House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Friday, April 8, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

GERMAN PLEBISCITE

POLLING OF VOTE OF GERMAN NATIONALS IN CANADA WITH RESPECT TO AUSTRIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Possibly the house will permit me, before we reach the special order, to answer a question asked yesterday by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) with reference to the German plebiscite to be taken on April 10. My right hon. friend asked:

(1) Has the German government asked the Canadian government to provide facilities for the vote?

(2) What reply was made?

(3) What steps have been taken to ascertain if any of those who claim the right to vote have been naturalized?

The answer to the first question is "no," and consequently no answer is required to the second.

With regard to the third question, I might say it is not anticipated that any German nationals resident in Canada will participate in the plebiscite. No question arises of German nationals voting in Canada. The present plebiscite is being held under the provisions of the German electoral law of 1933, as amended in 1935, whereby German nationals living abroad are accorded the right, although they are not obligated to exercise it, of securing from the German consular authorities in the countries in which they reside voting certificates, which are accorded on proof of their German nationality. These voting certificates permit them to vote in German elections either: (1) by returning to Germany; or (2) by taking passage on a German ship and voting on the high seas.

The law provides that if a minimum of ten German nationals in a particular port request it, and a German ship is available in port, the German nationals may be taken outside the territorial waters and permitted to vote. In the present instance, while the plebiscite is to be held on April 10, there are provisions to cover special cases, which would permit voting at any time between April 1 and April 15. I have been informed by the German consulate that in so far as they are aware, no arrangements have been made either in eastern or in western Canada for German nationals resident in Canada to take advantage of these provisions.

It is unlikely that there would be any substantial number of naturalized Germans in Canada who would be eligible to participate in the plebiscite. As a general rule, under the provisions of German law, a German loses his German citizenship upon naturalization in Canada. There are a few relatively unimportant exceptions to this rule.

There is a possibility that there might be persons resident in Canada who had been naturalized under the provisions of the Naturalization Act and who, notwithstanding such naturalization, were recognized by German law as retaining German citizenship. There is a further possibility that such persons might be in a position where they could participate in the plebiscite. If they did so participate, they would be subject to section 9 of the Naturalization Act which makes provision for the revocation of certificates of naturalization by the governor general in council on report of the Secretary of State of Canada.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the country will be pleased to receive the answer that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has been good enough to make. There arises out of the last part of the answer, however, a question that need not be elaborated now, but an opportunity may be offered again to do so. The truth is that numbers of Germans who had been naturalized in this country responded to the call of their country in 1914, and they gave us to understand that they felt they were bound to do so. It was desirable, I think, in view of the statements which appeared in the press, that we should receive the information that the Prime Minister has been good enough to give us; for it will do something to make clear what I now recall was known in 1934 and 1935 and which I had forgotten entirely until I heard the right hon. gentleman read it, as to the methods which have been provided for taking the opinion of German nationals on matters referred to them by way of plebiscite or otherwise.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): May I ask the Prime Minister if his knowledge of the situation indicates that these privileges of voting extend to the children of naturalized Germans, that is, those born in this country, or is it confined only to German nationals and those naturalized?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think children of Germans naturalized in this country would have the right to vote, but I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question definitely offhand.

CABLE AND WIRELESS RATES

ANNOUNCEMENT TABLED RESPECTING RESULT OF NEGOTIATIONS BY IMPERIAL COMMUNICATIONS ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I wish to lay on the table the official announcement of the new cable and wireless rates which will become effective on the twenty-fifth instant as a result of inquiries and negotiations carried on during the past two years at the instance of the home government and the governments of the various dominions by the imperial communications advisory committee.

SCOTSGUARD, SASK., FARMERS

LACK OF FEED FOR LIVE STOCK OWING TO DISCONTINUANCE OF WINTER FEED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to bring to the attention of the minister, with the permission of the house, a matter that I was asked urgently to direct to the attention of the government to-day, namely, the inability of the settlers of Scotsguard, Saskatchewan, to obtain feed for their cattle and horses, winter feed having been discontinued, and their being unable to secure adequate information in respect to the applications they have made to the officials in that section I was asked to bring the matter to the attention of the minister in the house in the belief that he would perhaps have more information than anyone else and would see that the matter was at least explained to the settlers in that locality.

[Mr. Bennett.]

PRIVY COUNCIL APPEALS

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO HIS MAJESTY IN COUNCIL

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George) moved the second reading of Bill No. 19, respecting appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

He said: This bill, No. 19, is short, containing only three sections which I propose to place on Hansard:

1. This act may be cited as The Privy Council Appeals Act, 1938.

2. The Judicial Committee Act, 1833, chapter forty-one of the statutes of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, 1833 and The Judicial Committee Act, 1844, chapter sixty-nine of the statutes of Great Britain and Ireland, 1844, and all orders, rules or regulations made under the said acts are hereby repealed in so far as the same are part of the law of the Dominion of Canada.

3. Notwithstanding any royal prerogative or anything contained in the Interpretation Act or in the Supreme Court Act or in any other act of the parliament of Canada no appeal shall lie or be brought from any judgment or order of any court in Canada, in relation to any matter within the competence of the parliament of Canada, to any court of appeal, tribunal or authority by which, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, appeals or petitions to his majesty in council may be heard.

Though the British North America Act, 1867, purported to declare that the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within certain classes of subject mentioned in section 91 of that act, it was nevertheless soon ascertained that the Colonial Laws Validity Act, enacted two years previously by the parliament of the United Kingdom, effectively restricted the field of Canadian legislation.

Section 2 of that act of 1865 provided that:

> Any colonial law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any act of parliament extending to the colony to which such law may relate . . . shall be read subject to such act . . . and shall to the extent of such repugnancy but not otherwise be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.

The Statute of Westminster, 1931, which enacts statutory bases for the constitutional position established in 1926, provides, in brief:

That the Colonial Laws Validity Act shall no longer apply to any law made after the passage of this act by the parliament of a dominion;

That no law and no provision of any law made after December 11, 1931, by the parliament of a dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any existing or future act of the parliament of the United Kingdom, and that the powers of the parliament of a dominion shall include the power to repeal any such act in so far as it is part of the law of the dominion; and

That no act of the parliament of the United Kingdom, passed after December 11, 1931, shall extend to a dominion as part of the law of that dominion unless that dominion has requested and consented to its enactment;

This bill purports to repeal the Judicial Committee Acts of 1833 and 1844 in so far as they form part of the law of this dominion.

In moving for leave to introduce this bill on February 10 last, I pointed out that by the commissions and instructions to governors of the provinces, authorizing the establishment of a judicial system, each governor in council was constituted the highest appellate tribunal in his province, and that such appellate tribunal consisted of the governor and members of his executive council, from whose decisions an appeal lay to the king in council.

That was an appeal from a provincial court, exercising both political and judicial functions, to another court at Westminster consisting of the king in council, which also exercised political as well as judicial functions.

That was the class of appeals which the Judicial Committee Act, 1833, purported to regulate, and eleven years later the Judicial Committee Act, 1844, provided for an appeal to the king in council from any judgment, sentence, decree or order of any inferior court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad. Those two acts of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the one 105 years old, the other 94 years old, which were adapted to the times and to the conditions which prevailed before the establishment of responsible government in these colonies—when the government at Westminster, by order in council, arbitrarily exercised supervision and control over all colonies and possessions abroad—this parliament is now invited to repeal, in so far as they now form a part of the law of this dominion.

The judicial functions of governors in council were long ago abolished throughout Canada, but unfortunately the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to whom the judicial functions of the king in council were transferred by the Judicial Committee Acts of 1833 and 1844, have never wholly ceased, in the exercise of their political functions, to decide constitutional issues, on appeals from other countries of the empire, on grounds of imperial political policy, which is largely based on considerations of political expediency.

Though Canada is declared to be an autonomous community within the British empire, equal in status to the United Kingdom and to the other dominions of the commonwealth, and in no way subordinate to the United Kingdom in any aspect of our domestic or external affairs, yet a committee of the privy council of the United Kingdom, under those two ancient acts which it is the object of this bill to repeal, still controls and directs the political development of Canada, and dominates the independent judiciary of this country, in respect of all civil matters coming within the appellate jurisdiction of the judicial committee. Their jurisdiction in criminal matters was abolished by this parliament in 1931.

For practical purposes therefore the sovereignty of Canada in civil and constitutional matters now resides in the judicial committee. Its members assume a final veto power over all the important legislation of this parliament. They arrogate to themselves the right to weigh the motives of members of this parliament in enacting such legislation, and, although personally ignorant, except through meagre press reports, of the social, industrial and commercial conditions prevailing throughout this dominion, they arrogate to themselves a prescience and clairvoyance which entitles them to substitute their political judgments, and even their personal preferences, for the deliberate legislative enactments of the elected representatives of the people who sit in the parliament of Canada.

In a debate in the House of Commons at Westminster on March 28, 1867, Mr. Gladstone, referring to the enactment of the British North America Act, 1867, said that this act had been passed—

> . . . with a promptitude which, if it had been a measure affecting ourselves, would have been precipitancy.

This was, however, he continued,

> . . . an acknowledgment of the title of these colonies to deal practically with their own affairs.

Mr. Lowe, afterward Lord Sherbrooke, who followed, remarked that the act had been passed with the expedition commented on by Mr. Gladstone just because parliament felt that it was a matter with which it had only the most formal concern. Nevertheless, the judicial committee, which thereafter continued to exercise political as well as judicial functions, have construed and applied the British North America Act, 1867, as if it were an ordinary enactment of the parliament of Westminster. They have ever evinced an extreme reluctance to inform themselves, in fact it would appear that they seldom, if ever, inform themselves concerning, and they have refused to refer to the political and parliamentary history of British North America as an aid in construing the original meaning and intent of the British North America Act. It is true that the judicial committee occasionally refer most casually to the intention of the parliament of the United Kingdom in enacting the British North America Act, although in so doing they ignore the fact that in enacting this measure the parliament of the United Kingdom was merely adopting and confirming a draft prepared by Canadian statesmen, who were expressing their final conclusions in the English language as then employed in British America, and that that parliament, without detailed discussion, enacted the bill as it had been drafted. They have therefore repudiated every suggestion that the terms of the act should be construed in accordance with the intentions of those who framed it, as clearly expressed in the public documents and debates which preceded its enactment.

Those who have carefully studied the constitutional development of these British North American colonies will frankly concede that the clear intentions of the Quebec conference resolutions, on which the act of 1867 was based, have in many instances been completely frustrated by decisions of the privy council, which our Canadian courts have been obliged to follow, despite their own opinions to the contrary. In fact, members of the Supreme Court of Canada, in deciding constitutional issues, must frequently refrain from considering the real meaning and intent of the framers of the British North America Act, and restrict their intellectual efforts to ascertaining as best they can the purport of the apparently conflicting decisions of the judicial committee.

Let us take as one example the "peace, order and good government" clause. Section 91 of the British North America Act enacts that:

> 91. It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces:

This phrase, "to make laws for the peace, order and good government" of Canada had been employed throughout a century in all the royal commissions and instructions to colonial governors in British America; in the Quebec Act of 1774, the Constitutional Act of 1791, and the Union Act of 1840, as clearly indicating that the power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of a colony or province included the power to make any and all laws which were not repugnant to such statutes of the parliament of Great Britain as in terms extended to such colony or province.

Lord Carnarvon, Colonial Secretary, in introducing the British North America bill to the House of Lords on February 19, 1867, said:

> It will be seen under the 91st clause that the classification is not intended to "restrict the generality" of the powers previously given to the central parliament, but that those powers extend to all laws made "for the peace, order and good government" of the confederation—terms which, according to all precedent, will, I understand, carry with them an ample measure of legislative authority.

But during the past seventy years successive decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have so far frustrated the intentions of the founders of the Canadian confederacy as to obliterate the residual power of the parliament of the dominion to make "laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada," except in the extreme case of civil strife or insurrection arising in Canada, or in the case of Canada becoming involved in war with a foreign state.

On the other hand, the judicial committee have so extended the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces to make laws "in relation to property and civil rights" as almost to reverse the relations originally intended to exist between federal and provincial powers, by vesting nearly all residual powers in the provinces, under the power to make laws in relation to property and civil rights in the province.

In a recent address at Toronto I explained in detail the origin and evolution of the provisions contained in section 92 of the British North America Act that "in each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within" the class of subjects therein designated as "property and civil rights in the province," and I showed quite clearly, I think, that that clause was inserted in section 92 of the British North America Act, as was declared at the time, and as all students of our Canadian history well know, for the protection of those French customs, laws and ordinances which had reference to the personal, family and community life of the French-Canadian people, and which had been definitely ascertained and embodied in the final report made by the commissioners for the codification of the civil law of Quebec on November 24, 1864.

It is perfectly clear, I think, that the framers of the British North America Act, 1867, had clearly in their minds that the matters comprised in the class of subjects designated "property and civil rights in the province" which were exclusively reserved to the provincial legislatures, were such matters of fundamental civil law as related to the ownership, alienation or conveyance and transfer of property, the leasing and mortgaging of property, the devolution of estates by inheritance and by will, rights arising from personal status and domestic relations, legitimacy, minority, capacity to contract or alienate, marriage, judicial separation, tutorship, curatorship and the like, as appear from the statutes and public documents of the century of our history preceding the enactment of the British North America Act.

It was this fundamental body of civil law, then definitely ascertained by the commissioners appointed for that purpose, which was placed within the legislative jurisdiction of each province by the terms of section 92, subsection 13, of the British North America Act:

> 92. In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects, next hereinafter mentioned; that is to say,—
> 13. Property and civil rights in the province.

The words of the statute "in relation to," as they appear in the phrase "in relation to property and civil rights in the province," with its several variations, such as laws "relating to property and civil rights" and laws "relative to property and civil rights," had been previously employed, time and time again, in English and in Canadian statutes and official documents, as meaning the dealing definitely, directly and essentially with certain fundamental laws therein indicated.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have practically eliminated the words "in the province" and have failed to give to these words employed in the statute the restricted signification which was clearly intended by the framers of the British North America Act, and which was attached to them throughout a century of Canadian history. Moreover, the signification of the words "property and civil rights" has been so widely extended that, excepting the subjects specifically enumerated in section 91 of the British North America Act, they are now deemed to include almost every other subject of legislation. In fact the words "in relation to property and civil rights in the province," as now defined by the judicial committee, who have substituted for the words "in relation to" the one word "affecting"—which they employ as meaning incidentally touching upon property and civil rights, not property and civil rights in the province but property and civil rights in the widest application of those terms—have now, with the exception of those specifically enumerated in section 91, placed every conceivable subject of legislation within the provincial jurisdiction, and even the subjects specifically enumerated in section 91 have been severely restricted by their interpretations.

This grave departure from the real purpose and intention of the framers of the British North America Act occurred within fourteen years after its enactment. Sir Montague E. Smith, in 1881, in the case of The Citizens Insurance Company of Canada v. Parsons, 7 Appeal Cases, 96, at page 111, without any investigation of the original purport and application of the words "property and civil rights," based the decision of the judicial committee in that case upon the terms of The Quebec Act, 1774, 14 George 3, chapter 83. He said:

> It is to be observed that the same words, "civil rights," are employed in the act of 14 George 3, chapter 83, which made provision for the government of the province of Quebec. Section 8 of that act enacted that His Majesty's Canadian subjects within the province of Quebec should enjoy their property, usages, and other civil rights, as they had before done, and that in all matters of controversy relative to property and civil rights, resort should be had to the laws of Canada, and be determined agreeably to the said laws. In this statute the words "property" and "civil rights" are plainly used in their largest sense; and there is no reason for holding that in the statute under discussion they are used in a different and narrower one.

The judicial committee quite properly interpreted section 8 of the Quebec Act, 1774, as enacting that the inhabitants of the province of Quebec, of French descent, should enjoy their property, usages and other civil rights as they had done before the cession of 1763, but the judicial committee made no investigation of the public records to ascertain the nature and extent of the civil rights which they had enjoyed in old Quebec under the French regime, an investigation which was essential to an intelligent decision of the issue then before the judicial committee.

They properly interpreted the same section 8 of the Quebec Act as enacting that in all matters of controversy relative to property and civil rights, resort should be had to the laws in force in Quebec prior to 1763, and that such matters should be determined agreeably to said laws; but they neglected to ascertain the terms and scope of those laws which were applied during the French regime. The judicial committee were content to trust to fancy for their facts and to make an entirely erroneous declaration that the words "property" and "civil rights" were used in the statute of 1774 in the largest sense possible, and they erroneously assumed that the same words in section 92 of the British North America Act should receive the widest possible interpretation.

In this complacent manner, they established for all time the widest possible interpretation of the term "property and civil rights in the province," whereas, if the judicial committee had read the address of the Attorney General Thurlow, afterward Lord Chancellor Thurlow, in the House of Commons at Westminster, or had read the evidence of Governor Carleton, Francis Maseres, former attorney general of Quebec, William Hey, Chief Justice of Quebec, and others given before the House of Commons sitting in committee upon the Quebec bill of 1774, no such decision could possibly have been given. And so it happened that the original intention of the framers of the British North America Act was frustrated and set at naught by carelessly considered decisions.

I have time to indicate only one other radical departure from the purpose and intent of the framers of the original act, although many others might be cited. In drafting section 91 of the British North America Act the framers of that act had before them section 8, paragraph 3 of article 1 of the constitution of the United States of America, which, dealing with the powers of congress, reads:

> To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with Indian tribes.

The Canadian draftsmen were not content with the restricted terms of that paragraph of the constitution of the United States. which had then been under review and broadly interpreted and applied by the supreme court of the neighbouring republic for nearly a century before the British North America Act was drafted. The Canadian draftsmen insisted upon vesting in parliament the authority to regulate "trade" as well as "commerce," without any restriction, and without differentiating between foreign trade and commerce, and domestic or interprovincial trade and commerce.

Section 91 of the British North America Act 1867, as then drafted and enacted, contains the following:

> It is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say: . . .
> 2. The regulation of trade and commerce.

It would be difficult to frame a more precise and concise clause respecting trade and commerce. The legislative authority thereby vested in the parliament of Canada was not only declared to be "exclusive" but it was declared to be exclusive, "notwithstanding anything in this act."

In the language then in vogue, "trade" included every mechanical or mercantile employment in which a person might engage for procuring subsistence or for profit. "Trade" did not apply to or include the learned professions, or to the liberal arts which were concerned with all branches of academic learning, or to agriculture, in so far as agriculture was concerned with the cultivation of the earth for the production of vegetable life. But "trade", in the parlance of that day, did include the purchase, sale or exchange of commodities of all kinds, including the products of agriculture as well as the products of every other productive activity, and particularly the products of every organized trade or business, whether such trade was foreign trade or domestic or home trade, whether wholesale trade or retail trade, whether involving sales in large quantities or in small parcels.

Commerce then connoted merchandise of every kind and description in the large and general sense, and included the exchange or sale of goods, wares and products of all trades, and commercial intercourse, by way of trade and traffic, in all its branches. Trade and commerce, under then existing conditions, connoted a continuous flow from primary production, through the various stages of transportation and distribution, until the product reached the consumer, either at home or abroad.

Eleven years after the British North America Act was enacted, Mr. Justice Strong, of the Supreme Court of Canada, admittedly one of the ablest members of that court, (2 S.C.C. 104) said:

> That the regulation of trade and commerce in the provinces, domestic and internal, as well as foreign and external, are, by the British North America Act, exclusively conferred upon the parliament of the dominion, calls for no demonstration, for the language of the act is explicit.

In 1880 the judicial committee (7 Appeal Cases, 96) remarked that:

> The words "regulation of trade and commerce" in their unlimited sense are sufficiently wide if uncontrolled by the context and other parts of the act, to include every regulation of trade ranging from political arrangements in regard to foreign governments, requiring the sanction of parliament, down to minute rules for regulating particular trades.

Nevertheless, the judicial committee then held that the full scope of the term could not have been intended by those who framed the British North America Act, because, "banking," "Weights and measures," "bills of exchange and promissory notes," "interest,' "bankruptcy and insolvency" were also mentioned in section 91. They seemed oblivious to the fact that these additional subheads were obviously used for greater clarity, inasmuch as "weights and measures" are employed for other than trading transactions; "bills of exchange and promissory notes" are not necessarily restricted to trading and commercial transactions; and "interest" may be payable on loans, advances, or banking credits in respect of matters which are obviously not included in the regulation of trade and commerce.

And thus, in decision after decision, the provision of the British North America Act which enacted that exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, notwithstanding anything in that act, extends to all matters—note the term—extends to all matters coming within that class of subjects described as the regulation of trade and commerce, has been restricted and circumscribed until, in the final results, the judicial committee have denied to the trade and commerce clause all efficacy as an independent enumerative head of dominion legislative jurisdiction.

The subject matter of the regulation of trade and commerce remains now as originally drafted in the simple, concise and unequivocal terms of section 91 of the British North America Act, and, though the complex activities comprised in that original clause have vastly expanded during the past seventy years, the legal signification of the clause has repeatedly been restricted and circumscribed by judicial interpretation, until almost every vestige of its original authority has been eliminated, with the exception that in the John Deere Plow case (1915 A.C. 330) Lord Haldane placed under the regulation of trade and commerce clause the power to incorporate dominion companies, though on another occasion, in the Great West Saddlery case (1921, 2, A.C. 91) Lord Haldane, true to his predilections for the metaphysics of Hegel, placed the power to incorporate dominion companies under the general power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Neither the ancient sophists, nor the more modern metaphysicians, have ever been so successful as the judicial committee in explaining that reality is a mere illusion of the mind. But in the case of the judicial committee it is unfortunately true that, as Gulliver once said: "If once judges go wrong, they make it a rule never to come right"; and so it has come to pass that Canadian courts are now precluded from reconsidering the original text of the British North America Act and so deciding constitutional issues upon their merits; they are inextricably bound by a series of decisions of the judicial committee that have served to impair the constitution which our courts are presumed to interpret.

A number of the decisions of the judicial committee, which now unfortunately control the discretion of the Supreme Court of Canada, as well as the supreme courts of the provinces, were rendered during the first twenty years of our existence as a dominion.

In 1871, in order to expedite the hearing of appeals from colonial courts, including those from the new Dominion of Canada, an act was passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom providing that four members of the judicial committee should each receive a salary of £5,000 yearly and that these four members might be English judges, or retired East Indian judges from Bengal, Bombay or Madras. Sir Montague Smith, a puisne judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and two other judges from the East Indies, were appointed, but so discredited, at that date, was the judicial committee, that three English judges, to whom it was offered, successively refused an appointment, and finally the Lord Chancellor appointed Sir Robert Collier, who was not and had not been a judge of any court, and who was not, therefore, qualified under the terms of the Judicial Committee Act, 1844. This lack of qualification was overcome by appointing Sir Robert Collier to fill, for three days, a vacant judgeship in the Court of Common Pleas, and then he was appointed a member of the judicial committee.

It is noteworthy that Chief Justice Cockburn of the Queen's Bench, in a letter to Mr. Gladstone, dated November 10, 1871, protested that the colourable appointment of Collier to the judicial committee had seriously compromised the dignity of the judicial office, and he denounced the grievous impropriety of the proceedings as a mere subterfuge and evasion of the terms of the statute. The government of Mr. Gladstone, which made the appointment, only missed censure in the House of Lords by a majority of one, and in the commons by a majority of twenty-seven, after a stormy debate that closed at three o'clock in the morning.

For fourteen years thereafter, these two English judges. Sir Montague Smith and Sir Robert Collier, with four East Indian judges, Sir James Colville, Sir Robert Couch, Sir Barnes Peacock and Sir Arthur Hobhouse, together with only one judge of standing from the English bench, formed the judicial committee, under the presidency of the Lord Chancellor of the day, when he was sitting, which was vested with the responsibility of interpreting the Canadian constitution, but as a matter of fact, on several occasions, in the guise of interpretative decisions, they wrote material amendments to the Canadian constitution, which to this day are binding upon our Canadian courts.

In the result, if Canada is to develop as a nation, we are constrained to procure amendments to the British North America Act, though there are reasonable grounds for the conviction that any new amendments are not likely to meet a better fate before the judicial committee than that which overtook certain sections of the original act.

The obvious aberrations of the judicial committee are partly explained by the fact that its members assume to exercise legislative and political as well as purely judicial functions. Haldane, Q.C., who shortly afterward became Lord Chancellor and president of the judicial committee, in 1899, in the Judicial Review, volume 11, page 279, in extolling the work of the late Lord Watson as a member of the judicial committee, frankly admitted the exercise by the committee of political functions. He said of Lord Watson:

> He was an imperial judge of the first order. The function of such a judge, sitting in the supreme tribunal of the empire, is to do more than decide what abstract and familiar legal conceptions should be applied to particular cases. His function is to be a statesman as well as a jurist, to fill in the gaps which parliament has deliberately left in the skeleton constitutions and laws that it has provided for the British colonies.
> The imperial legislature has taken the view that these constitutions and laws must, if they are to be acceptable, be in a large measure unwritten, elastic, and capable of being silently developed and even altered as the colony develops and alters. This imposes a task of immense importance and difficulty upon the privy council judges, and it was this task which Lord Watson had to face when some fifteen years ago he found himself face to face with what threatened to be a critical period in the history of Canada.

Haldane may have been referring to the disputes arising out of such appeals as Russell v. the Queen and Hodge v. the Queen, in the early eighties, or he may have had reference to the political campaigns in 1886 and 1887 for the secession of Nova Scotia from the dominion, or possibly to the resolutions of the conference of the Liberal premiers which was held at Quebec in 1888. Haldane then proceeds:

> Two views were being contended for. The one was that, excepting in such cases as were specially provided for, a general principle ought to be recognized which would tend to make the government at Ottawa paramount, and the governments of the provinces subordinate. The other was that of federalism through and through, in executive as well as legislative concerns, whenever the contrary had not been expressly said by the imperial parliament.
> The provincial governments naturally pressed this latter view very strongly. The supreme court of Canada, however, which had been established under the Confederation Act, and was originally intended by all parties to be the practically final court of appeal for Canada, took the other view. Great unrest was the result, followed by a series of appeals to the privy council, which it was discovered still had power to give special leave for them, was commenced.

The only knowledge which members of the judicial committee could have had of these domestic political controversies was derived from infrequent cable messages published in the London Times or from gossip in the purlieus of the courts at London.

Haldane then relates that he was engaged as counsel for the provincial premiers in a number of these appeals, and that Lord Watson, by his several judgments, sought to modify and amend the Canadian constitution so as to bring it in accord with their conceptions of the exigencies of partisan political contests in Canada. If the Supreme Court of Canada were admittedly influenced by such considerations, its members would be liable to impeachment. Mr. Haldane proceeds:

> Lord Watson made the business of laying down the new law, that was necessary, his own. He completely altered the tendency of the decisions of the supreme court, and established in the first place the sovereignty (subject to the power to interfere of the imperial parliament alone) of the legislatures of Ontario, Quebec and the other provinces. He then worked out as a principle the direct relation, in point of exercise of the prerogative, of the lieutenant governors to the crown. In a series of masterly judgments he expounded and established the real constitution of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time has elapsed.

Mr. CAHAN: I crave the indulgence of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may proceed with the consent of the house.

Mr. CAHAN: It is to be noted that Lord Watson sought, by judicial interpretation, to establish a new constitution for Canada, in which each of the nine provincial legislatures would be vested with sovereign or supreme power, and the power of the dominion government to veto provincial legislation, as established by the British North America Act, would be completely eliminated. Mr. Haldane proceeds:

> Nowhere is his memory likely to be more gratefully preserved than in those distant Canadian provinces whose rights of self-government he placed on a basis that was both intelligible and firm. . . . It was the same with other portions of the empire. . . . He was a great servant of the empire.

Lord Haldane, who in 1912 became a member of the judicial committee, endeavoured to follow in Lord Watson's footsteps, but, at this date it is extremely doubtful if the "distant Canadian provinces" are enamoured with the political policies which those two judges of the privy council carried into effect, under the guise of giving judicial interpretations to the British North America Act, which Canadian statesmen had framed and placed before the parliament at Westminster for final enactment; but, in any event, those two judges succeeded in laying down novel rules for the interpretation of the British North America Act, which have since controlled the decisions of the Canadian courts, and which justices of the Supreme Court of Canada, however learned and experienced they may be, must, under existing conditions, utterly fail to overcome.

Ten years after he became a member of the judicial committee, Lord Haldane, in the Cambridge Law Journals for 1922, again wrote of Lord Watson:

> Particularly he rendered an enormous service to the empire and to the Dominion of Canada by developing the dominion constitution.

That was in accord with the opinion of those publicists in England who, unfortunately, conceived that by fostering the division and disruption of a dominion and centralizing political control at Westminster they were ensuring the continuity of the colonial system with its arbitrary domination of the self-governing dominions. They sought to divide and rule. But history has proved the utter folly of such an effete imperial policy, and deplorable conditions in Canada to-day furnish convincing evidence of the disastrous effects of such a policy when expressed in judicial decisions which preclude the political and economic development of this dominion. Lord Haldane continues:

> At one time, after the British North America Act of 1867 was passed, the conception took hold of the Canadian courts that what was intended was to make the dominion the centre of government in Canada, so that its statutes and its position should be superior to the statutes and position of the provincial legislatures. That went so far that there arose a great fight; and as the result of a long series of decisions Lord Watson put clothing upon the bones of the constitution, and so covered them over with living flesh that the constitution of Canada took a new form.

Lord Haldane certainly exaggerates and incidentally, misrepresents the views of the Canadian courts which, in the earlier years sought to interpret the British North America Act, 1867, in strict accordance with the terms in which it is drafted and so sought to carry into effect the clearly expressed views of its founders. But the judicial committee have, as he admits, by a long series of decisions so amended and redrafted the original constitution and so clothed it in fantastic conceptions of their own, that it bears the grotesque features of a jack-o'-lantern which now serves to evoke derisive comment and criticism.

And then, disclosing the extent of his own self-deception, Lord Haldane exclaims:

> The provinces were recognized as of equal authority coordinate with the dominion, and a long series of decisions were given by him which solved many problems and produced a new contentment in Canada with the constitution they had got in 1867.

In these words, which were written less than sixteen years ago, we may clearly discern the tendency of the judicial committee to set at naught the provisions of the British North America Act as originally drawn, and to constitute one dominion consisting of nine provincial sovereignties, each coordinate with and of equal authority with the whole dominion, regardless of the immutable axiomatic truth that the whole is necessarily greater than its part.

We are now facing a problem which mere amendments to the British North America Act will not solve or eliminate, no matter what amendments may be procured, and that is the problem of interpretation. No amendment can prove effective to adapt a constitution to the needs of government if it is arbitrarily interpreted and applied, as were the provisions which it was intended to supplement and correct, by a tribunal of last resort, such as the judicial committee, which refuses to consider the conditions and circumstances in which and the objects for which such provisions were first enacted. There is no substitute for wise and enlightened interpretation, and, without it, the possibility of obtaining redress by mere amendment is a barren hope.

Expressing the views of Australia, Mr. Hughes, the Australian prime minister, at the imperial conference in 1918, spoke as follows:

Especially in relation to its decisions on the commonwealth constitution, the privy council has not proved a satisfactory tribunal. That constitution has special features of its own—features which differentiate it from the Canadian constitution, and some of which bear close resemblance to the constitution of the United States. It is a complex instrument, almost every line of which has its roots in Australian history, and bears the marks of an ultimate compromise between conflicting views. The eminent judges ordinarily available on the judicial committee, for all their legal learning and judicial experience, have not among them a single man who is intimately familiar with this constitutional document, or with the vital processes underlying it, a knowledge of which is, in the case of any constitutional document, necessary to a full appreciation of both letter and spirit. Australia's experience of the privy council in constitutional cases has been, to say the least of it, unfortunate.

And referring to the decision of the judicial committee in the then recent royal commission case, Colonial Sugar Refining Company v. Brown, Mr. Hughes continued:

Its decision is one which must have caused great embarrassment and confusion, if it were not for the fortunate fact that the reasons for the judicial committee's decision are stated in such a way that no court and no counsel in Australia has yet been able to find out what they were. That is what must happen when a tribunal on the other side of the world, no matter how eminent and experienced its members may be, has cast upon it the duty of interpreting a complicated constitutional document with the history and principles of which no member of the court, and perhaps no counsel practising before the court, is especially familiar.

As stated by Sir Arthur Berriedale Keith in his work on Responsible Government in the Colonies (1927 edition) page 1102:

It is idle to deny that the taking of appeals to the privy council is a mark of inferior status and partial servility.

And again, at page 1104, he said:

The maintenance of the present position is just and proper so long as the dominions desire to remain dependencies. But to talk of free and autonomous nations and equal partners in the empire under the circumstances is childish folly.

Other hon. members will recall opinions expressed by leading counsel of other provinces of Canada, but I will cite only representative lawyers of the province of Quebec of which I am one of the representatives in this House of Commons.

No Canadian who knew intimately the late Eugene Lafleur, K.C., could have failed to be impressed by his legal learning, experience and insight in relation to matters of constitutional law. In a letter dated April 14, 1914, to Mr. J. E. Martin, K.C., who was then batonnier of the bar of Montreal, and who subsequently became chief justice of the superior court of Quebec, Mr. Lafleur said:

The reason usually advanced in favour of maintaining the appeal to the privy council is that it secures a decision from a tribunal which is free from local prepossessions and from political, religious or racial prejudices. Such a humiliating confession has never been made, so far as I am aware, by any autonomous colony or state and implies less confidence in the judiciary than in the legislatures. It is no answer to say that our governments have too often made appointments to the bench on the ground of political services rendered rather than on that of professional merit. This does not prove that competent men cannot be produced or secured to satisfy our requirements, but merely that proper means must be taken to attain this end instead of solving the difficulty by an admission of inferiority and an appeal for external assistance. And I venture to think that our governments will not feel their full responsibility in this respect until our courts are as supreme in their sphere as our legislatures are in theirs. (Senate Hansard, 1916, at page 293.)

The late Charles S. Campbell, K.C., of Montreal, one of the most reputable and experienced members of the Canadian bar, is reported in Senate Hansard, 1916, at page 542, as saying:

The only authority for saying that an appeal from the supreme court to the judicial committee exists is the decision of the committee itself. The real reasons no doubt were as they generally are, matters of policy; the ostensible reasons contained in their orders or reports are rarely the real ones and no doubt that is why the views of dissentient members are never made public. Obviously a decision which is at once politic and of doubtful legality would not command any acceptance if dissentient members' views upon it were expressed. The expression of opinion by all the members is the real strength of any appellate tribunal, because, if the views of the majority are of doubtful legality, they hesitate to put them into language which may be attacked by other members of the court.

Aime Geoffrion, K.C., in a letter published in the Senate Debates for 1916 at page 542, referring to appeals from the Supreme Court of Canada to the privy council, says:

I do not believe in the appeal, whether the (supreme) court is unanimous or divided, nor do I believe in it even in constitutional cases.

Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C., in his presidential address in 1931 to the Canadian Bar Association, said:

If I may venture to express a personal opinion, without attempting to commit anyone to it but myself, I would like to see all our constitutional disputes go to the Supreme Court of Canada, or at least such of them as are considered of sufficient importance to justify the intervention of His Majesty's attorneys general of the dominion and of any one or more of the provinces. I would like to see the decision given in the supreme court, if it were allowed to become a final decision, henceforth looked upon as a binding authority both on that court and on the privy council in all future similar cases.

I have also taken the liberty of translating into English certain passages from an address in the French language, which the right hon. the present Minister of Justice delivered to the Cercle Universitaire at Montreal, and which is reported in the Revue Trimestrielle for March 1932:

I cannot find a single reason to justify Canada being the only country in the world of her rank, her population and intellectual development to confess her inability to settle her own judicial conflicts. . . . Our judiciary and our bar need not look up to those of any other country. The partisans of appeal to the privy council claim that it constitutes a bond between the dominions and the crown, that it entitles every British citizen to go to the foot of the throne to obtain justice and, more particularly, that it is a safeguard for minorities. First of all, it is not true that all British citizens reach the foot of the throne through the good offices of the privy council. . . . In view of the conflicts which took place in Ireland, in Australia and even in Canada, following certain decisions rendered by the privy council, it is difficult to describe it as a powerful bond uniting the dominions to the crown. . . . As for the protection of minority rights by the privy council, that is a fable. . . . I wish to assail this ghost, this myth of the privy council safeguarding minority rights in opposition to our Supreme Court. And I entreat my compatriots never to lend themselves to the schemes of the reactionaries who have constantly opposed the development of Canadian autonomy and who boastfully declare that the right of appeal to England shall be upheld by Quebec. We, ourselves, are the best and truest guardians of our rights and traditions. No authority outside the land will defend them adequately in our stead. Canada has now attained her majority and can dispense with tutelage, even a judicial one.

I trust I have translated it fairly; I have endeavoured to do so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is better than the original.

Mr. CAHAN: Thank you.

It is sometimes alleged that the right of appeal to the judicial committee is the immemorial right of British subjects to present their claims at the "foot of the throne." This is a mere myth. The phrase is merely rhetorical and represents a figment of the imagination and not a scintilla of historical fact. The judicial committee is a statutory body to which the forty-seven millions of British subjects in the United Kingdom have no right of appeal.

It is alleged that the judicial committee is the guardian of minority rights in Canada, racial and religious. This is not true, as everyone, who has read the decisions of the judicial committee in Canadian appeals, knows full well.

It is alleged that the privy council of the United Kingdom is a link of empire. So it was formerly alleged that the powers of reserving and vetoing dominion legislation were links of empire; but all these powers, which prevailed in the colonial era, were found incompatible with our status as an autonomous dominion. The firm links of empire will be found in our allegiance to the throne, our historical traditions, our firm conviction that our highest political interests and the security of our country in a world of international strife and rivalry, are best conserved by our free association and close cooperation in matters of common interest with the people of the United Kingdom and the peoples of the other British dominions.

It is alleged that the privy council serves to maintain the uniformity of law throughout the empire, that "it keeps the law in step." Maintaining uniformity in the law is not a function of courts of law, but of the parliaments and legislatures of the commonwealth which enact the law. The common law does not prevail in all parts of the dominions. Uniformity is not the end of law. Laws must be adjusted to the locality and to the times and conditions in which the different peoples of the British Commonwealth of Nations move and live and have their being. The law as interpreted and decided by the judicial committee differs in form and substance from the law as embodied in decisions of the House of Lords, which has supreme judicial jurisdiction throughout the United Kingdom.

I yield to no other Canadian in my desire and determination, so far as it lies in my power, to maintain all honourable relations, between Canada and the United Kingdom, between Canada and other parts of the British Empire, which comport with our history, our traditions and the covenants, express and implied, into which this country has voluntarily entered, though I deprecate any spirit of sycophancy or servility. Now as I near the close of a long and active life, replete, it sometimes seems to me, with much of adversity and personal disappointment, I have one supreme desire, and that is to see Canada becoming more stalwart, strong and self-reliant, courageously confronting all its domestic difficulties, intelligently assuming its national responsibilities, and participating, as an autonomous dominion, in so far as it is within our competency so to do, in the satisfactory solution of the complex political problems of this era of time in which providence has placed us.

With these ends in view I move the second reading of this bill and earnestly recommend its provisions to the favourable consideration of this house.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The subject matter of the bill, the second reading of which my hon. friend has just moved, is very important and I am sure the house and the country will be gratified to him for having initiated this discussion to-day.

It is fortunate that a member of the standing and personality, the long experience and the public record of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) should be the one to initiate this discussion. Surely no motive can be assigned to his action, and the question may be discussed on its merits without any suggestion of lack of loyalty or of weakness in the love of British institutions, of which my hon. friend has always given evidence of being a fervent adherent.

I am sure my hon. friend is not optimistic enough to take it for granted that this bill will become law in consequence of this first step, but the mere fact that it will be in the domain of public discussion will ensure its engaging the attention of all those who are interested in constitutional questions in Canada, not only legal minds, but the plain people as well, because they are just as much interested as the others in the solution of this problem. The mere fact, I say, that it will be in the domain of public discussion will create a public opinion which will enable this parliament to decide the question as it should be decided, in the best possible sense.

The origin of appeals to the privy council goes back very far into the past. I was reading in Lefroy's work on the federal constitution that when William of Normandy became King of England, the Channel Islands were under the duchy of Normandy and were never subject to the jurisdiction of the English courts. But there was an appeal from the decisions of the Channel Islands courts to the King of England in his quality of Duke of Normandy in council, and then this was extended to all the British possessions beyond the seas.

Prior to 1833 the appeals were by way of special leave, what has been called by the privy council "a residuum of the royal prerogative of the sovereign as the fountain of justice." This appellate jurisdiction was usually exercised in a committee of the whole privy council, which, having heard the allegations, made a report to His Majesty in Council, by whom a judgment was finally given. It is only in 1833, as my hon. friend stated I think on first reading of his bill, that it became part of the law of Britain by the Act for the better Administration of Justice in His Majesty's Privy Council, which act was later given the shorter title of the Judicial Committee Act, 1833. Later, in 1844, this act was altered and modified and the jurisdiction was extended; and other acts still further altered and extended the jurisdiction. But all these clearly established that it had become a matter of statutory jurisdiction.

I wish to indicate first the nature of the appeals in Canada, the different classes of appeals from Canada to the privy council.

First, there are the appeals in all the provinces, except Ontario and Quebec, which are by special royal grant in virtue of former imperial orders in council passed under the Judicial Committee Acts. Those appeals are (a) appeals as of right when a certain amount or upwards is involved; and (b) with leave of the court from which the appeal is taken.

Second, there are the appeals allowed by provincial statutes in the case of Ontario and Quebec. By the Constitutional Act of 1791, which divided the old province of Quebec into two new provinces called Upper and Lower Canada, provision was made by section 34 for the establishment of a court of civil jurisdiction within each of the said provinces respectively, and the appeal to his majesty and his successors was mentioned. In exercise of the power conferred by the Constitutional Act of 1791 the legislature of each province —that is Quebec and Ontario, then Lower and Upper Canada—enacted the two statutes, 34 George III, chapter 6, in Lower Canada, and 34 George III, chapter 2, in Upper Canada, providing for those appeals to His Majesty in Council in certain cases.

Those statutes were continued in force by the Act of Union of 1840, subject to certain modifications, and they were continued in force by section 129 of the British North America Act. The statutes in Quebec and Ontario which provide for those appeals are the Privy Council Appeals Act, revised statutes of Ontario 1937, chapter 98, and for Quebec, Article 68 of the Quebec Civil Code of Procedure.

Third, there are the appeals by special leave of His Majesty in Council, from any court in Canada, as in all British dominions. The instances where the special leave is granted may be defined as: (a) where no appeal lies by grant from the dominion or colonial court; (b) where the court below has no power to grant leave, and (c) where it has power but has refused to grant leave to appeal.

As far as the dominion is concerned, the Supreme Court of Canada was established in 1875 by 38 Victoria, chapter 11, with "an appellate, civil and criminal jurisdiction within and throughout the Dominion of Canada." Section 47 of this act enacted that the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada should in all cases be final, and that no further appeal should be brought to "any court of appeal established by the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, by which appeals or petitions to Her Majesty in Council may be ordered to be heard, saving any right which Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Royal Prerogative."

Thereafter this act was transmitted, as the law provides, to England to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. Quite a number of letters were exchanged, there was voluminous correspondence and discussion between the Hon. Edward Blake, then Minister of Justice for Canada, and the Earl of Carnarvon, Colonial Secretary. The act was not disallowed. It was found that the preservation of the appeal by the exercise of the prerogative was sufficient to ensure its validity, and it could be left untouched and preserved. But the result is that there is no appeal of right from the Supreme Court of Canada; there must be special leave by the privy council in every instance.

I come now to our dominion legislation with regard to criminal appeals.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister leaves that, may I direct his attention to the fact that the king in council apparently has conferred upon provincial courts of last resort the right to grant appeals to the privy council. That is the practice with respect to appeals from Alberta and Saskatchewan, for instance; I am not quite sure about Manitoba. Perhaps the minister has something to say with respect to that order in council, which was a delegation of the power which the king in council exercised as a prerogative.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think I shall touch on that matter later on.

In 1887 the parliament of Canada passed an act to amend the law respecting procedure in criminal cases, and a new section was substituted for section 265 containing the following subsections:

(3) The judgment of the supreme court shall in all cases be final and conclusive.

(5) Notwithstanding any royal prerogative, or anything contained in the Interpretation Act or in the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, no appeal shall be brought in any criminal case from any judgment or order of any court in Canada to any court of appeal established by the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland by which appeals or petitions to Her Majesty in Council may be ordered to be heard.

This became section 1025 of the criminal code. It remained in our statutes without being challenged at any time until 1927, when a famous case originating in the province of Alberta went to the privy council, in which the validity of section 1025, doing away with appeals in criminal matters, was successfully attacked. The privy council declared that this section was ineffective, first because whatever powers the dominion had under the British North America Act were confined to action to be taken in the dominion. In other words we in Canada did not possess the power of giving extraterritorial jurisdiction to our legislation; and, as the privy council was a court or tribunal in England, under the British North America Act we in Canada could not abolish appeals to that court.

Mr. BENNETT: Which arose under an imperial statute.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. The other reason was that under the Colonial Laws Validity Act any legislation of a dominion which was repugnant to an imperial statute was ineffective and null, and that this section of the criminal code was repugnant to the imperial statute allowing appeals to the privy council. This, of course, as the house knows, gave rise to many comments in Canada. The next stage was the Statute of Westminster, in 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: 1931.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, it was 1931, though something had been done about it in 1930. The Statute of Westminster removed the two disabilities I have mentioned. It recognized that the dominions had the power of giving extraterritorial jurisdiction to their legislation, so the argument that the appeals were heard in London could no longer stand. In the second place, the Colonial Laws Validity Act was repealed as far as Canada and the dominions were concerned, so that the legislation of Canada, or of any other dominion, stands good even if it is in conflict with an imperial statute regarding the same matter.

In 1932 and 1933 this parliament reenacted section 1025, which had been declared null by the privy council in the Nadan case, and put it back in our statutes under the power conferred by the Statute of Westminster. This new section has stood the test of appeal to the privy council. The house will remember that in 1935 there were convictions in the courts of Quebec against certain coal companies after an investigation under the Combines Act. These companies tried to appeal those convictions to the privy council; they asked for special leave to appeal. That is the case of the British Coal Corporation and the King. The judicial committee, presided over by Lord Sankey, held that the new section of the criminal code was constitutionally effective to prohibit appeals to the king in council in criminal matters. I shall refrain from reading the copious notes I have of the judgment of Lord Sankey, but I wish to direct attention to these words:

> Such appeals seem to be essentially matters of Canadian concern, and the regulation and control of such appeals would thus seem to be a prime element in Canadian sovereignty as appertaining to matters of justice.

So, as far as criminal appeals are concerned, there is no longer any difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: The principle was considered to some extent also in the application for leave to appeal in the Riel case.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, but that was very long ago.

Mr. BENNETT: That was before the statute was passed.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. I come now to the other appeals. I submit that it is within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada to abolish any right of appeal to his majesty in council, whether by special leave or otherwise, from any court in Canada, in civil no less than in criminal cases. But before going on with that I desire to discuss the policy and the right. Is it desirable to do away with these appeals; and then, can we do it? In other words there is first the policy and then the right. As to the policy, with regard to appeals to the privy council the imperial conference of 1926 said:

> From these discussions it became clear that it was no part of the policy of His Majesty's government in Great Britain that questions affecting judicial appeals should be determined otherwise than in accordance with the wishes of the part of the empire primarily affected.

Then Berriedale Keith says:

> . . . it is obviously absurd to declare that Canada is autonomous and an equal member of the commonwealth of nations and at the same time hold that the courts of the dominions are unfit to do justice to an unfortunate lady who has an accident while seeking to enter a Canadian railway station, to take one of the issues recently decided by the privy council overruling the dominion courts.

As far back as 1923 Lord Haldane said:

> ". . . it is obviously proper that the dominions should more and more dispose of their own cases. . . . It becomes with the dominions more and more or less and less as they please." But although "several of the dominions have shown unmistakably that they wish to reduce its power over their affairs to the absolute minimum," the situation so created has not yet been adequately dealt with.

I also have before me a statement by Lord Haldane in an article published in The Empire Review of July, 1927, but I do not think I have time to read it.

I must say that my reasons for the views I hold with regard to this matter may differ from those expressed by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George. He is opposed to the appeals mostly, or perhaps not mostly but largely, because of the quality of the decisions which have been rendered by the privy council. I will say in defence of the privy council that very often unsuccessful litigants have complained about that court as much as unsuccessful litigants here complain about the supreme court, and I should not be surprised if before the end of this debate we hear some member say things about the supreme court just as harsh as my hon. friend has said about the privy council. There have been most eminent men sitting in the privy council, and many of them have held the confidence of the people of the dominions. The privy council has been criticized very severely, for instance, on account of its decisions on the reference with regard to the social legislation a year or so ago. But after all, the privy council merely affirmed the decision of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, and if there had been no privy council the result would have been the same. So I do not think it is quite fair to blame the privy council for those decisions as much as it has been blamed in some instances.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister mind my saying a word?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has overlooked the fact that the supreme court was bound by decisions of the privy council which entirely eliminated the words "trade and commerce" from consideration at all, as well as other words to which reference has already been made. The supreme court was bound by those decisions, and hence it is that their decisions were as they were.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I cannot very well accept that view, because the decisions have been blamed by reason of the fact that the privy council had decided otherwise than it had decided in previous cases. So if the supreme court was bound by the previous decisions of the privy council, I do not see how they could have differed now.

However, my reasons are largely those expressed by constitutional authorities like Berriedale Keith and others, and by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George when he said that the sovereignty of Canada still resides in the privy council. We are an equal nation in the commonwealth; we have full power in every domain as a nation, and I do not think anybody would differ from me when I say that when we are a nation of twenty-five or thirty millions of people, as we shall be some day, it would seem absurd that we should go across the seas to get a decision in an appeal from our own courts. If it would be absurd when we are twenty-five millions of people, it becomes not so wise when we are a nation of eleven or twelve millions.

Then there is the question of expense. We must admit that recourse to the privy council means an expenditure of money which many litigants in Canada cannot afford to incur, and that makes the privy council too much of a court where only the wealthy can carry their cases in the last resort.

There is something else, too. There is the question—what shall I call it?—of judicial consciousness. I think that our own supreme court will not be as it finally will be when it is definitely a court of last resort for all Canadian litigation.

It is stated—it was stated, because the argument is weakening from year to year—the the privy council is a symbol of unity. Well, a symbol of unity which creates dissatisfaction carries some danger within itself, and I do not think that argument is strong enough to prevent a rational decision in the matter.

May I give—it is important to have all the data; for this question will certainly be discussed in the country—a statistical survey of the appeals to His Majesty in Council since 1867.

There have been from the provincial courts between 1867 and 1938, 329 appeals to the privy council. In 187 cases the judgment was affirmed; in 131 cases the judgment was reversed, and in 10 cases it was modified.

From the supreme court there have been since the creation of the court 198 appeals to the Privy Council. In 117 cases the judgment was affirmed; in 74 cases the judgment was reversed, and in 5 cases it was modified.

From the exchequer court there have been three appeals. In one the judgment was affirmed, and in the other two the judgment was reversed.

I have also a table of all the constitutional cases in which appeals have been heard by the judicial committee, indicating the court, dominion or provincial, from which the appeal was taken.

From the provincial courts 70 appeals have been taken in constitutional matters; in 35 cases the judgments were affirmed, in 4 they were modified, and in 31 they were reversed.

From the Supreme Court of Canada there have been 68 appeals in constitutional cases; 49 judgments have been affirmed, 15 have been reversed, and 4 have been modified.

I come back now to my argument as to the competence of Canada—

Mr. BENNETT: May I interrupt? Those three appeals from the exchequer court were exclusive of exchequer court appeals from the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not think that was made quite clear.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Appeals from the exchequer court direct.

As to civil appeals relating to subject matters within the exclusive authority of the dominion parliament—and I think the bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) is limited to those appeals—I submit there is no doubt as to the competence of parliament to abolish those appeals. This is supported by the decision in the Nadan case, and I will also refer to the decision in the case of Cushing v. Dupuy (1880) 5 A.C., 409. The decision in that case was as follows:

> The Quebec code of civil procedure, article 1178, allowed an appeal to His Majesty in Council as of right from final judgments on appeal to the Court of Queen's bench of Quebec.

A dominion act made in virtue of the power conferred by section 91, bankruptcy and insolvency, gave the Court of Queen's Bench a bankruptcy jurisdiction. This dominion act provided that the judgment of the court in such matters as were in question in the case should be final. It went as far as the privy council, and the judicial committee held that this provision was intra vires the dominion parliament and effective to bar the right of appeal conferred in general terms by the civil code. Sir Montague Smith said:

> Procedure must necessarily form an essential part of any law dealing with insolvency. It is therefore to be presumed, indeed it is a necessary implication, that the imperial statute, in assigning to the dominion parliament the subjects of bankruptcy and insolvency, intended to confer on it legislative power to interfere with property, civil rights, and procedure within the provinces, so far as general law relating to those subjects might affect them. Their lordships therefore think that the parliament of Canada would not infringe the exclusive powers given to the provincial legislatures, by enacting that the judgment of the court of Queen's bench in matters of insolvency should be final, and not subject to the appeal as of right to Her Majesty in council allowed by article 1178 of the code of civil procedure.

In the Nadan case, Lord Cave expressed the same view.

Mr. BENNETT: In the Crown Grain Company case there was the converse of that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Exactly. By the Statute of Westminster the limitations on dominion legislative power imposed by the Colonial Laws Validity Act, by section 129 of the British North America Act as regards the repeal or alteration of laws in force in the provinces at the union which were enacted by or existed under imperial acts, and by the doctrine forbidding extraterritorial legislation, were abrogated, as shown in British Coal Corporation v. the King, which I have mentioned.

These legal restrictions on the legislative powers of the dominion parliament having been removed, obviously it is within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada to prevent any appeal in matters within its legislative authority. We come now to a more difficult point, as to civil appeals relating to subject matters within the exclusive legislative authority of the province. First, the regulation or prohibition of appeals from provincial or dominion courts to His Majesty in Council, whether in virtue of the prerogative or a statutory grant, transcends provincial legislative authority and, therefore, is within the exclusive legislative competence of the parliament of Canada, in virtue either of its residuary power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, or of its exclusive and paramount power under section 101 of the British North America Act to establish a general court of appeal for Canada. Section 101 reads:

> The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

In virtue of the powers so conferred, the parliament of Canada established the Supreme Court of Canada, as I stated before, and provided that the supreme court should have appellate jurisdiction, civil and criminal, within and throughout the Dominion of Canada. The decisions which have been given by both the supreme court and the privy council afford authority for the propositions which I am going to submit. First, the legislative power conferred by section 101 may be exercised—this is the language of the section—notwithstanding anything in the act. The language of the privy council in the case of Tenant v. the Union bank, plainly indicates that parliament, so long as it relates strictly to these matters, is to be the paramount authority and to the extent that the provincial judicial system is repugnant to the legislation of the parliament of Canada within the scope of section 101, the provincial arrangements would not be valid.

In the Crown Grain Company case, to which my right hon. friend has just referred, it has been clearly ruled that provincial legislation cannot take away jurisdiction conferred upon the supreme court by the Supreme Court Act. In that case, as my right hon. friend will remember, it was held that the Manitoba Mechanics and Wageearners Lien Act, which enacted that in suits relating to liens the judgment of the Manitoba Court of King's Bench would be final and that no appeals should lie therefrom, was ultra vires of the provincial jurisdiction because no provincial act can circumscribe the appellate jurisdiction granted to the supreme court by the dominion parliament under section 101. I could quote what was said by Lord Robertson, who delivered the judgment of the board in that case, but I shall not.

Mr. BENNETT: It was a very brief judgment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The same thing was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada in Consolidated Distilleries Limited v. Consolidated Exporters Corporation. In that connection there is a very able judgment by the late Mr. Justice Newcombe. In Danjou v. Marquis, Mr. Justice Fournier held:

(Translation) As there is no doubt that the federal government has the right to subject these cases to appeal, any provincial legislation then existing to the contrary notwithstanding, it seems to me this provision should be given its full and complete effect.

Moreover, it is quite competent for the dominion parliament to allow an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from judgments of provincial courts, even though such judgments may not be final nor such courts the courts of final resort. This also has been decided by the courts. I shall quote the words of the late Chief Justice Taschereau in the case of L'Association St. Jean-Baptiste de Montreal v. Brault, where he said:

Section 101 of the British North America Act, 1867, enacts that notwithstanding the exclusive jurisdiction given to the provincial legislatures over civil rights, the parliament of Canada has the power to provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada, without restricting the power, as it does for additional courts of first instance, to the administration of laws of Canada.

It will be observed that this judgment points out that the power to constitute a general court of appeal for Canada is not restricted by the concluding words of the section, "for the better administration of the laws of Canada." Those words applied only to the establishment of other courts.

Mr. BENNETT: Like the exchequer court or the board of railway commissioners.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Exactly, That judgment was affirmed by the privy council, and Sir Barnes Peacock, who pronounced the decision, used words to the same effect: Another important consideration is the fact that provincial legislatures have no power to grant an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada; this is a federal power.

In the case of Union Colliery Company v. Attorney General for British Columbia, the legislature of British Columbia had enacted the power of referring questions to the appeal court of British Columbia with a provision for appeals, and the Supreme Court of Canada held that no appeal lies to the Supreme Court of Canada from the opinion of the British Columbia court on such a reference. If it was the intention of the act to create such an appeal, it was beyond the powers of the legislature of the province, and the appeal was quashed.

Mr. BENNETT: Although it will be remembered that in our similar act we did provide that there should be appeals to the privy council.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And they copied it, limiting it to the Supreme Court of Canada rather than the judicial committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, but the legislature of British Columbia could not do any such thing.

Mr. BENNETT: I have sometimes doubted whether we could until after we got extra-territorial powers.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Here is what I desire to submit. The power vested in the parliament of Canada by section 101, made exercisable as it is notwithstanding anything in that act, would authorize legislation giving the Supreme Court of Canada in its character of "a general court of appeal for Canada" not merely appellate civil and criminal jurisdiction as at present, but exclusive appellate civil and criminal jurisdiction in respect of all appeals, and rendering the judgment of this court final and conclusive. Such legislation would in my opinion involve no encroachment upon the powers of the provinces. The powers of the provinces in matters of administration of justice are in section 92 of the British North America Act, and they read as follows:

The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

There is no doubt that the giving or withholding of an appeal is a matter of procedure. The provinces have the right to provide for courts of appeal and appeals, but they are limited by section 92 to "in the province"; they cannot go outside, and that is the reason why they could not provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Their jurisdiction, their power of creating a court of appeal, is limited by the words "in the provinces." With this the dominion parliament would have no power to interfere. But the regulation of appeals in civil cases from provincial courts to an appellate court which is not provincial is a matter clearly extraneous to the power to provide for "the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts," or to prescribe the "procedure in civil matters in those courts." It is only the parliament of Canada which can give or take away the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. No provincial legislation can give it or deny it. This is abundantly established by the decisions which I have quoted.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the essence of our confederation scheme.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is the essence; but I believe that by parity of reasoning no provincial legislature can regulate or prohibit appeals to his majesty in council. If they cannot prohibit appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada because it is outside the province, they surely cannot legislate with regard to the privy council.

It follows that if the regulation of appeals in civil matters from provincial courts to an appellate court which is not provincial is a matter which is outside of the scope of provincial legislative authority, the legislatures of Ontario and Quebec have no power to repeal or alter the statutory provisions respecting appeals as of right to his majesty in council, and less still have they power to repeal appeals under the prerogative.

Mr. BENNETT: Or under the orders in council.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Or under the orders in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Because they are imperial orders in council.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Exactly. But if, as the judicial committee has said in the British Coal Corporation case, "such appeals seem to be essentially matters of Canadian concern, and the control and regulation of such appeals thus seem to be a prime element in Canadian sovereignty as appertaining to matters of justice," therefore as the powers distributed by the British North America Act between the dominion on the one side and the provinces on the other side "cover the whole area of self-government"—I am using the language of the privy council in the case of Attorney General of Ontario v. Attorney General of Canada, in 1912—"within the whole area of Canada," and "it would be subversive of the entire scheme and policy of the act to assume that any point of internal self-government was withheld from Canada," the power to regulate appeals to the king in council in civil matters, if it is not vested, as I think I have conclusively shown, in the provincial legislatures, must be vested in the dominion parliament, because we cover the whole area.

In my opinion this power is vested in the dominion government either in virtue of its residuary power under the opening words of section 91, "to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada" or under section 101, to provide for "the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada." In re County Courts of British Columbia, Mr. Justice Strong, speaking with the concurrence of the other judges of the supreme court, said:

> The constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts plainly includes the power to define the jurisdiction of such courts territorially as well as in other respects.

If that is true of a provincial court, surely it is true of the power of the parliament of Canada to define territorially the powers of its courts. The power given to the parliament of Canada for the establishment of a final court of appeal seems plenary, complete and paramount. If legislation such as that now embodied in the Supreme Court Act authorizing or permitting appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada from provincial courts, be legislation relating to "the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada," I can see no reason for thinking that legislation requiring all such appeals to come to the Supreme Court of Canada would not be equally legislation relating strictly to the matters covered by such words.

But I have a second argument. In the Nadan case the section of our code providing that there should be no appeal in criminal matters was declared ineffective because we did not possess the extraterritorial operation that we could give to our legislation. This has disappeared by the Westminster act, but it has not disappeared as far as the legislatures of the provinces are concerned. True, the Colonial Laws Validity Act was repealed for the legislation of the provinces as well as the legislation of this parliament—

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —but under the extraterritorial jurisdiction—

Mr. BENNETT: Except that we gave the provinces some extraterritorial jurisdiction.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, but it is closely limited. They would not have the extraterritorial power which is necessary to enable them to prohibit appeals to the privy council.

Mr. BENNETT: To repeal the provisions of an imperial statute.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): To repeal an imperial statute. They have no legislative capacity in that respect any more than they had before, and therefore if extraterritoriality of operation is essential to the legal efficacy of any law designed to abrogate the right of his majesty in council to grant leave of appeal from any provincial court, then the subject matter of such law clearly falls outside of and transcends provincial authority; and if my reasoning is correct it has to go somewhere, and it has to fall within the legislative powers of the only Canadian legislative body competent to make a law having extra-territorial operation, and that is the parliament of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Right there I have some difficulty. In view of the orders in council that delegated to the courts of last resort in the provinces the power to grant appeals to the privy council, a question arises as to who has jurisdiction to repeal or rescind those orders in council.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Unfortunately—not unfortunately, because I believe it is better it should be so—nothing has ever happened which could give to the provinces the right to repeal.

Mr. BENNETT: I am clear the provinces have not the power. About that there is no doubt. I am speaking, however, of the question whether we have the power.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does not my right hon. friend think that the Westminster act confers full authority?

Mr. BENNETT: I have had some doubt about that. I apologize for interrupting the minister's argument.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): With regard to the bill presented by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I quite realize that he would abolish appeals from the provincial courts as well as from the Supreme Court of Canada on matters within the competence of the parliament of Canada. Section 3 provides that no appeal shall lie or be brought from any judgment or order of any court in Canada, in relation to any matter within the competence of the parliament of Canada. I am afraid that a sort of chaotic condition would result if appeals could be instituted from some courts in Canada on some matters, which could not be taken from the supreme court on the same matters. In Australia for a time the commonwealth had done away with appeals in constitutional matters and the states had appealed to the privy council on the same matters which had been appealed to the supreme court of the commonwealth. The judgments which were rendered were different, and the Supreme Court of Australia refused to accept the views of the privy council. Quite a confusion was created for some time, though finally appeals were done away with in the states on the same questions.

If on appeals argument should arise as to whether the matter which is concerned in the case is one which is within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada or of the province, there would be discussions of all sorts; and with the view I have expressed, that this parliament has the paramount power to do away with all appeals and that we could do it, I would rather have us, if we did it at all, make it apply to all judgments from all the courts in Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: I should be very glad to see an amendment in committee to that effect, but I am now going so far as may be absolutely assured by present decisions.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As regards the extent to which my hon. friend goes, there is no question as to the power of this parliament to do it. But as he may see, the question is so vitally important that, for myself at any rate, I should like it to be further discussed and investigated—and this is not to suggest procrastination, a favourite word on many occasions—before we take a step which would be very important. Before doing so I think that everyone should have the time and the occasion to study the matter to the fullest extent.

I conclude my remarks by extending anew my thanks and congratulations to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): I am very glad that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) concluded his remarks by thanking the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) for introducing this bill; for it is with words of thanks to the hon. member that I wish to commence my remarks on this subject. He is entitled to the sincere thanks of the Canadian people.

I was very glad to hear the Minister of Justice express the view that it was within the competence of this parliament effectively to prohibit all appeals in all matters from all Canadian courts. I entirely concur in that expression of opinion. There were doubts in my mind as to whether it was competent for this parliament effectively to prohibit appeals in respect of those matters that are within the legislative jurisdiction of the various provinces, but I have come to the view that since the Statute of Westminster, 1931, this parliament has full and plenary jurisdiction effectively to prohibit all appeals in respect of all matters under either section 91 or section 101 of the British North America Act or under a combination of both sections.

I do not intend at this juncture to deal further with the legal argument; it was dealt with in a comprehensive manner by the Minister of Justice. Nor shall I at this stage discuss the effectiveness of the language used by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George in the bill that he has presented to the house. It may be necessary to consider some amendments, but we can attack that problem when the bill is in committee.

I shall confine myself to the principles involved in the measure that is now proposed. In my opinion the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has not been a satisfactory court for Canada. It is also my opinion that its decisions have in the main and in their totality caused great harm to Canadian national development, and constitute a menace to Canadian national unity. It is also my opinion that the retention of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is now an anachronism, a survival of colonial inferiority, and inconsistent both with our right and with our duty as an autonomous nation.

I do not deny that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has included within its ranks many distinguished jurists, but I suggest that on many occasions they have not possessed adequate knowledge of Canadian conditions. They have not often visited Canada; they do not know the Canadian people or the conditions under which they live, nor have they adequately understood the changes that are inherent in the rapid growth of a new nation. They have themselves admitted this deficiency on their own part, by inviting Canadian judges and judges from the other dominions to join the board.

Moreover, there has been little continuity in the membership of the court. Indeed, there has been less continuity of membership in this court than in any other British court in the world. The result has been confusion and uncertainty. They have frequently decided constitutional cases that came before them without any evidence, or without adequate evidence of the issue that was before the court. It is not an infallible court; indeed, it has made many errors and has frequently reversed itself; sometimes these reversals have been by strange and circuitous methods.

I am prepared to judge this court by its record. I agree with the Minister of Justice that it is unwise to make sweeping generalizations; indeed, it is impossible to do so. I am free to admit that many fine decisions have emanated from that body, but I have been driven to the conclusion, after many years of study, that in many vital and fundamental aspects their decisions have done almost irreparable harm to Canadian national development, and constitute a menace to Canadian national unity. I should, therefore, like to see all appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and particularly appeals in constitutional cases, immediately abolished.

I have frequently and for many years urged the abolition of all such appeals. I did so a year ago, when it was my privilege to speak on the subject of the decisions of that body. In the course of what I said a year ago I made four main charges against the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and its decisions. I stated, first, that the court was a court not of law but of political expediency: second, that it had mutilated the structure of our federal system and changed its basic character contrary to the spirit of confederation and contrary to the clear intent of the British North America Act itself: third, that its decisions had done serious harm to Canadian national development, and, finally that it had failed to protect minority rights. I need not repeat what I said a year ago in proof of the charges that I then made. I have given many years of study to Canadian constitutional law and welcome this opportunity of expressing myself once again in favour of the abolition of all appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I venture the hope that we shall soon see an end to any further disintegration of our national structure at the hands of that body.

What is the greatest issue now before the Canadian people? Can there be any doubt as to the answer? It is whether Canada shall be a great and united nation, able through this parliament to discharge its national obligations for the welfare of the Canadian people. It was the dream of the fathers of confederation that in North America there should be built a great new nation enjoying the freedom and the liberty inherent in the British constitution, and uniting the various racial stocks of which it was composed with the common bond of Canadian nationhood. It was Sir Wilfrid Laurier's proud hope that the twentieth century should belong to Canada. How far we are from this dream of the fathers of confederation! How far we are from the realization of the wish of Sir Wilfrid Laurier! Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there are more disintegrating influences in operation in Canada to-day than ever before in our history. We in this national parliament must become alive to that fact. Thinking men throughout Canada are becoming alarmed. The Canadian people are calling for action.

We see these disintegrating influences operating on every hand. The forces of communism and the forces of fascism are threatening our democratic system. In the great province of Quebec, which we have always regarded as one of the great bulwarks of Canadian nationality, there is a ferment going on which we who do not live in that province do not understand. There is a narrow, selfish provincialism rampant in some quarters in Ontario and elsewhere in Canada. There is discord and discontent in the western prairies, as a protest against the existing order. Our national life is in danger unless we take national action to save ourselves. Let it not be thought for a moment that I am advocating any sort of national government. But I do call upon the Canadian people to assert their rights and to perform their duties as a Canadian nation.

It is my considered opinion that the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have been an important factor contributing to this disintegration of our nation to which I have referred. Many of their decisions have deliberately weakened the bonds of confederation, with the result that this national parliament has been left powerless to deal with many problems that are national in their character. We are wearing a constitutional strait-jacket fashioned for us by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and shall never be able to discharge our national obligations until we are released from that strait-jacket.

