that a great many gentlemen who stand very high in the estimation of the people of this country have been guilty of exploitation. I do not want to accuse Mr. Moore of being guilty of exploitation.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the point of order?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has stated his point of order, and in my opinion it is not well taken.

Mr. BENNETT: I was about to state, Mr. Speaker, that I think what may be said with respect to one is equally true with respect to all who are charged as trustees with the maintenance of these industries.

Mr. TUCKER: The point of order was not stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I suggest on a point of order that there is a rule that nobody, not even the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), is permitted to refer to another member of this house by name. I submit that is a point of order which certainly can be raised

Mr. BENNETT: I had already thought of that very carefully, Mr. Speaker. I am now speaking of a gentleman in his capacity as a director, not as a member of this house. He is the member for Ontario.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was interrupted by you, Mr. Speaker, while stating my point of order; I was about to state it much more definitely. I do not think that even the leader of the opposition, with his long parliamentary experience and occupying the prominent position he does, has the right to transgress the rules of this house, as I think he is doing, by designating a member of the house by name. That was why I rose. I do not think he can very well refer to a member of the house in one capacity and in the next breath refer to him in another. It was for that reason I raised the point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have already given my ruling on the point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have very carefully thought of that question. I have here several names under the heading "directors";

G. W. Allan, K.C.	G. W. McLaughlin
J. S. Duncan	W. H. Moore
J. H. Gundy	F. K. Morrow
F. P. Jones	T. A. Russell, LL.D.
J. A. Kilpatrick	E. R. Wood, LL.D.
J. F. Lash, K.C.

I shall overcome any difficulty that may be experienced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) by saying that I understand that the W. H. Moore whose name I have mentioned is the member of this house for Ontario, so all difficulty on that score will disappear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That complies with the rule; the other did not.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; that complies with the rule.

I desire to make it abundantly clear that I do not believe it is quite right to charge men with exploiting the farmers of the country unless there is some evidence to support that statement. I should be only too willing to uphold any remedy that might be offered for the purpose of preventing exploitation. But there is one test which is not unfair, I submit to hon. members; that is, the audited reports of the enterprises themselves. Whether or not enterprises have made profits is usually indicated by an auditor's report, and those reports do not indicate that for years these enterprises have made substantial profits, nor have they made any returns commensurate with the capital employed.

It was suggested—and I want to get away from that—that the capital structures were not all that they might be. Well, at least they were capital structures that were authorized by the laws of the country, and so far as I have been able to ascertain upon inquiry it has not been charged that there was any water in the capital stock of these enterprises, either the common or the preferred stock. The change took place from what is called a par value stock to a no par value stock. The change of the unit was a change to which I am personally opposed. I have been steadily opposed to the idea that no par value stock is a sound way to deal with capital structure. But that has nothing to do with the matter; the law authorizes it. As my colleague, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), pointed out in this chamber some years ago, it would be impossible to change that now, because of the number of enterprises that have shares of no par value, without doing great violence to the whole theory upon which company business is transacted in Canada. That phase is not one that arises here because it is not said, as far as I can see, and so far as the evidence taken is concerned, that there has been a watering of the stock of the enterprise. The change of the unit from a par value stock to a no par value stock may produce, as I sometimes think it does, an erroneous impression in the minds of individuals, but it certainly does not have the effect of watering the stock of the enterprise. That is a matter which I think is sometimes overlooked.

What other question have we that has to do with the fairness of the prices charged? The fairness of the price charged for any commodity is reflected largely by the extent to which the commodity is sold. Let me give an illustration. If you have a limited unit of production your overhead is correspondingly high with respect to (a) taxes, (b) interest on borrowed money, and (c) interest on your fixed obligations—your bond interest and matters of that kind; it has nothing to do with dividends. That can be overcome only in one way; that is by increasing your volume of production, thereby lessening your unit cost. I am going to make in a moment the declaration which I think should be made, that a high duty, or a duty that some hon. members would call high in view of the discussion that has taken place in the house, would have the effect of lessening prices. I am going to do more; I am going to show that this is exactly what did happen in this country, and I am going to give the reason why.

If your units run to only one thousand, and your overhead is one thousand, then you have one dollar per unit of fixed charges, and the wheels go round without added cost as the number of your units increases, except for the small cost that is incident to production itself. The moment you increase your production, you lessen the unit charge for taxes, interest on borrowed money, interest on your bonds. If, when you are producing but one thousand units, these three things amounted to $500, you have to add fifty cents to the cost of each unit; but if you increase your production to five thousand, then only ten cents must be added. There is the position. If we are going to get cheap articles in Canada we must do everything within our power to increase the volume of production, which means what I started out with, namely, to as great an extent as possible we should give the Canadian market to the Canadian producer, price and quality being comparable.

Why have we had from time to time to maintain in this country duties that some people think unreasonable? The reason is that it was the only method by which we could secure that mass production without which there can be no cheapening of the price of the commodity. Labour costs in Canada and the United States are comparable. I go to the United States and look at a factory there. Then I go to Australia. I went through a factory in Australia with great care. I look at the factory there; I find the number of units a year that are produced of mowing machines, binders, rakes, or whatever it may be, and I know then what the cost per unit must be to meet interest on borrowed money, taxes and everything of that sort.

We have at this moment a fifteen per cent corporation tax, which is a higher figure than it was in 1930. That tax must be borne by the manufacturer, and he passes it on, of course, to the ultimate consumer, which means the division of the sum total of that tax by the number of units he produces. If the number of units produced is small, the tax is high. The producer may borrow money to expand his business, and if the interest on that borrowed money is divided by only a small number of units, it means that the cost of interest on borrowed money per unit is high. But as you increase the number of units produced, the interest cost is lessened.

Take a bond issue. It is true that some of these implement companies have not been able to meet their bond interest, and they have asked the holders of the bonds to agree to lessen the interest charges over a period of years in order that they may be able to get on their feet. Leaving aside politics for the moment, how would you meet the situation as a man of business? You have a cement mill. Its capacity is five thousand barrels, and you are producing two thousand barrels a day. What will you do? You will do everything in your power to drive that up to five thousand barrels in order to reduce the cost of cement to the consumer, because the fixed charges are passed on to the consumer before profit has to be considered. Now look at the taxes. There is income tax, fifteen per cent; that is the corporate tax. Then there is the provincial tax, if you are in Ontario.

Mr. DUNNING: That is after cost of production.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that is included in the cost of production.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me; it is. When the Minister of Finance says that fixed charges are not included in the cost—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that. Income tax is on earnings, after the cost of production has been met.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely, but the manufacturer has to make allowance for these taxes in fixing the price at which he is to sell if he is to make a profit. Does anyone suggest that when I go to sell my goods I have not to consider the tax I have to pay on my earnings?

Mr. DUNNING: Income tax is in a different class from the other taxes.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a tax on profits that are shown. If no profit is shown, no one need be concerned; but if he makes a profit, the state taxes him fifteen per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Fifteen per cent of the profit, which is determined after production costs.

Mr. BENNETT: I include that as part of the selling price if he is going to make a profit. We have the same view, but the minister desires to express it in another way. I am not going to get into a partisan discussion. I put it to you: As a matter of business what would you do? Suppose you were an executive, a member of a board of directors; suppose you had your own business; what would you do?

Mr. TUCKER: I would not raise prices. I would sell less goods if I raised prices.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member would not raise prices, then he would continue to have a loss and he would be bankrupt at an early date. Surely the hon. member realizes that if you continue to sell for less than your cost of production you are going to be bankrupt at an early date.

Mr. TUCKER: Are they selling at lower prices than in 1932 when costs were higher than now?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am just coming to that; it brings me to the point I am going to make. In 1930-31 we had occasion to consider this very matter. I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, that no matter had given me more concern as an individual or as a public man than the question of the cost of various commodities in this dominion, and I believed that if I could give the market of Canada—I said it standing in the Prime Minister's place over there—to the Canadian producer, I would increase his volume to such an extent that his unit costs would be less and he would be able to sell his goods cheaper. I took from the Canadian manufacturers a letter saying they would not raise their prices if this protection were given to them, not for exploitation, but that they might have this market and decrease their unit costs.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the leader of the opposition permit a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): May I ask if the International Harvester Company of Canada, which is one of the largest manufacturers of the article under discussion to-day, signed a letter to that effect?

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is, No. But they did not raise prices.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): They had no market. They were wise.

Mr. BENNETT: Had they not? Well, we shall not discuss that phase of the matter. This is not for the moment a partisan discussion. How are you going to deal with that situation? How are you going to secure to the Canadian producer, manufacturer, the home market to the greatest possible extent and not permit him to raise prices? First, we got him to sign that he would not do so. Ah, but you say, you cannot rely on that. We always become very doubting when we have to deal with that phase of the matter. But if hon. members will turn to chapter 30 of the statutes of 1931, they will see in section 17 how it was dealt with. It is referred to by Mr. Justice Turgeon in the textile report. Let us read it:

17. (1) In the event of producers of goods taking advantage of any duty imposed under this act to increase the price of such goods to the consumer, or using any such duty to maintain prices at levels deemed by the governor in council to be higher than should prevail, having regard to general economic conditions in the country, the governor in council may reduce or remove such duty.

(2) In the event of any one such producer violating the provisions of this section, the governor in council may impose upon all the

Provided, that neither subsection of this section shall apply to agricultural products.

There was the condition to which we were directing our attention. There is the remedy suggested. It divides itself into two phases. One relates to the individual who gets out of line, pays no attention to anything, but just raises his prices for his own purposes, having regard to his geographical location or some other such cause. What do we do? We impose an excise tax equal to the customs tax. Then there is the class as a whole, the agricultural implement producers as a whole. We say to them that if they do this, then we remove the duty altogether. What is more—

Mr. TUCKER: Did the right hon. gentleman do it in regard to textiles?

Mr. BENNETT: We did it with respect to glass, and we increased the tariff on textiles so as to give them the home market in this country. We did more; before we left office we took off, with respect to the British Empire, part of the specific duty and also, as perhaps the hon. gentleman will remember, the excise tax.

Mr. TUCKER: Were they not exploiting the people of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: The evidence was quite the opposite. But that has nothing to do with the matter at the moment.

Let us go a step further. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) said the other afternoon that the implement tariff of 25 per cent imposed in 1930 was the highest tariff that we have had in this country. It was. It was put into effect purposely. It was done for one purpose and one only—to secure the home market to the Canadian producer. I am not putting that forward as a partisan matter. It was intended to do that very thing; it did it, and what was the result? Notwithstanding the fact that we had drought and other bad conditions, there was a lowering of prices in this dominion. There was the effect, and it was logical. How could it be anything else? You have reduced your unit costs because you have given the manufacturer an expanding volume of business, and of course he is able to reduce his price. I have not any doubt in the world that if the agricultural implement producers in this country had a 17½ per cent tariff they could reduce their prices, and I have not any doubt that they would do it.

Mr. TUCKER: They are producing more units now than they were doing in 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER: Then why, on the right hon. gentleman's argument, are they increasing prices?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is perfectly clear. In 1932 we fixed the price on the basis of 1930. At the present time we have increased costs of raw material and labour, which were not a factor at that time. The undertaking, it will be remembered, was with respect to other factors than raw material. But could we get away from merely partisan thought about this, and just ask ourselves the question whether as business men sitting with a board of directors we would not agree that if we had a market of 10,000 units as compared with a market of one, we could lessen our price? What would we do? I ask my hon. friend who moved this motion, What would he do?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): I would say this to the right hon. gentleman. Everyone, I am sure, will appreciate that the matter of volume is a factor. But with regard to the farm implement people, during the last two years their volume has increased materially, and yet during that period we have had two increases in prices.

Mr. GARDINER: And raw material is down.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a very simple matter. From 1930 to 1935 the increase in volume was negligible. In other words, there never was a fair opportunity to try out the effect of this legislation, because of the drought in western Canada and the severe losses that were experienced there. I put to this house and to my fellow Canadians, forgetting their politics, just this question: Would any one of you, sitting at the head of the table with a board of directors, not say "If I could make my business 5,000 units I could reduce the price per unit as against it only being one or two"? My hon. friend who moves the motion says that is so. All right. Then let us give them the chance.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): What are you going to do on the other hand when, instead of reducing the price, an industry increases the price when there has been an increase in volume?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to that is that you have increased external competition by reducing the tariff to 7½ per cent. That is the real reason.

Mr. TUCKER: They are now selling more at higher prices, so that does not hurt them.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is not the argument. If my hon. friend the member for Rosthern were engaged in industrial activity, and were consulted by someone who told him that he was making no money and that he found himself unable to continue to operate at all unless he sold more than a thousand units in his business, the hon. member for Rosthern would advise him that the one thing to do was to increase his volume, and by increasing his volume lessen his unit costs.

Mr. TUCKER: Not if he were selling six million abroad and two million at home.

Mr. BENNETT: The real difficulty is that you could not do it.

Mr. TUCKER: That is what we are doing now.

Mr. BENNETT: Do you know what we are doing? Again, I am not going to be drawn away from what I shall designate as purely a little business talk to my friends here, and not a political discussion at all. I put it once more to the house whether or not the net result of increasing the volume is not to reduce the unit cost if you give the opportunity for the increased volume to be sold here. That is all. I have gone into this matter at great length because I want to make perfectly clear the purpose of the legislation that placed a high duty, the highest this country has known, upon agricultural implements. It was done, as I said when standing in the Prime Minister's place over there, for the purpose of giving Canadian producers the market; and it was done with two conditions, one affecting the individual and the other the industry. We made it possible that they could become effective if the situation prevailed for which they provided a remedy. It did in the case of glass, and action was taken immediately by the governor in council. What is more; there was one complaint which I recall with regard to prices, and on investigation it turned out that it had reference to raw material and nothing else. Every time any question arose where it was suggested that there should not be an increase in price, we investigated.

How can we hope to maintain this industry unless we can give it a market? I am not unmindful of the fact that one of these companies has a business in Germany, a factory in France, a couple of factories in the United States, an interest in the Sunshine works in Australia, and works at Brantford and Toronto; but they are not manufacturing abroad solely to sell here, and the prices of their competitors, if they were able to sell their surplus goods in this country, with our limited production as against their mass production, would be lower than ours, and they would put us out of business. We would fail. That is all there is about it. It is the 125,000,000 beside us as against 11,000,000 here that must be considered; it is the unit cost of mass production as against the unit cost of our limited production.

Take cream separators, to which reference has been made. Do we want a cream separator industry in Canada or not? The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Duffus) says, "Yes, we need it"; the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr McCann) says so too. Well, if we want this industry we ought to give it a fair opportunity with competition from abroad. May I point out—and it is one of the reasons I rose in my place—that in 1932, when we negotiated the British preference, we asked the British people, when the preference was given, whether or not they could undertake to provide us with cream separators in addition to what we ourselves were producing. The firm of Lister and Company had been providing cream separators for a long time in New Zealand; they supplied half the requirements there—and in New Zealand they make as good butter as anywhere else. The British government took over the plant when the war broke out, and because of that, the United Kingdom shipped to Canada only two separators in 1932. In 1933 there were shipped 535; in 1934, 956; in 1935, 1,355; in 1936, 1,994; in 1937, 3,163. We gave the preference to those producers who were well established in this country and they added to what we ourselves were doing. We believed that it was desirable to maintain the industry, a belief which is indicated by the addresses in this house, and we therefore passed the legislation to which I have directed attention. Is it desirable to do away with that British preference, to deny to this old and established house the preference we gave them in 1932 and for which they paid handsomely? As the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) has made clear in the house, they gave ample compensation for it, and established for our products in their markets a position which more than balanced what we did for them.

As I have pointed out, unless we are prepared to take such action as may be necessary to ensure that volume can be maintained in Canada we are bound to increase unit costs; and an increase in unit costs means that, without a duty or with a nominal duty, an unfair opportunity will be afforded the country with mass production to compete against us, with our production on a limited scale and with a population of 11,000,000, especially having regard to the fact that over half of our population now find homes in cities and towns rather than in the rural sections as heretofore.

There are other matters to which reference has been made. There is the effect upon our country's economic structure, not with respect to income tax alone but with respect to municipal taxes, provincial taxes, taxes on individuals, and the question of employment, direct and indirect. When I went into the factory in Australia I saw at once that coal was being used in large quantities, and so was coke. That gave employment to the coal mines at Newcastle. I saw at once that there were workmen engaged with wood, and I knew that meant work in the forest and everything connected with the fabrication of wood. I saw steel, and I knew that steel had been manufactured at the plant I had seen a few days before at Newcastle, just as in this country pig iron and steel in Canadian factories gives employment to men in Cape Breton or Hamilton or at the Sault. I realized that all these things combined to create the interdependence of industry, the relationship between the production of the raw material and the production of the manufactured article in its finished form. We must be prepared as men of business to deal with this matter in a purely business way and to provide, not protection for exploitation, but that measure of protection which will ensure equality of opportunity to Canadians with our limited market, in order that they may compete against the mass production of other countries, and that can be brought about only by the methods to which I have directed attention. I suggest that this report, if acted upon, will strike a blow at industry, will increase unemployment, and will render it far more difficult for the government to deal with the complex and difficult problems with which it is faced.

I yield to no man in the desire for cheap agricultural implements for the men who toil on the soil. I have studied this question since I first went to western Canada, and I have no doubt that if the house were prepared, with the legislation which is now on the statute books, to increase unit production in Canada to a point where we might be able with certainty to contemplate a market for Canadian production on the conditions that I have outlined, we would be able to reduce prices materially, because the unit cost would have been reduced strictly in accordance with increase in volume—and the volume here is so small, with 11,000,000, so insignificant compared with 125,000,000, in the manufacture of machines for use in the cotton fields in the south and in the wheat fields of the north, for use with vegetables and corn, with every kind of production of the farmer, as they are in that great republic, and with unit costs continually being reduced by mass production. What it is proposed to do, as suggested by the hon. member who moved the adoption of this report, would result in lessening the unit production by reason of increased competition for the moment by those engaged in mass production on a scale of which the world has never seen the like.

Let me refer again to what Mr. Fielding said in this house as Minister of Finance when he pointed out the dangers of a people finding their factories closed by competition from abroad. He said: "You will get cheaper goods for the time being, much cheaper; but in the end, when your factories are gone, when your mills are closed, when your countrymen are unemployed, the price will be the price that the monopolist fixes; and you will have no control over him, because you cannot get your Canadians to start again." If any hon. member is interested in reading the history of tariff legislation, he will find in the library many books upon the subject. If the principle my hon. friend contends for had been applied, you would not have what you have in this country to-day, namely, the production of Canadian steel rails for our railways. When I first went west I travelled on rails manufactured in the United Kingdom and in Germany. They bore the mark of Krupp or Barrow and other names. My inquiries—and this is subject to correction—lead me to believe that there is not now a rail on the main line of the Canadian Pacific between Montreal and Vancouver which was not made in Canada. I also believe, although upon this too I speak subject to correction, that the same is true with respect to the Canadian National Railways. Is that not a striking illustration of what I say? We gave them the entire volume of Canadian business. Yet forty years ago practically no rails were produced in Canada.

For that reason I have endeavoured not to enter into a controversy with those who have spoken before me on this question; there will be ample opportunity to controvert what I regard as some mistaken statements which have been made. But I appeal to them to ask themselves whether or not it is doing a service to this country to create an impression which

I say, with great deference, I believe is unwarranted, failing to realize that 11,000,000 people, if they are going to continue and maintain their integrity as a nation, must be prepared to see to it by adequate safeguards that they secure for their own manufacturers the largest possible volume of business that the country affords.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. R. EVANS (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the house is now considering the report of the committee on agricultural implements, a report which is of great importance to the farmers of Canada and one which has far-reaching effects. The committee should be congratulated upon the thorough and complete report it has presented to parliament for concurrence.

It is a well known fact that the price of farm implements is a vital factor in costs of production. If one takes into consideration the fact that in Canada to-day there are about 728,000 individual farmers who are purchasers and users of farm machinery, he can readily understand how an increase in the price of these commodities must have an effect upon the earnings and livelihood of about one-half of the population.

The other evening in his speech the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) proved beyond doubt that the implement companies were not justified in increasing their prices in 1936 and 1938. During the course of his speech the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) gave a comparative statement between bushels of wheat or pounds of live stock and farm machinery from 1913 to 1926. These figures in themselves show that it is impossible for a farmer to carry on and still pay the exorbitant prices he is now asked to pay for farm machinery.

For a few moments I should like to confine my remarks to that section of the report having to do with distribution costs of farm implements. We find that the committee secured information from the reports of Canadian trade commissioners in the British Isles, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, the Argentine and continental Europe, outlining the system of distribution in each country. These varied with the type of country, business traditions, and the economic position of distributors and farmers. We find that in the United States the companies sell outright to the dealers. The dealer is furnished with a suggested price list but may himself determine the retail price actually charged the farmer or purchaser, while in Canada, with the exception of repairs, the dealer is furnished goods on consignment from the companies. The companies accept in settlement notes given by farmers in payment thereof. The Canadian dealer is also furnished with a set price list which he must charge his customer for the different types of implements purchased or sold.

It would appear from the findings of the committee that the four major implement companies doing business in Canada have a monopoly of and control the price on all farm machinery. Dealing generally with the cost of distribution we find that the percentage of net sales in the different companies doing business in this country varies greatly, and appears to be exceedingly high. If we take the ten year period prior to 1935, and base our figures on the net sales in Canada, we find that the International Harvester Company showed a distribution cost of 22·13 per cent of net sales; the Massey-Harris Company, 33·46 per cent, John Deere & Company, 22·57 per cent, and the Cockshutt Plow and associate companies, 20·36 per cent, making an average for all companies of 24·47 per cent, or almost 25 per cent of net sales. That amount is used up in distribution expenses.

There is another factor entering into the distribution costs which directly affects the western farmer. I refer to freight rates and carrying charges. In 1898 the dominion government, recognizing the great disadvantage suffered by settlers in certain portions of western Canada, entered into the Crowsnest pass agreement with the Canadian Pacific railway, whereby the government paid the railway company $3,400,000 and, under the terms of the agreement, the railway agreed that the rates on certain commodities eastbound and westbound should never exceed a certain fixed amount. One of the commodities included in the agreement was farm implements. These fixed rates were enjoyed by the people of western Canada until 1919, when the union government on application from the railway suspended the Crowsnest pass agreement rates for a three year period. In 1922 these rates were partly restored, but only on wheat and wheat products moving eastward from western Canada. Farm implements were not included in the new schedule.

The following table of freight rates on farm implements will show to what extent the farmers of western Canada have been penalized by the increased freight rates on implements of production. The following is a table of rates on agricultural implements, taking the sixth class rate in cents per 100 pounds:

Toronto to:	Crowsnest rates 1898 cents	Present rate per 100 pounds cents	Increase per 100 pounds cents
Winnipeg. . .	68·5	82·5	14
Regina. . . .	97	128	31
Saskatoon. . .	116·5	139·5	23
Calgary. . . .	125·5	166·5	41

It will be noted that there is a substantial increase over the Crowsnest pass agreement rate, which is a factor entering into the cost of the delivered implement to the western farmer.

As a startling example of the increase in freight charges, to move a binder from Toronto to Regina by carload lot cost $17.80 in 1913, while in 1936 the freight charges on a binder weighing only thirty pounds more were $23.42, or an increase on this one implement of $7.62.

In the course of this debate we have heard a great deal from hon. members representing industrial ridings as to the great services given by the implement manufacturing companies to the farmers of western Canada. We have also heard a great deal about unity, and working together in cooperation. In his speech the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, (Mr. McNevin) said that repairs were purchased when farmers were hard up and trying to get along as cheaply as possible. That is the position of the farmers in western Canada this spring.

I hold in my hand a telegram received from the secretary of the board of trade at Climax, a point in the southern portion of my constituency. I should like to read the telegram to the house to show how well the implement companies are cooperating with the western farmers this year in helping them to put in their crop. This telegram, which is from Climax, dated May 2, and addressed to myself, reads as follows:

> Local implement agents report increase 15 per cent all repairs including these in stock here effective February 7. Companies also refusing to honour repair orders. Local dealers unable to finance. This board urge brought attention of government. Consider price increase unjustified.
> Climax Board of Trade,
> S. Stevens, Secretary.

A short time ago in this house we voted a guarantee of $14,600,000 to enable the farmers of western Canada to seed a crop this year. This money was disbursed through the municipalities, and under that guarantee orders were issued to the implement companies; but, as will be seen by this telegram, the implement companies refused to accept these orders, payment of which is guaranteed by the provincial and federal governments. I also have here copy of an invoice which I received from one of my constituents at Ponteix, Saskatchewan. He sent me this invoice last year when the implement committee was in session, together with a letter asking me to bring it to the attention of the committee, but it arrived too late for that. However, again this year he wrote saying that he had to buy the same repairs, which were two iron washers used on a one-way disc, for use in between the discs. They are just cast iron, weighing about 7½ pounds. Last year these two washers cost him $4.50 at Ponteix; this year, after the increase, they cost $5.20. This is the way in which the implement companies are cooperating; this is the excellent service about which we hear so much, to the farmers of Canada, especially the farmers of western Canada, during this trying time when they are doing their best to put in a crop with perhaps the greatest hope of securing a harvest that they have had for the past seven or eight years.

We have also heard a good deal of talk from our hon. friends opposite to the effect that the lowering of tariffs destroys industry and causes unemployment. To dispose of this fallacy I should like to place on record the following statement taken from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of December 28, 1937:

> Up to April 15, 1926, the tariff duty on all classes of automobiles entering Canada was 35 per cent. On that date it was lowered to 20 per cent on trucks and cars up to a value of $1,200. On cars over $1,200 it was lowered only to 27½ per cent.
> In 1925 there were 161,970 cars produced in Canada. In April, 1926, tariff was lowered. In 1926 production amounted to 204,727; in 1927 it was 179,054; in 1928 it was 242,054; in 1929 it was 262,625; in 1930 it was 153,372. In that year depression began to take full effect and thereafter was the determining factor.
> But certainly the lower tariff in 1926 was followed by a tremendous increase in production instead of the decrease forecast. Is there any reason to suppose the result would be different now?
> Incidentally, the increased production in 1926 over 1925 was 42,957 cars and the increase in employment in automobile factories was 1,604. At that rate, adding 20,000 cars to production now would employ something like 800 additional persons.
> The gains in production which might be made through higher tariffs are trivial. The gains in employment would be even more trivial. And the industry will have extreme difficulty in convincing Canadians that behind higher tariffs prices will be lower. That will be an utterly new experience for this country.

There is no doubt in my mind that what worked out so favourably in the motor car industry will likewise apply to the farm implement industry.

In conclusion, I would say that the farmers of Canada look to this government to help remedy the evil of high prices. Might I suggest, sir, the abolition of all tariffs on farm implements and cream separators and the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement of 1898.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, to one without party prejudice—and I think I can claim that—listening to this discussion there comes a sense of bewilderment and frustration. Here we have had about three or four different points of view expressed; one declares that you must have higher tariff, another that you must keep tariffs where they are, another that tariffs must be lowered and still another that there should be no tariffs at all. In the midst of it the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) rises in his place and gives a very fine, straightforward talk. If we could only be sure that the Minister of Agriculture had the disposition, in the first place—which I rather think he has—and the power, in the second place, to do what he implied in his speech he would do, probably we could breathe more easily; but I am inclined to be afraid that about all we will get out of this situation will be more compromise.

Compromise is a very fine thing, Mr. Speaker, providing one individual does not have to do all the compromising. What has been happening for the last forty years in western Canada, and, I fancy, in other parts of Canada as well where there is agriculture, is this: If you can imagine the agricultural interests starting at one end of a line and industry starting at the other, each of them entitled to fifty per cent of the line, probably there was a time when people tried to give each group the fifty per cent of the line to which it was entitled. But gradually the secondary producers have been claiming sixty, sixty-five, sixty-six, seventy, seventy-five and eighty per cent of the line, while the farmers have been continually pressing for at least fifty per cent. Now, with industry calling for eighty per cent of the line and the farmers claiming fifty per cent, it is not difficult to see about where the compromise is going to fall. Unless something is done very quickly the farmers are going to be "compromised" right out of the picture; that is actually happening at the present time to a very dangerous degree.

I think in what I have to say I shall follow the general outline adopted by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I thought he made a very fine address just before six o'clock, and I am sure he will be quite pleased to consider the problems of the farmers under exactly the same headings that he used. His first question was something like this: Is it desirable to have an agricultural implement industry in Canada? I am going to grant that it is desirable, but I am going to ask this counter-question: Is it desirable that we should have an agricultural industry in Canada? Just as the right hon. leader of the opposition concluded that everyone would answer yes to his question, so I assume that everyone will certainly answer to mine, Yes it is desirable that Canada should have an agricultural industry. Let us start as members of this parliament on that basis: It is desirable that Canada should have an agricultural industry now and in the future. There are several reasons why that is so. I think it is not necessary to stress them before this house, but it might be well to mention just a few.

In the first place, all secondary industries must recognize that without the farmers their prosperity would be greatly hampered, so that to be able to keep the goose laying the golden eggs it is important that we give the goose at least enough feed to keep her alive. But that is not all. While there is a great tendency for people to move from the country into the city—and that we will all grant—still when they get into the city they must be fed, and they are fed largely from the farm. All the fine observations which the right hon. leader of the opposition made this afternoon were perfectly sound, and I do not question them for one minute. But if in time of national emergency we should find ourselves in an extremely embarrassing position without secondary industries, how much more grievous would be our position if we should find ourselves with a seriously depleted agricultural industry? And that is becoming at the present time not only a possibility but a probability.

While we must be able to find food for the teeming thousands who are increasing in numbers in our cities, yet more and more we must look to a more suitable way of feeding all our people. We in Canada are not commencing to consume the agricultural products which our population should consume. I was much surprised at some facts I found bearing on this question which I am now going to submit to the house, and I think hon. members will find them interesting:

An inquiry instituted in the United States and worked out by dietetic experts and agronomists in the United States Department of Agriculture revealed, with respect to agricultural production, that if every person in the United States could have a thoroughly adequate diet, it would be necessary to bring under cultivation 40,889,000 acres more than were under cultivation in 1933, or 22,391,000 more than the average under cultivation for the five years, 1928-32. The details of the increased production over the average for 1928-32 that would be necessary, are illuminating; they include: An increase of 76 per cent in dairy cattle; 43 per cent in beef cattle; 68 per cent in veal calves; 22 per cent in hogs; 42 per cent in sheep and lambs; 36 per cent in poultry. It would be necessary to increase the acreage under vegetables by 204 per cent; under citrus fruits and grapes 112 per cent—

That item, of course, would not apply to Canada:

—and under small fruits 282 per cent. True, the acreage under wheat in this dietetic plan would be reduced 57 per cent, but that would simply remove the United States completely out of the international market.

Lest it be assumed that the cost of this diet is extremely extravagant we add that it amounts to $12.75 per week for a family of five, statisticians of the United States say that only 21 per cent of the people can afford that amount of food.

I am much afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the conditions obtaining in the United States obtain in equal degree in the Dominion of Canada, and that probably only twenty-one per cent of the population of Canada can afford to have what they need of the agricultural products which we in this country are equipped to produce in profuse abundance. But we are adopting from year to year policies which I am convinced are depleting our agricultural productive power. The statement may sound extreme, but all you need to do to realize its truth is just to travel through our great agricultural areas, where you cannot fail to be impressed by the tremendous number of farms that have been deserted. Why have they been deserted? Last year I had the privilege of travelling through a large part of the splendid province of British Columbia, and I was astounded at the number of fertile fruit farms that were standing idle. I was told by people who knew, that it would not pay even to trim the fruit trees. Why? "No sale," they said; "what's the use?"

What are we doing in Canada? We are destroying those fruit-producing areas as surely as I stand here. "Well," some people may say, "what can we do about it?" Well, we are the government of Canada. Perhaps no more needs to be said.

If the United States needs to increase her ability to consume agricultural products, then surely we need to, as well. But the all important thing, as I see it, before we learn how to enable our people to consume these products, is to see to it that we do not destroy our ability to produce them, so that we shall have them to consume when we learn how to do so. This is a far more serious matter than I fear the average individual in this country realizes. In the report of the nineteenth session of the International Labour Conference will be found this statement:

The cares of the American, Argentinian, Australian, Canadian or eastern European farmer would be conjured away if the urban populations of Europe and America could eat even a little more bread, butter and meat per head.

We are worrying about overproduction on our farms. There is a suggested solution, although up to the present time, strangely enough, though I have listened with great care, I have not heard advanced in this long debate, which has continued ever since the early part of March, a single constructive idea as to how we can enable our people to consume more except the suggestion from the Conservative party that if you put up a sufficiently high tariff wall you will enable your producers to get the home market. I grant that there may be some virtue in that suggestion. I shall not discuss it at all now, except to say that the most remarkable thing about it is that if that is the solution, it is strange that our people have been fighting over the question for all these generations and have not yet been able to come to a satisfactory decision about it. That is dismaying! If we must continue through another series of generations before we can decide which of these two policies is the better for Canada, what is going to happen to Canada in the meantime?

Is it desirable that Canada should have an agricultural industry? I have dealt with that from two standpoints. There is a third one. Three provinces of this dominion are primarily agricultural provinces. If we destroy the agricultural industry of this dominion, indisputably we destroy those three provinces. I think that can be said with complete confidence. I know it is not clear to a great many people—it would not have been clear to me if I had not gone into the subject with some care; I should still have thought just as an ordinary citizen—yet the policies in operation to-day are destroying those three provinces economically.

Suppose we grant for the sake of argument and progress that it is desirable to have an agricultural industry in Canada; then I should like to follow the two lines of argument which were pursued by the right hon. leader of the opposition. If they apply to the secondary industries they must apply with equal force to the primary industry of agriculture. His first statement, as I recall it, was that the quality of the product should be of the best. If there is anything which has desolated my feelings during the last seven or eight years it has been to see, in travelling through the splendid agricultural regions of my home province, to what an alarming degree the quality of production has been falling. I was raised on a farm; my roots are right in the soil, and I know whereof I speak. Where, as recently as 1928, we found it profitable to keep up our fine breeds of cattle, both milking and beef breeds, of swine and poultry and sheep, we no longer find it profitable. It now appears not economically sound to spend the amount of money on breeding stock which years ago we expended, for the reason that there is not a sufficient margin to make it pay. The result is that all over the agricultural areas of this country, at least in the three western provinces, people in general are unable to keep up the standard of quality, although there are exceptions. Generally speaking, the products of the cattle, sheep, horse, swine and poultry producing plants are depreciating rapidly, largely because the owners cannot replenish their breeding stock. That is a serious matter. Furthermore, the equipment is deteriorating. It is a rare experience to pass a farm where they have been able to paint the buildings. All over Canada, I find, it is an uncommon thing to see a farm where a new home or a new barn has been erected. As the hon. member who spoke a few minutes ago said, the farmers generally speaking are "getting by" by every means they can contrive with old machinery which should have been discarded years ago. What does that mean? It means that if we should be plunged into a national calamity comparable with the one which overtook us in 1914, it would be impossible for a considerable length of time for us to reach a parallel degree of production. I believe there can be no satisfying answer to that statement. We are not keeping up the quality.

Then, on a great many farms the land has been allowed to become weedy. Why? Because the farmers are not as good as they were? No; because they simply cannot afford to cultivate the land as they feel it should be cultivated. In many places fertility is decreasing because the farmers are unable to provide fertilizers; they cannot apply the crop rotations which should be employed in order to preserve the land; in many instances they are unable to adopt farming methods which will preserve the soil. So to a disquieting degree we are failing to keep up our quality. I am familiar with the exceptions. There will be in a given area three or four, or perhaps five or six such, depending upon the size of the district; but the majority, the great body upon whom we should depend, are not able to stand up to the difficulties.

The next important statement which the leader of the opposition made, and which is perfectly sound, is that price must cover costs. I believe hon. members who have been indulgent enough to listen to the remarks of our group have realized that over and over again we have stressed that your price must cover your costs. In laying down that principle the leader of the opposition was genuinely progressive in his economics. On that score let us examine the position of the agricultural industry. A farmer's costs are fixed. The leader of the opposition said that a manufacturer's costs are fixed. We will grant that. But few people realize that the farmer's costs are more inevitably fixed than those of the manufacturer. Let us examine them for a few moments. The farmer's handling charges must remain permanent. He has nothing to do with transportation charges. Out in the west an attempt has been made to enable trucks to replace other means of transportation; but, unbelievable as it may seem, there has been a most assiduous movement to impose such licence fees on the trucks as to hamper that means of reducing costs. The farmer's interest rates are also fixed, or were until certain provinces began to move in the matter. His taxes are fixed. The farmer carries in the main the provincial, municipal and also school taxes throughout vast rural areas, and from those charges there is no escape. Everything he buys has the price fixed, but not by him. It matters not how many members he sends to parliament: they lift their voices as men crying in the wilderness whom people indulgently and with patience abide, but concerning whom nobody ever thinks it necessary to do anything.

Consider the manufacturer of this binder of which hon. members have been speaking; does he depend upon supply and demand before he decides what his price is going to be? No; he knows in January what the price will be next August, and he manufactures the number of implements which he thinks will be demanded and can be sold. Contrast that with the situation which faces the farmer. I am not making any charges concerning what has happened in Canada, but this thing has generally occurred. Manufacturing industries have got together and have agreed upon a fixed price. This has been brought out time and again by speakers in this debate. I think it was elicited clearly in the investigation. Thus they formed a cartel and they fixed the price.

Now the tariff comes in to help them. Strangely enough, when a tariff question is to be decided, the men who can get close to the powers that be and make their influence felt are the men of wealth, the men who are concentrated. What chance have the farmers, scattered over thousands of miles? Again, their voices are as voices crying in the wilderness, they are scarcely listened to; the result is that the tariffs are set to suit the manufacturers. This painful truth cannot, I think, be questioned. All this debate that we have had during the last few days has tended to show the same thing. We are concerned earnestly about seeing that the Massey-Harris Company recovers its costs, but we are never worried about all the thousands of farmers whether they even survive or not.

It is commonly believed that there is a free market. Many people talk about free markets. I ask hon. members how much freedom there is in the market I have indicated, when these big concerns are able to get together and decide what the prices shall be. How can anyone call that a free market? Some hon. members have suggested in this debate that if we removed the tariff between Canada and the United States it would automatically bring down the prices of implements. I do not argue that; but I notice, from the figures I have of costs across the line, that they have similar troubles there. So, how much good it would do us to remove the tariff entirely, is a debatable matter. Competition among these men does not cut prices; it used to, but they have learned better now. One powerful man in my constituency told me in a conversation years before I was elected that big men do not fight each other. That statement I find has much more meaning than I thought it had when I first heard it. Big men cooperate. Contrast that situation with that of the farmer. The farmer's prices are not protected. If there is any protection it is meagre. I will grant that the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Macdonald) gave us a fine statement with regard to the amount of protection that farmers have. But when you compare the amount of protection that the farmers have on their prices with the protection these "infant industries" of ours have on theirs, you are impressed mainly by the disparity.

The farmer sells his goods in the open market and competition does have something to do with his prices; the law of supply and demand also undoubtedly has something to do with them. He has no way by which he can limit production and set a price, producing only what he is able to sell at a given figure. When his price begins to go down he does everything in his power to keep his business going and he increases production more and more, with the result that he only aggravates the situation for himself by producing tremendously more than is required, thereby bringing prices down still further. Contrast that with the situation confronting the manufacturer—and remember incidentally that this situation as a whole faces three provinces of this dominion—and then meditate what are the causes of Canada's "stresses and strains". How can the farmers live under such conditions?

There is another matter to which I should like to refer. The farmers' price fluctuates from day to day. Tens of thousands of farmers are virtually ruined because they are compelled by force of circumstances to sell when the prices are down, and they are mortified a few weeks afterwards to find that prices have gone up, which would have doubled their income from a hard year of toil. Someone else has the advantage; they have not. And usually that person is not in any of the three western provinces. I have not spoken very much for the farmers up to the present time, though my constituency is primarily agricultural. If I start talking about farmers' problems I am perfectly at home; the only reason I have not spoken about them before is that I am intent upon a solution rather than upon railing against their ills. When we in parliament have decided that these difficulties do exist, and when we have decided further, as I am sure we have, that something must be done, what do we now do but shrug helpless shoulders and wave helpless hands and say, "I am sure I don't know what to do". There must be a solution. Consequently I have not spoken very much about the inequities and the disabilities under which my constituency suffers. We know all about these. We fancy that the men whom we sent here in previous years told the house all about them.

Lest there should be some people who may be inclined to think that what I am saying is not completely justified—my statement with regard to the way in which the big interests are able to set prices—let me refer to three or four bits of evidence. Gardiner C. Means of Columbia university in 1935 issued a document which is called Industrial Prices and Their Inflexibility. In this he shows the way in which prices and production varied between 1929 and 1933. His figures are extremely illuminating. I am going to put the figures on Hansard and then talk about them for a few minutes, because, to a large degree, in these figures lies the cause of our woe in Alberta, as well as the woe in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. At least, here lies one of the causes of the trouble in connection with this very question we are now discussing.

There are two columns, "permanent drop in prices" and "permanent drop in production." The first item is agricultural implements, the very item we are discussing to-day. The permanent drop in prices was six per cent, which means that the lowest drop in the prices of agricultural implements in the United States between 1929 and 1933 was six per cent. Contrast that with what happened to farmers' products! Implement production was curtailed or limited or reduced to artificial scarcity eighty per cent. Let me give the table rapidly and stress the last one, which is agricultural production:

Price v. Production

	Permanent drop in prices	Permanent drop in production
Agriculture implements.	6	80
Motor vehicles.	16	80
Cement.	18	65
Iron and steel.	20	83
Auto tires.	33	70
Textile products.	45	30
Food products.	49	14
Leather.	50	20
Petroleum.	56	20
Agricultural commodities.	63	6

In other words, prices of agricultural commodities dropped sixty-three per cent, while farmers were able to limit or reduce production to the extent of only six per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Those figures all relate to the United States?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, but I have some that relate to Canada. In Canada, by the way, there was an increase in agricultural products instead of a decrease, but in the United States the decrease was due to the way in which they manipulated agriculture. The leader of the opposition said that if you raised the tariff and enabled industries to sell all their goods, or to get all the market, then automatically that would cause them to increase production to such a tremendous extent that factories would be able to sell more cheaply. There is soundness in what he says; but here is the other side of the picture, and it had considerable bearing in the United States with, I venture to say, repercussions in Canada.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The Statistical Year Book of 1935-36 of the world economic survey gives certain pertinent statements:

	Decline in Production per cent	Price per cent
United States.	46·2	29
Canada.	41·9	27
Germany.	46·7	28
United Kingdom.	16·5	7

These have to do with manufactured goods during the year 1932. Truths about agricultural production in various countries are set forth in the following quotation from The World Economic Survey, 1935-36:

> In the same period agricultural production maintained an increase of three per cent and agricultural prices declined as much as fifty-eight per cent in Canada, fifty-seven per cent in the United States, and forty-nine per cent in Argentina, while in European countries where governments intervened to shelter their farmers the decline was less; in Germany thirty-five per cent, and Italy thirty-seven per cent, and in Great Britain twenty-eight per cent.

The former figures had to do with secondary industry production. In every instance there was a limit to the production, while in the same period agricultural production showed an increase.

My soul longs for the time when I can see Canada somewhere in the lead of these countries which are doing something for their farmers, but I have not been able to see anything so far.

Mr. DUNNING: To what years do those figures relate?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The year 1932.

Mr. DUNNING: Why not get some recent figures?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would be extremely interesting to have those. They probably will come out.

Mr. DUNNING: They show a very great improvement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad to hear it, but we have not noticed it much out in the west.

The protection for agriculture is very meagre. If we are going to solve this problem about which we are talking, we must adopt some means designed to achieve the end which President Roosevelt apparently had in mind in his policies under the NRA and the AAA, the object being to bring primary producers' prices into line with secondary production prices. In Canada we have not given protection to our primary producers.

I have here a statement of an investigation conducted by the Edmonton chamber of commerce during the last year, which I shall read:

Alberta is handicapped frequently by a tendency under national tariff policy to facilitate the entry of agricultural products of other countries in return for concessions to Canadian manufactured goods.

This tendency is illustrated in the existing trade agreements with Australia and New Zealand, respectively, under which Canada reduced her duty on Australian and New Zealand butter in return for concessions by those two dominions on automobiles, rubber goods, newsprint, lumber, paper, fish and other manufactured goods. Similarly, under the agreement with New Zealand, the duty on mutton was reduced. The free entry of vegetable oils under the trade agreement with the United Kingdom already mentioned above is another illustration of this tendency. Moreover, the variation in duties on agricultural products of these kinds results in serious discouragement to the development of the production in Alberta of dairy and animal products, with a consequent obstacle to the diversification of farm production.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall conclude very quickly. The result of the whole thing is that we are simply not doing for agriculture what must be done if we are to maintain a sound economic structure in this dominion. What must we do? I suggest as palliatives, these, mainly drawn from the committee's report: Let us give our farmers protection. If the secondary industries must have protection, surely the farmers must have it also. We must be prepared to give subsidies perhaps. We must reduce the protection to secondary industries to an extent which at least will enable the farmers to live. We must make a great many freight rate adjustments in the interests of farmers, and see to it that there is a fair price for agricultural products as well as for the products of secondary industries.

Motion (Mr. Johnston, Lake Centre) agreed to, on division.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the first minister would not mind my asking him a question which he frequently used to ask when he was leader of the opposition. What is the progress of the trade negotiations with the United States of America? We would like to be advised—I think I quote his words—as to what the progress has been, and the present state of negotiations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): To which I may say, in reply to my right hon. friend: The progress up to the present is favourable.

Mr. STEWART: Favourable to whom?

CALGARY STRIKE

INVESTIGATION INTO PENALTY OF TWO DOLLARS A WEEK PER FAMILY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). On May 4 the Minister of Labour was asked a question with regard to a telegram received from Calgary respecting a strike in that city, stating that the city of Calgary is imposing a penalty of two dollars per week per family in order to break the strike. I should like to ask what investigation has been made. It is a serious situation, and one which needs clarifying.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I have no further information upon that matter, other than that which was brought to my attention before. The question is one of provincial and municipal administration, and has not been brought officially to the attention of the Department of Labour at Ottawa.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Does not the fact that the dominion contributes a certain amount of that expense make it a responsibility of the dominion?

UNEMPLOYMENT

VANCOUVER SITUATION RESPECTING CONCENTRATION OF SINGLE HOMELESS UNEMPLOYED MEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last a question was put by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) with respect to the position of single unemployed men formerly employed in the forestry conservation camps in British Columbia. I may reply that during the winter months of 1937 and 1938, under a dominion-provincial agreement with British Columbia, some 4,600 men were provided for under these forestry plans. They were paid at the rate of thirty cents an hour, with a deduction for board, and a portion of their pay was deferred and made payable to them after the termination of their service, by vouchers negotiable at the post office. I should mention that, during the same period, in addition to the forestry plan 300 men were given employment in British Columbia on farms. These special plans for dealing with the transient problem in western Canada during the winter months were terminated at the end of April. In dealing with this problem in British Columbia and in other provinces we have acted and are acting upon the basis of consultation and co-operation with the provincial governments.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of Bill No. 105, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to avail myself of this opportunity to deal with the statement made a few days ago by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in connection with this measure. I was called out of the house at the time he was speaking, and so I did not deal with his statement at that time.

As reported at page 2527 of Hansard for May 3, I said:

> The minister selected a very bad illustration indeed. The Fort Henry work was done under contract, and the contract was let by the provincial government. It is all very well for the minister to say that he asked the provincial government that there should be no discrimination. But the contractor, the Frid Construction Company if I remember aright, had as one of its officers, according to the letterhead I have, the president of the Kingston Liberal Association. And in answers to questions put upon the order paper, not one, two or three, but many of them, we have it indicated that men were given employment on the recommendation of that very man. Those were men who had no more claim upon employment than others unemployed. They were not selected by their names being taken out of a hat; they were not called; but this man sends a letter and on the strength of it we are told by the return filed in this house—not veiled insinuations of the leader of the opposition—that these men went down to Trenton and other places and were given their positions on the recommendation of that man.
> Mr. Rogers: At Trenton, does my right hon. friend say?
> Mr. Bennett: I think Trenton was one of the places.
> Mr. Rogers: But this was not relief work.
> Mr. Bennett: Oh, then there is a distinction between the two?
> Mr. Rogers: Certainly there is.

I said, "if I remember correctly,"; I did not have my papers with me. But I immediately got them when I went upstairs, and had I been in the house when the hon. member was speaking I would have at once answered his question. As reported at page 1846 of Hansard for March 30, 1938, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Clarke) asked whether Mr. Robinson was employed as a carpenter at the signal corps, Barriefield, under the Department of National Defence, and also on whose recommendation he was employed, together with two other questions. The answer was that he was employed on the recommendation of Mr. A. E. Stansbury.

The same hon. member asked a similar question with respect to Roy Graham, and the answer was "Mr. A. E. Stansbury." He asked the same question with respect to William Fowler, and the answer was "Recommended by Ontario Employment Agency."

The hon. member for Rosedale asked with respect to where this camp is located, and the answer was that it was situated in Frontenac-Addington. He asked a similar question with respect to Henry Bearance, and the answer was that it was on the recommendation of A. E. Stansbury. Then, there is a question at the top of page 1847 with respect to Mr. John Doyle, asked by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), and the answer was that it was on the recommendation of Mr. A. E. Stansbury; and the same with respect to Mr. Harold Johnston.

I said that I had in my hand what purported to be a letter head of the Liberal association, and while I was not sure as to who Mr. Stansbury was—and I am not—the letter head says: "Kingston Liberal Association, Bagot and Princess streets, Kingston; A. E. Stansbury, president; J. C. Reynolds, secretary; phone 2423."

Mr. ROGERS: But if my right hon. friend will permit, he said—

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that.

Mr. ROGERS: He said there was a connection with the Frid Construction Company.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and I am coming to that. I believe that the A. E. Stansbury whose name is at the top of that letter paper is the A. E. Stansbury who made the recommendations referred to in the extracts I have read from Hansard; and I said that if I remembered aright, it was the Frid Construction Company. As a matter of fact, there are three construction companies. There is the Frontenac Construction Company, that came into being in recent years, since this government took office, I am informed. There is the Campbell Construction Company, which came into being in recent years, and there is the Frid Construction Company. I was in error in stating that Mr. Stansbury was president of the Frid Construction Company, but I was not in error in stating that he has been directing employment with respect to the work at Fort Henry as well as in other places, including the work at Barriefield to which reference has been made in the questions which were asked, although those appointments had to do with more permanent positions. One of them we shall have occasion to discuss when the estimates are under consideration.

The other point that was made was that Mr. Stansbury was the president of the Frid Construction Company. That was entirely erroneous as I find by reference to the papers. I said, "if I remember aright," and I did not remember aright, because there were these three companies. Mr. Stansbury was not the president of the Frid Construction Company, and I do not know what his relations were with respect to either of the other two companies.

Mr. ROGERS: If I may ask, does my right hon. friend believe it is proper to make a statement of that kind upon the basis of faulty recollection; to have a statement of that kind go out and then have it corrected or denied some days afterwards? Should not these statements be made on the basis of facts?

Mr. BENNETT: It was a correct statement of what is occurring in Kingston and Frontenac with respect to employment. It is there conducted on the basis of politics, purely and simply; men are giving out jobs and using money paid in by the taxpayers, including myself, in order to give employment to one political class and no other. That is what is going on, and one of the men principally responsible for it is Mr. Stansbury, about whom we shall have something to say later when the estimates are under consideration. I do not think the hon. gentleman need have any fear about Mr. Stansbury being in any sense, shall I say, libelled or slandered, or that any false impression may be left with respect to him. That need not for one moment engage the hon. gentleman's sympathy or care or worry; I can assure him of that. I think I can say with all certainty from the investigations I have thus far made with respect to the appointments which have been made in connection with these companies that have complete control of these matters, that I have nothing to withdraw; and I say further that it is largely through the work of Mr. Stansbury and one other, whose name we shall mention at the appropriate time, that people who are not willing to subscribe to the tenets of the Liberal party as represented by their association were unable to get employment, although they had the same right to it, were just as decent people and had the same claim as Canadians upon employment provided by the money of the taxpayers as had the men whom I have mentioned. I desire to make that abundantly clear, and if there was an error with respect to the position which this gentleman occupies, I greatly regret having made that statement; but it was made with the qualification, "if my recollection is correct," and my recollection was not correct, as I immediately verified when I went to my room, and had the bill not been disposed of I would have made the statement when I returned to the chamber. The hon. gentleman said, very correctly, that he intended to mention it when I was here, but the opportunity did not arise either for him to make the statement or for me to make it before I was called out of the chamber; hence it is that I avail myself of this opportunity on the third reading of this bill, as the minister did when the bill was in committee to make the statement he did.

There is only one point I desire on the third reading of this bill to make abundantly clear. It is that we have reached a stage in this country where I believe common decency necessitates that men should not be compelled to yield such convictions as they may have or such views as they may entertain to a political organization for the purpose of securing employment provided by the money of the taxpayers. For that reason I said the observations of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other evening were splendid, and I repeat that it was a splendid statement to make. It indicated an earnest desire, I thought, to meet this situation; and if those to whom I have referred—and I say again that Mr. Stansbury, the president of the Liberal association, is one of the principal offenders in that regard—will be governed by the statement made by the Prime Minister that there will be more opportunity for those who have a just claim for employment to find it, and there will be less reason for complaint by the taxpayers that their money is being utilized for the purpose of providing employment only for those who may be politically opposed to them.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I should like to direct attention to some figures which the minister gave at the close of the discussion in committee on this bill. He was referring to the cost of administration, and he read certain figures indicating what that cost had been, according to his information. The figures that he gave struck me as being extraordinarily high, although I was not able to trust my memory for details as to what were the exact figures. My recollection was that for the first completed year administration for the relief camps cost in the neighbourhood of $80,000; the cost for the following year I thought was $100,000 to $120,000.

I obtained the first volume of the four which were tabled by the minister himself on March 16, 1937. It is called Final Report on the Unemployment Relief Scheme for the Care of Single Homeless Men, administered by the Department of National Defence, 1932-36. I find from this report that the administration, from the inception in October, 1932, to October 31, 1936, for the four years amounted to $489,665, which is rather less than half the figure mentioned by the minister, for one of the years.

Mr. ROGERS: What was that figure, if I might have it again?

Mr. STIRLING: It was $489,665. I challenged the accuracy of the figure when the minister gave it, and he replied, "That is the cost of the administration staff." So it is quite obvious that in the figures which he gave some other items have been introduced under the heading of administration which were not included in the report which was tabled by the minister. I shall be glad, therefore, if the minister will have inquiries made as to the accuracy of the figures he gave and what items were included to change entirely the figure for the four years given in the report itself.

We are quite accustomed to Liberal speakers presenting arguments against the relief camps. There was quite a volume of Liberal opinion in this country that was not unfavourable to the policy which the previous government was endeavouring to carry out in a time for stress for the care of the single, homeless unemployed, but it was noticeable in the house and in the campaign that Liberals, speaking with partisan motives, were never ready to make any appreciative reference to the work which was undertaken, and no reference is ever made to the work that was accomplished by those men. It was charged that they were not too well treated. It was charged they were improperly working. It was charged they were an unhappy set of people who did little or no work. I who was for a time connected with it know full well that those charges were without foundation, but I think it is of interest to note that, according to that report, the value of the work done by the men in the camps during those four years amounted to $18,213,091.

Materials, of course, go into that figure, at the price that was paid for them, and labour is accounted for at the going rates; but that is the value of the work of various descriptions which this country has received as a result of the work of those men who were charged with being a lazy set of people who never did any work. It is, I think, perfectly right that publicity should be given to that figure, and I think I had better put on Hansard the items which go to make up that total:

Airways, $2,471,698.
Air stations, $2,318,294.
Barracks, $1,474,438.
Clearing of land, $229,632.
Forestry, $1,319,971.
Fortifications and historic sites, $738,518.
Highways, $4,677,173.
Municipal and provincial airports, $175,107.
Rifle ranges, $464,736.
Training camps, $4,343,524.

That makes the total of $18,213,091 which I have already mentioned. That is the work accomplished by men who were cared for at the taxpayers' expense during a time of economic stress, who were sheltered, fed, clothed and medically attended, and many of them, as I know perfectly well, were only too glad to give a certain amount of work in return for what they received. Perhaps the minister will be good enough to take an opportunity to make the two sets of figures fit.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we have been in session now since the latter part of January, and with the exception of a couple of weeks at the Easter recess we have been on duty continuously. I am trying to sum up the results of our efforts during the time we have been in session. It is no wonder when one goes out from our deliberations here into the country among the people who are interested in our activities, that one finds them amazed at the little we have accomplished during the last three and a half months.

We find that unemployment is on the increase in our larger industrial areas; that it is becoming an acute problem, more acute now certainly than it was a year ago, and when we ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) for a statement of government policy we are met with practically no reply at all. We were told, for instance, during the previous discussion on this relief measure that we must wait for an announcement of policy until the supplementary estimates are before the house. I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, in view of the all-importance of the question of unemployment, that when the minister was introducing the measure dealing with unemployment and unemployment relief we might have had a statement of policy from the Minister of Labour himself, instead of waiting until the Minister of Finance had brought down his supplementary estimates. But I realize very well how little in the way of policy the government have. In fact, when the supplementary estimates are brought down within the next few weeks it will simply be a case of additional capital expenditures being appropriated to meet an emergency situation. As I have often stated on the floor of the house, no form of capital expenditure is in itself a solution of the problem of unemployment. If capital expenditures could have solved the unemployment problem, certainly it would have been solved in the United States where they have spent billions upon billions of dollars in attempting to deal with the problem. To me, sir, any form of capital expenditure for this purpose is similar to pumping oxygen into a very sick patient. To put into the economic structure of this country more money for capital expenditures will have an effect just so long as the money is in circulation, and the moment the new capital ceases to function we shall revert to the same state of unemployment that we had prior to the pumping of the money into our economic structure.

I would have thought that, having had this problem on our hands for a period of at least eight years, and after realizing, as the Minister of Labour must, that it had not yielded to treatment during that time, that is, to the different forms of capital expenditure and the different forms of relief we have tried, the government would have attempted something new in dealing with the situation. I know the government have great faith in the expansion of trade, and we are all anxious to see trade developed with other countries. I am in favour of trade agreements and of reducing tariffs, but I realize more and more as the years go by that a reduction of our tariffs and the creation of more trade agreements between ourselves and other parts of the world are in themselves no solution of the problems of the day. We are attempting now to effect another trade agreement between the United States and ourselves, but does it not seem absurd on the face of it to expect that because we effect a trade agreement with the United States, which has a more serious unemployment than we have, we are going to improve materially conditions in Canada? Trade agreements, in fact, while they might expand trade in one direction, very often have the effect of strangling trade in other directions, and it often happens that the result of trade agreements which are effected is merely to create new channels of trade without creating much additional trade; in other words, the sum total of benefits created is not very much.

As I said a moment ago, we are now in the second half of the session of parliament; perhaps we shall not sit as long as we have already done, and I think we should at least have a definite statement of policy from the government as to what they intend doing about the unemployment situation. We have in this country to-day at least 400,000 men and women who are out of work, and I am just wondering what hope this session of parliament is going to give to this vast number of men and women who are out of work, and who are looking to parliament for the solution of their problems and difficulties. There is nothing we have done during the past three months to give one ray of hope to this vast number of unemployed in this dominion, and is it any wonder that they are beginning to look on us with a certain mark of indifference, and some with a good deal of skepticism as to whether we really mean business in our attempts to solve this particular problem?

Wherever I go these days the same question is put to me: What is parliament doing to meet the problems confronting us in the dominion at the present time? And what answer can I give? There is only one answer, and that is that we are doing very little; that we are continuing to go along in exactly the same way as we have done during the past eight years. I put it to the hon. Minister of Labour, a student of economics, which is a form of science: If, after eight years the very serious problem of unemployment has not yielded to the treatment we have been giving it, is it not the logical thing, is it not the scientific thing, that we should seek to apply new remedies to meet existing conditions? Yet there are no new remedies; there is nothing new. We are continuing for the ensuing year with exactly the same kind of thing we have had in effect for the last seven or eight years. In 1930 we passed a bill dealing with public works and the giving of unemployment relief in the way of food, clothing and shelter. Now, eight years after we had our first serious problem of unemployment to cope with, we are dealing with it in exactly the same way. There is nothing scientific; I do not think there is anything really Liberal, about that method of dealing with unemployment. I had hoped that this year, when we met in January, faced with a falling volume of trade, the government would have presented some other means of dealing with the situation.

The present government have been rather fortunate. They came into power on the crest of a wave of trade expansion. When they went out of office in 1930, trade was on the decline. The moment contraction again sets in, we are faced with the same problem which confronted us in 1930, but with no means provided by the government, at any rate no means that they have brought before the house, in the way of an attempt to do something effective to meet the situation. How ineffective the house seems to be, particularly at this session! For the past three or four days we have been listening to a discussion on the reduction of the tariff upon implements of farm production. I am favourable to such a reduction. But does it not seem incongruous to have Liberal members pleading with a Liberal government to put a Liberal plank into effect by way of legislation? It should not require three or four days' discussion in the house to convince the government of the necessity of putting their own platform into effect. It could have been done in the first session of this parliament—

Mr. DUNNING: And it was.

Mr. HEAPS: —if the government had wanted to do so. But of course we had a lengthy inquiry by one of our committees, and then several days' discussion a year after the report was presented. Probably, when the next budget comes down or when the last budget before the next election is presented, we may find a little relief to the farmer by way of reduction in the tariff on farm implements. What I am more interested in is to make this parliament an instrument of some benefit and value to the great masses of our people. When I look at this session I find it is one of the most barren we have had in the history of this chamber. From the end of January to the present time we have not passed anything that can really be called legislation. As regards the present bill, it is not really new legislation, it is merely continuing legislation which we have had for the past seven or eight years. The other legislation which we were promised at the beginning of the session is likely to go into the discard; I refer particularly to the matter of unemployment insurance. So we have now been in session for approximately three and a half months; if we are asked what we have done in that time we can only say that nothing has been done, and as a person put it to me the other night, we have done it as effectively as any one knows how it can be done.

My plea to the government at this time is to face the situation in the serious way in which I expect a government to deal with so grave a question. Otherwise, when the session is over, what shall we be able to show? Money again allotted for unemployment and farm relief. As I have repeated until I am tired of saying it, I do not want to see our hundreds of thousands of unemployed kept on relief; I would far sooner put them in a position where they could earn their livelihood and retain their self-respect. It may be that a limited amount of funds will be put into the deferred estimates for public relief work. I am anxious to alleviate unemployment to the fullest extent we possibly can; but may I again point out that no form of public works is in itself any more than a palliative, and very often only a poor one at that. I would plead with the minister, with all the strength and earnestness of which I am capable, to devise some further ways and means of dealing with unemployment, dealing with it as effectively as they are trying to do in other parts of the world. To the south of us the president, in spite of drawbacks and handicaps, is at least making efforts to deal with this recurring question. Although he has spent billions of dollars, he has also taken other means of coping with the problem. But here we sit still. Week by week we sit idly by. Month after month goes by, but we accomplish so little and give so little encouragement to the unemployed. Now that we are on the third reading of this bill, I trust that before the session closes we shall have some announcement from the minister on behalf of the government that they are going to take means entirely different from those adopted in the past in order to cope with the present problem which has been with us in an acute form for the last eight years.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I agree with a great deal that has been said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. We have been here for nearly four months, and people are beginning to wonder what we are doing in Ottawa. This bill could easily have been introduced early in February. I think we should have had some definite statement with respect to what projects the government proposes to undertake under this legislation. Speaking to the bill the other day in committee, I made one or two suggestions which I thought were worthy of consideration, and I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to make a statement with respect to them. Speaking of clause 4, which gives power to the government—

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. gentleman has made three speeches on this question. One of them—

Mr. STEWART: This is the third reading.

Mr. GARDINER: One was made at the proper time to deal with this matter, when the bill was before the house. One was made the other night, when I raised objection. Now he is going to proceed to make another one on a matter which has nothing to do with this particular question.

Mr. STEWART: It is a different stage.

Mr. PERLEY: I see no point of order in that statement. The hon. gentleman generally transgresses a little himself by getting a little out of order, but we have not objected to that. However, I shall come to the point. In this bill the government is provided with power to relieve agricultural distress in the west. I hold in my hand a copy of the Regina Leader-Post, just at hand, in which it is stated that the premier of Saskatchewan announces a two million dollar plan for summer-fallow. Speaking at Frobisher, he announced:

> —a $2,000,000 government financed summer-fallow program to follow up on the heels of the spring seed and feed distribution.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member is making a statement with regard to the distribution of seed in Saskatchewan. It has nothing at all to do with this bill. Appropriations for a summer-fallowing program in Saskatchewan have nothing at all to do with the measure now before the house. As I have said, the hon. member has already made three speeches on this matter, one at the proper time and two at times when the rules of the house prevented him from making a speech. But my objection is that he asks me to make a reply, at a time when under the rules of the house I have no right to make a reply.

Mr. PERLEY: Well, I shall put it in this way, that under this act there is power for the minister to make arrangements with a government to relieve agricultural distress. The premier of Saskatchewan has announced a program of that kind. That program could not be announced unless some arrangements had been made with this government, for the finances of that province will not permit a two million dollar expenditure on summer-fallow or anything else without the approval of this government. I submit, therefore, if an arrangement of that kind has already been made, that we should have a statement from the minister which might come under any of the provisions of this bill. It is a very bold statement, particularly at this time. I quote:

> Depending upon the date of the election, the summer-fallow program would have to be financed either before or after the election, the premier continued. "If it is after the election," the premier continued, "ask yourself who can provide aid for you better, a government that has maintained the province's credit or one that contends that maintaining credit doesn't matter."

There is no question, in view of this statement, that some arrangement has been made between the two governments with respect to assisting farmers with their summer-fallow. It is right that they should be assisted, but we should have a statement now on the third reading of the bill as to what arrangement has been made in that respect with the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. ROGERS: I have no desire or intention to detain the third reading of the bill.

Mr. PERLEY: We should have a statement from the minister with respect to that matter.

Mr. GARDINER: It has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. PERLEY: Where do they get the power?

Mr. GARDINER: I am as anxious as the hon. member to have the house get on with the business, but what he has said has nothing to do with the particular business before the house.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I listened with some amazement to the observations made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). He said in effect that there was no hope, in respect of unemployment, in the policy of trade expansion; that there was no hope in the adoption of relief works, and that he was not satisfied with the provisions for direct relief. In other words, he said in effect that the problem of unemployment is insoluble, and then he complained that no solution had been found.

Mr. HEAPS: That is the minister's inference.

Mr. ROGERS: As I said the other night, the hon. member must be aware that unemployment exists throughout the entire world at this time and always has existed to some degree. As a matter of fact, in other countries, in Great Britain for instance, despite great industrial activity in the past year, there has been an increase in unemployment of over 200,000; and in the great country to the south of us there has been a far more conspicuous increase in unemployment; for recent figures that have been given show that there has been an increase from seven and a half to twelve millions—and that despite the adoption of certain measures which in his first breath my hon. friend condemned, and in his last breath suggested that we might very well imitate.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not say that. What I had in mind was the bill which is now being discussed in congress dealing with hours and wages.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend at the beginning said that there was no virtue or merit whatever in these policies that have been adopted in the United States, and then he complained that this government had not put into effect policies similar to those that had been carried out by the Roosevelt administration.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not say that.

Mr. ROGERS: The fact is that when we contemplate conditions here at the present time, in the light of the fact that a large portion of our agricultural area has been out of production for five years, we have every reason for confidence instead of despair. I say to my hon. friend in all kindness that the group to which he belongs was born in depression and nourished in despair. My hon. friend has not been willing to admit that there has been a distinct improvement from time to time. I have given the house on various occasions evidence of improvement in large sections of the country. In the maritime provinces in the past two years, unemployment, so far as it has affected relief, has been reduced 75 per cent; in the two central provinces the number of those on relief has been reduced between 35 and 40 per cent; in British Columbia there has been a reduction of 35 per cent. Only in the western provinces where climatic disturbances have had their effect, putting a large area out of production, has there been the persistent condition in an aggravated form that causes concern to my hon. friend. And let me assure him that he is not alone in that concern. Certainly this government, since it came to office, has not shown any indifference towards that problem.

My hon. friend says that we have not found a solution. Can he point to a single country that has found a solution except on the basis of forced labour, regimentation, and the enlisting of men in armies, and does he favour such methods?

Mr. HEAPS: They are attempting to do something.

Mr. ROGERS: Does my hon. friend favour that type of remedy?

Mr. HEAPS: I would favour this government doing what they are doing in New Zealand.

Mr. ROGERS: There is no comparison between this country and New Zealand. My hon. friend is going far afield. He began with a country in which the conditions are similar to ours, the United States, and now he is going to New Zealand. The truth of the matter is that we have not at any time shown any lack of interest or desire to deal with the problem. We have proceeded not on one line, but on several lines. We have tried to profit by the experience of our predecessors and have endeavoured to branch out along some lines of our own. We did not, as some hon. members have suggested, believe that foreign markets had disappeared for all time. We had the courage of our faith and we went out to find foreign markets; and the Prime Minister on Armistice day found a great market to the south that had not been enjoyed under treaty by this country since 1866. What is more, we believe that this market will be extended in time to come. We have gone in other directions as well and have found markets which my hon. friends said were beyond resurrection. We have found those markets and we have the faith that we can proceed along that line constructively and successfully.

As for relief works, I have stated on many occasions that relief works as such are not more than a palliative; there is no difference between my hon. friend and myself in that regard. We have, however, tried to concentrate expenditures in directions where there will be an increase in collateral and ultimate employment, and we believe that we should make expenditures in that direction where possible. The hon. gentleman comes from the great city of Winnipeg, and he knows that as a result of assistance given by this government and by the preceding administration there has been established there a modern sewage disposal plant which surely was of benefit to that community, and of temporary benefit to thousands of unemployed in Winnipeg. We have, through assistance given in connection with highways, opened up new areas and given encouragement to the mining industry, to the tourist trade, and to forestry; and in these directions, surely, our expenditures have not been wasteful. They have provided immediate employment, and also assisted towards greater ultimate employment.

We have also dealt with relief settlement on a moderate scale, and here again my hon. friend was the first to say that in the direction of rural rehabilitation we should proceed gradually and surely, because in the experience of some of the provinces we have found that to take families from the city and place them on the land tended to make their condition worse rather than improve it. We have, however, proceeded in that direction in association with certain provinces, and in some cases we have made marked progress in rural reestablishment.

We have also initiated plans for training the youth of Canada for reestablishment in industry. When that vote was before this house last year it was said to be an experimental vote. We wished to find our way, and we still wish to proceed cautiously, but surely. I think my hon. friend would not suggest for a moment that moving in that direction is against the interests of this country or of the unemployed young people who have not been able to find positions for themselves in recent years. Surely, if my hon. friend examines the estimates of last year, as he will in due course examine the estimates of this year, he will find that we have not proceeded along one line only, with any thought that in any one policy is to be found a solution for unemployment. That would be contrary to the experience of all other countries. But we have proceeded along a number of lines, trying to improve the situation in several directions at the same time, and we believe that our policies have had due effect.

I am just reminded of what has been done under the home improvement plan, also the Dominion Housing Act with its altered regulations; some $30,000,000 worth of construction has been stimulated under that legislation. Is that not a movement in the right direction, and does it not show the wisdom of government seeking when necessary to stimulate the operations of private industry to give employment in this country?

These are the directions along which this government has moved. If our progress has not been spectacular, at least it has been sustained. I have already given indications at various times of the improvement which has taken place despite the fact that in this great agricultural country there has been a large area out of production. I am not prepared to give a final answer as to our power to deal with unemployment until our agricultural provinces are restored to something approaching their normal production. We all hope that conditions in the west will permit a return now to normal production. If they do, I am sure the benefit will be reflected not merely in the cities of western Canada but also in those of central Canada.

I wish to keep my promise to be brief in what I say at this time, but I should like to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). I am sure he will acquit me of any desire to misrepresent in the figures presented to the house on a former occasion. As a matter of fact, I have before me now the figures I gave at that time, and I am certain that the difference between us is in regard to what shall be included in administration.

Mr. STIRLING: Exactly; that was the reason for my question.

Mr. ROGERS: My figures cover all the administrative staff, including the outside and field administration; the entire cost of administration of relief camps. My hon. friend's figures I have no doubt referred to the more restricted administrative staff. But I would remind him that when I was making the comparison it was in order to point out that the actual costs to the dominion government of administering relief had been decreased in the aggregate. The comparison was with the unemployment relief branch of the Department of Labour, and there, of course, one deals with both the inside and outside staff.

Mr. STIRLING: If I may interrupt, I would be grateful if the minister would look into the matter. I gave the figures contained in the final report of the work covered by the relief camps, and I would say that obviously they would include all the administrative work undertaken on behalf of that scheme.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be very glad to look into it, and make whatever correction is necessary when the estimates are before the house. I merely point out at this time that the figures I gave were given to me as covering the whole administrative staff.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is not in his place at the moment, and I gather that there will be ample opportunity later to deal with the matter which he raised. I accept gladly his statement that had he been in his place the other night when I directed attention to the error in his previous reference to the president of the Liberal association of Kingston as having been an associate of the Frid Construction Company, he would have made the correction immediately that information came to his notice. But I repeat that statements of that kind, which the leader of the opposition himself admitted were made on the basis of faulty recollection, ought not to be made at all. I think it is not unreasonable to put the matter in that way. This is not the first time that sort of thing has occurred. I took immediate occasion to find out if there was any basis for the statement that the president of the Kingston Liberal association was a member of the firm which had the contract at Fort Henry. The whole purpose of the leader of the opposition was to suggest that there was something sinister and corrupt in that relationship.

Mr. STEWART: I do not think my hon. friend is stating accurately the position taken by the leader of the opposition, either on the former occasion or as he stated it to-night. What he said was that the gravamen of his charge was that political influence was being used in the administration of work for the relief of unemployment.

Mr. ROGERS: I accept that statement fully, but in that case the leader of the opposition should keep to the gravamen of his charge. Surely it was not necessary, in order to support his charge, to make a statement of this kind upon the basis of recollection. The statement was entirely inaccurate. As regards the positions to which the leader of the opposition referred in the statement that followed, they are not positions in relief work of any kind; they are positions which occurred in the normal operation of departmental services in the city of Kingston, and I believe were filled in the same manner as in other years. I have no desire to detain the house further with this discussion. The leader of the opposition said he proposes to refer to the matter again, and when he does so I shall be glad to discuss it fully.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

BOARDS OF REVIEW, TIME LIMIT FOR FILING PROPOSALS, ETC.

The house resumed from Friday, March 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 25, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Since this bill was last before the committee I thought it would serve the convenience of hon. members better if the amendments which arose as a result of the discussion on the former occasion, and which have been printed in the Votes and Proceedings, were incorporated in a reprinted bill. That has been done; on every file will now be found the bill reprinted as proposed to be amended in the committee, following consideration of all the suggestions made by hon. members of the committee as to how the measure might be improved. We might proceed with the reprinted bill, as none of the sections of the original bill was carried, but all were allowed to stand for further consideration.

On section 1—Interpretation.

Mr. DUNNING: The change in section 1 arises out of the suggestions made in committee. It was suggested that paragraph (d) as drafted in the original bill should be further amended to include agreements for sale and assignments of such agreements in connection with which privity of contract was lacking. It will be remembered that section 1 as originally devised was intended to provide for cases where absence of privity of contract had hitherto debarred consideration by boards of review of contracts in connection with cases coming before them. The one suggestion which came from members of the committee and which seemed to find general acceptance was that the principle should be extended to include agreements of sale, and this is provided for in the section as amended.

Mr. STEWART: I think there are some objectionable features in the amendment. As the minister has stated, the original measure as drafted and as interpreted by judges and those to whom it was referred was held not to include a person who had acquired property subject to encumbrance. The whole basis of the act is the insolvency of the farmer and the arrangement of his debts. The decision went on the basis that there was no privity of contract; that there was no debt existing between a person who had purchased a farm subject to mortgage, and the holder of that mortgage. That principle is absolutely sound. The holder of that mortgage could not sue the party who had purchased the farm subject to mortgage. There was no action against him directly, because there was no covenant between the parties. All that could be done was to foreclose the mortgage. There was no liability whatsoever on the purchaser in respect of the mortgage. And no matter what that purchaser might be worth; no matter what other property he might have, or no matter what other assets he might have—there might be money in the bank, or an indication of solvency in many respects—the holder of that mortgage had no remedy whatever before the act was passed. The whole intention of the act was to enable the party indebted to the other to have a compromise of his debts. It seems to me that it is extending the act far beyond its original scope and intention and, as I pointed out before, it is introducing further complications and further difficulties at a time when the difficulties ought to be contracted. It seems to me we are entering upon another field upon which we should not enter at all.

Mr. DUNNING: The remarks of the hon. member revert to the discussion which took place previously with respect to the principle involved. I do not think I can add anything to what was said on that occasion. Certainly at the present time there are about 3,000 cases of farmers which cannot be dealt with by boards of review, because of the absence of privity of contract. I gathered it to be the sense of the house that the greatest good for the greatest number would be served by refusing further to allow the lack of privity of contract to prevent the board from considering the actual case. I have not any doubt that, headed as each board is by a judge of the high court, the circumstances involved with respect to the original vendor and the original purchaser will, of course, be fully considered. I hesitate to propose anything which would deprive anyone of any right; but, after all, this is bankruptcy legislation, and we must never lose sight of that fact. I therefore believe it to be the sense of the committee that the section pass.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 2, "Proposal filed prior to commencement of this act."

Mr. DUNNING: Section 2 of the bill, relating to the estates of deceased farmers, contains only two changes; only two changes have been made since the original bill was before the committee. One change is the insertion of the words "occurring on or after the 3rd day of July, 1934," after the word "farmer" in the first line, as a result of which the benefits under the amendment will be applicable only to the estates of farmers who died after the original act was passed. It is thought well not to extend the privilege beyond the coming into force of the original act. In every other such case the amendment stands exactly as when it appeared before the committee on the previous occasion, and provides that the estates of deceased farmers may go before a receiver under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and later before a board of review, suggesting an arrangement or composition upon the conditions set out in subsection 2. That subsection reads:

> The court, upon being satisfied that a member of the family of the decedent resides and will continue to reside upon the farm of the decedent and intends and is able to operate the same may, ex parte, upon such terms and conditions as the court deems fit, by order, grant such application.

When the bill was before the committee previously, the suggestion was made by the hon. member for Rosthern and, I believe, also by the leader of the opposition, that the proceedings should be ex parte, in order to make them as inexpensive as possible upon the debtor. But it will be noticed that the principle of the act is maintained, namely the principle of enabling the farmer to continue on the farm. If a member of the family of a deceased farmer demonstrates to the satisfaction of the court his or her intention or ability to remain upon and to operate the farm, then the executors of the estate of the farmer have the same rights, under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, as the farmer would have had had he continued to live.

Mr. STEWART: Is subsection 2 retroactive? Does it in effect open up all these cases which have been dealt with, and enable a case dealt with on the basis of the existing legislation to be reviewed by process of filing a new application?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: Surely that is going to result in endless confusion. Do I understand that to be the proposition the minister makes?

Mr. DUNNING: The proposition is that if any farmer who died since July 3, 1934, had made a proposal under the act which had not finally been disposed of at the time of his death, his heirs may continue the proposal. That is one situation. Then, secondly, if at the date of his death he was unable to meet his liabilities as they became due, in such case the legal representative of the family may apply. In answer to my hon. friend, it does contemplate that in cases where the board of review, because of the state of the law, has been compelled to say, "No; the farmer is dead and we cannot proceed," the application will be entertained. That is what it means.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. STEWART: I was discussing more particularly subsection 2 of section 1, which has not been passed, surely.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes; section 1 is passed.

Mr. STEWART: It was not passed, as I understand it. Subsection 2 was not read and was not passed; certainly not.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want to hurry matters, but I was under the impression that section 1 had passed. If my hon. friend wants to revert to subsection 2 of section 1, I shall not object.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): There was a misunderstanding there. Only subsection 1 passed, I think.

Mr. STEWART: Subsection 2 did not pass at all.

The CHAIRMAN: I called clause 1 and clause 1 was carried. Then I called clause 2, and we are now on clause 2, "Deceased farmers."

Mr. STEWART: If that is your interpretation of it, Mr. Chairman, we shall have to ask you to read what you propose to pass, because you read paragraph (d) and stopped when you called it, and paragraph (d) has nothing whatever to do with the matter under subsection 2 of section 1. It is not a clause at all; it is section 1.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I may facilitate matters, though I think the Chairman proceeded in the normal way in considering the clauses of a bill. I think it is for the committee to indicate to the chair if they desire to have the subsections of all sections dealt with separately. This session I do not think that has been done very frequently. However, I have no wish to limit discussion, and if it is your wish, sir, I am quite content to revert to section 1 for the purpose of considering what my hon. friend has to say with respect to subsection 2 of that clause.

Mr. STEWART: And also subsections 3 and 4.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend desire that the committee carry each subsection of each section?

Mr. STEWART: Certainly. I think that is the usual way.

Mr. DUNNING: It is rather unusual, but I shall not object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Very well; the committee will revert to section 1, subsection 2.

On section 1, subsection 2—Proposal filed prior to commencement of this act.

Mr. STEWART: It was on this subsection that I was asking the minister if the effect will be to throw open for review all those cases that have been dealt with under the legislation as it has existed.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: No matter what has happened in the meantime you go back and review all those cases where there has not been this privity of contract? Relations may have been entirely changed; the mortgage may have been foreclosed. I ask the minister what he would do in a case of this kind, and I know several of them: The receiver and the court before which the matter came held, properly enough under the existing legislation, that there being no privity of contract the farmer was not entitled to the relief, and the mortgagee went on and foreclosed his mortgage, entered into possession and possibly sold the property. What is to be done in a case of that kind?

Mr. DUNNING: Subsection 4.

Mr. STEWART: Subsection 4 states: "Where the title has been extinguished"; but supposing it has not been extinguished; supposing the proceedings are not terminated?

Mr. DUNNING: If the proceedings are on the way, it is just the same as any other proceedings; certainly the farmer can apply.

Mr. STEWART: And what is to happen to the mortgagee who has incurred costs in the meantime and has pursued his remedies under the act, gone into possession and rented the farm?

Mr. DUNNING: The board will take all those factors into account. We cannot make a judicial decision in this committee as to what would happen in a particular case. We can only provide adequate and fair judicial machinery to take into account the circumstances of each individual case.

I would remind my hon. friend that I did not create this legislation; I inherited it. My hon. friend had a very great deal more to do with its inception than I had. All these exceptional cases must have been in the minds of those who framed the act, with the best motives in the world, and how did they solve them? They did it as far as possible by setting up a tribunal which would exercise judgment in the circumstances of the individual cases. In all these amendments I am endeavouring to follow that principle fully, and to apply to cases where privity of contract up to the present has barred consideration by the board the same principles that have applied in all other cases. That has been the object, and I think the draughtsmen have carried it out very well. But if any member of this committee asks me what will happen in this or that kind of case, I am afraid I can give only the answer I would give if I were asked what would happen in court under certain circumstances. I would simply say that the judge would have to assess the various factors entering into the matter, size them up and give his decision. I submit that here we cannot enter into the judicial aspects of the cases which may come before the boards.

Mr. STEWART: There is no direction or provision as to what the judge may do or as to what the procedure shall be. The Minister of Finance says I had a great deal to do with the passing of this act. That is so, but as he knows very well it was only intended to be temporary legislation. It was intended just to tide the farmer over an emergency and here, after four years, we are expanding it.

Mr. DUNNING: Not quite four years, is it?

Mr. STEWART: It was passed in 1934, I think, and we are now in 1938. I have been endeavouring to convince the minister that instead of expanding it he should wipe it out, according to the original intention and purpose of the act. We are told that conditions are improved and that everything is so much better. When I point out to the minister that the only debts which can be taken into consideration are those that were in existence at the time the act was passed, and that four years have gone by since then, surely there is not the same reason for continuing the act that there was for initiating the act. The debts that existed in 1934 must have been dealt with in the main in some way by this time, and to expand the act now and to introduce all these added complications is, I submit, contrary to the original intention and purpose. It is going to end in confusion and create complications.

As has been pointed out, in the operation of the act in Ontario the hardship now is not so much upon the farmer as upon the party who holds a farm mortgage. About eighty per cent of these are farmers who have loaned money to other farmers, neighbours who have loaned to neighbours, persons who have sold their farms and taken back mortgages. The hardship is upon them, and that hardship is just as great as that of the farmer. It seems to me that the farmers cannot complain, after a lapse of four years, if legislation of this kind should, at least, not be expanded. It should be repealed. All I wish to urge is that in Ontario, in any case, the minister, as I believe he has taken power under this act, will see that it is repealed, and I suggest that the first day of July would be a suitable date for that repeal. I proposed to introduce a bill for that purpose. If the minister could only give me the assurance, which I am sure he will not, that this is his intention in connection with Ontario, I would not quarrel or quibble about some of the provisions that go in the direction of expanding the operation of the act, and taking it, as I think, beyond its original intention and scope, with further difficulties and complications and a greater measure of hardship, after this lapse of time, than the minister is going to relieve.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend always treats me with such courtesy that I hesitate to differ with him, at least in any acrimonious way. It is difficult for me to add anything to what was said in the discussion on the second reading and in the committee proceedings before on this bill. The point which my hon. friend now raises is one, I submit, which was settled by the house when it adopted the second reading of the bill. There was no doubt, as a result of the full discussion, what the will of the house generally was as to the principles contained in this amending measure. May I point out in that connection that I was very frank with the house and said quite plainly that, as a result of the discussion in previous sessions, I was quite certain I could not get through the house the amendments which were regarded as necessary by the representatives of some of the provinces unless I could also incorporate in the bill a provision which would permit of the termination of the operation of the act in some provinces. That provision is in the bill. I know it is a lot to ask of my hon. friend; but with respect to when the termination will take place in this province or that, I am afraid that, hard though it may be, he will have to trust the government. I know that is all but impossible for him to do; but I think he knows my views on the matter and that I do not desire to keep the act in operation in any province in which it is clear it is doing more harm than good.

My hon. friend and a number of others have undertaken to demonstrate in connection with various provinces that the act is now doing more harm than good. I am prepared to consider such representations at any time and will give fair consideration to them in any recommendations I make to my colleagues in the government with regard to putting into force the section withdrawing the provisions of the act from operation in any particular province. I desire to make quite clear, however, that the government believes there are several provinces in which this act continues to perform at the present time, a necessary service for the farmers, and in which under no consideration at the present time would we consider withdrawing its operation. On the other hand, there are provinces in which the evidence accumulates that the act is doing the farmer more harm than good. In such cases we are prepared to act on the powers which are contained in a section which is not yet before the committee but which was very thoroughly discussed on a former occasion.

Mr. GLEN: I would draw the minister's attention to the last paragraph of subsection 4, which says:

> The provisions of the two next preceding subsections of this section shall not apply in any case where by an order or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction the title of any farmer to any lands or chattels has been extinguished prior to the commencement of this act.

Does that mean prior to the commencement of the act of 1934, or to these amendments?

Mr. DUNNING: The amendments. That was to meet the point made by my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART: If we are considering subsections 2, 3, and 4 together, as they are more or less interlocked, I suggest to the minister that there ought to be a provision that this relief should be upon such terms as some court of competent jurisdiction might impose. Subsection 4 reads:

> The provisions of the two next preceding subsections of this section shall not apply in any case where by an order or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction the title of any farmer to any lands or chattels has been extinguished prior to the commencement of this act.

That means that if the mortgagee has foreclosed and extinguished the title, that is the end of it; but suppose he is in the process of doing that and has incurred legitimate costs; what is to be done about that? Should there not be some provision as to the power or authority of the court or some competent body to say that it should be upon such terms as may appear reasonable for the protection of the mortgagee? Unless the party seeking relief were asked to go before a judge and make his application—and the application might be granted upon such terms as the judge might impose—it seems to me it would be imposing an additional hardship upon the mortgagee who may have incurred $100 or $150 of legitimate expenses. What is to happen? His title is not completely extinguished. Is he to add those costs to the mortgage, or what is to happen?

Mr. DUNNING: It really does not make much difference because if the farmer is in such shape that he cannot pay the existing mortgage, he cannot pay the added costs. It seems to me that would be part of the question which would automatically be before the board of review in any case. The mortgagee would come there and say: "My mortgage is so much, and in addition I have commenced foreclosure proceedings which have cost me so much." But the question before the board of review is: How much can this farm be made to pay? And, of course, all of the claim would be taken into consideration, and the board would have to decide the issue, according to the terms of the act, upon the capacity of the farm and the farmer to pay. So it seems to me adequately covered now.

Mr. STEWART: I am concerned with the jurisdiction of the board to take into consideration anything of that kind.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no question as to the jurisdiction of the board of review to consider that.

Mr. PERLEY: There would be many farmers in the western provinces who would find themselves in the position of being in default, if you wish to term it that, under the proposals that were made prior to the coming into force of this act because, through no fault of their own, they have not been able to live up to the arrangement then made.

Mr. DUNNING: That point will arise on another section.

Mr. PERLEY: There is a later clause dealing with that?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that we have not yet passed subsection 2 of section 1, and I have something to say in regard to that subsection. It refers to the case where a proposal has been made but where, because of the absence of privity of contract, nothing can be done by the board of review or the judge. The proposed subsection allows the farmer in that instance to proceed to open up the case. The difficulties that were pointed out by the hon. member for Leeds are extensive, and it seems to me that the interests of the individual creditor should not be interfered with in this light manner. The moment the board of review passes on that and says it has no jurisdiction to deal with it because there is no privity of contract, under our present law the secured creditor is out so far as the board of review is concerned. If there is no provision in provincial law that prevents him from taking action to foreclose or other action that will give him possession of the property and enable him to sell it if he wants to, he has the right to proceed, but passing this law will expose a new purchaser under the foreclosure proceedings, or the man himself who has obtained the foreclosure, to an injustice. That is, he will be face to face with an opening up of those proceedings. Assuming that the man who has foreclosed his mortgage has sold it to an innocent purchaser, how is the latter going to be protected under this bill? You cannot protect him. An injustice arises.

Mr. DUNNING: Under subsection 4.

Mr. ANDERSON: Personally I am absolutely opposed to this legislation, and I would gladly vote for a bill which would rescind this law so far as Ontario is concerned. The Minister of Finance has said it has done more injustice in Ontario than any good it has done.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that.

Mr. ANDERSON: The minister shakes his head.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say just that.

Mr. ANDERSON: I have not particulars before me now—but I have communicated with the Minister of Finance in regard to it—of the case of an Ontario investor holding a mortgage in Manitoba. It is a most unjust case. It is not necessary for me to repeat the details at this moment because the minister is aware of the facts. In that case debts were incurred not in connection with the debtor's farm but in connection with some other business he was carrying on; he went to the board of review, and this innocent investor in Ontario, who had invested his life savings in Manitoba, in a farm regarded as one of the finest in that province, has had not only his revenue but the value of his security reduced. I know of another case in Ontario which is even worse than that. I am satisfied that I can properly refer to the county of Perth, from which the chairman of this committee comes. In that county there is great opposition to the operation of this act; I have heard it expressed by some of the chairman's own electors, and I have no doubt he can name a number of cases of the type to which I have referred. This will create an injustice as against persons who may acquire rights under foreclosure or otherwise, when the matter has been disposed of by a court of review. If this goes through, there will be no protection to such people. It says in the subsection that where the application has been filed but has not been dealt with because of the absence of privity of contract, then the man may renew his application. But in the meantime conditions may have arisen which make it an absolute injustice to allow the board of review or a court to open the matter up after that time. Surely there must be finality about it at some time, and that finality must not be such as to create an injustice. The hon. member for Leeds was trying to impress that upon the Minister of Finance, and I agree with the hon. member that we should not pass legislation which has that effect.

Mr. THOMPSON: I wish to register my opposition to this bill. I am pleased that the minister has included in it a provision for a province to be withheld or withdrawn from it. As far as Ontario is concerned, this legislation has outlived its usefulness, if it ever had any. I believe it has done more harm than good. I know of instances of people who were paying up their interest until this act was passed; then they stopped, and when interest had accumulated for a few years they applied and had the interest thrown off. I know of one farmer who retired and came into the town. He had about $25,000 invested in land mortgages, and last year there was not fifty dollars paid to him to live on. All the mortgagors had applied to the board, and he could not collect; that stopped all proceedings and left the man high and dry. It was never intended that this act should be permanently on the statute books, and I may say this, that I never was in favour of it. I thought it caused an interference with legitimate contracts with which no government should interfere.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member did not object very strongly at the time.

Mr. THOMPSON: The measure was passed unanimously because, I think, the house was making an honest endeavour to assist the farmer. But I must say frankly that I never looked favourably upon the bill. Now that debtors have had four years to make their adjustments they have been allowed plenty of time, and I do not think an act like this should be continued. It has destroyed the farmers' credit. No one will take a mortgage on a farm to-day because he is afraid of this legislation being invoked to rob him of his equity in the farm. No matter what may be said about it, it is class legislation of a most vicious kind, and I should like to see it repealed so far as Ontario is concerned.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Deceased farmers.

Mr. DUNNING: I have already explained that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. DUNNING: It had better be taken subsection by subsection.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall subsection 1 carry?

Mr. STEWART: Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, this is worse than the other:

6A. (1) In the event of the death of a farmer occurring on or after the third day of July, 1934 who

(a) has made a proposal under this act which has not been finally disposed of at the date of his death, or

(b) was at the date of his death unable to met his liabilities as they became due, the legal representative of the decedent may apply to the court—

Does this mean that it applies only to a case where a proposal was made?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEWART: Or is it extending it further and enabling the legal representative to apply to the court (i) for an order to continue proceedings under the proposal filed, or (ii) for leave to make and file a proposal on behalf of the estate of the decedent, as the case may be? Here is a case of a man who, we will say, died on July 4, 1934. His estate has been going along in the meantime. He was not entitled to come in under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act as it existed, because it did not apply to the estate of a deceased person. Now the legal representative comes in after the lapse of nearly four years, and what has he a right to do? He has a right to file a proposition on behalf of the estate of the deceased. Just imagine the confusion that is to result from doing that at this stage, and in respect of a debt that existed only in 1934! I cannot imagine anything more calculated to result in confusion, in tying everything up and in creating injustices and complications which I do not think can be solved under this act with any of the machinery that is created.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

On subsection 2—Order of the court; and subsection 3—Proposal to be proceeded with.

Mr. STEWART: This is to be an ex parte application.

The court, upon being satisfied that a member of the family of the decedent resides and will continue to reside upon the farm of the decedent and intends and is able to operate the same may, ex parte, upon such terms and conditions as the court deems fit, by order, grant such application.

(3) Upon any such order being made, the legal representative of the decedent shall be entitled to proceed with a proposal filed or to be filed in the like manner and with the like results as the decedent might have done if death had not ensued, and the provisions of this act shall in the case of such proposal apply in all respects as in the case of any other proposal made under this act.

Ex parte he may apply to a judge for leave to file a proposal, and the judge decides upon what terms and conditions he will grant the order. "Legal representative" means an executor, administrator, or other personal representative or person, according to the law of that part of Canada to which the context extends. In connection with the ex parte application, I think he ought to give notice to some person.

Mr. DUNNING: The ex parte provision was inserted at the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosthern and concurred in by the leader of the opposition. When the matter was last before the committee it was thought that if we were to have such proceedings it would be better for everyone that they should be ex parte in order that the expenses might be reduced to the minimum for the family of the deceased farmer.

Mr. STEWART: What about the creditors?

Subsections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Subsection 4 agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Stay of proceedings.

Mr. STEWART: What is the effect of this amendment?

Mr. DUNNING: The effect is in the last lines. The only amendment is an addition of the last lines:

Provided, however, that the stay of proceedings herein provided shall only be effective until the date of the final disposition of the proposal.

It is merely clarifying.

Mr. STEWART: I should have thought it would be clear without that.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Board of review.

Mr. STEWART: How many provinces have now more than one board of review?

Mr. DUNNING: None.

Mr. STEWART: There is just one board of review in every province.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: I should have thought that there was jurisdiction to appoint more than one, because the Interpretation Act says that the singular includes the plural.

Mr. DUNNING: The Department of Justice does not agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART: How many cases are pending in the different provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: Requests not set for hearing, as of March 31, are:

Prince Edward Island	7
Nova Scotia	29
New Brunswick	76
Quebec	494
Ontario	1,167
Manitoba	121
Saskatchewan	1,088
Alberta	899
British Columbia	10

That is, a total of 3,891 requests not yet set for hearing in all the provinces.

Mr. STIRLING: What proportion of these will reach the board of review?

Mr. DUNNING: Every one of these will reach the board of review.

Mr. SENN: How many appeals that have not yet been heard will reach the board of review?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the number.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—No new proposal after a certain date.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): Before this section carries, I wish to say a few words on behalf of the farmers of the most easterly part of Ontario. I see that the operation of the act has been more or less broadened in sections 1 and 2, and frankly our farmers do not want this act so broadened. I did not say anything on those sections because it might suit other parts of the country, but in our district it is now very difficult for farmers to borrow money from banks or private individuals owing to the operation of the Farmers'

Creditors Arrangement Act in the past. We claim that the act no longer gives the benefits which it was intended to afford the debtor, and it has made it almost impossible to obtain mortgages on farms, in the last few years and particularly in the last few months. Confidence is more or less gone because the secured creditor cannot realize security on a loan on a farm, so that a real hardship has been caused to creditors who were dependent upon incomes from farm mortgages. Old people whose savings were in the form of farm loans or mortgages must now in many instances ask for old age pensions. Farmers of integrity in our district are really opposed to the act. Many resolutions have been passed to that effect. Farmers' sons are forced off the land, and have to find a living somewhere else, and they deserve some credit. Speaking for the section of the country I represent, I can say that some worthy cases have not yet gone to the board of review, and therefore a certain lapse of time should be allowed by the government in order to give such people an opportunity to make an application. But this period should not be interminable. I absolutely agree with the hon. member for Leeds, and would recommend to the Minister of Finance that between now and the first of July is an ample period in which to receive such applications. After that date no applications should be received for reductions in farm debts under this act in Ontario.

Mr. ANDERSON: I have great pleasure in supporting the remarks made by the hon. member who has just spoken. It is left with the governor in council to determine the date after which no action shall be taken under the act. In my opinion enough wrong and injustice has already been done in Ontario to justify the minister in fixing the first day of July or, if this house should rise before that date, in deciding that the act should become operative in regard to this matter as soon as assented to by the governor general. I am altogether opposed to the act. If I had my way I would rescind the whole act as far as Ontario was concerned, and there would be less injustice done to the farmers and to the investors of Ontario than the benefit to be obtained by those 1,100 who have made application under it. In Ontario it is only the unprogressive and inefficient and—yes, dishonest—farmers who are asking relief under this act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART: At the present time.

[Mr. E. O. Bertrand.]

Mr. ANDERSON: It is not resorted to by the progressive, scientific, efficient and honest farmers.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): A moment ago I made a plea to have this law amended so that it would not apply after July 1, but I do not want to be associated with the expression of the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Anderson) who states that some farmers seek dishonestly to take advantage of the act.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask the hon. member for High Park whether he confines that remark to the farmers of Ontario, or applies it to the farmers of Canada generally?

Mr. ANDERSON: I am speaking of Ontario, and I do not think I am very far out. The act is not needed and not wanted by a very large majority in Ontario. It may be needed in certain other provinces, but if the western provinces had been fortunate in the last eight years in having as fair a crop as Ontario has had we would never have heard of it from them. There are many in western Canada who are not taking advantage of this act, because they dislike to appear in a role which has the appearance of dishonesty. There are many in the western provinces taking advantage of that act, just as in Ontario, simply because of their own inefficiency and dishonesty.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): I again protest against the suggestion of dishonesty as applied to any farmer in my section of the country.

Mr. FAIR: I would remind the hon. member that farmers of the west found it necessary to do what they did because of the dishonesty of some of those with whom they had been dealing, and are still dealing to-day.

Mr. NEILL: I hope it will be remembered that the opportunities of this act were largely relied upon by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) when he was putting through the amendment to the Soldier Settlement Act and some of us were complaining that the extension of the soldiers' bonus which he provided did not go nearly far enough. It will be recalled that we wanted it as it was before; but what was given was a very limited amount, and time and again when we asked him what the settlers would do in a certain event he said they could get relief or assistance under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I think the minister will admit that he dwelt very largely on that, and I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) himself was kind enough to say in answer to a question I asked, that he would weigh very carefully the question of discontinuing the act in any particular province. I ask him to be kind enough to renew that promise in view of the suggestions made that the act is not needed in Ontario; but in British Columbia I submit it is. So I hope he will be very careful before he takes that step as regards British Columbia.

Mr. DUNNING: To recommend to my colleagues action under this section is a responsibility which will be far from pleasant as far as I am concerned, because I am quite sure, in view of the violent differences of view with respect to this act on both sides and in all provinces, that I shall receive a great deal of abuse no matter which course may be adopted. I assure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that I shall bear in mind also that he is a pretty efficient protester in regard to anything which he thinks is not fair to his province, and that I shall incur his wrath if in any recommendation I fail to take into account the views which he has expressed. Of course one will have to weigh very carefully all the evidence and representations before making such a recommendation. I am not pleased to have to put before the house a provision of this sort. No minister who has any experience likes to be charged with such responsibility as this places upon him. He would much prefer to have parliament assume the responsibility and either put the act out or keep it in. But this appears to be the only method whereby we can conserve such advantages as may exist to the agriculturists of some sections, and at the same time get rid of the disadvantages which others allege have flowed from the operation of the act in other sections. I can only say that I shall try to discharge that very difficult task to the best of my ability.

Mr. THOMPSON: Would the minister state whether he intends to make this a permanent law in this country or not?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is an old parliamentarian; he knows that ministers do not make laws; parliament makes laws. In view of the expressions of opinion that have been given respecting this measure, I certainly do not regard it as a fixture in the statute books of this country.

Mr. STEWART: I do not think it will be allowed to remain a fixture. The minister will recall that when the act was introduced provision was made for the introduction of it in different parts of Canada by proclamation at different times. It was realized that conditions were different in different provinces and different sections; that its provisions might be very much more effective in one part of the dominion than in others, and that it might be desirable to have it in force in one province and not in another. Another matter that has caused difficulty is the administration of the act. It is a difficult act to administer.

Mr. DUNNING: Very.

Mr. STEWART: And the officials do not follow the same course in all the provinces.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 10, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

VICTORIA DAY

PROPOSAL THAT LEGAL HOLIDAY BE OBSERVED FOR THE PRESENT YEAR ON MONDAY MAY 23

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). In view of the fact that Victoria day falls on Tuesday this year, will the government consider declaring the Monday nearest May 24 as the legal holiday to be observed generally by the citizens of Canada in this instance?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was kind enough to give me an intimation of his intention to ask this question, and I thought it might be of interest to him and to other hon. members of the house if I stated the general position with respect to holidays as provided for in the statutes.

The following are the public statutory holidays in Canada, the dates of which are fixed by statute:

New Year's day
Good Friday
Easter Monday
Victoria day
Dominion day
Labour day
Remembrance day
Christmas day.

The following are fixed by proclamation:

The sovereign's birthday
Thanksgiving day.

When New Year's day, Christmas day, Victoria day, Dominion day or the sovereign's birthday falls on a Sunday, the following day, in accordance with statutory provision, is observed as the holiday. It will be apparent from this statement that if Victoria day were to be observed on Monday rather than on Tuesday this year, the statute would have to be altered in the meantime. I may say that I have received some communications suggesting that there should be no change, because arrangements have already been made to hold certain celebrations on Tuesday, May 24. I presume once it is understood that the governor in council has no authority in the matter, apart from that given by the statute, it will be apparent that we cannot very well alter the arrangement for Victoria day, at all events for this year.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INCREASE OF LICENCE FEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): At the last sitting the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) made inquiry as to a return of correspondence between myself and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with reference to the change in the radio licence fee. The information was sent forward by our department some days ago but apparently the return has not been brought down. However, for the information of my hon. friend I may say there was no correspondence.

SHOP CARDS REGISTRATION

PROVISION FOR REGISTRATION OF DISTINCTIVE CARDS OF LABOUR UNIONS AND PREVENTING UNAUTHORIZED USE

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 22, respecting the registration of shop cards by labour unions.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I happened to be called out of the house on April 26 when this bill was in committee. I should now like to make a few remarks with regard to it.

The shop card, which is the subject matter of this legislation, is stated to be desirable in order to afford labour unions, whose members engage not in the production of wares but in the performance of services, means of registering their distinctive cards in order that those establishments which employ, in the performance of services, members of these unions, may be enabled to use, by arrangement with the unions, the union shop cards and to prevent unauthorized use of the cards.

My only experience with shop cards has been in the barber shop in the city of Montreal, to which I resort occasionally, which displays a card indicating that all the employees of that shop are members of a certain labour union. This is a very proper method of advertising, and I think if it were within our power to do so we might approve of protecting that form of advertising so that a labour union might advertise that in certain shops the employees are all members of its particular union. A similar proposition was made to me some years ago when I was Secretary of State. I investigated the matter in so far as I was able so to do, and the opinion which I reached was at that time clear, and I think, decisive, that it is not within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada to enact a measure such as this, except possibly by enacting an amendment to the criminal code that would make it a criminal offence for a competitive shop to misuse a card, or to deceive its customers by the display of a card, indicating that its employees were members of a labour union when as a matter of fact they were not such members.

However, when this bill was up for a second reading I asked the Minister of Justice, I think, or the Secretary of State, to have the matter investigated by the Department of Justice, and the Deputy Minister of Justice, for whom I have a great respect indeed, has reported an opinion which appears in Hansard of April 26 last, in which he states that this bill does not deal with trade marks; but he adds, at page 2265:

> I am of opinion that the purpose and effect of the bill is to vest in certain labour unions a copyright which they do not now enjoy, and that the validity of the bill is supportable on the ground that it is copyright legislation within the meaning of section 91 (23) of the British North America Act.

As I have already stated, I was clearly of the opinion that this bill or a similar bill was not within the legislative competence of parliament, and that for parliament to enact such legislation beyond its powers would prove a disservice to the labour unions which requested its enactment. I am still of that opinion. I may individually commend the policy of this proposed act, but I think the utmost care should be taken to ensure its enactment by a legislature which is constitutionally competent so to do, so that its validity may be beyond doubt.

I am of the opinion that provincial legislatures are competent, and that the bill, if enacted by a provincial legislature, would be valid beyond question.

This bill does not deal with "trade marks." It deals with "shop cards of labour unions." The shop cards are not designs, devices or words to be used to distinguish a manufacturer's or trader's goods, wares or merchandise, and therefore these cards cannot be deemed to be trade marks either at common law or by statute. The bill does not deal with industrial designs, which are defined by our statute law and protected. It is clear, I think, that a shop card is used for advertising purposes only. It advertises, as I have already stated, that the employees of a shop in which a shop card is exhibited are members of a particular labour union.

I remember that when the matter was brought before me as Secretary of State some years ago I spent a great deal of time in examining all the precedents, and I could find no judicial authority to the effect that there may be, by common or statute law, a copyright in such an advertisement.

Copyright was originally a common law right which by a series of statutory enactments became merged in the statutory right known as copyright, and since 1911 such statutory right exists in the United Kingdom and in all British dominions and possessions.

Originally, copyright was the exclusive right which an author or designer had, at common law, to print, publish or sell his own original work. Then it was decided by the courts that it included the exclusive right of multiplying copies of an original work. It gave protection also to sculptors, designers and engravers, to authors of literary works, musical compositions, and later, as this house well knows, to performing rights in musical productions. The law of copyright was also extended to protect paintings, drawings and photographs, and works of architecture. But I can find no decision in respect of copyright, either under common law or under the statute law, which purports to protect advertisements.

Chitty, J., in Lamb v. Evans, 1892, 3 Ch. 462, held that there might be copyright in the headings under which advertisements were classified, but not in the advertisements themselves. And in 1893 the court of appeal, 1 Ch. 218, held that though there might not be copyright in advertisements, there might be copyright in the arrangement of a sheet of advertisements.

Recently it has been found that there is a copyright in the arrangement of statistics in regard to certain branches of insurance, so that those who originated those tables have a copyright in the tables and in their reproduction.

Tradesmen's catalogues may be the subject of copyright, but solely on the ground that the compiler of the catalogue has exercised skill and judgment in making his compilation.

Certainly these shop cards do not fall within that special category of advertisements. This bill does not purport to embody any criminal legislation whatsoever. No fines or other penalties are imposed by the bill. It merely provides that a labour union may have a shop card, not on the ground that the labour union is the author of the card, or that it designed the card, but by the mere fact that it has registered a card, as provided in the bill, in a new branch of the state department which is to be organized for that purpose.

Section 9 of the bill provides that a civil action may be brought for unauthorized use of the shop card. I quote:

> 9. (1) An action or suit may be maintained in any court of record having jurisdiction to the amount claimed, by any labour union which has complied with the provisions of this act as to registration, or by any authorized executive officer thereof, against any person, firm, labour union, association, or corporation, alleged to be using without permission the shop card of such labour union.

That, if passed by a competent legislature, might be commended. But the bill provides merely for a civil action for compensation for the misuse of personal or movable property, and under that provision, in a civil action, damages must be strictly proved. That is, under our English law of torts, an action for deceit. In other words, the bill deals with an alleged deceitful use of property, which is not a trade mark, or a copyright, and is therefore clearly, I think, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. The only action that lies under the terms of the bill is an action for compensation for the use or misuse.

Under these circumstances I am personally of the opinion that parliament should hesitate about placing this bill upon the statute books of the country, where it may mislead a number of labour unions, whose work I would highly commend and which should be commended; but they should be protected by a competent legislature, so that they may not be induced to bring actions which, before ultimately decided, will involve them in litigation and very considerable expense. I will not now vote against the third reading of the bill, but I thought it was my duty, in view of what has taken place during past years, to express this personal opinion on the third reading.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I hope my hon. friend will not deem it any discourtesy on my part if I do not reply at length to the remarks he has just made. This bill has been discussed for some time on a previous occasion, when it was up for second reading, and then in committee. On that occasion I had to explain, with my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), the reasons why we were bringing it in and recommending it to the attention of the house. I regret very much to have to disagree with my hon. friend, for whom I have the greatest regard, as also for his legal knowledge; but I must insist that every care was taken in the preparation of this bill, with the aid of officers in both departments, and we are not apprehensive about the point which he has brought up to-day.

I wish merely to remind the house that an amendment to the then Trade Mark and Design Act was adopted on March 25, 1927, to permit the registration of shop cards. That obtained for five years, and never once during that interval has the department been seized of the least doubt as to the validity of such an amendment. In 1932 my hon. friend, who was then secretary of state, brought forward a new bill, the Unfair Competition Act, where he did define "trade mark" in such a way that it would apply only to wares and designs associated with wares, and would not include the registration of shop cards. There is not one word in that bill which does so in a positive way. It was only the effect of the bill, in that as it was dealing only with objects or wares it did exclude automatically the registration of shop cards. But not even when that bill was discussed in the house was there the least allusion made as to whether it was constitutional or not to permit by federal legislation the registration of shop cards.

Since 1932, practically every year, when the labour unions came to Ottawa with a program of desired legislation, the request was made to restore the registration of shop cards. It was pressed before me in 1936 and 1937. I may say that last year we had a bill practically ready to achieve that object, and it was delayed only on account of the short session, which, hon. members will remember, we had last year.

[Mr. Cahan.]

When I introduced the bill this year, on second reading both the Minister of Labour and myself gave a very full explanation of the trend and the particular character of the measure, and I may add that even since this bill was first discussed there has not been the least intimation to the department, except by my hon. friend the former secretary of state, that it may not be within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

Mr. CAHAN: When the Unfair Competition Act was enacted—it is 1932 to which the hon. gentleman refers?—there was a full discussion in committee with regard to it; and that committee, was, I believe, an excellent one.

Mr. RINFRET: There was nothing in the discussion in the house which in the least reflected this objection. I do not believe there was even an allusion.

Mr. CAHAN: The discussions of the committee are not recorded in Hansard.

Mr. RINFRET: My hon. friend has been very moderate and exceedingly courteous, as he always is. This matter was submitted to the Department of Justice, and the department, through its deputy minister, gave the opinion which I placed on Hansard when the bill was up for the second time before the house. It was a very short one, and I surmise that the matter did not even appear obscure or at all contentious to the Department of Justice. It stated that whether it was a trade mark or copyright there was not the least doubt in the mind of the department that we had jurisdiction in the matter. After all, Mr. Speaker, a shop card or a design of a labour union is very similar in character to other objects which are protected under several acts of the federal statute. If it is a work of art or literature it is protected by copyright; if it is an invention of the mind, it is protected by the Patent Act; if it is a design distinguishing particular wares or objects it is protected by the trade mark act.

Mr. CAHAN: But this is neither.

Mr. RINFRET: But does it not appear that a shop card representing the performance of services or the work of a labour union, which cannot possibly come under the other categories that I have mentioned, would enjoy similar protection under another act? In every case it is the protection of a moral property or right duly registered with the state.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think it is necessary for me to go into the details of the bill again. I simply commend to the house the third reading of the bill, for the reasons I have given on previous occasions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. CAHAN: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

BOARDS OF REVIEW, TIME LIMIT FOR FILING PROPOSALS, ETC.

The house resumed from Monday, May 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 25, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 5—No new proposal after a certain date.

Mr. DUNNING: This provides for proclamation.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Subsection repealed.

Mr. DUNNING: This represents a minor amendment consequential upon the former one. The present reading of (j) in the bill means a proposal made by a farmer. In view of the change made in the previous sections enabling executors of farmers to make application, the word "farmer" is dropped.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Subsection repealed.

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with section 7, it is proposed to drop subsection 3 of section 2 of the present act and substitute what is contained in section 10A of the bill now before the committee. The reason for the change is the wide difference in the opinions of courts and lawyers with reference to the procedure to be adopted by creditors under subsection 3, as it now stands, of section 2 of the act in case of default of a farmer which has been annoying and expensive to all concerned. For that reason it is desired to repeal that subsection and to provide a clear-cut method of dealing with the dishonest farmer, as was intended when the original act was passed, by substituting the new sections 10 and 10A. The real effect of sections 10A and 10A(2) is that whenever a farmer does not carry out the terms of the composition which has been made for him by the board of review, and the reasons for his not carrying them out are not to be found in circumstances beyond his control, then the remedy provided is that the farmer shall revert to the position occupied by him in relation to his creditor before any order was made by the board.

Mr. SENN: Who determines whether the farmer is responsible in the circumstances?

Mr. DUNNING: The court.

Mr. TUCKER: Is that supposed to be the only remedy? As I understand the decision of the courts at the present time, if someone were supposed to pay a $100 debt at the rate of $20 a year for five years the creditor could sue, in the ordinary course, for that $20 when it became due. Is it intended now that this provision should be exclusive of other remedies? If a person had a $50 or $100 debt due him, it should not be necessary for him, before he could sue for that debt, to have the scheme formulated by the board of review annulled. As I understand it, at present one can sue in the ordinary way for a debt due under a proposal that has been confirmed by the board of review, and that is very satisfactory in the case of small debts; it should not be necessary for creditors to have the composition annulled. Is that the idea of the amendment?

Mr. DUNNING: This amendment provides the remedy set out in it in addition to any other remedies that may exist, particularly those that exist under provincial legislation. This is an additional remedy in the case of a farmer who dishonestly makes no attempt to carry out the terms of the composition that has been made in his favour. It means that under this legislation, in its relationship to the bankruptcy law, the whole transaction so far as the board of review is concerned is wiped out and the farmer reverts to the position he occupied before any order was made.

Mr. GLEN: Since the discussion on March 18, another case has been brought to my attention. A farmer who had already received an order from the board of review before the first payment was due called for an auction sale of his stock and equipment, and the creditors who went to the official receiver to find out what protection they had discovered that they had no remedy under the act. The clause as now drafted is sufficient for the purpose, but it will have to go further. When the matter was under discussion on March 18 I put on Hansard rules 48 and 49, which will be found at page 1494. There are four reasons for the issuing of an order setting aside a proposal: They apply where the debtor has:

(a) made a fraudulent or preferential conveyance, gift, delivery or transfer of any of his property;

(b) with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, departed or remained out of Canada;

(c) assigned, removed, secreted or disposed of any of his property with intent to defraud, defeat, or delay his creditors;

(d) conducted himself to the satisfaction of the official receiver in such manner as indicates bad faith towards his creditors.

The courts have taken the position that the rules apply only prior to the granting of the final order by the board of review. Unless the rules are altered so as to apply to a farmer who has defaulted of his own accord and not in consequence of circumstances, such as climatic conditions, beyond his control; unless it is possible for action to be taken under the rules after the board of review's order is given, then the rules mean nothing. Section 10 (a) as now drafted is satisfactory in that it provides for the cancellation of the order should any of these four reasons be established—and they are serious enough to warrant annulment of the board of review's order. But the rules will have to be altered so as to remove any doubt there may be in the minds of the court that the rules apply after the board of review have made their review as well as before.

Mr. DUNNING: The matter of amending the rules to make them conform to the intent of the section is now before the department and is under consideration. Of course, the provincial law of contract continues to operate in connection with settlements under this act, and we must be careful not to put in the act anything that might invalidate proceedings because of interference with provincial rights in that regard.

Mr. PERLEY: What will be the position of the farmer if he finds himself unable to carry out the arrangement made prior to the coming into effect of this act? He has been unable to make the payments under the former arrangement; he is in default through no fault of his own. Will he have to have a new proposal formulated, or can he get an extension of time?

Mr. DUNNING: He cannot be put into bankruptcy. It is clear that if the farmer is unable to carry out the arrangement through circumstances over which he has no control, this section does not apply. The court would not put that farmer into bankruptcy and thus have him revert to the condition he was in prior to the issue of the original order of the board of review. As I stated on a former occasion, there is not and cannot be provision for rehearing. If we were to open that subject again I know what would happen. It would be just what has happened on previous occasions; those who wish to have a better deal for the creditors will insist upon some right of appeal from the decisions of the board, from the creditors' point of view. I am afraid that if we provided for appeals or rehearings the value of this legislation would be lost in a tangle of legal proceedings. So it is not proposed to change that part of the statute; there is no intention to create a right of appeal either way. We believe that in that regard the legislation has worked as well as can be expected, having regard to the difficulties always attendant upon legislation of this kind.

Mr. PERLEY: Do we understand then that it would be within the competence of the board to grant an extension of time without having an appeal made by either creditor or debtor?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not within the competence of the board, but it is within the competence of the court.

Mr. PERLEY: The farmer would then be considered in default?

Mr. DUNNING: No, the creditor must go to court to put him in default.

Mr. SENN: If the farmer through no fault of his own is unable to meet his obligations, is there no time limit after which the creditor can step in and claim his right? Or will that state of affairs continue indefinitely?

Mr. DUNNING: It is wholly a matter for the provincial courts, under the law. The creditor can go to court at any time and seek to demonstrate that the farmer is not meeting his obligation although able to do so.

Mr. SENN: But in case he is not able to do so?

Mr. DUNNING: That is a matter of adjudication by the judge in each particular case.

Mr. SENN: If the judge decides that the farmer is not to blame, and is unable to meet his obligation, can the creditor at no time in the future get the right to press his claim?

Mr. DUNNING: In any event, if there were no Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act at all under provincial contract law the creditor would have to take court proceedings. He is in exactly the same position in that regard with respect to the carrying out of the terms of any order of the board. His position is not changed; the law of contract regulates that.

Mr. TUCKER: One point not to be lost sight of is the avoiding of expense as much as possible. As the wording now stands the first step would be to get an order of the board annulling the composition. That annulment would constitute an act of bankruptcy, and there would then have to be a subsequent application to throw the debtor into bankruptcy—in other words, two separate applications. In the past the practice has been to include both in the one application, for annulment of the composition and the declaration of bankruptcy. As it is worded here there would have to be two separate applications. Has that been considered?