A year ago I made the charge that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had mutilated the structure of our federal system and changed its basic character. They did this in two ways. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has elaborated in some detail the method the judicial committee followed in this regard. In the first place they cut down the jurisdiction of this parliament by whittling down the meaning of the words "peace, order and good government of Canada" and "trade and commerce," as these words are found in section 91 of the British North America Act, so that they are now almost meaningless.

Mr. BENNETT: And by expanding—

Mr. THORSON: Yes. On the other hand they increased the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures by enlarging beyond all reason the meaning of the words "property and civil rights in the provinces" and "generally all matters of a merely local and private nature in the province." This course of action on their part has resulted in withholding from this parliament the jurisdiction necessary to deal with national matters and has weakened our power to deal with national problems in the manner in which they should be dealt with. On the other hand there has been assigned to the provincial legislatures jurisdiction over many matters that were never contemplated as being of a provincial character when the British North America Act was framed. The result has been that the provincial legislatures either cannot discharge the obligations that now rest upon them, or do not dare by themselves to discharge them. We have reached an impasse that threatens confederation itself.

I have not time, Mr. Speaker, to deal in detail with the matters that have been held to be outside the jurisdiction of this parliament. I can enumerate them only very briefly. It has been held, for example, that we cannot legislate with regard to the matter of insurance; yet the whole institution of insurance, by its growth and its importance, has assumed the character of a national institution. Nor can we in this parliament inaugurate a national unemployment insurance scheme; yet everyone realizes that in Canada it is not possible to inaugurate any scheme of unemployment insurance unless such scheme is undertaken as a national venture. We have no adequate control over industry. We cannot prevent profiteering in industry; it has been so held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Nor have we adequate control over unfair practices in industry, even although such practices may be nation-wide in their extent. Nor have we that control over the incorporation of companies that we ought to have and would have had if the decision of the supreme court in the famous Bonanza Creek case had prevailed. We cannot deal effectively with labour problems, such as hours of labour, days of rest, wages or conditions of labour, nor can we set up effective machinery for the conciliation of labour disputes. We had effective machinery for that purpose and we used it for eighteen years, until in 1924 the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held that the Lemieux act was ultra vires. Even if this country as a nation enters into treaty obligations on the subject of labour conditions and labour generally, it is not possible for this national parliament to implement these national obligations by national legislation. Similarly we cannot in this parliament—nor it would seem, anywhere in Canada—validly enact comprehensive marketing legislation, even if we desired to do so. There is a curious no man's land that has been created in respect of this subject. The dominion cannot pass the necessary legislation because it interferes with property and civil rights in the provinces, nor can the provinces legislate effectively, because there is an interference with the dominion jurisdiction over trade and commerce. Then, too, Mr. Speaker, we cannot deal with national social problems. We cannot even attempt to deal with social security in a national way. In this parliament we can raise money by any method of taxation, but our right to spend the money is seriously in dispute. If the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in regard to the unemployment insurance act is sound—and I do not think it is—then this parliament cannot spend money for any object that is not within the legislative competence of this parliament. To this state of affairs we have come through decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and by the deliberate act of the judicial committee. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George read the panegyric which Lord Haldane delivered with regard to the work done by Lord Watson, in which he praised Lord Watson as an imperial statesman for making the business of laying down the new law that was necessary his own, and for completely altering the tendency of the decisions of the supreme court, that had been followed during the first twenty years of the history of that court. May we be saved from further imperial statesmanship of that sort. The fathers of confederation saw the weakness of the central authority in the United States as it had been created in that country, and they deliberately determined that in Canada there should be a centralized federalism with the residue of legislative power in the dominion parliament. For twenty years the Supreme Court of Canada upheld this viewpoint and uniformly maintained it; but when Lord Watson came upon the scene, he deliberately altered the tendency of these decisions, with the result that the basic character of the federalism of Canada has been changed so that we now have a decentralized federalism with the residue of legislative power in the provinces.

In the result we are left powerless in this national parliament to deal with national problems for lack of the necessary jurisdiction, and the provinces cannot effectively deal with the duties that have been assigned to them because they have not the necessary powers of taxation. We in Canada are wallowing in a constitutional morass. It was not necessary for the preservation of provincial rights that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should have gone as far as it did. I venture the opinion that the privy council failed to grasp and understand the spirit of confederation. They did not understand Canada and its national growth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what action should be taken by us to recover our national position? Some way must be found to undo the harm that has been done to our country by the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and to recover for this national parliament the necessary power to deal with national problems.

In the first place, we must prohibit all further appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. This is necessary for the reconstruction of Canada. We would not as Canadians for a moment permit any outside legislative body to legislate for Canada. Why, then, should we permit an outside judicial body to legislate for us indirectly as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has done? I am glad to see this move for the abolition of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In constitutional cases, particularly, the appeal should be prohibited immediately, in order that further violation of our national structure may be prevented.

It is not sufficient, however, merely to prohibit further appeals. We must do something more, for the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council will still prevail and be binding upon us. We must free ourselves from the constitutional strait-jacket that now confines us. To that end Canadian statesmanship of a high order must be directed. We must face the task of recasting our constitution so that Canada will be able to discharge its national obligations for the welfare of the Canadian people. That task will not be an easy one. It will call for courage—great courage, but the cause is a great one—the creation of a great Canadian nation able to discharge effectively its national obligations.

How is this great task to be performed? In the first place, we must recapture the spirit of confederation. We must determine, as the fathers of confederation did, that Canada shall be a great nation. We must face boldly and courageously the task of recasting our constitution. We must see to it that this parliament is vested with the necessary jurisdiction over national matters. We must take care not to interfere with minority rights. Indeed, we must guarantee minority rights so that they shall be preserved inviolate. There is a great distinction that ought to be drawn between minority rights and provincial jurisdiction. The former we must preserve and guarantee, but there is no reason why national matters should continue to remain within the jurisdiction of the provinces. There is plenty of scope for the provincial jurisdiction; there are many matters for the provinces to deal with that are best left to them.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we must revive the spirit of Canadian national consciousness. That spirit made our troops in France a great fighting force. It can make our people a great nation in the cause of peace. After all, what is the one bond that unites all Canadians? We live in a great country, with great possibilities, but it is a difficult country to govern. There are many racial stocks within its borders, and the economic interests of its various sections are widely divergent. I need not elaborate this further; for every member of the house realizes the difficulty of devising policies of universal application in the various sections of this country. Yet there is one unity amongst us all. The French-Canadians, the Canadians of British stock, the Canadians of foreign-born stock, have one thing in common: We are all Canadians and can unite in a common Canadian cause. That cause is the cause of Canadian nationhood. Surely, as Canadians, we can rip from ourselves the constitutional straight-jacket that now confines our actions, and face with courage and determination, in the cause of Canada, the necessary reforms of our constitution that will give this national parliament power to discharge its national obligations and at the same time enable the legislatures of the provinces to discharge their proper and appropriate functions.

I have great hope that we shall receive some assistance in this task from the report of the Rowell commission on dominion-provincial relations. I was very glad to see the wide scope of that commission; I was particularly pleased with this paragraph in the terms of reference:

> That the commissioners be instructed to consider and report upon the facts disclosed by their investigations; and to express what in their opinion, subject to the retention of the distribution of legislative powers essential to a proper carrying out of the federal system in harmony with national needs and the promotion of national unity, will best effect a balanced relationship between the financial powers and the obligations and functions of each governing body, and conduce to a more efficient, independent and economical discharge of government responsibilities in Canada.

I hope that the findings and recommendations of this national commission will open a new door to the future and will indicate the constitutional reforms that ought to be made. If they do, then we can accomplish the necessary recasting of our constitution. That task must be faced—it must be faced with courage and determination. It will call for Canadian statesmanship of a high order, but it will be a task worthy of the greatest Canadian statesmanship; those who face it will do a great service to the Canadian people; if they succeed, a great new nation will be born.

It is also my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the retention of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is now an anachronism, a survival of colonial inferiority, and inconsistent with our rights and our duties as members of a commonwealth of autonomous self-governing dominions. The appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were meant for the colonies. Canada is no longer a colony. It is a self-governing, autonomous community, equal in status with all the other British nations that make up the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Mr. BENNETT: All freely associated.

Mr. THORSON: Certainly, freely associated. Great Britain does not use the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as its court of last resort. It has as its court of last resort the House of Lords at Westminster; we in Canada should use at Ottawa our own court of last resort, the Supreme Court of Canada; make it in real truth a Supreme Court for the whole of Canada. Australia has limited appeals in constitutional cases, and as a result she has not suffered from the constitutional impasse which it has been the misfortune of Canada to endure.

I have often been asked why it is that Canadian students who attend English universities almost invariably come back to Canada stauncher Canadians than they were when they left our shores to attend the English schools. It is natural that this should be the result; there is nothing unnatural about it. These Canadian students who go to the homes of learning in England and elsewhere in the British isles learn the essential spirit of the British constitution, that is, that it is the right and the duty of all peoples who live under the British constitution to govern themselves in every aspect of government, internal and external, and that they must exercise every function of self-government, legislative, executive and judicial. It is more consistent with the essence of the British constitution than otherwise that Canadians should be good Canadians and should assert for themselves their rights to self-government, and assume all the duties of self-government. We cannot call ourselves a self-governing dominion as long as we allow such an important function of government as the judicial function to be exercised for us by a tribunal not our own. The British Coal Corporation case decided an important point. Viscount Sankey spoke of the regulation and control of appeals as a prime element of Canadian sovereignty. As long as we tolerate a continuation of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, we cannot claim Canadian sovereignty; we cannot claim that we are a self-governing dominion. It is more consistent with the best that is in the British constitution that we should prohibit appeals than that we should any longer retain them. As a devout believer in Canada, and in its destiny as a great nation, and as a devout believer in the fundamentals of the British constitution which underly the Canadian constitution, I welcome the abolition of all appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as the assertion of a national right and the assumption of a national duty.

Furthermore, as the Minister of Justice has stated, the abolition of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council will strengthen the Supreme Court of Canada and raise it in the esteem of the Canadian people. Its decisions and its importance as a national institution have been lessened to some extent by the fact that its judgments are not final, but are subject to review and reversal by a body outside of Canada. It should be the duty of Canada to attract the ablest and best of our Canadian lawyers to our supreme court bench and make the Supreme Court of Canada a great institution for the maintenance of Canadian unity.

May I again thank the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George for the great service he has performed in introducing this bill. The prohibition of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is an essential step that should be taken at this stage of our history. It is necessary to the reconstruction of Canada as a great nation, and it is necessary to the maintenance of that new nation if we have the courage to face the task of reconstruction. A belief in the destiny of Canada will give us the necessary courage. It is with great pleasure that I support the second reading of this bill.

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 15, to incorporate The Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company—Mr. Damude—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 8—Power to construct bridge.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the bill was last before the committee section 8 was under consideration.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): After listening carefully f · some time to the arguments pro and con the proposals for each of the bridges, I have come to the conclusion that neither of them represents the proper kind of bridge to be erected. In my opinion a bridge should be constructed as soon as possible and be absolutely free of tolls. When the private bridge company had its property removed by an act of nature, there was removed something which had been obsolete for some years, and an opportunity was given to Canada and the United States to erect a structure worthy to connect these two great Anglo-Saxon countries. For a number of years both countries have been trying to remove tolls from their roads and bridges, and now the opportunity has come for them to join in establishing a really modern, up to date bridge, one which should be, as I have said, toll free from the day of its completion.

Niagara falls is recognized everywhere as one of the wonders of the world. On one side of that great panorama is the Dominion of Canada and on the other side the United States—two of the most progressive countries in the new world, countries which have done a great deal in removing old-fashioned ideas and out of date customs. I believe we should take such action as will enable people from the old world who visit us to understand something of why the boundary between our two great countries is unprotected by troops and forts, and we should be able to show them something which will symbolize the good fellowship and friendly feeling which exist between us, who may truly call ourselves cousins. I believe the construction of a toll free bridge would encourage tourist traffic between us and would make us better acquainted with each other and with the possibilities of our respective countries.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether by a "toll free bridge" he means a private bridge or a publicly constructed bridge?

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): If the hon. member will be so good as to wait a minute, I shall come to that point. A toll free bridge would be made possible only through the association of the United States and Canada in bearing the cost of construction and maintenance. Under those circumstances I should not be greatly concerned about the general expenditure which will be involved. The expenditure involved should not be an obstacle, because, divided between the two countries, it can be but very small. When one considers the great advertising possibilities of this bridge, as a monument, for one thing, to the neighbourliness of two great countries that have lived in peace and harmony side by side for over one hundred years, without any force to keep the peace between them, why should that fact not be advertised? I do not want to take up much of the time of the committee—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Well, I suggest that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Damude) ought to thank me a little for this speech. I was about to say that I should like to see this matter referred back to the committee and brought back into the house with a proposal for a toll free bridge; and that should be done as soon as possible, because every day of delay means that the town of Niagara Falls, and for that matter the whole dominion and the United States as well, are losing revenue which would be derived if the bridge were constructed forthwith. The only point that seems to me to favour the present company is that they will be able to construct the bridge immediately, and I believe there is a possibility of these two great countries getting together and taking care of any expenditures that may be required and protecting any rights that the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company may have in the matter. I submit that the parties concerned should get together and construct a toll free bridge for Canada as soon as possible.

Mr. DUFFUS: This is the fifth occasion on which this matter has come before the committee. I have in my hand a copy of Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company, and also a draft copy of the United States act dealing with the same matter. I wish to refer to the discussion which has taken place on this bill, and it is not my purpose to take up the time of the committee talking about the people of the United States or Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Did the hon. gentleman say that there was a United States act? My information was that they declined to pass it.

Mr. DUFFUS: I said I have a copy of it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the one which was introduced, but it was not passed.

Mr. DUFFUS: May I say I have listened to the discussion of this important international matter, and to say the least I am amazed to note that the objections have emanated almost entirely from one group in the house. I have before me a list of the names of those hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and in addition to that of the hon. member for Rosedale, who has just sat down, we have had speeches from the hon. member for Davenport—

Mr. MacNICOL: You can always count on him.

Mr. DUFFUS: —the hon. member for Lincoln, the hon. member for Danforth, the hon. member for Broadview, the hon. member for Danforth again, the hon. member for Waterloo South, the hon. member for Davenport once more, and the hon. member for Rosedale.

An hon. MEMBER: And now the hon. member for Peterborough West.

Mr. DUFFUS: Something has been said about a nigger in the woodpile. I do not know which of these hon. gentlemen is supposed to be the nigger, but one thing I am sure of is that the woodpile is pretty well Tory. When this matter first came up I did not intend to speak, but now I find it difficult to refrain from doing so. The obstruction looks to me like a filibuster, and in my opinion it is doing the people of Ontario and of the dominion a grave injustice at this time. As a member of the committee I have listened to and have gone into the evidence. I have also read the bill. As I understand the situation, the government of Ontario, through a corporation, is seeking the consent of this parliament to construct a bridge over Niagara river from Niagara Falls, Ontario, to Niagara Falls, New York, to replace a bridge formerly known as the "Falls View" or "Honeymoon" bridge, which, as has been said many times in this debate, was destroyed by nature in January of this year. I believe that nature, or shall I say Divine Providence, has been extremely kind in removing the old bridge. At times there have been several hundred automobiles and trucks simultaneously on the bridge, and had the bridge collapsed with those automobiles and trucks and many more hundreds of people, it would have been, to say the least, an international catastrophe.

I have been told—and I believe it is true—that 5,304,000 people passed over the old bridge in the course of only seven months during the year 1937, and I believe it is our duty as public men not only to the present but to succeeding generations to see that there is an adequate bridge at this point. Now that the old bridge is gone, I submit that the most serviceable structure that reasonable means and human ingenuity can provide is the only one that should be considered at this time, if ample service and accommodation are to be maintained.

The United States tourist trade, to Canada and particularly to the people of the province of Ontario, is an important consideration. It is, and will continue to be, a major factor in the social and economic well-being, not only of the people of Ontario but of the dominion at large. The tourist trade is fast becoming our greatest industry and it is of increasing economic importance to the country. Moreover, its increase in gasoline revenue is a large and important item to the people of Ontario. I contend that free and uninterrupted traffic to and from the United States at this point will greatly assist the tourist trade and that ample facilities for customs and immigration inspection should be provided because that, too, is of vital importance to people on both sides of the river, as well as those from elsewhere who wish to cross the bridge from time to time.

I repeat that the present delay constitutes a loss to all of the people of Ontario and to many in the dominion, except perhaps to those who live in the city of St. Catharines according to the contention of the hon. member for Lincoln. When the matter was discussed in the railway committee it was said that it had been rushed through. On the first day the committee sat two-thirds of the morning was spent by those who were introducing this new proposal. On the second day at least two-thirds of the time of the committee was spent by those who were opposing it, and who were interested in the old bridge. With the exception of the hon. members who have objected to the proposal in this house, the opinion of the members of the committee was practically unanimous. I have been told that no bill of this kind has been given greater consideration in many years. I cannot substantiate that, because I have not been a member very long. At any rate let me say that tourists and motorists going to and fro between the United States and Canada are usually in a hurry. Delay is irritating and not in the best interests of the tourist trade or likely to create good will with our United States neighbours. Having regard for ample accommodations and the necessary outlay now and in the future, I am convinced that a structure backed and maintained by the province of Ontario and the state of New York is the only type that would be wholly satisfactory in these days of rapidly increasing tourist traffic. Roads and highways constructed only a few years ago are now found to be totally inadequate. It is the duty of public men to guard carefully against a recurrence of this condition of affairs. I should like to read to the committee a couple of verses which express this point of view:

Hordes of autos now remind us
We should build our roads to stay,
And departing leave behind us
Roads that will not blow away.

When our children pay the mortgage
Our fathers made to build those roads,
They'll not have to ask the question—
"Here's the bonds, but where's the roads?"

That pretty well expresses my conviction on this matter, and in the interests of the people of the United States, Ontario and the Dominion of Canada as a whole I am prepared wholeheartedly to support this bill. I think that delay will be a serious mistake and loss to the people of Ontario. Why those hon. members who represent constituencies in Ontario adjacent to Niagara Falls are holding up this bill is beyond my conception.

An hon. MEMBER: What are you doing now?

Mr. DUFFUS: I have not spoken several times as some hon. members have. Further, let me say that the bridge should be adequate to accommodate increasing tourist traffic for the next seventy-five years. The city of Niagara Falls seems to be quite satisfied with the proposed bridge, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Welland when he read to the committee a resolution passed by the city council to this effect. In addition, the proposed new bridge will be built over what is known as River street; it will not end on River street where there is bisecting traffic and where there have been traffic jams not only on holidays but from week to week at both ends of the bridge for considerable distances. When we build a bridge we should have regard to the requirements of the future.

Inasmuch as the Ontario government, and not this parliament, will be responsible for the construction of this bridge, and that it will be built with funds provided by the people of the United States and the people of Canada and elsewhere who use the bridge, through the tolls they will pay, I can see no good reason why it should be held up in this committee at this time. As a matter of fact, the province of Ontario is simply asking this parliament to sanction the project. It then becomes the responsibility of the government of Ontario to provide adequate facilities for those desiring to cross at this point. Surely, we as citizens of Canada should have some regard for our United States friends whose trade is so valuable to us. Hence we should see to it that this project is carried out with the least possible delay, and that a structure that will give ample accommodation to those who wish to pass back and forth over the border between the United States and Canada is provided.

Mr. POULIOT: To put the matter in a nutshell, it is generally agreed that the old Niagara bridge is a frozen asset, flooded with a tremendous quantity of watered stock.

Mr. LOCKHART: Since this bill, and more particularly section 8, entitled "power to construct bridge" came before this committee on April 5, I have refrained from making any further comments, as I was of the opinion that I had fully expressed my views on that section, as well as voiced the sentiments and protests of a number of home owners in Niagara Falls. These home owners have written me expressing their fear of increased taxation in case the provincial government should take over the five acres of river front property as suggested by the sponsors of this bill. In the light of what took place at the city council meeting of Niagara Falls on Monday last, and following the statements made and inferences suggested in this chamber during the discussion of section 8 on April 5, I find myself in direct conflict with many of the statements that were made both in the city council of Niagara Falls, Ontario, and in this committee.

I wish to direct attention to the remarks I made during the previous debate. I want to make my position quite clear, because I have some pointed references to make before I finish.

When this bill was first discussed my attitude was stated when I said, as reported on page 1831 of Hansard:

> I do not question the motives of the hon. member for Welland, because I have known him too well and too long to do that.

I also said that I did not want the hon. member to feel that any of my remarks were in any way personal, because I know that he presented the bill in the form in which it was given to him to present. I made that statement advisedly, because I had an interview with the hon. member in my own office in this building, and I questioned him as to the motives of those promoting the measure and the purport of this bill. His reply was that he was not familiar with the details of the bill, but that he had been asked to sponsor it; and he did not or could not impart any information to me. This lack of the information which I desired to obtain before making any further comments convinced me that the bill required looking into. I have now made my attitude quite clear as far as the hon. member for Welland is concerned. Turning to page 2049 of Hansard, we have some references which the hon. member made at that time. He said:

> Further, in connection with this matter the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart), addressed a letter, dated March 24, to the Mayor of Niagara Falls—and I may say it was a very fine letter, taking up eighty-three lines of foolscap paper and consisting of 1,079 words—asking the city of Niagara Falls to say whether it appreciated his efforts on their behalf.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to refer to a statement made by Alderman Donald which is included in the verbatim report of the council meeting appearing in the press on April 5. He said:

I don't know whether Alderman McAninch remembers what trouble Hon. W. L. Houck went to on behalf of the city of Niagara Falls—

Then he referred to some other matters, and went on to say:

The only member in Ottawa who is trying to read out the bridge bill is N. J. M. Lockhart, the member for Lincoln county. Do you know that two years ago when A. B. Damude, our member, asked the government for $90,050 to build the river road, Mr. Lockhart was the only member who objected. He didn't want to see a single five cent piece spent on any road in Niagara Falls. Now he says he is interested in this city receiving taxes.

I challenge the hon. member for Welland to substantiate that statement or correct it in the Niagara Falls press.

Mr. DAMUDE: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that I made that statement?

Mr. LOCKHART: That is the statement which was made; that has come into this argument at this stage, for what reason I do not know.

Mr. DAMUDE: Who said so?

Mr. LOCKHART: Alderman Donald, at the meeting of the Niagara Falls council, said that I opposed the voting of $90,000 in this house.

Mr. DAMUDE: Has that anything to do with the bridge bill?

Mr. LOCKHART: I ask the hon. member to be good enough to inquire into that statement and see if it is true. On March 24, the Niagara Falls council passed a resolution, which has been placed on Hansard already. I do not want to take time to read it again—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LOCKHART: If hon. members wish, I can easily take time to read it, but there are more important points to which I want to refer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. LOCKHART: This resolution was passed by the city council, and appeared verbatim in the Niagara Falls Review of March 24. The council wanted to send a telegram to the Prime Minister. This has been referred to already, and I do not consider it necessary to repeat it to-night. In any case they decided to send this telegram protesting against the passing of this bill until a clause was inserted to protect the citizens of Niagara Falls against the loss of any taxes.

Things seem to happen in Niagara Falls, as they do in Ottawa. Some people allow others to make up their minds for them. I note that the resolution read into Hansard by the hon. member for Welland was adopted by a division of four to three. That is peculiar, because the original resolution of protest was passed by a similar division, only the other way around. I have letters from citizens of Niagara Falls which I could take an hour to read, suggesting why some of the people might have changed their minds.

To return to this press report of March 24, which I am informed is verbatim, Mayor Hanniwell said that there was no encouragement to support public ownership in Niagara Falls.

The effects of it have crippled this municipality. We have had the tax exempt hydro, and confiscation of valuable city property by the Niagara parks commission, upon which no taxes are paid to the city, and there is certainly no incentive to support a publicly owned bridge if a repetition of the past is going to be a fact.

That statement was made early in the discussion of this matter. Alderman McAninch, according to press reports, expressed the same conviction.

I come now to the remarks or, shall I say, the inferences of the hon. member for Welland, as I find them at page 2051 of Hansard. It is to these that I want particularly to direct attention. The hon. member mentioned something about an Ethiopian in the woodpile. This inference can be interpreted only as having reference to the late Hon. J. D. Chaplin. My comment in that connection is this: I hope my hon. friend and I will some time possess the reputation that the late Hon. J. D. Chaplin possessed when he left Ottawa. Many members of this house, on all sides, have continued to impress upon me the sincerity of purpose of the late Hon. J. D. Chaplin.

An hon. MEMBER: Did anyone say that it was Hon. J. D. Chaplin who was referred to?

Mr. LOCKHART: The hon. member for Welland said:

It came from the county of Lincoln, the same place from which it is coming now. Probably there is a reason for this. A remark was made the other evening that there might be an Ethiopian. There is an old saying. Where there is an Ethiopian there usually is a woodpile, and I think the woodpile will be found at St. Catharines. St. Catharines possesses some excellent citizens who are vitally interested in the lower steel arch bridge at Niagara Falls, a company which received from the Canadian National Railways a rental of $100,000 a year. The president of this company, and the secretary treasurer also, two very fine gentlemen, live in St. Catharines; directors live in St. Catharines. For eleven years the opposition to the building of a bridge across the Niagara river has emanated from that point. To be frank, it came from a late hon. member and minister who resided in that constituency.

That is the statement which was made, and only one inference can be drawn from it; that it referred to the late Hon. J. D. Chaplin. I repeat that many on both sides of the house recall clearly the services which the late Hon. J. D. Chaplin gave to the house and the country. Let me say here most definitely that I do not intend to indulge in any insinuations to-night, but I should like to say that the two men in particular referred to by the Niagara Falls Review, the men who have fought very strongly for the taxpayers of Niagara Falls, are Mayor Hanniwell and Alderman McAninch. I want it distinctly understood that I do not even know these two men, and have never met them. I have heard of them, but I would not know them if they were to meet me on the street. I can say, however, that I believe the citizens of Niagara Falls owe a debt of gratitude to these two men and to the other members of council who have so ably expressed themselves against this bill in its present form.

The hon. member for Welland mentioned the Ethiopian in the woodpile; I have read the passage in Hansard, and I say it points definitely to the late Hon. J. D. Chaplin. Then my hon. friend went on to say that the president and secretary-treasurer of the lower arch bridge company were also residents of St. Catharines. The suggestion is thrown out again that there has been collusion of some kind between these gentlemen and myself. I refute that suggestion. I want to say definitely that I have not discussed with the president, the vice-president or the secretary-treasurer of the lower arch bridge company—

Mr. DAMUDE: Does the hon. member suggest that these gentlemen do not live in St. Catharines?

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not suggest any such thing at all. I said it was stated in this chamber that they lived in St. Catharines, and the inference was that I had been in collusion with these gentlemen. I want to state definitely, that I have never discussed the matter with any of the officers or officials of the lower arch bridge company, and I want that distinctly understood. My stand on this whole question in the House of Commons has been prompted by a great many home owners in the city of Niagara Falls, men struggling to save their homes, from whom I have received a number of letters in connection with Bill No. 15, and their fear of increased taxation. I could take time to read these letters, but I shall give the committee a number of the questions contained in them which I have condensed.

The first question I pick out of one letter is this:

> Why did Bill No. 15 as first presented authorize the raising of $7,500,000 to build a bridge when the bill as introduced in the state assembly of New York only provided for the raising of $3,000,000?

That is practically the first question I received. Here is the second question:

> What explanation has been given that the amount can now be reduced to $4,000,000, still $1,000,000 more than asked for in the state of New York?

Another question that was asked by a gentleman who is struggling hard at the present time to save his home in Niagara Falls is:

> Why has the meeting arranged for March 26 never been held?

I have referred to that meeting in previous remarks in this chamber. That meeting, which was to consist of all interested parties, was postponed. I have raised that question in committee, and I have raised it in the house, but the meeting has not so far been held. It was to be a meeting of the parks commission, the International Railway Company officials, the mayor and council of Niagara Falls, the Hon. W. L. Houck and the hon. member for Welland, to discuss the problems in connection with this proposal. The date of the meeting was to be three days after the bill was passed in the committee, where I objected to the bill being rushed through, and I asked for a short delay until the matter might be discussed at length in Niagara Falls.

Another question I have been asked is this:

> Is it not possible to insert a clause in Bill No. 15, that would protect the taxpayers of Niagara Falls against loss of taxation if five acres of river front is to be taken over?

It is pointed out that it is the most valuable river front property along the border. I can read the letter if that is desired, but I think the hon. member for Welland will admit that it is an extremely valuable piece of property. Here is another question I have been asked:

> Would I urge that a protective clause be inserted in Bill No. 15?

I think it has been suggested in council at Niagara Falls and in the discussions here that some protection should be given, and I have already made myself clear on that point. Another question I was asked was this:

> Could I ascertain if the report was correct that some of the provisional directors named in Bill No. 15 were related to members of the provincial government?

I can read the whole letter if any member wants me to. Those are pertinent questions, Mr. Chairman.

Another question was this:

In view of the statement made by the hon. member for Welland that he was assured the provincial government would protect the taxpayers, would I ascertain on what authority this statement was made?

The question was asked by an hon. member the other night, and I have not heard it answered yet. Another question was this:

If clause 8 in Bill No. 15, provided that no action could be taken by provincial authority until concurrent legislation was passed in New York state, and such legislation having been killed by the New York State Senate, could I find out why Bill No. 15 was being pushed through so rapidly, particularly before the postponed meeting of March 26 had been held?

There are many other inquiries of a similar nature which I have received in correspondence from taxpayers and home owners at Niagara Falls. Is it any wonder that I have to-day received one or two more letters asking whether I have found the Ethiopian in the woodpile.

I have felt it my duty to refer to the many insinuations and incorrect statements that have been made, and I should like the hon. member for Welland, before the bill passes, to clear up these incorrect statements, particularly the one that I blocked an expenditure of money. May I suggest further to the hon. member that he should observe the old axiom that "people in glass houses should not throw stones."

I want to give some more convincing evidence as to the amount of discussion that took place and may I again refer to that marvellous letter of 1,079 words to which reference has been made. I propose to put the whole letter on Hansard and then leave it to the committee to judge whether it is the sort of letter the hon. member represented it to be, that I was simply wanting to know whether the council and the corporation of Niagara Falls were satisfied with my actions. The letter is dated March 24, following receipt of most of these letters to which I have referred. The letter is addressed to the mayor and council of Niagara Falls, Ontario, and I am going to put it on Hansard so that the members of the committee may judge for themselves the inferences and references made here the other night:

I am enclosing a copy of Bill No. 15, which was considered again yesterday before the committee of railways and canals and telegraphs. The bill was sent on to the House of Commons for consideration, contrary to the wishes of some members of the committee. Several minor amendments were made to the bill but the intent and purpose remain the same.

I was one of the members of the committee who were of the opinion that the bill should not have been hurried through, in view of press reports and other considerations involved. I have no apology for the stand I took, which I considered was in the best interests of the citizens of Niagara Falls, Ontario. I based my arguments on the reports in the St. Catharines "Standard" under dates of March 21 and March 22.

On the first mentioned date, March 21, the following appeared:

"A joint conference of the city council, the chamber of commerce and representatives of the International Railway Company and the National Parks Commission, with A. B. Damude, M.P., and Honourable W. L. Houck, will be held at Niagara Falls on March 26 to discuss the two proposals for bridges across the Niagara river. Both Mr. Damude and Hon. Mr. Houck have assured Niagara Falls city council, according to Mayor C. D. Hunniwell, that they will do everything possible in the event of government bridges built to see that the municipality does not lose taxation on the structure."

Let me supplement that by stating that there was a letter by the hon. member for Welland to the mayor of Niagara Falls on March 15, in which he said he would not "support a measure that will deprive your municipality of the assessment that you so urgently need." The minutes of the last meeting of council show that although the matter was discussed on four or five occasions, no such assurance had so far been given. I quote again from my letter of March 24:

The following article appeared in the St. Catherines "Standard" of March 22: "The city council of Niagara Falls approved a motion to be submitted to the Honourable W. L. Houck recommending that all properties acquired by the province or the Niagara parks commission and in use for highway purposes be subject to proper taxation. Alderman J. A. McAninch declared that the parks commission was using some of the city's most valuable property fronting on the river, and they might as well take over the entire city."

My inquiry of Mr. Damude while in committee was that if such a meeting was being held on March 26, and in view of other press reports I was of the opinion that the council of the city of Niagara Falls were not satisfied with the deliberations to date, and I was opposed to presenting any bill to parliament until the people's wishes in Niagara Falls had been met. Mr. Damude later explained to me that the meeting called for March 26 had no particular bearing on the decision to be arrived at by the committee, and was called for the purpose of giving some general information. He urged that the bill be sent on to parliament, and he was supported by the majority of the committee. Accordingly, the bill has been sent on to the House of Commons.

Having in mind the difficult position that the municipality of Niagara Falls, Ontario, has found itself in during the past few years, and having in mind that perhaps over $10,000 per annum has been derived from the International Railway Company by way of taxes, and having further in mind that all municipalities are being faced with higher tax rates in 1938 by reason of increased responsibility for relief, I took the stand that the corporation of Niagara Falls, Ontario, should be supplied with every possible information and were fully satisfied before any steps were taken which might in future deprive them of taxes which are so urgently needed. It was my opinion and conclusion that the meeting to be held on March 26 would possibly clear away any difficulties in the minds of your council, as all the interested parties were to be in attendance.

May I, in further explanation, state that it was argued by the chairman, and supported by some members of the committee, that as the presentation of this bill to parliament had been properly advertised, and as the council of Niagara Falls, Ontario, had taken no steps to register any objection to the bill; and further, that a resolution passed by the council in February supported the erection of a toll-free bridge, there should be no further delay in presenting the bill to the House of Commons.

With this argument I could not concur, in view of all the information as contained in the foregoing part of this letter.

That there may be no misunderstanding, let me make my position clear. Either all the press reports were erroneous, or there must be some misunderstanding as to the purpose of the meeting that is to be held on March 26. My one desire is that the citizens of Niagara Falls, Ontario, through their council body, have every possible opportunity to express their views before any proposed bill was presented to parliament. The bill in its amended form will now come before the House of Commons in due course, and later before the Senate. If the rights of the citizens, in your opinion, are being protected in every way and their expressed views are being complied with, I cannot see that any good purpose can be served by further discussion of the bill now before the house.

I would appreciate knowing whether your council endorses the stand I took in committee on the bill. I would also appreciate advice as to what final decision is arrived at following the meeting on March 26.

It is my one desire to protect the rights of all citizens, who are after all, the people who are required to assume any increased burden of taxation.

It has been said that a resolution was introduced in the council and was defeated. That resolution was placed on Hansard before. That resolution was defeated four to three. It will be found on page 2050 of Hansard. It contains a statement that I said that the condition of the city of Niagara Falls is one of virtual insolvency. I hesitated to take up the time of the committee in reading the whole of this letter, but I felt it was necessary to do so in view of the statements that have been made. In this house inferences have been drawn and statements made which I hope are now conceded to be incorrect. This is another question from the verbatim report of the council meeting of April 4, Alderman McAninch speaking:

I believe they owe that loyalty to this municipality. They would see that we have something in writing about taxes on the bridge. You remember when I told Mr. Stewart Lyons we should have a new agreement regarding hydro taxes for this municipality, he said to me, "Niagara Falls sold themselves out when the former city council dealing with the former hydro commission didn't see there was a clause in the contract to protect the city of Niagara Falls." I have no axe to grind with who builds the bridge. I am not arguing that point, but after Mr. Lyons' "talk" I want to see to it the solicitor and the city council sees there is a clause put in the bill requiring the company to pay taxes on any property they take over, and their successors be obligated to carry out that agreement.

I could read passage after passage from the verbatim reports that have appeared in the press of Niagara Falls, and I could read many extracts from letters I have received, but perhaps what I have quoted will be sufficient. When anyone talks about there being an Ethiopian in the woodpile, I can only repeat what I said before, that "people who live in glass houses should not throw stones." I have the evidence; I had the letters—

An hon. MEMBER: One minute to go.

Mr. LOCKHART: I can go for much longer than that. I quote again from the verbatim report:

Alderman McAninch asked Mayor Carl D. Hanniwell if he had any assurance, in writing from either Honourable E. L. Houck, A. B. Damude, M.P., or anyone, that taxes would be paid to the city.

Progress reported.

PRIVY COUNCIL APPEALS

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO HIS MAJESTY IN COUNCIL

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cahan for the second reading of Bill No. 19, respecting appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this field of discussion may be regarded as a preserve for legal gentlemen, but the consequences of the existing arrangements are of such a serious nature that even a layman must seek to understand the principles involved. My own interest in this question of appeals to the privy council was quickened years ago by some informal gatherings that a few of us were privileged to attend in the home of the late John S. Ewart. I desire to pay a tribute to the pioneer work which he performed in the advocacy of constitutional reform.

I wish to join with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) in congratulating the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), upon introducing this measure, and, if I may, upon his able presentation. He is in years one of the older members of the house, but in spirit he is one of the most vigorous and most youthful. I find myself in hearty agreement with my fellow citizen the hon. member for Selkirk. I trust that his eloquent appeal for a true Canadianism will re-echo across Canada. I should also express my appreciation of the advanced stand taken by the Minister of Justice in declaring that the dominion has exclusive appellate jurisdiction—if I caught his words aright, "paramount powers of doing away with all appeals." But I confess that I cannot understand the hesitation of the Minister of Justice to proceed at once to enact legislation which would accomplish what I believe a vast majority of Canadians would hail with satisfaction. The hon. member for Selkirk put the situation graphically when he said that we are wallowing in a constitutional morass. The Minister of Justice agrees, but he takes the position in effect, "Let us wallow for a while longer."

Before the Minister of Justice spoke, I had intended to express regret at the limitations of the scope of the bill as contained in such terms as "in so far as the same are part of the law of the Dominion of Canada" and "within the competence of the parliament of Canada." But I am glad that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is willing to accept an amendment in harmony with the position taken by the Minister of Justice.

It is not my purpose to attempt an original argument in favour of the bill. Rather I content myself with the more humble task of presenting some paragraphs written by others which have appealed to me and which may be of service to lay members of the house and to the general public.

In my judgment, the best summary of the situation is contained in the brief of the League for Social Reconstruction, submitted recently to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. I quote:

> As a result of seventy years of judicial interpretation, the dominion parliament finds itself shorn of its general residuary powers, except on occasions of national calamity greater than the world crisis of 1929-35, shorn of much of its power to regulate trade and commerce, shorn of a great part of its power to implement treaties, and almost totally incapable of providing for the masses of Canadian population that protection against the national evils of unemployment, fluctuating wage and price levels, and social insecurity which is being increasingly demanded to-day. People in need have been forced to look to the provinces for help; the provinces in their turn are incapable of giving it in adequate measure.

Another summary which appeals at least to a layman is contained in the brief presented to the commission by the Native Sons of Canada, prepared by J. B. Coyne, A.R.M. Lower, and R. O. MacFarlane. Speaking of the members of the privy council, the brief states, at page 23:

> Its members have been held up as great imperial statesmen. But one of the anomalies of our history is that while the constitutional position of the dominion has constantly been growing larger vis-a-vis the imperial government, yet almost in equal proportion and at the same time, it has at the hands of the privy council been growing smaller vis-a-vis the provinces, and less able in consequence to fill its enlarging national role . . .

A little later:

> But the privy council has been unwilling to learn except in a most superficial way, the circumstances in which and out of which the enactment of the British North America Act arose, rejecting the history of the Charlottetown and Quebec conferences, the parliamentary debates that show the purpose and intention, the use made of the United States constitution as an example, the degree in which it was adopted, extended or rejected, and the negotiations in London. It has made no reference to them save in isolated cases where such reference served its temporary purpose. It is unfamiliar with subsequent change and present conditions in Canada, physical, economic, social and psychological. . . .

A little later on:

> . . . the privy council has remade the British North America Act and fashioned it into something entirely different from and contrary to that intended by the fathers of confederation and clearly expressed in its terms; that just what the privy council has made it into is almost impossible to discover because of contradictions, inconsistencies and confusions in and between its various decisions; that nearly all the defects found in the constitution as now interpreted have been put there by the privy council and that most of such defects do not inherently belong. It is not alone the actual decisions; where the privy council may be right in the result, it has said so much that is wrong.

The Australian experience has been similar to that which we have had in Canada. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has already quoted Mr. Hughes, the Australian Prime Minister who spoke at the imperial conference of 1918; but I think, since I am presenting my point of view, I may be forgiven if I quote a few sentences again:

. . . The eminent judges ordinarily available on the judicial committee, for all their legal learning and judicial experience, have not among them a single man who is intimately familiar with this constitutional document, or with the vital processes underlying it, a knowledge of which is, in the case of any constitutional document, necessary, to a full appreciation of both letter and spirit. Australia's experience of the privy council in constitutional cases has been, to say the least of it, unfortunate.

Referring to a particular case, Mr. Hughes added:

Its decision is one which must have caused great embarrassment and confusion, if it were not for the fortunate fact that the reasons for the judicial committee's decision are stated in such a way that no court and no counsel in Australia has yet been able to find out what they were. That is what must happen when a tribunal on the other side of the world, no matter how eminent and experienced its members may be, has cast upon it the duty of interpreting a complicated constitutional document with the history and principles of which no member of the court, and perhaps no counsel practising before the court, is especially familiar.

In an article in the Fortnightly of April, 1937, a writer calling himself Historicus notes the enlargement of provincial powers under privy council decisions. On page 471 he says:

What has happened? Merely this—that sections 91 and 92 have been interpreted by the privy council in such a way as to invalidate any dominion act unless it can be brought under the narrowest interpretation of the provisions of section 91, without coming into conflict with the widest possible interpretation of the "property and civil rights" provision of section 92. This process of interpretation by the privy council from the end of the nineteenth century down to 1930 enlarged provincial powers and diminished dominion powers in a way that would have astounded and discouraged Macdonald, Cartier, and their colleagues of 1867 . . .

The same point of view was definitely set forth by our own under-secretary of state for external affairs in his evidence before the 1935 special committee of the House of Commons on the British North America Act. I might say parenthetically that this committee was one which was set up after a motion of my own urging that we seek to discover some way of amending the British North America Act.

Doctor Skelton said:

In the United States they began with a constitution which emphasized state rights, but under the guiding hand of John Marshall and his successors, it was gradually transformed in many particulars until the balance was decidedly shifted in favour of national rights: In Canada, under the guiding hands of Lord Watson and Lord Haldane, a constitution which in the mind and intent of the fathers of confederation was deliberately designed to profit by the mistakes of the United States, manifested in the struggles culminating in the civil war, and to make the central government the predominant factor, the residuary legatee, has been interpreted in definitely the wrong direction.

The hon. member for Selkirk touched upon the contention that the right of appeal gave some assurance to the minorities that their special right would not be interfered with.

Mr. THORSON: No; I said quite the reverse.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member misunderstood me; I referred to the argument frequently advanced. After a very careful review of the cases, Mr. Frank R. Scott writes in Queen's Quarterly, 1930, at page 677:

What the privy council has done in our constitution is to safeguard, not minority rights, but provincial rights. An elaboration of this statement is not possible here, but it may be stated with little fear of contradiction that the privy council has carried its protection of provincial claims so far that to-day we have in Canada a distribution of legislative powers quite unlike that which was agreed upon at confederation, and one which by its undue enlargement of the provincial sphere, considerably weakens the efficient and harmonious structure of our constitution. Possibly the judicial committee has thought that in cutting down the dominion powers they were assisting the minority in Canada. If so they were grievously mistaken.

This conclusion was arrived at after a careful review of the cases that had been before the privy council. As to the general consequences of privy council decisions, I would refer anyone interested to the Canadian Bar Review of June, 1937. Into the details of that I shall not attempt to enter.

One other aspect of the situation is that the decisions of the privy council place vested interests above the public weal. This is emphasized in an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of February 22, 1912. It is quoted by Olivier in his book Le Canada, Pays Souverain, which was published in 1935. I quote:

A number of decisions of great importance made recently by the law lords of the privy council have been such as to raise doubt of the equity of that tribunal. Ground is given for the suspicion that, however disassociated the law lords of the P.C. may be from our local prejudices or predilections, they may not be without unconscious bias due to their own surrounding and atmosphere . . . several judgments recently given suggest an undue tenderness to vested interests, seeing that in all the cases referred to the Canadian courts had previously decided the other way . . . we take the liberty of thinking that the law lords of the privy council are quite likely to be the mistaken ones. And in all these cases it was a question of vested right against the public weal . . .

We confess that these cases, coming within a couple of years, shake your idea of the desirability of the option of going to the privy council. We believe Canadian judges to be of as high a standard of honour as English judges and to be as judicial in their frame of mind . . .

At all events, the fact is decidedly discomforting that in law suits affecting three great public contracts in Canada, all of which are governed by Canadian law, all the judicial decisions in Canada should have been in favour of the public and all the decisions of the imperial privy council in favour of the private corporations.

Without going into the arguments advanced for and against appeals, I would refer any student to Mr. J. S. Ewart's and Mr. George H. Sedgewick's article in Queen's Quarterly, 1930. It seems to me that the hon. member for Selkirk was quite right, that the appeal to the privy council is after all a relic of colonialism, and it should have no place since the passing of the Westminster act.

In closing, may I express the hope that the Minister of Justice will reconsider his position with regard to the desirability of further delay. Never had we a better opportunity of bringing about a much-needed and long overdue reform. As I heard him I could not but recall those lines from Shakespeare:

There is a tide in the affairs of men
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and in miseries.

I hope the Liberal party will give consideration to that aspect of the matter. Continued hesitation is probably a hang-over of the long-continued inferiority complex.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I listened this afternoon with much interest to the debate on this bill which has been introduced by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). I listened also with interest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and to the other hon. members who have spoken. All, or nearly all, of the references that have been quoted by hon. members are to the constitutional question, particularly judgments of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council concerning the relationship of the provinces to the dominion. This relationship is set forth in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. It is quite true that the judgments tend to disregard the intentions embodied in the Quebec resolutions of 1864; but in my humble opinion the fault lies not in the judgments themselves, but in the drafting of the British North America Act.

Lord Carnarvon was chairman of the meeting held prior to the introduction of the British North America Act in the House of Lords, on February 19, 1867. Montague Bernard was recording secretary, and the bill was drafted by Lord Thring.

On the address in reply to the speech from the throne I stated on February 10 that the British North America Act was an intentional misrepresentation of fact, and for that reason was null and void. I do not intend to repeat what I said at that time, but I would simply draw the attention of the house to the fact that no statement which I then made has to this date been refuted. At the first session of this parliament, the Prime Minister, on April 1, 1936, quoted from Sir Courtenay Ilbert, parliamentary counsel to the treasury, on the importance of a preamble. Without implying that Sir Courtenay Ilbert is not a great jurist, and without detracting in any measure from the honour that is his due, I desire to quote a few paragraphs from the works of his teacher, Lord Thring. In the Annual Register, of 1907, at page 110 we find that Lord Thring became counsel to the Home Office in 1860. In 1870 he left that post for the new office of parliamentary counsel to the treasury, his duty being to preside over a separate department charged with the preparation of government bills. This department, the idea of which was due to Mr. Lowe, was very successful, chiefly owing to the great skill in draftsmanship of its chief. He it was who drafted the British North America Act, the Interpretations Act of 1889, the Merchant Shipping Act amendment of 1862, the Irish Church Act of 1869, the Land Drainage Act of 1861, the Home Rule Bill of 1886, and numerous others, reference to which is made in his book Practical Legislation published in 1902. On page 9 of that book he says:

But it is necessary to attain, if possible, to a degree of precision which a person reading in bad faith cannot misunderstand. It is all the better if he cannot pretend to misunderstand it.

In speaking of the Army Act of 1881 he states that it took ten years to draft, and says:

Some idea of the labour involved in preparing this measure may be formed from the fact that the papers written to explain the law alone fill a folio volume of 1,067 printed pages.

In 1868 Lord Cairns appointed a statute law committee of which I am the only original member surviving. The duties of the committee are to make arrangements for, and superintend the publication of, a revised edition of the statutes.

The committee also superintend the preparation of an index of the whole statute law, digested on a system laid down in instructions of great particularity issued by the committee for the use of the compilers.

On page five he tells us:

I continued to be employed in drafting acts of parliament during my private practice at the bar till 1861, when I was appointed counsel to the Home Office, an office which was afterwards converted into the office of parliamentary counsel, and for the remainder of my official life I was occupied almost entirely in preparing legislation. "It will be seen, therefore, that whatever deficiencies may exist in the following treatise, they are at all events not due to ignorance or want of experience."

Lord Thring drafted the Colonial Laws Validity Act of June 29, 1865, which act no longer applies to the Dominion of Canada. He having drafted the British North America Act and the Interpretations Act of 1889, I have no hesitation in stating that in my opinion he knew whereof he wrote; and when he draws a distinction between the legislature of a colony and the parliament of Great Britain he means exactly what he says. As regards those who do not understand the decisions of the privy council, their failure to do so is due, in my opinion, to the fact that they do not differentiate between a parliament and a central legislature of a colony. The main difference between them is that whereas the acts of a parliament cannot be disallowed, the acts of a central legislature can. I desire to draw the attention of the house to the fact that according to Lord Thring this parliament is a central legislature and nothing more, the members of which should be designated by the letters M.C.L. and not M.P. And this house never was and never can be a parliament of the Canadian people. In the judgment of the privy council this house has no treaty- making power, and can have this power only when the provinces confer it. In their judgment they say that Canada, the dominion and the provinces together, have a competency of all power, both legislative and executive. In other words, they tell us that we can govern ourselves; that we are not subordinate to the imperial parliament. Now, Mr. Speaker, if Canada has a competency of all power to govern, and Canada is composed of nine provinces, there is nothing to prevent the nine provinces from creating a parliament of Canada whose acts would not be subject to the power of disallowance.

In my opinion, taking our cases to the privy council is an act of subserviency on our part and a distinct reflection on the erudition, dialectical ability or integrity of the eminent academicians of our supreme court, an act which should no longer be countenanced by the Canadian people. However, I do not wish the privy council of Great Britain to think that we desire to reflect in any way upon the admirable judgments they have handed down in the cases which we in the past were compelled to place before them. One of the main reasons why we can be considered capable of self-government is that we do understand the implications of these judgments of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

This house, which sits to-day upon the shifting sands of discontent, has no power to cancel these appeals. The provinces of Canada will only laugh at the attempt to detract in any measure or curtail in any manner their prerogative of taking any case before the august tribunal the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

I am aware that the statute of Westminster of December 11, 1931, does not apply to this house; for nowhere does it apply to the central legislature of a colony. No parliament of Canada can be created until there is an agreement signed among the provinces creating a parliament. As no attempt to refute the statements made by myself in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne on February 10 has been made, it is conceded that what I said is true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the hon. member a question? Do I understand him to suggest that this parliament has no status as a legislative body?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the hon. member says.

Mr. FINN: That is what he means.

Mr. KUHL: I believe the hon. member is justified in drawing that conclusion.

Mr. FINN: Then why is the hon. member here?

Mr. THORSON: Would the hon. member indicate where he got these queer ideas?

Mr. KUHL: I placed on Hansard on February 10 a clear outline of the reasons for my statement. If the hon. member wishes to refute any of the facts or arguments which I placed before the house, I shall be pleased to hear the refutation.

Mr. THORSON: Why battle against windmills?

Mr. KUHL: To continue, Mr. Speaker, I contend that since the arguments I placed before the house on February 10 have as yet not been refuted, it is conceded that what I said was true, that the British North America Act was an intentional misrepresentation of fact, and is therefore null and void. This being so, it cannot be retained as part of the statute of Westminster. Each province is therefore a political unit, without a political superior, and there is nothing to prevent them from creating a federal union and stipulating that the Supreme Court of Canada be the court of last resort.

Mr. THORSON: What authority is there for that statement?

Mr. KUHL: Subsection (2) of section 7 of the statute of Westminster.

Mr. FINN: Read it, please.

Mr. KUHL: It reads:

> The provisions of section two of this act shall extend to laws made by any of the provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such provinces.

Mr. THORSON: Would the hon. member read the first subsection?

Mr. KUHL: It reads:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or to any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

Mr. THORSON: So the British North America Act is preserved intact.

Mr. KUHL: In my speech on February 10 I believe I produced sufficient evidence to show that unless the preamble of a bill can be proven, the bill fails. If the preamble of the British North America Act cannot be proven to-day, how could it have been proven in 1867? If it cannot be proven, is it not a natural consequence that the bill is null and void?

Mr. THORSON: Does the hon. member expect that argument to be taken seriously by anybody in Canada?

Mr. KUHL: If it is based on fact, I certainly do.

Mr. THORSON: "If."

Mr. KUHL: I have presented what I regard as facts; I have quoted the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the authorities given by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to the nature of a preamble and what is expected of a preamble.

Mr. BENNETT: It must occur to the hon. gentleman that if the preamble is accepted by the enacting legislature as having been proven, it is not for us to say it has not been.

[Mr. Kuhl.]

Mr. KUHL: I am not sure that I understand the statement of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: I merely mean this, that the British North America Act is a statute which was passed by the parliament at Westminster, and the preamble was passed by that parliament. Having been passed by that parliament, it is not for us to question it. We have no legislative power in regard to it.

Mr. KUHL: Would the right hon. gentleman say there was evidence that the preamble to the British North America Act was proven by the imperial parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: It was accepted and passed by them.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to make one observation. It occurs to me that the hon. gentleman is definitely out of order to-night in bringing this matter before a body which has no legislative jurisdiction whatsoever in regard to it.

Mr. THORSON: Indeed, according to his own argument he has no right to be here, because he is here pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Act.

Mr. KUHL: I am placing my opinions before the house, and I shall be pleased to listen to any refutations that may be made when hon. members make their own speeches.

Mr. POULIOT: Would my hon. friend be kind enough to let me ask the question which the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) would not let me ask this afternoon?

Mr. KUHL: The hon. gentleman may ask, but I do not know that I can answer.

Mr. POULIOT: Whereas His Majesty King George VI is the king of Canada; and whereas it is the privilege of all British subjects to bring their grievances to the foot of the throne, how shall we do so if appeals to the privy council are denied?

Mr. KUHL: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would repeat his question after I have concluded my speech, if I may be allowed to do so.

Regardless of whether we think appeals to the privy council should be discontinued, we certainly have no power to determine the minds of the legislatures of the provinces in this matter. Further, I contend that to attempt to enact legislation upon this subject at this time, for the reason that this house disapproves the decisions which have been rendered in some cases, is to deprecate our own intelligence and is a mark of extreme discourtesy to the members of the privy council who in the past have given so much of their time to the cases we have placed before them. Notwithstanding this, I am in favour of the principle that the Supreme Court of Canada should be the court of last resort so far as all Canadian cases are concerned. But, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that one supreme court justice be nominated by the bar association of each province, appointed to the position, paid by the legislature of the province and sworn in by the central government. This would be a democratic method of procedure. But for us to attempt to take from the provinces at this time the right of appeal to the privy council, limiting them to the final decision of a supreme court nominated and appointed by the dominion executive, would engender a well founded suspicion in the minds of the members of the provincial legislatures that the executive of this dominion government were attempting to do away with their right of appeal to the privy council; so that if or when the dominion government should have the British North America Act amended without the consent of all the provinces, as is proposed, those provinces would have no appeal but would be compelled to abide by the decision of a court created and constituted by the dominion.

Thus would this government cut off the last resort of the provinces. After having had the decisions of the privy council to guide our actions with regard to legislation affecting all the provinces; having been told by them that the dominion is created by the provinces and is not their master; having been told that legislation in respect to Canada, both externally and internally, must receive the assent of all the provinces, why attempt to do something which is not within our power, something which will most certainly be held ultra vires of the power of the dominion by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council?

The question before the house is: Are we to attempt to enact a measure which will entail considerable expense in being taken before our courts, and from there to the privy council? I have no hesitancy in stating that in my opinion such an enactment will be disallowed unless it receives the assent of the provincial legislatures. Therefore I believe it would be best for all concerned if the hon. member would withdraw this bill.

Mr. THORSON: Before the hon. member sits down, will he please indicate to the house the name of the constitutional authority with whom he has been consulting in his study of these subjects, and the name of the author of the pamphlet which I have no doubt is the source of his dissertation upon these matters?

Mr. KUHL: I feel that the hon. member can answer the question for himself.

Mr. THORSON: What is the name of the constitutional authority?

Mr. KUHL: The authorities for the statements I have made are indicated in the speeches I have given, and if the hon. member would take the trouble to refer to my address of February 10, he will find in each case the authority for the statements I gave.

Mr. THORSON: Is the hon. member refusing to answer my question?

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate; but in view of the atmosphere that has been gathering momentum as the debate continues, of blaming the privy council for the chaotic condition in which we find constitutional matters in Canada to-day, I have thought it wise to make a few observations, because otherwise I am afraid the house might be taken as unanimously of the view that appeals to the privy council should be abolished.

I do not agree with the contention that the privy council is responsible for our constitutional difficulties to-day. I have gathered the impression, listening to the speakers this afternoon and this evening, that it was felt that the privy council should interpret the British North America Act in a somewhat different way from that in which they would interpret any other act or statute. I submit that the British North America Act is a statute and that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have interpreted that statute according to well recognized legal principles. In other words, they have been looking at the act itself, at the language used by the framers of the act, and have tried to discover the intention of its framers by the words they used. That is a well recognized legal principle, and when the words themselves are clear and plain there is no legal principle that I know of that would justify interpreting a constitution or act differently from any other statute. I submit that what the privy council has done is to give us what the framers of the British North America Act intended to give us by the words they used. Blaming the privy council to-day because we have constitutional difficulties in Canada is rather unfortunate. I think it unjustly reflects on the capacity that is being displayed by the privy council itself. We have heard that the pendulum has swung to and fro, restricting and extending the meaning of sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, but in no case do I know of any reference to the constitutional interpretation asked for, except perhaps in the Edwards case. The "living tree" was referred to in that case, and yet there was a particular exception made of sections 91 and 92; the definition of powers has followed definite legal lines. The "living tree" was the other sections of the British North America Act.

Mr. BENNETT: It was a water-tight compartment the last time.

Mr. POTTIER: It is only fair to make these observations in justice to the privy council. I should like to give a quotation now to show the functions of a court as distinct from what some would hold to be the duty of the privy council in interpreting the British North America Act to meet present day social and economic developments. I quote from Doctor O. D. Skelton:

> Courts may modify, they cannot replace. They can revise earlier interpretations, as new arguments, new points of view are presented, they can shift the dividing line in marginal cases; but there are barriers they cannot pass, definite assignments of power they cannot reallocate.

I think that has been our difficulty. The British North America Act assigned definite powers to the provinces and to the dominion and all that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have attempted to do is to define those powers. It was not their function to legislate; it was their function to interpret, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that they have done that, following well recognized legal principles. We are going too far when we put on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the burden of finding a solution for the difficulties we are in to-day. We need an amendment—not a new court.

I should observe too that there are provisions for members of the Supreme Court of Canada to sit in with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and in one case in which the powers of the provinces were interpreted in a wide sense the present Chief Justice of Canada, Mr. Justice Duff, sat in with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and gave the decision of the court.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the reciprocal insurance case.

Mr. POTTIER: Exactly, and in that case the previous decision approved and followed the other cases. I submit that when we say that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has interpreted the British North America Act in a wrong way, we would have had on the whole the same principle towards definitions established if the act had been referred by the Supreme Court of Canada in final resort.

Mr. MARTIN: What was the date of the Edwards case?

Mr. POTTIER: It was in 1924.

Mr. MARTIN: Contrary to the whole tradition of privy council judgments up to that time.

Mr. POTTIER: But the privy council is not bound by previous decisions, and Chief Justice Duff sat in with the judicial committee and gave the decision in that case. Any previous decision could have been reversed by the privy council if it had thought fit to do so. My point is that if the Supreme Court of Canada had been interpreting the British North America Act, they would have done what the privy council did, that is, gathered the intention from the words used.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, that decision has been narrowed since. The statement as contained in the decision of the chief justice as to our powers over criminal legislation has been regarded as too wide.

Mr. POTTIER: Exactly. I say that if the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada had been interpreting the British North America Act we would have the same condition as we have to-day; changing court is not the remedy.

Some reference has been made this afternoon to opinions given by individuals about appeals. I have here the opinion of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, an ex-Minister of Justice and afterwards Chief Justice of Canada. Addressing the American Bar Association in 1914, he gave his opinion as follows:

> In no part of the King's dominions has greater service been rendered by the judicial committee than in Canada, particularly since confederation.
> Since 1867, the judicial committee has been called upon in scores of cases to trace out the line of demarcation between federal and provincial jurisdiction, and it must be truthfully said that the result has been eminently satisfactory. Removed, as the majority of judges are, from all local strifes, desirous as they are to distribute the most impartial justice, it is not surprising that the right of appeal to the King in his privy council is one of the privileges most highly prized by the people of the dominion. I do not mean to say that there has not been exception taken to the freedom with which appeals may be carried to the privy council in ordinary civil matters, but whatever view may obtain in other parts of the empire, so far as Canada is concerned, I think I may safely say that, amongst lawyers and judges competent to speak on the subject, there is but one opinion, that where constitutional questions are concerned an appeal to the judicial committee must always be retained.

I am offering that opinion to balance to some extent the opposite opinions which have been offered. I rather think the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has rendered a real service to Canada. Their decisions have been one judgment, no dissenting judgments.

I would hate to think that this parliament was attempting to have the courts interpret the laws not as expressed by statute but according to their own views of what is in the interest of the state. We have seen the disastrous results of that procedure in other countries. It has done more harm and injury to the judiciary and the administration of justice than anything else I can think of. I am not criticizing the fact that this matter has been brought up in parliament, but I think we should keep in mind that this parliament has certain duties to perform and that the courts also have certain duties to perform. We should not try to have the one conflict with the other.

Mr. CAHAN: Should the court give a decision in accordance with the intention of parliament?

Mr. POTTIER: According to the words expressed by parliament. If parliament has used the wrong words and has given the wrong intention, the court should not be asked to place on the words an intention which they do not express. I think that is a clear principle of law. That is the point I was trying to make in defending appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

We must realize that two developments have been taking place in Canada at the same time. One has been the growth of Canada as a whole, and the other has been the development of the provinces. These two developments have reached the point where we find them to-day more or less in conflict. This situation has developed since the British North America Act was passed, and it was not contemplated at the time that statute was enacted. Therefore, the statute does not cover the situation to-day as we might hope it would. Our constitution is out of date.

I should like also to make a few observations on whether this parliament has the power to abolish appeals to the privy council. This afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) indicated that we had that power, and he depended upon section 101 of the British North America Act. I submit that the British Coal Corporation case does not bear out that opinion.

Mr. MARTIN: It does not deal with it.

Mr. POTTIER: I think it does deal with the powers of the provinces to abolish appeals in civil matters. I shall quote from the case itself, as follows:

> Among the powers which go to constitute self-government there are necessarily included powers to constitute the law courts and regulate their procedure and to appoint their judges: save for the provisions of the act, these powers in regard to the then newly constituted dominion would have all belonged to the king as the fountain of justice: but by the act these powers are vested in the dominion legislature, and thus pro tanto the prerogative is merged in the statutory powers. A most essential part of the administration of justice consists of the system of appeals. It is not doubted that with the single exception of what is called the prerogative appeal, that is, the appeal by special leave given in the privy council in London, matters of appeal from Canadian courts are within the legislative control of Canada, that is of the dominion or the provinces as the case may be.

> The question whether the dominion or the provinces is in any given case the proper authority to act depends mainly upon the subject matter dealt with.

While that is not a definite decision, it is at least an indication that in certain subject-matters the provinces only can abolish the right to appeal. Section 92 deals with civil procedure.

Mr. MARTIN: In order that the record may be complete, I would refer my hon. friend to the third paragraph of the judgment at page 523. Perhaps he would care to read it himself? The point is not decided. The privy council refused to deal with the matter.

Mr. POTTIER: I quite agree with that. I said that it was not decided definitely.

Mr. MARTIN: They did not decide it at all.

Mr. POTTIER: I said that the words used were an indication that in connection with those subject matters in which the province had jurisdiction, the province was the proper authority to abolish the right to appeal. I gave that quotation for that purpose, and I shall repeat it again:

> The question whether the dominion or the provinces is in any given case the proper authority to act depends mainly upon the subject matter dealt with.

That must have meant something. I submit that there is room there for the belief that in connection with those subject matters in which the provinces have jurisdiction, they are the proper authorities to take away the right of appeal.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a question whether they can or cannot, whether they have extra-territorial jurisdiction, because it arises under an imperial order in council.

Mr. POTTIER: I have a note on that and I was going to touch on it as another reason. The Statute of Westminster says that only the dominion legislature has extra-territorial jurisdiction. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has indicated a paragraph in the judgment in the British Coal Corporation case, which I shall place on the record:

> Their lordships have in this judgment been dealing only with the legal position in Canada in regard to this type of appeal in criminal matters. It is here neither necessary nor desirable to touch on the position as regards civil cases.

I quite agree with that. I stated before that in my opinion there was room for argument whether, in connection with those subject matters in which the provinces had jurisdiction, they were the proper authorities to deal with the matter of appeals, rather than the dominion.

There is another reason that causes me to doubt whether section 101 gives us sufficient authority to deal with the abolishing of all appeals to the privy council. The bill in question repeals them in so far as they are part of the law of Canada. This reason was referred to this afternoon by the right hon. Minister of Justice. After all, appeals are matters of procedure. Appeals are not involved in the constitution, maintenance or organization of a court. Section 101 deals only with the constitution, maintenance and organization of a supreme court. Appeals are a part of an action and not the constitution, maintenance, or organization of the court; and I submit that at least there is room for argument in the fact that section 101 has no reference to appeals to the privy council, which the provinces have through order in council.

Mr. FINN: Would my hon. friend read section 101?

Mr. POTTIER: I shall quote section 101:

> The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance, and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

There are a number of cases having reference to what the words "constitution" and "maintenance" of a court comprise, and I am suggesting that the above appeals of the provinces as a matter of procedure are not included in those terms.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member's contention is that section 101 does not give the supreme court control of procedure?

Mr. POTTIER: As to taking away the right of appeal to the privy council from provincial courts under order in council.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish briefly to summarize as follows the arguments that I have attempted to put forward:

First, that the British North America Act has been interpreted as any other statute would be interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. What in effect we have been trying to do is to place upon the privy council the responsibility of legislating rather than interpreting.

Second, I have grave doubts whether section 101 referred to by the right hon. Minister of Justice gives power to this parliament to abolish all appeals to the privy council, particularly those which were passed to the provinces themselves by order in council and which the imperial parliament only has power to deal with.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask just one question? Has the hon. member any doubt of the competence of the parliament of Canada to abolish appeals to the privy council in respect of any subject matter of legislation which is within the competence of the parliament of Canada?

Mr. POTTIER: Did I understand my hon. friend to say, any subject matter within their competence? No.

Mr. CAHAN: Then the hon. gentleman was combating, not the terms of the bill, but some observations made upon the bill.

Mr. POTTIER: I submit we are trying to abolish all appeals, which we cannot do, and the bill should not pass, at least in its present form.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I rise wtih considerable diffidence to participate in this discussion because I have never laid any claim to being an authority on law, but I should like to say a word or two for the purpose of bringing before the house some considerations which, I believe, are of real import in the discussion of this question.

Everybody recognizes, I think, that we are grown up now as a nation. We have been saying we are and thinking we are, and from what I can gather, the British people are quite glad to have us grown up and, so to speak, off their hands as far as their responsibility for us is concerned. I do not believe there is any doubt or disagreement about that among the people generally. But some serious matters are involved in this question.

I have noticed that many people in this house and in the country seem to think that if only we had things a little different from what they are, Oh, how we could solve our problems! It reminds me of a story my father used to tell me about the fellow who always wanted to live in a country just on the other side of the fence. It is a common thing for people to think that if we were thus and not so, it would be well with us. Particularly, just now, we have a constitutional scapegoat in this country. Everything this parliament wants to do it cannot do because the "constitution" will not let it; and as for the naughty provinces, they simply will not cooperate, so that we cannot solve our unemployment problem; we cannot solve our relief problem and we cannot solve this and that and the other thing; and the provinces are inclined to complain on much the same score.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I am not sufficiently informed, but I believe that all this kind of talk is simply window-dressing. I honestly believe that if we would go to work with an attitude of honesty and straightforwardness and with a sincere desire to solve our problems, and had the solution, we should not have very much difficulty getting the provinces to cooperate with us towards that solution. So far I have not found any provincial officer who is not ready to do pretty nearly anything, except sacrifice some of the rights which his province possesses, in order to help us solve the problems which are confronting all of us.

Just now the thought is that if only we could centralize powers in this country; if only we could transfer to the dominion the powers which the provinces possess, all these difficulties could be solved. May I examine for a few minutes what has been done by dominion governments for the last twenty-five years with the absolute powers they do possess? I shall mention three or four of them because I believe it will help people to understand why we have these stresses and strains. I may tell the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) very frankly that he annoyed me considerably when he blamed for those stresses and strains something which I did not believe should be blamed for them. I may be wrong, but in fairness to him I am telling him what I think.