Mr. DUNNING: It is difficult to get over that situation. In practice I think there would be no second application, because the object of the creditor in most cases would not be to put the farmer into bankruptcy but rather to put him back in the position he occupied in relation to his creditors prior to the order. That could be accomplished on the first application. Creditors generally have not found it to their advantage to put farmers into bankruptcy in the ordinary sense of the term. Only in very rare cases would a second application bringing into effect the ordinary provisions of the Bankruptcy Act be required. But in any case on application to the court the dishonest farmer could be put back into the position he occupied before the board of review made its order.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not think the minister got the point of my first question. If an order is made that someone is to pay a certain sum of money, say $100, in instalments of $20 a year, and the payments are not made, would it be necessary to have the composition annulled before the creditor could sue for the instalments? I take it the minister is under the impression that he would have to have that composition annulled before he could sue.

Mr. DUNNING: No, I am sorry if I gave that impression. The annulment rests not upon the farmer's inability to pay but upon his honesty in the matter. With respect to the question of suit for the instalments, that is a matter coming under the provincial law of contract, which differs in different provinces. In this legislation we do not interfere with whatever may be the rights of the creditor under provincial law with respect to contracts.

Mr. STEWART: The minister made a statement as to the law, concerning which I think there may be some question. This act is based upon the insolvency of the farmer. Once he comes under this act on the basis of insolvency, I am inclined to think that the remedies provided by this act are all that are available to the creditor. When a compromise has been effected and an order made providing for payment of instalments over a period of months or years I do not think the creditor can use that order as the basis of an action on contract. It seems to me it must rest for its strength and for any remedies for failure to comply with it upon the provisions found within the four corners of this act; so that if there is default I doubt whether there is an action in the civil court on the terms of the order or compromise. But that is not the objection I rose to point out to the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my friend permit me to deal with that point first? —because I am under the disadvantage of not being a lawyer although attempting to deal with a complex legal matter.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister is well on the way to becoming a very successful advocate.

Mr. DUNNING: Thank you. I am advised, with respect to the point now under discussion, that in the various provinces there have been many decisions, all of which, although arriving at the conclusion by different roads, concluded that the order of the board does constitute a new contract and is enforceable under the ordinary law of contract prevailing in the province. Experience has shown that, and the Department of Justice takes the same view. Therefore I think my answer to the hon. member for Rosthern is a correct one, substantiated by legal decisions, that in so far as the order of the board of review is concerned, that order is enforceable in the ordinary way under the law of contract prevailing in the province, because it is held to be a new contract; but that if the creditor deems the debtor dishonest, then under the provisions of the amendment now proposed he may still avail himself of these remedies.

Mr. STEWART: As I have said, that is not the point I rose to bring up in connection with this section. I still think it is not a matter of contract; it is an order, and the order stands for what it is worth, which after all I think is very little in most cases.

The objection I wish to urge to this section is in connection with the procedure outlined here. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is entirely inconsistent with the procedure that has been laid down in other sections of the act.

Let us see just what is the scheme under this act. A farmer finds himself in financial difficulty, insolvent. He initiates the proceedings; he files a notice and a proposition and all that sort of thing. The proceedings are taken for his benefit and at his instance; an order is made or a compromise is arrived at, which again is for his benefit and to his satisfaction. The hands of the creditors are tied. They cannot move. The farmer goes along and falls into default; he does not carry out his own proposition, or the scheme that has been adopted. Then I submit that the ordinary, regular and fair procedure would be for that farmer to come back to the court and make application for further indulgence, for an extension of time or some modification of the plan, and show that his failure to carry it out has not been his fault. Under this section the procedure is the opposite. The unfortunate creditor whose hands have been tied is the one who must come to the court. He, forsooth, must launch an application; he must take the burden of the proceedings, not because of any default on his part or because of any failure by him to comply with the order of the court. He has to launch these proceedings because somebody else, the farmer, has failed.

Just look at what he has to prove. He goes to the court and makes his application. I do not know just what will be the procedure; I suppose that will be defined in the rules and regulations. Probably he will have to draw up a notice of motion to serve on the farmer to attend at a certain time and place to show cause why something should not be done against him. Well, the creditor has to go to this expense and take this trouble. He is without knowledge; he is working in the dark. All he knows is that there has been default and that he is not getting what the court ordered him to get. So he has launched these proceedings and served notice on the farmer to come to court. We will say the farmer does not attend the court at all and the judge says, "You have to prove to me that this default is due to something within the control of the farmer." How are you going to prove that? The farmer has not come; he has defaulted again and the judge cannot move because he has no proof. Will he issue a subpoena or summons to bring the farmer to court?

Mr. DUNNING: What does a judge usually do when there is default in appearance?

Mr. STEWART: If he has specific authority to do certain things then he may do them. In the ordinary case of default of appearance, say in an action on a promissory note, the plaintiff will be able to swear of his own knowledge that the debt has not been paid and that the farmer is indebted to him; but in this case in order to succeed the creditor would have to prove that the default—

Mr. DUNNING: He would have to prove that the farmer was able to pay and did not pay.

Mr. STEWART: He would have to prove that the farmer was in default deliberately, that he was able to do something; and he would have to prove it, which would be something entirely beyond his knowledge. You are putting upon him an onus, under this section, that I submit should be upon the farmer, the man for whose benefit all these proceedings are devised, the man who gets the benefit of this legislation. Here you reverse the whole procedure and place upon the creditor the burden of getting what the court has said was his right. You are really putting the cart before the horse. I submit that the whole procedure is wrong; it is contrary to the principles of the act itself and contrary to justice. It is not fair. This section should be redrafted in such a way that the farmer, who is in default on his own proposition, is the one who must come to the court and get some readjustment or rearrangement. He should have to discharge the onus of proving what might be fair and equitable and just. Here the whole procedure is reversed, and this adds another objection to this act which I submit is worthy of consideration. I see many added difficulties, obstacles and delays in the way of a creditor getting his rights under this act. As I have said, I think this clause is drafted the wrong way about. The procedure should be quite the opposite to that laid down under this section.

Then as to subsection 2, the proposition is that he may be thrown into bankruptcy. I do not propose to deal with that just now, but if the creditor goes through all this procedure then the farmer is right back where he was before. The extension or compromise or scheme is set aside; the farmer is back where he started, and in addition to any other remedy the creditor might have, he must start all over again. This is the third round for him. The farmer has brought him in the first time. The creditor has had to bring the farmer in the second time, and now he has to start all over again. I do submit to the minister that this is putting too many obstacles in the way of the creditor. It is making it too difficult and it is increasing the hardships already manifest in the operation and administration of this act. It adds to the long delays that are inherent in the act as drafted. In my opinion it simply encourages the dilatory man to go along and default in his arrangement or compromise in the scheme set out for him and see how long he can get away with it, how long it will be before some creditor will go through this procedure of bringing him before a judge. The onus of proof is on the creditor. It seems to me that is an unreasonable provision. I contend that in this extension we are providing another strong argument for the repeal of this act as soon as possible, at least in Ontario. I am sure the operation of this act under these expanded and amended provisions will create a deep sense of injustice. They will cause delays and add expense to the proceedings. I submit that the section has been drafted on the wrong basis.

Mr. DUNNING: The remarks of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) illustrate better than anything else the difficulty of dealing with this kind of legislation. As a matter of fact the complaints with respect to the section in the original act which this amendment is proposed to replace came entirely from creditors. The draft now before the committee appeared first in votes and proceedings and later in the reprinted bill. Because of its appearance in the reprinted bill it became public and I have received from creditors nothing but commendation. I must confess that my hon. friend makes out a pretty good case that this proposed amendment would cause further injustice to creditors. I believe he used an expression of that kind. If that is the view of the committee I am quite prepared to drop this amendment.

It is a sincere effort to meet complaints received from creditors generally regarding the operation of the present subsection 3 of section 2. This amendment was designed to provide effective machinery for dealing with the dishonest farmer. There is not an hon. member who wants to protect the dishonest farmer, but every one of us wants to see the honest farmer who is paying according to his ability get as fair a chance as possible under the legislation, subject to judicial decision as to the circumstances of the particular case. I repeat what I said yesterday that we in the house cannot undertake to make judicial decisions with respect to particular cases; we can only put in the law such provisions as enable a judge, taking into account all the circumstances, to render a decision fair to both parties in the case.

The power proposed to be granted by this amendment will be in addition to such remedies as the creditor would have normally under provincial legislation, to enable him to bring the dishonest debtor into court and to get from the court a decision that by reason of the dishonesty of the debtor, the debtor should be put back in the position he occupied before the order of the board of review was issued. I am in the hands of the committee and I should like to have a full discussion on the matter. As far as the government is concerned we are not insisting on this amendment, but we believe it to be fair having regard to all the circumstances.

Mr. STEWART: If a compromise, an arrangement or a composition is not carried out, all the creditor has to do is go to a judge and get permission to proceed.

Mr. DUNNING: That will be found in subsection 3 of section 2.

Mr. STEWART: That power is there already.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend missed the point. The creditors claim that the power there now is not good and that the power proposed by the amendment is good. My hon. friend takes the opposite position. He says that the remedy in the present law is good while that proposed in the amendment is not good.

Mr. STEWART: I did not say that. I say that he has a remedy now and that this appears to be an alternative.

Mr. DUNNING: Not an alternative, an additional right. The present remedy reads:

> In any case where the affairs of a farmer have been arranged by a proposal approved by the court or confirmed by the board as hereinafter provided, part I of the Bankruptcy Act shall notwithstanding section seven thereof thereafter apply to such farmer but only failure on the part of such farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy. Provided that such failure shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy if, in the opinion of the court, such act was due to causes beyond the control of such farmer.

As a layman, that appeared to me to be fairly clear but lawyers and creditors tell me that it has been virtually impossible to get a decision under that section, particularly in some provinces. In certain provinces decisions such as are contemplated by the amended section have been rendered, but in many provinces the complaint has been that no decision could be obtained favourable to a creditor in the case of a dishonest farmer. My hon. friend as a lawyer can read the two sections side by side. He can read, as I have, the judicial decisions both ways, and

I think he will agree that at least some clarification is required in order to have some uniformity in the decisions.

Mr. STEWART: I think the minister has missed my point to a certain extent. My contention is that where a farmer who has an extension or a compromise fails to carry it out, then the creditor ought to have his rights restored and be placed in the position of being able to proceed as if the order had not been made.

Mr. DUNNING: Automatically?

Mr. STEWART: Or on application to the court. The farmer should know whether he wishes an extension and whether he expects to be able to carry out its provisions. If he does not go to the court and get an extension, then the creditor has the right to proceed. His rights are revived and reinstated because of the default. Under this proceeding, the onus is put upon the creditor and I contend that that is an undue onus. I am simply contending that the creditor should have certain rights and if the farmer wishes to postpone the granting of those rights, it should be up to him to make further application.

Mr. DUNNING: The law as it now stands places the onus on the creditor. The creditor must go to court in order to demonstrate that part I of the Bankruptcy Act—

Mr. STEWART: All he has to do is demonstrate that there has been default.

Mr. DUNNING: He has to demonstrate something else; he has to demonstrate that the default is due to causes beyond the control of the farmer. Let me read the existing section in part:

> . . . provided, part I of the Bankruptcy Act shall notwithstanding section seven thereof thereafter apply to such farmer but only failure on the part of such farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy. Provided that such failure shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy if, in the opinion of the court, such act was due to causes beyond the control of such farmer.

Therefore the creditor to-day must initiate proceedings and take the farmer into court in order to prove that the failure to carry out the terms of the compromise was due to causes within the farmer's control.

Mr. STEWART: If he wishes to take him into bankruptcy, he may do so. But he does not wish to take him into bankruptcy— That is the last thing he wishes to do—and he should be at liberty to proceed for recovery in his own way.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: He must do it in accordance with the provincial law of contract.

Mr. STEWART: No, not in bankruptcy.

Mr. GLEN: I hope my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart) is not correct in his contention, because this clause in the bill was inserted, as I thought, because of the argument I made in the discussion of the 18th of March. If my hon. friend is right in saying this is not what I want, then I do not know what I want. What I want is an additional remedy for the creditor in the case of a dishonest debtor. I know that the board of review in Manitoba take this position, that they have made a new contract following the old contract on which the application was made, and that that new contract is subject to the provincial law, and in the case of default in carrying out the terms of the order of the board of review the creditor has the remedy of going to court and taking foreclosure proceedings, depending on the state of his security. In addition to that, the courts have held that the rules do not apply so far as the proposal before the board of review is concerned, after the order has been made, and the creditor is left in the air; he has no remedy at all. But this new section gives the creditor an additional right to what he already has under the provincial law. It gives him an opportunity in an inexpensive way to make an application to the court, which in Manitoba is the county court; the creditor can apply to the county court for cancellation of the proposal. If he has to take foreclosure action on the board of review's order all he has to prove is default, and the farmer in defence would have to show that the default was caused not by his own act but by causes beyond his control. That is exactly the position we are in to-day. But this gives the additional remedy not of taking foreclosure proceedings but of going to the ordinary county court and there making a demand for cancellation because of the dishonesty of the farmer debtor.

I hope my learned and hon. friend will see that this provision should not be taken out. It is a serious matter in Manitoba, and I am quite sure in Ontario, and we want this remedy as against the dishonest debtor. In the case where cancellation takes place it means that you go back to the original debt and the order of the board of review reducing the value of the land, and the farmer debtor will then be in the position he was in before.

Mr. STEWART: I think that ought to take place automatically where the farmer makes default unless he himself institutes proceedings and gets an extension. That is what I am contending for.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: While I would not wish to see the section dropped, I am inclined to agree with the member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) that the onus should not be put on the creditor to show that the farmer defaulted through his own fault. I think the onus should be on the man who is looking for the favour. If you added a few words or changed the phraseology of one line I think it would meet the situation. I suggest that after the word "aforesaid" in line 4 the words be inserted, "unless the farmer satisfies the board that such default was due to causes beyond his control." Instead of putting it negatively, put it affirmatively, so that unless the farmer can satisfy the court that such default was due to causes beyond his control, the court may annul.

Mr. LAWSON: Sometimes when too many lawyers get into a discussion it is said that it creates confusion worse confounded, but in view of the remarks of the minister as to the meaning of the present law on the statute book, and at the risk of creating further confusion, I should like to point out what I conceive to be the difference and what I think is the issue now, if I may so describe it, between the hon. member for Leeds and the Minister of Finance.

In the present act, as I understand it as read by the minister, because of the phraseology of the section the onus is upon the creditor.

Mr. DUNNING: At the present time?

Mr. LAWSON: Not at the present time. Because of the way this new section is phrased, I think it does impose that onus upon the applicant, who of necessity under this section must be the creditor.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, the complaint of creditors to-day is that that is just the position the present section puts them in, and they have had from various judges in the provinces ample warrant for that statement.

Mr. LAWSON: If that be so, this section puts them in that position much more strongly. Let me point out why. If the minister will observe the section, there are two conditions which must exist in order that the court may set aside the composition previously made, and those two conditions as they are phrased in this section are what we call in law conditions precedent.

Mr. DUNNING: In the amending section?

Mr. LAWSON: In the amending section. The first is, "if the farmer defaults in carrying out any of the terms of the composition, extension or scheme aforesaid." That is condition precedent number one. Condition precedent number two is, "if such default was not due to causes beyond the control of the farmer." Now where you frame legislation so that you have conditions precedent to the court doing something, then the onus is upon the applicant to satisfy those conditions precedent before the court may exercise its discretion. That is, I think, what is creating the difficulty. The views expressed by the hon. member for Leeds and Kent, N,B,, might be met if you would remove the second clause of the conditions precedent and put it in after the discretionary power of the court, so that the section would read: "if the farmer defaults in carrying out any of the terms of the composition, extension or scheme aforesaid, the court may, on the application of any secured or unsecured creditor, annul unless it is proven to the satisfaction of the court that the default was not due to causes beyond the control of the farmer." I think that would accomplish the purpose the minister has in mind.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: If the minister would adopt my suggestion I think it would be much simpler. It would then read this way:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, in any case where the affairs of a farmer have been arranged by means of a proposal for a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement approved by the board or confirmed by the board as in this act provided, if the farmer defaults in carrying out any of the terms of the composition, extension or scheme aforesaid, unless he—

The farmer,

—satisfies the court that such default was due to causes beyond his control, the court may, on the application of any secured or unsecured creditors—

Do so and so. The onus is on him to prove then that his default was due to causes beyond his control.

Mr. DUNNING: It is said that in the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom, but I am inclined to doubt it. The creditors very evidently attached importance to the feature of the proposed amendment which involves what is not existent in the present law, and that is that the debtor, under the amendment, reverts to the position he occupied prior to the making of any board order. From the creditor point of view it is believed that that constitutes a most salutary check on dishonesty on the part of debtors,—

Mr. LAWSON: I think we all agree.

Mr. DUNNING:—the knowledge that the remedy here proposed—not in the present law, remember—constitutes an important change, that if the debtor is dishonest under the composition which has been made in his favour by the board of review the penalty may be, in the judgment of the court of course, that his indebtedness to his creditor shall be restored to the position which it occupied before any board order was made. Again I say to those who are anxious with respect to the reasonable rights of creditors that this amendment as drafted has had without exception the approval of all those who correspond with me endlessly on behalf of the creditors. They believe it to be a sound provision and an improvement on the present law; indeed I would hate to tell members of the committee the opinions expressed of the judicial decisions which have been rendered in various parts of Canada with respect to the present subsection 3 of section 2 of the law which governs this matter. Everyone expresses satisfaction with the intention and with the additional remedy provided. Speaking as a farmer and not now as a quasi-lawyer, I believe that the creditors are right in thinking that the additional remedy of saying to a farmer, "Now, if you don't live up to the terms of your composition—"

Mr. CAHAN: But no one has opposed that. I have listened to the discussion very carefully.

Mr. DUNNING: Everybody is in favour of that?

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I think the minister misunderstands the contention of the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Robichaud) which strikes me as a very proper suggestion at least for consideration. He is not objecting to the views which the minister has expressed as to the remedies which result from default, but he is suggesting that as a matter of evidence it may easily be proved that the farmer is in default, that can be proved by the creditor; but it is more difficult for the creditor to prove that the default was beyond the control of the farmer.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, he will not be interested in proving that, but in proving the opposite.

Mr. CAHAN: All that the hon. member for Kent is suggesting is that that subsection should be so worded as to leave the proof of default upon the creditor, but to place upon the farmer the burden of proof that his default is due to causes beyond his control. That is the gist of the whole discussion. I feel that the suggestion of the hon. member for Kent is well worthy of consideration by the minister and his legal advisers.

Mr. DUNNING: I must say that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has succeeded in penetrating my head with the idea much more effectively than have those associated with him. That is due perhaps to my dulness.

Mr. LAWSON: No, to his lucidity.

Mr. DUNNING: Can we consider that the interpretation of the suggestion as given by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is assented to by the hon. member for Kent and the hon. member for Leeds? Are we all agreed?

Mr. STEWART: That is what we have been trying to get all the time.

Mr. TUCKER: I must say that I do not agree. One point is being overlooked. The minister says that the farmer reverts to the position in which he was in before he made the application; but he reverts to a much worse position, because then he can be thrown into bankruptcy, whereas under the Bankruptcy Act as it stands at present the farmer cannot be thrown into bankruptcy. This parliament, when it passed this act said that if a person took advantage of the act and did not carry out, due to his own fault, the obligation placed upon him by the order of the board of review, he could be thrown into bankruptcy, whereas before that could not be done and when it did this it tried to protect the farmer and hedged that right of his creditors around with a great deal of precaution that farmers would not be thrown into bankruptcy on a wholesale scale. That, I think, is the point which is being overlooked, and that is why this was drafted so carefully.

Mr. LAWSON: The hon. member for Rosthern is discussing the next subsection of the bill, subsection 2. We are dealing with the point under subsection 1 of 10A. I suggest to my hon. friend, so that the discussion may not be more confusing, that he wait till we get to that subsection and then deal with the point he is raising.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I am satisfied that my suggested amendment meets the point absolutely. We will start from the third line on page 4:

. . . if the farmer defaults in carrying out any of the terms of the composition . . .

Leaving out the rest.

. . . unless he satisfies the court that such default was due—

Take out the word "not."

—to causes beyond his control, the court may annul—

And so on. So the burden is thrown upon him to satisfy the court that his default was due to causes beyond his control, and not on the creditor to show that his default was not due to causes beyond his control. That meets the point. In the fifth line, instead of "such default was not due to causes," after the word "aforesaid" I would have it:

—unless the farmer satisfies the court that such default was due to causes beyond his control, the court may annul . . .

And so on.

Mr. CLEAVER: I should like to support the contention advanced by the hon. member for Rosthern. As I read this amending section, it grants to the creditor an extraordinary remedy. Under a certain set of circumstances and in the event of certain proofs being made to the court, the creditor and the debtor are reinstated in their original positions. In many cases the penalty would be a very severe one. Under these circumstances is it fair to put on the debtor the onus of virtually proving that he is not a criminal?

Mr. STEWART: Not a "criminal."

Mr. CLEAVER: That he has not committed an act of bankruptcy? As I read the amending section as it is now, if the creditor wants to penalize the debtor to the extent of this extraordinary remedy of making the debtor liable for the original indebtedness, the creditor must have some evidence to substantiate that, and the onus is on him. I am entirely in support of the section as drafted.

Mr. STEWART: The creditor is not asking for any extraordinary remedy. All he is asking is that this farmer pay what he was ordered to pay or what he agreed to pay, and if he is in default let the onus be upon him to show why he should be allowed to go on indefinitely in default. All the creditor is asking is that the man carry out the terms of his compromise or scheme approved by the court. There is no extraordinary remedy in that; he is asking for his own plain, ordinary rights, which the court granted him, and when he is not getting them the onus should be on the party in default to show why.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: As a matter of fact the onus will be on the farmer. If the creditor takes him to court the farmer will have to prove that his default was due to causes beyond his control.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what I understand will happen.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Why not bring the legal proceedings in line with the facts? There will not be any hardship on the farmer; he will have to prove in any case that the default is due to causes beyond his control. He is the only one who knows the causes of the default and the court will no doubt ask him to show that those causes were beyond his control.

Mr. DUNNING: Having got clear what the suggestion is, I am prepared to debate the principle, and to debate it rather upon the practical issues just stated by my hon. friend from Kent. As a practical matter do we not all know perfectly well that if a creditor believes his debtor to be dishonestly evading the obligation created by the board's order, that creditor will proceed to take the debtor into court and endeavour to prove, out of the debtor's own mouth, what the conditions were that caused the default? That will be the practical way in which it will work.

Mr. LAWSON: How will he make the debtor a witness? You cannot call a man against his own interest.

Mr. DUNNING: Really, I have a great deal of sympathy with Jack Cade. Let me take the other side of the case. We must not put in the hands of the creditor such a weapon as will enable him unduly to harass an honest debtor. If we reach the place, as the result of accepting suggestions that would involve that any creditor, in the case of any default on the part of his debtor in fulfilling the terms of the order of the board, could say, "I will haul you all into the court, fifty or a hundred of you, and it is up to you to prove that you are honest in default"—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEWART: He proves that the debtor is in default; that is all.

Mr. DUNNING: It seems to me that in the provinces in which this act is most needed, to grant to the creditors this additional right beyond what was contemplated in the original statute, and to couple with it the provision that in order to avail themselves of that right of setting aside the whole order they must prove that the debtor was dishonest, is not an unreasonable provision. If they are to have on the one hand the right of putting the farmer in bankruptcy, which ordinarily they would not have under the bankruptcy law, and in addition to that the right to have the debt reinstated to the amount and under the conditions which existed prior to the board's order, then I say it is not too much to ask the creditor under these conditions to prove that his debtor is dishonest. That is a matter of principle.

Mr. LAWSON: Once you put it on the basis on which the Minister of Finance has now put it, it becomes a matter of opinion, and I have no wish to quarrel with anyone as to what the principle should be on which you should proceed. When I was on my feet before I was dealing with the question, what the section meant as it stood. If you want it to mean what the minister indicates, then leave it as it stands. As I know from experience, however, the minister is broad in his reasoning with respect to these matters. May I point out to him that if the section were changed as suggested, so that once the debtor was in default he would have to satisfy the court that it was through causes beyond his control, there would not be introduced any innovation into the principles of our law generally. In the long run, despite the quips that are frequently made, in ninety-nine per cent of all cases law is common sense. One very well-established fundamental principle of British law is that though the onus of proving anything is generally upon the applicant or the plaintiff, or upon him who asserts, nevertheless, there is a well-defined exception, namely, where the thing is peculiarly within the knowledge of the respondent or the defendant. Let me give a simple illustration. Let me assume that as the Minister of Finance walks out of this building to-night, a stone falls from the top of the building and strikes him on the head or on the shoulders, and he survives. Under the ordinary principles of law, in order to recover against the owner of the building, he would have to show that that stone fell by reason of the negligence of somebody, in other words, that somebody did that which he ought not to have done, or failed to do that which he ought to have done, and that the person so negligent was an employee or the owner of the building. In the very case that I have cited, however, the law makes an exception. It says: No; it is not reasonably possible for the injured person to know why the stone fell upon him. If a stone falls off a building which a man owns and keeps, it is within his peculiar knowledge what the conditions are, and so the law in that case puts upon the defendant or the respondent the onus of satisfying the court or the judge or jury, as the case may be, that he was not responsible. I have merely tried to illustrate the principle which I say this section ignores.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Having done that, I say that if the minister and the government still feel that the onus should be on the creditor—because it is their legislation—and despite the fact that the creditor is not in a position to know or easily to find out whether or not the debtor is in default by reason of dishonest motive or in consequence of causes beyond his control, then, of course, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. TUCKER: If the suggestion contended for is given effect to, this will be the situation. Farmers in Saskatchewan are in default of payments owing to certain companies at the present time under proposals confirmed by the board of review. All such companies would have to do would be to prove that the farmer was in default, and unless he at once hired a lawyer and went to court to prove that the default was due to causes beyond his control, he would be subject to an order throwing him into bankruptcy as a matter of course. Hon. members are contending that the onus should be upon him to prove that the default was beyond his control. Surely that should not be the intention. In regard to the suggestion of the last speaker, a great many bankruptcy offences are mostly within the sole knowledge of the person whom it is sought to throw into bankruptcy: for example, trading after he knew he was insolvent. That is proved out of his own mouth by examining the insolvent for discovery. So when we give to creditors the right to throw into bankruptcy farmers who otherwise could not be thrown into bankruptcy, there should be some protection given to them. When the farmer is in such a condition as to be unable to pay his debts he should not be required to travel long distances and hire a lawyer to prevent his being thrown into bankruptcy.

I uphold the Minister of Finance in his attitude on this point, but I have enough sympathy for creditors in these times to think that they should not be required to make any more applications than are necessary.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Does the hon. member not think it is proper that if the farmer has entered into a composition that he arranged himself, and then defaults on it, the onus should be on him to show why he is in default?

Mr. TUCKER: Most of these orders, at any rate in Saskatchewan, were applied for by farmers seeking such relief as they could get. They came before the first board of review, which apparently had doubts about the validity of the act, and so did not go nearly as far as the present board in cutting down debts, and orders were made which everyone knows now cannot be carried out. Farmers took advantage of that remedial legislation to get as much relief as they could under that law provided for their benefit. But everyone knows that they cannot carry out the orders made. Under the amendment proposed by some hon. members they will be thrown into bankruptcy unless they can go where the court sits and hire a lawyer to prove that the default is beyond their control. I suggest that if the creditor wants to throw the farmer into bankruptcy, which apart from these special provisions he has no right to do, the onus should be on him to prove the essential points, just as, if he wanted to throw a trader into bankruptcy, he must prove the act of bankruptcy. If a bankruptcy order is sought against a trader by reason of his having traded after he became insolvent there would have to be proof of the offence. The trader is not required to prove that he was solvent all the time he was trading. The creditor must prove his case before he can get an order. In the case of the farmer it was carefully provided in the Bankruptcy Act that he could not be put into bankruptcy, no matter how much he owed or how wrongly he acted.

Mr. STEWART: Can he not go into bankruptcy?

Mr. TUCKER: He can do so voluntarily, but he cannot be thrown into bankruptcy. What we are asked to do here is to say that if a farmer takes advantage of an act for the adjustment of his debts and then cannot carry out the arrangement he shall be thrown into bankruptcy unless he can prove that it was not his fault. That I say is giving to creditors a right which the act never intended them to have.

As the hon. member for Leeds pointed out, the creditor is forced, in the amendment actually before us, to take it in two stages: first to apply for an order annulling the composition, which order would constitute an act of bankruptcy, and then to apply for the bankruptcy order. In order to avoid the necessity of this second application I would suggest that something be added at the end of subsection 2 providing that the court, having found the creditor to have proved his case and having made such order of annulment, might thereupon declare the farmer bankrupt, so preventing the necessity for a second application.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I think the hon. member for Rosthern forgets that the words "on the application of any secured or unsecured creditor" are still in the section. We are not taking them out. Application will have to be made by the creditor. But there is no doubt that in practice the debtor will have to prove that his default is due to causes beyond his control, so it is not shifting the burden at all. The suggested amendment is simply putting the section in line with what will actually take place. The creditor will still have to start the ball rolling, and the debtor will have to come to court and defend himself, whether or not he has a lawyer.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It seems to me that the cases to which the hon. member for Rosthern referred, decided some years ago in Saskatchewan, can be reconsidered under subsection 2 of section 1. I do not think we have reached the stage where we have to absolve the debtor from every responsibility and place the onus always on the creditor. The case presupposed by the section we are dealing with is that of a man who has received some kind of composition and has defaulted on it. Surely he has then come to the stage where he should have to explain why he defaulted; the onus should be on him. If he has to make a new application he does so under subsection 2 of section 1. But if he comes to the stage dealt with in section 8, surely the onus should be on the debtor.

Mr. TUCKER: How can he make a second application?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am in favour of leaving this amendment as it is. It should be viewed in the light of actual happenings, and the happenings in the province from which I come are these. The great majority of the farmers who have had a composition are in default, by reason of having had a succession of crop failures. These defaulters fall into two classes; those unable to fulfil the terms, and those unwilling to do so. The Minister of Finance was very clear both last night and to-day in pointing out that the object of this amendment is to reach the people who were dishonestly refusing to pay when in a position to do so. I think the latter class will be admitted to be by far the minority of the debtors. Now the amendment clearly places upon the creditor the onus for initiating proceedings to annul the composition. It says that either a secured or unsecured creditor can initiate proceedings to annul the composition. Any creditor who would initiate such proceedings must have some reason to believe that the debtor is dishonest, that he is able to pay but unwilling to do so. Otherwise he would not initiate the proceedings, and if he has such knowledge or information he is the person who should be obliged to prove that. Otherwise you are going to assume that this large mass of debtors who, because of climatic conditions, have not been able to meet their obligations and fulfil the terms of their new contracts, are dishonest; that all are unwilling to carry out their contracts until they can prove that they are unable to do so. In other words you are going to assume that they are guilty until they prove themselves innocent. Surely if this section is going to place the responsibility upon the creditor for initiating annulment proceedings it ought to place on the same creditor responsibility for proving the unwillingness of the farmer to pay. I think this is by far the most logical approach to the matter. In the original act, as it now stands, the onus was not placed upon the farmer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes, it was.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Subsection 3 of section 2 of the original act states:

> Provided that such failure shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy if, in the opinion of the court, such act was due to causes beyond the control of such farmer.

The onus was not placed upon the farmer to prove that the conditions were beyond his control.

Mr. ANDERSON: The court has not knowledge of its own; it can only act on evidence, and that evidence has to be supplied by the farmer.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It will have to be supplied by the farmer under this section. The act now says:

> In any case where the affairs of a farmer have been arranged by a proposal approved by the court or confirmed by the board as hereinafter provided, part I of the Bankruptcy Act shall notwithstanding section 7 thereof thereafter apply to such farmer but only failure on the part of such farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy. Provided that such failure shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy if, in the opinion of the court, such act was due to causes beyond the control of such farmer.

Mr. LAWSON: That puts the onus on the farmer.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It does not place the onus directly on the farmer.

Mr. LAWSON: It places it upon him, whether directly or indirectly.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I submit that the amendment now proposed will place the same responsibility upon the farmer.

Mr. LAWSON: No, because, unfortunately, under the present section you set up a condition precedent before the farmer may be called upon to open his mouth. That condition is that he be in default through causes which are not beyond his control. That is your difficulty.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But I maintain that if you are going to place the responsibility upon the creditor class for initiating these proceedings, they must have some reason for doing so, and therefore the onus should be upon them.

Mr. STEWART: The only reason the average creditor would have for taking any action would be that he had an order or agreement providing for the payment of money, and he was not getting it.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I do not wish to continue this discussion unduly, because it is more or less immaterial to me how the bill passses; but, as I see it, my suggested amendment would not change the principle of the section one iota. It would simply redraft the section to bring it to conform with legal practice, I think.

Mr. DUNNING: I indicated earlier in the proceedings that I was more or less in the hands of the committee with respect to this section amending the present provisions of the act. Certainly I have reached a definite conclusion in my own mind, and it is that I would be far better to take the opinion of the creditors outside of this house than to take the opinion of those in this house who are endeavouring to stand by the normal, reasonable rights of creditors. This amending bill has been on the order paper for a very long time. The reprinted bill has been available for two or three weeks, in any event, and I am quite sure that most of the lawyers representing large creditors have obtained copies of it. I have had communications about it from creditors, and without exception they say this is a great improvement, and satisfaction has been expressed.

Frankly I anticipated criticism of this amendment from the other point of view. I anticipated that I would be accused of providing remedies for creditors which did not exist under the present law, and in fact that is the case. A remedy for the creditor is provided in the case of a dishonest debtor, but only in such case. I am willing to have a free vote of the committee on the section. I think we understand each other fairly well; I believe we understand the different points of view, and I stand by the section as it appears in the bill.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the committee that section 7 has not been passed.

Mr. DUNNING: Sections 7 and 8 refer to the same matter. One repeals a section and the other inserts something in place of it.

Section 7 agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER: I did not know that this was coming up last night and was not in the chamber when it did. I should like with the consent of the committee to ask the minister if there is not any possibility of softening his heart in regard to section 2, dealt with last night, in regard to the debts of farmers who have died. The date set out in section 2 is July 3, 1934. If that date could be put back to the beginning of the depression, say even to 1931, it would help a great deal. A great many people got into their difficulties in 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933, and it seems to me that if a man died in 1933, and his people are trying to carry on, they should receive some consideration. I do not ask that it be put back for more than about three years; then it would take in a great many people in the west who have been affected by drought conditions. I imagine there would be more than a hundred people in Saskatchewan alone who would benefit if this date were put back about three years. I do not wish to take up further time on the matter if the committee's mind is made up, but it appeared to me that the date of the act coming into force was taken more or less without considering the matter as fully as desirable, and that no harm would be done if the date should be put back to, say, 1931.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out that this section was carried last night.

Mr. TUCKER: I know; I asked the indulgence of the committee to mention the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I understood that my hon. friend did not want to initiate a new debate on the matter but desired to place his views before the committee. I can only say that consideration was given to the point he mentions in setting the date. We must remember that we are dealing with legislation for the whole of Canada. The reversion now provided goes back in fact nearly four years. My hon. friend says it ought to go back seven years, that the estate of a man who died seven years ago should be put in this position. I am afraid that would be going too far. I gave a great deal of consideration to the matter, to the representations of the chairmen of the boards of review with respect to it and to those of representatives of farmers' organizations, and I am quite sure that in establishing the date as that of the coming into force of the original act I am meeting ninety per cent of the representations that have been made to me with respect to the matter. I say that by way of explanation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe there is just the preamble to carry.

On the preamble.

Mr. STEWART: I should like to say just a word in regard to section 8, which inserts section 10A into the bill. In the third line on page 4 of the bill are the words "if the farmer defaults." The minister quite properly thought it necessary to amend a former section in connection with the use of the word "farmer," and under this amendment propositions might be made by persons other than farmers.

Mr. DUNNING: Applicants.

Mr. STEWART: I think a corresponding change should be made in this section.

Mr. DUNNING: If the debtor defaults.

Mr. STEWART: Exactly. I think that would widen it.

Mr. DUNNING: This illustrates how useful it is to have a lawyer on this committee. The suggestion is that the word "farmer" in the third line on page 4 be struck out and the word "debtor" be substituted therefor.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Would the minister be good enough to read the definition of "debtor" as given in the original act?

Mr. DUNNING: If we had only one lawyer we would be all right.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It seems to me that "farmer" is the correct word.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no definition of "debtor" in the act.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The word "farmer" has been used all through the act, and it presupposes that a man must be living on and farming the land before he is entitled to the benefits. It does not refer to the ordinary debtor as the public understands the word.

Mr. STEWART: We have extended the act to include executors, who were not provided for in the original act. Under a scheme of this kind there might be executors who were not farmers at all.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Would it not be better to use "farmer" or "personal representative?"

Mr. STEWART: Anything to widen the definition. "Personal representative" would be all right.

Mr. DUNNING: The word "farmer" occurs again in the same section. Having two legal advisers causes a little confusion.

Mr. DUFFUS: The remarks made by the hon. member for Swift Current bring to my mind a particular case of a gentleman in Ontario who owns many sections of land in Saskatchewan. For years this man has lived in Saskatchewan most of his time. Recently he has been going west in the spring at seeding time and again at harvest time. He has paid almost $100,000 in interest and taxes. Prior to 1930 he paid his interest and taxes in full. His case is now before a board of review, and some of his creditors are endeavouring to establish that he is not a farmer under the act. I think the committee should clearly establish his standing in that respect.

Mr. DUNNING: If that case is before a board of review I do not think this committee can be of any assistance in the matter. It is under consideration by a board in pursuance of the law, and I do not think we could render a judicial decision. After listening to the hon. member for Swift Current, I believe we had better leave the word "farmer" alone. The definition of a farmer is given as one who tills the soil.

PELAGIC SEALING

PROVISION FOR SANCTIONS FOR VIOLATIONS OF NORTH PACIFIC SEALING CONVENTION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 26, consideration in committee of Bill No. 98, respecting the North Pacific Pelagic Sealing Convention—Mr. Michaud—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 8—Pelagic sealing by Indians.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): I should like to offer an amendment to this section, that the last words in the section "and shall be forfeited to His Majesty" be deleted and the words "and shall be liable to forfeiture to His Majesty as hereinafter provided" be substituted therefor.

Mr. HOWE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Penalty for violation.

Mr. MICHAUD: There is a proposed amendment to this section, to add as subsection 2 the following:

Where any property is seized in respect of an offence against the provisions of section 8 of this act and a conviction is made in respect of such offence the justice making the conviction may adjudge and order as forfeited to His Majesty for the public uses of Canada the property so seized: provided that such property shall not be disposed of pending any appeal or any proceeding in which the right of seizure is questioned or before the time in which such appeal or other proceeding may be taken has expired.

Mr. HOWE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEWART: As I recall it, there was some suggestion that this clause might be amended to read in this way:

Every person guilty of an offence against this act or of a contravention of any regulation shall be liable upon summary conviction . . .

And so forth.

. . . unless some other penalty is provided by this act.

Is there not another penalty? That was the suggestion at the time.

Mr. MICHAUD: That amendment has been before the committee.

Mr. NEILL: Was there not some suggestion made by the leader of the opposition that some such amendment would be necessary because of section 6, which provides a different penalty, two years' imprisonment, and so on?

Mr. STEWART: Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN: There was an amendment to clause 11 which was carried.

Mr. STEWART: What was the amendment? Was it adding some words in the same line of clause 11?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment was carried, but I shall read it again. It was to add after the word "shall" in the second line the following: "Unless some other penalty is expressly provided therefor in this act."

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF MATURED, MATURING AND CALLABLE OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 107, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, there was a very full discussion of the general principle of the bill on the introduction of the financial resolution. At that time some questions were asked by various members of the committee. I have before me a mass of information, and if hon. members would be good enough to repeat their questions, some of which interlock, I shall be very glad to answer them as we proceed with the various clauses.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Power for refunding.

Mr. STEWART: Has the minister put on Hansard a record of the maturities that he proposes to refund under this section?

Mr. DUNNING: They were put on Hansard as part of the record when the resolution was under consideration. I have not checked up the record since. I have not the Hansard before me; but if my hon. friend, who has Hansard in his hands, would be good enough to look further on in the discussion, he will find the list there.

Mr. LAWSON: Was that the list which amounted to $280,000,000?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say as to the total amount, but it was a complete list of maturities up to, I think, 1942.

Mr. STEWART: The last part of clause 2 reads as follows:

. . . securities . . . as defined in chapter ten of the statutes of Canada, 1929, and/or of any company or companies controlled through stock ownership by any company comprised in Canadian National Railways.

What is the scope of that? Would that include any of the very, very long list of companies that—?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. It is the same provision as has been in every one of the preceding acts.

Mr. STEWART: But it would cover any of the securities in any of that long list of companies that are controlled by the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. DUNNING: It covers the list of securities as shown in the annual report of the Canadian National Railways system.

Mr. STEWART: The minister has not the page reference?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member will find it in Hansard. I am advised that the list is contained on page 2329, April 28, "Maturities by years." The list is there, covering the whole of the securities which are dealt with by legislation.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Issue of substituted securities.

Mr. STEWART: The amount here, I notice, is $200,000,000, whereas the amount of the securities mentioned in the list read into Hansard is apparently in excess of that.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but we are not expecting that my hon. friends would be willing to give us authority to deal blanket-wise with the whole issue of outstanding securities. The amount in the previous legislation of 1935 was $200,000,000, and I did not think it would be wise to ask for authority greater than that which was given on that occasion. As I indicated in the discussions on the financial resolution, the power then given has been utilized to the extent of within, I think, five or six million dollars—in that neighbourhood, anyway. As I further indicated, the interest savings effected amount to over $3,500,000 annually as a result of the refunding effected under authority of the last statute, which this one seeks to replace. I did not think it wise to ask for authority for more than $200,000,000, and I doubt if there would be a willingness to extend it.

Mr. STEWART: There is no limit on the time during which this refunding may be arranged, is there?

Mr. DUNNING: No, except that maturities within the next few years amply exhaust the authority.

Mr. STIRLING: This year, I see, there are $21,000,000 of issues maturing, and next year there will be nearly $36,000,000?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister contemplate proceeding right away with such schemes under this authority?

Mr. DUNNING: It is difficult to answer that question. Arrangement of time and place of maturity is necessarily one of our most valuable assets in disposing of matters of this kind, and I should not like to indicate in advance to the holders of bonds or to the market that anything might be done on a particular date. I have found it of advantage to move rather suddenly in such matters.

Mr. STIRLING: When things are all propitious?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. My hon. friends who were questioning the amount will notice there are bonds maturing or callable before December 31, 1943, amounting to $207,600,000, which exceed the authority here given.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Approval of governor in council.

Mr. DUNNING: The same provision.

Mr. STEWART: Is there anything different in this from what has been found in the preceding legislation?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall just make sure. Section 4 is identical.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Cancellation and cremation of original securities.

Mr. STEWART: It is all consequential upon the sale?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Loans authorized to National company not exceeding aggregate amount of $200,000,000.

Mr. STEWART: This is a similar provision to the one in the former legislation?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Subsection 2 is new, and makes it quite clear that if the dominion government makes a temporary loan, securities of the railway company guaranteed by the dominion may be issued to pay for the temporary loan. That has always been done, in any case, and this is to make it clear that there is no question about the authority.

Mr. STEWART: The minister was good enough to say that he was prepared to read into Hansard the answers to the questions of certain hon. members, and if he will be good enough to do that in respect of any who are absent to-day I think it would be satisfactory. I understand that the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Danforth asked for certain information, also the hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the information asked for was, in most instances embodied in the table which I got the permission of the house to insert afterwards in the proceedings, on the last occasion. I believe that on April 28 the whole table of all the securities issued was included in those proceedings. I do not know of any other specific question, except that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked about the guarantees given by the province of British Columbia. The hon. member was under the impression that some arrangement had been made whereby the province was relieved of that obligation. I have ascertained that no such action has been taken. There is no relieving of that province of obligations any more than any of the other provinces that have guaranteed, and as a matter of fact in the last provincial accounts the amount guaranteed is shown by the province as a contingent liability. That answers the question of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. STEWART: I assume that the interest on those obligations has been paid by the dominion.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no question about that. The leader of the opposition asked for information regarding the latest Canadian National Railways bond issue. I have before me a complete memorandum showing the transaction in detail, which I shall read into Hansard if I may.

Subscription lists were opened on January 10, 1938, for a $50,000,000 Canadian National railway company dominion guaranteed bond issue. The issue was comprised of four-year two per cent bonds dated January 15, 1938, and due January 15, 1942. The issue price to the public was 99·25, yielding 2·20 per cent to maturity. There were also thirteen-year three per cent bonds dated December 15, 1935, and due December 15, 1950. The issue price to the public was 97, yielding 3·29 per cent to maturity. Net prices to the company were 99 for the four-year bonds and 96·25 for the thirteen-year bonds, or a cost to the company of 2·27 per cent and 3·36 per cent respectively. The issue was over-subscribed and the books were closed at 10.15 p.m. on the offering day. Allotments were made as follows: four-year bonds, $20,000,000, and thirteen-year bonds, $30,000,000. The proceeds of the issue, totalling $48,675,000, were used in repayment of temporary loans obtained from the government for capital expenditures and the retirement of miscellaneous obligations.

I shall detail in Hansard what repayments were made. I can read it at the moment, but I can get it more intelligently in tabular form later. In round figures, the 1932 loan of $8,077,000 carried an interest rate of 5¼ per cent. The 1933 loan of $8,228,000 carried an interest rate of 4¾ per cent. On the 1934 loan by the company to the government of $10,747,000 the interest rate was originally 4½ per cent. On the 1935 loan of $7,293,000 the interest rate was originally 4 per cent. With respect to this group of four loans, the interest rate as between the government and the Canadian National railway company was reduced to 3¾ per cent as from January 1, 1937; that is, a little over a year ago a readjustment in the rate was made to bring it more in conformity with the cost of money to the government than the rates formerly in existence, from the time the loans were originally made by the treasury to the Canadian National Railways. On the 1936 loan of $7,011,000 the rate was 3½ per cent from its inception, and on the 1937 loan of $7,317,000, the rate was 3½ per cent from its inception. So that the total repaid by the company to the government as a result of the floating of this guaranteed issue was $48,675,000. The amount of discount on the new issue, $2,325,000, was paid to the government from working capital of the company, reducing still further the amount advanced under the 1937 Financing and Guarantee act. The amount of temporary loans remaining unpaid as between the company and the government, on the books of the dominion at March 31 of this year, was $2,392,000.

1932..	$ 8,077,338 33	interest rate	5¼%*
1933..	8,228,101 10	" "	4¾%*
1934..	10,747,973 98	" "	4½%*
1935..	7,293,065 84	" "	4 %*
1936..	7,011,230 75	" "	3½%
1937..	7,317,290 00	" "	3½%
	$48,675,000 00

* Reduced to 3¾% as from Jan. 1, 1937.

Mr. STEWART: Are the rates mentioned by the minister those at which the government borrowed money at that time?

Mr. DUNNING: I believe that was the basis used, generally speaking, in determining the rate of loans. Of course, it is not anticipated generally that amounts will be allowed to be outstanding as between the treasury and the company on capital accounts over long periods of time. But in adjusting the financing of railway obligations to the general volume of national financing, it is necessary sometimes to defer refundings which otherwise might have been made at an earlier date, and so we have this accumulation for four years. The interest rate situation was reviewed and the rate reduced, as I have indicated, to 3¾ per cent, which was approximate to the effective rate; I believe there was a differential, but it approximated the rate at which the government was borrowing money. Then the whole matter was cleaned up by the issue which was made on January 10, 1938, leaving a small balance of $2,392,000 odd outstanding as between the Canadian National Railways and the government as at the end of the last fiscal year.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister handy a reply to the question of the hon. member for Danforth as found at the bottom of page 2343 of Hansard:

> I therefore repeat my question, What portion of this $200,000,000, which is part and parcel of the $978,000,000 at present guaranteed . . . originates with the provinces, and what portion consists of bonds of a kind to which no dominion or provincial responsibility or guarantee or mortgage is attached.

Mr. DUNNING: Obviously I cannot answer that question literally because the questioner asks what portion of the $200,000,000 will be used for this purpose. The $200,000,000 is under a general authority and may be used for refunding any one of several issues depending upon whether or not we exercise our right to call certain perpetuals. If we exercised our right to call the four per cent perpetuals, that would involve one kind of answer, whereas if we did not exercise our right to call the four per cent perpetuals, obviously the $200,000,000 authority would extend over a longer period and embrace a wider list. As a matter of fact, has not the information been already put on Hansard?

Mr. STIRLING: I see there is a table at page 2331.

Mr. DUNNING: On pages 2329 to 2331 the figures are set out showing in each case the source of the guarantee. If it is a dominion guarantee, it is there stated; if it is provincial, the province is indicated; and if it is unguaranteed, there is no notation in the column headed "Guaranteed by."

Mr. STIRLING: That probably answers the question.

NATURAL RESOURCES

CONFIRMATION OF CERTAIN AGREEMENTS BETWEEN DOMINION GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCES OF MANITOBA, SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 106, to amend the Manitoba Natural Resources Act, the Alberta Natural Resources Acts, and the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Acts.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. STIRLING: Was there considerable discussion during the resolution stage?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The purpose of the bill was explained. This bill is to confirm supplementary agreements which have been signed by the dominion government, represented by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and by the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Under the statutes transferring the natural resources to the three western provinces the interests of the dominion in all lands, mines and minerals were transferred to the crown in the right of the respective provinces. But apparently some doubt has been raised in the minds of some of the provincial authorities as to whether it is clear that the transfer included the waters and water powers. This bill is merely to remove those doubts. The agreements have been signed by the three provinces and by the Minister of Mines and Resources, and the legislatures of the three provinces have confirmed the agreements. There cannot be any change accorded to them, and we are not losing anything. It is rather to accede to the wishes of the legal officers of the provinces so that no doubt should exist.

Mr. STIRLING: It has no reference to anything in the national parks?

Mr. CRERAR: No. The agreement covers just the point mentioned by my colleague the Minister of Justice, and another one relating to conservation of gas and oil in the Turner valley. The first point is to make it clear that waters and water powers were transferred to the provinces when the natural resources generally were transferred. I think our law officers held that the water powers and waters are included in the term "lands"; but apparently there is some doubt in the minds of the legal officers advising the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan particularly, and to put the matter beyond any question the supplementary agreement was entered into.

On the other point, as to conservation, the transfer provided that resources which had been alienated or disposed of by the federal government by contract or licence prior to the transfer should not be disturbed except by regulations or changes which would apply generally throughout the province. That, I assume was to guard against any possibility of discrimination. However, it was found by the Alberta government that it was desirable to put into effect certain conservation policies in the Turner valley, which, as hon. members know, is the site of a crude oil field in Alberta. The first drillings developed gas, from which naphtha and some other oils were taken. Later the crude oil field developed. But the value of the crude oil wells depends in a large measure upon the pressure of gas that may be retained several thousand feet down in the earth. The Alberta government wished to put into effect a policy which would conserve or control the escape of this gas; that is, that they could say to individuals or companies, You must take steps to prevent this gas from escaping and thus lowering the pressure. In 1932 the Alberta legislature passed an act, known as the Turner Valley Gas Conservation Act, to effect this purpose. According to the information supplied to me, at least ninety per cent of the operators in the Turner valley favoured that legislation; but there were one or two, one particularly, who took exception to it. The question was carried to the supreme court, and the supreme court declared that under the transfer agreement the province did not have the power to make such regulations unless it made them to apply generally over the whole province. So there was a condition that, for instance, in another oil field at Wainwright the province did not wish to apply these particular policies of conservation because it was thought the result would be detrimental to the operators. Consequently what is sought in this bill is to modify or change the agreement, giving the province of Alberta the power to deal with this particular condition which exists in the Turner valley. According to the information given to me, as I have stated, that commends itself to the judgment of an overwhelming majority of the operators in the Turner valley. Only one or two take exception to it. The technical officials of the Department of Mines and Resources have examined into the matter, and they commend it strongly as a necessary step to maintain as long as possible the life of this Turner valley oil field.

Mr. STIRLING: The operators believed in decentralization?

Mr. CRERAR: It might be put in that way.

Mr. STEWART: I assume that over the period of years while these resources were administered by the dominion, before being turned over to the provinces under the prior agreements referred to in the bill, obligations must have been incurred from time to time and contracts entered into by the dominion government and rights created. When the resources were turned over to the provinces and these agreements made, were there any outstanding obligations on the part of the dominion which parties might ask the dominion to enforce, although the resources have been turned over to the provinces; or have the provinces assumed all obligations into which the dominion entered?

Mr. CRERAR: The latter is correct.

Mr. STEWART: Then I assume there is provision in the other agreements that the provinces undertake to fulfil all obligations of the dominion in respect of these resources?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; I think that is contained in the original agreements. The point at issue is this: There is no doubt that the Alberta legislature can apply conservation policies in the Turner valley, provided they are also applied generally over the whole province. But that would operate detrimentally to the operators, say in the Wainwright field, according to advice given to me. Consequently what is sought in reference to this point is to endow the Alberta government through its legislature with the power to set up conservation policies in this particular area where they are very much needed. I can assure the committee that I think the legislation is necessary.

Mr. STEWART: What right would this central government have in respect to the matters to which the minister has referred? If we have any rights, how can we delegate them, if the jurisdiction is still vested in this parliament? I would be under the impression that this parliament has no jurisdiction whatever in the matter which the minister has mentioned. But if I understood him correctly he suggests that the effect of this agreement will be to release or relinquish any rights this parliament has with respect to this control, and vest them in the province. Am I right?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): By a paragraph of the original transfer agreement, which has been ratified by the imperial parliament, it was agreed that the provisions of the said agreement might be varied by an agreement confirmed by concurrent statutes of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of the province. Therefore there is no doubt that we can vary the original agreement by concurrent legislation, and this has the force of law by an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom. We are authorized to vary without going back to that parliament.

Mr. STEWART: Does this vary the original agreement in any way?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is supposed to, in the case of the Turner valley. In the other case it is merely the removal of a doubt.

Mr. STEWART: I just want to find out what rights were left with this government in connection with the Turner valley.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I cannot add anything more to what my hon. friend has said in that connection.

Mr. CRERAR: I have probably failed to make my point clear. The Alberta government, through the legislature of that province, can bring in conservation regulations, if I may describe them in that way, but under the original transfer agreement those regulations must be made to apply generally over the whole province. What they wish is to obtain power to pass regulations not applicable to the whole province; in other words, they wish regulations to apply to a particular area because in a peculiar way that area requires them. Under the judgment of the supreme court in 1933 they have not that power. As a matter of fact, the Alberta legislature thought it had the power, and the previous government of that province passed the act to which I referred a moment ago, dealing with the conservation of the Turner valley gas. The court here, however, held that the legislature did not have power to pass such an act unless it applied generally over the whole province, which was not what they desired. This amended agreement seeks to give the government of Alberta, through its legislature, power to make regulations which may apply only to the Turner valley situation.

Mr. STEWART: It is a difficult point.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I add this, which I read in the agreement with Alberta, with regard to the matter of the Turner valley:

—by paragraph 2 of the said natural resources transfer agreement the province agreed that it would carry out, in accordance with the terms thereof, every contract to purchase or lease any crown lands, mines or minerals and every other arrangement whereby any person had become entitled to any interest therein as against the crown, and further agreed not to affect or alter any term of any such contract to purchase, lease or other arrangement by legislation or otherwise, except either with the consent of all the parties thereto, other than Canada, or in so far as any legislation may apply generally to all similar agreements relating to lands, mines or minerals in the province or to interests therein, irrespective of who might be the parties thereto;—

In other words, the Dominion of Canada bound the province at the time so that the province would not alter any term of any contract with any party unless all the parties were agreed or unless such alteration by legislation would apply generally to all agreements relating to lands, mines or minerals, irrespective of the place or the person affected. Apparently this worked some injury in that particular district, and paragraph 2 is to be amended by adding these words:

—or is legislation relating to the conservation of oil resources or gas resources or both by the control or regulation of the production of oil or gas or both, whether by restriction or prohibition and whether generally or with respect to any specified area or any specified well or wells or by repressuring of any oil field, gas field or oil-gas field, and, incidentally thereto, providing for the compulsory purchase of any well or wells.

That will enable the province to make new arrangements with regard to certain wells in a specified area, which it could not do under the original agreement.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. A. B. DAMUDE (Welland) moved the third reading of Bill No. 15, to incorporate Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): May I express the hope that the senate will give this bill its considered judgment the same as was done by this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION IN CASES OF DAMAGES CAUSED BY ERECTION OF SNOW FENCES

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 5, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Snow fences.

Mr. HOWE: I am entirely in accord with this bill except in one respect. This bill amends a very important act, and for that reason it has been scrutinized closely by the law officers of the crown. The fear is that amendments of this type will alter the basic character of the Railway Act. While this bill was in committee, the word "land" in line 12 was struck out. The law officers feel that if this amendment is allowed to stand it will set a precedent and have the tendency to turn the railway board into a court for small claims. The board does deal with land damages, and if the word "land" is allowed to remain in the bill, the provisions of the bill would be consistent with the purposes for which the board was created. Therefore, I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Resources, to move that section 1 of Bill No. 5, to amend the Railway Act, as reported by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, be amended by inserting the word "land" before the word "damages" in line 12, page one of the said bill.

Mr. CRERAR: I move accordingly.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT

JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION IN CASES OF DAMAGES CAUSED BY ERECTION OF SNOW FENCES

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 6, to amend the Government Railways Act (as reported from the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, recommended that the bill be not proceeded with).—Mr. Boulanger.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would ask for permission to withdraw this bill.

PRIVY COUNCIL APPEALS

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO HIS MAJESTY IN COUNCIL

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Cahan for the second reading of Bill No. 19, respecting appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member who moved the adjournment of the debate (Mr. Finn) is not present this evening, perhaps this bill may be permitted to stand by consent and still retain its place on the order paper.

Order stands.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISION RESPECTING PROHIBITED CLASSES

The house resumed from Friday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Neill for the second reading of Bill No. 38, to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that should the hon. member now speak he will close the debate.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. There has been a misunderstanding about that. When this bill was up before, the order was called and I nodded my head, indicating that I was ready, and your honour put the motion for second reading. I was just about to rise to speak, as was my right, when I heard the clock striking nine o'clock. Knowing that the rules did not permit any debate after nine o'clock, I did not commence my remarks, feeling confident that you would protect me. At that moment the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) made some remark to the effect that he would move the adjournment of the debate on this bill which was closely allied to another bill. His statement that this bill was allied to another bill was so ridiculous that I took it as a jest, and in a jesting manner I said that I would rise to a point of order as they were not allied. If the hon. member had said that the moon was made of cheese, I would not have interrupted him because that would have been his privilege. According to the rules no practical debate can take place after nine o'clock. I am in the hands of the house, but with all due deference I submit that I should be permitted to speak on the second reading of this bill which I am sponsoring.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The impression on this side of the house was that the hon. member had moved the second reading of his bill and expected the vote on it to come immediately. He has just told us that such was not his intention, but that he had intended to speak and would have proceeded to do so but for the action of another hon. member in moving the adjournment of the debate. I am sure the house will be quite prepared to accept my hon. friend's statement and allow him to proceed with the second reading.

Mr. NEILL: I thank the house and the Prime Minister for his courtesy. There is no doubt that technically, according to the record in Hansard—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was no disposition at all to close off the discussion.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of the bill I wish to discuss it.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be well if, before the hon. member moves the second reading, the order now standing for resuming the adjourned debate be discharged. It is mentioned in the orders of the house as: "Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Neill for the second reading of Bill No. 38, an act to amend the Immigration Act."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move:

That the order for resuming adjourned debate on second reading of Bill No. 38 be discharged and an order for the second reading of the said bill be substituted therefor.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved the second reading of Bill No. 38, to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the number of this bill is 38, and its title, "an act to amend the Immigration Act." It has no connection whatever, express or implied, with Bill No. 11, although some member made some comparison between the two, but there is no connection at all. Bill No. 11, if you compare it with this bill, might be allied in the sense that two people travelling in the same train to a common destination could be said to be allied, although they would hardly be called allies because they might be utterly antagonistic in aim and outlook.

Bill No 11 is an act respecting Japanese immigration, and it definitely and specifically, by name, excludes Japanese nationals from entering Canada. The word "excludes" is not used, but that is the effect, and it is admitted to be so.

Bill No. 38, which is now before the house for second reading, and is an act to amend the Immigration Act, has nothing to do with that at all. It makes no reference to excluding anybody by name or by race. It does not even restrict orientals alone but applies to seventy-four per cent of the world's population, comprising many races, and, of course, an enormous population. It does not even stop them from entering Canada if they comply with certain conditions laid down in the bill.

I shall now explain the bill. It amends the principle that has been in our Immigration Act now for twenty-five years. I refer to section 3 of the Immigration Act, chapter 93 of the revised statutes of Canada, paragraph (t) of which provides that among those who are prohibited immigrants are those over fifteen years of age physically capable of reading who cannot read the English or French language or some other language or dialect. That is our law to-day and has been for many years. This bill simply goes a very little further, makes a very fair amplification of the same principle, and says in addition that the language which they use must be commonly spoken by and native to the people of some country or some political division in Europe. That is the only change it makes. It only brings us in Canada into line with Australia and New Zealand, of which I shall speak later.

Moreover, this is what I might call a legislative olive branch. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking on the second reading of Bill No. 11, indicated the opposition of his government to that bill, I considered the situation. In politics I think it is a good axiom, when you cannot get the right remedy for the grievance of which you complain, while not relaxing your determination to get it, to accept such minor measure as you can get as a palliative for the time being, and use that as a stepping-stone to obtain a greater measure of justice which no doubt time will bring. So in this bill I gathered up all the objections, all the prejudices, all the propaganda, all the opposition to Bill No. 11, and I said: I think the government is wrong; but the government is in the majority, and the government majority must rule. Therefore let us abandon this bill for the moment until the government is perhaps better informed by the result of a general election—

Mr. DUNNING: Is Bill No. 11 abandoned?

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. NEILL: For the moment. We are dealing now with Bill No. 38. So I said: Let us wait until the government is better informed as a result of a general election, which in British Columbia at any rate will show very definitely what the wishes of the people are. My definition of democracy—it may be a wrong one—at least contains this provision, that the government, those who govern, should govern according to the wishes of the governed, provided that their wishes are sufficiently and definitely and legally expressed. And so we say: Abandon for the moment the proper principle contained in Bill No. 11 and adopt this lesser measure of a totally different kind, which will in some measure placate the people of British Columbia, whose views have been expressed very plainly.

I hold in my hand a summary of the presentations made by the Pattullo government of British Columbia to the Rowell commission. It summarizes fifteen important items, and the one which they apparently deemed of sufficient importance to put first is this:

> Oriental immigration into Canada should be prohibited, and as many orientals as possible returned to their home countries.

Then here I have a resolution passed within the last few weeks by the council of the city of Vancouver, a Conservative minded body. This is not the chronic obsession of some solitary member, but expresses the feeling of the people of British Columbia as reflected in a resolution passed by the city council of the largest city in the province and the third largest city in Canada. They ask that the dominion parliament enact legislation to prevent a further influx of these people into our country.

This bill asks nothing like that at all. It does not ask that these people should be sent home or that they should be excluded, it asks simply that the immigrants shall be restricted to those who can read the language indicated. While I am anxious to secure the best that can be obtained for the people of British Columbia, in friendliness to the government, too, I should be glad to see them accept this bill because it is a way out of the unpopularity that will accrue to them if they reject Bill No. 11 without accepting some reasonable substitute.

It is customary, in introducing a bill, to anticipate the objections that will be made against it and to defend the bill against such attacks, but in this case I am at a loss because I do not see how anybody can object to this bill. I cannot see in it anything to which anyone could take exception.

One of the charges made against Bill No. 11 was that it was aimed at Japan, and certainly it was. But this bill is nothing of that kind at all. Japan is not mentioned first or last, neither directly nor indirectly, nor by inference. The restriction is entirely general, and general to such an extent that, as I say, it applies to seventy-four per cent of the world's population. The most sensitive pro-Jap advocate could not find any loophole for complaint in this bill.

Another objection made was that it touched the pride of the Japanese nation; that the word "exclusion" was antagonistic to their pride. That expression which I have heard for the last seventeen years is a mere subterfuge, a mere diplomatic phrase, that is trotted out when it suits them. It is wholly incompatible with what we have observed of their ideals in diplomatic and other fields, of their sense of their obligations, and so forth. It is a mere phrase used where convenient. However, I am willing for the moment to accept it at the face value. It utterly falls down as applied to Bill No. 38, because this bill contains no reference to exclusion. Under the bill, in fact, it is impossible totally to exclude anybody, because it leaves the door open to those who can read the English or French language; we go further in our gracious hospitality, and we will take in anyone, even from the continent of Europe, who can read any language that is current there. Surely that is neither a hard nor an unreasonable condition considering the condition of the world to-day; and it is of almost universal application.

Another argument was—I have heard it again and again, and I have heard it cited by the Prime Minister—that Japan particularly objected to that phase of any exclusion because it was aimed at them specifically. They said they would not mind at all if it was general and took in all nations; but their pride, or what they call their pride, was touched because they were specifically named. If that is the case, this bill is right into their hand; it should suit them. We do not exclude anybody, but we restrict immigration—from where? From India—our own vast domain of India—from China, Japan, South America, the Malay peninsula and those countries in the neighbourhood, Siam and Borneo, constituting a large number both in races and in population. In 1922, when the restriction resolution was before the house, the Hon. Charles Stewart was minister of immigration. The resolution called for the exclusion of orientals. Mr. Stewart introduced an amendment which struck out the word "exclusion" and substituted the words "effective restriction." I asked the Prime Minister of the day, who was the same gentlemen who now occupies that position, if we could understand by that such a measure of restriction as, for instance, was used in Australia, and he assured me that that would be the case. I have the quotation if it is needed. Well, we have not got so far yet. Sixteen years have passed; we have been looking for a phrase to meet the situation, and I suggest we have it now. This bill does that. It gives us an effective restriction equivalent to that in Australia without using the words "total exclusion."

We have precedents. The lawyers are great on precedents; they want to go slow until they see that a thing has been done before. We have a precedent of our own. For twenty-five years an educational test has been administered to people coming in. We have the precedent of Australia. This is what the Australian act says with regard to prohibited classes:

> Any person who fails to pass the dictation test:
> That is to say, who, when an officer or person duly authorized in writing by an officer dictates to him not less than fifty words in any prescribed language, fails to write them out in that language in the presence of the officer or authorized person.

It will be noticed that this goes much further than my bill, because it means any language at all, whereas I would be satisfied with any language of Europe. Their law requires any language prescribed by the government, and the government always takes great care to prescribe a language in which the immigrant cannot qualify. For instance, if he can speak six languages they would try him with the seventh, in which he would be bound to fail. I may say that in New Zealand the law is the same, but with this difference, that there they allow anyone to qualify if he can write fifty words in any language of Europe, whereas in Australia it is just "any language."

There is an incident connected with that which may be of interest to our Scotch friends in the house. Originally in Australia the words were also "any language of Europe"; but apparently some Scotsman got himself appointed inspector, and from some weird sense of humour he set a Chinaman to write out fifty words in Gaelic as being a prescribed language of Europe. The case will be found in the law books of 1905, Rex v. Wilson. But the Supreme Court of Australia decided that Gaelic was not a "language of Europe," very much to the disgust of the Scotch contingent, and there was very nearly a revolution. Kilts were donned and sporrans were waved—or whatever you do with sporrans—claymores were drawn and the fiery cross was sent abroad in the land. The government realized the danger of the situation, and capitulated, and at the next session of the house they changed the act to read "any language," which allowed the Gaelic brand of language to be used also. But in New Zealand it is "any language of Europe," and that is all I ask in connection with this bill.

Take another precedent, affecting the East Indians, those who live in India. They are our own fellow citizens, and some of them qualify ethnologically as being Aryans and therefore white men; but we prohibit them from coming into Canada, and the way in which we do it is by the barest subterfuge. We say they cannot come in unless they come in a ship proceeding directly from the port of embarkation to the port of debarkation in Canada, and moreover they must come on a through passage ticket. Then we take steps to see they cannot get a through passage ticket. It is done as simply and obviously as that. They might complain about it; but still that is the way we do it; that is the precedent.

I cannot think of any other objection. It is sanctioned by our own immigration law; it is sanctioned by our custom as regards the East Indians; it has been the law of New Zealand and Australia for at least thirty years. As I said, it is an olive branch, and it is also a test of the sincerity of the Japanese who are opposing this bill. We have met every objection to Bill No. 11, and have obviated it. I ask the house to note also that there is in the bill a provision that it will not come into effect until July, 1939, which gives ample time for the amenities of diplomacy to come into operation and also to make such arrangements that immigrants on the water would not be incommoded, but would have ample time.

To sum up; the law is of general application. It has been in force thirty years in the sister dominions of New Zealand and Australia. It is merely idle talk to say that we must not do this lest we offend one small nation comprising seven per cent of seventy-four per cent of the world population, and now subject to a similar restriction in these other dominions. If the house, and of course the government, will accept this bill I would be willing, with the consent of those hon. members who have promised me their support of Bill No. 11, to withdraw it. But I would say this to the government: British Columbia wants Bill No. 11 and will not be satisfied until she gets it, and she will get it after she has expressed herself sufficiently strongly at the election. But for the moment this bill would meet the situation and would meet a very serious situation in British Columbia. I cannot too strongly impress upon the house and the government how serious that situation is. It is all very well as long as things are going along smoothly, but there is a very strong and bitter undercurrent about this matter. You may gauge its importance when you find the city council of Vancouver taking it up, and every paper carries resolutions passed by this or that body along the same line. British Columbia will not be satisfied with anything but Bill No. 11. But for the moment, for the sake of peace, for the sake of the representations made by the Prime Minister and the views he expressed, founded upon what he says is his greater and inner knowledge of international matters, it would be a reasonable and fair compromise to accept this bill and satisfy British Columbia for the moment, and it would be a measure of justice. I earnestly commend it to the consideration of the government and of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before we proceed any further, the rules of the house as adopted on June 14, 1923, among other provisions contain the following:

> In the text of the bill, on the left hand page, new matter shall be indicated by such typographical means as may best suit the varying circumstances of each case, such as brackets, italics, underlining, asterisks, etc. Opposite each clause, on the right hand page, the enactment amended thereby, or so much thereof as is essential, shall be printed with the proposed changes to be made therein similarly indicated.

The bill that the house has before it has nothing at all opposite the clause on the right hand page. It is true that on the left hand side new matter is underlined; but the opposite page does not contain what the rules state should be complied with, namely so much of the enactment as is essential to be printed with the proposed changes to be made therein similarly indicated. Before we proceed further, I would ask your honour to give a ruling on the point whether the bill does comply with the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do any other hon. members wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. NEILL: On the point of order, I submit that the bill does comply with the essential feature of the rule, which is that changes shall be indicated by such typographical means as may best suit the varying circumstances of each case, such as brackets, italics, underlining and so on. That is done in the bill before us. The part which the Prime Minister says is left out is the "explanatory notes" on the right hand page, but that omission in so sense interferes with the essential part of the bill. The bill is so simple that I suppose the law clerk who drew it—I did not draw it—thought it unnecessary to put, in explanatory notes, what is so obvious. A number of bills have gone through the house since that rule was made and they have had no explanatory notes on the right hand page, the reason being I have no doubt, that the bills were so obvious as to render such explanations unnecessary. I would call attention to page 348 of the rules, subsection (3) of paragraph 7:

When a clause repeals an existing section, subsection or other minor division of a section, that section, subsection or division, or so much thereof as is essential, shall be printed opposite the clause.

The purpose of the explanatory notes on the right hand side of the bill is to enable us to see what we are amending. In this instance we are not striking out anything in order to substitute something else, and therefore it was impossible to print on the right hand page the provision to be struck out—impossible for the simple reason that nothing was being struck out. I have not looked up other bills on the file; but hon. members will find, on looking through their files, case after case where nothing is printed on the right hand page of the bill.

Mr. CHURCH: On the point of order, may I point out that Bill No. 11 is altogether different from Bill No. 38, which is now before us. The bills are not even allied. I am surprised that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has raised the point. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) moved the adjournment of the debate so that no one else could speak. Is this a free parliament or not? None of the rules quoted is at all relevant to the bill, because Bill No. 11 deals with an entirely different principle. I do not think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. NEILL: I would call attention to Bill No. 106, which is a case in point. There are no explanatory notes on the right hand page, but that would not prevent the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni proposes in this bill to substitute a new paragraph (t) of section 3 of the Immigration Act. He does so by adding a few words that are underlined in his bill, but he also seeks to attain his purpose by leaving out of paragraph (t) as it now stands in the act, a very important provision.

Mr. NEILL: What is that?

Mr. CRERAR: The method by which the test of literacy shall be applied.

Mr. NEILL: That is not left out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before you give your ruling, I might call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to another paragraph in the rules which ought to govern in this matter:

A memorandum by the draftsman explaining briefly the reasons for each clause, shall be appended to the bill, or distributed therewith. Whenever practicable the memorandum shall be printed on the right hand page of the bill, in paragraphs opposite the clauses referred to and numbered correspondingly.

There is in or with this bill no memorandum whatever by the draftsman explaining the reasons for its clauses.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have listened to the objections raised by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and also by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), and in my opinion both points raised are well taken. The rules that appear at page 348 of Beauchesne were adopted by the house to govern bills of the sort now under consideration. Bill No. 38 does not comply with any of the requirements set out in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 on page 348. I must therefore declare the bill out of order.

Mr. NEILL: I feel very much tempted to divide the house on your ruling, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the words "whenever practicable...."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Whenever practicable" follows independently.

Mr. NEILL: The rule says that whenever practicable the memorandum shall be printed. I do not wish to detain the house, but I do not think the government gets very much credit out of its method of disposing of this bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The ruling has been given and the hon. gentleman may appeal if he wishes to do so.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT, REVISED STATUTES, 1927, CHAPTER 95

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Neill for the second reading of Bill No. 11, respecting Japanese immigration.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I assume I am in order in speaking now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member is closing the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to direct the attention of the house to the fact that the hon. member in speaking now closes the debate.

Mr. RINFRET: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has the floor. Hansard will show that on the last occasion on which the bill was under consideration he had begun his speech. He therefore has the floor.

Mr. NEILL: This is Bill No. 11. Having been defeated on one front, I have to fall back upon a line of defence which I hope will be more acceptable to the government. When the bill came up last on March 22, I had spoken for a minute and a half before the hour had elapsed. A member on the government side, writing home to British Columbia, had this to say in his news notes:

> It was expected that a vote would take place on this but Mr. Neill, who rose to speak at five minutes to nine refused to end his remarks and let the vote take place.

That statement is neither correct nor fair. It was not five minutes to nine but one and a half minutes, as shown by the records of the house and of Hansard. It is not fair, because it says I refused to let the vote be taken. I refused to let the bill be defeated at that time for the reason I shall give. This bill was brought up for second reading on February 17; it was spoken to by a number of hon. members in its favour, and then the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke against it and moved the adjournment of the debate. Subsequently it came up on three or four different occasions, when four and two and three hon. members respectively, on the government side spoke until the time elapsed. They were all against the bill, with the exception of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who spoke for a few minutes. It was well known that the government intended to defeat the bill, because the Prime Minister told us at the beginning that he could not accept it. That would be the end of the bill for this session. As it was going to be defeated it did not make much difference whether it were defeated three weeks ago or to-day, but it was not fair that it should go out to the world after nine men spoke against it—I do not say they used sound arguments, but they did argue against it—and with no attempt being made to rebut their arguments. I did not want the bill to go to defeat without the house and country being informed as to the rebuttal arguments which could be put forward. That is important because this will not be the end of this bill; the fight will be carried to the next election. When the next election comes, I shall have ample time to visit the electorate of Vancouver island and the lower mainland and explain the situation to them fully. I am afraid some hon. members of the government party will have some difficulty in squaring themselves with their constituencies. They may say, "Yes, I voted for it, but the government would not permit it to carry." But they should have used their influence with their party to allow it to pass.

Let us deal now with some of the reasons alleged against the bill. First we were told: Do not worry about this bill; we will give you a committee of investigation to find out whether orientals are coming in illegally. But who composed the committee? A gentleman from Ottawa, and the head of the police department of Vancouver and of the immigration department, the two men on whom blame would rest if it were discovered that there had been any illegal entry. Human nature is the same in British Columbia as anywhere else. Does anyone think these men were going to condemn themselves? The real way to go about it, if there were to be an investigation along these lines, would be to appoint a retired supreme court judge; there are several available in British Columbia. But the really effective way to get practical results would be to do as was done in the war—have all orientals registered. That is no disgrace; I had to register, along with other people, and produce my registration card on demand. If that were done it would be a simple and ready test; for if any oriental could not show that he was in the country legally he would have no card.

On March 22 the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said he would endorse the bill if a proviso were put in that it should not come into effect until July, 1939. I hereby accept that condition, and hope for his support.

The bill could easily have passed but for the announcement by the Prime Minister that the government was against it. I make full allowance for the inner knowledge that the Prime Minister has of international affairs, but I think he might have given us some information, lifted the curtain to some extent. When we compare the situation in Great Britain, where members of parliament, even cabinet ministers, rise in their places and speak with almost brutal frankness regarding the conduct of nations in Europe, even in the present strained situation, I think we might have had some explanation of the reason why it was so urgent that this bill be not passed. I submit that the reasons given were inadequate. We were told that it was calculated to provoke war. That is a very strong statement, one which, I think, is hardly justified. If we were proposing something unfair to the Japanese nation, to take some territory away from them, or some of their rights, or some of their land in British Columbia, or to deport them, there might have been some justification. But what are we doing? We are seeking only to regain control of our own immigration, with which we should never have parted. To do so was a foolish thing, done by no other nation in the world. How can any nation, Japan or any other, object to our taking back control of our own affairs? One might as well complain because his neighbour comes and asks for the return of the lawn-mower that one borrowed from him.

Then it was suggested by the Prime Minister that as the immigration was so small—I think he put it at about 130—it was not worth going to war over, or provoking war over. Well, I can turn that argument roundabout. If the number of immigrants were only 130—it is not so, but let us assume that it was—is it worth Japan's while under present conditions to go to war over it, especially when they know that we are entirely within our rights?

The Prime Minister admitted, as reported at page 569 of Hansard, that Japan and China should be treated on an equality. But the principal argument alleged was that Japan might not like the action proposed. That is a poor reason. If we are going to be governed along those lines, we shall have to ask Japan if we have her permission to fortify British Columbia. I am sure she would not like that either.

Nations often do things that other nations do not like. The United States periodically raise their tariff against us; we do not like it, but I have heard it said often in this house that it is the right of the United States to do that. The United States at one time imposed a quota against immigration from Canada; we did not like it but we knew it was their right. How ready we are to take offence against British public men expressing opinions concerning our affairs! Let one of even humble capacity travelling through Canada as a tourist make some casual observation touching upon the way we govern ourselves, and we rise up in arms and almost wave the bloody sword and say we will not be dominated by Downing street; let the British people mind their own business. I have often blushed at the way in which we have treated British visitors. But no offence is taken; Britain smiles and says: They are a young nation; they will learn better as they get older. Apparently it is right and proper that we should insult our friends but accept insults from other nations. Let me quote a dispatch from Tokyo. This comes through the Associated Press; it is no propaganda of mine got in some hole-and-corner way:

> Tokyo, March 7—Foreign Minister Koki Hirota declared in the Diet to-day that American-born Japanese, even though living in America, "should be educated as Japanese."
> The statement was in reply to questions from Bunji Suzuki, labour leader, who asked if the government had any educational policy for those of the "second generation."
> Hirota replied: "A majority of Japanese born in the United States in recent years cancelled Japanese citizenship. They must receive an American education. But they remain Japanese, and they should be educated as Japanese in order to retain Japanese virtues. For this purpose the semi-official migration association keeps close connection with them."

We know what that means. It means that Japanese born in this country are maintaining a dual nationality. They leave our schools and get educated in their own schools. I wonder whether we would tolerate that if it were proposed in the British parliament, for instance.

Both the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) referred to what happened in the United States. What did happen? In 1924 the United States put a complete ban upon oriental immigration, and both hon. gentlemen quoted what Japan said at that time, with the vague suggestion that we had better be careful. That was all that was said, and what happened; I asked the Minister of Mines and Resources? Just exactly nothing happened. Even trade continued to flow along the usual lines between Japan and the United States. Nothing happened because they knew the United States were well within their rights. Did they go to war with the United States over that? They did not. The other day Brazil did the same thing. Japan made one of these infamous gentleman's agreements with Brazil, and I see that Brazil has become fed up with it and has passed a law cancelling the gentleman's agreement, imposing a very effective restriction against the Japanese. Did they go to war with Brazil over that? They did not. We read in the papers the other day that the government of Panama issued a most unfriendly, almost hostile, order that no Japanese fishermen were to come within so many miles of the coast of that country or they would blow them up. That is going pretty far; I would call that an unfriendly act. Did they go to war over that? They did not. Did they go to war with South Africa when that country negotiated a total exclusion agreement? Did they go to war with Australia or New Zealand when they did the same thing? They did not. If the Japanese swallow exclusion by these other countries but become insulted when Canada does the same thing, I say that is evidence of their insincerity, unsupported by any claim in international relationship or anything that governs as between friendly nations. When they say their pride will not permit them to be excluded, they are just as insincere as they are with all their talk about the loyalty of second generation Japanese. It comes out in their own parliament that they are arranging to have these second generation Japanese remain Japanese in thought and education.

Apparently the government is too apt to look at the Japanese angle and none other. Let us forget the Japanese viewpoint for a moment. Let us consider Canada; let us consider British Columbia, which will be a bloody shambles if there is a war in the Pacific. Let us think of that. Let us think of the Chinese viewpoint. The other day on the second reading of this bill the Prime Minister said that nations were slow to forget any injuries they thought they had sustained. Quite so; and he applied that to Japan. It also applies to China, does it not? Let us consider the Chinese viewpoint. In days to come we might be glad if we do something to make the Chinese forget that for sixteen years they have been excluded from Canada entirely, while we have let in Japanese. We have entirely excluded East Indians but have allowed Japanese to come in. It might be a good thing if we did something to make China forget that. It would be a fine gesture, would it not, not to give them any favour but to put the Japanese on equality with the Chinese, to put the two countries on the same basis. And it might be a good idea if we could help China to forget the way in which our minister treated them. We sent to Japan an infirm, old man, unversed in diplomacy, not acquainted with the country, and he allowed himself to be loaded up to the hilt with Japanese propaganda. Then he came back and disseminated it throughout Canada. It was not a globe-trotting tourist who could be passed by with a smile; he was our accredited minister. Do you think China has forgotten that? If we passed this bill it would be a gesture which would help them to forget it.

Perhaps it is a question of expediency; perhaps it is the goddess of expediency that governs. Let us take her off her pedestal and treat everybody on the same basis; let us check off our minister and treat them all alike. If expediency is to govern, by all means let us play with China, because Japan will not be a powerful nation for very much longer, and she does not know the meaning of the word gratitude. China will come back a strong, virile, united nation, with a sense of gratitude to those who have been her friends, and offering an enormous potential market of four hundred million people to take our goods. With no country in the world is it so dangerous to adopt an attitude of not standing up for your rights as it is with Japan. The school bully always gets more and more aggressive, pushing around people who do not want to quarrel with him, until some small boy half his size punches him on the nose and then everyone wonders why someone did not do it before. We cannot afford to adopt an attitude like that. Let us, as the French say, "Ayez du courage"; let us stand upon our own feet. "Dare to be a Daniel; dare to stand alone; dare to have a purpose firm." We need not be truculent; but let us stand up for our rights. That is the best way by which to bring about peace abroad and prosperity at home.

I have been accused of trying to stir up racial prejudice. Not at all; I have only pointed out the impossibility of assimilating such an alien race. One of the greatest obstacles to assimilation is the lack of marriage between the two races. The other day I saw a record of the births of one hundred thousand Canadian children; of that number I think only seven were Eurasian, and nearly all of those were the issue of white individuals and Chinese, not Japs. I think there was only one or possibly two out of the one hundred thousand born to white and Japanese parents. They do not want to marry us and we do not want to marry them. Look at Europe, where for centuries the Greek and the Turk have lived together in enmity. The best that civilization has been able to do is to move them by the hundreds of thousands back to where they came from. Look at the Arabs and Jews in Palestine, where the best solution that can be devised by the British government is to put a fence down the middle of the country and keep each race on its own side. Yet we talk about assimilating these people.

There is another point, perhaps the most important of all. A new policy has been developed in the countries of the world. It is now considered right and proper for a nation to interfere in the affairs of another nation, provided the second nation contains enough nationals of the first nation. That is what happened in Austria; that is what will happen in Czechoslovakia. Never in the world has there been such a coup d'etat as occurred in Austria the other day, because they had so many German sympathizers in that country ready to take action. Suppose we should be told some day that because Japan had thirty thousand nationals in British Columbia she insisted that they must be given the vote and all the privileges our own citizens possess, the opportunity to become lawyers, doctors and all the rest of it. What would we do about that?

Will the government meet the wishes of British Columbia or defy them? Will the government say that it is going to govern without regard to the wishes of those governed? That is not democracy; that is autocracy.

It is nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills having expired—

Some hon. MEMBERS: It is not nine o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not nine o'clock yet, Mr. Speaker. Seeing there is still a little time left, I should perhaps direct your honour's attention to the fact that, under the ruling which your honour gave just a moment ago, this bill too is out of order; in fact, it would seem to me that the rule cited is even more applicable to this bill than the previous one, because, according to the words of the mover himself, it is impossible to understand this bill without some explanation. Again I would quote the paragraph from page 348 of Beauchesne:

In the text of the bill, on the left hand page, new matter shall be indicated by such typographical means as may best suit the varying circumstances of each case, such as brackets, underlining, asterisks, etc.—

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is nine o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the order of business under consideration at six o'clock.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SHIPMENT OR TAKING OUT OF FURS WITHOUT PROPER AUTHORITY

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 110, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Mr. STEWART: Explain.

Mr. CRERAR: The purpose of the bill, Mr. Speaker, is to enable the government, through the council which administers the Northwest Territories, to exercise a closer control over the export or movement of furs from the Northwest Territories to any of the provinces. Abuses in this respect have developed during the last few years on account of the increasing number of people going into the territories and the augmented use of airplanes for transportation both into and out of the territories. Trappers frequently are taken to their trapping grounds by airplane and are brought out at the end of the season by the same method.

In 1927 the Northwest Territories Act was amended to provide that any one taking furs out of the territories must obtain a permit. A year or two later regulations establishing the charge that would be levied, was passed. This corresponds to the royalties imposed by every province in Canada on the taking of furs. This method worked very well, but, as I said a moment ago, the development in airplane transportation has led to evasions of the tax. It is suspected that much of the fur is being taken out without the necessary fee being paid.

This bill seeks to overcome this trouble by applying the principle applied by the Department of National Revenue in connection with excise collections. There is being added to the act a new section, the first clause of which reads:

A judge of the exchequer court of Canada shall grant a writ of assistance upon application made to him for that purpose by His Majesty's attorney general of Canada.

That is similar to the powers granted in connection with the administration of the Excise Act, only in that instance the writ of assistance may be secured from a judge other than a judge of the exchequer court. Under authority of this writ of assistance the baggage of a passenger who is suspected of bringing out furs illegally may be searched. Other provisions in the amendment deal with the disposal of the furs and the vehicle by which they are being transported. Subsection 4 provides that sections 171 to 184 inclusive of the Customs Act shall apply. These sections would provide for the disposal of a vehicle that may be impounded.

The necessity of this provision is emphasized by the fact that there are practically only two airplane bases at which airplanes from the Northwest Territories would land. One is at Prince Albert in Saskatchewan and the other is at Cooking Lake, about fifteen or eighteen miles from Edmonton. When a trapper is suspected of bringing out furs illegally, it is impossible to get a regular search warrant to authorize the search of his luggage before he gets away. Once he gets away, it is almost impossible to locate him again. Provisions of this bill would enable prompt action to be taken.

For the information of the house I might say that the total value of the fur catch in the Northwest Territories for 1935-36, the latest figures obtainable, was $1,188,000 in round figures. In 1934-35 the value of the catch was $1,678,000. At the present time the cycle of the fur catch is low, but several years ago the value of the catch ran over $2,000,000. In 1926-27 the value was almost $3,000,000. The revenue from this fur catch amounted to $57,000 in 1938. The revenue in 1936 was $105,000, and in 1935 it reached the highest point in any single year, $146,000. This matter has been receiving the attention of the Department of Justice, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Northwest Territories council, and they have come to the conclusion that the best method of dealing with these abuses is by means of the amendment to the act which I am now asking the house to adopt.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, the principle of this bill seems to be to strengthen the powers behind this law and to provide additional facilities for preventing the abuses which apparently have grown up. Assuming, as we must, that the law is sound, I can see no objection to the principle of this bill. There is no question that our laws should be enforced and that we should provide adequate machinery and facilities for that purpose.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

[Mr. Crerar.]

On Section 1—Judge to grant writ of assistance.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there any connection between this bill and the spectacular fur robbery that occurred two years ago somewhere south of Aklavik?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not recall the particulars of the incident to which my hon. friend refers. There may be some connection, but I cannot state definitely at the moment. Furs have been taken out illegally from the territories, and this practice is tending to grow and, I think, will grow still further with the increased use of the airplane. A trapper may go to his trapping ground by airplane, and an airplane brings him out when his trapping season is over. He does not report his furs to the authorities. He comes out, lands his furs at Edmonton, we will say, or Prince Albert, and sells them and there is no way of apprehending him. I am not a legal man and am not familiar with legal phraseology; but I understand that a writ of assistance is a sort of continuing search warrant issued to a particular individual; as I stated a moment ago, the bill has received the careful study not only of the officers of the department but of the mounted police and officers of the justice department as well, and the result of their combined wisdom as to how best to check this evil is the bill now before us.

Mr. STIRLING: How, practically, will the trapper go to work? Will he go to an official of the department and ask for permission to export so many furs?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; he is given a licence unless he is a native of the Northwest Territories. Indians and half-breeds are not required to take out a licence. The trapper is supposed to report his furs out at the expiration of his period of trapping; but in some cases he fails to do so, or he may report only part of his furs and sell the balance, and there is to-day no way of ascertaining whether he is reporting correctly. This provision is to enable a search to be made where it is suspected that a person is selling furs and evading the tax he should pay.

Mr. PELLETIER: Are the provinces in any way concerned with the regulations respecting furs illegally caught or sent out? Has there been any recommendation from any of the provincial departments of lands and mines with respect to the matter?

Mr. CRERAR: This relates to the Northwest Territories.

Mr. PELLETIER: But the minister said that the furs coming out of the Northwest Territories would be landed at Edmonton or Prince Albert, and I was wondering if the provincial governments had any jurisdiction, and, if so, if they had made any recommendations to the federal department.

Mr. CRERAR: No; they have made no recommendations. As a matter of fact, they are not interested in the furs that come out of the Northwest Territories because they do not collect any royalties on such furs. It is purely a matter of interest to the federal administration.

Mr. CAHAN: I assume that the search under this proposed amendment can take place only within the Northwest Territories. It certainly is not intended to give these officers any special jurisdiction in organized provinces.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; it has to be within the jurisdiction of the court or judge granting such writ.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so. I was simply replying indirectly to what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) had said.

Mr. STEWART: As I read the explanatory note, the offence is the carrying out or removal of furs from the territory. It says:

No person shall export, carry or cause to be exported or carried out of the Territories, any furs, without first having obtained a permit to do so.

That permit would not necessarily be issued to the trapper at all. I take it that a person might go in and buy the furs.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is the law as it is now before this amendment.

Mr. STEWART: Will that not be the law still?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My friend is reading the provision under the law of May 7, 1929. The amendment is for the purpose of enforcing that law.

Mr. STEWART: I understand that; but suppose a person goes in to buy furs, and buys them from a native or trapper; he is the one who must take out a licence.

Mr. CRERAR: He takes out a permit, but before he gets the permit the authorities have to be satisfied that the proper tax has been paid.

Mr. STEWART: Exactly, before he gets the permit to take it out. Then I notice that the exchequer court is the court that may issue the writ. Is there any other court having jurisdiction there and authority to issue the writ?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. STEWART: No other court or authority that could exercise the powers outlined in the bill?

Mr. CRERAR: No. In that respect, as I said a few moments ago, this section is a little bit narrower than the similar section in the Customs Act dealing with the excise duty.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NEW WESTMINSTER HARBOUR

EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES AND REMUNERATION OF COMMISSIONERS OUT OF HARBOUR REVENUES

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce amendments to the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners Act to extend the boundaries of the harbour and to provide remuneration for the services of the commissioners out of harbour revenues.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, the bill founded on the resolution divides itself into two parts, as the resolution indicates. The first part is to include in the boundaries of New Westminster harbour a small area lying between the present jurisdiction of the New Westminster harbour commission and the jurisdiction of the North Fraser harbour commission. This area arises out of a change in the boundaries of the North Fraser harbour commission, and it is desirable to have either one commission or the other have jurisdiction over it.

The second part provides that the governor in council may set up such remuneration for the New Westminster harbour commission as the government may determine. The present situation is somewhat unsatisfactory. No provision is made for paying the commissioners, so the remuneration is obtained through appointing the chairman the commission manager of the port, for which he draws a substantial salary, and I believe that part of his salary is paid by him to his two fellow commissioners. It is believed that it is not desirable to do indirectly a thing which is not provided for in the act. Similar harbour commissioners throughout Canada are paid small salaries for their services, and the government believes that the request of the city of New Westminster should be granted and that provision should be made for the remuneration of the harbour commissioners.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this an area which at present is in the North Fraser area, and is it going to be put into New Westminster?

Mr. HOWE: No; this is a sort of no-man's land between the two. At one time it was included in the North Fraser harbour commission jurisdiction, but the boundaries of the North Fraser harbour commission jurisdiction were changed some three or four yeras ago, and for some reason that I cannot explain this territory was dropped from the jurisdiction of the North Fraser commission. At the moment it is administered by the Department of Transport, but I believe it should be administered by one or other of the harbour boards, and it seems properly to come within the jurisdiction of the New Westminster harbour commission.

Mr. STIRLING: Who now owns it?

Mr. HOWE: It is owned by the crown and administered by the Department of Transport.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister tell us how many commissioners there are, what their proposed remuneration is, and from what source it will be obtained? Will it be from harbour dues?

Mr. HOWE: There are three commissioners. It is proposed to pay each of the three a small salary from the revenues of the port. The port of New Westminster is, of course, a very busy one—

Mr. STEWART: A free port.

Mr. HOWE: —and it has substantial revenues. The business is considerable, and it takes a good deal of the time of the commissioners. It is proposed to pay each of the commissioners a small salary for part-time work.

Mr. NEILL: I assume the remuneration will be paid from charges obtained on freights coming into the harbour, harbour dues.

Mr. HOWE: There are no harbour dues, but there are certain revenues from leaseholds, ships' dues and one thing and another, including wharfage. The revenues of the port are quite considerable, although there are no harbour dues on ships, and this bill does not propose that such dues shall be instituted.

Mr. WALSH: Are there three harbour commissioners there at the present time?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The late chairman, who is the appointee of the city, died recently; but the city have made a nomination to replace him and the nominee has been approved by the government, so there are three harbour commissioners. It is the practice to pay the chairman of the harbour commission of the harbour, and has been for some time, a salary as port manager. Of course it is somewhat irregular to have a member of a commission also an employee of the commission, which he is in fact under this arrangement; and instead of paying a salary of that kind to a commissioner as port manager it is proposed to pay each of the three commissioners a small salary. Perhaps the expenses of the port under this arangement will not be larger than they are at the present time.

Mr. WALSH: There will be no port manager appointed to replace the presumed retiring official?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say as to that. Whether a manager will be appointed is a matter for the commission to decide. It is my understanding that it is not the intention to have a port manager appointed. However, I am not promising that for the future.

Mr. WALSH: This measure will not entail any additional expense as far as the Department of Transport is concerned? Revenues at the harbour will be ample to cover any additional expense which may be involved in paying additional commissioners over and above what has been paid in the past to the chief commissioner?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct. The Department of Transport makes no contribution whatever to harbours of that class. This property is largely owned by the city. In every instance the harbours are self-sustaining.

Mr. WALSH: Would the minister care to comment on the principle involved in this measure, of paying harbour commissioners to look after the interests of a harbour, rather than having three commissioners on a voluntary basis, for the honour that goes with a position of that kind and the opportunity of service to their city?

Mr. HOWE: It is the practice in almost all harbours of this class to pay the commissioners. The work is exacting. New Westminster harbour is one of the very large and busy harbours of Canada. A great deal of time is required by the commissioners to handle their work as harbour commissioners. They are also the pilotage authority there. They have the jurisdiction of the river for, I believe, some twenty miles. To do their work properly requires a great deal of time. In my opinion it is entirely proper that these commissioners should be paid small salaries, not large salaries, for the time they give.

Mr. WALSH: I do not know whether I quite agree with the principle involved, because to pay even a small salary for an appointment of this kind means that the position is liable to become somewhat political in its aspect, and the prey of office seekers. With each change of government some persons in New Westminster or the immediate vicinity will desire to replace these three commissioners, whereas if the commissioners were undertaking the task on a voluntary basis of service to their city you might get a higher type of person interested, and you would not be so likely to have a change, if the service had been satisfactory, with every change of government. I know there is a considerable agitation at the present time, in other harbours under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board, to have honorary commissioners under the jurisdiction of the board. The idea expressed is that these honorary officials would be particularly interested in their respective ports and in the cities which are especially connected with those ports. Here we have a departure from a principle which I think is a rather good one. I feel sure, judging by the calibre of the federal representative from New Westminster that there must be many people living in that city who would be glad of the opportunity to have this honour conferred upon them and to work in the interests of their harbour and their city.

Mr. REID: I know it.

Mr. WALSH: Particularly in cooperation and collaboration with the federal member for that district.

Mr. REID: I know it.

Mr. WALSH: I believe that thereby the service would be very much improved. These men, without remuneration, would enter enthusiastically into their work; they would look at their positions from an altruistic point of view rather than from the viewpoint of the remuneration that they might receive. I am convinced that their services would be much more efficient. After all, you cannot get the type of man whom you would like to have actively interested in such a harbour as New Westminster, at the remuneration that you are prepared to pay. The compensation which may be given would not command the services of the best men available; at any rate it would not command their best service or their full-time service. I feel that the principle involved in this proposal is one which is to be regretted. I urge upon the minister and the committee the desirability of amending this measure in such a way that we might at least try out for a period of time a service of commissioners who would not undertake the work for the sake of the remuneration which might be in it. I should like to hear an expression of opinion from the hon. member for New Westminster, who knows the situation better than I do. I am speaking only of the condition in general and discussing a principle. He knows the actual situation in detail. I should like him to make a statement regarding the principle involved in the bill and whether, in his opinion, the minister is correct in his presentation of it, or whether the ideas I have given voice to might not be more acceptable to the people of New Westminster than the sentiments expressed in the bill itself.

Mr. REID: I shall be pleased to do so on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. HOWE: I think we have an ideal situation at New Westminster from the point of view of my hon. friend. We have a commission made up of two Conservatives and one Liberal, all active in the pursuit of their faith. The chairman of the board is an active Conservative. In my opinion we have excellent harbour commissioners at New Westminster. I believe the progress of the port has been due largely to the attention they have given it. The commissioners themselves have urged that the change be made. They realize the anomaly of being paid more or less by subterfuge, and they think it would be better in the interests of the port for them to be paid direct and legally rather than by the present method. The city of New Westminster, which owns a large part of the port, has endorsed the opinion of the harbour commissioners, and it is the view of the government that the recommendation is one which can very well be implemented.

Mr. STEWART: Has the government considered the wisdom or the feasibility of having this harbour operated, as other harbours are, under the national harbours board? That is the plan which has been adopted; it is an attractive proposal, and I do not know whether the experience of the minister would enable him to express an opinion on the advisability of having this harbour operated in that manner. We are told that it is an important harbour with a great deal of business, and possibly it might come under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board.

Mr. HOWE: The position of New Westminster harbour and of a number of others, such as the harbours at Hamilton, Toronto and three or four other places that I could mention, is somewhat different from the position of the eight harbours that have been brought under the national harbours board. Whereas in the case of the eight harbours that are under the national harbours board the larger part of the investment is federal, in the case of New Westminster, Toronto and Hamilton the larger part of the investment is municipal. Under the act the municipality is entitled to representation on the board, and the funds of the harbour in excess of those required to operate or improve the port revert to the city. In the case of these harbours the city has a much larger equity than the federal government. We looked into the question when the harbour board act was passed, and consideration was given the position of these harbours. It was thought then, and I have no reason to change my opinion, that harbours of that type where the investment is largely municipal should not be brought under the board.

Mr. STEWART: The minister says that the investment is largely that of the city of New Westminster. I have no doubt that is correct with respect to the harbour itself, but I am sure he will agree that very substantial amounts have been expended in dredging in the Fraser river for the purpose of making conditions in the harbour satisfactory; and from time to time, I believe, that must continue. Other control works also have had to be constructed all for this purpose. It appears to me, therefore, that there is a substantial investment on the part of the dominion as well as of the city in the harbour or in something that is necessary to make the harbour a success.

Mr. HOWE: I quite agree that the dominion government have spent large sums in order to make the Fraser river navigable, but I doubt whether that has any particular bearing on the administration of New Westminster harbour. Similarly, I doubt whether the fact that the federal government have spent very large sums in developing the St. Lawrence river has any particular bearing on the administration of the ports along the St. Lawrence. Fraser river is the largest river on the Pacific coast and is an important artery of traffic, and whether the port of New Westminster were there or not considerable expenditures for improving navigation on the Fraser river would be warranted. However, as I say, this port falls into the category of ports in which the city has a definite and large investment. The city has from time to time invested considerable sums in port improvements and these sums are a charge on the taxpayers of the city. It would be considered a high-handed act for the Department of Transport to step in and take over the harbour for operation under the national harbours board.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 111, to amend The New Westminster Harbour Commissioners Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REVISION OF RADIOTELEGRAPH ACT—CLARIFYING SECTIONS DEALING WITH LICENSING RADIO RECEIVING SETS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 52, respecting radio in Canada.

He said: This bill repeals the present Radiotelegraph Act, revising a number of clauses therein. The necessity for changing the act at this time arises out of the fact that all paragraphs in the Radiotelegraph Act having to do with shipping have been included in the Canada Shipping Act, 1934. Therefore there is at present a duplication between the two acts. While the clauses now included in the Canada Shipping Act are being deleted from the bill, the language of the bill is being modernized. The Radiotelegraph Act was passed twenty-five years ago. Since then matters relating to communication through the ether have developed greatly; additional uses of the ether waves have been developed, and new developments in radio broadcasting have occurred for which the present act has no proper provision. The purpose then is practically the rewriting of the Radiotelegraph Act in modern language and with provisions suitable to present day conditions.

Mr. STEWART: Will this bill have any effect upon radio broadcasting under the broadcasting corporation?

Mr. HOWE: The Radio Broadcasting Act governs the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. This bill does not alter their position in any way. But the bill governs the relations of the Department of Transport to radio broadcasting in this way, that is it covers the collection of fees, the regulation of wave lengths and certain general regulations which touch radio broadcasting as well as radiotelegraphy or any other use of the ether waves.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. LAWSON: Perhaps this is the proper section on which to raise a matter that relates to this bill in particular, and in general to a practice which is growing up in this house in connection with bills, and which I think should be drawn to the attention of the minister. I refer to the practice of giving in the explanatory notes information which is misleading and, in some instances, deceptive. I observe that the explanatory notes to this bill read:

> The proposed bill is a revision of the Radiotelegraph Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 195. It is revised at this time primarily because those sections referring to ships have been transferred to the Canada Shipping Act, 1934. At the same time, this has provided an opportunity to clarify and somewhat strengthen some of the remaining sections of the act, particularly with regard to the licensing of radio receiving sets used for broadcast reception.

These notes are exceedingly deceptive. The truth of the matter is that this bill introduces three new principles not previously contained in the Radiotelegraph Act so far as that act related to receiving sets and radio broadcasting. Let me outline them briefly, and as we come to them section by section I shall deal with them in detail.

In the first place this bill establishes the new principle that a radio licence collector or inspector can enter and search a man's house on a mere allegation by him before a magistrate that there is a radio receiving set in the possession of the occupant of that house. Under the old act it is true that a duly constituted and duly sworn and properly instructed police officer, a regular officer of the crown, could obtain a search warrant. But by this bill that power is extended to a radio licence collector.

The second point is that under this bill the mere possession of a radio receiving set, even though it may not be in operation, even though it has never been in operation, is made an offence. Not only is it made an offence, but it is made an indictable offence. And the indictable offence is punishable, not by the alternative of fine or imprisonment, because once one is convicted of that indictable offence the judge or magistrate must impose a fine and a penalty within the limits prescribed by the bill.

In the third place, if a person is charged with an offence under this bill, even the mere possession of a radio receiving set, and despite the fact that it is an indictable offence punishable with severe penalties as I have mentioned, the onus of proving his innocence is put upon the accused.

Those are three separate and distinct departures in principle from anything previously contained in the Radiotelegraph Act. Therefore I take this opportunity, on the very first section of this bill, of protesting against the explanatory notes given at the head thereof, and in general against explanatory notes which may be attached to amending bills in this house. It may be that I am endeavouring to set too high a standard. But I think a responsibility devolves upon a minister of the crown, when he introduces a bill in this house, to see that the explanatory notes are truly explanatory of the principles involved in the bill; and where there are radical departures from former legislation, such as there are in this bill, those departures should be clearly and distinctly drawn to the attention of the house, so that hon. members may not be misled by such notes as those which appear in this bill.

Mr. HOWE: The remarks of my hon. friend simply illustrate how deception can be found if a man is looking for deception. It seems to me that the explantory notes definitely call attention to the fact that we are strengthening the provisions of the present act. It says:

> . . . this has provided an opportunity to clarify and somewhat strengthen some of the remaining sections of the act, particularly with regard to the licensing of radio receiving sets used for broadcast reception.

How could that be made any clearer? As to providing for search, the first searches under this act were made in 1933. I remember very well my wife was almost frightened out of her life when a mounted policeman accompanied the radio inspector to our house and demanded to see her licence. I think my hon. friend was a minister of the crown at that time.

Mr. LAWSON: No; I had not that honour.

Mr. HOWE: Let me read the section of the old act and see if there is any material difference:

> 11. If a justice of the peace is satisfied by information on oath that there is reasonable ground for supposing that a radiotelegraph station has been established without a licence in that behalf, or that any apparatus for radiotelegraphy has been installed or worked in any place or on board any ship registered in Canada within his jurisdiction without a licence in that behalf, he may grant a search warrant to any police officer or any officer appointed in that behalf by the minister and named in the warrant.

2. A warrant so granted shall authorize the officer named therein to enter and inspect the station, place or ship and to seize any radiotelegraph apparatus which appears to him to be there used or intended to be there used for radiotelegraphy.

I need not read the next paragraph, which provides the penalty for establishing stations and apparatus illegally. I see no great change in principle in this bill as compared with the old act, except that this bill makes it unnecessary to terrorize a house owner, as is done at the present time by a police officer in uniform marching into the premises.

Mr. LAWSON: Let me point out the difference to the minister, if he does not see it. In the first place, under the old section it was no offence to be in possession of a radio. Let me give him the words that are added to the present section:

If a justice of the peace is satisfied by information on oath that there is reasonable ground for believing that a radio station—

Then these words are added:

—or a private receiving station has been established without a licence, or that any radio apparatus has been installed, or is being operated—

Then these words are added:

—or is in possession of any person in any place in Canada—

The minister says there is no deception. When a bill of this kind is introduced into this house, why should they not come out frankly and say in their notes what is the situation. The truth of the matter is that prosecutions were launched, and in the case of Rex v. Gignac, the citation of which I have not at the moment but which I could get if I had time to go upstairs, it was held by our courts that merely to prove that in a man's house there was a radio receiving set was not sufficient to convict that man of one of two offences, namely, that of establishing a radio station or that of operating a radio station. Because of that decision the government now proposes to amend this act to make it an offence to have in one's possession a radio receiving set, even if you never connect it and never operate it. At the moment I am not dealing with the principle of whether that should or should not be an offence.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend say it is deception, when the courts say that is irregular, to correct the law?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. LAWSON: No; I do not say it is deception to correct it; what I do say is that it is deception to introduce a bill into this house and to insert a headnote stating that this is a revision of the Radiotelegraph Act, and that it is revised at this time primarily because those sections referring to ships have been transferred to the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

Mr. HOWE: Is that a fact, or is it not?

Mr. LAWSON: I leave it to the members of this house whether or not, in view of the actual changes, that is a deceptive statement to insert in a headnote for the information of hon. members.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): "At the same time—"

Mr. LAWSON: Yes; it goes on to say:

At the same time, this has provided an opportunity to clarify and somewhat strengthen some of the remaining sections of the act—

It is not the intention, by this bill, somewhat to strengthen anything. The truth of the matter is that by this bill you create a new offence, and that new offence is to merely be in possession of a radio. You not only create that offence; you create it as an indictable offence, and on top of that you do not allow any discretion to the magistrate or judge as to penalty. He must impose both a fine and imprisonment; and on top of all that you put the onus of proving his innocence upon the man who happens to be in possession of the radio receiving set. That, I say, is a deceptive explanatory note; I protest against it, and I think the practice should be stopped.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What my hon. friend has read is merely a preliminary explanation. The rules require that every change shall be explained. The changes are contained in the various sections of the bill which follow. Each has an explanatory note on the opposite page. This preliminary explanation was not necessary at all; it is simply to give more information to my hon. friend. It was not essential. What the rules require is that the changes should be explained as they occur, section by section. If the explanations are given properly with regard to each section of the bill, surely my hon. friend does not complain because this has been added at the beginning.

Mr. LAWSON: I would not complain of any specific thing if it stood alone; but let me put this to the minister. In the bills brought into the house by the Minister of Justice I have noticed that he is particularly careful to see that every change is made clear to the members: he even goes to the extent, I have noticed in the bills he sponsors, of having the words that are new in each section of the amending act underlined, which calls them to the attention of the members. I ask the minister to go through this amending bill from one end to the other and find one section where the added words are underlined. I notice another thing about the bills introduced into the house by the Minister of Justice. In the explanatory notes on the right hand side he will specify the changes that are being made and the extent of them. Let me give the minister a concrete instance, though I might deal with this very section. I pick out one in particular to illustrate what I mean. Let me read the note opposite section 9 of this amending bill:

> 9. This is existing section 11, paragraph 1, reworded to clarify and conform to revision made in new section 5.

As a matter of fact, section 9 creates a new offence, namely, merely to be in possession of radio receiving apparatus. Let us go back to section 5. The explanatory note reads:

> This is existing section 6 reworded to clarify the intention.

Whose intention? The intention of the parliament that passed the original act was determined by the courts of the land in the case of Rex v. Gignac. Why not come out frankly in this bill and say in an explanatory note, "Because the courts have held that it is not an offence merely to be in possession of a radio, this section is intended to make mere possession an offence under this act?" That gives a concrete instance of what I have in mind in the protest I am making to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. STEWART: I am sure we are interested in the remarks of the hon. member for York South; and in view of the curtailed explanation and statement made by the minister on the introduction of this bill, and the explanations of some of these sections that have been given by the hon. member who has just spoken, I think in a measure his comment is justified. Speaking for myself, from the statement of the minister I gathered that this was a trivial, insignificant bill; that about all it did was to rewrite the existing act because certain provisions formerly in the act may now be found in the Canada Shipping Act. But now it appears that in addition we are having a flock of new offences created, new penalties imposed and people rendered liable to proceedings and prosecutions in a way that was not possible formerly. It seems to me that there are some grounds for the protest made by the hon. member for York South. In view of the statement of the minister I am surprised to find these provisions in the bill. In the light of the statements that have been made I am sure that we shall give the different sections careful consideration as we go along.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Powers of governor in council.

Mr. LAWSON: Paragraph (e) of this section is new. This section generally empowers the governor in council to prescribe the tariff of fees to be paid for radio receiving licences, authorizes the payment of a portion of the licence fees in effect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, authorizes the governor in council to accede to any international convention and make regulations for the censorship and controlling of radio signals. The new paragraph (e) reads:

> (e) make regulations imposing a penalty not exceeding $50 and costs or three months' imprisonment for the violation of any regulation made under this section for which a penalty is not already herein prescribed, and to provide that any such penalty may be imposed upon summary conviction.

I object to this form of legislation, irrespective of whether it is in this bill or in any other bill. When you impose penalties upon the subjects, who are all the people, I think those penalties should be prescribed in the law of the land. If it is the desire of the government to have a provision imposing a penalty I suggest to the minister that he have in this bill a separate section prescribing that for any offence under it, where no other specific penalty is imposed, the penalty shall be not exceeding $50 and costs or three months' imprisonment. I suggest that the principle of fixing, by governor in council, penalties for offences is wrong under any system of responsible government. I am not criticizing this bill in particular, but I suggest that this section be taken out. If you want to have such an omnibus penalty provision, let parliament say what it is going to be and have it included as a separate section.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I referred to this matter the other day. I do not wish to criticize the minister, but I think it was a great mistake to have a debate go on such as we had the other day, and then to have to listen to the remarks of this man Ferguson from Winnipeg. This gentleman and his kind are opposing the broad principles of the Chamberlain government, in relation not only to the League of Nations but to international affairs. The Prime Minister of Great Britain has ordered the British Broadcasting Corporation to stop many of these broadcasts. Just the other day I was reading criticisms of this policy in two or three eminent British papers. I have placed on Hansard just what Mr. John Buchan said with regard to this when he was a member of the British house.

These are troublesome times, but even we cannot discuss matters of this kind. It may be because the Prime Minister has been busy with other matters, but the fact is that a large number of the public hear these debates over the radio. Wrong facts or half truths are broadcast, and we hear statements absolutely opposed to the policy of the British government in connection with international agreements. I think the time has come when broadcasts of this kind should be stopped. This should be done not only in the public interest but in the interest of the British Empire.

We are prohibited from discussing questions such as Japanese immigration and the rule of Japan in the Pacific. When we as members of a free parliament start to discuss these matters points of order are raised, but the radio commission permit debates to be broadcast which are certainly objectionable to a large portion of the population of Ontario and some of the other provinces. I have read a criticism that was made in the British House of Commons of such discussions. The hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and Essex East (Mr. Martin) spoke over the radio in a network linked up by the CBC with the NBC. I did not hear their addresses as I was on a train at the time. I read, however, with interest, their speeches on other matters.

They discussed what Mr. Cordell Hull said after the Brussels conference. What was the result of the Brussels conference? It was a failure. The British ambassador, Sir Ronald Lindsay, left his office on one side of Washington and walked a block or two to the office of the secretary of state. He asked him if the United States would join with Great Britain in making a protest to Japan, and he was told that the United States were going to act alone. All these matters come under what I describe as pan-Americanism. This broadcast was absolutely opposed to the interests of the British Empire. We are not depending upon the Monroe doctrine; we are not depending upon pan-Americanism; we are depending upon the British army, the British navy and the British fleet to protect our shores.

What right has an outside commission to go over the heads of parliament? My right hon. leader asked if the government had been consulted at all. If we have any powers, why does the governor in council not reassert itself on behalf of this parliament and prevent these broadcasts under paragraph (d) of this section? I have no desire to criticize the commission or any official in it, but this is the view that I have taken in this house for many years. Mr. John Buchan, speaking in the British House of Commons when a member of that body, said that society consisted of the crank, the sentimentalist, and that appalling creature the publicist. Those are his words in criticizing the League of Nations Society. Two hon. members of this house and an outsider were engaged in a discussion the other day over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's service which was linked up with the broadcasting lines of the United States. In my opinion that broadcast should not have been allowed.

In section 3 we have the powers of the governor in council set out, and I trust that the governor in council will take the responsibility for acting in such a situation, because if we pass this section, which is a new one, the governor in council is directly responsible for what these people say in their discussions over the air. The government stopped it in England where it was held to be contrary to public policy, but anyone can go on the air through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and enter into discussions that are not in the public interest. In the great crisis of the past six months the settled policy of the Chamberlain government has saved not only the empire but the whole world from war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I find myself very much in sympathy with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) in the remarks which he has just made. At the present time we have been very careful not to discuss in this parliament the proceedings of other parliaments, and I believe that a rule which we find it advisable to observe here should also be observed by the commission in connection with broadcasts that may be made under its authority.

These are very critical times, as all hon. members of the house know, and as the citizens of the country generally know. In ordinary times we would not think of criticizing in this parliament the policies of a government or the proceedings of a parliament of another part of the British Empire. The policies of Great Britain, of Australia and New Zealand are their own policies, their own domestic affairs, and it is not for this parliament to say whether Liberals or Conservatives or the Labour party of Great Britain are right or wrong in what they are advocating.

So far as any policy relates to our own affairs, we are at perfect liberty, of course, to discuss as fully as we please the effect of government policy. What I am referring to at the moment is not whether, with respect to some particular matter, a policy is right or wrong. Each country is free to discuss in its own parliament any policy from the point of view of that country itself. I do not think, however, that one parliament should become critical of the proceedings of another parliament in another part of the world, particularly in times like these. What applies to debates in parliament should apply equally to broadcasting under a commission which derives its authority and powers from parliament.

One of the great difficulties in Europe, a condition which make the situation there so impossible of solution, is the perpetual broadcasting by one country of its comments upon the internal affairs of some other country. I think the British government have very wisely taken the view that while they wish to accord the greatest liberty possible to broadcasting, it is not proper either in parliament or out of parliament for criticisms to be made of the internal affairs of other countries where those criticisms are likely to prove embarrassing to the government and administration of the day. I think it is only right to say what I have said; and possibly more is not necessary at this time to ensure that by the commission itself a policy will be followed similar to that which all hon. members of this house seek to follow in their discussions.

Section 3, paragraph (a) and (b) agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph (c).

Mr. BLACKMORE: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that a penalty of not exceeding $500 is a tremendously severe one to be left in the hands of the governor in council without reference to parliament. I may be inexperienced in these matters, but it seems a severe penalty to me.

Mr. HOWE: There is no change in that provision. It is a very serious offence to interfere with an international convention. There are on this continent only 107 channels for broadcasting purposes, which must take care of 900 existing radio stations, and it will therefore be realized that there must be very efficient policing by each country of the channels within it. This provision is in the present Radiotelegraph Act. Those charged with administering these acts realize what a very serious offence it is to interfere with an international convention.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph (d).

Mr. LANDERYOU: This seems to be quite a paragraph. The governor in council may "make regulations for the censorship and controlling of radio signals and messages in case of actual or apprehended war, rebellion, riot or other emergency." The government is going to make regulations in respect of all these matters. What is meant by "other emergency"? What does the government consider an emergency?

Mr. HOWE: This is no change from the present legislation. Of course, to be recognized by a government as an emergency a situation must be a very, very serious one. The only change we are making here is to change the word "radiotelegraph" to "radio."

Mr. BLACKMORE: In view of certain things which are being rumoured and the power which is here being given to the governor in council to deal with all these matters and "other emergencies," and to prescribe the punishment when the emergency is merely apprehended, it seems to me that we are conferring power upon a group of men, whoever they may be or whenever they may be acting, which will render them pretty nearly absolute dictators of the use of radio in this dominion. I personally object to that very strongly. I believe in freedom of speech. I believe in free discussion. I am completely in sympathy with the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with respect to not discussing matters affecting other states that may cause complications in their domestic affairs and trouble perhaps between them and us. But I think we cannot do otherwise than face the fact squarely, that there is a disposition on the part of certain people in this country to say that other people are wrong and to prevent them, whether they are right or wrong, from discussing what they have to say. This is going to lead to disaster as sure as we live, because men are going to become more and more bitter, as they are doing, and where we are going to end no one can foresee. I believe it would be quite in order for me to suggest to the minister that some change be made in the wording of this paragraph so as not to leave it entirely to the governor in council to decide what the term "other emergency" shall mean.