In the first place, there are causes of stresses and strains of which the public generally have not even dreamed. Here is one. Unquestionably this parliament has absolute power over the tariff structure of the railroads. Surely there is nothing to prevent parliament from exercising that power. I have not heard that any province is questioning it. Let me indicate to the house some of the things which have happened to the disadvantage of my own province. Provinces are being strangled or smothered to death because of inequalities from which they have no power to relieve themselves and from which they cannot get any other authority to relieve them.

Referring briefly to the railroad structure, I find, according to information elicited by the commission which recently received evidence, such an absurd situation as this, in regard to barbed wire, which is vital to the farming industry in the prairie provinces. The rate per 100 pounds on that commodity from Montreal to Vancouver is seventy-five cents, while to Edmonton, a distance more than five hundred miles shorter, the rate is more than double, namely $1.98. I do not propose to go into this matter to any extent to-night. If I did I should be out of order. Just the same, there is here a problem which illustrates the sort of thing that this government has done with the power it absolutely possesses. Now, if that condition has been allowed to grow up; if it has gone on throughout the prairie provinces, as I shall show at a future time, it is bleeding those provinces to death economically. It has been completely in the power of this parliament; there has been no constitutional difficulty in the way of straightening the matter out, and yet this condition has been allowed to continue.

I shall mention one more and then leave this particular subject. I mention binder twine, which is all important.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want my hon. friend to be more annoyed with me than necessary, but I would ask him what that has to do with appeals to the privy council.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Simply this: A province like Alberta, or Saskatchewan, or Manitoba, must have some court to which it can bring its case, some court which will hear it. Those provinces have been sending members to parliament for years and years, capable, honest members who have presented our case before the high court of parliament year after year; yet these monstrous inequalities and injustices have been growing up. We have come and complained about them, for they have been sapping the very lifeblood from us; yet we have had no redress whatever. Do you wish to know, Mr. Speaker, the reasons for the stresses and strains? Let me ask any hon. member of this house: What can a province do when it realizes that it is placed in a position which is rendering its economic development and well-being an absolute impossibility? It has not the constitutional competence to deal with the problem. The government which has that competence will not listen. What is the province to do? If it has no appeal to the privy council or any other means by which it can take its case to the foot of the throne, will someone tell me what the province can do? I submit that as a result of this situation there are three of the majestic provinces of this dominion which are under the gravest handicaps. Now then, absolute power is in the hands of this parliament with respect to matters of this sort, the freight rate structure for example. I shall not go into more detail; I shall deal with it later on, because it is an abuse crying to high heaven for restitution and redress. It has existed in the west to such an extent that it has prevented us from developing our industry. We have known we were being hurt; but we have not known how until now, when we are just beginning to examine into the situation and are finding out. There has been someone in this dominion whose business it was to know whether we were being hurt, and that person has not attended to his business; now we have found this out, what recourse have we? I am not complaining unduly, but I am putting the matter honestly and in a straightforward way before the members of this house.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member knows that the whole freight rate structure was considered by the board of railway commissioners. The whole question was considered and representatives of the western provinces were heard. That court was set up by this parliament for the purpose of dealing with the very problems to which he refers.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The all important matter is—the results. The results have ruined us as far as many aspects of the possible development of our industrial life are concerned. I do not wish to get into any detailed discussion of the point; I am illustrating it in passing. The time will come when I shall rise in my place in the house and air this problem in considerable detail, and at that time we shall go into the matter of the railway board and find out if possible—

Mr. CAHAN: This is your proper court of appeal, not the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In the last analysis, the representatives of the province of Alberta and the other three provinces stand before this court. They can make their plea, but it is the voting strength of the representatives of all the provinces in this parliament that decides. And who are the provinces in this dominion that can outvote all the other provinces put together? It comes down to that. I do not wish to raise any cause of difference or cause of bitterness. All I want to say is this: You simply must make it possible for a people to live.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was to remove the matter from the realm of contention that the court was established and that it was provided that evidence might be heard and judgments given on that evidence. I should like to say to my hon. friend—because I was familiar with the matter in those days—that the western provinces had representation before the board, and so had boards of trade. The evidence is there in the library and may be read, and the judgments are predicated upon that evidence. This parliament could not create a railway commission and then declare that it should not decide the question of rates. Is that the suggestion?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not prepared to go into details. The details as they have been discovered and revealed by several of the investigating bodies that are making submissions to the Rowell commission disclose conditions which are positively horrifying, and when the whole truth is known to members of the house they will stand appalled. That is one little point which I cite to show what the dominion has done with a situation over which it had unchallengeable and absolute control. Here is another point—the tariff structure of the dominion. There is no doubt in the world that this parliament has complete control over that; no province challenges its right at all. All that the provinces can do is to stand and take it. This matter has been brought to the attention of the house several times. I shall again bring it chiefly to the notice of hon. gentlemen as an example of what this parliament has done in a matter over which it has absolute control, the idea being to show what parliament might do, what a court might do in Canada if we had absolutely centralized control.

Mr. CAHAN: Is this discussion relevant to the second reading of the bill?

Mr. THORSON: Surely it is relevant if it is directed to the relative merits of centralization and decentralization of authority.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks more closely to the question before the house, which is the second reading of the bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was giving certain details in answer to questions asked me, otherwise I should not have been speaking along that line for more than a minute. The idea is being put forward that we would be better off if we could centralize control in this dominion, and one reason given why the privy council has generally put us into the "morass" is that it has decentralized power, which, we are told, is one of the reasons why we should abolish appeals to the privy council. If my argument is not pertinent to that question, then I am afraid I am unable to reason straight. It is strictly pertinent to the argument brought forward by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and by many others. They have repeatedly stressed the fact that the privy council, by interpreting certain sections of the British North America Act and giving greater and greater power to the provinces, have thereby put us into a position in which it is impossible for this parliament to carry on. Therefore the privy council have completely confused the issue here; therefore we should abolish the appeal to the privy council. Is not that one of the arguments which have been advanced? And in dealing with that we have to show that the mere fact that absolute control will return to Canada is not necessarily an evidence that all things will be managed aright. I hasten along, not desiring to digress, because there are several other observations I have to make on this question, the pertinence of which I think no one can challenge.

Take the matter of tariff; the tariff structure of this dominion has been so arranged that the province of Manitoba is paying $9,274,000 a year more than it is getting; Saskatchewan is paying $25,000,000 more; Alberta is paying $19,000,000 more, while Ontario is receiving $51,000,000 more than it is giving and Quebec $31,000,000 more than it is giving. And all that has been done under the jurisdiction of a body which had absolute control over everything pertaining to tariff in Canada and which should have sat as an umpire seeing that every province got a fair deal.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the authority for that statement?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The present Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). This hon. gentleman is an authority, especially when his brief is in the records of a royal commission of this dominion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That was before he became a cabinet minister.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. I look on the hon. minister as an exceedingly fine man, one whose judgment is worthy of acceptance on any practical question, a man for whom I have the highest regard. His finding is worthy of the respect of everyone in Canada.

Probably I had better not deal with any other point than relief and unemployment. No doubt what we have been saying here during the last few days shows what Ottawa will do in matters over which we have absolute control in this country. Of course hon. members will say, "Oh, we have not control over the provinces." But I have never yet seen any province refuse to take money, if offered without too many strings. We hear reports of certain provinces not accepting money, but usually there was a string tied to such money.

I do not wish to delay the house any longer. I shall say a good deal more by and by on these subjects, because it must be said. We are seeking the reason for the strains and stresses now so apparent. Does any hon. member want to know the reason for the United Farmers of Alberta movement in Alberta? They were fighting for the right to live. Do hon. members want to know why there is a social credit movement in Alberta? They are fighting for the right to live. We talk about fascism and communism as though these things were a visitation of some supreme power over which we have no control, instead of a malady generated by conditions which we have allowed to develop. They are a result of certain causes, and we are not removing the causes. Right in this house lies the power to remove the cause. So I shall say a good deal more about these matters as we go along.

With respect to the bill, I think hon. members have gathered pretty well from what I have said that I agree in the main with the hon. member who spoke last (Mr. Pottier). I am not going to say just how accurate the decision rendered by the privy council was in each case, but to a most astonishing degree those decisions have agreed with the judgment of the supreme court of this country. That was shown clearly by figures cited this afternoon by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). What more would one ask? I do not wish to be mean in any way, but a man cannot help having a suspicion. I noticed that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George became agitated about this whole question of appeals to the privy council right after the decision regarding those three acts—

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member does not know the personal history of the member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I do not know how old the hon. gentleman is, but probably I was discussing that question before the time when he was born.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should not be at all surprised. I speak with all deference. I said I did not want to be mean, but just the same it is a striking coincidence. While I am not saying that it will not be in the interests of this country to abolish appeals to the privy council some day, yet there are grave considerations which ought to be reviewed before we make the decision to do so. In the first place, we should give public opinion, not only within Canada, but in Great Britain and in the rest of the world, time to adjust itself and solidify. I think every hon. member will realize the significance of what I say. Throughout a wide section of humanity importance will be attached to any such move. I am not sure that it is in the public interest that the move should be made now. Later on it may be. There exists to-day throughout Canada great confusion touching constitutional matters—one more reason why we should defer action on this question. I am, I think, just as appreciative of the work of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George as is the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson). I appreciate the good work he has done; I say here in his presence and before this house that I honour him as much as I honour any man in Canada. I reverence and respect him as a good man, one who is well informed and sincere. But at the same time we have to look at certain considerations. There exists in this country a wide diversity of opinion. While the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) was expressing views which are contrary to the ideas which we learned in our schools, and while I am not saying that I agree with him entirely, yet as sure as we are here these facts are leaking out and causing people to wonder. He said some most interesting things, which I was never taught when I was in school, and never taught to any class when I was teaching, but they are to be found in authorities which no one can question. I am finding out many things. There is a good deal of doubt in the minds of people because these things are just being discovered.

There is a great deal of dispute and controversy throughout this country as to the meaning and application of certain clauses of the British North America Act. Take one matter which has been exercising me tremendously. We say—and I stand open to correction if I am wrong—that the provinces have control over industry. I think that is in accordance with the British North America Act.

Now take as an example a canning factory. Suppose a man has $100,000 which he invests in a canning factory, and he takes all his capital to get the factory built and equipped ready to operate. Then he has to have a line of credit of $100,000 in order to operate his factory. To whom does he go for the line of credit? If he cannot get that line of credit he cannot run the factory. Has the province control of his getting that line of credit? If the province does not have control of his getting that credit, I ask any man or woman in this house whether the province has control of that industry.

Mr. CAHAN: Who says the province has control of industry?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I asked if it were not in the British North America Act; I think the province has control of industry, according to that act. Certainly the province has control of property and civil rights. I do not wish to get into the details of this question; I shall discuss those later on. This may be irrevelant, but it is a matter to be noticed, showing that the whole question of the British North America Act is not so simple as some people would suppose it to be. There is confusion in the minds of people, and really I am not sure that people generally throughout the country know what they do want. I have not found anyone who knows exactly what he wants. There are many people who will say that we want the British North America Act changed. Very well, I say; what change would you make? Immediately there is a surprised look on the person's face, and not very much assurance in the answer. If there is assurance in the answer I find there is very little value in it.

There is a growing conviction everywhere through Canada that the presently accepted allocation of powers between provinces and the dominion by the British North America Act does not sufficiently allow for the readjustments necessary to meet changing economic conditions. This is the reason for the stresses and strains. It is fundamental. Again, there is a vague doubt as to just what sort of constitution would be best for this country. I have heard some people say that if we could just scrap the British North America Act and get all the provinces together, we would be able to build up a new constitution. It is my humble opinion that if we scrapped the British North America Act and set about drawing up a new one, we would never get it finished, because we simply could not get the provinces to agree on the fundamental principles which would be involved in drafting a new constitution. The more informed they become, the less they will be inclined to agree. Take the west as an example. If the west could once get out of the grip and clutches of a constitution that permits a central power to build up a tariff structure which is entirely to the disadvantage of the west, do you suppose that any informed leader from that part of the country would ever go back into such bondage? Before doing so, he would think a long time.

There is a wide divergence of opinion because of the varying interests of the different provinces. It was reported in the press, I do not know on what authority, that one fairly prominent man from one of the central provinces said, "We won't be governed to suit the west." Very well, but apparently the same gentleman feels that it is quite all right for the west to be governed to suit the east. The provinces have had time to examine the workings of the British North America Act and to learn about all these matters; and now, in this time of testing everything, when even the president of the United States is worrying about fascism, while democracy is on trial, hon. members may be pretty sure that it will be a good thing to be a little careful about how fast we go forward. I would not do anything to rock the boat beyond what was absolutely necessary; as far as I can see, it is not absolutely necessary at the present time to abolish appeals to the privy council. There is a deep-seated apprehension in many provinces, as the best informed are coming to see no hope ahead. The more thoroughly experienced the leaders of the provinces become, the more convinced they will grow of this. The application of the proposed measure is simply this: There are strong indications that if appeals to the privy council were abolished, one of the last resorts, so to speak, now open to the provinces would be removed, right at a time when the provinces need all the safeguards they can secure.

I shall not detain the house any longer, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to make this plea, with all due respect to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, that consideration of this matter be held in abeyance; that we think it over; that we defer our decision on it until some future time when, after we have counselled together, our opinions will have ripened.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising at this late hour to speak on the bill introduced by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), I do so with a good deal of hesitation, because the time and, I suggest, the temper of the house will not permit me to deal with the bill in the way that, several days ago, I had hoped would be possible.

Mr. BENNETT: Move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MARTIN: I think I should use the time, if I may.

First, as a younger member of this house, and as a member of the younger generation in this country, I thank the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George for introducing this bill, and particularly for introducing it at this time. If proof were needed of the wisdom of introducing such a measure, it has been given in the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. The contention of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), as revealed in the discussion on this bill, show among other things that essentially due to the interpretation of the British North America Act by the judicial committee, our constitution and the constitutional development of this country has been given a turn not contemplated by the fathers of confederation. That, I think, is the important issue.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How do we know that?

Mr. MARTIN: That is a very fair question. All one can do is read the discussions which took place at the Charlottetown conference, which preceded the Quebec conference, and the discussions at the Quebec conference itself; the speeches of men such as Sir John A. Macdonald, Cartier and others; the pre-confederation debates; speeches in the legislatures and outside; discussions by students of the problem, all clearly indicating that the intention of the founders of this country was that we should have not a union of sovereign states but a union of provinces within what they erroneously called a confederation, really a federation a group of governments having power in respect of certain matters of self-government within the province. That was clearly the intention; anyone who goes into the history of the problem will come to that conclusion.

Mr. LANDERYOU: We may have doubts.

Mr. MARTIN: In proof of what I am saying the fathers of confederation had for examination the constitution of the United States. The framers of the constitution of the United States intended the very opposite to what was intended by the fathers of confederation. In the United States they intended to create a union of sovereign states.

In so far as emphasis was concerned the emphasis was to lie with the state authority. If one reads the life of Sir John A. Macdonald by Pope; if one reads the life of Cartier by his official biographer; particularly if one will read the observations of Sir John A. Macdonald in London prior to the passing of this imperial statute one will find the intention was to make out of the provinces affected a nation endowed with sufficient central authority. They intended to obviate the course that had been taken by the founders of the American constitution. And what has been the result? In the United States the result has been that the supreme court of that country has interpreted the law as did the judicial committee in our case in such a manner as gradually to withdraw from the states authority which has been transferred in the course of time by judicial process to the central authority.

Mr. BENNETT: The constitution, but theirs is not a statute. That is the whole difficulty.

Mr. MARTIN: That is a difficulty, and if I have time I shall discuss this apparent difficulty. As time went on, in the case of Canada, the judicial committee interpreted the constitution, as has been clearly demonstrated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, absolutely contrary to the intentions of its framers, with the result that we find ourselves in a position where we can almost completely compare first the intentions of the founders of our country with those of the founders of the United States, and, second, see to what extent the intentions of the founders of this country have been supported by judicial decisions, and to what extent the founders of the American nation have been supported in their intentions by judicial decisions. But there is not much point in labouring this. Hon. members opposite in the corner to my right do not agree with what I am saying. I can only say this, that my own interpretation of the historical development of this country is, I am sure, the interpretation which will be supported by the vast majority of the Canadian people.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Can the hon. member explain the provincial attitude at the present time?

Mr. MARTIN: I wish I could explain it, but I cannot. I was saying that I do not think there is any question that the vast majority of the people of this country who have given the problem any thought will conclude that my statement to-night in support of what has been said by so many other hon. members to-day is a correct statement of the problem viewed historically. If I interpret public opinion at the present time correctly, apart from the historical provocations, it is this: Having in mind the nature of our great problems, unemployment and the like; having in mind that these are national problems, there should be no question about endowing the central authority with the power to deal with them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They will try anything once.

Mr. MARTIN: I would remind the hon. gentleman, without wanting to occasion any controversy, that the province from which he comes, in respect of one important matter, unemployment insurance, has not acted in a manner consistent with what he said when he was speaking, namely, that we should not be bothered with these constitutional difficulties, and that we should extend to some authority the power to deal with these matters.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would my hon. friend permit a question for the purpose of clarification?

Mr. MARTIN: I have not much time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friend's statement has gone into Hansard and I want to know what he means. He means that Alberta has been willing to cooperate, does he not?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is what I wanted to get. Alberta is not doing any objecting at all.

Mr. MARTIN: Having in mind the official attitude of the province from which the hon. member comes, and having in mind his criticism of some authority in this country, for not dealing with these matters, he is hardly put in a very good light on that question.

The argument is often adduced—I believe it was adduced by the Minister of Justice to-day and, I fancy, by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George—that the fact that we are now in a position where we have to submit appeals to the judicial committee diminishes any mark of nationhood of which we might declare ourselves to be in possession.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the hon. member misunderstood with respect to that matter on which he was speaking with me a moment ago.

Mr. MARTIN: I am not referring to the hon. member at the moment. My submission is this, the mere fact that we do consent to have appeals heard by the judicial committee in no way, as matters now stand, derogates from the character of our nationhood. If one interprets properly the imperial conference of 1930, and if one interprets the full implications of the Balfour declaration of 1926, we have the power; and in demanding that power, if the method employed to-day is not satisfactory or adequate, we shall have no difficulty in removing this one apparent though not actual fetter—nationhood.

I suggest that when one considers the various groupings of personnel in the judicial committee—the Lord Watson group, the Lord Haldane group, the Lord Sankey, now Viscount Sankey, group and if I may say so the Lord Atkin group—one will find that the various members of the judicial committee in their interpretations, or, as it has been called, in their experiment in judicial interpretation, have revealed the very great dangers that lie open to any body of men, no matter how highly endowed judicially they may be, in interpreting the constitution of a people which, in effect, is not merely a constitution but represents the spirit and legitimate aspirations of a people.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), when he interrupted me a few moments ago, pointed out that there was a difference between the interpretation of a statute and the interpretation of a constitution. My submission is that the British North America Act, while it is a statute in form, should not be considered any differently from the constitution of any country. To give it the strict interpretation that has been given is, I submit, to have misunderstood the spirit and intentions of those who are the fathers of this nation. To have interpreted the British North America Act as a statute, as has been done, instead of as a constitution, with the implications of elasticity to meet changing periods and changing problems was, I think, a very great judicial error, unaccompanied by the benefits so frequently the result of sober, judicial law-making.

I just suggest as a matter of record to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George that when this matter comes to be considered in final form, what will we say in respect of the doctrine of stare decisis? Assuming that the appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from the Supreme Court of Canada and the appellate courts in the provinces in respect of both criminal and civil cases are to be effectively abolished, what then is to be the effect of the judgments which have been rendered during the course of time and which, as has been pointed out, have so permanently affected the machinery of government? I suggest, assuming that the hon. gentleman succeeds in the prosecution of this bill, that the final court of appeal in Canada will for all necessary purposes be a court of coordinate jurisdiction, and consequently will have the power of overriding any decisions of the judicial committee which it deems not in the interests of Canadian national development.

However, this will be a slow process. I submit that an effective method of disturbing those great mistakes in judgment which have been made and which have had a serious consequence upon our national development, is now available. It will be open to this parliament effectively to remove by legislation such judgments as that of Lord Atkin, for instance, in respect of the treaty making power.

I suggest to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George that we shall not be dealing with the matter completely even though we pass this bill in its present form, that is with respect to matters which come within section 91 of the British North America Act. I am sure that the Supreme Court Act would have to go through substantial amendment and modification in order to be consistent with the legislation the hon. member has introduced.

Perhaps one other word should be said, and I say it as a lawyer who has never had an opportunity of arguing a case before the judicial committee, but who has sat on many occasions before the board and listened to the argument of eminent counsel. The suggestion that the legal profession would suffer by loss of contact in the event of appeals being successfully abolished does not hold much water. No one denies the unprecedented calibre of the judiciary in the United Kingdom and the high standing of the profession in the United Kingdom, but I submit that the necessary contacts with the agencies giving leadership in the common law can be obtained through other agencies forms of contact. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George knows, the number of the legal profession in this country who have had contact with the judicial committee is relatively small. When one weighs the possible advantages of the transmission of the benefits of that contact by those who are there to other members in the profession, I think he will admit that not much consideration need be given to this phase of the matter.

I suppose as a French Canadian I should not let this occasion pass without anticipating an argument that will undoubtedly be levelled against this bill. It is likely to be said by many that should this bill pass, there will be lost rights held dear by many, rights that were obtained under the treaty of Paris and, by implication, under the statute of 1867. I think this legislation should be passed; I hope it will be passed this year; but I trust no one will suggest that I am thereby prejudicing the rights of the minorities as to race and religion. When one examines the decisions of the past, he must realize that in most instances they have not been as protective as we have so often been told they are. If those of us who belong to the so-called minority group, in respect of race or religion, feel that we cannot endow our final court with great judicial power, have it composed of men with great judicial learning, who have been taught and encouraged to respect the rights of minorities, then there is no use in our expecting to obtain privileges within the group itself. This matter may be allowed to rest with the judgment of our people. We can trust the judgment of the men who will come ultimately to sit on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada in the form of a court of last resort. I am sure that the men who will make up that final court will be of such a stamp as to preclude the possibility of interference with these rights.

I can only hope that the bill introduced so ably by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George will receive the support which I think it deserves. I am satisfied that at this time this legislation will do more than almost anything else to convince the members of this house, should that be necessary, the legislators throughout Canada and the people of the country generally that if we are to live up to the intentions of the fathers of this federation we must take this opportunity of using the judicial arm of government as an effective instrument in bringing about the solid unity of Canada.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I think this matter is of sufficient importance from every angle from which it may be considered by hon. gentlemen in this house, by legislators in the various provinces and by the people of Canada generally, that every part of the British North America Act should be considered, particularly section 101. I agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) there is no doubt that under section 101 the parliament of Canada can create a court superior to the privy council. This section reads:

> The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

[Mr. Martin.]

On motion of Mr. Finn the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order, until Monday, April 25.

Monday, April 25, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

UNITED STATES GOODS IN TRANSIT

INQUIRY AS TO REVISION OF CUSTOMS REGULATIONS PERMITTING TRANSPORT OF GOODS IN BOND THROUGH CANADA BY MOTOR TRUCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley). I am in receipt of resolutions passed by the municipal council of the town of Brampton, and the railway employees at that point, opposing any revision of the customs regulations which would permit the transport of United States goods in bond through Canada by motor truck. Would the minister care to give assurances to the house at this time that no such change is in contemplation?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Any change in the practice would have to be effected by amendment to the Customs Act, not merely by change in the regulations. No change in that regard is contemplated. However a large number of representations have been made to the Department of National Revenue on both sides of the question. If there is any change in the policy of the government in this regard that change will be announced in due course, if and when it is decided upon. In the meantime all I can say is that this question has received and is receiving some consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: But it can be effected only by legislation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

NATIONAL REVENUE

EXEMPTION OF $100 ON ARTICLES ACQUIRED BY CANADIANS VISITING UNITED STATES—FORTY-EIGHT HOUR PROVISION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I advised the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) that I desired to ask him whether he had any explanation to make concerning a report in the press indicating that importations of Canadian merchandise into the United States by tourists from that country to the value of $100 would be allowed to enter free only if such tourists had remained at least forty-eight hours in Canada; but that such regulation was subject to the proviso that if Canada waived the forty-eight hour provision with respect to her citizens visiting the United States and subsequently returning, a reciprocal arrangement would be made. It is a matter of such importance that I thought the minister might desire to make an explanation.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, a bill has passed the senate of the United States but has not reached any more advanced stage than that. Perhaps in view of the importance of the question I might read the part of the bill applicable to the matter in question:

That up to but not exceeding $100 in value of articles (including distilled spirits, wines and malt liquors aggregating not more than one wine gallon and including not more than one hundred cigars) acquired abroad by such residents of the United States as an incident of the foreign journey for personal or household use or as souvenirs or curios, but not bought on commission or intended for sale, shall be free of duty: Provided further, that the secretary of the treasury may by special regulations or instruction, the application of which may be restricted to one or more individual ports of entry, provide that the exemption authorized by the preceding proviso shall be applied only to articles acquired abroad by a returning resident who has remained beyond the territorial limits of the United States for such period, not to exceed forty-eight hours, as the secretary may deem necessary at the specified port or ports to facilitate enforcement of the requirement that the exemption shall apply only to articles acquired as an incident of the foreign journey: Provided further, that the exemption authorized by the second preceding proviso shall apply only to articles declared in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the secretary of the treasury by a returning resident who has not taken advantage of the said exemption within the thirty-day period immediately preceding his return to the United States: Provided further, that no such special regulation or instruction shall take effect until the lapse of ninety days after the date of such special regulation or instruction: And provided further, that section 37 of this act shall not take effect until ninety days after the effective date of this act: And provided further, that all articles exempted by this paragraph from the payment of duty shall also be exempt from the payment of any internal revenue taxes.

It will be noted that the section does not enact a forty-eight hour requirement, but it authorizes the secretary of the treasury to stipulate a forty-eight hour absence as a test of the bona fides of the declaration that the purchase was incidental to the visit abroad. This bill was passed by the senate—

Mr. BENNETT: On April 2.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and it goes to a conference between the senate and house of representatives. The house of representatives has appointed conferees, but up to the time of this statement, April 13, the senate had not taken similar action. That appears to be the stage the legislation has reached up to the present, and I think that gives the right hon. gentleman the information he requires. Apparently there is no provision to the effect that if another country eliminates the forty-eight hour provision it will be eliminated by the United States. That is not a feature of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: That was said to have been an amendment added in the senate. It passed the house of representatives, I think in somewhat different form; then passed the senate and stood for a conference. That was my understanding of it, but no conference has been held and there is no such legislation at this moment.

Mr. ILSLEY: True.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is only fair to say that for at least two or three years that I can recall, somewhat similar legislation has been before congress, and there is nothing further in this except that it has reached a stage where it may be the subject matter of a conference.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 7, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rogers thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 105, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES AND VICTORIA, B.C., BY-ELECTION—AMENDMENT OF MR. STIRLING TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Before the house resolves itself into committee of supply there are certain observations I want to make with regard to the attitude taken by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) at the time of the Victoria by-election. Before proceeding I should like to express my regret, and the regret of those from British Columbia who are associated with me, at the untimely illness of Mr. Robert Mayhew, the member-elect. I did not meet Mr. Mayhew on that occasion, but I was much struck by the warmth of the appreciation which was expressed on all sides with regard to Mr. Mayhew, and we earnestly hope that he may make a speedy and complete recovery.

The attitude of the minister, to which I want to refer, is that he made an appeal, for partisan purposes, on the expenditure of money for the defence of this country, and particularly the expenditure on the Pacific coast, added to the expenditure which would be undertaken by the government through the carrying out of the program outlined. The inference clearly was that the elector would do well to think deeply before he decided to vote against the government. There have been five ministers of national defence during the time I have occupied a seat in this house. None of the other four, so far as my knowledge goes, have made use of expenditures for the purpose of defence as an appeal for votes, and I think it is a deplorable thing that on this occasion the minister should have set such a precedent. The minister most clearly appealed for votes by submitting the expenditures of this government. Defence above all other things should be kept entirely free from partisanship. I believe there is a growing desire on the part of a considerable section of the general public that partisanship should be kept separate from expenditures of money in various departments. I think that a very great majority of the people consider that when we are discussing the defences of Canada expenditures of money certainly should not then be used as a basis for appeal.

Moreover, from the contact I had the privilege of having with the three branches of the service during the year I was minister, nothing was more clearly borne in on me than the fact that members of the services, departmental officials, were also desirous that questions of partisanship should not intrude themselves into their public work.

On November 18 the minister spoke to a theatre full of people in Victoria. I arrived in Victoria on the afternoon of the following day, and found that both the daily papers of the city contained a report of the minister's speech. Indeed so many of the observations of the Minister of National Defence were in inverted commas that I believe it is entirely probable that a statement was submitted to the press on behalf of the minister—and I am not suggesting the minister would be inclined to doubt the veracity of what appeared in the press.

There was a broadcast of proceedings at the meeting, and I met a considerable number of people who had either heard the minister in person or listened to him over the radio. There is no doubt therefore that the statement appearing in the Victoria Colonist is substantially accurate. I read now from the issue of November 19:

"I have never sought to make the defence of Canada a political question and I do not intend to do so now," he declared. "But I must tell you that the first week I was in office, I obtained a report on the condition of the three branches of the service—the navy, the army and the air force.

I found Canada lacked adequate forces to guarantee the neutrality in a war in which she did not wish to become a belligerent. Barracks, dockyards and other shore facilities of the naval service were antiquated and inadequate. The Esquimalt naval magazine had been condemned in 1905 and nothing had been done about it," Mr. Mackenzie continued.

"There were no anti-aircraft guns in Canada. The stock of field gun ammunition was only adequate for less than ninety minutes' firing. The existing field artillery was unsuitable for mechanical traction and was outranged from three to six thousand yards. Coast defences were obsolescent and defective. Firing from guns was restricted to prolong their lives.

There was no proper mechanization, no gas masks, no proper facilities for the manufacture of arms. The reorganization of the militia was recommended in 1932 and nothing had been done."

Mr. Mackenzie further claimed that the twenty-three planes of the air force were all obsolescent. There was no supply of air bombs. No survey had been made for national defence, he stated.

He charged that the Conservative regime had wrecked the air force and had crippled the training of the militia, whose appropriation had been cut from 11 million dollars to 8·8 million dollars, a reduction of 25 per cent, while the air force had been cut from 7·4 million dollars to 1·7 million dollars, a decrease of 75 per cent.

"Whatever the justification," he said, "I ask you to remember the record of the Conservatives when they come to you preaching about national defence."

Thereafter Mr. Mackenzie pointed out that the expenditure on Pacific coast defences under the regime of Mr. Bennett in 1935-36 totalled $1,916,116, while the appropriation for 1937-38 under the Liberal administration amounts to $8,163,188.

"This is an expenditure for defence," he declared, "which has not been equalled from the time of confederation. It must be borne in mind that the coast defence program cannot be completed until 1940. I ask you to remember what we are endeavouring to do, and I am taking this opportunity of requesting the electors of Victoria to approve the policy of defence of this coast when they go to the polls, November 29."

There can be no doubt whatever, I believe, that that was a flagrant instance of an appeal for political purposes. It is so very different from the attitude adopted by the minister when his estimates were before the committee last year. On that occasion he fully realized that the official opposition indulged in no carping criticism. He knew the assistance given by the official opposition was an assistance to him at a time when he was not particularly comfortable, as he was expounding views which were not acceptable to a very considerable number of government supporters.

It will be noted also that at least some of the criticism he used was just as applicable to the administration prior to 1930 as it was to the subsequent one. But the great unfairness of the arguments he used is found in the fact that he made no reference to the tremendous change which has taken place throughout the world, a change-over from disarmament to rearmament. As a member of the League of Nations Canada was committed to disarmament. Her defence estimates were prepared year by year under an atmosphere of disarmament. She did not wish to increase her defence expenditures. Indeed, had she done so, it would not require a very vivid imagination to imagine the speeches which would have been made by the minister and his right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King). On account of the depression it was not possible during the disarmament period for the then government even to set aside the quantity of money required adequately to keep up the services as they then existed, and it was unfortunately necessary to cut the training of men. But to this fact the minister made no reference whatever.

There is nothing out of the common in the minister's argument; it is the typical Liberal argument: "Use the facts which are convenient; make no reference to the facts which are not convenient, even though those facts are predominant." I am reminded of another Liberal appeal for votes which was contained in the speech with which the right hon. leader of the Liberal party opened the campaign in 1935. He told of one of his famous soliloquies. He was standing on Wellington street. On his right front there rose a magnificent building, one erected by his administration and adapted to the peaceful purposes of labour and agriculture. On his left front there was rising the gaunt skeleton of another great structure built by the then administration at a cost of a million and a quarter dollars. For what purpose was it to be used? It was to be used by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. A great barracks was being erected in Calgary. Barracks for the use of the police and militia were going up from coast to coast, many of them being erected with money voted for relief. According to the Ottawa Citizen of the following day, the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

"There are drill halls and armouries all over the country built at heavy cost" he said. "Why?" "It is to build up a great military force because all dictatorships demand force and the last word in dictatorship is the cannon and what comes out of the cannon."

That was the view of the Prime Minister at the beginning of the 1935 campaign. Yet within eighteen months he and his Minister of National Defence were preparing estimates for submission to this house which were $10,000,000 more than those submitted previously. The Minister of National Defence goes to Victoria and uses a diametrically opposite argument. The Prime Minister wished to paint us as war-like people.

Mr. BENNETT: Dictators.

Mr. STIRLING: As dictators. He claimed that we were making provision for cannons and for that which comes out of cannons, but when the increased estimates of 1937 were brought before this house it was found that they contained provision for cannons and that which comes out of cannons. On the one hand we have the leader of the Liberal party appealing for votes because we are making tremendous expenditures for military purposes. Then we have the Minister of National Defence, on the occasion of a by-election, trouncing us for not having made the necessary expenditures to keep up the defence of this country.

I should like to bring together the responsible facts of history which go to explain this tremendous change that has taken place. After the armistice the weary nations of the world met to lay down a platform of peace. They met to prepare a peace treaty and at the same time lay down the foundation of a noble structure for the preservation of peace. At the very first the idea of a league of nations suffered a heavy blow because of the withdrawal of a great nation which during the preparatory time had given its support but whose people were not ready to go any further.

The League of Nations came into being, and parallel with this fact, disarmament was imposed on Germany and her allies by our allies who themselves solemnly undertook to carry out voluntary disarmament. As time went on it became more and more difficult to bring a disarmament conference into being. There were wars and rumours of war. There was dissatisfaction because national boundaries had been drawn on the map with a pencil without sufficient notice being taken of racial distinctions and of the ideas which minorities have since shown that they believe in most strongly. Although the hope for a disarmament conference was dwindling, although such a conference was, shall we say, the first goal that the League of Nations attempted to reach, such a conference eventually did meet in February, 1932, when the delegates of sixty-one nations met in London to discuss disarmament. This conference was brought about because of the example set and the persuasion used by Great Britain. The conference had hardly met before it was realized that it was faced with the tremendous problem of endeavouring to make agree two principles which were incompatible. The first principle was that the disarmament which had been imposed on Germany was necessary before voluntary disarmament could be undertaken by the other nations. The second principle, which was acceptable to many of the other nations, was that they could not agree to a basis of disarmament which would jeopardize their own conception of national security.

But the disarmament conference went on talking. Within a year Japan had withdrawn and eight months later Germany withdrew. Germany had come reluctantly to the conference and had taken the view all the way through that the one and only basis which could be accepted by her as the basis for disarmament on the part of those nations which agreed voluntarily to disarm was the basis which had been imposed on her and to which she had rigorously to conform because she was governed in her every act by disciplinary measures and inspections carried out by allied committees. Germany withdrew, but the disarmament conference went on talking. Indeed, it has not yet been officially terminated.

In March, 1935, Germany took another step; she threw over the military clauses of the Versailles treaty. Eight months later she repudiated Locarno. In October, 1935, Italy entered Abyssinia. In July, 1936, there was civil war in Spain. By the intrusion of European nations into this conflict, Europe was brought hazardously near to the brink of war. I cite these instances because I want to draw attention to the important fact that must be considered in connection with the armament of this or any other country. We must realize that we have passed from disarmament to rearmament. In making his political appeal the minister omitted any reference to that all-absorbing fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, that is not correct.

Mr. STIRLING: I have not found it in anything that I have read, but perhaps the minister will explain further.

In 1934 Great Britain could no longer keep her eyes closed to the fact that she had slipped to the position of a fifth rate power in the air. Germany was away to a flying start. Great Britain started feverishly to train pilots and mechanics, to build new factories and adapt old ones, to provide herself with the necessary materials and to make the tools and build the machinery necessary for the manufacture of engines and planes. She realized that she was away behind the race.

Strive as she will, we still read from week to week in the press and hear it announced in the British house that she still realizes that she has not yet caught up.

It is not possible to name definitely the month in which disarmament gave place to rearmament. However, we can draw attention to the fact that the estimates for the Department of National Defence prepared prior to those of 1936 were prepared in an atmosphere of disarmament, whereas the subsequent estimates were prepared in an atmosphere of rearmament. It does not seem to me reasonable that a minister should go to a by-election and should preach the cause of political support citing as his reason for so doing the expenditure of money on national defence. Ever since the signing of the peace treaty, Great Britain had done all that she could to persuade and to lead the powers towards disarmament. She had made people in Great Britain, and indeed in the empire, extremely anxious as she reduced her navy in personnel and ships, as she reduced her little army, as she failed to replace her aeroplanes, and she did not even keep abreast of the tremendous scientific developments which were taking place with regard to the heavier-than-air machines. But she had pledged her word to disarm, and she was doing her best, whatever the spirit of the other nations might be, to carry out her undertaking.

Canada was in a similar position. She was a supporter of the League of Nations. The League of Nations had committed itself to disarmament. Great Britain had been preaching the word of disarmament and endeavouring to induce the nations to practise disarmament; she had hoped to lead the world to it. But she could not carry on further and see Germany overtake her in the air.

It is utterly improper in my opinion for a minister of the crown to use defence for the purposes of political appeal, and it is a reflection on public life for a minister to state a case with such unfairness as to omit reference to an overbearing and essential fact. Indeed, I do not think a public man will long enjoy the confidence of his public if he is known to be one who in stating an argument omits an essential fact On this occasion there can be no question that the minister made an appeal for votes by alluding to the expenditure of money for the defence of the Pacific coast, and not only the expenditure which was then going on, but the expenditure which would be carried on as the work proceeded which he had outlined. In my opinion this is such an unpleasant departure from the precedents of previous years that it is desirable to bring the matter before this house, and I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts):

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the opinion of this house, moneys appropriated by parliament for the defence of Canada should not be used, directly or indirectly, for political partisan purposes.

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): Mr. Speaker, in seconding this motion I should like to associate myself to the fullest possible extent with the remarks made by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) in connection with the by-election in Victoria, and I should like to draw the attention of the house to another occasion upon which the minister, or the department, or the government, or all of them, fell into the same deplorable state as they did in connection with the Victoria by-election, in that expenditures of public money in connection with a very important function of the government were made for partisan purposes. I refer to the method by which the Canadian contingent that was sent overseas to represent us at the coronation was selected.

As I have pointed out in this chamber before, Mr. Speaker, the coronation presented a golden opportunity for the Dominion of Canada to advertise its greatest product, its man power, at the greatest festival of empire that the world has ever seen. It was an occasion upon which the minister and the department and the government should have spared no pains to select from what I claim is the smartest body of men in uniform in the world to-day, the Canadian militia, a contingent that should be second to none. They should have been perfect in physique, perfect in drill, perfect in every respect in so far as what meets the eye may be concerned—because this was a parade, Mr Speaker. Our contingent, as did the other contingents, marched through the streets of London before a cloud of witnesses from all parts of the empire, and my complaint, and I am prepared to prove the facts on which it is based, is that in selecting the personnel of the Canadian contingent other considerations than those of merit entered into the mind of the minister.

First of all I should like to refer to the King's Regulations and Orders for the Canadian Militia, which, by virtue of the Militia Act, have the force of statute law. Paragraph 429 reads as follows:

An officer is forbidden to write private letters to officials at National Defence headquarters, on official personal matters.

Attempts to obtain favourable consideration of any application by the use of outside influence are forbidden, and, if resorted to, will be regarded as an admission on the part of the applicant that the case is not good on its merits, and it will be dealt with accordingly.

When an interview is asked for, or a letter written on behalf of an officer by any person other than himself, such application will be deemed to have been made at his suggestion, unless he can show to the satisfaction of the authorities that he has no knowledge, directly or indirectly, of such application.

Now I state as a fact, Mr. Speaker, that that paragraph was not adhered to in the selection of those who made up our Canadian contingent, and I submit, and I am prepared to prove it if given the opportunity, that political pressure was brought, and brought successfully, upon the department, with the result that the type of contingent that should have represented Canada did not go to London.

Just as one instance of what took place, let me say that I know of one entire corps which was represented by only one officer. That is manifestly unfair on any basis of representation. The one officer who was chosen announced some four months before the selections of the contingent were made, shortly after it became known that a contingent was to go to the old country, that he had great pull with the government, and that he was going to London. And go he did. I can think of nothing that will operate more effectively to destroy the spirit which has always permeated the Canadian militia, the spirit which built up for Canadian troops a name that will live as long as history is written; and I challenge the minister to show that political influence was not brought to bear constantly in the selection of the Canadian contingent. As a result of that, because the smartest, the best drilled, the most perfect physical specimens that could be selected were not selected, many very unfortunate incidents followed.

There is, Mr. Speaker, a quaint old military custom, familiar to you, I have no doubt, familiar to all members of the house, certainly familiar to the minister, that when soldiers are on parade they march in step. I hold in my hand a photograph of the contingent taken on this side of the water as they approached the boat at Montreal. Let me make it quite clear at this point that I am aiming no criticism whatever at the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, none whatever at the representatives of the Canadian navy, and none at the band of the Royal Canadian regiment. My remarks are confined strictly to the militia contingent, composd, I believe, of 256 persons, thirty-two of whom were colonels or lieutenant-colonels and five of whom were privates. If the minister will take the trouble to scrutinize this photograph—and remember, this was a public occasion—he will find, on looking at these persons representing the Canadian militia, that one soldier in the front rank is not in step with his leader, who is about ten feet distant.

That is of course bad drill, but it is bad business too. Going a little further, we come to the selection from a very large and important garrison centre, in which the local military authorities recommended an extremely smart officer who would have done great credit to them as their representative. But he was overlooked, for very obvious reasons, and in his place was sent one who could only be described as the ward heeler supreme of that part of the country. He has been the bearer of the Liberal banner in every election since time immemorial, and is now enjoying a well-earned rest in a cushy patronage job which he derived from the present Liberal government of the province. I have here his picture taken on shipboard—and let me say, I bear no malice towards him in making these remarks. I make these remarks because I am particularly keen as a former militia man that the Canadian militia should be properly represented on important occasions of this sort, and I feel it a duty to the militia of the country to bring to light the manner in which patronage overrode all other considerations in the selection of this contingent. I leave it to the minister to look at this photograph I have here, showing some of the officers of the contingent that crossed the ocean—I leave it to him to decide whether this officer of whom I speak, who was chosen over the head of the local authorities, is a smart soldierly figure.

An hon. MEMBER: Perhaps he was seasick!

Mr. BETTS: It is evidently a formal picture, because all the officers are wearing gloves and swords. The officer of whom I speak could not, by any standard, be described as either a good physical specimen or a good figure of an officer on parade. His head is resting on a splendidly developed double chin. He holds the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and large rolls of lieutenant-colonel are protruding over his Sam Browne belt.

That is not the type of officer that marched for the other dominions at his majesty's coronation. Words fail to describe the effect as I cast my eyes down his figure. His voluptuous calves are protruding from ill-fittings leggings, and his breeches—what shall I say of his breeches! They are tight where they should be loose and loose where they should be tight. They bring irresistibly to my mind that ditty immortalized by the troops in France about "those funny little pants that Maggie wore; they were baggy at the knees"—I won't continue, Mr. Speaker.

Let me make it clear, without any levity whatever, that that is not the type of officer who should have been selected to represent the Canadian militia at his majesty's coronation. And let me add that my criticisms have been echoed in every mess room, drill hall and canteen from Halifax to Vancouver.

Then, when we get to London, we find, in the picture I now hold in my hand, the guard moving to Buckingham palace, surely an important occasion. There they are moving along in fours and apparently the command "Eyes left!" has just been given; a compliment is being paid to somebody on the left of the parade. But one of the non-commissioned officers—a high-ranking one, you may be sure of that, because practically everybody in that contingent was high-ranking—is not thinking at all of the reason for the command; he is thinking of the girl he left behind him, or the big stoup of beer he will have at the barracks when he gets back. He is gazing straight ahead; he has missed out on his drill. Let me add that he is not one of the markers, and so his head and eyes should have been turned to the left. That is the sort of thing that happens when the canker of patronage eats into any department.

Taking up this souvenir book, which I imagine has had circulation all over the empire, we find a photograph of the Canadian contingent moving through Piccadilly circus, and at the head we see the band of the Royal Canadian regiment, moving as one man; properly covered off; all in step, just as smart as paint; and we cast our eyes to the left and find the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a credit to their corps, their commissioner, and their dominion. Then behind that, there is a serpentine effect of troops wobbling about, not covered off, a bulge in the centre of the column—bad drill, almost no drill at all.

This was not an occasion on which to sound the party tocsin and raise the party standard and summon old Colonel Dropsy and Major Spavin from the Liberal committee rooms and send them overseas on a joy ride. The minister was not administering Liberal campaign funds; he was spending public money. He overlooked that, but the country has not overlooked it. Why did not the minister in making his selections pick fine upstanding fellows like himself who would make the girls catch their breath and say: "Oh boy!" when the troops marched by? I protest on behalf of the Canadian militia and on behalf of the Canadian taxpayers that patronage was allowed to ruin this golden opportunity to advertise the Canadian militia in the heart of the empire.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I was astounded upon hearing the address to which we have just listened, not only conceived but expressed and delivered in the worst taste I have ever seen displayed in the House of Commons of Canada. I desire in the first place to inform the hon. member that the Canadian coronation contingent was selected by a committee of the permanent force of Canada, and the recommendations came from the commanding officers of the units themselves. I have here the nominal roll of the men. A great number of them earned high decorations on the field of battle, and the remarks made by the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts) this afternoon are an insult to the reputation and military record of every single man of that contingent. Did hon. members notice the method of insinuation followed not only this afternoon but on a previous occasion? "Yes, the mounted police were splendid." So they were, but as the Canadian contingent, after receiving their decorations from the hand of His Majesty the King and Her Majesty the Queen, swung in column of four past Buckingham palace, I heard one of the highest military officers of Great Britain say, "That was the finest marching by any part of the empire contingent."

My hon. friend speaks of patronage. He knows as well as I do that in many cases men who were actually presidents of the Conservative organization were members of the coronation contingent, and as far as I am concerned that would certainly be no bar to their being selected. Several were so selected from within twenty miles of Ottawa, and in Winnipeg. But the hon. member now wishes to convey the impression that members of the contingent were selected because they were adherents of the Liberal party and supporters of Liberal policy. The opposition are saying that now for the first time, and they have now thrown this issue of defence into politics; it was done very definitely this afternoon. It was done in a gentlemanly way, as one would expect, by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), and now it has been done in another way by the hon. member who followed him. Let me inform my hon. friend that if he had been in charge of the selection of the Canadian contingent we should have seen something diabolical in the extreme, not something done honourably and in good form as was the selection made last year. But it so happens that the party to which the hon. member belongs was never in power in this country at the time of a coronation, and never will be.

I shall deal next with the remarks of the hon. member for Yale. He asserted not only that I introduced the issue of national defence into the Victoria by-election contest but that I definitely did so in order to influence the decision of the voters. I am very much surprised that a gentleman of his fine personal qualities, who himself took part in that by-election, and who knows, I think, the actual truth as to what happened, should have found it necessary to raise this issue here this afternoon. I spoke in the Victoria by-election on two occasions, on November 18 and November 26.

Mr. BENNETT: And at the military institute.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And at the military institute; I am glad my right hon. friend referred to that. The address delivered to the military institute was entirely non-political. Does my right hon. friend doubt that? Very well, we shall find out. The right hon. leader of the opposition said in the Victoria by-election campaign that men who were working on national defence contracts required a red ticket from the Liberal organization in Victoria before they were employed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have here one of the red tickets. I show it to the house. It is a military pass from military headquarters at Esquimalt entitling them to enter the premises. It has nothing whatever to do with any political organization. I also hold in my hand a membership ticket in the Victoria Liberal organization of last year. Is that a red ticket? No, it is white. But that is the way politics were introduced into that by-election, not by the Minister of National Defence, but by hon. gentlemen who sit opposite me this afternoon.

I have here several letters of thanks concerning the way these men were employed—letters not from political organizations, but from the legion and other ex-service bodies.

The leader of the opposition referred a few moments ago to an address I delivered during that campaign to the United Services Institute. Also the hon. member for Yale, speaking in Vancouver, I think on the day of the by-election or shortly afterwards, made the statement that the Minister of National Defence had made a political speech to a military institute during the course of that by-election.

After it was announced that I was to speak in the Victoria by-election, and while I was crossing this continent en route to Victoria, a telegram was received by me from Major Crockett, secretary of the United Services Institute, as follows:

> United Services Institute of Vancouver Island extend a cordial invitation to you to address them at time convenient to you during your visit to Victoria. If able to accept kindly let me know as soon as possible date and subject.
> Major M. Kirkpatrick Crockett.

I demurred, as I thought such an address at that time might be misconstrued, as it has been this afternoon. I was assured by the officers of the institute that the meeting would be a private and confidential meeting, and so it was. I addressed that meeting, and there was not a single suggestion of political discussion during the whole course of my address. The other day I telegraphed to the officers of this institute, because I heard this question was coming up, and this is the reply I got. And let me say that the officers and members of that organization are not supporters of the party to which I belong. This is from a strong Conservative of Victoria who was present:

> Have discussed matter of your wire with Major Kirkpatrick Crockett, secretary of the United Services Institution, and he is wiring you separately. Personally feel most indignant, and that all others of the one hundred present at meeting would feel likewise if they knew your courtesy and confidence had been abused. Your remarks were confined to facts of a confidential nature, without any possible political taint, and your audience was presented to you as being composed of officers and gentlemen. Would be ashamed to believe that anyone there present could state otherwise. General Austin, president, and Sir Percy Lake, mover of vote of thanks, agree with me.

The telegram received from Major Crockett, honorary secretary of the United Services Institution, was as follows:

> Your address to United Services Institution of Vancouver Island was entirely military in character. Institution absolutely non-political and deals with service matters only. Your talk given at my invitation only after my assurance that meeting not open to press or non-members. Consensus of opinion is that you spoke as one officer to a group of brother officers and in confidence. President assured you that no publicity would be given meeting. Deeply resent any effort to misconstrue your kindness in addressing us.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would read the telegrams to which these are the replies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have not them here in my papers, but I should be very glad to do so. The telegram asked this officer—

Mr. BENNETT: What was the language of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to table the telegram. I think that is a complete repudiation of the suggestion that any political influence was brought to bear at that meeting.

May I say that at the first meeting, on November 18, I covered the record of this government; I covered the fourteen-point platform upon which this government appealed to the people in 1935. I took in the question of defence, but may I tell my hon. friend that the Conservative party was not even mentioned in that address. I may tell him further that at the meeting on November 26 I publicly corrected, from the platform in Victoria, the misquotation which appeared in the Victoria Daily Colonist dealing with the attitude of his party.

Mr. STIRLING: May I say that I was entirely unaware of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am quite sure of that. There was a misreport made by the Colonist which was not brought to the attention of my hon. friend; and I commended the Conservative party on both the first and second occasions on the support they gave the national defence estimates a year ago. I know where my hon. friend was misled; I have an idea who misinformed him both with reference to that meeting and the address delivered to the military institute. His allegations this afternoon are founded on misinformation that came from those in the city of Victoria who have been advising him; I could produce abundant evidence of that. I did criticize my hon. friends of the Canadian Commonwealth Federation party. I quoted what they said in this house last year, when they moved a vote of want of confidence on the estimates for national defence. Was it not fair for the Minister of National Defence, coming from the province of British Columbia, fighting a by-election in his own province, to explain to the people of Victoria what we were endeavouring to do last year when my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party moved a resolution of no confidence, which would have defeated this government, on the very issue I introduced into that by-election?

I make no apology for introducing the issue of national defence, and the people of Victoria to-day do not regret that defence was discussed. Then why all these post mortems and aftermaths, when the people of Victoria have decided this issue for all time? All the falsities and misstatements which have been brought to my hon. friends opposite will not alter the decision and determination of the people of Victoria to see to it that the defences around that city are prosecuted with vigour, vision and firmness. We have had two addresses, one dealing with the by-election in Victoria and the other dealing with the Canadian coronation contingent. We have had one man insulting the uniforms of the Canadian army, with the other man relying on the tittle-tattle which has come to him possibly from citizens of Victoria in regard to declarations made by the Minister of National Defence. I have nothing to apologize for, nothing to retract and nothing to explain. At those meetings I commended the support of my hon. friends opposite and condemned the attitude of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and in regard to this question of defence I would pursue the same policy to-morrow. The Australian election not long ago was fought entirely on this issue of defence, and recent by-elections in England and Scotland have been fought on the same issue. Sane defence should be one of the major policies of this country. Why should it be concealed from the people? Why this sinister assumption of secrecy at the present time in regard to general features of policy? Why? Because they lost a seat that had been theirs for thirty-one years; because the people of Victoria believed in the principles of this Liberal government. My hon. friends should take their defeat with patience and dignity. At this time they should not introduce a motion of no confidence in this government, in connection with a question already decided by the might and majesty of the public opinion of the good people of Victoria, British Columbia.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I had not intended to speak at any great length during this debate, but I think it must be abundantly clear to all that anyone who is a taxpayer in this country has some feeling of just resentment that his taxes thus paid can be utilized only to give employment to those who support the government. That is practically the proposition that was put forward in Victoria. I was rather surprised at the minister. He knew perfectly well that the red card to which he referred was the military card, but no one could get a red card who did not have the card of the Liberal association.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct.

Mr. BENNETT: That was correct at the time. What is more, the witnesses can be produced; all you have to do is issue a royal commission and you can get them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; they got them straight from the military organizations.

Mr. BENNETT: They got them only where they had to enter certain particular localities for the purpose of doing their work. The defences of Victoria were being proceeded with at the very time the by-election was being held, and those who were given employment were those who secured these tickets from the Liberal organization.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: And they got the red tickets that enabled them to have access to the areas in question. I cannot help who gave the contrary information to the minister; that was the fact, because men came and showed me—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But I have the direct information here from a list of ten ex-service men's organizations.

Mr. BENNETT: That may well be, but the minister had ex-service men's organizations being given employment during Christmas in Vancouver, but all the men were passed by his representative.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They did not.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, practically.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They did not.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to accept the hon. gentleman's word, but his representative was there and saw them, or the greater part of them; that was apparent also. I mention that because it is no good to say this is not being done. I am a moderate taxpayer in this country, and I do find it a little difficult to accommodate myself to the thought that my taxes go to supply work only for Liberals. That I find a little difficult to understand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not say the practice is limited to Victoria, because it is not; it extends to the other parts of the country as well, but this resolution puts it forward with respect to national defence and does not deal with other matters at all. It is a difficult thing to say that a man who pays large taxes can only thus provide employment for those who may be opposed to his political beliefs. It does not seem very just or right, with respect to matters of national defence at any rate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It does not happen.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it has happened. I am going to give the minister some information that will possibly enable him to go down to his department and find things which he has not heretofore found; or, shall I say, to discover some things which he does not want to discover. That is the better way to put it, to discover things that he does not want to discover. The real truth about it is this: There was a byelection in Victoria. The minister made the opening speech with the candidate. The former Minister of National Defence had not then arrived. Certainly I was not then in Victoria, but I read his speech, which has been quoted by the former minister and placed upon Hansard. In that speech the minister made a direct appeal to the citizenry of Victoria to support the government of the day because of what it had done for defence. At the same time he pointed out that the government's predecessors in office had not done what they should with respect to defence. The former minister has pointed out that the conditions to which we had committed ourselves had to deal with disarmament. Everyone knew what took place in that connection. We sent to Geneva a delegation headed by the late Sir George Perley.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I mentioned that also.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, later.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, in that address.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not so reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not mind that; I have the complete text of what I said.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps it was like the address delivered in Toronto, the one where the copies were not quite the same as the address delivered. I am quite familiar with that kind of address.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You should be.

Mr. BENNETT: I can say that with a good deal of satisfaction, for I never have a manuscript. You see, that is the difference. The manuscript handed out to the press and the speech delivered do not synchronize.

But certainly the truth is that this appeal was made. The minister to-day says what he had in mind was the attitude of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation supporters in this house, and a motion which they moved. I cannot say whether that was wholly in his mind or not, because I could not perform a surgical operation on his mind at that particular time. But certainly his language must have been used to disguise thought, and not to express it—I will put it as mildly as that; for certainly the speech he made indicated to me that his criticism was directed to the former administration, and to the fact that that administration did reduce expenditures.

They did it, it is true—under protest from their officials, because they felt that we should have spent more money for the purposes of defence. We had to point out that money was not available, so long as people were suffering from the effects of drought in western Canada and the lack of food and shelter in other parts of the country. But the primary reason was that we were committed to a policy of disarmament, through the League of Nations—a policy which we carried out, and which we were pressed in this house to carry out, a policy which was constantly being brought to our attention, and which we were being urged to make effective.

I can recall in this very chamber one of the members then sitting to the left of Mr. Speaker, rising in his place in the house and asking how much it cost per annum, per month and per day to keep the destroyers we had in operation, in commission, and how far these expenditures would have gone towards supplying food and shelter to people in Canada. And I remember the position taken by the now Prime Minister when he pointed out that these expenditures were expenditures which should not be properly made. I shall not repeat what has been said by the former minister as to what was said in the opening speech of the then Prime Minister at Kingston with reference to expenditures, looking at that building now occupied by the Department of Justice and other departments of the public service—that here was something erected by a dictator for the purpose of using cannon in the expression of his views. And the barracks being erected at Calgary, when there had been for years under consideration the erection in western Canada of some such unit. That unit was erected, and it was erected at Calgary. It contained provision for the air force as well as for other branches of the defence service, all these records of the past one recalls. But when the minister said, as he did in Victoria, that a week after he came into office he got a certain report, he knew, or must have known and did not say, that that was a report which was prepared for his predecessor in office.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I said it was.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not a report prepared for him. It was a report which existed, and had existed, and that he did not tell the people of Victoria. But he left the impression in their minds, in the minds of everybody, that everything had fallen into disuse through the action of the former administration; whereas the information given to him had been prepared for the former administration. With respect to the militia of this country the infantry association, a voluntary organization, had met in this city and made some recommendations. Some of them had been accepted and given effect to by the Department of National Defence. Then certain alterations and changes had been made. They came back, and it was not until 1935 that the final proposals and recommendations were made which have been accepted by the minister. To-day he has given effect to the very plans which were prepared for his predecessor—not for him at all. For not within one week, one month or several months could that information have been prepared. But he left the impression in the minds of the electors of Victoria, as he did this afternoon—no, not this afternoon—but as he did in days gone by, that this information was information which he had sought, and had set up machinery to deal with the matter. His was a committee which succeeded the committee presided over by the late Sir George Perley. It is something that had been done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I said so in this house last year.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no. There is the article from Victoria, and it is not so reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not responsible for that.

Mr. BENNETT: Then, one step farther: All these subjects with respect to the militia and defence of this country should, if possible, be kept out of politics. They were dragged into politics in Victoria. The minister says it is unfortunate, and that what he had in mind was an attack against the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, that is not so. I was replying to a vote of lack of belief in the program we had undertaken.

Mr. BENNETT: I have quite fairly stated that the minister indicated that he feared the misapprehension had arisen by reason of the former minister attributing the attack which was made by the minister against that vote of want of confidence to the official opposition, rather than to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. That is a fair way to put it.

I only desire to point out that all of us have endeavoured to the best of our ability to support any proposal made by any government at any time for the defence of this country. It was not easy to remain silent last year, in view of the statements made by the Prime Minister at the opening of his campaign in Kingston, only a few short months before. It was not easy to do that. But we exercised that degree of self-restraint. Not one word of carping criticism was heard from anyone on this side of the house with respect to those expenditures. Why? Because we believed that on a question of defence we should not place personal and party considerations over a common purpose.

The minister says—and I am bound to accept his statement—that the administration of these moneys has not been made the subject of party or political considerations. I can only say to him—and I shall discuss it with him personally—that I have the names of many people who came to me in Victoria and told me the condition under which they would have to get employment would be to pay a dollar to join the Liberal association, and get the ticket which would enable them to work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister says that is not correct. All I can say is that the Liberal party paid for a broadcast by the Reverend Clement Davis. He is from Vancouver, but he appealed to the young men and women of Victoria to support the government, because they would get more out of the government, by way of public expenditures, if they did so. The Liberal party employed him—he so said. And the broadcasting corporation controlled by the Minister of Transport indicates that he was employed or engaged by the Liberal party. There was a man paid to make an appeal for a purpose, a man who makes his headquarters in Vancouver. He was speaking to the young people of Victoria, and exercised considerable influence over them. That was the appeal. He spoke upon matters of defence, and indicated that the necessity for defence was very great.

I do believe that so far as possible we should avoid the use of very strong terms in connection with matters of this kind. We should try to be as kindly as we can under the provocation which has been created. Certainly I do hope the Prime Minister will take the view that public money, expended for defence purposes, should not be utilized as purely partisan funds, and that those who pay the taxes after all should not be compelled to see that their taxes only go to provide employment for those who are the supporters of the government.

I can readily understand the many difficulties the government may have. I have been through them. I know that when the barracks were to be built at Calgary the same effort was made. I know that the names of prospective employees were placed in a hat, and the mayor drew out the names, regardless of political considerations, in order that employment might be given without discrimination, on the ground that it was public money. A large sum of public money was to be spent. The question as to political benefit could have arisen. There the difficulty was avoided when at the city hall the names were put into a hat and taken out by a disinterested party. That was the fair way to do it, it seems to me.

I do know this that I saw something of the work that was going on in Esquimalt. I came in contact with many people, and they made the same complaint, that they could not find employment unless they had the approval of the Liberal party. I do not know that the Liberal government took the view that that was unsound.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will show my right hon. friend letters to the opposite effect—

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend says he will show me letters to the opposite effect, but this has nothing to do with those who might be considered strong supporters of the Liberal party. It has to do with those who were considered nondescript, may I say, with respect to the party. They had to go through this form of procedure in order to get employment.

There is no doubt that the contingent that went from these shores in 1937 was a political contingent. There were five privates of the line! I was in London for a little while and this is what they said: "Here come the Canadian colonels." I wonder if the minister has examined into the number of colonels there were in that contingent? I wonder if he realizes that when the guard was to be changed at Buckingham palace there were not enough privates to do it? There were only five and they had to use sergeants and corporals and others to do the work. The photographs are nearly all destroyed now.

Mr. PINARD: What is the objection to colonels?

Mr. BENNETT: None whatever, except that they make bad privates. Sometimes privates make good colonels, but colonels do not make good privates. At one time politics found their way into the Canadian militia with very disastrous effects. There is a view abroad that politics are again present in the Canadian militia. The minister says that the selection was made in a certain way, but I know how it was made. Will he say that there was not one man who had not a uniform in connection with which a specific order went out that he was to be included in the contingent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I know there were four of them taken on in London, but I do not know whether they had uniforms.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not talking about the ones who had left these shores before this specific order was issued.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not know of any.

Mr. BENNETT: Go down and ask the deputy minister, that is all. If the minister will be good enough not to evade the responsibility which I think attaches to this matter—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am accepting responsibility for everything.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I recommend strongly that he becomes familiar with what that responsibility is. If the minister will do that, he and I will be at peace with one another. All he has to do is to go and ascertain the facts. All he has to do is to bring in the files and see the directions that were sent out as to that man there and this man here being a member of the contingent for purely political reasons because he had been a handy man. Do not let us have any misunderstanding. Will the minister do that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad to.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you. If the minister will do that we will be content. I have nothing more to say because I am satisfied that he will see that I have made an accurate statement. It may well be that he has no knowledge of what I am saying, but it was done. The result was that Canada lost a great opportunity as compared with Australia. I wonder if one realizes the steps that were taken in Australia to deal with the matter? I wonder if one realizes how the men were selected and the training they underwent? When they swung up the street everyone realized the type of men they were.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They were no better than ours.

Mr. BENNETT: They were privates of the line.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They were allowed a three months' training period.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I am coming to. They were allowed a three months' training period and they were a magnificent type of men. By reason of that training, the public of London needed only one look at those men to see the type of men they were.

Mr. PINARD: We are not looking for any favours from London.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has an antipathy to London which he manifests on every occasion. I wonder what London has done to him outside of giving him the liberty and freedom of the city? I wonder what London ever did for him except give him the right to sit here?

Mr. PINARD: The people give me that right, not London.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman's antipathy to that great city always manifests itself. Apparently he dislikes the people who live there. If they knew him as well as I, they might have the same view with respect to himself.

Mr. PINARD: On a question of privilege —I should like the right hon. gentleman to sit down—I have nothing against the people of London and I do not want the right hon. gentleman to state that I am opposed to them. I was there and I believe they are the best people in the world. My right hon. friend can go there, but he will be lucky if he is accepted.

Mr. BETTS: On a question of privilege, I should like it to be made clear that we are speaking of London, England, not London, Ontario.

Mr. PINARD: I would not refer to London, Ontario, when I know that my hon. friend represents that city.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we can dispense with further discussion of this kind. The Prime Minister should make a statement to this country at this time that in connection with the expenditure of moneys voted for the public defence of Canada there shall be no political and partisan administration. That is all we can reasonably ask for in order that we may be able to secure a measure of unanimity under the very difficult conditions that now prevail in the world. We have not changed our policy of disarmament to one of rearmament merely because we are an isolated community; we did it because all the world has made that change. Those who are familiar with the history of the early days of our confederation will remember that at that time the nations of the world were arming. Germany in particular was arming, for the war of 1870 was not far off and France and the other countries of Europe were doing likewise. With a coast line both east and west and with trade to protect we are endeavouring by some united action to attain a given end.

I do hope the Prime Minister will find it possible to make a statement that will not induce the people to conclude that when their taxes are paid they can be made available only to providing work for those who support the government of the day. I do hope that that difficulty, which is a very real one in many communities, will disappear and that moneys voted by parliament for the defence of Canada will not be utilized for purely political partisan purposes.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bennett) has just expressed the hope that I would make a statement to the effect that moneys appropriated by parliament for the defence of Canada shall not be used, directly or indirectly, for political partisan purposes. I am prepared to go much further than my right hon. friend desires. My right hon. friend's hope had reference to moneys voted for the defence of Canada. I would say that the government would deplore moneys appropriated by parliament being used, directly or indirectly, for political partisan purposes, no matter for what service they have been appropriated.

Mr. BENNETT: Splendid.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume my right hon. friend will say that in those circumstances we should be prepared to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). I would be prepared to support the amendment if it were not an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply and therefore in the nature of a want of confidence motion in the administration. I know that the view is held by the authorities that there may be occasions on which the government need not accept as a want of confidence motion, a motion moved as an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply.

Mr. BENNETT: It was done by my right hon. friend's own government.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, on one occasion, but it gave rise to so much misunderstanding thereafter that I have thought it would be desirable at the moment to make perfectly clear just when that course might be followed without the possibility of its purpose being misconstrued; in other words when it would be appropriate.

Bourinot in his Parliamentary Procedure has the following at page 424:

> An amendment moved to the motion to go into committee of supply (or ways and means) does not necessarily involve want of confidence in the administration. When such an amendment simply affirms a general principle, or sets forth a public grievance, and does not directly or impliedly challenge the conduct or policy of the government, it is not, in a parliamentary sense, a motion of want of confidence, and consequently cases often occur of the government agreeing to the passage of such motions.

I would say that we can only judge as to whether this amendment does impliedly attack the government by the speech made by the hon. member who moved it. I think hon. members will agree that the hon. gentleman's speech was in the nature of a direct attack upon the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), an attack upon his attitude in discussing defence estimates at a by-election in Victoria; and if the government were to accept this amendment to the motion to go into supply, having regard to the speech which the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) has just made, it would be regarded as an expression of want of confidence in the government and in the minister in particular. In those circumstances I do not think the government can accept the amendment of my hon. friend moved as it is an amendment to the motion for the house to go into committee of supply. On the other hand, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that apart from the implication referred to, the government is wholly in accord with the substance of the amendment and the principle as set forth in the amendment, namely, that moneys appropriated by parliament for any purpose whatsoever should not directly or indirectly be made to serve political partisan ends.

My right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) says that the taxpayers will resent very strongly the idea that public moneys should be used for the purpose of serving political partisan ends. Well, he has good reason to know that that is true because in the last campaign, as I recall it, he did not confine his urging of public expenditures to one particular coast but started at one coast and went clear across the country from coast to coast advocating all along the way the expenditures of public moneys for purposes that would serve political partisan ends. And he got his answer direct from the electorate. They made it very plain that they strongly resented the leader of a political party seeking to win power by promising large expenditures of public moneys in the several constituencies in which he was seeking to elect his candidates.

What has been the position in Victoria? Holding the view that the electorate does resent the use of public moneys for political partisan ends, the electors of Victoria quite evidently did not regard the Minister of National Defence in what he was saying as seeking in any way to bribe the electorate. They understood perfectly well that he was defending one of the policies of the government, a policy which, in view of the attitude taken by the supporters of one of the candidates in that election, required to be defended at the instance of the minister. It must not be forgotten that in the by-election at Victoria there were three candidates. There was not only the Liberal candidate, but there was the candidate of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the candidate of the Conservative party, and it appeared from the results, as we assumed at the time, that the candidate of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was a much stronger candidate than that of the Conservative party.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not get more votes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh yes, he did. My right hon. friend does not like to admit it, but he did.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes; that is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And that lends point to what I am saying at the moment. The government realized in fighting the by-election at Victoria that it had to make perfectly clear what its position was in regard to expenditures on defence. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members in this house had moved a want of confidence motion against the administration on the score of its defence expenditures. This apart from all else made it necessary for the minister to make the explanation in detail which he did.

May I say that I agree very largely with what the hon. member for Yale has said, and also with what the right hon. leader of the opposition has said, when they urged that matters of defence and, I would add, matters that relate to foreign policy should not become unnecessarily controversial if that can be avoided, or be made too much an occasion for discussion in political campaigns. I wish we could make it a general rule that that view would be observed. Unfortunately it is only too true that there has scarcely been a by-election or a general election in some of the provinces of this dominion in which the question of defence has not been made a very live issue in the campaign, and the government has had to put forward in the clearest terms its policy and the reasons underlying it.

The hon. member (Mr. Stirling) has spoken about the difference between disarmament and rearmament. I agree with him that there was a period of disarmament which unquestionably had its influence upon the policies of the government. He says that it influenced the conduct of his government, and I am prepared to accept that statement; but I am not prepared to accept the view that the government of which he was a member was influenced by both policies. He cannot have it both ways, and say that they were actuated by a policy of disarmament, and then also say that they were actuated by a policy of rearmament.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, when disarmament was abandoned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The leader of the opposition comes to the rescue and says when the policy of disarmament was abandoned, and I suppose in so doing he has in mind the building to which he has referred, the large public service building which he had intended should be used for the purposes of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The large departmental building which is now occupied by the justice department as well as by some of the officials of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was to have been the headquarters of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is true I took exception to that building being used for any such purpose, and when we came into office the house will have recognized that the government, instead of having that large departmental building used in part as a barracks, because police were to be housed there as well as the building being used for offices for officials of the department—

Mr. BENNETT: They were not to be housed there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; the plans so indicate.

Mr. BENNETT: Just a few of them, for the purpose of safeguarding.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They had their drill rooms; the whole place was planned within as a Royal Canadian Mounted Police headquarters, and it was emphasizing the strength of the police. Now may I point this out to my hon. friend? He is quite right when he says that when I was talking about his policy in that connection I described it as one of the symptoms of dictatorship, and I did so for this reason: The police have to do with the maintenance of law and order within the confines of the country. They are not part of the defence forces of the nation, as we understand the militia and the air and naval services to be. They are part of the police maintaining law and order within the confines of the country itself, and I had the feeling—I may have been wrong but I still think I was right—that if my right hon. friend were to get into power we would see the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in this country magnified out of all proportion to the service which it could be expected to render within Canada itself.

As to what he might have done as regards the defence forces generally, that is not for me to say, but I do not think he had primarily in mind the matter of defence when he used a large proportion of the moneys appropriated for unemployment relief to construct barracks at different places, and particularly the large and elaborate barracks which was put up in the city of Calgary. However, that belongs to the past, and I have no desire to revive that question at the present time.

I wish to say in conclusion—

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not understand the right hon. gentleman's allusion to my having advocated a policy both of disarmament and rearmament. I was most clear, I think, in pointing out that all the estimates prepared prior to those of 1936, and consequently those of our administration, were prepared in an atmosphere of disarmament, and all the subsequent ones in an atmosphere of rearmament. How then does he prove that I argued both ways?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He does not. I am drawing attention to this fact: I have said that my hon. friend said that the policy of the government while he was a member of it was actuated by disarmament, and I contend that if that was the case, he cannot say that this building which is now being used for the justice department was put up for the purposes of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in consequence of some rearming policy that had subsequently succeeded that of disarmament. Nor can he say that the barracks in Calgary, or the other expenditures for military purposes made by his government were for rearmament purposes because he has just said that it was 1936 before the policies based on an atmosphere of rearmament came in.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no. It was before that, when Germany withdrew, when the Prime Minister of Great Britain made it apparent that disarmament had failed, and Sir George Perley and the Hon. Mr. Maurice Dupré returned. That was in 1935, or at the end of 1934, and the appropriation was made for the barracks at Calgary on the rearmament basis.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not go further into the controversy, but I would direct the attention of my right hon. friend to this fact that neither he nor his Minister of National Defence said anything in the general campaign to indicate that these expenditures were for rearmament purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: They did, with reference to Calgary, because it had been planned for many years that there should be one in the west.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, we will leave the matter at that point. However, unless my hon. friend who has moved the motion feels that his purpose has been served by the discussion which has taken place, and is prepared to withdraw the motion, I would ask the members on this side and others who are prepared to support the government to vote the amendment down because of it being in the nature of a want of confidence motion.

Mr. BENNETT: On a question of privilege, I felt I was right, but the Prime Minister spoke with such certainty that I sent for the record. Mr. Mayhew had 9,493 votes; Mr. McKelvie had 7,654 and Mr. Gordon had 6,550. He was the third candidate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Second in the previous by-election.

Mr. BENNETT: In the previous election Mr. Gordon was second, but the Conservative was first. The Prime Minister said that I was mistaken as to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I accept the correction at once, but my right hon. friend's memory was as treacherous as mine, because when I said the last election he agreed with me.

Mr. BENNETT: That was a question, because I felt so certain.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I was at Victoria during the by-election and consequently I know of the type of campaign which was conducted there by the supporters of the government. The minister has denied that he was in any way implicated in the promises and insinuations made and I accept his statement, but I would nevertheless point out that the canvassers on the government side invariably endeavoured to persuade the electors that it would be very much better to have a Liberal member returned to this parliament because he could speak for Victoria when these large expenditures were about to be made. That, it seems to me, is on all fours with the type of campaigning which was carried on in Montreal where responsible ministers of the crown made the statement that the hole on Dorchester street would be filled by a railway, which though owned by the government is managed by an independent board. That kind of campaigning reflects not only upon the government, but upon the entire institution of parliament.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to the fact that it was necessary to defend the government's position owing to the attacks that were made last year upon the estimates by the group with which I am associated. Last year our attack was centred largely around the point of view that the government, which could not find money for public works to alleviate unemployment, could find money for large military expenditures; and at Victoria, last autumn, our attack upon the defence proposals was centred very largely around the point that the Dominion of Canada was at that time permitting the export in vast quantities of scrap iron, nickel, copper, and other basic war materials to the nation which was clearly indicated by the government speakers as being the potential enemy of Canada in the future, or the country from which we might some time expect an attack. The nation was never named; but it was clear to anyone who heard, for example, the Reverend Clem. Davis, to whom reference has been made, speaking over the air, that that was the inference the electors should take from the statements of Liberal speakers. And it was very largely, as the records will show, on the grounds I have indicated that we attacked the defence proposals which were being advocated by the minister and the Liberal party.

In that by-election, as in previous general elections and by-elections, certain specific promises were made on behalf of the government. In Victoria the people were told to vote for the Liberal candidate, not only for the defence of the Pacific coast, but for the institution of unemployment insurance. "Vote for Mayhew and unemployment insurance" was the slogan of speakers throughout the city during the by-election. To-day we seem to be a long way from the enactment of an unemployment insurance measure.

While I am speaking of the Victoria by-election, may I refer to some others also? I have referred to the one in Montreal. Out in East Edmonton the same kind of campaigning was carried on. National control of currency and credit, old age pensions at fifty-eight, I think it was, or was it sixty?

An hon. MEMBER: Fifty-eight.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, at fifty-eight and so on. These promises were made at election time, and a similar type of campaign carried on in connection with defence expenditures, not perhaps by the minister, or by prominent and responsible Liberals, if they deny it, but at any rate by the canvassers who went from door to door endeavouring to persuade those who were not in possession of the facts to vote for the Liberal party.

I am therefore going to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), because I believe a good purpose is being served in bringing this matter to the attention of parliament and the people of Canada. It seems to me that we should endeavour to conduct our election campaigns on a rather higher plane than they have been conducted during recent months. I was at Victoria. The group with which I am connected lost there, but we are nevertheless proud of the type of campaign which our candidate, Professor King Gordon, conducted in the by-election.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): The amendment before the house involves, first, the question whether or not the defence works being carried on in and around the city of Victoria at the time of the recent by-elections were used for the purpose of securing Liberal preferment in that election. The charge is clear-cut and well defined, namely, that the man who got employment in that work had first to secure a Liberal ticket. It has now been changed a little bit from the charge that was made in the by-election itself. It is now said that you had to get a membership ticket from the Liberal party before you could get the red ticket which permitted entry into the various areas where defence works were being developed.

The investigation which was carried on during the by-election disclosed that every man working in Victoria and vicinity had to obtain that red ticket before the contractor was permitted to employ him. It was not a membership ticket in the Liberal association, but a military pass issued by the assistant adjutant-general and quartermaster-general of military district No. 11 at Work Point. This matter was clearly laid before the electorate during that by-election, as everyone knows who participated in it. And the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) fully explained to the electors in Victoria that work of the nature of that carried on at Albert Head was necessarily surrounded with a certain measure of secrecy. It was therefore decided that as far as possible only men who had taken the oath of allegiance to serve his majesty in the armed forces of the country should be permitted on the premises. Employment was actually restricted to ex-service men and members of the non-permanent militia. Word to this effect was circulated among the militia units and the ex-service men's clubs.

A surprising thing about this charge is found in the proportion of the number of men employed to the number of electors in Victoria. I want to congratulate my friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation on the fact that notwithstanding the pitiful rout which that party suffered during the general election they returned to the fight in Victoria, and increased the vote of their candidate by something like 390. I venture to think that was due to the splendid platform ability of the hon. member who has just preceded me (Mr. Coldwell). I also want to congratulate the Conservative party, because with a very bad candidate and after a very hard trip all the way from Halifax the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) took up what was recognized as almost a forlorn hope and succeeded in increasing the vote of the Conservative candidate over the vote secured by the very much beloved and lamented late Doctor Tolmie in Victoria by some 1,700 votes. With such success coming to both Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the Conservative party it would seem that the Liberals were in a desperate plight and might in their weakness feel it necessary to resort to some such tactics as have been charged. But for some reason or another the Liberal party, after taking third place in the previous election, was successful in changing that to first place with an increase of, not 390 votes or 1,700, but three thousand and some odd hundreds. What part could the red ticket or the Liberal association membership ticket have played in that, the total number of men employed on the defence works at that time being 291? And with the exception of fifteen key men every one of those was a returned man or a member of the militia and recommended by branches of the Canadian Legion, the Army and Navy Veterans, the Imperial Veterans, or the officers commanding the Canadian Scottish, the fifth C.G.A., the Army Service Corps, the Seventeenth Fortress Company and the Royal Canadian Naval Veterans Reserve.

The best test of the virtue of the charge made here to-day is found in the vote of the electors, because they voted upon these very facts; for all the issues raised in the charges made in supporting this resolution were raised in the Victoria by-election. If there is one group of men who more than any other, would resent the type of thing charged here it would be the returned men in the city of Victoria. But on November 11 the Imperial Veterans' Association, Victoria and district branch, wrote to the Hon. Ian Mackenzie, M.P., Minister of National Defence, Ottawa, as follows:

Dear Sir:

At an executive meeting of above association the following resolution was passed, and I am hereby authorized to send a copy on to you.

"Whereas the Department of National Defence in respect to the Albert Head project have laid down definite policy of allocation of employment re ex-service men, we the executive of the Imperial Veterans' Association of Victoria and district desire to go on record that we endorse the same and consider it of unquestioned fairness."

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

T. Miller,
Secretary.

That was before the election. After the election the minister received from the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League district council, Victoria, B.C., the following:

Dear Mr. Mackenzie:

At a meeting of the Victoria and district council, Canadian legion, British Empire Service League, held a few nights ago, I was instructed to convey to you the council's heartiest congratulations and best thanks on the arrangements made between your department, the Northern Construction Company and the Employment Service of Canada in so far as the employment of ex-service men on the Albert Head project is concerned.

Warm appreciation was voiced by the delegates present, and the hope expressed that the same arrangements will be as amicably arranged in any future contracts that may be entered into between your department and other companies.

From the first battalion, Canadian Scottish regiment, Victoria, came this letter, addressed to the Minister of National Defence:

I wish to take this opportunity, on behalf of my battalion and myself, of expressing appreciation of the manner in which employment of labour has been carried out in the defence works at Albert Head. The giving preference to employment of returned soldiers and serving members of the non-permanent active militia is eminently fair, and will do much towards the building up of the necessary defence forces.

May I express the hope that this policy will be continued in the further works that are now under consideration.

Respectfully yours,
J. R. Kingham, Lt.-Col.,
Officer commanding.

In the face of these letters one can hardly wonder at the splendid success that the Liberal party achieved with a candidate of the type of Mr. Mayhew.

The leader of the opposition charges that the defence issue should never have been raised in the by-election. But he raised it very definitely.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I must direct your attention to the fact that he did not raise it; it was raised when I was not on the island, by the minister in his opening speech to which reference was made. Let there be no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. McGEER: Well, it may be more correct to say that the leader of the opposition took advantage of remarks made by the Minister of National Defence to raise that issue in his own particular way. I do not think he is prepared to deny that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am prepared at once to deny that I raised the issue. I met the statement raised by the minister.

Mr. McGEER: Let me call as a witness the Conservative press of the city of Victoria. This is from the Victoria Colonist of November 26:

Mr. Bennett stated the people of Victoria should ask the government representative to state publicly what contracts were out for defence works and who had them; what airplanes have been bought and from whom, and what guns are being placed in Esquimalt and how old they were. "They are bringing old worn-out guns from Halifax to plant in Victoria."

That was the manner in which the leader of the opposition raised the issue of defence. And let me inform the house that he was, as I think they say in Quebec, hoist with his own petard, because the Minister of National Defence in a reply pointed out that the only worn-out, obsolete gun that had arrived in Victoria from Halifax was the leader of the opposition himself.

Mr. BENNETT: This is on the high plane of which my hon. friend spoke this afternoon.

Mr. McGEER: One can hardly blame the Minister of National Defence for taking advantage of an opportunity that was so obvious. Of course the right hon. leader of the opposition came to Victoria to win that by-election, and in his own mind he had no doubt but that in doing so he was going to launch a new national program in Canada based upon the worn-out cry of 1911 "No truck or trade with the Yankees."

Mr. BENNETT: I think I shall have to give that an unquestioned denial, though it does not make very much difference in offering a denial to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McGEER: Well, it never does make much difference if a denial does not change the fact.

I want to come now to the other issue that was raised by the leader of the opposition in his own particular way, and I ask hon. members to remember that according to the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) this amendment is based upon the assumption that men seeking votes from the electors for themselves or their party candidates should stand upon the highest ethical grounds of truth in stating facts to the public. As we saw that issue in Victoria, a world situation developed in which there was a possibility not merely of increased friendship between the British and United States governments but also of increased friendship and understanding between the people of Great Britain and the nations of the British Empire and the people of the great republic to our south. Some discussions had taken place between Great Britain and the United States indicating a desire on the part of both governments to formulate and consummate a new trade agreement between those two great countries. As soon as that information was made public, it was assumed by the leader of the opposition and his party that no such agreement could be formulated or consummated without sacrificing the empire trade agreements or some portion of them, and that no possible compensation could be secured by Canada that would permit her to authorize any variation or change in those agreements. The right hon. gentleman had a direct appeal to make to the fears of the lumbering interests, the fruit interests and the fishing interests of that great province on the Pacific coast. He not only charged this government with bringing obsolete guns from Halifax to defend the Pacific coast; he deliberately charged this government with a ready willingness to sacrifice not only the interests of the empire but the interests of the Dominion of Canada in a futile attempt to appease the people of the United States. Listen to how far he went. He said:

I would ask you people of this city to have the government of Canada say, before Saturday night—

That was the night of the election.

—whether or not the preferences on lumber are to go. That is the issue in this by-election. I know your government has agreed—

Now, notice the way in which the reporter of his own press carried that message to the people who did not hear it on the radio or who were not at the meeting. He said:

"I know your government has agreed," and there Mr. Bennett halted, leaving the inference the government has already committed itself to certain things concerning the lumber exports of Canada.

"I know your government has agreed," and then an inferential pause; but the reporter of the Conservative press did not take any chances on any unintelligent individual interpreting the meaning of that pause. He supplied what he at least thought the right hon. gentleman intended to convey.

Continuing, he declared: "Let this country know that this matter has been settled in a corner; that it has been discussed in cabinet. Never in my life have I been so concerned over public matters as this and it needs no prophet to see where it is all going to meet. It is an hypocrisy to say that this thing is being done in the sacred name of peace."

Well, Mr. Speaker, on the same day that this extraordinary statement was reported in the press of Vancouver and Victoria messages came through from Australia in quite a different tone. The Vancouver Province carried the following report from Sydney:

Grim warning of Australia's dangers in the event of war, and a strong plea for British empire understanding with the United States were made by Prime Minister Lyons in a recent speech on the Pacific situation.

Mr. Lyons stressed the dangers to Australian trade routes to-day and envisaged the possibilities of a blockade of Australia.

"We must foster the friendship and co-operation of other nations desirous of following the path of peace," said Mr. Lyons, "and in this regard the Australian government will cooperate in seeking a cordial political and economic understanding betwen the British Empire and the United States.

"We believe that the British Empire working in close cooperation with the United States can be an irresistible force of reason and conciliation.

"In the face of realities which every day grow more ghastly this great nation has been obliged to jettison a noble experiment and throw in the lot of her people with others who seek not for aggression but for peace.

"Any policy designed to guarantee the security of Australia must be one of cooperation in trade and defence with other members of the British Empire, and a political and economic understanding with the United States."

That was the very program, both in the matter of defence and in the matter of trade agreements which were to be considered between Great Britain and the United States, as we placed them in the issues of the by-election, to be voted upon by the electors in one of the most conservative and British cities in the whole of Canada. It was not a red ticket, a Liberal ticket, the misuse of public funds, the abuse of privilege by the Minister of National Defence, or a wrong act by any of the supporters of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) and the government which won so magnificent a majority. It was a clear presentation of the real issues involved. What I, and other persons engaged in the election, asked the electors to decide in casting their ballots was, first: Are you in favour of the defence program and its extension by the government, so far as the Pacific coast is concerned and, second, are you in favour of the government of Canada cooperating with Great Britain and other nations of the British Empire in helping to bring about a reasonable understanding between the people of the British Empire and those of the United States? Upon those issues they voted.

Some little word has been said that it was unfair to criticize the policy of the late government in matters of defence, because they were acting in league with a world program designed to create disarmament. No league of nations conference ever considered there was any necessity for disarmament in Canada, because Canada had never armed. The remarks of the right hon. the leader of the opposition quoted recently in Liberty magazine make that more than clear. The editor states that two years ago Liberty had the privilege of publishing the editorial, which I shall quote, by "the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, former Prime Minister of Canada." So that he was writing this, not when he was in power, but when he sat in the cool, quiet shades of opposition, with all the time required for reflection. Here is his statement as to a national defence policy for the protection of the dominion:

We have subscribed lightly to international covenants because others were doing so. If we had so much as hesitated to sign on the dotted line we would have gravely charged ourselves with delaying the millenium. We know now that these international emotional cloudbursts have little meaning. We cannot act alone; but we can, in association with others having similar aspirations and ideals, endeavour to give international contracts of the future some basis of reality. The problem of protection from external aggression is one that Canada has never seriously faced.

The issue we raised in that by-election was whether or not we should now face the issue as Canadian people, and whether or not we would secure from a national government a real program of Pacific defence which would recognize this dominion as a Pacific ocean nation. That was the issue involved in the by-election. I cannot see that that is anything but right and proper. Surely the people of Victoria and Vancouver, and of British Columbia generally, have the right to say whether, after full and open discussion, they approve the new policy inaugurated by this government of facing squarely within the means of the country the development of a defence system on the Pacific coast which will give at least some measure of security from sporadic raiding, should conflict break out among the larger powers.

This charge is just as silly and absurd as was the plea made by the leader of the opposition. If this same charge, supported by the meagre facts upon which it rests, were submitted to the electors of Victoria tomorrow, the majority secured by the Liberal party in the by-election would be overwhelmingly increased. I doubt whether this would do any great good to the Minister of National Defence. It can hardly add to his popularity on the Pacific coast, because that popularity is just about at the highest point it can reach.

Mr. H. S. HAMILTON (Algoma West): Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for me to refrain from speaking for a few moments in answer to the observations of the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts). He has assumed the liberty of criticizing severely the manner in which the contingent representing Canada at the coronation was chosen. I believe he has used language which reflects unfairly not only upon the government but upon the stamp and type of many of the splendid men who composed that contingent. I know nothing about how that contingent was chosen, generally, but I do know something about the choice made in my constituency. I know that there the military people chose a man who had a splendid record overseas, one who was a smart and able soldier and who was not at that time or never has been an officer.

It has been my privilege to serve overseas in the ranks of the Canadian expeditionary force, and I believe I can speak with some authority with respect to an able and smart non-commissioned officer. He was a representative officer and he honoured us by being in that contingent. He was well thought of and a highly esteemed and capable non-commissioned officer. I want to make this clear for his sake so that the people of my town will know that the choice of this man was made entirely by his comrades and officers in his own regiment. The selection was made utterly free of any influence of any kind. I had nothing to do, either directly or indirectly, with that selection.

This man went over there as a representative of his regiment. He glories in the fact that he was so chosen and he considers it an honour. Those who are dear to him also consider it an honour that he was so chosen to represent the regiment of which he was a member. I think it is unfortunate that it should be intimated that this choice was political. I realize that the hon. member does not single out this or that regiment, and I do not profess to speak in connection with the general selection. The minister and those responsible are well able to answer for themselves. However, in honour of the type of man I have referred to, in honour of the officers and men of his regiment who selected him, I think I should say these words. If they disagree in any way they will let it be known. In justice to them, I think the words I have said should be said.

May I add just one more word before I sit down? I am learning things from day to day and from week to week by listening to the debates in this chamber and observing the methods resorted to in connection with what might be termed parliamentary tactics or strategy. If there was anything censorable done in Victoria—as far as I know there was not—if national defence has been used for political purposes, then I think it is fair to say that because of the form of the motion that has been made an attempt is being made to force me to take a stand which indicates that I am approving of our defence policies being injected into political warfare. As has been pointed out by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), with the present wording of the motion I must choose between censoring the government—this amendment is equivalent to a motion of want of confidence—and appearing to support something that I naturally do not wish to support. Practically all hon. members agree that we do not want our national defence policies to be degraded to the extent that politics are played in connection therewith.

I wish merely to record my attitude on this matter. I think hon. members of the opposition generally and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who moved the amendment, would have been more fair to the public and would have put this issue more clearly before the house if they had stated that this motion was intended to censor the present government for playing politics in connection with the national defence policies of Canada. I do not believe that has been done. I believe they have subtly and cunningly injected this in the amendment they have put before us. Naturally I am voting against it because I believe the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and their colleagues have scrupulously tried to avoid mixing up our national defence policies with politics.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I have just come back from my constituency. Since the ninth day of this month I have been interviewing people at almost ten minute intervals until a couple of days ago. At this point in the debate I should like to say I feel sure that no one in my constituency cared whether the contingent sent to the coronation was made up of the militia or the marines. I do not think anyone in that constituency cares whether there were four or forty privates in that contingent. I have had military experience myself, and I realize that most of the duties which would devolve upon the gentlemen who went to the coronation would be social. If the contingent was mainly made up of colonels, they would be better able to handle these duties. My belief is that the time of this house could be better employed than in setting up straw men and burning them down with fiery rhetoric. I had hoped that for the rest of the session we would be through with fiddling and would perhaps devote more time to the fire protection of our Canadian Rome, which many of us think is burning.

When responsible members of this or other legislative bodies waste their time in this sort of thing, irreparable damage is done to the institutions of democracy. To-day's Hansard may cause a few chuckles in the odd militia mess, a few grins in party gatherings, but it will surely disgust the majority of ordinary people. I do not want to say anything more lest I condemn myself by my own remarks, but I do want to draw attention to what to my mind, and to the minds of the people of my constituency, has been a wasted afternoon.

Mr. STIRLING: The discussion has produced so clear a statement from the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to his attitude, and, I assume, the attitude of his colleagues, in this matter, that with the permission of the house, I am quite prepared to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Motion (Mr. Dunning) agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Departmental administration, $184,575.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I intimated at the time of adjournment that if we reached supply to-day, I should like to call an item in external affairs so that I might be in position, should it appear desirable, to take up some matters concerning this department at a later time in the week. I have not my papers with me at the moment, and possibly the committee would allow me to consider this department as being in committee for any future occasion.

Mr. BENNETT: All that is necessary is to call an item.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

An act to place Canadian coal used in the manufacture of iron or steel on a basis of equality with imported coal—administration, $600.

Mr. STEWART: What is this item?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The $600 item is to pay for the administration of the act in connection with subsidies on Canadian coal reduced to coke and used for the production of steel. It is to pay the advance costs, which are later repaid by the coal company.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems a small sum.

Mr. EULER: It is merely for the preliminary expenses. The actual subsidy is in the next item amounting to $200,000.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

International Labour Conference, $15,000.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): This is an item passed annually to provide for the expenses of the delegation attending the annual meetings of the International Labour Conference at Geneva.

Mr. BENNETT: It is $5,000 less than last year.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. Last year we had to make provision for a special preparatory conference on textiles which was held at Washington, and $5,000 additional was voted for that purpose in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. STEWART: How much of that $5,000 was expended in connection with the textile conference at Washington?

Mr. ROGERS: The Washington conference is not listed separately. Perhaps it would be preferable to allow the item to stand, and I shall be glad to get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART: All right.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Departmental administration, $112,655.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, I would ask that this be treated exactly the same as the Prime Minister's item, and be allowed to stand.

Mr. BENNETT: This department was not mentioned as one that would be gone into to-day, but I suppose we might as well get along.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was not. Thank you.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Marine service—Nautical services—Marine service steamers, including ice-breakers—maintenance, operation and repairs, $1,326,700.

Mr. PELLETIER: Inasmuch as the discussion of the sale of equipment by the government to the amount of $1,750,000 will probably take place on this item, and the minister will likely be making a statement upon it, perhaps we might call it six o'clock, to give him an opportunity to make his statement after dinner.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The proper place, Mr. Chairman, to discuss that, would be on item No. 417—river St. Lawrence ship channel—capital. It does not matter particularly, but I think we shall come to that item presently.

Mr. PELLETIER: The reason I raise the point now is that the minister advised me that the sale would be discussed under item No. 405, but if it is to be discussed under another item, I am willing that the item should stand.

Mr. STEWART: I notice there is a decrease of $80,747.75 in this item. Are some services being discontinued, or how is he able to carry on with this smaller amount? It is encouraging to find the expenditure decreasing, but sometimes there is a reason.

Mr. HOWE: There is no discontinuance of any service. As I said last year on this item, an attempt is being made to reduce the number of ships by keeping ships in commission twelve months in the year instead of having one type of ship for ice-breaking, another for laying buoys, and another for some other service. As a result of that policy, four ships were retired from service last year.

Mr. STEWART: What were they?

Mr. HOWE: They are the ones we discussed on another item—the Newington, the Loos, the Gulnare and the Mikula.

Mr. STEWART: Where were they operating?

Mr. HOWE: The Newington was operating from the Prince Rupert agency, and the Loos, Gulnare and Mikula on the St. Lawrence river, out of Quebec agency. They were retired from service and sold.

Mr. STEWART: Retired and sold? So there will be no expenditure upon them. Does that account for the entire decrease?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to give my hon. friend the particulars. The chief reduction is in the item, repairs to steamers, a reduction of $104,680; a reduction in supplies of $3,230; increase due to restoration of salary deduction, $10,507; increase in crews' wages, $10,254; increased fuel cost, $3,550; sundry increases, $2,850. The decreases total $107,000, and the increases $27,000, making a net decrease of $80,000 odd.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PELLETIER: In view of the fact that the shipyards at Sorel have been sold, the minister might tell us where from now on ice-breakers will be repaired, where maintenance will be carried out, and how much of this money is to be used for the purpose of maintaining these ships. He might also separate the cost of ice-breakers and other steamers which he has retained from the Sorel shipyards.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Certainly not in my time, and I am sure not for many years have steamers in this list been maintained at the Sorel shipyards. The Sorel shipyards have been used mainly for the repair and maintenance of the dredging fleet. The other work has been done in private yards and will continue to be so done. The ships attached to the Montreal agency are usually repaired at one of the Montreal shipyards, the work being done by the lowest tenderer. Ships attached to the Quebec agency are repaired at one of the three Quebec shipyards, also by the lowest tenderer; those on the Atlantic are repaired either at Saint John or Halifax, and those on the Pacific are repaired at either of the shipyards at Vancouver and Victoria, or at Prince Rupert.

Mr. PELLETIER: So that at no time at all have ice-breakers been maintained at the Sorel shipyards?

Mr. HOWE: Occasionally they call for incidental repairs, but no major overhauling or repairing is undertaken there. As a matter of fact there is no dry dock at that point and no possible way of making major repairs to ships of the size of which my hon. friend speaks.

Mr. PELLETIER: Whenever such ships have called at Sorel for repairs, have they been repaired at the government shipyards or by the private concern at that point?

Mr. HOWE: I do not understand the question.

Mr. PELLETIER: I understand that there were two shipyards at Sorel, one owned by the government and the other by a private company. I was wondering whether such repairs as may have been made at Sorel have been carried out by the government shipyards or by the private company. The minister says that occasionally such ships call for minor repairs.

Mr. HOWE: No ice-breaker has ever been repaired at Sorel except at the government shipyards, and only minor repairs can be carried out there. If it is necessary to put any ship into dry dock, it must be taken to the Vickers yard at Montreal or to one of the three yards at Quebec capable of undertaking that class of work.

Mr. CHURCH: I can see no reason why Ontario should not be given equal treatment with the rest of Canada in this matter. Why is this province not entitled to ice-breakers? In some of the municipalities bordering on the chain of inland lakes there are many public utilities that cannot operate in winter except under favourable conditions. There is a large vote for work of this kind in connection with Hudson bay, work that is scarcely necessary, whereas last winter the people of Ontario were faced with a serious state of affairs on the Niagara river where public utilities might in one half hour have been closed down, disrupting transportation and water services. I say that Ontario, in the matter of ice-breakers, is entitled to the same consideration which has been shown to other parts of Canada that have been favoured in this respect since confederation. Niagara river is navigable in part and there is an investment there of some $60,000,000, but when an ice-breaker is needed it is not available. I understand that an application was made to Toronto for assistance but without success, and had it not been for a favourable wind coming along at the right time a number of power companies would have been swept away and various utilities ruined for want of an ice-breaker. Under this item I can see no reason whatever why Ontario should not be given equal treatment with other parts of Canada. The province does not get very much money for harbours, and I submit that the department should give it some consideration.

Mr. HOWE: This vote covers services on the great lakes of the type my hon. friend mentions. For instance, we have two large boats with headquarters at the Parry Sound agency, and we contract for ice-breaking at the head of the lakes, using private boats for the purpose. The duty of this department, however, is to maintain navigation, and Niagara river is not navigable. The department has spent some $130,000,000 in providing navigation facilities for the Niagara escarpment by means of the Welland canal. We maintain a boat at Kingston and boats on the Trent canal, and in a general way we have attempted to give Ontario just as good service in the maintenance of navigation as we provide in the province of Quebec and the maritimes. I think we have succeeded reasonably well in that endeavour, for we have always been able to open the lakes at the same time as the St. Lawrence.

Mr. CHURCH: Did the department receive any application from the government of Ontario or from municipalities for the loan of an ice-breaker? It is all very well to say what the policy of the department has been, but I would point out to the minister that there are other bridges which might have been destroyed in the same way as the "Honeymoon" bridge; there are steamer landings at Queenston, Lewiston and Niagara that have been carried away, and had there been an ice-breaker in the river below these points this might not have happened. In my opinion the government should not regard the supplying of ice-breakers as pertaining entirely to navigation. It is an exploded argument that only the maritimes, the St. Lawrence and certain other sections are entitled to this service. The government should do its duty by providing in the winter adequate ice-breaking equipment wherever necessary, and Ontario is unquestionably entitled to this service. Did the minister receive any applications for assistance?

Mr. HOWE: We had two or three applications to help in an abnormal situation at Niagara, and we sent Captain Balcolm, one of the most expert men in the department in the handling of ice conditions. He went in an advisory capacity and informed us that there was nothing we could do; there was no equipment that we could send under any circumstances which would be of the slightest benefit. I repeat, we do provide exactly the same type of service throughout the waterway system in Ontario that we provide in the province of Quebec and the maritimes. Anyone familiar with ice conditions knows that in the occasional year conditions arise with which no one can cope. A dock, especially of timber construction, is liable to be upset or displaced by an ice push, and there is nothing the government can do to prevent it from occurring. They occur at all points.

Mr. PELLETIER: This item is for "marine service steamers, including ice-breakers." That conveys the implication that there are other steamers than ice-breakers. Since the government has sold the St. Lawrence dredging fleet, has it retained any ships which were formerly attached to that work in the St. Lawrence ship channel?

Mr. HOWE: There are twenty-four dominion steamers altogether; five are ice-breakers, the others are lighthouse supply ships, buoy boats and service boats generally, but chiefly those three classifications. In some instances the boats are equipped for combined services; we are gradually equipping our ice-breakers to serve as buoy boats as well. We did keep certain equipment which was formerly on the St. Lawrence, but that does not come under this vote. We kept the stone lifters, the sounding equipment and staff boats of the department for the engineering and inspection work. We kept all the equipment that was useful to the department, having in mind that it is the policy in future to have the dredging done by contract.

Mr. LENNARD: What type of fuel is used in these boats?

Mr. HOWE: They are all coal burners except four. The Citadelle, the McLean, the St. Héliers and the Saurel burn oil.

Mr. LENNARD: Is it more economical for them to burn oil?

Mr. HOWE: The chief advantage of oil fuel is the much longer cruising range it allows. It would be impossible to carry out the patrol of Hudson strait with a coal burner, as there are no coal supplies there. By filling the tanks and taking a deckload of oil she is able to carry on most of the season. As to the difference in cost, it depends upon the relative prices of coal and oil, but generally speaking oil burners are more economical for our work than coal.

Mr. LENNARD: Is the coal used Canadian coal?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, entirely.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous services relating to navigation and shipping including grants of $600 towards school of navigation at Lunenburg, N.S. and $500 towards school of navigation at Queen's university, $48,060.

Mr. BETTS: What are the particulars of the grant of $4,000 for relief of distressed seamen? What form does that take?

Mr. HOWE: Provision is necessary for the relief of distressed Canadian seamen abroad, according to the provisions of sections 295 and 303 of the Canadian Shipping Act; also to pay any legal expenses which may be incurred in that connection, and for shipping books and forms. Liability is incurred all over the world wherever distressed Canadian seamen may be found. In Great Britain they are looked after by the British Board of Trade, in foreign countries by the consuls, etc., and at home by shipping masters and customs officers. Accounts for expenses incurred are forwarded to the department for settlement. As far as possible refunds are obtained by the department from the shipowners concerned.

Mr. NEILL: I understand this item includes a vote of $5,000 for removal of obstructions. However, it is quite impossible that that should cover the matter I have in mind. Has the minister considered the removal this year of Ripple Rock in the channel between Vancouver island and the mainland? I know this question has been before him in past years. It is not an increased danger, but it is a danger to an increasing number of ships. Steamers running north from the United States and those of our own country have to lie up to catch the tide. If that rock were removed, this would not only expedite traffic but perhaps some day prevent a very heavy loss of life.

Mr. HOWE: The amount of $5,000 in this vote applies only to removal of wrecks which are a menace to navigation. If a ship is wrecked in a navigable channel, this covers the removal of the wreck. Of course $5,000 is only an estimate; sometimes very little of it is spent, and sometimes more than that amount is required; but on the whole it has proved sufficient in the past.

As for the removal of Ripple Rock, that is a matter for the Department of Public Works; it is not the type of work undertaken by the Department of Transport. We have recommended to the Department of Public Works the removal of Ripple Rock when sufficient funds are available. I think the Department of Public Works has it under consideration.

Mr. NEILL: This item covers grants to schools of navigation at two points on the Atlantic. Does not the growing importance of the port of Vancouver justify a grant for a school of navigation on the Pacific also?

Mr. HOWE: We are actively considering at the moment the establishment of a school of navigation, or rather a government-aided school in Vancouver. We are in negotiation with the Department of Education at Victoria, and it is probable that the supplementary estimates will include a small grant for that purpose.

Mr. NEILL: Would it be connected with the university?

Mr. HOWE: No; with the department of technical education of the province. An extremely efficient school has been conducted privately at Vancouver for some years, but the man conducting it finds that he needs help. We suggested to the province that a school be established, and we are prepared in conjunction with the province to give a rather more extended course than has been given there in the past.

Mr. CHURCH: Under this item an important principle is involved; that is the principle of what Canada is doing at the present time to create employment. This empire came into being by the sea. Canada has a large number of men out of work, many of them on the dole. Why does the minister not say to these young men—it may be in conjunction with the Minister of National Defence—Do you want to join in a volunteer navy with pay? Canada excels in all kinds of aquatic sports. At the time of the Gordon expedition up the Nile they had to appeal to Canadians to man the boats. There are now two schools of navigation, one at Lunenburg and one at Queen's university. There are thousands of young Canadians who would go to such a school, take up shipping and navigation if they could, and qualify for the merchant marine, which is the back-bone of the British navy. But this government sold a lot of merchant marine ships for a song, and the empire has 2,000 fewer merchant ships to-day than it had in 1914.

The minister, in association with those of other departments, should come along with a forward educational training policy for the great lakes and the seaboard, establish these schools throughout Canada where needed, and give free tuition for the navy. At present there is one in Lunenburg and another meets for a short time at Queen's. Why are not these schools established in connection with the other universities of the dominion, and on the same scale as the militia for the army? There are hundreds of young men in the canoe clubs, rowing clubs and yacht clubs of the country. This empire came into being by the sea and without it the empire would not last. We should train men for the British fleet and merchant marine. The government feels that adequate armaments are necessary, but armaments without adequate man power are useless. The minister could do a great deal to aid unemployment among the youth of our dominion, many of whom go down to the waterfront in the spring of the year in order to look for something to do on the ships. A survey and recruiting volunteer system should be established. As hon. members know, conditions in the merchant marine to-day in Canada are not what they should be, from the standpoint of health as well as in other ways, and as a result the young people do not go in for that branch of the service. To-day our navy depends upon foreign petrol and not coal for its motive power. If we are to continue in the British Empire the time has come for us to do something in regard to our naval strength, not only in connection with merchant shipping but in relation to other branches of marine work, and give active aid to the British navy and merchant marine. Where are the navy leaguers?

The Department of Marine has been in existence since confederation, largely for the benefit of the maritime provinces. It has not done very much for the great lakes or for the development of the youth of Canada for sailors or for that fine arm of the British forces. I know of no country that can produce better seamen, not only for the merchant marine but for other ships, and also cadets for officers than Canada, but our young men have no opportunity to become trained for that work. It is true that there are a couple of schools each receiving a grant of $600, but I think the time has come for the government to consider a proper, adequate, national policy. We are a maritime, nautical people, or should be. We have our great coast lines and this magnificent chain of lakes, and $250,000,000 invested in canals. Look at what they are doing in Detroit in the war marine department and all down the great lakes on the other side! We are asleep on this side of the border. Such a policy would provide employment for thousands of young people and give them a calling, but instead we simply vote the same amount year after year. Hundreds of youths leaving our high schools cannot find work. They belong to these aquatic clubs from Vancouver to Halifax. If they had someone to give them a lead; if there was a forward policy provided by the government, it would mean a great deal not only in the way of employment but also in the defence of Canada and the British Empire. Look at what New Zealand and Australia are doing! We had some merchant marine ships owned by the government which were sold for a mere pittance; ten ships sold for about $500,000, and now ships are badly needed to carry food to the old country in time of emergency. We have only a couple of schools of this kind, which are attended by very few people. I do not know how many days the schools last; I understand they are only seasonal, and I think this whole matter should be considered in a bigger, broader spirit by the government if we are to have any sort of defence on our sea coasts and great lakes. We should take a leaf out of the book of our sister dominions and aid the freedom of the seas by providing men and cadets.

Mr. HOWE: The government supports these schools directly, and in addition we make a grant to Queen's university, which gives a free course to any man wishing to qualify for a master's certificate. In addition the province of Ontario maintains in Toronto, through its technical education branch, a school not unlike those we maintain on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. We are working now with the province of British Columbia, cooperating in the establishment of a free school in Vancouver, and we shall be delighted to cooperate with the educational authorities of any province desiring to set up a school of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the grant to Queen's university?

Mr. HOWE: It is $500 a year.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Has the minister anything to say about the anomaly in the shipping act which provides that service certificates shall be given to masters and mates under easier conditions of qualification than apply to actually qualified masters and mates sailing out their time in apprenticeship? I might add in explanation that in British Columbia there is intense feeling because service certificates are given to so many people on the coast while qualified masters and mates who have served in deep sea ships are unable to obtain employment.

Mr. HOWE: The service certificate arose under the new shipping act that was put into force some eighteen months or two years ago. Under the new act certificates are required on boats that did not formerly require these certificates; that is, there are new classes of masters' and mates' certificates. It was impossible to qualify men to take over the work for which certificates were required under the new shipping act, and the service certificate was devised as a practical way of bridging the gap between the requirements under the old act and the requirements under the new one. The certificate of service will gradually disappear. It simply meant that men who were not qualified but who were actually doing the work were examined, and if they could pass a fairly simple test on the rules of the road and elementary seamanship they were granted a service certificate allowing them to operate in the home trade.

Mr. BENNETT: For how long?

Mr. HOWE: Indefinitely.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): But what I wish to point out is that apparently, from the layman's point of view, the particular clause in the act which permits these service certificates is badly drawn. If I had the act before me I could show the minister clearly that in that clause there is an implication which does not belong in the act.

Mr. HOWE: The clause in question was drawn up by the law officers of the crown. The officer of my department who is responsible for the examination of masters and mates says that in practice this has proved to be the most workable clause that could have been devised, and he could not suggest any changes in it at the present time. I may say that a strong difference of opinion exists on the two coasts with regard to these certificates of service. On the Atlantic coast we are told that the requirements are much too strict, that they prevent a number of people from serving who should be permitted to serve on boats in the home trade. On the Pacific coast we are told that the requirements are too lax. But taking Canada as a whole, as we must in administering a department such as this, we believe that in its present form the clause is just about as workable as any that could be devised.

Mr. NEILL: Are these service certificates not restricted to the handling of fishing boats?

Mr. HOWE: No; there are other boats in the home trade that have these service certificates. Fish packing boats require them as well.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I notice two items in reference to printing and stationery. In the first place $900 was provided for both 1937-38 and 1938-39. Further down there is a second item for printing and stationery, amounting to $6,000 for 1938-39 and $5,000 for 1937-38. Why is this extra $1,000 provided for printing and stationery in the one item, and also why are there two items? Why are they separated?

Mr. HOWE: Under the new shipping act new forms are required for practically everything the department does. This is a widespread service, and connected with it are large numbers of forms. Although some of them are used only occasionally, the change in forms requires a great deal of printing. The second item is an emergency one which will not recur, and arises this year because there has been extra printing in the revision of forms and bringing the stock up to date.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I have sent for a copy of the shipping act, and as soon as I receive it I shall direct a part of it to the attention of the minister. Despite his observations I am not satisfied that the section in question has been well drafted.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister has not given a complete answer to the question I asked him with respect to the miscellaneous services relating to navigation and shipping. Are we to admit that, so far as aids to navigation and shipping are concerned, the government will depend upon another power to keep open its trade routes? They might as well admit now that if this is all we are voting, we are simply sponging on the hard earnings of the British taxpayer, in our effort to obtain navigation and shipping protection. Cannot we, the country standing fifth in shipping, keep open these wonderful trade routes? This is a humiliating position for the people of Canada to be in, especially when we hear the minister who operates this trust for them admit that we have no protection at all, except that provided by the mother country. He admits that we have no protection on the great lakes, in the gulf, in the rivers or on the oceans where these routes exist. I am glad we know about it, anyway.

Mr. HOWE: We have sufficient seamen in Canada to operate all Canadian ships, and we have ample training facilities for any man who requires training. If any man wishes to come to us and ask to be trained for seamen's examinations, we shall have no difficulty in providing him with educational facilities. As I said, we are quite willing to extend these facilities to wherever the need may arise. We are endeavouring to do so at the present time in British Columbia, and have arranged to do so at the southern end of Nova Scotia, and we are prepared to continue this work if required. Obviously it is not wise to provide educational facilities in advance of the demand for the use of them.

Mr. THOMPSON: What qualifications have the men who apply for positions as sailors? What are their ages?

Mr. HOWE: Any boy with an ordinary high school education may enter one of these schools. Of course, he cannot obtain a certificate until he is twenty-one years of age, and has served two years at sea.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite; it is the sea service which counts.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, the sea service counts on the certificate, but he may enter the school if he has an ordinary high school education.

Mr. BENNETT: A large number of the boys in orphanage institutions are trained in this way.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Why has the expenditure in connection with telegraph and telephonic communications increased by over 100 per cent. There has been an increase from $500 to $1,180, and I should like to know the reason?

Mr. HOWE: I am told that again the increase arises out of the new shipping act. There are a great many new regulations, and the inspectors at outlying points have to telephone or telegraph to headquarters for an interpretation. Because of that there has been a considerable increase in communications with respect to the new act, various sections of which have not yet come to the attention of all the inspectors.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): May I refer to section 118 of the Canada Shipping Act, which has been amended as to time, and which forms the basis of my complaint. The section reads:

Every British subject who—
(1) served as a master or mate of a foreign-going or home-trade sailing ship of over 75 tons, gross tonnage, before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one—

And since altered to "one thousand nine hundred and thirty-six.

—for a full period of twelve months within ten years immediately preceding the date of his application for a certificate of service—

And so on. It is quite obvious from this section that the only qualification, so far as time of service is concerned, is that he should have served as a master or mate for a full period of twelve months. It does not indicate what length of time the man should have served at sea before that. That is the weakness in the drafting of the section. Deep-sea men have to serve a certain apprenticeship; they have to serve so long before the mast, so long as second mate, and so on, before they can actually qualify for captains' certificates. Why should this weakness be present in the drafting of the act? I tried to draw this matter to the attention of the senate, before the recess, but it was voted down because it had not been dealt with in connection with the issue then before that body. Manifestly the clause is badly drawn, and I would sincerely draw the attention of the minister to the fact that in British Columbia there are approximately six hundred vacancies for seamen. Since the act became effective about 220 certificates have been granted, a number of them to foreign nationals who have become Canadian citizens.

The situation is serious, because masters and mates who otherwise would be enjoying positions on ships are compelled to work as deckhands or to go on relief, when opportunities might be given them to obtain decent employment.

Mr. BENNETT: May I say a word, before the minister speaks?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: We had the act before us, as it came from England, and as it had been adopted by the imperial parliament and by the parliaments of the several dominions. There arose in every country, as there does in this, the question of those who have served in a capacity seeking recognition of that service in terms of their then employment. For instance, when the lawyers of the country first set up their organizations it was sometimes provided that if a man had been practising law for a period of years he might be entered on the register. That was so in the North-west Territories, when we first organized the law society. Provisions were made in the same way with respect to certain types of dentists.

With respect to masters and mates, to which this is limited, there had to be evidence that during a period of ten years preceding the date of the application, which could not be made after 1931—and subsequently extended to 1936—they had actually served—and the word that governs is "served"—either as masters or mates. If they had served as masters for a period of years, it was assumed that they were qualified to serve as such in a ship of seventy-five tons and therefore they got a certificate of service. If they had served as mates, it was assumed that they had gone through the various grades that qualified them to serve as mates; otherwise they would not be employed as such. They also got certificates of service.

I must say that when the act was under consideration by the former government, this was one of the clauses which gave me great concern. The minister by his amending legislation extended the time from 1931 to 1936. It is true the act was not in force until it was proclaimed and it was not proclaimed during the whole of those five years. Nevertheless, the time was extended. The minister has pointed out that no great hardship could possibly arise, although I have always had grave doubts about this type of legislation.

It cannot affect the evil the hon. member for Nanaimo has referred to; for the simple and obvious reason that if a man had served as a master for twelve months he must have been qualified to act as such. If he was not qualified, he had no right to be a master. It is idle to think that he got a certificate of service without having had a seaman's experience. He had risen to the rank of master or mate, and having risen to that rank he received a certificate saying that he had served and as such was recognized. I may say to the hon. member for Nanaimo that it is a recognition of having attained a position, the duties of which he is fulfilling. A man should be entitled to a certificate of service indicating that he had satisfactorily discharged his duties either as mate or master. On that basis he should get a certificate, and not otherwise.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am quite prepared to agree with what my right hon. friend has said as to the desirability of enabling masters and mates who had served for long periods before the shipping act was brought into full effect to obtain certificates. This practice has been carried on since 1906, and surely the time has long expired when the service certificate should be regarded as a necessary part of the act. Under the earlier acts the situation was different from what it is under the recent act and its amendment, in that a reduction has been made to a period of ten years. Certificates are granted in this period; otherwise they are granted only after a service of so many years for each qualification. Manifestly it should be the same in the act. The act should state definitely that during the course of ten years an applicant intending to apply for a master's or mate's certificate should show so many years of sea service. That is a reasonable stipulation which should be in the act. To assume something that is not in the act indicates poor draughtsmanship.

Mr. HOWE: He must have served his time prior to 1936. That is, he must have had his year's service at that time as master or mate to qualify him at any time subsequently for a service certificate based on that experience. As my right hon. friend has told the committee very clearly, it must be assumed that he was qualified to serve as master or mate when no certificate at all was required for that position. It must be assumed that to attain the position of master or mate a man must have served many years at sea. I do not think any one steps directly into a master's or mate's berth.

Applications for service certificates are dropping very rapidly. In other words, those who were qualified by service prior to 1936 have already obtained their certificates of service. The problem is a disappearing one. As these men drop out of the service, the certificates of service will also disappear. I do not know what would have happened to these men had we not included what is often called a grandfather's clause. This is a clause which stipulates that when new requirements are put in, the men already occupying the positions concerned are automatically granted certificates in the new service. I think this is typical of all new legislation of this type.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): You have carried that on for thirty years.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): In 1906 there was such a provision.

Mr. HOWE: Under the new act the service must be prior to 1936 and the application must be made within ten years of that date. There is no possibility of a man qualifying after ten years.

Item agreed to.

Life saving service, including rewards for saving life, $47,000.

Mr. CHURCH: Ever since I have been a member of parliament I have been directing the attention of this committee to the discrimination that exists in connection with the life-saving service of this country. If there is one item that should not be reduced, it is this one. The vote was $48,000 last year and it has been reduced to $47,000. Only a small amount of this vote is used in connection with life-saving. As will be seen from the details, an amount of $30,080 is provided for temporary assistance; an amount of $9,925 is provided for board—no life-saving there—an amount of $5,845 is provided for supplies and repairs, and an amount of $550 is provided for sundries. There is not much life-saving in all this.

Toronto is spending twice the amount of this vote on life-saving services. That city has to do practically all the life-saving work needed in central Ontario. I acted for the city as chairman of the harbour board when we took over the life-saving service from the former Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Hazen. On lake Ontario from Toronto and Hamilton to Cobourg there are only two lifeboats built in 1915, and I doubt if you could get them out of their sheds if anyone was in danger of being drowned. The city of Toronto spent about $35,000,000 on its harbour and the life-saving station at Toronto has to do federal government work. Some $47,000 is provided for this work in the maritime provinces and I doubt if it is half enough. Toronto spends $52,340 for maintenance and equipment, and $20,795 for materials and supplies. I am not objecting to other places getting life-saving services, my argument is that there should be an equality of service and treatment all along this magnificent stretch of navigable waters from the gulf of St. Lawrence, through the St. Lawrence river and our great lakes.

What are the facts? Many calls come in from Muskoka, Georgian bay, lake Simcoe, to the Toronto life-saving crew for assistance. We also receive calls from Georgian bay and many points on lake Huron, and on lake Ontario and its rivers. Many members from maritime constituencies in Ontario know of the conditions that exist on our great lakes during the fall of the year. A situation exists that is not at all creditable to this country which calls itself a nation. Many of the men who serve on the ships that ply the great lakes are equal to those who fought at St. Julien, and yet these men on Canadian ships are forced to sound their sirens to call United States life-saving crews to come to their assistance when they are in danger in the late fall—a fine toast to Canadian nationhood. It is not fair to these men who are advancing our grain crop to the seaboard by water to be without proper aids to navigation, and as one of the representatives of the city of Toronto I protest. I am sent here to find out something about this vote. The city of Toronto pays $96,000 a year to give a life-saving service to the province. Calls come in from as far away as North Bay for this service; the city has sometimes to transport by flat car not only a life-saving boat but skilled men to handle it, and the service is maintained all the year around.

The minister is in charge of all the navigation laws of the country. You have a large number of steamers on the great lakes. There was a boat attached to Amherstburg near Windsor, which the captain had to run into a bank or twelve hundred people would have been drowned two years ago. At the entrance of the Niagara river, for instance, there is a large sand bar five or six miles long. I was on board the boat going to the Niagara camp with the 74th or the 75th battalion, and in a wind storm the ship ran right on this sand bar and was there for the best part of a day. If an accident happens, all you can do is to sound your whistle to get the Toronto life-saving station. The city of Toronto is providing this whole service for the province, and at a time when the government is taking revenues away from the municipalities. The sum of $100,000—that is what it is with summer beach extra protection—of the taxpayers' money of the city of Toronto has to be spent to maintain this service and train these men to act as a life-saving crew. That is something which the federal government should do of its own volition, because by the British North America Act navigation is a federal responsibility. We heard in a debate in this house the other day that human life is not held sacred on the land; and on the water there is no chance at all. We have absolutely no life-saving station maintained by the federal government for the protection of the steamers or the merchant marine on the great lakes, and in case of accident all they have to depend upon is some life-preservers and a few old rowboats, and investigations that were conducted showed that the rowboats could not be got out in time, and that some crews received no proper drills. The time is coming, Mr. Chairman, when the municipalities cannot stand this any longer. Toronto has had to spend $51,000,000 on relief, and we should have relief from this item of $96,000 which the city of Toronto is spending on its life-saving service for the benefit of the province. I think this government should give Toronto $50,000 towards the work it is doing. The life-saving crew of the Toronto station has been called to many different places. In front of the summer cottage of one of my colleagues from Toronto who is not present at the moment there was an accident not long ago in which five or six people were in peril, and they had to send to the Toronto life-saving station for dragging irons to get these poor people out.

Members of parliament have been criticized by a section of the press for being decadent, but I say that the House of Commons is no more decadent than the public press has been of recent years, and if there is no public press to bring this and other matters to the attention of the government, it is the duty of a private member of parliament to do it. That is why I am bringing it to the attention of the responsible minister who is administering this trust, and a very sacred trust it is. I would not want to travel on some of the boats that are under the control of the minister. There are two boats going to Port Dalhousie at the present time. I was on one of them once, and I would not say it is safe; I have not been on it again.

I did not know this item was coming up to-night or I could have read in detail what the Toronto life-saving station is doing. It is doing federal work. Navigation is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada by the British North America Act. I do not object to the maritimes getting votes for navigation because they are entitled to them, and they have been getting only pin-money in many ways for a maritime province, but I do urge the minister to do something for the only modern life-saving station on the lakes at Toronto, and in Ontario and for aids to life-saving and navigation in the late fall. They are called all over the province. Look what is being done around the Detroit river! They call on the war department of the United States, which maintains large stations and fast boats on the lakes winter and summer, and I venture to say that the insurance on our Canadian ships in the fall of the year would be much greater if the insurance companies did not depend on the United States life-saving stations to do the duty which Canada should have done. It is a fine commentary on Canada being a nation and on the talk and chatter at banquets of such a claim while brave sailors are drowned!

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is very fond of saying what Toronto does in life-saving. It is true that in Toronto harbour there are several fast motor boats that have to do with the safety of life in Toronto harbour, but their work is chiefly that of life-saving crews at beaches and attendants at swimming pools. Incidentally that is conducted not by the city of Toronto but by the Toronto harbour commission, which is responsible in a measure to the department we are now discussing.

I hold no great brief for the service provided by the Department of Transport, but I am tired of hearing so much about our great dependence upon the United States service, and how great a service it is. As a matter of fact, the worst marine disaster on the great lakes within two years occurred at the entrance to Cleveland harbour, when the Sand Merchant went down, and I did not hear of any great rescue there.

The fact of the matter is—and we recognize it in the department—that the service we are discussing was designed for the days of wooden ships, and to-day, with all the aids to navigation, with wireless and wireless telephone on the boats, the service is not the type of service that is of any particular merit as an aid in the protection of life on the great lakes. During the past year we have had an extensive study made of the whole situation, and the report, I am told, is about ready for us. It will mean in my opinion either that we abandon the service altogether or that we put in modern mechanized equipment which will be able to cope with the type of disaster which we have at the present time. But in the meantime the service we are maintaining is actually the same service that has been maintained for at least fifty years, and longer, I assume, in this dominion. All I can say is that when these estimates come up next year we shall have new recommendations to make concerning this item.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. CHURCH: I am surprised that the minister knows so little about the case of the city of Toronto. I was chairman of the board of control and one of the harbour commission when we took over this work in 1916, and I can tell the minister that the city of Toronto gives $96,000 to the harbour board for this particular work instead of the city doing the work itself. This $96,000 is the taxpayers' money of the city of Toronto, earmarked for this purpose. The harbour board have no revenue as such. The amount is $73,135 for 1938, but with extra work done it is $96,000. All the revenue they get comes from the city of Toronto, and this whole amount of $96,000 is paid by the taxpayers of the city of Toronto to its trustee board, the harbour board. That is the fact, and it cannot be disputed.

The minister need not be sick and tired of hearing about Toronto. The city is also sick of the unjust treatment it receives. Toronto is entitled to a fair show from this house and from the minister. The minister need not be sick of Toronto. Toronto, I can tell the minister, is the largest tax-paying city in Canada, and this government is collecting $40,000,000 in income tax from that city, and in all $90,000,000 of revenue, while we get nothing. I am sick and tired of hearing the minister make statements like he did a moment ago when he said that it was not the city of Toronto but the harbour board that was paying the $96,000. What the minister said is not a fact. And he need not be sick of Toronto. The city of Toronto is sick of the kind of treatment it is getting from this department. Facilities are provided all over the country at the expense of the government; there are airports throughout the country so established. But in the case of Toronto the same treatment is not given. I do not like to bring these matters up; but when Toronto, the city I represent, is attacked by the minister, I am bound to reply. I want justice and fair dealing. I was sent here to represent that city, and I can tell the minister that Toronto is the only city which gave a grant in connection with a viaduct that cost $30,000,000. We have three or four mills of our tax rate for purely federal burdens.

The minister need not be sick of Toronto; he may be sick of me, but he will be far more sick later on if he continues along the line he is now going. I repeat, we are entitled to some consideration. The minister is a gentleman for whom I have a great deal of respect, and I tell him that the city of Toronto is not being fairly treated. The morgue in Toronto is full of outsiders; for whenever there is any drowning fatality life-saving crews are sent out by the city all over central Ontario. They are sent to North Bay, Nipissing, lake Simcoe, Georgian bay, lake Huron, all over lake Ontario and to the lake Simcoe district ports. Why should the city pay for these federal services? Navigation and shipping and aids to navigation including life-saving are all, under the British North America Act, part of the duties and functions of the dominion government. I see my young friend the hon. member for Trinity here to-night. He goes out yachting sometimes and he knows something of the work of these life-saving crews. As a yachtsman he will agree with everything I say.

I do not wish to delay this vote; far from it; but I do want to see some protection provided for those using the ferry boat and the Niagara and other lake boats. One serious accident happened to a boat at Brockville the year before last. I want to see these people on the lakes given some protection, but under our present laws they have none. What is the $47,000 for? It is for temporary service, but I doubt whether one man will be saved as a result of it. Did the coastal trade get any of it? Did Hamilton, Cobourg and other cities and towns benefit? I do not see the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario here, but I know that up in Muskoka there are no life-saving stations. When anyone is drowned they have to telephone to Toronto for a crew with grappling irons and life-saving equipment. Well, if that is all the life-saving the department is doing, I can tell the minister that however sick he may be of Toronto he will be very much more sick at the next election, and will need all the life-savers he can get.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not already in our law a provision by which all sea-going ships carrying passengers are inspected, (a) as to the boilers, and, (b) as to equipment, including life-saving apparatus, life-boats, life-rafts, and life-belts? That part of it, I understand, is in another vote and is cared for by the branch of the department formerly known as the Department of Marine and Fisheries. What the hon. member (Mr. Church) is dealing with is rather more important than the minister would indicate. He is dealing with the question of loss of life on the great lakes in ships that are not always subject to investigation and control by our own people, that is, ships which are cast up against the shores of our own country, sometimes with consequent loss of life. He has been suggesting that we should make provision for a fund to do the work which, unfortunately, he finds that the city of Toronto has to do at expense it can ill afford. There is something in that argument. We should justly and fairly be required to make some financial provision for the safety of people and for the care of those who may be wrecked. But there has been at times, in all countries and under all circumstances, laxity in connection with inspection. The minister will recall the terrible disaster, with tremendous loss of life, that befell a certain ship which went out from New York. That tragedy occurred between New York and Cuba. There are other ships which I shall not mention by name, inasmuch as it might reflect upon the lines owning them. The same thing has happened on the great lakes. The minister referred to a ship that was not on the Canadian register.

Mr. HOWE: The Sand Merchant was on the Canadian register.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought she was on our register. She was wrecked in United States waters?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought she was on their register as well. I am in error as to that. As far as I could read, that ship had apparently been inspected. Was there any laxity in the matter of inspection, or was the accident one of the inevitable consequences of a storm or, shall I say, of an ill-directed course? Was there laxity in the inspection of her boilers and equipment and matters of that kind? That is the question to which the hon. member is directing attention, and properly so. The investigations into the accident that happened to the ship which was lost off the Atlantic coast between New York and Cuba, and the accident that overtook the United States vessel lost near Asbury Park, New Jersey, disclosed lack of discipline in one case, and in both cases some laxity in inspection. In connection with the Sand Merchant, was anything disclosed that indicated that we had failed in the discharge of our duty in the testing of boilers, equipment, lights and all the other factors that go to make up the safety of a ship? Was she certificated when she should not have been? Was she given a certificate of fitness which she should not have had? Those are proper questions, and I think the minister will agree that there is a duty cast upon the nation rather than upon municipal institutions to bear the cost that may be involved in connection with matters of this kind.

Mr. HOWE: I did not understand that the hon. member for Broadview was referring to the inspection of ships.

Mr. BENNETT: He was discussing the whole question of safety.

Mr. HOWE: Our inspection service is equal to the British service, which is supposed to be the best in the world, and it is quite rigid. As a matter of fact, in the case of the Sand Merchant the inspection was made about three months before the disaster. Nearly everyone in the ship was lost; it is therefore hard to know what happened, but it must have been some unusual disaster of the sea. I have the finding of the court here if my right hon. friend wants to have it.

Mr. BENNETT: Just the sense of it.

Mr. HOWE: The court found that the loss of the Sand Merchant was due to the shifting of the cargo of sand, and that the loss of life must be laid to the first, and, to a lesser degree, the second officers, who were over-confident and not sufficiently alert in obeying the master's orders to get the life-boats out and the crew aboard. The court exonerates the master from blame but considers that he should be warned, and that he is open to censure for failing to have life-boat drill aboard his vessel, and for permitting an unauthorized person to be on board. The operators of the vessel were held to be without blame.

Mr. BENNETT: It comes down perhaps to a question of proper stevedoring of the sand.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; apparently they were too confident; they did not realize the roughness of the sea, and did not stow their sand properly. Of course the municipal bathing beaches are the responsibility of the municipalities. The Toronto harbour commission's expenses are paid in part by shipping. The commission looks after the safety of shipping, and the city contributes to the cost of life-guards on the beaches and purely municipal services. However, as I said, this particular vote is to maintain life-boats and life-saving stations at certain points on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the great lakes. The type of equipment used, the service generally, is in our opinion not in tune with modern requirements. We have been studying the situation for some months, we hope to arrive at a conclusion which we can present to the committee when the estimates come up next year. It will mean either a largely increased vote or the abolition of the vote altogether. In other words we believe that the present service is very little better than no service at all, and unless we can find a way of putting on a first class service we may ask to abolish it.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. LENNARD: I feel that I should rise in defence of the Toronto life-saving station. The minister stated that their principal occupation was to look after swimming pools and harbour patrol work—

Mr. HOWE: Pardon me; I have been misquoted so often as to what I said about Toronto that I should like to correct that statement. I said the city paid for that portion.

Mr. LENNARD: Well, I myself on one occasion with a companion was rescued by a patrol boat some three miles out in lake Ontario, and I was glad to see them come along. Someone might say it is too bad they came; however I am here and I appreciated it.

Mr. NEILL: I hope the minister does not indicate that he proposes to abolish the life-saving service entirely on the Pacific coast. Reorganization might be necessary, but to do away with it would be a retrograde step. At present service is given on the west coast of Vancouver island by two life-saving stations operating small gasoline life-boats. It might be that some improvement could be made in the service. I have heard it suggested that it might be advantageous to put on a larger boat which would patrol the whole coast and be always on the water, with wireless equipment so as to be readily available at any point. To compensate to some extent for the increased cost it might be equipped so that, especially in summer time when the life-saving work would not be excessive, it could handle some minor duties, such as serving the lighthouses; because that work is always increasing. Hardly a month goes by that there is not a demand for another light somewhere, which all means additional work for the already overdriven tenders, the Estevan, and I think the Alberni, to serve these lighthouses. And there is the yearly replacement of the acetylene in the fixed lights, where there is no guardian at all, which might be done by a smaller boat as a sort of auxiliary. In that way it might be possible to relieve the pressure on the lighthouse service and still maintain the life-saving phase. It would be unfortunate if the minister undertook to abandon that.

Mr. HOWE: As my hon. friend knows, that very matter is under consideration. As a matter of fact, the present small life-boats do some of the services to the lighthouses, and we are examining into the possibility of putting on a modern high speed lifeboat, which at the same time could do a certain amount of the work the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. NEILL: I did not mention that these present small boats, while they are all right for going out to small fishing boats, would be of no use for a larger boat, whereas a bigger boat might do the service I have indicated and perhaps be the means of saving a big ship some day with quite a number of people on board.

Marine signal service, $96,000.

Mr. PELLETIER: I fancy this item would include the buoys we see in the ship channels. At present the department's ships are busy setting out the buoys in the St. Lawrence; in fact, I believe the job is now finished. Anchors or sinkers are used to hold these buoys in place. Would the minister tell us what happens to those sinkers, where they are manufactured, the number he gets from year to year, the use they are put to, if any, after they are taken out of the St. Lawrence, how many are lost, and matters of that kind? They are made of cast-iron, weighing two, four, six or eight tons, and it seems incredible that they would wear out in a short time.

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry to discourage my hon. friend, but we have not come to his item yet. The signal service under this item is an observation and telegraphic service extending from Cape Race and the straits of Belle Isle up the St. Lawrence and through the great lakes as far as Sault Ste. Marie. The purpose of the service is to report ships, give their position, and the position of ice, and to report any undue disturbance. It is more or less used by the services along the river, such as dredging, and receiving and sending out weather reports. It is the news service of the shipping lanes from Newfoundland to the head of the lakes.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am not disappointed; I am extremely patient. I naturally concluded that "marine signal service" would have something to do with the markers or buoys in the St. Lawrence, to guide ships in the river channel. However, I shall ask the question again when the proper item comes.

Mr. TUSTIN: In connection with this item I notice an amount for telegrams and telephones, some $5,500 increase. What is this huge item for?

Mr. HOWE: The telegraph is part of the service, extending it to the branches of the signal service stations, and wireless to ships. The increase this year is due to the increase in shipping. We have the operators' salaries, $48,000, and then the telegraph and telephone lines we lease from existing companies; that is, the service is sent over their wires.

Item agreed to.

Administration of pilotage, $125,904.

Mr. BENNETT: What happened to the litigation that was pending in Quebec, an action over the dismissal of pilots?

Mr. HOWE: I am told that it is on appeal to the exchequer court.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the case been tried?

Mr. HOWE: I am told that it was tried last week.

Mr. BENNETT: Was judgment given?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Item agreed to.

To provide subsidies for wrecking plants—Quebec and British Columbia, $45,000.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What are these wrecking plants? What work do they do?

Mr. HOWE: There are two items, one of $15,000 for the west coast and one of $30,000 for the gulf of St. Lawrence. The company on the east coast is a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific railway. The company maintains two wrecking tugs with all equipment and keeps them available exclusively for assistance to ships in distress.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They have nothing to do with salvaging ships; or when a boat becomes obsolete do they take it apart and save the good material and throw away the rest?