Mr. WEIR: What does my hon. friend think about the licensing of the press then?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The important thing at the present time is the use of the radio; but since my hon. friend has been impertinent enough to break in with another matter not in any way connected with this, let me tell him that the "licensing of the press" made no attempt to prevent any party or group from presenting its views at as great a length as it desired. The Alberta government never attempted to limit free discussion or intended to do so. But just as sure as we are in this chamber to-night, there have been attempts made to prevent in this country free discussion of vital matters pertaining to our domestic affairs. I do not charge the minister with any wrong intention, because I have a great respect for him, and as he says, these words were in the previous act. But in the light of conditions as they are to-day we cannot be too careful. If fascism has its word to say, I should like to hear fascism express itself fully and completely over the air, so that we can all hear about it; and if communism has a case to present, let it do the same, so that the people may hear the whole story. Then, if liberalism, conservatism, the cooperative commonwealth federation and social credit have ideas which can compete successfully with those ideologies, let the people hear.

Mr. SPENCE: Shut them all off.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There we have the voice of fascism—"shut them all off!" I just wish to register my disapproval of that wording, and to urge the minister that it will be wise to specify just what is meant by it. Let me repeat that to give this body power to decide what is an emergency and what is an apprehended emergency is conferring upon them tremendous powers.

Mr. HOWE: This act has been on the statute books in its present form since 1913. It was invoked only during the years of the great war, and all countries find such a provision a very necessary part of carrying on war. I think there is no possibility that the governor in council will invoke it for any minor situation.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Nevertheless it places a tremendous power in the hands of the governor in council. I believe that regulations governing this question should be set out by parliament. Otherwise entirely too much power is being placed in the hands of the governor in council, which may not be used in the best interests of large sections of the people of Canada. We know how the power has been exercised in the past by the governor in council, and that some people in this country have not been pleased with it or have not derived much satisfaction from the powers they have exercised. Now is the time parliament should assert itself and establish regulations regarding these matters, and not leave them entirely in the hands of the governor in council.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph (e).

Mr. LAWSON: I suggest to the minister that he very seriously consider, in that connection, that a penalty be prescribed not by regulation, making a separate section of the act, if he so desires, to provide that for offences for which no specific penalty is prescribed there shall be a penalty not exceeding a fine of $50. Probably the Minister of Justice would agree with me, if he gives the matter a moment's consideration, that it is not good legislation to have penalties prescribed by the governor in council on general principle. I admit there is an exception in the case of the preceding one, covered by section 3 (d), because that is to meet an emergency condition under emergent circumstances, but this paragraph (e) is only to deal with ordinary run-of-the-mill offences which are not specifically provided for with some penalty otherwise in the act.

Mr. STEWART: I cannot think that the minister has read some of the speeches of his leader and of the Minister of Justice, delivered in the last parliament. If he had, I am sure he would not have presented to the house a bill containing this provision. I remember that on many occasions the present Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice very severely condemned legislation by the governor in council, and condemned it when it did not occupy the field of imposing penalties, and they were particularly severe whenever it was suggested that the governor in council might impose a penalty. I cannot believe that the Minister of Justice saw this section before it was presented to the committee. Certainly it is in direct opposition to the position his party have taken during a period of four or five years in connection with similar sections in other legislation. The position taken by the hon. member for York South is absolutely sound. A penalty of this kind ought to be found in a section of the act, and it ought not to be left to the discretion or to the judgment of the governor in council to impose penalties. We should know, when a penalty is being imposed, what it is, the extent of it and what it is for, why the penalty is imposed. I call attention to the fact that this is a new section; that it is not found in the act. The minister cannot justify it on that ground. He is inserting a new section which, as I have said, is contrary to the position that was taken and adhered to and reiterated and emphasized by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice in the years gone by. I am sure the Minister of Justice will agree with me that on former occasions he has taken the position which I am now taking.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I would be afraid to deny that.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: As regards this clause 3, paragraph (e), inasmuch as I had to disagree with the hon. member for York South this afternoon, I am very glad at this time to say that I agree with him. I do not think we should give the governor in council the power to make regulations to impose penalties. To my mind it is just as easy to insert the provision in a section of the act. For instance it could be subsection 2, reading as follows:

Any person convicted of a violation of any of the regulations made under this section for which a penalty is not already herein prescribed shall be liable upon summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars and costs or three months' imprisonment.

It would be just as easy to have it in a section of the act as to make it subject to regulation by order in council.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Once more I wish to protest against legislation of this kind. I made a protest under paragraph (a), where they can make regulations. Now I find that the governor in council can impose a penalty, and they are given absolute control. Parliament is given no right to say what the penalty shall be or what the regulation shall be.

Mr. HOWE: Since all the serious thinkers seem to agree on this point, if paragraph (e) can be allowed to stand we shall suggest an amendment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad that the minister has taken that attitude, because, while I would not suspect this government of doing such a thing—

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member puts too much confidence in them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —once these paragraphs are passed there is a complete and perfect set-up for the development of a dictatorship between one session of this parliament and the next, and nothing can be done to prevent it. Everything can be done by order in council. Dictatorships have started in other parts of the world just as easily as that.

The CHAIRMAN: All other paragraphs of clause 3 are carried.

Mr. ESLING: In this discussion as to licences and penalties, I wonder whether the minister would think it unreasonable if I asked him to inform the committee the government's attitude in connection with radio patents. I fully realize that patents come under another department, but at the same time it is up to the minister to initiate any action for the relief of the public. For instance, let us take an example such as this: A man purchases a radio and pays his licence fee of $2.50. It just so happens that he bought that radio in the United States—why? Because the action of Radio Patents Limited permit the radio manufacturers in Canada, about twelve in number, to charge anywhere from 50 to 100 per cent more for the same style of radio produced in Canada than is charged in the United States. That man has paid his licence fee and along comes Radio Patents Limited and asserts its right, as it contends, to confiscate that radio and destroy it. It makes the purchaser sign an undertaking that he will not bring a radio into Canada; that he will not use one; that he will not sell one, or manufacture one. That situation is created entirely by a series of patents held by a holding company, and these manufacturers lease from that holding company the privilege of using their own patents. And, of course, the royalty they pay is tacked on to the cost of the Canadian-made radio.

We know that the matter is before the tariff board, but in the meantime the government is in full possession of the facts. It knows that these people will assert their right, so-called, to confiscate a man's radio. The government knows that the purchase price in Canada is anywhere from 50 to 100 per cent in excess of the price in the United States. In view of these facts, does the minister not think that, without waiting for action on the part of the tariff board some action should be taken at once to relieve the public of these impositions made by Radio Patents Limited?

Mr. HOWE: I think the government has taken the logical step in ordering a full investigation of the situation. The situation has been known for many years and there has been a growing realization of it. It is, of course, a complicated matter. Our patent laws are there, and it is our own patent laws that make the situation possible. Bringing out the full facts and disclosing all sides of the question is a necessary step before any action can be taken.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I understood the minister to say, when this question was under consideration before, that the matter was receiving the attention of the tariff board. I brought it up because I had letters from my own constituency. In one instance a salesman told me that there were three hundred convictions on file. I was of the opinion that this was an exaggeration; but even if it is, that point should be definitely established. I understood the minister to say that the matter was before the tariff board for a ruling. Has there been a ruling on it?

Mr. HOWE: It was referred to the tariff board in February and they are now assembling the facts, but no ruling has been given.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There will be a definite ruling on that?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ESLING: Action could be taken under the combines act. It does seem unreasonable for the public to have to continue suffering under these impositions. Under section 11 of the combines act immediate action could be taken to remedy the situation. It is almost incredible that a Canadian citizen cannot purchase a radio in the United States, bring it into Canada after he has paid the duty, and enjoy the possession of it, but that is the fact. He cannot bring a radio in from any country even though he pays the fully assessed duty and the sales and excise tax. He simply cannot bring it in and call it his own. Just think of any corporation having the power to confiscate a man's radio after he has paid for it and paid the government duty and obtained his licence, while the government does not interfere but is simply willing to wait for the tariff board to investigate the matter, though we know that this condition exists. We have already put the facts on Hansard; we have stated cases. There is the case of the Winnipeg concern where they were permitted to sell their radios on condition that they paid a royalty and all legal charges. We had cases in Prince Rupert. There was a case in my own home town. A man simply refused to sign the undertaking, and he was told that if it occurred again Radio Patents Limited would exercise its right to confiscate his radio and destroy it, a radio that he had paid for and brought in. It is true he brought it in under the $100 exemption, but he declared it and got his clearance. It makes no difference, however, whether you bring it in under the $100 exemption, or in the regular course, paying the customs duty; Radio Patents Limited still asserts its right to confiscate your radio and destroy it. Let me ask the minister this question: Is there any reason under the sun why that state of affairs should continue? Should there not be more speedy action than is possible as a result of a mere reference to the tariff board? Is the matter going to drag for another year? I know just about how much has been paid in royalty by these radio manufacturers to Radio Patents Limited for the privilege of using their own patents, and then that royalty is tacked on to the price of the Canadian-made radio. Does the minister not think that there should be more immediate action than we can obtain by waiting for the outcome of a long drawn out hearing by the tariff board? The combines act would permit of such action, and the public would feel much better disposed towards the department and the radio business in general if such action were taken.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps a word as to the manner in which the present reference to the tariff board originated might be useful at this stage. Representations were made to the government last year regarding unreasonably high prices, particularly of radio products. Allegations were made that these outrageous prices were probably made possible by the operation of the tariff. Other statements were made similar to those just made by the hon. member, and denials and qualifications and all the rest of it came in great volume from those affected. The government determined that I should make a reference to the tariff board with respect to the bearing of tariffs on the conditions revealed in the radio industry. But in examining the matter for the purpose of reference it did not take me long to come to the conclusion that such an investigation could not lead to anything of value unless it included a full investigation of the manner in which the Canadian patent law operates with respect to radio. I would point out that the patent law operates with respect to any commodity coming within its provisions; there is no difference in the treatment of radio or radio tubes and parts and the treatment of any other commodity under that law. But because of the circumstances to which my hon. friend referred I believed that no investigation by the tariff board could produce useful results unless there were combined in the reference the investigation of the manner in which the patent law operates in connection with the price structure and prices charged and the provisions of sale of radio parts. For that reason this method was chosen as being the one most likely to bring out the facts of the situation both from the standpoint mentioned by the hon. member and with respect to the bearing of the tariff on the cost of radios and radio parts.

I expect that the tariff board will be proceeding very shortly with the hearing, which I can assure my hon. friend will be a very thorough investigation into the whole matter. I think we have at our disposal no more effective machinery for investigating the whole matter. An investigation dealing only with the patent law would be subject to two difficulties: (1) that the patent law is the same with respect to any article which is patented, and any abuse which exists may not be confined to radio but possibly extend to other patented articles; (2) an investigation based only on patent law would ignore the tariff aspects of the problem. So for that reason it was thought well to have an investigation before a body competent to go into all aspects of the matter and to give to parliament and the country the facts upon which judgment could be intelligently based. There are many views on the matter. Personally I am inclined to the view expressed by the hon. member, but certainly that view is contradicted very strongly by those interested in the business. By the means we have adopted we shall be sure of a complete understanding of the facts. The tariff board can call to its assistance auditors and experts of any kind, go right into the business of the people concerned and get all the facts.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to support the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), and, I am glad to know that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has taken the steps which he has. There is one angle to this business that requires to be carefully investigated. It concerns people who brought in small radios under the $100 exemption. I drew the attention of the house last year to a case of which I have knowledge in which the purchaser of an automobile radio and a small cheap house radio was forbidden by the radio patent corporation to use either of them, then subsequently granted a permit. The point is that the patented tubes and so on in these radios paid a royalty in the United States; then by what law can the radio patent corporation collect a further royalty? If our law is weak in that respect, I should like to see the gap closed by this parliament.

Mr. HOWE: I have an amendment to suggest to section 3 covering the objection to paragraph (e):

That clause 3 be amended by striking out paragraph (e) and inserting a subsection 2 reading as follows: "Any person who violates any regulation made under this section for which no penalty is provided shall be liable upon summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars or three months imprisonment."

Mr. STEWART: Are the words "and costs" in there?

Mr. HOWE: The words "and costs" should go in.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I so move.

On section 4—Ministerial regulations.

Mr. BARBER: I believe the question of licence fees for broadcasting companies would come under this section. The question I want to bring to the attention of the minister relates to some confusion which seems to exist. A small station in my district, each time it applied for a licence in the last five years, applied for increase of power from 100 to 250. Other small stations in the upper country have received an increase to 1,000, but this station does not require that amount of power to cover its district, which is a valley in the mountains. But each time it made application it was said that the matter would have to be taken into consideration by the officers of the department. Looking over the file I noticed in the communications of the last two years that the department said that the matter would have to be considered by officers or some technicians of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Then the broadcasting corporation write back and say it is a matter for the department. I discussed the matter with the manager of the broadcasting corporation a couple of days ago and he promised to go into it thoroughly. But there appears to be considerable confusion. I wonder if that could be explained.

Mr. HOWE: The procedure in connection with a change of power is set out in the broadcasting act. The application must go first to the broadcasting corporation, and a recommendation is then furnished by the corporation to the governor in council, which may or may not carry out that recommendation. The final action rests with the governor in council. So far as the particular application of my hon. friend is concerned, I may say that his application has passed all these stages, and I think it became law to-day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if the minister would explain what is meant by paragraph (a), so that we may understand why such a law should be passed.

Mr. HOWE: This simply prescribes the form of the application. In other words, if you apply for anything from the Department of Transport, you do it on a prescribed form setting out the information required.

Paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) agreed to.

On section 4, paragraph (d).

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister explain this paragraph in order that we may be quite clear as to what is meant by "conditions and restrictions"? It may help the minister to understand what I have in mind if I tell him that not very long ago there was a radio station approached by a gentleman who wished to deliver a speech over it. That speech was perfectly harmless; it was quite angelic as compared with some of those to which reference has been made to-night; yet the man in charge of the station said that he dare not allow that speech to be delivered because he feared he might lose his licence. This gives rise to a great many suspicions.

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing in this act which governs in any way the subject matter which may be broadcast over the stations of the corporation or any other broadcasting station. This simply governs the more technical aspects. If my hon. friend will study the broadcasting act which was passed by this parliament two years ago, he will find all the provisions governing the matter to which he refers. I may say, however, that owners of private stations who for some reason of their own do not wish to carry certain broadcasts are very much in the habit of blaming it on some censorship by headquarters, but I can assure my hon. friend that the censorship by headquarters has been very rarely used, and then only after numbers of complaints have been received as to the nature of a certain program.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 4, paragraph (e).

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This paragraph provides for the licensing of radio receiving sets. On a previous occasion the minister promised to give some consideration to the possibility of having the licence fee for battery sets less than the fee for electric sets. I wonder if the minister has given any further consideration to that matter, and if he would care to say anything about it at this time.

[Mr Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: The licence fee for battery sets is, in fact, less than the fee for other sets. There was no change in the licence fee for battery sets; the change was made only in connection with power-operated sets.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was that the original intention? I understood the licence fee was the same for all sets. Was that changed subsequently to the discussion in the house?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say whether or not it was subsequently; it may have been. There was, in any event, a change made before the regulation was published.

Mr. LAWSON: Is it not a fact that there was an original order in council passed? My recollection is that last December or January an order in council was passed providing for an increase in radio licence fees, in respect of all receiving sets, to $2.50, to become effective April 1, 1938. Then, subsequently, my recollection is that there was an order in council passed—though I do not believe the second order in council was tabled in the house—amending the original order and providing that in the case of battery sets the fee should remain at $2.

Mr. HOWE: No; there was no second order in council. The first order in council contemplated regulations, and subsequently regulations were issued providing for the fee, but there was only one order in council.

Mr. LAWSON: Has the minister power to prescribe the fee? I thought the tariff of fees was prescribed by order in council.

Mr. HOWE: As my hon. friend says, there were two orders in council, but the second simply authorized the detailed regulations under the first. The first order in council mentioned certain regulations to be passed later. The second order in council issued the regulations, and when those regulations were issued the distinction was made between power sets and battery sets.

Mr. LAWSON: When were the regulations issued which provided for the fee of $2 on battery sets?

Mr. HOWE: I should think some time in March. I know a considerable time was required in which to issue the licence forms.

Mr. LAWSON: That is what I had in mind.

Mr. HOWE: That is right; the regulations were issued later.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Then I understand that the old rate applies to battery sets?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. NEEDHAM: And that would apply also to car radios, which are run by batteries?

Mr. HOWE: No; it applies to houses which are not connected to a source of electric current. It does not apply to cars.

Mr. COLDWELL: If a battery set is operated in a home where they have electric power, it pays $2.50?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, if there is electric power in the home.

Mr. COLDWELL: Even though a battery set is being operated?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LIMESTONE IN OTTAWA FEDERAL PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. What are the total approximate amounts of cut limestone that have been used in the construction of federal public buildings in Ottawa during the last five years?
2. What approximate amount of such limestone has been purchased from each of the provinces?
3. What amount of Queenston limestone has been purchased during the above period for the construction of public buildings at Ottawa?

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Cardin):

1. 3,967 cubic feet.

2. From Quebec, 2,001 cubic feet; from Ontario, 1,966 cubic feet.

3. 1,966 cubic feet.

Note.—The above figures represent the actual quantity of cut stone used in buildings. No information as to total quantity of rough stone purchased for this purpose.

SLOT MACHINES

Mr. LECLERC:

1. How many slot-machines were imported into Canada during the year 1937?
2. Is the importation of such machines increasing from year to year?
3. What are the customs and excise duties on such machines?
4. Is the government aware that some are smuggled into the country?
5. Is the ordinary operation of slot-machines in public places considered as legal?
6. If not, would it not be in the public interest to have such importation prohibited?

Mr. RINFRET:

1 and 2. This information is not available from statistical compilation.

3. Slot machines are dutiable according to the material of which they are manufactured and their finish. If nickel-plated to the extent of 50 per cent or more of the exposed metal surface, they are classified under tariff item 362c at 33⅓ per cent ad valorem, intermediate tariff, less a discount of 10 per cent, under the Canada-France Trade Agreement Act, to the benefits of which the United States is entitled as a most favoured nation. If not plated to the extent mentioned in the directly preceding paragraph, and the articles are composed in chief value of iron or steel, they are dutiable under tariff item 446a at 25 per cent ad valorem, under the Canada-United States trade agreement. The articles are also subject to the special excise tax of 3 per cent on the duty paid value and the consumption or sales tax of 8 per cent on the duty paid value.

4. While an occasional seizure is made of smuggled slot machines, the government has no information of any systematic smuggling of such articles.

5. This involves a question of opinion and depends upon the facts surrounding each case.

6. See answer to No. 5.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This question involves a matter of policy, and if action is taken it will be announced in due course. I must say, however, with respect to the last part of the question, that it would require provincial legislation.

RADIO LICENCE FEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to refer to a question which I asked the other day, and in reply to which the statement was made yesterday by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe):

The information was sent forward by our department some days ago but apparently the return has not been brought down. However, for the information of my hon. friend I may say there was no correspondence.

I cannot quite understand that explanation in view of the fact that in the evidence before the radio committee it is mentioned in several instances—and I have copies in my hand—that there was correspondence. In fact, it says definitely that there were letters, and extracts from the letters were read in the committee. I asked for copies, and the minister says there is none. But the chairman of the board and the vice-chairman say there were.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Apart from my hon. friend being out of order, I might call his attention to the fact that he has the information, and yet he wants to get it from the house.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wanted copies of the letters, in order to ascertain the true facts for myself.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

BOARDS OF REVIEW, TIME LIMIT FOR FILING PROPOSALS, ETC.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 25, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to point out only one factor which I think should be considered by the government concerning instructions which may be given to those who are charged with the administration of the act. I have had my attention directed recently to a case in which a value of about $9,000—$9,552, I think, was the exact figure—was placed upon mortgaged premises by the soldier settlement valuator. The mortgage on the property is for $11,500, and it was suggested that it should be reduced to $7,500, payable over a period of ten years, and that the rate of interest should be reduced from five to four per cent. I desire to point out one principle which, I think, has been overlooked with respect to the administration of the act. Bankruptcy contemplates the liquidation of the assets of the insolvent and the distribution of the proceeds pro rata among his creditors. That is to be kept in mind as the real basis of all bankruptcy legislation—realization and distribution. We applied the general principle of bankruptcy to the farmers' creditors and afforded them relief on that basis, but obviously we did not contemplate realization. The difference between true bankruptcy and the application of the bankruptcy principle is to be found in the fact that, instead of realization, we contemplate the retention by the debtor of his premises; but we afford him an opportunity to pay his creditors the same rate on the dollar as though there were an attempted realization, the theory being that realization would be at such a low figure that any amount of money which might be paid to the creditors would be so small that it could be easily discharged and met by his continuing to occupy his farm and to make out of his operations sufficient money to pay the rate on the dollar that would be realized by a forced realization or liquidation of his property. When the act was passed we contemplated the application of a principle which, I submit, has been overlooked. It is a very simple one: First, one that is now recognized, that there should be insolvency; and, second, that we should, in arriving at values, keep in mind prospective as well as present-day values.

Mr. DUNNING: That is one of the difficulties.

Mr. BENNETT: As long as the minister grasps my point—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, quite.

Mr. BENNETT: —that is all it is necessary for me to say for the moment on that aspect. Inasmuch, therefore, as we contemplate a prospective value within, I submit, the period of time given for adjustment, it is incorrect for the boards to take the valuation of to-day, placed by their appraisers upon these properties, for the purpose of determining what the amount of the obligation on the property should be.

Mr. DUNNING: Its earning capacity is an important consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: But the earning capacity also involves an estimate based upon a present-day value, whereas we contemplate a revival of business in this country and an improvement in conditions that will be reflected in increased prices for agricultural commodities and products and a corresponding increase in the value of the properties themselves.

Mr. DUNNING: I meant that earning capacity is one of the factors in determining the present-day value.

Mr. BENNETT: Earning capacity for the purpose of determining present-day value is not, as the minister knows, the sole factor.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: But it has been a factor. I do not want to get into a general discussion, but I wish to put my proposition to the government as clearly as I can.

1. Bankruptcy, which is the basis of this legislation, contemplates realization and distribution of the proceeds. That is an essential earmark of all bankruptcy legislation.

2. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act contemplates the retention of the property by the debtor, and distribution, not of the proceeds of what it is believed would be realized from a forced sale, but of what is regarded as the amount that would be realized from a forced sale of the property by his creditors, over a period of years.

3. In arriving at the value of the property, consideration should be given not only to present-day conditions but, as the statute says, to prospective values.

Mr. DUNNING: Right.

Mr. BENNETT: I submit that this principle has been departed from in many instances, and that the whole principle upon which we proceeded, the bankruptcy principle, has been disregarded. That has been caused, I submit with deference, by the fact that people have seen their properties reduced in value on present-day valuations by the soldier settlement board without any regard being paid to the prospective values of the properties and their prospective earning power, and that the provision which has been made for the payment of debts has been on the basis of a valuation which is, shall I say, nothing more than an estimate of the amount that will be realized on forced sale, under present conditions.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my right hon. friend permit me? In communications regarding that particular complaint, I must say that in all the cases of which I have recollection the board of review always insisted that it did take into account not merely present forced sale values but prospective values as contemplated by the act. In any correspondence between the administrator under my direction and the judge who is the head of one of the boards of review, the matter comes down usually to one of opinion as to whether or not prospective value has been fairly taken into account. I am speaking now merely of experience, not objecting to what my hon. friend lays down as a sound principle, because I agree with it in every particular. But somebody has to decide. The words "prospective value" are in the act and have been called to the attention of the chairmen of the boards of review on many occasions, and this discussion will serve a useful purpose in again directing that feature to the attention of those responsible for the administration.

Mr. DONNELLY: Are there not two or three valuators?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I interrupted my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all I have to say.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PELAGIC SEALING

PROVISION FOR SANCTIONS FOR VIOLATIONS OF NORTH PACIFIC SEALING CONVENTION

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved the third reading of Bill No. 98, respecting the North Pacific Pelagic Sealing Convention.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF MATURED, MATURING AND CALLABLE OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 107, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations.

He said: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was not here yesterday. On a previous occasion he had asked certain questions and I believe I put on Hansard the desired information.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. NEILL: I believe that this bill is perfectly in order, but in accordance with the ruling given last night I would point out that there are no explanatory notes. Will it be necessary to discharge the order and have the bill reintroduced?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the ruling given last night, is this bill in order? I do not want to delay the house, and the suggestion that the bill is not in order because there are no explanatory notes is so patently absurd that I am prepared to withdraw any objection I might raise; but I would call attention to the absurdity of the ruling given last night.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think my hon. friend will admit that the objection should be taken before the bill is being considered in committee. The objection should be raised before the second reading; but when the bill has been considered fully, studied from every angle and reported by the committee, and when it stands for third reading, I suggest it is rather late in the day to raise the objection.

Mr. NEILL: That is exactly what I thought last night. Standing order 70 reads:

No bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape.

If the Speaker finds that the bill is in blank or in an imperfect shape, he will decline to put the question and will return the bill to the member who must take another opportunity of bringing it up in conformity with the rules.

It is at that stage that the Speaker should exercise his discretion. He did not do so with my bill; he did not do it with this bill; and as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) truly says, it is too late to bring the matter up on second reading.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; I said third reading.

Mr. NEILL: After the Speaker has given official sanction and allowed the bill to be introduced, that is an admission that it is not in an imperfect shape; and that applies to one bill as well as another. I hope we are going to have the same rule apply in the house all round. I have before me a record of ten bills, one a private bill, the other nine, government measures, all introduced and considered. One of them is the relief bill sponsored by the Minister of Labour, and there are two by the Minister of Finance and two by the Minister of Justice. They are all in the same shape as my bill which was ruled out last night. Are they all to be thrown out and begun de novo? The question needs only to be asked to show how absurd it is.

Mr. DUNNING: On the point of order, may I direct attention to page 348 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. It appears, from subsections 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 of section 7 there set out, that the ruling in question applies to bills amending existing legislation.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. DUNNING: That is my reading of it:

1. In the preparation of bills amending existing enactments the amendments . . .

That has reference to bills amending existing legislation.

2. In the text of the bill, on the left hand page, new matter shall be indicated. . . .

That evidently refers to an amending bill.

3. When a clause repeals an existing section. . . .

That must refer to an amending bill.

4. A memorandum by the draftsman explaining briefly the reasons for each clause, shall be appended to the bill, or distributed therewith.

That again, in clause 4, evidently relates to an amending bill.

5. The above rules shall also as far as is practicable apply to the reprinting of bills.

The bill under consideration is an entirely new bill. As I explained on the second reading, it is practically identical with legislation now on the statute books, but it in no way amends that legislation; in fact, it replaces it entirely.

Mr. NEILL: As regards the rules quoted at page 348 by the Minister of Finance, it is only subsection 1 that has reference to the amending of existing legislation. The others, 2, 3, and 4, do not refer to amending existing enactments. I would point out further the provision that the rules of the House of Commons as to the preparation and printing of bills "must be followed by all departments." I did not know I was a department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are an institution.

Mr. NEILL: I leave it to the judgment of any legal member of the house whether the words in subsection 1 can be read into subsections 2, 3 and 4 to suit the momentary convenience of the Minister of Finance. The first subsection reads:

In the preparation of bills amending existing enactments the amendments shall not ordinarily be made by clauses which add or leave out words or substitute words for others—

And so on.

Mr. DUNNING: Read subsection 2.

Mr. NEILL:

2. In the text of the bill, on the left hand page, new matter shall be indicated. . . .

In certain forms that are set out; and "on the right hand page the enactment amended thereby, or so much thereof as is essential, shall be printed with the proposed changes," and so on. I entirely agree that this bill is in order, but if it is in order my bill yesterday was also in order. I do not see how the minister can escape that position. I should like to hear some legal member say that I am wrong in that regard. I do not think he would stake his legal reputation because he knows better.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot pose as a legal member, but it did seem to me last night that the bill introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) was ruled out on a technicality. I was opposed to the bill in itself, and I would have voted against it; but when it came to the question whether it was in order, it did not seem to me necessary to rise to support the hon. member on the point of order. I was surprised that he was ruled out of order. It does seem to me, now we come to another bill in connection with which very similar conditions prevail, that we as members should insist that discriminations of this kind should not be permitted. This situation is similar to that which existed last night, and decisions should be uniform and applied impartially.

Mr. BENNETT: If the Minister of Finance will be good enough to look at the opening clause of the rule to which he referred, he will see that in its application it is not limited to amendments. I was not present yesterday, but it seems to me that the objection taken then is one which would apply with even greater force to the measure now before the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): On third reading?

Mr. BENNETT: There is no difference between third and second reading with respect to the matter except that on third reading the bill has gone a step further before attention is directed to the point. I recall once in this house—I cannot recall any other occasion—that the objection had to be taken when the bill was being introduced.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): On second reading?

Mr. BENNETT: No, before the bill is proceeded with on second reading.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It comes under second reading after being introduced. There is no other place.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be apparent from the bill itself that this has not been done; therefore it would have to be after introduction and printing. When the bill is printed, if there is no explanation it should not be proceeded with. If there has been a violation of the rule with respect to this bill, and attention is now directed to it, it does not seem to me it makes the position any better that the objection has been delayed, except that the Minister of Justice might have said that the discussion in committee obviated the necessity of further explanation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is what I meant.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course that would be true. I confess that on reading Hansard it is somewhat difficult to understand just why that particular rule should be applied at that stage of the proceedings, because the bill had already been proceeded with. The debate on second reading had been delayed from time to time and no objection had been raised. It has always been uncertain whether or not the rule was limited to amendments. As you read the beginning of it, the rule appears to be intended to cover all; but as you proceed, it seems to be limited more to amendments than bills; it is not abundantly clear that it applies to all; the language is ambiguous at best.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think by analogy the position should be taken as being the same as when a bill is standing for second reading and has not been printed in both languages. That is an older rule than this one requiring explanatory notes. I was in the house many years before this new rule about the explanatory notes was enacted, but the other rule was in force. Citation No. 748 in Beauchesne reads:

> When the bill comes up for second reading in its proper course, one of the clerks at the table will read the order aloud, and the member in charge of the measure will then move its second reading. The member should take care to inform himself whether the bill is printed in the two languages, as that is absolutely necessary at this stage. The letters E.F. on the order paper will show whether that has been done. If any objection be made on that ground, it will prevent the bill being taken up for its second reading on that day. But if the motion has been made and the debate allowed to proceed thereon, it will be too late then to raise an objection as to the printing in French.

I believe the case is exactly the same when it comes to this defect of the explanatory note not being printed on the opposite page. When Bourinot wrote what I have just read the only rule on the matter was that which required printing in both languages. It is simply common sense that it is on the second reading that this objection should be taken. If no objection is taken then and the bill is allowed to proceed even though not printed in both languages and with no explanatory note, all the explanations required are being given by the minister or the member in charge of the bill, in answering any questions asked; so why should there be a rule asking for explanatory notes when the bill has been explained during perhaps two or three sittings? I think the rules of common sense apply in parliament as elsewhere; in fact, they should apply more in parliament than elsewhere.

Mr. NEILL: If the explanation were there, it might influence my vote on the third reading.

Mr. CAHAN: I remember a previous occasion when I, as Secretary of State, introduced a government bill, and on second reading objection was taken by the opposition that I had not placed on the opposite page of the text of the bill the section or sections amended or affected. The Speaker of that day ruled the bill out of order, and I was compelled to reprint the bill and bring it again before the house. The same decision that was given by the Speaker last night was given on that occasion on the point of order then raised by a leading member of the opposition of that day.

Mr. DUNNING: Was it an amending bill?

Mr. CAHAN: It is true it did amend; that is, there were amending sections in the bill. If I remember rightly, it was a bill relating to the Companies Act. The Speaker of that day gave exactly the same decision as that given last night, on the same ground.

Mr. DUNNING: Speaking of former decisions on this point, I find in Hansard for 1931, page 1412, an objection taken to a bill on second reading by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) on the ground that insufficient information was given on the opposite page. Referring to that decision I would call attention to the fact that the bill was an amending one, and the Speaker ruled that the information given on the opposite page was sufficient. The hon. member on that occasion was not sustained in his effort to have the bill ruled out of order. I desire to adhere to my original appeal, which is on the ground that the rules quoted, on page 348, obviously by their language apply especially to amending bills, and the bill of which I am now moving third reading is not an amending bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does that statement apply to subsection 4 on page 348?

Mr. DUNNING: I admit that this is the foundation for the statement of the Minister of Justice that there might be some question, but there is no doubt in my mind that paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 clearly refer to amending bills, and that paragraph 4 may be deemed to do so because otherwise it would have no particular meaning.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the point of order taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is quite correct; though I have not read all these clauses thoroughly, my opinion would be that they deal with amending bills. I should be inclined to take that view, but the most important point is that raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who quoted citation 748 of Beauchesne. I think the point is well taken, that the point of order should have been raised when we were proceeding with the second reading of the bill last night. The point being raised at this late date, it is out of order, and I so rule.

Mr. NEILL: I challenge your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order having been raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), on the ground that this bill was out of order because certain explanatory notes were not contained on the right hand pages of the bill; Mr. Speaker having decided that the point of order should have been taken prior to the second reading of this bill, and the hon. member having appealed from that decision, I would ask those in favour of the Speaker's ruling being sustained to signify by saying "yea."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the ruling sustained.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed on division.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REVISION OF RADIOTELEGRAPH ACT—CLARIFYING OF SECTIONS DEALING WITH LICENSING RADIO RECEIVING SETS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 10, consideration in committe of Bill No. 52, respecting radio in Canada—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 4, paragraph (e)—Ministerial regulations.

Mr. COLDWELL: In the discussion of this section last evening the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) took exception to some of the policies of the Canadian Broadcasing Corporation, and in so doing mades specific reference to a recent broadcast over the Columbia broadcasting system and the Canadian broadcasting system, in which I participated. The inference from the remarks of the hon. member, which I have read very carefully to-day, I think is both unfounded and unfair. May I just read the paragraph to which I refer:

When we as members of a free parliament start to discuss these matters points of order are raised, but the radio commission permit debates to be broadcast which are certainly objectionable to a large portion of the population of Ontario and some of the other provinces. I have read a criticism that was made in the British House of Commons of such discussions. The hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and Essex East (Mr. Martin) spoke over the rado in a network linked up by the CBC with the NBC. I did not hear their addresses as I was on a train at the time. I read, however, with interest, their speeches on other matters.

They discussed what Mr. Cordell Hull said after the Brussels conference.

And so on. Then—and in my opinion this was much more serious—the hon. member for Broadview was followed by the right hon. Prime Minister, who said:

Mr. Chairman, I must say that I find myself very much in sympathy with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) in the remarks which he has just made. At the present time we have been very careful not to discuss in this parliament the proceedings of other parliaments, and I believe that a rule which we find it advisable to observe here should also be observed by the commission in connection with broadcasts that may be made under its authority.

These are very critical times, as all hon. members of the house know, and as the citizens of the country generally know. In ordinary times we would not think of criticizing in this parliament the policies of a government or the proceedings of a parliament of another part of the British Empire. The policies of Great Britain, of Australia and New Zealand are their own policies, their own domestic affairs, and it is not for this parliament to say whether Liberals or Conservatives or the Labour party of Great Britain are right or wrong in what they are advocating.

May I point out that in the broadcast in question there was no reference to the policies of Great Britain or even to the policies of this parliament or this government. The broadcast related purely to an academic discussion of the value of the League of Nations. And may I go one step further and say this, that if in a broadcast in the Dominion of Canada in the interests of free discussion we are not to be permitted to discuss policies that are of domestic interest, the moulding of public opinion in Canada is going to be very seriously interfered with. I would also draw to the attention of the committee this fact, that if Mr. Ferguson of the Winnipeg Free Press and Doctor H. L. Stewart, who are commentators on behalf of the radio corporation of this country, are to be prevented from expressing their opinions in their commentaries, then I say that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should prohibit the pro-Chamberlain broadcasts from Great Britain that are re-broadcast over this country. I have particular reference to the broadcasts of Mr. Beverley Baxter under private arrangements with the Canadian broadcasting chain. I am of opinion that it is in the best interests of Canada that our broadcasting corporation should endeavour to get before the Canadian people the various points of view expressed in Canada and elsewhere at this time, because it is necessary that our people shall be well informed regarding all aspects of our domestic and international affairs.

May I point out further that the foreign policy of the Chamberlain government in Great Britain, which, as I have said, in my opinion does not represent the real feelings of the British people, as the recent by-elections show, may involve this country in a serious situation. I have before me a speech of the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), made in this chamber on February 4, 1937, at a time when the house was discussing a resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). At that time the right hon. gentleman said:

In the constitutional position of Canada today neutrality would mean that an enemy of our king could be a friend of Canada; that we could trade with him during a war in which the king might be engaged; that to nations with which the king might be at war we could send ordinary material, anything that a neutral nation could sell to countries actively engaged in war.

This question as to the right of the dominions to be strictly neutral is one of the questions yet to be solved, and it will not be solved in the way suggested by my hon. friend.

If that be so, the foreign policy discussed by Mr. Ferguson, Doctor Stewart and others over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation chain is a policy of domestic interest to Canada because, if the Minister of Justice is right—and I believe he is—the right of this country to be neutral in the event of war has not yet been established. Therefore the commitments being made by the national government of Great Britain with European dictators are commitments in which this parliament may find itself involved in the future.

I therefore urge upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government to reconsider any decision they may have taken, to reconsider the statement made last night by the Prime Minister, and not to attempt to muzzle the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in connection with matters of this kind. I want to do more than that; I want to express on behalf of what I am certain is a very large section of our population, our appreciation of the manner in which the present corporation is endeavouring to place before the Canadian people the many sides in connection with various problems. I believe that that is appreciated throughout the length and breadth of the country, and I am surprised that a Liberal government in Canada should take an attitude which I regard as distinctly illiberal, and different from the traditional Liberal point of view. After all, those of us who sit in this corner share that traditional viewpoint.

Mr. THORSON: Just a moment; who is muzzling the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. COLDWELL: I would advise the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) to read the speech of the Prime Minister delivered last night and reported at page 2752 of Hansard. He will find there that the Prime Minister agreed with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), and that the hon. member for Broadview disagreed with the principle of free discussion of these problems over the air.

Mr. THORSON: No; he simply agreed with the desirability of moderation of language.

Mr. COLDWELL: No; there was no question of moderation of language involved. And in the broadcasts in question, and particularly the one in which the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), Doctor Leggett and myself engaged, there certainly was no immoderate language. And yet that was definitely referred to last night by the hon. member for Broadview.

I would also draw attention to the fact that the Prime Minister concluded his observations with these words:

> I think it is only right to say what I have said; and possibly more is not necessary at this time to ensure that by the commission itself a policy will be followed similar to that which all hon. members of this house seek to follow in their discussions.

I do not anticipate for one moment that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would permit many of the immoderate statements made in the house; and yet a direct criticism has been made on several occasions of broadcasts I have heard and to which I could take no exception.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What part of the Prime Minister's words does the hon. member object to?

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member will find it running quite largely through the entire speech of the Prime Minister. Let us take this statement, for example—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, read the first statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: I read:

> So far as any policy relates to our own affairs, we are at perfect liberty, of course, to discuss as fully as we please the effect of government policy. What I am referring to at the moment is not whether, with respect to some particular matter, a policy is right or wrong. Each country is free to discuss in its own parliament any policy from the point of view of that country itself. I do not think, however, that one parliament should become critical of the proceedings of another parliament in another part of the world, particularly in times like these.

Mr. GRAY: Do you take exception to that?

Mr. COLDWELL: My point is that the policies specifically referred to last night were not policies that concerned another parliament in another part of the world. They were policies which concerned this parliament, as the opinion of the Minister of Justice clearly indicates. Because a policy pursued by the imperial parliament or imperial government might lead us into a position where we would find it impossible to do other than to participate in a war; for when the king is at war, according to the Minister of Justice, we cannot remain neutral. And so I say that that is the point at issue. Last night the Prime Minister deplored the discussion of a matter which may be of domestic interest at this time to Canada.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is not what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. BENNETT: Read the last paragraph of it.

Mr. GRAY: Does the hon. member suggest—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; he told the corporation not to do it, in the last sentence.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is not what he said at all.

Mr. HEAPS: He was instructing the corporation what to do.

Mr. HOWE: May I interrupt? In the first place, this is entirely out of order, has not anything to do with the present bill or any section of it. When the Prime Minister spoke he was replying to the speech of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and began his observations in this way:

> I must say that I find myself very much in sympathy with the hon. member for Broadview.

That is his speech. Evidently he was speaking his personal opinion. As for muzzling or attempting to muzzle the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in any way, no action is taken and no action can be taken, except in case of war or emergency. The only law we have on the subject is contained in the bill before us, in a paragraph of section 3 of which power is given to regulate radio in case of war, riots or conditions of grave emergency. The Prime Minister's reference was entirely to paid commentators, and every country in the world, I think, has had its troubles with paid commentators. I know that at least twenty members of the House of Commons have protested vigorously to me against the broadcasts of Boake Carter from the United States, which come in, not over the Canadian broadcasting stations, but direct from the United States stations. They objected on the ground that the broadcasts are most anti-British. There has also been a great deal of protest against views expressed by our own paid commentators. But paid commentators are in a very different position from my hon. friend when he engages in a series of discussions presenting on the same evening two views of the same subject. Such a discussion, I think, represents the greatest possible freedom of the air, in that both sides of any question may be presented on the same evening. But to put on the air a paid commentator to present a very biased view on a subject of international importance is something quite different, and it was upon that that the Prime Minister last evening was giving his personal opinion. I think nothing further can be read into his statement, and as far as that goes, the broadcasting corporation has its own legislation which requires it to control the material that goes over the air. The legislation before us permits the government to take over that control only in case of war, riots or grave emergency.

I might add that commentary on the news is absolutely forbidden in Great Britain. No news commentary whatsoever is allowed by the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Am I to understand that Mr. Ferguson and Doctor Stewart are paid commentators engaged by the radio broadcasting corporation?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is correct?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to conclude with this thought. The Prime Minister last night said:

> —and possibly more is not necessary at this time to ensure that by the commission itself a policy will be followed similar to that which all hon. members of this house seek to follow in their discussions.

It seems to me that there the Prime Minister did lay down a policy, and read in the light of the remarks which preceded it, it would in my opinion make it very difficult for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to continue to broadcast commentaries and news items such as we get from Doctor Stewart and Mr. Ferguson, both of whom give in understandable terms an interpretation of the news.

With regard to Great Britain, I have listened occasionally to rebroadcasts from various places in Great Britain, and if they are not news commentaries I do not know exactly what they may be called. I am thinking at the moment of a number I have heard from a gentleman who was formerly employed in the diplomatic service. I am not certain of his initials, but I think he is Sir Malcolm Robertson. I have enjoyed his remarks, but they are certainly a commentary on the news of the day.

I think I am expressing on behalf of many people the hope and desire that the Prime Minister's remarks—shall I put it this way?—will not be interpreted by the radio corporation or by this house or the country as a warning to the radio corporation not to proceed with the discussion of public matters, giving all sides of the questions involved.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to state with regard to the broadcasts made by Mr. Ferguson and by Doctor Stewart—I do not know Mr. Ferguson, but I know Doctor Stewart and I have a great respect for him—that these gentlemen are engaged by the radio corporation and are paid what amounts to a stipend for the preparation of the broadcasts which they make. They are supplied with broadcasting facilities from one end of the country to the other, and on several occasions I have listened to them discussing acute international problems in which from my own personal knowledge they trusted to their imagination for the facts; and when on some occasions they did not trust to their imagination they were simply repeating, on occasion, the common twaddle which finds expression in some of the German and other foreign papers.

Mr. THORSON: Will the hon. gentleman give particulars of the statement he has just made?

Mr. CAHAN: I am stating what I know to be the fact, and that is the ground of my objection. If I were to go into particulars I would have to exceed my forty minutes, but there are some things of which I have knowledge.

Mr. THORSON: If the hon. gentleman—

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to make my statement? He may refer later to what he wishes to state.

My objection is made not to the expression of opinion over the radio, because any person who wishes to engage time over the radio to express opinions, which are permissible in the public press, should be permitted to engage the radio for that purpose under conditions prescribed by the radio corporation, which prohibits certain expressions of opinion which are profane or indecent or malicious misrepresentations of the facts. But here are two men, engaged and paid by the radio corporation, who are expressing opinions from one end of the country to the other for which those who engage them and pay them must in the public mind take responsibility. I refer, for instance, to this repeated reference to the Cliveden intrigue, which has been repeated by one of the commentators. Those who know the facts know that those representations emanate from a foreign press and a hostile press, and are not representations of the facts.

All that I took from the remark of the Prime Minister last evening was that with respect to broadcasts which receive the endorsement of the broadcasting corporation, and which are given free facilities, and for which the broadcasters are being paid by it, it is incumbent on those who are broadcasting under those conditions to be careful indeed as to the statements and the expressions of opinion which they disseminate. I think that is a view which is prevalent throughout this country. I have no objection to my hon. friend (Mr. Coldwell) going on the air from time to time, if he can secure radio facilities, to give arguments in favour of social credit theories.

Mr. COLDWELL: I object; for I do not advocate social credit theories.

Mr. CAHAN: Or other expression of political opinion. He may discuss, if he wishes, the Quebec padlock law and other measures which he deems reprehensible. But it is condemnable, I think, and cannot be approved, that in grave international crises men should depend on their imaginations for expressions of opinion which they broadcast by radio. Listening to that Sunday afternoon broadcast from time to time, you will find that they often do not even pretend to state facts but are stating hypothetical opinons which have no basis in fact. On one occasion I wrote to one of these gentlemen. He was discussing certain international events which arose when I was a delegate to the League of Nations, and the representations which he made he had heard or learned, I suppose, from some gossip. But those representations were utterly lacking in reliability, were a misrepresentation of the events which actually took place, and they had a most pernicious influence from one end of this country to the other, because time and again those statements were repeated by others as though, emanating from that broadcaster, he must have assured himself of the facts before he gave expression to those opinions. It is to that I object, and I know that I express the sentiments of many hundreds of people of my acquaintance. Many have communicated to me their opinions and have protested against that sort of misrepresentations being paid for and receiving free radio facilities worth thousands of dollars for broadcasting on Sunday afternoons from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. CHURCH: With reference to what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, I think he is under a misapprehension. I was not attacking the hon. gentleman's speech on the radio, in fact I did not hear it. I made the statement about Mr. Cordell Hull of my own volition. The hon. gentleman will find the same observations in my address of March 24, and also on the same date the remarks of a member of the British house to the very same effect as to his opinion of this society. I said further that I had often read the speeches of the hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar and Essex East (Mr. Martin) on other subjects with a great deal of interest, but I did not hear these radio addresses. I did object to the policy of the corporation and these debates; I object to it now and I have objected to it all along. And since the remarks made by me on April 28 objecting to this broadcast the government brought down paragraph (d) of section 3 of this bill, a new section which gives the government of the day power to make regulations in case of actual or apprehended war, rebellion, riot or other emergency.

Dealing with the particular principle referred to by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) I may say that he has been a member of the house for only two or three years. He is a gentleman for whom I have some regard, and I would not make an unfounded statement concerning him or anyone else, because I back up any statement I make.

Let me come to what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has been saying around the Toronto district. The effect of his words is nothing but pacifism. As a result of the British Broadcasting Corporation's policy with regard to this matter, objection was made to that corporation as I pointed out last evening to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). It was made by whom? By the secretary of state for war, Right Hon. Leslie Hore-Belisha, and by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. For what reason? Because of the activities of this society, the League of Nations society. Objection came from Poland, from Germany, from Italy and two or three other countries to what these people were saying on the radio, with the result that the British Prime Minister has brought in the very same provision that is contained in paragraph (d) of section 3 of this bill.

Pacifists, of whom the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is one, have had their day in this country, but it will cost us thirty-six millions for defence this year. I objected last night to this part of the radio corporation's program. Let it be understood that I am not criticizing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or any official connected with them. The corporation was created by the former prime minister, and I am one to give them a show, but I have always objected to these debates on controversial matters. They do not convert anybody. We have had several of them on the radio, and people are getting sick and tired of them; they would rather hear music. I may say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who purports to represent the younger people, that the young people take more interest in social matters and sports than they do in politics, pacifism, radio debates and that kind of thing. As a consequence of the British Broadcasting Corporation's program of debates of this kind and similar propaganda, the secretary of war, Right Hon. Leslie Hore-Belisha, said Britain was expending hundreds of millions on rearmament.

What has happened since 1921 as a result of trying to bring people together through the League of Nations? The league is dead, and the British Broadcasting Corporation have been instructed by the government of the day along the same line as the Prime Minister indicated here last night. I refer to the words I used on March 24 in connection with the national defence estimates as proof of what I said last night. The secretary of war in England said that this propaganda through the B.B.C. had hurt recruiting and done the empire untold harm. He objected also to what some of the clergy were saying, and to all this campaign of pacifism. Now see where pacifism has brought the mother country. She faces insult and invasion, all as a result of this policy of disarmament in the old land. The minister of war has had difficulty in getting recruits. He brought the matter up in the House of Commons and told the pacifists in the house that they had had their day. They have had their day in this country, too, and I can say, as I said last night, that we are just where we were a hundred years ago. You have no army, no navy, no armed forces; you are depending on the people of the mother country for your liberty and defence. That attitude seems to be very popular in this house; in almost every question that comes up we are told that we belong to the American continent; and I was glad to see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) bring in this paragraph (d) because the minister and the Prime Minister were being blamed unjustly for the broadcasts to which I have referred. I alluded to the matter on April 28, and at the end of the discussion these remarks were made:

Mr. Church: You had better send for a life-saving station.

Mr. Bennett: Was the consent of the government sought?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Bennett: It was not sought or given?

Mr. Mackenzie King: No, that is right.

I objected then and I object now to this linking us up with pan-American propaganda on such a controversial subject as defence and foreign affairs. It is not in the interest of a united empire. We are not dependent upon the Monroe doctrine and pan-Americanism, we are depending on the British fleet, army and air force and the British people who are now so heavily taxed for Canada and the empire. Facts are facts. I agree with every word that was so ably said the other night by my right hon. leader in Chalmers church as to what we owe to Britain. I was sorry that the press, although it could publish four pages of ballyhoo about hockey, could devote only a few lines to the references made in my leader's speech to this matter of what Britain has done for us and the empire.

I say, as I said last night, that there are thousands of people, intelligent people, in this country who are sick and tired of the League of Nations society and the pacifist ideas which are spread through the schools as well by this agency. I object to it as a citizen and on behalf of the constituency I represent. This League of Nations society is doing and has done a great deal of damage to rearmament, as it did in England until it was checked by the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain.

In conclusion, may I say I have nothing but the kindest regard for hon. members in the group on my left. They may have their views, and I respect them, but those views are not mine. I am sent by my constituents to represent them, and I believe that the overwhelming majority of the people of this country is in favour of the policy of England and of rearmament and in favour of putting brakes on the sort of thing we have been hearing from radio speakers and pacifists. Let me remind the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that the British labour party voted 2,250,000 "for" to 262,000 "against" on the question of rearmament, and the support of a policy of putting a brake, in difficult days like these, upon these mischievous broadcasts. I believe that the minister and the government are to be commended for having inserted this clause (d) in the bill in such difficult days as these.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it is interesting that support for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should come from the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I have no desire to enter into the details of the broadcasting which has been done by Doctor Stewart and Mr. Ferguson, but I content myself with saying that I disagree entirely with what has been said by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I too have read something of the English press, and that part of the English press that is not inspired by Germany—or Russia, as someone says—and I quite agree with what has been said elsewhere that many of the statements of these commentators to which objection is taken are very well founded indeed.

However, I wish to come back to the speech of the Prime Minister last night which gave rise to this discussion. The Minister of Transport rather seeks to excuse the Prime Minister's statement by suggesting that he spoke as a private individual. I do not think the Prime Minister can very well speak as a private individual in this house, especially when he lays down such important propositions as he did last night. I regard them as a very serious menace to the freedom of speech which we should have in this country.

What are these two propositions? First of all the Prime Minister says:

> In ordinary times we would not think of criticizing in this parliament the policies of a government or the proceedings of a parliament of another part of the British empire.

Why not?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Because it is not good form.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When, as my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar points out, these policies that are being discussed in the British Empire may involve us in war, I should like to know why it is not "good form." I have nothing of the sense of the inferiority of our parliament to that of Great Britain which some hon. members seem to have. As a British citizen I have as much right to speak in Ottawa as if I were a member of the parliament at Westminster. I have just as much right to discuss these large questions. I cannot see why we should be told that simply because these things are being discussed at Westminster, or in New Zealand, or somewhere else, we should be prohibited from discussing them here.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is not the statement at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let me read the statement once more:

> In ordinary times we would not think of criticizing in this parliament the policies of a government or the proceedings of a parliament of another part of the British empire.

I leave my hon. friend to make his own interpretation.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is not that a part of the rules of the house?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; there is nothing whatever in the rules to that effect. It is absolutely a new rule that the Prime Minister seeks to introduce at the present time. Further, in commenting on something he believed had taken place in Great Britain, the Prime Minister extends that rule and says:

> . . . it is not proper either in parliament or out of parliament for criticisms to be made of the internal affairs of other countries. . . .

What an extraordinary statement! Am I not to make any statement in parliament or outside regarding the internal affairs of Germany—of Germany's action in invading Austria? Am I not to make any statement with regard to France's position, or Italy's?

Am I not to make any criticism here of what takes place in Russia? It is a preposterous proposition that we cannot here, either in parliament or outside it, criticize what is taking place in other countries, lest perchance we should get some government into trouble somewhere. A statement of that kind on the part of the Prime Minister ought not to go unchallenged. As far as I am concerned, so long as I am a member of this parliament I propose to speak definitely regarding anything that concerns the interest of my country, whether it is being talked about in New Zealand or Great Britain or Germany or Russia or anywhere else. I do not think that any doubt should be left as to where this parliament stands when the Prime Minister will venture to make a statement of that kind.

Then he goes on to the broadcasting side of the matter, and this is the second proposition:

> What applies to debates in parliament should apply equally to broadcasting under a commission which derives its authority and powers from parliament.

If that is not a new proposition I should like to know what it is. We have a commission that controls or is supposed to control broadcasting, and here we are told that we must not discuss on the air anything that goes on anywhere else.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, yes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What about the second paragraph of the Prime Minister's remarks?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let the hon. member read that when he pleases and make his own interpretation.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On a point of order, I would say, it is not a matter of interpretation, but of the literal reading truthfully of the second paragraph.

Mr. HOWE: Read it all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will read the whole paragraph:

> So far as any policy relates to our own affairs, we are at perfect liberty, of course, to discuss as fully as we please the effect of government policy. What I am referring to at the moment is not whether, with respect to some particular matter, a policy is right or wrong. Each country is free to discuss in its own parliament any policy from the point of view of that country itself. I do not think, however, that one parliament should become critical of the proceedings of another parliament in another part of the world, particularly in times like these. What applies to debates in parliament should apply equally to broadcasting under a commission which derives its authority and powers from parliament.

That is what he said.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And it is entirely different from what the hon. member said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let the hon. gentleman express his own opinions. I am willing to leave it to the general public to read that paragraph and make their own interpretation. The Minister of Transport suggests that the Prime Minister must have been speaking as a private individual. What words did the Prime Minister use in closing? They have already been quoted by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar:

> I think it is only right to say what I have said; and possibly more is not necessary at this time to ensure that by the commission itself a policy will be followed similar to that which all hon. members of this house seek to follow in their discussions.

Is that a warning or a threat?

Mr. HOWE: I think, after listening to my hon. friend, who is a member of this house, that the Prime Minister has given the radio corporation ample latitude.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not quite catch the point.

Mr. HOWE: He suggested that the radio corporation should observe the same reasonableness that all hon. members of this house do, and in that I suggest he has given them ample latitude.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He might have, after listening to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George! Unfortunately this statement of the Prime Minister goes much further than that. The Prime Minister did not hear this debate.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member has referred to the member for St. Lawrence-St. George. My objection was to placing public funds into the hands of a corporation to pay certain commentators to broadcast certain particular opinions in certain cases. That is the pith and substance of my objection. I would have no objection to my hon. friend broadcasting any opinion he has expressed in this house or out of it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I appreciate the very good opinion of my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George, but I was referring just now to his expressions of opinion not with regard to myself but with regard to Mr. Ferguson and Doctor Stewart.

Mr. CAHAN: I was dealing with what I knew in certain cases, very particular cases.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: These words of the Prime Minister with regard to the commission do seem to be in the nature of a warning or of a threat. I cannot think that any private individual would say things in just this way and confidently expect that nothing further than his own private opinion would bring about the required change of policy. Since when did we in Canada adopt the arbitrary methods that prevail in authoritarian countries? Is it possible that a ukase or declaration can be issued by the Prime Minister as to what public boards are to do? I thought responsibility with regard to these matters lay with the broadcasting corporation. I thought the ultimate responsibility lay with parliament. I did not think it was possible for a prime minister to tell this country what its policies were to be. It comes to that.

It is true this kind of arbitrary action might be considered necessary in times of war, but certainly it should be confined to times of emergency, and should be preceded by a proclamation. We are still, I am glad to think, in comparatively normal times, even if they are difficult times. If I understand anything of the principles underlying democracy, we must preserve the fullest right to freedom of speech even in difficult times and even when considering the very complicated problems confronting the world to-day. With the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) I hope that the statement of the Prime Minister—and it is a statement of the Prime Minister—will be reconsidered; that it will not be regarded as the policy of the government, either with regard to members of this parliament or with regard to the broadcasting corporation.

Mr. THORSON: With what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) had to say I am generally in accord. We in this parliament should not let the opinion go abroad to the Canadian people that we are seeking in any manner whatsoever to curtail the fullest possible right on the part of the Canadian people to discuss public matters in any way they see fit. The right of free discussion of public affairs is one of the most sacred rights that we in a democracy enjoy. It is one that men have fought to win, and we must not permit any encroachment upon it. I regard some of the opinions expressed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) as an attempt to insert the thin end of the wedge of repression. If commentators are employed by the broadcasting corporation to comment upon the news of the world they are employed for the purpose of expressing their opinions as to the significance of international events. They are not employed merely for the purpose of narrating the events; that is done by the press. They are commentators upon international events, and being such it is desirable that they should express their opinions. If they are not to express their own opinions and views, whose views and whose opinions are they to express? Is anyone to be set in authority over them to say to them, "You must not express this opinion"? Here are two men who have been commenting upon the news of the day, and their hours of comment are eagerly awaited by thousands of people from one end of Canada to the other: is it necessary that their opinions or views shall coincide with those of all their listeners? What would be the value of comment of that kind?

If comment is to be of any value it must be a clear and honest expression of viewpoints. What is going to happen to comments of this sort upon the news of the day if after a commentator has expressed an opinion upon some controversial point he knows that on the following Monday on the orders of the day the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is going to rise in his place in this house and say, "I object to that expression of opinion"? Is that going to be conducive to honest expression of views and opinions? I would much rather have inaccuracy than suppression of opinion. If these broadcasts are to have any educational value whatever our commentators must have assurance of the fullest and freest right to express the views that they honestly hold. I do not believe for a moment that either Mr. Ferguson or Doctor Stewart are dishonest men or that they are expressing views that they do not honestly hold.

Mr. CAHAN: No one suggested it.

Mr. THORSON: Well, it was intimated. If there is going to be a debate in this house about every expression of opinion with which some hon. member of this house may disagree, what is going to happen to free discussion?

Mr. CAHAN: I have no objection to expressions of opinion over the radio. But, when the most critical of international matters are being dealt with, I suggest that if one or two men are to be paid a stipend for the expression of their views, and given broadcasting facilities worth hundreds or even thousands of dollars an hour, then other people who differ from them, and who have closer knowledge of the facts than these people can possibly have, should have the right of reply.

Mr. THORSON: Who would those people be?

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I know one or two events in which I was actually participating, which were entirely misrepresented. If the hon. member for Selkirk refers to the broadcasting by a gentleman from his own city I say that he, without any knowledge but trusting to mere gossip, has no right to make statements with respect to what he called the Cliveden intrigue, concerning which he can have no personal information, and which are denied as being untrue.

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member can make such statements as this if he wishes, but I do not think he has any justification for saying that Mr. Ferguson invented what he said in that broadcast or made it out of whole cloth.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not say that.

Mr. THORSON: I have a distinct recollection of the occasion on which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George objected to the broadcast in question, and my recollection is that he objected to the opinions expressed.

Mr. CAHAN: I objected both in this house and in the public press to the expression of such opinions by paid propagandists, paid out of the public funds of this country, without any permission or opportunity being given to others to controvert the statements so made.

Mr. THORSON: Whose opinions is the commentator to express, if not his own, if they are honestly held?

Mr. LAWSON: The point is that he should pay for expressing his own opinions.

Mr. THORSON: It is a service that is welcomed by thousands of people from one end of Canada to the other.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You can build up a demand for almost any service if you pay enough for it.

Mr. THORSON: It is a good service, giving countless people throughout Canada an understanding and appreciation of what is going on in the world which otherwise they would not obtain.

Mr. CAHAN: A very erroneous one sometimes.

Mr. THORSON: And through listening to these broadcasts they are given an opportunity for education. The free right of public discussion of public affairs is the very foundation of our democracy.

Mr. CAHAN: I entirely agree.

Mr. THORSON: We have very recently—

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member for Selkirk that this discussion has been allowed a very wide latitude, and I should like him to confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. THORSON: We are dealing with radio broadcasting.

The CHAIRMAN: Quite true; we are on paragraph (e) of section 4.

Mr. THORSON: And that, as I understand it, has to deal with the extent to which the government shall deal with radio broadcasts, and everything I have said is strictly in order.

Mr. HOWE: If I may interrupt, this deals with the regulation that no radio receiving set or apparatus for installation or use as or in a private receiving station may be sold or serviced by any person until a licence has been obtained for that station. It has to do with the licensing of receiving sets.

Mr. THORSON: Then perhaps my remarks would be more appropriate under another section, but why should I be called in question when so far the discussion has centred around these radio broadcasts?

We had a decision by the Supreme Court of Canada recently that I think is valued by every Canadian. The decision was to the effect that the right of public discussion of public affairs underlies our whole constitution. That is new ground to be broken by the courts of this land, and it is splendid ground. There are fundamental rights that must be maintained and preserved at all costs; for only by the exercise of these fundamental rights can progress result. We must not stifle free discussion in this house. We must not stifle free discussion in the press, and we must not stifle free discussion over the radio; for the radio is now the greatest instrument for the free discussion of public affairs.

There is a distinction to be drawn between the proprieties that ought to be observed in the discussion of certain matters, and the rights of people to discuss them. I do not think it was ever the intention of the Prime Minister that there should be any attempt to abridge the right of any hon. member of this house to say what he likes about public affairs. The Prime Minister indicated the desirability of moderation in language and of refraining from discussing in this parliament matters that solely concern the parliaments of other countries. In this regard the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has raised a question. He has expressed the view that what is happening in Great Britain as a result of British foreign policy may have a direct result upon the people of Canada. He has the right to express that point of view. There are many people in Canada who hold the same view, and they have the right to express the opinion they hold. The government of the day can indicate its policy, and naturally it will seek to avoid gratuitous comment upon what is happening in other countries; but any member of this parliament or any Canadian who thinks that what is happening in Great Britain or in Europe has a direct or indirect effect upon the people of Canada and upon the welfare of the people of this country as a whole, has a duty and an obligation to express his viewpoint fearlessly and courageously, without any apprehension that some member of this house will rise in his place and say that he must not say this or that. Every member of this house should be as zealous as possible to safeguard this fundamental right of free discussion of public affairs.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I should like to ask the hon. member if he believes that this man, expressing his own views, should be paid for doing so, through a government agency.

Mr. THORSON: I thought I had already expressed an opinion in that regard, when I said that thousands of people in Canada welcomed these broadcasts; and for the purpose of making available this service, which thousands of people in Canada are very glad to receive, the broadcasting corporation has employed two paid commentators. All right; if they are commentators and not merely narrators of what has happened it is desirable that they should express the opinions and views which they honestly hold. It matters little whether those who listen to them agree with those views. That is the opinion I express.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): For some minutes now we have had the peculiar spectacle of members of this house setting up straw men at great length in order to knock them down again. The hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat protested vigorously against the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), remarks which were moderate, reasonable and dignified.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Some of my hon. friends laugh. I venture to say that if any hon. member, when he thinks the matter over seriously to-morrow and reads the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George as they were uttered in this house, fails to find them reasonable and moderate and dignified, he will not be condemning the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George; rather he will be condemning his own powers of reasoning and judgment.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was protesting against paid commentators making statements that were not warranted by the facts and giving opinions that were not wise, at public expense. The hon. member for Selkirk protests that this means limiting the freedom of discussion, which he says is the foundation of democratic government in this country. I can see no connection between the two. On the other hand the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), set up another straw man and knocked it down. He took the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this house yesterday; he had them before him, and there was no excuse at all for misquoting what was said. But the hon. gentleman said the Prime Minister had told us that we must not discuss anything going on anywhere else, in any other country or any other parliament, whereas in the second paragraph of the speech, which afterwards he was good enough to read, the Prime Minister distinctly stated:

> Each country is free to discuss in its own parliament any policy from the point of view of that country itself.

And the last words of the Prime Minister:

> I think it is only right to say what I have said; and possibly more is not necessary at this time to ensure that by the commission itself a policy will be followed similar to that which all hon. members of this house seek to follow in their discussions.

Does any member of the house or does anyone in the country think that policy is not wide enough for any paid commentators of the corporation? Should the paid servants of the corporation have more latitude in remarks and criticisms of either parliamentary or other subjects than do the representatives of the people in this house? To me it is a most amazing doctrine that the servants of the crown should be given more licence to spread their doctrines not only throughout this country but throughout other countries.

Mr. HEAPS: They are not doing that.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The principle is that they should be allowed to do it, according to the hon. member's leader. He states that they ought to be permitted to do it, because he has said, "Surely these kinds of programs are not to be taken away—"

Mr. HEAPS: My hon. friend is confused.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No; "my hon. friend" is not a bit confused. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) made that statement in words something like those I have given the committee: "Surely this is not to be the policy laid down by the Prime Minister of this country. That is what is done in authoritarian states." He knew that was not so at all. All that the Prime Minister suggested was that the corporation would see to it, not in response to a ukase—I believe that was the word used—or a decree of the Prime Minister, but in deference to the discussions in this house, that critics on the air—not commentators alone by the way—should be as fair in their way of talking and as decent in their public discussions as members of this house are supposed to be.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Prime Minister did not refer to it in that way; it was not "as members of this house speak," but as he believed members of this house should speak. Those are two different things.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I can admit quite readily it is different, so far as the hon. member is concerned.

Mr. HEAPS: That is the principle which was indicated.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): These are the words:

> . . . a policy will be followed similar to that which all hon. members of this house seek to follow in their discussions.

I would say the Prime Minister was being charitable when he used those words. My hon. friend and I, and many others, sometimes go beyond the bounds of the most moderate discussion, and sometimes take ourselves a little bit seriously. I admit that my hon. friend, if his conscience sees fit to do it, is sufficiently educated to permit him.

Mr. BENNETT: "Sensitive" is the word.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If he is not, that is not my fault. However, I believe the hon. member, or any other hon. member, does possess a conscience which is sufficiently sensitive. Hon. members do believe there should be reasonable and moderate discussion, and that should be latitude enough.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) reproached the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), when that hon. member was only protesting against the hired commentaters paid for by the people of Canada, who were going on the air. Probably they were giving their honest opinions, but that has not anything to do with the matter. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said it was most important that state paid propaganda should not be permitted. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke of those who supported the attitude of the Prime Minister.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and members from other parts of the house do so. I do not believe there is anything to complain of. I would suggest—and I am going to follow my own advice—that we have spent a lot of time on this subject, and that we should discuss the matter more immediately before the committee. I did not begin this discussion; I believe it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth).

I must say that hon. members who have been speaking, each and every one of them, would be the first to protest if any civil servant of this country, any deputy minister or member of a bureau, went on the air, on a platform or anywhere else, and advocated his own opinion on contentious matters, without being paid for it particularly or being asked that that opinion should be given. They would not permit that sort of thing to run freely throughout Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: Setting up another straw man.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What would the hon. member say if the deputy minister of finance, or the head of the tariff division, or any other officer of the kind went out next Sunday and preached a sermon in favour of high tariffs, giving his opinions on the subject?

Mr. HEAPS: That has nothing to do with the principle, has it?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member does not see the point. Here are men who are engaged to deal with affairs in the world, and throughout Canada. Here are men who are hired by the people of Canada to do certain work. They have gone out and at public expense expressed private views, which they have a right to hold, but they have expressed those views.

Mr. THORSON: They are hired to comment on the news.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Such things as this will bring about a condition whereby either the corporation will have to engage men to give out views of the commission, or—

Mr. HEAPS: They are not their own views.

Mr. THORSON: They are truthful.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The question of truth is difficult to decide. In the opinion of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George the facts were misquoted. But when it comes to a question of opinion—

An hon. MEMBER: Who will decide that?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): A question of fact may be proved, but a question of truth is a matter of opinion. However, I do protest against the expenditure of public money on political propaganda which may have—

Mr. THORSON: It is not political.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Oh, "it is not political"! I was referring to political propaganda which may have serious effects upon people in this country, our friendly relations with other countries, and our relations throughout the world.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn) Which of the two commentators we are now discussing does the hon. member consider was a propagandist?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am not discussing an individual commentator at all. I am speaking of a principle underlying our institutions and our state.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Which of these two gentlemen whom we have been discussing to-day? Those are the two gentlemen who have been discussed.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member may discuss those gentlemen as much as he likes, but I am not doing it. You cannot make me say anything about them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But the point is that those are the two gentlemen referred to by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and we now find that the hon. member for Melfort is agreeing with those views. Which of them does he consider to be a political propagandist?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The views of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, if he will pardon my giving my interpretation of them, were that it was wrong to spend public money to put propaganda over the air, and to give views or opinions which might be held quite sincerely in the minds of commentators but which, in some instances at least, were not accurate, and did not reflect accurate news. I have not mentioned the names of the commentators, but am simply outlining the principle that it is not wise to spend public money on propaganda of that kind.

Mr. STEVENS: The section under discussion raises a question which, in my mind, ought to be considered at some stage. The discussion which has been proceeding for some time bears directly upon the point I wish to raise. The whole section is one by which the minister may make regulations. The paragraphs define the kinds of regulations he may prescribe.

In the old original bill the application was to a large extent to ship operations and radio stations including ship stations. The establishment of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the ownership by the Dominion of Canada of a portion of the broadcasting stations have introduced a new feature. I am coming to question the wisdom of operating broadcasting stations through a government corporation. In saying that, I admit frankly that in its original form, patterned somewhat after the British Broadcasting Corporation, there was in the minds of those who fostered the Canadian organization the desire to improve broadcasting conditions. I am under the impression that it was the abuse of broadcasting by advertising agencies which really suggested the move. However, as the years have gone by, we are now facing just the condition indicated by the discussion this afternoon.

I find myself wholly in accord with the member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) when he advocates freedom of speech. Whether that freedom of speech is in the form of public expression, or of the written word through the press, or whether it is through this new medium of radio broadcasting, I am in favour of freedom of speech, and I am opposed to the restriction of freedom of speech. But the limitations on that freedom in broadcasting ought, in my opinion at least, to be the same as the limitations on the newspapers or on utterances from a public platform, with respect to libellous, seditious and such like utterances, which are controlled by our ordinary criminal law. But by introducing control of the administration of a part of broadcasting, and only a part of it, by a government agency, we introduce at once a very difficult proposition, because while we are in favour of freedom of speech we are then faced with the position which has been stated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), that a government employee or someone paid out of the taxpayers' money may advocate views which are distinctly at variance with and do offence to a very large number of taxpayers. It is all very well for the hon. member for Selkirk to argue that a man has the right not only to tell the news but to give his opinion of the news. That is all right if he is doing it at his own expense and under his own agency, whatever that agency may be.

Mr. THORSON: But he is paid for doing that very thing.

Mr. STEVENS: That is exactly where my hon. friend and I differ in our viewpoints. When it comes to a government paying a man to express views for which the government would not hold themselves responsible, from which views they may indeed differ, then I think we are entering upon a dangerous field.

That brings me to my comment upon the principle which is involved in this whole business, that is whether it is advisable for a government agency to administer and operate broadcasting stations. I believe the radio corporation should be limited to a supervision of the technique of broadcasting—wavelengths, licensing, the times at which stations shall operate, and their power. I think it would be better, in the light of the circumstances that have gradually developed, if broadcasting were in the hands of private corporations.

Mr. THORSON: In other words, have the broadcasting emasculated.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend can apply any interpretation he likes to put upon it.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is a fairly recent convert to this view, I take it?

Mr. STEVENS: As I said in my opening remarks, I had come to this view after watching the operations of the radio corporation for a few years. Let me say to the minister this: I think this is the first time I have offered what might be considered criticism of the radio corporation, and I am not now criticizing that corporation. Generally speaking, I believe it has discharged rather difficult duties in a fairly efficient way. I am inclined to the view, although my opinion is not, I think, one of the best, the present radio corporation is an exceptionally able body of men, and they are doing a very fair job. But that does not prevent me from taking exception to some of the policies which are being followed, and I do take definite exception to a government body paying individuals to express opinions upon controversial subjects. We do, for instance, carry on a debate over the air, and I think that probably is good, if it is very carefully supervised. I think the corporation should know beforehand what is going to be said by the two persons taking contrary sides of a question. Such a debate might be useful on some subjects. I am not taking much exception to that. But to give an individual carte blanche to express his opinion on the news of the day, and to use his half hour, or whatever his time may be, for the dissemination of his own views at the taxpayers' expense is, in my opinion, a wrong use of the radio.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about the news items, the broadcasting of news? Does not the selection of the news really involve discrimination?

Mr. STEVENS: I was coming to that question, and I might as well deal with it now. There has been a good deal of suggestion, shall I say, that we should be very, very careful about the news which is disseminated to see that nothing is done to disturb other nations. I was in the old country for some time this winter, and the whole of Great Britain and the continent were just seething with bitterness one way or another because of the use that was being made of government broadcasting agencies to attack other countries; for instance, Italy was disseminating in Arabic views that would stir up the Arabs in Palestine, and that was carried to a point where it became quite serious. Germany also has its form of broadcasting propaganda. On the other hand, Germany and Italy charged speakers in Great Britain with giving views contrary to their interests. The controversy became very bitter; but fortunately, so far as Italy and Great Britain are concerned, they met and one of the chief points agreed upon between Mr. Chamberlain and the Italian government was that there must be an abandonment of that form of broadcasting. It only goes to illustrate that care ought to be taken in announcing the news not to make the announcement in a form which is distinctly offensive, and calculatedly so.

As to the ordinary news commentators in Great Britain and the United States—and we get them over the short-wave from other countries—I think they are excellent, and I have no objection at all to that. It is not difficult for a person trained in newspaper work or in headline work in the newspapers to pick out the important news items and to give them to the public in a fair and true light. That is of the very essence of good newspaper work, as newspaper men will agree; that is, the ability to give a news item without colouring it with editorial comment. The same principle should be applied to broadcasting. I can see no objection to that. But I do object to engaging commentators and paying them with public funds to give their own interpretations of the news items. If they wish to do so at their own expense or over private broadcasting stations, that is another matter.

This brings me back to my main point, whether the time has not arrived when we might well consider the abandonment of the actual administration of broadcasting stations by the government of Canada through this corporation and the turning of them back to private ownership, the corporation, of course, retaining control of what affects the public generally, such matters as wave-lengths, the power of the stations, and matters of that kind, which by the way, of course, are definitely affected by international agreements. I think that this discussion brings quite vividly to the front the need of great care in the exercise of the minister's powers under this section, and the point that we are treading on very dangerous ground when commentators are allowed to use their discretion in commenting upon the news of the day.

Mr. HOWE: Before this subsection carries I should like to move an amendment to clarify the clause. The words "sold or serviced by any person" are used. "Serviced" is, in my opinion, a word that needs to be clarified. I would ask my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to move that clause 4, paragraph 1 (e) be amended by striking out the words "sold or serviced" in line 3 and substituting therefor the words "sold, repaired or maintained."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I move accordingly.

Mr. STEWART: Does that make it the obligation of the firm that repairs a radio set to ascertain whether it has a licence or not, before they make any repairs on it?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: Is not that going a long way?

Mr. HOWE: Why?

Mr. STEWART: Why should it be the business of an individual partnership or a company who repair radios to be concerned about the licence? Does that apply to private radio sets?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEWART: Is that not going pretty far, to make a man engaged in the repairing of radio sets—when all he does is, perhaps to put in new tubes or make repairs on a receiving set when he is called in—concerned in the question whether a licence has been issued for that radio set? Do I understand that the subsection goes that far? It seems to me that it does.

Mr. HOWE: The old regulation provided that it was not legal to sell a radio without a licence being secured.

Mr. STEWART: Quite so.

Mr. HOWE: This goes a step further and makes it illegal to repair a radio unless there is a licence issued for that radio.

Mr. STEWART: I admit the accuracy of the position with respect to a sale. I think that is quite sound and proper. But it does seem to go pretty far to require the man who makes repairs on a radio set to find out at his own risk whether the owner has a licence for it, before he can do any repairs on it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think that the point raised by the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) should be allowed to pass without at least some comment. There is no doubt that private owners of radio broadcasting stations and others who are opposed to public ownership, have within recent times put up a great barrage against government ownership of radio broadcasting. The point which was emphasized by the hon. member for East Kootenay, as far as I could ascertain, was that it was not right that paid commentators or commentators paid by the government should be engaged to comment upon the news, particularly upon the foreign news. I have listened for quite a long time to these Sunday evening broadcasts by Doctor Stewart, I believe ever since they began. I did not agree with him on all occasions, but it does not follow that because I did not agree with him he was wrong and I was right; the reverse may have been the fact, and even though I did not agree with him, the broadcasts are in my opinion a good thing for the people of Canada.

I should be interested to know what complaints have been made to the minister in regard to these broadcasts. I have heard very few complaints myself. The complaints that were made to-day are merely matters of opinion. The statement was made that the commentator was using his imagination without having the facts, and the person who made that complaint did not bring any evidence to show that he had the facts and that the other fellow was using his imagination. If there is anything which would make me more favourable to government ownership of radio broadcasting than I have been, it is that we had a government which, although I do not regard it as very progressive, had engaged commentators of the calibre they have engaged for the purpose of analyzing foreign affairs to the people of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. member will permit—he is confusing the government with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. MacINNIS: I assume there is some connection, and that if they were not acceptable to the government they would not hold their positions very long, I may be wrong in that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe we can assume there is some connection. However, I am glad that the hon. member brought the point to my attention. I believe that parliament should consider this matter very carefully before it departs from the principle of public ownership which has been in force since 1932.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister inform the committee what length of time these commentators have on the radio each week—the ones who have been particularly referred to this afternoon?

Mr. HOWE: I listen to them occasionally. I would say, fifteen minutes, but if somebody assured me that I was wrong I would accept their statement.

Mr. HEAPS: Fifteen minutes each?

Mr. HOWE: No. I think they alternate.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder if some of the hon. members who have been complaining this afternoon about the addresses of these commentators have not slightly overstated the case, if, as has been mentioned by the minister, these commentators occupy the radio for only fifteen minutes a week. If we compare that with the whole length of broadcasting by the corporation in a week, it will be seen that very little time is given for comments on the news of the day. I have heard no complaints from any source as to the comments of the gentlemen referred to. I do not know whether the minister or the department have received any. But I have listened to them for quite a long time, and I have been very much interested in what they say. Although very often I find myself in disagreement with their viewpoints on the news of the day, that does not mean that they should not be permitted to comment over the radio. Similar facilities are granted over the private stations in the United States, and if private corporations can give comments on news in that country why cannot a public utility do the same thing in Canada? If definite complaints are made with regard to the comments, it would be a different story, but so far nothing specific has been stated in this house by way of objection to what has been said. If there is anything definite I should be interested to hear what it is. So far there has been no real complaint except that comments have been made over the radio. These commentators are not propagandists, as suggested by some hon. members. They do not give their own points of view on questions, but merely interpret as best they can the events of the preceding few days. Knowing some of the opinions of some of these gentlemen who give comments over the radio, I am sure that they do not give their own personal points of view, and I do not believe that they are propagandists. I am sorry that my hon. friend from East Kootenay comes out in opposition to public ownership of radio in Canada. Those who remember the kind of broadcasting we had a few years ago, and who note the broadcasting that we have to-day, will have observed the tremendous strides we have made in Canada in the past two or three years. Excellent service is given, and I would say that our broadcasts are far superior to those in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: We get most of it from there.

Mr. HEAPS: Some of the main broadcasts do come from the United States, as the leader of the opposition has pointed out; but anyone who has lived in the United States for even a few weeks and who has turned on the radio to get some entertainment knows that one is compelled to listen every few minutes to some form of obnoxious advertising. No one who has had that experience would say for a moment that the broadcasting in Canada is not preferable to the broadcasting in the United States. The moment you tune in on any American station, apart from expensive broadcasts, you are in for a long series of advertisements. I am thankful that we in Canada have not broadcasting of that sort.

Mr. CAHAN: It would be inopportune to go at length this afternoon into what I know to be some of the misstatements made over the radio, but I would direct the hon. gentleman's attention to references made by Mr. Ferguson to what he called the Cliveden intrigue, when he broadcast throughout Canada that there were meetings at Cliveden, at Lady Astor's house, which brought the government of the United Kingdom under the influence of the ambassador of the Fuehrer of Germany—sayings such as that, which were mere scandal and which started first in foreign propaganda. I could refer to other matters but it is not worth while; it is not worth the time. I simply call attention to this fact, that if extreme propaganda of that kind is to be made freely at public expense, some similar opportunity should be allowed to others to controvert these statements. But such opportunity is not given under present conditions.

Mr. BENNETT: Does not the minister think that this is carrying bureaucracy rather too far?

Mr. HOWE: It is a shade further than my right hon. friend went, just a shade.

Mr. BENNETT: It is going just a bit too far. In the light of present knowledge, does not the minister think that a man should be able to have his radio repaired without being under the necessity of disclosing to the workman who repairs it whether he has a licence or not? Surely that is carrying bureaucracy too far. Bureaucracy has a great hold in Canada in many directions. I have had occasion in the last few days to look into its application in another department of our activities, in our national parks, and now we are going to apply it to radio. I can understand our going a certain distance in the direction proposed here, but when it is suggested that a workman coming to my house to repair my radio should ascertain whether or not I have a licence—well, the average man would say, "That is none of your business; I have employed you to repair my radio and I am prepared to pay you." But the workman will answer, "The government says that I must inquire whether you have a licence before I can repair your radio, and if you want me to do it you will have to satisfy me that you have a licence." Is not that going too far? I do suggest to the minister that it is going a bit too far and that the section might very well disappear.

Frankly I have always had grave doubts, and I have graver doubts to-day, whether it is quite sound to apply the principle in question even to the sale of radio sets. Are we not carrying our powers perhaps beyond our jurisdiction? I put this to the minister, because once more we have the old conflict. The courts have decided that we have jurisdiction, but they have not decided that our jurisdiction extends to the sale of radio sets. That surely is a matter of property and civil rights. We have no right to fix prices and things of that sort; they are still within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. I have grave doubts whether we have the power, with respect to the sale of radio sets, to impose this condition, and I certainly have graver doubts with respect to the repairing of radios. When I employ a workman to come and repair my radio, when I go to the telephone and ask that a man be sent around to put in a couple of tubes that are worn out, and he comes and says that before he can do that work he must know whether I have a licence, I think we are going too far. What happens then? Is it his business to be a common informer? Is it within the competence of this parliament to deal with the matter? Is it not a question of purely provincial and local jurisdiction, a question of property and civil rights, a question of contract between the workman and myself? Shall we say that such a contract cannot be enforced unless this condition here proposed is complied with? I submit that it is going too far.

Mr. HOWE: I am told that the only change here is to embody in the act itself a regulation that has been in effect for many years under the Minister of Marine, and more recently the Minister of Transport. Parliament has decided that the operation of a radio shall be illegal unless a licence has been obtained, and certain penalties are prescribed. I see no great objection to putting this regulation in the act. I do not think it is bureaucracy to use every means to enforce the intent of the radio act. That is the principle on which we have been collecting radio licence fees from the start. A man can bring a policeman into your house to see whether you are operating a radio without a licence. When dealing with a situation of this kind I do not think that it is going too far to have a regulation of this sort, which has been in effect for many years, embodied in the act. It is not a new departure.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): Would it not be better to have the system followed in connection with automobile sales? Every automobile salesman must report to the province when he has made a sale. I do not think we should make radio dealers and repair men collect for the government. It is asking too much, for all they get out of it. If they report the sale that ought to be enough; it is then up to the government to collect the licence fee.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I understood the minister to say some time ago that if those who are on relief are not able to get a radio licence they would not be pressed too hard by the department. Must the owner of the machine, no matter whether he is on relief or not, produce a licence before he can get repairs done? What is the department's attitude in such a case?

Mr. HOWE: It is a matter of leniency. We do not change the law; we simply do not apply it to people on relief. Similar leniency would apply in the matter of repairs. For instance in the area in the west known as the drought area the instructions have been not to press the collection of radio licence fees. A similar instruction would go out in that area regarding the production of licences in case of repairs.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would the same thing apply to people on relief in Calgary, or would they have to be definitely in the drought area?

Mr. HOWE: Definitely in the drought area.

Mr. NEILL: I do not think there is anything very objectionable in this condition. I understand it has been in effect by way of regulation for some time, and I rather applaud the minister for having the courage to put it in the act instead of taking advantage of what is unknown to the members of this committee, doing it in a more or less underhand way by way of regulation. It has not worked any hardship to me. As owner of a radio set, if I ask a man to come and repair it I know I have to have a licence, and if he asks to see it I ought to be prepared to produce it. I do not think it involves making the mechanic act as a collector, for he does not sell me that licence; all he does is ask if I have it, and if I have not he does not repair the radio. Collecting these radio licence fees is rather difficult because of the difficulty of knowing who has them and who has not.

Mr. HOWDEN: What are the provisions of the act as to the collection of radio licence fees? As the matter stands there is something very wrong about it. The sale of these licences has been placed to a large extent in the hands of department stores and other large establishments, no doubt for the convenience of the public. But the government have also appointed collectors, who unfortunately seem to be as impotent and helpless in the matter as new-born babes. I do not mean to say there is lack of ability on their part to collect, but apparently they have no power. I know of one such man who has made a dozen calls at one home trying to collect, and has been told by the owner to go—wherever he likes; he does not have to pay a licence fee and he will not until he is good and ready. Surely that is an absurd situation. If the government is merely making a mock gesture of giving men the right to collect these fees, on a commission basis no doubt, and if they have to call on owners of receiving sets over and over again and have no power to force payment of the licence fee, there is something wrong. I have been told by this collector, who is not very far from me, that he knows for a fact that many people in the vicinity have not paid their licence fees and he has no power to force them to do so.

Mr. HOWE: He should report the case to the department.

Mr. HOWDEN: Well, I shall be glad to point that out to him, but there are collectors in the part of Canada I come from who have the impression that they have no power to make people pay.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I understood the minister to say just now in answer to a question that only people in the drought area in Saskatchewan are exempt from the payment of radio licence fees. Does that not apply to any other part of Canada? I represent a section of Toronto in which many people are on relief. They have not the money for licences. I think if something is granted to people in another part of Canada it should be granted to people in similar circumstances in Toronto. I do not see why people in one part of the country who are on relief through no fault of their own should be charged for a licence or deprived of the pleasure of having a radio while people in another section are favoured.

Mr. HOWE: Of course no one is exempt from the payment of radio licence fees, but there is a general instruction to all those collecting radio licence fees that if the owner of a radio can show that he is on relief, or indigent, whatever that means, and is unable to pay, has no earnings, the demand for payment is not pressed. The reason I mentioned the drought area was that the question asked by the hon. member for Bow River had to do with the drought area. But it applies to all people on relief or indigent, and repairs could be included.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): When a licence has been issued for a radio set and a repair man comes and asks to see the licence, how does he know that the licence shown him is for that particular machine? Is there any way he can tell?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): A man might borrow his neighbour's licence; they might have one licence for the whole street.

Mr. HOWE: The name and address is on every licence. But if there are two or more radios in the house and one licence is shown there is no way to check that.

Mr. KINLEY: It seems to me that a radio is a bit of a luxury, and the question arises whether a man on relief should be encouraged to have it.

Mr. WEIR: In connection with the requirement that anyone repairing a radio must assure himself that the owner has a licence, what about a man who comes in and buys a set of tools from the dealer to fix his own radio? Also what about a radio that is in a house but is not being operated? If I correctly understood what was said last night, if an inspector finds his way into the house and discovers a radio there, he may oblige the owner to obtain a licence even if it is not in operation. We have some radios that are obsolete; perhaps new ones have been purchased and the old ones have been allowed to remain. I hope a man will not be under obligation to purchase a licence for a radio of that kind.

With regard to the amount of the fee, last night the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked whether the owner of a battery set in a home where there is electric power would pay $2.50, and the minister replied that he would. I do not know what distinction is going to be made with respect to electric power in homes. We have a good many people operating ordinary automobile generators with little windmills and thereby producing electricity which they use to charge their radio batteries and perhaps in other ways. In addition, we have the ordinary 32 volt farm lighting plant, which in some cases also charges the radio batteries. I should like the minister to clear up those three points for me, particularly the question as to what is going to be considered electric power in a home.

Mr. HOWE: Taking the last point first, the case to which my hon. friend refers is a local source of supply for that one home. That would be considered a battery set, and the fee would be $2. The act provides that if the house is connected to a central power station the $2.50 fee will apply.

In connection with a radio in a house but not in use, under the act the presumption is that if the radio is in the house it is in use. If the owner can show to the satisfaction of whoever is handling the matter that the radio is not in use, of course there would be no fee; but under the act there is the presumption, which I think is fair, that if the radio is in the house it is in use.

Mr. WEIR: What about the repair man?

Mr. HOWE: Under the act, before a radio is repaired, the repair man is required to ask if a licence has been obtained. I do not know that it is necessary for him actually to look at the licence; I suppose it is.

Mr. WEIR: Suppose he sells me half a dozen tubes and I take them home?

Mr. HOWE: That would, I think, be a little different from repairing a radio.

Mr. MULOCK: Under subsection 2 of section 4 the minister may authorize the imposition of a penalty not exceeding $50 and costs or three months' imprisonment for the violation of any regulation. Under the proposed amendment that would extend to the repairs, and may I point out that a man on relief, could not get his radio repaired, even though the person doing the work did it without charge, without the latter being liable to go to gaol for three months. From what the minister said I know it was not his intention that people on relief should not be allowed to use their radios, and I would suggest that the wording of the amendment be changed.

Mr. HOWE: The question of dealing with relief recipients is entirely a matter of leniency. There is nothing set out in the law providing that if a man is on relief he does not have to pay his licence fee. I was simply explaining that in the administration of the act our instructions are very strict; that a man on relief is not to be pressed for the collection of a radio fee, and the same thing would apply to the repairing of a radio for a man on relief.

Mr. KINLEY: Have you the power to do that?

Mr. HOWE: No, we have not. It is a matter of leniency; we have the power to sue or not to sue.

Mr. KINLEY: The law should treat everybody alike.

Mr. MULOCK: I would point out that it says a person may not make repairs unless the licence has been obtained. It is the man who makes the repairs who will be responsible for the fine or imprisonment, not the man on relief. The man making the repairs is not protected by that statement.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will look at subsection 3 of section 10, he will see this provision, which has been in all radio acts since the inception of licences:

No proceedings shall be taken against any person under this section except by order of the minister.

The minister has to sign personally the complaint, and the minister does not sign complaints against persons on relief.

Mr. LAWSON: But that relates only to an offence under that section.

Mr. MULOCK: That has to do with establishing stations without authority.

Mr. STEWART: Surely the minister does not have to authorize every police prosecution.

Mr. HOWE: Every one. I sign them personally.

Mr. STEWART: Then I think the minister will be very busy for the rest of the year.

Mr. HOWE: It has always been done in that way. My hon. friend was a member of the government which drafted these regulations in the first place, and nothing we are doing here changes them particularly. There is only one very slight change in this act; we are changing the language slightly in order to modernize it, but the only real change arises out of a court case which made the old act unworkable. We are changing it in that respect, but these are all old regulations. Ever since I have been minister I have had to sign an authorization for every prosecution.

Mr. STEWART: There are several new sections and new definitions and sections revised. You will find that right through.

Mr. HOWE: But, as I pointed out, it is simply transferring the regulations, which were issued under ministerial authority, to the act. Those regulations have always been there.

Mr. LAWSON: I have no desire, while we are on this section, to deal with section 10, subsection 1; but as we come to sections 5, 9, 10 and others throughout the bill, I think we shall be able to satisfy the minister that these are not merely enacting things that were in the regulations before. I just do not want to allow his statement to pass without calling attention to that fact.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister says these regulations were here before. He must recall the difficulties that attended the creation of this enterprise in the first instance, and the criticism that was always being made. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni says the government is to be congratulated upon having transferred the regulations to the act, but they are still doing it by regulation. This section authorizes the minister to make regulations; that is what we are dealing with. The section says, "The minister may make regulations," and this is one of the items about which the regulations may be made.

Will the minister submit these two questions to the Department of Justice? 1. Has this parliament power to legislate with respect to the sale and conditions of sale of radios in Ontario? 2. Has this parliament the right to insist upon a repair contractor ascertaining whether or not a licence has been taken out by the owner of the radio upon which he is to work, and to make him liable to a penalty if he fails to do so? I shall not take up the time of the committee beyond this.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad so to refer those questions, and in the meantime I would suggest that this paragraph stand.

Paragraph (e) stands.

Paragraphs (f) to (k) inclusive agreed to.

On section 4, paragraph (l).

Mr. BENNETT: This is the kind of paragraph about which, in former times, it was the habit of hon. gentlemen now forming the government to complain. After having provided for special matters and special regulations which may be passed, in paragraphs using most of the letters in the alphabet, the minister then puts in a paragraph covering them all, whether those regulations are or are not contained in the preceding paragraphs.

Mr. HOWE: Opposite it says: "No change."

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing surprises one so much in the house in the last few years as to see the justification the government puts forward for its conduct by saying, "No change."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We are keeping what is good.

Mr. BENNETT: And then one must turn up Hansard and read the speeches of the present Minister of Justice on those occasions when he said there was much danger; the sacred rights and liberties of the people were being taken from them. Then there were references to the powers of the governor in council, and how that bureaucracy was tightening upon the very lives of the people, and choking them to death. Now the minister says, "No change."

Paragraph (l) agreed to

On section 4, subsection 2—Penalty for violation.

Mr. LAWSON: I assume the Minister of Justice will move a similar amendment with respect to this subsection, as he did with respect to paragraph (e) of section 3.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; that will be done.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I move:

To amend section 4 of Bill No. 52, by striking out subsection 2 and substituting therefor the following:

"(2) Any person who violates any regulation made under this section shall be liable upon summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding $50 and costs or three months imprisonment."

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Section stands.

On section 5—Station licences.

Mr. LAWSON: This section illustrates as well as if not better than any other the protest I raised, when the bill was first introduced. to the effect that the notes in respect of the different sections are deceptive. The note at the side of this section is in these words:

This is existing section 6 reworded to clarify the intention.

As a matter of fact, the section does not clarify the intention at all. The section in the bill has the same effect as section 6 of the Radiotelegraph Act, with the exception of the added words "operate or have in his possession any radio apparatus at." The effect of those words is to make a radio contained in an automobile subject to licence. I do not believe the minister would seriously suggest that under the old Radiotelegraph Act there was power to licence a radio in an automobile; yet this very section is designed for that purpose.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. LAWSON: The minister says, "No." Why, then, does he put in a proviso exempting the cars of tourists who happen to be in Canada? In the first place, I say that the section in the bill creates a new offence. It had previously been an offence to install or to establish a radio station. Under the bill it becomes an offence to operate or to have in one's possession any radio apparatus. The expression "in any place" in the old section has been changed to "at any place" in the new. The proviso is:

Provided that the governor in council may exempt from the operation of this section any radio apparatus installed in any automobile or other vehicle temporarily in Canada which is owned by a person who resides outside of Canada in a country which accords a similar privilege to residents of Canada.

Therefore I say that in view of the fact that the section creates a new offence, these notes are deceptive.

Let me show another respect in which they are deceptive. We are told that this is the existing section 6, reworded to clarify the intention. It is reworded to clarify the intention of what? Surely it must be to clarify the intention of the original act, which was passed in 1913, and known as the Radiotelegraph Act. Did any one in the house or the country ever hear of such a thing as a radio being installed in a motor car in the year 1913? Is it conceivable that any House of Commons sitting in 1913 intended in a section of an act then enacted to provide for the installation of radios in automobiles? I say that on every possible ground the information is deceptive and is not in accordance with the facts. I point this out in particular at this time because of what was said last night by the Minister of Transport when I raised the matter.

Mr. HOWE: I assume it was the intention in the original act that radios ought to be licensed. This arises out of Rex v. Gignac, quoted the other day by the hon. member.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENTS OF PROFESSOR ANGUS OF ROWELL COMMISSION WITH RESPECT TO ORIENTAL SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I would like to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) two questions. The first is, has his attention been called to the fact that Professor Angus, British Columbia's representative on the Rowell commission, has been making partisan speeches concerning a matter on which as one of the commission he will presently have to pass judgment and which formed part of the representations made by the province to the commission, namely the oriental situation? Secondly, if investigation proves this to be correct, will he consider the advisability of removing Professor Angus from the commission in order that the confidence of the people of British Columbia in the fairness of any judgment which the commission may render, may be restored?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have received a complaint about a speech which was made by Professor Angus before the Ontario Medical Association in Toronto, which I assume is the speech to which my hon. friend has made reference.

Mr. NEILL: It is one of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the only one to which I have had my attention drawn. Upon receipt of the complaint I immediately had it brought to the attention of Professor Angus. I presume I may say that in speaking, Professor Angus was speaking as a private individual, not as a member of the commission nor were the remarks complained of made in the course of the proceedings of the commission, nor, as I understand it, with respect to any subject which comes within the scope of the commission itself. The commission has not been empowered to deal with any question of franchise. That, I believe, is the subject to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. NEILL: That speech was only one of them, and this matter is sub judice, because the premier of British Columbia made representations.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. NEILL: I am in order.

CANADA-NEW ZEALAND AIR SERVICE

REPORTED NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND DOMINIONS AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with regard to an associated Press dispatch which appeared the day before yesterday in the Brantford Expositor. The dispatch refers to an announcement made in the British House of Commons by Lieutenant-Colonel A. J. Muirhead, Under-Secretary of State for Air, to the effect that negotiations were under way with the dominions and the United States concerning a proposed air service across the Pacific ocean from Canada to New Zealand.

My question, therefore, is this: Has the Dominion of Canada, as one of the most important dominions concerned in such a proposal, been consulted in regard to this matter, and, if so, does the Prime Minister deem it to be in the public interest to inform the members of this house as to the present position of the negotiations?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member drew my attention just before the house assembled to the question he intended to ask; I give him and the house the following information in reply.

The question of an air service across the Pacific ocean between Canada and New Zealand has received informal and preliminary consideration on various occasions. No definite suggestions as to such a service have been put forward, however, and no negotiations are being carried on on the subject at present between the Canadian government and the governments of any other members of the commonwealth.

The statement made by the Under-Secretary of State for Air in the House of Commons at Westminster on May 10 referred not to negotiations on the general subject of the establishment of an air service but to discussions on the preliminary question of the ownership of certain Pacific islands along the proposed route. It is understood that the conversations in question, which are being carried on between the governments of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand and the government of the United States, are concerned with the ownership of certain islands in the Phoenix group and other islands lying between Honolulu and Australasia.

ALBERTA DEBT LEGISLATION

INQUIRY WITH REFERENCE TO EFFECT UPON CREDITORS AND GENERAL CREDIT OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): I should like to ask two questions of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). First, is the government aware that the three recent enactments of the province of Alberta, namely, The Securities Act, 1938, The Home owners Security Act, and The Limitations of Actions Amendment Act, 1938, have the effect of preventing the payment of all secured debts in Alberta? Secondly, in view of the fact that individual and corporate creditors in all parts of Canada have their securities destroyed, and that similar legislation on the part of other provinces would entirely destroy the credit of Canada, does the government contemplate any action to deal with the situation?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Official certified copies of the acts to which my hon. friend refers were received by the Secretary of State and transferred to the Department of Justice on April 30. As to the effect of these acts, they are at present being considered by the department. I have received many letters and telegrams and have been advised that on Monday formal petitions will be filed for their disallowance, such petitions coming from various organizations including the insurance companies' association, the loan companies' association and others. As to what the decision will be, of course I cannot give any answer.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing services administration, $50,000.

Mr. THOMPSON: When the committee adjourned last Friday evening I was calling attention to the cooperation that had existed during the last three years, between the Department of Agriculture of Ontario and the federal department, and I was endeavouring to show that it was not in the best interests of the dairy business, particularly from the standpoint of the marketing of our cheese. I had pointed out that an association known as the Eastern Ontario Dairymen's Association had been in existence for sixty years and had built up the great dairy business of eastern Ontario, from which section the best cheese made in Canada comes, and that their grant of $1,500 had been withdrawn. That grant had been expended entirely on the production end of the business. We knew that if we wished to retain our premium for cheese in the British market we must continue to manufacture a superior quality product, just as I have read in the report which has been submitted that Canada's success in marketing cheese in the United Kingdom depends upon the quality.

I pointed out further that there were two features that marked the success of cheese in Canada; the first was quality and the second, quantity. It was in this direction that the efforts of this association were made. Their grant was withdrawn, however, and the Ontario government permitted an organization known as the Cheese Producers' Association to collect five cents per hundred pounds on all cheese sold in the province. As I said, in 1936 the cheese producers' association collected $22,000, and in 1937 over $38,000, which was supplemented by a grant of $5,000 from the federal department. My contention was that this money was not spent in the best interests of the dairy business. I am not at all opposed to money being spent in the interests of agriculture, but money which, in my opinion, has been uselessly spent I object to. I have here a copy of the auditor's report of the Cheese Producers' Association of Ontario. New Zealand sent her cheese to Great Britain in consignment. And the cheese was sold in the old country by agents on commission. The Canadian cheese was all sold in Canada before it left our shores.

This cheese producers' association endeavoured to break up the selling organization, which had been built up in the last seventy-five years, an organization that we were proud of; and I may add that in New Zealand, the leading men there will tell you, they are sorry they ever opened warehouses in Britain and sold cheese as they are doing to-day.

This association of which I am speaking went into the business, borrowing from the banks $204,887.52, with which they purchased cheese. There was appointed in Belleville a man known as a secretary, at a salary of $3,000 and expenses, and he bought the cheese, and another man was sent to London at a salary of $5,000 and expenses and he sold it there. Their auditor's report shows that on their operations they lost $800.82, and the loss would have been considerably more had it not been for the fact that the federal Department of Agriculture came to their assistance and purchased a large quantity of cheese for shipment to the dried-out area in Saskatchewan for relief purposes. That was the only sale of cheese on which the association made a profit last year.

Let us consider for a moment their other activities—their convention and their office expenses. The auditor's report shows that their receipts come from three sources. The five cents per hundred pounds which the Ontario government allowed them to take from the farmers on their cheese amounted to $38,671. Then they received from the county organizations $2,925, and a grant from the federal Department of Agriculture of $5,000, making total receipts of $46,596. Their expenditures included: office and general expenses, $4,308; secretary's salary and expenses, $4,014. There is a board of five directors who were paid fees amounting to $2,986. A man was sent to England to sell this cheese, and his salary and expenses came to $6,346. Auditing and accounting fees were $625. Everybody was liberally paid; apparently they spent all the money they could spend, and wound up the year with a surplus of $18,935, which they did not know what to do with. Yet they had taken from the farmers who sent milk to the cheese factories $38,671 and had received a grant from this government of $5,000. I know that their secretary has gone back to London. A friend of mine told me he met him on the street there a couple of weeks ago and asked him what he was doing there, and he said, "I came here in the interest of the Ontario Cheese Producers' Association." Some of this nearly $19,000 that they had left is being spent in that way. My contention is that not one dollar of that money was of any benefit to the dairymen. Every report of the dairy business with the old country has shown, and those of us who have spent our lifetime in this business know, that the success of our cheese in the old country depends first on quality and then on the quantity that we can supply. Our money should be spent on the production end, and not foolishly wasted in the selling end.

Mr. GARDINER: What year is that report for?

Mr. THOMPSON: The auditor's report for the year ended December 31, 1937. During the three years that this cooperation has been going on and that attention has been diverted from the production end and directed towards the selling end, what has happened to our cheese? I receive every week during the production season a statement from the dairy and cold storage branch of the Department of Agriculture giving the prices of New Zealand cheese in England and the cable prices in Canada. It had been always known that Canadian cheese sold at a premium over New Zealand cheese. I have here some figures taken from the returns given to me by the Department of Agriculture. I find that in 1934 there was a premium of 3 to 4 shillings per hundredweight of 112 pounds for Canadian cheese over New Zealand. But in 1937 we find this reversed: in July and August of that year there was a premium of 3 to 5 shillings per hundredweight in favour of New Zealand.

I know that figures have been produced and statements made at some of our public meetings by officials of the department to show that Canadian cheese was at a premium over New Zealand cheese. But how did they arrive at it? New cheese is selling in Canada to-day for about 15 cents a pound wholesale, but go into any grocery store and ask for old matured cheese and you will have to pay 30 to 35 cents. Would it be fair for me to come to this committee and say that that is the price of cheese? Not at all. Yet the grocers' price has been taken in London to show that we still have a premium, and that price included the old cheese. It is a well known fact that New Zealand manufactures a very moist cheese, which is palatable when it is fresh but has no keeping quality. Invariably the British merchant buys Canadian cheese when he wants to have old cheese.

[Mr. Thompson.]

I have looked over the new report which came to my hand to-day. It says:

> Canada has two important advantages over competing countries in having almost to the complete exclusion of competing countries, the trade in mature cheese for the retail trade and for the manufacture of pasteurized processed cheese. There is little doubt that with continued attention to quality Canadian producers can retain these advantages.

We have to the almost entire exclusion of other countries the market for old matured cheese, and it can be retained if we keep up the quality of our product. A report which I got from the department showed that for the last three years the premium upon cheese had dropped. In 1935 it was 2½ cents; in 1936, it was 1½ cents and in 1937, one cent. But that included the old matured cheese. The figures I have given are taken from the report of the department, giving the wholesale prices. My contention is that this money has been spent on the selling end where nothing could be accomplished, and that the production end, where everything can be accomplished in regard to both quality and quantity, has been neglected. I want to read a statement from the report of the chief grader. He said:

> The total cheese placed below first grade last season was 94,546 boxes, an increase of 39,792 boxes over the previous year. The total loss on these cheese was approximately $90,000 and the extra loss owing to an increased percentage of under-grade cheese was about $38,000. This is a tremendous loss to the cheese industry, but I do not imagine that the larger quantity of under-grade cheese would affect the reputation of Canadian cheese on the markets of the United Kingdom if our first grade cheese was equal to the standard of quality for previous years.

Even our first quality cheese was not up to the standard.

> I have no definite information on this point which would apply to the season's make. However some reports have come back that July and August cheese were not quite up to former years, and we also know that there were many shipments of first grade cheese on which the total score was lower than 92 points owing to slight defects in workmanship.

Then let me read another clause from the report of the chief grader. Referring to a chart which is shown he says:

> This chart shows the grading of Ontario cheese throughout each month of the season and this indicates that there was a decrease in first grade every month excepting May. Weather conditions should be very favourable during the latter part of September, also in October and November, but decreases in the percentage of first grade are shown during these months, and the inference, therefore, would be that even with good weather conditions either the milk producers or the cheese makers or perhaps both, were not doing their job as well as it should be done.

Here is the point: We have been allowing the quality and to some extent the quantity of our cheese, the only things over which we had any control, to be neglected. What did that mean to the farmers? Last year nearly $39,000 was forcibly taken from the pockets of the farmers by an assessment made on their cheese at the factories, and in addition, with the cuts that were made on low grade cheese, in the selling end they lost $128,000. That is taken from the report of the chief grader. I am not at all opposed to money being spent if the dairy industry, or any other branch of agriculture, is getting the benefit of it, but in the last quarter century we have had only one minister of agriculture in this house who seemed to understand the dairy business and the intricacies of mixed farming in eastern Canada. That minister was the present hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell). I have been connected with this business all my life, and during the term of office of the hon. gentleman I discussed these matters with him on many occasions. He was born and brought up in the county in which I live; his home was outside the town of Perth, and he lived there until he was twenty-one years of age. He was brought up on a dairy farm; he understood the requirements of our great dairy business.

I would simply ask the minister this, that in future he see to it that the money voted is spent where it will bring some benefit to the farmers engaged in the business. I am not asking him not to vote the money, but simply to see that some good results from it.

I do not think I need argue this matter further at this time. My whole intention has been to lay before the minister and the committee the necessity of seeing that the money is properly expended, for the purpose for which it is intended, and I claim that not one dollar of this money brought any benefit whatever to the dairy industry. It is utterly impossible for a few men to think they can buy a few cheeses, ship them over to London and break up a selling organization that has existed in this country for the last seventy years, and of which we are justly proud. As a result of the efforts of these few gentlemen to whom I have referred they lost $800 last year, without taking into consideration the salaries and expenses of the men who were doing the work. They lost on the actual buying and selling of the cheese, so I would ask the minister in future to maintain more strict supervision over the expenditure of these amounts.

Mr. WARREN: I am rather at a disadvantage, Mr. Chairman; I came into the house while the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) was speaking, and certainly I was unaware that there was to be a speech of this kind dealing with this question. I realize that the riding represented by the hon. member for Lanark is more interested in the question of cheese than the riding which I represent. We do a good deal of dairying in Renfrew county, but principally in connection with the manufacture of butter rather than cheese.

Because I was not aware that this question was coming up I have none of the figures before me, but I must take very strong exception to the view that has been expressed by the hon. member for Lanark. Particularly must I take exception to an hon. member of this house adopting the attitude that the farmers of Canada ought not to bother their heads about the marketing of their own products. If there is one thing the farmers of this dominion ought to learn it is to pay some attention to the marketing of their products. We have been given, not only by the Department of Agriculture but by the farmers' organizations themselves, a great deal of education with regard to the proper grading of our products. During the past few years we have learned to sell our eggs on a graded basis. We have learned to a certain extent the proper type of hog to produce for the British market. We are learning that we ought to have our cream in proper condition so that we may produce the proper quality of butter for our markets. All this sort of education has been of great benefit not only to the producers but also to the consumers throughout Canada. Now we have reached a stage in the cheese industry, as far as grade is concerned, where there is not very much opportunity for improvement. Something happened last year, of course, that caused our grade to go down to some extent, but two years ago, if I remember correctly, our cheese graded something like ninety-eight per cent No. 1.

Here we have an effort on the part of the farmers of Ontario to get together in an organization of their own, financed by themselves, receiving a small grant from the federal treasury, and to improve the marketing of this important product. We must remember that in regard to cheese we are almost entirely dependent upon the export market. Our home market is very limited; we do not appear to be a cheese eating people. The situation is very different in regard to butter; we consume practically our total production of butter, but we must sell our cheese in outside markets. Here we have farmers representing every county in which cheese is manufactured. These men get together and form an organization, which is surely a democratic organization, with directors appointed for each county. These men get together to study the whole question, and they make an effort to improve matters in connection with the selling of this product, to my mind with very considerable success as a beginning. It is true that they had a man in England last year, and I believe that this feature of their work is not being carried on this year. Even at that they are experimenting and studying the whole question. Yet we have the spectacle of a member of this house who represents a dairying section of the country objecting to farmers getting together and doing something for themselves in connection with the sale of their own product.

I submit that the farmers are entirely within their rights when they get together and say, "We are going to impose the small tax of one-tenth of a cent per pound, or five cents per hundred pounds, in order to make our contribution towards the organization." We must remember that that organization is in its infancy. They are experimenting and trying to find out how they can improve the market for and the sale of their own product. Yet this hon. member who comes from a farming community objects, contending that the farmers ought to attend to the production end and leave the selling to somebody else. That "somebody else" would mean commission houses; certainly they will take care of their own profits. The farmers, I repeat, are entirely within their rights in making an effort along these lines in order to better the selling of their product. If the Department of Agriculture is willing to give assistance to the organization by way of a small grant I am sure such assistance would be appreciated by the farmers of the province.

I have discussed the work of the organization with the heads of the Department of Agriculture and I find they are in complete accord with what is being done. They believe the efforts of the organization will be of considerable value to the farmers. I am entirely in favour of farmers getting together at any time to improve the marketing of their own products, and certainly to my mind there should be no objection when they are willing to finance the scheme by imposing a small tax on themselves.

Mr. GARDINER: Before the discussion proceeds further may I point out that we are discussing item No. 8, but it is item No. 6 that is before the committee. If hon. members are prepared to pass item 6 and proceed to discuss No. 8, I shall be content. I do suggest however we should discuss the items as they come before the committee.

Mr. LEADER: Under what item may we discuss matters in connection with beef cattle?

Mr. GARDINER: Item No. 11.

Mr. SENN: When the item was before the committee the other evening there was some discussion about what is commonly known as the Shaw report. The minister stated frankly that the report had been somewhat changed. I am pleased to state that to-day I received by mail a copy of the new edition—I do not know whether I should call it a report, because it is not so designated.

I believe the old report was concurred in by all the members of the committee who went overseas. I stated the other evening that some very good men were on that committee. Certainly the officials of the department who visited England are efficient and capable men. I have no reason to believe that they would include in a report statements with which they are not fully in accord. In fact the initial report in its foreword, signed by the director of marketing services, Mr. Shaw, states that the findings and recommendations contained in the report are agreed to in principle by all members of the party. Yet we find that shortly after the report was printed and issued it was suppressed and distribution cancelled; meantime a new report has been drafted and is now presented to parliament. In many respects the new report is different from the old one. The other evening I asked the minister why the changes had occurred, and he replied they had been made because of certain complaints and because of certain reports which had been issued; I cannot think however that those were all the reasons for the change. I feel that complaints have been made from certain quarters of which we have not been made aware.

I asked the minister if any of the industries or interests connected with the marketing of farm products had objected, and he said they had not. But there is undoubtedly some reason, and a very important one, for the change in and the redrafting of the report and for the incorporation in the new report of matters which were not in the old one.

It seems to me that to change a report drafted by a committee which spent a considerable sum of money in connection with the matter is an unusual procedure. The report has been garbled, certain of the findings have been left out, and some of the recommendations have been changed. I suggest the minister should make a more frank statement than he made the other evening as to what occurred, why the report was changed and from what points the complaints came. He should take the committee into his confidence, because I believe if he does so he may hasten the passage of this particular item.

Mr. THOMPSON: May I point out to the minister that I was discussing the marketing end of the matter, and would appear to have been in order.

Mr. GARDINER: Item No. 8 is the item with respect to dairy products. Marketing services in connection with dairying products would come under item No. 8. We are discussing administration at this time.

Mr. THOMPSON: I wanted an opportunity to reply to the hon. member for Renfrew North.

Mr. GARDINER: We will come back to that subject, but at the present time I should like to have the discussion in proper order. If we are going to run up and down the list we will be in difficulty all the time.

Mr. THOMPSON: All right.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) has raised a matter which was discussed the other evening. I believe he has very effectively in his first few observations answered the question which is in his mind. He pointed out that the first pamphlet issued was the report of a committee. As I indicated the other night that was a committee composed of some officials of the department, and some officials of farmers' organizations and of one canning organization, all outside the department. Those men went to England and examined into the conditions surrounding the marketing of farm products in Great Britain, and in pursuance of their observations made a report. I believe it goes without saying that a committee of that kind writing a report would be likely to make some recommendations which any government in office would find it impossible to put into effect. They might even make some criticism of the activities of the government of the day. However, they would make their report on the basis of what they themselves considered to be fair in connection with the case.

A report of that kind was issued and, as was stated a few moments ago, it was published. Somewhere between five and six thousand copies in English and French were printed and in the neighbourhood of 5,000 copies were circulated throughout Canada. I believe every hon. member of this house received a copy, as well as the members of most of the legislatures of the different provinces; each daily newspaper in Canada received a copy as well as all the agricultural papers. I believe that most of the farm organizations of one kind or another also received copies. In other words, there was a wide distribution of the publication.

The statement I made the other evening was that after the press summary had been handed out there was one statement which perhaps unduly called attention to certain findings of the committee and made it appear that those would likely be acted upon. As a result of criticisms that were made, the report was not circulated to the general public but it was left in the possession of the press. It was not suppressed; as a matter of fact it was placed in the hands of every publicity organization in this country. Most of the newspapers across Canada wrote editorials having to do with the report or commented upon it in one way or another. I venture to say that no report made by a committee to any department of government has had more publicity than the one we are now discussing.

The department decided, and I as minister take responsibility for that decision, that an outline of the policies adopted as a result of this report and certain information which the report contained, would be more beneficial to the general public, particularly to the farmers throughout Canada, as indicating the ways and means that were going to be adopted, than the report itself. I asked that the publication which would go out to the general public as a result of requests coming in should contain the actual policy of the department, decided upon after having had the report of the committee. What I read the other evening was the main part of the new pamphlet that was brought out and which sets forth the policy of the government decided upon as a result of having obtained the report of this committee, presented to us I believe on December 8 last. In the first division of this new publication on pages 8, 9 and 10, will be found set out the general policy, and the pages following will be found to contain the information gathered by the committee that it was considered would be of general interest to the people of Canada. These pages contain the information that they should have to arrive at conclusions as to what might be done, either by processing organizations or the producers themselves, to produce a product up to the standard and grade that is intended to be handled through the department.

I think these explanations cover everything that has happened up to date. If there are other questions that hon. gentlemen desire to ask, I shall be pleased to give the information.

Mr. PERLEY: What does the minister call this new publication?

Mr. GARDINER: In common with many other publications got out by the department, it contains information with regard to the policies of the government in connection with marketing. It contains information on marketing gathered by the committee.

Mr. PERLEY: In the centre of the front page of the first one is the word "report." It is not on this one. What does that mean?

Mr. GARDINER: The previous one was a report.

Mr. HARRIS: I have seen a great number of reports in the last decade and a half during which I have been in this house. This states distinctly that it is a second edition of a report. I do not know just what it is if it is not a report. The minister says it is a new publication. Is it the second edition of the first report, is it a new publication, or is it another report?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a report in the sense that it reports on marketing conditions in the old country, but it does not contain the recommendations that were in the first part of the report as submitted by the committee.

Mr. HARRIS: The words "second edition" should be deleted, because it is not really a second edition of the first report.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): This seems to me to be a strange procedure. I agree with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) when he says that there should be more explanation by the minister as to why this change was made. Five thousand copies of a report by a committee appointed to investigate marketing conditions overseas were circulated throughout the country. I have not a copy of the old report before me, but I have one of the new. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) has pointed out that the word "report" does not appear on the front page, while the hon. gentleman who has just spoken points out that it states it is a second edition of the first report. It is published by the direction of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), but the word "report" is missing from the second page. On the third page, where we would ordinarily expect to find a submission over the signature of Mr. Shaw, as chairman of the committee, to the effect that the report was being transmitted and was based on the personal investigations of marketing conditions made by members of the committee, no such statement appears on that page. The so-called foreword is placed on that page of this so-called second edition of a report, or whatever you wish to call it.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not the report of the committee.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It does not say it is a report of the department; it does not say it is government propaganda, nor does it say that it is a political handbook taking the place of a report. It is the most nameless and peculiar document I have ever seen presented as a report to this house since I have been a member. Surely there is some reason for its being presented. I hope it is not because of conflict between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture. There has been danger of that under other governments as well as under this one, and I believe it has not been eliminated entirely at the present time. As the old saying is, "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life," and as we are all interested in marketing conditions overseas, the wording of this very important document may mean very little. I commend the government for any efforts they have made and for any they propose to make in the future in connection with investigating conditions overseas. For many years I have felt that our governments have been all too lax in making thorough investigations into the needs of the consumers in this and other countries. This information is essential to a country that depends upon export markets for the disposal of a considerable proportion of its agricultural products. It seems to be even more important to our domestic welfare in this country in view of the fact that we consume in our own markets the greater percentage of what we produce. Fortunately perhaps at times, but at many times unfortunately, a small surplus automatically sets the price at home. It is therefore most essential that our markets overseas should be carefully studied and every assistance given in order not only to standardize products but to classify our exports and regulate the supply so that a fair price may be maintained.