Mr. HOWE: No; the service is simply for boats in distress. If a boat runs aground, the salvage tugs go and take the boat off the sand. If a boat is sunk, the salvage tugs will raise it and tow it to the nearest dry dock?

Mr. NEILL: Why not call it a salvage plant?

Mr. HOWE: That is exactly what it is.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is not really a wrecking plant?

Mr. HOWE: No; more of a salvage plant.

Mr. LENNARD: Is the government recompensed by the insurance companies at times for that work?

Mr. HOWE: We simply subsidize the service; there is no recompense to it. The service of course costs several hundred thousand dollars to maintain. The boats are insured, and if there is plenty of work of course the salvage company is well paid by the insurance companies for the work they do, but the river receives a lower insurance rate by virtue of having this salvage equipment available. In some years there are very few wrecks, and the companies are out of pocket. This service is provided, however, and the government has found it desirable to subsidize it in these two cases.

Item agreed to

Aids to navigation—construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $1,897,785.

Mr. TUSTIN: I notice there are a great many lightkeepers under this item. In the class of lightkeepers, grade 3, I find one at $2,090 and another at $977.50. Why is there such a difference in the salaries of these two men when they are both in the same class?

Mr. HOWE: Would my hon. friend say what station he refers to? I find it a little hard to follow him.

Mr. TUSTIN: Under this item there are sixty-three lightkeepers, class 3; one at $2,090; forty-three at $2,040; one at $1,995; eight at $1,935; three at $1,920; five at $1,860; one at $1,062.50 and one at $977.50. That is on page 222 of the estimates.

Mr. HOWE: The explanation is that at some stations the lightkeeper is required to pay his own assistants, and in some cases he has two. The lower salary is for an assistant lightkeeper paid by the department.

Mr. TUSTIN: And this man who received $2,090 pays the assistant who helps him. Is that it?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; he pays his assistant out of his own money.

Mr. PELLETIER: I suppose the question I asked a moment ago would come under this item. I notice that on materials and supplies there was an expenditure of $390,500, and $48,000 for contracts. How much is spent by the department each year for sinkers to hold the buoys in place in the St. Lawrence ship channel?

Mr. HOWE: I believe about $10,000 to $15,000 a year is spent in replacing the anchors for the buoys. The anchors are chiefly lost in the stretch of the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec, where a winter buoy service is required. The ice movement occasionally shears away the buoy from the anchor. We try to recover such anchors, and do recover a number of them, but each year we find ourselves short a number of anchors, which we have to purchase.

Mr. PELLETIER: Undoubtedly there is some loss from year to year through causes beyond the control of the department, but it seems to me that some care should be exercised to see that these costly items of equipment should be looked after as well as possible. As I mentioned to the minister, they are things that could not possibly wear out within a short space of time. They are immense cast-iron blocks weighing from two to eight tons each, and that they might wear out is something beyond belief. Where are these articles purchased; how much do they cost each and is this work let by contract? I should like to know also whether the government at one time possessed the equipment necessary to produce these articles.

Mr. HOWE: There orders are always placed by tender. These articles are made chiefly at Quebec and Sorel, where there are three firms who make a business of this sort of thing. They cost within a fraction either way of three cents a pound, and the contracts are always let to the lowest tenderer. They were never made at Sorel shipyard. The government shipyard has no foundry for casting articles of this kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Are they not wrought iron rather than cast-iron? Good anchors are always wrought iron, I understand.

Mr. HOWE: My officers say they are just cast-iron, with only few exceptions.

Mr. TUSTIN: One of the greatest increases is in connection with temporary assistance. There is an increase from $466,324.25 to $581,546.27. Why should there be such a heavy increase?

Mr. HOWE: Because there is a large amount of repair work carried on, and that work is increasing. We have about 2,000 lighthouses, many of which include a dwelling, and it is inevitable that repair work must be done as the lighthouses get older. For this work we use temporary crews during the summer months.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): What increased lighting facilities have been granted on the Pacific coast?

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member refer to lighthouses or lights on wharves?

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am speaking generally, and include the lighting of beacons, buoys along ship channels, and so on. Has anything been done to render more perfect the marking of ship channels?

Mr. HOWE: The lighthouse board met three months ago and a number of recommendations were made, the larger portion of which were for the Pacific coast. There is a provision in the item for those beacons. I have not the details as to just what lights have been provided, but I know there are a number for the west coast.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I drew the attention of the minister and his department to the necessity of a light at Sidney wharf, but apparently the lighthouse board considered it was not necessary. I then drew the attention of the director of marine services to subsection 2 of section 471 of the Canada Shipping Act, which reads as follows:

> The owner or occupier of every dock, wharf or landing place at which passengers are put on shore or taken on board, shall also, at night, cause to be shown conspicuously on such dock, wharf or landing place, at every angle or turn thereof, during the whole of the time that any such ship is approaching, or alongside, good and sufficient lights.

That appeared to me to be a direct charge on the lighthouse board to recognize the fact that Sidney wharf required a light. Is there provision in the estimates for such lighting? I ask the question, because when I made inquiries about two months ago I received the reply that it had been referred to the legal department. I know that delays may be serious, but surely it should not take two months to find out whether or not the section applies to Sidney wharf. Has provision been made for lighting that wharf?

Mr. HOWE: When a legal point is placed before the department we like to know whether or not it is well taken. The hon. member approached the department with the suggestion that the clause was mandatory, and that a light must be placed at the point he indicated. The opinion of the Department of Justice is that the clause is not mandatory.

Of course, the point the hon. member has raised has no relation to the vote we are discussing. I suggest it comes under the item dealing with government wharves, and has nothing to do with the lighthouse board. Whether or not we light a wharf depends entirely upon the revenue derived therefrom. If in our opinion the revenue is sufficient to justify a light, we make provision therefor. In the case of Sidney wharf may I say we have made arrangements whereby the two companies using the wharf shall pay part of the cost and we shall pay the balance. The wharf will be lighted.

Mr. NEILL: Did the minister say the lighthouse board met three weeks ago?

Mr. HOWE: In January, I think.

Mr. NEILL: I was under the impression it met only in January.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. NEILL: It meets once a year?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Does not the minister think it might meet twice a year?

Mr. HOWE: It creates quite enough expense at one meeting.

Mr. NEILL: It is a long time between drinks, from January to January.

Mr. LENNARD: I notice there is mention of a shop superintendent; where would he be located?

Mr. HOWE: Each agency has its own shop.

Mr. LENNARD: How many shops are there?

Mr. HOWE: There are a good many of them. There are nine agencies, and each has its own shop.

Mr. LENNARD: Is there only one superintendent? Does he travel from shop to shop?

Mr. HOWE: No; there is one superintendent of lights for each agency.

Mr. LENNARD: There is only one mentioned in the estimate, and the provision is for $1,800.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; that is at Quebec. We have a large shop at that point, and this is a new position which has recently been created. As a rule the superintendent of lights has charge of the shops.

Mr. LOCKHART: I notice in the item a considerable reduction in the number of men. I thought the service along the waterways would be more or less permanent, and I am wondering why the reduction in numbers should take place—a condition which is tragic at this time, when unemployment is a big question. What is the explanation for the reduction?

Mr. HOWE: I should be surprised if there is any reduction in the personnel. Where does the hon. member find it?

Mr. LOCKHART: There is a reduction in the total from 711 to 690, and in connection with lightkeepers, class 15, I find a reduction from 60 to 49.

Mr. HOWE: Those are lightkeepers drawing small salaries, and we have changed a number to unwatched or automatic lights.

Mr. PELLETIER: How many sinkers were contracted for in 1935, 1936 and 1937, and to whom were the contracts awarded?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot carry all the information with me, but I shall be pleased to supply it to the hon. member. There are thousands of contracts in the department.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am trying to obtain some idea of how many sinkers are lost each year in the St. Lawrence. I believe the average cost is about $250 or $300 each; they are quite costly: There seems to be a serious loss, from year to year, necessitating new contracts for the replacement of articles which in the usual course of affairs never wear out. Would the department be in a position to make a check-up and to prevent the losses which occur. These are costly pieces of equipment, and I am wondering if the minister or his department could arrive at some figure indicating how many are used from year to year. I am sure he would find that great numbers of them have been lost, and possibly he may find an explanation for the losses.

Mr. HOWE: There are 700 buoys in the Montreal agency alone, on the St. Lawrence river and I suppose approximately the same number in the Quebec agency. We lose about forty a year, and the expense runs about an average of $10,000 a year. We do not deliberately try to lose them. Generally the buoys are sheered away by the ice. We have winter buoys all the way from Montreal harbour to below Quebec, which are required for the use of the ice-breakers. With the shifting ice, occasionally a buoy will be ripped away from its mooring chain.

Mr. PELLETIER: Undoubtedly the minister has a report in connection with this costly equipment, showing when these buoys were lost. I know the minister is always careful with the equipment under his care, which after all is the property of the Canadian taxpayer, and he should be in a position to tell us exactly how these things occur. Who makes the report? Who takes care of these things? They are worth money, and they should be considered by the department in exactly the same light as the Minister of Finance would consider the dollars under the control of his department. I believe the minister must have at his disposal a ready reckoner to show exactly how, when and where each of these things were lost. If the minister cares to go over the figures and give them to us later on, I am sure an opportunity will develop to tell the people exactly how these things are done. It may result in saving the Canadian taxpayer a vast amount of money now being spent for sinkers which in the ordinary course of events could not possibly wear out.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend cares to visit the department he will find a record of every sinker, as he calls them, that has been lost for many years past. I shall be glad to get an accurate record for several years back if he desires it. When a buoy breaks loose, a record is made. If the anchor is later salvaged, that is also reported. This information is available.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I notice there is a considerable increase in the vote for stationery and printing. Last year the vote was $3,000, while this year it has been increased to $5,500. What is the explanation for this increase?

Mr. HOWE: In the former estimates there was a general departmental vote for stationery, but now each separate item has to carry its own stationery cost. The increase in this vote is due partly to the reorganization of the service with an accompanying change in the forms. An expert was brought in to revise all our forms, and the number of forms has been cut down to about one-quarter of what it was. By making each item carry its own stationery, a closer check is kept.

Item agreed to.

Steamboat inspection and the carrying out of the provisions of the conventions for the safety of life at sea and load lines, $185,310.

Mr. TUSTIN: How much revenue is obtained under this item?

Mr. HOWE: In 1937-38 the revenue was $120,000, and we estimate it will be about the same this year.

Mr. TUSTIN: What is the fee charged? I have in mind a small ferry boat which plies across the river in my constituency and of which an inspection is made occasionally. I know a fee is charged, and I should like to know how that charge is arrived at.

Mr. HOWE: There is a long order in council from which I could quote. The annual inspection is covered by statute, and the fees charged are as follows:

	Passenger	Non-passenger
Under 50 tons	$ 20	$ 15
50 to 100 tons	30	25
100 to 150 tons	35	30
150 to 200 tons	40	35
200 to 300 tons	50	45
300 to 500 tons	65	55
500 to 700 tons	90	75
700 to 1,000 tons	130	110
1,000 to 2,000 tons	160	135

Over and above 2,000 tons and up to 10,000 tons a charge of $50 is made for each additional 1,000 tons.

Over and above 10,000 tons, a charge of $10 is made for each additional 1,000 tons.

Mr. LENNARD: How often are these boats inspected?

Mr. HOWE: Annually.

Mr. LENNARD: Are all foreign passenger boats coming into our ports inspected?

Mr. HOWE: Only boats under Canadian registry are inspected.

Mr. LENNARD: Is there no supervision over foreign boats entering our ports as to whether they have been inspected?

Mr. HOWE: If they are passenger boats they carry the inspection certificate of their own country.

Mr. ISNOR: I wonder if I would be in order in asking the minister to revert to item No. 410? This item went through without any questions being asked, and I missed it when I went to my office to procure a memorandum. It appears to me that there is discrimination against the Atlantic coast in connection with these subsidies. A subsidy is paid to a company operating out of Quebec and to another company operating on the Pacific coast. Last year I suggested that in order to provide greater protection on the Atlantic coast a subsidy should be paid in connection with this particular work. There is a large salvage company operating out of Halifax, and I feel that they are under a handicap due to the fact that a subsidy of $30,000 is paid in one case and $15,000 in another to salvage companies operating out of other ports. I should like the minister to give to the committee the conditions under which these two companies operate and explain why these subsidies are paid.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the subsidy is to provide salvage service. Nova Scotia has a salvage service. I think there are six companies there altogether, and one of them does more salvage work perhaps than any other company in the dominion. If the service is there already, there is no purpose in a subsidy. If you had no service and came to us and asked for a subsidy, we would lend an ear. But these are very old subsidies. I think probably in the St. Lawrence there is not enough work because it is open only seven months in the year.

Mr. ISNOR: Would the minister give the committee a little information about the service that is given by the company operating out of Quebec? What territory do they cover? Do they go right to the coast of Newfoundland? Have they any particular area to cover?

Mr. HOWE: Under the subsidy they are required to furnish a service in the river and the gulf of St. Lawrence. They are not restricted at all as to how far they can go.

Mr. ISNOR: Their service extends how far in the gulf?

Mr. HOWE: Down to Newfoundland and the strait of Belle Isle.

Mr. ISNOR: It appears to me from the very reason advanced by the minister that a handicap is placed on the company which is operating successfully out of Halifax. I am not advocating that the government should give the company in Halifax a subsidy; but if they can operate successfully, why cannot the company from Quebec stand on its own feet and operate on the same basis? I have known cases where the company from Quebec was obliged to steam 550 odd miles into territory covered by the company operating out of Halifax, and it would take the Quebec boat two and a half days to reach a certain point whereas the boat from Halifax could reach it in one and a half or two days at the most. I think this is also bound to affect the insurance rate and make it work against our coast. I really cannot see why the subsidy should be paid to the Quebec company as against no subsidy on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. HOWE: There is no handicap through lack of service on the Atlantic coast, because your service is as good as any in Canada—perhaps better.

Mr. ISNOR: I think it is.

Mr. HOWE: At one time a subsidy of $70,000 per annum was paid in the gulf of St. Lawrence, but that has been reduced now to $30,000. Each year we are shown a statement of the operating company and told that the company is losing money, and great pressure is brought to bear for an increase in the subsidy. However, it is the belief of the government that this work should be done without subsidy, and the tendency is therefore downward rather than upward.

Mr. ISNOR: I would ask—

The CHAIRMAN: I must draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he is out of order. Item No. 410 was carried fifteen minutes ago, and I would therefore ask him to make his remarks as brief as possible.

Mr. ISNOR: I knew the item had been passed, Mr. Chairman, and I mentioned that myself and asked permission to bring up this subject.

Mr. LOCKHART: I notice that the travelling expenses in connection with the last two or three votes have gone up from 25 to 33 per cent. Is there any particular reason why the travelling expenses should have soared on these boats and remained about the same in the case of the others?

Mr. HOWE: The Canada Shipping Act placed a vast number of boats in the class requiring inspection over what was there before. All the small motor boats have now to be inspected. There has consequently been an increase in the number of the staff and in their work, and they have had to travel to ports where they were never required to go before. It is a very small port that does not require a visit now from an inspector.

Mr. NEILL: I notice on page 224 of the estimates there are three tackle inspectors. Where are they located?

Mr. HOWE: Halifax, Montreal, Vancouver, and there is also one at Alberni, one at Charlottetown and one at Saint John.

Mr. TUSTIN: I notice that the total salaries have gone up $10,000 or more. I understood the minister to say that there was a larger staff, but I notice there are fifty-nine this year and there were fifty-nine last year.

Mr. HOWE: I think my hon. friend will find that when the department was set up provision was made for salaries but the appointments were not made. We have appointed several men this year. I think my hon. friend will find that the amount provided last year was not spent.

Item agreed to.

Agencies, salaries and office expenses, $243,910.

Mr. LENNARD: What is the reason for the increase in this item?

Mr. HOWE: There is an increase of $8,868 for restoration of salary deduction; $3,750, statutory and promotional increases; $800, additional amount required for casual help; various small appointments, mostly clerical help, $5,580; sundries, $2,080, or a total of $21,078. Then I am pleased to say there is a decrease of $4,000 for printing and stationery, and a reduction of $2,755 in the salary rate due to the newcomers being appointed at the minimum of the class. That makes a total reduction of $6,755, and a net increase of $14,323.

Mr. LENNARD: What are these agencies?

Mr. HOWE: They are the headquarters of the lighthouse and buoy services. There are nine of them, and they are used as the headquarters of the boats.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence ship channel—contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, and the extension of existing weirs, including cost of administration—capital, $2,933,400.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, a year ago I asked the minister if he was satisfied as an engineer that the method which had been followed by the department for several years, perhaps many years, of keeping the channel open was the correct way of doing this work. Every year we have an item in the estimates like this, or for double or treble the amount, or a similar item may appear in public works. So that over the years the dredging of the St. Lawrence ship channel has cost the country a vast sum of money.

Last summer when returning up the St. Lawrence I got up early in the morning to have a look at the channel as the ship went up the river. I went on the bridge, having first discussed the matter with the captain and having discussed with him the possibility of the methods that are being followed not being the very best to keep the channel as it should be. It appears that one year the harbour is deepened, and another year the outlets to the harbour are. Apparently what is done is to increase the flow of water out of lake St. Louis into the river. Is that the right way? The harbour continually recedes lower and lower, and as the harbour continues to recede naturally the following year the river has to be dredged again. The question is, where will it end? Are we following the right engineering methods? I am not prepared to say. Are we following the same engineering methods that are followed in all large rivers such as the Elbe in Germany, the Rhine flowing into the North Sea and the Thames?

I have read of, as I am sure the minister has, and last summer I saw, the plans of a proposed dam across the Thames at London to eliminate this sort of thing, thereby maintaining the level of the water. Has any survey been made of any possible plans to eliminate every year the expenditure of four, five, or six million dollars, more or less in dredging Montreal harbour and east? Certainly anything that can be done to improve the harbour should be done. Anything that can be done to improve that great waterway, one of the greatest in the world, over which there floats more commerce than over a great many of the large rivers of the world, should be done, and I will support anything along that line to provide shipping facilities for the improvement of that harbour. As a Canadian, and like all other Canadians, I am proud of what has been done by this country to increase shipping facilities in that harbour. On the other hand, I am not so sure that we are following the best methods in our attempt to reduce the cost of maintaining those facilities. I asked the same question a year ago. I wonder whether in the meantime the minister has had an opportunity to make a survey in order to find out whether we are following the right methods in constantly dredging and digging the outlet of Montreal harbour, reducing the water level, instead of doing something to maintain it, and eliminating the constant necessity for spending millions in dredging.

Mr. HOWE: In January, 1934, the former government set up an interdepartmental Montreal ship channel water levels board to study this very question that my hon. friend has now brought up. The board spent over three years in making a thorough study of the requirements of the river. The desired result is of course a minimum depth of thirty-five feet at low tide, low water, and a width adequate for the largest type of boats to traverse safely from the ocean to Montreal. The board made a report some months ago. I have that report here and shall be glad to furnish my hon. friend with a copy of it. The decision was that a procedure more or less like that which had been followed is required to complete that work. The report goes into considerable detail with regard to the work required to complete the channel, and it is estimated that a cost of $11,500,000 will be required to obtain an adequate channel of the dimensions that I have just indicated.

Maintenance work on the St. Lawrence is in itself very light. There are only two or three points where silting occurs and where constant maintenance work is required. For a channel of that length, however, the maintenance work in itself is a fairly simple problem. In the actual construction of the channel the work has been going on for a great many years, and if the interdepartmental board is correct we are now approaching the end, so that in the next four or five years we can say to the world that we have a thirty-five foot channel of adequate width from the sea to Montreal; and this capital vote, if not dispensed with entirely, should be reduced to a very small amount.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister satisfied as an engineer that the plans being pursued are the best?

Mr. HOWE: I believe so. As an engineer, I have studied the report thoroughly. I have followed the conclusions of the board. The board was unanimous except for two differing opinions. One expressed the view that not as much work was required as was suggested by the majority, but he did not differ as regards the methods to be followed; with him it is only a question of timing. The view of the other was that the result could be obtained by weirs. He was one out of nine. Personally, I agree with the majority report. I believe that the majority report is sounder in the conclusions it draws from the data available.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then the minister will not support the use of weirs.

Mr. HOWE: No. The majority report does not recommend weirs. We have weirs in the river, but doubt is expressed as to whether they were placed there wisely. We have studied them and have decided to maintain them, but they do increase the current considerably, causing a good deal of scour, and it is a question whether they are justified. There are two opinions as to whether they should not be dredged out and the result accomplished in some other way, but after two years of study we have decided to maintain the weirs we have now in the vicinity of Sorel.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the channel itself confined so as to increase the speed of the water in order that the speed itself will clean out the channel, somewhat after the method pursued at New Orleans in the Mississippi, or does the St. Lawrence river bed permit of anything of that kind?

Mr. HOWE: The Mississippi flows through alluvial country and acquires a great deal of silt; the St. Lawrence flows through limestone country and carries very little silt. It is not a case of the river silting. We have nearly completed the thirty-five foot channel. After a thorough study, however, we believe that we know exactly what to do to arrive at the desired result and we are proceeding in that direction. Anything excavated from the bed is being so placed as to compensate the flow; in other words, we try to keep the area of the river constant by placing dredging material in other parts of the stream in order to cut down the area by an equivalent amount.

Mr. MacNICOL: Having finally reached a thirty-five foot channel, which everyone hopes will be as beneficial as the department expects, following that should not some method be adopted, such as conservation of water, say on the Ottawa river, where there are so many excellent places to hold water, so that in the latter part of the season, when the water level in Montreal harbour is generally too low, more water could be poured into the St. Lawrence from the Ottawa to maintain the level in Montreal harbour; so that ocean ships would be able at all times to come up to Montreal instead of having to stop at Quebec or Three Rivers, as they often have to do now? After all, Montreal is our great national port, and anything that can be done should be done to keep it in condition so that ocean going ships of any draft up to whatever it is at present and whatever it is hoped to be—I am not sure whether it is thirty-five feet now all the way to Montreal?

Mr. HOWE: No; it is about thirty-two feet now.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have often thought that if some method were adopted to hold water in the Ottawa river particularly, it might be beneficial to Montreal harbour and shipping in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. STIRLING: Where does the thirty-five foot channel extend to now? At the time of that inquiry, if I remember aright, it was within about 4,000 feet of the bridge.

Mr. HOWE: We have been dredging in Montreal harbour steadily for two years. We have the channel now up to the foot of the canal, and we have deepened the main portion of the harbour, that is between Queen Alexandra pier and the King Edward pier adjoining, to thirty-five feet. There is an area lower down included in this year's program. We are gradually developing ample space at the thirty-five foot depth in Montreal harbour.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. STIRLING: Have the piers just referred to been deepened to accord with the thirty-five foot channel?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; both the King Edward and the Queen Alexandra. We have driven cylinders down into the rock beside the piers to the lower depth and cut away the rock beyond. We are just finishing this winter the last phase of the work at the Queen Alexandra pier.

Mr. STIRLING: Where will the contracts in connection with this amount of a couple of million dollars be let? Where will the money be spent this year?

Mr. HOWE: In Montreal harbour, area A, which is down at the lower end of the harbour near the oil tanks, an expenditure of $805,000; in area B, $236,000; in area C, $140,000; in lake St. Peter, the big program, $1,227,432; and the St. Augustine pier, $303,000.

Mr. STIRLING: How is the work measured? Is it measured by results, the depth obtained, or is there some check on the yardage taken out?

Mr. HOWE: The contract work is entirely by place measurement; in other words, the surface is measured and the finished work is measured up.

Mr. ISNOR: This item includes $805,000 for area A; $236,000 for area B, and $140,000 for area C; a total of $1,181,000. In view of the fact that Montreal harbour, like Halifax harbour, now comes under the national harbours board, would the minister tell us whether this amount is chargeable to the operations of the national harbours board, or is it a direct capital charge to the Department of Transport?

Mr. HOWE: This is a capital charge to the Department of Transport. Formerly the dredging in Montreal harbour was, and the maintenance dredging is still, charged as a capital vote against the harbour: but in course of the deepening program from thirty to thirty-five feet the dredging was carried out for a time under the Public Works Construction Act, and is now being carried out as part of the ship channel program. That, however, does not apply to the work in the slips; it applies simply to the main area of the harbour.

Mr. ISNOR: I was anxious to draw this to the attention of the minister, as of course I understand that the harbour dues in the various ports are expected to take care in a measure of the dredging operations in these harbours. I wondered whether there are any expenditures to amount to anything in connection with the Halifax harbour which would come under an item such as this.

Mr. HOWE: There is neither very much expense in the harbour nor very much contribution to the capital vote. It is short both ways.

Mr. ISNOR: That should be taken into consideration in connection with the harbour tolls. It is hardly fair to a port that requires no expenditure for dredging to be charged the same rates as a harbour which costs one and a half or two millions every year for dredging.

Mr. PELLETIER: In connection with this item it might serve some public interest to review the question of dredging the St. Lawrence channel for some time past. The dredging of the St. Lawrence is not anything new; it began about ninety-one years ago and has been carried on almost continuously since then. As a result of the policy of successive governments to deepen the St. Lawrence channel there grew up a shipyard at Sorel equipped to take care of this kind of work. Now a different policy has been adopted by the government, namely, that in future all dredging will be done by contract. That was a great change in policy. Although I realize that the minister may not be altogther familiar with all that has gone on, because this work has only recently come under his administration, yet he may be in a position to give us complete information as to what prompted the government to adopt this new policy. I remember the minister making a statement in Montreal immediately after the sale of the Sorel shipyard to the effect that this was done because there was not going to be very much more dredging done in the St. Lawrence; but now we discover that there is going to be dredging to the extent of $11,500,000 more before the thirty-five foot channel is completed. So the item is sufficiently large for the minister to make a statement as to the reasons for the change of policy.

Mr. HOWE: The dredging of the St. Lawrence river began in 1844; it has been going on for over ninety years. I could give all the early history—the hon. member says I do not know about that, but just to prove that I do I shall give it if he likes. But if we can skip to more recent times we can get on faster. Up to date there has been spent on the St. Lawrence—

Mr. STEWART: Below Montreal.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, below Montreal. Down to 1929 there had been spent $37,000,000, of which $13,000,000 was spent on the shipyard and plant. The balance was for dredging. In 1929 it was decided to build a thirty-five foot channel, and it was found that the rate of progress in the past required to be speeded up considerably if that thirty-five foot channel was to be provided within a reasonable time. In 1929 a considerable contract was let for dredging.

Mr. LENNARD: What is the amount of that contract in 1929?

Mr. HOWE: Adding it up roughly it appears to be for about six million yards. That was contracted for. In 1934 the contract was extended for an additional four and a half million yards and again in 1935 for another ten and a half million yards, all at the unit prices mentioned in the first contract.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOWE: Just a moment; the hon. gentleman wanted the story of this transaction and I am giving it to him. As I say, part of the work of dredging the St. Lawrence consisted of maintaining a shipyard at Sorel for the repair of the government fleet, and the government fleet was an expensive unit. I believe there were some sixteen dredges, six tugs, several coal barges, a quantity of dump scows and the various auxiliary equipment that goes with dredging operations.

I think the Sorel shipyard has been a source of concern to every Minister of Marine who has anything to do with it. The difficulty, of course, was that the shipyard was primarily built to repair one particular fleet of boats. The boats required overhaul in the winter months, and when they were operating they required only casual repairs. The shipyard's main work was to look after this dredging fleet. The result, of course, was that in order to maintain steady employment at the shipyard a number of men had to be maintained in idleness while the dredges were in operation. It is impossible to maintain an efficient operation under those circumstances. As a result of the idleness at the shipyard in the summer months it became a convenient depository for men for whom it was desirable to find employment. It has been estimated by my officers that an efficient crew at the shipyard would consist of about 250 men. The number actually employed fluctuated. I think it was never less than about four hundred even in my time; I never was able to get it below that, and it went as high as nine hundred and at times a thousand men. As a result we were appropriating something over $200,000 each year for the shipyard generally, and in addition repairs to the dredges were charged against the dredging appropriation. My officers estimated that the repairs to the dredges could have been made at outside points for at least one-third less than the charges at the Sorel shipyard, and it must be remembered that the charges for the work done were in addition to the amount of over $200,000 appropriated each year for the shipyard itself.

So much for the Sorel shipyard. When I came into office the dredging fleet was only twenty-five per cent efficient; in other words, seventy-five per cent of the fleet was tied up or anchored in the stream, entirely useless except for scrap. The twenty-five per cent that we called efficient consisted of dredges of a type no longer efficient for working in a thirty-five foot channel. We had ladder dredges; one of them sank shortly after we sold them. I was afraid it would happen before we got rid of the fleet, but it was not our loss. It was the loss of the buyer; a case of caveat emptor, I think. At any rate we had equipment that was far from efficient for the purpose for which it was to be used. Analysis of the dredging costs indicated that forgetting all about the repair bill the cost of a yard of contract dredging was considerably less than the cost of a yard of dredging with our own crews and equipment. It was necessary for me to examine the situation to see what was to be done. Should we buy new equipment; should we repair the existing equipment; should we attempt to modernize some of the dredges that we had, or should we dispose of the outfit and carry on by contract dredging? In arriving at a conclusion I had to keep in mind the report of the departmental board that about another eleven and a half million dollars of expenditure would complete the thirty-five foot channel for all time, except for small maintenance expenditures.

It seemed to me that the course was clear. If we carried on with the fleet we had, at the end of the eleven and a half million dollar program we would have a fleet and a shipyard with no work to be done. The capital cost of modernizing the equipment seemed out of proportion to the amount of work that equipment would have to do, for eleven and a half million dollars is not a very big program as dredging programs go. It seemed to me that we should dispose of that shipyard and dredging plant while we had a little leverage in the way of contract work to help the sale along. I took the responsibility as to procedure, and I might say that I had the advantage of some little background that I thought entitled me to handle a transaction of that kind. All my life has been spent in the construction business, and the last twenty-five years have been spent in negotiating and awarding contracts having to do with the construction industry. I have considerable knowledge of dredging work, because from time to time during the period of my professional practice I have been associated with projects requiring a good deal of dredging. For that reason I took on the work of handling this transaction.

My first step was to obtain the valuation of the assets, and for that purpose I retained the Canadian Appraisal Company, the largest and, I believe, one of the most reliable appraisal companies in Canada, to make an appraisal of the property, comprising the dredging fleet and the shipyard, with the exception of such parts of the property as we decided to retain for maintenance purposes. An appraisal was made, and a valuation placed on each item.

I then considered where we could find a buyer. There were a good many problems in that connection, the chief one being the maintenance of labour. Naturally we had a large number of men employed at the Sorel shipyards, and a considerable number employed on the St. Lawrence fleet, and when seeking a buyer it was necessary to keep in mind the continuity of the employment of those men. The main contractor for dredging work on the St. Lawrence, since its inception, has been General Dredging Contractors Limited, with headquarters at Sorel. However, the work has been too large for any one firm, and this company has associated with it the Canadian Dredging and Dock Company and J. P. Porter and Sons, Limited, the three companies I believe owning about two-thirds of all dredging equipment in Canada, and having the greater part of that dredging equipment engaged in the deepening work in the St. Lawrence river.

It appeared to me that these were the only firms capable of undertaking a project of this size, or having equipment suitable to carry out the work. The fact that the General Dredging Contractors Limited had headquarters at Sorel, where the shipyard was located, and also operated a shipyard at that point which could merge with operation of the government plan, and work out a program for maintaining the level of employment in Sorel, indicated to me that General Dredging Contractors Limited were the people who should buy this property. I approached them on the subject and found them at first extremely reluctant to enter into the transaction. However, I was determined that this was the time to sell the property, and I urged them to consider the matter.

The negotiations extended over two or three months. Of course the appraisal made by the Canadian Appraisal Company was the basis for negotiations. Finally we arrived at a price which was about seventy-nine per cent of the value the Canadian Appraisal Company had put on the property. The leverage I used on the contractor to work out the contract was the fact that if this could be worked out we were in a position to award the balance of the dredging.

The method of awarding the dredging contract may be questioned. I believe that there again we used every safeguard and exercised the best business judgment. The first contract for dredging the St. Lawrence was awarded in 1930 to the lowest tenderers, tenders having been called for in 1929. The lowest tenderer had associated with him his two greatest competitors. So that the three principal dredging companies in Canada were working on the dredging of the St. Lawrence at prices which represented the lowest tender in 1929.

Mr. BENNETT: What were the prices?

Mr. HOWE: There is a long range of prices, which I shall give.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Were they all put out by tender?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; all by tender in 1929.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And the lowest one taken?

Mr. HOWE: The tender was for the whole work; you cannot split a job of that kind. Loose rock and shale were put in. The prices have relation to location, as well as to the nature of the material. Reading from the 1929 contract I find the following information:

Approximate quantities in cubic yards place measurement	Name of location	Solid rock rate per each cubic yard	Loose rock rate
549,518	Longueuil shoal	$8.80	$0.90
209,524	Montreal east	8.00	.50
190,199	Batture Perron	8.00	.60
304,446	Batiscan curve	8.00	.50

The table continues to give further information for the different projects. The work covered by the 1930 contract had been completed in 1934, and the then government extended the contract at the same unit price for a further six million yards. In 1935 the contract was again extended at the same unit price, and that contract is in effect up to the present time. We have not yet started work on the new contract.

Meantime the interdepartmental board of engineers had studied the new program and had analysed costs. The costs they recommended in many cases were lower and in no case greater than the unit price of the existing contract. The contract for the balance was made at or below the figures recommended in the engineers' report. In a few cases we were able to get a price somewhat below that indicated in the report of the interdepartmental engineers for each particular section. In no cases were the prices higher than those recommended in the report.

The result was that we sold our shipyard for seventy-nine per cent of the appraised value. We awarded the contract for the balance of the material either at prices recommended by the interdepartmental board or at prices lower than those mentioned in the report of that board.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Those contracts were let out by tender, too, were they?

Mr. HOWE: No; there have been no tenders for work on the St. Lawrence since 1929, for the very good reason that there is no one to tender. The only firm with sufficient equipment of the necesary type is today, and has been since 1930, working on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What was the leverage used in connection with the sale?

Mr. HOWE: The leverage was that I was not prepared to negotiate on the new work unless I could get a sale for my own equipment. The sale was put through at the highest prices for scrap material that have prevailed in this country for many a decade. A great deal of the material was sold as scrap because in effect it was scrap. I believe the prices received were good prices for the assets of which we had to dispose. Let me give an indication of what we might have expected had we tried to sell this equipment piecemeal. I might mention that there were some pieces of equipment belonging to the Montreal harbour commission that had not been used for a number of years. Some of these pieces were in a workable condition, but others were no better than scrap. Some months before we started these negotiations we sent a letter to contractors and dealers in Canada whom we thought might be interested and we received an offer of $500 for six scows. That was the only offer received in connection with the equipment which subsequently brought $2,250,000 at the sale. At the sale we received from the General Dredging Contractors Limited $2,000 each for three scows and $3,000 each for the other three. If anyone suggests that we could have done better by advertising this equipment unit by unit, I refer to him the experience we had in trying to sell the Montreal harbour equipment. I suggest this was a fair indication that such a disposal was not possible.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the appraised valuation of the whole property?

Mr. HOWE: The Canadian Appraisal Company Limited appraised the value of the property as of May 5, 1937, at $2,249,931.97. That amount should be reduced by $40,000, the value of one derrick scow at Montreal which was withdrawn.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the basis of the valuation, cost less depreciation?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. If the unit was in effect scrap, it was valued at the going value of scrap which at that time was the highest in many years. The sale price was $1,704,544, which is seventy-nine per cent of the appraised value.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What was the original cost?

Mr. HOWE: This goes back to the turn of the century, but I can give the cost if the hon. member is interested. Dredge No. 3 was constructed in 1900 at a cost of $94,000; dredge No. 4 was constructed in 1900 at a cost of $94,000, and dredge No. 5 was constructed in 1927 at a cost of $388,000.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not know that it is necessary to give that information as it was given in a return brought down.

Mr. HOWE: All the details were contained in a return.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister said that the reason why the department decided in 1929 to do this work by contract was to save time and to expedite the dredging of the St. Lawrence river; but I would point out to him that I have information from his own office to the effect that during that particular time when dredging was being done by contract, his own fleet was lying idle in the Sorel shipyards. The minister has developed a picture of the Sorel shipyards in an effort to show that the only thing that could be done in that shipyard was repair work. I submit that is not the case. The Sorel shipyard was equipped to do all kinds of work, to construct all types of vessels and even to build marine boilers. To say that the Sorel shipyard was only equipped to repair vessels is to give a wrong impression of the actual value of that shipyard.

We then come to the valuation of the dredging fleet which was sold to General Dredging Contractors Limited. The minister appears to be glad that he was able to realize such a price. He figures it was a good sale, but if he will go back and find the true valuation of these dredges I think he will realize that this equipment was practically given away. The minister refers to certain steel dump scows. I realize that if he tried to sell them as useful vessels he would not have been able to get very much. Everyone knows that there is a dredging monopoly in this country enjoyed by the people to whom he has referred. No one else was in a position to buy any of this equipment which was capable of giving any service. Let me point this out to the minister. Is he sure that his department always gives the auditor general correct figures?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I ask that that be withdrawn.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no. I have heard the minister say worse than that about honest men.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member asked me if my department gives correct figures to the auditor general.

Mr. PELLETIER: Quite so, and I repeat the question.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a proper question.

Mr. DUNNING: I submit it is not a proper question.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the matter with it?

Mr. DUNNING: No department gives figures to the auditor general. The auditor general has access to the books and records of all departments, but there is no question of giving anything to the auditor general.

Mr. PELLETIER: I submit that I can prove what I am saying at the present time.

Mr. DUNNING: What is the hon. member saying?

Mr. PELLETIER: I will prove it. I will say this: Either the department of marine was negligent in its duties or the department of the auditor general was. Let me refer the Minister of Transport to page xxxiii of volume 1 of the report of the auditor general for the year ended March 31, 1937. He will find there a list of stores and equipment of the various government agencies. He will see that the stores and equipment for the department of marine are listed at $17,843,282.36 for 1936-37, and at only $8,596,794.63 for the previous year. When I noticed that difference I immediately got in touch with the department to ascertain why there had been such an increase in the valuation placed upon the equipment then in the possession of the department. I wrote to the auditor general and asked for an explanation, and he replied that from year to year he had given instructions to the various departments to supply as complete information as possible, and had succeeded only in the past year in obtaining this. I have his letter on my file.

In order to get a break-down of these figures I got in touch with the deputy minister of the department and I am sorry to say that I could not get the information I was seeking. I was referred to this famous appraisal by the Canadian Appraisal Company, which is not a fair appraisal according to the figures of the department. I had to do a great deal of beating about the bush in order to ascertain exactly what was represented by this increase in this item. What is the present position? We have a valuation of $2,249,931.97 which was placed upon certain government property by the Canadian Appraisal Company. Only five months before, the officers of the department submitted an inventory to the auditor general to the effect that according to their estimates they had in their possession property to the value of eleven million odd dollars, or a difference of $9,423,000 odd. Surely there must be some explanation. The Minister of Finance laughs, but I am sure that if he mislaid a dollar of Canadian money he would not do a thing like that. He would want it all accounted for. Why is it that complete information was not given to the auditor general with respect to property paid for by the taxpayers, or if it was given, why did not the auditor general make an accurate report to parliament of his dealings with the department? Either the department of marine or the auditor general is to blame, and that is why I suggested that the minister had only recently taken charge of this department and was possibly not aware of the negotiations which had been going on. Perhaps he did not know that his department was not making a complete report to the auditor general. I maintain that it is the duty of every department to supply accurate information to the auditor general and that there can be no excuse for an increase of eight million dollars in a single year without any satisfactory explanation being given. That is why I said I wanted the minister to be sure that he realized what he was undertaking when he said it had been done by a former minister. I said that in all kindness to the minister, and he told me that he knew a good deal more about the St. Lawrence channel then I did. Possibly so, and if he does I hope he will be in a position to give us a proper explanation of the inaccurate reports that have been given to this House of Commons by the marine branch.

Mr. HOWE: I think there is a simple explanation. The Department of Transport, my hon. friend will recall, is made up of two full departments and some offshoots from a third. As far as the inventory filed by the auditor general is concerned, it represents the cost of various properties. No depreciation is charged in the government books. If a dredge was bought in 1900—

Mr. PELLETIER: Just one second—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure of the explanation, but I think it is this, that the auditor general in earlier years had an appraisal of one branch of the department. Of course, the department of railways had almost as much floating equipment as the department of marine, and the civil aviation branch of the Department of National Defence also has a considerable inventory of equipment. I assume the explanation is that the revised inventory of the Department of Transport was furnished to the auditor general in time for the statement. It could not have been filed much earlier because the department was put together not much over a year ago.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister says that he does not know or that possibly he cannot give a satisfactory explanation. Perhaps I can help him. The explanation is that there never was any inventory made of this particular equipment on hand prior to 1936. That is why I say that the taxpayers' money is permitted to lie about in property and equipment at the Sorel shipyards without a proper inventory being supplied to the auditor general, who is responsible for accounting to parliament for all of the goods on hand which belong to the Canadian people.

The minister also said that it was a question of making an inventory based on the original cost, and then deducting the depreciation.

Mr. HOWE: I said the government did not depreciate its equipment.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am glad of the correction.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not a correction. That is what he said.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am glad the minister repeated his statement because it makes my point all the stronger. If that is the case, the true valuation was placed on the equipment at the Sorel shipyards in 1936 because, as the minister says, it was the first inventory that had ever been reported to the auditor general. He accounted for $7,872,007.01 of this increase in the inventory I am talking about. The same thing happened in the Quebec agency, with the result that altogther there has been a vast increase in the amount of money represented in the holdings at the Sorel shipyards, the Quebec agency and the St. Lawrence ship channel.

But the question of valuation is only one part of the item under discussion this evening. The minister maintains that the true valuation is the one given to him by the Canadian Appraisal Company, and I say that just five months prior to that his own officers in his department for the first time made a valuation of certain properties which exceeded the valuation placed upon them by the Canadian Appraisal Company by something like ten million dollars. Inasmuch as this was the first time an inventory was taken, I would like the minister to explain just how that difference occurred. Surely it cannot be said that that amount of depreciation took place over a period of four months. Certainly that is hard to believe.

In order to show quite clearly that the Canadian Appraisal Company's valuation is not a true one, let me take simply the industrial site covered by the Sorel shipyards. I have under my hand a copy of the valuation placed on that particular property by the Canadian Appraisal Company, and I find that they appraise the land, including wharves, railway sidings, paving, fences and drainage at $60,000, and buildings and other structures at $125,789. In the town of Sorel we find that that property, though it does not produce any revenue, is carried on the assessment rolls at $1,000,000. Yet the Canadian Appraisal Company submitted an appraisal of something like $215,000 for property assessed approximately at $1,000,000.

Furthermore, let us consider the cost to the government of this land, in order to try to ascertain its true value. The Canadian government has purchased this land from various individuals and the records show how much has been paid for this land per square foot. It is almost eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I have a good deal more to say.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

SASKATCHEWAN FARMERS

REPORTED LACK OF SEED AND FEED AT CARDROSS—DELAY IN DISTRIBUTION OF SEED WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I have been asked to bring to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the fact that at Cardross, Saskatchewan, the farmers are without feed or seed; their horses have had no fodder since March, and it is alleged that they are without seed for the purpose of putting in a crop, although conditions seem to be favourable for an adequate return if they are fortunate enough to get the seed. I can only say that those who have asked me to bring the matter to the attention of the minister are of the opinion that if he will take notice of the conditions he may be able to remedy them.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I would suggest that if those who send such telegrams would direct them to the provincial government they would get much more speedy action than by sending them around by way of Ottawa. I took this matter up fully with the government of Saskatchewan when I was in Regina last Friday and Saturday, and they are giving every attention to any delay that there may be in getting the seed grain distributed.

Mr. BENNETT: Apparently that action had been anticipated; for they complain that they are unable to get any action from Regina. That is the only reason it is brought to the attention of the minister through this channel at the moment. It is just possible, as it was Friday or Saturday that the matter was dealt with, and this telegram having come through Crane valley, that they were not aware of the conditions to which the minister has referred and to which I shall direct attention.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to a report appearing in the two Regina newspapers, the Leader and the Star, to the effect that the Minister of Agriculture of that province had given an interview in which he stated that the wheat board was responsible for the delay. I understood that the federal minister was meeting with the wheat board in Winnipeg, or was getting in touch with them, and I was wondering if he would care to make a statement as to the result of that conference.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know whether I understood the first part of the remarks of the hon. gentleman. Was it suggested that I had made the statement that the wheat board was responsible?

Mr. PERLEY: No. I have here the two Regina papers, which state that Mr. Taggart admits a hitch in distributing seed wheat, and charges the wheat board with responsibility for the delay. The report goes on to the effect that the federal Minister of Agriculture had been in communication with the wheat board by telephone, and it was understood that on his return to Ottawa he would take up the matter with the board in Winnipeg. I wondered if the minister cared to make a statement as to the result of that conference.

Mr. GARDINER: I interviewed the wheat board while passing through Winnipeg and also discussed the matter with the provincial government in Regina on Friday last: In those two interviews I discovered that there had been some delay due to the unnecessary sending of messages, first from Winnipeg to Regina and then from Regina back to Winnipeg, when the messages might have been transmitted from either one point or the other without the duplication that actually resulted. That probably brought about a delay of about one day in some of the distributions. The main difficulty in connection with distribution, however, is that this year wheat had to be found for a very large area, and had to be brought in from outside the province. Until very recently it was impossible to know the amounts that should be shipped to the different municipalities, but it is hoped that any delays will be overcome during the present week.

MEMBER FOR BEAUCE

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION INTO CHARGE MADE BY PREMIER OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley). Has the minister taken notice of a charge levelled by the premier of the province of Quebec against a member of this House of Commons the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Edouard Lacroix) to the effect that this member had defrauded the Department of National Revenue by bringing trucks into Canada without paying duties? What steps are being taken by the department to protect the revenue in this case? Will the government conduct an investigation into this charge, and if so, when?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): I have not seen any newspaper reports of the charge to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I may say that the hon. member for Beauce himself informed me of a charge having been made. The hon. member denied the charge, said it was entirely false and demanded that I have an investigation made into it. This I propose to have done.

Mr. EDOUARD LACROIX (Beauce): On a question of privilege arising out of the question just asked by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) I desire to say that the charge referred to is false; that I owe no money to the federal government or any department thereof, and that I have already asked that the fullest investigation be made by the government with regard to the charge mentioned by the hon. member.

CANADA-GUATEMALA TRADE

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT SIGNED ON SEPTEMBER 28, 1937

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 80, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and Guatemala.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Agreement approved.

Mr. STEVENS: We have had only a brief opportunity of glancing at this bill, which appears to be very ordinary and simple. The explanatory note indicates that it is an agreement providing for the exchange of most favoured nation treatment. I should like to ask the minister whether, in the light of modern developments, or, shall I say, particularly developments in the older countries of Europe and indeed in all parts of the world, special consideration has been given recently by the government to the effect of the extension of most favoured nation treatment.

This is an old principle, as far as Canada is concerned, in international trade. If my memory serves me rightly, some twenty-two or twenty-three countries enjoy the privilege. I remember making an analysis a few years ago which indicated that whenever a reduction was given to one of these countries it extended also to the whole twenty-three countries. The result, of course, has been a much wider reduction in tariff charges than an individual agreement would indicate on its face, and I was led to the opinion that the whole system ought to be reviewed. When I say that I wish to assure the minister and the government that this observation is not offered in criticism of them or their policy, because this matter extends back over a number of governments and a great many years. But in the light of changing conditions, with the controlled markets of many of these countries, it is a question whether we should continue the principle of extending in blanket form the most favoured nation treatment. I think I am within the judgment of the house and of those who have studied modern trade conditions when I say that in the last ten years the trend has been more to special agreements between countries, the limitation of imports except under quota arrangements, and such practices or customs as these would indicate, as against the blanket extension of all the privileges that are enjoyed by all these other countries, in this case to Guatemala. I am wondering whether or not we are wise in following that course. That is the question that arises in my own mind, and I was wondering if the minister had given any recent study to the situation and whether he would be prepared to-day to express an opinion as to the result of such study; also whether he considers the extension of most favoured nation treatment the best course to pursue in making new agreements with other countries.

Perhaps one further question might be asked: has he any opinion as to the wisdom of abrogating some of the existing treaties, again in the light of changed conditions? For instance, by the extension of the most favoured nation privilege we accord a country an extremely wide entry into our market. As a matter of fact, our general tariff might be considered a dead letter to-day. Most stuff comes in under the intermediate tariff; I refer of course to other than British Empire countries. Therefore I feel strongly that the time has arrived when we should review conditions of import into each of these countries, the extent to which in recent years they have placed on imports restrictions which affect Canada as they affect other countries, and whether or not many of these countries are enjoying undue privileges with respect to the entry of goods into Canada under most favoured nation treaty arrangements as against the restriction of imports into their own markets.

Perhaps the minister will accept this somewhat casual way of expressing a difficult question and suggesting an important problem. I am quite sure he is familiar with the situation, and will grasp what I have very imperfectly put before him.

Mr. EULER: As every hon. member knows, it is of course true that the conclusion of a most favoured nation agreement with any one country extends certain tariff privileges to all other countries with which we have most favoured nation arrangements. That it has worked to the detriment of Canada up to this point, I certainly would not like to say. As a matter of fact it is definitely the policy of this government to negotiate to promote the exchange of commodities with all countries. I would say, however, that when any agreement with any country whatsoever is contemplated, the specific interests of that country and their relation to Canada are very carefully considered before arrangements are made. So far as the agreements with Hayti and Guatemala are concerned, the implications are not important, because our trade with these countries is very small.

The former Minister of Trade and Commerce has asked whether or not the time has arrived to consider whether some of these agreements giving most favoured nation treatment should be cancelled or abrogated. That, again, is a question upon which I should not like to give a very definite opinion. Occasionally—and perhaps at the present time—it does happen that where we might desire to give certain concessions to one country we are obliged to hesitate because it would involve the same concessions to some other country, importations from which might be prejudicial to Canada. Speaking generally I believe it is in the interests of Canada and of the trading nations of the world to have as free an interchange of commodities as possible, without detriment to our own industries. In anticipation of some questions which might be asked may I say that the present bill involves the ratification of a trade agreement between Guatemala and Canada which was signed on September 28 of last year. It provides, as stated, for the exchange of most favoured nation treatment and— perhaps this will answer one question which has been asked—also that if either country introduces exchange restrictions, exchange control, a quota system or anything of the kind, Canada shall receive proportionately as good treatment as any other country.

The agreement is for three years, and will continue unless terminated by the giving of six months' notice. With regard to the point raised by the hon. member, as to whether or not we should consider abrogation, I would say offhand that it is not very probable. But where any agreements are made in which most favoured nation treatment is conceded to another country, the whole situation is carefully canvassed before the agreements are finally signed.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the volume of trade?

Mr. EULER: Almost infinitesimally small. Last year the imports from Guatemala were valued at $52,000, of which all but $1,000 came in the form of coffee. The exports, consisting chiefly of wheat flour, amounted to only $88,000.

Mr. CHURCH: While the minister may say that the trade involved is small, I would remind him that the principle behind the treaty is not small. I suggest to him that in future not only treaties with smaller countries but also those with the United States be submitted to industrialists and agriculturists for study before bills are introduced. I suggest he should adopt a new policy, that followed by Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain and by the federal administration at Washington, of giving industrialists, agriculturists and others a chance to be heard before a treaty is consummated.

So far as these treaties are concerned, we are only having a post mortem. The agreements are signed, sealed and delivered. We have to swallow the whole thing, although some of our constituents may not favour the agreements which have been made. I do not object to the treaty now under consideration. But the government is running all over the world looking for treaties, while it forgets about the home market. I know that the present treaty is only a small one, and that a small amount of business is involved. I do point out however that we must consider an important principle, and must consider the effect agreements may have on employers of labour and employees. We should not permit the making of treaties without first consulting the people interested and giving them a chance to be heard.

We are losing our home market, and prominent industrialists do not know where they stand. At Christmas time one may walk into Eaton's or Simpson's in Toronto and see on display the goods coming in under preferred treaties. From fourteen or fifteen countries we see goods of all descriptions, even down to Christmas cards, and all that sort of thing. This practice is taking the home market away from our own people. This is a stable market, not one which is here to-day and gone to-morrow. It is true that only a small amount of money is involved in this agreement, but an important principle must be considered, because we may have before us a treaty of greater importance, namely that between Great Britain and the United States. The British government have called industrialists and agriculturists to the city of London so that they may know what the government is doing. In Washington they have seen fit to send to Canada a list of forty-seven pages of items, and have asked their people to give consideration to them. Business men were to file their written objections or support by March 14. On March 20 there was a public hearing at Washington before which any person could express his views—not after the treaty was consummated, but before.

Coming from an industrial city I protest against the irregular practice of consummating treaties in this manner. It has been stated in the press that this is a decadent house. Someone should answer such a charge. I say the government should answer, but it has been left for a private member to do so. If this is a decadent house, I would say it is a decadent press which gives the public and business men no notice of treaties until they are consummated. The treaty with Hayti is to be considered, but we have had no notice of it. The press will print three or four pages of ballyhoo about sime kind of sport, or that sort of thing, but not one line about these treaties.

The minister, who has some regard for the public, should consider a new policy. He should consider the possibility of giving business men proper legal notice. They should be given a chance to be heard and then there could be no complaints made. This is a matter of policy in administering this matter for Canada.

Mr. EULER: The complaint made by my hon. friend arises out of the difference of procedure in the two countries. I take it that he is referring to the United States, and, of course, to Canada. Under the law of the United States a certain procedure has to be followed by which a list of the articles in connection with which it is proposed to negotiate, with Canada in the present instance, must be published in order that the producers may be given an opportunity to make representations. That is not the procedure followed in Canada. As to whether that should be done would be a matter for future consideration by the government. My hon. friend is in error when he states that the same practice was followed in connection with the treaty with Great Britain. They did not follow the policy of notifying their industrialists to come in and make representations.

I am not so sure that any great practical benefit would result if the industrialists were called in in advance. I am quite sure my colleague, the Minister of Finance, will bear me out when I say that practically every producer and manufacturer in Canada has already made representations with regard to every commodity under the sun in connection with which we may negotiate with the United States. Any trade agreement which we might make with the United States will have to be ratified later on by parliament, at which time a full discussion can take place.

I think it should be stated that where we make a most favoured nation arrangement with another country, Great Britain and all the other parts of the empire are excluded from the operation of that clause. In connection with this particular treaty with Guatemala, the other Central American republics are excluded from the operations of the most favoured nation clause.

Mr. BENNETT: What countries are they?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that I can enumerate them. It is all the Central American republics, and they can be easily identified. As far as Hayti is concerned, the exception there applies to the Dominican republic, which is a part of the same island.

Mr. LENNARD: Is it expected that these treaties will greatly increase our trade with these countries?

Mr. EULER: I would not care to make any prediction with regard to that. Having regard to all the circumstances, I do not suppose it is physically possible that our trade with either of these two countries will ever be very large. However, it has been thought well to make this trade agreement because of certain restrictions which might be brought into force with reference to exports from Canada to Guatemala if no regular agreement were made.

Mr. CAHAN: What are the transportation facilities for the exchange of trade between Canada and Guatemala?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that I can give an answer to that question. They would probably consist of tramp steamer service which would be offered from time to time, as well as rail facilities.

Mr. BAKER: Are the Central American republics specified in the agreement?

Mr. EULER: I do not think they are mentioned.

Mr. BAKER: Should they not be specified?

Mr. STEVENS: "Customs union" is the term used.

Mr. EULER: I do not think there is any doubt that they can be readily identified.

Mr. BAKER: Should they not be named specifically in the agreement?

Mr. EULER: They are named. Article IX reads:

> The advantages now accorded or which may hereafter be accorded by Guatemala to the commerce of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua or Panama, so long as any such advantage is not accorded to any other country shall be excepted from the operation of this agreement.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this treaty designed to give assistance to any particular commodities which it is hoped Canada will be able to export or import?

Mr. EULER: As I said before, we have not any great hope that our trade is going to be considerably extended. However, we hope to keep what we have. I could give the names of the commodities which we now sell, but in most instances the amounts are quite small.

Mr. STIRLING: What about mahogany and woods of that kind?

Mr. EULER: For importation into Canada?

Mr. STIRLING: I said exports or imports.

Mr. EULER: I do not know that any particular commodity has been kept in mind. Like most countries, we are more concerned perhaps with exports than with imports. We export wheat flour, rubber tires and tubes, various vegetable products, newsprint, rubber belting, silk socks and stockings, brushes, cotton duck, farm implements, bags, whisky, cotton cloth, needles and pins, and other commodities, but in most cases the amounts are quite small.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Coming into force.

Mr. BENNETT: Who signed the agreement?

Mr. EULER: It was signed by the British minister.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing to indicate who he is.

Mr. EULER: It was signed by Mr. J. H. S. Birch.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not stated in the agreement who Mr. J. H. S. Birch is.

Mr. EULER: He is the British minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not that an oversight? There is nothing to show who signed this agreement on our behalf.

Mr. EULER: I do not think there will be any difficulty in identifying him.

Mr. STEVENS: Article IV, which I believe is a little unusual, reads:

> In the event that the government of Canada or the government of Guatemala establishes or maintains an official monopoly or centralized agency for the importation of or trade in a particular commodity, the government establishing or maintaining such monopoly or centralized agency will give sympathetic consideration to all representations that the other government may make with respect to alleged discriminations against its commerce in connection with purchases by such monopoly or centralized agency.

In the absence of precise knowledge of the origin of that article it would appear that there is either already in existence or contemplated a centralized agency or monopoly in connection with some article of commerce that is likely to enter into trade between the two countries. Instead of the agreement specifically undertaking that Canada shall have fair treatment by such centralized agency or monopoly, all that is done is to assure that sympathetic consideration will be given to representations made. Sympathetic or courteous consideration is usually accorded to any friendly country, so that in a treaty of this kind these words are meaningless. On the other hand, the article seems to imply the existence of a monopoly. The minister mentioned coffee, and it may be that the export of coffee from Guatemala is controlled. It also may be possible that some article entering that country from Canada is at present under government monopoly—we will say, for instance, flour, which might indeed be an important article of export. If it were under the control of a central monopoly in Guatemala, then such central agency could very well discriminate, and this agreement would not ensure to Canada either most favoured nation treatment or any treatment at all except such as the monopoly might desire to give us.

Mr. EULER: There is a clause which declares that Canada shall not be discriminated against in any case such as that. For instance, if exchange control or a quota were imposed by Guatemala she could not do it to the disadvantage of Canada as compared with any other country.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite aware of that, but the very presence of this article implies that some central agency does exist, or else the article is superfluous.

Mr. EULER: I will give another reason for that.

Mr. STEVENS: Frankly, I think the article is one that should not be in the agreement, but of course it is there and I suppose we must accept it, and that is all there is to it. But I was wondering if the minister had the facts behind it, because there must be something behind this article. It strikes me that there is a central agency or a number of central agencies controlling, we will say, imports; buying, we will say, all the flour, all the lumber or some other commodity and supervising its distribution within that territory. That is quite a common practice nowadays in many countries, and if such exists then it might well nullify the effects of this treaty, because that does not affect the question of exchange or import quotas or matters of that kind. These are governmental actions. But this contemplates the establishment or the actual existence of an official monopoly or central agency. I think some explanation of that should be given to the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: It is covered by the agreement itself. The monopoly covers matches, wax matches and lighters, and it is so indicated in article II, in the last paragraph, which is the reason for article IV being in the agreement. Article II says:

> The advantages and provisions contained in the present article and in article IV shall not be applicable to the importation, production or sale of matches, wax matches and lighters, in view of the existing laws in Guatemala on the monopoly of such goods.

And article IV sets out the matter in the terms there indicated.

I cannot understand why there is nothing in this schedule that indicates who made it. It is the first time I can recall such a thing happening, although I am not challenging my memory with it. This is an agreement purporting to be made between two countries.

The schedule reads:

Trade Agreement between Canada and Guatemala

The government of Canada and the government of Guatemala, desiring to further facilitate and develop the commercial relations existing between Canada and Guatemala, have resolved to conclude a trade agreement and for this purpose have agreed upon the following articles:

And at the close we have these words:

In witness whereof, the undersigned, duly authorized to that effect, have signed the present agreement and have affixed their seals hereto.

Done at Guatemala City, this twenty-eighth day of September nineteen hundred and thirty-seven, in duplicate in English and Spanish, both texts being equally authentic.

There is nothing to indicate who these people are. The minister now tells me that one of them is the British consul. I do not know who the other, Carlos Salazar, is. There must be some reason why an agreement submitted to this parliament for confirmation does not indicate who the parties are who signed it. Any agreement that I have ever seen made with any community, however small, usually states that it is made between the government of the country represented by so-and-so. One of the agreements we made with the West Indies was signed by five or six of their ministers, and it was stated who they were on the face of the agreement.

Mr. EULER: There is an order in council authorizing someone to sign on behalf of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The order in council must include all of them.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is nothing in the agreement itself to indicate who signed it on behalf of Guatemala or on behalf of Canada, which I do submit is most unusual—I will put it that way. There must be some reason for it; I do not know what it is.

Mr. EULER: I do not think there is anything ulterior in it.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not suggesting anything ulterior; I said there must be some reason for it.

Mr. EULER: In a practical way there can be no possible difficulty about the matter. Whoever signed for the Canadian government was duly authorized to sign.

Mr. BENNETT: The Canadian government could not authorize the representative of Guatemala to sign.

Mr. EULER: No, I said on behalf of Canada, but certainly I would not think for a moment that the government of Guatemala did not authorize someone to sign on their behalf. I would not suspect that somebody out of the air signed this agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Has any such document come before us in the past, with no indication as to who were the signatories?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I agree with my right hon. friend that the regular form would be as he indicates. It should state: the government of Canada, represented by the person duly authorized to represent the government; and the same thing on behalf of Guatemala. But the fact that it is not mentioned in the agreement does not, I think, vitiate in any way the validity of the agreement, because the two countries are mentioned and specified. Of course, these treaties are the object of legislation in both countries, and while I do not foresee any difficulty, I agree with my right hon. friend that it would have been better had it been done as he indicated.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest that possibly the agreement was not copied in its entirety. I assume that the information is given in the original agreement.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Possibly.

Mr. BENNETT: And I was wondering whether or not the schedule had been completely printed.

Mr. CAHAN: The government must have some evidence of the authority of Carlos Salazar to sign on behalf of the government of Guatemala in this case. There must be some evidence of authority somewhere.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend is quite right.

CANADA-HAYTI TRADE

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT SIGNED ON APRIL 23, 1937

Hon. W. D. EULER moved the second reading of Bill No. 79, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and Hayti.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the value of the trade?

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, this agreement in its terms is practically identical with the treaty with Guatemala. The trade is very small, the imports to Canada amounting to $59,000, and the exports $164,000. The imports from Hayti practically all consist of sisal fibre, and the exports consist almost entirely of certain fish products. I may say that both of these agreements—and perhaps this may account for no very meticulous attention being given to the various clauses—are really extensions of existing agreements.

Mr. CAHAN: Who is the F. M. Shepherd who, apparently, signs?

Mr. EULER: The British minister.

Mr. CAHAN: Did the minister have any objection to indicating that a British official was acting in the capacity of agent of the government in signing the document?

Mr. EULER: Oh, I am not very particular about these matters, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LENNARD: Will the trade commission services be enlarged because of these several treaties with West Indian and Central American countries?

Mr. EULER: No, it is not so contemplated.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Agreement approved.

Mr. STEVENS: Clause 2 ratifies the agreement. The suggestion I made a moment ago regarding article IV of the other treaty in connection with official monopolies was brushed aside very lightly, as if it were of no importance.

Mr. EULER: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Article IV of this treaty provides exactly what I suggested should have been done in the other treaty:

> In the event that Canada or Hayti establishes or maintains a monopoly for the importation, production or sale of a particular commodity or grants exclusive privileges, formally or in effect, to one or more agencies to import, produce or sell a particular commodity, the government of the country establishing or maintaining such monopoly, or granting such monopoly privileges, agrees that in respect of the foreign purchases of such monopoly or agency the commerce of the other country shall receive fair and equitable treatment.

That was exactly my criticism in connection with the other clause.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but the other specifies the monopolies already in effect.

Mr. STEVENS: No, that was not the correct answer. That answer applied to monopolies regarding lighters, wax matches, matches, etc., but it did not apply to other monopolies which might be erected or established.

Mr. EULER: Which might be established later on.

Mr. STEVENS: Or which might exist, other than matches, wax matches or lighters. Of course the other point is passed, and I am not going to quibble about it. It is not a very important item; it is the principle which I think we should safeguard. What I am pointing out is that in this agreement article IV does safeguard the rights of this country, whereas in the other agreement in article IV such rights were not properly safeguarded.

Mr. EULER: But there is a clause that if any such monopolies are established there may be no discrimination against Canada as compared with any other foreign countries.

Mr. STEVENS: My. hon. friend is referring to the other agreement.

Mr. EULER: To both of them.

Mr. STEVENS: That refers to exchange on certain specified things.

Mr. EULER: Any restrictions that may be placed upon trade.

Mr. STEVENS: Not in connection with monopolies that may be established.

Mr. EULER: That is a restriction.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Before you report the bill I should like to ask the minister if the government is giving consideration to trade agreements with other countries in the vicinity of Hayti and Guatemala. I refer especially to Cuba and the Dominican republic, having reference to trading between them and the maritime provinces, which is very important. These treaties, I suppose, are all to the good for other parts of Canada, but possibly we in the maritimes do not get the same benefit from them as we should do from agreements with the other countries I have referred to. Have negotiations been opened up between Canada and Cuba or any other countries in that general area?

Mr. EULER: The government is always concerned in making trade agreements with any country which may promote the trade of Canada. But even this government can do only one thing at a time. Ever since the government came into office we have been fairly well employed in the making of agreements. I understand quite well the desire of the maritime provinces to have some trade agreement which will promote the sale of some of the products in which they are especially interested—for example, with Cuba —and the government is bearing that in mind. At the same time I must say that at present there are no trade negotiations in progress with Cuba.

Mr. BENNETT: To what extent does the proposed agreement modify existing commercial relations between our country and Hayti?

Mr. EULER: Not at all. Really it is just a continuation of the old agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not quite sure.

Mr. EULER: That is so in both cases.

Mr. SENN: Do I understand by that that the rate of duty on Canadian goods entering Hayti is not in any way changed?

Mr. EULER: We have had most favoured nation arrangements with that country for the past seven or eight years at least, and practically no change has been made. In one case a specific duty is changed to an ad valorem duty. I believe that the duty on rubber pneumatic tires has become twenty per cent where it was nine cents a pound; I am informed that that constitutes a reduction of about twenty-five per cent. Otherwise this is just a continuation of the old agreement. They have given us most favoured nation treatment and we have given them the same.

INSURANCE COMPANIES

AMENDMENT OF CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932, AS TO INVESTMENT OF FUNDS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 81, to amend The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Investment of company's funds.

Mr. DUNNING: I think I explained at an earlier stage on the bill that it is proposed, by the first portion, namely (i-d), of the amendment now under discussion to permit Canadian insurance companies to invest in the equipment trust obligations of Canadian railways. I believe that will commend itself to the house generally as a wise provision.

Mr. CAHAN: The explanation refers to the sub-clause (i-d)?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: It does not cover clause (i-e)?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry; I should have remembered that they are both in the same section. A number of the Canadian life companies which do business in the United Kingdom and in other parts of the world have asked that we take cognizance of the fact that, particularly in Great Britain, new types of public authorities have come into being. At the present time there is at least a doubt as to whether Canadian insurance companies may invest in the securities of these public bodies. In some cases there is no doubt that under the existing law they cannot, and in others there is doubt. It is therefore proposed that power shall be extended in the language of (i-e). I have suggested a qualifying amendment which would make clearer the type of body to which it refers, namely, in line 30, to strike out the words "with power to regulate the administration of" and substitute the words "or to a body so responsible, with power to administer."

Mr. BENNETT: I thought there was something left out, because it does not make good sense the way it now reads.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, there is that difficulty, and not merely that. As it was originally, the limitation would be to a body responsible to the government of such kingdom or dominion, or to any minister of such government; whereas in many such cases there are bodies which are responsible to the minister, which in turn occupy a regulatory relationship to the body actually issuing the securities. So the insertion of these words will make it clear that if the body is under government supervision and control, then the bonds of such public utility or other corporation would be a proper investment for Canadian life insurance companies.

Mr. CAHAN: But the minister wishes to exclude any other authority than a governmental authority, does he not? The mere fact that a company may be incorporated for a certain purpose should not bring it within the scope of (i-e).

Mr. DUNNING: The difficulty there is due to the fact that the body may not be a governmental body in the ordinarily accepted sense of the term. It may be a body administering a utility—

Mr. BENNETT: Such as the electricity board in England.

Mr. DUNNING: —but under a board which in turn is under the direction of the minister. We are endeavouring to include the various types of quasi-governmental authorities which are being erected in England particularly, which are nevertheless public in reality. The law officers have had some difficulty in finding descriptive terms which would cover specific cases which have been put up to the department, as, for instance, the electricity board, the Port of London Authority, the London Transport Board, all of which have in varying degrees relationship with a minister of the crown of Great Britain. In some cases that relationship is direct; they are immediately under the minister's direction with respect to rates and matters of that sort; in other cases they are responsible to a board which reports to the minister, the board itself in most cases being a board of civil servants, in some cases with what are called over there co-opted members. Various experiments are taking place in England of a very interesting nature with respect to the combination, in the operation of great public utilities particularly, of private enterprise on the one hand and governmental capital investment or supervision, or both, on the other. You cannot use a phrase which is descriptive of all these experiments, because they vary in certain particulars. But there is no doubt that the securities issued by them rank very high in England, and it is for that reason that we think Canadian insurance companies, particularly those doing business in England, should have the right to invest in such securities, which in England are regarded as being prime securities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver) moved:

That the words in line 30 "with power to regulate the administration of" be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

"or to a body so responsible, with power to administer or regulate the administration of."

NEW WESTMINSTER HARBOUR

EXTENSION TO INCLUDE SMALL AREA BETWEEN NEW WESTMINSTER AND NORTH FRASER HARBOURS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners Act. —The Minister of Transport.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The bill in question is for a very simple amendment to the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners Act, to bring in a small portion of property lying between that under the control of this harbour authority and the adjoining harbour authority. Since the bill was presented I have received strong representations from the New Westminster harbour commission and the city of New Westminster to add a further small amendment to the bill; but as this amendment requires a resolution, I would ask the unanimous consent of the house to withdraw the bill and introduce it again, with a resolution, in the form now required.

Bill withdrawn.

NATURAL RESOURCES

CONFIRMATION OF CERTAIN AGREEMENTS BETWEEN DOMINION GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCES OF MANITOBA, SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to confirm certain agreements between the government of the dominion and the governments of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, respectively, concerning the transfer to the said provinces of the interest of the crown, in the right of the dominion, in and to certain natural resources.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, this resolution will authorize the introduction of a bill to confirm amendments to the agreements transferring the natural resources of the three western provinces. They were transferred under agreements which mentioned that all lands, mines and minerals in the right of the crown were to be transferred to the respective provinces. There has been doubt as to whether those terms included waters and water powers, and in order to remove the doubt an additional agreement has been signed with the three provinces transferring waters and water powers as well. That was always the intention, and this is merely to avoid any difficulty in that regard.

Mr. CHURCH: Are any regulations included in these agreements with regard to natural resources? For instance, one of the agreements is with Alberta, where there are valuable oil and coal deposits. From some of the factums and briefs which have been presented to the Rowell commission we have learned how the natural resources of this country have been squandered. I believe the time has come when we should have some regulation in this regard, because one of these days the United States are not going to have enough coal for their own people, let alone enough for us. I believe these provinces, especially the three prairie provinces, since they are the only ones left where such regulations could be enforced, should be under some sort of control with regard to their natural resources in order that these resources may be conserved for the future. In the old province of Ontario we have had trouble about water power. They will have it in this resolution without riders. In Canada we have 42,000,000 horse power in all, but only one-seventh of it has been developed. So I believe there should be some provision in these statutes for federal authority and conservation in this regard.

At the present time federal authority in Canada is the weakest it has been since confederation. There seems to be no central control over these provinces. We have agreements made both without and within the British North America Act. If there is one thing this country needs at the present time it is cohesion and unity between the provinces, but to-day they are like a lot of Balkan states, quarrelling among themselves and fighting federal authority. No doubt the resolution will pass, but when the bill is brought down I hope the minister will consider inserting some provision for the protection of posterity by conservation of natural resources. This country does not belong to those who inhabit it to-day. It is an inheritance from the past, a possession for the present and a trust for the future. Notwithstanding the reflections that have been cast on this House of Commons, this body is quite competent to deal with the affairs of the country without appointing royal commissions. If we hand over all these great natural resources in these provinces, oil, coal and all the rest of it, without restriction, we shall be criticized by posterity. We have seen the trouble the British government has had in Mexico in regard to oil. Here in Canada in Alberta we have the Turner valley, and as I stated when I first came to this house, we should have a national policy dealing with all our resources, including coal, oil, lumber, water powers and so on.

There should be some measure of protection and of conservation. It may be said that under the British North America Act we have that protection as to cash subsidies. Each year we hand over to the provinces certain sums of money by way of cash subsidies, but when it comes down to the fine point we have absolutely no control over these subsidies, although they arise under the British North America Act. The provinces spend the money as they wish, though it was intended for provincial and municipal purposes. This is the only way in which we can bring to the attention of this parliament the need, from social, economic and business standpoints, of doing something to protect these resources in these interprovincial agreements. In British Columbia they are selling timber to Japan, I am told, for about $1.30 a thousand. It costs $10 to deliver it in Toronto by the Panama canal. I am not in the lumber business, and I have not my papers here, but that resource is being squandered to-day. In England and other countries they are doing something to put a brake on conservation of resources and on this sort of thing, but here it is almost too late. In the United States the federal government is trying to exercise some control over the states.

These three provinces in this resolution are as rich in natural resources as any provinces of Canada. The Lord did not intend these wonderful natural resources to be only for the millionaires who can take a holiday once in a while in Bermuda or the West Indies. The Lord intended the water power, coal, oil and all the rest of our great resources for the benefit of all his creatures, not for the few favoured people of this country. That is the trouble to-day. In a rich country like Canada, with all the natural resources that we possess, we have people suffering and starving in a land of plenty though we have all the fuel and oil we need and all the falling water to generate power to help the poor farmers who are struggling on the land. This is a very important bill; as I have said many times before, we should have a legal committee where matters of this kind can be considered. In my opinion there should be some rider inserted in the statutes which will protect the people of the country and establish some federal authority.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the Minister of Justice inform the committee whether there have been any controversies in the courts with regard to the title of Manitoba or Saskatchewan or Alberta to the water powers located within those provinces? I do not remember that the issue has arisen in the courts. As a matter of fact I was under the impression that the province of Manitoba assumed that it had not only title to all the water powers but complete control over them within that province, and that from time to time it had granted charters and franchises with respect to the development of hydro-electric power. Just how did the issue arise at this time?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am sorry that the Minister of Mines and Resources is away at the moment. My name has been placed on this bill but it really concerns a matter arising under the Department of Mines and Resources. If my hon. friend will agree we shall give all the information requested when the bill is up for second reading. As a matter of fact I agree with my hon. friend; I do not recall that there has been any litigation in this regard, but I know that this legislation has been requested by the attorneys general of these three provinces because of some possible doubt as to the transfer including the water powers. I am sorry I cannot give more information to-day, but I can promise it when the bill is up for second reading.

Mr. CAHAN: That will be quite satisfactory, if by passing this resolution we do not preclude ourselves from such an inquiry when the bill is before the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; a bill will be introduced to-day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister did not mention fisheries. As I understand it, the legislative authority with regard to fisheries lies with the dominion, but the administration, in most provinces, has been by the province. Is there any provision in the bill which will save subsequent litigation in this matter?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, nothing regarding fisheries. Of course the agreement as signed cannot be changed; it is an agreement requested by the provinces. Nothing concerning fisheries appears in it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will the bill contain any provision for the maintenance of watersheds on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): When the bill is introduced the hon. member will be able to find that out for himself. I have not a copy of it before me.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 106, to amend the Manitoba Natural Resources Act, The Alberta Natural Resources Acts and The Saskatchewan Natural Resources Acts.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PERMANENT MILITARY AND AIR FORCE SERVICE TO BE INCLUDED FOR PENSION PURPOSES

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 40, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Part I and rules and regulations applicable.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the minister give an explanation?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I believe the explanatory note is sufficient, and gives clearly the purpose of the amendment. Under the act as it now stands the reservists are enjoying all the privileges enjoyed by the mounted police under the act. This is to make the act apply only to those killed or wounded on duty. The pension privilege would not apply otherwise.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Act not to apply except as specified.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This section makes the same provision.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Stoppage of pay.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In this section we wish to substitute the words "any other penalty which may be imposed under this section" for the words " a fine or imprisonment." It is to subject an offender convicted of absence without leave to a stoppage of pay each day he is absent, in addition to any other penalty.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Time in permanent forces included.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The act as it stands says that the time served in the permanent forces of Canada may be included for purposes of pension in the term of service of an officer. This is to make it clear that the permanent forces shall include the Canadian naval and air forces as well as the military forces.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is there a similar provision for men, as well as officers?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, there is a special section.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Constable may be required to retire.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is the intention under section 5 to make section 65 of the act harmonize with subsection 3(a) of section 66. Thus, when any constable has completed a service of twenty years or not less than ten years, and has reached the age limit, the commissioner may, with the approval of the governor in council, require him to retire upon the terms as to pension which are prescribed under the act. The former section was as follows:

When any constable has completed a service of twenty years, or has reached the age limit, the commissioner may,—

And so on. The purpose is to add the words "completed a service of not less than ten years," because that is the requirement in connection with pension.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Certain constables pensioned may be recalled.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The purpose of this section is to repeal what has been changed under section 5.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Time served in permanent forces included.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is the purpose under section 7 to achieve the purpose pointed out by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, namely to apply the same rule to constables as to officers.

Section agreed to.

BATTLEFIELDS COMMISSION

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT TO COMMISSION OF $75,000 A YEAR FOR PERIOD NOT EXCEEDING TEN YEARS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 53, respecting the national battlefields at Quebec.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Payment of $750,000 authorized.

Mr. DUNNING: As I explained in the discussion on the resolution preceding the introduction of the bill, the measure is introduced to extend for a further period of ten years the present provisions of the act with respect to the national battlefields commission.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The national battlefields park is a dominion memorial. There has been considerable discussion lately in Quebec city with regard to a move to place in the park a new monument which has no connection with the purposes for which this memorial was created. I have had correspondence with several individuals in Quebec who have urged that the commission cannot be said to be carrying out its trust when it permits the battlefields park to be used in this way. It seems that recently an American lady offered to donate a statue of Joan of Arc which it is proposed to place in this park. Many people feel that this statue should not be placed on what is a Canadian historic site. I believe the case is fairly well put in an editorial which appeared in the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph of March 25, a paragraph of which reads as follows:

Under these circumstances, the chairman and members of the commission, although it happens that most of them at present are residents of Quebec city, are trustees for the whole nation and are not justified in acting from any merely provincial or parochial point of view. It will hardly be pretended, for instance, that public opinion in Canada desires or would approve of the use of the park for the erection of monuments having no connection with Canadian history and of direct interest only to some particular section or group of the population.

By what process of reasoning, then, the commissioners can reconcile it with their duty to accept a monument of St. Joan of Arc from a private individual who is an alien citizen and resident, and erect it as a conspicuous feature of the park, we are at a loss to think.

The editorial goes on to state that an appeal has been made in vain to the commissioners with regard to this matter. I think it is only fair that the matter should be introduced into this discussion and the minister give an explanation as to why this action should be taken.

Mr. DUNNING: At a former stage of the discussion of this matter I was asked certain questions by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). I have also received communications from various organizations. No application had been made by the commission for authority to erect anything of this nature and consequently it was necessary to make inquiries. I do not think I can do better by way of explanation than read a letter which I received from Sir George Garneau, who has been chairman of this commission for thirty years. The letter is addressed to me under date of March 29, 1938, and reads:

I was informed of the debate which recently took place in the House of Commons when you moved that the house go into committee of supply to consider the resolution authorizing the payment to the commission of the sum of $75,000 a year, for a period not exceeding ten years from April the 1st, 1938.

Having read most carefully in Hansard the questions asked and answers given during this short debate, I feel it advisable to inform you immediately of the particulars concerning the valuable gift of a bronze statue of Joan of Arc; the work and conception of one Anna Hyatt Huntington, officer of the Legion of Honour; and offered and given to the commission by Mr. and Mrs. Archer Milton Huntington, of New York.

Acting under the terms of its charter, the commission gratefully accepted this donation; which being a gift entailing no expenditure did not, in our opinion, necessitate the approval and sanction of the governor general in council.

Were it not for the questions put to you recently before the house, I would have waited until a later date to acquaint you, in greater detail, of all that had transpired in the matter.

This equestrian statue of Joan of Arc, one and a half times life size, is the replica of those already erected at Blois, in France, and at Riverside Drive, in New York.

The offer of this statue was made to us in the first days of August, 1937. The gift comprised not only the statue, but its pedestal and base, as well as the expense of erecting it.

The donation was accepted by the commission at its meeting held on September the 2nd, and I then proposed the sunken garden as the most suitable place to erect the statue; as here it would enhance the beauty of the garden, without being directly connected with the historical portion of the park.

This sunken garden occupies a strip of land 540 feet by 140 feet. It is bordered on one side by Laurier avenue, a city street, and on the other by No. 1 driveway of the park. Being long and narrow, it has proved difficult to treat along the lines used in landscaping the rest of the park. The placing of the statue in this section would solve the difficult problem of decoration, and meet in part objections raised in certain quarters as to the advisability of erecting, in the battlefields park, the statue of a personage not connected with Canadian history.

It was with this object in view, and in the hope of eliminating all such controversy, that we made the choice of this site.

A meeting of the board was called on December the 17th when the commission, after due consideration of all factors concerned, resolved to maintain its previous decision and accept this munificent gift to the people of Canada.

The suggestion has been made that the Montcalm monument be removed from its present position and placed in the sunken garden and that this vacant site be occupied by the statue of Joan of Arc. This, in our opinion, would be quite unsuitable, as the small size of the Montcalm monument would be further dwarfed by the large area in which it would stand.

I confess that I fail to see how the erection of this statue can detract from the historical significance of the park. Joan of Arc died over 300 years before the conquest of Canada and her statue symbolizes the valour and patriotism of the men of 1759 and 1760, which we commemorate in the park.

My long association with the development of the battlefields park, covering as it does a period of thirty years may I hope give the assurance that in the opinion I have reached with my colleagues we have been moved only by the desire to accomplish satisfactorily the work entrusted to us; and, in the fulfilment of this duty, we have endeavoured to give to those who so generously contributed to this park a memorial worthy of our country.

I thought it well to place on record Sir George Garneau's answers to the questions asked when this matter was before the house on a previous occasion. Perhaps I could summarize by saying that the statue is being donated and will cost the national battlefields commission nothing; they will not even have to pay the cost of erection. As Sir George Garneau points out, the statue is not being placed in what might be termed the historic part of the battlefields park; in fact, it will be nowhere near the actual battlefield. It is to be placed just off one of the main streets of Quebec which borders the battlefield and will be between that street and number one driveway which gives access to the battlefield. After reading Sir George Garneau's letter I felt that no valid objection could be made to the acceptance by the commission of this gift and its erection in the particular spot to which it had been assigned.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, may I take this opportunity to pay a tribute to Sir George Garneau, the chairman of this commission, who has been giving most of his time without remuneration to the work of maintaining and improving something which is of great value to our country. Of course there is a board, but, as my hon. friends know, work of this kind is done by one man, and he has been devoting his energies to giving Canada a monument that shall be worthy of our country. I feel that we owe it to Sir George Garneau to express emphatically our appreciation when an occasion such as this arises.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I heartily endorse the tribute to Sir George Garneau. I think the work which he and his commission have performed is a work of great historic interest to Canada, and the commission, and he as chairman, are entitled to our commendation. The question did arise in the minds of many whether the statue of Jeanne d'Arc should appear on a Canadian battlefield as a figure of historic interest in that connection, but I have such confidence in Sir George Garneau that when he states, as he does in this report, that the statue is not to be erected on the historic battlefields site but in another portion altogether, so that the purport of its erection may not be misunderstood, it satisfies me and I think will satisfy the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the place in the park where the statue is to be erected a part of the park that will be maintained with this donation from the dominion government?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not recall whether this edge of the park referred to by Sir George Garneau is part of the property originally acquired by the government many years ago, or a part that was given by the city of Quebec. In any case it is a part of the battlefields park—there is no question about that—but as I explained before, and as Sir George Garneau makes clear, it is just off a city street which borders the edge of the park and is not on the historic part of the area.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think the question where the statue will be erected has anything to do with the main question, which is that of establishing a precedent, and whether this is a statue that pertains to the historic battlefields of Canada. I claim it is not. Suppose it is erected, and then next year someone offers a monument of someone else, say William Prince of Orange; would that be erected in some part of the park?

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of National Defence suggests Mary Queen of Scots.

Mr. MacINNIS: Possibly the Minister of National Defence would have no objection to that, but then again someone else might. A few years from now someone might wish to donate a statue of Lenin to be placed in the park. That is the difficulty we are getting into, and I suggest it is a wrong precedent to establish. There is an obvious religious significance attaching to this statue, and consequently I do not think this government is right in accepting it or allowing it to be placed in a park that is kept with dominion funds.

Mr. DUPUIS: Not even if there is plenty of room for your monument?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is all right, and I have no objection to having a monument of my friend placed there if he has any connection with the battlefields of Canada. But that has no bearing on this question at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not wish to carry this any further, Mr. Chairman. I introduced this matter to get a statement from the minister. I do not think the statement from Sir George Garneau really covers the point. Sir George is obviously desirous of beautifying this park, and it may very well be that the statue which has been donated will do that. Personally I have very little use for war or war memorials, but I would say that the people of Canada, who are contributing these funds for the upkeep of historic monuments, ought not to be put in the position where they are practically giving away part of an historic site for the use of a certain number of individuals who for their own reasons wish to have such a statue as this erected. There are a great many very important people in Europe who have contributed enormously to western civilization, and I can quite understand that their memory should be perpetuated in this country. But that is not the point at issue. The question is whether public funds should be used—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, they are being used, because in the bill before us we are asked to donate public funds for the maintenance of this park, and a part of this park is to be used by private individuals for the erection of a monument which they seem to think it is desirable to have erected in the city of Quebec. The city of Quebec is a large city, and no doubt there are other places where the statue could be erected. Canada is a large country, and there are other parts of Canada where it could be erected. I do say that when we are here administering public funds we ought not to be asked to grant public funds for the maintenance of an historic site, and then allow that historic site to be used for another purpose. Hence I must protest against the passing of this bill.

SHOP CARDS REGISTRATION

PROVISION FOR REGISTRATION OF DISTINCTIVE CARDS OF LABOUR UNIONS AND PREVENTING UNAUTHORIZED USE

The house resumed from Thursday, February 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 22, respecting the registration of shop cards by labour unions—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. RINFRET: I move, Mr. Chairman, that we revert to section 5.

Motion agreed to.

On section 5—Grounds for refusing registration.

Mr. RINFRET: When we dealt with this bill on a previous occasion all sections were passed but it was agreed to leave the bill in committee in order that an amendment might be introduced to allow an appeal from a decision of the minister refusing to authorize the registration of a shop card. The proposed amendment has been drawn and appears in the votes and proceedings of the 29th of March last. I will ask my colleague to move the amendment and to explain what it is.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

That section 5 of the bill be amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

"(2) If the minister refuses to authorize the registering of any shop card, the registrar shall refuse the application and shall give notice in writing to the applicant of his refusal and shall state his reasons for refusing to grant the application for registration.

(3) Upon the refusal of the registrar to grant, wholly or in part, any application authorized by this act to be made to him, the applicant may appeal from such refusal to the Exchequer Court of Canada within sixty days from the date upon which the notice of the decision was dispatched to the applicant by the registrar or within such further times as the court may allow, either before or after the expiry of the sixty days aforesaid.

(4) Notice of such appeal shall within the time limited as aforesaid be filed with the registrar and with the registrar of the Exchequer Court of Canada and a like notice shall within such time be given by registered mail to such unions as may appear from the register to be the proprietors of any shop cards which have been referred to by the registrar in the decision complained of.

(5) In any case in which by reason of the nature of the question presented by such appeal, the court considers that such question cannot be properly dealt with without public notice by advertisement or otherwise of the hearing of the appeal, it may direct such public notice to be given in such manner as appears to it to be necessary to bring the question raised to the attention of the persons whom it considers may be concerned or interested in the decision thereof.

(6) Subject to the direction of the court, any such appeal shall be deemed to have been abandoned if it has not been brought on for hearing within six months after notice thereof was filed with the registrar of the Exchequer Court of Canada."

Mr. STIRLING: Was this the point in which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was particularly interested?

Mr. RINFRET: No, not that one.

Mr. STIRLING: Because he has been called away to fulfil an engagement.

Mr. RINFRET: I am aware of that. But we may perhaps make at least a little progress with this matter. This amendment was asked for by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Factor) and agreed to by the leader of the opposition. Section 5 of the bill contains the grounds for refusing registration. One of them is:

If, in the opinion of the minister, the registration of the shop card is otherwise on public grounds objectionable.

The point was made that, in the same way as it applies in respect to trade marks and patents, an appeal might be granted to a labour union whose shop card is refused by the minister, and this amendment, which is comprehensive but reproduces practically word for word the phraseology of the Unfair Competition Act, provides for such appeal before the exchequer court in exactly the same terms as the other bill I have referred to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. RINFRET: This relates to the point raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George as to the validity of the bill. He suggested to the Minister of Justice that the bill be referred to the department for an opinion as to its validity. I will now read the memorandum submitted to the Minister of Justice and which has been transmitted to me:

Referring to the remarks of the Honourable Mr. Cahan at page 887 of Hansard for 25th February, 1938, to which you directed my attention, I have examined the provisions of Bill 22—"An Act respecting the Registration of Shop Cards by Labour Unions"— from the standpoint of their constitutional validity, and beg to advise you as follows:

I am of opinion that the bill is within the legislative competence of parliament. If the bill is regarded as dealing with trade marks, which I think it does not, its validity is supported by the reasoning of Lord Atkin in delivering the judgment of the judicial committee of the privy council in the recent reference as to the validity of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, 1935, and the more recent remarks of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Davis in the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada concerning the validity of three bills passed by the legislative assembly of Alberta.

I am of opinion that the purpose and effect of the bill is to vest in certain labour unions a copyright which they do not now enjoy, and that the validity of the bill is supportable on the ground that it is copyright legislation within the meaning of section 91 (23) of the British North America Act.

W. S. Edwards.

Mr. STIRLING: The attention of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George will no doubt be directed to this statement that the minister has read, and on the third reading he will have the opportunity of making any remarks he wishes to make.

Mr. RINFRET: Well then, the bill might be reported.

Bill reported.

PELAGIC SEALING

PROVISION FOR SANCTIONS FOR VIOLATIONS OF NORTH PACIFIC SEALING CONVENTION

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 98, respecting the North Pacific pelagic sealing convention.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Is the minister going to speak on this bill?

Mr. MICHAUD: Oh yes, in committee.

Mr. NEILL: Is the minister not going to speak on the second reading?

Mr. MICHAUD: Not unless I find it necessary.

Mr. NEILL: I was waiting to give the minister the courtesy to speak. I wish to say something. As the subject of this bill deals entirely with waters that lie off the district I represent, and nobody else, I think, handles it, it behooves me to take some interest in the matter, and in the past I have done so.

The purport of the bill might be best expressed by referring to the explanatory note on page 2. I may preface that by saying that the pelagic sealing treaty was enacted between the United States, Britain, Japan and Russia—Canada was a contributor by virtue of being at that time under the British government—in 1911, forbidding pelagic sealing except to some stated Indians under certain conditions. The explanatory note says this:

> The legislation adopted at the time—the Pelagic Sealing Act—contains no provision whereby such Indian or other aborigine could be penalized for violating this provision of the treaty.

I have read that explanation with a great deal of interest and pleasure, because I have been trying to tell the officials of the department that for the last nine months, and they have been sedulously denying it; and now, I think with admirable frankness, they have stated it in the explanatory note. The matter arises in this way. I will not go into details, but some man or some company with a very obvious axe to grind made representations to the government here that certain Indians were fishing illegally on the Pacific ocean, and the department in my humble opinion got stampeded and at once issued a most peremptory and, I think, ill-considered order that all skins were to be seized by the customs officers—who do not know anything about seals—provided not that they showed evidence of having been taken illegally, but that, they showed evidence of having been shot. There was a great deal of correspondence between the department and myself. The minister very kindly—and I now express my gratitude to him for doing so—gave permission and arranged that a case should be taken before the exchequer court. It is now before the court or in process of being brought there, so, the matter being sub judice, I will not go any further with the merits of that particular case.

As regards the bill itself, as amended it contains fourteen sections, but I fail to see that it leaves the matter very much clearer than it was to start with. I take exception more particularly to section 4, which says:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of carrying out the convention or for giving effect to any of its provisions.

That of course is a clause such as we find in many bills, but I do not think we find it under conditions such as depicted here; because whoever has the power to make these regulations is not going to make regulations, he is going to make a law. The whole purport of this bill is to put restrictions and penalties on Indians breaking the law in that regard. It is all going to be left to regulations made by the government; they may be wise or unwise, reasonable or unreasonable, but once made they are there, and the act says they shall have the full force of law. In a matter where the very purpose of the bill is concerned it is going to be done by regulation. I submit the greater features at least should be expressed in the bill itself.

Then we come to the other sections. They do not seem to agree. Section 5 says that anyone who breaks the treaty "shall be guilty of an offence against this act". Section 6 says something different. It says that if any person other than an Indian, etc., uses a port or equips a vessel with the idea of going sealing illegally, he shall be liable to a fine, but does not state the amount.

Mr. MICHAUD: Pardon me; there will be an amendment to that.

Mr. NEILL: That is what I was wanting to hear; I thought the minister would explain it was a mistake. It was in the old act, but that it was wrong twenty-five years ago does not make it any better now. But under that section he will be liable to a fine or two years' imprisonment upon indictment, or on summary conviction to imprisonment or fine. This is what he is liable to get, on summary conviction, which means conviction before two justices of the peace, not sitting as police magistrates in a city, but away out in the bush on the Pacific coast, men who have been selected very often because it is necessary to have someone to sign papers and not for their legal knowledge or training. On summary conviction by two justices of the peace an offender will be liable to a penalty of $500—no minimum, and I know justices of the peace who have the idea that the maximum fine should always be imposed. The maximum is $500, and six months' imprisonment, no minimum; and further, the vessel and everything connected with it is liable to seizure and forfeiture. That is the result of committing an ordinary offence against the act. And the people who come under it, by virtue of section 5, and section 8 where Indians are concerned, are liable.

Here is the discrepancy: I direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to section 6, which provides a penalty, as I have already indicated, for anyone equipping a boat with the intention of going sealing. But subsection 2, which I think should apply to the whole lot, reads as follows:

> If any officer authorized by the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act to board and search is satisfied that there is reasonable cause for believing that a vessel has been or is being equipped contrary to this section, he may seize and detain the vessel and bring her for adjudication before the Exchequer Court of Canada on its admiralty side, or before any superior court in the province in or near which the vessel was seized.
> (3) The court may thereupon adjudge the vessel and her equipment to be forfeited to His Majesty. . . .

There is the difference. If a poor ignorant Indian goes out and takes a seal in the open sea in pursuance of immemorial custom he is liable to have his little boat and gear and everything he possesses seized and forfeited, not on the adjudication of the exchequer court, in which we all have the greatest confidence, but on the mere say-so of an officer as defined under the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act, which includes a fisheries officer. A fisheries officer is a man in the employ of the fisheries department, he may have been there only two weeks; he may be a political hack of the most obvious description and owe his appointment to that cause, but he has this power. I do not care what act it is in; I contend it is wrong, and that no one short of a court should have the power to declare the forfeiture of something on sight.

A clear case occurred two years ago in my own district in connection with the fisheries regulations. There was one of these absurd—I think I should rather call them infamous—sections, by which a man's boat worth perhaps $15,000 could be confiscated on sight by a fisheries officer. The man was charged with some comparatively trivial offence, such as fishing illegally in a certain place. The fisheries officer was told about it and went and seized his boat. It was quite illegal, because he had to do it on sight, and it was not done on his sight but someone told him of it. Before the case came up for trial—for there was a charge as well—someone enlightened the fisheries officer as to his error and he withdrew the confiscation. The man went on trial and was acquitted; he was pronounced innocent of any offence, yet if that fisheries man had happened to see the boat the seizure would have been legal and condemnation and forfeiture to the crown would have been legal. So we should have had the remarkable and utterly unjust situation of a man charged with an offence against the law, properly tried and legally acquitted, and yet unable except by mercy of the crown to get back his boat which had been seized.

The same thing exists here. It may be a case of a wealthy firm equipping a schooner; the boat can be seized by one of these subordinates, and that is all right, but he cannot condemn it; he can only bring it before the nearest exchequer court or superior court. But under section 8 this wretched Indian is liable to have everything he owns in the world forfeited on the say-so of someone who is described as a fisheries official. I submit it ought to go before a court in every case; let the man be prosecuted and brought into court, and let the forfeiture follow conviction. But to have a condition under which it would be possible for an innocent man to be acquitted but his boat previously forfeited is utterly intolerable. Section 8 says that the Indian who fishes illegally can have his boat seized by any officer authorized to board and search, and it shall be forfeited to his majesty.

That ought to be followed by the words "after due process of law" or something of the kind.

I have already referred to the severe penalty. You never make law good by making the penalties too severe. In almost every other act in connection with summary convictions you find—the Minister of Justice will correct me if I am wrong—that there is a minimum penalty provided so as to prevent ignorance or personal feeling operating to give a man a tremendous penalty, perhaps $500, for shooting a seal the skin of which may be worth $2.50.

Then section 5 provides that an Indian is not subject to the act if he has been engaged in pelagic sealing in convention waters in strict compliance with the stipulations of article 4 of the convention. Let us look at article 4. It says that:

> It is further agreed that the provisions of this convention shall not apply to Indians, Ainos, Aleuts, or other aborigines dwelling on the coast of the waters mentioned in article I who carry on pelagic sealing in canoes not transported by or used in connection with other vessels, and propelled entirely by oars, paddles, or sails, and manned by not more than five persons each, in the way hitherto practised and without the use of firearms.

Now there is a contradiction in law, and certainly in common sense. It was put in there by the British when they were drawing up the treaty nearly twenty-five years ago, and were not familiar with conditions on the Pacific coast and ocean. They drew it up wrongly. It says, "a way hitherto practised and without the use of firearms." I submit that the one contradicts the other, because the old way did permit the use of firearms. There is no question about that. I am thoroughly familiar with the subject; I lived there for many years; I was Indian agent and had to do with these Indian crews and sailing captains, and I have often heard them talk about it.

The course followed by the sealers was this: They used to be fitted out in Victoria in the early spring, probably in March. Then they went down the California coast and came up there. Very often they ran into Victoria to get fresh stores, and then proceeded up towards Bering sea, going up the west coast of Vancouver island. That is where they took the skins now in dispute, but for all that distance from the California coast up to Bering sea they were allowed to use shotguns. There is no question about that. They did not always do so; if they could use their spears they preferred to do so, since a seal that is shot is liable to sink.

Mr. REID: Might I ask the hon. member whether they were allowed the use of shotguns when the treaty was signed in 1911, forbidding the use of firearms?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, they were. The business had dwindled so much that there was very little done, but they were allowed the use of firearms outside Bering sea. When they reached that point the American or Canadian cutter came up and compelled them to seal their guns. If the guns had been illegal all along the cutter would not have sealed them up; it would have seized them, but they were allowed the use of firearms as far as Bering sea. Now the words are "as hitherto practised." If that is to be the policy they can use firearms now. If the intention had been to introduce something different from the existing practice they would have said "hitherto practised but without the use of firearms." They did not say "but"; they said "and," indicating that they thought there were no guns allowed on the coast at all. That was a mistake; the wording was erroneous, and it should be corrected now. There is provision under the treaty for conferences by means of which the various signatory governments can get together and agree on modifications of the treaty, and I believe that should be done. In any case I maintain that these Indians are entitled to go out and use a gun off the coast of Vancouver island, because that was the old way of getting the seals.

What was that provision put in the treaty for? The idea was that these were poor, uneducated Indians, unable to earn their living other than in the ways to which they were accustomed, and it was considered desirable to perpetuate the status quo and let them go on doing what they had been doing before. That is all I am asking. The language is capable of being interpreted in the other way, I admit, but I believe it should be interpreted according to what was evidently the intention of the framers of the legislation.

There is another point I should like to make; perhaps it is not quite so strong as this but still I think it is applicable. This treaty was negotiated twenty-seven years ago. At that time the idea was to rehabilitate the sealing industry, which had fallen to a very low level, owing to the methods of sealing in practice and the frequent poaching that went on. Sealing was practically nonexistent, and it was considered desirable to get together and draw up this treaty so that the herd could be built up. That was why they restricted the Indians to the old method.

But those conditions no longer exist, and I think we should move with the times and allow the Indians the same facilities we allow anyone else, twenty-seven years after the event. The seal herds have increased enormously under this protection, so much so that they are becoming a menace to salmon fishing on the Pacific coast. I have heard many people advocate that we denounce the treaty altogether and begin to kill the seals in the old way because of the enormous number of salmon they eat. Of course people who want to prove the opposite catch a few seals at a time and place when they know there are no salmon in the water. Then they triumphantly produce the stomachs of the seals and say, "These seals are not eating salmon; there are none in their stomachs." Of course there would not be any, because there were no salmon for them to eat. I remember an argument one time in regard to sea lions; it was said that only seaweed had been found in their stomachs, and it was argued that therefore they lived on seaweed. I suppose if they had found a piece of motor tire in the stomach of a sea lion they would have argued that they lived on motor tires; and that would have been possible, because old motor tires are used as fenders on many of the fishing boats.

I submit that there is no longer need to protect the seals, and that is an additional reason why we should not be too hard on the Indian. Then again, why should we not allow the Indian to use modern methods? In 1922 a royal commission consisting of members of this house went thoroughly into conditions on the Pacific coast. We found that on the Skeena river no one, white or Indian, was allowed to use a power boat. A fisherman was not allowed to have a little Evinrude or a little two horse-power engine to buck the tide; he had to use sails or oars. It seemed an extraordinary thing that people who were licensed to go fishing should not be allowed to do so in the most modern and appropriate manner. On investigation we discovered that the reason was purely a financial one. At that time the canners financed those people much more than is the case at present, and they foresaw that they would be up against buying engines for all these boats. So they violently objected to the use of engines, but we could not see that it was unreasonable or improper that a man who was licensed to catch salmon, who was restricted by closed hours, seasons and so forth, should be allowed to catch the fish in the most practical method possible. Therefore we ordered that they should be allowed to use power boats thereafter, and nothing in particular happened except that it was a great deal more convenient for the fishermen. I suppose going back to antiquity we can recall that members of parliament, if they existed in those days, used to blot their letters with sand instead of using blotting paper, and they made copies of everything by hand, just as the monks did, some of whom would spend half a lifetime writing one book. We do not need to do such things now; we have gone ahead with the times, and if we allow the Indian to catch seals I do not see why he should not do it in the most reasonable way and with the least effort possible.

As I mentioned before, article 16 of the treaty contains a provision whereby one or more of the parties concerned may ask for a conference forthwith between representatives of all parties to consider and agree upon a further extension of the convention with such conditions and modifications, if any, as may be considered desirable. So there is opportunity for this government, in agreement with the other nations concerned, to make such modifications as would meet the situation, without going to the extent of entirely denouncing the treaty. I submit that in fairness to these Indians that should be done. They are not represented by members here, but because they do not have members representing them they should not be penalized. In New Zealand, where there is a comparable race called the Maoris, they have four members to represent them in parliament, so their interests are well looked after. We should not discriminate against the Indian here. A white man who has a schooner and who proposes to go out sealing illegally cannot have his vessel seized until the matter has been disposed of by the exchequer court, but in the case of the poor Indian his vessel may be seized on the mere say-so of a man calling himself a fisheries officer.

I do not submit these views to the department in any spirit of antagonism at all, but I do hope they will consider these points when they are dealing with this matter later on.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MICHAUD: As indicated in the explanatory note, this bill is for the purpose of amplifying a measure passed in 1913 which was passed in confirmation of the treaty entered into and signed in 1911 by Great Britain, the United States, Japan and Russia, regulating sealing in Pacific waters.

In 1911 Canada had no treaty making powers, and after the signing of the treaty the enabling legislation was passed by the British parliament. It was not until 1913 that this parliament passed legislation with a view to controlling natives who might fit out boats on the Pacific coast or along Canadian shores for purposes of fishing on the high seas. Since 1911 we have been operating under the legislation I have indicated; but last year, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, a situation arose which, in my view, necessitated the revision of the then legislation. There was some room for difference of opinion as to whether or not we had the necessary machinery to punish those who violated the provisions of the treaty.

It mighlt be well for the committee to understand that through the treaty of 1911 Canada has relinquished any claim to property in the seals frequenting the waters. The United States claimed they owned a herd; Russia claimed they owned a herd, and Japan made a similar claim because, as was pointed out, the herds were found in the neighbourhood of islands within the territorial waters of those countries.

By virtue of our agreeing in 1911 not to interfere with the property of those countries with respect to seals, we are being allotted each year a certain number of skins, the valuable part of the seal. We receive a certain number of skins from the seals destroyed under the supervision of the governments of the United States, Russia and Japan. We receive those skins in return for helping those countries to protect the herds of seals by refusing rights to people from this country to fit out vessels on our shores and to go to sea hunting for seals, and for generally contributing towards the enforcement of the treaty.

The governments of the United States, Russia and Japan permit their natives to destroy or kill a certain number of seals each year, and under the provisions of the treaty we are granted fifteen per cent of the furs of seals killed by the United States, fifteen per cent from Japan, and ten per cent from Russia. Those skins are delivered each year at Victoria by the countries in question. The skins are sold at auction at St. Louis, Missouri, and London. From the sale of skins allotted to us we have derived $1,493,540.71 since the inception of the treaty.

The white people along the coast of British Columbia have not participated in the killing of seals, but under article 4 of the treaty the aborigines or Indians along the coast are allowed certain privileges. In 1936 the proceeds from the sale of skins from animals caught by them amounted to $1,888. In 1937 their share, according to departmental statistics, amounted to 2,671 skins.

Mr. BENNETT: What happened to the proceeds of the sale of skins?

Mr. MICHAUD: It goes into the consolidated revenue fund. It is not administered by the department, and is not charged against departmental expenditures. My information is that since 1911 payment has been made into and made part of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

I find that the skins are sent either to London or to St. Louis, depending upon the state of the market. I am informed that these are the two great fur markets of the world. The furs are sold at auction and the proceeds are paid into the treasury of the dominion.

Mr. REID: Does that take place in regard to skins from Russia and Japan?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes; that is my information. I know that has happened in the last two years, and records of the department show it happened before that time.

Mr. BENNETT: Do we take the skins or cash?

Mr. MICHAUD: In the last few years we have taken the skins, but I am informed that prior to that we took cash. I am informed that for some years the skins have been delivered at either Victoria or Seattle. Russian and Japanese skins are delivered at Victoria, and the share contributed by the United States is delivered at Seattle.

Mr. NEILL: Has Japan given her share in recent years? I think not.

Mr. MICHAUD: I believe so.

Mr. NEILL: I think not.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think so. We take the word of the governments of those countries, and I do not know of any investigation being made to ascertain whether or not we were getting exactly the proper number.

Mr. NEILL: My impression is that in the last two or three years the Japanese have not paid their share. If I am wrong, I am ready to apologize, but the minister ought to know.

Mr. MICHAUD: I may be wrong, but I understood the difficulty was with Russia, that they had been late in making returns in one or two years. However, I am not positive about that. It may be that Japan delayed in making her returns, but I doubt it. My information is that they have made returns regularly. However, I shall find out and give this information to my hon. friend as it appears on the records of the department before we finish discussing this bill in committee.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has complained that this bill contains more clauses than the original act. This is necessary in order to administer the legislation. It was found advisable to provide in the bill for the necessary machinery to administer the act as it should be administered. The original act passed in 1913 implemented the provisions of an order in council passed by the British government. At that time it was thought that the fisheries legislation provided the necessary procedure and machinery to enforce the provisions of the act. This matter was looked into after the hon. member directed the attention of the department to the anomalies of which he complained. It was suggested that in order to remove all doubt the act should be recast and the necessary provisions included to cover all cases as they might arise.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. NEILL: There is an obvious mistake in spelling in the fifth line. "Fur sales" should read "fur seals." Will the minister correct that?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Regulations by governor in council.

Mr. NEILL: Could the minister give us some information as to what he proposes to do with regard to issuing regulations?

Mr. MICHAUD: The regulations will provide the means for properly marking and identifying skins taken legally by Indians. These provisions exist already.

Mr. NEILL: Where?

Mr. MICHAUD: The regulations were passed not long after the 1913 legislation. The department has been administering the law under the provisions of those regulations.

Mr. NEILL: I understood that there were no regulations.

Mr. MICHAUD: Oh, yes.

Mr. NEILL: The explanatory note states that the legislation adopted at the time contains no provision whereby they could be penalized.

Mr. MICHAUD: No provision.

Mr. NEILL: You are providing regulations to penalize them.

Mr. MICHAUD: My hon. friend should remove from his mind any thought that the object of this bill is to penalize anyone. The idea of the bill is to enforce the provisions of a treaty which we have bound ourselves to observe and enforce. The object of the bill is to make it easier for the people to observe the law and for the department to enforce it. There will be regulations covering the issuing of certificates and the declarations to be made by those who purchase skins. All these matters have been covered by departmental regulations.

Mr. NEILL: Under what legislation were they made?

Mr. MICHAUD: Under the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. NEILL: Of the treaty?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: It states here that every regulation shall be published in the Canada Gazette. Were the regulations referred to by the minister published in the Gazette?

Mr. MICHAUD: I cannot say.

Mr. NEILL: I have never seen them.

Mr. MICHAUD: It was before my time.

Mr. NEILL: Is not this the situation? There has not been the least attempt made to put any penal clauses in the act. I think we might as well admit that and then go on. My contention is that there were never any regulations which were legal in the sense of having been gazetted. I think it will be found that the deputy minister, or an assistant deputy minister, wrote to the customs people and asked them if they saw any skins which they did not like the look of to seize them. I have seen those instructions. I did not think this matter would come up in this shape and I do not have them under my hand. I am very much of the opinion that they were not in the form of regulations; they were in the form of a letter from the deputy minister, or with the authority of the minister, to the customs people, asking them to detain any skins which they had reason to believe had been obtained illegally. Those instructions were concentrated, so to speak, at Victoria.

Apparently it has now been discovered that those instructions did not have the force of law. Last July the deputy minister made an attempt to enforce them, but he found that he had not anything to enforce. The customs people seized some skins on his instructions, but the people who owned the skins asked for their authority. There was no authority, and this legislation is the outcome. I say that we should forget the past and deal with the future. What kind of regulation has the minister in mind with regard to inspection? These skins should be inspected by some one readily accessible to the Indians. The skins ought not to be sent to Vancouver or Victoria, as at present. They ought not to be inspected by customs officers who may not know whether they are seal or lion skins; they should be inspected by some officer of the department having knowledge of fishing, by somebody who knows something about it, and if possible always the same officer in the same district. It is a comparatively small district, and a couple of customs officers might do the work, but fisheries inspectors would be much better. They are capable men and maintain a continuity of policy, so to speak, and they would come to know by practical experience whether a skin was illegally shot. It is quite simple for anyone to break the law by coming along in a canoe and taking a 32 rifle and shooting, and the temptation would be to shoot the seal, and then poke a spear through the hole made by the shot. Now it is alleged they go and shoot them with shotguns. But I doubt that. The Indian is not a fool. He may be a lawbreaker. But every time you use buckshot it makes the skin less valuable; the Indian would be penalized when he sold it, and it would be obvious on a cursory inspection that the seal had been shot. I cannot believe the Indian would do that.

But these men say: Yes, here are these skins with shot-holes in them, and therefore the seals must have been shot. That is what the case turns on that is now before the exchequer court. There may be buckshot holes in them, but that does not prove that they were illegally shot. I was in the butchering business at one time, and I have killed cows that had a lot of small shot-holes in their skins because some indignant gardener had fired at them. It is a well known fact that the white fishermen who go out trolling for salmon get so mad pulling up their lines and finding nothing but heads on them that they take a shotgun and fire at a seal if they see one, not to kill it, but to scare it away, to keep it clear of their lines. It is quite possible that some of these skins might have been shot in that way, and later on have been speared legitimately. Therefore I say this legislation should be administered by somebody who knows these things. It does not follow, because there is a buckshot hole in the skin, that therefore the poor Indian is responsible. I have seen hides of cattle with holes in them as big as your thumb due to an insect called a warble that makes a hole like a bullet hole. Is the minister going to arrange for some practical men, some persons easily accessible to the Indian, to do the inspecting, and will there be some method of marking the skins so that if an offence has been committed you can get back to the real sinner?

The exchequer court case is that of a storekeeper who bought the skins and paid cash for them to the Indian, and as you never can get cash back from an Indian, the storekeeper is now confronted with the loss of the skins. You cannot say whether the skins were shot illegally or not. The department should have said that in future the purchaser must be more careful, and the department then have legislation such as this passed. Is it the intention to proceed along these lines that I have been suggesting?

Mr. MICHAUD: Certainly. The object of this legislation is to remedy the situation which has just been described by my hon. friend and to obviate the difficulties which have arisen in the past year. The regulations which it is proposed to make under this legislation will meet the situation described by my hon. friend.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Use of Canadian ports for equipping vessels for pelagic sealing prohibited.

Mr. MICHAUD: There is an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to add after the word "fine" in line 8 of the section the words "not exceeding two thousand dollars."

Mr. RINFRET: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. NEILL: A pretty steep fine for an ordinary offence. After all, it is not murder.

Mr. MICHAUD: It says "not exceeding," and it may be only one dollar.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Importation or possession prohibited.

Mr. NEILL: There is a word misspelled in line 37 on page 3 of the bill.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, the word "otherwise." That will be corrected.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Pelagic sealing by Indians.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to renew the appeal I made a short time ago. Why not put the Indian on the same footing as the large vessel owner? You cannot seize the big man's vessel without going to the exchequer court. Why not insert the same provision in section 8 as regards the Indian, and have the same process of law? It is against common sense—I do not know about law—for the reasons I have already given that it should be possible for a fisheries official, a man without any legal training whatsoever, to confiscate a boat, and then afterwards it may be discovered that the man was innocent of the crime for which the boat was seized and confiscated. Those are the words used at the top of page 4. The boats may be seized by any officer and shall be forfeited to his majesty. I suggest that the Minister of Justice should have inserted a provision that the case should go to some competent court.

Mr. MICHAUD: My hon. friend should take cognizance of the difference in the size of the penalty for those prosecuted under the provisions of section 6. Section 6 reads:

If any person (other than an Indian or other aborigine in respect of the exercise of the privilege reserved by article 4 of the convention) uses any port within Canada for the purpose of equipping any vessel intended to be operated or used for any purpose whatsoever connected with the operations of pelagic sealing—

And so forth. That would be persons who were operating a large vessel. It would be valuable property which we would not allow an ordinary officer to seize and forfeit to his majesty without process of law. But section 8 deals with the Indian who generally operates in a canoe.

Mr. NEILL: No; you would not be seizing it if it were a canoe.

Mr. MICHAUD: In a canoe or other vessel. It is generally a small craft that the Indians use for this work because they know they are violating the law and they try to conceal their method of operation as much as possible. The value of the property is not such that we should place the offender in the position of having to defend forfeiture proceedings, incurring a large amount of costs, and the same with respect to the department in prosecuting.

Mr. NEILL: I would not insist on the case going to the exchequer court because that is an expensive proceeding, but it should go to any superior court such as the county court. I wonder where our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and communistic friends are to-day. They would have just heard a pronouncement that will ring throughout Canada, that if a large vessel is seized the case must go to the exchequer court, but if it is only a small vessel, worth only $1,000 or so, owned by an Indian, it can be confiscated on sight. That is a terrible position to put this parliament in. My protest is registered against that proceeding. What I have said cannot be gainsaid.

Mr. STEVENS: I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. This is a serious matter to an Indian or one operating a small vessel. The vessel is likely to be of some value, in fact a very great value to the Indian; it will be one that can go to sea and will probably be equipped with a gas engine; probably it will represent almost the entire possessions of the Indian. May I suggest to the minister—and I should like the Minister of Justice to listen to this suggestion—that at the end of clause 8, instead of saying—

. . . may be seized by any officer authorized under the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act to board and search, and shall be forfeited to His Majesty.

—words should be used somewhat to this effect:

. . . shall be held pending the decision of a court in the matter.

The Minister of Justice could easily frame something of this kind. The idea is to give the seizing officer only the right to hold the vessel in order to hold the man. I quite understand that if an Indian, having been arrested for this offence, were allowed to go with his boat, it might be difficult to find him again, but the vessel could be held pending the determination of his guilt. It will be noted that in section 11 penalties are provided for violations of the act, so that there is no need to insert in this clause an added penalty against the Indian by the seizure of his vessel. I agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that it is more serious to an Indian to lose his vessel than it would be to a group of individuals in the form of a company who have equipped a vessel for such a purpose. I know how this all arises. In days gone by—and I remember it very well, thirty-five or forty years ago—it was one of the glorious practices of seafaring folk on the Pacific coast to equip vessels, as dozens of them did in Victoria and some at Vancouver and other places, and go out poaching and killing seals. It was a real thrill to the men who operated those vessels. I knew some of them well. One whom I knew personally very well indeed was the "Sea Wolf," and one could not help but admire the spectacular type of individual he was, but he was utterly unscrupulous so far as poaching seals was concerned. A law that provides against the equipping of vessels under such circumstances is quite right; but where an Indian goes out and is tempted to kill a few seals, although I am not condoning the offence, to take from him his whole livelihood on the say-so of an officer authorized under the Customs or Fisheries Protection Act is giving to that individual a power and a right which I do not think should be given to any individual. So I suggest to the minister that the words as printed be struck out and that there be substituted the power to detain or hold the vessel.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes; I agree—

Mr. BENNETT: I think there will be found in the Nadan case a somewhat similar provision. A confiscation is a judicial act. In the Nadan case liquor was being carried in an automobile from British Columbia into Alberta and across to Montana, and the statute contained a provision that the magistrate should have authority or jurisdiction to declare the automobile and the contents forfeited to the crown. All that is necessary in this case is to clothe the stipendiary magistrate, or the judge of the county court if there is one resident nearby, with the same authority as the provincial act clothed the magistrate within the Nadan case. In that case confiscation was held to be within the powers of the magistrate in view of the provisions of the statute. All that it is necessary to do is to provide that it shall be the result of a judicial hearing and not an arbitrary exercise of judgment by an individual.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Possibly the words could be inserted which are used at the end of section 9:

. . . shall be liable to forfeiture to His Majesty.

Mr. BENNETT: And then say how.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Instead of saying "shall be forfeited." And then say how,—yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the clause would have to be recast to provide the name of the judicial officer who would exercise the judicial power of determining the forfeiture.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This confiscation or forfeiture should be a judicial act and not an arbitrary discretion exercised by an officer. That is the general principle which underlies these decisions.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes. The proceedings against violators of section 8 will be generally summary proceedings. If the committee will allow this section to stand, I shall try to have it recast so that it may include this provision, making the boat or vessel liable to forfeiture by the tribunal before which the person will be tried.

Mr. BENNETT: And name the tribunal.

Mr. MICHAUD: And name the tribunal.

Mr. STEVENS: I think this requires a little more thought. If the clause is merely revised in the way the minister suggests I fear the court will conclude that if a man is guilty this forfeiture must follow. It should be made clear that forfeiture should follow only in a very flagrant case. The fact that a man shoots a seal is not cause enough to forfeit the means of his livelihood. That point should be safeguarded. Let me give an illustration which I think is in point although it is not in regard to pelagic sealing. Two men, father and son, owned a gas boat on the Pacific coast with which they earned their livelihood by doing a little work along the coast. A fellow borrowed the boat and "ran" some liquor. This happened a few years ago when that practice was being indulged in. The customs officers seized and sold the boat; the owners, although entirely innocent of any offence, lost their means of livelihood. My point is that before taking a boat away from a poor man we should be convinced that the offence warrants so extreme a penalty. I suggest that the minister pause over the dinner hour and consider some provision which will fit the case.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, April 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company—Mr. Damude—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 8—Power to construct bridge.

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not propose to say anything further at length in connection with this bill, but there are one or two points to which I wish to make brief references. I refer to page 2176 of Hansard of April 8, where a reference was made by me to an item which appeared in the Niagara Falls paper, and which I called to the attention of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Damude). I read the item and asked the hon. member whether the statement was correct. The article said that I had made some protest against the expenditure of $90,-050 to build the river road and that I was the only member who objected to this. I should like to ask the hon. member whether that statement was correct, or if he has made inquiry, as I asked that he would.

Mr. DAMUDE: I did not make that statement. Of course I have no jurisdiction over other people who may have made such a statement. I had no knowledge that this matter was brought before the city council, and did not make the statement.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then the statement is not correct? I did not oppose any resolution of yours for $90,050?

Mr. DAMUDE: As far as I am concerned it is not correct.

Mr. LOCKHART: I thank you. I do not intend to bring down another thirty or forty letters which I have received since the Easter recess, as it is not my intention to take up the time of the committee, but I want to verify a statement I made in connection with the taxpayers' claims. There was an assurance given to the taxpayers of Niagara Falls I believe by one of the members of the Niagara Falls hydro commission, saying that the taxpayers were protected. Might I ask the hon. member for Welland if any further assurance has been given the taxpayers of Niagara Falls since the discussion before the Easter recess? I am still receiving letters asking that something be done in that connection.

Mr. DAMUDE: As I pointed out on a former occasion—and I think the statement is correct—this bill makes no provision for taxation, which is under the control of the provincial legislature and the municipal authorities of Niagara Falls. I have made no further statement, and if any member of the Ontario hydro commission has made any further statement it is not within my knowledge.

Mr. LOCKHART: I appreciate that very much, because there seems to be an impression, as I gather from the inquiries brought to my attention, that they are expecting some assurance of some kind. The taxpayers are still concerned about that point.

Another point to which I want to refer is in connection with numerous inquiries I have received from taxpayers relative to a meeting that was to be held on March 26, a few days after the bill was passed in the special committee of this house. There still appears to be a feeling among those who have communicated with me that that meeting should have been held. It was to have been a joint meeting of the chamber of commerce, the Niagara parks commission, the city council, representatives of the International Railway Company, the Hon. Mr. Houck and the hon. member for Welland, to discuss the question of arrangements acceptable to the ratepayers of Niagara Falls. I have not had opportunity of making any definite inquiries; I am going only by the letters I have received asking about that meeting. I would ask the hon. member for Welland whether that meeting has been held or if any arrangements have been made or are intended to be made for the holding of that meeting.

Mr. DAMUDE: I seem to be under cross-examination to-night. I have never refused to meet any body of citizens of the city of Niagara Falls, and if there has been any cancellation of any meeting it has not been my fault. If the meeting has been deferred, this has been done by other people or organizations, not through any fault of mine.

Mr. LOCKHART: I appreciate that assurance. I do not want the hon. member to feel that I am making this a personal matter with him; but I am trying to get information, as there are fifteen or twenty of these letters from citizens of Niagara Falls, to which I still have to reply. I do not feel that the hon. member for Welland is responsible in any way; nevertheless he sponsored this bill and so I suppose I have to look to him for information. I am definitely assured that if some protection such as I have suggested could be given, protection similar to what was given in connection with the Buffalo-Fort Erie bridge, or such as was set forth in the resolution sent to the Prime Minister of Canada in connection with that bridge, I think the people of Niagara Falls would be only too happy. There is no question that they need a bridge, with the tourist season coming on; but they do resent the fact that a bill was presented in this house providing for an expenditure of $7,500,000 and that by a stroke of the pen we were able to take off $3,500,000 at the start; they are wondering whether it would not be possible to reduce it to the amount in the bill brought into the New York state assembly, which was $3,000,000. They are continually asking me these pertinent questions. I assure the hon. member for Welland that I appreciate his frank admission absolving me from any intention of trying to stop anything he may want to do in the house. Now I shall make it my business to check up with the members of the Niagara Falls council.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman. Any remarks I have made have been on behalf of the taxpayers of Niagara Falls, who have gone through a very serious period of stress and strain, even to the extent of having to appoint a city manager. That, of course, is no disgrace. Many cities in the Dominion of Canada and the province of Ontario went through the same difficult situation. But I agree with the ratepayers of Niagara Falls that the way the bill was handled in this house, the way it was promoted and the way it was lobbied and subsequently cut nearly in half, were enough to make the taxpayers of Niagara Falls feel a little suspicious, and they appealed to a source from which they thought they might get some information.

Mr. LENNARD: Earlier in the debate the hon. member for Welland stated that he had been assured that there would be no loss of taxation to the citizens of Niagara Falls through the passing of this bill. Would the hon. member state where he got his assurance and what that assurance was?

Mr. DAMUDE: My assurance, of course, was that the province of Ontario setting up an authority, in conjunction with a like authority in the state of New York, would permit taxation in connection with the bridge by the municipalities of Niagara Falls, New York, and Niagara Falls, Canada.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, since this house has had to consider this measure the members of this committee have been attacked from outside this house. It has been charged that we have been derelict to our duty in connection with this legislation. No self-respecting member of this house can allow any such statement to be made without resenting it. Therefore I made it my business during the holiday to study this measure and give it such attention as my capacity permitted, and I propose to oppose it and to give my reasons for doing so very carefully and very fully. I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, that the House of Commons shall be overawed or threatened by any person, whoever he may be or however high may be his position, with respect to legislation pending in the house. It is a pretty day indeed when members of this house can be charged—as we have been— with having lost to the province of Ontario large sums of money per day, because members saw fit to examine into the legislation which was submitted for our consideration.

It might be well to deal with the matter very frankly and fully so that there may be upon the records of the house a permanent memorial as to what has transpired. When this bill was first promoted, according to the advertisements in the Gazette and in the local newspapers, the international railway bridge was in existence. I have heard that bridge referred to in this house as the "honeymoon" bridge, but in fact it was a bridge built by an international corporation under authority of the appropriate bodies, namely the parliament of Canada and the United States of America. In January last that bridge was destroyed by an act of God, and those who were the proprietors of it have the right to reconstruct the bridge. They are preparing their plans and hope to have the bridge completed by the end of 1939.

Mr. GRAY: Have they the right to construct it without coming to this house?

Mr. BENNETT: They are advised that they have that right, and I am advised that the hon. gentleman as a lawyer must know that.

Mr. GRAY: It is debatable.

Mr. BENNETT: In the opinion of some eminent counsel it is not even debatable. I do not express any opinion myself, for it is not necessary that I should. I am only saying that my investigations have satisfied me that steps are being taken to reconstruct that bridge; that plans have actually been prepared to a considerable extent, and that it is expected that the structure will be completed by 1939. Right here may I point out that the other evening the hon. member for Peterborough West in this very chamber asked the members of the committee to believe that the United States authorities had given their approval to the construction of this bridge. Not only is that not true, but the bill was rejected, and the governor of the state is reported as having said that he will never sign that bill as long as this international company have their vested rights unprotected. Then why should we pass a bill?

Mr. McLARTY: Did not the hon. member for Peterborough West state during the debate that he had a copy of the bill which was proposed in the state of New York?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall read what he said, which appears at page 2173 of Hansard:

Mr. Duffus: This is the fifth occasion on which this matter has come before the committee. I have in my hand a copy of Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company, and also a draft copy of the United States act dealing with the same matter. I wish to refer to the discussion which has taken place on the bill, and it is not my purpose to take up the time of the committee talking about the people of the United States or Canada.

Mr. Bennett: Did the hon. gentleman say that there was a United States act? My information was that they declined to pass it.

Mr. Duffus: I said I have a copy of it.

Mr. Bennett: That is the one which was introduced, but it was not passed.

Mr. Duffus: May I say I have listened to the discussion of this important international matter, and to say the least I am amazed to note that the objections have emanated almost entirely from one group in the house.

Mr. McLARTY: Is not my right hon. friend drawing an inference?

Mr. BENNETT: That statement was calculated to do just one thing and nothing else—to leave the impression with the house that the United States had agreed. When I asked the hon. gentleman if he did not know that the bill had not been passed, what did he do? Is he here? Let him answer.

Mr. McLARTY: May I suggest to my right hon. friend that the difference between a bill and an act might not be completely clear to a lay member of the house. My right hon. friend is drawing an inference that I question very much.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not drawing an inference at all; I am only saying that the speech speaks for itself. It should be made known at once to the house that the United States, as represented by the state of New York, has declined to proceed with legislation similar to that before us; that the governor gave a reason, and that the reason was that the vested rights of another company should not be disregarded, they being now in the process of converting those rights into a new bridge. Whether or not this may eventuate I cannot say; but one thing is perfectly obvious and it is this: This country should not be incorporating a company to construct a bridge when the country with which it must connect has declined to do so, for we would have but a structure hanging in the air. Then why the hurry? Why are we doing this?

Let us take the second point. It is alleged that the province of Ontario is behind this measure. If that is so, why did the responsible ministers not become the incorporators? The other night the Minister of Transport said there was some difficulty about a province doing this. Of course there is; but there is no reason why the responsible ministers should not do it, as persona designata, as minister of public works, treasurer and minister of highways, etc. They could obtain incorporation for the purpose of enabling the province to deal with the situation.

Let us go a step further. I wonder if the government—I heard the Minister of Transport speak the other night—has ventured to read the bill that was sought to be put through this house. I do not believe the province of Ontario is so lost to public shame as to endeavour to put through this parliament Bill No. 15 as it was originally offered to the house. I cannot think any government would try to do it. I wonder how many members have read that bill, which was offered to this house, in the terms in which it appeared. Here are a number of gentlemen being incorporated to do what?—to construct a toll bridge across the Niagara river, an international stream, and the works are declared to be works for the general benefit of Canada. That divests the provincial legislature of all control. That is not my say-so. That is the decision of the courts.

In their original bill they say, in section 2, that "the works and undertakings of the company are hereby declared to be for the general advantage of Canada." That certainly places some obligation on the government of this country, because a declaration that a given enterprise is a work for the general advantage of Canada is something with respect to which the government of the day usually exercises its control.

It has not been usual in this country for a private member in a private measure to declare that a work to be constructed is for the general benefit of Canada. There are instances, of course, in which this has been done.

Mr. GRAY: It has been so declared in all international bridge bills.

Mr. BENNETT: That was done by act of parliament.

Mr. GRAY: And introduced by private members.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, certainly. Governments do not usually introduce this type of private legislation. But it is usual for the government in some way to intimate its view as to whether or not a given enterprise should be declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

I assume from what was said the other evening by the Minister of Transport that he does regard it as a proper exercise of that power, and that therefore the government is agreeable to this bridge being declared to be a work for the general benefit of Canada. But, Mr. Chairman, just let us look at what the original bill says. It is said the province of Ontario is promoting this; remember that. This is what they are promoting, under section 4:

> The capital stock of the company shall be five hundred thousand dollars of common stock divided into shares of one hundred dollars each and may be called up by the directors from time to time as they deem necessary.

Just turn over the page and look at the powers given. The amazing thing is that under section 13 they are given power to issue that stock—in payment for what? Let us look at it. Where are my friends who have cried aloud about watered securities? Where are my friends who have talked about the iniquity of these enterprises being created with stock handed out to promoters? Let us look at section 13:

> 13. Subject to the provisions of the Companies Act, the directors may issue as paid-up stock shares of the capital stock of the company in payment of any business, franchises, undertakings, rights, powers, privileges, letters patent, inventions, real estate, stocks, assets and other properties which the company may lawfully acquire, and may for such considerations allot and hand over such shares to any person or corporation or its shareholders or directors; and any such issue or allotment of stock shall be binding upon the company and such stock shall not be assessable for calls, nor shall the holder thereof be liable in any way thereon; or the company may pay therefor wholly or partly in paid-up shares or wholly, or partly in bonds and debentures or as may be agreed upon.

If we take those two sections together, I just ask this committee whether or not they think the province of Ontario would put itself behind that legislation? Take those two sections and read them; see what they mean and, knowing what we do about company practice, as it is reported in the courts of the country, and in the cases, just ask that simple question.

We leave that; for when the bill went to the railway committee, it was not prepared to adopt that view, and they reduced the capital stock to $500, or five shares of $100 each. Under ordinary circumstances any promoters who came to this parliament with a proposal asking for the issue of $500,000 worth of capital stock for the company, and providing for its disposition in the manner indicated by section 13, and who went before the committee and agreed to reduce that to $500, would not get very far; for it is the same promoters.

The provision as to its being work for the general advantage of Canada still prevails under section 2 of the bill which came from the committee. So I find myself, as a member of the House of Commons who is being attacked because I ventured to say half a dozen words about this matter, now asked to give my approval to legislation incorporating an enterprise which the United States government, as represented by the state of New York, has declined to sanction, approve or recognize; I am asked now, in advance of any such action being taken, to approve this incorporation with a capital of $500. Either one of two things must be apparent to every thoughtful member of the committee. Either the $500,000 was intended as a steal, or the $500 does not represent anything. Which is it?

All I can say is this, that the bill as originally introduced in the house is just the kind of measure that has been introduced by every promoter who is getting a franchise to sell.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not what we are discussing now.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I am discussing, if the minister will permit me to say so.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not what the committee is discussing.

Mr. BENNETT: I am discussing that for the moment and within my rights. The hon. member may think he may associate himself with one who attacked this house from outside. But I am going to deal with this measure under the sections with which we are dealing, and shall point out why we should not approve this section, because of the endeavour on the part of promoters to foist this scheme upon parliament and, when they fail, to offer us a new scheme, cutting the capital of the company to $500, to build an international bridge.

Mr. GRAY: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question? I hesitate to interrupt; but is he aware that the promoters also agreed and filed with the committee an agreement by which they agreed to transfer all their assets to the Niagara parks commission for the sum of one dollar, and therefore stepped completely out of the picture?

Mr. BENNETT: That, if it had any validity, would be in the bill. It is not binding upon anyone; it is just the old promoters' trick. What is more, the books are full of the very same cases, the very same thing. Let it be written in the bill; that is the place where it should be written. If this is, in reality, what it is said to be, why did the commission not apply for the bill?

Mr. YOUNG: Apparently they have not the right to.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I pointed out that it is not in any sense derogatory to the dignity of the minister of public works or the minister of highways, or whoever it may be, of Ontario, to apply for a charter for something the province of Ontario wants.

Mr. YOUNG: May I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that was the point upon which I, too, felt somewhat keenly. The committee, on my suggestion, asked the deputy minister of justice for a ruling, and we have his opinion in writing stating that that could not be done; otherwise that would have been in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: What could not be done?

Mr. YOUNG: That either the government of Ontario or the Niagara parks commission, acting for the government of Ontario could not be named in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Who gave that opinion?

Mr. YOUNG: The deputy minister of justice.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it in writing?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to see it; for, high as my opinion is for the deputy minister of justice, I know he never gave an opinion that individuals who constituted a government, to the number of three, could not apply for a charter, if the province of Ontario wanted it. They do it. As I say, the minister of public works, the minister of highways, whoever it may be, three of them, might apply for an act. That is all there is about it. There could not be any question about that. I should like to see that opinion and I would thank the minister for it. If that is the sort of opinion we are getting on other matters; if those opinions are no more accurate than that, then I feel rather sick for this country.

Let us go on to the next point. The next thing that appears in this legislation is that this is to be a toll bridge. Therefore the item of cost becomes a primary consideration to everybody concerned. The representations that have been made as to cost make it difficult to understand just what is meant. I confess that I do not. This may be due to my lack of understanding, but all one has to do is to look at the original bill and then at the redrafted bill to find out what the difficulty is. Section 12 of the original bill deals with the issue of securities and reads:

1. The company may issue bonds, debentures or other securities in aid of the construction herein mentioned, to an amount not exceeding seven million dollars.

2. For the purpose of securing the issue of such bonds the company may execute a mortgage or mortgages,—

They may mortgage their properties and it is specifically provided that the tolls may be mortgaged. What does that mean? We are asked on behalf of the province of Ontario to authorize the formation of a company that cannot build beyond the middle of the stream and give that company power to issue $7,000,000 worth of securities. Bear in mind what I have pointed out as to section 13 and as to the giving away of the franchise and the granting of powers for the issuing of paid-up shares to the extent, if needs be, of $500,000. Then take your mortgage and bonds that may be issued to the extent of $7,000,000 on a toll bridge and compare the result with the provisions we have in the revised bill. What have we there? Section 12 stipulates that the amount shall not exceed $4,000,000.

I remember the golden days when they used to promote legislation of this kind in the old houses of parliament. Here we have a company coming to us at the instance of the province of Ontario, first with a capital of $500,000 which is reduced to $500, which company it is suggested at first shall be authorized to issue securities to the amount of $7,000,000, which amount is subsequently reduced to $4,000,000. What do hon. members think of that?

We come now to the next point. The power granted in the original bill is the power to build a bridge across an international stream. I asked the Minister of Justice whether we could confer any such power by this parliament. I raised that issue, but I said I was not going to bother about it. The hon. member for Lambton West said that is what we did in another case.

Mr. DUNNING: In many cases.

Mr. BENNETT: In several cases. The fact that we were wrong does not make it right in this instance.

Mr. DUNNING: The bridges are there.

Mr. BENNETT: That is so; they are there under an amalgamated company. They are there because the states concerned have granted the power to land the bridge. In this case the state concerned has refused to do this.

Mr. DUNNING: Refused?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, refused to do it. The other night the hon. member for Peterborough West read the bill. I said then that I believed what I subsequently took the trouble to ascertain. Senator Lee, who is one of the senators in a nearby community, said that there was no reason why this information should not be used publicly. The governor of the state has said that he will not agree to this bill with vested rights thus being destroyed.