While I have not a copy of the report at hand—the real report—of the committee which was named by the department to investigate these conditions overseas, I have read it; I received a copy of it some time ago. It is strange that that report is not before us at the present time. Surely the department and the treasury of this dominion will pay the expenses of that report even though they were employees of the department.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman—if I may be permitted—one of the reasons why all the copies printed were not sent out was that we might have a sufficient number here to supply hon. members any time they liked to ask for them, and they are available, if hon. members desire to get them.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): All I would say in that regard is that if there is a large supply—

Mr. GARDINER: There is not a large supply. There are enough to supply all the members.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Then I would suggest to the minister that he see that every hon. member is furnished with a copy of the report before this item passes.

Mr. GARDINER: Every member has already had one. If any hon. member desires another one, he can get one upon application to the department.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I suggest that they be provided with another one. True, every member had a copy last fall, but those copies may be some place in their libraries at home. I venture to say that there are not half a dozen available at the present time in members' rooms in the House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, yes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): They went as ordinary literature. This is an important report, but I think the old report is much more important and much more necessary for the solution of this great problem of marketing than is this document we have before us.

I compliment the department and the government upon the selection of the men who made this investigation overseas. Besides Mr. Shaw, I see the names of Mr. J. F. Singleton, Mr. L. Pearsall, Mr. R. M. Scott, Mr. R. A. Wright, president of the Western Canada Live Stock Union; Mr. J. F. Lindner, Mr. C. L. Smart and Mr. H. King to advise on merchandising problems. I do not know all of these gentlemen, but I am acquainted with most of them and I believe that no finer committee could have been sent over to investigate these matters. Now these men, who are divorced from politics, who are not under the necessity of appealing to the popular sentiment of any district, who are public servants, having made a careful study, their report should have been submitted as it was. I merely point out that instead of the submission signed by Mr. Shaw we have the following statement:

> The agricultural marketing policy and the results of the investigations conducted in the United Kingdom are presented as a guide to those interested in the production and marketing of agricultural products.

A change entirely on all three of the first pages of this document, even though it is called a second edition of the report. When one turns to the table of contents one sees indications of more important changes which we can expect through the report. In the first place, the recommendations of this important committee are left out entirely, and the policy of the government is put in their place. I know every member of this committee will agree with me that for many years we have recognized the fact that countries overseas such as New Zealand, Australia, Denmark, and the Union of South Africa, in many respects, as regards marketing in foreign countries, have more careful plans, more systematic, more cooperative and I might say more scientific production and distribution of their agricultural products than we have. This committee made a careful study of the publicity used by those countries to advertise their products and the policies followed in order to regulate their supplies and standardize their grades; and, strange as it may seem, the table of contents shows that the publicity and policies of the exporting countries of Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and even Canada are left out entirely.

Turning to the next page, we have really only the heading left so far as the original report is concerned. "The British market and the Canadian farmer," it is headed—"Introduction." It does not even say when the committee's investigation started, or when it was concluded. The summary of the first report is now made the introduction to the second —so-called—edition.

The next item on the same page is headed "Summary." The first paragraph of the original report, of which this is called the second edition, is left out entirely. In fact one of the most important paragraphs of the summary of this committee is deleted.

Then we find that the next three paragraphs, while they are differently numbered, are the same. In a paragraph headed "Knowledge of Canadian Products," we find the first sentence changed. The original report of this committee of investigation found that overseas, Canadian goods seldom stood out; in other words they were not marketed as they should be, they were not of a grade or quality that enabled them to stand out. That sentence is entirely changed, and this second edition, this more or less political document, states that "very few retailers so display Canadian goods that they are easily recognized." Just imagine; we have a committee of investigation, any one of whose members I would say, in all fairness to the minister, has made a more careful study of marketing problems and of scientific agriculture than either he or I; they come back and report to the department that Canadian goods do not stand out, in other words are not advertised as they might be; and yet the second edition coming from the minister of the department says that "very few retailers so display Canadian goods that they are easily recognized," evidently turning the blame on to the distributor in the old land.

On the same page, preceding this, there was another paragraph which was headed, "Little apparent benefit by past advertisement." The committee found that there was little benefit to the producer by the advertising policies pursued in the past. I should like to ask the minister why that entire paragraph is deleted. These two paragraphs outline the very crux of the problem, but they are not particularly advertising the department and thus evidently left out.

Following that, one paragraph is left in, and the purport of it is that despite these weaknesses of the past there is no ill-will in the markets overseas among our consumers there.

I submit in all fairness to this committee that after having such an able committee going overseas and investigating and finding out that our present advertising methods have more or less failed, that our goods are not marketed as they should be, that they are not holding the place of prominence which they might—finding out these different weaknesses that many of us in this country have talked about for years and coming back and laying a report before the department. We should have that report. While the treasury paid $5,000 or more for a report, to-day we have not that report before us, but we have another document which more or less smothers, beclouds and deletes the most important features of the original report.

Mr. LEADER: Why should the hon. member blame the minister? Every member of this house received a copy of the report. I have one upstairs. I cannot see the point he is making, because the report is available to everyone here, and everyone could have studied it if he so wished.

[Mr. W. E. Rowe.]

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I blame the minister because he calls this the second edition of the report.

Mr. LEADER: And we have the first.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): "We" have. Has the hon. member?

Mr. LEADER: Yes, I have one upstairs.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Let me point out to the hon. member that these reports were submitted early last fall, and that there are many agricultural producers who are not in this house, who have been making an intensive study of this problem of systematic marketing.

Mr. GARDINER: The other night I gave the house information in regard to this matter. I pointed out that we publish over three hundred reports of different kinds each year. Why should I be expected to have a copy of this report on every desk to-day when there are no copies of the other reports and no one suggests that there should be?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Did the minister print a second edition of the other three hundred reports?

Mr. GARDINER: Some of the others have run to a tenth edition.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): If every edition of the other reports is changed as much as this edition, by the time the tenth edition is reached no one will recognize any similarity between the tenth and the original. That, however, is apart from the issue. This is an important matter, Mr. Chairman. Every member of this house recognizes the importance of studying world markets. Some years ago I proposed in this house that we should establish an export marketing board, and I also suggested that we should do what the minister himself evidently set out to do in connection with the investigation of conditions overseas. No one ever expected that there would be produced, at the expense of the country, a report so changed and garbled as this one is.

On the next page there are also many changes. Page 8 is the most important of all. It was the page which in the old report embodied the recommendations of this committee of trained and experienced men who had studied the problem—the recommendations that they were asked to submit to the department. Here we find this page of the first report entirely wiped out and replaced by a reprinted speech of the Minister of Agriculture made on January 24, 1938, and apparently copied from the recommendations of the original report, because we find in several paragraphs almost the very same wording. Here, however, they are not set out as recommendations from this able and efficient committee that went overseas to investigate market conditions, but as a speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture in this country.

Mr. GARDINER: In the city of Ottawa.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Yes, in the city of Ottawa. I remember it very well. I thought it was a reasonably sound speech in many respects and I did not suppose for a moment, at that time, that it was merely a recital from the recommendations submitted by the committee whose original report the minister now fails to bring before us.

Mr. GARDINER: Was the hon. gentleman at the meeting?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): No, I was not.

Mr. GARDINER: That is why he does not understand. I read it all and said that it was from the report.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Well, here we have the spectacle of the minister reading this report at a public meeting—not all, but part of it—as his own speech, and now to-day we find that he refuses to give it to parliament except as a changed second edition.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. gentleman had better read the heading on page 8.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The headings are about all that the minister has left of the original report. He has been very careful to have all the headings practically the same. Only this morning did I receive this report, and about fifteen minutes to three I had a chance to compare it with the original. I did not have a copy of the original report in my room and therefore borrowed one from another member. I compared the two, and I venture to say that throughout the balance of this edition there are proportionately as many changes as I have so far indicated.

I suggest that we should not pass this item until we have a fuller understanding of the original report which was submitted by the committee that investigated marketing problems overseas. And we should have that independent of politics. The heading on page 8 is "The Marketing Policy" and under that there is the following:

> The Honourable James G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, in an address delivered at the annual meeting of the Canadian Chamber of Agriculture, Ottawa, January 24, 1938, stated the policy which the department intended to follow as a result of receiving and adopting many of the recommendations of the report of its investigating committee.

It would be interesting, as the minister says, to read it all, and I hope that I shall have an opportunity in the future to do so, in order to ascertain whether he and his department have lived up to all these splendid policies which he said would be put into effect, but none of which have been carried out.

Mr. GARDINER: Read page 10.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister wants me to read that page. Why should he not? This is an entirely new page and it is more or less an advertisement of the government's virtues. The headline is "Proposals already made effective." I venture to say that the committee had nothing to do with that heading. This is written by the department; it is a new page. If this report were all like this page, of which the minister seems to be so proud, he could well use it as a political handbook and take it with him for the forthcoming election to Saskatchewan. This is nothing more or less than a political sheet. An hon. member asks me, don't I like it. Yes, and most of it was in effect before the present government came into power.

An hon. MEMBER: Which parts?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): As a matter of fact, what part of it has not been considered before? What has this government done so far as agriculture is concerned? The hon. gentleman seems to smile in satisfaction at what this government has done. I can show various ways in which the government cannot take credit for what has been done. They cannot take credit for the things that were done prior to their assuming office.

I have not had time to go through the whole of this report and I am not going to read it all. I do not propose to have my friend tell me what I am to spend my time on when I am speaking, but I see before me paragraph 5 on page 10, which I would ask my friend to read. As he reads he will find that the real steps to expand the marketing of bacon overseas were taken long before his party came into power, and the increase in the exports of that commodity is a fair test of the effect of those measures. Many other similar items could be pointed out.

On page 29 of the new report another political paragraph is interjected. There is a long statement covering two or three pages dealing with the market for bacon products overseas, and on page 29 there is a curious paragraph. We sat in this house some years ago and heard members of the present government party for weeks and weeks condemning the empire trade agreements, only one member of that party voting for them. Yet here we have interjected into the report a paragraph not a syllable of which I venture to say was mentioned by the committee of investigation which reported to the government. Just listen to this:

The trade agreement of 1937 assures Canada the right to supply up to a total of 280,000,000 pounds a year.

Do any of my hon. friends say that that right had not been secured before this government came into power? This right was secured in face of the opposition of every hon. member of the party now in power except one. To quote further:

Article 5 of the trade agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom states the position as follows:

"The government of Canada, recognizing that it is the present policy of the government of the United Kingdom to promote the orderly marketing of bacon and hams and of meat in the United Kingdom with due regard to the normal development of trade, declare their willingness so far as their power extends to continue to assist the government of the United Kingdom in carrying out this policy, and in particular, to furnish from time to time estimates of forthcoming shipments of bacon and hams and cattle and beef.

As regards bacon and hams, the government of the United Kingdom undertake:

(1) that any duty or levy which may be imposed on bacon and hams imported into the United Kingdom shall not apply to imports of Canadian bacon and hams when consigned from any part of the British Empire;"

Those are clauses of the 1932 agreement which every hon. member on the government benches to-day opposed, and I venture to say that the Minister of Agriculture campaigned against them in Saskatchewan.

"(2) that there will be no regulation by them of such imports unless the rate at which the trade from Canada progresses towards two and one-half million hundredweight per annum should become abnormal and such as to endanger the effective working of the system of supply regulation;

(3) that no such regulation would be put into effect without prior consultation with the government of Canada."

I hope they will keep that third undertaking in mind when they are negotiating the trade agreement with the United States. So I point out this interjection so far as the original report is concerned; I venture to say that not one clause of it was written by the committee of investigation. Why it is there no one knows better than hon. members who recall the opposition given to the trade agreements of 1932, which the government now take credit for having endorsed in 1937.

[Mr. W. E. Rowe.]

Mr. GARDINER: Does my hon. friend intend to convey to the committee the impression that these terms which he has just read with regard to bacon were in the 1932 agreements?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Again I say that "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." No one knows better than the minister that the principle was established by the government of that time against the opposition of his party.

Mr. GARDINER: This is not the wording of the 1932 agreements.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Not the exact wording, perhaps. If the minister wishes to discuss exact wording I have some very interesting things from the few minutes' comparison I had time to make.

The chief features of the report of the investigation which was made have been more or less deleted, and what might be termed political touches substituted. Turning to page 44 of the old report—there is one here yet—you will see the difference between the investigating committee's report and the government's political handbook. Perhaps the end is taken to justify the means, but when the people of the country read the report of the committee and the political twist given it by the government of the day they will see a vast difference. In the latter there is very little information as to the way it is going to be put into effect, only pious hopes and advocacy of policies that they believe might attract the people, but nothing definite even in that. By a coincidence it is on the same page of this anomalous document—the minister says it is not a report; it is just a second edition of something. The original report said:

In view of the controlled market for these products in the United Kingdom we have no recommendations to make.

But it also says, under "Recommendations":

Nevertheless, a certain quantity of them is constantly being exported. This fact would seem to indicate that the quality of our product is satisfactory and, provided British control measures are modified, our export might assume considerably larger proportions.

The new report says:

In view of the effort to increase production of these commodities in the United Kingdom, of the very active domestic market in Canada and of the relatively higher prices for cheese than for butter, we have no recommendation to make.

That helps the committee out in the matter of wordage at least. Following that it goes on:

Nevertheless the quality of these products is satisfactory and considerable quantities particularly of unsweetened condensed milk and milk powder are being exported. Exports of the former product will probably be considerably greater during 1937 than during 1936 or 1935, while exports of milk powder will probably be considerably less during 1937 than during 1936 or 1935. With a less active domestic demand and prices of butter more favourable with relation to prices of cheese, export of milk powder might assume considerably larger proportions.

They point out that in view of the buoyant times in Canada for the dairyman there was not so much milk powder exported, but that exports of condensed milk had increased considerably since this government assumed office. I do not think the committee were particularly interested in that. However, in chapter VI, at page 45, in connection with dressed poultry, where it might be understood that the empire agreements had helped the poultry producers of this country, after an exhaustive study of the matter and figures of imports for these years the original report of the investigating committee adds:

Consequently, Canada's share of the total imports (though still a small percentage), and that for chickens and turkeys, has gained during the past four years while the import figures have been declining.

In other words, we have a greater proportion; we have been gaining steadily for four years while the imports into Great Britain during the same time have decreased. That section is left out entirely in the new report. Why? Why on page 45 is a clause particularly added that seems to reflect some credit upon the government of the day, while on page 46 a clause is left out that might give some credit to the policies that were pursued by the previous government? The whole edition of the report is a political defence of the government of the day, burying the real report of the investigating committee in its truer sense.

There are many other pages to which reference might be made and many other differences that might be pointed out. At page 74 we find practically the end of the new edition, but as a matter of fact it was really only the beginning of the original report of the committee. From page 74 on it will be observed that there are tables with reference to imports and exports, and so forth. That is in the new edition. The last sentence of the old edition, the report proper, states:

The complaints need serious and immediate study.

That of course is left out of the new edition, and they end the report with tables of statistics with regard to imports and exports of practically all the countries of the world, especially concerning Canada in connection with the articles we send overseas. In the old report there were three full pages dealing with the marketing and publicity policies of exporting countries, including Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Canada. I submit that this is in fact one of the most important parts of the report. I believe we need better marketing conditions overseas, and I further believe that only by careful study of the requirements can we lay sound and reasonable plans for supplying those markets. I feel that we have made too little study of these problems in the past. For many years in this country we have failed to study the demands of the consumer; we have failed to do our grading as they desire, and even more dismally failed to export a regulated and carefully inspected supply. Any steps that may be taken in this house to remedy this condition will receive my heartiest support. For some ten years now I have proposed, both to this government and the previous government, that steps should be taken to fulfil the requirements of these markets overseas. I think at one time in this house I proposed—and I would not hesitate to propose it again—that we might make some effort to establish what might be termed a quid pro quo between those in the agricultural districts of Canada and those in the industrial sections. I think it is just as reasonable to put a bonus on export agricultural products as to put extremely high tariffs on industrial products.

I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that until we have a more prosperous agriculture in this country there will be no sound and lasting solution of the great problems which exist in Canada to-day. I am also convinced that this government has much more to do in the search for markets overseas than merely change a report like this to suit itself. It has an obligation to protect agriculture as well as the industries that give employment in the urban centres. With the situation that exists in Canada to-day, in regard to our imports of agricultural products, everyone engaged in agriculture is keenly disturbed. We speak about finding a market for our cattle. One year we send them to the old land, and the government fits boats at great expense; another year we send them to the United States. There is no regularity of supply. We have a market in the United States. When the quota there has been filled, or when the price drops, where shall we send our cattle? In the western part of this province we have farmers who on their feeding lots are feeding cattle brought from western Canada last fall. I believe the government should be commended for the assistance given in that connection, in regard to freight rates and so on. But, Mr. Chairman, while they were assisting the farmers of the west, and indirectly the eastern farmers who are feeding these cattle, at the same time they were bringing into this country eighteen thousand head of cattle in cans; all the hides taken off and the bones taken out in another country, and the cans manufactured by other people while our industrial workers stood idle. Surely this old matter of fiscal policy is no longer going to be—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I certainly do not wish to deviate from the item under discussion, but I know that nothing relates more closely to the marketing of agricultural products than does the fiscal policy of this country.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Even my hon. friend from Huron North agrees with that, and I submit that when the hon. member and I agree you might very well reconsider your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Huron North would be out of order too.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not propose to continue at any great length, Mr. Chairman, except to submit once more that the marketing of our agricultural products is seriously affected by the importation into this country of enormous quantities of the same products we are trying to sell. When we realize that enormous quantities of vegetable oils and vegetable fats which could be replaced with animal fat within our own borders are coming into this country; that we are now trying to find a market for over half of the lard produced in Canada, and that each year fifty train loads of vegetable oils come into Canada duty free, half of which consists of edible vegetable oils and replaces animal fats and lard used for cooking purposes we must understand that if that procedure is not stopped it will soon destroy the live stock industry of Canada. I make that statement as a farmer.

In his responsible position as a member of the government I believe the Minister of Agriculture, even though he may have clung to other fiscal theories in the past in connection with the marketing of agricultural products, should talk the matter over with the Minister of Finance. I well recall that when the Minister of Finance entered the house he showed strong inclinations towards that old and dusty doctrine of free trade. But the longer he sat in the house and the longer he has faced the problem the more he has realized that if we are going to develop Canadian resources we must bury the old differences between our fiscal policies and realize that in the marketing of the products of agriculture we are confronted with the competition of cheaply produced agricultural substitutes of other countries, and that those substitutes have been just as disastrous and have just as effectively hindered the farmers of Canada as have the longer working hours, lower wages and lower standards of living hindered the manufacturing industry.

I have always stated and repeat to-day that the farmers of Canada are entitled to the same fiscal policy as the industrialists. There must not be one policy for one class and another for another. I do not suggest for a moment that because we have millions of pounds of oil entering Canada and taking the place of our own product the government should make a political gesture and state that in lieu thereof it will take the duty off farm implements, or something of the kind. The farmers of Canada do not wish to destroy another man's opportunity for employment. But they are concerned with the fact, as is every other citizen, that there must be jobs for their boys, jobs for their neighbours' boys, and markets for their products not only overseas but at home. Ninety-five per cent of the live stock produced in Canada is marketed at home. The committee was well advised on that point when it considered the marketing and publicity policies of Australia and New Zealand. We find that these countries consume only about fourteen per cent of their agricultural products, and must find an export market. The export market is almost their only market. But in Canada we have a vastly different condition; the development has been the other way. Our great market for agricultural products is right here in Canada. We realize that more fully when we are told that twelve carloads of meat go to Kirkland Lake every week. The district surrounding Timmins, and other extensive mining sections, provide important markets which must be given careful consideration.

I agree with many of the recommendations which have been made, and I hope the government may see fit to put them into effect. I believe there should be a national market. I believe the committee said there should be an empire market; the second edition however does not say that.

Mr. GARDINER: That does not apply to the higher standards.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): That might be well justified. I submit in all seriousness that the government should give consideration not particularly to licensing exporters, but that they may more carefully guard their products. To-day in Canada three-quarters of a million families are affected by the prosperity of agriculture. In view of the small amount of agricultural products exported from Canada I believe the government might be well advised to consider the advisability of a bonus policy in connection with the export of high class agricultural products.

All one needs to do is to drive along the roads of Canada and to see the buildings in need of repair in the rural districts to know that the standard of living in those districts is not comparable to that of even the humblest urban resident. Improvement along this line would involve an enormous amount of employment in Canada and an enormous amount of business.

I realize that while only a small portion of our agricultural production is exported, it is that small amount which sets the price in the home market. Someone may ask, "What about the consumers' league?" I would say, and I have no doubt the hon. member for Huron North would agree, that the consumers are not so much concerned about what they have to pay for their food, if they receive reasonable wages.

Mr. DEACHMAN: What about the housewives in Toronto?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The hon. member has mentioned the housewives in Toronto, and I would agree where unemployment has been increasing, and where they have had no more work, and where they have been humiliated by taking relief. Certainly they do not want higher prices for foodstuffs. But I would rather be employed at sixty cents, fifty cents or even thirty cents an hour and pay twenty cents for a loaf of bread, than be unemployed and be able to buy a loaf for a nickel—if I did not have that nickel.

We must improve the standard of living and increase purchasing power. The prosperity of the farmers must be restored and so far as it can the government should assist in that restoration. If we are going to have any improvement in general conditions I would submit—and I suggest this is the common belief—that in the marketing of agricultural products the minister must give careful consideration to the vast amount of products being imported which are replacing the agricultural products of Canada. In this connection I mention particularly the importation of vegetable oils. Later I propose to deal more fully with the point. I know it is a matter which has been dealt with by others who have given it careful study.

I submit that any hon. member from an agricultural district in Canada who realizes the importance to our national welfare of the prosperity of agriculture will agree when I say that we cannot continue to import millions of pounds of edible vegetable oils and over 100,000,000 or 125,000,000 pounds of inedible vegetable oils. The inedible vegetable oils taking the place of the coarser animal fats, and the first group I mentioned, the edible oils, taking the place of the finer butter and animal fats produced in this country. It costs something to put fat on live stock; I know that. We will soon have a condition whereby the fatter we make our stock the cheaper they will be. Certainly that will be the result if the present policy is followed. I mention that in passing.

I submit the minister should see that every member considers the real report made by the committee of investigation, and should leave the most of this document for a political handbook at the next election.

Mr. GARDINER: As I indicated a few moments ago, the report has been in the hands of all hon. members of the house since last December. I shall refer first to the sentence which my hon. friend states has been left out of the new publication. This sentence reads: "The complaints need serious and immediate study." The reason for leaving out such a sentence in the present publication is that the department considers that we have given serious and immediate study to the report of the committee. I am particularly pleased that the hon. member who has just spoken is so satisfied with the personnel of the committee and the report which they made. I am sure that can be looked upon as an endorsation of the action of the department and of the men who went overseas to make this report.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not wish to convey the idea that I endorse the report one hundred per cent. I endorse fully the motives for sending this committee overseas. I say again that they were an able committee and I believe the most of their report is reasonably sound.

Mr. GARDINER: I find the hon. gentleman more in agreement with me than I had expected. I do not agree with all of the report either. The whole report has not been adopted as a matter of policy. As I stated a few moments ago, this committee was made up only partly of officials of the department. When a government appoints a committee to report on anything it expects the members to use intelligence and to give expression to any views they may have as a result of their investigation. However, when the government considers the report and announces a policy to be based thereon, it is quite natural that that policy should not be in exactly the same terms as the report, unless the government is accepting all of the report. In this case, as in most cases, the department has not accepted the whole report, although I think I would be safe in saying that we have accepted at least ninety per cent of the suggestions made by the committee. As the government had given serious consideration and study to the report and had come to certain conclusions, I thought it was unnecessary to have that sentence included in the publication.

Coming back to the first item which was discussed at considerable length, and which reads:

This is the second edition, with certain changes and additions, of a report on the markets of the United Kingdom, including a statement of marketing policies by the Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. James G. Gardiner, and a list of proposals which have been put into effect.

This report outlines the results of an investigation conducted during the summer of 1937 by a special committee named by the Minister of Agriculture.

The committee is then named.

—to advise on merchandising problems.

The agricultural marketing policy and the results of the investigations conducted in the United Kingdom are presented as a guide to those interested in the production and marketing of agricultural products.

I do not think that any further explanation is required in order to indicate what this volume contains or what the objects were for its publication. It has been stated that considerable changes were made in the introduction. Of course this is an introduction to a different publication. Exception is taken to the similarity between the recommendations of the committee and the policy adopted by the government, as outlined on page 8. I intimated that in announcing the policy I was only reading the recommendations of the committee. In view of the fact that my hon. friend agrees with most of the recommendations made by the committee, I shall not consider it a criticism of the department or of myself that the greater part of the recommendations were accepted. I would direct his attention to the reasons given on page 9 for leaving out some of the previous paragraphs.

The dominion Department of Agriculture does not and never has conducted advertising campaigns in Great Britain. Any recommendation made with regard to the advertising of agricultural products would be considered by others, not by the Department of Agriculture. In studying our policy with regard to the matter we have not dealt with advertising. Something has been said to the effect that there were criticisms of past advertising policies, and my hon. friend agrees that some criticism was warranted in connection with the matter. "Advertising policies" was the term used in the report of the committee. I repeat what I have said in this house on two previous occasions. I did not wait for the report of this committee to say that, I made that statement as a result of my own investigations in Great Britain in the early part of 1936. For some time previous to that, I do not know for how long, there had been no advertising carried on in Great Britain similar to that carried on by some of the other dominions of the empire. In the interval between that time and now there has been a considerable speeding up in the advertising program in the old country, but that has not been done by the Department of Agriculture. Therefore, nothing is said about it in the announcement of the policy with regard to marketing activities.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister said "for some time previous." Did we ever conduct an advertising campaign equivalent to that of Denmark?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not recall that there has been one. So far as I know there never was an advertising campaign that would compare with that of New Zealand, Australia or some of the other dominions. The hon. member has pointed out that the announcement of policy on pages 8 and 9 are the recommendations of the committee word for word. The only changes that are made are in the terminology in connection with the appointment of the chief official who is to represent us in England.

It was said also that the proposals outlined on page 10 are merely a repetition of what had been carried on previously by the department. I want to say that there is not a single item in the ten outlined on page 10 that was carried on by the department previously, with the exception of item No. 5, referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What about the first one, which deals with the appointment of an agricultural commissioner?

Mr. GARDINER: There was no agricultural commissioner in London when this report was made to the government.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Steps had been taken with reference to the appointment of a commissioner.

Mr. GARDINER: Those steps had not been completed when the report was made. This gentleman left for England just last week.

Mr. PERLEY: What about trial shipments of poultry?

Mr. GARDINER: Proposal No. 6 reads:

Most of the recommendations made in regard to poultry are already embodied in new regulations. Several trial shipments of fresh eggs have been successfully made to the British market and it would appear from the results to date that there is a definite possibility of establishing a regular trade in fresh eggs.

That activity started only last fall. Let me go through the whole list, giving just enough in each case to identify the paragraph:

1. An agricultural commissioner, to be stationed in London, England, has been appointed.

2. A standardization trade mark has been adopted.

3. Arrangements have been completed to have a definite quantity of fresh-killed beef forwarded weekly to the London market.

4. The seed of a particularly promising new variety of tomato has been purchased.

5. A comprehensive study of processing and handling of export bacon is under way.

6. Most of the recommendations made in regard to poultry are already embodied in new regulations.

7. Several of the recommendations made in regard to fruit and vegetables are also embodied in regulations already worked out and in operation.

8. A satisfactory method of marking Canadian cheddar cheese has always been regarded as extremely difficult. This difficulty has recently been solved and it is now possible to use a mark which is not only permanent and distinctive but entirely practical.

9. Transportation as it applies to the handling of perishable products at Canadian docks is under investigation.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): That is not new.

Mr. GARDINER: It is entirely new.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It certainly is not.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, my hon. friend may know more about it than I do, but it certainly was not going on two years ago and is only now being put into effect as a result of cooperation on the part of the Department of Agriculture with the Department of Transport, which was not in existence until two years ago.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): There were trial shipments made with reference to dressed beef.

Mr. GARDINER: There was beef killed in Saskatoon—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The ships made available by the former government are not made available by the present government.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there was beef killed in Saskatoon some years ago, shipped under the same facilities as there are now. This has nothing to do with that. No. 9 continues:

The Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the national research council has the matter under consideration.

This is the question which was discussed in the house the other night.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It is not new to have it under consideration.

Mr. GARDINER: It is new to have it under consideration by the research council, because it was just transferred there within the last few months. Previously it was under consideration by the Department of Agriculture. We came to the conclusion that this would have to be transferred to the research council for further investigation, and we have asked the cooperation of the Department of Transport in putting into effect any results we get from the investigations that are being carried out. That is an entirely new thing, started, not altogether before this report was made, but, in so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned, turned over to the national research council before the report was made.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Every one of those was started before this government came into power, and not one is completed yet except the trade mark.

Mr. GARDINER: That is one of the difficulties I have found as a result of following the old government.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister has followed it pretty closely.

Mr. GARDINER: A great many things were started, but they had not got anywhere. We have undertaken during this last year to try to put some of these policies into effect, and page 10 gives ten of them which have been brought into effect since the report of the committee which is under discussion was made.

Mr. SENN: They are mostly try-outs.

Mr. GARDINER: I agree with the hon. member when he compliments the government upon the selection it made of the committee and compliments the committee itself upon the report it made. The report is based upon observations made overseas; the recommendations which the committee made were based upon those observations, and the policy which the government has followed since receiving the report on December 8 last has been based upon the recommendations contained in that report. In the publication which I have in my hand are given the policies of the government based upon those recommendations and the information presented by the committee upon which those policies rest, and that is being forwarded to anyone who desires to have it, to be read as an assistance in coming to conclusions as to what ought to be done in the production of our products, in grading them, and, finally, in placing them before the customer, either in this country or in Great Britain.

I think that is all I need to say with regard to the report. I see no necessity for holding up this particular item because the old report is not at the moment available to each hon. member. The old report is available in the department to each hon. member if he desires to have it, and those who have brought their copies with them of course have them now available.

Mr. THOMPSON: Would the minister allow me just a moment? In regard to this report, about two weeks ago I was looking up some figures here, and I telephoned from my office to Mr. Shaw and asked him if I could have the old report. A copy was sent to my home some time last fall, before the house opened, and I knew it was at home. I told him I wanted one because I wished to get some data from him. Mr. Shaw told me copies were not available and I could not get one. Afterwards I telephoned to an officer in the dairy and cold storage branch, asking if I could have a copy of the report, and when I was told that it was not available, I had the report forwarded to me from my home.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The hon. member might have got one from the Department of Trade and Commerce!

Mr. THOMPSON: I believe there were others who wrote to Mr. Shaw and received letters from him telling them copies of the report were not available; at least, hon. members have told me so.

Mr. GARDINER: As I said a few moments ago, when the printing of the report was discontinued I gave instructions that a sufficient number of copies were to be retained to supply hon. members if they desired to have those reports, and that they were to be available when this publication which I hold in my hand was made available to hon. members. This publication was made available, I believe, yesterday, and as I have indicated, a sufficient number of them has been kept to supply all hon. members with copies, either French or English, of the original report. There will be no distribution other than to members of the house, but I thought it was only fair that there should be sufficient copies for the use of hon. members for purposes of discussion and so on.

Mr. THOMPSON: Well, I could not get a copy. I was obliged to write to my home and have the one I had on my desk sent to me. There are other hon. members in a similar position.

Mr. GARDINER: That was three or four days ago?

Mr. THOMPSON: No; this is two weeks ago.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I say they have been available since yesterday; as soon as this report was made available, the others were made available—

Mr. THOMPSON: That may be.

Mr. GARDINER: —in order that they might be compared.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister suggested we should not press for the report—

Mr. GARDINER: Will the hon. member wait until I complete my statement? I have not finished it. There is no necessity for holding up this particular item. I think the report itself is sufficiently wide that it can be brought into the discussion of almost any item, and certainly any item under marketing; there are many other things in it which have to do with production and would probably come under production. I do not think there is any possibility of stopping the discussion on parts of this report or comments upon the report under any of the items that have to do with marketing. Therefore I would say, if there is nothing else to discuss on administration, we might pass this particular item and go on to some others.

Mr. SENN: The minister seems to have shifted his ground a little from the other evening, as to why this report was not distributed any further. He says now it was because he wanted enough copies saved to be passed around to members and others who desired them particularly.

Mr. GARDINER: No, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. member does not wish to misrepresent me. I have not shifted my ground. The reason we stopped the further printing of the report is the reason I gave, but I did ask the department to keep sufficient copies of the report available to make distribution to hon. members for use when the matter was up for discussion in the house.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The hon. member for Lanark could not get one.

Mr. SENN: In the minister's statement the other night about the copies that were issued, I find the following as reported in Hansard:

> At that time attention was called particularly to the press report which went out covering the report itself, and some exception was taken to statements in the press report summarizing the report itself. As a result of some of these complaints I suggested that the report as then published be not sent out to the general public.

Mr. GARDINER: Exactly what I am saying now.

Mr. SENN: No; the minister said it was because he wanted certain copies. However, I shall not press it.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the hon. member will find, when he reads Hansard tomorrow, that I made exactly the same statement a few moments ago.

Mr. SENN: I have in my hand a copy of the original report. It says it is published by direction of the Hon. James G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, Ottawa, 1937. I am sure the minister would not authorize the printing and publication of this report unless he knew what it contained before it went out. It would not be reasonable to suppose that he would do so. But certainly some influence was brought to bear on him at a later date, so that he saw to it that this report was not distributed any further, and he said that it was because of certain complaints which were made. I asked the minister, when this discussion started this afternoon, where those complaints came from, and he has not yet told the committee. I imagine that the minister, when he changed the report, deleted from it any criticism of another department. Perhaps that was a courteous thing to do; but at the same time he did make deletions, and he is now presenting a new report which, I venture to say, nine out of ten people will not recognize as a second edition unless they happen to turn to the foreword, where they will find that certain additions have been made. The minister, in fairness to the committee, should certainly give us the information, which it is reasonable to ask for, as to who made the complaints, why the change was made, and why the first report was not published to any greater extent.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I desire to bring a note of good cheer to take the place of the clouds of pessimism which we have had for a few moments this afternoon. I was particularly moved by the remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe when he suggested that there was grave danger that the live stock industry of Canada might be ruined by the importation of canned meats. While he was talking, I checked up the figures and was impressed with this idea: If we were in danger, why did he not stop it when the danger threatened? He was in the house during 1933, or at least his party was here, and I find we were importing at that time 4,249,000 pounds of canned meat; the following year, 6,000,000 pounds; in 1935, 10,000,000 pounds; in 1936, while the tariff policies of the former government were still in force, our imports rose to what he would call the magnificent height of 12,000,000 pounds of canned meat, and yet no wave of trouble rolled across his peaceful breast.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I suggest to the hon. member that all he has to do is to look back in Hansard, where he will see that I criticized the government of that day. Two wrongs do not make a right, and I criticized my own government.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I readily grant the contention that no other government which ever held power in the dominion was so fully deserving of criticism as the government of that day which the hon. gentleman supported.

An hon. MEMBER: You are getting back into line.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I will show the hon. gentleman that I have several lines, and the kind he likes, too. Taking the total imports of meat into Canada, the value in 1933 was $678,000, and that rose steadily to $964,164 in 1936.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Give them for 1929-30.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The hon. gentleman wishes to go back too far. Let me give the exports—and, by the way, a Conservative is never cheered either by imports or by exports, because he believes in shutting the door both ways so that no one can get either in or out. Liberals, on the other hand, though they do not always practise their faith as fully as I should like, believe, and I hope they will come to believe more fervently, in the development of export as well as import trade. Let me show what happened. Here are the exports of meat: In 1933, $6,000,000; in 1934, $15,000,000. Why do they not cheer now? They were in power when the exports of meat were increasing. In 1935 the figure was $24,000,000, a magnificent development, and the following year $24,000,000. And then the Liberals came in. In 1937 our exports were $36,114,000, or a greater gain between 1936 and 1937 than there had been in the previous period during which the Conservatives were in power.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What was the change of policy?

Mr. DEACHMAN: I shall let the hon. gentleman explain that. We have heard to-day of the remarkable failure of all governments in developing markets in Great Britain, and one would think, from some of the speeches made this afternoon, that we were at least second-raters compared with South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, or almost any other country. Well, I sent for the Statistical Abstract for the United Kingdom while my hon. friend was unrolling his gobs of gloom, and this is what I find. I shall take the period from 1913 to 1936, because I wish to take as wide a range as possible in order to include all political parties. Between 1913 and 1936, the exports of South Africa increased from £12,000,000 to £13,000,000; Australia, £38,000,000 to £61,000,000; New Zealand, £20,000,000 to £43,000,000—and I congratulate them upon that—whereas from the Dominion of Canada the increase was from £30,000,000 to £75,000,000.

Sometimes we forget what we are. We are one of the foremost peoples in the world, and if I did not take the opportunity sometimes to remind the house of this fact we would forget it after listening to the pessimistic speeches of hon. gentlemen to my left, and would become so discouraged that even the grass would not start to grow. My hon. friend was worrying a few moments ago, and I thought I would give him a word of cheer. In 1933 our exports of agricultural and vegetable products to the United Kingdom were $114,000,000. After a couple of years of struggle they rose to $127,000,000; but in 1937—and this is the last year for which we have complete figures—the amount was $197,000,000.

Let us take exports to the United States—and my hon. friend will be glad to hear this. They dropped to the amazing point of $3,905,000 in 1933, and in 1935 they had moved up to $43,000,000. That is not too bad under a Conservative government. But then there came an opportunity for my hon. friends to vote for larger markets, and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe lined himself up with the people who believe in the obstruction of markets. We opened that market, and in 1937 our exports reached $73,603,000. We are not doing too badly, and we would do better if we still further reduced our tariffs.

I do not think we can reach the point at which we can adopt the policy suggested by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. He suggests that we should bonus the export of farm products. I ask the committee and the hon. gentleman what other governments would do if we proposed to bonus the exports of agricultural products. Australia, New Zealand, the Argentine, South Africa, would have to follow the same policy, and in that case we would arrive eventually at the point at which we would be attempting to feed not only ourselves but the British people as well. In that case they would be willing to accept our products—or would they accept them? I do not know; but I think not, because, in this time of stress and storm, when one nation sets up barriers against others and then proposes to bonus exports, there is a tendency on the part of most other countries to restrict imports from the country that is giving the bonus, and therefore we would find ourselves worse off than before. When the hon. gentleman makes that proposal I wonder how far he thinks it will get us.

At one time we discussed in caucus—and I am not revealing anything now, because this was several years ago—a proposal to give a bounty on cheese, and it was agreed on all sides that if a bounty were given on the export of cheese from Canada the United States would invoke the law which calls for the imposition of a countervailing duty. Do we want a storm of duties and countervailing duties? Is not the true, rational policy—and I wish I could convince my hon. friend of this—to lower the cost of production and to expand markets? I suggest to him that we can never expand our markets while we rise in our places in the House of Commons and suggest that we should do something desperate in order to stop the importation of a few pounds of imported canned meats.

While the hon. gentleman's own party was in power, I heard a Conservative talking once about importations. It was at the time of an election, and I enjoyed it as one of the most pleasing recollections of a bitter campaign. He said: "Watch the imports come in, torrential tides of imports tearing down the mountain side." Could you get that or anything like it from anyone except a Conservative? The goods coming in constitute payment for the goods sent out, but they fear that when we are being paid for exports we are being ruined. That is the Conservative attitude of mind, and that, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe will note, is why this country could never develop trade under the Conservative policy. That is why, when his leader sat on the other side in 1933 and 1934, he said, "There are no markets; markets are gone." The restrictions were relaxed and markets restored. If we break down these restrictions against imports, we shall have no more trouble in marketing our produce than a stream has in flowing to the sea. It is natural for goods to be exchanged, as natural as for the sun to shine.

Mr. TUSTIN: I was surprised to hear the minister say that nearly 6,000 copies of this first report were printed and that some 4,800 had been given out. I wrote to the department asking for a copy of this report and received a letter from the director of marketing saying that there were no more copies available but that a second edition was being printed.

At each session since I have been in this house I have asked the Minister of Agriculture how much money was set aside for advertising our agricultural products. It is true at the first session there was nothing being spent, and last year he promised to give the matter consideration. This first report is a very honest one; I believe the committee which was set up went to the United Kingdom and made a good job of investigating the markets or prospective markets there, and in my opinion they made a fine report. They speak of "little apparent benefit from past advertising." There is no advertising of Canadian products in the United Kingdom. I see in the new report that the minister says that this government does not do any advertising.

Mr. GARDINER: The Department of Agriculture does not. I did not say that no other department does.

Mr. TUSTIN: It goes on:

> Little apparent benefit from past advertising. Canada has not benefited to any noticeable degree from advertising done in the past, whereas New Zealand, Australia and South Africa have achieved definitely favourable results. New Zealand is the best known supplier of foodstuffs among the dominions; Australia comes next, followed by South Africa and Canada.

I was surprised, when I made a little private investigation in the old land, to find how little the people knew of Canadian products. My surprise ceased after I had paid a visit to some of the shops. It is true, as the committee says, that Canadian cheese was being sold as American cheese. A goodly portion of our Canadian cheese was being sold as "empire product," and I admit some was being sold as Canadian cheese. I know the minister suggests that he is going to adopt a national mark for high grade agricultural products shipped to the United Kingdom. Let me suggest that there is only one mark which should go on high class products of this country, and that is the word "Canada." The minister will do a great service to this dominion if he has all the products graded very carefully before they go abroad.

Referring to "the marketing policy," clause C reads:

> To advise, cooperate with and assist all government, producer and merchandising agencies in placing Canadian foodstuffs effectively before the British housewife.

I see no reason why the government of Canada should wait for some other agency to make an attempt to advertise the products of this country. The duty rests upon the government of Canada, not upon some provincial government or private individual. If we go about advertising our products in the right way, next session the minister will be able to report very much greater exports to the great market of the United Kingdom than at the present time. We could easily become the greatest factor in that market, but we must be careful to send only articles of first grade, and the very best quality.

Item agreed to.

Dairy products, including contribution of $581 to the international institute of refrigeration, $381,500.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister assured us before that practically anything in this item could be discussed under other items.

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact, we have been discussing it all under the wrong item. No. 12 is the proper item under which to discuss this report. That is the item under which the expenditure was made and under which any similar expenditure can be made this year.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister said the report would be open for discussion again under item No. 12.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Has item No. 7 been discussed?

The CHAIRMAN: Item No. 7 stands.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister indicate the reason for the substantial increase in this item? At the same time he might give a break-down of last year's expenditures.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that the hon. member desires a comparison between the expenditures last year and this, showing the increases this year.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, an explanation of the increase. Possibly a break-down will give it.

Mr. GARDINER: The figures are as follows:

	1938-9	1937-8	Increase
Permanent employees, salaries	$199,285 00	$169,355 50	$29,949 50
Temporary employees	54,359 50	62,723 00	—8,363 50
Wages	9,560 00	6,750 00	2,810 00
Living allowances	6,022 50	4,380 00	1,642 50
Telephone, telegrams, cables and postage	6,435 00	5,930 00	505 00
Equipment	1,200 00	3,350 50	—1,150 50
Canada's annual contribution to International Institute of Refrigeration	581 00	580 80	20
Press clippings, laundry, membership dues, electric current	950 00	382 50	567 50
Lawyers' and analysts' fees	3,700 00	3,300 00	400 00
Rents	1,780 00	1,840 00	— 60 00
Printing, stationery, office supplies, etc.	14,424 00	13,949 20	474 80
Express, freight, cartage, refrigerator car service	5,900 00	5,471 00	429 00
Travelling expenses	77,303 00	64,280 00	13,023 00

That makes an estimated total for 1938-39 of $381,500, while $342,272.50 was voted for 1937-38, showing an increase this year of $49,801.50, against which there is a decrease of $10,574, making a net increase of about $39,200.

Mr. SENN: The minister has already spoken about what he calls a national mark which is to be placed on goods going from this country to Great Britain, and, I suppose, to other countries as well. A statement has been made also in regard to a distinctive mark that has been invented or devised so that Canadian products can be identified in any market. I should like to know just the nature of that mark. Will the mark placed on cheese be simply the word "Canada," and will it be on all classes of cheese leaving the country or just on the high grades? I understand that most of the cheese exported from Canada is of good quality, but I should think the same policy should prevail in this instance, and that any distinctive mark should be placed only on the highest quality.

Mr. GARDINER: The policy is, as I read it, the adoption of a national mark for Canada's high grade agricultural products shipped to the United Kingdom. That has been announced as a matter of policy, and on the next page of the pamphlet we state that we have adopted a mark.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What is the mark?

Mr. GARDINER: A few moments ago some reference was made to the word "Canada," and it was suggested that the word "Canada" should appear on all our goods. As I understand it, the law of Great Britain compels that now; everything shipped there has to designate the country of origin. But the complaint has not been in that regard; it is more directed to the fact that when the commodity is placed before the consumer for sale the customer often does not know that the product is Canadian at all. To overcome that, as has been indicated in another section, in so far as cheese is concerned, has been a matter of great difficulty. It has been hard to devise a means by which even the word "Canada" could be placed upon the cheese without interfering in any way with the product itself. A method of doing that has been developed, and that is being done. But so far as the distinctive mark is concerned, what we have in mind is that the mark also will have the word "Canada" on it; that is, a very prominent part of the mark will be the word "Canada." Underneath that will appear what you might call the trade mark, as trade marks are placed on different products by different concerns. Then there will be the words "quality guarded," and that mark will appear only on the highest grade products that go from Canada, whatever those products may be. As to the products to which it will apply, that has not yet been decided. It will be determined through discussions with the persons turning out those products and with the officials of the department.

Mr. SENN: I think I understand what the minister has in mind in regard to a distinctive mark so that the product can be followed right to the breakfast table of the consumer, but would he give the committee some idea of how the grading of cheese for the export market is carried on? Is it done at the factory or at the port? Is it sample grading, or is each cheese graded as it is put on board? I think that is very important.

Mr. GARDINER: The grading is done at the warehouses, whether those be inland or at the ports. There is one cheese graded out of every vat. Those grades are established, and we hope to be able to maintain them right through to the customer in the old country or wherever they go.

Item agreed to.

Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, $53,177.85.

Mr. GARDINER: I might explain that this item comes down every year pretty much in this form, but it is always necessary to give consideration to further amounts in the supplementaries. When these estimates were brought down we were not sufficiently familiar with the amounts required, and further amounts in connection with these cold storage warehouses will be provided in supplementary estimates.

Mr. STIRLING: This just takes care of existing contracts?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Has there been any change in the policy of the department in regard to these warehouses under the Cold Storage Act? Has there been any further encouragement given cold storage plants throughout the dominion, in order to assist in the marketing policies that have been suggested this afternoon? I think it very important that more encouragement should be given.

Mr. GARDINER: There has been no change in policy. For some years past the policy has been to pay thirty per cent of the cost, provided the cold storage plant is available for public use, and that policy is still followed. There is an impression in some parts of Canada that we have gone quite a long way as a government in establishing cold storage plants. At the moment we are not considering any change at all, but some representations have been made to the effect that probably we have gone as far as we should in encouraging the establishment of cold storage warehouses.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): If the minister has any doubt in the matter, may I say that in many parts of the country there is the feeling that perhaps governments have not gone far enough. On the other hand, I know there are some in the business who feel that governments have gone far enough. It is my view that the matter is so closely allied to efficient marketing of perishable products that encouragement should be given to cold storage plants.

I have in mind a condition partly in my own constituency and partly in the Holland marsh district, and I realize what a cold storage plant at that point would mean. The assistance the government could give in districts like that would be of great value. To my mind the subject is closely related to efficient marketing methods, and has particular bearing on perishable products requiring cold storage facilities. I believe that in its efforts to improve grades and to regulate the supply the government might give special consideration to this matter connected with the marketing of perishable products. I suggest that it should encourage the operation of cold storage plants in different parts of Canada.

Earlier to-day I mentioned a system of bonuses which might be paid in connection with agricultural products. May I point out that the term might be interpreted in different ways. We pay subsidies on iron and steel production, and we pay bonuses and subventions in connection with other activities. It is my view that through greater encouragement to the operation of cold storage plants assistance might be given in the marketing of agricultural products. Great assistance could be given to new developments throughout the country, and especially to developments such as that in the Holland marsh district. Many families at that point are finding it almost impossible to make a living in view of the fact that thousands of dollars worth of their vegetables must be wasted through decay from the lack of cold storage accommodation. We realize that under the Cold Storage Act the government does give subsidies, but I do not believe the amounts are sufficient in those districts in which the people are engaging in this most laborious type of production. These people are endeavouring in difficult times to make a success, and I believe the government could give them substantial assistance by offering greater cold storage facilities.

In these districts small pieces of ground give employment to many families. A patch of four or five acres means a great deal to such families. I would recommend that the government give serious consideration to amending the Cold Storage Act so as to give greater assistance to a class of people who are toiling at what I believe to be about the most difficult, doubtful and questionable type of agricultural production, namely the production of fruit and vegetables. Unless some assistance is given by way of cold storage plants in the district I have mentioned, the development is going to meet with much greater difficulty in the future. Many families are now employed and earning a livelihood from their work, and I would urge upon the government the necessity of increasing the subsidies and amending the act so that increased assistance may be given them. Undoubtedly some would oppose a change of that kind, but I believe such a change would indirectly assist the purpose we all have in mind, namely the more efficient distribution of perishable products.

Mr. LENNARD: How are the cold storage plants subsidized?

Mr. GARDINER: The act lays down the conditions under which anyone providing cold storage facilities may receive a subsidy. If the concern meets with the conditions of the act, we pay 30 per cent. I understand 50 per cent is paid the first year, and the other 50 per cent is spread over four years.

Mr. PERLEY: How many plants are subsidized in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: There are four.

Mr. PERLEY: At what places, and who operate them?

Mr. GARDINER: One is at Moose Jaw, and is operated by the Moose Jaw Cold Storage Company; then there are the Saskatchewan Cooperative Creameries at Regina, the Saskatchewan Cooperative Creameries at Saskatoon and the Saskatchewan Cooperative Creameries at Vonda, Weyburn and Yorkton.

Mr. STIRLING: Are they now receiving the subsidy?

Mr. GARDINER: The last two are not now operating; there are only four.

Mr. STIRLING: Are the other ones now receiving the subsidy?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the total number of those which have received subsidies.

Mr. PERLEY: According to the details at page 56 of the estimates, there is none receiving subsidies.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: There is none still drawing subsidies in Saskatchewan. They have been in existence for over five years. Those to which reference is made in the details are still drawing subsidies.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which ones in Alberta are receiving subsidies?

Mr. GARDINER: There is none obtaining a subsidy at the present time. Any which were set up in Alberta have drawn their full subsidy.

Mr. PERLEY: And there is none in Manitoba?

Mr. GARDINER: No; there is none in Manitoba.

Mr. STEWART: The minister has said that the authority for the subsidies is to be found in the act. Looking over the subsidies paid during the last year, and comparing them with the estimates for the present year, I notice that in many instances the reduction is only 50 per cent. Did I not understand the minister to say that in the first year they received 50 per cent, and that in succeeding years, extending over a period of four years, they received a reduced amount? If that is so, how is it that this year there is a 50 per cent reduction of the amount paid?

Mr. GARDINER: The first payment is 15 per cent of the total cost at the time, but it is 50 per cent of the total subsidy we pay. The payments in the other four years are in different percentages, namely 7 per cent, 4 per cent, 2 per cent and 2 per cent.

Mr. STEWART: Then most of them must have been on the 4 per cent rate, and are now on the 2 per cent, because in most instances the reduction is 50 per cent. Where the reduction is not 50 per cent, I suppose they are on different rates for the different years. Is that so?

Mr. GARDINER: The first year will be 15 per cent and the second year, 7 per cent, which is approximately half. The next year it is 4 per cent, which is again approximately half. Then it goes down to 2 per cent and 2 per cent.

Mr. STEWART: Which is absolutely half.

Mr. GARDINER: For one year and the year following it is the same.

Mr. STEWART: The reduction from $84,000 to $53,000 is quite substantial, especially in view of the fact that it covers the same number of cold storage warehouses. Does the minister anticipate that there will be another batch, if I may use that term, in the supplementary estimates? Will there be a certain number of applications that will qualify for grants?

Mr. GARDINER: I gave that answer before. The supplementaries will provide for those under consideration, while these estimates provide for our commitments.

Mr. STEWART: The ones to be covered by the supplementaries will be new propositions?

Mr. GARDINER: Largely.

Mr. STEWART: Will any of these be covered again in the supplementaries?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. BROOKS: Is there any cooperation between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Fisheries in connection with the construction and operation of cold storage warehouses?

Mr. GARDINER: All grants for cold storage warehouses are provided for in the Department of Agriculture estimates. We pay the grants, but the warehouses may be used for any purpose.

Mr. BROOKS: Is any contribution made by the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. GARDINER: No; all provision is made under these estimates.

Mr. PERLEY: Have any new plants in Saskatchewan applied for subsidies?

Mr. GARDINER: No. As my hon. friend knows, most of the cold storage facilities in Saskatchewan are owned by the Saskatchewan Cooperative Creamery. A few years ago I know they had more storage space than they knew what to do with, but I could not say whether that condition exists to-day.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the amount of dairy and creamery butter in storage in those plants?

Mr. GARDINER: The bureau of statistics publishes that information regularly.

Mr. SENN: The minister stated that there were certain applications under consideration, and he also outlined how the financing was arranged. I should like to know what is necessary to be done in order to have the department accept a proposition. Is there any difference in the treatment meted out to a cooperative organization and to a private concern?

Mr. GARDINER: Application is made by the organization desiring to establish a cold storage warehouse. They are required to submit plans and specifications which are gone over by the department. If the proposed warehouse will not provide more storage than is necessary for the proper carrying on of business in that district, in all probability the department will accept the application. After the plant has been constructed, an inspection is made to see that the specifications have been followed. If everything is in conformity with the regulations, a grant is made automatically under the law.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How many cooperative organizations and private concerns have been assisted under the present cold storage legislation?

Mr. GARDINER: The name of the concern would be the only intimation as to whether it is cooperative or private. We could get that information and bring it down at a later stage. They are listed in the details.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How many are there altogether?

Mr. GARDINER: Thirty-three, of which more than half would appear to be cooperative, according to their names.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Under this item what assistance in the way of warehouse facilities?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no cold storage provided for tobacco. That would come under another item.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Have drying warehouses been provided under this item?

Mr. GARDINER: No warehouses have been provided, and certainly no cold storage.

Mr. SENN: There has been some criticism of the whole scheme of government assistance for cold storage warehouses, which criticism I do not think is well founded, as these warehouses serve a very useful purpose. A certain number of warehouses receiving assistance from the department have gone into liquidation, and I should like to know how many have ceased operations. I should like to know also if a proper investigation of all the circumstances was made before grants were given.

Mr. GARDINER: A few warehouses have closed up, but the number is small when compared with the total number. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again this day.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REVISION OF RADIOTELEGRAPH ACT—CLARIFYING OF SECTIONS DEALING WITH LICENSING RADIO RECEIVING SETS

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 52, respecting radio in Canada—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 5,—Station licences.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): When this bill was last discussed I was answering a suggestion by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) that there had been some deception in the explanatory notes of the bill; that the evidence of this was in clause 5, and that the real purpose of the clause was to take care of radios in automobiles. As a matter of fact, the old Radiotelegraph Act amply covered automobiles. It provided that a licence fee was collectable for a radiotelegraph station anywhere; and, of course, under the old act a radio receiving set is a radiotelegraph station. One statement my hon. friend made and strongly emphasized was that radios in automobiles were unknown in 1913. Just to dispose of that assertion, I have before me the year book of wireless telegraphy and telephony, 1913, and in it we have a photograph of a motor car wireless telegraph station which I should be glad to send across to my hon. friend simply to show him that wireless in automobiles was not unknown in 1913, as he so dogmatically stated. However, the purpose of the change in the article other than the change in the phraseology is to take care of the flaw in the previous legislation which was brought out in the Gignac case, in which the judge found that use of a radio must be proved by actual evidence of use; that is, the inspector must find, to prove use, the owner of the radio actually with the power turned on and turning the dial. In the Gignac case the defendant was convicted of installing a radio without a licence; but it was quite clear from the finding of the judge that had the installation taken place before the time limit—I think it is one year—in which complaint must be made, he could not have been convicted on a charge of illegal installation. Section 5 in its present wording is inserted to close the opening left by the decision in the Gignac case, and the provision for exemption of visiting automobiles is simply put there to provide for a situation which was not provided for in the old act. Under the old act a radio in a visiting car was taxable, and this makes it clear that there will be an exemption.

Mr. LAWSON: I cannot help remarking that the minister had to go a long way to find this ancient vintage of an automobile which was apparently equipped with a radio.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend said it was unheard of in those days.

Mr. LAWSON: I think the committee understood what I meant, that it was unheard of in any passenger vehicle used by people to run about the country. I observe, in the very fine photograph sent me by the minister, that attached to the rear of this so-called automobile are about eighteen telephone poles. I assume those were to carry the station, and I would draw to the minister's attention that if he had but read the article which goes with the picture he would have found that this was not an ordinary case of a radio being installed in a pleasure motor car, but one of a motor car being built purposely to have a radio station which, by reason of being moved about from place to place, changed the wave length and thereby preserved secrecy for signals which were then being transmitted by radio.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am wondering if this section 5 makes it necessary for a person to pay an extra licence fee if he has in his possession an obsolete radio. If one is keeping as an heirloom a radio presented to him in years gone by, is it going to be necessary for him to pay a licence fee every year? I notice it says:

No person shall . . . have in his possession any radio apparatus.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right. It is necessary to have it.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the answer to the question?

Mr. LANDERYOU: If a man had two radios, would he have to pay two licence fees if the radios were in the same house?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and if the radio apparatus is in the man's house the onus of proof is on the owner to show it is not in use. Under this legislation possession is presumption of use.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There is a question which I wish to ask the minister and which, I believe, was asked in the committee, and Major Murray said he would get a ruling on it. A man lived in a town in which there were electrical facilities; his house was wired, but he was not using the electricity for any purpose, and he had given to him a battery set. The question arose, Would he have to have a licence for a battery set or an electrical set, if he was in a town in which electrical facilities were provided but was not using them in any way in his house?

Mr. HOWE: We obtained a ruling on that point from the Department of Justice. The department ruled that if a house is not connected with the electric current the owner would pay a battery set licence fee.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But whether it was wired or not, if he was not using the electricity for any purpose?

Mr. HOWE: There, again, it would depend upon whether the owner could prove he was not using the electricity in the house. If the electric wiring was installed the onus of proof would be on the owner to show he was not using electricity in his house.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The man who wrote to me stated that when he moved into the house he did not figure he could afford electricity, so he had the meter turned off. The house was wired, because the people who occupied the house before him had been using electric lights and electricity. When he came in he had the meter shut off and did not use electricity, and he had a battery set given to him. The question is whether he had to pay $2.50 or $2 for his licence. I maintain that as he was using a battery set and was not using electricity for any purpose he should not be required to pay $2.50 for that battery set. That is the question on which we wanted a ruling.

Mr. HOWE: The case is, I should say, most unusual. I should say he was quite justified in taking out a battery set licence, but to make absolutely sure of the law it might be well to advise him to disconnect the wiring into his house.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That would be entirely up to the man who owned the house, not to the renter.

Mr. LAWSON: Would the minister point out where in this legislation one is exempt from committing an offence under it if he merely has in his possession a radio, and it is not in use. In answer to a question by one of my hon. friends to my left, the minister said the onus is on the accused to show that the set is not in use, and left the inference that if it were not in use then it was not an offence under the legislation to have it. I am sorry, but that is not the way in which I read the bill. The section says:

> No person shall establish any radio station or private receiving station, or install, operate or have in his possession any radio apparatus. . . .

Apparently merely having it in one's possession is an offence, unless the minister can show me where, somewhere else in the bill, the non-user exempts one from the offence prescribed by section 5.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can explain the point this way. Complaint comes to the department in various ways that there is an apparatus in a house. Before any prosecution takes place a permanent officer of the department visits the house. If it can be proven to him that this apparatus is not in use, no prosecution follows. Provision in the law in that connection brings up the old question involved in the Gignac case, that we must prove use. To prove use you must see the apparatus in use. Two witnesses must see it being used, the current turned on and the dials being manipulated. That is the ruling in the Gignac case. Having a radio apparatus in your possession is covered by the legislation, but in the operation of it our officer is instructed to make very sure that the apparatus is usable. To define that in the bill, however, would lead us into the same technical difficulties that were encountered under the old act.

Mr. LAWSON: In other words, the question whether I am to be prosecuted or not for having in my possession a radio is one which is to be decided at the will of a civil servant of the Dominion of Canada, and frankly I object to being put into that position. I object not only on my own behalf, but also on behalf of the people of Canada who may be subjected to prosecution. Furthermore, I think the minister is badly advised when he says that provision could not be made for the situation which I have mentioned without going right back to the position that prevented conviction in the case of Rex v. Gignac. By a clause of this bill the onus is put on the accused. The moment a person is accused of an offence, the onus is put on him of proving that he is not guilty, and that being so, the accused, once he is charged, must satisfy the court that he is not guilty. The reason that the crown lost in the Gignac case was that the onus was on the prosecution of establishing that the machine had been installed or had been operated, and the crown could do neither. That, however, will no longer prevail. Now, a man can be haled into court for mere possession, and the onus is on him to establish non-user. Surely, under these circumstances, a clause could be inserted in the bill providing that where an accused satisfies the court that the radio apparatus was not in use in the licence year in which he was prosecuted, there should be no offence under section 5. That, it seems to me, can be set out without in any way weakening the legislation or embarrassing its enforcement.

If that cannot be done, we come back to the general objection that I made in connection with this bill. In my opinion, it is a great mistake in our legislatures, whether it be the House of Commons, or a provincial house, to give some particular body, whether civil servants or other individuals, any one you like, the power to determine whether or not I have committed an offence or whether I should be prosecuted. That power should be given only to those who are duly appointed and constituted judicial officers. In reading current reports in the press I find that I am not alone in that view. Before coming into the house to-night I noticed a statement in the press that the attorney general of Ontario, an attorney general, by the way, of a Liberal administration, agrees entirely with that view and says that he is unalterably opposed to this legislation.

I suggest to the minister that he confer with the Minister of Justice as to the wisdom of this legislation leaving discretionary power in the hands of any civil servant to determine who shall or shall not be prosecuted; for when he determines the question of prosecution he likewise determines the question of guilt or innocence, because under the section as it now stands the mere possession of a radio apparatus constitutes an offence.

Mr. HOWE: This section was drawn up by the officers of the Department of Justice in the light of the Gignac case, but I shall be glad to allow the section to stand and ask the Minister of Justice to review the situation having regard to what my hon. friend has said, and I must say that I have some sympathy with his point of view. We shall see if a workable clause can be drawn along the lines he suggests.

Mr. LAWSON: Thank you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: While the clause is being redrafted, some provision ought to be made to enable dealers to have radio sets in their possession without having to obtain licences. I cannot see how they can do that under this clause as it now stands, but perhaps I misinterpret it.

[Mr. Lawson.]

Mr. HOWE: The situation with regard to dealers is taken care of in the regulations. No special legislation is required.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps I am saying what has already been said; but it seems to me that the principle of putting on the accused the onus of establishing his innocence is altogether contrary to fundamental principle of British procedure, whereby a man is considered innocent until he is proved guilty. I greatly object to having that principle violated just for the sake of $2.50. It is offensive to me to see a man put in the position where he might be declared a criminal and made a gaolbird in consequence of a law of this sort.

Section stands.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Radio operator a British subject.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is involved in subsection 2 with regard to declaration of secrecy?

Mr. HOWE: That refers to the secrecy of messages transmitted from one point to another. An amateur radio operator can often pick up messages that are being transmitted over commercial wireless stations, and the legislation requires that if he does happen to intercept such a message he is bound to secrecy.

Mr. LANDERYOU: This deals with commercial messages?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Search warrant.

Mr. LAWSON: Again I am going to ask the minister to consider seriously the wisdom of this section. I realize that with two exceptions it is not vastly different from the old section 11 which was in the act passed in 1913. Under the act of 1913 a search warrant could be issued only by a magistrate to a duly constituted police officer within his jurisdiction, whereas under this section it may be issued to one of many persons therein indicated. Furthermore, under the old section it could not be issued on the mere allegation of possession of a radio set. I would point out that the old Radiotelegraph Act was passed in 1913, and despite the picture in the book of an automobile which had a radio in it, it never was conceived that the act was directed against the ordinary citizen who had a radio set in his home. In those days radio, as far as commercial use was concerned, was confined to ships at sea and to land stations that communicated from land to land or land to ship. In such circumstances it was necessary, where illegal stations were established, without licence, that a search warrant should be issued on the allegation that there was such an illegal station established, because the lives of passengers on ships at sea might be endangered by it, or international complications might arise from messages falsely transmitted by such illegal stations from one country or nation to another. In that situation and under those circumstances these drastic clauses were necessary. But let us bear in mind that all the business of radio stations in respect of ships, etc., has now been taken out of this legislation.

Mr. HOWE: Just in respect of ships.

Mr. LAWSON: All right; all radio stations in ships have been taken out of this legislation and transferred to the shipping act. Surely it is not the minister's intention that these drastic powers should be given in respect of entering people's homes. I do not want to take the time to run over all the arguments that one reads in newspapers and that have been advanced as to the opportunities it would give for crooks to gain entry to people's homes and that sort of thing. Suffice it to say that under this bill a land station, that being, I assume, a commercial radio station is defined, and a private receiving station is also defined. Private receiving stations are in people's homes. If it is necessary to pass any legislation as drastic as that contained in section 9 and two others to which I shall refer later, confine it to your land stations; do not let us extend these arbitrary and unreasonable powers of entering people's homes in order to deal with some man who may have committed the very minor offence of having in operation a radio for which he has not paid $2.50 for a licence.

Mr. HOWE: I assume it is the intention of the legislation to collect $2.50 from every user of a radio. There is no change in the intent of this section. If my hon. friend will look at the old act he will find it has exactly the same provision. Since 1932 it has been the custom to have warrants to enter homes in order to obtain evidence for prosecution. When I came into this office I tried to avoid that situation, naturally everyone who has had to do with this, even as a private citizen, knows the present system is very objectionable. We tried to find some alternative, but we found our collections of radio licences would drop by half, were it not for the ability to obtain evidence to prosecute. It is only the fear of prosecution that holds the collection of radio licences up to where it is to-day, and it is far from 100 per cent to-day. If any other workable plan can be found I would be glad to adopt it. Collection of radio licence fees by present methods is most difficult. It causes more complaint and upset than anything else in the department. But after two years of diligent search we have found no other practical way of collecting this fee, without an expenditure out of proportion to the amount to be collected.

Mr. LAWSON: There are thousands of things for which a licence fee is imposed, municipal, provincial and dominion; but no one in his senses would conceive of giving the right to enter a man's home and search, in order to collect it. Let me take a couple of examples that occur to me at the moment. In the municipality in which I live, and, I think, in every other municipality, you must have a licence to keep a dog. Would not any parliament be laughed to scorn that would pass legislation authorizing a warrant to search a man's home in order to ascertain whether he has a dog?

Mr. DUNNING: A radio does not go out walking like a dog.

Mr. LAWSON: Where I live you are not allowed to let a dog off your premises or be at large. Dogs can be kept in the house.

Mr. DUNNING: But they may be taken out on a leash.

Mr. LAWSON: That is true, but if the minister persists in this legislation I am afraid he may be taken out on a leash by the public before he is finished.

There are dozens of things for which one requires a licence, but parliaments do not give authority to issue search warrants to go into people's houses and search for such things. The minister says this is necessary if licence fees are to be collected. I do not think that is quite true. I admit that when it was necessary for the crown, in order to get a conviction for failure to have a licence, to prove that the person charged had either actually installed a radio or actually operated it, such powers might be required. But that is not going to be so in future. By this bill you are making it an offence for a man merely to be in possession of a radio. If he is in possession, the onus is on him to show that he was not operating it. All any police officer has to do is to peek through the window and he can see whether there is a radio on the floor.

Mr. HOWE: Is that a legal act, to peek through a window?

Mr. LAWSON: It is a legal act for a police officer.

Mr. HOWE: Not a very dignified one.

Mr. LAWSON: Unquestionably not. But, in fact, it is not an illegal act even for ordinary individuals, except under certain circumstances which I shall not at the moment describe. But in all seriousness, when you have made it an offence merely to have possession of a radio—

Mr. HOWE: But my hon. friend insists we must not. We are not doing that at the moment, presumably.

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, I presume you are. I never dreamed that you would think of changing. What I suggested was that you reconsider the clause so that if a man who is brought into court can satisfy the magistrate that he had not been operating the machine or that it had not been in use, then the magistrate should have power to say no offence had been committed. That is why I asked the minister to reconsider the section. After all, it is not a matter of life and death to this country if we fail to collect two or three per cent of all the radio licences.

Mr. HOWE: Or fifty per cent?

Mr. LAWSON: Fifty per cent is a very different matter, but with the amended legislation contained in this bill you have at your disposal the means of collecting ninety-five per cent of the radio licences without exercising the right to search a man's home. I want to say to the minister in all seriousness—

Mr. DUPUIS: Does the hon. member object to citizens who own radios being obliged to obtain their licences.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, Mr. Chairman, the intelligence of that question, having regard to the subject matter under discussion, deserves the intelligent answer of ignoring it.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, either the hon. gentleman wants the licence fees to be paid by people who own radios—

Mr. LAWSON: I submit that the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. DUPUIS: —or he does not.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must remember that another hon. member has the floor, and he must not interrupt without permission.

Mr. LAWSON: I just want to say to the minister that we should not lose sight of this fact, and I am not making this allegation against this government in particular. There is a terrible tendency in legislatures and parliaments in general in this country to-day to go on curtailing and interfering with what we have always regarded as the inherent right of a British subject, namely that his home is his castle. I for one will not allow these fundamental principles of rights to be interfered with lightly, and though I realize—

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LAWSON: No. Though I realize that in the general interests of the public it is necessary to have powers of search given where it is alleged that serious offences have been committed, nevertheless I think we ought carefully to restrict such powers of searching a man's home, and curb the extension of any such powers. I suggest to the minister that he consider very seriously the power which is being given in connection with this matter.

Mr. HOWE: If I may ask just one question, how could my hon. friend obtain legal evidence of the use of a radio or of the possession of a radio without going into the home?

Mr. LAWSON: I think it could be obtained in many ways. For example, a radio inspector calls at my house. He asks if I have a radio licence, and I say no; then he asks me if I have a radio. Ninety-nine per cent of the people will answer yes or no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAWSON: There are not many who are wise enough to say, "Mind your own business," and shut the door in his face.

Mr. HOWE: A very large percentage say exactly that.

Mr. LAWSON: All right, then; if a very large percentage say exactly that, nothing could be a clearer indication of the feeling of the people of this country in connection with this whole business of radio licences. I would ask the minister to bear in mind that neither this nor any other government on earth can maintain and enforce a law which has not behind it the great weight of public opinion, I do not care what your law may be.

To come back to the question, I suggest that your inspector or police officer, by looking in the window of a house, could see if there was a radio in that house. I suggest also that, for example, you get a record of every radio which is sold in Canada. I could go down to the bureau of statistics to-morrow morning and find out how many radios had been sold in the month of February of this year.

Mr. HOWE: You must still prove possession.

Mr. LAWSON: I quite agree that you must prove possession. You know a radio has been sold to a certain man, and you know his address. I really do not think it would be exceedingly difficult to get sufficient evidence to show that there was a radio in existence in that man's house. Remember, no one can now acquire a radio without some department of government getting a report of it. I still say that though there may be instances in which you would not be able to prove that a man had possession, as the lesser of two evils I believe the government would be well advised to abandon this granting of the power to search a man's house in connection with a radio.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to give my point of view, as I understand this legislation. Of course, to follow the argument of the hon. member who just spoke we must compare this with other legislation passed during other regimes. Just recall legislation passed in connection with customs and excise, for example. Much drastic legislation has been passed in that regard.

Mr. LAWSON: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPUIS: As far as I am concerned I am opposed to drastic legislation. We love liberty, and if there are people in this country who love liberty more than others it is those represented on this side of the house.

Mr. STEWART: Liberty to break the law.

Mr. DUPUIS: No, not liberty in that sense; liberty to do good.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is to judge?

Mr. DUPUIS: The judge is our conscience.

An hon. MEMBER: And if you have no conscience?

Mr. DUPUIS: As far as I am concerned I am ready to admit that I may have the least sensitive conscience on this side of the house, but still it might compare favourably with those of others. Let us come back to the point. This legislation seems a little drastic; I am ready to admit that, because of my love of liberty for the citizen.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the padlock law?

Mr. DUPUIS: We shall talk about the padlock law later on. The trend of thought and the policies of both parties since confederation have been based on experience. How could the Department of Transport deal with this matter of radio licences except by having regard to the experience of other departments, such as the Department of National Revenue, for instance. The hon. member who just spoke is an eminent lawyer from Toronto; I shall not call him ignorant, as he called me. I admire him for his ability, and he knows perfectly well that under the customs and excise legislation, for example, a person who has in his car smuggled goods or goods which are prohibited by law may have his car seized and confiscated as a result of having such goods in his possession. That is drastic law. That is a law which is repugnant to the spirit of liberty. Those are laws which have been passed by the party to which the hon. member belongs just as much as by the party now in power, and arise out of experience.

In the present instance I ask, as the Minister of Transport has done, how we can find out that a citizen has a radio set in his house, if we do not go into that house. How can the country collect the licence fee due it if the officer charged with the collection of fees cannot enter a house where he believes a fee is due? I am sure the hon. member who has just spoken is honest and wishes the citizens of Canada to pay their licence fees, but after listening to him our conclusion must be that he is trying to encourage the citizens of Canada to evade or to break the law. Otherwise the hon. member would agree with the minister, particularly in view of legislation adopted under other circumstances by this chamber. After all, I believe there is no citizen who is unwilling to pay a licence fee for his radio set in his house. If there are any such people, I believe we shall find them in the ranks of those who are encouraged by the observations of the hon. member, and who have a desire to evade the law. It may be that they would not be willing to permit the officer from the department to search their houses.

While I am on my feet may I say that I should have liked to see the licence fees for automobile radios reduced, because, so far as Quebec is concerned—and I believe all the provinces are in a somewhat similar situation—the people use their automobiles at most for only six months in the year. Consequently we would not avail ourselves of the use of our automobile radios to as great an extent, and I suggest it would be only fair to reduce the fee to one dollar a year. I made that submission before the committee which considered radio problems, and I believe it is my duty to repeat it in this committee. I am sure the Minister of Transport has discussed this very important matter with the cabinet, the members of which represent Canada from east to west. I have enough faith in my superiors to abide by their decisions because, after all, it is not more pleasant for a member of the cabinet than for a private member to adopt unpopular legislation. My personal opinion is that a reduction to one dollar in the case of automobile licence fees would have been preferable, and I believe that view is shared by many other people. However, the position is that the cabinet has decided it is not possible to do that and, having a fair understanding of the difficulties experienced by the members of this or any other cabinet, I am content to abide by their decision.

Mr. STEWART: The consideration of section 9 involves a review of the other sections of the measure, because in order to understand and appreciate this section we must read it in the light of other provisions. With that in mind I would refer the committee to paragraph (e) of section 4:

(e) prescribing that no radio receiving set or radio apparatus for installation or use as, or in, a private receiving station may be sold or serviced by any person until a licence is first obtained for such station.

When we refer to the opposite page in the bill we find that this is a new paragraph. I do not know whether the minister is considering an amendment or change in the section, or whether it stands for consideration.

Mr. HOWE: For the moment it stands.

Mr. STEWART: I thought so. I would point out that in that paragraph we have a new provision which would appear to be a very complete check on radio sets. The official of the department charged with the collection of licence fees has in his hands or at his command a source of information in addition to that which he had under the former act. If the section is to remain whereby one who goes to a house to make a temporary repair, no matter how trivial it may be upon a radio, must see that a licence has been taken out for that radio, then I do not see how anyone can escape without rendering it necessary to make use of the drastic remedy of a search warrant. The minister may point out that this provision appeared in substantially the same form in the previous act. I see that it has been redrawn, reworded and recast in some respects. My point is, however, that the minister has provided additional drastic and effective checks upon the issue of radio licences, and that the agent charged with the collection of licence fees now has at his disposal information he did not have before and information which, I submit, will enable him in a very large measure without a search warrant to find out whether or not licences have been taken out. I do not know what the minister proposes to do with respect to the section which stands, but I think it is fair at this stage to point out to the committee the situation which will exist if the section passes.

Mr. HOWE: Hon. members opposite are endeavouring to point out that this is all new legislation, and that it has never been in effect before. In reply to that may I say that I have in my hand a regulation signed by Alfred Duranleau, Minister of Marine, and dated at Ottawa on June 16, 1932. While I refer to this regulation I would ask the hon. member to cast his eye along paragraph (e) of section 4 to which he has referred. The regulation I have before me is in these words:

6. (c) No person shall sell any radio receiving set to any person for installation or operation until the purchaser has produced for inspection of the vendor his private radio receiving licence.

(d) No person shall service a radio receiving set until the owner thereof produces to such person his licence to operate such set.

My hon. friends opposite had exactly the same legislation. We have not changed their legislation one iota. In 1932 hon. gentlemen opposite enforced the collection of radio licence fees by search warrants and the sending of police officers into people's homes. This practice has continued since then. The practice of the department has been built up on what hon. gentlemen opposite started in 1932. We have not been able to find a substitute method which could be put into force without causing a considerable drop in revenue and tremendous injustice to those who pay willingly. There is a certain section of the population who will not pay unless there is some form of compulsion. I wish we could find some other system. Every year I bring the officers of the department charged with collecting these licence fees into conference to see if at the end of the year they have not found some variation to the existing system which will produce the same or better results. But we have not been able to find such a variation. We are not passing new legislation; we are continuing the legislation that was in force in 1932, 1933, 1934 and 1935 when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. The practice was started by hon. gentlemen opposite; it was built up by them, and we have been unable to find a substitute.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I cannot see anything particularly wrong with this section. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) has told us that ninety-nine per cent of the radio owners would give voluntary information when an official came to their homes.

Mr. LAWSON: I am sorry, but I did not make that statement.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: What percentage did the hon. member mention? I thought he said ninety-nine per cent.

Mr. LAWSON: The hon. member is right as far as the percentage is concerned, but the rest of the statement is wrong.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I believe that ninety-nine per cent of the people would answer truthfully when an officer came to them and asked if they had a radio. This section was intended to deal with the one per cent of the population who would not answer truthfully. It would be only in a few instances that this section would be enforced. I agree with the hon. member that ninety-nine per cent of the people would disclose that they had radios and, if they had no licence, would be ready to give excuses. It may be contended that we would not be losing much revenue by not enforcing this section, but that is not the question. If a radio owner can escape paying his licence fee, the news soon spreads and his neighbours will say, "If he does not pay, then we will not." The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) has said that paragraph (e) of section 4 would provide a complete check, but it seems to me that there are instances where that paragraph would not work. Suppose I buy a radio; the dealer who sells it to me would hand in my name and address. But suppose I use it for a month or so and give it to my neighbour, my brother or my mother; I am not a seller and I do not have to report to the department. Where would the check be?

Mr. STEWART: Would not your sister or your mother be a person?

Mr. ROBICHAUD: But I would not be a seller.

Mr. STEWART: It says, "By any person."

Mr. ROBICHAUD: "May be sold." When I buy it they have a check on me, but in the instance I mentioned I would not be the seller. I am giving away the radio.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Section 9 provides that a justice of the peace may issue a search warrant when there is reasonable ground for believing that a private receiving station has been established without a licence. I contend that this section places too great a power in the hands of a justice of the peace. In many municipalities the aldermen have the right to be appointed justices of the peace and from time to time these appointments are cancelled. Many people in this country look upon their home as a castle and they are going to resent these search warrants being issued. Some of them are likely to take exception to the search being made and we may have violence and other forms of trouble. We are granting the right to issue a search warrant for the collection of $2 or $2.50.

If it is thought necessary to have search warrants issued, then I submit the power to issue should be placed only in the hands of officials appointed by the federal Department of Justice. We should not have the promiscuous searching of homes when only $2.50 is to be collected. To my mind this provision is too wide. I have heard the discussion on both sides of the house in connection with this section, and according to hon. members opposite the principal reason for its being in this bill is the fact that in 1932, 1933, 1934 and 1935 the members of one political party enacted similar legislation and therefore it must be all right. This legislation is before us for revision and these various matters should be looked into. The question of whether this section is right or wrong should not be governed by the fact that similar legislation was enacted previously. I ask the minister to look at this matter fairly and not make it so easy to obtain a search warrant.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to make two suggestions to the minister. The first is whether it would not be better to change the phrase "justice of the peace" to "a police magistrate" or some person having some legal training. I am not familiar with the other provinces; but I know that in the province from which I come men are appointed as justices of the peace who have no legal training, who, in some instances, have little if any training of any sort, because in a small community some man must be found who can take oaths and that sort of thing, and a man is given the appointment. I know many such who—I say this with all deference are not in a position to pass judgment in a case like this as to whether a search warrant should or should not be issued. I appreciate the minister's difficulty; I recognize that you must prove possession, and to prove possession you must enter a person's home, but I believe it would lead to a lot of troublesome meddling if you gave that right to some men who have not any training and are perhaps not in a position to exercise fair judgment.

I also refer the minister to the clause, "he may grant a search warrant to any police officer or any officer appointed in that behalf by the minister." I can understand the latter phrase, "any officer appointed in that behalf by the minister," but as to "any police officer," I am not just clear why that should be permitted. I think it should read, "any police officer authorized by the minister or asked by those authorized to make collection of this licence fee"; any police officer at their request might act. But to allow any police officer authorized by any justice of the peace to do so might lead, it seems to me, to meddlesome trouble-making in small, minor districts where personalities and little local quarrels might intrude, and give the minister a great deal more trouble than he has, and I know he is anxious to avoid that. I therefore suggest that the phrase "justice of the peace" might be changed, unless there is some good reason why it should not, and that the other phrase should read, "any police officer appointed in that behalf by the minister," leaving out the first part of it, "any police officer".

Mr. LENNARD: The minister stated a few moments ago that this system was started by the late government in 1932. It does not matter to me for one moment whether it was started in 1932 or not. I might suggest that two wrongs do not make a right, and if the late government made a mistake in instituting the present system that is no reason why this government should carry it on. Personally I am absolutely opposed to the fee of $2.50 for a radio. I believe it would be well, if a yearly fee is to be charged, to charge $1 a year for the first radio and $2 or $2.50 for any additional radio in any one household. That would make it easier for the small householder.

I have another suggestion to offer, that it might be well to charge the tax on radios at their source; that is, charge the manufacturer or the selling source. It would cease to be a nuisance tax; the person buying a radio would be prepared to pay a certain price for it, and when that price was paid that would be the last expenditure he would have to make for it. I am opposed to this annual tax. It is a nuisance tax. The government well know it and they are sorry they are mixed up in it.

Mr. HOWE: As we are wandering somewhat afield, I would move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, $53,177.85.

Mr. TUSTIN: I notice an item of $2,808.75 for Kingston Cold Storage. Would the minister kindly explain that?

Mr. GARDINER: The payment that is shown opposite Kingston is the first instalment of payment to the Kingston Cold Storage.

Mr. TUSTIN: That is the new cold storage plant?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. TUSTIN: The same applies to the next item, Moncton?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; the same thing applies to Moncton.

Item agreed to.

Agricultural economics, $120,260.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What constitutes the increase in this branch?

Mr. SPENCE: What is "agricultural economics?

Mr. GARDINER: Salaries, permanent, $54,360, submitted for 1938-39; for 1937-38, $31,106.25. There is an increase of $23,253.75 this year. Then there are temporary salaries, last year, $24,535; this year, $28,160; an increase of $3,625. Other items:

	1937-38	1938-39	Increase
Telephones and telegraphs	$ 500	$ 1,200	$ 700
Equipment	2,075	3,850	1,775
Printing and stationery	6,278	13,140	6,862
Travelling expenses	7,627	17,750	10,123
Miscellaneous	785	1,800	1,015

The net increase is $47,353.75. The real explanation of the increase is an expansion of services.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this Mr. Booth's branch?

Mr. GARDINER: This is Doctor Booth's branch.

Mr. TUSTIN: Why should there be so large an increase as $10,000 in travelling expenses?

Mr. GARDINER: The increase in travelling expenses is largely accounted for by the fact that the staff is larger and that there are more people moving about in connection with those inquiries. Much of the increased economic work is due to the expansion of marketing activities.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister provides for a chief of markets information service. I assume this is a new appointment. Does this not come into conflict with the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. GARDINER: No, it does not.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Will the minister be good enough to give us an outline of the nature of the work performed by the economics branch of the department? There are two problems in which I am particularly interested. Speaking from the standpoint of Ontario, I believe that conditions are changing, and the old 100-acre farm seems destined to pass away. Has the economics branch considered what is the optimum size for an Ontario farm; that is, what size of farm is the most efficient unit of operation? Is it 100, 300 or 500 acres? Has any study been made along that line, and is any information available?

The agricultural implement companies are steadily tending towards the production of larger sized implements, looking in the direction of power farming, and this is leading to the larger sized unit of farm. If the department could work out an analysis of this question which would help to determine the size of farm that would be most profitable, I think it would be a sound contribution to Canadian agriculture.

There is one more problem to which the department might possibly give some attention. It is extremely difficult to secure any details in regard to the earnings of Canadian farmers. We have a record of the earnings of civil servants; we have a record of the wages of the men who work in industry; but because the farm situation is much more complex, and the farmer gets his living on the farm, it is extremely difficult to secure adequate information. It could be done only by a close and detailed analysis over a sufficient number of farms so that we might have some actual insight into the real situation. This would be valuable to agriculture in more ways than one, because it would give some idea of what the farmer actually earns, and it would be valuable information to some of the people engaged in other industries. Moreover, from the standpoint of the farmer himself, it would give him certain necessary information which would be helpful to him. Jim Hill once said that if you are in business and cannot find out what profit you are making, it would be better for you to go out of that business. If some of the farmers knew the real situation as it is to-day, they would be more keen in the pursuit of their own interests and find means of improving the conditions on their farms, and if other classes knew what the farmer was earning, then perhaps there might be a broader measure of sympathy in considering the problems of agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: The activities of the economics branch are to some extent along the line advocated by the hon. member. Most of the work undertaken is done on the invitation of, and in cooperation with the provincial departments. The reason for this is obvious. Much of the inquiry has to be made on lands that are privately owned, most of which are under the control of the provinces, and even where it is crown lands that are being examined they are under provincial control.

A few years ago there was in Ontario an investigation of the sort suggested by the hon. gentleman. It was carried out under the direction of the college of agriculture at Guelph, and as a result there is some information which has been regarded as standard up to the present time. It is possible that there is need for another inquiry into the size of farm that can be operated most successfully by the average farmer in Ontario, but any request for such an investigation would naturally come from the province. We set up the machinery for making inquiries of this kind largely because of the impossibility of nine different organizations in Canada conducting such work, and also because of the expense. There would be no way of getting proper comparisons between the activities carried on in one section and those carried on in another if the work were done under a number of different authorities. The department here has therefore attempted to build up an organization which can cooperate with the different provinces.

Some of the work being carried on at the present time is done in western Canada in connection with the land utilization plans, and inquiries are being conducted in cooperation with the governments of the different provinces. Economics research work covers a fairly wide field including research and general marketing problems; the study of costs of distributing fruits and vegetables; making an annual analysis of the farmers' cooperative marketing enterprises; cooperative purchase of farm supplies. Another phase of research in marketing is that of analysing marketing problems in Toronto and Ottawa, and studies are being conducted into the consumption of milk, cheese, cream and meats. The purpose is to appraise the facts affecting consumption of farm products. This division also directs research in land utilization in the west. These studies are confined to the drought area and are concerned with the economic utilization of land in Saskatchewan and Alberta. In addition to this, the division makes studies with regard to the cost of milk production in Ontario and factors affecting the price of Nova Scotia apples. They also get out a number of publications dealing with different subjects that have been investigated.

Mr. TUSTIN: What relationship has the chief of transportation to the economics branch?

Mr. GARDINER: Transportation is naturally a very important part of marketing. The product is drawn usually from a considerable distance; that is, the surplus that has to be sold and shipped is produced at a considerable distance from the place where it is consumed. There are very many problems affecting the farmers from one end of the country to the other, problems having to do with cost of shipment, particularly local freight costs, where, because of some new development, the freight is travelling in different directions from the route it usually follows. When these conditions arise we have someone available to make inquiries and, on behalf of the farming communities, to present the case properly to the different transportation organizations.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there any discrimination in the rates on fruits going from British Columbia into the prairie provinces as compared with the rates on fruit going from Nova Scotia, particularly in carload lots? I understand that in order to get the cheaper rate from British Columbia, the quantity must be something like 60,000 pounds, while for a similar rate from Nova Scotia, it is only about 30,000 pounds. Has there been any investigation in that respect?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure of the facts with regard to the regular rates as between the maritime provinces and the prairie country as compared with the rates from British Columbia to the prairies. Last fall we got a special rate on apples shipped from Nova Scotia to the prairies. By getting the special rate from Nova Scotia we were able to lay apples down in the prairies at a slightly lower cost than the apples from British Columbia cost.

Mr. SENN: I listened with interest to what the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) said concerning the condition of agriculture and the state of the farmers generally, and particularly in eastern Canada. It has been truly said that if the farmer were to keep books and charge up the same labour and other costs that manufacturing industries do, he would never put a plough in the ground, because he could never show a profit. But although he cannot show profits from a bookkeeping standpoint, he seems to get along, although I fully agree with what the hon. member said about his position at the present time.

How far does the federal administration deal with domestic marketing? I understand that, under the constitution, trade within the country is purely a provincial matter; yet it seems that our federal department does make investigations into domestic marketing. I should also like to know what attention is being paid by the department to cooperative efforts in agriculture. It seems to me a very important branch of marketing, and every effort by farmers towards cooperative marketing of their products should be fostered and assisted as far as possible by the federal department. What assistance is being given to farmers' cooperative organizations throughout the dominion?

Mr. GARDINER: There is some difficulty in regulating the marketing of farm products from a federal centre. This was realized when the Natural Products Marketing Act was referred to the supreme court. However, it is recognized by the provincial governments that a large part of the work, particularly that having to do with the regulations covering standardization of products, can be done better by a central organization than by nine different authorities. The result is that even where the constitution does not permit of our taking action to enforce certain regulations, the provinces cooperate with us by naming our officials to be their officials in many instances to do that work. While we pay these men who conduct the work, they are acting in some circumstances as appointees of the provinces as well. There has been no difficulty in preventing overlapping in connection with work of that kind. It is fully realized by the provincial authorities that if a product is produced in one province and sold in another there must be a good deal of cooperation.

As far as farmers' cooperatives are concerned there is no other work I can speak of at the moment than that of issuing information through this economics branch as to what has been done elsewhere in connection with the development of farmers' cooperatives. The work is being promoted in that manner in all parts of Canada where information is required through this branch.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I wish to make a plea for the potato growers of Prince Edward Island. For the last few years they have been largely dependent upon the growing of potatoes for which they have to find a market outside. Under a previous vote we found that there is quite a staff in Great Britain looking after the marketing of our produce. Last year I was over there, and it is a fact that we have to fight our way into that market, because the British farmer is looking out for himself and does not wish to allow any more of our products to come in than can be avoided. But they want to buy certain products, which we have in abundance. I refer to all kinds of grain. The British farmer does not want to use his land for growing grain because he can get better returns from live stock. He is willing to let us grow the grain here and ship it to him. But our potatoes have always been shut out of the British market; there has been a total embargo. I do not understand why we could not overcome that in some way. The reason the British Department of Agriculture gave is that we have the potato beetle in Canada, and it might be carried over there and the country become infested with it. I have pleaded before this that the department have a real investigation made into this question. I do not believe that the potato beetle could be introduced into Great Britain in that way. They receive potatoes shipped from different European countries where the beetle has been for years, and where, in fact, it is said to have originated. If the potato beetle could thrive in Great Britain, it would have been established there long ago, because these insects are great travellers.

In all fairness, in view of the amount of goods we purchase from Great Britain, the Department of Agriculture should again take up the question of the lifting of this embargo. A few years ago we made a determined effort to prove that it would be impossible for the potato beetle to be carried over there in potato sacks. In New Brunswick they even went so far as to put in brushing machines, the potatoes are carefully graded and brushed, every potato inspected, and the bags carefully inspected and sealed. Notwithstanding that, we were unable to get our potatoes admitted to the market. There must be some other reason than the potato beetle. I made extensive inquiries while I was over there, and the tremendous amount of potatoes imported into Great Britain was a surprise to me. In all fairness, Canadians are entitled to a share of that business. I believe if the matter were taken up by the minister, he might be able to obtain something in the way of a satisfactory agreement with them so that our potatoes might get into that market. We are endeavouring to process potatoes, putting them up in cans, and I understand that venture is meeting with a great deal of success, but still the same problem confronts the farmer. This year he had practically to give away his potatoes, to sell them below cost of production.

Mr. SPENCE: You grew too many; that was all.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): We grow potatoes because in the past they have been a good cash crop. I agree that perhaps we should get back more to the mixed farming that was carried on years ago, and the department of agriculture of Prince Edward Island has been urging the farmers to do so. But there were good years when the farmers made a good deal of money out of potatoes; they have started off on this line of farming, and they seem anxious to stick to it. There is another market that we are always hoping to regain; that is the Cuban market. I know it is not the function of the Minister of Agriculture to negotiate treaties with foreign countries, but it is a very important part of the work of the Department of Agriculture to endeavour to find markets for the products of the farmers of this country. I wish the minister would take up with his colleagues the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue the possibility of something being done to bring about a trade agreement with Cuba and some of those other countries in South America and the West Indies. I should like to hear from the minister what hopes he has of getting into the British market.

Mr. GARDINER: About a year and a half ago, the government of the province of New Brunswick sent a man to the South American countries in order to explore market possibilities there. At that time we did not have either the facilities or the funds to assist in that work, but last year we appointed a representative to go to the South American countries and explore the possibilities of creating a market for potatoes throughout all the countries in which it is possible for our seed potatoes to be sold. As a result of the activities of the provincial man or men, of our trade commissioners in the different countries and of the representative of our own department, who was able to discuss with these people not so much the marketing but the different varieties that we produce, the proper way to plant and care for them and how to fight the diseases that are associated with our potato crop, the sale of our seed potatoes in South America has been greatly promoted. Speaking from memory, I think somewhere in the neighbourhood of seven hundred thousand cases of potatoes were sold in South America following those activities. This year we have sent the same man to Europe, and more particularly to Great Britain, to carry on activities similar to those he carried on last year in South America and the West Indies.

Mr. SENN: Who was that man?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Arkell, who was previously in the department. I may say that I have had quite a number of communications from different countries in South America commenting very favourably upon the experience they had with our official while he was there, not from the point of view of promoting trade but because he was able to discuss with them general agricultural problems, and to give them the benefit of the experiences of the department here in different lines of agriculture, more particularly in connection with the growing of potatoes. As I said, within the last two weeks he left for Great Britain, and our agricultural commissioner left this week for the same country. These two gentlemen will immediately take up such problems as those just referred to by the hon. member for Prince, and I am sure that some beneficial results will come from the activities now being carried on.

Mr. SENN: I was greatly interested in the statement just made by the minister, to the effect that other gentlemen, in addition to those who were over there last summer to investigate marketing conditions in Great Britain and other parts of the empire, have been sent—on a fairly good salary, I believe—to investigate certain matters. I just asked the minister the name of one of these gentlemen, and I find that I know him of old. He is an estimable gentleman who at one time occupied a very high position in the Department of Agriculture. But I wonder if it was necessary to undertake this extra expense at this time in connection with these activities. Not only have we had a commission investigating marketing in Great Britain; we have our trade commissioners there and in other parts of the world, whose duty it is to undertake just the sort of work that Mr. Arkell has been called upon to do. It seems to me that the work is more or less overlapping, and it would appear hardly necessary to make such extra expenditure for this purpose. However, I suppose it is impossible at the moment to have anything done about the matter.

Before I sit down I should like to ask the minister one other question. I understand that the set-up of the marketing division has already been discussed to a certain extent; but in the estimates I notice provision for an assistant director of marketing services, at a fairly good salary, under this branch of agricultural economics. In addition, I was going to ask the minister, when the administration vote was up, about the provision for a special poultry commissioner, also at a very fair salary. In the old days we had gentlemen at the heads of the different branches of agriculture. We had a dairy commissioner, a live stock commissioner, a head of the sheep and swine division, and so on. I do not see those names mentioned in the present set-up. I am wondering if these gentlemen have been demoted or, if not, just what their position is to-day. They were perhaps the best available men within the department at the time, and it may be that their positions are differently described to-day; but in any event I think the minister might at this time give us some idea of the standing of these gentlemen, whether they are still heads of the different departments, or whether they have been absorbed in the general rearrangement and have no official standing at the present time.

Mr. GARDINER: In reply to the first part of my hon. friend's remarks, the part of the work which cannot be done properly by officials located at particular points, whether agricultural or trade commissioners, is the matter of checking on efforts that are being put forth by those selling similar commodities in other parts of the world. For example, Mr. Arkell has just been in South America, where he found that most of the seed potatoes which do not come from Canada or the United States come from Holland, Germany or some other European country. We have found that there are certain advantages—at least he and the others who have gone to South America have so found—in the Canadian seed. It has been found also that some excellent varieties are produced in some of the other countries and shipped to South America for seed. Part of the work we intend to do in Europe is to have these men, particularly those working under Mr. Allen, who has been sent over there recently and who is an expert in many of these lines, examine into the activities carried on in these countries and, if any varieties or methods can be found that might be used to advantage in Canada, to have them tried out on our experimental farms here and, if possible, to develop those lines in Canada. Mr. Arkell, having examined into the activities in the South American countries will, in turn, examine into the activities in the countries in which those varieties of seed originated, and will be in a much better position to give advice to the department as to what we ought to do by way of experimentation than would any individual who may be established permanently in any one place. It is work of that kind which is being done by Mr. Arkell, and any others who may be sent. It is not a matter of inquiring into marketing possibilities, in the sense that we sent a committee last year to England for the purpose of making inquiries; rather it is an inquiry into the agricultural possibilities, generally, a matter of working in cooperation with our commissioners and bringing back information which can be made available to organizations in this country.

As I said at the beginning of the discussion on the estimates we have set up four different divisions. There is the marketing division, the production division, the experimental division and the research division, and there is a director for each of them. In so far as any of the original branches of the department can be associated with one or another of these divisions, this is done. A section of a branch which is not properly allied with the work being done in connection with marketing, for example, but more closely allied with production, is placed in the production division. But, so far as economics is concerned, may I say in reply to an inquiry which was made that the assistant director is Doctor Booth, who was previously in charge of the economics branch of the department. His classification in the department, so far as salary and general position are concerned, is exactly the same now as it was before.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What classification has Mr. Arkell?

Mr. GARDINER: He is just engaged temporarily from time to time, at a certain wage, and is given expenses in addition to his salary.

Mr. SENN: I do not wish to take up too much time, nor do I wish to criticize the set-up of the department or the work that is being done. In fact, I believe most of the work is being carried on in an excellent manner and, further, I believe that a good deal of the work is necessary. But I still cannot understand why it is necessary to send special representatives to these foreign countries and to the British market when we already have estimable gentlemen there representing the Department of Trade and Commerce whose specific duty it is to look into the very matters that Mr. Arkell and the other special representatives who are sent over there look into. It seems to me there must be a certain amount of overlapping, and if there is any overlapping it may be that any misunderstanding which may have existed between the departments will continue to exist. When the minister was speaking about Mr. Arkell he used the expression, "or any others who may be sent." Does the minister anticipate that any other men, whether they have special qualifications or not, are likely to be sent within the near future to assist the organization already in existence in Great Britain and other countries? Will they be undertaking special missions of the kind Mr. Arkell pursued, in days gone by and is pursuing at the present time? If anything of that sort is anticipated, I think the minister should frankly tell the committee about it.

Mr. GARDINER: We do not have anything in mind at this time in addition to what is now being carried on in that direction. But, as a result of information we get back from people there, it may be necessary to send experts in certain lines.

Mr. LENNARD: At page 104 of the report it is indicated that there was a study of the cost of milk production in Ontario in 1937. What are the results of that study?

Mr. GARDINER: The investigation in connection with milk in Ontario is still continuing, and the results are not yet available for publication.

Mr. STEWART: I have listened to the minister's observations respecting the reorganization of his department. To what extent have the activities of that department been expanded? Am I correct in assuming the work that is now being done was, in some measure at least, performed in the past, but through different agencies, and that he has just rearranged and realigned duties which were formerly assigned to other employees or officials? To what extent is he embarking on any new or untried policy which was not, at least to some extent, being carried on before he undertook to reorganize? We have heard a great deal about reorganization, reclassification and rearrangement. As I understand the situation, practically all of the work now being done was done before. Possibly it was done by other officials, but what I do want to have is a concise and clear explanation of the expansion of or any new development in the work of his department which has followed or will follow as a result of the reorganization.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It is reconsideration, not reorganization.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it will be remembered by hon. members that on the first evening we discussed the estimates of the Department of Agriculture I explained that the reorganization was for the convenience of the administration in operating the department. The Department of Agriculture, like other departments of government in Canada, has grown up since confederation—

Mr. SPENCE: And is still getting bigger.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, bigger and better. I believe other ministers in the department have had in mind the thought that there should be some reorganization. When I took over the department I was satisfied that was so, and the reorganization was done in as direct a manner as was possible. We took longer in bringing it about than I had hoped would be necessary, but I believe that was to be expected in dealing with an organization as widespread as the dominion Department of Agriculture. The main expansion has been in connection with marketing activities. Other branches have been made to relate themselves to our greater efforts in connection with marketing. As I said the other evening, in the first place we did research work to discover other organizations, whether in Canada or out of it, with which we might associate ourselves in order to bring to bear upon agriculture in this country all the scientific and other discoveries it was possible to find in connection with agriculture.

Mr. STEWART: Is that new?

Mr. GARDINER: No; that is not a new undertaking, but we did that in the first instance. We carried our activities to the experimental farms, as has always been done. We are still carrying on our activities in connection with production, as has always been done, but we are going one step farther and are emphasizing the necessity for greater care in connection with marketing.

I agree with the statement made the other evening by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) that the most important efforts along that line will have to be made in Canada itself. The greater part of our farm products is sold and marketed in this country. Only cheese, wheat and possibly apples and bacon are sold in considerable volume, as compared with entire production, outside Canada. For that reason our activities will be continued in Canada in connection with promoting the sale of these products and increasing consumption by producing better standards. I may say that I know of no activity, either within or without Canada, that has to do with the selling of products. We have no sales organization. In so far as agriculture is concerned, our activities outside Canada have been expended in another direction. We have sent overseas a man who is recognized throughout Canada as an agricultural expert. He has the ability to go into any agricultural educational institution on the other side, acquaint himself with their activities and make known to our agricultural colleges and other institutions the possibilities of growing certain products now being produced on the European continent and in Great Britain. This gentleman speaks two or three of the languages of the people in those countries. I believe having a man in touch with activities on the other side is a new idea.

Mr. STEWART: I believe the minister appreciates and sympathizes with the objectives of the Natural Products Marketing Act. That act had as an objective the improvement of the quality of our products at home and the providing of better marketing facilities abroad. Have the objectives of that act been kept in mind and has a way been found to carry them into effect? That legislation had a rather unfortunate fate before the courts, but I believe the minister will agree that its objectives were sound and in the interests of agriculture. Perhaps the minister has studied other methods by which the same objectives could be reached. Has that been the policy of the department or have the objectives of that act been scrapped altogether? Are we proceeding along new lines to attain the desirable results which were in view when that legislation was enacted?

Mr. GARDINER: Earlier in the afternoon we listened to a discussion on dairying matters as they were related to the Natural Products Marketing Act. For example, the province of Ontario carried on certain activities in the latter part of 1935 and in 1936 in connection with the cheese producers' organization. These activities were carried on under the Natural Products Marketing Act. This organization was empowered to charge five cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. STEWART: That was provincial, absolutely.

Mr. GARDINER: Originally it was federal. When the Natural Products Marketing Act was declared ultra vires, the cheese producers' organization made application to this government for a grant of $8,000 in order to continue the activities started under the act but for which collections could not be made. We had to accept some responsibility as a federal government for what had been set up under the Natural Products Marketing Act, and we made a grant of $5,000, which was used by the organization to assist in paying an official whom they had sent over to Great Britain. We did not give a grant in 1937 as we did not assume any responsibility for that year. After our act was declared ultra vires, the provincial government passed an act empowering producers' organizations in Ontario to collect fees similar to those which had been collected under the Natural Products Marketing Act. I am not sure whether we have had applications for assistance since then, but I know none has been given. The report which was read to the committee this afternoon indicated that the $5,000 was paid in 1937, but it was paid in our financial year 1936-37. It just happened to go into their treasury after December 31, 1936.

I think this illustrates what has been done as a result of the finding in connection with the Natural Products Marketing Act. The province of Ontario has taken action in connection with cheese and, I believe, some other commodities. New Brunswick and British Columbia have both taken action in connection with certain products. These three provinces have taken action which makes it possible for certain products to be marketed under schemes similar to those set up under the Natural Products Marketing Act. So far as the federal department is concerned, we realize that we have certain obligations, particularly in connection with the marketing of products in other countries and interprovincially.

Mr. STEWART: And in grading.

Mr. GARDINER: We have a perfect right to do that under the constitution. We have endeavoured to create the best possible sentiment among our customers by seeing to it that they get a superior commodity; that is, we are trying to standardize and raise the quality of our products. We are trying to place in the hands of the consumer a product with which he will be satisfied, no matter what may be the marketing facilities which place that product at his disposal. I believe we are getting fairly good results from these activities.

Mr. BROOKS: I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) in connection with the efforts being made to sell potatoes in South America and Cuba. The hon. member asked the minister what possibilities there were of selling potatoes in Cuba, but I do not believe the minister gave an answer. The potato growers of the maritime provinces are very much interested in the possibilities of selling potatoes in Cuba. During the last few years a certain portion of the press in the maritime provinces has been stating that a great market for our potatoes exists in Cuba. Then we hear that the farmers in Cuba can raise enough potatoes to supply that market. We hear also that the reason why we are not selling potatoes to Cuba is that a dumping duty has been placed against Cuban sugar. I think it would be a splendid thing if the minister would tell the committee, and through the committee the people of these provinces, whether there is a market in Cuba for New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island potatoes. I should also like to know if Mr. Arkell, who was investigating conditions in South America, Cuba and the West Indies, has made a report as to the prospect of future sales of seed and table potatoes in those countries. It is all very well for the agent to go down and investigate; but unless the people are informed as to the result of this investigation and unless he finds some market for their product, I would not consider that his activities had been of very much use. I know we have been selling a great many seed potatoes in South America recently; but in the maritime provinces there are not so many producers of seed potatoes as there are producers of the table potato, and what agitates the minds of most of the farmers in connection with the sale of the potato is not only the seed potato but also the table potato, of which, as everyone knows, we in the maritime provinces can raise the best in Canada, possibly in the world. If the minister would kindly answer these questions, I think it would satisfy many of the farmers in my own province of New Brunswick and in the neighbouring province of Prince Edward Island.

I should also like to know whether the department at Ottawa is cooperating with the departments in the various provinces. New Brunswick, for instance, sends agents down south nearly every year, and we hear of the federal department sending their agents there also. It seems to me that if there were cooperation it would not be necessary for so many of these men to be travelling all over the world at the expense of the federal and provincial governments. Fewer men and better results would be better for the governments, for the country and for the farmers who are more interested in selling their products than in reports.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Arkell, who was down there last year and made inquiries with regard to the possibilities of markets for both table potaoes and seed potatoes in the South American and West Indian countries, reported back to the government here first what he found in those countries. Then he went from here to the different capitals of the provinces where potatoes are grown in great volume, but particularly to the capitals of the maritime provinces, made separate reports to their governments, and met the representatives of different organizations that are interested in the marketing of potatoes in those countries.

Mr. BROOKS: Was this report published?

Mr. GARDINER: His report has not been published, but any of his findings are available to the authorities in the provinces. In addition to that, he made reports to us somewhat along the lines of the discussion which has now started, that is reports as to whether it would be advisable in years to come to promote the sale of seed potatoes in certain countries as against promoting the sale of table potatoes. There are certain parts of South America where, we understand from the reports made to us, seed potatoes can be grown to advantage. When those countries develop the growing of seed potatoes we, of course, being further away from those countries, shall probably find that we shall lose a market rather than gain one by promoting, for the time being, the sale of seed potatoes there. We are benefiting as much as we can by information of that kind in directing others who may be intending to develop markets in any particular countries in South America.

In addition to that, the men who have been sent down by the different provinces, particularly by New Brunswick, have been sent to promote the sale of the potatoes of their particular province in South American countries. When our potatoes have gone down there, there have developed, in connection with certain varieties, certain diseases. The provincial authority has then made application to the federal authority, as the latter is the only authority which has experts who can go down to deal with a problem of that kind, and we have now a man in South America dealing with a disease which developed there in connection with potatoes shipped from the maritimes, a disease which, I understand, did not prevail in this country before the potatoes went to South America, but has developed within the potatoes there with new conditions existing. We have found, from the first report received from our representative, that he has proven to the satisfaction of the South American people that this disease did not have its origin in Canada, because the same disease is prevalent among potatoes the seed of which was obtained from European countries.

It is that kind of work which is being done. If we did not have representatives down there to deal with the matter on the spot, at the moment the disease develops, it would be very simple for other countries to convince people there that this disease was introduced through the introduction of a new variety of potatoes from Canada, and if that were the case we should immediately find ourselves in exactly the same position in those countries as we are in Great Britain, by reason of their objection to our potatoes because we have potato bugs in this country. We do not want a situation of that kind to develop, so we think it is good business from the agricultural point of view to send men down, when the provinces ask that they be sent, in order to check up on any diseases which develop in connection with any province.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, now, will the minister kindly answer the question with reference to the possibility of markets in the island of Cuba? In the maritime provinces, because we used to sell great quantities of potatoes to Cuba, there prevails an impression that that market, were it not for certain duties, would be open for our potatoes and could take very large quantities.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I said some little time ago that there was really no overlapping between our department and the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I do not want to get into a discussion with regard to trade agreements. In so far as trade agreements and tariffs on different items affecting agricultural products are concerned, I do not intend, under these estimates, to get into a discussion of that question. I can only say that, as I understand it, there is a question in the minds of potato growers in the maritime provinces as to which line of development would be most beneficial to them, whether to promote largely the sale of seed or to promote mainly the sale of table potatoes. With that discussion the people of the maritimes are much more familiar than

I am. There is a question in the minds of all those who go down there as to whether the people in Cuba can maintain the production of potatoes at the present level as a result of having imported into that country seed potatoes from Canada and other northern countries. I am not at the moment in a position to answer the question as to which would pay the maritime people best. At the present time there is a market for both kinds of potatoes.

Mr. HAYHURST: I commend the Minister of Agriculture for the addition to the program this year, because it seems to me that this is the psychological time to develop our marketing facilities, especially in Great Britain and the countries of northwestern Europe. As the committee knows, those countries are suffering to-day from drought and will need this year a great many more of our products than formerly; and no doubt next year, when we look over the departmental reports, we shall find that the Department of Agriculture will have a glowing statement showing the tremendous increases of exports, especially to Britain and Germany, if they develop those markets, because the demand exists, the people need the goods, and anybody can sell them to them. This is the psychological moment to press this sales agency idea, because we are getting away from that conception of the past when holding policies of various organizations in Canada more or less restricted the purchasing power of those other countries. Because of the antipathy towards us, these people tightened their belts and used black instead of white bread. To-day we have an entirely different picture facing us. It seems to me that these agencies have been organized at the right time, and now we want results.

The minister has mentioned four services; Marketing, production, experimentation and research work. As far as possible we should avoid overlapping between any of these services such as experimentation and research. The provinces are at present spending a tremendous sum on these services, but naturally the federal department could spend money profitably on marketing. We know this is likely to be our banner year, especially in western Canada, and we shall have potatoes, wheat, oats and other commodities in abundance. We want a market for these products, and this is the psychological moment for these efforts to be made. I suggest that a genuine effort be made to promote good will in obtaining these markets. The government should expand its services at this time. I also recommend to the minister a proper coordination of these various services so that we may obtain from time to time the knowledge we require of what is going on. We trust that next year, through the increase in the grant, some good will result. The government has a glorious opportunity now, and I am sure that all hon. members, no matter to what party they belong, wish Canada prosperity. This is probably our year for obtaining it. As I say, the government has an excellent opportunity, and we hope that the best possible use will be made of the grant. We know that we can produce enough, but marketing is the end to which attention must be paid. That is the be all and end all of the industry.

Mr. GARDINER: I wonder if the committee would pass item 7? We have been discussing item 10 for the last hour.

Mr. LENNARD: With regard to the production of milk in Ontario, can the minister tell us when that investigation started, how long it will last, and who is carrying it on?

Mr. GARDINER: Investigations with regard to milk in Ontario have been going on for two years. They are carried on under a cooperative arrangement involving the government of Ontario, the agricultural college at Guelph and the Department of Agriculture here, through the economics branch. It is being directed by our official here, and a similar official in Toronto, and will continue for a number of years. The investigation is one that requires records over a term of years if it is to be beneficial. I am not in a position to say how many years it will take to get sufficient records to be really valuable.

Mr. LENNARD: Is it being carried out on different farms throughout the country or merely at experimental stations?

Mr. GARDINER: On different farms throughout the province in cooperation with the farmers and with their consent.

Mr. LENNARD: Just a stated number of farms in different localities?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a considerable number. It is not a matter of dividing it up among municipalities and saying that each municipality shall have so many. It is a matter of groups of farmers.

Mr. LENNARD: Different breeds?

Mr. GARDINER: The breed does not enter into the checking, but certain herds are checked.

Mr. MARSH: Item No. 7 calls for $120,260 for the pursuit of agricultural economics. I take it that this is a necessary item, or this and other governments would not vote money for it year after year. The number of employees has been increased from twelve to twenty and the amount of money by $47,000. I was not altogether satisfied with the minister's reply to an hon. member who spoke a few minutes ago as to the extent to which this will be a new service to the farmer and the extent to which it is an elaboration of an already existing service. Will the farmer on the back road feel the impact of any part of this $47,000?

Mr. GARDINER: This is based on activities begun in 1922. I believe the branch was set up about that time. Of course, it has been developing from then until the present day. The increase in staff this year is due to the demands that are being made on the branch from different parts of Canada, and the increase from $72,000 to $120,000 represents as nearly as possible the increase in activities along the lines we followed previously. We have been increasing activities in different parts of the country.

Mr. LENNARD: Has there been any progress in connection with the new terminal market in Toronto?

Mr. GARDINER: As my hon. friend knows, an investigation was carried out and a report made to those interested in the market.

Mr. SENN: Have they asked for any assistance from the federal department in connection with the new terminal market in that city, and is there any intention on the part of the department to give that assistance?

Mr. GARDINER: We have no request for assistance of the kind indicated. We have requests for service, and we give whatever service we can, such as investigations and reports.

Mr. PERLEY: As the minister knows, we are faced with many economic problems in Saskatchewan, and I would say that some of the policies adopted by the present government will add to those problems. Under this item, what sort of work is being carried on in the western provinces? We have been discussing the marketing of our products and the question of advertising in other countries. Last fall at about the time that Professor Shaw was overseas on this work under the new branch—

Mr. GARDINER: Would my hon. friend mind leaving that until we are on that item? It is item 12.

Mr. PERLEY: Under the item at present before the committee we have discussed nearly everything in the line of marketing. The discussion has been along the lines of advertising our agricultural products. At that time the wheat board initiated a very extensive campaign in Great Britain advertising Canadian wheat. I understand Professor Shaw is a member of the wheat board as well. I am not suggesting that he is drawing two salaries, but the minister might explain his position. Did Professor Shaw, during his time over there last fall, take any part in this advertising scheme initiated under the wheat board?

Mr. GARDINER: Dean Shaw, as he was at the time of his appointment, was appointed to the wheat board in 1935, and has continued as a member of that board. At present, while he is a member of the board, he is drawing only his salary as director of marketing in the Department of Agriculture. While he was in England last year he was, of course, a member of the board. The board set up an advertising program which was being carried on in connection with wheat prior to the time Dean Shaw went to England. These activities were going on when he was there, but not under his direction as director of marketing in the Department of Agriculture. The wheat board is operating under the special act which sets it up. It is operating through the Department of Trade and Commerce, both in Canada and outside.

In regard to the activities of the economics branch in Saskatchewan, I can only say that its main activities there at the present time have to do with the land utilization investigations being made throughout the drought area of Saskatchewan.

Mr. TUSTIN: Why should there be such a large item for temporary assistance? I notice that the salaries have increased from $32,625 to $54,360, and temporary assistance has increased by about $4,000. Why should such a large item be carried as temporary assistance?

Mr. GARDINER: In this branch, the same as any other, all employees who are taken on are temporary at first. The fact that we are taking on a number of new employees naturally makes the temporary list rather large.

Mr. SPENCE: Are these temporary employees marketing experts?

Mr. GARDINER: Not necessarily, in connection with this work. These men are taken on, and even if they are going to be permanent eventually they have to be temporary when appointed. All who are taken on for a short period are temporary.

Mr. THOMPSON: Are the appointments made by the civil service commission?

Mr. GARDINER: All these appointments are made by the civil service commission.

Mr. BARBER: The minister has referred to officials travelling to different parts of the globe. Owing to the increase in travelling expenses in connection with this department we might almost say it is becoming a roving department. I believe I am right in saying—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that the estimate for travelling expenses alone for the Department of Agriculture amounts to about $965,000, or an increase of $93,000 over last year. That is over ten per cent of the total estimates. Is it the policy of this government that this shall continue to increase each year? Can we expect an estimate of a million dollars next year for travelling expenses in the one department?

Mr. GARDINER: If I remember the figures correctly, the Department of Agriculture was spending about $11,000,000 back in 1928 or 1929. It is one department that was cut very heavily by the former government, probably more than any other department. Apparently the late government did not consider agriculture of as great importance as the present government does. We have been gradually building the department up; it is not yet back where it was when we left it in 1930.

Mr. BARBER: Building it up by increasing travelling expenses. I notice there appears to be a decrease from the estimates of last year. We must bear in mind that the supplementaries are yet to come down, which will no doubt increase this item, which now reaches $965,000 for travelling expenses alone.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was somewhat surprised to hear the minister make the rather facetious reference he did—I am sure it must have been by way of humour—when he mentioned that the previous administration had not quite as high a regard for agriculture as this administration has. He must have been listening to the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman).