Let us see what we are trying to do. In the original bill the company is being authorized to construct, maintain and operate a bridge across the Niagara river for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, carriages, electric cars, street cars and other like purposes, with all necessary approaches, roads and works, from a point described in the city of Niagara Falls, in the county of Welland, in the province of Ontario, to a point in the city of Niagara Falls in the state of New York, one of the United States of America, and to purchase, acquire and hold such real estate as may be necessary for such bridge. Here is the important language in the section:

> . . . but the company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge nor exercise any of the powers hereunder, until an act of congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States of America has been passed authorizing or approving such bridging of the said river, but the company may, in the meantime acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council and do all things authorized by this act.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Would any sane man suggest that he would do that in connection with his business? I just put that to this committee. Just think what we are being asked to do as legislators, as members of this committee. I am saying to the committee that although the province of Ontario, to use their own words, may not construct this bridge or any part of it until such time as the state of New York or the United States of America give authority to do so, nevertheless they may go ahead in the meantime with real estate speculation. I ask, would anybody do that?

The international company has its approaches at both ends of its proposed bridge. I have taken the trouble to ascertain the value of these properties and I have been told, not by the company itself, that they are worth $500,000. I have the further information that the engineer has estimated the cost of spanning that river to join up the two properties of the international company to be $1,400,000. I believe the Minister of Transport will agree that Colonel Monsarrat is the most eminent of the steel engineers we have in the country. That is his estimate and those are the plans he is now preparing. Yet we are being asked as legislators to say, in the face of the attitude taken by the governor of the state of New York, while you cannot commence to build a bridge until New York agrees, even though New York has refused already, nevertheless you can go ahead and have a real estate boom. That is what they are doing. More than that, they are to be given authority to issue securities to the face value of $4,000,000 on the bridge. Does that mean the Canadian part of the bridge or the whole bridge? Does that mean half of the bridge or all of the bridge?

An hon. MEMBER: The whole of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not quite sure of that, although I assume it would be the whole bridge. But a bridge can be built for $1,400,000, according to the estimate of Colonel Monsarrat. What is more, this company already has property valued at half a million dollars, according to the estimate I received. I am very careful to say that I know nothing of this personally, but the two items make an expenditure of roughly $2,000,000. Yet in this instance we are being asked to give our sanction to the issuing of securities to the extent of $4,000,000, the original bill asking for authorization to the extent of $7,000,000 That is the position.

Section 8 in the new bill is somewhat similar to the same section in the old. The new section reads:

. . . but the company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge nor exercise any of the powers hereunder, until an act of congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States of America has been passed authorizing or approving such bridging of the said river, but the company may, in the meantime acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council and do all things authorized by this act.

What does that mean? Listen to these words. It states that the company shall not exercise any of the powers hereunder, but that they may in the meantime buy lands, submit plans and do all things authorized by this act. What does that mean? There is a prohibition in one line and authority is given in another line to do everything. Why? I do not know. There is only one explanation that is feasible, only one explanation that has been suggested. Knowing as they do that they cannot build a bridge beyond the medial line of the river, the only thing left to do is to create a real estate boom. Why? Because when this matter was considered on another occasion I recall that it was pointed out very clearly—my hon. friend the surveyor (Mr. Fafard) smiles—that under the old International there had grown up certain well-defined rights. People had built homes; the traffic had been diverted in a certain way. But now, before we have the right to build a bridge at all, with that prohibition against our doing anything about it, we are going to authorize them to buy all the real estate they want and to place their plans before the governor in council, and notwithstanding the prohibition, "to do all things authorized by this act." What does that mean? If that is not a plain contradiction in terms, I cannot understand what a contradiction is. On the one hand you have the condition that nothing shall be done until the United States has granted authority, and on the other side what? The permission to do all things authorized by this act. Surely, Mr. Chairman, we have not reached that stage.

It is all right to say that you must read the two together, and I tried to do that. When you read them together as a whole, what have you? You cannot do anything until the act of the United States authority permits you to land the bridge over there. That is No. 1. But before that is done—and that permission has already been refused—they can in the meantime acquire the lands, submit plans to the governor in council, and do all things authorized by this act. That only proves one thing, and that is that the authority to build the bridge is improperly given. It must be to build a bridge to the centre of the stream, and to that point only, because obviously the governor in council cannot be given approval to what has not any substance in law. What plans are they going to approve? They cannot approve plans for constructing beyond the middle of the stream. How could they? In the meantime the only plans they could submit would be plans to the centre of the stream, because otherwise they would be dealing with plans of the United States of America, over which it is admitted they now have no power.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): May I ask a question? This is not a new principle. In the Civil Practice Act of the state of New York, section 76, subsections 1222-23-24 and so forth, the attorney general of New York is permitted to go into a foreign country and sue there for the state of New York when some money has been hidden in that foreign country. Surely the attorney general cannot come into this country and sue if there is not any provision here in Canada that allows him to do it. This bill incorporates a company that will have the right to go ahead with its plans subject to the laws of another country. That is all it is.

Mr. BENNETT: I followed my learned and hon. friend with great ease; but he has overlooked one thing and that is this, that we have no jurisdiction to confer power to construct a bridge beyond the centre of the stream.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have the capacity to organize a company that may ask for that power from the United States, and that is all we are doing.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but that is after you get the consent of the state of New York.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have to organize the company first.

Mr. McLARTY: May I ask my right hon. friend a question? Before the company can take any step at all, does it not have to be clothed with the capacity to accept the right which extraterritorial jurisdiction may give it?

Mr. BENNETT: I answered that very proper question of my learned and hon. friend the other evening in the affirmative, and I would not be averse to answering it now. Capacity is one thing, and power is another. Capacity to hold a share does not necessarily imply that you must exercise the power to do what the company has the right to do

Mr. McLARTY: But does not capacity precede the right?

Mr. BENNETT: In this case what is happening is just the opposite. This is conferring power to build a bridge.

Mr. McLARTY: It is capacity.

Mr. BENNETT: No, power. It says:

The company may construct, maintain and operate a bridge—

That is not capacity; that is incapacity.

—across the Niagara river for the passage of pedestrians—

Now, mark you, this is a case not of capacity to hold something but of capacity to construct and operate a bridge:

—for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles—

And so forth, and it states between what points, between a point in Canada and a point in the United States. That means the crossing of the river; we cannot give power in this parliament to operate a bridge across an international stream, and that the hon. gentleman knows far better than I. We cannot confer the power to operate the bridge.

Mr. McLARTY: Quite true; but the capacity, as my right hon. friend will agree, is something we can give to the corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not what you are doing. I said the other evening that I was not going to take up the time of the house on this matter, and until the committee was attacked I had no intention of doing so. But I am a free member of this parliament now, and I am going to do it. I am glad that my learned and hon. friend has directed attention to that distinction, and if he will put that distinction into section 8 then one of the difficulties will disappear. But at the moment what he has done is to clothe the corporation with power to construct and operate a bridge across an international river into territory foreign to Canada.

Mr. McLARTY: Subject to the power being given by the appropriate United States authorities.

Mr. BENNETT: But there cannot be a conferring of power by this parliament to operate in a foreign country.

Mr. McLARTY: The capacity.

Mr. BENNETT: Capacity to hold is one thing; power to operate is another. This is the power to operate, and that power we cannot confer even though it is conditional upon the granting of power elsewhere, because there must be a conferring of the power to operate by the foreign company, and then the two amalgamate for the purpose of having the company operate as a whole. That is the story; but that is not what this says.

I want to ask, in view of those facts, why it provided that they may acquire real estate. Why? Suppose New York never gives its permission? Should they be permitted to buy real estate for a company that cannot lawfully be organized, because the basis of its organization was to operate a bridge, which it cannot do over international waters. Should we as legislators give this authorization to the province of Ontario by another name? They changed the designation of their legislators the other day from M.L.A.'s to M.P.P.'s, and with respect to this matter the province of Ontario has now become Welby, Young, Scott, Kaumeyer and Farrell? That is the name of the province of Ontario with respect to this bridge. I ask my learned and hon. friend just where we are at in this matter. Can we authorize the province of Ontario, under this name, to proceed with a work for the general benefit of Canada? Mark you, the province has no longer any jurisdiction over this. It is ours now; it is a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. McLARTY: In the matter of taxation, the municipality and the province retain the right to tax even if it were for the general benefit of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my learned and hon. friend knows that question can obtain only one answer. The power to tax and the power to operate are not the same thing. The power to tax is a municipal power. The power to operate this bridge over international waters is a power that this parliament only can grant; and when the work is declared to be for the general benefit of Canada, you divest the provincial legislators of their jurisdiction with respect to operation and matters of that kind and the necessary powers are vested in this parliament only.

Let us go to the next point. I said that this was a toll bridge. I said that the International were now constructing a bridge. Their plans are being prepared; they propose to go forward with their undertaking, which also is a work for the general advantage of Canada, and they are advised by the authorities in New York that they may proceed there. I shall read at the proper time what Senator Lee says the statement of the governor was when the measure came before him. This proposed company now contemplates buying real estate and preparing plans of a bridge. May I ask my hon. friend, What bridge? A bridge across the Niagara or a bridge half way across? Where do they get the power to prepare plans beyond the medial line?

Mr. McLARTY: The capacity to prepare.

Mr. BENNETT: The capacity? Their digestive powers must be sadly tested. Now my learned and hon. friend is in rather deep water. "Capacity" is not going to help him out of that. What plans are they? Of what bridge?

Mr. HOWE: If I may interrupt for a moment I would say, as an experienced preparer of plans, you can prepare plans for any bridge, anywhere, without an act of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: I have heard of the Minister of Transport preparing plans. Sometimes they were not any too good either. He says he can prepare plans. Certainly he can; and all his plans do not become works.

Mr. HOWE: That is quite right. But you can prepare plans.

Mr. BENNETT: And sometimes plans are not just what we expect them to be. The hon. gentleman, as an experienced man, knows that is so. If any ocular demonstration is required, perhaps the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) can give evidence on that point.

Let us go a step further.

Mr. DUNNING: Some lawyers lose lawsuits, too.

Mr. STEWART: That is the fault of the client, though.

Mr. BENNETT: I have lost lawsuits because my appreciation of the law was erroneous. I have also lost cases because the witnesses told one story in court and another to me. And sometimes, when I listen to stories about these bridges, I think those who tell them must all be witnesses. But I ask my learned and hon. friend to look at this point:

> The company may in the meantime acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council and do all things authorized by this act.

Notwithstanding the fact that they cannot do anything until New York or the United States agrees. What does that mean?

Mr. McLARTY: It is purely an empowering section, I would say to the right hon. gentleman; empowering, as the whole act is, creating a corporation with powers, but not directing what they may or may not do, except as to capacity, not as to power.

Mr. BENNETT: Well then, the provision that they may do these things which they are forbidden to do is merely one of those juxtapositions of words that sometimes arise in a section; is that it? The last part of it should not be there at all. But I put the question to clear up the point upon which I want to be quite clear: What plans are to be submitted? What plans does the Minister of Transport consider? When the plan of this bridge comes up, what plan is the minister going to consider?

Mr. FACTOR: Then is there no way of building a bridge across the Niagara river?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the resources of civilization against its enemies are not yet exhausted, to use the language of Gladstone.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, it would never be constructed if we were all to see the difficulties which the right hon. gentleman sees to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: It is an odd thing, is it not, but they have built bridges, and it is very odd that the International is going ahead with its plans to build a bridge?

Mr. FACTOR: Under the same kind of act.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. The learned and hon. gentleman is already qualifying for judicial office. But what I want to know is, Of what bridge is he going to submit the plans? That is what I should like to know, and until that is clear, surely this committee have a right to decline to take further action. They cannot be dragooned into action—one of them, anyway, cannot—by some person outside this parliament. I just want to know what plans are to be submitted.

Mr. HEAPS: The same as with any other bridge.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought so. Five hundred thousand recedes to five hundred and seven millions to four and a giving away of the stock to the promoters. Is that what is meant?

Mr. HEAPS: No; I mean that if plans are to be submitted, they would be submitted in the same way, I assume, as when we have been dealing with other bills before the house.

Mr. BENNETT: That shows again how conversion does not always convert. The attitude of mind of the hon. member some days ago was not just what it is now; but he has suddenly become converted; he has seen a great light; Saul of Tarsus has become Paul the Apostle.

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. gentleman cannot say that to the hon. member!

An hon. MEMBER: He has not the capacity.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Finance reminds me that I should indicate to the learned and hon. member that the hon. member for Winnipeg North has not the capacity to act in that direction, and I take pleasure in conveying that intimation.

We were at the point where the statement was made that the procedure would be "the same as with any other bridge." But this bridge cannot be built or started until such time as the United States give their approval, and they have refused it. Then what bridge plans is it intended to put up? Are they to be of a half bridge or a whole bridge? That is what I want to know.

Mr. DUNNING: Nine o'clock. The clock is striking.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not got fairly under way yet.

Progress reported.

PELAGIC SEALING

PROVISION FOR SANCTIONS FOR VIOLATIONS OF NORTH PACIFIC SEALING CONVENTION

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 98, respecting the North Pacific Pelagic Sealing Convention—Mr. Michaud—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 8—Pelagic sealing by Indians.

Mr. REID: Is the language of this section as clear as it ought to be? It mentions Indians dwelling on the coast; what about Indians from the interior moving out to the coast?

Mr. MICHAUD: Before recess it was suggested that an amendment should be made to this clause. I suggest the following:

That in line 3, page 4, the following words be struck out, "and shall be forfeited to His Majesty," and the following words added: "and may be liable to forfeiture to His Majesty as may seem just by the court of competent jurisdiction in the province in or near which such canoe, vessel, equipment, firearms or fur seal skins was or were seized.

Mr. RINFRET: I so move.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the words "court of competent jurisdiction" are hardly sufficient.

Mr. NEILL: What is a court of competent jurisdiction?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MICHAUD: A county court, a magistrate's court or the exchequer court; any of the courts to which we might resort.

Mr. STEWART: Does that not leave it obscure as to whether an action would have to be brought in a competent court to declare a forfeiture? Would it not be better to provide that on summary conviction before a magistrate the magistrate should have power and authority to declare a forfeiture? As it is now, it is left wide open to controversy whether you must bring an action to have a declaration that a boat is forfeited, or whether it should be part of the proceedings after a conviction or in connection with a prosecution. It seems to me it should be provided that where a charge is laid and conviction made, the same court that makes the conviction should have power and authority to declare a forfeiture.

Mr. MICHAUD: Let the clause stand.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister will find it preferable to make it read, "on summary conviction before a stipendiary magistrate or other competent court," a fine not exceeding so and so. That is the course which has been pursued in similar cases and has been found satisfactory.

Mr. MICHAUD: I was not sure what courts were sitting in those outlying districts of British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: There is always a magistrate.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is intended to make it subject to the jurisdiction of the court which may happen to sit in the district.

Mr. STEWART: I understand that in all parts of Canada there are courts of summary jurisdiction. That would be sufficient.

Section 8 stands.

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Penalty for violation.

Mr. MICHAUD: I have an amendment to clause 11. As it is now, it is not clear. I submit the following:

In the second line, after the word "shall" insert the following: "unless some other penalty is expressly provided therefor in this act."

Mr. RINFRET: I move that amendment.

Mr. NEILL: Does the act provide any other penalty?

Mr. MICHAUD: In sections 6 and 8 penalties are specifically provided.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Does the minister not think the words "made hereunder" should come after the word "regulation"?

Mr. MICHAUD: By the interpretation clause "regulation" means any regulation made by the governor in council under the authority of this act.

Mr. BENNETT: That covers it.

Mr. CAHAN: I think that does cover it, but I wish to call the attention of the minister to this: He has reserved section 8. I suggest that he should also reserve sections 9 and 10, because the same objection can properly be made to them as was made to section 8. If he proposes to submit to his own legal advisers or to the Department of Justice an amendment to section 8, he might also suggest a similar amendment to subsection 2 of section 9 and to subsection 1 of section 10. They were passed so hurriedly that I had no time to make my suggestion. I make it now as section 11 purports to deal with all offences against this act.

Mr. MICHAUD: Sections 9 and 10 are not intended to apply to the same violators as those mentioned in section 8. Section 8 applies only to Indians. The suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill)—

Mr. CAHAN: I was not referring to the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni; I was calling attention to the fact that we slipped over sections 9 and 10, and there was no time to raise the issue which I am raising now. Subsection 2 of section 9 provides that:

> Any person who contravenes the provisions of subsection 1 of this section shall be guilty of an offence against this act—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that these sections have been carried. He may proceed with the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I am content to let it go until third reading; but the sections were slipped over, because if I may say so the Chairman spoke very quietly and his voice did not carry this far, so we did not know that he was dealing with sections 9 and 10.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member please resume his seat for a moment? I simply rose to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the hon. member was out of order. With the unanimous consent of the committee he may revert to sections 9 and 10 if he so desires, but those sections were carried ten minutes ago.

Mr. CAHAN: That may be so; but I submit also, if we wish to be extremely technical, that I am not out of order; that I have a right at any stage of the proceedings to draw the attention of the minister who has charge of the bill to the fact that, in dealing with offences under the act, he might properly reconsider two subsections of sections 9 and 10 which were inadvertently passed without discussion.

Mr. MICHAUD: As far as I am concerned I am quite willing that the hon. member should proceed.

Mr. DUNNING: In order to straighten out the matter I move that we reconsider sections 9 and 10. That will put the whole matter in order.

Motion agreed to.

On sections 9 and 10—Construction subject to governor in council regulations—expropriation.

Mr. CAHAN: On the reconsideration of section 9, subsection 2, I wish to suggest again to the minister that when he considers his amendment to section 8, as he proposes to do, he or his legal advisers should consider also whether a similar amendment is not necessary in the case of section 9, subsection 2, and also in regard to section 10, subsection 1. Whether it is considered now or at a later date is quite immaterial to me, because the rights of a member of this house arise at a later stage of the debate, but I made my remarks out of courtesy and as a suggestion to the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend will see that the language of section 9 is different from the language of section 8, in that the last line of section 9 subsection 2 reads "shall be liable to forfeiture to his majesty," which is quite different from "shall be forfeited to his majesty" in section 8. It is clear that "liable to forfeiture" means that it would have to be declared so by some court, while under section 8 it is forfeited ipso facto. So far as I am concerned I would rather suggest to the minister that he suspend those three sections in order to consider amendments which will meet the wishes of the committee.

Mr. CAHAN: I am merely suggesting—and I am sorry that I even suggested it—that instead of having duplicate actions, the first with regard to liability to fines and the second, subsequently, with regard to forfeiture, it would be well to consider whether both could not be dealt with in the one proceeding. That is all I am suggesting.

Mr. MICHAUD: I quite see the point raised by the hon. member, and inasmuch as we have allowed section 8 to stand for reconsideration we might as well let these two sections stand as well. They can all be considered at the same time, later on.

Sections 9 and 10 stand.

On section 11—Penalty for violation.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 11 has not been carried. An amendment has been moved and carried, but the section as amended was not carried.

Mr. NEILL: Would you please read the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: I have already done so, but I shall read it again. It is in the second line; after the word "shall," the following words are inserted: "Unless some other penalty is expressly provided therefor in this act."

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 12, 13 and 14 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. MICHAUD: There is an amendment to be made to article 13, appearing on page 11 of the bill. In the second paragraph the word "Russian" is to be stricken out and the word "Japanese" substituted therefor. This is a misprint. I am sure this change will please the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. NEILL: I prefer the Russian; thank you.

Mr. RINFRET: I move this amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MICHAUD: Just before the dinner recess the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked me whether the Japanese had fulfilled their obligations under the treaty and had turned over our share of the proceeds of the sales of skins or our share of the skins. At the time I replied that they had done so. I have found since that my reply was correct, and that they have each year given us our share of the skins or our share of the proceeds from the sales.

Schedule as amended agreed to.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHERIES—STATEMENT OF MR. NEILL ON MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): As this is the first day that we are going into committee on the fisheries estimates I should like to make a statement dealing with some points in connection with that industry. Possibly some of them are only local; others are certainly provincial; some of them are national and one matter at least might fairly be called international. I thought perhaps it would be fairer to the minister and the department to make my statement at this time so that he might have an opportunity of looking up these various matters before they come up on the detailed estimates in committee of supply.

The first matter I want to present, and about which I desire to register a mild protest, is the custom that has grown up, not only under this minister but under previous ministers, of allowing a subordinate officer in British Columbia to issue a statement to the press containing what is called a review of the situation as regards the fisheries of British Columbia, without first submitting that review to the head office of the department. The relations between head office and the office at Vancouver are not my business, if that is the way they prefer to do things—to have a man out there tell them not only what they should do, but what they are going to do. But I do protest, when it becomes a source of trouble to fishermen, and to people who represent fishermen. Unfortunately it sometimes becomes not a review, but a preview, and announcements are made as to what the policy of the government is going to be. Sometimes the government's policy is not in accord with the announcement that is made, and this causes a lot of trouble.

Recently an extensive review was published. The review was a long one, because the compressed report in the papers took up nearly a column of print. It leaves the impression, as evidenced by the big headlines, that the department have in hand some scheme or method by which fishermen can obtain loans in order to enable them to buy better and bigger boats. That is a very nice idea, indeed; I am all for it. I have advocated it for years. In fact, I believe the minister himself two years ago introduced some scheme of the kind. But British Columbia did not accept the offer he made. Now the department says it has no such scheme before it. I have letters from fishermen asking how they are going to get in under this new scheme which is to be evolved. This makes trouble. It may be alleged, perhaps correctly, that the official did not definitely use that language; but that is the impression he conveyed to the press, and the press indicated it by printing, in big headlines, "B.C. Fishermen May Get Money to Build Traps."

The fisherman does not discriminate between the use of the word "may" and the use of the expression "is going to." They expect that that is going to be carried out. I submit a lot of trouble would have been saved if the official in question had not issued these reviews, or previews, without first submitting them to the department at Ottawa. I wonder if the minister—or any minister—would allow a deputy, or any subordinate official here, to announce what the policy of a department was going to be? That is what happened in this case and, as I have said, it makes trouble.

May I point out that with the idea of getting a proper conception of the alleged proposals I asked for a copy of the review—once on the fourth, twenty-two days ago, and again on the eleventh. But I have not yet had them given to me. Either the deputy in the west has not seen fit to forward them, or the minister here has not seen fit to furnish me with a copy. In any event, I think the principle is an unhappy one, and should be abandoned. It is not only to-day that this trouble has occurred; it has also occurred in the past.

The next matter I should like to deal with is a local one—and I am sorry to bore the house with local matters. I assure hon. members that it is only after long correspondence and after permitting myself to be stalled for several years in the hope that the very obvious facts—the unalterable and logical facts—would bring the government to take action in the matter. Apparently that has not been done, and I am forced to bring the matter to the court of last resort. It reveals a record of stupidity and neglect, and a refusal to face obvious and inescapable facts, and to deal with existing conditions.

The matter is linked with Comox lake, a lake five miles from Courtenay. Into that lake streams and creeks run from higher ground, and provide an ideal spawning place. Then, out of Comox lake runs the Puntledge river, to the sea, some five or six miles lower down. Some twenty-five years ago a colliery company wishing to establish a source of power built a dam on the Puntledge river. That was in 1913. The law is that the owners of dams must, on the request of the Department of Fisheries, put in suitable fish ladders. So far as I can ascertain, and so far as the records show, the department made no attempt to do that, until individuals and boards of trade alarmed by the drop in the amount of fish running in that direction, stirred them up. It took a couple of years before any action could be obtained. But in 1920 the department did take some action. They obtained a report from one of their officials, a man who had been twenty years in the service and who had intimate local knowledge, a man whose reputation stands high. He has since left the service. This is what he said:

> I am not in a position to state whether salmon got into the lake in any quantities before the impounding dam was built, but it is a fact that now they do try to get into it and are prevented from reaching the lake owing to the present structure of the dam. I have been up the lake on several occasions and have carefully inspected the nature of the bottom of it and I am convinced that no better spawning ground could be found anywhere. . . . In my opinion as fishery officer I have no hesitation in saying that I most certainly consider that a suitable fish ladder should be erected in the impounding dam.

Not satisfied with that, the department consulted a real expert in such matters, an expert in the culture of fish and the operation of hatcheries. He was a very able man, and now occupies a very responsible position, doing the same kind of work for the provincial government. He made this statement, which is even stronger:

> I can state, without hesitation, that the Cruikshank river which enters the lake from the north, and Beadnell creek entering the head of the lake, offers spawning grounds unsurpassed in quality and extent, by any I have seen in other parts of the province.

British Columbia abounds in rivers in which there are salmon and fish of all kinds. When experts say that Comox lake and its tributary creeks provide the best spawning grounds to be found anywhere in the province, they are saying something worthy of attention. He described the fish attempting to pass up the dam as being variously described as "crowds", "lots" and "hundreds". He ended up by saying that he considered the number of fish attempting to enter the lake fully justified the expenditure of installing an efficient fishway. People might believe that any body of water would do for salmon spawning, but that is not so. Special conditions are required. There must be a special kind of bottom soil, or gravel. And, for most classes of fish there must be, as in Comox lake, creeks entering the lake. The fish go up the river, into the lake. Then they go into the creeks to spawn.

Then they go down, after spawning, and stay a year in the fresh water of the lake, following which they go out to sea again, to fulfil their destiny. That is true of the two most important and valuable salmon, the sockeye and the cohoe. So that when both these men specializing in the culture of fish have spoken in the manner indicated, surely it is urgent and important that we take steps to develop such wonderful spawning grounds. Both the sockeye and the cohoe, as I have indicated, go into the creeks above Comox lake. No sockeye are in there at the present time. There was an attempt made to introduce them, but apparently it failed. But it can be done, because it has been done in other places, and the conditions are ideal.

But the cohoes were there, and they are not there to-day. The sockeye is the most valuable commercial fish; but the cohoe, while commercially valuable, has a much greater value in its opportunity for development as a sporting fish. It has been discovered only in recent years that they will take a fly and, as they make a tremendous fight, they become valuable as a sporting fish. All the world knows, however, about the big spring salmon taken in that neighbourhood. They come from all over the world as the club records show. The cohoe sport will not be competitive with that, but will be supplementary to it, and will add tremendously in increasing sporting facilities for the tourist trade. It is estimated that every tourist who comes from afar to take one of these large springs will leave anywhere from a hundred to five hundred dollars in the province for each fish he takes.

Incidentally the cohoe is a valuable fish to the working fisherman. All a man needs is a rowboat to go out to make a start. This type of fishing does not require any nets; they do it by what is called trolling. It offers an opportunity to the working fisherman to get a living with the least possible expenditure.

An agitation was stirred up by the public and by the boards of trade, and the officials of the department told the company that they would have to put in a ladder, which they did in 1922. The first blunder was in not making the company do it a number of years before, and the second blunder was in allowing the installation of this type of ladder in the place where it was installed. The proper place to have put it was at the end of the dam in the solid rock where it would have been permanent and effective. It should have consisted of a series of pools about two and a half or three feet above each other. The fish could jump from one to the other, almost like children jumping up a stairway. This type of ladder has been a tremendous success in a similar river near Alberni where tourists come from all over just to watch the fish going up.

Because it would be cheaper for the company, they were permitted to install what is known as the Hocken type of fish ladder. This ladder consists of an opening eighteen inches deep and a certain number of feet wide in the bottom of the dam. This ladder worked for a while in a sort of way as some fish got up after it was put in. But it was workable only under ideal and unusual conditions; that is, when the water on one side of the dam balanced to some extent the water on the lower side. But when there was any large quantity of water; when there was high water in the river, it was impossible for the fish to get up. In order to do so they would have had to dive down and go through this hole through which there was a rush of water. It was like asking a minnow to go up a fireman's hose against a pressure of sixty pounds to the square inch. The fish simply could not go up unless the water was fairly well balanced. The error was made in allowing this type of ladder, but it was done because it would be cheaper for the company. The company has rebuilt the ladder twice. The ladder has been constructed three times and it has washed out again, so it was not any economy for the company. At no time was it effective, and for the last three years, certainly for the last two years and a half, it has been a total failure. Later on the company wanted more power and they raised the head of the dam some three or four feet.

The ladder was washed out in 1927 and was replaced that year by the company. The same type of ladder was put in on the advice of the officials. Then it was washed out again in 1934 and replaced in 1935, and it was washed out again last December. When it was rebuilt in 1935, it was moved somewhat to meet the changed condition of higher water, but it was not placed at the end of the dam as it should have been. The result was worse than it was before. I think I can safely say that there have been no fish go up since. There is a record of one trout that was believed to have been found above the dam. The company is not to blame as they put in what they were ordered to put in. They constructed the ladder three times at their own expense, and I understand they are now saying to the department that they have done their part; that they have done what they were told to do, and that if the department cannot devise a ladder which will be effective and permanent, they had better do it themselves.

I asked a question as to what the cost of this ladder had been and I received a reply that that information was not available as the fish ladder was built and installed by the owner of the dam. That is quite correct, but I have in my hand a letter from one official to another in which the cost of the first ladder is given and an estimate of the second ladder is made. This is not very important, but it illustrates how determined the department is not to give information that they do not want to give. Perhaps I could now suggest that the department is to blame in the matter, but I am not altogether prepared to do that. It is easy to be wise after the event, and possibly if I had been in their position I would have made the same error, but I certainly would not have assumed the attitude that they assumed subsequently. I do blame the department for refusing to recognize results and facts.

They spent two or three years trying to prove that I was wrong, trying to prove that people who had lived there all their lives did not know what they were talking about. The department contended that fish were going up when in fact they were not. Some years ago I made a sporting offer. I said: Let us forget whose fault it is, let us unite to try to get the situation remedied. But the officials of the department are like the Medes and Persians, perhaps far more so; if they once say a thing is so, then it cannot possibly be proved to be wrong. They were so determined not to admit the thing was a failure that they built a trap above the dam to catch the fish that they were sure were going through, but they did not get even a sucker. They now admit that the thing is a failure and that the cohoe run has been killed. I have under my hand six letters from various officials, all of which state in more or less precise language that that is so. They admit the run is killed; they admit the ladder is no use, and still they do nothing.

Then, in order to put themselves right, they turn around and say: Well, after all, the cohoe did not go up into the lake; they spawned in the river. Tell that to any fisherman and he will laugh at you. They may spawn in the river below the dam under certain circumstances, but they are not successful. How can they be when there is a record a couple of years ago that that area below the dam was dry for three weeks? They want to go up, not only into the lake but into the streams above the lake. Then they said: Well, perhaps after all the fish never did go into the lake, even before the dam was built. If that is so, what can be said about the report of their own officials? What is to be said about the fact that they compelled this company three times to build the ladder? What about the expert who said that there were lots of fish going up? I think I might quote from one letter which is typical and illustrative of what the officials say. This reads:

> Indeed, I have gone back on the original records in the department about the matter, and I find that as long ago as 1898 the then commissioner of fisheries in dealing with natural obstructions in a lower portion of the river stated that "at present the river is of small importance as a salmon river."

Of course it was of small importance as a salmon river forty years ago. Those were the days when the salmon were so thick in the Fraser and Skeena rivers and their tributaries that the cannery men put a quota on the fishermen. They would take only 200 fish a night from each boat. After that they had to throw them overboard or stay in. Of course this river was of no importance as a salmon river forty years ago because the salmon could be caught more easily and in greater numbers in other rivers. That is a very poor argument to use to support the contention that they should abandon the river now when every river and stream is important.

As I have said, this ladder was washed away last December. I asked what steps had been taken towards replacing it, and I was told that the need for requiring replacement was under consideration. It has been under consideration for three years and we are not any further ahead than we were then. We have reports from two officials stating specifically that conditions as they are now could not be improved. If you are willing to abandon this spawning ground which has been stated by experts to be the best or at least as good as any in British Columbia; if you are willing to abandon this run of cohoe salmon which is so valuable for sporting purposes and to the working fisherman, then I suppose it is all right if you are prepared to accept that situation.

When the hatchery was abandoned some years ago, it was mentioned in this house that we should devote more and more time to natural propagation, to the encouragement of runs by natural means. This is the case in point and this is just exactly what we are not doing. I have no use for faultfinders who do not suggest a remedy. I have indicated what is wrong and here is what I think is needed. We need a fish ladder like the one they built some years ago on the Stamp river near Alberni. It was entirely successful. It has renewed the run of sockeye salmon, which is a very valuable asset, furnishing employment for 200 men, and of advantage from a tourist point of view as well. Put the ladder in at the right place, around the end of the dam, and it will be permanent and therefore effective. I have no brief for the colliery company. They have as little use for me as I for them; but fair is fair, and if anything further is to be done it should be done at the expense of the government. The colliery company were told to put the ladder in the wrong place, and it was of the non-effective type. So much for that item.

Next I want to protest against the method of handling herrings in British Columbia. I am referring now to the reducing of herrings. To those not familiar with it I may say that reducing herrings is a method of squeezing the oil out of them, and by some process of applying acid they reduce the residue into what is called fish meal, which is largely used as fertilizer and to some extent for stock feed. I maintain that that is a waste of a valuable food fish. There is an ample market, if it was pushed, for putting up herrings in the shape of canned and smoked herrings, canned in oil, kippers, and so on. In that way we would give the largest amount of labour and get the most money value out of a given quantity of fish; but by reducing them we get the very least amount of labour, and it is the least profitable, and requires an enormous catch to make it profitable to operate. The result is that it depletes the herring spawning grounds.

There is an important industry there of reducing pilchards, which is very much more profitable for several reasons. They are much more full of oil, containing double the amount found in herrings sometimes, and that makes it more profitable. Pilchards do not spawn in our water, so we cannot take too many of them, so to speak. Pilchards are to a large extent not cannable, because they are so oily, and there is not a good demand for them.

The department will say; I have heard them say, that we cannot and do not deplete the run of the herring on the spawning grounds because it would be trying to dip out the ocean, so to speak, and you cannot do that. That is true in a way, but herrings do not spawn in the ocean like pilchards, but spawn in narrow, confined waters, in bays and inlets. I have seen seine boats like a procession of motor cars, one waiting until the other one pulled out of the only good place in the bay, and there would be a continual succession until the bay was cleaned out. You do not eliminate herrings. You cannot catch them all, but you can harass them until they go away. I can name harbours—Nanaimo is one—where the herring were taken almost inside the town itself, almost at the door of the hotel. They treated them like that and the herring went away and did not come back for fifteen or twenty years. That is what herring will do if you harass them enough. It is not that you take all the herrings, but that they abandon the spawning ground.

There was a large run of herring last year, the department will say, due to taking in large new areas, and incidentally because of the incidence of the gulf stream, which in certain years comes nearer our shores and brings more marine growth, which the fish follow. The experts say that the size of the fish taken indicates that they are being depleted.

I have not yet mentioned the principal thing about the herrings. The principal thing is that they are feed for salmon, and are sought for by the spring salmon, as they are called. I have a quotation here from a fisherman. It is headed in big type "No herring, no salmon," and reads:

> Prohibit the reduction of herring and good times will return to the salmon trollers. This is the considered advice of Pete Larsen.

He is a fisherman from Norway, well known on our coast.

> According to Pete, the trollers have not even made expenses in the past month and he blames it on the wholesale destruction of herring which provide the salmon's natural food.
> "No herring, no salmon!" is Mr. Larsen's firm conviction.

Even if they do not clean out the herrings, they break up the schools and then the salmon do not follow them so readily. I suggest that we should follow the system adopted in Norway. I have some data in connection with that. I do not think Norway reduces herrings at all. If it does, it is only from offal. Most of their herring go into canning, and they can them in sixteen different ways. I shall not mention them all, but they have smoked herring, unsmoked, herrings canned in oil, in tomatoes, and so on. They make the very best use of their herring in that way, and get the most money from them. Norway, with a population of sixty per cent less than the maritime provinces of Canada, including British Columbia, in that sense, in 1935 and 1936, the last two years for which records were available, exported 74,000 tons of canned herring, not raw herring, while we in Canada with all that much greater population exported exactly 1,428 tons—74,000 tons as against 1,400 tons, or about 6,000 per cent more. And Norway received $228 per ton for its herrings, while we received $145 for ours—quite a difference. They get the most out of their herrings by putting them up in oil, in tomatoes, and so on. I suggest that we should develop our herring industry along the line of Norway's system. But the difference as between $228 and $145 per ton is only minor compared with the difference between canning them and reducing them, and that is what I want to go into.

In British Columbia in 1937 we used approximately 84,000 tons of fresh herring for reduction purposes. That is a lot of fish to be converted into fertilizer meal and oil. We got a price that netted us for our fresh fish $9.50 a ton, of which the seagoing fishermen who caught them would get $2.25 a ton, split seven ways, and an extra share for the boat; so each fisherman actually got only one-eighth of $2.25 per ton for every ton he helped to catch; sometimes it would be $2.50.

I ask, Is it good policy to allow the reduction of herrings under those circumstances, there being very little profit to the producer owing to the low oil content; also it depletes the spawning grounds and destroys the food of the salmon, particularly that of the springs. A fisherman can go out at night or in the morning and troll for springs, and if he catches only one large spring he will get more for that one fish than if he went out in a herring seine boat and participated in a catch of five or six tons of fresh herring. I think we should feature Norway's way of doing it, and develop our industry along those lines. It uses less fish, and does not add to the output of pilchard oil and meal, because the market for that is somewhat restricted; the pilchard industry can take care of it in any event, and if you overload the market the price goes down. You would get $225 a ton as against $9.50 a ton—a far bigger return. Therefore I say we should stop reducing herrings. I think that is the logical and reasonable thing to do.

The next item on the list is the question of fish traps. We heard a lot about it last year in the committee, and I do not propose to take up the time of the house with it now. But I have the report in my hand, and it says:

> That no more trap licences be granted in British Columbia waters except in the so called Sooke area, and concerning which we are unable to come to a decision as to whether they should be continued or not, without the opportunity of securing further information.

I might also say that that report recommended that the licence for each trap should be raised from $50 to $500, a little increase of a thousand per cent, the difference between $350 for the lot, and $3,500—which, most significantly, met no objection from the two companies who owned and operated these traps. It also suggested that we should get certain data as to what was caught in the traps.

Some weeks ago I presented to this house a petition with approximately ten thousand names on it, petitioning against the further use of traps in British Columbia. I may say that it was no political device. Nobody was paid to go around and collect the signatures. It was a spontaneous movement. The total expense at least as far as I was concerned was three or four dollars for printing the petition, because I thought it would look better if we had it printed. It met with a very large and very quick response. In the light of the petition I thought that possibly the minister, the department or the government, whoever is responsible, would either stop the traps this year or send the matter to the committee to consider the data obtained. I have before me some of this data. I shall not go fully into it, but it is quite illuminating. They caught three quarters of a million fish, and one might almost say they caught everything, from whales to shrimps. That would be an exaggeration, but they caught one whale, one porpoise, a number of wolf fish, barracuda, sharks, sea lions, hake, herrings, ratfish, sturgeon, and of course, all kinds of salmon. It must have been a comprehensive operation when it took everything from a whale down to a herring. The minister, I regret to say, voicing the views of the department, refused either to stop the traps or to refer the matter again to the committee; their motto was that of the French war heroes, "They shall not pass"; he would not even discuss the matter. So far as my knowledge goes, that brings the matter to an impasse; it is impossible to go any further at the present time. I can only say that it must wait until the next general election, which I anticipate will take place this fall.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, well!

Mr. NEILL: I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Has my hon. friend any information on the subject to give to this committee?

Mr. NEILL: I would be prepared to go into that fully on some more appropriate occasion. If I did so now, it would break away from the line of my argument. At the present moment I am talking about fish. Like the man in the bible, I have observed "the signs of the times" with regard to a general election.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I see.

Mr. BENNETT: But not the times of the signs.

Mr. NEILL: The next item is one which comes home, or should come home, to every man and woman in Canada. It is the most vital thing in British Columbia fisheries; upon it depends the whole existence of the salmon, cod and halibut fisheries. It is not a question of cutting down overfishing; it is elimination, wiping them out. I allude to the destruction caused by the "Japs," if I may use that word, by intensive and unrestrictive fishing outside the three mile limit. Unfortunately, as far as we know, they are within their legal rights; they are outside territorial waters, where it is open to the whole world to fish. It was suggested that a Norwegian boat was coming around, and that a British boat intended to fish for halibut. Either representations were made or something else happened; for some reason or another they did not come.

But the greatest danger in any event would be from the Japanese, because they are best suited owing to their nearness, their experience, and the ruthless methods which they have never hesitated to employ. Their idea of fishing is to take every fish as long as you can see one, and then go somewhere else. They did that with their own fishing grounds off their own coast. Then, having by some means obtained fishing from the Russians, they proceeded to do the same thing there, and now they have come to Alaska and are carrying on in the same way. Later, British Columbia will be the victim. I might explain how it is done. They bring a great big mother ship across the ocean, able to carry launches like the schooners on the Atlantic carry dories; they anchor outsde the three mile limit, where the salmon runs are, and they fish intensively and relentlessly and with no regard to time, season or conservation. They put the fish on board, process them, can them, freeze them or whatever is required in the way of preparation, and then go home with, I was going to say, their bloody spoils, but their fishy spoils would be more correct. The United States government is seriously alarmed. They obtain an income of seventy million dollars from their salmon in Alaska, and they see it seriously imperilled. This is no wild idea of visionary men looking into the future; it is going on to-day; it has been going on for the last couple of years.

In an article published in Japan not long ago, it was stated:

The Behring sea has become an arm of Tokyo bay.

[Mr. Neill.]

That must be nice reading for the Americans. A fleet of one hundred and one Japanese vessels this summer was strung along the coast of Bristol bay, Alaska, for two hundred miles. Think of it! Two hundred miles! Ostensibly they were after crabs. Yes, they said they were only prospecting for crabs. Their intentions were as innocent as regards salmon and halibut as their intentions as regards a certain nation alongside them are or were supposed to be. Unfortunately there are resources of modern science; the fishing people sent out aeroplanes from Alaska; they took photographs of twenty thousand fish on the decks of this mother ship; they went so close that they could even discern, not the signs of the times but the names stamped on the cases of packed salmon; they swooped down within a hundred feet. There is not a question but that that is going on. Now, as I understand, having their attention occupied elsewhere, they have agreed with the United States not to send any more ships over for the present, for the next year. They said that last year. I suppose that is one of those famous or infamous gentleman's agreements which are used only so long as it is profitable to adhere to them. One United States congressman has been asked to introduce a bill in congress declaring that any fish spawned in Alaskan waters belong to the American people, the same as we might say that any fish spawned in the Fraser river belong to us. It is rather a far-fetched thing, and it would not apply as regards halibut, for they do not spawn in our waters. The United States might perhaps establish a claim to shut off the Bering sea as a clausum mare, on the ground that the coast line is from headland to headland; but considering the enormous size of the Bering sea, which is not a bay but a sea, I am doubtful whether such a claim could be upheld.

We made a wonderful treaty three years ago with the United States. Under it the halibut fisheries have been built up; the catch is much greater and much more assured of permanence; but this is just going to be wiped out because the Japanese or any other foreigners can anchor off our banks—the fish are to be found in certain defined areas—and clean them up. Now there must be some way of stopping that. If it is not stopped, all our fishing goes; all our regulations, and the army of officials we maintain, our close seasons and restrictions all go by the board. If we are going to lose the fish anyhow, we might as well clean them out ourselves. There must be some means, diplomacy perhaps, of having a surcease in this matter. Speaking offhand and out of my own ignorance, I suggest this: The biggest market the Japanese fishermen have for canned salmon is in the United States and Great Britain. If the United States and Great Britain would say: If you are not going to cease this cutthroat policy, so ruinous alike to yourselves and us, we will not let a tin of your canned salmon into either the United States or Great Britain. That would bring them to time.

This is a most important matter, a matter for diplomacy rather than departmental action. Our ambassador to Japan might well enter into negotiations concerning it, instead of making himself a willing conduit for the dissemination in Canada of Japanese propaganda against, to us, a friendly nation. He would be much better employed in doing that. If he has been doing anything of that kind let him announce it; it would make him a lot more popular in British Columbia, where his stock is anything but high at the present time. If there have been negotiations going on, let us know the result. Anything would be welcome provided it was not in the form of a gentlemen's agreement. I say with all respect to the minister that he has rather withdrawn himself behind a wall of silence for the last three years; let him come out from behind that wall and use the ability which we believe he possesses to deal with these matters. Let us know the best and the worst. It is well to know the worst, because we have to know it sooner or later. Let him tell us what has been attempted in these matters and what his future policy is, and we shall have confidence in him, and I am sure many hon. members, including myself, would be very glad to give him every possible support.

Just two other small matters. One is that the dominion has lately handed over to British Columbia the control of non-tidal waters as regards fishing. It is not clear whether they have handed over all the non-tidal fish or only the non-tidal sport fish; in that regard the order in council contradicts the Fisheries department letters. There is also difficulty by reason of there being such a divergence of fact in the matter. For instance, there are tidal sport fish and there are non-tidal commercial fish; so again the question arises, If the dominion is going to say, "We control the tidal fish and the province the non-tidal," where is the line to be drawn? I believe another difficulty has arisen in Quebec; there I do not think the term used is non-tidal so much; I think it is the waters above the navigable portions of the St. Lawrence. However, there again is opportunity for dispute and doubt as to where the dividing line is.

I am told that according to the British North America Act the province could demand control of its non-tidal fish. Possibly so, but surely the British North America Act is not responsible for the anomalous situation which I am now going to describe. It seems that the dominion still has control of the regulations, because apparently under the British North America Act we control the regulation and catch of fish, while the province can claim the right in the fish in non-tidal waters. To suit the province apparently, the department, I think rather weakly, agreed to pass whatever regulations the province asked them to do. Now there is going to be trouble about that, and very soon. Some day the province is going to ask for some foolish, ill-advised regulation. Suppose they took it into their head to put poison in a lake in order to get rid of some predatory fish, and in doing so poisoned the run of valuable fish; or suppose someone ate some of those poisoned fish. Who would be responsible? We would. We have the responsibility under the British North America Act; we cannot evade our responsibility. The department must in some way have sensed that danger, because I see in a recent Gazette, in giving out some regulations in connection with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, they say it is done at the request of the department of agriculture of the provincial government. They are going to try to get out of their responsibility by saying, Bill Jones in Alberta or Tom Smith in Saskatchewan asked us to do it, and therefore we are not responsible. I think the lawyer members of the house will say that we cannot divest ourselves of our responsibility, and if anything wrong is done we would be responsible. I think the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour will agree that they have had sad experience of the inadvisability of the dominion government handing over either its authority to act or its cash for any province to use or spend.

Suppose, for instance—a more likely thing, and I have such a case in my mind—the province took a certain lake in its efforts for the encouragement of sport fishing. I could name a place where it might well happen. Suppose the dominion government have gone to great expense putting in a fish ladder and large quantities of fish fry to facilitate the run of sockeye salmon and have developed them in that lake, and they are proving valuable, a couple of hundred fishermen getting a livelihood from them. But suppose the province says, We are not concerned about your commercial fishing; all we are concerned with is sport fishing, and we are going to put sporting trout into this lake, which will live on the roe and the young of the salmon. The one will kill the other. That situation might well happen. I suggest that this parliament should retain complete control. The dominion has the responsibility; we cannot evade it; therefore let us keep the power.

Another matter is this: Large sums are spent every year for advertising fish with a view of increasing the sale. In the last seven years $184,000 odd have been spent. With what result? I notice the complacency of officials; with them everything is always the best in this best of all possible worlds. In this instance I am not hitting at the fisheries department; this happens to come under the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have in my hand a recent issue of the Commercial Intelligence Journal, in which it is stated that the retail sales of canned salmon in the United Kingdom during 1937 were satisfactory. Let us see what "satisfactory" means in the opinion of those gentlemen. They go on to give the imports of canned salmon into Great Britain, and here is the record for 1931 to 1937 inclusive. The imports of Canadian canned salmon went down five per cent; those from the United States went up twenty per cent, and the Japanese sales went up eight hundred and eight per cent. And that is not the multiplication of a small amount, but an increase of £1,400,000 in British money. Very likely, as the right hon. leader of the opposition says, some of it was British Columbia salmon under a Japanese label.

Then I turn over the pages and find the record for 1937. Total imports better by ten per cent than those of the previous year. Canada contributed 175,000 hundredweight, which was a slight increase; note that, a slight increase. Japanese packers secured the major portion of the trade, with 454,558 hundredweight, an increase of no less than seventy per cent in one year. Whether you take an increase of eight hundred per cent in seven years or an increase of seventy per cent for the last year, it does not seem to be a matter of which our departments should be very proud in connection with increasing the sales of our canned salmon. I have in my hand a bulletin issued by the fisheries department last month in which they say that sales of canned fish showed an increase of almost a million and a half. I do not know what kind of fish they meant, because here is the record in regard to canned salmon, and canned herrings do not amount to very much either. It seems to me that we need either a new policy or a different method of distribution.

There are other matters I should like to have taken up, but these points I have raised I think are vital to the industry, and I have tried not to approach them in any petty or critical spirit. I hope the minister will consider these matters and be able to give us some definite information when his estimates are before the committee of supply. Perhaps he may be able to hold out some hope; possibly he may be able to tell us of some action which has been taken in regard to some of these matters. If he can do that; if he can come out with a definite policy either on the part of his department or on the part of the government as a whole, we shall be very glad to hear him. This is the third session of this parliament, and I hope the Minister of Justice will allow me to say that we are coming at least in sight of a general election. So I think it is time we had definite and concrete information in connection with matters that have occurred in the past, and a definite statement as to what is contemplated for the future.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) did not give me any previous intimation that he was going to take up these matters at this junction, so I am sure the house will not expect me to reply to everything he said or to give all the details in regard to the several matters which were mentioned by the hon. member. However, he is to be congratulated upon his noble effort and his appeal to the minister and the department for a statement of policy with the hope that something may be done to remedy the conditions of which he is complaining.

If we consider soberly the questions raised by the hon. member we must admit that they are in the main matters of detail, over which there have been differences of opinion in British Columbia and throughout Canada for a great many years, matters which it seems impossible to adjust in such a way as to satisfy all concerned. My hon. friend began by complaining of officials of departments who take upon themselves the responsibility of issuing statements which might be interpreted in some quarters as explaining or laying down the policies of the department or the government. Of course, in the Department of Fisheries, as in every other department of the government, we have human beings as officials, and they are liable to err and make mistakes. In this instance I find that it has been the policy of heads of branches in the areas in which they are stationed, particularly in the east and west, occasionally to make reports of what has been going on, covering their activities during the period of a year.

The other day the hon. member brought to my attention a matter in regard to the annual review made some time ago by the supervisor of fisheries for British Columbia. I have looked into this matter. I asked for the report which was made, as I informed the hon. member, without being first submitted to the department. I find that it was a very general statement of facts, with the possible exception of one matter upon which a wrong interpretation was placed by some of the newspapers in British Columbia. The matter will be further explained when the exact words used by the official come before me and have been studied. Judging from the newspaper reports, however, I think some of the newspapers, as well as the hon. member, jumped to conclusions which were not warranted by the facts as reported in the press at the time. I may say at this point that these statements are not generally submitted to the minister before they are given out, because they are supposed to be statements of facts. If sometimes the imagination of the officials carries them away and they become too enthusiastic over their work, I suppose they will have to be disciplined or reminded that in future they should refrain from attempting to commit the department or the government to any policy.

Another matter of which the hon. member complained is the old question of the Puntledge river fish ladder. I find that this has been under consideration in the department ever since 1920. It appears that in 1913 Canadian Collieries Limited built a dam on the Puntledge river to develop water power and generate electricity to serve the people in that vicinity. It may be stated that from the information before me the dam is not at the mouth of the river but is some distance from Comox lake, which would be a suitable ground for spawning purposes. My information is to the effect that around 1917 some people thought a fishway should be built in that dam in order to facilitate the entrance of the fish to Comox lake. Since 1920 three attempts have been made to construct suitable fish ladders, not always at the same location; but unfortunately they did not hold; they were washed out, and at the present time there is no fishway in that dam. So far as I can judge from the records of the department, since 1920 every official charged with the administration of the regulations in that part of the country has tried to meet the situation as best he could. Many opinions have been offered by officials and by independent persons, but I believe the situation is very well expressed in the reports of the district supervisor of fisheries and the chief supervisor of fisheries for British Columbia. Those reports have been made after many years of observation and study.

It is represented to the department by our engineers and officials who, we believe, are competent in such matters, that to build a fishway at the place where it is suggested it should be built, namely on the left side of the dam, would certainly jeopardize the efficiency of the dam. If the fishway were cut through the rock at the side of the dam, there is no assurance that the salmon would use it, or that it would assist in any way to increase the run. Such a fishway would necessitate blasting pools in the rock on the left side of the stream, which would undoubtedly weaken the structure of the dam.

The towns of Cumberland and Courtenay, with populations of 2,371 and 1,219 respectively, as well as the towns of Comox and Royston, and the territory wtihin a radius of thirty-five miles, are dependent upon this source for power and light. It seems that there is not much evidence to show that above the power dam, to Comox lake, these waters have been frequented by large numbers of salmon. It is represented, and has been ascertained by officials of the department, that the different varieties of salmon frequenting these waters are being well maintained, and that there is sufficient room in the Puntledge river below Comox lake for the spawning of all salmon coming to the stream in recent years. In the opinion of the Courtenay-Comox boards of trade, and the affiliated fish and game association of Vancouver island, Comox lake is more valuable from the standpoint of sport fish than for salmon, and the latter association have asked that salmon be not introduced into Comox lake.

Mr. NEILL: When did the board of trade recommend that?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am not sure exactly of the date, but I can find out the exact date that the recommendation was made.

Mr. NEILL: While the minister is looking for it, he might look for one dated last year, in which they recommended that the ladder should be put in, and the run of cohoes protected.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I have a copy of it.

Mr. MICHAUD: It goes to show that this is a difficult proposition, and that there is room for a wide difference of opinion. According to the hon. member, even the same people change their minds about the efficiency of building a ladder along the lines recommended by some people. Some think the plan would not be feasible and would jeopardize the efficiency of power development at that place.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister say how high the dam is?

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not think I have the information here. This matter has been considered by various officials, and by my predecessors, since 1920, and we have all tried to give our best attention to the problem. It is our conclusion that it is not worth while to incur the necessary expenditures, and to jeopardize the good water power, in order to increase the spawning facilities in Comox lake, particularly when we feel that every facility is offered below the lake and below the dam, from the mouth of the river.

However, we are still looking into the matter and we hope some day to find a solution which will meet with the approval of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and of the board of trade.

Another matter which has been brought up has been the criticism of the method of handling herring in British Columbia. I admit that it is a fish which is hard to handle in that province. We are told it would be much more profitable to can and smoke the herring rather than reduce it to fish meal. Well, that is another matter in connection with which there is room for great differences of opinion. I am not an expert in the matter, and I would not give my own opinion; but I find that for the last fifty years people from British Columbia, in this house and out of it, have given opinions, and have widely differed in their suggestions. But it seems to me that if it was so much more profitable to can or to smoke the herring rather than reduce it, there would be a sufficient number of intelligent people in British Columbia to go into that business. They could, or should, see the advantages of changing the method of handling the herring catch.

I am informed that about ten years ago the same proposition was advocated, and that some people tried canning rather than reducing the herring. It was found most unsatisfactory and unprofitable. However, I hope the hon. member will be able to convince people in the fishing industry to change their methods of handling that kind of fish, and if he is successful I can assure him that, so far as I am concerned, there will be no obstacles raised by the department.

Mr. NEILL: Before the minister leaves that, would he permit me to speak on a question of privilege? I have in my hand the communication to which I referred. The resolution passed by the Courtenay board of trade, after setting out various whereases, contains the following:

Therefore be it resolved, that the Minister of Fisheries be requested to see that an efficient fish ladder be installed at the Bevan dam.

That is dated January 12, 1937.

Mr. MICHAUD: Has my hon. friend the other letter in which the other alternative was advocated?

Mr. NEILL: What date?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have not the date.

Mr. NEILL: No. Has the minister the letter?

Mr. MICHAUD: Not here, but I shall bring before the house the information on record in the department regarding this matter. In connection with fish traps my hon. friend stated that the minister refused to discuss the petitions which were presented by him to the house and which he alleged contained the signatures of ten thousand people. This matter was referred last year to the committee on fisheries and every opportunity was given to those who wanted to get information to obtain what they wanted. That committee made recommendations to this house which were implemented in full by the department. When the petitions were presented to the house by the hon member for Comox-Alberni, I raised no objection as it was not my duty to pass upon them or to state what should be done. Some petitions containing the same heading were forwarded to my office, I suppose inadvertently. These contained the postal addresses and occupations of the people who signed them and I found that they contained the signatures of more chicken farmers than fishermen.

Mr. NEILL: Certainly. The fisherman population is quite small as compared with the total population of British Columbia, and it will be still smaller if these traps are permitted.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is not true when the hon. member says that the minister refused to discuss the matter referred to in the petitions.

Mr. NEILL: I have the letter here.

Mr. MICHAUD: The letter does not say that I refused.

Mr. NEILL: Here is the letter.

Mr. MICHAUD: Will the hon. member read it?

Mr. NEILL: I wrote to the minister on February 28, 1938, in connection with these petitions, and I said in part:

Are you disposed to give them notice that they will not be allowed any for or beyond this year, or do you propose to refer it again to the fishery committee of the house?

The answer was dated March 4, and reads:

Replying to your letter of the 28th ultimo with reference to the question of fish traps at Sooke, B.C., I beg to state that at the present time I am not disposed to give any notice that traps will not be allowed in the future. Further, I do not think that the petitions presented to the house should be referred to the fisheries committee inasmuch as they do not appear to disclose any new arguments besides those which were brought before the committee last year and inquired into.

I did not ask that the petitions should be referred to the committee; I asked that the data which the committee recommended last year should be gathered should be referred to it. I have that in my hand and I ask that it be referred to the committee.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is a matter which my hon. friend should refer either to the house or to the committee. As far as the department is concerned, the recommendations made last year by the committee were carried out. I feel that is all that should be expected of the minister or the department.

Regarding the other matter that was brought up, the wholesale destruction of fish by Japanese outside the three mile limit, I am sure my hon. friend knows that is an extremely delicate international matter. He must know that matter is being taken up by the United States and Canadian governments.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know that.

Mr. MICHAUD: My hon. friend should have enough confidence in the government to know that matters of such importance will be considered as they should be considered. That is a matter which can be remedied only by international treaties or agreements.

My hon. friend referred to the handing over of the jurisdiction over fisheries in non-tidal waters in British Columbia. I do not think he quite understands the situation. We have no jurisdiction to hand over anything that does not belong to us. What we did was to discontinue the administration of the sports fisheries in British Columbia. This was done because of recommendations made by representatives of the provincial government and officials of the department. We handed over all facilities that had been developed in that respect. The exact limit of jurisdiction is a moot question and has been such ever since British Columbia entered confederation. Case after case has been submitted to the privy council and neither party has seemed to be satisfied with the decisions. However, I believe we have come to some understanding as to where the jurisdiction should end, and I think the regulations have been amended so that they will meet with the approval of the provincial authorities. I shall deal with advertising later on when the appropriation for that service comes before the committee.

I was not given any notice of this matter, but I should like to say that when the items of the department come up for consideration I shall provide all the information in the possession of the department. I shall do my best to satisfy my hon. friend.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): When the Minister of Fisheries is dealing with his estimates, I would ask him to have available the necessary information to enable him to give the names and addresses of the persons concerned and the amounts received in connection with the appropriation of half a million dollars that was made last year and that was stated to be of great urgency to assist the distressed fishermen of Canada. I understand also that a report is being prepared in connection with possible markets for fish in South America and some parts of the West Indies, and I should like to feel that that report was before us before we consider further the matter involved in that expenditure, or in any expenditure which may be provided for in the estimates dealing with market conditions and the marketing of fish products.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Departmental administration, $218,080.

Mr. BENNETT: There are a few questions that might be asked with respect to this item. What additions have been made to the departmental staff since the year ended March 31, 1937? I know there are three, but for what purpose have the additions been made? While it does not arise directly out of this item I will ask now, because it will enable the minister to give me the information later. What are the net proceeds of the last guaranteed Canadian National loan and what was the disposition made of the funds? The minister will remember that no information was given the house or the committee as to how the proceeds were distributed. It was said that it was for the purpose of reimbursing expenditures that had been made by the dominion government. Of course, it would have a direct effect on the budget itself, and before we reach that stage perhaps the minister at the appropriate moment could state what were the proceeds of the loan and its distribution.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): With respect to the first question, while I have not my documents before me, there has been very little if any change in the departmental staff under this vote. The amount of increase is just sufficient to take care of the statutory increases in salaries. Any changes that I can at the moment recall are with respect to other votes, such as housing and so forth, and do not relate to this departmental administrative vote. The increase in the vote is some $6,000, and my right hon. friend will understand there could not be an increase in the staff for such a small amount.

With respect to the other question I shall be pleased to bring down the details at the appropriate time. I shall not attempt to do so now.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not expect them to-night.

Mr. DUNNING: It is better to be accurate about a matter of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one other point. I assume that the entire finance department staff that formerly dealt with matters connected with currency is now part of the staff of the Bank of Canada, although they are housed as yet in part, until the new building is completed, in the finance department.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And the work of signing bills still goes on in the finance department, but as a matter of fact it is done for the Bank of Canada. Is that correct?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; that is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I just wanted to be sure because I was asked that question the other day.

Mr. STIRLING: What is this item of express on coin shipments? There is a considerable increase.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will be good enough to reserve his question until that vote is called, we shall have the information. The only vote I am calling to-night is the one relating to departmental administration.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Departmental administration, $137,145.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): This is exactly the same amount as last year except for an increase of $5,000 odd for the restoration of the salary deduction.

Mr. BENNETT: This would be the appropriate item under which to discuss the whole question of the administration of the Department of Justice, but it will serve my purpose if the minister is in a position to state when we may expect the report of the penitentiary commission. It is a document that will take some time to consider carefully, and I was hoping that it might be in our hands a reasonable time before the penitentiary estimates are considered.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. As a matter of fact the report is now complete and is in the hands of the translators and printers. I expect to be able to table it in the early future.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In regard to the act commonly known as the padlock law, I understand that the date for review is July 7. Will the minister be good enough to say when the government will come to a decision as to whether it is to be referred to the courts?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The decision will be reached at the appropriate time. I shall have to work pretty hard on it because, as my hon. friend says, there is not much time left for study and consideration of such an important matter. But the decision will be reached in good time.

Mr. BENNETT: These philosophical cogitations and disputations that are so essential to determine the validity of the padlock law must necessarily involve a good deal of consideration.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): A good deal.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Departmental administration, $95,775.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): The small increase of $5,000 in this item is due in part to the restoration of the five per cent salary deduction, and partly to statutory increases and a certain readjustment in positions. It will be observed from page 192 that there has been a reduction in the amount for temporary assistance. Otherwise there is no change.

Mr. BENNETT: There is just one question which arises out of the consideration of that item, and that is as to there being a congestion of work in the patent office, which some have alleged is so serious as really to invite public criticism. I promised I would bring the matter to the attention of the minister in committee of supply so that he might make a statement. I have no reason personally to believe that the situation is anything like as bad as it is said to be.

Mr. RINFRET: There is a vote later on for the patent office, and I have in my hands a report on the situation, which, as my right hon. friend says, shows the situation is not as bad as it has been depicted in some quarters. But this vote deals merely with departmental administration—correspondence, registration office, remission branch, library and the accountant's branch. There is a separate vote for the patent office, and then will be the proper time to make the report to which my right hon. friend has alluded.

Mr. BENNETT: No part of the patent office expenditures for administration or otherwise is included in the vote which we are now discussing; is that correct?

Mr. RINFRET: That is correct.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.53 p.m.

Wednesday, April 27, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—APPOINTMENT OF COUNSEL

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current) moved:

That the recommendations contained in the first report of the special committee on electoral matters, presented to the house on Tuesday, the 26th day of April, 1938, be now concurred in.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to protest against the expenditure involved in bringing counsel here for the purpose of dealing with this matter. For a long time we have had counsel employed by this committee; it was the subject matter of some discussion, not to say criticism. Information from all parts of the world has been gathered and collated. Just why additional expenditure should be incurred at this time by bringing a representative of the legal profession down to assist the committee, when the bill has been drafted, the evidence collected and the information made available, is beyond me. I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that this is a wholly unnecessary public expenditure.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Mr. Speaker, during the past two years the committee has had the benefit of the services of Mr. Butcher, who has done a great deal of work in collecting information relating to other countries and presenting it to the committee. He also had something to do with the drafting of the act now before the committee, and is able to explain the reasons for every change which may be made in that act. I understand also that he had something to do with Bill No. 90, which is also before the house, and is able to give invaluable information regarding it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Biggar is said to have been the author of that.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I do not believe he is the author of it.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister said so the other evening, but perhaps he does not know.

Mr. BOTHWELL: As I understand the situation he is not the author of that bill. Although the Prime Minister may have referred to the fact that eminent counsel had been retained for the purpose of drafting that bill, the reference may not have been to the same person.

It seems to me the committee itself should be the best judge of whether or not counsel is necessary, and the report that was presented yesterday dealing with the retention of counsel, or containing a request to the house that counsel be retained, was unanimously adopted by the committee. I think possibly the committee could get along without counsel, but we are endeavouring to bring into the house a measure which has been considered over a period of many years. Since I have been a member I think the elections act has been revised on three different occasions, and now we are endeavouring to bring in an act that will not need revision for some years to come.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I did not get my notice of the committee meeting until after that meeting had been held. I do not say this was any fault of the clerk of the committee, but it was an unfortunate circumstance; the notice was in some way mislaid and I did not receive it in time, so I did not know that the committee was meeting yesterday. I must say that in my opinion it would be—I was going to use a harsh term—rather a waste of money to retain counsel for the purpose of advising the committee in connection with the act at this stage. During the last two years the committee have been studying the matter with the assistance of Mr. Butcher, the chief electoral officer and Colonel Thompson, the franchise commissioner. In my opinion these three men have more knowledge of the electoral laws of Canada than any new counsel, I care not how learned he might be in the law, could possibly acquire during a full sitting of this parliament. It would take any new counsel, however learned he may be, a great deal of time to familiarize himself with the technique of the electoral law.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It is the same counsel; Mr. Butcher is the man referred to.

Mr. STEVENS: I had not heard the report, but I gathered there was a change. If it is Mr. Butcher I would certainly approve of his being retained for this session, because he has acquired a knowledge of the law which would be invaluable to the committee. However I was not before the committee, and I took it for granted a new counsel was being retained. If it is Mr. Butcher, I would certainly support the motion.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Swift Current was out of order in speaking to this resolution, and had he—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And so are you.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and that is the reason I say it. I had thought when he moved the motion I would be able to deal with one or two matters he mentioned. However, I have only this to say: So far as I am aware, when a bill has been introduced, as a bill, there is no precedent for the engaging of counsel. There is precedent for such engagement in the preparation of it. I have never known of a bill referred by this house to a committee involving the retaining of counsel, but I have frequently with relation to the preparation of it. That is quite a simple matter. But after the government has launched a measure and it has been offered to the house, I cannot recall any occasions—there may have been some—on which that has happened. After a measure has been crystallized into a bill, I must say the suggestion that counsel be retained is entirely new to me.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am in the happy position of being in order.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It may be only seldom, after a bill has been read the second time and referred to a committee, has counsel been appointed. I believe however that it has been done. There is nothing in the rules to prevent it. Under the rules a committee has power to summons witnesses and to appoint counsel in respect of any matter referred to the committee. The fact that the bill has been referred after second reading does not alter the situation in any way so far as the power of the committee is concerned. On the merits of the matter I suggest the house should accept the opinion of the committee on a matter of this kind. I have no doubt that this will have the consent of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: May I direct the minister's attention to one thing: He realizes, of course, that both these bills were introduced on message.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Therefore they represent the policy of the administration. While the minister has been speaking I have been thinking carefully, and I cannot recall any case in which after second reading of a bill based on a message counsel has been engaged by a committee.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I can say that without the assistance of counsel in the past two years we would have had great difficulty in committee. Only yesterday when the committee was discussing the terms of the bill it was found that the information given by counsel was of considerable assistance. But further than that several of the clauses were reserved because the phraseology employed was not exactly what had been anticipated by members who were formerly on the committee. Those were referred to counsel in order that they might be presented in proper form. In the ordinary course of events they would have been sent back to the Department of Justice. I have heard several remarks which were not very considerate of the Department of Justice—

Mr. BENNETT: The law clerks— not the Department of Justice.

Mr. GLEN: I am sure of this, that there would be a great deal more satisfaction in the committee if the phraseology of the bill were examined by the counsel who has been mentioned. I am satisfied that the members of the committee are of the opinion that in obtaining the services of the counsel named we have one who has devoted himself so assiduously to the work that when the bill is brought to the house it will be received without any of the acrimonious discussion which formerly obtained, and will be a measure acceptable to all parties.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe a reference to the terms of reference to the committee might clear up the matter. I would direct the attention of hon. members to the terms of reference as they appear in votes and proceedings of April 5. After indicating the names of the hon. members comprising the committee, the motion states that they be appointed to consider:

1. A certain bill intituled: "An act respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members to the House of Commons," and to make such amendments thereto as it deems advisable;

2. A certain bill intituled: "An act respecting political expenditures," and to make such amendments thereto as it deems advisable;

3. Such other proposed legislation relating to elections as may be referred to it by this house;

4. The methods used to effect a redistribution of electoral districts in Canada and in other countries;

5. The evidence and report of the special committee appointed in the session of 1936 and reappointed in the session of 1937 to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, and the Franchise Act, 1934;

With power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses and to report from time to time.