Mr. GARDINER: He expressed a general opinion.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would point out that there is among farmers in eastern Canada a growing feeling that much more attention should be paid to them and their problems than is paid by this House of Commons. Although we spend in the neighbourhood of half a billion dollars here, only one-fiftieth of the entire expenditure goes to agriculture. It is not much wonder that the farmers of eastern Canada are asking members of parliament what is being done for eastern Canadian agriculture. Something must be done soon to help many of these specialty lines of agriculture in which eastern Canada is so much interested. I am sure there is not one hon. member from an agricultural constituency in eastern Canada who begrudges the amounts given from time to time to agricultural pursuits in other parts of Canada. And while I have never advocated a rising tide of expenditure, but rather the opposite, I think there are many departments of government which might give way and have their estimates reduced and thereby allow more to be spent upon the development of eastern Canadian agriculture. One particular problem in many ridings similar to my own is in connection with vegetables. Vegetables may not seem so very important to the minister, but I point out to him this cogent fact, that the problem of the vegetable grower in Ontario and elsewhere is one which ultimately must be met.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but fruit and vegetables come under the next item, No. 10.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Minister of Agriculture looks very much interested, and perhaps the committee will allow me to finish my remarks in regard to agricultural economics. I am speaking more particularly on the subject of research. In any event I may point out to the minister that so far as the vegetable growing industry in eastern Canada is concerned there is a feeling that these growers do not always get a square deal. I think some of this money which is voted from time to time for research might well be applied to the vegetable industry in the province of Ontario and elsewhere. Among their other grievances the vegetable growers feel that the statistics with regard to their industry, for instance, do not indicate the real importance of that industry to Canada as a whole, and I would suggest to the minister that this is one way in which a substantial portion of the money voted for agricultural economics might very well be spent. I draw that to the attention of the minister in all fairness, and I hope when he has further remarks to make with regard to the contrast as compared with the administration of previous years, he will consider that, after all, in those years conditions generally were somewhat different from the conditions that exist to-day.

Mr. GOLDING: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAYDON: We did not have the expanding revenues of the present day; nor did we have the expanding expenditures, I would point out to the hon. member for Huron-Perth. Having regard to our expenditures throughout Canada as a whole, it seems to me that under this administration the Department of Agriculture has not received a fair proportion of that increased expenditure.

Mr. MASSEY: On March 16 the hon. member for Essex East introduced a resolution in this house, the latter part of which I should like to read. I shall not read the preamble, which is a tome in itself, but the latter part states:

> Therefore be it resolved,—that, in the opinion of this house, the government
> (a) should consider the necessity for improved marketing facilities;
> (b) should consider the need for providing adequate storage, drying, government grading and inspection facilities in order that the quality of the corn be improved and its production increased.

That motion was agreed to, and I think it would be of interest to the committee if the minister would state what has since been done in this connection.

Mr. MARTIN: Before the minister replies, perhaps I, as the mover of that resolution, might be given an opportunity to say a word. When the resolution was brought forward, the Minister of Agriculture was not in his place, and it will be remembered that the Minister of Trade and Commerce accepted the resolution in so far as it dealt with the grading, inspection and weighing of corn.

Before the Minister of Agriculture replies, I may say also that the board of grain commissioners have made arrangements pursuant to the observations of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and will this month, I am advised, visit Canada's outstanding riding, Essex East, which is the greatest county in Canada, to consider and to implement the observations made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I thank the hon. member for Greenwood, who represents a city riding and who has not the opportunity that is afforded me and many other hon. members, to represent so many farmers in this country, for making the observations he did make, because it will give the Minister of Agriculture a chance to tell the committee first of all that he had the opportunity of reading my speech, and, second, of telling the committee briefly what his department considers to be the importance to this country of the great corn growing industry of western Ontario.

Mr. GARDINER: One of the few speeches I have read this session was the speech of the hon. member for Essex East in regard to corn. Ever since I came to this house the hon. member has been extremely persistent in placing before the government the requirements of Essex East in relation to corn. We had two different inquiries made in that section before the resolution was moved in the house, and as a result of those inquiries we have improved our methods of assistance in regard to the production of better seed in that area, and the improvement of the seed generally that is being used by farmers in that section of Ontario. In addition, we have adopted a certain policy in connection with the encouragement of the establishment of driers, somewhat on the basis of our policy in connection with cold storage warehouses, which was discussed earlier in the day. As yet no desire has been expressed to have that policy developed in that section, but we hope something along that line may be done during this summer. So far as this department is able to cooperate with the Department of Trade and Commerce in promoting the marketing of corn in those counties, we shall be pleased to do so.

In reply to the hon. member for Peel, I would say that last summer I had the privilege of driving through Essex East, Kent and other sections where vegetable growing is a very important branch of agriculture. I quite agree with him that very few people outside that section of Canada realize the importance of the vegetable growing industry both to that section and to Canada as a whole. I am sure that when we come to item No. 10, which has to do with fruit and vegetables, the hon. member will be desirous of obtaining further information.

Mr. GRAYDON: When the Minister of Agriculture says that after going through the county of Essex and adjacent parts of Ontario, his understanding of the great vegetable growing industry was very largely increased, he greatly encourages me. May I suggest that to conclude his investigation, and as the crowning point in the formation of his opinion, he should drop into the county of Peel some time and look it over. Then he will become convinced beyond all shadow of doubt that the vegetable growing industry really amounts to something in this country.

Mr. SENN: The minister has been very agreeable to-night, and I think the chairman has been quite lenient in allowing such a wide range of discussion. I did want to have something to say about what the minister said with regard to the cheese producers' association, and I should have liked to ask further questions about the reorganization. The minister gave us a good deal of information about this reorganization, but if he would prefer that I wait and ask the questions on another item, perhaps when the last item of his department comes up, I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not want to hold up the item for any length of time, but it seems to me the government might give us some intimation as to what steps have been taken towards greater coordination as between the federal and provincial departments of agriculture. I think this might well come under the agricultural economics branch, since in the last half hour we have discussed so many matters that it would seem that almost anything might come under this branch. I believe some time ago in Ontario it was even suggested by the premier of the province that the provincial departments of agriculture, labour and health might be taken over by the government at Ottawa.

Mr. MARTIN: Who made that suggestion?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The premier of Ontario. Whether or not after that time he lost confidence in this government I do not know, so I cannot say whether that is still under consideration by the government at Queen's Park. It at least gives rise to concern as to what might be done by way of coordination of effort. I believe it was the intention of those who drew up the British North America Act that the provinces would have to do with the production and the dominion would have to do with the distribution of agricultural products. It was understood, I believe, that the different provinces would establish the departments for that purpose. One can readily see from the reports given to the house that the dominion department has gone far afield from what was considered the original intent under the British North America Act. In these days almost as much consideration is given to production by the dominion department. I am not suggesting for one moment that consideration of production should be confined entirely to the provinces, but I feel that in order to standardize our grades it is necessary that there should be coordination of the efforts of the provinces. The minister has not given us any indication as to what steps, if any, have been taken, or what consideration has been given to a closer coordination of efforts of the different departments. While travelling expenses have been paid for efficient officers who have travelled far afield to study agricultural economics in other countries, it is my belief that more attention should be given to certain conditions in connection with research which could be carried on in Canada.

According to the minister's report I realize that many matters were considered by this branch. Among other things he has mentioned the utilization of lands in Saskatchewan and Alberta, the consumption of agricultural products in representative cities, a study of the terminal market facilities for fruits and vegetables in the city of Toronto, and an analysis of farm loan experience in Saskatchewan. It would appear that the economics branch deals with the broader interests of Canadian agriculture rather than simply the matter of overseas marketing. I believe the minister would do well to tell us what was done in connection with cooperation with the provinces with respect to local production and distribution, especially in view of the fact that such a high percentage of our market is in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: This whole matter was discussed under item No. 3, the vote dealing with the advisory committee on agricultural services. That committee is set up, meets at least twice a year and it is discussing these questions continuously. I do not wish to discuss a matter which has been discussed before under the proper item.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The report of last year makes specific reference to the economics branch. Surely the minister would not imply that all these matters are considered under item No. 3 in the estimates where an expenditure of only $5,000 is involved? The matter I have in mind involves an expenditure of $120,000. Surely the item of agricultural economics was not fully discussed under item No. 3?

Mr. GARDINER: The economics branch is concerned only in so far as it may prevent overlapping with economics investigations that are carried on. Those are carried on in cooperation with the provincial governments. It is only on the request and in cooperation with them that these investigations are carried on.

Mr. GRAYDON: I notice in the details at page 55 of the estimates with respect to agricultural economics that there is an increase in staff from twelve to twenty, and an additional salary vote from $55,641.25 to $82,520. Would the minister give some information with respect to the extension of services involved?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a salaries increase of $26,878.75. Then, under the heading of "permanent," there is provision for eight positions authorized for additional activities in connection with the organization of agricultural marketing services; the promotion and upward revision and classification of rates authorized by the civil service commission, amounting to $1,740. Then, there is provision for statutory increases to the extent of $1,425; return of salary deductions amounting to $1,518.75, and the temporary amount required to pay salary for a full year to the personnel taken on during 1937 and 1938, $2,272. Then, for one stenographer, grade 1, authorized September 16, 1937, there is an amount of $720, and the statutory increase for the office boy, amounting to $240. There is the return of salary reductions amounting to $513, giving a total of $3,745.

Then, for four positions abolished there is the amount of $6,120, and the amount required for additional temporary staff is $6,000. In connection with travelling expenses the increase amounts to $10,123, the break-up showing the expenses of the staff of the markets information division organized in 1937 as amounting to $2,000. There is provision for travelling expenses in connection with the study of the demand for Canadian farm products in the United Kingdom, amounting to $2,250, and a further provision for travelling expenses in Canada in connection with following new projects, the analysis of prices and grades of apples, the study and cost of farm living, the survey of credit in Ontario, the Agricultural Outlook, and special investigations, totalling $5,873. The miscellaneous item amounts to $1,015.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thank the minister for that information, although I had not expected he would give it in such detail. As I understand the situation, the increase is largely brought about by virtue of increased marketing service activities.

I believe the Agricultural Situation and Outlook, which is published every year, comes under this vote. In view of the avalanche of criticism one hears in connection with votes of this kind, I think we ought, on the other hand to give credit where credit is due. My own personal experience, and I believe that of a great many farmers, has been that the editions of the Agricultural Situation and Outlook have been most useful in connection with agricultural problems. Most of us who came from farms have seen great numbers of agricultural publications of a useless type come through the mail, and we are pleased to welcome something as practical as the Agricultural Situation and Outlook has proved to be. I do not think we should let this opportunity pass without expressing our appreciation of the efforts made by those who edit this publication to provide a first class service for the farmers of our country. The farmers in my constituency seem to be more than satisfied with the type of service given by this publication. I do not think there is any other publication issued by the department that is more acceptable to practical farmers.

Mr. SENN: I have in my hand the report of the Minister of Agriculture for 1937. In that part of it having to do with the economics branch, it states that the research activities of this branch were continued during the year. One of the chief items of research was the consumption of agricultural products in representative cities throughout the dominion. I do not know just how far that investigation has proceeded, but it seems to me that it brings up a live question in connection with the importation of vegetable oils and its effect upon the consumption of lard and butter in our cities. Have the officials who are conducting this investigation made any report to the department? How far has the investigation been continued? I think this is a matter that affects agriculture not only in Ontario but throughout the dominion. Sooner or later we shall have to make a complete study of the effect that these importations have upon the agricultural life of our country, particularly our live stock industry.

Mr. GARDINER: Investigations have been carried on in Vancouver, Calgary, Oshawa and Quebec, and the reports thereon are now available to any one who desires to get them. There has been no special investigation into the relationship of vegetable oil importations and the consumption of dairy products. It is well known that last year there was an increase in the production of dairy products as well as in the consumption. Whether there would have been a greater consumption had there not been so much vegetable oil coming in, is something I am not at the moment prepared to say. That is a question upon which there has been considerable discussion.

Mr. SENN: That is a vague answer. I believe the minister, like some of the rest of us, has a decided idea as to what effect the use of vegetable oils for shortening and spreading purposes has upon our live stock industry, our dairy industry and our fish industry. Is it contemplated that any such investigation shall be held? It seems to me that is one line along which research could be made. It would prove of great advantage to agriculture generally. The minister named the four cities in which an investigation has been conducted, and without wanting to say anything against any of these cities I think it will be admitted that Oshawa and Quebec are not our larger centres of population. Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg are our largest cities, and it seems to me it would have been more to the point to conduct investigations at those points. I do not know who was responsible for choosing these cities, but surely some investigation should be undertaken along the line I have indicated.

Mr. GARDINER: The cities chosen for the first investigation were typical cities. Provision is being made in this item for a survey of the Ottawa market. I think I stated earlier in the evening that provision is also being made in connection with Toronto. The investigations have been completed in the four cities I have named, but the work is continuing from one end of Canada to the other.

Mr. MASSEY: How are the investigations being conducted?

Mr. GARDINER: Under Doctor Booth in cooperation with the provincial authorities.

Mr. MASSEY: What is the procedure?

Mr. GARDINER: A house to house canvass as to consumption.

Mr. LOCKHART: Will there be an extensive study made of the effect of the importation of vegetable oils upon our dairy industry?

Mr. GARDINER: I stated a moment ago that this is not being done.

Mr. LOCKHART: Will it be included in the investigations being made?

Mr. GARDINER: Not under the present study.

Mr. LOCKHART: This is a live question among householders who are beginning to realize that much of their shortening is made of vegetable oil.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I think this is very important because of that one factor.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not proper for us to discuss it; that is the only thing.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Whenever the minister is asked a question which he finds it difficult to answer, he says it should be brought up under another item. I suggest that he has a lot more to answer than that question.

Mr. GARDINER: Since the hon. gentleman has taken that attitude, I should like to tell him that the item under which this should have been discussed has been passed already. We have passed the item dealing with dairy products, and that was the one under which this matter should have been discussed. If it is simply a case of carrying over this item to another day because the hon. member did not avail himself of the opportunity of asking his question under that item, then I should like to say that we shall have to stay closer to the rules in future discussions.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not want the minister to assume now that I am taking any particular attitude.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISION RESPECTING PROHIBITED CLASSES

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 112, to amend the Immigration Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, the house seems to have a perfect yen for asking explanations about my humble, unobtrusive bill. If it is not one section asking, it is another section demanding. There have been so many bills reprinted in the last few days, this seems to be a sort of legislative Easter. This bill is the resurrected body of Bill No. 38, which was crucified three days ago by the application of a fifteen-year-old rule for which there did not seem to be very much precedent. It now comes before us clothed with explanations, as with a garment, like some beautiful and ostensibly repentant Magdalen knocking at the doors of society for reentry. I hope it will be received with that kindly interest that society always does accord to people with a lurid past when they are fair to look upon and when their sins are sicklied o'er with the pale cast of repentance.

The bill is exactly the same as the one introduced on March 9; the two are identical, word for word, with the exception that the date is different. On an attached sheet, but not forming part of the bill, are to be found certain explanations required by law and I shall be pleased to read them if necessary, though that would take some time. I suggest that I might epitomize the explanation by saying that the purport of the bill is to extend and amplify to a small extent a section of the Immigration Act that has been in force for some twenty-five years, which applies the educational test to immigrants. Those who really want to see further into it will find it set out at page 2735 of Hansard of May 10.

I am sure that, relieved of its handicap in the form of a lack of explanation, the bill will now be treated on its merits and have a pleasant, prosperous and speedy passage through the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

River St. Lawrence ship channel—contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, and the extension of existing weirs, including cost of administration—capital, $2,933,400.

Mr. PELLETIER: I believe the minister had begun the other evening to give an explanation of the disposal of the St. Lawrence dredging fleet. Before we proceed further perhaps he would like to resume what he was saying on that occasion.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman was speaking at the close the other evening. He called it eleven o'clock. Perhaps he would like to continue.

Mr. PELLETIER: Shortly before eleven o'clock I had just begun to point out that three of the contentions advanced by the minister were not, in my opinion, quite accurate. In the first place he told us that the government began to give out contracts for the dredging of the St. Lawrence in 1929 because it realized the necessity of hurrying the work in order to provide a thirty-five foot channel. The records show that contracts were given quite a few years before 1929, but what strikes me as most peculiar is the information brought down by the minister in which he states:

> The number of dredges employed by the contractors and by the department on the St. Lawrence work has varied from time to time and it has happened that work has been done by contractors' dredges when departmental dredges were not fully employed. This has been due in part to the urgency of the work.

[Mr. Neill.]

If the work was really so urgent, why were the government dredges doing nothing when contracts were given out to contractors?

The second point which the minister discussed the other day was the Sorel shipyard. He told us that the Sorel shipyards, to use his own words, were maintained simply to repair the government dredging fleet; that that was the yard's main work. I do not think that is quite an accurate picture. It would lead us to believe that the Sorel shipyard was nothing but a repair yard. That is not so. I said the other day, and I repeat it, that the Sorel shipyard was equipped to do a great deal more than mere repair work; it was equipped not only to repair but to build vessels. In proof of that I would point to the number of vessels that were being built in certain years. For example in 1925 two vessels were building; in 1926, eight; in 1927, twelve; in 1928, ten, and so on. So to say that the Sorel shipyard was simply a small affair without much equipment is far from accurate. The Sorel shipyard was equipped not only to build vessels, but even to manufacture the marine boilers required therefor. Furthermore the number of employees at the yard goes to show that it could not have been a small establishment. The minister stated the other day that at times there were between nine hundred and one thousand men employed, so certainly the capacity was much greater than the minister indicated.

But the most important aspect of this deal is the question of valuation. The minister told us the other night that he had asked a private company, the Canadian Appraisal Company, to make a survey of the equipment which was to be sold, and that he based his calculations upon such survey. I believe if we studied the story of the valuation we should find that there is a great deal more to be said than just what the minister told us the other day. For example I have in my hand a part of the return brought down by the minister, showing on page 9 a summary of appraisal values by the Canadian Appraisal Company. I should like to discuss item No. 1, which reads as follows:

> Land, including wharves, railway sidings, paving, fences and drainage, value, $60,000.

I believe that valuation is entirely wrong, and I propose to give figures taken from the department's own records to show what the government paid for the land in the first place, proving positively that the valuation of $60,000 is a ridiculous figure in the face of what it cost the government.

On May 26, 1932, the following purchases were made at Sorel: parcel 442, 4,356 square feet; parcel 443, 4,356 square feet; parcel 444, 17,424 square feet; parcel 445, 15,130 square feet; a total area at that time of 51,266 square feet were purchased. The purchase price was $18,316.62, which means roughly 35 cents per square foot. I refer not to the buildings or improvements but to the actual land itself, upon which there can be no such thing as depreciation. This deal was made in 1932 at the lowest point of the depression, and one has only to read the speeches of the then leader of the opposition to know what the condition of the country was at that time and how low values were. Therefore that price of 35 cents a square foot was paid by the department at a time when values were at the lowest possible level.

Mr. HOWE: What land is it that the hon. member is referring to? Where is it located?

Mr. PELLETIER: I have given the minister the parcel numbers.

Mr. HOWE: Is it part of the shipyard property?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes, I believe it is now.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member does not know whether it is or not.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is land that is now part of the shipyard property, commercial land used for that kind of purpose in the town of Sorel. Since the shipyard property is in a much more valuable location, I imagine it would be more valuable than other property.

Mr. HOWE: Downtown property in the town of Sorel?

Mr. PELLETIER: The situation at Sorel is this. The Richelieu river runs into the St. Lawrence there, and the best possible industrial locations would be immediately at the junction of the two rivers. That means that there is water frontage on two sides, an ideal condition for property for that purpose. In any event these are prices paid by the department for land there, and I take these parcels as examples because they were purchased in 1932 at a time when values were known to be low.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend stated that this land was purchased by the government and later sold, and he has just told us something which would indicate that nothing of the kind took place. Suppose he apologize to the committee for giving false information.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not believe I have given false information. What I am trying to do is to establish the value.

Mr. HOWE: Did the hon. member say, or did he not, that the land was purchased and then sold?

Mr. PELLETIER: Let me put it this way. I am establishing the value of land around that point.

Mr. HOWE: Let us have this straight. The hon. member either can or cannot tell the truth, and we want to know.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOWE: Is this land that was bought and later sold, or not?

Mr. PELLETIER: If the minister is incensed now he had better reserve his comments until later, because this is just the beginning. What I am trying to do is to establish the value of land in that particular location, and I am taking the year 1932 when this deal was made in order to have the lowest possible valuation that can be made.

Mr. HOWE: Is this land in the town of Sorel?

Mr. PELLETIER: I have given the locations.

Mr. HOWE: It is part of the town of Sorel?

Mr. PELLETIER: I believe that parcels 442, 443, 444 and 445 are either in St. Joseph de Sorel or in Sorel.

Mr. HOWE: Which town is the shipyard in?

Mr. PELLETIER: It is in St. Joseph de Sorel.

Mr. HOWE: And not the town of Sorel?

Mr. PELLETIER: It is across the Richelieu river from the city of Sorel.

Mr. HOWE: But not in the town of Sorel; in other words it is in the parish of St. Joseph?

Mr. PELLETIER: Possibly so; it is across the river.

Mr. HOWE: So the hon. member quoted a number of assessments on property in the town of Sorel the other day just for window dressing, is that it? They had nothing to do with the shipyard, because the shipyard is not in the town of Sorel. Is that the idea?

Mr. PELLETIER: How can the minister get away from this explanation? This is the value of industrial land in that part of the country. If he figures that the government paid too much at 35 cents a square foot I am willing to take a much lower figure, and I can still show the minister a great discrepancy between the $60,000 the Canadian Appraisal Company said it was worth and the true value. So, continuing with these figures, we find that the land eventually sold was not a matter of simply a few hundred thousand square feet. I believe the actual acreage was 34·93, that is to say 1,521,550 square feet. That is the land that was sold, according to a return made by the minister himself. If we figure out the value of 1,521,550 square feet, at the price paid for it by the government when values were at their very lowest, we see that this gives us an amount of $543,042.50.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend again says, if we figure it out at what the government paid for it, suggesting that what he is referring to is the land which was sold. He is either talking about the land which was sold or he is not. Again he is creating the impression that the figures he gives as to value apply to the land now under discussion, whereas a few moments ago he admitted that it is not the land at all, that he is using these figures for purposes of illustration.

Mr. PELLETIER: I could very well use the figures for the shipyard itself, because that information was brought down in this house. The trouble with that is with regard to one figure; something over twenty-four acres are shown without any value at all. They appear as a gift from some other department, so it is impossible to establish the true cost to the government. Furthermore, how else can we ascertain the value if we do not take into consideration the value of properties adjacent to the property we wish to sell? You must have some basis of valuation, and here I am taking land which the government itself purchased at 35 cents per square foot. If that figure is too high I can put it at 25 cents and still show a discrepancy.

In passing I should like to point out that this $60,000 was not the actual amount realized by the Canadian government from the sale of this property. In reality the amount realized was only 80 per cent of that figure, so actually this land brought a return of some $48,000, when it was worth at least $500,000.

Let me go further with these values. We could group together several items. Let us take items 1 and 2, which are valued in the report of the appraisal company at $60,000 and $129,789 respectively, making a total of $189,789. Item No. 1 covers wharves, railway sidings, paving, fences and drainage, while No. 2 covers other properties. As was mentioned the other day, the assessment roll of the city of Sorel values the government property at more than a million dollars. The minister may claim that the shipyard is located in St. Joseph de Sorel and that some of it remains unsold and is still in the possession of the government. I am prepared to take the minister's explanation in that regard, and it is possible that the valuation covers more property than was sold. Nevertheless I believe I have shown that the valuation of that particular land is not at all fair, and that it has resulted in quite a serious loss to the Canadian government.

We might go further and take up the question of the equipment itself. The instructions from the minister to the appraisal company were that a fair valuation was to be placed upon this equipment. Let us turn to item No. 10, which includes the dredging fleet at Sorel and Quebec. The valuation shown by the Canadian Appraisal Company is $1,534,750, and of that amount eighty per cent was received as the sale price, that is to say $1,227,800. Now let us compare that price with the cost to this government of some of that equipment. It may be all right to tell us that this equipment was absolutely obsolete, but I am not going to deal with any obsolete equipment. I am going to mention two pieces of that equipment which together cost the Canadian government more than was realized from the sale of all this equipment to this private firm. We have dredge No. 16, built in 1923, and dredge No. 17, built in 1931. These two dredges alone cost more than the total amount realized by the government from the sale of all the equipment. Dredge No. 16 cost $837,200 and dredge No. 17 cost $444,535, or a total cost to the Canadian government of $1,281,735.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Is the hon. member able to give to the committee the proper depreciation from year to year on equipment of that kind?

Mr. PELLETIER: Well, Mr. Chairman, even if these two dredges depreciated to such an extent that they vanished, still there would be the rest of the equipment to take into consideration. Perhaps it is necessary to read the list of equipment and show the cost prices. Here we have dredge No. 3, at south channel; value for scrap, $7,500. Then there is dredge No. 4, also valued at $7,500, which originally cost the government $94,564. This was an old dredge, and it may be that this value is approximately correct. Dredge No. 5, built in 1927, was valued at $70,000 and cost the Canadian government $388,952. Dredge No. 8, built in 1907, cost the government $450,435 and was valued at $150,000. It is worthy of note that this dredge was rebuilt in 1928 and changed to a bucket dredge, so that the original cost would have to be increased to the extent of about $150,000. Then there were dredges Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16 and 17, and No. 18 which is not yet finished. There was also Churchill No. 1, built in 1928. There were also several tugs; in fact in all, apart from the two pieces I have mentioned as costing the Canadian government more than the total amount realized for the equipment, we find that there were included fifty-nine other pieces of floating equipment which so far have not been mentioned.

When we find that these two dredges alone cost that amount of money, what are we to say? Has the depreciation on this equipment been so heavy that they might be said to have vanished into thin air? When it comes to the matter of depreciation I should like to relate the story of one particular dredge, which will indicate that this equipment was still capable of doing work for some considerable time. It must not be thought that a dredge which cost the taxpayers of this country some $444,000 in 1931 would become scrap in 1937. I do not believe that that is possible, no matter how much work it has done. If, then, these figures are not satisfactory to the minister and do not indicate to him that the appraisal of the Canadian Appraisal Company was certainly not in accordance with the valuation placed upon the property, let me return to the auditor general's report.

The other day the Minister of Finance mentioned that the auditor general always gave us accurate figures. I believe he does, when he gets them. But there are times when he does not get them, and that is what I meant the other day. The Minister of Transport has not yet given us a satisfactory explanation as to why no inventory was made prior to 1936. It is true that the minister has not always had this particular branch under his administration; I know, for example, that this matter was given to the minister only within the last few years. He could not possibly have known what had been going on in the past, and the remarks I have just addressed to him to-day are remarks which really should be for those who administered this department before he became its head. However, he must now be in a position to provide us with a satisfactory answer.

I did mention the auditor general's report; apparently it is found that there might have been some misunderstanding about it, so I have brought with me to-day the auditor general's instructions concerning values. It was maintained that these were original values, without any depreciation having been placed upon them. That is not so. I say that simply because the first inventory was made in 1936; it appears in the report of the auditor general for the first time in that year. Four months later the dredging fleet was sold. There could not have been any change in those four months; at least there could not have been depreciation to warrant anything like the depreciation claimed. What are the instructions of the auditor general? Let us go over them:

> In either case the inventory should be prepared to show the total value of such property on hand.

Then he tells us how to arrive at that value. Then, in regard to values—

> I wish to point out that as the principle of depreciation is not being observed—

Mark this,

> —under the policy of the government respecting the value of public property in general, it is not intended that depreciation should be considered. It is suggested therefore that property values once established—

And this is my point—property values "once established" for the first time; and they were established in the report of the auditor general under date of December 31, 1936. In this particular case they had not been established before, because no inventory was ever supplied to the auditor general. Therefore the values once established were the values established on December 31, 1936, as instructed by the auditor general. He says:

> —either on a cost or an estimated basis, should be maintained unchanged in your records from year to year until such property is finally disposed of—

In this particular case the property was disposed of only four months after the valuation took place. So that it cannot be said the minister—

Mr. BOTHWELL: May I ask a question, for information? Did I understand the hon. member to say, when reading the auditor general's instructions, that he told them not to take into account any depreciation, but that they should value at cost, or on some similar basis?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes. I will read it again.

Mr. BOTHWELL: And the values then fixed were fixed upon that basis?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes. The position is this: These values were fixed for the first time on December 31, 1936.

Mr. BOTHWELL: And that concerns part of the equipment which was built in 1907. Depreciation was not supposed to be considered; is that so?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member has been quoting from a letter containing instructions from the auditor general. It is difficult to get clearly the contents of the letter because the hon. member interpolates his own observations. Would he facilitate proceedings in committee by reading the letter, without comment, so that it may appear on Hansard in that form?

Mr. PELLETIER: I will table it.

Mr. HOWE: Read it first.

Mr. PELLETIER: Here is part of it—

Mr. HOWE: Read it all.

Mr. PELLETIER: All right.

The instructions from the auditor general with regard to the compilation of these inventories read as follows:

"This inventory should include stationery supplies, travelling accessories such as trunks, bags, cases, etc., and motor vehicles. The actual or approximate cost—"

Mr. HOWE: "Cost."

Mr. PELLETIER:

"—of each individual item of stores and equipment on hand should be given, but where such information cannot readily be obtained then the estimated value should be indicated. In either case the inventory should be prepared to show the total value of such property on hand.

In regard to values, I wish to point out that as the principle of depreciation is not being observed under the policy of the government respecting the value of public property in general, it is not intended that depreciation should be considered. It is suggested therefore that property values once established, either on a cost or an estimated basis, should be maintained unchanged in your records from year to year until such property is finally disposed of, subject of course to any modifications required by additions or betterments."

This is the part of the letter which contained the instructions from the auditor general. If the minister wishes to have it—

Mr. HOWE: Read it all, then table it.

Mr. PELLETIER: I will do so.

The statement published by the auditor general indicates an increase of $9,436,608.85 in the value of stores and equipment of the Department of Transport at December 31st, 1936, as compared with December 31st, 1935. This leaves an opening for misinterpretation.

Mr. DUNNING: Who says that?

Mr. PELLETIER: It is signed by V. I. Smart, Deputy Minister of Transport.

No inventory of plant and equipment had been made and reported to the auditor general in respect of the St. Lawrence Ship channel, the Sorel shipyard, and the floating equipment attached to the Quebec agency prior to 1936. The inventories at December 31st, 1936, in these respects were as follows:

St. Lawrence ship channel, $7,872,007.01.

And so on. So that that indicates—

Mr. HOWE: Read it all; do not skip anything,—because the hon. member draws very strange conclusions.

Mr. PELLETIER: All right.

St. Lawrence ship channel	$ 7,872,007 01
Sorel shipyard	310,225 23
Quebec agency	2,776,141 41
Total	$10,958,373 65

so that the indicated increase in 1936 over 1935 was more than offset during that year because of the inclusion for the first time in the auditor general's statements of inventories of units that had not been previously reported although the units had been in existence for many years.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly.

Mr. PELLETIER: It continues:

The detailed inventories represented on the statement herewith are on file in the records of the stores and equipment branch of the department in the Hunter building. They are voluminous and as we have only the one copy a tremendous amount of work would be involved in having copies made to forward to you. Perhaps you could arrange to see these inventories at our offices in the Hunter building in charge of Mr. C. H. Edgett, general purchasing agent.

Yours faithfully,
V. I. Smart,
Deputy Minister.

Mr. HOWE: But you did not go to see them, did you?

Mr. PELLETIER: I did not need to. I had the totals, and that was sufficient.

Mr. HOWE: You preferred to draw your own conclusions without going to get the facts.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am not drawing my own conclusions. These are figures given to me by the department itself. I do not know what the minister means. Does he mean to say that I cannot accept the figures given to me by his own deputy minister? I cannot understand him.

Mr. HOWE: I mean if my hon. friend wants to put interpretations upon them, he had better get the facts. These statements are so weird that I prefer to reserve comment until the hon. member finishes. Let him get through, but do not take it seriously.

Mr. PELLETIER: The position I am establishing is that no inventory was made prior to 1936, and yet the minister accepts it. This comes from his own department, and what is the meaning of it?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, what is the meaning of it?

Mr. HOWE: You tell us.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am wondering what the meaning of it is. I have an idea what it is.

Mr. HOWE: Tell us what it is.

Mr. DUNNING: What is the idea of it? What is your idea?

Mr. PELLETIER: On top of the valuations of property around that vicinity, and on top of figures which I quoted as government purchases in that part of the vicinity, and on top of the auditor general's report—those are the three items by which I measured—the appraisal of the Canadian Appraisal Company was certainly not in accordance with the facts as given to me by the department.

Mr. ST-PÈRE: Who made the valuation for you?

Mr. PELLETIER: The Canadian Appraisal Company.

Mr. ST-PÈRE: For you?

Mr. PELLETIER: For me? The Minister of Transport. Let me add something more in connection with the auditor general. He states:

I am dependent on the departments for the accuracy and completeness of the inventories transmitted to me but, as a result of continued correspondence and of my comments to the departments resulting from special examinations of their systems of control, etc., the inventories of stores and equipment are more complete year after year. To illustrate, the following comparisons are cited; they are taken from the inventories of the marine division.

	1935	1936
Quebec	$382,868	$3,146,406
Montreal (Sorel buoy depot)	392,057	687,635
Sorel ship channel	....	7,872,007
Sorel (government shipyard)	186,805	459,382

I am asking the minister to explain how it is that such a report can be tabled. If the information was not given to us previously, as it should have been, there is only one thing that can be said, and that is that this parliament is not being supplied with an accurate picture of a certain situation. The valuation of the Sorel shipyards is shown as $186,805 in 1935 and in 1936 as $459,382. In a period of one year, instead of having a depreciation, we find a great increase in valuation. Possibly I am not aware of the reason for this, but it must be known to others. Taking the figures supplied by the auditor general and those shown in the auditor general's report, taking into consideration the method of valuation recommended by the auditor general we find we have this picture:

Quebec agency	$ 2,776,141 41
Montreal ship channel	7,872,007 01
Sorel shipyard	459,382 56
Total valuation as at December 31, 1936	$11,107,530 98

It was at that time that an inventory was taken for the first time following instructions received from the auditor general.

Mr. DUNNING: Without any depreciation on any of them.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is not what the auditor general says in his letter. When were the values established? They were established on December 31, 1936, and not before. The shipyards were sold four months after.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I should like to know if the figure the hon. gentleman quotes represents the cost price of all this equipment.

Mr. PELLETIER: If I were to give the total cost price my hon. friend would be at a loss.

Mr. HOWE: Let us get this right. I tabled the cost price of everything at Sorel. The hon. member has received that return and he should read it item by item.

Mr. PELLETIER: I did it once before.

Mr. HOWE: Read it slowly. I want to have this on Hansard.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister supplied me with the information and I am not worrying about putting it on Hansard again. It is as follows:

Dredge No. 4, $94,564.

Mr. HOWE: When was that built?

Mr. PELLETIER: In 1900.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The hon. member should read all the figures so we may know where we are.

Mr. HOWE: If the hon. member is reading a document, he should read it all.

The CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) is well taken. When an hon. member reads from a document he should read it all.

Mr. PELLETIER: With pleasure. The figures are:

Dredge No. 4, built in 1900, cost $94,564.
Dredge No. 5, built in 1927, cost $388,952.
Dredge No. 8, built in 1907, changed to bucket dredge in 1928, cost $450,435.
Dredge No. 12, built in 1912, cost $285,963.
Dredge No. 13, built in 1912, cost $267,832.
Dredge No. 14, built in 1914, cost $287,500.

Dredge No. 15, built in 1914, cost $287,500.
Dredge No. 16, built in 1923, cost $837,200.
Dredge No. 17, built in 1931, cost $444,535.
Dredge No. 18, still unfinished.
Dredge Churchill No. 1, built in 1928, cost $363,245.

Those are the costs of the dredges alone. I have only a few other items such as hopper barges. Hopper barge No. 5 cost $226,428. I have not the costs of all the items. I did not ask for it as I thought it would take too much time to supply. There were the following tugs:

Deschaillons; Becancour; Lake St. Pierre; Varennes; Contrecoeur; Iberville.

Then there are the following:

Coal barge No. 6; hopper barge No. 1; hopper barge No. 3; hopper barge No. 4; hopper barge No. 5; rock breaker No. 1; steel sand dumping scow No. 22; steel dumping scow No. 23; steel dumping scow No. 24; steel dumping scow No. 25; steel dumping scow No. 26; steel dumping scow No. 27; steel dumping scow No. 28; steel dumping scow No. 29; steel dumping scow No. 30; steel dumping scow No. 31; steel dumping scow No. 32; steel sand dumping scow No. 33; wood dumping scow No. 34; wood dumping scow No. 35; steel dumping scow No. 36; steel dumping scow No. 37; steel dumping scow No. 38; steel dumping scow No. 39; steel dumping scow No. 40; steel dumping scow No. 41; winch scow No. 1; 11-barrel floats; 3 small wood flat scows; fire scow No. 1; fire scow No. 2.

It is not for me to say how much this cost the Canadian taxpayers, because I have not the information before me. I did get the cost of the dredges, which represented the most important part of the equipment on the St. Lawrence river. I have shown that two of the dredges could not be considered as old. The life of a dredge is not the same as the life of an automobile; it is much longer. I have shown definitely that two of these dredges alone cost the Canadian government more than what all the rest of the equipment put together was sold for. One dredge was built in 1931 and the other in 1933. The minister has told us that part of the time the equipment at Sorel shipyards was lying idle, so it cannot be said that these dredges were worn out. There may be some allowance for upkeep, but the minister has said that these dredges were idle and the work was given to private contractors. These are some of the general matters.

Since we are discussing dredging I think it might be well for me to go back into the past, because this subject has, I believe, never been brought before the house in this manner before. Governments change, and apparently the thing was not considered to be of sufficient importance, but when it concerns millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money I think it is deserving of our consideration. The particular case I am going to mention occurred in the past and the present minister may not be acquainted with the details, but I know he is in a position to obtain the information.

It is a principle that unless otherwise authorized to do so by order in council, the Department of Public Works cannot let any contract for work without calling for tenders. I find at page 240 of volume I of the auditor general's report for 1929 that a contract was awarded without tender to the Richelieu Engineering Company, contrary to clause 36 of the Public Works Act. An explanation was asked for by the auditor general, and this is the reply he received. The minister has been negotiating since 1927, and furthermore the minister stated that it was in the public interest that this tug boat, or whatever it was, should be built.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend persists in paraphrasing what he purports to quote from the auditor general's report. I submit, sir, that if a communication from the auditor general is quoted, it ought to be quoted and not paraphrased by anybody.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order taken by the Minister of Finance I think is well taken.

Mr. PELLETIER: I would simply draw the minister's attention to this point, that I gave him the page and volume number of the auditor general's report—page 240, volume I, 1929. It is a public record, filed in this House of Commons. I have stated just where the quotation is. What more can I do?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member can then proceed to quote it correctly.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am doing it.

Mr. DUNNING: If the hon. member quotes it, he must quote it.

Mr. PELLETIER: All these matters are of public record, and the minister can read it for himself. But the conclusion I am drawing is this, that no tenders were called for, and the reason given was that it was adjudged to be a matter of public expediency. Yet we find that negotiations had been going on since 1927 for the building of such a boat, and then finally it was said that the matter had become so urgent that it was necessary to build the boat without calling for tenders.

To go back again into the days gone by—this concerns the money of the taxpayers of this country—let us look at some of the contracts which have been made in the past. The minister stated the other day that the principle of giving contracts was started in 1929. I do not believe that that is an accurate statement of the case, because contracts were given long before 1929.

Take contract No. 15423, which was awarded to Les Chantiers Manseau of Sorel, Quebec. This company later became the Marine Industries Limited, with yards at Sorel, and their equipment there. The date the contract was awarded was May 5, 1927. The work was done from April 19 to August 5 of that year. The amount removed was 347,524 cubic yards, class B, at 26 cents. What is noteworthy is that the work on this particular project began eighteen days before the contract was ever signed.

Then take contract No. 15493.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, while I do not desire to interrupt my hon. friend, I think I am right in stating that he has now spoken considerably more than forty minutes. No one has desired to interrupt because it was thought he wished to complete his statement with respect to the particular matter he was criticizing, which was the disposal of certain equipment. Would it not facilitate the proceedings if he were to confine his remarks to that point? He will have the right to speak again, but if he wishes to proceed now at any length unanimous consent will be necessary. I have no objection to the hon. member proceeding, but I raise the point just that we may keep in order.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have been interrupted by the minister. He has just sat down, and had quite a number of words to say.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You do not get another forty minutes now because of that.

Mr. PELLETIER: I was interrupted two or three times, and I sat down.

The CHAIRMAN: The rule as to the forty-minute limit is the same in committee as when the Speaker is in the chair, and unless an hon. member has the unanimous consent of the house he must take his seat when his forty minutes have expired.

Mr. PELLETIER: I think, Mr. Chairman, you ought to take into consideration the fact that the Minister of Transport interrupted and made a statement during my forty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member's time has expired, and I must ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. STEWART: Does not the interruption of the Minister of Finance—

Mr. DUNNING: Interruptions do not affect the rule.

Mr. STEWART: On several occasions it was more than a mere interruption, and two or three have spoken during the hon. member's time. I submit that according to a strict interpretation of the rule the member who is speaking has had a chance to come to his feet again, and he is on his feet again after a speech by the Minister of Finance, and therefore is due for forty minutes more.

Mr. DUNNING: On that point of order, Mr. Chairman, whether an interruption entitles the member who has the floor to another forty minutes from the time of the interruption, I would submit as one who has suffered from interruptions quite a good deal and never been allowed for them in that manner—although I have had to acknowledge the courtesy and consideration of the house in granting me more than my original forty minutes—that we would be establishing a new rule if we said that interruptions such as have just taken place entitle a speaker to an additional forty minutes. I have no objection as a member to allowing my hon. friend to finish his speech. I merely rose to call attention to the fact that he had already exceeded by more than five minutes his forty minutes, and I think five minutes would probably be sufficient to allow for the interruptions. But we should be establishing, I believe, a new rule, Mr. Chairman, if we said that interruptions, or points of order raised, automatically give the member who has the floor an additional forty minutes from the time of the interruption.

Mr. STEWART: I admit that, but I would consider the minister's statement a little more than an interruption.

Mr. HOWE: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member wishes the indulgence of the committee, I am entirely in favour of giving him more time if he is going to speak to the item. At the moment we are discussing an item of the Department of Transport, which previously was the Department of Marine, with reference to St. Lawrence dredging and the Sorel shipyard. When my hon. friend was interrupted last he was talking about dredging under the Public Works department, which has nothing to do with this item at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is drawing it too fine, because since I have been here nearly every member has violated almost every rule of the house.

Mr. HOWE: If there are rules, we should respect them, and there is a rule confining a member to forty minutes. But if the hon. member wishes to discuss this particular item, I shall be delighted to ask for unanimous consent to permit him to continue for a reasonable time.

Mr. COLDWELL: There are occasions upon which the enforcement of rules is dangerous to all concerned, and I think in this particular instance, because of the interpretation that might be placed upon any curtailment of the discussion at the present time, we would be well advised and it would be in the interests of the house generally to let the hon. member proceed. I know nothing of the matter under discussion. I am listening with an entirely open mind and hearing it for the first time, and I think in the interests of all concerned it would be well to allow the hon. member to continue.

Mr. HOWE: Just to relieve the committee I may say that when the hon. member gets through with the question he is discussing I shall be able to reply to him, item by item, with documentary evidence. So if any hon. member feels that anyone may be left besmirched by cutting the hon. member off, he can dismiss that from his mind at once. Let the hon. member proceed.

Mr. COLDWELL: That was the point I had in mind. I think it would be well to let him go on.

Mr. DUNNING: If the hon. member has the indulgence of the committee to speak for more than forty minutes, should he not at least respect the other rule and confine himself to the item before the committee? He should not, if he is given the indulgence of the committee on a particular point, undertake a roving commission over everything; because obviously the minister cannot answer with respect to matters extraneous to his department.

The CHAIRMAN: In order to clarify the whole situation, I would point out to the hon. member that while, with the consent of the committee, he may continue, he must confine his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. PELLETIER: The item under discussion represents almost $3,000,000, which sum will be paid to a private company to dredge the St. Lawrence, and the dredging becomes necessary because equipment owned by the government has been disposed of. This was formerly under the Public Works department, and has now been taken over by the Department of Transport.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. HOWE: It was never under the Department of Public Works; it was under the Department of Marine.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister is drawing fine distinctions. At any rate it was under a different minister. It is necessary when we review the situation to go back some time in the past. What I am emphasizing is this. I regret that the impression should prevail among the public that because a utility is publicly owned it is necessarily badly administered. Private enterprise on all sides points to examples of public administration which it is said have not been successful, and that is used as an argument against public ownership of various utilities. If in our public administration there are departments that are not administered as efficiently as they should be, that makes it possible for private interests to argue against public ownership. They say, "When that happens under government administration, what is to be expected"?

The point I wish to bring out is that work on various contracts was begun days, and in some instances weeks, before the contract was signed. Does that mean that any individual company can plant its equipment in the St. Lawrence and start dredging and then come to the government and get a contract? I do not understand how it is that any contractor can begin work before his contract is signed. Possibly there is a logical explanation, and, as the minister has said, he will be in a position shortly to explain to the committee how things of this sort come about.

We have been talking about values, and in my opinion that is relevant to the item before the committee. The minister made it clear to me that he wanted a complete statement with regard to values and therefore he must be interested in the subject from that point of view. Why not tell the story of the famous dredge Marine and Fisheries No. 10, which is now known as Manseau 101, or of Marine and Fisheries No. 11, which is now known as Manseau 103? Both were built a long time ago. They were owned by the government and then sold after a certain period.

Mr. DUNNING: How long ago?

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not know exactly. At any rate they were disposed of to a private individual in Montreal. They became the property of Manseau Shipyards Limited, and to-day one of these dredges is doing contract work.

On the order paper there appears a question of mine with regard to painting and repairs to the buildings at the Sorel shipyards. The question is No. 7 on to-day's order paper and part 2 reads:

How much money was spent for painting and repair to the buildings at the Sorel shipyards for the five months preceding July 22nd, 1937?

That was the date on which the Sorel shipyards were sold. I have not received the answer. The question was first asked on May 4, and it is now May 13. Possibly the minister has not yet had time to secure the information.

Mr. HOWE: The information has just come to hand and I shall be glad to give the answers orally. The first question is:

Did the government sell coal barge No. 6 to the General Dredging Company last year?

The answer is, yes.

If so, (a) has the government used or rented coal barge No. 6 from the General Dredging Company since it was sold to them?

The answer is, yes.

(b) how much rent has the government paid each day?

The answer is that the contract was for $265 per day for a period not exceeding ten days.

(c) for what purpose was it used?

For the purpose of assisting in the spring rush of laying buoys at the Montreal agency.

2. How much money was spent for painting and repair to the buildings at the Sorel shipyards for the five months preceding July 22, 1937?

The answer is $2,058.96.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am glad to get the information. I realize that the minister did not have very much time in which to get it. If I understand rightly, the barge was rented for a period of ten days at $265 per day. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: When the shoe is on the other foot what happens? When the government rented to a private contractor certain equipment at least comparable to this they rented it at $100 a month. Rock crusher No 1 was taken from the Sorel shipyards in 1931 and has been rented at $100 a month. It is now the property of the company who rented it, they having bought it for $15,000. But when the government want to rent equipment from a private concern they have to pay $265 a day. If they paid only half or only a quarter of that sum, compare the rent paid by the government with the rent paid by a private concern to the government. As I say, the government for a whole month received $100 for a rock crusher which is now in the yards at Sorel.

Mr. DUNNING: Would the hon. gentleman expect to rent an automobile at the same rate as a bicycle?

Mr. PELLETIER: If the Minister of Finance would visit the shipyards at Sorel he would see the sort of work the rock breaker does. It is used for breaking rock at the bottom of the channel, and is considerably larger than any automobile. An automobile would cost to rent $50 a month. He knows that this sort of discrimination cannot be defended.

The figures I have used to-day in connection with this item were supplied by various government departments. I realize my limitations. I know my capacities, and it is not possible for me to delve into this matter as deeply as someone with better qualifications might. I do not think it is an easy task for one person without proper information to get at all the facts. I rely upon the Minister of Transport and I know that he will be able to explain to us why no inventory was taken before December 31, 1936. I hope he will explain that and other matters that I have brought to his attention. I could have read more of the contracts and shown the discrepancy between the date the contract was awarded and the date the work began, but I leave that off the record. My purpose is this: I believe that certain functions performed by a government should be performed as efficiently as they could be performed by any private enterprise. I believe if this kind of government administration is permitted—loose accounting, for example, or careless accounting—it gives ground for private industry to say: "See what happens when a thing is owned by the government. This is what you get under public ownership when governments are administering anything." I believe that if the facts are told it would be possible for any department of the government to administer any business in this country properly, and do it as efficiently as private enterprise ever can. I pause, because I believe that my time has expired once more: I shall probably resume later.

Mr. BAKER: It is difficult to grasp the idea that the hon. member is trying to convey, but in summary is it this: that the government has been selling machinery to private companies at ten to twenty cents on the dollar, and then giving them large contracts in which they use this very machinery and get large sums of money out of the government? If that is so, of course there is something for the government to answer.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am not a lawyer, but if I were I would say that that is a very leading question. I do not know what interpretation the government can place upon it; I have simply attempted to put on record the facts.

Mr. BAKER: I am not defending the government; I say if that is the purpose of it they should answer.

Mr. PELLETIER: I agree that possibly the government will answer, and I should like the hon. member to join with me in insisting that it should be done. The minister no doubt has a few remarks to make, and perhaps he would care to make them now.

Mr. HOWE: I have listened for the last hour and a half or thereabouts to some very serious accusations. If any part of them were true, I would have no option but to resign from the government and place my seat at the disposal of my electors. Fortunately none of them are true in any particular, therefore I shall stay here.

Now I should be feeling very serious resentment, for as I stated clearly in the committee, I personally attended to every detail of the negotiations for the sale of this equipment. Therefore the accusation is against my personal honesty, and I should feel very bitter against the hon. member. But as a matter of fact I cannot bring myself to feel so at all.

An hon. MEMBER: You should sympathize with him.

Mr. HOWE: I realize that the hon. member is very young and very gullible. Months ago we heard rumours that a great scandal was to break in the house about the sale of this Sorel shipyard, something that would shake the government. Then an obscure journal published in Quebec began to say that it was expected that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) would make the presentation. We then had the hon. member visiting Sorel. He was taken to the assessor's office, not of the village of St. Joseph de Sorel but of the town of Sorel. He was furnished with a list of assessments in the town of Sorel, which he solemnly read to us here a while ago, I presume to lead the committee to the conclusion that these were assessments of shipyard property.

An hon. MEMBER: Who took him to Sorel?

[Mr. Baker.]

Mr. HOWE: We all know who took him to Sorel.

Mr. PELLETIER: Tell us.

Mr. HOWE: I simply want to explain why I feel no great bitterness in the matter. The men who had been advertising this situation in advance needed not only someone young and very gullible, but someone completely addled as to financial affairs, because without that it would have been impossible to show to any hon. member the documents he was shown, and expect that hon. member to accept them seriously. This is all the more the situation since my own department has answered clearly and fully every question that he asked, and the hon. member has in his possession absolutely correct statements of everything that he has given in a garbled and distorted manner to this committee.

Let us start at the beginning. Let us take his statement about assessments of property at Sorel. He tried, I think, in his speech a week ago to lead the committee to the conclusion that the land comprising the Sorel shipyard was worth a million dollars, and was carried on assessment rolls of the town of Sorel at that price. Of course at that time he did not explain to the committee, as he has admitted to-day, that the shipyard is not in the town of Sorel but in the parish of St. Joseph de Sorel.

Mr. PELLETIER: It was eleven o'clock, and the chairman stopped me.

Mr. HOWE: Well, eleven o'clock came very conveniently. This is the list of properties he read, in the town of Sorel, totalling $1,046,000 on the assessment roll:

Elevator and Weaver coal wharf	$ 650,000
Cournoyer's old store	2,000
Morgan wharf	7,500
Beaudet wharf	9,000
Leveille wharf	5,400
Alfred Lavallee's property	15,000
McCarthy wharf	16,800
Lanctot basin	100,000
New wharf, Department of Public Works	200,000
Buoys wharf	15,000
Office of Transport department	25,000
Lot at end of Ramesay street	300
	$1,046,000

I think my hon. friend will now admit that not one square inch of the property in the list I have just read and of which he quoted the assessments has anything to do with the Sorel shipyard in any way, shape or form.

Mr. PELLETIER: How does the minister arrive at the value of the industrial property we are talking about?

Mr. HOWE: I simply took it off the assessment roll of the town of Sorel, the figures you went there to get.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister did not mention the industrial property in question.

Mr. HOWE: I am coming to that. When my hon. friend was visiting assessment offices he could just as well have gone to the municipality of St. Joseph de Sorel and got the assessed values of the property he was talking about. I do not know whether he went there or not, but I am assuming he did not, because I cannot conceive of his going and getting the information without presenting it to the committee. I have here a statement signed by the city clerk of St. Joseph de Sorel, and stamped with the seal of the village. The document is in French but I shall read what I believe to be an accurate English translation:

I, the undersigned, Gerard Cournoyer, secretary-treasurer of the village of St. Joseph, do declare under my oath of office:

1. That the federal government appears on the roll as the owner of pieces of land covering an area of 3,940,000 square feet which pieces of land are appraised at the sum of $500,000.

2. That no separate municipal appraisal is recorded in the books of the corporation for that part of the lands which was formerly occupied by the government shipyard;

3. That since the sale of the government shipyard an appraisal has been made of the lands and buildings sold in the sum of $150,000. This valuation has been made by the three appraisers of our municipality, appointed by the municipal council and sworn in by the secretary-treasurer.

4. That the pieces of land sold to the General Dredging Contractors, Limited, represent an area of about 800,000 square feet, or one-fourth of the total area of the lands.

(Signed) G. Cournoyer,
Secretary-Treasurer.

April 27, 1938.

Now what do we conclude from that? The government owns in St. Joseph de Sorel 3,940,000 square feet of land, which is of course the old ordnance property and the shipyard. The shipyard represents 800,000 square feet, or a little more than one-fifth of the whole. If my hon. friend had gone to the proper town for his tax appraisal he would have found that the appraised value on the books of the town is a little over $100,000, we will say at the outside $125,000, for the shipyard property and the land that was sold. It now stands in the books of the town with an assessment of $150,000 against the new owners. So much for the appraisal of the land.

Now let us come to the auditor general's inventory, which is simply a statement carried in the books of the government showing what various properties cost. There may be some obligation on departments to keep those inventories more or less up to date, and I may say that the rules of the auditor general provide that items shall be entered in the inventory at cost. They are carried at cost until the items are actually disposed of by the government, and of course, some items are never disposed of, so as a result the "inventory" is a more or less meaningless affair. However, the auditor general did call to my attention the fact that our inventory was not up to date and I issued instructions that it be brought up to date. I have in my hand a copy of the document furnished the auditor general by our department, giving the items in detail. This was furnished in response to his request and is the document from which the figures quoted by my hon. friend were taken. In this list there are two columns, the first showing the original cost of the article and the second the market value, as it is described here, as in 1936. The figures given to my hon. friend were the cost figures.

Mr. COLDWELL: What was the date of that document?

Mr. HOWE: February, 1937. It is the inventory of the fleet at the end of 1936, the first inventory of that equipment we ever supplied to the auditor general. This inventory adds up to $7,872,007.01, which is the figure my hon. friend gave.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister stated there was no inventory supplied before. Will he please explain why?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say that; all I know is that the first request came to me, as minister, in 1936, and I complied with it. I thought if the auditor general wanted the inventory he had better have it, and I issued instructions to have it made up and given to him. That was the first request I ever received, and I complied with it as soon as the inventory could be made up.

The figure given by my hon. friend as being the original cost of this equipment was $7,872,007.01. I have the present day value, which was furnished to the auditor general at the same time, and that figure is $1,953,900. However, on this list there are many items that were not sold. For instance, we have the steamship Bellechasse, the steamship Berthier, the steamship Detector, the steamship Frontenac, the tug Lanoraie, the tug Laviolette, and the tug Lavaltrie, which the government still own. Then we have coal barge No. 5, stone lifter No. 4, stone lifter No. 5, sounding scows Nos. 1, 2 and 3; winch scow No. 2; a coal scow; steel catamaran No. 1; wood catamaran No. 2; D. M. motor boats Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. The total cost of the material not sold was $1,327,948.35, giving the net cost of the material sold—and remember this is the cost—of $6,544,058.66. The material not sold, according to the inventory furnished the auditor general, had a market value as of that date of $455,800, leaving the market value of the material sold $1,498,100.

This is the document on which my hon. friend attempted to base his argument that this equipment was ridiculously overvalued. It is the very document he asked for. I am sure if he had asked the auditor general for the present day values, instead of the values as carried on the books of the government, the auditor general would have been glad to give them. If he still wants them, I am sure the auditor general will furnish them, because they appear on the same sheet with the other figures to which my hon. friend referred. According to this statement, which was furnished the auditor general—and because of which my hon. friend asks us to believe that there has been a great scandal—the present day value of the equipment sold is given as $1,498,100 and the sale price of the equipment was $1,494,594, or practically the inventory figure made by the department in February, 1937.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister is telling us now of the equipment he still has on hand. I did not mention anything about the equipment that remained unsold. The figures I quoted covered the list supplied to me by the department, and had nothing to do with the equipment remaining unsold. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend quoted the list furnished him by the department, I take it?

Mr. PELLETIER: That is right.

Mr. HOWE: The figure mentioned by my hon. friend was taken from the auditor general's report, and I have just read from our report to the auditor general. The figure of $7,872,007.01 mentioned by my hon. friend is the figure I have been breaking down for him.

Mr. PELLETIER: I referred to the auditor general's report as of December 31, 1936. I do not know what reports have been made since that time. I have not that information, but that is not material. I am not concerned with what happened after that date; I am talking about the report as it appears in the auditor general's report.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: That is exactly what I am giving. This is the statement from which he made up his figures.

Mr. PELLETIER: Since that time.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. PELLETIER: Since December 31, 1936.

Mr. HOWE: No, it is the only report we ever filed.

Mr. PELLETIER: But it does not change the total of over $7,000,000 for the St. Lawrence ship channel.

Mr. HOWE: I have shown how all that figures out. I think I stated that it was because my hon. friend is absolutely addled as a financier that he has been chosen for this work. I cannot state the position more clearly than I have.

Mr. PELLETIER: Why does the minister say I was chosen for this work? He has no right to say that. Mr. Chairman, I am speaking to a point of order. I do not see why anything like that should be said.

Mr. HOWE: I will put it this way—the person who chose you to take on the work.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is not a withdrawal, and I think the minister should take it back. I was not chosen. I am doing it of my own accord because it is in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer and the truth.

Mr. HOWE: It must have brought you in rontact with very strange friends, then.

Mr. PELLETIER: On a point of order, I think the minister should take that back. He should not say that I was chosen.

Mr. BRADETTE: What about the insinuations you make?

An hon. MEMBER: It is a false accusation.

Mr. HOWE: What is a false accusation?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That anybody hired him to do the work.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say anybody hired him.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That was the inference.

Mr. HOWE: No, I deny that. No insinuation of the kind was made, and I think no hon. member could reasonably take that from what I said. I did not say he was hired for the work.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier), I take it the point is that the remark of the Minister of Transport was that he was chosen—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Chosen by Providence.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion that expression is not out of order.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Chairman, I have absolutely nothing to say. I leave it to the committee to judge whether or not your interpretation of that kind of language is correct.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Peace River has made a reflection upon the Chair which he must withdraw.

Mr. PELLETIER: If I made any reflection upon the Chair, Mr. Chairman, while I cannot see it, I will withdraw it.

Mr. HANSELL: When the Minister of Transport used the word "chosen" the thought that came to my mind was that it might be interpreted that the hon. member had been chosen by this group.

The CHAIRMAN: Would the hon. member speak louder, please?

Mr. HANSELL: When the minister used the term "chosen" the thought came to me that he might have meant the hon. member was chosen by this group, and that is not so. The hon. member has himself stated that he did this entirely of his own accord. That is his privilege. So far as some other hon. members and myself are concerned may I say that we do not know anything more about it than does the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. LANDERYOU: The minister has no right to reflect upon the "friends" of the hon. member.

Mr. HOWE: I make it quite clear that I did not intend to insinuate that any one in the Social Credit party or group chose the hon. member for the work, nor do I wish to intimate that any one paid the hon. member for the work. If any such inference was taken by anyone from my remark I wish to state that no remark of mine is to be taken in that way.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Who are the friends to whom the minister referred?

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister has just said he does not believe the hon. member was chosen by the group, or that he was paid by somebody else. That does not take away from the fact that he has not changed the word "chosen."

Mr. DUNNING: Surely it is not wrong to use the word "chosen." For instance, he might have been chosen by Providence; divine inspiration might have descended upon the hon. member. In view of the hon. member's speech I am surprised he should be so very thin-skinned, because if there is any merit in the hon. member's speech then the Minister of Transport, as he has said himself, ought not to remain in public life. If a man takes the responsibility of making charges of that sort with respect to a minister and a department surely he cannot take exception to the statement that he was chosen to do the work.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Chosen by whom?—that is the point. By whom was he chosen?

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion is quite out of order. The point of order was raised by the hon. member for Peace River, and I gave my ruling, which was that in my opinion the point of order was not well taken. Proceed with the discussion.

Mr. THORSON: Perhaps the hon. member could clear it up by telling the committee who took him to Sorel.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is the point, Mr. Chairman; the inference is thrown right back.

Mr. HOWE: Who did take him?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That must be proven.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is settled; proceed with the discussion.

Mr. MARTIN: Was or was not the hon. member for Peace River taken?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You said he was.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Perhaps to Beauharnois.

Mr. HOWE: I do not wish to labour the point, but may I point out that the principal charges against me were based upon two documents. I believe I have shown the facts so far as the assessment at Sorel goes. The document used was one taken from the records of a town in which no property which was involved in the sale of this shipyard is located. I have given the details which made up the figures which were given. I have also given the figures for the town where the shipyard is located. I have referred to tax records there and I have shown that from the records of the town where the shipyard is located—and I think those are the proper records—the assessment of the property before the sale and to-day is just about what we would expect from the figures and details which I have laid before the house with respect to the sale of equipment.

Then, reference has been made to the auditor general's report. The hon. member was invited to come to the Department of Transport and to see all the details which went to make up that report. He did not go; he preferred to go to Sorel. He would not go across to the Hunter building to see what we had on the subject. Had he gone there he would have seen every detail which went to make up the report and he would have seen the report just as it went to the auditor general. I am sure if he had called at the auditor general's office that official would have been glad to show him the report, just as I have it here to-day.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would my visit have changed the total figures? Had I visited the Hunter building would there have been any change in what the auditor general has on the files?

Mr. HOWE: What does he say the total is?

Mr. PELLETIER: He says the total was $10,958,373.65.

Mr. HOWE: The total of what?

Mr. PELLETIER: The total of the St. Lawrence ship channel, the Sorel shipyard and the Quebec agency.

Mr. HOWE: Where is the Quebec agency located? May I say to the hon. member that it is located in the city of Quebec. What are the other items?

Mr. PELLETIER: There is one for the St. Lawrence ship channel amounting to $7,872,-007.01.

Mr. HOWE: That is the figure I have been reading, and the one we have been discussing. The St. Lawrence ship channel fleet was tied up at Sorel.

Mr. PELLETIER: If I had gone to the Hunter building would those figures have been changed?

Mr. HOWE: No, but you would have found out that it was cost and not value. Had the hon. member gone to the auditor general he would have found out about the figures.

Mr. PELLETIER: The auditor general's instructions are here, and if I must go over them again, I will do so. In regard to values he definitely states how values will be established. His words are these:

It is suggested therefore that property values once established—

[Mr. Howe.]

And those are the important words—"once established." They were established in 1936.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member never reads the pertinent part of a letter. If he would read it from the start he would be more fair. I do not think the hon. member understands it, otherwise I would not be so patient. If he will read it again I will explain it.

Mr. PELLETIER: Perhaps many of us do not.

This inventory should include stationery supplies, travelling accessories such as trunks, bags, cases, etc., and motor vehicles. The actual or approximate cost of each individual item—

Mr. HOWE: Stop right there. He says, "actual or approximate cost." He states that if the cost cannot be determined, then the estimated value should be indicated. Could anything be clearer than that?

Mr. PELLETIER: That is quite clear. I quote:

The actual or approximate cost of each individual item of stores and equipment on hand should be given, but where such information cannot readily be obtained then the estimated value should be indicated. In either case the inventory should be prepared to show the total value of such property on hand.

Those are important words.

Mr. HOWE: We gave both the cost and the value in parallel columns. I shall be glad to file that information, or the hon. member can get it from the auditor general. He chose to take the cost, which was an indication to me that the cost was what he wanted when I had put both figures before him.

Mr. PELLETIER: The auditor general could have used figures other than those he did use?

Mr. HOWE: We furnished the cost and the value.

Mr. PELLETIER: He then goes on to state how the values are to be ascertained:

It is suggested therefore that property values once established, either on a cost or an estimated basis, should be maintained—

When were those values established? They were established in 1936.

Mr. HOWE: But cost is still cost.

Mr. PELLETIER: "Either on a cost or an estimated basis."

Mr. HOWE: We gave him the cost figures because in every case we were able to establish the cost.

Mr. PELLETIER: Nevertheless, it comes down to this: we must take the value as at December 31, 1936, because that is the first time any valuation was made. That is the point that I consider material in this matter. It has not been shown why an inventory was not taken before. We do not know what happened before and we cannot make any comparison with the past.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence ship canal—operation and maintenance, including any portion of contract dredging chargeable to maintenance, $321,600.

Mr. STEWART: Is the considerable decrease in this item due to the sale of part of the fleet?

Mr. HOWE: This item of maintenance dredging was set up last year for the first time. The channel was nearing completion and we thought we should separate the capital vote from the maintenance vote. We voted $438,400 last year, but we found that the actual maintenance dredging cost less than that and we reduced the item accordingly. It is thought that the cost of the maintenance of the channel will stay constant at about this figure.

Mr. STEWART: How much was spent last year under the vote?

Mr. HOWE: I do not appear to have the details of how the money was spent.

Mr. STEWART: If the minister has the estimated figures for this year it will give us a guide.

Mr. HOWE: The amount for permanent staff is $49,270, of which $25,620 is charged to capital dredging. This would leave permanent staff expenditures of $23,650. Then there is:

Temporary assistance, $73,873.86.
Contract dredging, $150,000.
Fuel, staff boats, $21,919.69.
Materials and supplies, staff boats, $8,574.48.
Repairs, plant and equipment, $29,818.03.
Sundries, $13,763.94.

Mr. STEWART: I notice it is proposed to do some contract dredging. Will that be for deepening the channel or just to maintain what has been dredged to the required depth?

Mr. HOWE: It is purely maintenance. There is silting at two points below Quebec and one point below Three Rivers and this must be attended to practically every year.

Mr. STEWART: It is proposed to have some of that work done by contract.

Mr. HOWE: We have no dredging equipment of our own.

Mr. REID: How much money has been spent on dredging in the St. Lawrence during the past five years?

Mr. HOWE: The total expenditure for the period from the fiscal year 1931-32 to the end of the fiscal year 1936-37 was $30,300,000.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the removal of derelicts in Canadian waters, $15,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the committee some information with regard to this? I see it is a new item.

Mr. HOWE: It is new in the main estimates, but an item that has been continued for I think now three years in the special supplementaries. The harbours of Canada were littered with derelicts, and there seemed to be no one responsible for their removal. The derelicts that caused the trouble were those for which no owner could be found and no department would assume responsibility. It is the policy of the Department of Marine to remove these derelicts and to give strict instructions that no more shall be allowed to accumulate in the organized harbours of Canada. I think some $70,000 has been spent on this work altogether, and this item is intended, I believe, to complete the work.

Mr. STIRLING: How, actually, is the work done?

Mr. HOWE: By contract. Each one is treated separately. In some cases it may be a matter of only seventy-five or a hundred dollars, but there have been derelicts that cost from eleven to twelve thousand dollars to remove.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): It applies only to the organized harbours?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and by organized harbour I mean a harbour with a harbour master.

Item agreed to.

To provide towards the construction of a combination icebreaker and service vessel, estimated to cost $600,000—amount required for 1938-39—capital, $200,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Is any part of this spent on the great lakes, around Port Arthur?

Mr. HOWE: This item is for a new service steamer. The fleet, as hon. members who live by the sea are aware, contains some very old vessels. The new boat is to be a combination boat which we hope will mean the scrapping of three of the oldest vessels, the Aranmore, going on now to forty-nine years old, the Bellechasse, and the Lady Grey, both of which are very old and exceedingly expensive to operate. We expect to build a boat which will be able to release these other boats by doing double and triple duty on the St. Lawrence, enabling us to retire these older boats which are very expensive both in operation and in repairs. This $200,000 is part of an expenditure that is estimated to run around $500,000, the $200,000 being required this year.

Mr. STIRLING: How does the new boat compare with the McLean?

Mr. HOWE: This will be of a lighter draft than the McLean. It is being built primarily for icebreaking service in the St. Lawrence. None of the present boats can work back outside the limits of the channel, because of their deep draft; our boats have as deep a draft as the ocean liners, and therefore they must confine their work to the channel. But this lighter draft ice-breaker will be able to work outside the channel. It will also take the place of the Bellechasse, which is the principal staff boat for the St. Lawrence dredging, and it will have buoy-lifting equipment, so that it will be able to help out with the buoys in the spring and fall.

Mr. STEWART: Has the contract been let for this boat?

Mr. HOWE: No, plans have been prepared, but we cannot very well award the contract until the money is voted.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it the expectation that this icebreaker will open the St. Lawrence channel earlier than it has been opened in the past?

Mr. HOWE: No, but we have never failed to get the channel open in time for navigation, that time depending on conditions in the strait of Belle Isle. The channel will not be open any earlier, but we think it will be opened a little more efficiently and a little less expensively.

Mr. BROOKS: So the ports of St. John and Halifax will not suffer by the use of this new equipment?

Mr. HOWE: No, they will be in a neutral position so far as this item is concerned.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

Salaries of Board of Railway Commissioners, $53,500.

Railway grade crossing fund, 19-20 Geo. V, chapter 54, $200,000.

Railway grade crossing fund—amount (in addition to that provided by section 262, subsection (6) of the Railway Act) to be placed to the credit of the railway grade crossing fund, and to be applied by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada pursuant to, and within the limitations of, the provisions of section 262 of the Railway Act, as enacted by chapter 43 of the statutes of Canada, 1928, and amended by chapter 54 of the statutes of Canada, 1929, $300,000.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister give the committee a statement on the present condition of the fund? He will recall that in years gone by there was an accumulation of arrears, as it were; that is, a number of orders had been made but the funds were not available to satisfy the amount which the dominion was required to contribute under the orders. I do not know whether those arrears have been overtaken or just how we stand with respect to our liabilities to the fund.

Mr. HOWE: A revote is required this year for moneys for which we are committed and for work partly done. That revote is not in the main estimates but will be amongst the railway items in the supplementaries. We were not able to determine the amount until the end of the fiscal year, and so the amount was not ready for the main estimates.

Mr. STEWART: Do I understand the minister to say that the liabilities that will be provided for by the main estimates will be approximately $2,000,000.

Mr. HOWE: That will be in the supplementaries.

Mr. STEWART: And this is to take care of what the minister anticipates will be required during the coming fiscal year outside of arrears?

Mr. HOWE: The position is that there is a statutory vote of $200,000 for the grade crossing fund, and this amount of $300,000 is to supplement the statutory vote. Of course, my hon. friend is aware that under the Public Works Construction Act a fund was placed at the disposal of the railway board apart from the statutory vote. It ran to about a million dollars a year. Whether that will be placed at their disposal again will appear later.

Mr. STEWART: Is this amount to take care of anticipated obligations during the coming year outside of any special provision?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: This is a very important item in view of the number of accidents that are occurring at railway crossings, and I would ask the minister what plan the department has for the elimination of railway grade crossings. Is it the intention gradually to eliminate them, and how is the selection made of those which are to be removed at different times?

Mr. HOWE: The selection is made entirely by the board of railway commissioners, who administer this fund. The department has nothing to do with the selection. The board hears applications for the abolition of grade crossings in the order, I suppose, in which they are filed, determines the merits of the application, whether there should be a division of the cost, and if so, what it should be, and then issues its order. The order carries with it, of course, sufficient funds to carry out the government's contribution as assessed by the board. All we do is to vote the money, turn it over to the board of railway commissioners to administer, and approve the orders sent forward.

Mr. BROOKS: Will the most dangerous crossings be eliminated first? Is there a plan working to that end?

Mr. HOWE: The board does not initiate grade crossing projects, but simply passes upon applications made. As a matter of fact there is no great rush of applications to the board, strange as that may seem. Two years ago they were worried because they did not know whether there would be a sufficient number of applications to enable them to spend the money voted by parliament before the vote expired. Any application for a grade crossing project filed with the board receives careful consideration, and if the situation warrants it a proper appropriation is made.

Mr. BROOKS: If it were a very dangerous crossing would the board wait for an application, or would they use their own judgment to eliminate it?

Mr. HOWE: The board does not initiate any projects; application must be made.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Who has control in a situation such as I will now describe? Somewhere close to the city of Grand Forks the railway passes over the main automobile road and there is a bridge constructed of stone and brick, I believe. The road crosses under the railway track, shall we say, from southwest to northeast, but as a result of some stupidness in the construction a gap has been left from southeast to northwest and the road has to be adjusted to go through that gap. This has made the crossing for automobiles extremely dangerous. Is there any supervision over such matters to prevent that sort of thing happening, or when it does begin are steps taken to control it before it is too late?

Mr. HOWE: I hope my hon. friend is not accusing any particular branch of the government, because there are three parties involved, any one of whom might be responsible. The board of railway commissioners has an efficient engineering staff that looks after work of this sort, specializing in grade crossings. The work is carefully planned and supervised, and every precaution is taken against the sort of engineering mistake the hon. gentleman refers to.

Item agreed to.

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada —administration, maintenance and operation, including provision for the appointment of George Kydd as division engineer at a salary of $3,420 per annum, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $262,040.

Mr. GREEN: Does the department intend to increase the number of railway commissioners or increase their salaries in consequence of the new duties placed upon them by reason of the transport act?

Mr. HOWE: Can my hon. friend tell me whether there is to be a transport act or not? There are six commissioners provided for by statute and there is one vacancy at the moment. It is not anticipated that the number of commissioners need be increased, although some additional staff will be required.

Mr. STEWART: This involves an increase of $22,053. The board of railway commissioners is an organization of some years' standing, with a pretty regular and well-established staff, and it might be interesting to know exactly why the increased expenditure this year is required. The minister might also tell us whether this is the first payment to George Kydd, whose salary is stated here to be $3,420. I notice that this appointment is made notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act. It would appear that this gentleman has been appointed to a position outside the provisions of the act. When was he appointed?

Mr. HOWE: Restoration of salary deductions accounts for $10,000; statutory increases $2,000; increase to the secretary authorized by order in council, $500—that is a civil service position—and the position of division engineer to which Mr. George Kydd has been appointed, $3,420. That is not a new position. Then there is a temporary staff of three men. That makes a total of $17,000 in staff. Printing and stationery amount to $3,000; travelling expenses, $2,000; contingencies, $5,500. There were decreases in the salaries of the chief engineer, and the assistant chief engineer, and the deductions total $6,420, the net increase being $22,053.

As regards Mr. George Kydd, he has been an employee of the dominion government for over twenty-five years, having begun on the Trent canal. When the work at Churchill was undertaken he was moved from the Trent canal to that port as engineer in charge. He was at Churchill from about 1919, or at any rate from the time the work was resumed after the war until the completion of the port. While there he was in charge of the entire operation, receiving a salary that was considerably more than he is now getting. We had no further work for him, that being the last construction job we had. Of course construction work at Churchill was not under the civil service commission, so that after twenty years of service—indeed, more than that, twenty-five years—he found himself out of employment and without a pension. He is admirably qualified for the work he is doing for the board of railway commissioners and they were very glad to have his services. Unfortunately he could not technically be approved by the civil service commission, though they admitted that he was undoubtedly qualified. We are of the opinion, therefore, that we are justified in carrying him from year to year by naming him in the estimates.

Mr. GREEN: On page 227, which gives the list of employees whose salaries are included in this vote, there appears an item for a senior electrical engineer, special duties, at $600 per annum. Is he a regular employee of the government, or some outside engineer who is brought in for special work?

Mr. HOWE: That refers to Mr. John Murphy, who, I believe, occupies three positions, one of them being that of electrical engineer to the board of railway commissioners; another is electrical engineer for the Department of Transport; and the third, acting superintendent of the Rideau canal. His position is under the civil service commission and the appointments are approved by the commission. It is purely a civil service job. The amount here represents a division of his salary; $600 of his salary is charged to this vote.

Mr. GREEN: What is his total salary?

Mr. HOWE: His total salary from all sources is $5,520.

Mr. STIRLING: How near are we to the day when the present freight rate structure of Canada will be done away with and a new one, on a perfect basis, substituted therefor? It has appeared to me for a long time that never shall we do away with the preposterous anomalies which exist all over Canada until we get on a proper basis and away from this one which has just grown.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend can name a man who could design a perfect freight rate structure, he would help me more than I can say, and perform a service to the continent of North America for which there is not enough money in the treasury to compensate him. The freight rate structure has grown up over the years; it has been modified for this and for that; it is interwoven between the United States and Canada, and the task of scrapping it and starting afresh would be almost superhuman.

Item agreed to.

Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $51,080.

Mr. GREEN: How many official cars are there, and for what purposes are they used?

Mr. HOWE: There are four official cars owned by the government. One is allotted for the exclusive use of the Prime Minister. The author of the Railway Act, I am happy to say, made it mandatory for the government to provide a car for the exclusive use of the Minister of Transport. The Minister of National Defence has a car; I believe that situation arose during the war. And there is one car to be assigned to any minister travelling on official business.

Mr. DUNNING: The fourth is called "the tramp."

Mr. GREEN: Is there also a regular staff engaged for these cars?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; there is a porter for each car.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay railway—To provide for the difference between expenditures for operation and maintenance, and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1939, not exceeding $370,000.

Mr. PERLEY: This is an item in which the western members are very much interested. I note that there is an increase in this vote. What is the total cost of operation and maintenance, and the total revenue? I trust the government are giving due consideration to that port. It is a very important port, and I have talked with different men interested in shipping who claim that for a considerable part of the year it is as safe as the St.

Lawrence waterways. I trust the government are not slackening in their efforts to make it a success. What effort is the government making to get business for that port?

Mr. HOWE: The vote under consideration is for the Hudson Bay railway. I assume my hon. friend refers to a later vote for the port of Churchill. For the railway the cost of operation last year was $364,000, and of maintenance, $336,500, making a total of $700,500. The operating revenues were $364,000, leaving an estimated deficit of $336,500.

This year we are providing for operating expenses, $329,000 and maintenance, $370,000, or a total of $699,000, and we anticipate an operating revenue of $329,000 and are providing for a deficit of $370,000.

Mr. PERLEY: How many vessels came into that port during last year?

Mr. HOWE: There were two cargoes shipped out last year. There was one in and there were two out.

Mr. PERLEY: What would the cargoes consist of?

Mr. HOWE: The incoming cargo was general merchandise. The boat is put on the berth at London for all goods offering for movement into western Canada by Churchill. It takes general merchandise, hardware, fencing, glass, binder twine, material of that kind.

Mr. PERLEY: The outgoing cargoes were what?

Mr. HOWE: Entirely wheat.

Mr. PERLEY: As this Hudson Bay railway and the port are more or less the baby of the Minister of Finance, I trust the government are making every effort to make that port a success. I think if a little more advertising were done and effort made to get business, it might be put on a paying basis. If they could get another $370,000 worth, it would practically carry its operating expenses.

Mr. HOWE: Last year, as my hon. friend knows, was a very exceptional year in grain traffic. There was a premium for cash wheat over the option as high as twenty-five and thirty cents, and naturally wheat at Churchill is not cash wheat. So market conditions put Churchill out of line last year. For a time Vancouver was in almost the same position. Some years ports have a good flow of the grain, and in others they do not. We did everything possible to attract grain to Churchill last year, but the best position we could find would have required a cash contribution from the government of about eight cents a bushel to justify the movement of grain to Churchill.

Mr. STEWART: Are the expenses of the operation of the elevator included in this?

Mr. HOWE: No; this is just the railway. The port is another item; we shall come to it later.

Mr. GREEN: What passenger and freight service is given on this railway? Would the minister give a short review of the present situation, the kind of traffic that is carried, whether it is operated all winter, and other details?

Mr. HOWE: In the summer months the train runs every second day between The Pas and Churchill. It is a mixed train, a way freight with passenger accommodation. That train leaves The Pas one day and comes back the next. Of course, when grain is moving, additional freights are put on as required. In the winter the service is cut down to one trip a month through to Churchill, but there is a weekly service between Gillam and The Pas. Gillam is about three hundred miles from The Pas.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any increase in the freight traffic, or are any mines being opened up along the railway?

Mr. HOWE: As my hon. friend knows, the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company's mine at Flinflon is tributary to this line, as is also the Sherritt-Gordon mine. We have heavy traffic over the part near The Pas from these mines. Unfortunately no further worthwhile mining development has been discovered along the line.

Mr. CRERAR: Before the item passes perhaps I may be permitted to say a word or two, because this railway is in the constituency I represent in this house.

Mr. STEWART: It is your baby just now.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, and I am rather proud of the baby. The Minister of Transport has mentioned the mining development in northern Manitoba. It may be of interest to the committee to learn that to-day there are five operating mines in Manitoba north of the town of The Pas, four in the western part of the province and one in the eastern part. Seventy miles from The Pas, at Flinflon, is the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company operation, which gives steady employment to 1,700 men, and produces copper, zinc, gold, silver and some other rare metals. Eighty miles north of The Pas is the jumping-off place for another mine which came into operation two years ago and to-day gives steady employment, as I recall, to something like 150 men. Then, still further north, about 250 miles, is a point called Ilford, from which all the freight goes into the God's Lake mine in eastern Manitoba, and another development that is taking place east of that again in the province of Ontario at a place called Sachego lake.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister say how many miles up the railway it is to that connection for God's lake?

Mr. CRERAR: It is at a place called Ilford. I am not sure of the distance, but my recollection is that it is about 250 miles.

Mr. STIRLING: Long before the crossing of the river?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, before we came to the Nelson river. At the moment this is really a pioneer road. I have not the slightest doubt that if it had not been for the last eight years of depression the progress in northern Manitoba, as indeed in the northern parts of our other provinces, would have been very much greater than it has been. Undoubtedly, in this northern country, in Manitoba as well as in the other provinces, there are all the evidences of rich mineral possibilities. While I am aware of the popular notion held in eastern Canada with regard to the Hudson Bay railway; while I am aware of the fact that some people fairly high in authority have condemned it, nevertheless I venture to say that the time will come when the Hudson Bay railway will justify its construction and operation just as much as the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway has justified its construction and operation in the province of Ontario. Even in my brief memory I can recall that when the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario was built there was a great deal of opposition to the spending of money to build a road into a wilderness that would never produce anything. Well, development has entirely belied those statements, and I am equally certain that the same thing will hold true of the Hudson Bay railway.

I might just add this, that I think Canadians generally fail to appreciate the possibilities of the development of wealth in our northern areas. Certainly one of the essentials for that development is transportation. While it is true that we have been obliged to provide sums of money to make up deficits resulting from the operation of this road, I am quite certain that the day will come when these deficits will cease and the developments along the road will be making a worthwhile contribution to the wealth of this country. It was unfortunate that, because of conditions in the west last year, no grain went to Churchill. Undoubtedly Churchill will ship grain; but last year Saskatchewan produced scarcely enough wheat for its own bread and seed, and under those conditions no grain was available to go to Churchill. My colleague the Minister of Transport referred to the market conditions that obtained during practically the whole season. Because of the scarcity of our hard wheat on the prairies, the cash premiums on spot grain went to as high as twenty-five or thirty cents a bushel over the future months. Consequently grain could not be sent to Churchill, or rather it could be sent there, but no dealer or trader would take the risk of purchasing it under these high premiums unless he was sure he could move it out to take advantage of the market at any moment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister still thinks it is a practicable route for the future?

Mr. CRERAR: I have never had any doubt of that, and I have never been more certain of it than I am at this time. That route will develop. The time will come when it will be one of the important trade and development routes of Canada. It may not be in our day, but that time will come. I am satisfied that in regard to northern Manitoba and the Hudson Bay railway we shall have a repetition of the very fine contribution that has been made by the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway to the development of northern Ontario.

I just wished to say this word in justification of this vote, because I would not want hon. members to continue in the view—if they hold it—that is held by some of our friends and critics in eastern Canada, that the Hudson Bay railway is simply a great sink-hole which never should have been built. It is a development road. The criticism may be made that it was built a little ahead of time. I do not think so. Certainly, if that road had not been built to The Pas and had not been extended further, we would not have had the great mining development that has taken place even in Manitoba within the last ten years. I am sure hon. members will agree that if this country needs anything to-day, it needs development of our hidden wealth, because only in that way can we reach a national income which will enable us to carry the burdens that have been placed not only upon the federal government but upon provincial governments as well.

Mr. GREEN: I heartily agree with everything that has been said by the Minister of Mines and Resources with regard to the importance of developing our northern country. The Minister of Transport has stated that there is only one train a month into Churchill during the winter. Is there any air service? If not, it does seem to me that those people should be given better service than one train a month.

Mr. CRERAR: There is one train a month to Churchill from The Pas, it is true, but there is a regular service every week to a point something beyond mile 300, which serves the intermediate country. The monthly service to Churchill is sufficient to meet the needs of the town during those months of the year when the port is icebound. The weekly service supplies the mining areas on either side of the road that I mentioned a little earlier.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the population of the port during the closed season?

Mr. CRERAR: It depends upon the volume of trade.

Mr. HOWE: There are about 200 people, including employees of the port, railway men and a few wives.

Mr. PERLEY: How many are temporary and how many are permanent employees?

Mr. HOWE: May I remind hon. members that for the moment we are discussing a railway item. When we reach the appropriate vote in the estimates, we shall give the information.

Mr. GREEN: Is the government doing anything to induce or to assist prospectors to get into the area by way of building trails or roads, so that they can get at the mineralized area? If so, what is being done? It is important, so far as the railway is concerned, because we know the railway needs traffic.

Mr. HOWE: I would suggest that if the hon. member wishes to become clear on the point, he should take a trip over the line some time, especially when he talks about trails over the barren lands.

Mr. GREEN: I am asking for information.

Mr. HOWE: The section near Churchill is not a very good prospecting country; we shall put it in that way.

Mr. GREEN: Then the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Mines and Resources do not agree. There is something wrong there, somewhere.

Mr. CRERAR: I dissent from the remark of my colleague the Minister of Transport. There is a lot of very good prospecting territory for several hundred miles north of The Pas; our geological reports so indicate. The same is true of northern Saskatchewan. I would make the statement for the first three hundred or three hundred and fifty miles along the railway, from The Pas, north.

Possibly at this point I should mention another interesting fact. The Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company at Flinflon have invested over $30,000,000 in that north country. They have a power plant on the Churchill river seventy miles north of Flinflon. A year ago they had to add an additional unit to that plant, and this year they are adding another one. I believe they will now reach their maximum development on the Churchill river. On the Nelson river, farther east, several hundred thousand horse power of electrical energy is capable of development.

My point is that the whole area is only in the beginning of its development. With the railway we now have facilities whereby prospectors can get in. With the aid of aeroplanes from The Pas and Flinflon they can cover quite a large area economically. Under the vote for mining roads which has been passed by parliament in each of the last two years, sums of money have been spent on small improvements here and there to reduce costs of transportation. The work may be that of taking rocks out of a stream to permit the passage of a loaded canoe or boat. It may be that of putting in a dam here or there to raise the water and make a stream navigable. It may be the work of clearing ground around a portage, or building short stretches of road. All these improvements cheapen the cost of getting essential materials into the country to help in its development. That procedure has been followed not only in Manitoba but in Ontario and Quebec, and particularly in British Columbia. I would say to the hon. member for Vancouver South that I doubt if there is any province in Canada which has benefited more from those expenditures than has British Columbia. We are trying only to carry along a sensible development. I do not believe I can add anything further; perhaps I have already taken up too much time of the committee.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the Minister of Mines and Natural Resources that he might be helped a great deal in the development of northern Manitoba if he borrowed the official railway car of the Minister of Transport and took that minister for a trip to Churchill in order to convince him with respect to the resources in the territory.

Mr. CRERAR: I have already obtained a promise from the Minister of Transport, and I serve notice upon him here that I shall hold him to that promise to go to Churchill this summer.

Mr. HOWE: So that there may be no misunderstanding, I have made more trips over the line from The Pas to Churchill and I have spent more time in Churchill than has any other man in the house.

Mr. PERLEY: It would appear from his last statement that the minister must have had something to do with the building of the elevators there, before he joined the government. We must remember that the Minister of Transport is the member for Port Arthur. I do not think we shall find among the electors in that constituency much enthusiasm for the port of Churchill. Possibly the Minister of Mines and Resources was out of order in discussing the item. I must say, however, that he has not given much encouragement with respect to developments or efforts being made to make it a grain port. He has cited the premium on wheat at Fort William. I have no doubt the grain men who have interests at Fort William will never be great boosters for Churchill. I trust, however, that both ministers will set aside their personal interests in their respective constituencies and put forth a greater effort to get grain traffic to the port.

Mr. WARD: I believe the building of the Hudson Bay railway was just a further example of the faith of our people in the future of Canada. I imagine that the gentlemen who sat in this house in the days when the Canadian Pacific railway was being built from eastern to western Canada, or in the days of early development at Montreal, heard the same questions asked as have been asked today with respect to Churchill and the Hudson Bay railway. It was my privilege to visit Churchill on the first passenger train which went to the port, at a time when the present Minister of Finance was Minister of Railways and the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) was an engineer—

An hon. MEMBER: Did he run the locomotive?

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. WARD: He was going to Churchill to lay the foundations for the elevator. That building has been referred to as one of the finest structures of its kind in the world. I have continued to visit Churchill for about two weeks each summer, because I like the place very much. Up to date I believe the railway has justified its existence and all the money which has been invested in it. Hon. members have spoken with respect to the failure of Churchill as a wheat port. I believe if those hon. members would look at the wheat quotations for October wheat in 1936 and 1937, they would find that on the option market alone there was in both years an average spread of about fifteen cents between October and May wheat. Would any one in this chamber who had money to invest, invest it in October wheat and store it at Churchill when May wheat was fifteen cents below the October price? Of course no one would do that, and I say that is the reason why the Churchill elevator has not been used.

If the west has a fair crop this year, it is my opinion that we shall not be able to handle the wheat offered to Churchill. We must have confidence in the future of that port. During a stay at The Pas last fall I got a car one afternoon and drove about fifteen miles up the Carrot river valley in the direction of Nipawin, and while on that trip I was amazed to see the wonderful quality of the land in the valley. I was told that there was a large acreage of land, with rich alluvial deposits, and free from stone, to be settled and developed. I have in mind one farmer about ten miles from The Pas who threshed 5,000 bushels of grain last year. I inquired from a man who had made a trip overland from The Pas to Nipawin, a distance of about 130 miles, and he told me that some day that district would be one of the finest agricultural districts in western Canada. I say to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) that when that day comes, we shall not have anything to worry about as far as the Hudson Bay railway or Churchill is concerned. That railway will be one of the most important lines in Canada.

Mr. PERLEY: I agree with what the hon. gentleman is saying.

Mr. WARD: All that is required is a little more confidence in the future of the country. We should appreciate the agricultural and mining possibilities of that north country. I am convinced that some day there will be half a million people on agricultural land between The Pas and Churchill. Only forty-two miles north east of The Pas I saw as fine vegetables as could be found anywhere in Canada. Grain ripens in that district, as do pumpkins and tomatoes. They can grow anything that can be grown in the Niagara peninsula, with the exception of peaches and a few things like that. In 1927 The Pas won the district prize for vegetables, competing with the whole province. The future of that country is just as assured as was the future of Montreal seventy-five years ago.

I rose in my place to criticize the government for the smallness of the vote being provided this year for this district. Large expenditures are being made in connection with Montreal and other points along the St. Lawrence river, but the expenditures for this district are quite small. I wonder if they are adequate? I have every confidence in the ability of the minister, and I know he is sympathetic toward the Hudson Bay railway and the port of Churchill. However, I submit that port will not be able to achieve its maximum development without the establishment of a bonded warehouse. A seasonal port like Churchill requires a place where an importer can store his goods until he is ready to distribute them throughout the country. A bonded warehouse does not mean that goods come in free of duty; it simply means that a place is provided in which goods may be stored and the payment of duty and other charges deferred until the goods are distributed. I had hoped that some consideration would have been given to this matter this year. There is a warehouse there at the present time, but it is not large enough. Perhaps a division could be made to provide for bonded facilities, but it would be better to extend the warehouse. An expenditure of $10,000 or $20,000 would permit of a considerable extension of the warehouse to accommodate the binder twine, glass, barbed wire and other commodities that are imported into this country to be used principally in western Canada. I hope serious consideration will be given during the coming year to the establishment of a bonded warehouse at Churchill.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, it will be recalled that I had my little say on this matter during the debate on the address. The minister was good enough to state at that time that he would give an outline of the activities of the department in connection with drumming up freight for this route. I remember I read the report of the debate in the papers next morning, and I saw where some one who should have known better referred rather disdainfully to the fact that there had not been a carload of wheat shipped through that port last year. I am sorry to have to state that there have not been many cars of wheat of last year's growing shipped from Saskatchewan to any other port. We cannot ship what we do not grow. Present prospects would seem to indicate that we shall soon be getting back to normal production.

I do not want to count chickens before they are hatched, but nature in the form of abundant moisture would seem to be setting the hen for a crop.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) speak so hopefully of this project. Churchill was a good port before Montreal or the St. Lawrence route had been used to any extent. It is true that Jacques Cartier landed at Gaspé four hundred years ago, but it was some time after that before any great amount of traffic was going over the St. Lawrence route. I do not want to be thought to be decrying that route; that is not my intention at all. I am glad to see these dredging expenditures being made, because, with our water disappearing, it is necessary to deepen and widen this route. I hope to see the day when Montreal will be an all year port. Everything would seem to indicate that this may happen. I believe our experts and scientists have the ability to perform a feat of that kind. If this can be done, then the same enterprise can produce relatively the same results for Churchill so far as safe navigation for four months in the year is concerned and possibly more.

I was quite encouraged to-day by hearing what I did hear. I could not hear the minister very well, or the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) or the hon. gentleman in the back benches from a Conservative riding, but I understand there was no disposition to discount the possibilities of the Hudson bay route. Two hundred years ago there was on the Prince of Wales island a fortification stronger than any other in Canada at that time. This had been built by the Hudson's Bay Company, possibly with the assistance of the British government. I nearly lost my political scalp when the matter of this port location was trembling in the balance. Perhaps I would have, if it had not been for the truth of that old Indian legend that you cannot scalp a bald man. However, that trouble has been satisfactorily overcome. I am hopeful that with a return to normal production and prosperity generally, we shall see millions of bushels of grain going through Churchill. I hope to see not only grain but other farm products, as well as a considerable incoming, movement of domestic requirements. After all, no port can hope for ultimate success without both incoming and outgoing freight haulage.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has always been a great booster for the Hudson Bay railway; but I regret that on certain occasions when he could have exerted more influence to have this route built a little earlier, he did not take advantage of his opportunities. I can remember when the hon. member was interested in an election in 1908. We have a splendid theatre building in my town, and I can still remember the motto that was displayed at a Liberal meeting. It read: "Laurier will build the Hudson Bay railway, not to-morrow but now." We know when it was built; it was years later. The hon. member has always been a booster for this route, and I was glad to hear him express himself as he did.

Mr. BROOKS: There was one remark made by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) to which I should like to take exception. He said that he hoped he would live long enough to see Montreal made a winter port. I am sure we all wish the hon. member for Melville, who is one of the grand old men of this house, many years of life, but I certainly do not wish to see him live long enough to see the port of Montreal one of the winter ports of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. BROOKS: "Why not?" The maritime provinces have made sacrifices continually for the rest of Canada. Why should the western provinces, in order to save a few cents in freight rates on grain, which I assume would be the reason, wise to sacrifice the ports of Saint John and Halifax? That sort of thing has been going on for years; it is a sentiment which we in the maritime provinces resent very much, and I believe that sentiment is not shared by many in western Canada and in other parts of this country.

Mr. STEWART: The minister stated that the expenditures at the port of Churchill might be found under another item. Is it under national harbours?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay railway—construction and improvements—capital, $25,000.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the nature of this expenditure?

Mr. HOWE: This is just a capital vote. The amount asked for is required to continue the work started in 1908 on the Hudson Bay railway project. The construction of the railway is practically completed, and the road is in good operating condition although it is likely for several years to require a certain amount of ballasting and drain filling to make up for the settlement and shrinkage which will undoubtedly occur in the embankments. This amount will provide for the excavation of off-take ditches, the elimination of timber trestles and the construction of cedar culverts where additional openings are required.

Item agreed to.

Maritime Freight Rates Act—

To hereby authorize and provide for the payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1938-39 to the Canadian National Railway Company of the difference (estimated by the auditors of the said company and certified by the said auditors to the Minister of Transport as and when required by the said minister) occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (upon the same basis as set out in section 9 of the said act with respect to companies therein referred to) on all traffic moved during the year 1938, under the tariffs approved, on the eastern lines (as referred to in section 1 of the said act) of the Canadian National Railways, $2,278,000.

Mr. HOWE: This item was considered and approved in the railway committee, but I assume it should be called here.

Mr. STEWART: How is the increase of $478,000 made up?

Mr. HOWE: As was explained in the railway committee, this is a statutory item and the increased requirement is due to increased business.

Mr. STEWART: The minister anticipates that?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It is twenty per cent of whatever business moves under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. We had to supply a deficit on last year's operations, which has appeared in the supplementaries for last year. This year we are appropriating approximately the actual cost of last year.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to provide for payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1938-39 of the difference, estimated by the board of railway commissioners and certified by the said board to the Minister of Transport as and when required by him, occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (referred to in section 9 of the said act) on all traffic moved during 1938, under the tariffs approved by the following companies: Canada & Gulf Terminal Railway; Canadian Pacific Railway, including: Fredericton & Grand Lake

Coal & Railway Company; New Brunswick Coal & Railway Company, Cumberland Railway & Coal Company, Dominion Atlantic Railway, Maritime Coal, Railway & Power Company, Sydney & Louisburg Railway, Temiscouata Railway Company, $860,000.

Mr. STEWART: Is this item also under the Maritime Freight Rates Act?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The previous item applied to the Canadian National Railways, and this one applies to the Canadian Pacific railway and other railways which receive payments under that act.

Mr. STEWART: To railways other than the Canadian National.

Item agreed to.

Interest on rails rolled for Canadian National Railways: To provide for payment of interest under the terms and conditions of orders in council P.C. 1462 and P.C. 1533 of June 7, 1935, respecting orders of steel rails for the Canadian National Railway Company, $30,000.

Mr. STEWART: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. HOWE: Under the Public Works Construction Act of 1935, orders were placed for steel rails in anticipation of requirements, the provision being that the government advance to the railways a portion of the cost of the rails and undertake to pay interest on the balance until the rails were required. These rails have been gradually taken into stock as the railways could use them, and the $30,000 represents the interest on the rails which are still in store at the steel plants, and of which the railways have not taken delivery.

Mr. STEWART: Has the minister any idea when delivery is likely to be taken and the complete obligation terminated?

Mr. HOWE: We are taking this year all our rails except a certain amount of 130-pound rails. The main line improvements have not been proceeding rapidly enough to give us any assurance when we shall be able to take the last of the 130-pound rails, but I think it will be in two or three years.

Item agreed to.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT SWEEPSTAKES ORGANIZED BY PROVINCES FOR BENEFIT OF UNIVERSITIES OR HOSPITALS

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bertrand (Laurier) for the second reading of Bill No. 28, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier): It is almost two months since we started discussing this question. When the debate was adjourned on the last occasion I intended to quote Mr. Peter McGibbon, at one time member of parliament for Muskoka, Ontario. In 1934 Mr. McGibbon said:

I am more concerned with the possibilities for good, with the amelioration of the sufferings of humanity, and the lessening of the economic wastage of the human machine through the instrumentality of this bill than I am with the methods or the disputed morality connected with it.

The objections to this bill are all directed from the point of view of morality. I have received a large number of letters from persons throughout the country, a few in protest and also some marked copies of newspapers, to which I should like to direct the attention of the house. I have here a copy of The New Outlook, which, I believe, is published in Toronto. It is a marked copy, and there is in it an article entitled "Sweepstakes; a Moral Issue." The moral issue seems to be the scarecrow argument against sweepstakes. Here is an article that is typical of a large number of others written against the bill. The author is a Mr. Mutchmor, who gives as his qualification the fact that he is associate secretary, department of social service and evangelism. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to bear that in mind—evangelism. I want to show how charitable the evangelists are in this instance. This is what the writer says:

"With an Ontario-Quebec gang-up" to compel the federal government to amend section 236 of the criminal code in order that Mr. Bertrand's bill to legalize sweepstakes may be passed, we find ourselves in danger of a gambling craze similar to that experienced just after the war. Mr. Bertrand stated in the House of Commons that such legalized sweepstakes would help the Catholic university of Montreal. Such an argument is hardly sufficient, when we consider the moral issues at stake.

I have already quoted another author who wrote on lotteries, H. M. Muller. She has given a good deal of information and considerable data in relation to sweepstakes and lotteries. At page 64 I find the following:

> The records show that by an act of parliament money was raised by lottery for the British Museum. Also England provided money for our Virginia colonists by means of a lottery. Thomas Jefferson heartily endorsed a lottery created by congress. John Adams and Benjamin Franklin obtained a "lottery loan" to meet government bills.

And so on.

I wish to call the attention of the house to one extremely uncharitable paragraph in Mr. Mutchmor's article. He says:

> Perhaps one of the greatest moral weaknesses, if the proposed bill is passed, will reveal itself in the civil service.

All we are asking the house to do is to pass a bill which will permit of the organization of lotteries under the absolute control of the legislatures, and this gentleman who is typical of all those who are opposed to the bill, declares that the weakness is in the civil service. He says:

> Corrupt practices endanger good government.

We knew that before he said it.

> We raise some pertinent questions: Who will receive the printing contracts? Which political friends will have the commission and sale of tickets? Whose nephews and nieces, cousins and sweethearts—

Mark you, Mr. Speaker, "sweethearts."

> —will be employed as stenographers and clerks? The state has too small a credit on its moral ledger to extend any more business privileges to such a group as the gambling fraternity.

I strongly protest against such articles. Merely because we wish to give the provinces the right to permit the organization of lotteries for charitable purposes, I do not see how we can be opposed on the ground that the object is to give employment to cousins or nephews or sweethearts or anybody else.

An hon. MEMBER: What paper is that?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is the New Outlook, and the author of the article is Mr. J. R. Mutchmor, associate secretary, department of social service and evangelism.

Mr. HANSELL: What is he secretary of?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): He is the associate secretary of the department of social service and evangelism. That is all. That is what appears under the title of the article in this marked copy which was sent to me.

Mr. HANSELL: He must be secretary of something.

[Mr. E. Bertrand.]

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I take it he is the associate secretary of the department of social service and evangelism. He is not identified any further than that. As I say, I have received a large number of letters and marked newspapers, and one letter that did surprise me came from the association of rural municipalities of Saskatchewan, because I had been told that in the rural municipalities people were opposed to sweepstakes for charitable purposes, and when I showed this communication to my good friend the hon. member for Saskatoon I believe that he, too, was surprised. In March of the present year a resolution was passed by the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities at a meeting at which there were 650 delegates. They unanimously voted in favour of the resolution supporting the present bill. I have here a letter from the secretary of the association. He says in part:

> In my letter of the 25th ultimo I quoted resolution No. 33 which would come before the 33rd annual convention of this association which was held in Saskatoon on March 2, 3 and 4, 1938. I am now pleased to advise you that when the said resolution was presented to the 650 delegates there was not a single vote registered in opposition to the suggestion for legalization of sweepstakes for hospital purposes.

Mr. PERLEY: Who signed that?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): He describes himself as secretary, and his name starts with "G."

Mr. YOUNG: If his name starts with "G," the hon. member has the wrong secretary!

Mr. DUNNING: In any case he is merely transmitting a resolution.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I would ask the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young), who knows every one of his constituents, to give me the right name.

Mr. YOUNG: It is Mr. J. J. McGurran.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Since this bill was introduced, everyone knows that the Ontario legislature has passed a bill which is ready to be put into force; now we have the province of Quebec; we have such bodies as this association of Saskatchewan; we have resolutions of different municipalities in and outside the province of Quebec. I even got a letter from the secretary of the city of Calgary, asking me if the bill could be extended so that they could organize a sweepstakes to build a gymnasium for the young men of Calgary. We have the plebiscite that was taken in the beautiful city of Vancouver where the result was 27,000 for and 9,000 against, if I remember correctly.

Mr. DUNNING: In favour of sweepstakes?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, in favour of sweepstakes.

Mr. BARBER: A very large vote for a city of that size!

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, I am ashamed to say I have never been west and have never been in Vancouver.

Mr. BARBER: In the third largest city in Canada, 27,000 votes for sweepstakes!

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, perhaps a lot of people who did not vote are of my opinion. Anyhow those who took the trouble to vote were three to one in favour of lotteries.

Since this bill was introduced, something very important happened. There was a drawing for the Irish Sweepstakes for the benefit of the hospitals in Ireland. The newspapers tell us that in Toronto alone there were about 300,000 people who had bought tickets, and that three times a year Torontonians were buying tickets to the extent of $1,000,000 each time. Does it not strike anyone that this money which is going to foreign countries should be made to stay here?

Mr. BARBER: If this legislation were enacted, would it stop the sale of Irish Sweepstakes tickets in this country?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): My answer is that it would stop it to the extent that legislation for the control of liquor has stopped the illicit sale of liquor. I do not see why, if the government of Ontario or Quebec or any other province are interested in selling something for the benefit of their hospitals or universities, they would not go to the trouble of stopping illicit sale. I am sure they would to a very large extent. I do not know why any Canadian would buy tickets for the Irish Sweepstakes when he could buy a ticket here the benefit of which would go to a charitable institution in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: He does not buy his ticket for that purpose.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, that is a question. I would not go to the extent of agreeing with my hon. friend, who implies by his question that the 300,000 Torontonians who buy tickets are buying them just for the sake of winning a large amount of money. It is the pleasure of buying the tickets.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BERTAND (Laurier): The average intelligence of Canadians is high enough to know the chances they have when they buy a ticket. But they buy it for the pleasure of it. And the pleasure would be much greater if they knew that the money was going to be invested in something that would benefit the community. We have a law which was passed in 1936. I do not know whether hon. members realize that when the best newspapers of Canada published last March the results of the drawing of the Irish Sweepstakes they were committing a criminal offence for which the president or general manager could be sent to gaol for one year. I have some newspapers here, among them Le Canada, which is a good newspaper, the Montreal Gazette, the Toronto Globe and Mail, all the newspapers of Ottawa; yet according to this law passed in 1936 amending the criminal code they committed an offence for which the manager or president could be sent to gaol for one year. It shows the fallacy of such laws. Let me read it. I leave out the words which are not necessary for the purpose of this argument. It is 1 Edward VIII, chapter 29, paragraph 7, amending section 227 of the criminal code. Common betting place is now defined as:

> . . . an office, room or place which is opened, kept or used for the purpose of facilitating or encouraging or assisting in the making of bets upon horse races by announcing the results of horse races whether such horse race takes place in Canada or elsewhere.

If we have reached the stage where we can put upon our statutes laws creating criminal offences which can be committed publicly right at the door of parliament, it is about time that we see to it, when we know that so many millions are going out of the country for this purpose.

I said the purpose of the bill is not to encourage the gambling habit; it is to keep that money here—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time to speak.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I was just going to conclude. In the argument on this question in this house in 1934 the Prime Minister of that day, who is now the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), quoted some lines written as an epitaph by Hone, when George IV ended what his father George III had done and stopped lotteries. This epitaph indicated that lotteries in England were killed forever. Yes, Mr. Speaker, killed at the rate of £18,000,000 in three years just for the Irish Sweepstakes: I much prefer the verse of Rudyard Kipling in which he says:

> If you can make one heap of all your winnings,
> And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
> And lose, and start again at your beginnings,
> And never breathe a word about your loss.

If he were the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) I think he would vote for this bill.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member introduced his bill on March 15, he gave us his arguments in support of this measure, and I think that this evening he has added very little to those arguments.

First of all, he claims that this measure will put an end to illegality. That is a mere statement; there has been no information brought forward indicating that it will work in that way, and although one cannot bring statistical proof in a matter of this kind, undoubtedly general experience would seem to indicate that legalizing sweepstakes rather tends to encourage the practice of gambling. In any case there has been no evidence whatever brought before this house that it would put an end to it.

Again we are told that legislation of this kind might divert some of the money which now goes to Ireland. Again that is a hope, but notwithstanding what the hon. member has said to-night—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): If it is true that so many millions of dollars are going there, what else can we do to stop it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is entirely another matter. This is not going to stop it; there is no evidence whatever that it will do so. In my judgment, which I give for what it is worth, if we go in for this sort of thing and encourage it, it is more likely to lead to still larger amounts going to Ireland or any other place where people think they can get something for nothing.

We are being asked to endorse this measure on the ground that it will help to support hospitals and universities, particularly the university of Montreal. Well, I am not going to be led away by an appeal for sympathy for one particular institution in one particular province. In dealing with the criminal code we should think of the whole of Canada, the welfare of all the people, rather than the welfare of some particular institution. I go down to Montreal now and I find that they support their hospitals, in part at least, by a tax on food. You cannot get a meal in a restaurant without paying that tax. I do not see why the wealthy municipality of Montreal and the comparatively wealthy province of Quebec cannot support these hospitals, as other provinces are able to do, through the taxes of the people or through voluntary effort.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This is a tax.

[Mr. E. Bertrand.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, no. I wonder that the hon. member suggests that; I cannot see anything analogous to a tax in this proposal. The hon. member says:

—if this bill were passed almost everybody, even the unemployed, would readily buy a ticket to take a chance on a sweepstake for the benefit of our hospitals and universities.

The hon. gentleman has just said that this is a tax; and, if it is a tax, he proposes to tax even the unemployed. That is going a long way. I should say the equitable way—decent thing—would be to tax the wealthy, who can easily afford to pay such a tax, not to try to wring it out of the poor people, even the unemployed, on the odd chance of their winning something. What a policy! Extract the very last drop from the poor, in the vain hope that by taking a chance of this kind they may get something out of it!

The hon. member administered a rebuke to the Social Service Council of Canada. Possibly it was merited; that is, if we interpret that statement which was read into Hansard as meaning we should not pass this legislation because of the effect it might have on church givings. I am not quite sure whether or not that is what it means, but I would say that churches and charitable institutions are in a very bad way indeed if they must live through the avails of a prostituted desire for gain. I hope the churches and charitable institutions have not sunk quite so low as that.

The hon. gentleman goes back several hundred years and tells us that some of the big universities were founded through lotteries. I have not checked that statement; it may be so, but in those days we had slavery and a great many other evils which we have since outgrown. He says the universities were born in sin but they are not looked down upon to-day. Well, to put it in other words, that means that the end justifies the means. I think that is one of the ideas underlying the appeal we have heard to-night, that the end justifies the means. Some of us cannot accept that teaching.

The city of Vancouver has been lauded by the hon. member for Laurier. If he will go to Vancouver he will find that in that city birth control is openly advocated. I do not know whether or not he will laud that, but to be consistent he should be rather inclined to look to Vancouver for a lead along this line.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I did not go back two, three or four hundred years, in making my statement about universities, because I could not find any examples to give as of to-day. Russia is one country where they have sweepstakes organized by the government; other countries are France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Denmark, Holland, Luxemburg, Australia, New South Wales, China, Sweden, Turkey, Mexico, Panama, Cuba, Serbia, Algeria, and the Argentine Republic.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman gives us some further information. I am rather surprised that he goes to Russia to find an example. The other day he said:

—after all, universities like Oxford, Harvard, the University of Paris, were all started on lotteries—

That was the statement to which I had reference. If I understand it aright, the principle underlying gambling is that we are trying to get something for nothing. "Something for nothing"—that is the underlying principle. Strip away all these other special pleas. It is the desire of certain people—and I think it is well founded—that in this way they can raise more money than in some other ways, but down underneath they rely upon the all too prevalent desire to get something for nothing.

I admit that the defeat of this legislation will not prevent gambling of a more serious kind, gambling in real estate, on the grain exchange, in stocks and shares and that sort of thing. Big gambling of that kind, which in my judgment is a much more serious type of gambling, is not touched by anti-gambling legislation.

Further, I submit that there is a difference between a man making an odd bet—whether or not that is justified I am not going to discuss—and the legalizing by this parliament of sweepstakes as a method of carrying on the necessary institutions of our country.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this country was founded on the ideal that prosperity should come to people not through chance but rather as the reward of patient industry. I do not think it is in the interest of our people that we should turn ourselves into a nation of gamblers even to support the various concerns that need assistance. We have generally gone on the principle that people should support worthy institutions either by means of taxation or by means of voluntary contributions. The change proposed would be a backward step. I believe that more and more we shall have to raise our funds for social services through taxation. That is the fairest way of doing it, because in that way the incidence falls upon those who are best able to bear the load. Undoubtedly there are a great many things which will still have to be cared for by means of voluntary gifts. I hope in such cases, we shall still continue to be in a position to give freely without having to be induced to give by the thought that possibly we may get back more than we give.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate because of convictions which may be just as strong as those which prompted the hon. member to sponsor the measure. May I, first of all, congratulate him upon the literature he has been reading lately. We have been taught by our early teachers that the more we read about a thing the more we become like it; I would say that the New Outlook would come in the first rank of clean literature in Canada, and I should like at this time to pay tribute to Mr. Mutchmor, the social worker who wrote the article. I know the gentleman well; he is a better man than I am. I might not compare favourably with the hon. member who sponsored the measure, but I do know that Mr. Mutchmor is a better man than I am, morally, spiritually and intellectually. It is for that reason I believe that he would compare favourably with the best men in the house.

I did not get my reasons for opposing the bill from the New Outlook; I got them from my dad when I was a very small boy, at a time when I bet threepence on a donkey race. My dad talked to me reasonably and sensibly, and I believe that at that time the desire for gambling was nipped in the bud. I did not see much good in it then, and I do not see any good in it now.

I have three reasons for opposing the bill, and in the first place I would put the economic reason. A system of sweepstakes would be bad economics. I am sure there is not a member in the house who would not do his best to find some economic system which would kill unemployment, which would bring production to the highest point and distribution to the point of perfection, and all with the least possibly injury to any human being. I am convinced, however, that this end cannot be achieved by instituting a system of sweepstakes. When we are laying the foundations for the youth of Canada, the land of our adoption, we must think of those people in church, state and business who have tried to keep God first and others next. I am convinced that they have laid the foundation well, and woe betide the individuals who would try to switch us from that rock, the foundation on which we build.

The hon. member has said we should keep our money in Canada. I am wondering if there would be any sweepstakes tickets sold in the United States. As a boy I was taught that if I gave anything for a benevolent purpose, whether it was for a hospital or for a charity of some kind, I was to forget about it. I was told that if you cast your bread upon the waters it would return to you after many days. I say, therefore, that when we give $2.50 to a hospital we should not expect a cash return. Our payment would come through the well-being of those to whom we gave it.

When a man spends $2.50 he should expect to get at least three per cent for his money. I believe the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) would say that that is a reasonable amount.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a little high.

Mr. McIVOR: But when you purchase a sweepstakes ticket for $2.50 you have no assurance that you will receive back your money plus a small additional sum.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): May I point out to the hon. member that if he were giving the money to charity, he would not expect such a return.

Mr. McIVOR: That may be so in theory, but it is not true in practice. If I buy a sweepstakes ticket, I am throwing in my lot with all the rest in the hope of getting $150,000, or some other enormous sum.

It has been said that licence kills or hurts the drink business. I am not so sure about that, and especially when I see that in Ontario we have a drink bill amounting to $72,000,000, a sum of money which would put a great many people to work. Who buy the sweepstakes tickets? We do not find any of the Scotch buying them—at least not many of the Scotch. They do not buy because they recognize that a system of sweepstakes is bad economics and represents a poor investment. We do not find any of our Hebrew brethren buying sweepstakes tickets; they recognize them as a bad investment and very poor economics. For the government to invite people to speculate, without even the pretence of promoting industry, is to hinder recovery, check stabilization and frustrate orderly development.

I find that the intelligent press is against sweepstakes, and in that connection I would quote the Ottawa Journal. Had I the time I could quote the Montreal Herald and the Montreal Gazette along similar lines. The Ottawa Journal makes the statement that lotteries are bad and, without reading the editorial may I point out that not one sentence in it is in favour of a system of sweepstakes. I was amused when at one point the editor states:

> The comparison of sweepstake with a horse race or a modest bingo game is far from exact. In the one case there is the element of amusement and the wager, if an important by-product, still is not the whole thing. But money spent for a sweepstake ticket brings no such return in entertainment.

A group of Chinamen may sit around a table and play their game of hong kong—or whatever you call it—and have a little fun. But when one buys a sweepstakes ticket I wonder what fun he gets from it?

The argument I use with greatest force and sincerity is that it is bad morality. The old commandment says: "Thou shalt not covet." I read somewhere that if you break the moral law, the moral law will break you. We must remember the commandment: "Thou shalt not covet." I do not think the parliament of Canada, with its three great divisions of King, Senate and House of Commons, can improve upon that moral law.

When I buy a sweepstakes ticket for $2.50, what do I expect to receive in return? I expect a return not only from my ticket but from the tickets of thousands of others, possibly 400,000 of them. It is bad morality, and it is a system whereby we covet what the other man has or may expect to get. When we attempt to support hospitals by sweepstakes and an appeal to the gambling spirit we are using a low method of supporting any cause, whether it be moral or philanthropic.

Mr. Speaker, I say most respectfully that I try to reach the chamber on time each day regularly so that I may hear you coming before a great parliament and praying to lead us not into temptation. Yet I see people going through the country trying to convince our youth to buy sweepstakes tickets. I see a man of mature years approaching a young man and saying to him, "Here is a sweepstakes ticket; it will cost you only $2.50; take a chance." What is that man doing? It is against the temptations of such men that we must pray, "Lead us not into temptation." Those men are leading the youth into temptation when they offer tickets for sale at $2.50.

I cannot but think of some of the great institutions in Canada that get along very well without subscriptions of this type. We must take off our hats and pay our respects to an organization like the Salvation Army which does its work without respect of persons. If they resorted to sweepstakes for funds to carry on their work, they would be doomed. They have far more sense than to do that. The Canadian people do not need to have their sense of generosity stimulated by the hope of winning a sweepstake.

It is bad politics. I have great admiration for the premier of Ontario because I believe he has done many great things. However, I disagree with him in his stand on this question. I admire the members of his government who would not support the principle of sweepstakes. If I supported this resolution, I would be giving the premier of Ontario the right to give me a special appellation.

It is bad morality and it is bad politics. In 1906 an act was passed in England prohibiting betting and wagering in the public streets. That country understood the viciousness of anything in the way of sweepstakes. I should like to quote an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of May 3, reading as follows:

> Contrary to universal opinion, the hospitals of Ireland are not in clover because of returns from sweepstakes, to which money is contributed from all quarters of the globe.

The Montreal Gazette is opposed to the principle of sweepstakes because it is bad morality, bad economics and bad politics. An editorial in the Montreal Herald reads as follows:

> Medical men of Dublin, Ireland, are attacking the hospital sweepstakes, declaring that they have greatly injured the voluntary hospitals of the city.
>
> At the annual charter dinner of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, prominent medical men and others attacked the system.
> They declared that the sweepstakes were started to help the hospitals but the government had stepped in and was collecting a tax of twenty-five per cent of the funds and diverting it to other causes. Out of this had sprung a demand for a municipal hospital and the scrapping of some of the voluntary hospitals which have been useful for many years. The protests may develop into a concerted drive against the sweepstakes.

Both the Montreal Gazette and the Montreal Herald are opposed to the introduction of sweepstakes into Canada. Many of our leading citizens are also opposed to sweepstakes. We have only to look around us here in this chamber to see many who are opposed to sweepstakes. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has declared himself against this thing. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has declared himself against sweepstakes. The Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) took action in the city of Brandon and would not permit advertising of sweepstakes to be carried through the mails. I take off my hat to the Postmaster General for taking that action. I pray that it will not be long before he is back in the house. I admire him for his courage and the willingness to do the square thing. I see another man in this house who is opposed to sweepstakes, a gentleman whom I have known for forty years, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth). I would imagine that the leader of the social credit group (Mr. Blackmore) is also against sweepstakes because he does not believe in handing out money without getting something in return. Another reason for his opposition would be his own personal Christian character and his good, sound economic common sense.

It is the task of every good citizen to oppose gambling in every form, whether it is said to be for a good or for a selfish purpose. Our leaders have given us the lead and it is our duty to follow. I agree with those who say that we have no right to tell a man how he should spend his money. But, when it becomes a matter of public policy, we should let our judgment and conscience speak. The foundation of our great country is laid upon our faith in God and the common welfare of our fellow men, and we should not be afraid to take a stand and vote against something which is not in the best interests of our fellow citizens.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make just one or two observations with regard to this matter. Several preachers have spoken against this bill, and it would look as though this is a great day for preachers. It may be thought that we are assuming to be the custodians of the morals of the country. That is not necessarily so; but perhaps it may be said that the clergymen of this country, to use that term in a general way, are more or less responsible for the morals of the nation. They should be anyway. I am not saying that they are making a good job of it, but they should be and are interested.

I should like to follow the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. McIvor) in what he has said with regard to the premier of Ontario. I have always regarded that gentleman as being a great man, but I did not relish the crack he took at the clergymen when he was commenting on their attitude toward his bill. It may be said that this is not the business of the clergy; but if it is not their business, whose business is it? I do not suggest for one moment that the sponsor of this bill is sponsoring it because he desires sweepstakes as sweepstakes. I give him credit for sponsoring this bill because he sees in it a new avenue by which money can be obtained for education, health and other purposes.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Whereby money can be saved.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know just how money would be saved. I rather agree with those who have spoken already when they say that to legalize sweepstakes will not necessarily keep any money in this country. We are continually looking for new sources of revenue. The hon. member for Fort William has referred to the economic aspects of this bill, but I should like to approach the matter from another angle. The hospitals, the universities and the other institutions that are in need of money, are in need of money because there are only two sources from which governments can get it, that is through taxation or by borrowing. The only other possible means of revenue is by some bill such as this. I do not intend to go into a discussion of social credit policies at this time, so no one need worry.

There is no reason in the world why we cannot make our economic system so fit into the picture of our national life that these institutions will be cared for and have the money they need, and that people who are ill or need false teeth or new glasses or whatever else they may require will be able to get it without the hospital authorities having to go begging. These institutions should have the money that a proper money policy can give them, and that is my argument against sweepstakes being permitted simply because they are a source of money.

I referred to the clergy a little while ago. It is their business to be, and they are, interested in anything that is for the welfare of mankind. I am wondering though, and I think I can speak along this line because I am one of the clergy myself, just how far the clergy of this country have studied the money problem and diagnosed the situation as it exists in regard to the creation of money, and whether it is not possible for money to be created, as it now is, for the purpose of running our national life—and you can apply that not only to the upkeep of hospitals but to the problem of relief. I have been in a good many ministerial meetings and listened to a good many speeches over the radio on such things as the degradation caused by improper housing, and I have listened to speakers on behalf of charitable institutions; but my impression has been, with my little knowledge of economics, that the speakers have not really gone to the root of the matter. It does not help the situation to give someone something out of our own pocket simply because that individual has no money. That does not remedy the economic problem, though it may help the individual to get by for an hour or two.

While I am on the subject of the clergy, I would say that it is the principle of running lotteries that we have to deal with. Unquestionably gambling is involved, and I do say, and perhaps this is one way in which I can bring the matter to the attention of the clergy of this country rather than by speaking to one or two locally, that we must sweep our own doorstep first. I say to the house through you, Mr. Speaker, that the principle of gambling, whether it is done through buying a sweepstakes ticket or a ticket for a raffle held in the basement of a church, is the same in both cases. I would suggest that the principle is a little bit worse in a lottery because when you buy a sweepstakes ticket you can at least pick your horse.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSELL: Some of my hon. friends do not agree with me. That shows I am perfectly honest in saying that I have never bought a sweepstakes ticket in my life.

Mr. EDWARDS: You are the only one in the house who has not.

Mr. LEADER: No, he is not.

Mr. HANSELL: In a raffle you take a chance and get what you pay for; but if you buy a sweepstakes ticket and win, somebody else has to pay for what you get.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the way to approach this question is not to deal with an individual matter like sweepstakes. There are other matters along the same line. It is not only hospitals that need money but universities, and many doctors in this country need money. There are a good many medical men in Canada who cannot collect their accounts to-day. I read in the Lethbridge Herald that at a medical convention in Saskatchewan the doctors threatened to move out of the province because they could not make a living there. So if you are going to have sweepstakes, the doctors should come in for a slice too. You can carry it to any extreme, and include all sorts of institutions. Where are you going to end once you legalize sweepstakes? The principle involved in the bill is one of gambling, and I am against anything that would make us a nation of gamblers.

On motion of Mr. Rowe (Athabaska) the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Departmental administration, $425,720.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) resumes the debate, may I say it is the intention to let this item stand after the general discussion has been concluded, so that any members now absent may discuss under this item any phases of defence policy. So, as soon as the discussion is concluded, another item will be called, and opportunity will be afforded to members present and those now absent to discuss all phases of defence policy under the item now before us.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Chairman, for a few minutes before the house adjourned just six weeks ago—when the defence estimates were last up for consideration—I had been dealing with the problem of the defence of Canada's Pacific coast. I had pointed out that for the protection of that coast against major attacks this government seemed to be relying upon the American navy, there being no British navy within seven thousand miles, the nearest naval unit being at Singapore. I had also pointed out that there was no adequate defence on the Pacific coast at the present time against minor attacks, such as hit-and-run raids by ships carrying aircraft, and attacks to establish bases on our coast. I think the Minister of National Defence will admit that so far we have not on the Pacific coast adequate defences to protect ourselves against these minor attacks. I think he will also admit that defence against minor attacks is what is known throughout the British commonwealth as local defence, and as such is the responsibility of Canada alone. That principle has been established throughout the commonwealth for many years, and I would refer the members of the committee particularly to the summary of the proceedings of the imperial conference held in 1923, at page 16, in paragraph 3 (a):

> Subject to this provision, the conference suggests the following as guiding principles:
> (a) The primary responsibility of each portion of the empire represented at the conference for its own local defence.

That principle was reaffirmed at the imperial conference in 1926, and again at the conference in 1937. At all three conferences the Canadian delegation was headed by our present Prime Minister. The principle means simply that Canada must defend her own coasts against minor attacks; and as minor attacks are the only danger at the present time, on the Pacific coast at least it means that those Canadians who live on the Pacific slope must look to the Canadian defence forces for protection.

There is the problem; and while the government is doing something about it—and I give the government and the Minister of National Defence credit for what has been done in the way of improving our defences on the Pacific coast—I submit that this government is failing utterly to deal with some aspects of the problem. I believe its greatest failure is that it has not provided, and apparently is not taking steps to provide, for an adequate coastal defence fleet. It is obvious that we must have such a fleet. The minister himself so stated during the Easter recess, and if the newspaper report from which I propose to quote is not accurate, I would ask him to correct it. It is an article appearing in the Vancouver Daily Province reporting the minister's speech in that city two or three weeks ago, and reads in part:

> For defence of our focal sea areas we need sea and air forces capable of destroying hostile surface craft, submarines and air raiders. This requires reconnaissance, fighter and torpedo-carrying aircraft, and adequate naval strength.

Then he went on to say:

> To defend our neutrality we need constant patrol of our coastal area by auxiliary surface craft and aircraft, bombing aircraft to destroy bases, means to dispatch small expeditions.
> It is contemplated that naval and aircraft will patrol the entire coast from their respective stations.

That all means that we must have an adequate fleet on the Pacific coast. He might also have mentioned the fact that we have on that coast to-day at least 1,200 Japanese fishing vessels operating in and out of the different harbours and ports, which might have to be dealt with in the event of hostilities with Japan. In his speech in introducing the defence estimates, the minister said as reported at page 1647 of Hansard:

> A certain amount of priority has been established after deliberation: first for the air services; secondly, for naval defence; and thirdly, in regard to the repairing of deficiencies in equipment of militia services, permanent and non-permanent.

That is the position taken by the government itself; yet what do we find? In these estimates provision is made only for two secondhand or used destroyers, which are to be purchased from Great Britain. These ships are to be placed on the Pacific coast where we shall then have four destroyers and two mine-sweepers. That will be the extent of our fleet. Apparently the government is buying odd ships from year to year; it appears to have no plan whatever as to the size of a Canadian navy or as to the time when it is to be completed.

If there is a plan, it should be announced. The Canadian people should be taken into the confidence of the government just as has been done in Great Britain and Australia; within the past few weeks we have seen press reports of the ships to be added to those other empire fleets; surely the Canadian people are entitled to have similar information with regard to the Canadian navy. One would think that the Department of National Defence would at least have decided upon the minimum naval requirements for the local defence of the Canadian coasts. If so, the Canadian people should know what that plan is. If the department has not such a plan, it is derelict in its duty.

I can find no report anywhere of plans for a Canadian navy. The only thing of the kind I have been able to trace is the recommendation submitted by Admiral Jellicoe when he came to Canada in 1919 on a naval mission at the request of the then Canadian government; he recommended in his report, at page 10, chapter 1, dealing with the naval requirements of Canada, paragraph 4:

> The question of the naval forces required by Canada may be viewed in two ways: first, in the light of Canada's own requirements, and Canada's own safety; and secondly, in the broader light of the security and safety of the empire as a whole. The naval force suggested as adequate purely for the protection of Canada's trade and Canada's ports under the conditions assumed, comprises—

And this is what he recommends as a minimum for a Canadian defence navy:

—three light cruisers, one flotilla leader—

Which, I believe, is a large destroyer.

—twelve torpedo craft, eight submarines, with one parent ship, and certain auxiliary small craft for training purposes, etc.

That was immediately after the great war when the danger was nothing like what it is at the present time. It does seem perfectly clear that in Canada we require at least one or two flotilla leaders and more destroyers as well as submarines, motor torpedo boats, and submarine chasers which can be used to attack hostile fleets. We have at the present time no ships for that purpose. We also require craft for laying out and protecting mine fields and a mosquito fleet to patrol and protect our inlets. All these small craft could operate only within a few miles of our coasts, so that no one could say they were for purposes of aggression. I suggest that a coastal defence fleet of this type might be established this year—not in four or five years, but this year—by borrowing ships held by Great Britain in reserve. I understand that they have many ships of this type being held in their ports in reserve, which could be on loan until Canada had completed her own navy. Many of the smaller ships could be built here. We have shipyards that could do that work, and it would give a great stimulus to the shipbuilding industry of the country. The government could take steps at once to start a building program for the construction of a defence fleet. So much for the navy.

Then, I submit that the government is not facing the problem of defending our coasts, because it is taking no adequate steps to have not only ships but also aircraft, guns, munitions and equipment manufactured in Canada. There is a plaintive wailing by the government about being unable to buy: they cannot buy anything; their hands are tied. The minister said, as reported at page 1648 of Hansard:

> Difficulty has been experienced with reference to obtaining deliveries, and that has accounted for another part of the reduction.

At page 1649:

> With reference to militia services there has been carried out by the department what is known as an interim plan of armaments for both coasts. This is a result of the fact that heavy ordnance cannot be acquired from British concerns for a period of about three years.

In other words, we have to sit back and be inadequately defended for a period of three years. Canada might just as well face the fact now that other nations are too busy preparing to defend themselves to be able to sell us arms; that if Great Britain is at war we cannot expect to get war material from her; and that future wars will be largely mechanized, requiring primarily machines which we are able to manufacture in this country if only we have the energy to do so.

Then, the government is not facing the problem of defending the Pacific coast, because it is not setting up naval or defence reserves on that coast. There are many strategic points on the mainland and the islands which should be held by the government; the property there should be acquired. There is nothing at all now to prevent, for example, the Japanese government from indirectly acquiring land, timber rights or mineral rights, at these strategic points or near our bases or fortifications. As a matter of fact, we hear rumour after rumour that such is the case. This is not good enough; the government should reserve these strategic points. I suggest to the minister, with all the seriousness I can, that he have a survey made as soon as possible of the ownership of the land and timber and mineral rights at these strategic points and near fortifications and bases, and particularly a survey such that it will show which of these lands and rights are held by or for foreigners.

The government is also failing to face the necessity, from a military point of view, of highways to the Pacific coast. At present we have no highway across British Columbia. The trans-Canada highway is impassable because there is a gap of about thirty-three miles; the government builds a little this year, a little next year; it is to be completed in 1939, we hope; but that road should be completed at once, because it is a strategic road. Further, there is no road through southern British Columbia; there is a gap in the Princeton-Hope road of about thirty-seven miles, which should also be built for strategic purposes; and we should have a highway through to Prince Rupert or Stewart. These would all be strategic highways and should be the concern of the Department of National Defence as well as, say the Department of Mines and Resources.

Finally, in connection with the failure of the government to face this problem of defending the Pacific coast, I doubt very much whether there are sufficient trained men in British Columbia to man the fortifications we have there, or will have, to protect the bases, and to repel raiders. I believe there are one or two hundred men of the permanent force—the minister can correct me if I am wrong—and according to the last report of the department, about 2,550 men of the militia. That is the total number who underwent training. I suggest that the minister allow the British Columbia units to recruit up to a strength which will provide the people in that province with a force sufficient to man the fortifications, protect the bases and repel raids; further that these militiamen on the coast should be fully equipped at once and given the best training possible. It is not fair to men who volunteer to risk their lives in the defence of the country to leave them half-equipped and half-trained. Nothing is more unfair on the part of a national government.

I suggest that these features of the problem of defence of our coasts are sufficiently serious to warrant an investigation this year by a special committee of this house, representative of all parties. I believe it would be possible for us to agree unanimously on a policy for the local defence of our coasts. That agreement can best be obtained if the government will set up a special committee, with all parties represented on it, and place all the facts before that committee. So much for the problem of local defence.

Turning to the broader aspects of Canada's defence problem, the minister admitted, and I think will admit to-night, that Canadians can defend themselves against major attacks only by cooperating with other nations; for example, on the Atlantic with the British fleet. It is quite clear that Canada must cooperate with the other nations of the British commonwealth. Actually the government is doing so now, but will not admit it. This pretence that we are not cooperating with the other nations of the British commonwealth, this "Hush, hush" policy, misleads the Canadian people and weakens the British Commonwealth of Nations in the eyes of the other nations of the world, and the result is to hurt us here as far as the defence of our country is concerned. Actually every Canadian government since the war has cooperated in defence measures with the other nations of the commonwealth. One has only to refer to the imperial conference summaries for 1923, 1926, 1937. Our present Prime Minister was in command of the Canadian delegation at each of those conferences, and we find the principle laid down as clearly as possible that Canada is to cooperate with the other nations of the empire in defence. In 1923 they stressed naval bases at page 16 of the summary of proceedings: in 1926, air bases, at page 29. Then I quote from the summary of proceedings for 1937 at page 12:

> Though we shall discuss other important subjects, we are agreed that questions of foreign affairs and defence shall be our main subjects.

At page 1649:

> The conference gave close attention to the subject of defence, and considered ways in which it would be possible for the governments concerned to cooperate in measures for their own security. The occasion was taken for a detailed review of the state of defence in each of the countries represented at the conference and this opportunity was generally welcomed.

At page 18:

> The conference recognized the vital importance of measures to safeguard maritime communications, including routes and waterways essential to defence and trade, and to provide naval bases and facilities for repairs and fuelling of ships.

At page 19:

> The conference also recorded the progress made by the several governments in creating and maintaining an adequate chain of air bases and refuelling stations along the lines of communications between the different parts of the empire.
> The conference noted with satisfaction that in accordance with recommendations of previous conferences a common system of organization and training and the use of uniform manuals, patterns of arms, equipment, and stores had been adopted, as far as practicable, for the naval, military and air forces of their several countries. Each of them would thus be enabled to ensure more effectively its own security and, if it so desired, to cooperate with other countries of the Commonwealth with the least possible delay. The interchange of individual officers of the naval, military and air forces of the countries was recognized as conducing to the dissemination of the experience acquired by the officers concerned under the widely different conditions existing in various parts of the empire . . .

The conference gave careful attention to the question of munitions and supplies required for defence both by the United Kingdom and other parts of the Commonwealth, and also to the question of the supply of food and feeding stuffs in time of emergency.

In other words, Canada is in alliance for defensive purposes with our kinfolk, the other nations of the British commonwealth. It is the safest and wisest defence program we could adopt. All these British nations are aiming at peace and not war. At page 13 of last year's imperial conference summary we find this:

Thus they agreed that for each member of the commonwealth the first objective is the preservation of peace. In their view the settlement of differences that may arise between nations and the adjustment of national needs should be sought by methods of cooperation, joint inquiry and conciliation. It is in such methods, and not in recourse to the use of force between nation and nation, that the surest guarantee will be found for the improvement of international relations and respect for mutual engagements.

Holding these views and desiring to base their policies upon the aims and ideals of the league of nations, they found themselves unanimous in declaring that their respective armaments will never be used for purposes of aggression or for any purpose inconsistent with the covenant of the league of nations or the pact of Paris.

Then, further down on page 14:

Being convinced that the influence of each of them in the cause of peace was likely to be greatly enhanced by their common agreement to use that influence in the same direction, they declared their intention of continuing to consult and cooperate with one another in this vital interest and all matters of common concern.

It is our safest course because all the nations of the commonwealth are trying to agree on the fundamental principles of foreign policy. For example, they are all trying to collaborate with the United States of America. Further, we know these peoples of the British nations; we know we can depend upon them; we know we can trust them. Those of us who served overseas know that, if trouble arises, you can have no better men beside you than the men from the other parts of the British Empire. There is very little risk of one nation of the commonwealth doing anything that will drag the others into war. We have seen that within the last few weeks, in the attitude taken by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. And remember this, Mr. Chairman: Any Canadian foreign policy necessarily must involve some risk, and my submission is that any other policy than that of working with the other nations of the empire would involve far more serious risks.

My complaint against this government is that instead of focusing the attention of the Canadian people on the fact that our foreign policy actually is a defensive alliance with the other nations of the commonwealth, with peace as the aim, and collaboration with the United States and friendliness with all nations, this government keeps harping on the fact that its hands are free, that it has no commitments. This government says: "Oh, we can be informed by the British government of what goes on; but we cannot be consulted, because that might involve some obligation upon us," as though the policy of working with the other nations of the British commonwealth were something to be ashamed of. This attitude on the part of the government is entirely out of line with the courage and clear-sightedness of the Canadian people. In my opinion the government policy could be best described as spineless.

Finally, in considering the question of Canadian defence and Canadian foreign policy one instinctively thinks of the nationhood of the Canadian people and of the Canada of the future. As a nation we have done many worthwhile things. For example, our part in the great war gained us the respect of all the civilized countries of the world. The part we have played in the League of Nations has been more outstanding than that of any other nation in the Americas. Like Great Britain, we have done what we could to further disarmament among the nations. We have become one of the leading nations of that group which ranks immediately after the seven great world powers; in fact, I believe even in population Canada is among the first twenty nations of the world. Canada is now at a fork in the road. Are we going to bury our heads in the sand, and depend upon other peoples for our defence, which means for our very existence? Are we going to refuse to look beyond the borders of Canada? I would suggest that the attitude of this government would lead any reasonable Canadian to believe that such was the case at the present time. If we take that road, probably we shall end up as a small American republic. Or are we going to continue to be a nation, taking a worthwhile part in world affairs, facing these problems of defence and foreign policy frankly and fearlessly and letting the other nations of the world know exactly where we stand, yet with world peace always our main objective? This government, with its great majority, the largest number of followers any Canadian government has ever had—I sometimes think they would be glad to lose a few of them—should be the strongest government Canada has ever had. It has a great opportunity to give leadership to the Canadian people in connection with these problems. If it will remember the Canadian character; if it will act with the initiative, the soundness, the friendliness and the courage of the Canadian people, it will not delay any longer in leading them along the second road.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): At the outset I wish to say that I agree almost entirely with what has been said by the hon. member (Mr. Green) who has just sat down. I particularly noted one expression he used, that all nations were seeking peace. I think that statement is true, generally speaking; I do not think of any nation that would be an exception to that rule. I believe every nation in the world—

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the hon. member think Japan is seeking peace?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I shall come to that in a moment. I have learned that when a lawyer is faced with a question he does not want to answer, he always says he will come to that in a moment, and I am learning from the lawyers. I think Germany is seeking peace. I do not think the people of Germany want to go to war any more than we do. I cannot bring myself to believe that the German people are desirous of throwing themselves into a conflict.

Mr. BAKER: Have the people any say in the matter?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is a different proposition. I do not think the people of Japan are any more desirous of having their young men go out and be killed than we are. I do not think China is any more desirous of war than any other nation. I do not think Italy desires war. The fact that the government of a country has thrown that country into war does not mean that the people share that desire. That is one thing that we are contending right in this country. If we went to war, would it be a case of the people desiring that war? I shall speak of that a little later on in my address; but I believe we have taken the wrong road, and I believe we are still taking the wrong road if we are looking for a permanent solution of this question of war.

From speeches I have heard in this house; as I have read the press, and from articles that have appeared on different occasions I have come to the conclusion that the greatest strife in this world is competition, which travels through nations, through dominions, through municipalities and right down to the individual. We have always contended that competition was the life of world trade; but I am not so sure that this has been the correct reasoning, especially when we look about us and see that, almost without exception, in the end this rivalry in trade leads to war. I think we had a very good example of that not so long ago in connection with the oil industry of Mexico, which showed just how nations may become involved in competition for trade and through large financial concerns. Rightly or wrongly the Mexican government took possession of the oil fields of that country. Immediately we had representations made by the governments of the United States and Great Britain in an endeavour to get back those oil fields. In that case I think it was the financial interests who were influencing the government, more than it was the desires of the people. Surely that was Mexico's own business. Yet we were interfering there with another nation in connection with the control of its natural resources. Whether that control was or was not going to be carried out to the best advantage of all concerned, we cannot say. Yet that was their policy.

I believe if we go back to find out the causes of war we would be getting nearer the solution. I am thinking now of war in the broader sense, and not of the war where there are battles for the purpose of killing people. We have war in the state from the rivalry of individuals. Man has to make a living; so he is continually combating his neighbour for a better economical situation, and this combat leads to keen rivalry. The individual reaches the state where he becomes financially embarrassed and must appeal to the municipality. The municipality on the other hand becomes equally financially distressed, and looks around for help. The municipalities must do that because they find great competition in financial matters. It is their desire to get a greater amount of revenue. Finding themselves at a loss they turn to provincial authorities, which are already overtaxed. It is not possible for the provinces to increase their revenues and so, in turn, they come to the only source left, namely the dominion. Then, the dominion is so overwhelmingly in debt that it has almost reached the limit of its possibility of getting greater revenue. Facing that condition, the dominion must endeavour to borrow from other nations. It must try to meet its debts by increased trade, and eventually conditions become so intense that a physical war breaks out.

I read the other day an interesting quotation from the observations of Henry W. Morgan of Montreal, chairman of the executive of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, in which he stated that to-day Canada had piled up an indebtedness of over eight billions of dollars, or about $800 per person. He pointed out, and properly so, that this huge debt would go on piling up indefinitely, and that inevitably there must come a day of reckoning.

We now have a rearmament program in which we are about to spend $34,000,000. In Great Britain they are spending thirty-eight billions of dollars or about $800 per person. There is a new seven and a half billion rearmament plan, and it will continue to grow. In the United States the national debt is about thirty-nine billions, or $325 per person; they have a new five and a half billion dollar rearmament plan, and it is still growing.

Where will this economic system lead us? Does anyone think that these huge debts can be paid out of taxation, or in some way, by people or governments, or that any government will solve this problem of debt by simply creating another debt? Our present debt system requires the formation of a system of national credit for the creation of wealth and happiness for our citizens.

We are coming closer to the real cause of war when our financing puts us into such a position that it is almost impossible for us to go ahead and prepare for war without creating a still greater national debt, a national debt which we shall never in the world pay off. The other day I was speaking with respect to debt to a very able man in this city, and he said he did not believe that it would ever be paid off, and added he believed that theoretically it would be wrong to pay it off. Yet we are going ahead and taxing our people. Over fifty per cent of the taxes they pay goes to pay interest on our tremendous debt. Without exception, every country in the world faces a similar situation.

What is the cause of this debt? Why has it reached such dimensions? I believe one of the greatest trading opportunities we have is right around us; our greatest market is right here in Canada. Until such time as we have satisfied the needs of our own people we should not turn our attention to other markets. We find all nations endeavouring to increase their trade simply because competition is becoming so keen. They are endeavouring to turn their attention to other countries. Why are they doing that? Do they do it because they want to go to other countries and kill? I do not think so. I do not believe Italy went into Ethiopia with only the desire to kill the citizens of that country. I do not believe, when Germany entered the last war, she did so merely for the opportunity of killing. She went to war for a definite purpose, namely to extend her boundaries.

Why did Italy or Germany wish to extend their boundaries? They had that desire because the great nations are becoming overcrowded and because they were searching for further supplies of natural resources. Circumstances compelled them to take such action. They have been compelled through circumstances which we, ourselves, as a world people, have built up. The whole matter has evolved itself into a European situation, one which, as was stated by the hon. member who just took his seat, in some way or another we must be above.

I do not believe we can sit idly by and permit ourselves to see the policies of other nations drawing us into a web which is eventually going to turn to war. It has been pointed out that in the house we must be cautious as to the remarks we make respecting the policies of other countries. There is a fear that observations might draw us into a serious situation which could develop into war. The European situation, however, has a bearing on the situation right here in Canada.

When we turn for a moment to look into the European situation we find that not very long ago Germany annexed Austria. It is somewhat of a coincidence that not long ago in this city I was speaking to an individual—not the one about whom I spoke a moment ago—who was well versed in foreign affairs. With respect to this question he said to me that the annexation of Austria by Germany should never have been permitted in the manner in which it was accomplished. He claimed that the greatest mistake was made at the conclusion of the last war, and it was his opinion that it was inevitable that Germany should take Austria. He then asked why we should prolong action until a time when Germany was forced to enter Austria and take it in the manner in which she did.

Germany learned a great lesson from the last war. We know how it developed—through transgressing the rights of Belgium. The invasion of that little country was what caused the entrance of Great Britain. Germany has now learned her lesson. We see that this time she did not attempt annexation in that way, but was content to use another and a more clever device which achieved exactly the same purpose.

Since the last war Germany has grown up to be a tremendous nation, and it has been stated over and over again that she did not have sufficient people to do the work she had outlined. Someone may say, "Oh, yes, but she conscripted all her men for the army." I do not care what she did with them. The fact remains that there were no unemployed. We condemn her methods; but through all the criticism we pass upon Germany it must be clearly remembered and understood that the Germans are an intelligent people, and the very fact that the followers of Hitler are found in such large numbers is proof that the German people are doing a great deal of thinking. They must of necessity be behind Hitler. Whether his plan be right or wrong—

Mr. BAKER: Is the hon. member not going too far afield in his discussion of defence for Canada?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have not gone as far as some other hon. members. I am trying to keep in my mind the principles which lead to warfare, and I cannot see how I am out of order. I leave it to you, Mr. Chairman, to state whether or not I am in order.

Mr. BAKER: Surely the question of defence for Canada does not involve the affairs of Europe.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is a question we should consider.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With respect to the point of order, may I say that ordinarily the point raised by the hon. member would be well taken, but there was an understanding that under this item all questions of policy could be discussed by hon. members.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I appreciate that.

Mr. BAKER: Of all other countries?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I believe, if the world had taken advantage of the situation before Germany annexed Austria, we would have saved ourselves a great deal of trouble. As I stated last year—and I have not changed my stand in the meantime—I believe there should have been a conference of nations; probably the best results could have been obtained through the League of Nations, but such conference should have been held. Take the case of the annexation of Ethiopia by Italy. This conference could have been called, and if it could have been shown that Italy needed more territory or access to more raw materials in order to keep up her industrial life, then possibly these matters could have been settled. I do not say that consideration should be given to the need of materials for the manufacture of muntions. This is something to which we shall have to turn our attention sooner or later. We shall have to see that all nations are satisfied as far as their domestic requirements are concerned. Other countries that have natural resources in abundance may possibly have to cooperate. This is one of the things that must eventually come about.

I should like to refer to the invasion of Ethiopia by Italy because it leads up to another point in my argument. I think it is generally conceded that when that occurred most countries objected, but the tables have now been turned. It is rumoured that the British Empire is to concur in that annexation and permit Ethiopia to become part of the Italian empire. I cannot see how Canada will be able to keep out of these things. As the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, when Great Britain goes to war, Canada goes to war whether or not we like it. That is stated definitely in the statutes of Canada. When Great Britain is at war, we are at war. If we are going to be involved in these matters, then I think we should give serious consideration to the manner in which we are going to be drawn into them.

There is another question in which I think Canada should concern itself. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, I am not saying that we should concern ourselves in these matters to the extent that we would be ready to take any part in action that might be taken by other nations. If we are going to participate in these matters, then we have to expect the natural results. There is another situation arising in connection with Czechoslovakia. In my opinion the geographical location of that country is such that it is bound to be taken over by Germany, not in the manner in which Germany attempted to expand in 1914, but in a manner more like the annexation of Austria. Who is there to stop her? No force was used in connection with Austria; it was simply a matter of nazi-izing, if I may use that term, the country. The same thing will occur in Czechoslovakia. That country is going to be taken over whether or not we like it. Russia has guaranteed protection to Czechoslovakia. France has guaranteed protection to Russia. Great Britain has guaranteed protection to France. Where does Canada come in?

The point I wish to make is this: Is Canada prepared to enter a European war because of Czechoslovakia? Is Canada prepared to enter a war because of a conflict between Ethiopia and Italy? Is Canada prepared to participate in a war between China and Japan? Is she prepared to do these things any more than she would be prepared to go to war with Germany because of the annexation of Czechoslovakia? I think not. That is something about which we should not concern ourselves. As I have said before in this house, I do not think we should interfere with other countries. We should attend solely to our own affairs. I do not say that we should break away from the British Empire; I say that Great Britain should adopt a similar policy. If all the British Empire stayed together, there would be no difficulty. We should adopt the attitude of minding our own business and letting the other fellows do the same. This brings me more or less to the statement made by the hon. member who spoke a while ago, about this government having no commitments. I have in my hand a copy of an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of March 18, 1938, and which reads:

Canada Should Keep Out of War

There is no hint of the Canadian parliament being consulted on Canada's war liabilities before the eleventh hour, but there is every likelihood that the Minister of External Affairs, Premier Mackenzie King, is being informed from day to day by the British authorities at Whitehall. They are, doubtless, anxiously looking for guidance in the task of determining British foreign policy.

A Canadian press dispatch from London yesterday stated that the United Kingdom government is "working in close consultation with the dominion governments in an endeavour to evolve a program to meet the increasingly grave international situation." It may be taken as highly probable that this Canadian press statement is based on information from official sources in London.

The people of Canada, even the representatives of the people in parliament at Ottawa, seem to be in the dark on Canada's position with regard to the situation in Europe. The members are rarely given an opportunity to express themselves on the floor of the house. They are easily discouraged from offering any guidance.

Without being consulted, this parliament sanctioned Premier Mackenzie King's decision to substitute His Royal Highness the Duke of York for Edward VIII as King of Canada. A similar decision to indicate—or to do nothing to indicate—the extent of Canadian cooperation with the United Kingdom in an impending European upheaval, without consulting the dominion parliament until after the event, could apparently be made without much protest on the part of members on parliament hill.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Whether or not that is true, I cannot say, but I do not think many hon. members will contend that the press is not telling the truth. If they do not tell the truth, then I take the stand I have always taken, that they should be forced to tell the truth. The evidence is that there is a close contact. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) makes his statement with regard to the policy of this government, as I understand he will do in a day or two, I hope he makes clear the position of Canada. I should like him to state that this dominion will never participate in a foreign war without the consent of the people. There should be the consent of the people, not just the consent of parliament. It might be said that this parliament gave its sanction as far as Edward VIII was concerned, but that was given after the event. I hope the policy of this government will be made perfectly clear when the Prime Minister makes his statement.

I continue with the editorial:

At the same time, British statesmen seem to leave no doubt about the close cooperation of Great Britain with France. It is at this point that Canadian opinion would do well to be clear on Canada's responsibility as a member of the family of British nations.

It goes on to say:

Lord Halifax stated in the House of Lords last Wednesday that Great Britain is anxious to have the dominions as well as the people of the United Kingdom united behind any steps that may be taken to deal with the grave situation in Europe. Lord Halifax is reported as saying that British foreign policy must be conducted "so it may deserve and command support in this country of a united people, and in the dominions of a united empire."

If that statement is true, then it is manifest that Canada is going to take part, whether or not she likes it. It has been said that no commitments have been made, but apparently Great Britain has assumed that we have made commitments. Therefore, we are going to be held responsible. If this is not so, I should like the Prime Minister to make a definite statement in order to counteract the impression that has gone abroad. Apparently this is the opinion of the press and the people of Great Britain, and I think we should be very cautious. Our policy should be one of distinct neutrality. That is a very difficult road to follow. As I have stated before, I think we should have one of the best defended countries in the world, and I make no apology for making that statement. I should like to see the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) spend more money on defence, although I may tell him quite frankly that I do not like the method by which he raises the money. But I think we should follow a policy of neutrality. Let us see whether we are following such a policy or whether we are making commitments, probably innocently, but nevertheless commitments.

I have a clipping here dated London, England, March 21:

> It was learned here to-day that the Chamberlain government's negotiations with Mussolini's representatives for a pact between London and Rome are nearing completion.
>
> Italian troops were reported withdrawing from Libya as a concession to Britain.
>
> The fact that Chamberlain is making a pact with Mussolini is greatly displeasing the public. Yesterday 20,000 people marched through the streets of London protesting such a pact and shouting: "Chamberlain must go!"

This is the part I want the committee to note:

> It is understood that the pact includes provisions for a large loan to the Italian dictator, whose country is near to a financial crisis.

If that loan is negotiated, will there not be a commitment? Will not everyone who subscribes to the loan be more or less involved in the outcome? I say that you are automatically committing yourself there, whether you like it or not.

We had a good many statements not long ago about a boycott; but the very fact that you boycott a nation means that you are taking sides. There again you are definitely committing yourself, whether you like it or not. Some persons suggested that we should send munitions to the loyalists in Spain to even things up. That may be all right, but as soon as you do that you are making commitments. That is not leading to the road of neutrality. You must be consistent. If you are going to keep out of these troubles, you must keep out of them entirely, and let these other nations work out their own affairs. All these things tend to develop a public opinion; whether intentionally or unintentionally is not the point; the fact is that they do develop public opinion.

There is one other thing which makes it exceedingly difficult for us to stay neutral, and that is the exportation of arms and munitions from this country. I hold in my hand sessional paper No. 204, which I asked for in the house some time ago. It shows the number of permits issued and the value of our exports of arms and ammunition. This was the answer that was brought down:

> 196 permits were issued from July 31, 1937, to date—

That would be about nine months:

> —for the exportation of arms, ammunition, implements or munitions of war.

That is an average of twenty-four permits a month. How can we stay neutral under those circumstances?

An hon. MEMBER: Why can't we?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I will show you in a moment why not. Permits were issued to the number of thirty-four for the export of a total value of arms and ammunition to the United Kingdom of $233,295.83; to Australia, the total value of the shipments was $11,052.03, and the number of permits issued, twenty; Newfoundland, total value of shipments, $5,316.19, and fifteen permits issued; New Guinea, total value of shipments, $2,890, and one permit issued; New Zealand, total value of shipments, $5,000, and one permit issued; Trinidad, total value, $9.98, and one permit issued; the Argentine, total value, $90,336, and five permits issued; Brazil, total value, $550, and one permit issued; China, total value, $210,200, and thirty-five permits issued. We have shipped directly to China, a nation at war, arms and ammunition to help that country. Is that neutrality? I cannot conceive that to be neutrality because you are definitely taking sides. To the Dominican Republic we shipped arms and ammunition to a total value of $16,168, and one permit issued; Japan, total value of shipments, $43,500, and two permits issued. We shipped that amount of war materials to Japan. We are supplying both China and Japan with munitions. Is that taking the road to neutrality? Surely that is not a neutral stand we are taking. I think it is one of the most definite commitments we could make, and yet we are endeavouring to take a neutral stand. To Nicaragua we shipped arms and ammunition to a total value of $40,600, and two permits issued; Norway, total value of shipments $84, and one permit issued; Turkey, total value of shipments, $266,892.20, and three permits issued. To the United States, which is one of the best equipped nations in the world to manufacture arms and munitions of war, we shipped $59,134.46 worth of arms and ammunition, and sixty-nine permits were issued. I wonder where those munitions went after they were shipped to the United States. No doubt they went to Italy, China, Japan, or some other of the warring nations. Altogether we shipped arms and munitions to a total value of $1,051,781.69, and the total number of permits issued was 196. Those were munitions all ready for use; the figures do not include raw materials.

I have in my hand, another return, which I shall not read in detail, but it shows the amount of scrap iron or steel, aluminum scrap, brass scrap, nickel and copper that we shipped out of this country between 1935 and 1937. Let me give the figures for nickel. In 1935 we shipped out of this country 1,427,265 hundredweight of nickel, of a total value of $36,285,482; in 1936, 1,736,375 hundredweight, of a total value of $44,594,296; in 1937, 2,227,700 hundredweight, of a total value of $58,913,217. And we are taking a neutral stand! Think of the tremendous amount of war material we have shipped to these warring countries, and yet we are endeavouring to be neutral! We say we have made no commitments. It seems to me that our commitments could not be greater or more offensive to other nations than the very ones we have made in this way.

Here is another article headed, "Canadian delegate states Canada is arsenal of Japan." It reads in part:

> On Saturday the Canadian delegate declared that "Canada is the arsenal of Japan; but for war materials from Canada it would have been impossible for Japan to begin her aggression and impossible for her to continue it."
>
> Addressing 900 delegates from 19 countries, Mr. MacLeod declared that in 1936 Canada supplied Japan with 71·7 per cent of its aluminum for aircraft; 79·11 per cent of her copper and, directly or indirectly, 100 per cent of her nickel.
> "Any movement against Japanese aggression which does not lead to a government embargo on shipments of war material," he said, "would be absolutely meaningless."

I stated last year that I thought it was the government's duty to declare an embargo on shipments of war material, and I still think that is the proper course for it to take. Last year, when speaking on this question, the Prime Minister informed me that an investigation was being made into the manufacture of munitions to find out if any profiteering was going on. I have not heard of any report being made on that investigation. I think it was the proper course to inquire into the matter, and I think the report should be made public if there was an investigation, so that the public would know whether there was any profiteering or not in that industry. I have never contended that our manufacturers should make munitions for nothing; I think they should have a reasonable commission, and no one, I think, would contend to the contrary; but when it comes to profiteering I think that is wrong. When we ship arms and munitions to countries that are openly engaged in war, I think it is absolutely wrong and is leading us right into war, and I believe we should declare our policy most emphatically when the Prime Minister is making his statement on foreign policy.

I have no objection to defence; I believe we should be properly defended, and I think the suggestion made by an hon. member a short while ago in regard to the defence of our coasts is sound. He is an army man and knows better than some of the rest of us do what the requirements are, and no doubt the minister will avail himself of the information which that hon. gentleman has given. I would suggest, however, that defence divides itself into two parts. In the first place, provision must be made for weapons—airplanes, machine guns and things of that sort. And let me say that, if the need arises, we can build those things right here in Canada. For that matter, we could start now. We have an admirable beginning in our aircraft. But one of the greatest forms of defence, one form that we are neglecting, the one most essential, is the proper care of our people, because when war is declared you must have healthy men to fight. And how will you have healthy men unless you pay attention to them now? You will not have good, healthy men in the ranks of the unemployed if you leave them poorly clad and housed and ill fed. One of the main considerations of the government should be to see that our people are properly cared for. That was what they promised in 1935, and that is what they should be giving their attention to at the present time.

But the question will be asked, Where is the money to come from? I said a moment ago that I did not agree with the government's plan of raising money for defence. Let me repeat, I have no objection to defence, but I must vote against this estimate for the same reason that I gave last year: I object to the method by which the money is to be raised. The Prime Minister in 1935 said that he would issue money in terms of public need. Surely there is no greater public need than the defence of the country. And there is no greater need in times of peace than the proper care of the citizens of the country. If the Prime Minister would put that promise into effect, I would have no objection to this estimate. If he would issue debt-free money to take care of defence, instead of piling up the national debt by increasing taxation; if he would devise a plan of that sort and issue money in terms of public need, debt free, then there would not be anyone who would vote against these estimates. We must have more money if we are to have defence; and where will it come from? The Minister of Labour on March 2, as reported at page 979 of Hansard, made a statement from which I wish to quote:

> . . . but the dominion government can appeal to no one for grants in aid. In connection with its increased expenditures it can go only to the taxpayers of this country. That is a consideration which we are bound to keep in view.

That, it seems, is where the money is to come from. Further on, he said:

> I think it is quite clear from the returns made by the income tax branch of the Department of National Revenue that it would be quite impossible to raise this additional sum by increasing the taxes imposed on the higher brackets of income.

Rest assured it will not come from the higher brackets.

> No doubt some additional income could be obtained in that way—so far as I am concerned I would prefer that it be done in that manner—but there is no doubt that if we endeavoured to obtain this revenue it would be necessary to go into the lower brackets of income where we would be taxing once more the small home owners who have already been seriously affected by the heavy burden of relief in our municipalities.

If we have to build up a defence force by means of money obtained from that source, then I say that we are destroying the greatest arm of defence that we have—the health and well-being of our citizens who must necessarily participate in any war of defence. On the next page the minister is reported as follows:

> If we did not have recourse to the income tax to raise the money required by the dominion government taking over the entire cost of relief, we would have to consider the sales tax. I think it will be agreed that here again we would be burdening that group of moderate wage earners who represent, so to speak, the working force of the country as a whole. Not only that, but with an increase in the sales tax we would be providing another deterrent to a revival of the building industry.

It is clear from the foregoing exactly how the government intends to get the money to build up a defence force. Perhaps, however, I am wrong, because the Minister of National Defence did say that he would issue $500,000,000. I hope he will persuade the government to do this. If he does, I can assure him that I shall vote for this estimate. I hope that he will carry out that promise which he made in the west.

The CHAIRMAN: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am just about through. I want to assure the minister that if he keeps the promise which he made in Edmonton, of issuing $500,000,000 of debt-free money, I shall vote for these estimates, and not otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We will let it stand.

Item stands.

General—Closing relief projects, $2,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Are they all closed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. This is a small sum for unforeseen contingencies and to meet claims for compensation for men who formerly worked in the camps.

Mr. STIRLING: What has happened to the physical properties of the various camps throughout Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand they have been disposed of, through the salvage officer, to the provincial governments relief organizations, and, in some instances, for public use, and so forth.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to remind the minister of a situation I brought to his attention once before, namely with regard to the Long Branch rifle ranges situated near Lakeview in the county of Peel. During the last month or so, some dismantling operations have been under way in connection with the buildings which were occupied as relief camps in the years gone by. During the dismantling process, a number of men were employed. I absolve the minister of any serious criticism with regard to the actual employment of these men who were obtained to do the job; but I would point out to him that a number of complaints have reached me as federal member for the district, and I believe a number of complaints have reached some other members of the house from interested parties who were seriously seeking employment for unemployed returned soldiers at that point. Some time ago I had an undertaking from the Minister of National Defence that he would look into the complaints, which to a large extent had to do with the fact that a number of men who were employed in this dismantling process were not overseas veterans. I know the minister has a keen interest in veterans' problems, and as far as humanly possible I have no doubt he will see that returned soldiers have a proper place in this employment scheme. I am sure he will be glad to accede to my request that something be done in the matter. I am not in a position to make a personal statement in regard to this; I only repeat to the minister complaints which have arisen from time to time that those who were employed on this Long Branch dismantling project found it necessary to seek advice and guidance as to employment from the president of the local Liberal association. I do not want especially to criticize the president of the local Liberal association. I know him very well. But I do severely criticize the system. I know I need only draw the matter once more to the attention of the minister for him to see that some different system is put into effect regarding employment on that kind of work. I would welcome at this stage some statement from the minister to the effect that the matter has been satisfactorily dealt with and that no more ground for complaint will be given.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On April 6 on the orders of the day my hon. friend asked a question with reference to the situation, and instructions were given on April 19 that in the event of the remaining huts being dismantled, as many ex-service men as possible were to be employed. At the time the question was asked there was available only a sum of $250 for this work. At that time six men were working, of whom two were returned soldiers and four were not. Subsequently to that date a further amount of, I think, $1,600 was made available for the dismantling of the rest of the huts, and I understand that since then ten men have been taken on of whom four are returned soldiers. The instructions from headquarters are, and certainly the desire is, to employ as many ex-service men as possible on all projects connected with defence. We have in all our contracts a clause to that effect, and on some of our projects the personnel is 100 per cent ex-service men.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is encouraging to know that this is the view held by the minister in his department. What has been happening has evidently been entirely contrary to the minister's instructions. I hope he will see that from now on his wishes and the instructions of the department shall prevail in this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to do so.

Item agreed to.

Battlefields memorials, $40,000.

Mr. MacNEIL: What work is contemplated under this vote?

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The break-down of the vote will give it:

Temporary employees, of whom there are two	$ 2,200
Wages	4,300
Total salaries and wages	$ 6,500
Pay and allowances of one officer	9,315
Stores and equipment	1,800
Construction of buildings and works	500
Operating expenses of properties	10,600
Repair and upkeep of buildings and works	5,885
Transport and travelling of personnel	150
Sundries	5,250
	$40,000

Last year's vote was $51,340, but in last year's vote, or in the vote of the year prior to that, my hon. friend will understand that there were many expenses in connection with the unveiling of the Vimy memorial.

Mr. MacNEIL: Who is the officer to whom reference is made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Major Simson, who is in residence in the neighbourhood of the Vimy memorial, in the city of Arras.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to make an observation which I hope, will not be considered too irrelevant. A returned man wearing a button, stopped me to-day within a block of this building, said that he was out of work and that he had not the privilege of going to the shelter, and asked the price of a meal. He said that what he wanted most was work. I had no opportunity of checking that particular case; but unfortunately I have been approached by scores of men like that right here in Ottawa, and I know personally large numbers of returned men who are definitely in need of relief. It seems to me that while we are erecting monuments in marble, we ought to give adequate attention to the poor fellows here in Canada who are out of jobs and are living on charity. I make my protest against the large sums that are being used, some of them overseas, for memorials which may be of interest to an occasional tourist, while we are giving such inadequate support to a great many of our Canadian citizens here at home.

Mr. GREEN: Are these battlefield memorials all in France? Will the minister tell us which ones they are, and also how large a staff we have looking after them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are at Passchendaele, St. Julien, Hill 62—Mount Sorel, Vimy Ridge, Dury, Bourlon Wood, le Quesnel in front of Amiens, and Courcelette. The staff comprises one officer and three employees, employed continuously.

Mr. HAYHURST: In the details on page 140, what does the item, "pay and allowances, $9,315," cover?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This item provides for the pay and allowances of Major D. C. U. Simson, engineer in charge, and a contingency amount to provide for loss on exchange.

Mr. GREEN: Is there a temporary staff too?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There may be casual employees from time to time to look after the grounds, say in summer.

Mr. GREEN: In the details on page 140, there is an item, "operating expenses of properties, $10,600." For what is that money spent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is to provide for the maintenance of the Vimy memorial site and seven other battlefield memorial sites in France and Belgium. The increase in this item this year is on account of the cost of maintaining the Vimy site. Certain small improvements had to be made to the site itself after the unveiling of the memorial.

Mr. STIRLING: I suppose the work on the fortifications at Quebec, for instance, does not come under this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; this is entirely for overseas memorials.

Mr. STIRLING: Under what item would that work at Quebec come, if there is any going on now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The national battlefields commission, I am informed, which I think is under the administration of my colleague the Minister of Finance. The battlefields near Quebec are not under the Department of National Defence, but I think certain work on the citadel and walks has been done from time to time under the direction of the department and under another vote.

Mr. STIRLING: Some admirable work was done under the relief scheme, some walls taken down which were in jeopardy, and rebuilt from the base up; and I think after that time some further work was done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We did some last year.

Mr. STIRLING: But there is none going on now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not just at the present time, I am informed.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims, including grant of $300 to McGill university toward upkeep of war museum, $64,000.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister explain this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is for the payment of expenses and services arising as a result of the great war, including claims for adjustment of pay and allowances, separation allowances, war service gratuities, headstones on graves in Canada of ex-members of his majesty's forces, war medals and decorations, the compilation of the official history of the Canadian forces in the great war and other historical information, and miscellaneous expenses attributable to the great war.

Mr. MacNEIL: What progress has been made in publishing the historical record of the Canadian corps?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The first copies should go to the press for review almost immediately. As a matter of fact, I have the advance copy in my possession now, and I think it will be released within the next few days. This memorandum was prepared some time ago, but according to it the text volume has been run off and awaits the index before binding can be carried out. The appendix volume has been run off. It is estimated that copies of both text and appendix volumes, sufficient for circulation to the press, will be ready between the 9th and 16th of May, which is three or four days from now, and for public sale two weeks later.

Mr. MacNEIL: How will these be made available for circulation? Will they be placed in the libraries of the country?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand they are to be placed in the libraries and also sold through the king's printer. Copies will be made available to members of the house, as was done formerly.

Mr. STIRLING: Of the first volume?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Two volumes; the first volume, with the maps and appendices which are correlated with the incidents described in the first volume, up to 1915.

Mr. STIRLING: And with regard to the second volume, has the minister any information?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I cannot give any definite information as to the date of completion of the second volume.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I ask if any provision exists for the adjustment of claims in respect of working pay overseas or in respect of repatriation expenses?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That question has been very strongly brought to the attention of the department quite recently by the national headquarters of the Canadian Legion and also by representations made by certain hon. members through questions asked on the floor of the house. So far as I can gather it at the moment, the situation is that without question promises were made by regimental officers in regard to working pay for certain members of the Canadian corps, but a general order was issued later, abolishing working pay in the Canadian forces. The unfortunate situation is that many of those men, particularly those who served with the 3rd Canadian tunnelling company, believe that they are entitled to working pay. The official viewpoint is that there was no official authorization for such working pay, so it is a matter of controversy and really there has been no final settlement up to the present time.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister also deal with the question of repatriation expenses, in connection with men who returned to Canada after service at their own expense? Under an old arrangement they were, I think, entitled to something.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So far as I know, there are no representations in this regard before the department at the present time.

Item agreed to.

Radio services, Northwest Territories and Yukon radio system, $358,050.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give us a general outline of what is involved under this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): First, I shall break down the vote: Salaries, civilian personnel, twelve temporary employees, $13,450; pay and allowances of officers and other ranks, eight officers, $23,322; other ranks, eighty-two, $136,478. Total pay and allowances, $159,800. Stores and equipment, $102,800; construction of buildings and works, including the purchase of land, $30,500; operating expenses of properties, $11,350; repair and upkeep of buildings and works, $11,150; transport and travelling (personnel), $15,750; freight, express and cartage, $4,500; printing and stationery, $2,350; medical and dental services, $2,150; telephones, telegrams and postage, $1,200; sundries, $3,050. This makes a total of $358,050.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. GREEN: What is the provision for medical and dental services? Is that for the men employed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This provides for medical and dental services for the military personnel, and the small increase of $150 is on account of an increase in the personnel this year.

Mr. STIRLING: Where are the stations located?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): First of all, there is Headquarters, Barriefield depot. The stations are at Dawson City, Mayo, Edmonton, Fort Smith, Fort Resolution, Fort Simpson, Fort Norman, Aklavik—Herschel, Cameron Bay, Fort McMurray, Chippewyan, Yellowknife, Goldfields, Outpost Island, North Battleford, White Horse, Gordon Lake and Burwash Landing.

Mr. STIRLING: To what extent do these stations assist in commercial or emergency work?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This, of course, is under the control of the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals. The system serves to link up the Northwest Territories and Yukon with the communication systems of the rest of Canada. Transfer points to commercial telegraph systems are maintained at the following points: Dawson City, Fort McMurray, Edmonton and North Battleford. This system also links with the Royal Canadian Signals (permanent force) radio system, which has stations at Ottawa, Kingston, Toronto, Winnipeg and Calgary. Communication is also maintained by radio with the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system, steamers in arctic waters, Department of Transport stations and stations in the Northwest Territories belonging to private companies. The system transmits daily press bulletins from Edmonton to all stations in the Northwest Territories and Yukon. In addition, aircraft weather reports are provided free of charge at frequent intervals, or as required, to all who desire them. Arrivals and departures of aircraft and steamers and similar vital services are provided at nominal cost. Traffic and weather reports for all departments of the dominion government are handled free of charge. Departments and services making use of this service include the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Department of Transport, Department of Mines and Resources, Post Office Department (in connection with air services), the Royal Canadian Air Force, etc.

Mr. BARBER: The estimate for transport and travelling is almost double. Is that mainly by air?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This provides for the transport and travelling expenses incident to inspections, original appointments and enlistments, retirements, transfers between stations and other travelling expenses. The increase of $7,800 is chiefly to enable personnel at the northern stations to be relieved more frequently. Many non-commissioned officers spend four to five years without relief, whereas three years is considered the normal period of time that should be spent.

Mr. BARBER: Is the travel mainly by air?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In some instances it would be by air, but not necessarily.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister explain how this system is correlated with that under the Department of Transport?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was some suggestion made a year ago that there might be overlapping as between the radio service established by the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals and that under the Department of Transport. An interdepartmental committee was set up which made a thorough investigation, and I have here the report, pointing out that the operation of this system by military personnel has distinct advantages from a defence standpoint; that certain types of training are given to Royal Canadian Corps of Signals men which cannot be given by the department in any other way. A continuation of the operation of this system is of tremendous value to this department from many angles. It is agreed that the system could be operated for less money per annum. It is not agreed that it could be more economically operated. If the Royal Canadian Signals did not get the training they now obtain in this way, more men would be required in the corps paid for from the permanent force vote in order to ensure that an adequate number were trained. Other training arrangements would have to be devised to compensate for the training these men now get, and altogether the ultimate cost to the taxpayer from a broad point of view would be greater than at present. The finding actually was that there was very little duplication as between the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals and the Department of Transport. This question was brought to our attention less than a year ago.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there any international use of this service? Does the United States request our assistance on occasion?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In Alaska, and within the last few days we have had official thanks from the Russian ministry in Washington, I believe it was, thanking the Canadian government for the use of the services of the signal corps in the search for the lost airmen.

Item agreed to.

Militia services—Grants to military associations and institutes in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $103,450.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister give us the information on this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The details show that there are the rifle associations of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association, the National Defence headquarters and the university and local.

Then, there are various service associations. May I point out that the vote last year was not in this form, although a sum of money was included in another vote. The service associations are listed as cavalry; artillery; engineers; signals; infantry, machine gun and tanks; army service corps; army medical corps, and a small contribution of $500 for the magazine known as the Defence Quarterly. Under the headings of military institutes we find the Canadian, of Toronto; the Western, at Winnipeg; the Alberta, at Calgary; the United Service Institute, Vancouver; the United Service Institute, Regina; the Royal Military College Club of Canada; the United Service Institute of Saskatoon; the Institute of Nova Scotia, Halifax; the United Service Institute, Vancouver Island, Victoria; the United Service Institute, Ottawa; the United Service Institute, Quebec; the United Service Institute, Moose Jaw; the New Brunswick Institute, Saint John; the Military Institute, London; the Military Institute, Edmonton; the Military Institute, Kingston; the Military Institute, Charlottetown, and the United Service Institute, Montreal.

Mr. MacNEIL: Who are eligible for membership in the rifle associations? Must they be members of the militia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, of the military associations; for these grants they must be members of the militia. I understand in other days there were grants made to civilian rifle associations, but they were discontinued some time ago.

Mr. MacNEIL: What are the responsibilities of rifle associations? There was some question in previous sessions as to the right of the district officer commanding to call upon rifle associations in cases of emergency. What exactly is the jurisdiction of the district officer commanding? What responsibilities must be accepted by members of rifle associations?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would say none at all, in their civilian capacity, but I shall look into the question. If they were members of the militia, there would be jurisdiction.

Mr. MacNEIL: I would remind the minister that a general order which appeared showed that rifle association members were liable for service under orders of the district officer commanding, in the event of emergency, and particularly in the event of civil disturbances.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not sure of it, but I should like to have the order pointed out.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any regulation as to how this money shall be spent by the different associations, or are they allowed carte blanche?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In regard to the financial aspect of the question, they are under obligation to submit an audited report to the department. With reference to the general aspect of the question, I think they are allowed very wide jurisdiction with respect to the exact manner. Generally speaking, moneys for service organizations, for instance, are spent for meetings and conventions for the discussion of problems concerning their own particular arms of the service. In connection with the rifle associations, there are, of course, organizations in each province, and then each year we have an annual meeting here in Ottawa at the Connaught range in charge of the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association. Then, there is the final stage when the Bisley team is selected by the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association and sent to England each year to compete with other members of empire teams. With reference to general expenditure, I may say that they have very wide jurisdiction and are subject to audit every year.

Mr. MacINNIS: How many associations are there in British Columbia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The only one named getting a grant in British Columbia is the provincial organization. The British Columbia Rifle Association gets a grant of $1,500 a year.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the minister any information as to the membership of the association?

[Mr. MacNeil.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have not the details here, but I shall get them for the hon. member. They might also be in their annual report, but I am not sure.

Mr. GREEN: Does membership in these associations include members of the militia, or do militiamen obtain their training in rifle shooting separately?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Militiamen obtain training in their own units, of course; but very often that is supplemented by membership in rifle associations, especially if they are expert shots.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention that these rifle associations shall train men to shoot who are not in the militia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I answer the question by referring to some information I have before me. These grants are made annually to permit and encourage rifle shooting, and to assist associations in defraying expenses connected with the annual prize meetings. Rifle associations are classified under three headings, namely the Dominion of Canada Rifle Associations, the provincial rifle associations and, in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East, university and local rifle associations. If the hon. member wishes to have the information, I can describe the various associations.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many associations of each type are there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver:) I have before me a statement by military districts, showing the number and the state of military and civil rifle associations, giving the numbers in each group, as of February, 1938. I shall place the table on record:

Military District	Military Active	Military Inactive	Civilian Active	Civilian Inactive
No. 1	4	5	1	..
No. 2	24	12	2	..
No. 3	15	3	4	2
No. 4	15	5	..	..
No. 5	9	5	6	2
No. 6	23	5	..	3
No. 7	8	2	2	2
No. 10	8	4	7	..
No. 11	14	2	3	..
No. 12	22	4	2	2
No. 13	10	..	5	..

I would point out that military district No. 11 is the British Columbia district.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are there not other types of associations than rifle associations?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; there are the military institutes and the various service associations.

Mr. HAYHURST: What kind of rifle is used in these rifle associations?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Lee-Enfield rifle.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the totai membership in these organizations?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Royal has the floor.

Mr. BROOKS: Has the minister ever received any requests from military organizations in Canada that these associations be confined entirely to active militia, and that there should not be the civilian element? I have asked the question because I have heard representations made that these civilian organizations were practically useless, so far as any benefit to the country was concerned. The men who belong to these civilian rifle associations look upon it as a sport, as other people would consider golf and so on, and yet the country is paying for it. Have any representations been made along that line?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No representations have been made in the last two and one half years that I know of.

Mr. BROOKS: Were any made prior to that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The grants to civilian rifle associations were discontinued in November, 1934, as it was felt that the value obtained did not justify the expenditure involved.

Mr. BROOKS: Then there are no civilian rifle associations?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not receiving grants of money?

Mr. LENNARD: Do these rifle associations devote any of their activities to machine gun instruction?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think so generally.

Mr. LENNARD: In my opinion these rifle associations are becoming antiquated. The majority of those who attend the meetings are styled more or less as pot-hunters. I think it is about time we curtailed that sort of thing and got down to business. We should devote more time to teaching the modern branches of the service.

Mr. MARTIN: Of the slaughter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The point raised by the hon. member has occasioned many debates in these associations; but the general opinion is that despite the development of the automatic, the rifle and the sharpshooter constitute an essential factor.

Mr. STIRLING: In each case the grant is made to a provincial association?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, to those named.

Mr. STIRLING: Then there are member associations in different parts of each province?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is right.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there any relation between the amount of the grant and the number of associations that operate under the provincial association?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not exactly familiar with the basis upon which the grants are computed, but there has been no change for many years.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the purpose of the grant to the military institutes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are similar to the grants made to the service associations. Discussions of various kinds are held in connection with defence, military tactics and so on. These grants have been given for a great number of years. This is the first year in which they have been shown in a separate vote; they are more obvious than they were in former years.

Mr. MacNEIL: Who comprise the membership of the institute?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Active and reserve officers of the permanent and non-permanent forces would be eligible.

Mr. BROOKS: Are there any non-commissioned officers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think so.

Mr. GREEN: The bulk of the vote for the rifle associations goes to the dominion association?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: What is that grant used for?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are the main controlling body of rifle shooting in Canada. They correlate the activities of the provincial organizations and take charge of the annual shoot at the Connaught ranges. They select the Bisley team, following the results of competitions in the provinces and the annual one here in Ottawa.

Mr. GREEN: Does this item include the cost of sending the Bisley team to England?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is an item in another vote to cover the expenses of the adjutant or the commandant of the Bisley team. They have jurisdiction over the manner of expending the grant and spend some of this money in connection with the Bisley team.

Item agreed to.

Royal Military College, $381,500.

Mr. STIRLING: There were some additional buildings at Kingston brought into use last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is a new dormitory wing.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many students are there in the college?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The regulations call for not more than 200. If that number is to be exceeded, a special order in council is required.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the size of the staff?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Civilian personnel, permanent, fifty-six, temporary, twenty, officers, seventeen, and other ranks, sixty-two.

Mr. MacNEIL: How many gentlemen cadets graduated at the last term according to provinces? What is the method of selection for entrance to the college?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The number of graduates for the last several years are as follows:

1926-27	33
1927-28	31
1928-29	34
1929-30	39
1930-31	40
1931-32	29
1932-33	38
1933-34	48
1934-35	51
1935-36	25
1936-37	38

The method of selection is that each province is allowed a quota, and they are graded by order of merit according to performance on the basis of junior matriculation. If the provinces do not take up their full quotas, then a general dominion list is made up in order of merit. Selection is made by a board at national headquarters here, and the vacancies are filled from that general list if there are any gaps in the quotas of the provinces.

Mr. MacNEIL: Has the qualification for entrance been raised recently?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Generally speaking, it is the level of junior matriculation throughout Canada. Of course, it is not called that in some provinces, but that is the standard.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) used the term "gentleman cadet." Are all the students gentlemen cadets, or are there some cadets and some gentlemen cadets?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are all cadets and they are all gentlemen.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister stated there was a permanent staff of fifty-six. How many of those are actually engaged in academic work, and what are their salaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The staff is as follows:

Professors	Salaries
Mathematics	$5,045
Modern languages	4,680

In addition, there are twenty-five cleaners and helpers for $29,025, with all salaries totalling $110,405.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice that, in some instances, there were two or three in the same grade. There were two mathematics teachers, for instance, and the salary seemed to be given for one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were three associate professors teaching different branches of mathematics.

Mr. HAYHURST: Are mathematics and chemistry practically the same as the academic subjects taught at a university?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, except that engineering, geometry, mathematics and physics are very much emphasized in the curricula of the Royal Military College.

Mr. NEILL: Do the particulars given include the military officers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend want the names of the officers?

Mr. NEILL: No. I was wondering how many officers there were and what they received.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are seventeen officers and sixty-two other ranks.

Mr. GREEN: I take it that the reason Canada maintains the Royal Military College is to train officers for our defence forces. What happens to these cadets when they graduate?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The number of graduates taking commissions in the Canadian permanent force and the Royal Canadian Air Force, and in the imperial and Indian armies are as follows:

Number of Graduates taking Commissions

Year	In Canadian permanent force and R.C.A.F.	In Imperial and Indian armies
1926-27	2	4
1927-28	9	..
1928-29	4	..
1929-30	8	1
1930-31	9	3
1931-32	3	2
1932-33	16	2
1933-34	14	3
1934-35	21	4
1935-36	6	5
1936-37	8	6

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister give the totals of those going into the imperial forces and into the Canadian permanent force, and the total number of graduates in the ten years?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have already given the number of graduates taking commissions in the Canadian permanent force, the Royal Canadian Air Force, and in the imperial and Indian armies. The percentage of graduates taking commissions is as follows:

	Percentage of graduates taking commissions
1926-27	18
1927-28	29
1928-29	12
1929-30	23
1930-31	30
1931-32	17
1932-33	47
1933-34	35
1934-35	49
1935-36	44
1936-37	37

Mr. GREEN: Is there any regulation providing that the other graduates must go into the non-permanent militia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, that is the undertaking.

Mr. GREEN: All other graduates take commissions in the non-permanent militia?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. HAYHURST: Are the graduates from the Royal Military College given credits at a university for the subjects in which they have graduated? Does the work they have done at the college count at a university towards an academic degree?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Concessions are made by the university in regard to time and subjects, but I have not the specific concessions before me at the moment.

Mr. HAYHURST: But their credits at the college would be accepted by the university?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, according to what they take up.

Mr. MARTIN: Is it not a fact that a graduate of the Royal Military College is credited with two years at our universities, that he goes into the third year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: There are many graduates across the country, and I should like to know what is the difference between a cadet and a gentleman cadet.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is actually none, but it is an appellation by which the students go at the Royal Military College, and have done for many years.

Mr. STIRLING: All over the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Is it necessary to have graduated at the Royal Military College to secure a commission in the permanent force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; but they have the first chance at vacancies that may exist.

Mr. GREEN: Is any training given to the cadets to qualify them for positions in the air force? The minister has stressed the importance of the air force in our defence forces, and I think we should be training some of our air officers at the Royal Military College.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is an air officer on the staff of the college; there is a certain amount of air instruction give to such cadets as desire it, and some proceed to a commission in the air force.

Mr. GREEN: They require subsequent training?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; it is ground training that is given at the college. They would then need ab initio training in the air, and then advanced training.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be possible to train at the college those cadets who want to become air officers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They could take courses at our summer training camps, and qualify in that way. Some do.

Mr. COLDWELL: What percentage of these young men go into the army and what percentage into the professions and business? I understand that quite a number of the boys who go to the Royal Military College do not go into the service, but gravitate into business of various descriptions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The most recent figures are as follows: The number of graduates who have taken commissions in the Canadian permanent forces, including the Royal Canadian Air Force, is 241, or 19·8 per cent of the graduate body; in the imperial and Indian armies, 234, or 19 per cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: Those taking commissions in the Canadian permanent forces amount to 19·8 per cent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: A very small percentage.

Mr. TREMBLAY:

1. Is there in the harbour of Quebec any wharf reserved to the general public for the unloading of coal?
2. What persons or corporations have made use of the wharf since it has been placed at the disposal of the public, and what is the volume of coal that has been unloaded at such wharf by such persons or corporations?
3. Has the national harbours board received any offer to rent this wharf? If so, from whom, and on what conditions?

Mr. HOWE:

The following information has been furnished by the national harbours board:

1. Yes.
2. None.
3. Inquiries have been received from time to time from parties expressing a general interest in securing a lease of this wharf. As the area available for this purpose is a restricted one, and as it was prepared and reserved for use as a public coal dock in response to strong local representations in that behalf, the board felt that the regulations which it has formulated to ensure that the dock should be kept available for public use should be adhered to, at least until such time as it should be clearly established that the wharf would not be made use of for the purpose intended. Therefore, negotiations were not entered into with any of the parties inquiring with a view of securing exclusive use of the wharf for a long period.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Agricultural economics, $120,260.

Mr. SENN: The other evening when the committee rose we were discussing research work carried on in different cities regarding the purchase and consumption of agricultural products. I asked the minister whether any investigation had been made into the consumption of vegetable oils and the effect upon the sale of other agricultural products. The minister replied in the negative, and he was asked whether any such investigation was contemplated. I think it is desirable in the interest of agriculture, and particularly of the live stock industry, that some such investigation be made. Would the minister tell us who initiates these investigations? Under whose authority are they begun? Is it by his own authority, or has the department power to initiate them? If it is the minister's prerogative, will he consider the advisability of inquiring into the effect of the increasing sale of vegetable oils in Canada in recent years upon the sale of animal fats for spreading and shortening purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: The investigation into the use of vegetable oils that has been asked by certain individuals is an investigation of the type that might be carried on by the tariff board. As I understand it the question which has been submitted to that board is whether or not the dairy industry should be given some protection through some action regarding the importation of vegetable oils. That is not a question that would be investigated by the economics branch of this department.

Mr. SENN: I scarcely agree with the minister. I was not asking an investigation into the merits of placing a tariff on vegetable oils or otherwise; but it is undoubtedly true that the sale of vegetable oils in Canada is increasing very rapidly, and naturally it must have some effect upon the sale of animal fats and oils. I think it might very well come within the scope of any investigation to determine to what extent these vegetable oils are displacing animal fats for spreading and shortening purposes. I do not wish to carry the matter further than to say that I believe it would be in the interests of agriculture generally if the minister would initiate such an investigation.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask the minister one further question. The other day he made some reference to the fact that a study was being made of the cost of farm living. I wonder how far that investigation has been carried and how it is being conducted. Is it being carried on in all parts of the dominion or only in Ontario or some other provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: Most of these investigations are carried on in cooperation with the provincial authorities and, in some instances, agricultural colleges and universities. They are of a local nature in the sense that at one time they may be carried on in Alberta, at another time in Ontario and at another time in Nova Scotia, but there is a relationship between the investigations in one part and those in others.

Mr. NEILL: Reverting for a moment to the question of vegetable oils, perhaps the Minister of Finance could tell us whether or not there has been an investigation made by the tariff board. I was under the impression that he ordered an investigation by that board into the importation of vegetable oils, which arose, so far as my interest in it was concerned, not only as regards the dairying interests in my district but also in connection with the competition it afforded to fish oils made from the reduction of pilchards on the Pacific coast. Perhaps my memory is bad, but I gathered that the matter was being investigated by the tariff board. Has the Minister of Finance any knowledge of that?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is quite correct, Mr. Chairman. The reference to the tariff board of the matter of tariffs on vegetable oils and matters connected therewith was made some time ago. I cannot recollect the date, but in any event it was within the past year Hearings have taken place; submissions have been made, and there has been very considerable argument about the whole matter. Offhand I cannot state the stage of the proceedings at the moment, but a very thorough inquiry is proceeding.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I realize that it is difficult to discuss a matter that is now before the tariff board; but on the other hand, as the hon member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) has stated, the situation warrants further investigation by the department into the effect on our agricultural products of the importation of vegetable oils. I presume if it is impossible to discuss the matter under this item it may be impossible to discuss it under any other. The government may later consider any recommendations that may be made by the tariff board in regard to the tariff on vegetable oils, but I think if investigation discloses that vegetable oils are replacing animal fats and oils to a considerable extent there may be some other method of assisting and protecting the producers of animal fats in this country. The tariff board is dealing with the tariff phase of the issue; nevertheless I think under this item the government might well institute investigations to ascertain to what extent animal fats and oils are being replaced by the vegetable oils that are shipped into this country. The government should consider that matter very carefully, as a government; and it is the responsibility of the Department of Agriculture to consider the effect on agriculture in this country. I am not so much concerned with the manner in which the government might assist the farmers, whether by implementing any recommendations made by the tariff board or by the imposition of a processing tax, but I do feel that this question deeply affects agriculture, and might well be considered by this economics branch instead of being left entirely to the tariff board as a tariff or fiscal matter.

Personally I think the importation of these vegetable oils affects the very basis of the agricultural industry in this dominion. I know of nothing that promises so adversely to affect Canadian agriculture as the importation of substitutes for animal fats and animal oils. The live stock industry is recognized by all outstanding agriculturists, both in the department and in various parts of the dominion, as one of the most important branches of agriculture. If we are to perpetuate a sound agricultural industry in Canada we must maintain a prosperous live stock industry. I think every farmer within the sound of my voice will agree with that general principle, and that industry is being threatened by the greatly increased importation of vegetable oils and the ever-widening use of these oils as shortening, replacing lard. It is possible that in the not far distant future they may be used in the manufacture of substitutes for butter and other dairy products. When one realizes that to-day we find it necessary to export more than half the lard production in Canada one realizes the effect of these importations on our live stock industry, and there is no doubt that the almost prohibitive tariff against the importation of vegetable oils into the United States has had the effect of increasing the importations into this country. I do not mean to say that the imposition of tariffs is the only method of relieving the situation. While we are speaking about agricultural economics I must observe that I know of no single factor which affects so adversely the agricultural situation throughout Canada as does this great increase in importations of what might be described as a substitute for live stock products. It may be said that these many millions of pounds of imported vegetable oils are inedible. While that may be true it is also true that much of the oil imported as inedible is made edible before it reaches the Canadian market.

I believe the department would do well to consider means of relieving the situation, and as the Minister of Agriculture is the one most responsible to agriculture in Canada I suggest that he recommend to the government effective measures through which this serious situation may be remedied. In making these observations I believe I am not speaking out of turn, although the Minister of Finance has declared that the subject is before the tariff board. It seems to me that some form of taxation would be highly justified, in view of the fact that these importations strike at the very roots of successful agriculture and would have the effect of destroying our live stock industry.

Mr. HAYHURST: I have received about five hundred letters from dairy farmers in the northern section of Alberta, and especially from my own constituency, dealing with the problem of the importation of vegetable oil. I have no doubt other hon. members have received similar letters. In order that hon. members may be familiar with the situation I should like to read one letter.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is the hon. member referring to letters or only to circulars which came through the mail?

Mr. HAYHURST: They are circular statements signed by individual farmers.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But they are not letters.

Mr. HAYHURST: They are letters in the respect I have indicated.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): If they are signed by individual farmers they are letters.

Mr. HAYHURST: And they are signed by individual farmers.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Handed to them to sign.

Mr. HAYHURST: Signed by individual farmers who object to large importations of vegetable oil.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Propaganda.

Mr. HAYHURST: Propaganda it may be, from your standpoint; but at the same time the dairy industry in Alberta and in other provinces must be protected. I am not saying it will have to be protected by the imposition of high tariffs upon vegetable oils, but there should be some way of helping the dairy farmers. The letter is as follows:

Dear Sir,—

I note that last year there were over 200,000,000 pounds of vegetable oils imported into Canada, chiefly from tropical countries, practically duty free, and that the quantity of shortening manufactured in Canada, not made from animal fat, has doubled since 1932. I have every reason to believe that the substitution of cheap foreign vegetable oils for Canadian produced animal fats is becoming a serious menace to Canada's 750,000 farmers.

Something must be done about this menace, for we farmers can't compete with the cheap native labour of the tropics. I urge you, therefore, to take such steps as will cause a duty to be placed on these imported vegetable oils as outlined in the application of the National Dairy Council to the tariff board in December, 1936. Successful diversified farming can only be continued through the encouragement of the live stock and dairy industries. As one of your constituents, depending on mixed farming for a living, I urge you to support a reasonable and fair tariff on the importation of these foreign substitutes for Canadian produced animal fats.

[Mr W. E. Rowe.]

We know that very large areas of Canada are dependent upon the dairy industry. If the industry is not aided by the federal government the substitution of vegetable oils will have serious effects.

An hon. MEMBER: How?

Mr. LENNARD: Use your head.

Mr. HAYHURST: Some are not accustomed to using their heads.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You promised fifty-cent butter in 1930 and we got five-cent butter.

Mr. HAYHURST: If large quantities of vegetable oils are brought into Canada and used as shortening in the baking industry we will lose the local market for products we can produce in great abundance. I would urge the Minister of Agriculture to put his experts on agricultural economic planning to work on the subject. They should see that the dairy industry of Canada is properly protected.

Mr. MAYBANK: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak because of the pleas put forward in the last few moments. Although I represent a city constituency, I come from an agricultural province. I believe the city, part of which I represent, knows as well as any city can know the needs and desires of farmers, and recognizes as perhaps no other city does how completely and fully its own prosperity is tied up with the prosperity of the surrounding farming community. I hope that the government will not be influenced by pleas of the sort which have just been made for the imposition of tariffs on these products. I do not know for certain that all the representatives from Manitoba are in agreement with me, but I believe they are. I have spoken with the Manitoba members on the subject and have heard no voice in favour of the tariff now sought. I did not wish the moment to pass without speaking, especially in view of the silence of several representatives from Saskatchewan, which might indicate an acquiescence.

I believe the people in western Canada realize that they cannot at one and the same time ask for a general lowering of tariffs and an increase in the tariff on these particular commodities. Taking it by and large, it will be found that the farming communities will be consistent in the requests they make from time to time. I am well aware a certain campaign has been put on in favour of a tariff increase in this connection, and that some sections of the farming communities may be in favour of it. However it is my belief it will be found that no representative of the great province of Manitoba—and certainly Manitoba is an agricultural province, with many dairy farmers—will be in favour of this particular plea.

Mr. SENN: I have listened with interest and attention to the observations of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Maybank). I do not know just what is the attitude of the farming population of Manitoba toward this question, but I venture to say that many of them want something done to curb the importation and sale of vegetable oils which are being used in preference to animal fats produced in our own country. The hon. gentleman has referred to the attitude of agriculture generally regarding the tariff, but he will find that in certain parts of this country the farmers are not asking for lower tariffs. All that they ask is that they be placed in a position of equality with other industries throughout the dominion so far as the tariff is concerned.

The hon. gentleman has referred to the propaganda being carried on, but I know that if conditions were reversed, if other classes of goods were coming in to displace other Canadian products, a more intensive campaign of propaganda would be carried on. I have in my hand a clipping containing a statement made by the president of Canada Packers in which he states that if a certain amount of protection were granted to this industry it would mean a third of a cent per pound on every hog slaughtered and a fifth of a cent per pound on every steer. If hon. members will take the trouble to estimate what that would return to the farmers of Canada they will realize that it would mean from $6,000,000 to $7,500,000 annually. That is a considerable item.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) did not say that he was putting forth an argument on behalf of the consumer. His argument was rather on the ground that they have consistently been asking for freer trade and in this instance they had to be consistent again. It seems to me that his argument is not at all well founded. I did not rise at this time to enter into a discussion of this matter. All I ask the minister to do is to authorize an investigation into the extent to which imported vegetable oils are displacing animal fats produced in Canada. It seems to me that that would come well within this vote. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has stated that the matter is being inquired into by the tariff board, but I doubt if that investigation would be as thorough as one which could be made by officials of the department who would go to cities and towns and other parts of the country and make a house to house investigation.

Mr. GARDINER: The importation and use of vegetable oils has a relationship not only to the dairy industry but also to the live stock industry. If vegetable oils replace anything, it is animal fats rather than the products of the dairy industry. The whole matter of the relationship of these different products has been referred to the tariff board. I do not think it would be proper for the economics branch of the Department of Agriculture to start a second inquiry when the matter is before the tariff board. However, everything that has been mentioned here will naturally be given consideration during this investigation.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The army of privilege fights hard and never dies. The men who have been making an argument to-day in favour of restriction are the men who opposed a reciprocity agreement with the United States which gave us access to the American market. We cannot continue to export unless we continue to import. In 1930 our exports to the United Kingdom were $283,000,000; in 1937 they were $409,000,000.

Mr. SENN: Give us the figures for 1928.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I will let my hon. friend choose any year he wishes, but if I were to give those it would only show the extent to which our trade fell off after the government of my hon. friend came into office. I do not want to make this a political issue. The imports from the United Kingdom dropped from $189,000,000 to $129,000,000. There is a strong feeling in the United Kingdom that we drove a very hard bargain when we negotiated the empire agreements with that country. A bargain is never a real bargain unless both parties to the transaction make a profit. When you drive a bargain in which the loss is entirely upon the other side, then you have lost the deal. That is especially so when it is a national transaction. You may have sharp practices with an individual and get away with it, but a nation must be honest, it must be square in its dealings.

Mr. CAHAN: Is the hon. member insinuating that sharp practices were applied to the British delegates at the conference?

Mr. DEACHMAN: The leader of the government of that day was emphatic in the statement that he was going to bargain in a tight, hard way, there is no question about that. Were it not for that fact, where did the phrase, "blast our way into the markets of the world" originate?

Mr. CAHAN: I ask my hon. friend either to make his reflections clear or to retract them.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I am making my reflections quite clear. We drove a hard, tight bargain.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt, I should like to say that there was no hard, tight bargain driven. I was at every conference between the British and Canadian delegates. If we had given all that the British delegates demanded, it would have been such a hard bargain for this country that industry could hardly have survived.

Mr. BAKER: I think the hon. member should be asked to withdraw the words "sharp practices."

Mr. DEACHMAN: Here is the record of the bargain. Exports to the United Kingdom in 1930 stood at $283,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I think this discussion is taking in a rather wide field. I would request hon. members to confine their remarks to the item before the committee. We are now on item No. 7.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I am dealing with a question involving the importation of vegetable oils into Canada, and I propose to submit this argument. We are now engaged in negotiation not only with the empire but with the United States for the extension of our markets. I submit that it is perfectly appropriate for me to point out that restrictions upon imports into this country must necessarily restrict exports. I was illustrating this fact by stating that in 1930 our exports to the United Kingdom were $283,000,000 and in 1937 they had increased to $409,000,000. Our imports from the United Kingdom were $189,000,000 and they dropped to $129,000,000. What happened in connection with vegetable oils? In 1933 our imports of vegetable oils from the United Kingdom amounted to $1,005,000 and in 1937 they had increased to $6,288,000. I submit that here was one little ewe lamb that we managed to offer to Great Britain. We offered her a market in this country for certain types of vegetable oil, and she took advantage of that offer. When there is one item of a few million dollars that seems to stand out, hon. gentlemen on the Conservative side rise up with one voice and say, "Let us restrict the imports of this commodity." I ask, where are we going? Do we want markets or do we not want them?

[Mr. Deachman.]

We are endeavouring as best we can to expand our markets for agricultural products not only in the United States but in the United Kingdom. It is, I submit, the most vital issue in this country to-day.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Can he tell me the amount in value of vegetable oils produced in the United Kingdom in any recent year?

Mr. DEACHMAN: We are buying them from there.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to know what is the amount in value produced. The quantity produced is infinitesimal.

Mr. DEACHMAN: We are purchasing these oils refined or partly refined from the United Kingdom, and this is the market so far as the United Kingdom is concerned. I might counter by asking what products we ship abroad and what proportion is produced in Canada; but we cannot go into those details to-day. The broad fact is that we must receive payment for the products which we export or we cannot continue to export them, and in face of the fact that we are now engaged in trade negotiations we have the suggestion made in this House of Commons, by men who, I presume, are definitely interested in the welfare of agriculture, that we should announce increased restrictions on the import of vegetable oils from the United Kingdom and also duties upon agricultural products coming in from the United States—that is what it ultimately involves.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order arising out of your ruling, now that my hon. friend has stated what might be called the other side, could we not get back to the real point before the committee?—which, as I understand it, is whether this parliament is prepared to have $120,000 expended on the study of agricultural economics. I think, sir, your ruling was quite correct, that the discussion should be confined to the purpose for which the money is to be voted. The question is not the importation of vegetable oils or the usual budget debate on tariffs, either high or low, free trade or protection, but whether it is a good thing and a sound thing that there should be an organization in the Department of Agriculture to make an intensive study of agricultural economics, and of course to produce reports and make them available to parliament. The ruling, I submit, should be adhered to, but I hesitate to interrupt my hon. friend because he was stating the other side.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I have no objection whatever to the ruling of the Chair, and I would hesitate to take any exception to a ruling, but I do suggest that we have been discussing this question for nearly three-quarters of an hour; there was no protest when it started, and yet when I am stating my case, which is a refutation of the argument made by those who are opposing me from the Conservative side, then we have these rules of order raised.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no. I think the hon. member has stated his case pretty completely. I had no intention at all of raising a point of order against him. I was not in the other night when the Chairman made his ruling, but it seems to me a common sense ruling. My hon. friend has just stated his point admirably, and I thought that was an appropriate place to try to get the committee back on the rails. However, it is entirely in your hands, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): While I do not agree with the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), yet on the point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DUNNING: The point of order is decided.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The Minister of Finance was speaking to it.

Mr. DUNNING: No, I was simply suggesting that the ruling should be enforced.

Mr. POULIOT: As your ruling, Mr. Chairman, was broad, and as the subject matter is very broad, may I point out with regard to trade with the United Kingdom that one should consider not only production over there. That would be a great mistake and would show very deep ignorance, because it is well known that with regard to butter, for instance, speaking in a wide sense, in England the sales of butter exceed greatly the production of butter, and the same with a great many other commodities.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is out of order. We are discussing item 7, and if the hon. member will turn to page 55 of the details of the estimates he will find that the item is made up entirely of salaries. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to item 7.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Mr. Chairman, I desire to deal again with the point brought up a moment ago with regard to the importation of vegetable oils. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) suggested that the effect of the importation of vegetable oils would be the addition of, I think it was, approximately 35 cents a hundred, to the price of hogs in the Dominion of Canada. He quoted from a document which he said was prepared by Canada Packers, and I suppose I may be permitted now to quote from the same document in respect to this important item:

> A careful calculation indicates that the duty proposed would involve an increase in the cost of household necessities not less than $15,000,000 per year. This is equivalent to $7 per family. And the weight of it would fall principally on labour and farm families, which are the largest consumers of bread and soap.

I submit that when we consider the investigation of vegetable oils we ought to consider very carefully the reduction in the purchasing power of the Canadian people which would result from the addition of a total bill of $15,000,000 to what labour, the farmer, and the consumers of Canada generally would have to pay for two ordinary household necessities.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the minister what the duties of the senior agricultural economists will be?

Mr. GARDINER: The senior agricultural economist is Mr. Booth, who was appointed in 1929 for the purpose of making investigations into the economic side of agriculture. It is not his duty, as I pointed out on three or four occasions last Thursday afternoon, to make investigations into the relationship of the tariff to the exportation of goods from Canada or the importation of goods into Canada. That is the duty of the tariff board. His duty is to make investigations in, say, Saskatchewan as to the costs of producing certain commodities or as to the cost of operating farms under certain circumstances, or as to whether one type of farming would be beneficial as against another type, and all subjects of that kind having to do either with the marketing or with the production of farm commodities.

Mr. COLDWELL: Have these inquiries been begun? Are they being conducted at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: Quite a number of them have been carried on over a period of years. There have been investigations into the marketing of fruit and vegetables, such as a study of the marketing of fruit and vegetables in the city of Toronto, an investigation of the variations in price received for apples exported from Nova Scotia, an investigation of distribution costs of fruits and vegetables distributed by wholesalers and jobbers, wholesale fruit and vegetable distribution costs. There is a whole page of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister mentioned western Canada. What work is being done in this regard in the prairie provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: Land utilization surveys, 1937, and an economic land utilization classification in Saskatchewan.

Mr. COLDWELL: With regard to the surveys for land utilization, the members of that staff are, I believe, highly qualified soil chemists. Is this the place to ask for information regarding the rates of salary paid to these men? I understood the minister to tell me last year that they were classified as graduate-labourers.

Mr. GARDINER: The proper place to discuss that would be under experimental farms, on the next page.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister spoke of land utilization. I thought this might get the discussion back to the item, as a matter of fact.

Mr. POULIOT: Under this item I see: two senior agricultural economists, two agricultural economists, two senior assistant agricultural economists, two assistant agricultural economists, and one junior agricultural economist. I suggest that the minister should be very careful about economists, and should have business men of his own type in the first place; even if they are economists on the side I would have no objection to it. But in certain departments we have too many doctors, and I have suggested already that we should see them in full regalia: we have too many doctors, we have a pest of doctors, and at times they are fake doctors.

Mr. THOMPSON: What about the lawyers?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not mean doctors of medicine like my hon. friend from Lanark; I mean fake doctors in sciences, and especially doctors in philosophy. I am afraid of these people because they are dreamers, they are not practical men. I should like to see all these economists of lower grade replaced by men of high standing who have experience in agriculture, men of the type of the minister and other good men I see here in the house. They would do much more for the farmer and the country than some of those who are now in the Department of Agriculture. That is all I have to say about it for the time being.

Mr. BARBER: Under this division of the department has any investigation been made into fruit marketing and production and dairy production in British Columbia? I believe that these activities are supposed to be carried on in conjunction with the local officials. If so, what has been done?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: We have had investigations into creamery management and into milk consumption in British Columbia, and at present there is being organized an investigation into the fruit industry of that province.

Mr. LENNARD: Can the minister tell me where these different economists are located at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: All of the officials whose positions are listed on page 55 work from a central office in Ottawa, but they may be carrying on duties in British Columbia or Nova Scotia or Saskatchewan—as a matter of fact, in any part of Canada.

Mr. BAKER: Do they ever leave their Ottawa offices and go out and see the land at all?

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes; they go out continuously from the Ottawa office. They make investigations in different parts of Canada.

Mr. BAKER: Go out and take a peek at it once in a while; is that it?

Mr. PELLETIER: To come back to the question asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I have in my hand a report of the Department of Agriculture, and amongst the duties listed under the economics branch are the following:

> The research activities of this branch were continued during the past year. The special phases of research emphasized have been: A study of the cost of production of milk in Ontario; land utilization in Saskatchewan and Alberta. . . .

I believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made it clear that he was referring to land utilization in Saskatchewan and Alberta, so that under this particular heading I believe I shall be in order in making a few remarks concerning land utilization in those two provinces.

I know the minister believes that eventually the drought areas of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta will come back into their own. For many years past I have agitated along the line that these people, instead of being kept continuously on relief in the areas in which they live, would be in a much better position if definite steps were taken to establish them—those of them for whom there is no hope in the future—in other areas in the northern parts of our provinces where they would have at least some opportunity and hope of reestablishment. This economics branch could very well undertake, for example, the study of wooded soils and their management. It is a subject which in my opinion comes definitely within the purview of this branch. I understand that some work of this kind has been carried on in the past by various provincial governments, but in order to get at the root of this problem the economics branch should undertake a survey along lines which would give reasonable hope that a solution shall be found where apparently no solution exists at the present time.

I have often spoken about the Peace River country. I happen to know that in that particular part of Canada there is a vast area which needs development, which could easily locate many thousands of settlers who have no hope of recovering their lost fortunes in the places where they are settled at the present time. Apparently it is impossible to foresee with any degree of accuracy just how long it would take to rehabilitate them under the uncertain conditions which they have to face. The point is this, that year after year we in this parliament are required to appropriate vast sums of money in order to relieve the situation in the drought area, and I believe that one permanent way to meet that condition would be to investigate those parts of Canada which are capable of agricultural development. Eventually these people would no doubt be better off, and the government would benefit financially—and so would the taxpayers of Canada—if they were provided with new locations in areas where drought is unknown.

I realize that drought may be the result of a man-made condition and eventually might afflict these places which it is proposed to develop. That is why I maintain that proper research work in the undeveloped wooded areas in the northern parts of our provinces would certainly afford information which at the present time is not possessed by the Department of Agriculture. I do not know what work has been done along that line, but I believe that in that direction lies at least a possibility of doing away with a large part of the burden of assistance which we have been carrying. Furthermore I wish to point out exactly what it means from the standpoint of the original family itself. We find these people in various drought areas in Saskatchewan living on hope year after year, always hoping that perhaps the next year will be a better one. Yet what happens? Bitter disappointment, bitter failure; that is always the extent to which their hopes materialize. I am sure there are certain places in Canada where we could very well settle these people, make new homes for them, and free them from the conditions under the disadvantages of which they are now existing. As I have said, sometimes drought is the result of development and the opening up of the land too quickly; therefore I believe valuable investigatory work could be done by the economics branch of the department. I look forward to the day when the greatest volume of production in the prairie provinces will come from the northern section.

Under this same heading I notice that the marketing of fresh fruits and vegetables in Toronto is one of the functions performed by the economics branch.

Mr. GARDINER: Not the marketing; they are making an inquiry into marketing.

Mr. PELLETIER: I would like them also to make an inquiry into the marketing possibilities in the Peace River country. I have agitated up there for many years for a coast outlet so that we could secure fresh fruits grown in British Columbia, and I shall lose no occasion to point out that in the Peace River country there is a vast market for British Columbia fresh fruits. The population is close to 70,000, and I am continually receiving letters to the effect that if there were an outlet from the Peace River country to the British Columbia fruit districts they would find in that part of Alberta a large market for their fruit. There is a vast internal market for our products, and it should be one of the functions of the economics branch to ascertain and make known the manner in which these markets may be secured, or how the people can use the products which we produce in abundance. I think this study should be extended beyond the city of Toronto, and if it is found that other areas in Canada are capable of absorbing products from other parts of the country, the method to be used in getting the product to the market should be studied by that branch. We do use some fruit in the Peace River district at the present time, but the freight rates are so high and the haul so long that the people cannot afford to buy the British Columbia product. Yet in a direct line British Columbia is very close to the Peace River country.

Coming back to my first point, I think the minister should seriously consider the possibility of reestablishing settlers from the drought area in areas which are known to be productive but are at present undeveloped. We have hundreds of thousands of acres of such land in the Peace River country, and I am sure some arrangement could be made between the dominion government and the province concerned to permit these people to establish themselves in the northern part of our provinces. I speak of northern Alberta because I know it best, but I feel sure the same thing applies to northern Saskatchewan, where I believe there are thousands of acres of undeveloped land awaiting settlers. Just picture the situation: we keep these people year after year in the dried out country in southern Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, while we have at our doors vast areas of land capable of production. The result of transferring these people would be to give them a better hope in the future, and materially and permanently to lessen the amount of money required to maintain them in the drought area. A relocation of the farmers from the drought areas of western Canada in productive areas now unoccupied is a subject which offers the minister great opportunity for study and action. I should like to know whether he considers that such a survey might well be made by the economics branch of his department.

Mr. GARDINER: The money for carrying on such work as that to which the hon. member has just referred is voted in the supplementary estimates in connection with our rehabilitation program in the drought area. It is not part of the work carried on directly by the Department of Agriculture, but it is carried out through that department under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. We shall have opportunity of discussing that at length when we come to that vote.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then what do the words "land utilization in Saskatchewan and Alberta" mean?

Mr. GARDINER: These investigations are general inquiries into land utilization in all parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta—that is, occupied land. It does not refer to soil conservation, which is dealt with through the experimental farms branch and the universities of the different provinces through their agricultural colleges. It is really centralized in our plant at Swift Current in connection with the experimental farm there. The work consists of examining into the nature of different soils, and is carried on continuously. It is financed partly by the provincial governments, partly by grants from the federal government, and, as far as Saskatchewan is concerned, partly by a fund which was set up following the operations of the wheat board during the war, about $250,000, the interest on which is expended each year in making a soil survey. The whole province is now mapped. If you are going there to farm you can examine a map in my office or in any other agriculture department office in Canada and select the kind of soil you desire. The mapping of the other provinces is being proceeded with.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Mr. PELLETIER: Do I understand that this branch of economics has the painful duty of attempting to make the drought areas produce? If that is so, then the suggestion I have made is well worthy of consideration. It might be possible to consolidate these two divisions in order that their combined efforts might lead to some satisfactory result.

Mr. GARDINER: That is done now.

Mr. PELLETIER: Well, does "land utilization" mean an attempt to revive the dried-out areas in which the people are at present living on relief?

Mr. GARDINER: It deals with land now occupied by persons who have perhaps been living there for forty or fifty years. The economics branch gets a complete record of what has happened on that farm, analyses it and compares it with what has happened on another farm on a different type of land. As a result we get a picture of conditions in the different communities. All the information this economics branch gathers in that kind of survey is available to those who are carrying out what may be called land utilization policies. As we get the people off certain types of land, as a result of what we have found out we put them on other types of land. But the actual expenditure on this work of moving people about or doing anything in connection with those areas is made under our supplementary vote and not this vote.

Mr. STIRLING: This work is purely statistical?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: I understand that in certain provinces the land in certain areas is being repossessed by the province. Would there be any assistance from this branch to enable the provinces to know what areas they should retake or repossess? I am sure the minister is just as familiar as I am, or more so, with the particular projects going on in the various provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that work has been going on since 1935, and it is the information which has been gathered through that work that is being utilized in our present rehabilitation work.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understood the minister to say that maps were available showing the classification of the soils in the different provinces. Is that work undertaken north of latitude 54 in Saskatchewan? Has the department started on that?

Mr. GARDINER: There is some work being done up there, but I doubt if it is mapped north of 54. There is some line drawn across the north end.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was thinking of the Goodsoil area.

Mr. GARDINER: There has been considerable work done in the Goodsoil area. I am not sure that it is mapped, but all the settled part in the northern part is pretty well mapped.

Mr. COLDWELL: The work is being continued up there? That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it possible to get detailed reports of these surveys?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, the maps can be secured. They are for sale at the experimental farm, and I think they can be procured also at the university of Saskatchewan.

Mr. QUELCH: Is there a report as well?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there is an inscription on the bottom of the map from which anyone can ascertain the condition of the soil at any point.

Mr. PERLEY: I was pleased to hear the minister say that the investigation was being carried on in Saskatchewan under this branch of his department, with respect to land utilization. I suggest that if such work had been done twenty-five or thirty years ago that province would not be in much of the difficulty with which it is faced to-day, because a great deal of it never would have been turned up to the sun by the plow but would have remained ranching country. I presume that after these reports are made the minister will carry on his work of trying to convert some of that land back to ranching country, and possibly it will be better utilized in that way.

I want to suggest that this department might well investigate the system employed in Saskatchewan in collecting cream. The creameries are established in large centres, and there is much waste under the system now employed. Several large trucking companies cover the same territory, which certainly must mean added cost. I suggest—and this has been mentioned to me by members of the dairymen's association—that zones be established for the collection of cream and routes laid out by someone in authority, in order to avoid the overlapping occasioned by the trucks covering the same territory. Certain members of the dairymen's association have represented to me that a considerable saving could be effected if this were done. I should like the minister to make some investigation along that line.

I was interested to-day in listening to the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) making his usual address on free trade, which as usual fell on deaf ears. He said what we wanted was markets. That is true enough, but I want to see the agriculturists and dairymen of western Canada have a fair opportunity to compete for at least their own domestic market. While this importation of vegetable oils continues I do not think they have a fair opportunity even to retain their own market.

Mr. GOLDING: I rise to a point of order. Surely it is absolutely unfair to refuse one hon. member permission to speak on a certain matter and then allow another hon. member to go on and deal with it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): He was supposed to have been through.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding) is well taken. I was about to rise and point out to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) that he was out of order, for the same reason that I considered the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) out of order.

Mr. PERLEY: I shall have to bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I have been interested this afternoon to note that the only statements we have had from hon. members on the government side have been points of order, to try to shut off the discussion of one of the most important matters in western Canada to-day. If the minister will assure us that under item 12, possibly, we shall have an opportunity to discuss the question of the importation of vegetable oils, I shall be quite willing to leave it at that.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Looking over the report of the department for last year I see that the work of the agricultural economics branch included a study of terminal market facilities for fruits and vegetables in the city of Toronto and a utilization of farm lands in Saskatchewan. Following what has been said by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the advisability of giving some study to the utilization of farm lands in Ontario. I quite realize that vast areas in the western provinces might be more effectively utilized, but I also believe that the utilization of great areas in the northern part of Ontario might be brought about by careful investigation and methodical research.

Mr. GARDINER: And southern Ontario also.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Most of southern Ontario is being pretty well utilized now; however, I would appreciate an extension of the study into the southern parts as well. My hon. friend from Essex East (Mr. Martin) shakes his head, but it appears to me that a study of this kind in his own district would be of great importance. I am glad he utilizes much of his time in the interests of agriculture. No studies have been made so far as I know—at least we have not observed results from any—as to what different districts might accomplish in the way of greater economic production. I believe we have fallen far short throughout the whole dominion in the utilization of our vast agricultural areas. We are many years behind in having what might be termed a zoning policy, giving special study, consideration and encouragement to different districts to produce the crops to which they are most suited. I am glad to note that even in some parts of Peace River they believe they can produce vegetables, and with good reason, because I have seen some of their vegetables which are comparable to those produced in southern Ontario. Certain districts are more suited to the raising of live stock and to dairy production, while others are undoubtedly better suited to grain production. I see some hon. members smiling with pride when they think of the Ottawa valley and districts in eastern Ontario that are more adapted to live stock and dairy production, but there are districts in central Ontario which undoubtedly are more suited to the production of grain. Other districts in the western and northwestern part of lower Ontario are also adapted to the production of live stock, while in the south and southwestern part of the province there is land the rich soil of which might be utilized to greater advantage than it is at present.

I rose particularly, however, to bring to the attention of the minister the need for study of the utilization of agricultural lands in northern Ontario. In many parts of northern Ontario there are rich and fertile agricultural soils, but the climate is cold and the seasons short. I do believe that the constant application of more scientific methods of production in many parts of northern Ontario which today are not giving returns sufficient to encourage agricultural development, would return a substantial improvement. This is all the more important in view of the steady development of the great mining industry.

It has been my privilege to visit northern Ontario, to see some of their excellent crops and to talk to men who have shown their vegetables at the Canadian National Exhibition and the Royal Winter Fair. I talked to a man who in one year won a championship for potatoes produced in the community outside Timmins, where the season is short indeed. I have seen the excellent herds of dairy and beef cattle in northern Ontario, and have at the same time been reminded that consumers in that district are paying more for their meat and dairy products than are the consumers in southern Ontario, despite the fact that the farmers in the district who are struggling to establish herds and to promote agriculture are at times selling their beef cattle at prices lower than those received by farmers adjacent to Toronto. Cattle are shipped to Toronto, slaughtered and then shipped back to the mining districts of Timmins, Kirkland Lake and Sudbury, and the farmers who produce meat products in that part of the country are receiving much less than the farmers in southern Ontario. These are matters closely related to agricultural economics which might be considered by the economics branch of the Department of Agriculture.

The hon. member for Peace River has truly stated that the long freight hauls from British Columbia affect the consumption in his constituency of fruits and vegetables. A similar system of freight rates affects the dairy producers in western Canada. Some years ago western Canada produced only cereals of different kinds, and was not considered seriously in connection with the production of live stock and animal products, but we have lived to see the day when the value of dairy products in Canada has been substantially greater than the value of our wheat production. Although I am not sure of 1931 and 1933, I do know that in 1932 the value of dairy products was greater than that of wheat production. Some other hon. members may be more familiar than I am with dairy production in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba. But the economics branch in its report of last year recognized the importance of the establishment of terminal market facilities for fruits and vegetables in Toronto, and it must be of equal importance to study market conditions respecting other agricultural products which must be carried by long freight hauls.

When we know that it costs $1.86 per hundredweight to ship butter from the community surrounding Winnipeg to Toronto, that it costs $2.65 to ship from the Regina section of Saskatchewan and $3.33 from the Edmonton district of Alberta, we realize at once the importance of freight charges. The rates are correspondingly large to Montreal and other eastern centres. While I am not deviating from the point at issue, or for the moment attempting to answer the hon. member for Huron North, I feel that if we who live in the southern and eastern parts of Canada are to reap the benefits of industrial development and advancement we must give careful study to that phase of agricultural economics which so directly affects the welfare and prosperity of the farmer in other districts. The figures indicate that one must pay $1.10 per hundredweight to ship lard from Winnipeg to Toronto, $1.45 to ship it from Regina and $1.76 from Edmonton. Tallows and other coarse fats are shipped at cheaper rates in tank cars. Vegetable oils are shipped in to Toronto and Montreal in tank carloads at twenty-five cents per hundredweight in competition with our animal products.

The minister may contend that I am deviating from the point at issue—

Mr. GARDINER: You have never reached it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It may be by your tariff board.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to confine his observations to item 7. As points of order have been raised this afternoon I must ask that he conform with the rules.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I shall be pleased to abide by your ruling; that is the reason I did not attempt to answer the hon. member for Huron North who, I suggest, deviated farther than I have from the point at issue. Agricultural economics with respect to marketing conditions are of vital importance. The hon. member for Peace River, I submit, was quite in order when he mentioned freight rates in connection with the utilization of production within the dominion.

The economics branch of the department should long ere this have been directed to give more careful attention to the development of markets and the utilization of products in some sections of the country. This is a matter which, although not entirely divorced from the investigation by the tariff board, is to some extent outside it. The other matters for the consideration of the board deal with specific items entering Canada, the wages paid, the processing, the standard of living and other matters relevant thereto. It is my firm belief that the economics branch should give careful consideration to the question whether some of the products which are regarded as not interfering or directly competing with live stock products or, in fact, are in actual competition with them.

We are capable of producing sufficient butter fat, lard, edible tallow and greases and oils to meet the requirements of the country. Eastern Canada alone could produce sufficient of these products to meet all requirements and, if it was profitable, western Canada could produce still more. We have 318,000 dairy farmers in Canada, all of whom are vitally concerned in this issue. If you ask these farmers in what branch of agricultural economics they are interested, they will reply that it is in the finding of better markets for their products. They are more interested in that than in any research as to what may be a better producing district than another.

Then the soya bean and linseed oil production should be considered. The hon. member for Essex East might give some study to the production of soya beans in his district.

Mr. MARTIN: I made a speech in the house on that subject.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): My hon. friend made a speech on that matter. He also has a large automobile industry in his constituency which offers an enormous market for agricultural production.

Mr. YOUNG: The farmers could be helped still more by giving them cheaper automobiles.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): If the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) can induce the chairman not to rule against me, I shall be glad to deal with that.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I am ordered by the Chair not to answer that question.

I should like like to see the production of soya beans and linseed oil increased, to the benefit of the agriculturists of this country. Some districts are more suitable for this type of production than others. We have the manufacturing equipment for the processing of these products. I urge upon the minister that a careful study be made of this matter, quite apart from the consideration being given to it by the tariff board. These issues vitally affect the agricultural prosperity of this dominion and concern the future welfare of the live stock industry of Canada. I say this in all seriousness and with no desire whatever to hold up the estimates.

Mr. GARDINER: I would not suggest that at all. This reminds me of one of the hon. member's speeches that lost Ontario.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister has mentioned election speeches, but all this is aside from the issue. If a careful study is not made of the effect of the importation and use of vegetable oils upon the production of animal products, a day will come when the old-line free traders who now shake their heads will regret that they did not stop such importations in time to save the government of the day from defeat.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Only thinking of the old-time promises?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The farmers are the one class of people who have not an organization to present the facts of their case to a board of investigation. They have few organizations similar to those possessed by other producers or classes in the dominion. I believe that I speak to no small extent on behalf of hundreds of thousands of dairy farmers and other farmers when I say that in these times we cannot afford to lay our home markets open to the competition of tropical countries which can produce these things much more cheaply than we can. A careful study should be made of the effect of this competition and whether these products are entering markets which properly belong to the live stock industry, the basis of agriculture in Canada.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Chairman, no hon. member knows better than I do the justness and impartiality with which you preserve order in this committee. It is for that reason that I venture to rise to say a few more words upon a subject which I cannot permit to be dropped without further explanation. A moment ago I referred to the attempts being made to develop newer areas and to remove people from drought areas into other parts of the country. The great danger in doing this is that those who do not believe in such a plan are often prone to go about the country and say that those favouring the plan desire to drive the people from their homes, from the centres which they have known since childhood and from the places where their children have received their education. I do not believe that a scheme of this type should be carried out on a compulsory basis. I merely suggest that those who desire to avail themselves of this sort of hope for the future, if I may put it that way, should have at their command satisfactory knowledge as to what they will have to face. They should be supplied with the most accurate information as to what they may expect to find in the new areas.

This is a problem with which I am acquainted personally. Five years ago the United Farmers of Alberta government took people from the Sunnynook area and moved them up into the Peace River district. A large number of these people arrived one day at Falher, where I reside, to establish themselves some twenty miles south of the town. They came from a district where they had been living year after year in the hope of having a crop. A decisive step had been taken on their behalf. I know that this must be most boring to many members of the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not mind listening to speeches that have to do with the matter under discussion, but as I said before, this whole matter will come up under the vote for that purpose. If there is any more discussion on this item, we are prepared to listen to it, if not, I think we had better ask that the item stand.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Pensions and other benefits—civil pensions—Robert Allen, $269.52.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, these and the following items on the same page are all for the payment of life pensions to civilian employees who sustained injuries in the discharge of their regular duties which resulted in permanent disability, also pensions to dependents of civilian employees who were killed in the discharge of their regular duties, the pensions being calculated on the basis of the provincial workmen's compensation acts in the various provinces. As these cases do not come under provincial or federal acts, these sums are voted every year.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): May I ask in what connection these injuries were sustained?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On January 3, 1916, Mr. Allen, who was employed as a civilian truck driver for the mechanical transport branch, suffered an accident which resulted in a permanent disability. While he was driving a truck, the fly wheel burst into pieces, and the flying pieces struck him, breaking the bones of the ankle, also above the ankle in two places. As a result there is complete ankylosis of the ankle joint, with the foot at a right angle to the leg, and no active movement of the toes of the foot. The outer side of the foot is short almost two inches.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): My question was asked because I have received letters claiming consideration by the government for wounds received during the strike of 1919 in Winnipeg. Is the minister able to inform the committee whether any such claims are being considered by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with the military personnel?

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): No; civilian.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has not been drawn to my attention.

Mr. TUSTIN: Is Mr. Allen still in the employ of the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; he is not able to work, I understand.

Item agreed to.

Civil pensions—Florence Walker, $360.

Mr. SENN: Why are some amounts larger than others? Are these cases all incapacitated and unable to work?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The compensation is based on the scale provided by the compensation act in the province in which the injury took place.

Mr. SENN: It is on the same basis?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Militia services—Royal Military College, $381,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This item was discussed for a considerable time on Friday evening.

Item agreed to.

Cadet services, $139,500.

Mr. HAYHURST: What are the amounts granted to each province?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amounts depend on the number trained in each province. I shall give the strength in the various provinces as of August 31, 1937; Nova Scotia, 1,526; Prince Edward Island, 885; New Brunswick, 1,561; Quebec, 49,866; Ontario, 21,531; Manitoba, 1,723; Saskatchewan, 851; Alberta, 1,151; British Columbia, 1,245; making a total of 80,339.

Mr. PELLETIER: I see that pay and allowances are provided for all ranks. Is payment made to the cadets themselves or simply to the officers commanding?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is a grant of one dollar made on behalf of each cadet between fifteen and eighteen years of age who qualifies.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there any allowance now for uniforms, as there used to be?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister not consider restoring to an extent that assistance towards uniforms? I should be glad if he would. I personally come into the matter to the extent of being connected with a sea cadet corps in my own town, and there is another one close by. I appreciate the work done voluntarily by those connected with these corps, and the effect on the boys so trained. The expenses which have to be met come principally at the present time out of the pockets of the citizens, and it is quite right that this should be so in many instances, because they are related to the cadets, but I should like to see a little further assistance given by the department. Considering the trend of the times and the fact that the reductions were made when times were not as prosperous, shall I say, I wonder whether the minister would not seriously consider giving a little further assistance to the cadet services.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad indeed to take the suggestion of my hon. friend into careful consideration. The reductions were made in 1931, when conditions were extremely difficult. I quite agree with my hon. friend as to the valuable services performed in connection with the cadet movement, and that applies not only to the land cadets and the sea cadets but to the splendid services of the air cadets whom we have at Port Hope, and it is hoped that the air cadet service will be extended in the near future.

Mr. BARBER: At what points in British Columbia are the cadet corps located at the present time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are twenty units in British Columbia as of August 31, 1937. I have not at the moment the locations of the stations.

Mr. MacNICOL: How many units of sea cadets are there in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall get that for the next sitting. They are not separated in my book from the ordinary cadets.

Mr. GREEN: What provisions are made for enabling the sea cadets to enter the Canadian navy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are given every possible preference. Some of them go on to the naval reserve after training, and their training stands them in good stead. They are given every encouragement and every possible preference.

Mr. GREEN: How many sea cadets have gone into the Canadian navy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I could not say at the moment.

Mr. BARBER: At what age are they taken on?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At fifteen for cadets.

Mr. BARBER: But at what age do they go into the navy? I think it is twenty.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They can join the regular Canadian navy as boy seamen at the age of seventeen. The grants for cadets are limited to those from fifteen to eighteen years of age.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister any intention of increasing this vote? Last year a number of us suggested that the vote be increased. I think it is one of the best votes we pass in this house. The cadet services have been most beneficial to this country, and from what the minister said last year I was hoping the vote would be increased this year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I agree with my hon. friend. The vote, of course, depends on the number of cadets who qualify for the grant. I regret to say that there has been a decrease in the last year in the number of cadets. Perhaps if the recognition suggested by the hon. member for Yale were again accorded it might improve the situation quite extensively.

Item agreed to.

Non-permanent active militia, $2,830,488.

Mr. TUSTIN: There is a considerable increase in this vote. Will the increase be allotted among the units of the non-permanent forces to give them more training in camp?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. Of the increase of $318,000, $250,000 is for additional training for all the units of the non-permanent active militia. The actual time of training varies, according to the branch of the service, from about eleven days up to twenty-one days for some of the technical units for coastal defence.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are they being trained with the most modern equipment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Well, as far as the most modern equipment is available, they are. But at least they are trained in the theory of the most modern equipment. Some of that equipment is, of course, not yet available, but we are hoping to have it very soon.

Mr. TUSTIN: I was talking a few days ago to one of the officers of a regiment here, and I learned that that regiment is to go into camp for six days. I was led to believe that they would leave home on a Sunday and arrive home the following Sunday night, which is eight days, but they are to receive only six days' pay. The minister might well see that that does not happen. The non-permanent units are certainly giving great service to the country and are by no means adequately paid for the services they render. I do not think it is fair that the government should expect them to give two days of their time for nothing. I suggest that the minister should see to it that they get eight days' pay, or that they be paid from the time they leave home until the time they get back.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am very glad to hear the observation of my hon. friend. I believe that the actual details in these matters are left very largely to the district officers commanding in the various military districts, but if there is any hardship in regard to any particular unit I should be very glad if hon. members will bring it to my attention. The general idea is to insist on at least five days' camp training. In previous years, largely owing to lack of funds, it was impossible to have much camp training; it was largely regimental and local training, but this year an endeavour is being made to insist upon camp training for all units.

Mr. TUSTIN: This is not a complaint from the non-permanent forces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, I understand that.

Mr. TUSTIN: But I was given to understand that those are the facts in this particular case.

Mr. BARBER: Will the minister explain this item of temporary assistance, $290,376?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the group of the director of equipment and ordnance services, by military districts, the following is a summary of the number of employees: No. 1, 17; No. 2, 21; No. 3, 36; No. 4, 17; No. 5, 11; No. 6, 25; No. 7, 6; No. 10, 12; No. 11, 22; No. 12, 21; No. 13, 13; or a total of 201 employees, with additional caretakers 8, making a total of 209. The additional employees to whom I refer have been recommended by the district officers commanding in the various districts, consequent upon the reorganization of the militia eighteen months ago. Director of engineering services group: No. 1, 7; No. 2, 25; No. 3, 24; No. 4, 19; No. 5, 6; No. 6, 14; No. 7, 8; No. 10, 12; No. 11, 16; No. 12, 10; No. 13, 11; a total of 152. Miscellaneous group: M.D. No.

3, 1; No. 5, 2; No. 6, 3; No. 7, 2; making a total of 8. Total number of employees in three groups, 369:

Mr. BARBER: Is this clerical and labour?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mostly in the caretaking class, I should think.

Mr. BROOKS: I quite agree with the hon. member who has just spoken, about the attitude the non-permanent militia has taken during the last number of years as far as service to the country is concerned. I know personally from seeing many officers and men that they have devoted their time during the years of depression with very little remuneration. I should like to ask the minister with reference to reserve battalions in the different units. As he probably knows, there are many officers put on reserve units when they are still quite young and could be of great value to the service. There is no use made of them in our non-permanent force. The active battalions go into camp and get their training. Yet some of the best trained officers we have, whose training has entailed a lot of expense as far as the country is concerned as well as a good deal of expense to themselves personally, are not utilized in any way. It occurred to me that it might be possible for the minister to devise some way in which they could be employed with benefit to the militia and to the country. Has the minister anything in mind with regard to that matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As a matter of fact that very point was brought to my attention a while ago by some of the militia officers. A memorandum was directed to the department with respect to the question. Certainly it is to be regretted that these men, at a comparatively early age, cannot be utilized except by giving the benefit of their advice and experience to the active units. The question of utilizing their services certainly deserves consideration. Of course if an emergency should arise these highly trained men are available.

Mr. LENNARD: What steps are being taken to create anti-aircraft units?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Steps have been taken with regard to the establishment and the training of anti-aircraft units in the dominion. Unfortunately we are handicapped by the fact that orders placed by my predecessor in 1935 for anti-aircraft guns have not yet been filled. For reasons which I have no doubt my hon. friend realizes it has not been found possible to supply them. In regard to the theory of training, we have anti-aircraft units, their establishment is complete, and they are receiving training.

Mr. GREEN: I am afraid that these units which are trained in theory only will not be much use in defending the country when it comes to destroying bombers and so on. Would the minister say just what equipment it is that we have not got with which to train our defence forces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think it is reasonably accurate to say that the training carried out in Canada compares very favourably at the present time with the training carried out in the territorial forces in England. I have authentic reasons for making that statement. Of course we have not got so far the most modern types of equipment, and in some cases that does constitute a handicap in regard to training. The two most pronounced types of equipment which are lacking to-day are, first, anti-aircraft guns, and second, the most modern type of heavy ordnance with the most modern mountings. Those are the two principal deficiencies in equipment.

Mr. GREEN: What about machine guns, also searchlights and equipment of that kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have some supplies of various types of machine guns for training purposes. Of course the Lewis gun is now practically obsolescent or obsolete. We have a supply of Vickers guns and several more on order, and as my hon. friend knows, as regards the new type of gun we are taking steps now to supply our forces with it.

Mr. GREEN: Are there not also tank battalions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. If my memory serves me correctly there are six.

Mr. GREEN: Have we tanks in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have armoured cars, which take the place of tanks for demonstration and drill purposes.

Mr. GREEN: Can we not procure tanks for training purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have been ordered some time ago.

Mr. GREEN: In regard to these different articles of equipment that are on order is there any reason why they cannot be manufactured in Canada, or why steps should not be taken at once to get ourselves in a position to manufacture them in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has been very carefully considered.

Mr. GREEN: It does not seem to get very far. Are our manufacturing plants unable to manufacture goods of this kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should think they would be able.

Mr. GREEN: When is it expected that we shall be able to obtain at least enough to train our troops with?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think that before very long we shall have tanks available in Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: I take it item 184 or 185 would be the item under which to inquire further into the question of contracts for tanks and equipment generally?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: I noticed recently that the minister attended a dinner in Montreal and spoke to employers of labour, soliciting their assistance in facilitating employees going to camps. To what extent has that been successful? Have any further developments taken place, and were employers of labour ready to grant such facilities on full time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On February 7 last I addressed a circular letter to the boards of trade and chambers of commerce throughout Canada, which I might read. It is as follows:

I should like to bring to attention a very important matter concerning preparation for the defence of Canada in time of war or emergency real or apprehended, and am taking the liberty of addressing this circular letter to boards of trade, chambers of commerce and other organizations through which can be reached those who employ members of the non-permanent active militia, the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve and the non-permanent squadrons of the Royal Air Force.

Officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the Royal Navy, the permanent active militia and the Royal Canadian Air Force are competent and efficient but, as you well know, relatively very few in number. Man power which would be required in time of emergency or war would be drawn from the non-permanent forces.

The immediate purpose of this letter concerns the training of the non-permanent forces. Given that young Canadians in sufficient numbers offer to serve with the non-permanent forces, which indeed is the case, it becomes necessary to train them and this is carried out by members of the permanent forces.

Training of personnel of the non-permanent active militia, for instance, is carried out at local headquarters of the regiments or units. In the summer, training is carried out at military camps at different points throughout the country. Employers of non-permanent active militia personnel will grant that the training at local headquarters, usually carried out in the evening, does not disturb the ordinary course of work or employment. It may be somewhat different when the employee asks leave or absence in order to attend militia training camp.

The non-permanent active militia is the first line of Canada's land defences. It is to these officers, non-commissioned officers and men that Canada must look for national security. It is submitted that these soldiers are deserving of all possible assistance and encouragement. Speaking on their behalf, I would earnestly request the sympathetic consideration of employers in making it possible for members of the non-permanent active militia to train without feeling that their positions or employment may be adversely affected by such patriotic action.

It would be greatly appreciated if the gentlemen to whom this letter is addressed would extend their cooperation by bringing this request to the notice of all members.

That letter has had a very encouraging response from all over Canada. Active committees are at work amongst employers, and already instructions have been given by several large firms to encourage their employees to attend summer training camps, with the assurance that there is no danger of their wages being interfered with. In other words a feeling of security has been given, and I think that will be of great assistance to the non-permanent forces.

Mr. STIRLING: To what extent has the reorganization of the non-permanent active militia been carried out?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think in regard to personnel of units it is practically completed. There may be some units of the technical services not entirely completed. The difficulty of course is to get the necessary equipment for training purposes.

Mr. GREEN: What is the authorized peace establishment of the non-permanent militia, and what is the actual strength at the present time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The peace establishment as of June, 1937, was 85,982 and the strength was 45,631, but I happen to know that the training strength for the current year is 46,840.

Mr. GREEN: The peace establishment is shown in the last report of the department as 7,647 officers and 91,938 other ranks. Has that been reduced in the last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As my hon. friend knows, the paper strength was reduced at the time of the reorganization. I think we had a paper strength before the reorganization of 120,000, and that was reduced to about 90,000 at the time of reorganization because certain units went out of existence and smaller units of a technical nature were formed in their place.

Mr. GREEN: The last report of the department is dated March 31, 1937; at that time the authorized peace establishment was over 99,000. The minister says that at the present time the peace establishment is 85,000. Has there been a reduction of 15,000 in the last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The figures I gave were as of June 30, 1937. Of course these would not be the figures at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: How does the minister account for the discrepancy between the figures on page 98 of the last annual report and the figures he gives as of June, 1937?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The correct figures would not be those shown at the end of the fiscal year. These figures are entirely paper strength, and not material in regard to the actual strength of the units.

Mr. GREEN: What is the actual strength of the permanent and non-permanent militia on the Pacific coast?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For military district No. 11 as of June 30, 1937, the non-permanent numbered 3,249. The permanent force on March 31 of the present year was 31 officers and 299 other ranks; total, 330.

Mr. GREEN: What proportion of the non-permanent militia is in the interior of the province—that is, would not be available for coastal defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would not admit that they would not all be available for coastal defence. We consider that those in the interior would be available practically at once in any emergency.

Mr. GREEN: It seems obvious that in order to defend the coast we must have enough soldiers to man the fortifications and protect naval and air bases and also if necessary to repel raids. Does the minister think the forces he has on the Pacific coast at the present time are ample for that purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course if there were an emergency on either coast the theory of the staff is that all the militia in Canada would be available very quickly.

Mr. GREEN: This as the minister knows is a very serious question for the people residing on the Pacific slope. Does the minister think that the militia strength in British Columbia at the present time is sufficient to protect the people of the province? Apparently it is not recruited even up to peace strength. Would it not be possibls to recruit the units further until we have enough men there to do the job?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Recruiting has increased to a very encouraging extent in British Columbia.

Mr. GREEN: But is an attempt being made to bring the units there up even to peace strength, and if not does the minister not think it should be done?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Every possible encouragement is being given to recruiting; a special effort is being made not only in British Columbia but all over Canada, and I think the results are encouraging.

Mr. GREEN: Could the department supply equipment and officers for the full peace establishment of the British Columbia units under the vote which is going through at the present time?

Mr. STIRLING: My hon. friend is speaking of the non-permanent active militia?

Mr. GREEN: Yes, the non-permanent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can assure my hon. friend that nothing has been done by the department to retard recruiting.

Mr. GREEN: I am asking if anything has been done by the department to bring the strength of the British Columbia units up to the peace time establishment. I understand they are thousands below it at the present time

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course, if there was any need for it we could have ample forces moved to British Columbia in very short order. It is not anticipated by anyone that the forces actually on either coast at present would be ample in case there should be a real emergency. That is not a theory upon which any system of defence is built up, because obviously it would be unworkable.

Mr. GREEN: Are there enough soldiers in the province even to man the fortifications that are being built, and to protect the bases?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Enough are available and their positions in that regard are very carefully assigned.

Item agreed to.

Permanent force, $6,087,760.

Mr. STIRLING: I notice a moderate increase in this permanent force vote. Bearing in mind that the principal use of the permanent force in peace time is to train the skeleton force which we know as the non-permanent active militia, and that this force recently has been reorganized and must be trained in the use of more modern weapons and equipments, remembering also that money is being spent on defence works on the Pacific coast, does the minister really think there is a sufficient increase in the permanent force vote to take care of that work?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I agree with my hon. friend immediately that at present the members of the permanent force are exceedingly hard worked in regard to the duties they have to perform by way of giving the necessary instruction to the non-permanent active militia. Of course it is very difficult for me to answer the question categorically. Personally I should have liked to see a further increase in the vote for the permanent force, for the purpose of carrying out these instructional duties; but after a careful balancing of the available resources, this small increase was finally agreed upon.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister is no doubt aware of the fact that with the completion of the batteries being erected on the Pacific coast it will be necessary for sections of the permanent force to reside in those neighbourhoods, because I assume he will not leave the guarding of those emplacements to the non-permanent active miltia; it will have to be done by permanent force men. That will take away a certain number of officers and men from their other duties of training the non-permanent active militia, and I greatly question whether, remembering the work that falls on the permanent force at the present time, the minister has sufficient at his disposal for that purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend is quite correct in regard to the duties of guarding these emplacements, which in ordinary times will take some of the personnel of the permanent force away from their other duties, but the non-permanent force is assigned the duty of actually manning these emplacements if any emergency should arise.

Mr. STIRLING: Quite so, and we all hope the emergency will not arise; but the guns and emplacements cannot be just left without any guard at all, and I should imagine that guard will have to come from the permanent force.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; I think that will be the arrangement.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have been informed that the delay in the delivery of airplanes to the Canadian government—and incidentally to the transport service—is being occasioned by a large order for planes for the government of Japan. To-day the Toronto Star carries a story from its Ottawa correspondent, Mr. Lipsett, to the effect that an order for thirty planes has been placed in Canada by the Japanese government, and that this is likely to interfere seriously with the delivery of planes both to the government and to the trans-Canada air service. Can the minister tell us anything about this?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was not aware of the news dispatch to which my hon. friend refers; but I can tell him immediately that those firms building airplanes for the government of Canada have not had any orders retarded, as far as my knowledge goes, as a result of any orders for airplanes for Japan. As a matter of fact, at the present moment I can make the statement that I do not think any of the firms building planes for this government have such an order; if they have, it has not come to my notice. I could give from memory the names of the firms that are building planes for this government, and as far as any information at my disposal goes they have not received an order from Japan.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would the minister give the names of those firms?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is Canadian Vickers, in Montreal; Fairchild, in Montreal; the Noorduyn company, Montreal; the Ottawa Car Company, Ottawa; the de Havilland company, Toronto; the National Steel Car Corporation of Canada, Hamilton; the Fleet company, for training purposes, in Fort Erie, and the Boeing company, now converted to a Canadian company in Vancouver.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have a British mission in Canada at the present time, I believe, looking over the ground for the purchase of airplanes in Canada, and it strikes me that this is another matter which might be considered by the department owing to the international situation. Also in to-day's newspapers there is the story of the bombing of a Canadian Baptist mission by Japanese planes, and it seems to me we shall be placed in rather an unfortunate position if Canadian firms are to supply Japan with planes that may be used for such purposes, particularly if they are likely to interfere with the delivery of the planes for which money has been appropriated by this parliament or the parliament of the mother country. I bring that to the attention of the minister and the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thank you.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What firms are making planes now for shipment to Japan?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have no information at all.

Mr. GREEN: If I might I should like to ask one further question with regard to the non-permanent active militia. Last winter I heard complaints to the effect that the militiamen were not supplied with boots, and that in many instances this kept men from enlisting, because they did not feel that they should buy heavy boots which would be of no use to them in civil life. Is it a fact that the militia men are not supplied with boots by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As far as my information goes, the members of the non-permanent active militia never have been supplied with boots by any government in Canada. I quite agree with my hon. friend that there is at the present time a strong feeling among the militia that they should be supplied with boots for summer camp purposes and also for ordinary training purposes, and although no definite decision has been arrived at, the matter has been receiving some attention in the department within the last month or two.

Mr. HEAPS: Are there any factories making airplanes in Canada besides those mentioned by the minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, I think so; but not for us. There is one factory in Fort William, I understand, manufacturing airplanes, but not for the Canadian government.

Mr. HEAPS: Are they not in a position to manufacture quite a large number of airplanes in the Fort William area?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Speaking quite unofficially, I understand so.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not possible that they may be making airplanes for the Japanese?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am speaking entirely without knowledge, of course; that is possible, but I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Before those airplanes could be shipped out, there would have to be a permit issued by the department, would there not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That would be a matter for the Department of National Revenue, in regard to the section of the Customs Act dealing with war materials; I think it is section 290.

Mr. HEAPS: Supposing those were commercial airplanes which could be converted into military planes; would they come under the government ban concerning the shipment of goods for war purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That would be entirely a matter of policy for the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not a policy of the government also?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not in regard to the export of planes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is a licence required for the export of these planes? We are not recognizing any war between China and Japan.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think a licence is required. Of course this does not come under my department, and in these answers I am speaking subject to correction.

Mr. COLDWELL: Perhaps the Prime Minister would tell us?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand there is a licence.

Mr. COLDWELL: They have to have a licence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand so.

Item agreed to.

Engineer services and works, $2,483,500.

Mr. STIRLING: Probably this is the item under which the minister would like to discuss the issuance of contracts. This involves a consideration of weapons and equipment of all sorts. My feeling, and one which I believe is widely felt, is that at least four years ago Canada was officially aware of the fact that the supplying of materials and equipment in Great Britain would prevent firms over there from being able to deliver orders from Canada and other dominions within a reasonable space of time. Shortly after this government took office we were informed that the minister was making an intensive survey of industrial concerns in Canada to find out what factories there were, and what extensions might be made for this purpose. Now that we are in the year 1938 the public is beginning to wonder how much information has been collected on the subject, and to what extent it is possible to employ Canadian workmen in Canadian factories for the supplying of this very much needed equipment. Would the minister give in some detail a description of the investigations he has made, and state to what extent contracts are already in their hands?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The investigation to which the hon. member refers comes under the next item respecting general stores. Some eighteen months ago an industrial survey was commenced under the direction of the master general of the ordnance. Speaking in round figures, I believe about 700 firms in various parts of Canada have been surveyed with reference to their potential capacity for production in any particular direction in the event of a national emergency. The procedure followed was that expert engineers—sometimes one and sometimes two of them—visited the plants and brought back thorough and comprehensive reports with recommendations as to what the potential capacity of an industry might be. At the present time these reports are being codified and correlated in the department, so that we shall have available a complete list of all the firms in Canada. The last figure I have shows that there are 768 firms. I believe I said in the first instance that there were 700. The greater figure brings the list up to date, and includes the whole of Canada.

In addition to this, a complete list has been prepared in the department showing the various implements and types of equipment which can now be manufactured or produced in Canada. Second, we have a list of the various types of equipment which could be produced in Canada as a result of further development, such as government cooperation with industry, or the government operating on its own initiative. Third, we have a list of those types of equipment which cannot be produced in Canada. I refer to such equipment as heavy armour-piercing shells, the manufacturing of which requires the highest form of technical skill and many years of experience.

Mr. STIRLING: Were they not made in Canada during the war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe towards the end of the war there was a commencement made in that direction; at least that is my recollection, but I am not sure. In any case those classifications have been made.

In regard to the actual procurement may I say that since the house last met, in regard to munitions there was an order given to a civilian firm in Montreal which is now manufacturing shells. If I remember correctly, the order was for 30,000 shells. As I stated some time ago, the main handicap is in connection with the heavy calibre guns and the modern high angle mountings which, of course, greatly increase the range of guns.

Briefly speaking, that has been the result up to date. I wish to state frankly, however, that possibly it will be necessary to go further in connection with the question of procurement. It would appear to become more obvious all the time that it will be necessary in Canada to rely upon our own production and manufacturing resources for the procurement of equipment essential to meet a national emergency.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister referred to the 768 firms which might be used in the event of a national emergency. My point is this: Why are we not now proceeding—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should have used the words, "prepare for a national emergency."

Mr. STIRLING: Why are we not now proceeding to produce some of these things? For instance, it is perfectly well known that all Canada has been able to get in the way of Bren guns has been a very small number for purposes of demonstration. Why have we not a contract at this time in some factory—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister says that we have. Would he give information with respect to it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I refer to some notes I have with reference to the matter? As far back as the summer of 1936 the Department of National Defence came to the conclusion that it would be necessary to arm the forces with the Bren gun, and that 7,000 of these guns would be required. A few model or specimen Bren guns were ordered, and it early became clear that Canada could not look to the manufacturing establishments of the government of the United Kingdom as a certain or timely source of supply reasonably safe from possible enemy action. The two model guns which we now have were made not in England but in Czechoslovakia where they were invented; the Enfield plant near London cannot satisfy the United Kingdom government's requirements before several years. The fact that the United Kingdom is not only willing but anxious to order 5,000 Bren guns from a Canadian manufacturer is of utmost significance. We received direct advice to this effect from the War Office.

This memorandum was prepared before the actual contract was let. In view of the situation then existing it was deemed advisable to consider the possible necessity of having our requirements manufactured in Canada. The probable difficulties of the position of the United Kingdom were surmised here from the beginning. Because of known variations in cost factors, heavy outlays for machinery that would be required if the guns were to be manufactured in Canada, it was known that Canadian production costs would be more than English production costs; if only 7,000 guns were to be made in Canada, it was believed that the cost would be prohibitive under normal conditions. Such has turned out to be the case, to the extent that the placing of the 5,000 order in Canada will save something more than $1,000,000 in cash to Canadian taxpayers. It is impossible to translate into dollars the other advantages to Canada in regard to extending our means of defence.

Therefore the Canadian government has let a contract for 7,000 Bren guns to a firm in Toronto, the John Inglis Company Limited, I believe it is. Then, the War Office directly and not through the Canadian government has given a contract to the same firm for 5,000 guns. The terms of the contract were very carefully analysed and examined for over three months by the interdepartmental committee on profits, and a subcommittee of the main one gave special attention to the matter. Various suggestions were made and possibilities examined with respect to government plants, and in connection with various other methods of carrying out the contract. The contract, which I shall be pleased to place before the committee, was entered into on, roughly speaking, a basis of ten per cent cost plus. The War Office contract is on exactly the same terms and conditions as the one with the Canadian government. From information available in the department it appears that the War Office have expressed themselves as being satisfied with the terms of the contract entered into with this Canadian company in Toronto. In Australia they have a Bren plant which is publicly owned. That plant has been constructed I believe, for two or two and a half years, but they have not yet got into production. I am subject to correction when I say that in England the Enfield company were two and a half years before they got into production, but they are now producing fifty Bren guns a week. A guarantee has been given that the Canadian company will be in production within twenty-four months. As a result of the separate orders from England and from ourselves, the actual saving will be $1,380,000. We are using much of the plant which we had in storage in Canada, and there will be a considerable saving on capital cost of machinery, probably to the extent of $250,000.

Mr. STIRLING: That is the machinery which was in storage at Valcartier?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: It is being used by this Inglis company?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Machinery is being supplied by each of the two governments, the Canadian government paying for two-thirds of the cost and the War Office paying one-third. The ownership remains with this government.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Have any contracts been given out by the government on a cost plus basis?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my memory is correct, there are six.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): What are the different firms?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The particulars of the contracts are as follows:

1. 18 Bristol "Bolinbroke" aircraft, contract given to the Fairchild Aircraft Company, Montreal.

2. 11 Blackburn "Shark" aircraft, contract to the Boeing Aircraft Company, Vancouver.

3. 12 Lysander aircraft, to the National Steel Car Company, Hamilton.

4. Battery at Albert Head, British Columbia. Contract given to the Northern Construction Company and E. J. Ryan, Vancouver.

5. 30,000 shells, 20,000 of one calibre and 10,000 of another, to the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Company, Limited, Montreal.

6. Bren gun contract, 7,000 and 5,000 to the John Inglis Company, Toronto.

Reconditioning 18 Wapiti aircraft, Ottawa Car Company, Ottawa.

35 trucks, four-wheeled, 15 hundredweight, with spare tires, tubes and canvas covers, General Motors Limited, Oshawa.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Were there any other firms that could have done the work covered by these contracts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): These contracts represent a very small part of the total amount of the contracts let. In other instances contracts were let by tender, either through public advertising or from selected lists. In all these instances the contracts were carefully scrutinized by the interdepartmental committee, and with one exception it was known that in each instance a competitive tender was impossible. The contract for the Albert Head work was let in this way because of military secrecy.

Mr. BROOKS: According to the particulars on page 133 of the estimates there is a decrease of about $1,300,000 in the vote for buildings and works. I suppose the works referred to have to do mainly with gun emplacements and fortifications on the western coast. I believe the minister told us some time ago that these works were in the second stage of development.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to know what amounts are being apportioned for the preparation of defence works on the eastern coast. We hear so much about the defence of the west coast that I am afraid the minister might forget that we have an eastern coast to Canada, and that the western coast is not the only part which requires defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Most of the work being done on the Atlantic coast under the estimates this year is in connection with the air force vote. I shall be glad to give my hon. friend the details of the money expended under that vote when it is reached. For certain obvious reasons special consideration has been given to the Pacific coast, but I assure my hon. friend that this is not because the minister comes from there. This work is being done because of a definite recommendation by the general staff and others who are advising the department with reference to these matters. I can assure my hon. friend that there is no intention of neglecting the defence of the eastern coast.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it the intention of the department to start these defences this year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Only with reference to air defences.

Mr. BROOKS: At what points?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Dartmouth, Yarmouth, Truro and Sydney.

Mr. BROOKS: Those points are all in Nova Scotia, to which fact I have no objection. However, Saint John is one of the great ports of Canada. It is one of the focal points, so far as trade is concerned, and it seems to me there should be some development in connection with the defence of New Brunswick. Some time ago I suggested that use should be made of Sussex, the local training area in New Brunswick. I hope the minister will consider some development along these lines in New Brunswick.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to remember what my hon. friend has said. A very definite plan has been prepared in connection with Saint John defences.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

My recollection is that the recommendation was made that the air defences to be provided at Nova Scotia points would prove an effective defence for Saint John as well. That does not apply to the local defence of Saint John, in connection with which careful plans have been drawn up.

Mr. BROOKS: Will any of this item be devoted for that purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is for air defences only.

Mr. BROOKS: Are we to have anything in the way of gun emplacements at Saint John, or anything else of that nature?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think so as yet.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister must have the information.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think there is.

Mr. GREEN: What is the present position with regard to the fortifications at Albert Head, the York island battery and other fortifications on the Pacific coast?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The York battery is completed.

Mr. GREEN: What about Stanley park?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The guns are in place at the York battery. The Albert Head emplacement will be completed, it is expected, by July. Other defences in the neighbourhood will be completed this year. Stanley park will be completed in June.

Mr. GREEN: Has anything been done in connection with Prince Rupert and the Queen Charlotte islands?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were certain technical difficulties with reference to Prince Rupert, but the air base on Queen Charlotte island will be prepared during the summer. A seaplane base in the vicinity of Prince Rupert and a site for batteries in the northern area will be proceeded with this year.

Mr. GREEN: On what basis was the work done in Stanley park?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Day labour.

Mr. GREEN: Was that on a cost plus basis?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was no contract at all. The work was done by day labour, with an engineer officer supervising for the department.

Mr. GREEN: I have a complaint to make with regard to the manner in which men were hired to work on the Stanley Park fortifications. I contend this was a most short-sighted way in which to hire men. The minister assured us last year that returned men and militia men would be engaged on that work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: And I understood him to say last year that returned men would be chosen by the veterans' assistance committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I did not say that.

Mr. GREEN: There is an honorary committee in Vancouver to help the returned men find work, and there were five thousand returned men registered in that city as unemployed; yet instead of the veterans' assistance committee being asked to get the men required, I believe they were obtained in other ways and in each case had to have the approval of a representative of the minister or of the government. I would like the minister to explain that action because I think it is short-sighted, and it certainly does not help very much in solving the problem of the unemployed veteran. The work on Point Grey fortifications has not yet been begun, and I would ask the minister whether it would not be possible to have the returned men who are to work on these fortifications chosen by the veterans' assistance committee in Vancouver.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With reference to the total of forty-eight working at Stanley park, seventeen were selected by the committee, and the rest by various veterans' organizations, and I may say that I have letters of commendation from veterans' organizations for the manner in which these men were selected for that work. I am very much surprised indeed, when we have 100 per cent returned men and militia men working on this work, that there should be any dissatisfaction. My conception of the duties of those taking on men would be to employ ex-service men, and not a process of selection such as my hon. friend mentioned. After all, the responsibility as to the personnel employed, rests on the minister and the department, and once any returned men's organization such as the veterans' assistance committee is assured that ex-service men are to be employed, their function is to get ex-service men employed on the work. The gentleman who represented the department is an ex-service man, and I shall be very glad to show my hon. friend letters of commendation with reference to the way in which he carried out his work.

Mr. GREEN: But that does not explain why the approval of a representative of the government was required. That is what I consider patronage, and I do not think it is fair to bring that in on works of this type which are for the defence of our people.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I deny that it is a question of patronage. I have not the slightest knowledge of the political affiliation of the gentleman in question. In Vancouver and Victoria the selection of these men met with the absolute acceptance of all the veterans' organizations and the citizens generally on Vancouver island, and it is to be regretted that now, when for the first time the principle is adopted, anything should be done to destroy the excellent precedent which has been set.

Mr. GREEN: I hesitate very much to bring it up; but personally I am certain that all these men had to pass a representative of the government, and that is the belief in Vancouver. Of course, if the minister says that is not the case—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They were sent up by the various veterans' organizations.

Mr. GREEN: But after they were sent up, they had to pass a representative of the government. If the minister says that is not the case—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I say that in both instances, on Vancouver island and in Victoria, we had an employment officer who was an ex-service man whose duty it was to see that ex-service men got employment.

Mr. GREEN: Who were these men who were the employment representatives in Vancouver and Victoria?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Richard Stanton in Vancouver and Alexander MacFarlane in Victoria.

Mr. GREEN: And the only reason they were chosen was to see that the men who got work were returned men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And general supervision because general principles were laid down in regard to the secrecy of these works, and that only ex-service men and members of the militia should be employed, and it was their duty and the duty of commanding officers of units to see that these instructions were carried out.

Mr. GREEN: What salary did Richard Stanton receive?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): $175 a month.

Mr. GREEN: He had only forty-eight men to choose for work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At times they wanted more.

Mr. GREEN: He is still getting $175 a month?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I assume so if he is working.

Mr. BROOKS: Were any special qualifications required?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He is a man of excellent reputation, the president of one of the ex-service men's organizations in Vancouver, and, I think, very acceptable generally.

Mr. BROOKS: But the minister said that if those who applied had the necessary qualifications they would be taken on; and I am asking if there were any special qualifications.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There would be trade qualifications, so many carpenters, so many of other trades, and so on.

Mr. BROOKS: No politics?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. GREEN: There has been a great deal of discussion in British Columbia in recent weeks about a proposed highway from the states running through British Columbia and the Yukon to Alaska. The United States authorities and the United States press have admitted quite freely that it is to be a strategic road, a military road. I would ask the minister whether his department or the government have paid any attention to the suggestion or given it any consideration at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I may inform my hon. friend that many years before the present public discussion, the department considered such a project, and the general staff gave opinions with regard to it which were of a confidential nature.

Mr. GREEN: What about the present proposal from Washington and Victoria? Has the minister given any consideration to the proposal for building a highway through British Columbia to Alaska which has appeared in the press?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have an alert staff who observe all these press dispatches, and they have frequently been brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, the staff of the department have been reading the newspapers?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They always do. That is one of the first duties of the intelligence staff of any military department, to read papers from all over the world if they can.

Mr. GREEN: I realize that, but is the government taking any stand whatever or doing anything in regard to this proposed highway?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The stand of the government will be made manifest by their actions in the future, if they are doing anything.

Mr. GREEN: When may we expect that stand to be disclosed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think my hon. friend had better wait and see.

Mr. GREEN: We have been doing that for a long time in connection with a lot of things under this government.

Mr. CAHAN: I trust that if the minister is supervising any negotiations to that end, he will see that the conduct of the negotiations and also their supervision are restricted to federal agencies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I quite realize the significance of the remark of my hon. friend.

Mr. BROOKS: Will the dwelling house which belonged to the caretaker in the town of Sussex and which was burned about two months ago be reconstructed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It will be reconstructed.

Mr. BROOKS: What is the break-down of this $1,572,000? I should like to see where the money is being spent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to do so.

Construction of buildings and works, $1,572,000; Ottawa, Ontario, Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, $12,650; Petawawa camp, water system, $2,500; gas chamber, $1,250; grading and loading platforms, $1,050; miscellaneous, $3,500.

Military district No. 1: Small arms ammunition magazine, $6,000.

Military district No. 2: Niagara, Ontario, markers' shelters, $10,000; camp buildings, $5,000; Hamilton, rifle range, $40,000.

Military district No. 3: Kingston, Ontario, garage and gun shed, $25,000; Barriefield, Ontario, officers' quarters, $10,000; barracks square, $3,000; officers' dormitory, $50,000; roads and grading, $12,000; basement of barrack block, $10,000; sewers, $14,000; electrical, $10,000; water tank, $11,000.

Military district No. 4: Sherbrooke, Quebec, armoury alterations, $4,000; Belvedere street armoury, $1,700; Craig street armoury, floor under gun shed, $7,000; rifle range construction, $30,000; grading in the 17th D.Y.R.C.H. armoury, $2,000; Westmount, Royal Montreal Regiment armoury roof, $3,500. St. John's, P.Q., barracks, fire hydrants, $1,000.

Military district No. 5: Valcartier, new water mains, $7,600; Rimouski, addition to armoury, $20,000; Quebec citadel, repairs to citadel buildings, $22,000.

Military district No. 6: Halifax, Nova Scotia, joint service magazine, $15,000; Halifax, magazine at Fort McNab, $3,500; Wellington barracks, renew roof in officers' block, $3,000; parade grounds and roads, $5,000; repairs at King's wharf, $3,000; radio station, $8,650; Aldershot camp, roads, $2,000; Sussex camp, New Brunswick, $5,000.

Military district No. 10: Winnipeg, Man., St. Charles rifle range, road, $1,500; electric supply, $1,500; Fort Osborne barracks, roofs, buildngs Nos. 14 and 15, $3,000; radio receiving station, $5,650; new roof on power plant, $5,000; Shilo camp building program, $19,000.

Military district No. 11: Esquimalt, B.C., joint service magazine, $75,000 artificers' workshop, Signal hill, $2,800; hospital at Work Point barracks, $22,000; Cranbrook armoury, $17,000; Kamloops magazine development, $20,000; Pacific coast defences—this is the second stage, to which I referred some time ago, in regard to these various emplacements, probably about twelve or fifteen in number—$1,000,000.

Military district No. 12: Dundurn camp, completion of buildings, $2,000; Regina, radio station, $650.

Military district No. 13: Calgary, Alberta; ordnance depot, purchase of land, $5,000; Currie barracks, married officers' quarters, $11,000; Sarcee camp, additions and improvements, $10,000, total $1,572,000.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I notice that last year provision was made for an expenditure under this item, construction of buildings and works, of $2,857,450. This year the amount is $1,572,000, or a total dfference of $1,285,450. Why has the grant dropped off in this one specific item to the extent of over a million and a quarter dollars? I notice that all the other items which are brought forward—salaries, etc., sundries, pay and allowances all ranks, other allowances—show an increase. The same is true as regards stores and equipment, operating expenses of properties, transport and travelling of personnel, freight, express and cartage, printing and stationery, medical, dental and veterinary services, sundries; all these show larger amounts of expenditure; but to make the book balance a little better on the right side, it seems, we find a reduction in the construction of buildings and works of more than one and a quarter millions, although expenditures this year are approximately a million and a quarter dollars greater. Will the minister give some explanation of these differences?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The main difference, as I said before, is that the program of actual construction of buildings is not so extensive this year as it was last year. Last year we had to undertake some extensive construction works and fortifications in various places. As a result of the review made of the various amounts available, it was decided not to spend so much this year upon this particular activity of the department.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): The difference in the amount is large; but how many fewer men is it estimated will be employed as a consequence of discontinuance of construction of buildings and works?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have here a long list of the actual works which were commenced and completed last year; and as a result of those works having been completed, it is not necessary to carry on so much this year.

As regards the other question asked by my hon. friend, it would be very difficult indeed to estimate the actual decrease in the number of those employed on these projects. Of course there would be some.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the difference between repairs carried on under the item of $1,572,000 and repairs carried on under the item of $861,500?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The first is for construction only and the second is for maintenance and repairs.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister had mentioned the word "repairs" in describing the other item.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Under which paragraph are the works with reference to Trenton?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Well, Trenton is in the air force vote, but it is the same kind of work.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Are there any works going on at Camp Borden district this year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A small amount of work. Camp Borden is being utilized. I shall be very glad when I come to the appropriate vote to give my hon. friend details of the numbers who are to train there —roughly, I believe, three thousand.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Chiefly in the air force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Two or three services are going to train there this year.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STIRLING: There are one or two other matters about which I should like some information. In passing, I should like to say what a pleasing and businesslike aspect is apparent on highway No. 2 at both Trenton and Barriefield. It cannot but impress the travelling public passing those places. I understand Trenton is to be the home of the Royal Canadian Air Force, as Barriefield is to be the home of signals?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Correct.

Mr. STIRLING: To what extent has that change taken place? Have the signals moved into Barriefield from Camp Borden, and has the air force moved into Trenton?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The air force main depot is now at Trenton. The signals have not entirely moved to Barriefield.

Mr. GREEN: Has any attempt been made by the government to reserve strategic points on the Pacific coast, either on the islands or on the mainland? I believe there are several points which may be of importance for defence purposes in time to come; probably now would be the best time to acquire them, and from the reports appearing in the papers I gather that the provincial government would be only too glad to cooperate in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There has been no reserve placed on any area in British Columbia. The intelligence branch of the department has been alert for a considerable time now in regard to obtaining all available information in reference to the acquisition of any properties in British Columbia, learning who the owners are; that information is available.

Mr. GREEN: Is a survey being made of the ownership of lands and rights near these fortifications and bases?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, that is being done.

Mr. GREEN: Does it show whether the owners are foreigners?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Another question about which I should like some information is in regard to, shall I call it a permanent training area in southern British Columbia? I know investigation has been going on up the valley of the Thompson and in the Nicola country, and I wondered whether any decision had been reached.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. The training area at Vernon was considered to be somewhat limited in extent, especially for the purpose of artillery training, and last year several investigations were made by the staff officers of the department in the neighbourhood of Kamloops and also the Nicola valley. I think substantial objections were found to every area which has been definitely surveyed, so that the situation at present is that no permanent area has been selected for permanent training in British Columbia. For summer camps I believe two or three places will be utilized in the coming year.

Mr. GREEN: Has the department under consideration any move to complete strategic highways across British Columbia? I believe the minister will agree that at present it is impossible to cross the province by road.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; as a department we have no plans under way in that regard.

Item agreed to.

General stores, $3,854,437.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is it under this item I might say a word in reference to the stores at Lindsay?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Lindsay arsenal has been reopened to a small extent. It is anticipated that a sum between $100,000 and $130,000 will be expended there during the current year, largely in an experimental way in testing its capacity for certain purposes with reference to ammunition and cartridge cases. The present proposal is to manufacture at Lindsay arsenal brass cartridge case discs for production of quick firing cartridge cases. Already an amount of $10,000 has been appropriated for reopening the plant. It is hoped that orders will shortly be placed for the purchase of equipment to an estimated value of $26,000. An additional amount of $4,600 will be required for overhauling the present equipment. When the financial estimates were prepared it was thought that the industrial firm selected to manufacture cartridge cases would provide a supply of brass discs. Later it was decided that there might be considerable difficulty in getting metal of uniform characteristics. It was subsequently found advisable to reopen Lindsay arsenal for the production of this metal. Funds are provided in the general stores vote for the production of ammunition in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Lindsay arsenal has been visited by the minister. I am glad to hear that he proposes to do something with it this year. The site is one of the best in Canada, and in the past a great deal of equipment was manufactured there. Reading in the press of late that a number of companies have been given contracts for the manufacture of munitions and supplies, I have wondered why the government itself does not put that splendid plant into complete operation. Wages there are at least not higher than anywhere else. While I am not an advocate of low wages by any means, perhaps they are as low there as in any centre making the same kind of equipment. The buildings and a large amount of machinery are there, and it is too bad if contracts have to be given to outsiders for material that could be produced at Lindsay in a plant owned by the government. The minister probably knows better than any hon. member of this committee what use these buildings are capable of. I commend to his consideration the possibility of further increasing the production of these supplies in that fine community of Lindsay.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I quite agree with my hon. friend. The matter is also being pressed upon me by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. McNevin). The estimated expenditure will be:

Engineer services	$ 10,000
New equipment	26,000
Overhauling present equipment	4,600
Estimated wages	29,000
Material	57,000
Sundries	3,500
	$130,100

I may inform my hon. friend that if it is decided to go ahead with any further development towards procuring supplies as a government enterprise, the claims of Lindsay are very much before us.

Mr. MacNICOL: This year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. McNEVIN: As the item under discussion covers the proposed production of certain material at dominion arsenal No. 2, which is located at Lindsay, I desire to make a few observations. First, I want to express to the minister my appreciation of the start which has been made in preparations for production in the rolling mill and foundry divisions of the plant, thus fulfilling the intimation given by the minister last session when his estimates were under discussion. Yet, Mr. Chairman, this development covers only a limited part of the extensive buildings and equipment connected with the Lindsay arsenal property. I feel sure that the minister, and in fact every hon. member, will agree that the more extensive the operation, the more the overhead expenses could be reduced. May I point out that these arsenal buildings were erected in 1915 and 1916, and are of modern construction. Except for some inside machinery and equipment which may be obsolete, the plant has been maintained in excellent condition.

With regard to the location, which is an important point in connection with the production of military supplies, the arsenal at Lindsay is situated approximately in the centre, from east to west, of the Dominion of Canada, forty miles north of lake Ontario and, of course, far inland from our northern shore. Industrial factories of this kind, in the event of some act of aggression against our country, in all probability would be the object of attack from the air. Transportation facilities are also of great importance in connection with the production of munitions or military supplies. May I point out that both large railway companies operating in Canada have direct connections at this centre, and there is also the Trent canal and the through highways. Considering these facts, are we not correct in assuming that the location is ideal for an industry of this kind?

With regard to sources from which we may secure arms, munitions or kindred supplies, is it not true that on account of conditions which are well known to all of us, Great Britain has been forced to concentrate upon the production of military supplies for her own use? Consequently the delivery of similar materials required by Canada, which have been purchased in Great Britain, has been unavoidably delayed. In addition, is there not a strong possibility that if conditions in Europe were to become more aggravated, this source of supply would be seriously affected?

There is another source from which we obtain substantial quantities of these supplies. I refer to the private corporations of Canada. I have always maintained that the government should not enter into competition with private business in regard to overseas orders for commodities of this sort; but when it comes to the requirements necessary to take care of our own defence program, I believe we owe it to the Canadian taxpayers, who supply the funds for these purposes, to use to the fullest possible extent the buildings located at Lindsay, Ontario, which represent the only government-owned munitions factory in this province.

In seeking to direct the attention of the minister and the members of the committee to the importance of this matter, Mr. Chairman, may I point out that I believe a majority of those present in this chamber will agree that the conditions which prevail throughout the world at the present time are so serious as to warrant careful consideration of the advisability of reconditioning the remaining facilities that are available at this arsenal for the manufacture of munitions or military supplies. This suggestion, if it were adopted, would provide increased employment for our Canadian workmen.

With regard to the materials which it is possible to produce at this point, may I suggest for immediate consideration the manufacture of shells; the manufacture of hand grenades, the manufacture of guns, or the assembling of gas masks? In addition, if it is not possible in the near future for the government to utilize the entire plant and equipment, I believe we have large orders pending for overseas, and the minister might consider permitting the use of a portion of this plant by some of these other companies which otherwise might be forced to construct buildings. I believe this would be an economical move.

[Mr. McNevin.]

I commend this additional thought to the committee. Defensive equipment, regardless of type or class, is of little value unless ample supplies of munitions are available. In the event that the estimate under discussion is insufficient for the purposes referred to, I would ask the minister, in whom I have every confidence, to consider very carefully whether he should not increase the figure or provide for a much more liberal expenditure in the supplementary estimates, which could be considered later in the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad indeed to bear in mind the observations of my hon. friend in regard to the Lindsay arsenal.

Mr. LENNARD: Would the minister explain the increase of $47,300 in transport and travelling of personnel?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This provides for the transportation and travelling expenses of inspectors of arms and munitions and the transportation of arsenal employees between Quebec and Valcartier. It has not been definitely decided whether this arrangement will be put into effect or whether it will be necessary to make some adjustment in the wages of the employees who commute between Quebec and Valcartier. My hon. friend will understand that the movement from Quebec to Valcartier will take place soon, and this increase is to take care of that added expense.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): There is quite a decrease under stores and equipment. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is a net decrease of $2,189,015, the principal reason being that the full value of requirements for armaments, stores and munitions was provided in 1937-38, whereas for 1938-39 only that portion likely to be spent during the financial year has been included, owing to the uncertainty of obtaining deliveries.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the details on page 134 of the estimates largely have to do with the dominion arsenal. What is the number of employees, other than the officials mentioned in the details?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are thirty permanent civilian employees and four temporary civilian employees. In addition, there are those who are paid so much an hour. I shall have the number in a moment.

Mr. MacINNIS: The employees I have in mind are those covered by the amount of $619,676 for wages.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that the number is about five hundred. I think I tabled a reply to a question two or three days ago, giving the number as 539.

Mr. MacINNIS: What are the trades and the rates of pay in connection with those trades?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are as follows:

Cartridge factory:
Group 1, machinist, 83½ cents an hour.
Group 2, labourer, 65 cents an hour.

Tool room:
Group 1, toolmaker, $52 a week.
Group 2, machinist, $1.08 an hour.
Group 3, labourer, 80 cents an hour.

Workshop:
Group 1, machinist, $1 an hour.
Group 2, blacksmith, 77½ cents an hour.
Group 3, plumber and pipefitter, 55 cents an hour.
Group 4, saddler, 60 cents an hour.
Group 5, mason, 62½ cents an hour.
Group 6, sheet metal worker, 58 cents an hour.
Group 7, electrician, 75 cents an hour.
Group 8, labourer, 66½ cents an hour.
Group 9, chauffeur, $28 a week.

Quickfiring and charger plants:
Group 1, machinist, 83½ cents an hour.
Group 2, labourer, 56½ cents an hour.

Foundry and rolling mill:
Group 1, machinist, 57 cents an hour.
Group 2, labourer, 69¾ cents an hour.

Stores:
Group 1, labourer, 44 cents an hour.

Carpenter shop:
Group 1, wood turner, 72 cents an hour.
Group 2, carpenter, 58 cents an hour.
Group 3, moulder, 75 cents an hour.
Group 4, labourer, 67½ cents an hour.

Shell factory:
Group 1, machinist, 70 cents an hour.
Group 2, labourer, 65 cents an hour.

Laboratory (Examining department):
Group 1, labourer, 44 cents an hour.
Group 2, labourer (female), 53 cents an hour.
Group 3, tool maker, $1.05 an hour.
Group 4, machinist, 76 cents an hour.

Laboratory (Filling plant):
Group 1, labourer, 85 cents an hour.
Group 2, machinist, 85 cents an hour.
Group 3, carpenter, 50 cents an hour.
Group 4, labourer (female), 31½ cents an hour.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Under the sundries item there is an increase of $10,000; what is the nature of that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to make a small addition to my former reply. The figures I gave were maximum figures. For instance, I gave a maximum of 53 cents for labourer, female; there is a minimum of 22 cents. In another section, group 4, I gave 31½ cents, and there is a minimum of 22 cents an hour. Then, for a labourer I gave 65 cents an hour, and the minimum there is 18 cents an hour. In the work shop, for machinists, group 1, I gave the maximum of $1 an hour, while the minimum is 68½ cents.

Mr. HAYHURST: At page 134 of the estimates I find an amount of $1,500 for a physician; is that only a part-time physician?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. HAYHURST: I had brought to my attention the case of a boy who enlisted as a private and last fall contracted infantile paralysis. He was placed in Christie street hospital, Toronto. I went to see him. I understand that when I went he had been sick for a couple of weeks, and it occurred to me that perhaps the doctor had not properly diagnosed the case. The boy had been set to work scrubbing floors, and while he was at that work he was overcome by paralysis. He is still in bed. I was thinking it would be well to have really efficient medical men employed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall look into that case.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What necessitated the increase in the vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the item for sundries there is an amount of $10,050. This sum provides for the protection of property at Valcartier. This service may be carried out by the personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or through other arrangements as decided by the department. Then there is an amount of $50 for unforeseen items at the dominion arsenal at Lindsay.

Mr. MALLETTE: When will repairs be resumed on the drill hall at Montreal?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I cannot give a definite reply. Requests have been made to have the necessary funds available for the work, but I cannot give a definite reply.

Mr. MALLETTE: The few militia units using the hall would like to see the work finished. Resumption of this work would provide employment for quite a number of men. I am sure the people in Montreal would like to see the scaffolding that has been there since last fall disappear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This comes under the Department of Public Works, but I believe the work may be done at an early date.

Mr. STIRLING: What progress is being made at Valcartier in connection with taking over the filling station? Has it been moved, and, if not, what are the prospects of getting it started at Valcartier.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Within three or four weeks possibly we expect to have the movement commenced.

Mr. TUSTIN: This afternoon the minister said it was almost impossible to get anti-aircraft guns. Is it possible to have those guns manufactured in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are very hopeful that this may be possible. The matter is being carefully investigated by experts of the department at the present time.

Mr. TUSTIN: It seems to me that is one of the most important matters before us to-day. We should take some steps towards getting such equipment as anti-aircraft guns under way, and I believe the minister might well consider the matter at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BAKER: We are here considering an expenditure of $3,854,437. What is the government receiving by way of production from this expenditure? In running an industry the important thing to know is what one is getting for his expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The only answer I can make is that we are getting a certain measure of national security.

Mr. BAKER: Are they not producing material at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; we are getting supplies, equipment and ammunition.

Mr. BAKER: We have no memorandum showing the actual production from the expenditure of this money. This just shows expenditures for salaries, and so on; if we are receiving nothing we ought to know it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Perhaps if I were to describe in general terms the purpose of the vote I may answer the question of the hon. member. This is the information I have: For purchase, maintenance, repair and inspection of clothing, equipment and ordnance stores for the permanent and non-permanent active milita including armament stores, medical dental and veterinary stores, mechanical and water transport, telephone signal and wireless equipment, maintenance and upkeep costs in connection with manufacture and output of munitions at the dominion arsenal; construction, repair and upkeep of arsenal buildings and plants; freight cartage and other incidental expenses.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. BAKER: The minister mentioned the output of material. I suppose those materials are made through the expenditure of these wages. I may be wrong, but the overhead seems tremendous as against the wages paid to labourers or workers. What material are we getting for our money?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the hon. member want a detailed list?

Mr. BAKER: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Perhaps I should give a few of them. They are as follows:

Cartridges, S.A. 10,500,000.
Chargers, ·303-inch cartridges, 2,100,000.
Boxes, ammunition, 11,050.
Cartridges, S.A. ball, ·303-inch, 500,000.
Cartridges, Q.F. three-pounder, cordite, 3,000.
Boxes, ammunition, Q.F. three-pounder, repaired, 188.

Mr. BAKER: That is the answer; apparently we are receiving something for the expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes: I have a long list of articles here to read.

Mr. BAKER: Has the minister any idea of the total value in dollars of it all?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BAKER: What is the amount? I want to see if the minister is running a good factory.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amount is $1,153,773.

Mr. BAKER: That is all we are receiving by way of value out of the expenditure of $3,854,437, is it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; there are many other details in regard to clothing, etc. I shall give the hon. member some other items—clothing and armament stores and munitions, wireless, signals and various other services.

Mr. BAKER: I doubt very much if it is an economically operated factory.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I must say to the hon. member that the dominion has the reputation to-day of making the best munitions in the whole world.

Item agreed to.

Naval Services — Royal Canadian Navy, $5,744,297.

Mr. STIRLING: Canada now possesses two torpedo boat destroyers built by Canada in 1929 and commissioned in 1931. She has two A class destroyers purchased from Great Britain in 1935, and two which we are expecting this summer. That will make six. She has one tender, with three more building, and a three masted schooner for training purposes. I believe that completes the craft afloat. I remember that in 1909 Sir Wilfrid Laurier adopted the policy of providing Canada with a flotilla on each coast. If I remember rightly, he actually got so far as to call for tenders for the construction of at least some of them. With that in mind I wonder if the minister could tell the committee whether we are working toward a program. Perhaps the minister could refer to this if he cannot describe it in detail. Are we doing that, or are we merely living from day to day or from year to year? The defence situation of Canada has changed entirely with the change from disarmament to rearmament. Obligations to both the east and the west are such that Canada should be working toward a definitely laid out scheme. This scheme possibly could not be completed this year or the next, but it would be an objective towards which we would be working.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When the general staff committee made their survey a year and a half or two years ago, certain recommendations were made with reference to all three branches of the service, that is, the air force, the naval and the militia services. Some progress has been made in that direction although not as far as the recommendations suggested.

Mr. LENNARD: Are the ships of the Canadian navy oil burners exclusively?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The destroyers are oil burners and the mine sweepers will be coal burners.

Mr. LENNARD: Upon whom do we depend for our supplies of fuel?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Plans have been made to ensure an adequate oil reserve. I understand this has been done through the Canadian oil companies.

Mr. LENNARD: Do these supplies come from Trinidad or the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The crude would come from wherever the Canadian companies get it, but steps have been taken to ensure the necessary oil supplies.

Mr. LENNARD: It is possible that Canada might be involved in a war along with Great Britain, and any oil supplies from the United States would be cut off if that country remained neutral.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That question has been surveyed very carefully in the last three months. I can just repeat my previous reply, that arrangements have been made to provide an adequate oil reserve in Canada.

Mr. LENNARD: Certain ships in the British navy are equipped with dual firing machinery to permit some of the boilers to be fired wtih coal. I think it would be a good move on our part if something like that were done in connection with our ships. We have supplies of coal on both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, and in case of emergency we would be able to use Canadian coal. This would also help the Canadian mining industry.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to note my hon. friend's suggestion, but he can rest reasonably assured that proper provisions are being made.

Mr. KINLEY: There are certain features of this vote in connection with which I should like to make a few remarks. I think more should be known about this matter by the public, especially the public along the Atlantic coast. I refer to the personnel making up the several units of the Canadian navy. As I understand, the Naval Act of 1910 provides for a purely voluntary service. In this it is somewhat different from the Militia Act. There are three units making up the personnel of the Canadian navy. First, there is the permanent force which includes those men who make the navy their profession; second, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve which is composed of men who make their living from the sea, such as fishermen and men in the merchant marine; third, the Royal Canadian Voluntary Naval Reserve which is composed of men who have a liking for the sea.

I understand the permanent naval force is to be increased this year, and I think it would be well if the young people of our country knew the conditions of enlistment in the Canadian navy. However, what I am particularly interested in at the present time is the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve. I understand that this force has an authorized strength of 500 men and officers but that there are only 240 in it at the present time. The age limits for enlistment are eighteen to thirty years. A man who joins this force as a naval reservist is given $45 a year as a retaining fee, as it were. He trains six weeks during his first year of service, for which he receives on the average $1.80 a day. This works out to about $100 a year. The opportunity to earn an extra $100 a year may be very attractive to a young fisherman on the coast of Nova Scotia. The course of training would also improve his seamanship and benefit him mentally and physically and at the same time he would be cooperating in a scheme for the defence of the Canadian coast.

I submit that schools for the training of men who enroll in the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve should be established in the seaport towns of Nova Scotia. The training is done during the off season. There are armouries in many of the towns along the sea coast, especially in the riding which I represent. I realize the mechanics of the problem would have to be worked out by the technical naval officers of the department, but I believe if naval instructors and equipment were supplied these schools could be carried on with very little expense.

It occurs to me that there should be coordination between the Department of Labour, with its troubles in connection with employment, and the naval and militia branches. Earlier in the discussion of these estimates we were told that in the air service it takes seven men on the ground to maintain one man in the air. I consider it most important that we should manufacture as much as possible of the material used for defence purposes. When we manufacture airplanes we are creating technically trained labour which would be available should the need for defence ever arise. In the meantime we are providing employment in civil life. We are creating future artisans to take their place in the civil life of the country.

Years ago the defence of the country was a different matter. The farmer, for instance, who lived on a farm was usually a good horseman, and his horse provided the best method of transport. He had his rifle and was a good shot, also a good scout, and so the farmers made a splendid unit of defence. But that has changed. The defence of the country is subject to the changes progress has brought in other directions. Science demands that you must train men in the laboratories for defence; also in our industrial plants, where machinists and mechanical engineers are at work, we find a training field for the youth of Canada that is especially valuable and very desirable. It seems to me that if the Department of National Defence would cooperate with the Department of Labour in every way possible they would be able to train men for the engineering trades in our industrial plants, and this would also help the unemployment situation. Industry in this country should assume some part of the burden, and it might well be required to train men in the industrial plants of Canada. I once suggested to the Minister of Labour that we might even go so far as to have subsidized apprenticeships so that our young men might be trained for some skilled work which they could follow as they grow older, because it is well known that when a young man gets up to be twenty-one or twenty-two without any objective he is inclined to become a drifter instead of helping out in industry.

I think men could be trained, particularly for the naval service. Our fishermen are good pilots, skilled in the handling of boats, and resourceful. This training will improve their condition; it would mean for young men more earning power and give them a better standing in their profession. I trust the minister will explore the situation fully. I know he has already looked into the possibilities, and I hope he will explore them further with particular reference to the Atlantic coast.

The Royal Naval Reserve is to a large extent built up from the merchant marine. They have a flag. It will be recalled that we had a discussion in this house this session about a national flag for Canada. The merchant marine may fly the naval reserve flag, which is the blue ensign, with the coat of arms of Canada on the fly. In order that this flag may be flown, a certain number of the crew must be naval reserve men, and the ships that are permitted to fly it consider it an honour. The old idea was that if the ship had a gun crew they could fly this flag. The flag is flown by some of the boats of the Canadian merchant marine. The flag, to seamen, has a language all its own, and is very important.

We have heard a great deal about how vulnerable the Atlantic coast is to attack. Our distance from European powers, however, is an element for safety because enemy craft upon the sea or under the sea and in the air are handicapped in working a long way from their base. So Canada's geographical position does provide us with an element of safety, but not sufficient.

Many people think our defence preparations against coastal attack should include submarines. The submarine is like a shark in the water. Nobody likes to go into shark-infested waters, and there is also the same fear of the submarine. It might be particularly valuable on the coast of Nova Scotia because at certain seasons of the year we have fog. This fog and other conditions make the coast of Nova Scotia not a desirable place for strange craft to hover. It seems to me that under such conditions the submarine would be especially valuable as part of our defence preparations. On our coast between 1914 and 1918 and this applies particularly to my own riding, our shipping suffered very considerably from submarines and raiders along our coast. I have here a list of the vessels that were sunk off the Nova Scotia coast. Some other Nova Scotia vessels that were destroyed were registered in the West Indies; otherwise, I think this list is complete, and it shows what may happen when raiders make their appearance, which they might do at any time. Vessels returning from the fishing banks followed the coast as close to the shore as they could. In those days, when power was not used, there was danger in approaching too close to a lee shore, and one vessel went ashore and was lost with all hands. I desire to place this list on Hansard. It shows that twenty-seven vessels from Nova Scotia and two from New Brunswick were lost by enemy action off the coast of Nova Scotia from 1914 to 1918. The list is as follows:

Prepared from the records of the Department of Marine.

We in the east realize the position of British Columbia, and the needs of that province in regard to defence. I think that what the minister is doing is in keeping with what the people expect for the defence of the coasts of this country. Such preparations are desirable and extremely necessary at the present time, and I want to commend the minister for his energy and his department for the progress they seem to be making in this work.

Mr. GREEN: Did I understand the minister to say to the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) that the government was building up a navy according to a program?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. What I said was this, that naturally recommendations were made by our own staff with reference to our own requirements in all branches of the service, and within our financial resources and limitations we have done, I think, more than has ever been done before in this country in trying to improve our naval defence.

Mr. GREEN: Conditions are quite different from what they were before. Surely the department must have some plan for a minimum navy for the defence of Canada's coasts. Does the minister say that no such plan has been drawn up?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have already stated that plans have been drawn up with reference to each branch of the service, but naturally these plans are confidential and cannot be disclosed by the minister.

Mr. GREEN: The governments of Great Britain and Australia seem to feel that they can take their peoples into their confidence with regard to plans for naval defence, and I cannot see why the Canadian people should not be told just what can be expected in the way of a navy. If that cannot be done, what is the objection to having a special parliamentary committee, representative of all parties, before which the facts could be placed? You would then in all probability get the unanimous support of the whole house for a plan for the defence of our coasts. I should like to know from the minister what objection there can be to such a procedure being followed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So far as I personally am concerned, there would be no objection at all. If that were the feeling of the house committee, I would be only too glad to give my hon. friend all the information I have myself with reference to the plans of the Department of National Defence. But I would say that these plans are disclosed when the estimates are presented to parliament and are discussed as fully as they can be. No Minister of National Defence can outline definite plans for the future in this dominion. We are endeavouring to do the very best we can with the information at our disposal, and every single thing which has been done in the last two and a half years has been done according to a very carefully laid down plan, a plan laid out by the three service staffs of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister not think it would help a great deal if he could have a special committee appointed upon which all parties in the house would be represented and let them consider the plans which the department have?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As far as I am concerned, all that that committee could get is the information my hon. friend is now getting. I think he is being very successful in obtaining all the necessary information. There is no disposition on my part to withhold from my hon. friend all the information I have myself with reference to all the activities of the department. But if he is going to endeavour to pin me down this evening to a definite and comprehensive plan for the future, I am not going to make any such declaration.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. GREEN: I would not attempt such a difficult thing as to pin the minister down.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear.

Mr. GREEN: I think it would be a waste of good time. But I do suggest that this country is entitled to know what sort of a navy it is going to have. This government just goes along from year to year, buying a ship here and a ship there, and expecting us to sit back and be satisfied, and when we do ask for information the hint is thrown out that "that is none of your business."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Every single question asked by my hon. friend has been answered.

Mr. BROOKS: I am very much interested in the remarks made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley), and I heartily agree with his suggestion regarding a naval reserve and the employment of some of our maritimes fishermen. As a matter of fact, this is one of the first suggestions I have heard for the benefit of the fishermen from the maritime provinces since I have been in the house.

In mentioning the different ships we have for our defence on the Atlantic coast, I thought the hon. member might mention His Majesty's Canadian ship Venture. Down in the eastern provinces we have heard a good deal regarding this ship, since she was built, and we hear that as a "venture" she was a very poor one, not only for the Department of National Defence but also for the contractors and the workmen, and in fact for everybody that had anything to do with her. I should like to ask the minister certain questions with reference to this vessel. I note on page 22 of the report of the Department of National Defence, 1937, that this vessel was built by the Meteghan Shipbuilding Company in Meteghan, Nova Scotia. The contract price for the ship was $57,508. I should like to know if there were any other tenders at the time this contract was let, the number of tenders, and the amount of each.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Tenders for construction were called and quotations as follows were received: The Meteghan Shipbuilding Company, Meteghan, N.S., $57,508; W. C. McKay & Sons, Limited, Shelburne, N.S., $59,395; Smith & Rhuland, Lunenburg, N.S., $60,102; George E. Wagstaff, Port Greville, N.S., $64.650; Halifax Shipyards Limited, Halifax, N.S., $64,996; Yarrows Limited, Victoria, B.C., $98,572; The West Coast Salvage and Contracting Company, Limited, Vancouver, B.C., $118,402.

Mr. BROOKS: These tenders, I understand, were for the ship completed, all ready to be turned over to the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; I understand that during the process of construction the firm which was building this ship went bankrupt, and the department had to take it over from the construction firm and remove the ship to Halifax.

Mr. BROOKS: Was the ship not completed before this company went bankrupt?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not quite. I understand that certain final work of completion had to be arranged by the department.

Mr. BROOKS: What was necessary to complete it? What is the minister's understanding of the further work which was needed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think, less than a thousand dollars' worth of extras.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister says "I understand" and "I think." I should like to have something definite from him. We have heard these understandings and thoughts all afternoon. We are entitled to definite information.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The contract called for progress payments in varying percentages being made in accordance with the several stages of progress in construction. To date these payments amount to $51,655.20, leaving a balance of $5,852 due under the original contract price.

In the autumn of 1937 it came to the department's attention that the contractor was seriously involved financially. There were large claims against the contractor from parties who had supplied material, equipment, machinery, etc., used in the construction of the vessel, and from the bank which had made an advance on a promissory note. In addition, there were claims by the dominion government in respect of sales tax, the provincial government for provincial taxes, workmen's compensation assessments, etc., and for unpaid wages to the contractor's workmen, all of which the contractor had no funds to meet.

At that time the vessel was almost completed, but the contractor's financial position prevented him from doing the further work required, and the department under the contract therefore took over the ship for this purpose. She was brought around to Halifax as she was being hazarded in the berth where she was lying at Meteghan. The ship was completed by the dockyard authorities, duly commissioned, and has carried out its winter training program in the vicinity of Bermuda.

After the ship had been taken over by the department, the majority of the creditors held an informal meeting in Halifax with the contractor and his solicitors, and it was decided to proceed under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933. A court order approving a scheme of arrangement under that act was issued. The scheme provides for the contractor, assisted by a committee of creditors, negotiating with the department to determine the amount to be paid by the department for the construction, etc., of the ship, and, upon the amount being so determined, the same will be paid to the Eastern Trust Company as trustee, to be disbursed by the trustee to the several creditors as set out in the scheme.

The contractor has submitted a claim for additional compensation, which has been examined in detail by the technical naval officers, their report being received within the last few days, and this report is being considered in principle by the deputy minister, the judge advocate-general and Mr. Burchell, K.C., of Halifax, the agent of the department of justice, who was consulted in the matter. This is the situation with reference to the Venture.

Mr. BROOKS: I understand, then, the ship was practically completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: But that they still owed a considerable amount to creditors.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: Did the government take over the responsibility of paying these creditors?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, not yet.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it the intention of the government to pay?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that this committee is still reviewing the situation. The final report is not yet before the minister.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, I shall ask the minister: Is it the policy of his department or any other department of the government, when a contractor becomes bankrupt and has certain obligations and debts, for the government to come to the aid of and pay the creditors of that particular bankrupt?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; I should say that would not be the policy. At the same time I would think that if there were wages owing to workmen in a bona fide way, it would be reasonable for the government to see that those wages were paid.

Mr. BROOKS: Then I understand the sums which are being paid are being paid only to the workmen?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As I say, no final settlement has yet been recommended to the minister by the committee.

Mr. BROOKS: How much money did this company owe at the time it went into bankruptcy, and to whom were these amounts owing?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The department is not yet familiar with all the amounts owing by the bankrupt company.

Mr. BROOKS: How much had the department paid the Meteghan Shipbuilding Company at the time it went into bankruptcy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Payments totalled $51,655 leaving a balance due under the contract of $5,852.

Mr. BROOKS: Was there not considerable trouble during the building of this ship over the wages which this company paid? That is, it was not paying according to the schedule laid down for contracts of this kind. Was there not an investigation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; certain complaints were made and they were immediately referred to the Department of Labour, which sent an investigator there and asked us to hold back a certain amount of money.

Mr. BROOKS: What was the amount?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was $6,000.

Mr. BROOKS: And that was for the benefit of the workmen?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To make sure that funds would be available to settle any amount owing.

Mr. BROOKS: Was that not held back by the Department of Labour for the benefit of the workmen?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was held back by the Department of National Defence consequent upon the investigation by the Department of Labour.

Mr. BROOKS: For the benefit of the workmen?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand so, yes.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. BROOKS: Are the workmen receiving the amount that was held back?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think a final decision has yet been made.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has stressed the need for naval forces with which to attack a raiding fleet and any bases which might be established on our coasts. What type of boat does he expect to use for that purpose? Apparently at present he has only destroyers. Has there been a report from the department concerning the advisability of using submarines, motor torpedo boats and similar craft?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The available reports are definitely against our using the types mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister stated this afternoon that in these contracts it was his desire to have, and his efforts were devoted to having as many returned men employed as possible. Is he aware how many returned men were employed in the construction of this ship at Meteghan?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. BROOKS: Were any representations made to him that returned men were not being employed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not aware of any.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister probably forgets, because I called his attention to it myself. I had a number of complaints that the man in charge would not employ returned men at all unless they belonged to his own political party. I wrote the minister to that effect. Out of 100 men employed on this work I understand only two were returned men. I understand also that the men's wages were held back; that they were paid wages below the scale; that some weeks they were not paid at all; that they would have to buy their goods from Mr. DeVeau, the contractor; that the prices charged them were away above the average, and the whole matter was something of a disgrace. I am not blaming the minister personally, but it certainly did not reflect any credit on his department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I assure my hon. friend that as soon as the department discovered the situation, everything possible was done to correct it. I frankly admit that it was an unsatisfactory piece of work.

Mr. GREEN: What arrangement has the Canadian government with the British government for the training of our naval personnel, officers and men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is an exchange of officers; our naval officers take specialist courses of various kinds at the various staff colleges, and some of them go to sea; and some of the ratings also have training in the British naval forces, and our cadets proceed there for two years' training.

Mr. GREEN: The position then is that all our cadets who are to be the officers, and some of the ratings, go to the British navy and are trained there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think all the officers have training at one time or another in the staff colleges of the British navy.

Mr. GREEN: Not only in the staff colleges, but they train on the British ships?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Some of them are sent to sea for certain periods.

Mr. GREEN: Do we pay anything for that service to the British navy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Is that included in this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any chance for a Canadian officer to get promotion in the British navy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If he is a Canadian officer going for training he remains a Canadian officer, and returns for promotion in the Canadian naval force.

Mr. GREEN: But are there facilities for a Canadian officer in the higher grades going on up the ladder in the British navy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not aware of any occasion when that takes place.

Mr. GREEN: Why were the two destroyers, Vancouver and Champlain, scrapped a year or two ago? It would seem that they might have been kept as training units.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Because they were not the property of the Canadian government; they were the property of the British admiralty, and they were scrapped by order of the British admiralty.

Mr. GREEN: Has the government made any attempt recently to borrow any other naval vessels from the British admiralty?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. GREEN: Would it be possible to do that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not in a position to say whether it would or not.

Mr. LENNARD: From what Canadian oil companies is the fuel procured for use on the destroyers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that at present the purchases are being made from the Imperial Oil Company.

Mr. LENNARD: What price is being paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am sorry I cannot give that information; I do not know.

Mr. STIRLING: Did the Venture travel around from Meteghan to Halifax under her own sail?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Has she auxiliary power?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. I may say that while I said the contract was unsatisfactory, the ship is an excellent ship. According to the reports we have received, she is first class. But the way in which the contract was carried out was unsatisfactory to the department.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister know what cost was incurred after she reached Halifax? I understand she was completed by dockyard help. How much was logged up against her at Halifax?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have not the amount before me, but I understand it was only a few hundred dollars.

Mr. GREEN: Is it possible to build destroyers and submarines in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, certainly.

Mr. GREEN: Why is the government not making some attempt to build our destroyers here?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the first place the cost would be very much more; in the second place the time taken would be four or five times as much, and in the third place the very best thing possible was done with the resources at our disposal.

Mr. LENNARD: Is the coal used on the coal burning naval ships strictly Canadian coal?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Item agreed to.

H.M.C. dockyards and armament supply depots, $422,260.

Mr. GREEN: How many dockyards are there in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Two: Esquimalt and Halifax.

Mr. GREEN: Are those dockyards large enough and well enough equipped to handle a fleet of the British navy? Apparently we are depending upon the British navy to protect us; are we at least able to furnish bases for these ships?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It would depend upon the strength of the fleet in those harbours.

Mr. GREEN: Could the dockyard at Esquimalt take care of a battle cruiser, or of a 10,000 ton cruiser?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think for ordinary repairs the dockyard would be adequate.

Mr. GREEN: What would it cost to fit this dockyard so that it would be suitable for repairing units of the British fleet, that is, ordinary units such as cruisers or battle cruisers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have no knowledge; I have made no estimate as to that nor have I been asked for any estimate.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Would the minister explain the reduction in this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The sum of $200,000 voted last year for the construction of buildings at the joint service magazine at Esquimalt has been reduced this year to $120,000, a decrease of $80,000.

Mr. PELLETIER: Are any oil supply depots available on the Pacific coast for the use of the British navy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not at the moment. The facilities would be at Esquimalt, if we decided to have storage there.

Mr. PELLETIER: I should like to point out to the minister the vast natural resources of Alberta in regard to oil; I believe that is an asset of which we should take cognizance. I think eventually the oil resources of Alberta will prove of material assistance to both the Canadian navy and the British navy, and I think it should be part of the work of this department to look into the question of the supply of oil. Oil is known to exist in Alberta in unlimited quantities. The department might also turn its attention to the tar sands at Fort McMurray, where we understand there are many millions of barrels of oil which could be very easily piped to Vancouver for the use of the Canadian navy. I think matters of this kind, when it comes to the question of supply depots, might very well be considered by the government, and I was wondering if anything had been done in the line of research work into the possibility of developing those oil fields in order to assure a supply of oil in case of need.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister was probably busy and did not follow my question. I asked if it was the intention of the government to have any sort of survey made in order to ascertain whether or not those supplies could be used in case of need. As I said, I believe the resources of Alberta in that regard are almost unlimited, and certainly they would come in very handy in time of need for both Canadian and British navies. I was wondering if the department had made any survey along that line with a view to ascertaining what use might be made of this oil and how quickly it could be made available.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I may say that investigations have been made. I am not at liberty to disclose the nature of them, but I shall be glad to keep the observations of my hon. friend in mind.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): There is an item of $20,400 for the repair and upkeep of properties, which is an increase of $10,400, and another item of $31,600 for operating expenses of properties, an increase of $8,000. What is the difference between the repair and upkeep of properties and the operating expenses of properties. I suppose general repairs would come under one, but what would be the operating expenses of properties?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The appropriation for operating expenses of properties for 1938-39 is $31,600. The explanation is that this is to cover electric light and water services and the heating of buildings for dockyards and naval armament supply depots. The explanation of the increase is this: Last year it was $14,735 and this year it is $17,900, and the increase of $3,165 is required owing to the additional buildings to be serviced in that fashion during the coming year. There is an increase of $4,600 in the heating of the buildings, which is required owing to additional buildings to be serviced during the coming year.

Mr. GREEN: Is the overhaul of ships of the Pacific coast squadron done at the government dockyard at Esquimalt or let out by contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that most of the repairs are carried out by the department and the drydocking is done by civilian firms.

Mr. GREEN: Is the government not equipped with a drydock there in which the work could be done?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Evidently not.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Naval Reserves, $319,800.

Mr. NEILL: Early in the session the minister told us that he was either contemplating or actually had in operation a scheme for developing some system of naval reserves on the Pacific coast. Could he give us some particulars as to the progress made, the number of men enlisted, the terms of enlistment, when they are trained, and so on?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As I told my hon. friend two or three weeks ago, before the session commenced we had a naval officer of wide experience survey the situation with the idea of having a fishermen's reserve if possible on each coast. We have just completed the survey on the Pacific coast and intend to proceed with one on the Atlantic. The officer in question has submitted a definite suggestion to the department, and it is hoped that action will be taken, if not this year, at least early next year on both coasts.

Mr. NEILL: You have not any men actually signed up yet?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. It would not come into effect until next winter, when the fishing fleet will be laid up.

Mr. NEILL: I understood from the press that the officer actually had been up the coast, made contacts with fishermen and gained their consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; I think in his preliminary surveys he obtained from them their willingness or otherwise, when their ships were laid up in the winter, to enter such a fishermen's reserve. Of course the agreement could not be proceeded with until next winter.

Mr. NEILL: How long would the training be?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think the final details have been worked out as to the length of training, but I would think probably it would be a month or so.

Mr. NEILL: Could the minister indicate what would be the anticipated enlistment, or what would be the size of the force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): About two hundred, I think.

Mr. NEILL: On the Pacific coast?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: All fishermen?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Air services—Royal Canadian Air Force—permanent air force, $9,410,567.

Mr. TUSTIN: What are the qualifications required of a man entering for training as a pilot in the Royal Canadian Air Force and also the qualifications required of the young fellows who go in for training as mechanics?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I assume the hon. member refers to the qualifications for training as a pilot. These are the qualifications:

To qualify for ab initio flying training in the Royal Canadian Air Force applicants must be—

(a) Of pure European descent, sons of parents both of whom are or if deceased were at the time of their death British subjects, or naturalized British subjects;

(b) unmarried;

(c) medically fit for full flying duties;

(d) between the ages of 18 and 25 on the 1st of June in the year in which he is applying for entry;

(e) a graduate of the Royal Military College or a graduate of a four year course in the faculty of applied science, arts, arts and science, law or forestry of a recognized Canadian university;

(f) otherwise suitable including appearance, character and personality;

Mr. TUSTIN: What are the qualifications for a young man wishing to qualify as a mechanic?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To be eligible for non-flying list commissions the candidates must fulfil the following conditions:

(a) They must be of pure European descent and must be British subjects and the sons of parents both of whom are or if deceased were at the time of death British subjects.

(Where there is doubt the burden of proof will rest upon the applicant.)

(b) They must be unmarried;

(c) They must be medically fit, in accordance with R.C.A.F. standards, and otherwise suitable.

(Medical examination to be completed on form M.F. B 336.)

(d) They must have attained the age of twenty-one years but not twenty-five on the 1st of June of the year in which the candidate is applying for entry.

(No extension of these age limits can be allowed.)

(e) They must be graduates of—

(i) Royal Military College;

(ii) The applied science, commerce or arts (in commerce) faculties of a recognized university, or possess certificates of having passed the intermediate accountancy examination set by a provincial chartered accountants association.

Mr. LENNARD: Do those qualifications apply to mechanics?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the stores and accounts branch of the Royal Canadian air force, for permanent commissions.

Mr. LENNARD: But they are not mechanics.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The applicant for enlistment to the Royal Canadian Air Force as an unskilled man must:

(a) Be a British subject resident in Canada, the parents of whom are (or, if deceased, were at the time of their death) British subjects.
(b) Be medically fit (category A) and unmarried.
(c) Be free from engagement with any other service of His Majesty's forces.
(d) Be willing to enlist for a period of three years for general service at any place to which he may be posted or transferred.
(e) Be willing to be vaccinated and inoculated.
(f) Have attained his 18th but not his 45th birthday.
(g) Be in possession of an entrance examination certificate or its equivalent.
(h) Be of good moral character. A certificate to this effect is required from the principal of the last school attended, a clergyman, or another responsible person.

7. Applicants who are qualified as above are eligible for enlistment as unskilled airmen.

Mr. TUSTIN: When a young man enlists in the Royal Canadian Air Force, does he enlist as an unskilled man, if he wishes to qualify as a mechanic?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is another special provision for skilled men. It is as follows:

In exceptional cases, an applicant may be enlisted as a skilled man (tradesman). In addition to being qualified as in paragraph 6, he must pass a practical and theoretical test in one of the air force trades. Before arrangements are made for this test, proof must be submitted in writing that the applicant has been employed at his trade for at least three years, and that he is proficient in it.

9. Some of the trades covered by this paragraph are: Fitter, carpenter, metal worker, cook, fabric worker, machinist, tailor, wireless operator, etc.

Mr. TUSTIN: Possibly I am not making myself clear, but we know that in the Royal Canadian Air Force there are a great many mechanics who work on aeroplanes. The question I am asking is this: Does a man enlist as an unskilled worker to qualify as a mechanic, or how does he enlist if he wishes to become a mechanic?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If he enlists as a mechanic, he must have the qualifications I have just read for a skilled man, otherwise he would have to enlist under the other section I read.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister give some idea as to the purpose of our air force in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; the purpose of the air force in Canada is to cooperate with the naval and militia services for the defence of Canada in the case of an emergency. While I shall not answer at length, it has been said in general debate that an air force is not primarily for defensive purposes. I must say that the advice I have received from those supposed to be qualified to advise is to the opposite effect. They say an air force can be as effective in defence as it may be in offence. So far as the plans drawn up in the Department of National Defence are concerned, may I say that the entire purpose of the air force is to combine, according to carefully prepared plans, with the land force, if necessary, and with our small sea force for the protection of our focal areas, our trade routes and our coastal areas and, if we were neutral, for the protection of our neutrality.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister has mentioned the protection of our neutrality. A matter occurs to me which, I believe, has not yet been discussed in the house. Within the last few days we have heard a great deal as to the possibility of Canada supplying planes or other munitions of war to Great Britain. In that case I fancy it might very well be that the first objective of any attacking force would be the factories in which such aeroplanes or war materials are being produced. In such event I fancy it would be difficult to protect our neutrality. It would be difficult to remain neutral if we were actively engaged in supplying materials of war to any nation, whether it be a British nation or a nation outside the empire. I should like to ask whether or not any arrangement has been arrived at by which no materials would be manufactured in or exported from Canada without a licence from the Department of National Defence, and whether in the granting of such licence consideration will be given to the added dangers which, it seems to me, would come to Canada because of the manufacture in this country of munitions of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The licence referred to by the hon. member is not given by the Department of National Defence.

It is a permit given, under the amended section 290 of the Customs Act, by the Department of National Revenue, which deals with these matters. May I say further that the Canadian government has not been a party in regard to the supplying of any munitions. In two or three minor cases up to date the British government have given orders to Canadian firms. One would be the National Steel Car order at Hamilton, and we know they have given an order for the Bren gun to the firm in Toronto to which the Dominion Department of National Defence gave an order. With these exceptions, very few orders have been placed with Canadian industry by the British government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When I referred to Canada I did not mean the government of Canada. I had Canadian firms in mind. It does not seem to me that this is a matter which concerns merely another department, in the same manner as other exports might concern that department. It seems to me these matters are vital to the welfare of the whole of Canada, especially from a military standpoint.

If I may repeat, it seems to me that the very fact we were producing munitions would create a greater danger for Canada, either the physical danger of being attacked or the constitutional danger in case we wished to remain neutral. Has the Department of National Defence taken these matters definitely into consideration when the contracts are being let to Canadian firms?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member may rest assured that every possible consideration is being carefully weighed with respect to these orders.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the Department of National Defence consulted before any licences are given for the manufacture or export of munitions of war to other countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, naturally, because I think they are naturally referred to the governor in council. I think all these permits are referred to the governor in council, and the Minister of National Defence should be familiar with what has taken place.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): There is a difference of nearly $2,000,000 in the amount allowed for stores and equipment this year as compared with last. What is the explanation of this large decrease?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The large decrease in this item is chiefly on account of the reduction in the number of aircraft, together with equipment and spares therefor, to be obtained during the current year as compared with 1937-38. In the estimates for the Royal Canadian Air Force provision was made for 102 machines, whereas this year seventy-five are provided for. It is anticipated that delivery cannot be obtained during the year of all stores and equipment ordered. Provision is being made to the extent only to which deliveries can be expected during the current year.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Will the air pilots on the Trans-Canada Air Lines have any rating in the permanent air force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have not at the present time, but it is expected that conferences will be held to discuss the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. TUSTIN: Getting back to the matter of qualifications, I am still not clear as to what the minister said with regard to qualifications, but possibly I am not making myself clear. The point is that a certain number of young men have enlisted to become mechanics in the air force, and I should like to know if those men enlisted as unskilled workers or if they had to have special qualifications? I understood the minister to say that in connection with unskilled workers it was only necessary to have passed the entrance examination.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to send over a copy of the printed regulations dealing with the qualifications for enlistment in the Royal Canadian Air Force. The position with reference to the enlistment of unskilled men is exactly as I read it.

Mr. TUSTIN: I can understand the situation as far as the skilled men are concerned. Men are continually being trained as mechanics, and I understand that the air force prefer to train these men along their own lines. The department has advised certain young men whom I know that they must have at least four years secondary school education, and I was not quite clear as to the necessary qualifications.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They cannot enlist as skilled men unless they have certain qualifications which are stipulated; the regulations provide for the training of men as tradesmen after enlistment. The qualifications are set out in detail in the pamphlet to which I referred.

Mr. TUSTIN: I should like to have a copy of that.

Mr. STIRLING: With this new method of preparing the estimates, I notice it is very seldom noted that the appropriation was not required, that is the appropriation in the estimates of the previous year. In connection with this vote, we have been given to understand that orders placed in Great Britain for airplanes have been considerably delayed. Does the minister follow me?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am sorry; I do not.

Mr. STIRLING: A total of $10,595,000 was voted last year for this item. Was that all spent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. STIRLING: With the present method of submitting the estimates, where would the balance appear?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Part of it may lapse and part of it may be revoted later on.

Mr. STIRLING: In the form of supplementaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They may come in the supplementaries or they may lapse altogether.

Mr. McNIVEN: The minister said that the vote last year provided for 102 airplanes. How many have been supplied?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have about 60, but that number may be one or two out one way or the other. The great proportion of those are light training planes. The heavier planes included in the 102 provided for last year could not be delivered so soon.

Mr. McNIVEN: Will the vote for the 42 planes lapse? Are those planes under construction, and, if so, where?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A certain amount of the vote of last year will lapse.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) put a question to the minister in connection with contracts placed in Canada by the British government. Is any direction given by the Department of National Defence in the placing of those contracts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In certain instances the British government might ask the Canadian government for information as to the ability of a certain firm to carry out certain work, but the contracts are let directly by the British government to the individual industry concerned.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the department made a complete survey of plants throughout the country equipped to do certain work?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The survey is not complete, but extensive work has been done in that connection. We have surveyed 768 firms throughout the dominion.

Mr. EDWARDS: That work is being done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is being done now.

Mr. GREEN: How many modern first line aircraft have we?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is what I said a minute ago. Most of those that were completed are of the training type. My hon. friend presumably refers to the fighter or service type. Very few of those are completed yet, probably not more than twelve.

Mr. GREEN: How many shall we have as a result of this vote? What is the total number provided for now, including what we have actually on hand?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): At the end of this year, 203.

Mr. GREEN: Those are service machines?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Service and training combined.

Mr. GREEN: How many service machines will there be?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think I had better give them by types.

Mr. STIRLING: Before the minister begins, are the 203 being built in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; some of them in England, thirty-three of them.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister indicate, when he gives the list, which are service planes and which are training planes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): First, the fighter planes; it is expected that seven will be ready next year at this time. Then bomber and army cooperation, twenty-four; flying boats, four; Stranraers, seven; torpedo bombers, sixteen; coastal reconnaissance, eight.

Mr. GREEN: That first list is of service planes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. Then the training planes: seven of the 621; twelve of the 626; forty-three fleets; twenty-six tiger moths; eight Bellanca—these are obsolete now—sixteen Fairchild 71; one Fairchild super 71; twenty Deltas; four Norseman. The trainers are the tiger moths.

Mr. GREEN: So one year from now we shall have only seventy-eight service machines, according to those figures. Is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is approximately correct.

Mr. STIRLING: That will be the case only if delivery is made by Great Britain in time. These Wapiti are being built in Great Britain?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have them here in Canada now.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the government ever considered getting over that difficulty in the way I understand Australia has? When the money is voted it is placed in a fund in London, so that it actually passes from the country for that purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; that has come to our attention. They have a trust fund, I understand, especially for that purpose. I am informed—I am not sure whether it is correct—that under the provisions of our Audit Act that could not be done so far as Canada is concerned.

Mr. GREEN: What aircraft cannot be built in Canada? The service craft?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Any aircraft of any kind can be built in Canada. I am certain that our industry is equal to the production of any type of aircraft.

Mr. GREEN: There is no reason why Canadian factories could not at the present time produce the most up to date aircraft?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No reason at all; factors such as time and capital expenditure could be overcome if sufficiently large orders were forthcoming.

Mr. McIVOR: I want to say that the Department of National Defence have been very busy in finding out just what our first-class airplane factories are capable of doing. I know our Fort William factory has had several visits from the department's experts. I say this only because I feel sure that we are going to get two or three big orders before very long.

Mr. GREEN: Where is the construction of buildings and works, costing $1,508,000, as given in the details on page 138, to take place?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The details are as follows:

The amount submitted is $1,508,000.

Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, $410,000, made up as follows: Radio station, $7,000; services, $28,000; water supply and pump house, $30,000; barrack block, $50,000; airdrome—grading, runways and so forth—$195,000; administration and single officers' building, $100,000.

Sydney, Nova Scotia, $70,000; Truro, $100,000; Yarmouth, $100,000; No. 1 aircraft depot, Ottawa, $55,000; R.C.A.F. station, Ottawa, $55,000; Trenton, $134,500; Petawawa, $15,000; Winnipeg, $5,000; Calgary, $13,000; Vancouver, $268,000; Alliford Bay, $75,000; Kamloops, $32,500; Patricia Bay, B.C., $100,000; Prince Rupert, $75,000.

Mr. GREEN: Will that complete the air base at Patricia bay and Prince Rupert?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. I think it will only take care of the acquisition of the property and the commencement of grading operations for the preparation of the ground.

Mr. HAMILTON: In view of the discussion which has taken place as to contracts for war material and equipment, perhaps it would not be out of place for me to point out to the minister and the government that most of this material is based on steel, and that again is based on iron ore. I believe I am correct in saying that there is no iron ore mined or produced in Canada. The maritimes get their supply from Newfoundland, and central Canada gets its supply from the United States. Should the neutrality laws of the United States be such that they could not supply Canada with iron ore, the whole bottom of our steel industry drops out. I think I am correct in saying that there would be very little reserves of iron ore in supply at any given time in Canada. Iron ore is of vital importance to ensure Canada of a continuous supply of steel, which goes into the production of war materials and equipment of every kind. As the committee no doubt knows, we have plenty of iron ore resources in Canada, although unfortunately it is of a low grade. We have also different types of iron ore. Because of the bounty that has been granted by the Ontario government, the mining of iron ore is now being developed north of my constituency, where there is a large supply of siderite ore, and they contemplate being able to develop that with the assistance of the bounty. There are many types of iron ore that can be successfully used in our blast furnaces. I rose just to point out to the committee that if a supply of war material is important to Canada, and important to Great Britain through Canada, then the supply of iron ore becomes a significant and vital consideration for us to keep in mind.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the hon. member for Algoma West (Mr. Hamilton) is not correctly informed when he says there is no iron ore produced in Canada. My information is that iron ore is being produced at the present time in British Columbia and being shipped directly to Japan. To-night we are appropriating money to defend the Pacific coast of Canada from a country that we insist on arming.

Mr. HAMILTON: If that is the case, I think it must be a recent development; for the information I had not very long ago was to the effect that iron ore is not mined in Canada. If it is being shipped from British Columbia to Japan, that is something new to me. I accept the hon. member's statement.

Mr. TUSTIN: How many Canadians have enlisted in the Royal Air Force, that is the imperial air force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total will be ten a month, one hundred and twenty.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it proposed to establish any other air fields than those the minister has already mentioned?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Those I have mentioned are all those that are covered in the estimates for 1938-39. As regards the future, I could not speak with any definiteness at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: What developments are to be made at the Jericho air base this year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are building two hangars. As my hon. friend knows, two were built last year. There are further extensions of the nature of officers' quarters.

Mr. GREEN: Is any more property being acquired?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that application has been made to the exchequer court for more property. The application may be heard some time during the present year.

Mr. GREEN: Is that for buildings or just vacant land?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe that both buildings and land are included.

Mr. GREEN: What buildings are to be acquired?

[Mr. Hamilton.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is to the west of where the barracks are being erected at the present time.

Mr. STEWART: I notice that the amount for pay and allowances for the current year is $2,866,000 as against $2,188,000 odd last year. In order to save time, I shall combine two questions in one: Will the minister give the total number of all ranks that will be involved in this item, and also the rates of pay and allowances for the different ranks?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The numbers are 247 officers and 1,823 air men.

Mr. STEWART: That is for the coming year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For 1938-39, a total of 2,070, at a cost of $2,866,904. The rates of pay and allowances are quite extensive. Does my hon. friend wish to have them all? They are involved—pay on appointment and rations and quarters and married allowances. Perhaps, if I gave the pay on appointment to the various ranks, that would be sufficient.

Mr. STEWART: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Air commodore, $5,000; group captain, general list, $4,300; wing commander, general list, $3,700; wing commander, non-flying, $2,900; squadron leader, general list, $3,300; squadron leader, non-flying, $2,500; flight lieutenant, general list, $2,850; flight lieutenant, non-flying, $2,050; flying officer, general list, $2,350; flying-officer, non-flying, $1,550; pilot officer, general list, $2,100; pilot officer, non-flying, $1,300; warrant officer, No. 1, $1,460; warrant officer, No. 2, trade, $1,314; warrant officer, No. 2, standard, $1,241; flight sergeant, trade, $1,222.75; flight sergeant, standard, $1,095; sergeant, "A," $1,131.50; sergeant "B," $1,076.75; sergeant "C," $1,040.25; sergeant, standard, $1,003.75; corporal "A," $967.25; corporal "B," $912.50; corporal "C," $876; corporal, standard, $821.25; leading aircraftman, "A," $876; leading aircraftman "B," $821.25; leading aircraftman "C," $784.75; leading aircraftman, standard, $730; aircraftman 1 "A," $839.50; aircraftman 1 "B," $784.75; aircraftman 1 "C," $748.25; aircraftman 1 Standard, $693.50; aircraftman 2 "A," $784.75; aircraftman 2 "B," $748.25; aircraftman 2 "C," $711.75; aircraftman 2 standard, $620.50.

Mr. STEWART: In addition to that, varying allowances, I suppose?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, yes, varying.

Mr. STIRLING: I am not clear as to which this property is in the vicinity of Jericho. The minister says it is west of the new barrack building now proceeding. I am not sufficently acquainted with the points of the compass to know where it is. Is the road leading past that to the present air force north and south? If it is, west of that would be behind the barrack property on the beach.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; I think application has been made to the exchequer court to expropriate the property now occupied by Mr. Spencer—twelve acres, I think.

Mr. GREEN: Does that include the very large home of Mr. Spencer?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think that is included in the application.

Mr. GREEN: What is it to be used for?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would think, for single officers' quarters.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister any idea of the price?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; we cannot say. It will be determined eventually by the exchequer court.

Mr. GREEN: Was there an offer made by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. STEWART: As I understand it, in matters of expropriation those items are not included in the estimates; they are payable out of the consolidated revenue as a result of the judgment of the court. There is nothing included anywhere in these estimates for it, is there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think there is an amount in this estimate towards that purpose. It is $30,000.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister be good enough to say what portion of the vote for the year 1937-38 amounting to $10,595,000 has not been expended, and the major items of the vote of last year in respect of which there has not been a full expenditure?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed that the final figures are not available as yet, but that the average underspent will be less by way of proportion than it was in some previous years. That is the only definite information I can give my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister explain why a home of that nature, a very expensive home, should be necessary for single officers' quarters?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The recommendation was made by the officers of the department. I think a saving will be effected as compared with single officers' quarters, that otherwise would be constructed.

Item agreed to.

Non-permanent Air Force, $987,050.

Mr. GREEN: The minister said during his main speech on these estimates that there were to be two non-permanent squadrons. Where are they to be located?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are two in Montreal—

Mr. GREEN: No; the two new non-permanent squadrons.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The location of the twelve, which is the total number contemplated at the present time, is as follows:

No. 110, army cooperation squadron, Toronto;
No. 111, coast artillery cooperation, Vancouver;
No. 112, army cooperation squadron, Winnipeg;
No. 113, fighter squadron, Calgary;
No. 114, bomber squadron, London, Ontario;
No. 115, fighter squadron, Montreal;
No. 116, coast artillery cooperation squadron, Halifax;
No. 117, fighter squadron, Saint John, New Brunswick;
No. 118, bomber squadron, Montreal;
No. 119, bomber squadron, Hamilton, Ontario;
No. 120, bomber squadron, Regina;
No. 121, fighter squadron, Quebec.

The three to be organized are Nos. 114, 116 and 117.

Mr. GREEN: Does that include the two new ones?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It must, because twelve is the total number arranged for.

Mr. STIRLING: These are not by any means all in being now, are they?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, not all.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently a year from now we shall have only about seventy-eight modern fighting planes. Will any of these be available for the non-permanent air force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; it is hoped that we shall have not only trainers but also advanced trainers a little later.

Mr. GREEN: But will any of these modern service planes to which the minister has referred be available for the non-permanent squadron?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. May I say further in reply to the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) that those which have been organized or are in process of organization are the following: No. 110, Toronto; No. 111, Vancouver; No. 112, Quebec; No. 113, Calgary; No. 115, fighter squadron, Montreal; No. 118, bomber squadron, Montreal; No. 119, Hamilton; No. 120, Regina; and No. 121, Quebec.

Mr. STIRLING: Are they complete with officers and other ranks?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not altogether. Some just in process of organization.

Item agreed to.

Civil government air operations, $356,000.

Mr. STIRLING: These are operations for other departments?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Have they increased in amount?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A decrease of $5,000 this year.

Mr. BARBER: Is it under this vote that the operations on the Pacific coast in connection with fisheries and forest fire control come?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, this is mostly for photography, in the northwest part of the province.

Mr. STIRLING: What portion of this will be for surveying?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is practically all for that purpose. The break-down is as follows:

Pay and allowances	$ 1,000
Stores and equipment	265,000
Aero gas and oil	47,000
Overhauling aircraft engines and equipment	25,000
Transport and travelling	10,000
Telephone, telegraph and postage	300
Sundries	7,700
	$356,000

Stores and equipment:

To provide for the replacement of one aircraft complete, which was destroyed by fire, with cameras and equipment	$ 85,000
To purchase two spare engines	19,500
To provide for purchase of air craft spares for recently purchased Delta aircraft	27,500
To defray balance due on four Delta aircraft	110,000
To purchase aircraft equipment for air survey purposes	9,000
Film required for photography	14,000

Mr. STIRLING: Do I understand that the requirements for topographic surveys are still furnished by the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; we do the photographic work. I have a detailed description of the operations. The requirements of air survey take the Royal Canadian Air Force from coast to coast and from the United States boundary to the arctic circle, and the demand for new work is always greater than can possibly be accomplished. In 1937 the Royal Canadian Air Force detachment photographed from the air a total of 77,500 square miles. The photographic season is from the time the snow melts to the first snowfall of the following winter. Last year because the snow did not arrive until December the aircraft were kept on photography a month later than usual, with the result that the work which normally is done in the winter, such as overhauling aircraft engines and cameras, had to be hastened in order to get the aircraft out to their work in the west where the snow disappears earlier than in the east. Two aircraft are almost ready to leave for British Columbia—this was written on March 10—where they will be operating in Barclay sound on the west coast of Vancouver island. Two detachments, five aircraft in all, will be sent to the drought areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta when the snow leaves the ground. They will continue a detailed survey commenced last year until the ice breaks in the Great Slave lake area, when the detachment will change to floats in order to fly into the Yellowknife district. When the work there has been completed they will return to the prairies via lake Athabaska, where the opening up of a new mining area has created a demand for detailed maps. The fourth detachment of two aircraft will be located in Nova Scotia, and on completion of their work in that province they will be operating in Quebec in the Fort Coulonge area. In addition, another aircraft will be sent to photograph the Bruce peninsula. Although the program of operations has not been definitely decided by the committee appointed for this purpose, it is expected that it will require approximately 400 rolls of film and around 2,000 hours of flying time.

Mr. BARBER: Are some of these planes equipped with pontoons?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BARBER: Do they use the air fields prepared by the Department of Transport?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. They are really amphibian planes, in that they can be fitted with pontoons or wheels.

Item agreed to.

Mr. STEWART: Before the committee rises, may I ask whether item No. 180 is left standing? We desire to have one item left open upon which anything might be discussed, and No. 180, departmental administration, would appear to be the proper item.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the understanding. That item is not passed.

Mr. STEWART: And on that item—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Any question of defence policy may be discussed.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing services—Agricultural economics, $120,260.

Mr. SENN: I should like to take this opportunity of endorsing the suggestion made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) regarding some investigation of duplication in the collection of milk. He suggested to the minister that this branch might very well investigate the costly method of collecting milk which prevails in Saskatchewan. I believe such an investigation should be carried on in Ontario. The collection of farm produce is extremely costly, and must be dealt with before marketing can be successfully carried out. There is always a great deal of extra expense, because there is so much duplication. The same trucks travel up and down the same roads from day to day collecting milk, which adds greatly to the cost and, of course, affects the farmer's price. The department might very well undertake an investigation of this. The minister will perhaps say that there is not sufficient time for this branch to undertake all kinds of investigations. Frankly I do not think the vote is very large for this purpose. I believe research and the tabulation of statistics helps as much as anything that can be done to assist the farmer to market his products, and a larger sum might very well be spent when it could be so well utilized in investigations of this kind which should result in some benefit to agriculture.

There is provision for an assistant to the agricultural executive. What is the agricultural executive? This is another question that may bring out something in regard to the new set-up in the department. We are getting the information piecemeal, and there must be a great deal more information available with regard to this new set-up. If these estimates are to be discussed intelligently, we should have a thorough knowledge of the set-up of the department, what the new set-up means and how it is better adapted to the needs of the department and of agriculture generally.

Mr. GARDINER: As to whether or not there should be an investigation into the collection of milk, I think that is a subject which might very well be studied. As I said the other evening, usually these economic investigations are carried out in cooperation with the provinces. It will be understood that the gathering of milk is pretty much a local matter, certainly a provincial matter; but this branch is always available to carry out investigations that may be helpful, and as time goes on and money is made available for investigations of this kind, I am sure this branch will be prepared to give consideration to this matter.

The vote has been increased considerably this year, from $72,906.25 to $120,260. We realize that a considerable amount of this work can be done to advantage, and that is why the amount has been increased.

The position referred to, set out I think at page 55 of the estimates, has been established in the department for quite a number of years. It is the position occupied by Mr. Goddard.

Mr. SENN: What are his duties?

Mr. GARDINER: He is described as being in charge of general office administration, keeping a general check on office work in the economics branch.

Mr. THOMPSON: I notice a very considerable increase in this estimate, and I think some of that money could be spent to great advantage in examining the soil of different farms throughout the country. The use of fertilizers is just in its infancy in Ontario, and I believe a great work could be done by having farmers made acquainted with just what their soils require so that they might fertilize them accordingly.

Mr. GARDINER: I might point out that this would come under the vote for experimental farms rather than under this vote.

Item agreed to.

Fruit and vegetable products, including grants of $5,000 to the Canadian Horticultural council, $555,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give an account of the expenditure of money for the purchase of fruit and vegetables for distribution in the drought areas? A certain quantity of these commodities was purchased by the department. The fruit grower in British Columbia was faced with a particularly difficult marketing situation this year. He had a large crop himself; in the United States there was a far larger crop than for many years past; there was an enormous increase in citrous fruit production, and then there was the slowing up of purchasing power. The Department of Agriculture intervened and purchased I think something like 140,000 boxes of apples at a time when that assistance was greatly appreciated. I also believe some 10,000 barrels of apples were purchased in Nova Scotia for the same purpose. I believe it would be of great interest to the committee if the minister would go into some detail with regard to the purchase of such fruits and vegetables for that purpose and describe where they were bought and in what quantities. I remember that the other day, when this matter was referred to, the minister said he had been able to obtain a better transportation rate from Nova Scotia than from British Columbia. I should like some further information and explanation in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: As has been stated, last fall the department had $1,000,000 supplied to it for the purchase of surplus supplies of farm commodities in different parts of Canada outside the drought area for distribution within the drought area. There was purchased a quantity of cheese, beans, fish and vegetables, as well as a quantity of apples. At least two-thirds of the apples were purchased in British Columbia; the others came from Nova Scotia. I was scarcely correct the other night if I gave the impression that the cost per barrel in shipping was less from Nova Scotia than from British Columbia; but if we take distance into consideration, the cost was considerably less in connection with the apples that were shipped from Nova Scotia.

The price at which the apples were obtained in Nova Scotia was considerably less than the price paid in British Columbia, and there was a reason for that. In Nova Scotia last fall they had a very bad wind during the picking season, and there was a very heavy windfall of apples. As those who are familiar with the apple business know, the regulations of the department do not permit windfalls to be shipped out of Canada, no matter how good may be the condition of the apples. These apples were all gone over very carefully, and it was generally admitted that they were of practically as high quality as the apples that had been picked. They were obtained at a lower price, however, as a result of their being windfalls. That, together with the freight rate on the fruit from Nova Scotia, made it possible to deliver the apples in the drought area of Saskatchewan for less than we were able to deliver No. 1 apples from British Columbia.

Mr. STIRLING: Do I understand that the transportation companies met the minister in that regard and gave him any sort of special rate?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; they gave us half rate on the apples from both provinces.

Mr. EDWARDS: That applied to vegetables also, did it not?

Mr. GARDINER: That applied to all vegetables shipped in. The basis upon which the railways have operated in connection with all these matters has been that where the products were given free and were delivered free, the railways have given free transportation. That is, where churches have gone out and collected food or clothing and it has been delivered free at the other end, the railways have donated the freight. In places where purchases have been made, they have given us a half rate. On all these commodities this was done. I have a list of the purchases made. It is a long one, and I do not suppose the hon. member wants it.

Mr. STIRLING: What are the purchases in the various provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: I have the carloads of shipments of different commodities. There are fifty-three carloads of cheese, thirty-five of dried beans, 101 of fish, 283 of fruit, practically all of which was apples. Of those, 183 carloads were shipped from British Columbia and 100 from Nova Scotia. There are 375 carloads of vegetables shipped chiefly from Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta.

Mr. EDWARDS: Can the minister break down the figures in connection with the vegetable shipment, or is it a long list?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a long list, but I believe it can be broken down.

Mr. EDWARDS: Take it by districts, if you wish.

Mr. GARDINER: From the Quebec market gardeners' association there are seventy carloads of vegetables; from various growers, per J. L. Ferguson, Bradford, Ontario, sixty-nine cars; from the Pelham Vegetable Growers, Fenwick, Ontario, twelve cars; from various growers, per Rev. Father Baillargeon, La Salle, Ontario, five cars; from various growers, per W. Brillinger, Stouffville, Ontario, ten cars.

Mr. STIRLING: Are those purchases ?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. From the Lambton growers' cooperative association, Sarnia, Ontario, four cars; from M. J. Smith, Chatham, five cars; from Claude Lockery, Thedford, Ontario, three cars; from the St. Claire vegetable association, Sarnia, two cars; from the Ontario vegetable growers' association, Islington, Ontario, twelve cars; from The Aldershot District Cooperative Limited, two cars, making a total of 194 cars.

Mr. EDWARDS: They are pretty well distributed.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: As regards the inspection service, to what extent does the revenue go towards meeting the expenditures? The inspection is compulsory so far as export is concerned, is it not? I believe that is true also with regard to interprovincial transactions. Besides that, there is the shipping point inspection which is asked for and paid for by the shipper. Would the minister break up the information by provinces, and show to what extent the shipper and grower pay for the facilities they receive?

Mr. GARDINER: The information I have will, with some further explanations, give the required answer. The cost to the fruit branch of the $3 inspection fee is, in British Columbia, $7.31; in Ontario, $10.12; in New Brunswick, $6.40; in Nova Scotia, $10.85, and in Prince Edward Island, $7.25. The average for Canada is $8.78.

Mr. STIRLING: That covers all the export and interprovincial, which is compulsory?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Those cars cannot leave the country without that inspection?

Mr. GARDINER: That is true.

Mr. STIRLING: But the minister is not able to separate the shipping point inspections so as to show what is incorporated in the cost of the cars inspected for which the shipper pays.

Mr. GARDINER: These are exclusively the shipping point costs, with no costs from the standpoint of destination.

Mr. McGREGOR: Has the minister the unit prices paid of so much per bag or bushel at different points?

Mr. GARDINER: Does the hon. member mean the relief vegetables?

Mr. McGREGOR: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the prices for the same companies to which I referred a few moments ago.

Mr. McGREGOR: Were the prices the same at all points?

Mr. GARDINER: They vary somewhat with regard to different items. The prices with respect to the different items are as follows:

	Commodity—Price
Item No. 1—	Cabbage, $18 per ton.
	Beets, $15 per ton.
	Carrots, $15 per ton.
Item No. 2—	Cabbage, $15 per ton.
	Carrots, 50 cents per bag.
	Beets, 50 cents per bag.
	Parsnips, 65 cents per bag.
Item No. 3—	Beets, 50 cents per bag.
	Carrots, 50 cents per bag.

Mr. McGREGOR: Is that the price paid the farmer or the shipper?

Mr. GARDINER: There were no shippers involved. They were all purchased from farmers or from organizations representing farmers.

Mr. PERLEY: How many officials in the department were employed in gathering these quantities of vegetables?

Mr. GARDINER: There was no extra staff at this end; it was all done by the regular staff. It was under Mr. Wheeler, who was in charge of the branch, and our regular inspectors made the inspections and carried out the work.

Mr. PERLEY: Did they receive offers from wholesalers to ship the fruit, vegetables, fish, beans and so on, before they undertook to gather them in this way?

Mr. GARDINER: Quotations were obtained from different vegetable and fruit marketing organizations, but it was thought advisable to purchase as directly as we could from those who had surpluses of these commodities. For example, down in the Holland marsh area, where it was not possible for the people to dispose of the vegetables grown there, we purchased a considerable amount. The main reason for not dealing with wholesalers at both ends was the fact that we were purchasing commodities which, in the ordinary course of events, would not have found their way into these homes. The individuals in the relief areas were supplied with schedules providing for a certain amount per month, which was covered by vouchers to the merchants. These vouchers covered those things which were considered to be absolute necessities. We have had considerable difficulty in the past, particularly in farm homes throughout the drought areas, because the merchants did not carry certain of these things. They had no opportunity to sell them, and the vouchers were not sufficient to permit of that kind of thing being purchased. We had in mind the idea of providing certain commodities that otherwise would not be purchased. In addition, we thought this provided an opportunity of placing these commodities in homes where they were not ordinarily consumed. We selected the best of these commodities. The best British Columbia apples were selected, the best cheese and the best cured fish was obtained. Many of these homes had not been large users of these commodities for many years. It was considered that this was money well spent for advertising. These commodities were being placed before the people of this area, and it was thought that they would be larger purchasers later on as a result of this being done.

Mr. PERLEY: Why did the department or the minister decide that in many places in Saskatchewan the distribution should be general? He just made the statement that these commodities were placed in homes where they were not generally used, but in many cases the distribution was general.

Mr. GARDINER: There was a general distribution to those who considered that they needed these supplies. There was no check up to the extent that deliveries were made only to those on relief. The first reason for this was the belief that many people could be kept off relief by having these additional supplies. I believe many did stay off relief as a result of having vegetables in their cellars and a little fish and cheese in their pantries. The other reason was advertising. These people were given these supplies as an advertisement. It was felt that they would not be shipped in at all if they were not shipped in in this way. The hon. member suggests that these supplies were delivered to everyone. There was a restriction placed against persons who were receiving regular salaries, such as bank managers and station agents. I dare say there were some exceptions, as is bound to happen in deliveries of this kind. However, those who felt themselves in need and who applied were given these supplies without too much check being made upon the situation existing in their homes.

Mr. PERLEY: I have not the correspondence with me at the moment as I did not expect we would reach this item, but I have letters from secretaries of municipalities enclosing copies of a letter that went out from Doctor Stapleford stating that there was to be a general distribution and that this suggestion came from the minister. I know of places where distribution was made to bankers, lawyers, butchers, hotel keepers and people of that sort. In some instances the people refused to accept the supplies. I should like to know how the minister arrived at the quantity required, even assuming that distribution was to be general. Just a minute ago the minister said that they had thirty-five carloads of beans. How did they arrive at that quantity? A grocer told me that was more beans than would be consumed in Saskatchewan in three years. I have also been told by a grocery firm that the prices paid for beans was in the neighbourhood of a dollar a sack more than the price for which they could have supplied them. Could the minister tell us what price was paid for beans, where they were gathered and how the quantity was arrived at? There are certain members who come from the districts in Ontario where beans are grown and they could compare the prices.

Mr. GARDINER: The beans were bought at $1.30 which was the lowest price that could be secured by anyone. The cost of shipping would be lower to the government than to a merchant because we were shipping in carload lots and at half rates. I do not think it would have been possible to supply the beans for a dollar less. The amounts supplied to a family of five were thirty pounds of cheese, thirty-three pounds of beans, one hundred and fifty pounds of apples, forty-four pounds of fish, one hundred pounds of turnips and one hundred and fifty pounds of other vegetables. The cost was a little over $13 per family, which I do not think can be considered as high.

Mr. PERLEY: Where was the fish obtained? Could the minister give us a statement with respect to fish and beans similar to that which he gave with respect to vegetables?

Mr. GARDINER: The beans all came from various members of the Ontario bean producers' association. The fish purchases were as follows:

Zwicker and Company Limited, Lunenburg, salted cod, 168,000 pounds at 5½ cents.

W. C. Smith and Company Limited, Lunenburg, salted cod, 168,000 pounds at 5½ cents.

Adams and Knickle, Lunenburg, salted cod, 168,000 pounds at 5½ cents.

Mrs. Jean D. Lohnes, Lunenburg, salted cod, 100,800 pounds at 5½ cents.

Robin, Jones and Whitman, Lunenburg, salted cod, 67,200 pounds at 5½ cents.

Total, 672,000 pounds of salted cod.

Maritime National Fish Company, Halifax, chicken haddock, 6,000 boxes at $2.30 per 24 carton.

Halifax Fisheries Limited, Halifax, pollock, salted, 95,200 pounds at 3¼ cents.

W. and C. H. Mitchell, Limited, Halifax, 36,000 pounds pollock at 3¼ cents.

Barker-Eakins Company, Limited, Yarmouth, 100,800 pounds of pollock at 3¼ cents.

Robin, Jones and Whitman, Halifax, 91,600 pounds at 3¼ cents.

Rowlings Limited, Halifax, 44,800 pounds at 3¼ cents.

A. M. Smith and Company, Halifax, 302,400 pounds at 3¼ cents.

Total, 670,800 pounds of pollock secured in Halifax at 3¼ cents.

B. Connors Fish Company, Saint John, chicken haddie, 4,000 boxes at $2.25 per 24 carton.

Connor Brothers, fish dealers, Black's Harbour, herring in tomato sauce, 10,000 boxes at $3.80 per 48 carton.

Grand Manan Smoked Herring Board, St. Andrews, smoked herring, 26,332 boxes at 62 cents a box.

Mr. BARBER: Has the minister the figures for Prince Rupert and other points in British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: No. We bought apples altogether from British Columbia. I might add that there is a list here of about fourteen individuals from whom we secured smaller amounts of pollock, salted, at three cents.

Mr. QUELCH: I had an experience similar to that of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. I found that in certain areas these foods were distributed without regard to whether people needed them. I made a protest, and the answer I received was that the federal regulations did not state whether or not a person had to be in need in order to receive the food. The reason I protested was that in the marginal areas adjacent to the federal drought area there was a great deal of distress, and apparently the people in that area were not eligible for the distribution of these supplies. I protested, and the answer I received was that the people outside the federal drought area, no matter how much distress there might be, were not eligible for the distribution of this food.

Mr. GARDINER: There was some difficulty at the beginning, and complaints came in from the area immediately adjacent to what was known as the federal drought area where we were taking care of the people 100 per cent. An attempt was made to take care of that situation by inducing the voluntary committee to make their distributions in the area outside rather than inside the federal area. There was some difficulty experienced in having that done because there were instances where people had expressed the desire to have their carload go to a particular section, and of course where any desire was expressed to have a car that was being sent gratis to western Canada distributed in a certain place, that was done. There were other instances of church organizations having directed cars to certain places, and it was impossible to change their destination. But we tried so to distribute the voluntary relief that was given as to assist those round about the federal area to greater advantage than those who were being assisted inside that area. We depended entirely on the local authorities to make the distribution, and I would say that in 90 per cent of the cases at any rate the distribution was carried out in the very best possible manner. In other cases there may have been some misunderstanding on the part of the local authorities as to just what was to be done with the commodities, and there might have been some distribution made where probably, if we had restricted them by regulation, distribution would not have been made; but I do not think any great harm was done or any great loss sustained as a result. I think it will be found that most people, as was stated by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), who did not feel they were entitled to the goods did not take them. That was the case over the greater part of the area.

Mr. HAYHURST: Was any part of the fruit and vegetables that were supplied by charitable organizations distributed in the federal area?

Mr. GARDINER: In Alberta the provincial authorities asked us not to make any distribution of vegetables because they had sufficient vegetables to take care of the situation in the federal area in that province, but there was a certain section that was taken into the federal area in Alberta by special arrangement with the province. We had selected forty-two municipalities that we thought should go into the federal area. They made representations to the effect that there should be fifty-three. We questioned that, and a compromise was arrived at, the amount of the cash grant to the Alberta government to take care of the area outside the federal area being cut in two. When it came to the distribution of the food we suggested, in the first instance, that we would confine the distribution to forty-two municipalities. They proposed that they would make a distribution of vegetables over the whole area provided we covered the complete area with the other commodities, and that was done.

Mr. BAKER: Does the minister consider that all this great quantity of food was essential out there, and that it was well used, or was a large quantity not required and therefore wasted?

Mr. GARDINER: I think anyone who has been through that area would agree that there was very little food wasted in that area this year. There were more people going short of food than wasting any food in the drought area last winter.

Mr. BROOKS: Was any distribution of potatoes made?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, by the provincial government, and for that reason we did not make any distribution of potatoes.

Mr. BROOKS: Where were the potatoes obtained?

Mr. GARDINER: Pretty much from western Canada, although some were obtained as far east as Fort William, some from the newer part of western Ontario, also from Manitoba, and, I assume, from Alberta and British Columbia.

Mr. BROOKS: There were a great many potatoes sent out there from New Brunswick, and I was wondering if any were purchased from New Brunswick.

Mr. GARDINER: We did not make these purchases. I would not be absolutely certain, but I do not think they went as far east as New Brunswick to purchase potatoes. I think there were sufficient supplies in Manitoba and closer to the area, and therefore there would not be so much freight to pay on them.

Mr. PERLEY: I am not complaining at all of the distribution because I think it was a splendid thing and the right thing to do. It not only gave relief to those in Saskatchewan who needed it, but made it possible to help those in eastern Canada who had fruits and vegetables for sale. What I was complaining of particularly was that in the distribution certain people did get fruit and vegetables who did not need them, and the consequence was that those who could have done with a little more did not get it. I have before me a letter which states that the distribution in this particular locality was three-fifths of a box of apples to each person, fifteen pounds of carrots and fourteen pounds of cabbage. It says nothing about potatoes. If that was the only distribution, it would not be a very large quantity of apples for the individual, and the distribution would be less because of people getting these supplies who did not need them. The minister admits, I suppose, having approved that system of distribution, because the letter from Doctor Stapleford says that it is the special request of the minister that everyone should participate and the populations of the municipality and of the urban centres within the municipality are given to make sure that the supplies could be divided accordingly, so that each one would share in them. When the minister is replying he might also give us the parties from whom they collected the beans and also the fish.

Mr. GARDINER: I just gave information about the fish and the beans.

Mr. PERLEY: I had reference to the cheese.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think it has been sent to us yet, but we have a complete list of all the people who got these supplies. When we sent out the supplies we arranged with every person who obtained the apples, when the apples were shipped first, to sign an application for them, to state the number of persons in each family, and to sign for the amount they obtained. The last report that I had before the office was closed up was that they had returns from every municipality regarding the apples, with one exception, and they expected to have that one in within a few days, before the office was closed. I have not inquired since if that one report was in, but the others are. It was intended that there should be a full sign-up on all the other commodities in addition to the apples. They got the list of persons to whom they supplied the fish, beans, cheese and other commodities from the first list of apples shipped. The apples had to be shipped before frost. We got a complete list, and knew from that list what to ship into each municipality to supply individuals. The letter which was sent out, and which, as indicated by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, was of a general nature, went to rural municipalities. But the instructions which went to the urban centres, that is the villages and towns within the area, indicated that not more than seventy-five per cent of the population was to be supplied. It was indicated clearly at that time that those who were to be left out were persons who were on salaries and were getting along about as well as if the drought had not existed, because they were being paid practically the same salaries as before. It was ordered that those people were to be left out of the distribution, and I am quite sure that the instruction was carried out over the greater part of the area, because I had quite a number of letters from different places complaining that it had been carried out.

The statement as issued under date of March 10 to the department at Ottawa contains this sentence.

> In answer to question twelve, the goods were distributed not only to those on relief but also to practically all farmers, on the basis that many who were not on relief were suffering even more than those who had accepted relief. To the smaller towns and villages supplies were sent on the basis of seventy-five per cent of the population; that is, it was assumed that in the towns and villages twenty-five per cent of the people would not require the supplies.

That is the answer, I think, which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle himself received on the list of questions given.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister any record of the enormous quantities which were given besides those to which he has referred? Added up together from the various parts of Canada, there must have been an enormous number of carloads of gifts, in the form of food as well as clothing, that went in for distribution through the area.

Mr. GARDINER: We had complete statements made up. I am speaking from memory when I say that I think the number that was shipped voluntarily this year was about 1,200 cars.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister might explain why these cars were all billed to Regina. Is that the centre from which the carload lots were distributed?

Mr. McNIVEN: The fish, cheese and beans?

Mr. PERLEY: Well, were not the vegetables shipped there and then transhipped again, rebilled?

Mr. GARDINER: The apples were shipped directly to the point and unloaded there. Of course, they had to move cars from one point to another; there might be a car and a half required at one particular point, and then a half car would go on to the next point. Vegetables were handled in very much the same way. The fruit and vegetables had to be got out before the frost, and were distributed to the local points. In so far as cheese, beans and fish were concerned, it was seldom that a carload of any one of them was required at any one point. Those were shipped to Regina, unloaded and repacked in cars in the quantities required at each point, then reshipped to that point and distributed there.

Mr. PERLEY: The idea I had was that when there were fifty-three carloads of cheese and 101 carloads of fish, they might have been shipped, or some of them, directly to points like Weyburn and Swift Current and there distributed, instead of being unloaded at Regina and reshipped or parcelled. Some of the cheese, I understand, was cut into smaller parcels at Regina. I thought they might have had some system of billing in transit like they have for flour, and so on. Possibly that would have saved freight because local freight would be charged from Regina to other points. A great deal of it could have been shipped to and handled at the larger centres like Weyburn and Swift Current.

Mr. GARDINER: This was all inquired into at the time. The man we had in charge was a gentleman who had previously been in charge of Simpson's mail order business. We secured the assistance, by loan from the Canadian National Railways, of a freight man, and from the Canadian Pacific Railway, of another freight man.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): And special freight rates.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. These officials took charge of the whole administration and distribution. I think it is generally admitted that a very good job was made of the distribution itself.

Mr. PERLEY: How many warehouses, apart from the railway companies' warehouses, were used in Regina for distributing this stuff?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand only one warehouse was used in Regina. I would not be absolutely certain of that, but I think there was only the one.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. PERLEY: No; it is not carried, Mr. Chairman.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Mulock be substituted for that of Mr. Chevrier on the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

That the name of Mr. Chevrier be substituted for that of Mr. Mulock on the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT RATE ON FLOUR

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURE TO BE MADE EFFECTIVE BY RAILWAYS ON JUNE 6

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to make an inquiry of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). Representations have been made to me by certain milling interests in my constituency that on June 6 next the export rate on winter wheat flour is being increased by the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways by approximately 6 cents per barrel. They further say that Australian flour is competing very strongly with our product in the West Indies at present and that in the interests of the wheat producing farmers and millers in Ontario no further handicap should be placed upon their efforts to compete successfully in outside markets. Will the minister kindly take up with the railways the question raised, with a view to having the export rates remain as they are?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I have no knowledge of the proposed increase in rates, but I may say that it is not the function of the minister to take up with the railways matters of rates. I would suggest that whoever made representations to my hon. friend should themselves take up with the railways the matter of export rates.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

DELAY IN DELIVERY OF LOCKHEED TRANSPORT PLANES AND QUESTION OF SALES TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the government, and I am sorry that I was unable to give longer notice of it. Will the government make a statement regarding the alleged delay in the delivery of aeroplanes for the Winnipeg-Toronto-Montreal service on account of the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation of Canada having accepted a contract for the delivery of thirty of their planes to the Japanese government, including several allegedly already commenced for delivery to our service; and will the government assure the house that no licence will be issued for the export of such planes to Japan?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): In reply to my hon. friend's question may I say that Canada does not manufacture planes of the standard transport type. The order for the requirements of Trans-Canada Air Lines was therefore placed in the United States, with the company that manufactures practically all the requirements in that regard for this continent. Our deliveries have been delayed, as I presume all deliveries have been delayed in connection with planes of this type. I have no knowledge that exports to Japan have anything to do with it. However, if they have, it is a matter between the government of the United States and Japan.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LIST OF BRIEFS SUBMITTED TO ROWELL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I ask the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if his department keeps a memorandum of the various briefs submitted to the Rowell commission; and, if so, if it would be possible for him to table to-morrow a list of the briefs submitted to that commission each day since it commenced its work?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Copies of a number of briefs have been sent to the department, but I do not think anything could be tabled—if anything at all could be tabled by the Department of Justice—until the work of the commission is completed.

Mr. POULIOT: I will write to the right hon. gentleman in that regard.

ANTICOSTI ISLAND

PROSPECTIVE SALE TO FOREIGN INTERESTS—STRATEGIC AND DIPLOMATIC CONSIDERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, according to the Montreal Star, at the annual meeting of the Consolidated Paper Corporation the president, Mr. L. J. Belnap, referred to the prospective sale of Anticosti Island to parties in Holland who several months ago had secured an option. Several months ago a group of German technicians had made a careful survey of the island, and it is suspected that this is the group that secured the option. Be that as it may, is it in the general interest that the ownership or control of this island should pass into the control of a foreign company? It would seem that important strategic and diplomatic considerations are involved.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member that the government is aware of the importance of the island from the point of view to which he has made reference, and different departments of the government have been making inquiries concerning the situation. I believe the interests of the country are being fully safeguarded in the matter as it stands at the present time, and the situation will continue to be watched.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Fruit and vegetable products, including grant of $5,000 to the Canadian Horticultural Council, $555,000.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned last night the item had been discussed at considerable length. One is struck by the large proportion of the vote which is allotted to salaries, namely $414,000 odd.

The details of the vote indicate that there are 137 inspectors, and provision for their salaries is made in the item. While one does not desire in any way to curtail or limit reasonable and necessary expenditures for the promotion of agriculture, and while one realizes that distances are great and that there are other circumstances which must be considered, yet it would appear that this is a large number of inspectors for one branch. We hear a great deal in these days about the excessive costs of government, and we hear the charge that there is too much overlapping. In other branches of the Department of Agriculture as well there are many inspectors. Does not the minister think that the efforts of the inspectors in the different branches could be coordinated and some saving effected in this respect? Is it necessary to have this large number of inspectors in one branch? Could not their work be consolidated with that of other inspectors, or could not the inspectors in this branch take on the work of those in other branches?

Travelling expenses must be heavy, and it seems to me that to a certain extent these inspectors must be crossing and recrossing each others' trails. What provinces are undertaking the same kind of work? Is there any duplication or overlapping in the provincial and federal services? How many of the inspectors are assigned to each province, district, or whatever the division is termed? Answers to these questions are important in view of the undoubted and widespread contention that the cost of government is excessive, and that there is duplication and overlapping. I repeat that I do not wish in any way to limit the number of officials who take part in the promotion of the necessary work of the department or who are required to assist in the development of a great industry. But this is not a new subject in the house. Year after year we have heard statements about the very large number of inspectors and the amount of money expended in these services. There is a suggestion of duplication and overlapping, and there would seem to be a necessity for consolidation and economy.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, the question raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) is a proper one. The total estimate for the branch is $555,000. The earnings of inspectors are approximately $125,000, leaving a net amount of about $430,000 voted to cover entire expenses over and above earnings.

There are 42 inspectors in Prince Edward Island, 43 in New Brunswick, 88 in Nova Scotia, 92 in British Columbia and 77 in western Ontario. Those are the sections in which the greater part of the fruit and vegetables are produced. Not all the inspectors are on full time; a considerable number of them are seasonal employees who work only during the season when inspections are being made and the crop is harvested.

The question whether this work can be done more cheaply by preventing overlapping through the use of inspectors from other services is one that might stand some consideration. However, I am sure it will be realized that inspectors who are inspecting fruit would be expected to be familiar with the growing, packing and marketing of fruit. I believe it has been considered by those who have been in charge of the department in days gone by that it is better to have this service performed seasonally by people who are familiar with the industry than to use inspectors who might be employed throughout the year and used for one purpose at one time and for another purpose at another. Which would be the least costly I am not prepared to say at the moment, but I am inclined to think that the best service can be obtained by using men who are familiar with the particular work when they are required.

As far as staff is concerned, the figures do not indicate any great increase in staff for inspection purposes. There were 14 senior fruit and vegetable inspectors last year, and the figure for this year is the same. There were 20 supervising fruit and vegetable inspectors last year, and the figure for this year is 22, an increase of two. There were three fruit and vegetable inspectors, grade 2, last year, and the number is the same this year. There were 13 fruit and vegetable inspectors, grade 1, last year, and 13 this year. There were 82 fruit and vegetable inspectors, grade 1, seasonal, last year, with the same number this year.

Mr. STEWART: There is one part of the minister's answer that suggests further inquiry. What is the reason for the large number of inspectors in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. GARDINER: Principally because of the large production of potatoes and turnips in that province. These products are shipped either to other parts of Canada or to other countries.

Mr. STEWART: Are there any inspectors in Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: There are 77 in western Ontario alone.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. LANDERYOU: Are any new orchards being planted in the various fruit growing areas of Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no pronounced expansion in the planting of fruit trees at the present time, but the usual replacement planting is being carried on.

Mr. BARBER: Would this vote cover inspectors at the experimental farms who deal with the diseases of vegetables and fruits?

Mr. GARDINER: None of this inspection is done through the experimental farms.

Mr. BARBER: But there is some carried on at the experimental farms?

Mr. GARDINER: Only the certified seed potato inspection, and the work having to do with diseases.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): I agree with the minister that this inspection service is very important to the fruit and vegetable industry. The other night the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) referred to the lack of statistics in connection with this industry. If hon. members had proper statistics before them they would appreciate the value of this production. I believe that this industry is worth $150,000,000 to the Dominion of Canada. A grant of $5,000 to the Canadian Horticultural Council is included in this vote. I believe at one time this grant was either $8,000 or $9,000. No other organization of producers covers the country so completely as this one. It is performing a great work, and I submit the minister should consider the granting of more assistance to this organization than is provided for in this item.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just supplement the remarks made by the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) with respect to statistics in connection with the vegetable industry. I dealt with this matter the other night for a moment or two under another item, but I should like to ask the minister at this time if any move has been made recently to provide a complete picture of the entire vegetable industry. If so, could he give us the details?

Mr. GARDINER: The gathering of statistics of this kind is done by the bureau of statistics under the Department of Trade and Commerce. We give them all the assistance we possibly can in that regard. I do not believe there is anything of an exceptional nature under way at the present time.

In reply to the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) I would point out that down to 1931-32 the grant to the horticultural association was $8,000. In 1932-33 the grant was reduced to $5,000, which, with the deduction of ten per cent in effect at that time, made the net grant $4,500. The deduction has been restored and the grant is now $5,000. There was first a ten per cent deduction, then a five per cent deduction and it is now $5,000 even. The matter of giving further assistance has been under consideration, but we did not think it possible to increase the grant this year.

Mr. LANDERYOU: There are certain fruit growing areas in Ontario which have difficulty in marketing their production on account of the lateness of their seasons. Is there any way in which the department assists in the marketing of these fruits that come along so late?

Mr. GARDINER: Some assistance has been given in Ontario, particularly to those sections producing grapes and peaches. This assistance was in the form of advertising last fall when the fruit was coming on with a rush. The provincial authorities cooperated with us in that and I think it is generally recognized that good results were obtained. The fruit was got rid of in great volume and to better advantage than in previous years.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Are there any other areas in Canada that have this difficulty because of the season?

Mr. GARDINER: Every section of Canada has its own peculiar disadvantage in connection with fruit growing. We are so far north that our fruit comes in a little later than the fruits in the United States.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I was not referring particularly to the United States; I was interested in the districts in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: That is where the comparison is made. There is difficulty in Canada because we are so far north and our fruit comes on a little later. Sometimes there is difficulty in getting rid of a large crop, but we pay attention to all parts of Canada equally.

Mr. DAMUDE: I concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) with respect to the inspection of fruit as applying to the Niagara district, which I have the honour to represent. I am pleased to note that the minister has under consideration increasing the grant to the horticultural council, which has done splendid work. The amount of $5,000 is very small to take care of a work which is national in its scope.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): As the committee knows, there are two branches of the service, the fruit and vegetable inspectors, who take care of the inspection of table stock potatoes and fruit shipments and vegetables, and the plant disease investigators, who take care of seed potato inspection. I understand that these two branches of the service are being amalgamated, or are to be administered under the one head, and I should like the minister to give the committee some information as to what the lay-out will be in the future and who will be the head of the branch. I understand that the table stock and fruit and vegetable inspectors have always received higher pay than the members of the other branch of the service. But to my way of thinking a plant disease investigator has to be a very much more competent man, and the head of the service in the different provinces has to be a university graduate who has had years of training for his position. It would seem to me, therefore, that the two branches of the service should be on a par so far as remuneration is concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that there has been a reclassification of the positions concerned, but there is no bringing together of the two services. I understood the objection of my hon. friend was to an amalgamation of these services, but that is not being done. One group is provided for under this vote, and the other group under production.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I have received a number of complaints from fruit growers in the Nelson area of British Columbia against the tremendous cost of shipping their fruit into Alberta. Has the government considered subsidizing in any way the shipments of fruit from that area going into Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a question, of course, whether the people of the Nelson district are any further away from certain sections of Alberta than those of the Okanagan and other fruit growing districts of the province. The government has not considered bonusing the shipment of fruit from that area.

Mr. LANDERYOU: One fruit grower told me that he had shipped fruit from Nelson to New Zealand or Australia and made a little money on it, but on another shipment to Calgary he lost money because the freight was more than the value of the fruit.

Mr. SPENCE: That has always been the case.

Mr. GRAYDON: While we are discussing advertising, which the minister mentioned a few moments ago in connection with the fruits and vegetables of Ontario and other provinces, may I draw his attention to the reported vote by congress during the latter part of 1937 of $2,000,000 for the fruit and vegetable industry and other branches of agriculture in the United States, which I think may have its effects upon Canada so far as the marketing of their products in this country is concerned.

We have been experiencing, as the minister well knows, a great influx of citrus fruits from the United States during the last decade and longer. No matter what we may hear with respect to the matter, I have no doubt at all that these imported citrus fruits do displace some of our home grown fresh fruits. It is very difficult to understand any reasoning to the contrary. We permit the importation of oranges and other types of citrus fruits, and while our consuming population must have them, at the same time I think we should meet that competition by a well-organized advertising campaign in favour of our own fresh fruits and vegetables. I should like the government to give its earnest consideration to a new type of advertising for our fresh fruits and fresh vegetables. There is nothing better in the whole world, from the standpoint either of health or of deliciousness, than our own fresh fruit and vegetables, and they should have an early claim on any government expenditure and in the framing of government policy with respect to advertising. Growers' associations in many parts of the United States have for many years been conducting intensive advertising campaigns for the marketing of citrus fruits in Canada, and I think their efforts should be met without any further delay by a campaign on behalf of our own growers.

As the member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) said, one who has not made a detailed and comprehensive study of the fruit and vegetable industry in Canada is apt to consider it as somewhat of an orphan industry, but actually it is one of our great agricultural industries and is growing rapidly. I trust the minister will consider taking advantage of this opportunity to assist so far as may be possible by dominion grants in the promotion of a great scheme of advertising and marketing of our fresh fruits and fresh vegetables. I make that suggestion to the minister knowing his sympathetic interest, as expressed the other night, with the growers in different parts of Canada, and I should like to have a statement from him as to what he thinks might be done along these lines.

Mr. GARDINER: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to defer my statement until we get to item 12, which has to do with marketing.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I agree with what the hon. member for Peel has just said. I believe in an advertising campaign—

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. GARDINER: Might I then suggest, if my hon. friend agrees with him, that we leave the discussion of that until we reach item 12, which has to do with marketing and advertising?

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not necessarily agree that advertising alone will solve the problem I have in mind, but rather subsidies by the government of the shipment of fruit from British Columbia.

Mr. GARDINER: That has all to do with marketing, Mr. Chairman, and I would ask the hon. member to discusss it on the other item.

Mr. TUSTIN: In the second report on marketing which we received the other day, there is a paragraph on page 10, paragraph 4, which reads as follows:

> The seed of a particularly promising new variety of tomato has been purchased. It has been distributed among canners throughout Canada who have undertaken to have the crop produced and processed under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture.

I would ask the minister what companies have been asked to cooperate in this scheme, and in what parts of the country the demonstration is taking place.

Mr. GARDINER: We purchased a small amount of this seed for investigational purposes, which encouraged others to purchase larger amounts, and there has been a general distribution through the two activities. Much of the work is being carried on by the canners themselves.

Mr. TUSTIN: What companies have the seed which has been purchased by the department, and in what part of the country have these experiments been carried on?

Mr. GARDINER: The department has the seed which has been purchased by the government, and is experimenting with it. The companies are purchasing seed and having it distributed among their customers.

Mr. TUSTIN: Is this experimentation being done by the department at the experimental farms?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. TUSTIN: It says here that the canners are carrying on under supervision of the department.

Mr. GARDINER: The canners are carrying it on jointly, with the seed they purchased, as the result of this experiment which has been arranged by the department.

Mr. TUSTIN: Could the minister give us any idea in what part of the country this experiment has been carried on?

Mr. GARDINER: It is altogether in Ontario. As a matter of fact it is starting this year.

Mr. TUSTIN: I am particularly interested in this item. The minister said a few minutes ago that more canned vegetables and fruits were grown and processed in three provinces, two in the eastern part of the country and one in the west. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent there are more vegetables processed than in any other part of the country. Last year the territory from Napanee, Ontario, on the east, to Peterborough on the west, produced approximately fifty per cent of all the vegetables canned in Canada. Not only that, but approximately fifty per cent of all the exports to foreign countries took place from that territory. There is an abundance of tomatoes grown and processed in those two counties which I represent, and I was deeply interested when I read this item that seed had been purchased. I thought that the department may have looked up the county of Prince Edward, which produces more tomatoes than any other county in Canada and has an ideal soil for their production. If this experiment is to be continued there certainly should be a demonstration lot in that county in order that the canners in that part of the country may benefit by the production of this kind of tomato.

Mr. SENN: I should like to second what the hon. member (Mr. Tustin) has been saying with regard to the new variety of tomato which is being introduced into Canada. The canners themselves, I believe, are alive to the situation. They have been making a study of what is required in the British market, and I believe that it is the small tomato which is most popular there; when it goes into the can it does not break up as our present-day product does. I have an idea that the canners themselves, rather than the Department of Agriculture, are largely responsible for what is being undertaken. However, that is aside from what I wanted to mention to the minister at this time.

The packaging and grading of fruit and vegetables are a very important part of the work of this department. Not only should these products be properly packaged and graded but they should be consistent in quality. Too often we hear that different packs of fruit and vegetables from different orchards and localities, though both graded number one, are not alike in grade and in quality. In my opinion, contrary to what has been said by some hon. members this afternoon, not only have we not too many inspectors but perhaps we have not enough. In regard to the grading of tomatoes, which I understand has been undertaken to a certain extent at the canning factories: when the price spreads commission was investigating certain matters, one of the complaints that were made was that the farmers were not always satisfied with the grade which was given them when they brought their tomatoes in wagon lots and truck loads to the canning factory. I think that arrangements have been made to have government graders at different times and in different places at these factories to see that the grade is properly given, but it would be a good thing if we could have at each of the canning factories where tomatoes are coming in in large lots, just during the canning season, government graders all the time to see that the farmers get the grade to which they are entitled, that they have not to accept the grade which comes from the canning factory owners themselves. Even if it is the fair grade some people may be inclined to think they are not getting a square deal. To make sure that they do, is, I think, in the interest not only of the farmer but also of the canner. I should like to know what the department is doing in this respect. I understand that action is being taken. How far has the work proceeded?

Mr. GARDINER: In so far as the matter of grades is concerned, and some showing a little better classification under the grade than others, all that a government grade can do is set a minimum that each one must reach who gets into that grade; there is no way in which a government can or would desire to prevent someone from classifying above that grade. That is, some persons who are desirous perhaps of reaching a certain market may put a better grade of commodity into a certain pack, and call it No. 1, than another person may put into his, but still the lower pack may be above the minimum of the grade. Of course that depends a good deal on the market which the individual is trying to serve, or, perhaps, the way in which he thinks he can best benefit himself by making the pack.

In connection with the matter of full time inspection in certain plants, the government has been and is prepared to supply government inspectors to plants for full time service, provided the plants are prepared to pay the costs. A certain number of plants are willing to do that. They do not pay the inspectors; they remunerate the government for the cost. The inspector is a government official, paid by the government and not by a company. That has been done and can be done under the system now in operation. But the government has not found it possible—largely because of some of the criticism we have heard, even in the house during these estimates, to the effect that we have too many inspectors on the road now,—to meet the wishes of both groups, those who think we should have enough for full time inspection in all factories, and those who think that we have too many of them going the rounds. We try to compromise by saying that where persons are prepared to meet the expense we are prepared to give the service for full time, otherwise they take the same service as anyone else gets.

Mr. SENN: I am glad to know the department has gone as far as the minister says in furnishing inspectors when they are paid for by the canning factories themselves, but that does not answer the criticism of the farmer. The farmer is the man who thinks he is not being justly treated, and I believe that in justice to the farmer himself something should be done even to make it compulsory that canning factories in their operations, as a condition of getting their licences, should employ government inspectors full time. Not only are they thereby protecting the farmers' interests but they are safeguarding themselves from criticism. I do not believe anybody will criticize a government inspector who is there doing the best work that he can. Frankly speaking, I do not think we have too many inspectors engaged in the grading and inspection of our packaged products. If we are to continue to enter the foreign markets we must put up the best product we can, and that product must be uniform in grade and quality. In spite of what the minister has said about certain shippers who put up products which are above the grade, it seems to me that we should have, particularly for grade 1, the very highest possible quality if we are to compete successfully in the markets of the world, particularly in Great Britain. The minister would be well advised before another fall comes around to make provision that in all these large canning factories and institutions under licence, one of the conditions of getting the licence should be to have a government inspector to look after the grading of the farmers' products.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a feeling among the growers—perhaps in some instances there is not a great deal of justification for it—that there is a lack of cooperation between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of National Revenue as regards the time at which the dumping duties are placed upon various imported fruits and vegetables, particularly vegetables. I think it is only right to bring the matter to the attention of the minister. I do not wish to be unduly critical because I can quite appreciate the difficulties that face both departments. It is my desire to be extremely fair in this connection. As someone has very aptly said, however, with respect to the importation of vegetables, time is of the essence of the whole matter, and a few days' difference in the application of the dumping regulations may mean either success or failure to the Canadian grower. In the main, perhaps, not a great deal of criticism can be offered, but this year certain complaints did reach me as representative of one of the great vegetable-growing sections of central Ontario that the dumping duty on asparagus was perhaps a little late going on. I want to pass that complaint on to the minister, because from now on I think there should be a more careful survey of the production end of the industry and a note made of the exact time when the crop is ready for marketing here.

I repeat, I do not wish to be particularly critical of these two departments, but I want to voice the feeling that I have heard on many occasions and to point out to the minister how very essential it is that the dumping duties be applied at the right time and not seven or eight days too late, as some have suggested that, in certain instances in the past, they have been. I should like the minister to assure the committee that steps will be taken to see that no recurrence of this sort of criticism will be possible in the future.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): Before the minister replies to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) I would ask him to look carefully over the applications made during the past three years and compare them with those of the previous five years. If he does so he will find that there has been wonderful cooperation between the two departments mentioned in order to achieve the results that we have seen in the past three years.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not expect my remarks to bring the hon. member to his feet quite so quickly, though I know what a great interest he takes in the growers there. I hasten to assure the minister that I was not attempting to compare the work of different governments; in fact, I am not interested in any such comparison, no matter how good either of them may have been in their time. I am simply trying as a humble representative of a vegetable growing section to see that the minister takes proper steps to safeguard the interests of the growers in the future. What I am interested in is the future, not the past.

Mr. GARDINER: The question under discussion is really one for the Department of National Revenue. The dumping duties are put on through that department and the dates are finally determined by them. They simply seek information from our inspectors who are about the country and act upon it as they see fit. I may tell the hon. gentleman that there is the closest cooperation between the two departments.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am glad to have that assurance from the minister, because my criticism was directed largely towards safeguarding the future of the industry itself.

Another matter to which I wish to call the minister's attention is the purchase of vegetables for shipment to western Canada last fall. In bringing this matter up I have no animus towards any part of Ontario, but I would point out that there were some districts that seemed to receive a little more attention from the government's purchasing department than others. Perhaps there is a very good reason for this, but in any event when the vegetables were purchased in the latter part of September last I looked into the distribution of them. I was interested to know just how the purchases were made up. I found that during that time there were shipped from Ontario to the drought-stricken area of western Canada some 267 carloads. That appears in a return to an order of the house dated February 18, 1938 and it may be seen in sessional paper No. 139. The total spent among the vegetable growing districts in Ontario was $56,000. I think it was an excellent idea to relieve the congested areas as far as possible of surplus vegetables which we had in various parts of the province at that time. No one will attempt to criticize that. Moreover, the scheme of transporting these surplus vegetables and utilizing them for the benefit of western Canada, which was in such an unfortunate condition, is one that can be highly commended, though the distribution of the purchases is not equally commendable. For instance, in the purchases, from the Holland marsh area there were 69 carloads, and from the county of Peel there were only four carloads.

I can assure the committee that this comparison does not in any way indicate the respective characteristics of the two counties from the standpoint of their ability to produce vegetables. I quite realize, as I presume everyone else does, the plight of the people in the Holland marsh district. I do not intend to suggest that there was discrimination, but I do suggest that the minister might have done quite a lot better for the county of Peel and still perhaps have kept up his good work on behalf of the Holland marsh district, because in the county of York, outside the Holland marsh area, eighteen carloads were taken on that occasion, as compared with four from the county of Peel. The county I represent—I believe my figures are correct—is either third or fourth in the production of vegetables in Ontario. I hope that we shall never be faced with the same unfortunate situation again, but I would ask the minister to give the county of Peel a little better treatment than he did last fall and, should it be necessary to make similar purchases, to see that they are made on a basis more equitable to our growers. I offer this criticism only for the purpose of calling the minister's attention to the difference in the number of carloads that were purchased. Perhaps the minister has a suitable explanation. If so, I shall be glad to hear from him.

Mr. MULOCK: My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Graydon) does not entirely approve of the number of cars of vegetables bought in the Holland marsh district. There was a very large production of vegetables in that district, and I believe that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) will substantiate that statement. The people there were having difficulty in getting rid of their vegetables at a price that would give them any profit after paying their costs of production. I entirely disagree with the hon. member for Peel on this point and I want to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture not only on the scheme he put into effect but on the way it was carried out and on the cooperation the growers in that district received from the officials of his department. I also congratulate the department upon having purchased direct from the growers instead of dealing through any middlemen, thus ensuring to the producer the full results of his labour. On behalf of the vegetable growers of Holland Landing I want to express our appreciation of the kindness and efficiency of the department in connection with this service.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) said he was glad these vegetables were bought from the individual growers of Holland Landing. I am not opposing the purchase of these vegetables, because if they had not been purchased by the government the growers would have received nothing at all for their stuff; it was simply rotting away, and it was a godsend for Holland Landing and my good friend from York North that this did happen. But I notice that the Toronto papers gave credit to the hon. member and to the member of the local legislature for having influenced the minister in order to get him to come there and buy the stuff in Holland Landing. And I should like to ask the minister if he did pay the individual farmers for their stuff, or if he did not appoint an agent to buy the stuff for him. What is the use of making statements like that? No government would go around the country paying individual farmers for the stuff they put in the cars; it is always done through an agent.

I am not going to condemn this government for the wrong things they have done any more than I would condemn any other government, but in the past the governments have not put on the seasonal tariff soon enough or have taken it off too soon. The hon. member for Peel has said that previously the government removed the embargo or seasonal tariff on asparagus too soon or did not take it off soon enough; our own stuff was coming on the market and the influx of American vegetables was ruining the price. That has happened every year, no matter what government has been in power. You go to the Department of Agriculture and they say the Department of National Revenue puts on or takes off the tariff or embargo. You go to the Department of National Revenue and they say, "We do not do it; we do as we are told by the Department of Agriculture." Then you go back to the Department of Agriculture and they say, "We take our information from the horticultural council," and there is no responsibility anywhere. That is the whole trouble; there is no one who knows his job, either in this department, in the horticultural council or in the Department of National Revenue; there is no one to say when the seasonal tariff should be either put on or taken off, and they never listen to anyone who does know anything about it.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) mentioned the fact that we had 137 fruit and vegetable inspectors. Then the Minister of Agriculture comes along and says there are 42 inspectors in Prince Edward Island, 88 in Nova Scotia, 43 in New Brunswick, 92 in British Columbia and 77 in Ontario. Can anyone tell me what justification there is for having 42 inspectors in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. GARDINER: Just part time.

Mr. SPENCE: They are just chasing each other around the island, that is all, doing nothing at all. I am just as fond of Prince Edward Island as anyone else, and the growers there are to be congratulated because they need practically no inspectors at all. Their packing and grading are so perfect that they have made markets for themselves in all parts of the world, and as long as they continue to pack and grade in this way they will never lose those markets. I think 14 inspectors would be sufficient for the whole island. Then you have 43 inspectors in New Brunswick. What do they inspect? You have 88 inspectors in Nova Scotia. What is there but a few apples down in the Annapolis valley? I will say they need some inspectors to watch them, because as yet they have not learned to pack an honest package. They need a little education there in regard to packing. Some hon. members may differ with me, but I know what I am talking about. I have shipped their products to the old country, and the result was not as good as it might have been; it was not very satisfactory. Nova Scotia has 88 inspectors. Can anyone say that 88 inspectors are justified there? What can they be doing?

In British Columbia there are 92 inspectors, and there they grow a great many commodities that are not produced in the other provinces. But they have learned a little more honesty in the last few years than was formerly the case. I can remember when it was difficult to get anything honest from British Columbia, but to-day their apples, tomatoes and many other products are coming in honestly packed, and reflecting credit upon the country. To-day their apples are taking the place of apples from Oregon and Washington in the United States because of their honest packing, but they were forced to do it; they could not get a market until they did. You cannot make farmers honest; if they do not want to be honest the inspectors cannot force them to be, and no one can find a market except by shipping an honest package, it does not matter how many inspectors you have on the job. Then you have only 77 inspectors for Ontario, a province which I think grows more fruit and vegetables than any other province in Canada.

Mr. McIVOR: They do not need to be watched.

Mr. SPENCE: No; the packing situation in Ontario is not very good either. We have had a great deal of nonsense in Ontario, but I must say that the packing of the fruit growers in Ontario has improved wonderfully in recent years. They are putting up splendid, honest packages of peaches and other commodities in the Niagara district, which are satisfying the public, but they did not do that until they were forced to it.

Mr. MULOCK: How about apples?

Mr. SPENCE: They are not so well graded in Ontario as in British Columbia; they are more on a par with Nova Scotia. I could mention individuals who have large orchards in Ontario who are grading splendidly, but I am sorry to say that does not apply to the whole province. They do not believe in grading; for instance, you cannot get Ontario to grade potatoes at all. Some two or three years ago the county of Simcoe tried to force the potato growers to grade their potatoes and stamp them showing that they came from that county, but the attempt was not very successful. My hon. friend from Peel thinks his county is the best in the country; it is a very good county, and I know it very well. They grow a large quantity of good stuff, but they also grow some bad stuff. They have some honest packers and some who are not so good. The situation in regard to the grading of potatoes in Ontario is a crime. If in Ontario potatoes were graded as they are in Prince Edward Island, properly inspected and properly graded; if the best commercial grades were planted, as in Prince Edward Island, Irish cobblers and green mountains, they would keep Prince Edward Island potatoes out of Ontario entirely. In place of that last winter I saw Prince Edward Island potatoes selling for $1 and $1.10 a bag, while Ontario potatoes were selling for 50 cents. The bad condition has been drawn to the attention of the potato growers again and again, but they shovel everything into the bags—potatoes broken at the ends; potatoes broken by the implements used to dig them up; small ones and large ones, hollow ones and everything else. What we need is a little education along this line in Ontario, and I hope we will get it.

Then you start the marketing board, at great cost to the country. I hate to talk about that, because it was the biggest mess ever started in this country. How could a bunch of young fellows, without any experience whatever, knowing nothing about ports throughout the country, not knowing where to find a market for anything, come into the department and expect to market successfully our product as against men who have had twenty-five, thirty-five and forty years of experience? Yet the advice the minister gets is all from young, innocent kids around the department who know nothing about it. Then you bring a professor from the college at Kingston—no, I did not say the penitentiary—and make him deputy minister. He may be the most able man in the world; he must be very highly educated and all that, but still he lacks the experience he needs for the marketing of anything, no matter what it is. It is a pity the government interferes so much in business. That is what is ruining the United States to-day. That is what is ruining this country, and what is making conditions so bad. We are interfering too much with business people. To-day there is no encouragement for a man with means at his disposal to put it into anything because he is afraid of the government stealing it from him. We could restore this country to a normal condition much faster if we kept our hands out of other people's business, and gave some encouragement to the man who has money to invest. He feels now that if he makes an investment we will steal it from him.

But I am getting away from the subject of fruit and vegetables. When I say there are too many inspectors of all kinds I could go on to a discussion of entomology, and refer to a bunch of fellows who are going around the country picking up bugs here and there off nursery stock received from foreign countries, and particularly from Holland. The shippers in Holland are as particular to-day as are the people in Canada—I believe they are even more particular. Their only market is their export market. They have to be very sure that the stuff is properly inspected, and it is carefully watched before it comes here. Yet we have an army of inspectors who go all over Canada making inspection. They will pick up an evergreen and stand for half an hour turning a leaf back and forth looking for a bug, but they would not find one in fifty years. I have been importing stuff from Holland for twenty years, including evergreens, fancy trees and shrubs of all kinds, and yet I have never had trouble with them. The insects are killed by fumigation. In Holland everything that is exported is fumigated. Even the moss which is packed around the roots is fumigated and sterilized. They cannot afford to lose their market, and if they did not pack properly they would lose it.

These inspectors are decent fellows, and one could not say an unkind word to any of them. They always have a kind answer for one. In that respect they are like the secretary of the civil service commission. You can write to him a thousand times and you will get a thousand letters back, each letter increasing in length. First you will get half a page, next almost a whole page and then you will get three pages. They are the most complete business letters you ever saw, but if you ever got anything out of them in your life I never did. The Department of Agriculture is the same.

Then, there is other extravagance in the Department of Agriculture. The minister must know more about it than he professes to know. To my mind he is not stupid; in fact I think he is alert. If he were managing a job for himself he would make more examinations than he is making. He accepts all these increases in salary, increases amounting to $28,000. This country is no more prosperous to-day than it was ten years ago; people are no better off. How much money have you in your pocket to-day? What did you have ten years ago? Yet we have all these increases. Why should we have the increases? It is a pity the government do not economize and carry on their business in a businesslike fashion. I am not condemning any individual minister. But I will guarantee that if they were placed in a business of their own they would not manage it the way they manage the business of the country.

I have asked the minister if the department dealt with individual farmers when it bought stuff at Holland Landing, or did it appoint an agent who bought the stuff or looked it over.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) is going to answer. I shall answer afterwards.

Mr. SPENCE: I know something about it.

Mr. MULOCK: I am sorry if I said anything during my remarks which hurt the hon. member for Parkdale—

Mr. SPENCE: It will not hurt me a bit.

Mr. MULOCK: My understanding of the matter was that the government sent cheques directly to every person from whom they bought; but no doubt the minister will be able to make a statement on that point, and he will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. SPENCE: Who put the price on? Did you? Why did you not engage someone who knew something about values and who could put a fair price on the articles?

Mr. MULOCK: I thought the hon. member was objecting to the government spending the money and using the dominion inspectors.

Mr. SPENCE: I am not criticizing the government for buying the stuff at Holland Landing, because it was a godsend that they did buy it. But you did not need to take so much credit for it—you and the hon. gentleman who represents York North in the local house. You took great care that the papers were full of it so that it would help you out. That kind of stuff is no good, politically.

Mr. GARDINER: The people in the Holland marsh area asked a price which they obtained, one which was a little lower than the prevailing price at the time.

[Mr. Spence.]

Mr. SPENCE: It could be no lower than the prevailing price, because the stuff was worth nothing.

Mr. GARDINER: I quite agree that the stuff would have been worth practically nothing if the government had not taken that great surplus out of the Holland marsh and the district round about.

Mr. SPENCE: That is correct.

Mr. GARDINER: The county of Peel, which is just adjacent, benefited by the fact that the great surplus was taken out. These people themselves suggested a price which appeared to be reasonable to the department, and the department paid it. The cheques went directly to the individuals as they loaded the cars. One man was placed in charge at the cars to take delivery of the vegetables, and to see that they were properly packed. He was provided by the growers themselves, and not by the government. Our inspectors were there to see that the vegetables were of a proper type when put into the cars.

Perhaps this may not be the proper item on which to discuss the matter which has been under debate, but as we have returned from time to time to a discussion of the shipments of fruits, vegetables and other products to the drought area, it might be well if I were to read the full statement with regard to these purchases of commodities, so that everyone may read it in Hansard. It is as follows:

Owing to suffering throughout a large part of Saskatchewan and a portion of eastern Alberta which became most acute in the year 1937, due to continued crop failures, and also owing to the fact that there were large surpluses of foodstuffs in the eastern provinces which promised to glut the market and thus cause distress among the farmers by lack of an opportunity to sell their products or to sell only at ruinous prices, the dominion government decided to purchase certain food supplies and send to the farmers of the stricken areas of the west.

Supplies were purchased under governor general's warrant, P.C. 2422, chiefly in the maritime provinces, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia. By agreement between the federal government and the government of the province of Saskatchewan certain 177 rural municipalities and local improvement districts in the province of Saskatchewan were designated as the areas which had suffered most from the crop failures of the past eight years and hence were entitled to share in this special distribution of food supplies.

Similarly, by agreement between the federal government and the government of the province of Alberta certain 50 rural municipalities and local improvement districts in Alberta were designated to share in this special distribution. The Dominion Department of Agriculture issued instructions as to the allotment of the supplies on the basis of five to a family. The instructions were as follows: 30 pounds of cheese; 33 pounds of beans; 150 pounds of apples; 44 pounds of fish; 100 pounds of turnips and 150 pounds of other vegetables.

These instructions were followed as closely as possible. A total of 285 cars of apples, 142 cars of turnips, 242 cars of cabbage, carrots, parsnips and beets and 220 cars of assorted fish, cheese and beans (these latter 200 cars being reshipped ex Regina after being warehoused and repacked) were shipped to their various destinations by this office.

Population figures for the rural areas and for the incorporated towns and villages were secured through the provincial governments and later checked and verified by the local municipalities. The carloads were broken down to the nearest eighth part to fill the requirements for each municipality or district. The cars of apples and vegetables were spotted direct to their destination. The cars containing fish, cheese and beans were all spotted for Regina where the contents were warehoused, repacked into suitable size for distribution and then reshipped to their ultimate destination. This involved a great deal of warehouse space. At one time as many as sixty-six men were engaged in the task of preparing the fish, cheese and beans for distribution to 73,450 homes.

The weather was favourable, especially during the weeks that the apples and vegetables were being handled. Only two carloads, one a refrigerator car and one a box car, both containing carrots, were partially destroyed by frost. From each of these cars from one-quarter to three-eighths was saved for human consumption, the balance of the two cars being distributed for cattle feed.

Only two cases of demurrage at railway points were reported, both being for one day duration.

Only two complaints were received as to shortage in cars which could be chargeable to the shippers. Particulars of these cases were immediately reported to the Department of Agriculture, Ottawa. Two complaints were also received with regard to the quality of the commodity, one being with respect to two barrels of apples from Nova Scotia and the other that the dried fish was unfit for use. This latter complaint, upon investigation, was found due to the fact that the complainant did not know how to prepare the food for the table. From every municipality and district without exception have come reports of the excellent quality of the supplies furnished.

The recipes sent by the Dominion Department of Agriculture as to the best way of preparing fish, cheese and beans for the table were greatly appreciated and added much to the value of the foodstuffs provided by the government.

The responsibility of distributing the supplies throughout the towns, villages and rural municipalities was placed upon the shoulders of the secretary-treasurers, reeves and councillors and the overseers of the towns. They measured up to a very difficult task and discharged their duties in a fair and efficient manner. No one who had a right to be served was purposely overlooked. It is no small task to divide the contents of 879 carloads of food supplies among 367,250 people over wide and often thinly populated areas to the satisfaction of all. Very few complaints have come in and adjustments were made when found necessary. Special mention should be made of the work of the secretary-treasurers of the rural municipalities. Upon them fell the work of directing the task of distribution. Immediately upon allotment of cars or parts of cars the municipal secretaries were reached by telephone. This was considered in the best interests of distribution since the prairie winter weather was close at hand, and also in order that information should be relayed throughout the districts concerned to insure the quickest possible delivery to the people. It was decided that mailing of instructions was too uncertain since this entire movement of freight was not going on regular schedule but by special trains which were being routed on all lines at all times. Telephoning also ensured that instructions as to forwarding parts of cars from one municipality to another were properly understood and any points regarding any of the work about which officials were in doubt could be fully explained.

The railroads gave the best of service. Special mention should be made of the fine cooperation given by Mr. W. J. Anderson, district freight agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway and by Mr. R. E. Johnston, district freight agent of the Canadian National Railways. They did everything in their power to assist in the smooth working of the plans for speedy distribution.

The supplies sent out by the federal government have been greatly appreciated by the people who received them. We have a large file of letters which have been sent to us from ratepayers' associations, congregations of churches, community clubs and individuals expressing their appreciation and sincere thanks. Frequently the high quality of the foodstuffs is referred to and also the fairness of distribution made by the municipal councils.

I have the costs of distribution down to the date of this report if they are of interest to hon. members.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The statement just read by the minister deals more with relief. He did not say anything more with reference to the purchase of vegetables in the Holland marsh district. Who was in charge in that district?

Mr. GARDINER: A man by the name of Ferguson was in charge of the loading for the growers.

An hon. MEMBER: Howard Ferguson?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think it was Howard Ferguson.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Who acted for the growers? Probably the hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) could tell me.

Mr. MULOCK: I am sorry, but I did not hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Ferguson acted for the growers and Mr. Wheeler, who is here at the moment, and one of our inspectors, acted for the department.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I understood the minister to say that the growers selected one of their own men to represent them.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure where Mr. Ferguson lives, but he represented the growers.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I understood the minister to say that the purchases were made from individual farmers and not from the cooperative organization.

Mr. GARDINER: The purchases were made direct from the individuals. Mr. Ferguson and our inspector tallied everything that was delivered into the cars and the individuals received departmental cheques.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Ferguson is one of the growers?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has just read to us a very detailed statement, and I think it was proper that that statement should have been given at this time. I am not complaining about the manner in which the distribution took place, apart from the complaints I made yesterday in connection with the distribution having been general. I should like to ask the minister if the department made any effort to secure any vegetables last year in the northern part of Saskatchewan. They had a bountiful harvest of vegetables in that part of the province and I understand that certain municipalities offered to collect several carloads for distribution in the southern part. I should like to know also if any effort was made to obtain fish from the northern part of the province. It is well known that the lakes in the north are teeming with fish and there was a part of the season when any fish caught could have been kept frozen. While I am on my feet I may as well ask another question I had in mind. The statement just read by the minister referred to certain demurrage having been paid in Regina. Perhaps this could have been avoided.

The minister also mentioned that Doctor Stapleford had been employed to superintend the distribution. I wonder if it would be possible for him to give the committee the correspondence that took place with Doctor Stapleford in connection with his employment. Earlier in the session we were told that this gentleman was receiving $500 a month and expenses to carry on this work. When the people of Saskatchewan found that out there was considerable criticism. I do not think the public generally knew that this gentleman was receiving that amount for doing this work. For many years Doctor Stapleford had received a salary from Regina college and the church to which he belonged. Later on he was employed by the university. I understand he was then retired on superannuation and had accepted a position as assistant principal of a college in Ontario. I should like to know why it was thought necessary to employ Doctor Stapleford to do this work. I have no doubt that there were 500 people in Saskatchewan who would have done this work voluntarily, or at least for a dollar a day and expenses. The minister has stated that the distribution was made in 177 rural municipalities. The mayors of these municipalities gave of their services freely. The clergy in the towns also gave their services free, and in view of all the work that was done voluntarily I think it was an outrage that this man should have been employed to do the work at that salary. The members of the relief commission under the late government gave their services free. It was managed by Mr. Daniel and consisted of four or five business men, one or two from the city of Regina, one from Moose Jaw, and a farm woman, who also gave her services free except for her expenses while in Regina. The whole commission gave their services practically free except for the expenses they incurred for travelling and the like. Then consider that this work under this government was done by a man who was paid $500 a month! I would like to have the correspondence relating to his appointment, and a statement from the minister as to why it was necessary to employ this man, who was drawing a superannuation allowance, and as well I believe an annuity from the university of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I have here a list of the questions asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) some time ago. They appeared to begin with in the form of a question on the order paper, which was later converted into an order for return, and that return was brought down for the hon. member and gives him all the information he has just asked for. I do not think I should be required to read it all to the committee.

Mr. PERLEY: It does not give the correspondence, or the reason why no one else could have been employed at a lower remuneration.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall answer my hon. friend's question with regard to the person appointed. So far as correspondence is concerned, I do not think there was any correspondence in engaging him. I interviewed him personally in Toronto; later he came to Ottawa where he had another interview. He discussed the matter with officials in the department before going west, and was given full instructions how to proceed. He also discussed with them the matter of purchases at this end.

So far as Doctor Stapleford himself is concerned, many members both in the east and in the west know him personally, and I do not need to make any apologies for him. He is known to leading business men from one end of Canada to the other, and everyone who knows him will acknowledge him to be not only one of the foremost educationalists—one important eastern university has just engaged him for a very important financial task—but also a man who for directing the business side of an institution is one of the best we have in Canada; and he has been recognized as such in all parts of Canada.

The only reason he was leaving Saskatchewan was that the church college, which had been operated in Regina for many years, and is one of the best educational institutions in the western provinces, was taken over by the university of Saskatchewan and is now being operated under the president of that university. The church did not desire to continue with it longer; when it was taken over by the university Doctor Stapleford found that his duties there were not in exact accordance with his desires, and he later was offered the position he now occupies with Victoria university in Toronto. He was a graduate of that institution and was taken back there to do work in connection with the financial side of their set-up.

The churches had been doing a great deal of work on a voluntary basis in connection with the distribution of food sent from eastern Canada to western Canada. On a number of occasions I had had discussions with the head of the United church, the superintendent of missions of the United church, and representatives of other churches in regard to the matter. I discussed with them this particular distribution in its relation to their distribution before we undertook it. Throughout the discussions which took place between those who were interested in the distribution of their own products and myself as interested in the distribution to be made by the Department of Agriculture, we were in agreement that there was no better man in Canada to do the job and no man whose appointment would be more acceptable to the people generally than Doctor Stapleford.

It might be suggested that he should have done this work for a lower salary than was paid him, and there might be some justification for that view were it not for the fact that that was the lesser of the two jobs that he had to do. Doctor Stapleford was asked to take over these duties and see to the co-ordinating of the work of this organization with that of the voluntary organizations, and he was asked at the same time to make a complete report to the government of Canada upon the giving of relief in western Canada dating back as far as governments have been giving relief. When the late government started their relief activities in 1930 or 1931 I venture to say they were in much the same position as that in which we found ourselves when we took over the government in 1935, that no authentic information on relief distribution was to be had anywhere. Unless you searched the files of municipal, provincial and federal departments of government from one end to the other in order to find out, there was no authentic information available upon which to base any action in connection with the handling of relief in these different areas. An expenditure of $8,700,000 was made in 1914-15 alone, and since Doctor Stapleford has been at the task of compiling in one volume all the information with regard to past distributions of relief I have found that in common with every other public speaker who has been delivering addresses in western Canada I have been making misstatements in regard to the distribution of relief. I looked up all the information I could find upon it in certain departments and I gave that information to the public, but when I had the complete information in my hands I found I have been giving some information that was not correct.

I think every member of this committee will agree, since apparently we are going to have these periods of drought in western Canada, that it is essential that we should have available an authentic report of what has taken place in the distribution of relief from away back in the eighties down to the present, so that the information may be available when one of these difficult periods recurs. Doctor Stapleford has performed that task. He has placed in the hands of the government a complete report in so far as it could be found in the records of departments and of governments either at Ottawa or in western Canada, of all the activities of municipal, provincial and federal governments and relief organizations, voluntary and otherwise, in regard to the handling of the problem particularly of giving direct relief to the people of western Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask if that report is available?

Mr. GARDINER: I have read the report myself and it is being read by officials of the department. It is not available in printed form at the present time, and it has not yet been determined whether it will be printed.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could mimeographed copies be provided for the members of this house?

Mr. GARDINER: Not at the moment. It has just been turned over to us in the last week or so.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could that be done some time?

Mr. GARDINER: I think eventually, yes, but I have yet to bring before the government what we shall finally do with the report. But it has been compiled. It gives maps of the different areas, and the different amounts expended by different governments. All this information has been compiled in one volume, which will be available to those who have to do this job in the future, whether five or ten years from now or at some other time. That was the task Doctor Stapleford was really paid for at the time he was engaged to do the work. He was not certain what his future activities were going to be, and it was expected he would take until June or July of this year to complete the work. Some time during the winter Victoria college was very anxious to have him take over the duties which they had offered him previously and they suggested that they desired him to take them over on, I believe, the first of April. He was anxious to wind up the work by that time, and we engaged an assistant for him, at about half the amount he was obtaining himself, to act with him during the last six weeks of his activities in order to wind up the work by the end of March. That report has been made. all of which is part of the work done by Doctor Stapleford.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister answer the first two questions, with respect to the purchase of vegetables and fish?

Mr. GARDINER: In so far as the purchase of vegetables in western Canada is concerned, I believe we purchased about thirty-nine cars, mostly in Manitoba, a few in Alberta, and I am not sure that a few were not purchased in Saskatchewan, but they were very few. The first reason why we bought so few in Saskatchewan is that there were not many vegetables in that province. We had almost the most complete crop failure in Saskatchewan last year that we ever had; and while we speak of the 170 municipalities referred to as the "hundred per cent drought area," it does not by any means cover the whole drought area of the province in that year. The drought area extended right up into the northern section, and though certain municipalities had a surplus of vegetables, it also happened that alongside of them were municipalities which had to get vegetables. We did not think it fair to go into the northern area where there might be a surplus in a comparatively small district, and compete with some municipality alongside it in purchasing vegetables required by those individuals. In other words the policy was to go into districts where there were surpluses which might be a drug on the market, and purchase them and distribute them in the drought areas.

As far as the fish are concerned, if the desire was only to take fish out of the lakes and freeze them, we probably would not have had to go up into the northern area. My hon. friend knows that the Qu'Appelle lakes, alongside my farm and his own, are full of fish.

Mr. PERLEY: And lots of men there.

Mr. GARDINER: There are, of course, men there who can and do fish, and who fished last year and sold fish as they had done previously. I venture to say that smoked fish—salted cod and that sort of thing—does not enter into competition very actively with fresh fish in areas where fresh fish is easily available, but it nevertheless forms the basis of a diet which is very healthful; and in better times, when these people who last year were eating dried cod and smoked herring for the first time in their lives are looking for some tasty food, they will probably go down to the maritimes to get it. That is one of the reasons we took the action we did.

Mr. PERLEY: I cannot agree altogether with what the minister has said, particularly his statement that there was no authentic information available to the government in respect of relief matters and distribution. The commission which was appointed by the previous government and operated until 1934 had before them everything in great detail with respect to population, the conditions of the population, the condition of the areas, and they had had four years' experience—one or two of them almost, although I admit not quite, as bad as the present.

An hon. MEMBER: They made an awful mess of it.

Mr. PERLEY: That information was available. During that period there was not a single charge against that commission of misappropriation of funds or maladministration in connection with the distribution of relief. When the minister says that Doctor Stapleford was about the only man available in Canada to do this work, I do not think hon. members will be disposed to agree. True enough, he had been principal of Regina college, and no doubt he made a very good job of that. His principal work was to get funds in order to keep the college going. He was an adept at that. I was one who was tapped occasionally for considerable amounts by way of subscription; no doubt the minister was too. When Doctor Stapleford came around it was pretty hard to put him off. I admit he made a success of that kind of work, but I believe there were a great many people in Saskatchewan, men with business experience, who could have done this work at considerably less salary. I should like the minister to tell us just what superannuation he is drawing, also whether he received an annuity from the university or from the government of Saskatchewan when he was retired from the university. I think that the fact that he was drawing these amounts was sufficient, and that he should not have been considered when many other men in Saskatchewan needed the work and could have done it just as well.

Mention has been made of the work that he was carrying on by way of an inquiry. The minister states that his work is completed and the report is in the minister's hands. I think that report should be tabled. I have here a questionnaire that he sent out. It relates to the problems of rural relief; I might say that he distributed it to a great many people in Saskatchewan. All members of parliament, provincial and federal, got copies. The first question is:

> To what extent has the economic distress of the past few years in the rural area of your constituency affected the morale (1) of individuals, (2) of the community as a whole?

Then it goes on:

> To what extent is relief as at present administered breaking down the morale of the recipient of relief?

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure that the hon. member does not want to misrepresent the facts. That was not a questionnaire which went to every person; that was the questionnaire which went to the members. Various questionnaires went to doctors, ministers, members of parliament, school-teachers and so on.

Mr. PERLEY: I was coming to that. I mentioned that it went to both federal and provincial members. I think that when we compare the effect of the distribution of relief upon the morale of the citizens under the present system with what took place in the previous four years, the citizens of Saskatchewan can safely be left to judge the result. I believe that the morale of citizens who have been forced to accept relief under this set-up has been more seriously affected than was that of those who had to accept relief from 1930 to 1934.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to ask the minister if the salt fish was cod fish. Maritime people have told me that some of the fish sent out to western Canada was not cod, and that that was the reason for some of the difficulties, that it was a lower grade fish which they call pollock. I do not think it was pollock such as we knew in the old land, because we did not salt it, but they call it pollock, and some people from the maritimes have told me that that was a cause of dissatisfaction, and that this fish is not cod.

Mr. GARDINER: The list I read last evening answers, I think, the hon. member's question—that we purchased a certain amount of cod at 5½ cents and a certain amount of pollock at 3 to 3¾ cents, and it is acknowledged that pollock is not as good a fish as cod. In the process of distribution an attempt was made to give some of each to each family, but that could not be carried all the way through; it was not possible to give every family exactly the same type of fish. But where one person was given pollock and another cod, it would probably be found that the person who got the pollock had some canned herring and chicken haddock or something of that kind put in as well.

Mr. COLDWELL: The only point is that so far as advertising the fish of the maritimes is concerned, I am afraid it was not very well advertised by the pollock.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the fact that only two complaints came in is a good indication that whatever was sent was pretty well advertised.

Mr. COLDWELL: Probably they did not write in, but I was in the west recently, and I heard some interesting stories and more interesting remarks about the salt fish.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister answer my question with respect to superannuation?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle has asked me about the superannuation which was allowed to Doctor Stapleford. All I can say is that I do not know anything about it.

Mr. PERLEY: That does not answer the second question.

Mr. GARDINER: It answers it as far as I am concerned. I do not think it is any of the business of the government whether Doctor Stapleford is getting a superannuation allowance from some other concern or not. We did not hire him because he was getting superannuation or was not getting it. We hired him because we thought he could do the job.

Mr. DEACHMAN: What progress has been made in developing a market in Canada for sweet cider? I understand that at present there are some shipments of sweet cider to England, and I wondered whether any progress had been made in developing a market at home. I have a pleasant recollection of cider, and I should like to see the market extended. Another question: Has there been any development in Canada in connection with a product called powdered apple? I tried to get some information in this connection, but I could not find anything. Perhaps the minister can tell me something about it.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no literature in Canada which we can find with regard to the powdered apple industry, or the preservation of apples by that means, but inquiries are being made. The process is being experimented with in Germany, but nothing has been done in Canada. As regards sweet cider there has been some activity in the experimental farms branch. I believe it has to do with the same question raised a few moments ago by the hon. member for Peel. I agree with what has been said, that we in Canada could well afford to pay more attention than we have done to advertising with a view to developing our own fruit industry. I see no reason why apple juice in certain forms could not be put on our tables as readily as tomato juice or orange juice or other juices that are consumed. After all, however, it will be found that while the United States as a government, is doing a good deal of advertising of commodities, the main activities were carried out by the people in the industry, the orange people themselves. The activities were carried out by them in the early stages. All that a government can be expected to do is to show the way. Our vote No. 12 for marketing is $200,000 this year as against $350,000 last year, but it should not be regarded as a reduction. It means that for that particular part of the work we have $200,000 as compared with $350,000 last year. This year, part of the $350,000 has been distributed through the reorganization of the department. The $200,000 will compare fairly favourably with even the $2,000,000 voted in the United States when you take into consideration the population in the two countries, and the comparative revenues.

Mr. GRAYDON: In the latter part of 1937 or early in 1938 great sections of the growers of Ontario and other parts of Canada became alarmed over rumours which were then prevalent with regard to changes that were being made in the protection afforded the vegetable and fruit men in the proposed new agreements to be entered into between the United States and Canada. The tariff board in 1933 made certain recommendations in answer to an application from the fruit and vegetable growers of Canada. The findings were, in part, that the applicants had made out a case in favour of preserving for the Canadian producer during his growing season a market in the section of the country which he is able to supply. Since the last changes in the agreement between the United States and Canada, which went into effect on January 1, 1936—I am only speaking from memory in this connection, but I think I am right—the increase in general imports from the United States was 33⅓ per cent, whereas the increase in imported vegetables was something like 53 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: I must call the hon. member to order. The committee is not now discussing the tariff, and I would ask him to confine his remarks to the item under consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: This item has to do with fruit and vegetables, and I thought I might be given a little latitude in order to bring out this point. The fruit and vegetable growers believe that they have already assumed more than their fair share of the burden imposed by the trade agreements, and when the new agreements are finally brought before the government for consideration I trust that the Minister of Agriculture will be very careful to protect the interests of the vegetable growers so that there will be no relaxation in the tariff and no easing up so far as the dumping duties are concerned.

Mr. McGREGOR: There is some question as to procedure in connection with the dumping duties. Who puts on the dumping duties? This is a very important matter, because a good deal depends on the early market. The first goods put on the market always get a good price, and if the dumping duties are not put on at the right time the growers will not get the benefit of that price. The minister might tell us what the procedure is.

Mr. GARDINER: The question is one that could be better discussed under the estimates of the Department of National Revenue. They have much more information than we have. They seek information wherever they can get it. They have their own men out getting information and we have our inspectors, who naturally make reports. The Department of National Revenue before making any decision consults the fruit and vegetable branch of the Department of Agriculture, but that is the department that takes action in pursuance of the information it receives from different sources.

Mr. McGREGOR: Where does the horticultural society come in?

Mr. GARDINER: Officially they do not "come in." They may be consulted like anyone else who is associated with the business. The departments will consult anyone. I have consulted individuals on occasion myself.

Mr. McGREGOR: It has been said that this $5,000 paid to the horticultural society is handed over to their secretary and he makes reports as to when these duties should be put on. Is there any truth in that statement?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no relation between this $5,000 and any reports that may come from the horticultural society. This arrangement has existed for many years; first it was $8,000, later $4,500 and then, because of the return of the ten per cent, it became $5,000. That goes to the horticultural society, which has a secretary. As I understand it, the same gentleman happens to be secretary for the wholesalers of fruit, and naturally they make representations through their secretary to the Department of National Revenue. They may on occasion even write letters to the Department of Agriculture. Like any other organization that is interested in these things they make representations to the different departments concerned, but the departments make their own decisions as to whether or not they will agree with the recommendations.

Mr. McGREGOR: In other words this gentleman gets $5,000 from this government, indirectly, and probably another $5,000 from the other people; he plays both ends against the middle, makes whatever recommendations he wishes, and the government carries them out.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. gentleman is hardly correct in saying that the government makes a grant of $5,000 to the secretary.

Mr. McGREGOR: I did not say that.

Mr. GARDINER: That is about what it amounts to.

Mr. McGREGOR: Let us put it this way: The government pays the horticultural society $5,000 and the society pays him $5,000. Is that plain enough?

Mr. GARDINER: I have no knowledge of what the horticultural society pays him or what the wholesalers pay him. I only know that the same gentleman happens to be secretary of both organizations, because as such he communicates with us from time to time. I presume the organization is quite capable of engaging its own secretary and knowing whether or not he is giving service for the money.

Mr. SENN: I should like to ask the minister a question about containers. A short time ago I was speaking about tomatoes and their grading. The report of the minister for 1937 states that progress is being made towards the standardization of containers for canned fruit and vegetables. That was a very live question when the price spreads commission was investigating certain matters. There appeared to be containers that looked very much alike but which contained entirely different amounts. Could the minister tell us just what progress has been made towards standardization of those containers. It is undoubtedly true that standardization could not be carried out fully in connection with export trade because of the difference in the demands of importing countries in regard to canned goods; containers of the same size would not be suitable for the markets of all countries. But I think it is very important that we should know something of what is being done towards the standardization of containers.

Mr. GARDINER: There has been a great deal of activity in the direction of trying to obtain standard containers for the different types of packs, but that is a matter which concerns international trade to such an extent that we must give some thought to what they are doing elsewhere. There is a bill before the United States congress at present having to do with that matter, and the department here is keeping close check on it with the idea that when we finally do something in this regard it will conform fairly closely to what is being done elsewhere.

Mr. SENN: I should like to ask one more question having to do with the inspection of apples. The Shaw report, so called, among other things has this to say with regard to our shipments of apples to the United Kingdom:

> Complaints regarding the variation in the grading of Canadian apples were without doubt in many cases well founded.

And again:

> Greater care should be taken to assure that the top layer of apples in a barrel is a fair sample of the whole contents.

Evidently that has not been so in the past. Then in his recommendations he states:

> More rigid enforcement of the grading regulations would undoubtedly tend to remove these complaints.

I could mention some other features of the report. As I understand it, the grading and inspection of apples is done at the port, and they are graded only by sample; in fact I understand that only about one sample out of twenty is inspected. It seems to me that more careful inspection of our exports of apples should be maintained, and I would ask the minister just what is contemplated in that direction.

Mr. GARDINER: Ordinarily, of course, the inspection consists of about one in twenty, or about five per cent; but as a matter of fact where there is any doubt about it at all the percentage might be much larger than that; perhaps the greater part might be inspected. That is the practice followed. There will be improvement in that connection as we go along, just as was indicated a few moments ago by the hon. member for Parkdale, who I think agreed in part at least with the gentlemen who wrote the report that there were some grounds for complaint in connection with the packs from certain parts of Canada. That complaint is being looked into, and instructions have been given our men to make more careful checks. It is part also of our activities overseas, as the result of the appointment of a man to represent the department there, to have these packs checked more closely on the other side in order to try to maintain our standard at as high a level as possible.

Mr. SENN: This report also states that American and Canadian apples are sent to the old country at about the same season of the year; that Canadian apples are frequently looked upon by the trade as American, and are sometimes sold as such. Has the department any idea that Canadian apples or the packages containing them might be marked differently so that they could be recognized in the market over there as being Canadian apples, or could any method be devised by which this might be brought about?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been no decision with regard to apples, as to whether or not we will apply the standard mark to them; but that is the whole basis of the standard mark, to have it put on the high standard products in order that they may be identified as Canadian.

Mr. SENN: But that applies only to the container, and once a barrel of apples is opened up the person who buys them in the retail store does not see the container and is not in a position to know whether or not they are Canadian apples. I understand that most of the apples shipped in hampers are wrapped in tissue paper or cellophane or something of the kind; these wrappings at least might bear the word "Canada" so that our apples may be known as such.

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. GARDINER: There is no difficulty about the apples that are wrapped with paper and shipped in boxes; those can be marked just as Sunkist oranges are marked. But with apples packed in barrels, as they are in Nova Scotia, there might be greater difficulty in having that mark appear. One can see from that what might be a standard mark in one place would be difficult to apply in the same way in another place.

Item agreed to.

Live stock and poultry, $537,339.

Mr. LEADER: I notice an increase of approximately $55,000 in this item, which is indicative of the importance of this branch of agriculture. Live stock should be regarded as one of the main factors in successful agriculture. Anyone who has had the experience will substantiate that statement. The breeding, feeding and marketing of live stock is therefore very important.

It seems to me that our domestic market must be given some careful consideration. I have read in the Ottawa papers where dressed beef can be purchased for ten cents a pound. That beef is sold in the market in Ottawa. Then, we notice advertisements in the paper showing that better cuts of meat sell for thirty-five cents per pound. But when one goes to a restaurant he pays $1.50 per pound. In order to assure myself that I was not exaggerating I went to one of the leading butcher shops in Ottawa and asked how much beefsteak a restaurant would serve on an order. The reply was that ordinarily they would serve eight ounces and, in rare cases, ten ounces. When we consult a bill of fare we find we are charged seventy-five cents or eighty cents and sometimes a dollar for a beefsteak, but we are receiving only half a pound. It is for that reason I say that we are being charged at the rate of $1.50 per pound. This matter received consideration by the legislature of Manitoba in the present year when it appointed a special committee to investigate the matter. It might be in order to go farther and ask the dominion parliament to undertake an investigation along similar lines.

Mr. STEWART: What else, for which there is no stated charge, does the hon. member get with the beefsteak?

Mr. LEADER: You get a lot of frills which do not appease your appetite. I would be satisfied with the service I would get with a beefsteak costing fifty cents, because I think that should be the outside price for one.

When I rose to speak I had in mind chiefly the marketing of fresh beef in the old country.

Some time ago I asked the Minister of Agriculture if any investigation had taken place in connection with the placing of fresh killed beef on the British market. I received the answer that in 1921 the Harris Abattoir, which is now connected with Canada Packers, made a trial shipment. I was told, further, that in 1923 the dominion government had made a trial shipment, and that in 1934 the university of Saskatchewan had made one. I have no knowledge as to the outcome of the shipments made by the university of Saskatchewan and the dominion government, but I have a distinct recollection of the matter being discussed in the house in 1922 and 1923 after the trial shipment was made by the Harris Abattoir. The shipment proved that our meat met with satisfaction in the old country market, and it sold on a par with British killed meat, and at a substantial premium over chilled and frozen meat from the Argentine. I wonder why this market has not been developed, and why our great packing institutions have not developed the placing of fresh killed beef on the British market. I do not know the reason, but sometimes I think the fact that the packing industry in Great Britain and on this continent are vitally interested financially in the meat business of the Argentine, and that might be the reason why they have not undertaken to develop the fresh meat trade with the old country. As the trade would be developed, it would displace exports from the Argentine. It seems to me that some government agency must undertake this work if we are going to make any advance.

When we read the report submitted by the committee which was sent overseas we find the project is altogether feasible, and that there is a distinct advantage in undertaking this work. At this point I should like to read to the committee an article written by Miss Cora Hind, agricultural editor of the Winnipeg Free Press. I read the article because Miss Hind is, I believe, one of the greatest authorities on the continent in agricultural matters. It will be remembered that about two years ago she made a tour of different countries in the world, following which tour she submitted a report of her travels, and made particular mention of the possibility of placing fresh killed beef on the British market. The article is headed "British Market is Open for Meat" and is in these words:

> In regard to live stock and the products thereof, I am firmly convinced, after my three months in the Argentine, that Canada, and for that matter Australia and New Zealand, can never successfully and profitably compete with the Argentine in the matter of chilled meat for the British market. In time, and at very considerable expense for sires, Canada could undoubtedly produce the quality but not at the price. Some of the Canadians who scoff at the idea of Canada putting fresh killed, grain finished beef on the London market may be surprised to know how men on the Argentine frigorificos are alive to that possibility and that more than once I was asked as to the likelihood of Canada doing it.
> It might be well for Canada to get busy on this scheme before a generation in England has grown so used to the tender but really rather tasteless Argentinian chilled beef that it will refuse to pay higher prices for Canadian grain finished, fresh killed beef. Doors that may have stood open and inviting for a long time, when never used, have an uncanny habit of closing in the face of those who, long neglecting, suddenly decide to use them.

The question of fresh killed beef on the British market has long since passed the experimental stage, and I am glad indeed the minister has decided to undertake the work. Perhaps it will be done only on a limited scale at the present time. However, if he will develop the market I have no doubt in the world that we have the facilities and the farmers who desire and are able to furnish the finest beef grown in the world. I refer, of course, to grain-fed baby beef.

A few moments ago I said the packing institutions of Canada have had about seventeen years experience in connection with the project, but have not developed the trade. It seems to me the government should step in. My suggestion would be that it should lend assistance to some cooperative society which would place the meat on the British market. The government might build an abattoir, or lend to some other organization at a low rate of interest the money necessary for that purpose. At some point on the Atlantic coast there should be a year-round port from which Canadian beef could be shipped to the British market. Our beef could be placed on refrigerator ships and be delivered in the British butcher shops ready for cutting up. It would have to be hung for a period of ten or twelve days after killing. My belief is that under such arrangements it would arrive in the British market in the pink of condition.

I have mentioned a cooperative society because the other day, when speaking about Danish bacon, the minister said that this product was bred, fed and sold cooperatively. Every hon. member knows that the selling of Danish bacon in the old country market has been most successful. I believe it fetches a premium over any other bacon on that market.

I am deeply interested in the subject, having been engaged in the live stock industry all my life. It was a pity the Canadian government got rid of its merchant marine. The government owned marine service would have taken care of the shipments and would have seemed almost like a gift from Santa Claus. However, those ships have been scrapped, but they might have been used in conjunction with our Canadian National railways to carry our beef to market. Despite this handicap, we should go forward in the development of the fresh beef market. I have said more than I intended to say, but I am really interested in this work and I should like the minister to tell the committee what steps have been taken or what advance has been achieved in connection with supplying fresh killed beef to the British market.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member has just referred to the activities in connection with supplying fresh killed beef to the British market. He stated that he was familiar with the experiment carried on by the Harris Abattoir some years ago. I happen to be familiar with the experiment carried on by the university of Saskatchewan a comparatively few years ago. On that occasion the present director of marketing in the Department of Agriculture was in charge of the agricultural college at the university in Saskatoon. He was really responsible for the experiment that was carried on. That experiment consisted of choosing seventy-five steers. I believe those steers were first on the Matador ranch in Saskatchewan and then they were finished with grain. Twenty-five were killed in Saskatoon and shipped directly to the old country to be sold on the Smithfield market. Twenty-five were shipped to Montreal, killed in an abattoir there and the meat shipped in cold storage to the Smithfield market. The other twenty-five were shipped on foot to Birkenhead, where they were slaughtered and the meat sent to the Smithfield market.

There are certain difficulties to be overcome in undertaking an experiment of this kind. The Canadian railways have no refrigerator cars capable of carrying beef in sides, as it is desired in the old country. Therefore, the meat had to be hung in a way in which it should not be hung in shipping it from Saskatoon to Montreal. The refrigerator cars available in this country have been constructed for the purpose of carrying any commodity that requires cold storage, and it was found that the beef was not heated evenly at the top and bottom of the car. When the meat reached Montreal it had to be handled under the conditions I described the other day in connection with bacon. It had to be taken from the refrigerator cars and moved across the wharf, sometimes in great heat, then put into the hold of the boat and taken across the Atlantic. It just happened that when this meat reached the other side the conditions on the Smithfield market were not right for the marketing of it at the end of the week, and it was thought advisable to hold the beef over until Monday, if I remember rightly. That necessitated opening up the hold to take out all the other commodities and then closing it up again and putting the Canadian beef back into storage for another two days. The result was that the beef which had been killed in Saskatoon had undergone about as trying a trip as beef could be expected to undergo. That which was shipped from Montreal encountered conditions a little less difficult. The beef shipped on foot and killed at Birkenhead demonstrated that this was the most efficient manner of placing this product upon that market under the conditions prevailing and with the facilities existing between Saskatoon and London.

My memory of what happened is that the Canadian beef slaughtered at Birkenhead sold at prices which compared very favourably with the best Scottish beef. The beef which was killed in Montreal sold at a little lower price, and that which was killed in Saskatoon sold at a still lower price. My memory is that the beef killed in Montreal sold to better advantage than Argentine chilled beef and demonstrated that beef shipped under those conditions, or under the slightly improved conditions possible to-day, can be sold to advantage as against Argentine beef.

Mr. SENN: Was the beef that was slaughtered in Montreal sold at a price sufficiently higher to pay the freight from the west, and was the beef slaughtered in England sold at a price sufficiently higher to pay the ocean freight, which I understand is $15?

Mr. GARDINER: The beef shipped on foot and slaughtered in England returned the best price to the individual on this side. The beef slaughtered in Montreal brought the next best return to the individual on this side. The beef killed in Saskatoon brought the lowest return to the individual on this side. With the facilities available it would appear that it would be better to ship the beef on foot. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) is advocating that a change should be made in the conditions; but, as was indicated the other day, we are carrying on experiments in the hope of providing better facilities, either at Montreal or at some other point, for the transference of beef killed in Canada to ships. All I can say is that the Argentine trade in beef has been developed over a long term of years. The first thing they did was to provide for careful breeding, and that country has some of the best beef stock to be found anywhere in the world. Another point in their favour is the fact that most of their stock is comparatively near to the seaboard. My understanding is that it is all slaughtered on the wharves and that there is no change in temperature from the time of cooling following killing to the placing on the ships. They have also developed ships which are used only for the carrying of beef, and in which the temperature is constant.

We could ship beef from this country to England to be sold as fresh killed beef. I understand that on the British market beef is considered as fresh killed if it has been slaughtered within ten days. My understanding is that it takes a month to deliver Argentine beef to the British market, and therefore it is shipped in chilled form. We can ship ours as fresh killed beef and sell it in competition with other fresh beef on the British market. However, to do this, facilities must be provided on our wharves and boats must be specially constructed to handle this fresh meat. We would have to use all the space provided in the boat for this purpose.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Is any being shipped now?

Mr. GARDINER: We are arranging to ship limited amounts.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How much?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact amount. We have entered into an arrangement with the packers to carry out this experiment for us and to undertake shipments to the old country markets for a period of twelve months.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Where will that beef be killed?

Mr. GARDINER: Mostly in Toronto.

Mr. SENN: In carrying out this experiment is consideration being given to the pluck and offal? These are important items in considering the return from an animal. There is a return from the heart and liver and things like that, and the other offal which may be used for fertilizer and other purposes.

Mr. GARDINER: Every part of the animal will be accounted for. The liver and offal will not be shipped to the old country. It will be used on this side.

Mr. SENN: It will be in the returns?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. LEADER: My idea is that these cattle should be killed, not in Toronto, but at the Atlantic seaboard. We can raise all kinds of first-class feeder cattle in western Canada, and are glad to sell them at the market price, and I am sure that the maritimers would gladly buy them at the market price. If these feeder cattle were slaughtered at the seaboard, the maritimers could fatten them down there, and the fresh killed beef would arrive in the old country at the very lowest possible cost of production. But if they are killed in Toronto, you have to have refrigerator cars to ship them to the seaboard, and transportation costs are greater. We have fooled with this thing long enough. If you are going to make an honest-to-goodness attempt to put fresh killed beef on the British market, then take the best method you can find, something like that used in the Argentine, slaughter the cattle at the seaboard and place it on the market in the shortest possible time. If we adopt the best possible methods, we might be able to win our way with fresh killed beef into the British market.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Why was Toronto selected?

Mr. GARDINER: The facilities at the seaboard are not as desired by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, and again Toronto is the one market where you have the greatest number from which to make your selection of high grade beef. That is the condition at present. All factors that enter into cost can be determined. The cost of shipping from Montreal or Toronto, the difference between the cost of shipping live cattle and the dead animal—all these differences will figure in the cost and can be determined.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It is in the nature of an experiment?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and I do not think it would be advisable for the government or anyone else to enter into the enormous expense involved in building an abattoir at, say Saint John, and putting in the equipment necessary to handle the beef like they do in the Argentine, with a complete line of boats, or even only one boat, to carry on an experiment of this kind. All we can do is to say that we are carrying on the experiment under the most difficult conditions one can possibly prescribe, and if we can succeed under those conditions we could succeed much better if we had better facilities. These facilities might then be provided by private capital. That is the way in which it is done in the Argentine. It is not done by the government there, but three companies do the business largely, one being Swifts and another an English organization. They handle the beef direct from the Argentine to Great Britain.

As to what will develop out of the experiment, that will depend upon what has been accomplished when it has been completed and upon the attitude of private interests as to whether they want to go into a business of that kind.

Mr. THOMPSON: Will there always be sufficient cargo space to take these carcases across? There has been great difficulty in getting boat space for the shipment of live cattle. The difficulty might be overcome if we had the assurance that there would always be sufficient refrigerator space in the vessels to take the fresh killed beef across.

Mr. GARDINER: So far as this experiment is concerned, special arrangements are being made covering the whole twelve months, so there will be no difficulty in obtaining space, because the space will be booked and the beef will be put into cold storage weekly throughout the year.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Seeing that the government is paying for the experiment, would it not have been advisable to do as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) has suggested, have the cattle slaughtered at the seaboard and the fresh killed beef shipped from the nearest possible point to the British market? I realize that the experiment may not be profitable in its initial stage, but certainly it would be profitable for this dominion it we could establish a market in the old country for our fresh killed beef. Many people have recognized that for many years, and I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie that the shortest possible route to the British market is the one which should have been taken, and the cattle slaughtered at the seaboard. I realize the volume of the business that is done in the city of Toronto, but there would be advantages from a national standpoint to ship, if at all possible, directly from Halifax or Saint John, or even Montreal, although shipments from Montreal would take a day or two longer, and that port could not be used the whole year round. I think the government might well consider the advisability of adopting that suggestion, independently of the extra cost of supplying a smaller quantity. I notice by the minister's report which was given to the house the other day, or perhaps I should say the report of the committee—

Mr. GARDINER: Call it mine.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): After looking at the spectacular page ten I think it should certainly be called the minister's report. Paragraph 3 on page ten states:

> Arrangements have been completed to have a definite quantity of fresh killed beef forwarded weekly to the London market.

Evidently the arrangements have been made and we are now committed to supplying the British market weekly with our fresh killed beef. Toronto is a long way inland, and subject to the handicaps, to which the minister alluded a few moments ago, of its being necessary to change from car to boat during hot weather conditions. All these are difficulties that have been recognized for some years, and I think they are still difficulties in making the test so far inland successful. I do not know whether the facilities at Halifax would be suitable, but I do think that even at some extra expense the department would have been well advised to ship high class beef animals on the hoof to Halifax or Saint John, no matter how few in number, to see if we could not establish for ourselves a market in Britain and meet the demand by a continuous and regular supply of high class beef. Even Montreal would have been much closer than Toronto, and would have avoided the change from car to boat.

I personally commend the effort which the department is making in this regard, and which I think is only in keeping with what might be done in many lines so far as the export of our meat is concerned, but I do think the government would be well justified in spending even more money to carry out the experiment from the closest possible port to secure the British market. It is in keeping with the suggestion I made here the other day with reference to giving assistance in the marketing of live stock products. Some have said that this is unsound; but I have observed in the old land, in the very market in which we are endeavouring to sell our farm products, they have their bacon development board, and indirectly or almost directly they are giving assistance, even what might be called subsidies, to make up the difference between the market price and the fixed price. I think there would be very little criticism throughout the dominion if the government spent a considerably larger sum to develop this trade, which I believe could be developed more efficiently if we chose the shortest possible route and shipped the beef from the nearest possible point to the British market.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I realize the difficulties on account of lack of facilities at the seaboard, but I should like the minister to explain the advantages in shipping the beef dressed over shipping cattle on the hoof as we do now.

Mr. GARDINER: The great difficulty, of course, in maintaining our British market has been to maintain a continuous supply in that market. In shipping the beef on foot as we have been doing, there seems to be a tendency on the part of our people, whether it is the producer or those who are handling cattle, to direct shipments for a time, say to the Chicago market, because temporarily the price is a little better there; then, when there appears to be a little better price from the British market they direct our live cattle there, with the result that we find ourselves left, as we were for a few weeks last winter, in a position where it is difficult to find any market at all. We believe that if we could develop a continuous market in the old country, it would be to the advantage of our cattle people to do so. At the moment we are experimenting to convince ourselves one way or the other on the facts; we think at the moment that if we had facilities established along the route to have our cattle slaughtered on this side and shipped across in substantial amounts, and had the facilities to handle them, we could satisfy the old country market and keep it to better advantage than we are doing, and under those circumstances we hope we shall get a price which will warrant our producers in keeping our cattle in that market.

The matter of facilities is not the only problem which has to be dealt with. If it were merely a case of slaughtering cattle in connection with the experiment at Saint John, and knowing we could always do that to advantage, we might conduct the experiment entirely from Saint John. But if we are to continue to gather our cattle at the centres where we have gathered them in the past, Toronto will need to be given consideration, because the greatest volume of our best cattle comes to the Toronto market, and unless strong reasons could be supplied for an individual taking them to some point further east they would continue to go to Toronto, and under certain conditions might find their way back as far as the Buffalo or Chicago market when we might prefer to see them going to Britain. That is the reason for including Toronto for the time being in the experiment, whatever the result of it may be.

As far as the production of the cattle themselves is concerned, I stated to the house last year and, I think, in the preceding year, that we were hopeful of developing some plan of inducing the movement of many of our young cattle from areas in western Canada where we cannot maintain them. We can breed the very best of cattle and bring them up to a year or eighteen months under conditions which keep them in the very best possible health and produce the very best kind of feeder, but in many seasons we have not the feed with which to finish the cattle. We have been attempting to develop a natural movement of cattle from the west towards the east, to be fed on grass and in stalls in the eastern part of Canada and moved in the end to what we consider one of our natural markets, namely the British market. At the moment we are trying to associate the construction of community pastures in western Canada with that policy. We are organizing those pastures in areas where some attention has already been given to the breeding of live stock, largely through the fact that they are in natural ranching areas, and we are hopeful of having a policy in connection with breeding, especially in relation to pastures which have an acreage of twenty to one hundred thousand acres, that will bring out of those pastures a common type of stock. It can be said then to any community in eastern Canada, "Well, if you want to obtain the very best type of shorthorn feeders—or whiteface feeders, or the type my hon. friend is interested in, Aberdeen-Angus feeders—there are certain of those areas where that is the type which is bred, and by sending there you can get that type of cattle. Even without going for them, you can get so many carloads of that particular type of cattle shipped down to your area." We are hopeful, through the development of that policy over a term of years, that we can accomplish what they have accomplished in the Argentine because of their close proximity to the sea; we can get those cattle moved eastward and have them down here at a year old; probably they can go on the grass for a year, or they may be stall fed for a winter. If we can induce our friends in the townships of Quebec to feed more beef cattle; if we can persuade our friends in the Saint John valley to feed more beef cattle, and our friends in Nova Scotia to do the same, we can bring cattle down and perhaps in some of those areas they can produce the feed to finish them. If they can not produce feed they can ship it in to better advantage than we in the west, who have not the same facilities in respect of water transport. If our experiment proves successful and we can market fresh killed beef in Britain to advantage, facilities can be provided by cooperative organizations, the government, or private organizations—whoever will take an interest in it—to place that beef on the market in competition with beef coming from the Argentine and elsewhere.

Mr. POTTIER: Could the minister tell us approximately the quantity he has in mind in his reference to definite quantities of fresh killed beef?

Mr. GARDINER: Twenty-five carcases a week constitute the quantity under consideration at the moment.

Mr. POTTIER: And that arrangement is carried on through the government, not by private individuals?

Mr. GARDINER: The arrangements would be carried on through an agreement entered into by the government with any of the private organizations that desire to undertake it. Up to date there are only two that have indicated the desire to do so—Canada Packers and Swifts. But the government only pays any losses that may be incurred. If the beef does sell to advantage after being shipped, in all probability the government will not have to pay anything, but if there are any losses in connection with it the government will pay the losses.

Mr. KINLEY: The minister was in Nova Scotia last year. I think he opened the maritime winter fair in Amherst. Has he anything to say regarding the opportunities of Nova Scotia for raising cattle for the British market? I know my county has fine beef cattle. They tell me that the exhibition at Bridgewater exhibits the finest show of beef cattle that one can see anywhere in eastern Canada. It seems to me Nova Scotia should be able to raise cattle for the British market. We have plenty of pastures, the very best, similar to those in Scotland. The abundance of dew and rain makes the pastures green and the grass grow quickly, and I cannot understand why we cannot in Nova Scotia, with our geographical position, raise cattle which will be acceptable on the British market.

Mr. GARDINER: The natural conditions in Nova Scotia, of course, are favourable, but the fact remains that that province does not produce nearly as many cattle as it might, largely, I suppose, because that market has not been properly developed and the means of getting the cattle there have not been properly developed. But I would point out that, while the conditions in certain parts of Nova Scotia compare favourably with those in Scotland, the Scottish people do not attempt to raise all the cattle they feed. The main part of the industry of producing feeder cattle which we now carry on is in order to supply the Scottish feeder with feeders. When I was in Glasgow two years ago I was talking to a very large feeder who feeds cattle in the vicinity of St. Andrews, Scotland. He said that he had seven farms; that he and his two sons were in the market buying Canadian cattle, and that up to the time I was speaking to him he had bought thirty. I asked him how many Canadian cattle he could take. This was in the month of August. He said, "Between now and November I can take six hundred, if I can get six hundred like the thirty I have just bought," and he said he had not any idea that he would get more than a fraction of that number in the period, by coming down to Glasgow and picking up what he could get.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Would it be impossible to get twenty-five a week of the right quality in the maritime provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure whether it would be possible to get twenty-five a week of the type they want. We want to keep a certain type on the market for one year and then be able to assure the British people that we can produce afterwards a certain number of the same type. By that method it might be possible to induce some one to take an interest in that kind of trade.

Mr. KINLEY: We have good beef cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: The cattle I saw there were as good as one could find anywhere. I saw some later at the royal fair and they took prizes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Seeing that there are good cattle in the maritimes, a small shipment might have been tried from that section, which is close to the British market. The minister has suggested that those who ship the twenty-five head weekly will be reimbursed for any loss, and naturally, if they make a profit, that is their inducement to cooperate with the government. I take it that the government will have a careful inspection made, because it is only under government inspection that any type should be allowed to be exported by the private individual. What I mean is this: If the department is reimbursing the private shipper for any loss that may be sustained, its inspectors should select the carcases that are exported. I assume that will be the procedure.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The department will have a check on that all the way through. In Canada we have established over the years certain methods of marketing and I do not know whether we can change them, but for the time being our cattle are being exported in great numbers from certain points. Our main desire is to determine whether we can set up conditions under which we can constantly divert a certain number of these to the British market. Personally I think we should be sending about 200,000 to the British market, and we should maintain that number. If we could send that number to the British market and the same number to the United States, carefully selecting them from certain sections, it would assist materially in building up our trade. But a constant level must be maintained. As it is one year we ship 6,000, another year 60,000, and if we go ten years back we find that in one year we shipped 100,000 and sometimes 200,000. These variations are such that we cannot say we are maintaining any position in the British market. What we should assure ourselves of is that even with present marketing conditions, with the great bulk of the stock being accumulated at Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg, we can go ahead and compete in the British market. If we can do that, then we shall have conditions under which we can compete to better advantage.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The principle involved in this experimental service in connection with beef cattle is of great importance, and it is one that could be put into effect to great advantage in connection with other lines of exports, particularly animal products. I do hope that the department will see that the quantities we ship are of sufficiently high quality. It would be in the interests of the great bacon industry of Canada if similar precautions were taken to maintain the quality of bacon shipped overseas. We have such an enormous market in Canada that those who are interested in the processing of live stock products here are bidding to the most important market, the one that takes ninety or ninety-five per cent of the product. Only a very small fraction is shipped overseas, and the price which is received for that surplus automatically fixes the price for the large quantity sold in Canada. Sometimes the large quantity sold here automatically in turn increases consumption in Canada, and as it increases consumption I am not sure that the individual processor does not make more money by selling high class products in Canada instead of looking for markets for a high class product overseas, which would automatically increase the price of the article to the farmer here. I suggest that not even bacon or other live stock products should be exported unless precautions are taken to see that a proper standard of inspection is maintained.

I commend the department for the experiment in connection with the shipment of twenty-five weekly, and I suggest that the most careful system of inspection and supervision be carried out, independently of the ability of those who are processing. The integrity of those with whom the department is negotiating need not be questioned; but it is most important and fundamental in order to attain the end aimed at, namely a market for fresh beef overseas, that a system of careful inspection should be carried out. The same principle might very well be followed in connection with bacon and dairy products, and, indeed, practically all live stock products. As I say, the very small percentage that is exported automatically fixes the price for the whole dominion, and it is therefore of the utmost importance that this small percentage should be of high quality. It is only four or five per cent in the case of bacon, and in all animal products it is not ten per cent. It is extremely important that this surplus should be of a high quality which will bring a price that will reflect favourably on the price paid in Canada, which in many places is lower than cost of production.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION AGAINST REFUSAL TO EMPLOY OR DISMISSAL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN TRADE UNIONS

The house resumed from Friday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the criminal code.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): When this bill was before the house some time ago, Mr. Speaker, I indicated, as indeed the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) had stated previously, that the right of workers to form or join trade unions has the full support of this government. There is no difference whatever in that regard between us and the sponsor of this bill. There is in this measure, however, a very definite attempt to secure protection of the right to organize by an amendment to the criminal code, and it is the opinion of the law officers of the Department of Justice that such legislation would be colourable and that the proper means of giving due effect to freedom of association lie within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. In those circumstances, therefore, obviously the government cannot accept legislation which, in the opinion of the law officers of the crown, would be inoperative and invalid.

In this connection I wish to point out that on various occasions the dominion government has affirmed the right of workers to organize in trade unions; but it has always done so in the form of a declaration and has never proceeded by way of a legislative enactment. It may be interesting to members of the house to recall that the first formal declaration of this kind was made in the closing months of the great war. In July of 1918 an order in council was passed which was designed to bring about industrial peace in those difficult years. It was set out in that order in council that it would be in the interests of industrial peace that employers should give full recognition to the right of workers to organize. I should like to quote from the order in council a number of clauses which are pertinent to this discussion:

1. That there should be no strike or lockout during the war.

2. That all employees have the right to organize in trade unions, and this right shall not be denied or interfered with in any manner whatsoever, and through their chosen representatives should be permitted and encouraged to negotiate with employers concerning working conditions, rates of pay, or other grievances.

3. That employers shall have the right to organize in associations of groups, and this right shall not be denied or interfered with by workers in any manner whatsoever.

4. That employers should not discharge or refuse to employ workers merely by reason of membership in trade unions or for legitimate trade union activities outside working hours.

5. That workers in the exercise of their right to organize shall use neither coercion nor intimidation of any kind to influence any person to join their organizations or employers to bargain or deal therewith.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under what government was that?

Mr. ROGERS: That was in 1918, so it would be the union government of that day. The order in council is dated July 11, 1918.

Mr. STEVENS: Was that order in council passed under authority of the War Measures Act?

Mr. ROGERS: I know that at the close of the war a number of the provisions of the order in council were rescinded, and that may well have been because the War Measures Act no longer applied; but the provisions to which I have referred were not rescinded, and still remain as a declaration.

Mr. STEVENS: But the point is that if it were passed by virtue of the authority of the War Measures Act it would have the effect of law; otherwise it would be merely a pious declaration. If it were under the War Measures Act, of course it would last only until the War Measures Act was repealed some time later.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. Well, I can say that in the preamble it does not appear that the order in council was passed under the provisions of the War Measures Act.

Mr. LAWSON: Does it not specify the act under the authority of which it was passed?

Mr. ROGERS: No. Perhaps I should quote the preamble:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report dated 9th July, 1918, from the Minister of Labour, representing that industrial unrest during the past few months has become more general than formerly, thus causing serious interruption in some lines of war work, and indications are that it will become more widespread still unless successful efforts be made to check it. This unrest has many causes, among which are the shortage of labour, rapid advance in the cost of many of the necessaries of life, employers denying their workmen the right to organize or to meet them in joint conference to discuss requests for improved conditions or to negotiate adjustments of differences; and in others from too hasty action on the part of working men in ignoring the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and in adopting drastic measures before exhausting every reasonable effort to reach a satisfactory settlement. Wages alleged to be inadequate, together with length of the work day said to be too long, are among other frequent causes of such unrest.

Then it goes on to say:

The minister, therefore, recommends that the governor in council declare the following principles and policies and urge their adoption upon both employers and workmen for the period of the war.

So I think it is quite clear from the form of the preamble that the order in council was designed rather to be a declaration on the part of the government, and was not intended to have legal effect under the War Measures Act. But as I mentioned a moment ago, at the close of the war—

Mr. MacINNIS: What would be the effect of these orders in council? Would they have any legal standing?

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, no. This was really an appeal, with the authority of an order in council, to employers and workmen to observe these principles as laid down for the promotion of industrial peace, and my point is that when the government has dealt with this question in the past it has proceeded by way of declaration and not by way of legislative enactment.

At the close of the war these principles remained in effect as a declaration of the position of the dominion government towards recognition of the right of workers to organize in trade unions, but I have no doubt that on the part of a great many people of this country they were soon forgotten. I suppose it is natural that questions regarding the right to organize and collective bargaining become more acute in a period of increasing prosperity. It is a matter of common knowledge that strikes are more frequent in such periods than during periods of depression. It so happened that shortly after this government came into office a number of strikes did occur, on account of charges that employers had been discriminating against some of their employees who belonged to trade unions. This government received a number of delegations from labour organizations in Canada, all emphasizing the importance of a more general recognition on the part of employers of the right of workers to organize in unions of their choice. When that matter was brought to the attention of this government and particularly to the attention of the Minister of Labour, who has a special interest and responsibility in these matters, the particular question of jurisdiction was referred to the law officers of the Department of Justice. That was in December, 1936. We were advised by the law officers of the Department of Justice that freedom of association was a civil right; that it lay within provincial jurisdiction, and that it was within the power of provincial legislatures to provide the means for a more adequate recognition of the right of workers to organize in trade unions.

In that connection I think I might very well remind the house that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, which had been particularly zealous in pressing this question upon the government, received legal advice, and on the basis of that legal advice had a bill drafted which was sent to all the provincial legislatures. I might quote from a circular letter from the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, addressed to the members of provincial legislative assemblies, and dated February 15, 1937. In that letter there is this paragraph:

> Having secured legal advice we are informed that under the division of legislative powers between the dominion and the provinces the subject matter of this bill falls within the exclusive legislative competence of the provinces.

With that circular letter went this draft bill which was intended to secure, through provincial legislation, more adequate safeguards for workers who desire to form or to join trade unions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister not say that was because of the attitude of the Department of Justice in saying the matter was provincial and not federal?

Mr. ROGERS: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have already stated to the house that on this question being referred to the Department of Justice, the Department of Labour was advised that the jurisdiction lay properly with the provinces. That view was communicated to the officials of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

At the same time there is clearly a suggestion here that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada themselves secured legal advice, and were advised accordingly that they should seek to have their draft bill enacted by provincial legislatures rather than by the dominion parliament. I am sure the hon. member would not for one moment suggest that the law officers of the Department of Justice would not give a proper opinion in this case. They were asked for their opinion upon the case as submitted, knowing full well that the proposal had been made by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada

The opinion as given was communicated to the Trades and Labour Congress. They, I believe, took additional legal advice. Pursuant to that advice they later made representations to the provincial legislatures. I would add further that as a result of their representations to the provincial legislatures statutes have been passed in five provinces which, in effect, do provide additional safeguards for the rights of workers to organize in trade unions. In much of that legislation—and I shall not deal with it in detail because it was referred to previously by the Minister of Justice—there are special safeguards against employers who discriminate against their workmen because of membership or activity in trade unions.

I should like also to point out to the house that this government has at the same time done what it could properly do by declaration and persuasion to bring about, on the part of employers, a more general recognition of the right to organize. On January 1, 1937, as Minister of Labour I issued a statement which had behind it the full approval and endorsement of the government, a statement which referred specifically to the importance, in the interests of industrial peace, of a clear recognition on the part of employers of the right of their workers to organize in trade unions. Perhaps hon. members would permit me to quote briefly from that message:

> In connection with recent strikes in Canada there have been frequent complaints that certain employers have denied to their employees the right of association and have summarily discharged men and women who have been active in the organization of labour unions. It is necessary to state in the clearest terms that the right of association is a civil right, long established by law and usage. It was affirmed with special reference to Canada by an order in council of July 11, 1918 (P.C. 1743). It was proclaimed explicitly in the treaty of Versailles at the close of the world war. To deny the right of workmen to combine in any lawful organization they desire for the promotion of their common welfare is an open invitation to extremists to preach the futility of collective bargaining as an alternative to direct action. The right of association for legitimate purposes should be respected in the national interest and labour should not be denied the means of organizing for collective bargaining. The right of employers to organize for all lawful purposes is not questioned in any quarter. Employers are not entitled in the same breath to protest against governmental regulation of industry and to deny to labour its right to resort to legitimate measures of self-help through voluntary association.

I quote that simply to indicate to the hon. member, if indeed, it is necessary, that there has been no hesitation on the part of this government to do what it properly could to secure a more general acknowledgment of the right of workers to organize in trade unions. During the past two years I have had occasion to repeat that declaration on numerous occasions. May I say further that there have been a number of cases where employers are alleged to have discharged their employees because of their connection with trade union activities. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) referred specifically to a number of these cases when he spoke upon the bill. Whenever such cases have been brought to the attention of the Department of Labour we have done what we could by way of persuasion, and with the full influence of the government behind that persuasion to induce employers to reinstate workmen who have been discharged for such causes. I shall not say to the house that we have been uniformly successful in securing the reinstatement of workers discharged under these circumstances. At the same time I have been agreeably surprised at the attitude of a number of employers who apparently did not realize the fact that in discharging their workmen for such causes they were entrenching upon the freedom of association and were violating a civil right which, after all, is one of those civil rights which make up our heritage of freedom.

I can equally assure the house that this government—and I am not suggesting other governments have not also been active in this respect—will not cease to use its efforts in that direction.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. STEVENS: What recourse has an individual who is discharged and is not taken back?

Mr. ROGERS: The truth of the matter is that prior to the passage of the legislation in the last two years by provincial legislatures, to which I referred a moment ago, there was no recourse. The situation was then very unsatisfactory. I fully agree with the hon. member in that regard. The most that could be done before that legislation was passed was to point out to employers that they had violated a civil right, and that they should take immediate steps to make amends for what they had done. As I have stated, in a very considerable number of cases reinstatements were brought about in that way. Of course, there is always the question as to how one can best encourage and bring about a more general acceptance of freedom of association, and a more general realization of the advantages of collective bargaining.

In supporting the bill the hon. member referred to legislation in other countries and, as I recall it, referred in particular to the Wagner Act passed by the United States congress. It is possible, where jurisdiction has been established, to deal with this matter in a manner which will compel employers to deal with trade unions, and through processes of collective bargaining. In the United States that legislation is of quite recent origin. It has been declared valid by the supreme court, because of the very wide powers conceded to congress through its control of interstate commerce.

In another country, a country from which Canada has inherited the greater part of her tradition, the question has not been dealt with upon the basis of coercion. In Great Britain there is no legislation of the nature of the bill now before the house. Among the employers of Great Britain there has developed over a period of years recognition of the value of collective bargaining. The right to organize, or what we term freedom of association, has been supported by an educated public opinion. I certainly hope that in this country there will be an increasing measure of support for the processes of collective bargaining. To my mind, if you can establish trust and good faith between employers and employees in the conduct of their industrial relations, you have established what is by far the best basis for industrial peace. In other words, it is desirable that these practices should develop, where possible, upon a voluntary basis. That has been the way in which the practice of collective bargaining has developed in Great Britain. I believe there is reason to hope that we are moving more and more in that direction in Canada.

I have no fault whatever to find with my hon. friend for submitting this bill to the house. As a matter of fact, I think he is to be commended for emphasizing the importance of this question. However, I know he will not misunderstand me when I say that in the light of the advice given by the law officers of the Department of Justice it would be in the nature of deception upon those whom my hon. friend is anxious to assist if this government gave its support to legislation which, it is considered, would be invalid and inoperative. I cannot emphasize too strongly the support which I feel should be given to this right to organize. I want to express once more my own conviction that within the last few years there has been a marked improvement on the part of employers in their attitude toward this important question and in their relations with their employees.

Mr. McIVOR: Has this government gone as far as the British North America Act will permit in giving the toiler the right to organize in the union of his choice?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe the answer to that question would be that the right to organize is a civil right. On several occasions the dominion government has gone as far as it could go, under the advice of its law officers in affirming that right and in giving its full support to the freedom of workers to organize in unions.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to observe, from what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) said, that the government has a good deal of sympathy for the proposal now before the house. However, I think the house ought to take a more definite attitude toward this question and not bring in the British North America Act as a sort of excuse for doing nothing. I use the words "sort of excuse," because I feel quite sure that if I were to go to lawyers in this chamber, even to those sitting on the Liberal side, I could get opinions to the effect that this bill is entirely intra vires of the British North America Act. I can remember in 1935 when we had the opinion of the law officers of the crown that certain measures then introduced were within the confines of the British North America Act. However, when they came before the highest court in the empire it was found that the law officers of the crown were not quite correct. The same thing might happen in this particular case.

I have seen lawyers in the courts and other places arguing cases. One lawyer would have in front of him a stack of precedents about two feet high in favour of his side of the case, while the other would have just as high a stack of precedents in the opposite direction. It is the easiest thing in the world for a lawyer to dig up precedents to show why something is either right or wrong.

Mr. LAWSON: You have no idea how hard it is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They charge $100 a day to do it.

Mr. HEAPS: I think it is one of the easiest things in the world to dig up precedents. I shall go so far as to say that it may be a little difficult for some lawyers to dig them up.

Mr. ROGERS: The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada were most active in promoting legislation of this kind, even before this bill was introduced. Does my hon. friend not think they would have satisfied themselves on the legal question before they submitted the draft bill to the provincial legislatures?

Mr. HEAPS: I can deal right away with the question asked by the hon. minister. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada suggested in a circular submitted to the various provincial councils which were affiliated with them, that this matter came within provincial jurisdiction, but I understand that before that circular was sent out they consulted with members of the government. It was probably on the say-so of members of the government that they took the attitude they did. However, I have before me the statement they submitted to the Rowell commission in January, 1938, and from this it would appear that they have had a change of heart on this important question. This is what they submitted to the commission:

> Where social and labour matters are concerned, the effect of the series of judgments of the privy council on the British North America Act has been to declare for provincial jurisdiction with rare exceptions because such subjects were held to be matters of civil rights and hence provincial. Without presuming to question the soundness in law of the decisions, it can be pointed out that the entire course of those judgments might just as well have taken an opposite direction in so far as the opinions of the judicial committee are concerned. We base this statement on two important principles laid down by the privy council itself in dealing with our constitution. The first of these principles was given in a decision of 1896 (the Distillers and Brewers' case) when their lordships stated that they did not doubt "that some matters, in their origin local and provincial, might attain such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the dominion and to justify the Canadian parliament in passing laws for their regulation or abolition in the interests of the dominion." Obviously this means that a matter of civil rights or of a local or private nature in its origin should cease to be reserved exclusively to the provinces when it becomes of such prominence to attain national significance.

I am not a lawyer, but I venture to assert that this particular judgment can be interpreted to mean that the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) comes entirely within the category to which reference is made.

Mr. ROGERS: That judgment would be before the law officers of the Department of Justice when they gave their opinion on this question.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister referred to the submission of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and I was giving this as part of their submission to the Rowell commission, after the circular referred to had been sent out. This indicates clearly that they felt that matters of this kind, which would pertain to the bill now before the house, would come within the scope of that interpretation and, therefore, within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

Again this year, in 1938, the year the Trades and Labour Congress submitted the same request to the dominion government. Let me read it:

> We realize that jurisdiction in these matters rests with the provinces at present, rather than with parliament, and in the past year we have approached the several legislatures seeking protective legislation, with success in some cases. We firmly believe, however, that the dominion parliament also should recognize the rights of the workers to freedom of association and collective bargaining in as far as its jurisdiction extends, by providing suitable penalties for proven cases of interference with those rights.

That is the last word which the Trades and Labour Congress submitted to the cabinet in the early part of this year. Then, in January of this year, as previously mentioned, it submitted to the Rowell commission the following, which is also to be found on page five of its submission:

> The second principle, contained in the decision on the radio case (1932), may be taken either as an extension of the first, or as parallel to it. Lord Dunedin, in giving judgment, had established that the point at issue was given by the act neither to the dominion nor to the provinces. As a residual power, and as a matter essentially national, jurisdiction was declared to rest with the federal authority.

I declare that the matter dealt with in the bill now before us is of such dimensions that it has become federal in its scope and nature and if the federal parliament enacted the legislation I believe it would be difficult to have it declared ultra vires and beyond the powers of parliament under the British North America Act.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. member will permit a question, does he know of any responsible legal opinion which would be contrary to what the Minister of Labour has expressed to be the view of the Department of Justice? I ask that question in all sincerity.

Mr. HEAPS: Really the question would have to be decided by the courts. I have not gone to any lawyers to obtain an opinion on the bill; but personally, from my own reading and having studied the matter as well as a layman can, I believe it is clearly within the jurisdiction of parliament to enact legislation of this kind.

I would say, further, that in the attitude which parliament has adopted in years gone by in regard to the jurisdiction of parliament and of the provinces we have been stirring up for ourselves a pile of trouble until we have reached an impasse, and now we do not know where we stand and where jurisdiction lies, whether with the federal parliament or with the provincial legislatures, with respect to various matters.

But matters pertaining to trades unionism and the right of workers to organize, and any penalties in relation thereto, are, in my opinion, purely federal, because, after all, trade and industry are matters of federal concern. You can not have one right in one province and another right in another province; and on the further ground of the desirability and the necessity of having uniformity in such matters I think a bill of this kind would be entirely within the scope of the federal parliament.

It has been claimed by the Minister of Labour that there are certain employers of labour who have denied to their employees the right to organize; that the employees who have organized have been penalized for attempting to become part of what one might call a legitimate trade union in Canada. If no penalty is provided for such employers of labour, then the right to organize becomes a mockery. In fact, the workers have not this right. Within recent times, within the last six months or so, we have had this right demanded by workers all across this dominion. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) cited the case of Burns and Company at Vancouver, and a few weeks ago I referred to the employees of the Canadian Press who were being denied at that time the right to collective bargaining and the right, in many respects, to be recognized as a union. Illustrations galore could be given of men being intimidated and of ordinary men and women being denied this right. The employee is not in the same fortunate or favourable position as the employer of labour.

The Minister of Labour referred to conditions in Great Britain. I think he knows more about the history of the trades union movement and more about the struggle of the masses in Great Britain than I ever knew. But there is a history attached to the growth of the trades union movement and the labour movement in Great Britain, and when the minister says it grew gradually by a process of mutual understanding between employers and employees, I do not think he was putting the case quite correctly. We in this country are years behind Great Britain in these matters. I am not now referring to the Trades Union Act of 1906 because, even if that were not in existence in Great Britain, we are still a long way behind that country in the scope of our trades union activities. One of the reasons why to-day there is in Great Britain more of this mutual understanding between employer ad employee is because the trades unions have grown in strength over a period of years until they have become so strong that they have not only earned the respect of employers of labour but also inspired them with fear.

There is a different situation in Great Britain from that which prevails in Canada at the present time. Here in the past few years we have been turning back the hands of the clock. Look at the recent legislation passed in the province of Quebec. Surely the hand of progress has been going backward during the past few years. One has to go back almost a century and a quarter to find a parallel. To show how the British trades union movement has developed, I might cite the famous Times case which was decided in 1812, under the Combination Act of 1799. Men who had tried to organize were found guilty and were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from nine months to two years. This is what the judge said to the prisoners in the dock on that occasion, in 1812:

> Prisoners, you have been convicted of a most wicked conspiracy to injure the interests of those very employers who gave you bread; with intent to impede and injure them in their business and indeed as far as in you lay to effect their ruin.
> The frequency of such crimes among men of your class of life and their mischievous and dangerous behaviour to ruin the fortunes of those employers, which a principle of gratitude and self interest should induce you to support, demands of the law that a severe example should be made of those persons who shall be convicted of such daring and flagitious combinations in defiance of public justice and in defiance of public order. No symptom of contrition on your part has appeared, no abatement of the combination in which you are accomplices has yet resulted from the example of your convictions.

That is going back about 125 years, or a little more, and if we look at the history of the trades union movement we find its inception dates back to about that particular period. When they found that industrial activity was not sufficient to give them what they wanted in those days they turned to political action, and from political action they turned to industrial action. So, gradually, over a period of years there has grown in Great Britain the industrial and the political movements which to-day have become such a powerful factor for progress in the old country. It might be of interest to note the demands of the Chartist movement, which barely 100 years ago first became prominent in what one might call British democracy. What were its famous demands? One was equal electoral areas; the second, universal suffrage; the third, payment of members; the fourth, no property qualification; the fifth, vote by ballot; the sixth annual parliaments. To-day these demands look picayune because of the progress we have made over the years. If I may advance over a period of time and come down to the time when the Independent Labour party of Great Britain was born, they formulated a program which to-day looks so conservative and limited that one is inclined to express surprise at the timidity of those who formulated it less than half a century ago. There are many to-day who can still remember the formation of the British Independent Labour party. I myself have a very faint recollection of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But these reforms were achieved by the Liberal party.

Mr. HEAPS: Quite so; but when the Liberal party ceased to function as such, the Labour party took over where the Liberal party left off. I hope that the Liberal party in this country, even that section of the Liberal party which sits in this house, will take to itself at this juncture of our history those old and historic traditions which were so manifest in the Liberal party in the old country.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That did not prevent labour from turning against it.

Mr. HEAPS: The right hon. gentleman knows very well that if any good legislation is introduced by the Liberal party, it will have our whole-hearted support. I refer to such historic Liberal principles as Liberals in the old country fought for—freedom of speech, freedom of thought—

An hon. MEMBER: Freedom to do wrong.

Mr. HEAPS: —and other principles which have characterized British Liberalism. When the Liberal party in this country gives to those principles the same expression here as Liberals gave over there, it will have our whole-hearted support. When the Liberals of Quebec will rise in their places in this house and condemn the padlock law, which is a violation of all Liberal principles, they also will have our whole-hearted support.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not hear loud cheers.

Mr. HEAPS: As regards the Independent Labour party of Great Britain, what were their immediate demands in the platform of 1893? They asked for the abolition of child labour under fourteen years of age; a legal eight hour maximum working day; state provision for the aged, sick and disabled workers and for widows and orphans; abolition of indirect taxation and taxation to extinction of all unearned incomes, and work for the unemployed—every proposal for the purpose of extending political rights and democratizing the system of government. I point this out to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour when he speaks of the Labour movement in Great Britain, where he claims programs have been carried out by voluntary effort. My hon. friend knows how these efforts expressed themselves in the repeal of the Taff Vale judgment and the passing of the Trades Union Act of 1906. These things occurred because of the growing strength of the organized labour movement in Great Britain. And when, in 1918, the government of the day in Canada passed an order in council which stated that the workers had the right to organize, and contained other beneficial provisions, it was done at a time when labour was in the ascendency in this country and when the need for labour and for peace in industry was most urgent. It was in the latter part of the war, and consequently the provision was put into the order in council; but it was given no real effect; no real effect has been given to other and later expressions of opinion by the government, and I know the only way in which this can be done is by some form of legislative sanction.

An hon. MEMBER: But you must have the power.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: Yes; it is a question of power, but it is also a question of opinion. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and our law department say that the government have not the right to enact legislation of this kind.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. gentleman permit an interruption? I suppose one of the strongest intellectual foundations of my hon. friend's own political party, Professor Frank Scott of McGill university, has written and said over the air that this is clearly a "civil right," and under our constitution a matter with which this parliament cannot deal.

Mr. HEAPS: Does my hon. friend mean that Professor Scott has said that this bill is not within the power of this parliament to enact?

Mr. MARTIN: No. What Professor Scott said, in a series over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation facilities in which I took part, is that freedom of association, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and all these other aspects of liberty are, in so far as giving effect to them is concerned, matters that come under the heading of "civil rights," and under our constitution can be enforced only by the legislatures of the provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: I would sooner have the opinion of the same gentleman on this bill which is now before the house instead of upon a purely abstract question. I venture to assert that if Professor Frank Scott would go over this bill, he would be just as likely as not to say that it is within the power of this parliament to enact, because I know of bills which he has gone over carefully and which he has claimed are perfectly sound in law, but when they came within the minute inspection of law officers of the crown they expressed a completely different opinion from that of Professor Scott. So it is quite likely that if he had this bill before him, he would declare in an opposite direction to that expressed by my hon. friend on this occasion.

However, I have no desire to continue this discussion any further. I wish to express my strong approval of the principle contained in this measure. If we have legislation on the statute books of this country, it should be enforceable by law. If workers engaged in industry who want to organize are intimidated; if they are penalized because they attempt to exercise that right which we believe is theirs, and so find that in reality they do not possess it, there should be a dominion law which will give to the workers all across the land the unquestionable right to organize in unions of their own choice so that they may be able to bargain collectively with their respective employers.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): It is not my intention to intrude myself into this debate, but there have come to the fore one or two questions upon which I thought it my duty to make an observation or two.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in a remark attempted to convey the idea that progressive reforms in England were instituted by the Liberal party and its adherents. I would invite the minister in his spare moments to review his British history and see whether he cannot satisfy himself that most of the reforms which were introduced into England from 1832 to the present time were brought forward by Conservatives and embodied in Conservative legislation. I do not need to particularize; but it will be recalled, for instance, that the two reforms of the electoral law were instituted by British Conservative governments, and the same is true of child labour legislation. I make that remark merely by way of correction. If we come to our own country we shall find that Conservatives have been in no way behind Liberals in introducing reform measures. The right hon. gentleman might recall to mind, among others, enactments of very recent date which prove that the Conservatives made at least a real effort to put on the statute books and give effect to legislation beneficial to the workers and intended to improve social conditions in this country.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) has quoted opinions from the legal authorities who are at present in the service of the government. I shall repeat publicly to the minister the suggestion I have already made to him privately, that there should be attached to the Department of Labour a competent lawyer who is well and truly versed in matters pertaining to labour and labour legislation. It is all very well to go to the Department of Justice for a legal opinion; but if there were attached to the Department of Labour a lawyer who had given a lifetime of study to legislation of this kind, whose whole time had been devoted to such matters, we would get a legal opinion that would probably vary from that given by the ordinary lawyer at present employed in the Department of Justice. I agree with the hon. member who has just concluded his remarks, that if lawyers on the Liberal side were consulted in reference to this legislation, opinions would be received disagreeing entirely with that expressed by the Minister of Labour, which he had obtained from the lawyers in the Department of Justice. Lawyers do differ in their opinions from time to time; a great deal depends upon their attitude to the subjects under discussion and upon their background and training. I am sure that there are lawyers in this house who would disagree with the opinion expressed by the Minister of Labour.

I do not intend to debate the merits of this bill, but I agree with its purport. I think legislation of this kind is within the powers of this parliament.

Mr. MARTIN: I am for this bill if we have the power to pass it, and I should very much like to be told, since the hon. member has said we have that power, precisely on what basis he makes that statement. Exactly what is the basis for the statement that he has just made, that this parliament has the power to pass this legislation?

Mr. WALSH: I am not a lawyer—

Mr. MARTIN: But the hon. gentleman has made the statement.

Mr. WALSH: —and I do not propose to elucidate that statement. The hon. gentleman has a legal mind and training and he knows the reference that has been made. It is a point that has been amply discussed by the previous speaker, and I am quite sure that it would be the opinion of any lawyer who had interested himself particularly in labour matters and who had a background of that kind. It is for that reason that I am prepared to support the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my hon. friend not know that this is entirely a constitutional matter? There are men in the Department of Justice who have made a life study of that branch of law, and I may tell the hon. gentleman that if he went there—because he interjected the remark that there might be some political affiliations—he would have some trouble in finding Liberals in the department.

Mr. WALSH: I am sorry that the Minister of Justice should have taken that view; I did not intend to make any such suggestion. I am sorry if that is the impression I have created. I merely questioned their opinion, and I wish to put beside that opinion the opinion of other lawyers probably just as competent.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Who are they?

Mr. WALSH: I could mention some.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mention one.

Mr. WALSH: The minister probably knows at least one whom I could mention under the circumstances, but it is not my place to do so. I make that statement, however, as a reason for my support of the measure before the house. I believe I could find an opinion at least equal to that given in support of the minister's contention.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): One name, please.

Mr. WALSH: I am not at liberty to mention names at the present time. The Minister of Labour knows of lawyers whom I could consult.

Mr. ROGERS: I certainly have not consulted any lawyer who has given an opinion contrary to that expressed by the Minister of Justice. I would certainly wish the hon. gentleman to be entirely free to suggest the name of any lawyer he has in mind who has expressed a contrary opinion.

Mr. WALSH: I urge again that the Minister of Labour endeavour to have attached to his department a lawyer whom he could consult without having to consult the lawyers in the Department of Justice. I agree with the points of view expressed by members to my left, and I am ready to support this measure on the basis of what has been suggested.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): With regard to the hon. gentleman's last suggestion, that there should be attached to the Department of Labour a lawyer who would have knowledge of all constitutional matters, may I tell him that under the law, under the statutes of Canada, the Department of Justice and the Minister of Justice are responsible for any legal opinions arising in any department and for any legal work done in all the departments of government. Unfortunately for my hon. friend, therefore, even with his legal light installed in the Department of Labour, it would still be the Minister of Justice who would be responsible for the opinions given to him. May I tell my hon. friend also that when lawyers working in other departments are confronted with some difficult matter they always ask the opinion of the Department of Justice. They have more confidence in the officials of that department than my hon. friend has.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): In view of what the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) has said, I may inform the house that the subject matter of this bill is Liberal reform, because the Liberal government in Nova Scotia passed in 1937 an act, being chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of 1937, respecting the rights of employees to organize. It is almost word for word the same as the bill that has been introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and it indicates that Nova Scotia considers the matter to be within its jurisdiction. That province evidently believes it has the jurisdiction to pass such legislation, and it seems to me it would be utter folly for the parliament of Canada to try to invade the rights of a province after it has taken action on a particular question.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing services—Live stock and poultry, $537,339.

Mr. LEADER: I do not want to delay the item unduly, but in view of what I said this afternoon, and having regard to the information that grew out of the discussion, I feel that I must reiterate what I said. Though I am sure the minister is actuated by the best intentions in the world, I believe he is off on the wrong foot. I suggest that we should give this project a 100 per cent test. We have had undertakings to place on the British market the product which I mentioned, fresh-killed meat. The minister gave us a certain amount of information this afternoon, when he told us that in the experiment conducted by the university of Saskatchewan meat processed at Montreal fetched a little lower price than British killed meat. Then he told us that meat processed at Saskatoon fetched still less than that processed at Montreal. It seems to me that if we would go just a little further and process this meat right at the Atlantic seaboard, we would have a chance to place this product in the British market in such a way that it would perhaps fetch a price equal to that paid for the home killed product itself.

The minister also told us that the government were to reimburse the packers for any loss they might sustain in this experiment. I want to say in all sincerity that I think the government would be well advised to go just a little further. There must be abattoirs on the Atlantic coast, at Halifax and Saint John; perhaps they are owned by the same people. Why not have this meat processed on the Atlantic coast, as I have suggested, and give it that final and the only sure and fair test? So my suggestion to the minister is that in the interests of Canada and of this great industry we should do everything within our power to place the best possible product on the market that we hope to enter.

Mr. FAIR: I should like to refer to the statement made by the minister two or three hours ago, that we in the west should raise cattle and send them to the east coast for finishing. I have been wondering why we could not make use of our own products; why we could not send our grain out in the form of beef rather than pay high freight rates and have to put that grain through the exchange at Winnipeg. I believe we could escape that evil at least by sending our cattle to the seaboard in a finished condition. In that way I believe quite an improvement would be brought about to the advantage of the western farmer. Another thing I believe we should do is provide a steady market for our cattle. I have before me the numbers of cattle that have been shipped to the United Kingdom and to the United States since 1928, and there has not been at all a steady flow.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Will the hon. member speak a little louder? The Hansard reporter has difficulty in hearing him.

Mr. FAIR: If hon. members would not talk quite so loudly, perhaps it would be a good deal easier to hear me. We find that our exports of cattle to the United Kingdom in 1928 numbered 405. In 1929 there was none exported at all. In 1930 the number was 5,400. In 1931 that number increased to 27,149. In 1932 it was 16,568; in 1933 it rose to 50,317; in 1934 it was 53,953; in 1935 it dropped to 6,704; in 1936 it rose again to 38,495, and in 1937 it decreased to 9,610. With an irregular flow like this, I do not think it is possible to maintain a worthwhile market, and I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, who suggested that the government had an opportunity through this experiment to do something beneficial for the farmers of the west.

Mr. FINN: When I came in this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, the hon. the Minister of Agriculture was speaking of "live stock"; and I felt that while I was not in the category about which he was speaking, I was still alive, and to prove it I am now on my feet. I was struck by the remarks of the minister this afternoon in explaining this item, as I was by the remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) who is leading the opposition to-night in the regrettable absence of the right hon. the leader of the opposition, and by the interest shown by that hon. gentleman in the development of cattle raising and cattle exporting from the maritime provinces. I was also impressed by the remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley). It seems to me that Nova Scotia—and I speak more particularly of the constituency which I have the honour to represent together with my colleague the other member for Halifax—has not been as progressive in this matter as might be wished. It is not my duty to speak for the entire province, but I should like to explain my position and what I believe to be the position of the cattle raisers of Nova Scotia and more particularly of my own constituency. I wonder if I could obtain the figures as to the exports of cattle raised in the maritime provinces or Nova Scotia, to the British market, through the efforts and under the general policy of the Department of Agriculture?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FINN: I am not being carried; I am still alive. I may be able to obtain that information later, but it is a regrettable fact that in our province, and in the county of Halifax more particularly, we are taking a retrograde step in reference to this item, which is a branch of agriculture. When you go to the agricultural fair up in the Musquodoboit valley, which is one of the most fertile spots in our lovely province, you see on exhibition some of the finest cattle that can be seen in any part of Canada. If you go to the provincial exhibition in the city of Halifax you will find the same thing. If you go to the various county fairs throughout the province, in those counties where cattle can be raised profitably if given a fair show, you will see cattle that will compare favourably with what is known as western steer beef. I heard the minister say this afternoon that he was interested in the same breed of cattle as that in which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare was interested; I think it was the "Aberdeen-Angus." I do not know whether that is a mixture from Scotland and the premier of Nova Scotia, whose name happens to be "Angus" L. Macdonald. It does seem to me that the great obstacle, the great setback, the hindrance, to our people is largely due to the fact that the large corporations, such as Canada Packers, practically control the maritime market. They are not a great benefit in the city of Halifax or to the cattle breeders of the province. When tenders are called from persons engaged in the legitimate business of cattle raising and cattle selling, these tremendous corporations, which sell directly to the wholesaler in Halifax and throughout Nova Scotia, tender also in competition. In nine cases out of ten the wholesaler is put to one side because Canada Packers would get the contract. The man in the wholesale business paying his income tax, his rent, his business tax, his city tax and his school tax, has to stand aside while this corporation, which has developed like the roots of the rubber tree in southern countries, obtains the business. Where those trees grow one cannot build a house, because once the roots of the tree are reached it is impossible to find the terra firma upon which to build, and the land in the neighbourhood of the tree must be abandoned as a possible site for building. If this sort of thing continues, agriculture in Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces will become a thing of the past.

Let me give one further illustration which, to my mind, is convincing beyond contradiction of even the most technical expert in agricultural matters. Eatons and Simpsons have come into the maritimes market in the city of Halifax. In construction Eatons spent about a million dollars. They bought out Mahon Brothers, one of the two leading retail general dry goods stores, one which had a splendid standing in the community, and developed a large business. The Eaton company paid its help less wages, and followed a practice of taking some of them on for two or three days and then laying them off for a similar period. In connection with their store a groceteria has been developed in which they display, to a degree of which only Eatons and Simpsons are capable, beef and other agricultural products. The displays are presented in such a manner that the people flock to the store. While buying other things, they visit the groceteria, and on Saturday, which is market day, they buy their beef, eggs butter and cheese in those departmental stores.

The matter has developed to such an extent that on one occasion I thought it well to speak to the premier, the Hon. Mr. Macdonald, on the point. I said to him that I thought the effect of that type of trade was against the interests of the agriculturists of the province, and particularly those in the vicinity of Halifax. I was not speaking politically. Most of those agriculturists are to the north, northeast and east of Halifax city, across the harbour, on the Dartmouth side. We know that in the vicinity of Cole Harbour there is fertile land suitable for the raising of cattle and poultry, or in the production of eggs which some day may develop into chickens. We find that the farmers come in to Halifax from Cole Harbour, Eastern Passage, Cow Bay, Lawrencetown, East Chezzetcook, West Chezzetcook, Little River, Middle Musquodoboit and Upper Musquodoboit. They used to come to the market and stand around on the sidewalks of what was known as Cheapside, opposite the post office. There they sold the products of their farms and did a splendid business. Rain or shine they were there, without cover. At that time an attempt was made by the city council to drive them out. I was serving in the legislature of Nova Scotia—I do not raise the point through any desire to speak about myself—but "Joe Howe" preserved to them their interminable right to carry on their trade there, and I placed legislation upon the statute books to permit them to continue to carry on their trade on these sidewalks. Later on, the city of Halifax built a market on Market street.