It will be seen that there is a very much wider reference involved than merely a single bill. It seems to me the committee have a great deal of work to do of an intricate legal character, and if they unanimously desire to reengage counsel they have had in previous sessions, I do not believe, despite my desire to save money, that I can enter any objection.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BENNETT: No; on division.

Motion agreed to on division.

OYSTER BED LEASES

READING OF PETITION OF ELLSWORTH GILLIS UNDER STANDING ORDER 68

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask, under standing order 68, that the petition of Ellsworth Gillis, tabled on the twenty-sixth instant, be now read.

Motion agreed to.

(The Clerk Assistant read the petition as follows):

To the honourable the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled:

The petition of the undersigned Ellsworth Gillis of Ellerslie, Prince Edward Island, humbly sheweth:

That his Most Gracious Majesty's privy council rulings of 1898, 1913 and 1917 in respect to fishing in the tidal waters of the dominion points out that the Fisheries Act granting fishery leases for oyster beds or fishing grounds to private interests in the tidal waters are ultra vires of the dominion.

Your petitioner therefore humbly prays that all leases of oyster beds in Prince Edward Island tidal waters to private interests be withdrawn, and if this request is not granted that the question of leasing the fishing privileges in tidal waters of Prince Edward Island be referred to the privy council in England for decision.

And as in duty bound your petitioner will ever pray.

Dated April 12th, 1938.

Ellsworth Gillis,
Secretary of Fishermen's Union,
Station No. 8, Ellerslie, P.E.I.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF MATURED, MATURING AND CALLABLE OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways and for the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada in respect of such refunding to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding $200,000,000.

He said: His Excellency, the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

ANTHRACITE COAL

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN PRICE IN THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the government and particularly the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to an increase of seventy-five cents per ton on anthracite coal which has been put into effect throughout the province of Quebec. It is said that this increase is necessary because of an increase in transportation and insurance rates as well as in the wages paid to the coal miners. We have had a lot of trouble in the province of Quebec in previous years in connection with this coal situation, and I submit an investigation should be made immediately to see whether this increase is justified. It seems to me to be extraordinary that the increase should be applied to the whole province, and I do hope the Minister of Labour will look into the matter and try to stop this increase, if possible.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent) was kind enough to give me notice of this question. My present information is that the increase to which he has referred, in the price of anthracite coal, is due to a corresponding increase in the price of British anthracite. However, I shall be very glad to look further into the matter.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED AMENDMENT RESPECTING OPERATION OF MOTOR CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker I should like to direct a question to the right hon. the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Lapointe). At the request of the minister, Bill No. 10, which stands in my name on the order paper, and was debated at length, was allowed to stand on February 17. I am willing to have this bill stand over during this session as the minister intimated that he would bring in a government bill. Can the minister give us any information soon as to when this bill will be brought down and if it will cover hit-and-run drivers? There have been thirty-one killed in our city since February 17, when the bill was up before, and the deaths from this cause in Ontario have increased for 1936 and 1937 from 221 to 304, or an increase of 37 per cent. Will the bill also include an offence for unlicensed drivers who are also causing many accidents?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am able to satisfy in part the curiosity of my hon. friend. I expect to be able within the next two weeks to introduce a bill to amend the criminal code. I can only say that this bill will contain some provision with reference to the matters covered by the bill of the hon. gentleman, but he will understand that I am unable to disclose to-day the extent to which these matters will be covered.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 105, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the resolution which preceded this bill was before the house I gave a general statement covering unemployment conditions and the various measures adopted by the government during the past year to deal with those conditions. In view of that statement and the debate which followed during the greater part of the week before the Easter recess, I think it would meet the convenience of the house if I simply made a formal motion for the second reading of this bill at this time in order to advance it to the committee stage. I shall only say in addition that this bill does not differ in any material respect from the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1937, which expired on March 31 of this year. It provides the authority by which the government may make expenditures, subject to parliamentary appropriation, either directly or under agreement with the provinces, for the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to detain the house, but I had no opportunity of speaking during the committee stage of the resolution. The resolution which preceded this bill is not the same as the bill itself. That is my first objection. My second objection is that there is no amount named in the bill, and my third objection is that it contains the same principle as previous bills of providing for contact only with the provinces, but not with the larger cities and towns. Last year we had in the bill a clause dealing with industry, but not a thing was done. Our apprenticeship problem could be solved if we had a proper contact with industry, the only agency that can aid in the solution.

Under the rules of the house the proper time to object to the principle of a bill is when it is up for second reading. May day comes next Sunday, and I do not think this bill will appeal to employers, the unemployable unemployed or the employable unemployed. The bill does not create any new jobs in Canada for Canadians. Instead of the municipalities being given some comfort in this bill, the larger cities like Montreal, Hamilton and Toronto are told that they must go to see the provincial authorities; we have no contact with you. We had commission No. 1 appointed and now roving; commission No. 2 has been appointed and we shall probably have its report after two or three years, at which time it is quite likely that another commission will be appointed.

I want to protest against the principle of this bill inasmuch as it grants no power to the government to make agreements with the larger municipalities that are suffering. The unemployed in industry are to be found in the cities and the towns, in the townships and the counties; they will not be found in the parliament buildings in the capitals of Quebec, Manitoba, British Columbia and the maritime provinces, the only people with whom the minister will make contact. All jobs in those places are patronage.

The bill itself is defective. There should be federal loans to industry, and a system of bonuses, subventions and subsidies should be established for certain key industries, just as we did with the coal industry, steel and iron to a moderate degree, and agriculture, with stabilization and other funds. On the second reading I cannot discuss the bill clause by clause, but the bill speaks of making agreements with industry as it did in 1937. No such agreement has been made, so that is a mere paper clause; any agreement made, I suppose, will be about on the same basis as last year, and as a result nothing will be done. The amount for the whole bill is not named. It is to be left, no doubt, to considerations of political expediency because, as I said and as my leader said, there are politics mixed up in many of these votes for public works for relief. Some of the provinces get the votes and others do not. To those who vote properly shall be given, and those who do not vote properly shall not be given a five cent piece, as was said a few years ago with respect to unemployment relief in Ontario. That is the kind of treatment we are getting to-day.

These loans to the provinces, and the agreements under which they are made, are of no value because the province can take the money and do what it likes with it. The auditor general has no control over its expenditure. We know how the money is spent. There has been a certain amount of chiselling in connection with relief grants. In Ontario on one occasion they struck off fifteen per cent, and in addition they took away income tax from the municipalities by two raids, first, federal, and then, provincial, by the economic raid and the financial raid. The cities and towns have had income tax from confederation down to 1918; but since then two raids were made on them, one by the province and the other by the dominion. That revenue would otherwise have gone to help take care of the relief bill, hospital and social services, in the city of Toronto, which was $51,000,000 in the last seven years, and the taxes had to be put on real estate. Of that amount, $20,000,000 is paid by the city and the balance by the dominion and the province. That is a very heavy burden for real estate to carry, and the result is that the building and construction industry is almost at a standstill. This bill will afford no comfort at all to those engaged in that industry and to the industrial workers. They are asking for something, and the government gives them nothing; they ask for bread and are given a stone. There are to be no loans under this bill to the provinces unless there is a certified statement made.

When you look at the votes for public works you find there are votes to build uneconomic roads away back in the north country. It is just a straight hand-out to a certain few contractors and those who attend the good roads meeting for the building of uneconomic roads in the back districts to Hudson bay where nobody who is an industrial worker can work. What about fifty per cent of the industrial workers of the country who will not share in any part of these votes for uneconomic roads? These votes are a direct subsidy to the oil ring and motor car industry, which is competing with the railways and taking business away from them. This bill extends the same principle. In my opinion the principle is wrong and should be remedied. There was a debate in the Ontario legislature on this subject, and the leader of the opposition there said that this bill was very largely "headlines." The leader of the government of Ontario said not only that it was "headlines" but "headaches" as well. It will give the unemployed and the municipalities a headache too on May 1 next because under this bill there is no relief provided from the intolerable conditions of last year, no relief for real estate or the cities and towns and no relief for the construction and building industry in this country. The relief being provided is only for a certain few.

Summing up the government's policy, in my opinion it is one largely of inertia, coma, vacuum, somnolence, and May day will show that I am correct. The government have no contact with the unemployed at all. The only contact they have is with the provinces, whereas the agreement should be made with the municipal authorities where relief is being paid out on the ground by the cities and towns. The government has done nothing but waste time for two years by appointing the Purvis commission. That commission did nothing but talk. Its report has come out, with a blue cover on it; but on next May 1, I am afraid the unemployed will say it should have a black cover on it, because it provides no relief for the unemployed industrial or agricultural workers who will still be carrying the black flag. This is not a practical house or a practical government, or such a state of affairs would not be tolerated.

What did they do in the United States? Compare the principle of this bill with what was done in the United States, with a population of 127,000,000 people. There, one man, Mr. Hopkins, spent $8,000,000,000 on relief for 15,000,000 people, unemployed and some of them employable. What did the United States senate tell him the other day? They passed a resolution of thanks for his great work in the past five years in the United States. The United States ten years ago had prepared by surveys and reports for those unemployment conditions. Here in Canada ten years ago, when we were sitting in opposition, I urged the government to appoint a commission after the fashion of the Couzens commission of that year in the United States. In Washington they had appointed a senate commission, and the result was they were prepared for the unemployment situation when the great crash came. They had their unemployment surveys and agencies, and all these other agencies, some of which are now recommended in the Purvis report, and I might add that some of the recommendations in the report of the Purvis commission are taken from the report of the Couzens commission re employment agencies, youth, public works and apprenticeship. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that instead of this whole question being sent to a commission, it should be handled by a committee of the House of Commons. You have reports these days, and very good ones, from committees of this house, and especially the mass buying committee of 1935 that was appointed by the present leader of the opposition. Take, for instance, the report of the Bennett mass buying committee, over which the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) presided. That commission did more work than the Purvis commission, or the Rowell commission, or any other kind of commission; the money spent on it was the best spent money this country has ever had, and the Conservative government did the work well. It showed the people and the unemployed what could be done by careful consideration by this house of this great economic problem and the real facts. The solution of unemployment should be a responsibility of the house and not of any commission, and the house should not be the slave of any commission. Are we to sit here, 245 members, and admit we are slaves to whatever commission is appointed? Are we going to admit that any commission can usurp our functions and powers, take them out of our control without the consent of the majority of the 245 members of this house? The present commission and the last commission may collect all the statistics they like and from whom they like, and gather up the fragments so that none may be lost, but they will be no closer to a solution of the problem of providing jobs for Canadians on relief. The relief problem cannot be solved by these commissions or by any maelstrom, or through a carnival of collecting facts and statistics. The unemployed on May 1 next are not going to depend upon the report of a man who is at the head of duPont's, General Motors and Canadian Industries, one of the directors of the British American Oil Company and of many other Canadian industries that are going to benefit by the policy of the government in building these uneconomic roads away in the back concessions and up around Hudson bay for the oil and motor companies as a subsidy. What benefit is that going to be to the unemployed industrial and agricultural workers? If you thus grant the oil ring and motor car companies a subsidy, so should there be subsidies, bonuses and subventions to industry and the municipalities.

As I say, the policy of the government seems to be to balance their budget, to collect income money from the municipalities, and also to enable the provinces to balance their budgets at the expense of the hungry and unfortunate unemployed. There was a million dollars in this bill in 1937 for youth, and by contrast there is in the same estimates an amount of three and a half million dollars for the health of animals. All that is done for youth is little or nothing. In my opinion there is no basic difference between losing one's home on a farm in Saskatchewan by the drought route, and losing one's job at home by the unemployment and foreclosure route, which is the way the industrial worker is losing his home. This parliament puts one section, Saskatchewan, on a preferred basis compared with other provinces where the industrial workers are. We are supposed to legislate on a fair, just and equal basis for the whole dominion. But this parliament places agriculturists in a preferred class. I do not object to what has been done out there; far from it; but I object to the treatment meted out to the outcast and forgotten man under confederation, the industrial workers, comprising fifty-one per cent of the population of Canada.

Further, parliament imposes all kinds of taxes. It has raided the income tax field. Now, after two years' delay, the government is back to where it started. It has collected all the facts, but the unemployment situation is very little better than it was before. True it is that there are a few more men in casual work and some other occupations; but it is seasonal, and there has been no proper count made of the unemployed; some of them find work for a short time; but as for any real improvement, I fail to see it, and many listed as employed are so only for a few weeks and are yet employable unemployed. In the Couzens report and the Washington senate committee's report I find several clauses which make some attempt to deal with conditions as they found them; but as for this blue report, we find it of little value. I hope this is the last we shall hear of it, because all this Purvis commission has been is just a humpty-dumpty commission, leaving the unemployed out in the cold. The lady member of the commission seems to be the only member who has a sense of humour. She refers in her minority report to the commission suggesting a method of partition requiring the wisdom and the law of Solomon—with apologies to King Solomon. With such a report as this we have seen, I hope, the end of that vain-glorious humpty-dumpty commission. I opposed its appointment two years ago. I believe that my honoured leader has hit the nail right on the head as regards the way to deal with unemployment; a committee of this house could have met a committee of the provinces around a table and settled the whole question instead of the government appointing a string of royal commissions to act in the way they have done.

I also believe that the kind of agreement about which there was some discussion yesterday, a sort of quasi free trade with twenty to twenty-four countries, tends to the ruin of the home market and the industrial worker. The industrialist cannot figure where his business is going to wind up, because of the taxes imposed upon him and the conditions he has to meet. The way the tariff is being administered now, the tariff has a great deal to do with the matter.

There was a long discussion yesterday with regard to fisheries. I sympathize with the poor people engaged in the fish trade in the maritimes. We know something of what the trawlers have had to meet; yet there is not one word in this report about the fish industry, large and small; not one word about a national coal supply, or anything else that will help the country out; nothing about protection for all these workmen, that would create work for thousands. They could well afford to have had a survey made of the fish industry. I remember in 1924 when hon. members opposite laughed at the idea of a national coal inquiry; Sir Henry Thornton said I was proposing a lunch-counter system of freight rates with subventions and subsidies and bonuses for coal; but to-day three million tons of coal move economically from the maritimes to the head of the lakes as a result of that sound policy with work for thousands. I would apply the same policy of bonuses and subventions and subsidies to industry and agriculture, to protect these primary industries. In England the government has taken over the coal mines. I am not prepared to say that we in this country should go so far as that, but I believe a survey should be made to see what could be done to arrange for a national coal supply, in relation to national employment, so that all the coal we use in this country will create employment for our people; that is, it will be mined under the British flag either in Alberta and the maritime provinces or in Wales. The same policy could be adopted on behalf of the fisheries, the small man and the trawlers.

We are told in the report of the Purvis commission—and the bill admits it—that nothing can be done to give effect to these recommendations of the commission until this larger and vaster commission than has been has presented its report. I saw some of them in Toronto on Monday morning, these gentlemen with all the secretaries, counsel, advisers and others. Talk about King Solomon in all his glory; he was not arrayed like unto these. They paraded up to the parliament buildings there, where Attorney General Conant in the legislative chamber was ready and delivered an address of welcome, after his leader in the house had said only a month ago that a lot of this government's policy for relief and employment was a "headline and a headache." Now this commission arrived at the parliament buildings to be welcomed by the Ontario administration with applause, this commission which is just doing work that this house could have done; they could find the same information in the library in books and stacks of volumes of reports. If all these commissions were lined up here in front of the parliament buildings on one of these fine days, parading two deep, with all the employees, secretaries, counsel, advisers and others, and the private members associated with them, and with all their briefs stretched out, they would reach one-third of the way to Lansdowne park.

What is this new, vaster than has been, commission doing? My resolution which was discussed in the house at the time when this Purvis commission was appointed, proposed an investigation in connection with the British North America Act and of constitutional and parliamentary law and cabinet reforms which are wrapped up in this particular question. At that time I was told by the responsible minister that it was intended to appoint this vaster commission. The commission was appointed a year after. Instead of dealing with the British North America Act they are going all over creation. They have had as a witness a former chancellor of Germany over here. Dear knows how long they will go on with all the witnesses they are calling, from all over the world; yet all they can do is to give this parliament advice and collect data, with no power to act or go places. You should see the parade of them into the legislative chamber; there were more there than the whole of the legislative assembly to hear these wonderful commission people, including Doctor Dafoe, who was criticizing a while ago the waste of natural resources. Doctor Dafoe seemed to be the gloomy dean of the commission. It was only ten years ago, when I sat in the house, that the said doctor—I do not know what he is doctor of—was in the gallery on a visit to Ottawa about the time when the Siftons by the Ottawa canal bill were trying to get the whole Georgian bay and all the natural resources and water powers of the Ottawa river given over to them by a Liberal government, in the spring of 1927. I say that is the answer to the reference by one of the commissioners to the waste of natural resources, which has no doubt caused considerable unemployment.

This new commission is dealing with the very thing which is covered by the Purvis report. In fact, the Purvis commission seems to be the lower house and the Rowell commission the upper house in connection with this whole question. After a review of the Rowell commission I would call them the doomsday commission; when all the reports they are collecting have been assembled they will be known as the collector of the modern doomsday book. The doomsday book of 1086 was a real report. It is the first economic report we have. It counted up every man, woman and child in England; it enumerated every town, house, lot, farm, horse, pig, cow, sheep, it was a real report and it gave some information. It was not like some of our modern commission reports for which the minister is responsible. In the minister's department the unemployment situation is dealt with by means of an index system; a few letters are written to industries inquiring as to the number on the payroll, and so on. That is not the sort of report that will get us anywhere. I know of one industry in Canada presided over by the chairman of this commission. What did he do in the very week during which this report was signed and presented? What did this representative of the duPont dynasty do?—this gentleman who is supposed to have the interests of the Canadian working class at heart? I will tell you what he did in one industry. He and his fellow directors and managers introduced into the industry of which he is the head a machine that put out of employment seven or eight men who in all their lives had never been off the payroll. That is one thing he did in one of the industries of which he is a director and it indicates how he solves the unemployment problem.

I can tell the minister that there will come a day of reckoning for the government on account of these royal commissions they have appointed. Yes; there will be a day of reckoning for the way in which they have mishandled this whole problem. Compare what these roving commissions in Canada have done; compare the way in which this government has handled the unemployment situation, with the work that has been done in the United States, by one man, Mr. Hopkins, in a country with a population of 127,000,000. He had the power to do something and he went ahead and did something practical. The other day he was congratulated by the United States senate upon the manner in which he had dealt with the question not only in connection with housing and slum clearance, but in other respects as well. I do not approve everything that has been done in the United States in this regard; far from it. I know that they have made mistakes, naturally; but they have done a good deal nevertheless for those on relief and for the municipalities. They have done good work in many ways in dealing with the unemployment problem.

In Canada a good deal of unemployment has been caused by the failure of the government to put on dumping duties and tariff protection and thereby give industry a chance. We have been here now for three years, this is the third session. The first year we went away without having accomplished anything; the second year a commission was appointed to make an investigation; and now the matter is still being investigated. We have had one report, and by the time the whole thing is disposed of, it will be found that nothing has been done. The very object of appointing the Purvis and Rowell commissions has been to prevent the House of Commons from doing anything practical; they have simply hindered the House of Commons in its functions. That is the purpose for which these commissions were appointed, as the government do not want to solve things, and the result is that the unemployed are still idle. The government's present policy will get us nowhere. It seems for the unemployed to be based on the principle that a commission a day will keep the bailiff away. The government's policy has been simply this: it has mistaken the babble of the Purvis and Rowell commissions for the voice of the people of Canada on these social and industrial questions.

I asked certain questions in regard to slum clearance, and housing, and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) also made certain inquiries along that line, but we have not received any very definite information. The leader of our party when in power appointed a committee of the house to look into the question of some slum clearance, and housing, and that committee sat for weeks and got somewhere on the motion I introduced in 1935.

In reply to questions asked by the hon. member for Greenwood in 1935 as to what had been done in regard to housing, we found that nothing had been done. They did not have a place even to house Duncan Marshall's famous bull and it died.

On April 6, I asked the following question with regard to the recommendations of the housing commission:

1. Have any steps been taken by the government to carry out the recommendations of the special committee on housing in 1935 in their final report?

2. Will any federal slum clearance program as set out in this report be considered or brought down this session not only for the cities, but for the country?

In answer to the first question the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) replied in the affirmative. He seemed to be the only minister doing anything in connection with the Dominion Housing Act. Under the housing act a lot of money has been spent, and I admit it has helped some people and given them a good bargain; but the unfortunate part of it is that though the act is dominion-wide it has been of little benefit to those who have no money. It is only for those possessed of some assets and employable. As for any general scheme to help the industrial worker, nothing whatever has been done to give him work from industry by the bonus and subsidy policy. The industrial worker does not want any favours; he simply asks for equality of treatment with others as in Saskatchewan. He wants to get equal treatment with the agriculturist. If the government had set up a committee of the house three years ago we would have got somewhere. To return to the work done by Mr. Hopkins, what did he do? He himself ascertained the extent of unemployment among a population of 127,000,000; then he asked for the necessary money that would enable him to act, and he did act. Before he took charge—just one man in that vast country—people stood in the bread line for hours, and many were foreclosed. Now conditions there are not what they used to be. But what is being done in Canada?

The minister referred to the tourist trade and he gave an estimate of what it would amount to. He talked about three hundred millions, but that seems to me to be altogether too extravagant. At any rate, how that is going to help the unemployment situation I do not know, and where does the estimate come from? No doubt it creates some work.

In England the government, through its responsible ministers, addressed the unemployed and the youth of the country, saying to them: "You young people are on the dole. Would it not be far better for you to work for the government and for your country on land and sea and in the air and be independent, serving for five years and on a voluntary apprenticeship? You will learn a trade and will receive from $1 to $1.50 a day and you will get your food and clothing, and splendid recreation, not in crowded camps but in good housing accommodation. You will live the life of an ordinary civilian in this volunteer service." That was what the government did in England, and the result is that a large number of the youthful unemployed have been taken off the relief rolls. The movement has been twice blessed; it has helped to rearm England and it has been a great boon to industry and to employment. We were told that this government, if elected, would end unemployment, but after three years they have done nothing. All they have done has been to submit to the law courts the wise, social legislation passed by the former government; yet they are ready to criticize the one government that did do something for the industrial workers of Canada. The former Prime Minister, now leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), got a raw deal because he was the first Prime Minister since confederation to explore all the paths of trade and commerce and to adopt practical measures to cope with the unemployment situation. But we find now that these roving commissions appointed by the present government simply move around the country like an opera company and minstrel show, crowding all the hotels and trains, and reaping the benefit of the work done by the mass buying committee and commission appointed by the late government to investigate these very problems that these commissions are now looking into. When their report is presented you will see that it will be merely a paraphrase of the Couzens report, after the fashion of the report of commission No. 1. The Purvis commission was the retail end of it and the Rowell commission is the wholesale end of the commission trade.

Now I wish to refer to the situation of the city from which I come in regard to unemployment. The government say they are sick and tired of hearing about life-saving stations. Well, they had to call upon the United States life-saving crews frequently in order to save Canadian lives on the upper great lakes; I can give you the pictures if you want to see them. If we created our own national life-saving service and training for the navy and merchant marine, it would help create employment and would be of benefit to shipping and empire defence. This government sent representatives to the last imperial conference. There New Zealand and Australia learned something about how to relieve unemployment through shipping, but what did we do? Our representatives sat there and did nothing but veto every proposal for a shipping solution. New Zealand and Australia got something out of it. I have here a return from the city treasurer of Toronto showing that over $51,000,000 has been spent in that city in direct relief, hospitalization, social services and things of that kind. In the last seven years this government have taken from the province of Ontario over $250,000,000 by way of income tax. The figures for each year are as follows:

1933	30,681,000
1934	28,613,000
1935	32,104,000

This is from the last monthly statement of the Bank of Canada, the white book which is published monthly. In other words, during these seven years this government took from the industrial province of Ontario the sum of $254,697,000 in income tax, and for 1938 it will probably amount to $72,000,000. What did they spend on relief during that time? For the whole of Canada they spent only $203,000,000 on direct relief. In other words they collected $51,000,000 more in income tax from Ontario then the total cost to them of relief in Canada. That shows the extent to which Toronto and the other large industrial cities of Ontario are soaked, and they can get no relief. One of the results of these employment commissions is that they create more unemployment. Unemployment is caused by the government appointing commissions to meddle in domestic and economic problems. In all this I see the decay of parliament and the decline of the House of Commons. The report proposes no new remedy for Canada's problem of distribution or for restoring private property, as it was held by the people in the days of Macdonald and Laurier. I contend that if the Purvis commission had made a survey along the lines of the survey made by Hon. Mr. Brown, Minister of Labour in England, a great many of these young people who were taking the dole would have welcomed the opportunity of learning a trade under the apprenticeship system that I suggested some time ago. Two years ago, when discussing the appointment of the Purvis commission, I told the house something of what had been done by the British board of education along this line, and Miss Perkins, secretary of labour in the United States, has adopted some features of that English educational system of apprenticeship.

The other evening a special grant of some $2,000,000 was made to Saskatchewan, most of it for education. That is one of the difficulties under the present state of affairs. Does the house know that the city from which I come spends about $12,000,000 on education, and receives from the province only from nine to eleven per cent of that amount? In other words about ninety per cent of that amount has to be paid by the taxpayers of Toronto. There should be concurrent jurisdiction in regard to education; the dominion should contribute something also for education for each municipality. That would create employment, and the same would apply to public health. We hear talk about the road problem; the government are going to do something about these uneconomic, wasteful roads, which are nothing but subsidies to the oil and motor car industries. The roads should be built somewhat around the industrial cities and counties where the unemployment problem centres most.

The decision to give work instead of a dole to the unemployed is a bold experiment which has national sympathy. All recognize the demoralizing effects of idleness, and the improved morale that comes with work. There is agreement that the unemployed and destitute must be cared for in a humane manner, and that this had much better be done by providing work at fair remuneration than by any system of gratuitous public support. The real question is whether so vast an undertaking to provide employment under government auspices will realize the hopes that inspire it. From the standpoint of the rest of the community it must be regarded as an additional problem and burden at a time when each and every household is beset with new problems and difficulties of its own. Granted that there is a social obligation to care for the helpless, there is a primary obligation for every person to provide for himself and his family dependents in so far as he can do so, that he and they may not be a burden upon others. It is the individual's own sense of this obligation and of his failure to meet it that causes the humiliation and moral deterioration resulting from the continued receipt of public relief. All social obligations are reciprocal; no one owes more to another than the other owes to him, and self-respect requires of all of us that we impose no unnecessary burdens on each other.

The right to work is real in a proper sense. It is right that everyone should have an opportunity to work, but as one person's claim on his fellows it is subject to limitations. It cannot be said that he has a right to any particular kind of work, or work at any particular rate of pay, or at any particular place, for obviously it might not be possible for every person to be supplied with work on his own terms. The rights of an individual are limited by the equal rights of all other persons, and regard for the general welfare must be the guiding principle.

These considerations require that the policy of aid to the unemployed shall have regard for industrial recovery. First in importance to the common welfare is the maintenance of the economic system in at least its present efficiency, and its restoration to normal capacity as quickly as possible. The monetary system is the very heart of the economic system, and the solvency of the nation is dependent upon both. A breakdown of the monetary system would paralyze industry and plunge the nation into chaos. I have referred to the standing menace of currency agitation and the relation of an unbalanced budget to this peril is the very crux of the problem. Unless favourable results from the policy are evident, the treasury deficit will naturally become a matter of increasing concern among investors and business men considering long term commitments, the very class of business in which revival is most needed in order to revive industry.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that coming from the industrial city of Toronto I am very much disappointed in this bill now before the house. However, there is one provision in it of which I think advantage should be taken. It is the provision concerning agreements granting financial assistance to industry. I believe if we applied bonuses, subventions and subsidies not only to agriculture but also to industry, some result might be achieved. I believe also there should be large grants to the larger municipalities in order to help them solve their real estate problems. The province is taking $11,000,000 from Toronto by way of income tax, and only about two and a half million is given back. As a result the city is out about $9,000,000. The receipts from that income tax would go to take care of municipal services of all kinds, which have been starved for the past six years. In Italy they have solved the problem. They are advancing money to the municipalities for the relief of unemployment, to be used in the construction of schools, courthouses, hospitals and public works of every kind, taking care of their needs for the next forty-five years. I am suggesting that these loans be made in a lesser degree to the municipalities. We will remember that in 1919 a loan of $21,000,000 was made to municipalities for housing purposes. Almost every dollar of that money was paid back. In fact the municipalities seem to be the only organizations which pay back to parliament. Does the Quebec harbour board pay back, or do other harbour boards pay back money advanced? No, they do not.

For these reasons I believe the bill is not adequate and does not provide an adequate remedy. It does not provide enough and will be only a small source of comfort to the unemployed next May day. We have sat here and failed to do anything. We appoint commissions which do nothing. The onus for the solution of the problem is on the government, and so long as they form the government hon. members opposite must accept this great responsibility, a responsibility with respect to which they have fallen down all along the line. They have attempted to transfer the responsibility to a roving commission which appears in Vancouver to-day, Calgary to-morrow, Toronto the day after, and dear knows where they may be before they wind up.

This is not the responsibility of a commission; it is that of the House of Commons and the government. One point further: I believe the right hon. the leader of the opposition will be remembered by the people of Canada for many years to come. He was the first man who ever tackled social problems and trade and commerce, and who ever attempted to dissect sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. He would have had this matter discussed around a table by the dominion and the provinces and got a quicker solution. He did the spade-work, and got nothing but abuse for it. Although my right hon. leader may not be the head of the government, certainly he is de facto the leader of the House of Commons in matters of legislation this and last session. Certainly the government would have been better off if it had accepted his constructive policy of meeting around a table here in Ottawa, of hearing the views of the provincial governments and attempting to bring about the solution of the problem when all information was available.

I see no hope at all for the municipalities. They are outcasts. The federal government will not deal with them. One might think that they had some sort of legislative disease. This government will not deal with the mayors and boards of control of Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal and other cities. It says, "You may go to the provincial governments. We will have no contact with you." That is a wrong policy, and one which has been found wanting in many respects. The matter is being handled in England, New Zealand and Australia, but we sit here day after day and do nothing but act as a lot of slaves for these useless commissions.

Mr. J. A. MARSH (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to be brief in the observations I have to make on this measure which has for its purpose the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress. After studying the contents of the bill one must conclude that in scope it seems to be broad enough; it seems specific enough in its clauses to meet that problem which, I believe we must all admit, is one of the greatest problems confronting our people.

But I am mindful of the fact that we have on our statute books measures which, while considered wise when they were passed, have failed to remedy conditions, because of poor administration. For that reason, and because the present measure is not dissimilar from the bill of last year, I am much concerned as to the possibility of proper administration.

Much of the discussion in the house thus far respecting unemployment—and I must plead guilty to contributing my share—has dealt chiefly with the extent of the problem. We have failed in our consideration of what we must do to cure the ills of unemployment. I wonder if we can look forward, not back. I wonder if we can forget the things that have been done in the last few years in an effort to solve the problem? I wonder if we will devote our attention to the problems of to-day, and if we will deal with them. We must, too, be mindful of the problems of to-morrow. I do submit, however, that so much of our discussion concerns yesterday and yesterday's problems that, for the most part it is futile and useless.

When the resolution upon which this bill is founded was in committee stage some weeks ago, the minister said that we should avoid excessive pessimism. I heartily agree, because I dislike the pessimist and avoid him as heartily as I do those little black and white animals we meet occasionally on the back roads. I believe the biological name is mephitis mephitica—and that is not the name for a cat. I do not like the attitude of the pessimist, but I suggest we cannot be blamed for being conscious of, alive to and aware of the tremendous distress throughout the country to-day. That consciousness is not pessimism; pessimism is the refuge of the craven. Rather than being pessimistic I suggest we are simply being aware of the hardships being undergone by our fellow men. The problem is a difficult one, one which requires not an alleviate, not a prop or a crutch—because these are not permanent—but a cure.

No one can be more conscious than I am of the difficulty the minister had in administering the last measure. A few days ago I was speaking to the mayor of Hamilton, and during the course of our conversation it was indicated that in Hamilton $4,000,000 had been spent in five years for purposes of relief. Of that amount $3,000,000 had been funded. We find, further, that to-day the city of Hamilton is increasing its relief rolls to the extent of 1,000 people a month. I am informed 250 heads of families a month have been added in the last three months to our relief rolls, and this at a time when one might normally expect conditions to improve, the spring of the year. In that observation I make allowance for the normal lag in relief figures from the winter months.

In other words, no matter how we may brag about our trade, the situation in Hamilton—and after all I speak for Hamilton, because if every hon. member discussed the problem as he knows it best we would make better progress—is becoming definitely worse. Certainly it is not getting better.

I wonder if our approach to the problem has been lacking, as we have tried to deal with it year after year. My submission is that if we can find a way to stimulate the building trades, and to reestablish the home as the centre of national prosperity in this, or any other country, we could go a long way towards solving the difficulty. In Hamilton there are sixteen per cent fewer homes owned to-day than there were seven years ago. Only three or four days ago eight hundred properties in Hamilton were sold at a tax sale, and as a result the city became a property-poor landlord. The amount of money involved was $85,000. Why has that condition developed? The reason is that the home owner and the tenant—because whether or not a man owns a home he must pay for it if he lives in it as a tenant—are staggering under burdensome taxation which they cannot long continue to bear.

That burden has been placed on his shoulders by one senior and two junior governments, namely the federal, and the provincial and municipal governments. I do not think the city I represent is any different from any other city. I am convinced that the cities of this country are becoming property-poor landlords; that their people are gradually becoming a nomadic race who wander about from one house to another, sometimes doubling up two or three families in a house. This is aggravating a housing problem, of which I know the minister is conscious.

I was interested in the minister's report on housing. I have nothing condemnatory to say of the housing program, but I suggest that he is inconsistent when he refuses to co-operate with the mayors' association to provide a solution and do something for our municipalities. If it is necessary that our people should be properly housed, it is also necessary that the confidence of the man who owns a home should be built up so that he will have an urge to keep it.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think my hon. friend intends to misrepresent me. I did see the mayors' association, not once but on several occasions.

Mr. MARSH: I did not mean to say that the minister did not see the association; I know that he did. What I meant to convey was that the Minister of Labour has not seen fit to bring in any legislation that would lessen the load, that would proceed along the lines suggested by the mayors. If we can create in the man who owns a home the urge to keep that home; if we can make it possible for a young man and woman to own a home without being staggered by the burden of taxation and being forced to say, "What is the use, it will be confiscated in a few years?" then I submit that we shall be doing something for unemployment.

I wonder if it is possible that we as a parliament are thinking too much internationally; that we are thinking of international problems, of the place of Canada in the empire or in the world of nations. Are we thinking too much about big projects and neglecting the biggest thing we have to-day in the Dominion of Canada? What is that? It is a man. Take that John Citizen and multiply him a few hundreds of thousands of times and you have a nation. We should get down to fundamentals and think in terms of men and women, of young men and women. When we think in terms of the individual, then we shall be thinking in terms of national prosperity.

I should like to read an article that appeared in a magazine called Canada's Business. I think it is so fine and deals so clearly with this situation that it should be read into Hansard. The title of the article is "Taxes Retard Building" and it reads:

During the last eighteen months the federal government has been priming the building pump through its public works, H.I.P. and home building legislation. Only recently another dominion-wide architectural competition has been announced from Ottawa but even in the low-cost-home field, which this latest contest is designed to assist, there is another factor that would seem to need urgent consideration by governments—taxation on property. In 1934, for instance, about one-third of Canada's tax revenue from all sources was derived from taxes on real property.

The Rowell commission inquiry is bringing to light many interesting facts and that brief presented by Winnipeg's real estate board, while only one of the property owners' voices that will be heard, bears comment. In Winnipeg, to take a particular case, property owners pay 92 per cent of that municipality's revenue in levies on real property or in charges connected therewith and revenue from other sources in most municipalities is likewise compaartively small.

I would interject to say that in the case of Toronto the percentage is 90 per cent, and in the case of Hamilton, approximately 89 per cent. I quote:

While rents vary with the times, the property owner goes on paying static or increasing taxes, meanwhile, the property tax bears no relation to earnings from that property, although this tax basis is enjoyed by Great Britain.

But property owners in Winnipeg comprise less than one-third of the voting population of that city. Thus the people who pay 92 per cent of the taxes are outnumbered two to one by other voters. Is this an unfair burden on a minority of the voters who have a minor voice in electing those who dictate tax rates and tax spending? The vast amount of property taken over by the city for tax arrears shows how little encouragement there is, for people to build their own homes.

Moreover, in the nine years from 1928 to 1936 city taxes on 23 representative commercial properties in Winnipeg averaged 37 per cent of gross revenue from these properties or over three times the respective wage bill.

What is the best way to make a good Canadian? I submit that the best way to make a good Canadian is to give him a stake in the country. If I ask one of my fascist friends to tell me about fascism he cannot do it; there is not one in a hundred who can. If I ask my communist friends to describe communism to me, there is not one in a hundred who can do it. But if I ask any one of those men if he understands what it means to lose a home, what it means to be discontented, he will soon say, "amen" and give me a complete peroration on what it means in the way of human hardship to lose a home.

Discontented men and women provide fertile fields in which the fascist party—I think their numbers have been greatly exaggerated —or the communist party—likewise exaggerated—can sow their seed, which may be nurtured and grow to be a real danger to our democracy. What can we do? We can make real estate attractive to private capital. I do not think the erection of public buildings is a solution. The solution would be to spread that money around by way of lessened taxes on those who have property and thus give encouragement to young men and women who want to buy homes. At the moment private capital considers that an investment in real estate is throwing money down the sewer.

For the last two or three years the civic administration of the municipality that I represent has hewed close to the line. The city of Hamilton is a business man's city and it has been run as such. Expenditures have been wisely made; we have been paying as we go. Two and a half years ago the city of Hamilton was nearly bankrupt; to-day it is solvent. But what encouragement do we get? In the last three years the basis upon which relief has been paid has been increased from 20 per cent to 37½ per cent. We cannot plan; we cannot budget successfully when we do not know what we shall have to pay for relief. It will be impossible for us to remain solvent if we have to continue to bear the present load of 37½ per cent of relief expenditures.

The minister may say, "Where am I going to get the money"? Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will want to know that. As I said on one other occasion and as stated in this chamber many times, the municipality is extremely limited in its scope of taxation. The provincial government has wider powers of taxation, but the dominion government has the widest powers of all. We as a government have no money? May I assure you the home owner has none and we are trying to take from him the little he has, namely his equity in his home, the only thing that keeps him a good Canadian.

There are natural difficulties in the way of the successful administration of this legislation. There are problems that might be said to be provincial. There are provinces to the west of us which in years gone by have contributed to the granaries of the world. They have been mighty provinces and they will be mighty again. I am not bragging; I am simply stating a fact when I say that in Ontario we have no destructive acts of God. Our acts of God are blessings. We have no catastrophes; we have no famines. Our problems to-morrow will be substantially what they are to-day, and our problems to-day are pretty much what they were yesterday. But the fact remains that old Ontario has paid millions and millions of dollars to the west. We are glad to have done so and I wish we could do more; but if the province of Ontario is to remain solvent; if it is to continue to be the financial anchor upon which the other provinces may depend in times of stress, then the province and the municipalities in Ontario must be given a break.

Just a word about youth reestablishment. I am asking the question: What has youth received in return for the two million dollars that was voted last year? I am not asking it in any sneering way, because I am not sure but what the minister has done as much with that two million dollars as he has been able to do; but I am cognizant of the fact that 1,606 young men were put into either learnership courses or apprenticeship courses to farmers, and that approximately 1,100 young women were put into training in this or that vocation or into the home.

Mr. ROGERS: Is my hon. friend speaking of Ontario? His figures must be for one single province.

Mr. MARSH: Yes; I was speaking of Ontario. I am subject to correction, but I understand that the number was 1,606 young men and over a thousand young women. Might I suggest that that vote has merely scratched the surface. Great problems in the past have been sometimes met with the theory that the end justifies the means, and therefore we have to do it. I do not like to talk about war; I hope we may be spared a war, and yet the time may come when we shall have a war. If a war were to start, and if the very existence of Canada were at stake, this parliament, I venture to say, would vote a few hundred millions of dollars just like that, and seventy-five per cent of the members sitting here would vote yea. Is it possible that this problem of youth reestablishment is one of which we can say that the end justifies the means. Let us forget about the emotional and sentimental part of young men and young women, forget for a moment their spiritual needs and the ideals that are so common to youth, and think just for a moment of the problem as a financial one. I am told that it costs $7,000 to bring a child into the world, and to bring him or her up through the tender years of childhood through public school to high school, pay doctors' and dentists' bills, and pay the contribution we all have to make for living in organized society, and turning him out at the age of sixteen into the professional, mercantile or industrial world. Now seven thousand times the number of young men and young women of sixteen years of age who are out of a job represent the substantial sum of several hundred million dollars, and that is an investment which is yours, Mr. Speaker, and mine, and which we should protect. I hope the minister has in mind appealing to this parliament for a substantially increased vote for the reestablishment of youth.

And now may I ask that this government deal with the realities and be not too much concerned with the supposedly big things? What are the realities? Home, the individual, young men and young women. These are the things which contribute towards the wealth of this country, and it is the only wealth about which we as a people are justified in boasting.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I offer no apology for speaking once again on this subject. It will be recalled that I spoke on it when the resolution which preceded the bill was before the house. At that time we did not know what the bill would contain, but judging from the resolution itself I took the liberty of suggesting that the bill would not visualize a forward step in dealing with this great problem.

I do not apologize for another reason, and it is this, that this is the most important measure to come before parliament this session—the most important measure, bar none. It represents the full measure of the government's appreciation of the great problem of agricultural distress and unemployment and their duty towards it; and realizing that, I cannot remain silent. In the face of this bill I must express not only my disappointment but in perhaps more precise terms my criticism of the course which the government has pursued.

One would think that parliament, and indeed the government, were unaware of the fact that we are actually in a new economic era. We have been passing through a veritable revolution during this last ten years. It has been a bloodless revolution, for which we should be duly thankful; nevertheless it has been a real revolution. The conditions that obtain to-day and the major economic factors dominating our life are such as never existed before, nor shall we ever return to the conditions and the dominating factors of ten years ago. Scarcely a day passes that one does not hear some business man— I qualify that because, thank heaven, there are a great many who to-day are coming to realize the situation; but you hear some fairly prominent business men talking as if we were going to turn back the wheels of time to the conditions that preceded 1929. I think parliament ought at least to come to this fundamental decision, that we shall never go back to those conditions again.

My hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Marsh) very properly suggested that we should look at the problems as they are today and as we anticipate them to be tomorrow and in the days to come, and that we should forget the past. I would not like to go that far because I do believe that from the experience of the past there are very many valuable lessons to be learned. But to base our legislation, the measures we are adopting, upon the assumption that by a turn of the wheel we are going to wake up some time and find ourselves back in the halcyon days of 1928 and 1929 is sheer folly. Indeed, I feel to an extreme degree the responsibility that rests upon me as an individual member of the house; and to a much greater degree does that responsibility rest upon the shoulders of the government. There never has been a leader of the government in Canada who has been louder in his advocacy of responsible government than the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), but I want to say this to him—I am sorry he is not in his seat—and to his colleagues that it would appear—I hope I may be wrong—that they are basing their legislation and their discharge of their duty upon an evasion of responsibility rather than upon an acceptance of it. That is the situation developing in this country, as I see it, and I am hoping that before this session ends we may find the government giving some leadership in accepting responsibility in some of these matters.

Let me turn for a moment to the bill. This bill is supposed to be, on the implied assurances of the minister, at least, and his colleagues, the fruition, shall I say, of the labours of the commission that has been sitting for two years. That is what this bill is supposed to be, because two years ago when we were asked to vote for the appointment of the commission we were assured that it was necessary to set up the commission in order to explore the ground, and that when the commission had performed its duty that would be the time when we might expect measures to give effect to recommendations made after a careful study of the conditions. I again remind the minister that when the commission bill was before the house I warned the government that we should wake up—after eighteen months, I said; I find it is two years now—with little or no progress made. The preamble of that bill, chapter 7 of the statutes of 1936, closes with this sentence:

> Whereas it would appear that such nation-wide cooperative effort can best be effected through the appointment of a representative national commission, with power to cooperate with the provinces, municipalities and other agencies in respect of unemployment relief, and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed. . . .

As I pointed out the other day, the net result as far as the commission is concerned is a report which shows that the commission had become acquainted with the various problems, and it makes certain recommendations and suggestions. That in itself is somewhat disappointing, but the bill that the minister now bases upon the commission's report is nothing more, in effect, than the bill we had two years ago, three and four years ago, and certainly a year ago, and is simply carrying on the same old form of temporary cooperation with the provinces. Indeed it goes a step further down the scale by saying that the dominion "should continue for a further period to support and supplement the measures of the provinces." The word "supplement" is introduced for the first time. The government is accepting an even lower position of responsibility than it ever did before, by implying, through the introduction of the word "supplement," that the measures must be instigated or originated by the provinces and that this parliament will provide for supplementing such measures.

Surely parliament must be alive to the position in which we now find ourselves. The commission appointed two years ago has studied this question, yet now we are merely asked to do exactly what was done two years ago and a year ago and other years preceding them; there is nothing at all in the nature of progressive measures, no recognition of the possibility of a solution of the problems, no recognition of the fact that there are definite, permanent problems. I wish I could impress that point upon the mind of the minister, that we are confronted with definite, permanent problems and not merely an emergency such as we thought, about nine years ago, was all that this condition represented. When the collapse of the New York stock exchange occurred in the fall of 1929, and we were faced with a serious recession of industrial and financial activity all over the continent, there was naturally a condition of emergency; then unemployment occurred, and it swept through the country. But surely now that it has lasted for nine years, and along with that experience we have, goodness knows, literally mountains of reports, in the United States and Canada as well as from other parts of the world, showing the existence and the causes of this problem, it is most deplorable that we find ourselves just where we were at any time during this depression period, and virtually no further advanced; a little provision made for a few men here and there, but no attempt at a solution.

Let me say one other thing before I refer further to the report itself. As I said when I spoke on the resolution, it is rumoured that the government intends to bring in a list of appropriations for public works. I submit to hon. members that that list of appropriations should have accompanied this bill or should have been tabled with it, so that we could give fair weight to whatever effect they may have on existing conditions. As I have already said, it may be that these appropriations will disclose something startling, but from my survey of the government's approach to the question I do not anticipate anything of the kind. I think what it will probably amount to is a list of public works, such as post offices and buildings and dams, scattered over the various constituencies of Canada, which will have a tendency to act as a sedative to local disturbance and agitation. It is possible that there will be included in the appropriation some lump sums for cooperation with provinces in road building and a few other activities of the kind. That is about what one can visualize. I would say that this bill should not pass its second reading until the minister tables the appropriations referred to in the bill and upon which the efficacy of these measures depends. All through the bill, it will be noted, such language as this is used, that the government may enter into agreements with provinces and depending upon expenditures such as are "made out of moneys appropriated by parliament." I suggest to the minister and to the government that before parliament is asked to give sanction to the second reading of this bill there should be tabled the list of appropriations referred to in this bill.

Having said that, I wish to discuss the matter in a little more general way. One would naturally expect that the bill would give effect to what I consider to be the somewhat meagre recommendations of the commission. No one can say that this commission ran wild. No one can criticise it on the ground that the measures it suggests are too extravagant. They are extremely cautious and conservative: in my opinion they do not go in any sense far enough. But the bill which represents the action of the government falls short of the report itself. It does not implement that report to any extent. I find very little in this bill which deals, for instance, with the tourist trade. I do not know that there was much in the commission's suggestion, except that this is an important activity and should be exploited and developed. Already we have a body to do it, but one would have thought that some attention might have been given to the matter. Take the question of housing, which was dealt with in such an interesting way by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh) and was referred to in the interim report. Here again the commission were exceedingly cautious, but they do recommend a definite attempt to promote and encourage housing. I have spoken on this so often that I do not intend to labour it, as my views are very well known. It is not a solution of the economic difficulties which are the background of our problem—not at all, but it is one of the things which would lend itself to a most substantial reduction of the number of unemployed. A day or two ago I was reading a report from the United States in which it was stated that the value of the ordinary dwelling houses of the people of that country is greater than that of all other forms of construction put together. I am not prepared to assert that as a definite statement of fact, but I have no doubt that the aggregate value of the dwelling houses of Canada is a tremendous single asset.

We do know, and the most casual, the most indifferent observer cannot but be impressed with the fact, that in the realm of housing, particularly in the cheaper classes, the lower rental classes, Canada is lamentably behind the times and in arrears in construction. I know that very often hon. members on the other side, if they do not voice the feeling audibly, at any rate intimate it in other ways, that no suggestions are forthcoming. They say, "What suggestions have you to offer"? Well, in the first place it is not our business to make suggestions; I may have ideas but I am quite without the power of giving them effect. It is the business of the government to give leadership in these matters. I am prepared, however, to make some suggestions, as I have done on other occasions. Again I refer to the remarks of my hon. friend a moment ago because they were very much to the point. He pointed out, as I did two or three weeks ago, that the weight of taxation upon real estate is one of the chief impediments to normal housing construction in Canada, let alone a program of rehabilitation in the housing situation. To the maintenance of normal housing conditions in Canada one of the main obstacles is the weight of taxation. There is scarcely a city in the country that has not on its hands, according to its size, from hundreds to thousands of parcels of land that have been taken in on tax sales—yes, and in many instances buildings too.

Now there we have two important factors. We know that housing is of tremendous importance from the economic standpoint. It is one of the largest assets we have. We know also that it is lamentably in arrears in ordinary construction, and we know that one of the chief causes is the burden of municipal taxation. I am going to make one suggestion to the government, a suggestion which I am prepared to elaborate, though not at the present time. It is something to which I have given a good deal of study. I think the federal government could and should offer to pay in the form of a subsidy to every municipality in Canada a sum equal to twenty-five per cent of its taxes derived from real estate on the condition that that municipality shall not increase its assessment rate or its assessments during a stated period of years—

Mr. DUPUIS: They are already too high.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, they are too high, and I was about to suggest that they should be reduced by twenty-five per cent, and that the dominion government should pay a subsidy to compensate the municipalities for the reduction of twenty-five per cent. That, in my opinion, would remove at once the main difficulty by which rehabilitation in housing through ordinary channels is now prevented from proceeding. If we can start in this country a general, nation-wide movement in housing it will take us thirty years to catch up. Leaving aside growth, expansion and increase in population, it will take us thirty years to catch up with the necessary housing in the cities and towns of Canada; and I hope we can carry it at an early time to the farms of Canada, particularly in the backward districts of the old provinces and in some of the newer districts of the newer provinces, where housing conditions are indeed deplorable.

Not long ago a survey was made in a large section of Saskatchewan, the northern section, —it did not cover the whole province—by the university of Saskatchewan, and it was found that in many homes, a very substantial proportion of them, there was no manufactured furniture. It was found that in many others there was very little, and in most instances they were four or five years behind in the purchasing of furnishings and clothing, to say nothing of machinery. With a known condition of that kind we are faced in Canada with economic problems that ought to be focussing and demanding the attention of the house to the exclusion of other things; yet this afternoon we have had a very desultory attendance in the house, an extremely poor attendance, when the most important measure of the session is before us, a measure vitally affecting this matter. I see three ministers in their seats.

Mr. GARDINER: How often has the hon. gentleman been here this session?

Mr. STEVENS: I have been here constantly since my return.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Once every two weeks.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I have been here constantly since returning from a trip abroad. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will go back over the last twenty-seven years that I have been in this house he will find that very few members have attended the sessions of parliament more closely than I have done. I believe the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who is the only older member in the house than I, will at least accord me that. True, I was away in the early part of the session when I was absent from the country; but what I am saying has reference to this particular occasion and the discussion of this bill. I am not speaking of the discussion of ordinary estimates or of any pro forma matter; but here is a bill, the most important measure before the house this session, and there is comparatively little attention being paid to it.

Mr. MARTIN: Particularly on the opposition side, as the hon. gentleman will agree. Just look!

Mr. STEVENS: In all parts of the house.

Mr. MARTIN: Look opposite; it is pitiable.

Mr. STEVENS: In all parts of the house. If the statement gives offence to the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Agriculture I want to assure them that it is not said in any offensive spirit. I mention it merely because I am interested in this measure.

Coming back to the question of housing, I make the suggestion which I have submitted because in my opinion it is one of the things that will go a long way in the direction of reducing the number of unemployed in Canada and it will give the greatest impetus to the development of business; because anyone who has studied the question knows perfectly well that money spent in the construction of houses finds its way into so many industries that it is one of the best ways in which money can be spent.

If you will proceed to an examination of the report you will find on page after page many suggestions and conclusions on the part of the commission. I find one that deals with land settlement. In my opinion, here again is a very prolific source of assistance to a solution of the problem. They suggest that there be a survey of unoccupied lands and a careful selection of persons eligible for assistance.

They suggest that a survey be made of improved lands available for settlement and that financial assistance be accorded settlers wishing to move from poorer districts, and so on. Something is being done in that regard now, and I am willing to give the Minister of Agriculture credit along this line. But we are not moving along national lines; that is the point I am impressing upon the house. Turn over the page and you will find suggestions along other lines. For instance, on page 18 I find some conclusions dealing with the way in which the commission recommend that the government should proceed. There is no evidence in any of these measures that the government has even taken notice of these matters. And so on through the report. In many parts of the report numerous suggestions have been made which are not reflected in the legislation before us, and to my mind it is a lamentable thing that this should be so.

I wish now to make one or two general observations. There is nothing wrong with Canada. I have no sympathy whatever for the calamity howlers who tell us the country is going to the bow-wows. The only thing wrong with Canada, as far as I can see, is this: We, the people of Canada—and we who are in parliament must take more responsibility than those outside, because we are in a position of leadership—are not giving leadership to the country. I would put it this way: In the realm of industry I question if those who are the leaders of industry to-day are giving real leadership along the lines of the new economic life that has developed in the industrial realm. I need take only one illustration; it is commonly known, yet nothing is done. In the last few years machinery has displaced literally tens of thousands of workers. That is a platitude; no one should be entitled to any credit for having said it, but the fact remains that neither the leaders of industry, the leaders of parliament nor the leaders of finance are paying much attention to those hordes of people thrown out of work; nor are they attempting to solve the problem of distribution or the social problem that arises therefrom. We know the situation but we are doing next to nothing to face the fact. So I say there is a lack of leadership in the realm of industry.

I think also there is a lack of leadership in the realm of finance, because we find that the outstanding economic phenomenon of modern times is the extent to which the control of capital has been narrowed into fewer and fewer hands, by a perfectly natural process. Publicity; the rapidity of transport and communication between cities and international communications have made it possible for capital to be gathered under the control of smaller and smaller groups. You have your great insurance companies, for instance. I remember that in my boyhood days not very many people had life insurance. To-day it is almost difficult to find anyone who has not life insurance. What does that mean? It means that in the intervening period familiarity with life insurance has increased and the laws concerning it have become so improved that nearly everyone is insured, and that great mass of capital comes under the control of a very small group. I am not saying whether that is bad or good; I am saying it is a fact. Then take our great banking system, of which we are so proud. We have a right to be proud of it, because it is one of the most stable banking systems in the world. Here again, however, is there given to the management and control of credit and finance in this country that degree of consideration in regard to public policy that the control of such an immense amount of credit would warrant?

I have given these few illustrations to indicate that there is a lack of leadership, and I had hoped that the government might do something in that regard in view of this report and the analysis which it contains of the economic conditions of the country, because the report does devote a considerable number of pages to quite an interesting analysis of the economic factors that enter into this problem of unemployment. I had hoped that in view of that report the government might have come before parliament with some leadership in dealing with these problems. Can we be surprised, as I have said on other occasions, if in a province such as Alberta, for instance, there comes forth a gentleman who leads a certain movement along the line of the control of credit, when he knows that the people of his province, as in many other provinces, are suffering under the pressure of an unbearable debt, personal and public? Should we be surprised if the people follow someone who at least offers some hope, when other authorities do nothing? That is why I think parliament should have given a great deal more study to these problems than has been given. So I say that in my opinion we have failed lamentably as a parliament; for the moment I shall not speak of the government, which is the leader of parliament and the leader of the country. I will say that parliament, including myself and every member of it, is failing in this very session, as I think we have failed to perhaps a lesser degree in the past, to give leadership in these matters to this country.

These are serious statements, I grant, but they are warranted when we look at the unemployment and distress in this country which is capable of sustaining fifty million people just as easily as not. There is no question about that. We could feed and sustain fifty million people with perfect ease, but what is wrong? In the short time at my disposal I am not prepared to analyse all that is wrong, but we know that certain things are wrong and it is our duty as leaders—every member I see before me is a leader in his community—to find a solution to these problems.

I have already referred to the matter of Canada being capable of sustaining a very much larger population than we have. There is nothing wrong with this country. What I think business men are looking for from the government in the way of leadership is some evidence of stability in business. I think the working classes are looking for security, and I would include, of course, the great agricultural community. They are looking for some degree of security, and as the referee between conflicting industrial, economic and social groups in this country it is our duty as a parliament to see that the game is played fairly, but we are paying little or no attention to it. This measure before the house to-day, which ought to have given the people of this country hope; which ought at least to have given effect to the suggestions contained in the report, is simply a repetition of the acts which we passed in 1936 and 1937, as the minister said when he introduced the bill. I thought that was perhaps one of the most lamentable admissions of defeat to which we could possibly have listened; in the few words with which the minister introduced his bill he said that it did not differ in any essential degree from the acts of last year and the year before, and that is perfectly true. But the minister has had training in these matters; he is young and virile, and when he came to parliament his friends and others looked to him for leadership in this very realm. Can he sit complacently in his seat and feel that by the introduction of the bill that is before us this afternoon he has discharged his duty? I am sorry that I have had to express myself on this matter in strong terms, but I feel that unless we protest vigorously against this inertia, this evasion of responsibility, there is not much chance of stirring either the government or parliament to the action necessary to meet the situation.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, when the minister presented the resolution preceding this bill I did not take part in the discussion; I preferred to wait until the bill was brought down in order to see what he had to offer to the thousands and thousands of unemployed in this country. I happen to be one of those who represent ridings which contain great numbers of people. Unfortunately, altogether too many thousands of the people in my riding are unemployed, and naturally it is my duty to present to this house what I believe to be their hopes in regard to obtaining employment. I want to tell the minister in the kindliest way possible, because I am one of those who have a very high regard for him, that I am tremendously disappointed in this bill. As one who has been associated with labour and employment problems, to the extent of employing thousands of men, I confess I can see very little in the measure which would give employment to those thousands of men who are unemployed. Possibly the minister intends to bring down another resolution or another bill which will indicate what is to be done.

Mr. ROGERS: Is the hon. member aware that the present bill provides authority under which expenditures are made to deal with unemployment and agricultural assistance? Expenditures may be made directly by the dominion government or through agreements with the provinces; but there is no restriction whatsoever as to the purposes for which expenditures may be made. They are dealt with, of course, in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. MacNICOL: Having in mind that the same kind of resolution has been presented in the last two years, and that those resolutions were followed by bills, and knowing how little resulted from those resolutions and bills, what can I expect from the bill now before the house?

Mr. ROGERS: I hope the hon. member will be disappointed if he expects little.

Mr. MacNICOL: If we do not get more from the present bill than we did from the last ones, it will be too bad for the country. I have before me a document pointing out the platform of the Liberal party during the last campaign, the first clause of which states that it will set up:

> A representative national commission to administer unemployment relief and provide work, and a national system of unemployment insurance.

A commission has been set up—we are commissioned to death, as I have said before, and as I am sorry to say again. But despite that fact, much work has not been provided.

I see one or two rays of hope in the bill from which I would hope some results might come. If the minister has a good understanding of industry, and the manner in which industry can be encouraged, a good deal of employment may come from that clause in the bill referring to the assistance of industry.

Mr. STEWART: The commission has been dissolved.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; but I believe the government could go ahead and implement the recommendations in the bill which have to do with assistance to industry. That has been done in other countries. No doubt the minister is thoroughly familiar with what has been done in the United States. I cannot say that their efforts have been wholly satisfactory.

Mr. ROGERS: They certainly have not stopped unemployment.

Mr. MacNICOL: Quite true. They may not have attacked the problem in the proper way. But I hope our minister will do it properly, and I am going to suggest to him a way in which industry can be assisted. We know that industry is being materially assisted in France, thoroughly assisted in Germany, and tremendously assisted in the old country.

I do not know whether or not the minister had the privilege of being in the old country last year; but I had that privilege, and while there I made a thorough survey into the assistance given industry by the British government. I was able to take note of the benefits derived in industrial areas, and I am pleased and happy to say that I found tremendous industrial activity. If the clause in the bill involves an assistance to industry anything like that which I have in mind, or that which has been done elsewhere, well and good.

During the course of a survey I made, I found some information with respect to a factory in Canada, the name of which I should not give, but whose circular I have before me. It is a large industrial institution in Toronto. I am happy to say there is a similar plant in Quebec, one which reflects great credit on our compatriots in that province. Those two companies are now manufacturing in Canada a large piece of equipment for the crushing of stone and the screening of it in one operation. A representative of one of these companies interviewed me in reference to obtaining consideration from the government to assist in the production of these machines. I asked them to what extent the assistance would be required. I was told that blue-prints had been brought in from the United States; that Canadian engineers have made thorough surveys of them; that Canadian draftsmen have prepared plans, and that Canadian technicians, toolmakers, engineers, machinists and other workmen have been successful in producing the equipment to manufacture these machines in Canada, one company in Quebec and one in Toronto.

Mr. St. PERE: And putting a lot of day labourers out of work. They are depriving the labouring man of his work. That is the general complaint in Quebec.

Mr. MacNICOL: Manufacturers of these machines provide a lot of labour.

Mr. St. PERE: That is the old slogan.

Mr. MacNICOL: On the other hand, if they are not manufactured in Canada they will be brought in from the United States. Last year eight large machines of this kind were imported from that country.

Mr. St. PERE: The labouring men are complaining about that, every day.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, I would much rather have those eight machines, which were manufactured last year in the United States, made this year in Canada by Canadian workmen. If any men were put out of work, then they were out of work because of American and not because of Canadian machines.

Mr. St. PERE: They are the same thing.

Mr. MacNICOL: Developing that point farther, may I say that there are thousands of pieces of equipment now imported which could be made in Canada, in the same way as the machines about which I have been speaking are now being made. In the making of that equipment many thousands of men would be given employment in all walks of activity in industrial institutions. The hon. member has said that machines put men out of work. I do not dispute that fact. But when the machines have to be made, and are imported, I would much sooner have them made by Canadians in Canadian plants than have them made in United States plants by workmen of that country.

If that is part of the minister's proposal, then I will say it is a good one. They have followed that procedure in England. If the minister had been in London last summer, and had visited the industrial areas at Slough and South Wimbledon, he would have seen large numbers of new factories. Some of those are branch factories. I visited one which was a branch of a factory in Toronto, which manufactured steam traps. Those articles are now being made in England, because the English government saw to it that before the industry received the benefit of the industrial support given by the government, the industry must manufacture to the extent of fifty per cent in England. I found in the plant about seventy-five men who were engaged in the manufacture of steam traps of one kind or another. I inquired of the manager where they were shipping the material and he replied that a great deal of it was sold in England, and that a certain portion went to the Scandinavian countries and to Germany.

That equipment was formerly made in Canada. Why cannot we take a leaf out of the book of the ministries of industry and boards of trade—some are ministries and some are boards of trade—of other countries, where industry is assisted. I had hoped in reading the bill that an attempt was to be made to assist industry, and I said to myself, "There is one thing I can support, even if there is no good in a lot of it." I shall go farther, and say this: I cannot name one line of industry which does not benefit agriculture. Last June Sir Harold Hartley delivered a most enlightening speech at Southport, near London. The subject of his speech was "Agriculture as a potential source of raw materials for industry." That seemed to me to be an extremely good subject and I took particular pains to study what Sir Harold had said. He was dealing with the automobile industry only. I see the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is in his seat.

Mr. MARTIN: I am always in the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: I compliment the hon. member on being a regular attendant. I was in his riding a few days ago, not to do any injury to him but to make a survey of a great automobile plant in that riding.

Mr. MARTIN: You were well received, but your cause was not.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe I am right in stating that the Chrysler plant is in the hon. member's riding.

Mr. MARTIN: Their production this year is the highest it has been in the history of the automobile industry.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I get through saying what I have to say, the hon. member will have another guess coming. Will he just wait until I finish my remarks? I made a survey of that great plant and I found that there are some 2,800 men employed. This is due to the fact that at the moment there is a fairly substantial demand for the cars made at the Chrysler plant. However, I have been told—I want the hon. member to listen to this—that were it not for the fact that 16 per cent of the lower priced cars coming into this country last year were made in the United States by workmen other than Canadians, there would be considerably more employment in the automobile plants of this country.

Mr. MARTIN: There is no question about that. Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member will just sit down for a little while I finish what I have to say, I have not much time before the house rises at six o'clock and I am anxious to lay before it the opinion of Sir Harold Hartley as to the connection between agriculture and the automobile industry. He was dealing only with Ford cars manufactured in the United States and the figures he gave had reference to a unit of a million cars. He stated that to manufacture this number of cars, 89,000,000 pounds of cotton were necessary, which represented the production from 558,000 acres of land. Cotton is not grown in Canada, but there are other commodities produced here and other lines of industry to which these figures would apply. I am simply giving the figures that apply to the manufacture of cars in the United States. This consumption is a direct benefit to agriculture in the United States. The cotton was used for upholstering, for the production of brake linings, timing gears, safety glass and so forth.

Half a million bushels of maize—I assume he means corn—were required, representing the production from 11,280 acres, for rubber substitutes, butyl alcohol and other solvents. Next, 2,400,000 pounds of linseed oil, representing the production from 17,500 acres of flax, were required for paints, core oil, soft soap, glycerine, et cetera. Next, 2,500,000 gallons of molasses, representing the production from 12,500 acres of sugar cane, were needed for anti-freeze, shock absorber fluid and other solvents. The production from 800,000 sheep, equal to 3,200,000 pounds of wool was needed for upholstering, gaskets, anti-rust liquids, floor coverings and lubricants.

Mr. DONNELLY: That was to pull over the eyes of the farmers.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. gentleman is known all over the country as an unvarnished free trader, but he must realize that every man at work offers an additional home market to the farmer.

Mr. DONNELLY: How much do these automobiles cost in Canada?

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member can find that out just the same as I can. The next item is 1,500,000 square feet of leather, the production from 30,000 head of cattle, for upholstering and glues. Perhaps a lot of those cattle were raised in Saskatchewan, and the farmers there were probably pleased when there was a market for the hides of 30,000 head of cattle.

Mr. DONNELLY: The motor car people say that all the hides are obtained from the Argentine.

Mr. MacNICOL: The next item is 1,000,000 pounds of lard, the production from 20,000 hogs, for lubricants, brushes, etc. I do not want to get down to the narrow view of this problem; I want to see something done for the working men and women, of whom I have 45,000 in my riding. The next item is 350,000 pounds of mohair, the production from 87,000 goats, for fabrics and upholstering. I do not know where these goats would be raised. It is suggested to me by an hon. member that there are some in the House of Commons, but I doubt that very much. The next item is 2,000,000 pounds of soya bean oil, representing the production from 10,000 acres, used for enamels.

Some hon. members have tried to interject some levity into the discussion of this very serious problem of unemployment. I cannot go home to my riding without the verandah of my house being crowded with people who come to see me to ask if something cannot be done to relieve unemployment. If the minister desires to assist industry, a golden opportunity is given him at the present time. Earlier in the session I made reference to what I had heard during my visits to munition, steel and gun plants in the United Kingdom. I suggested that the government get in touch with the British government in order to encourage the removal of some of these great plants to Canada. One of the ministers, I have forgotten just which one, laughed at the idea. However, during the last few days there have been reports in the newspapers about the suggested manufacture in this country of airplanes for war purposes. According to press reports the British commissioners are now in the United States and the suggestion has been made that seven, eight, or perhaps ten thousand airplanes will be manufactured. I am giving an arbitrary figure; the actual figure may be less. I for one would like to see these airplanes made in the great plants of this country. Every thousand men put to work making airplanes would be a thousand less to provide for in connection with unemployment relief and an increased home market would be provided for our Canadian farmers. I hope the minister will do everything he can to encourage the production of airplanes in this country.

There are other industries that might be encouraged to come over here. Any one who knows anything about the industrial areas realizes how congested they are. Slough, South Wimbleton, Port Talbot, Manchester and other areas are all extremely congested. If these areas were destroyed, it might prove difficult for the British government to carry on a war. If these industries were moved to Canada, they would be two or three thousand miles further away from possible attack by bombing planes.

I had hoped that something would be in this bill about the proposals which have been submitted by the Ontario government to this government with reference to flood prevention; that we would have heard something about the proposals of the Ontario government to eliminate floods on the Grand river. The hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), a very capable member of this house, exceptionally capable when he gets up and gives a good tariff protection speech for the industries and industrial workers of that great industrial city of Brantford—and when he does that we are ready to welcome him over here for he is fighting for the working men of Brantford—after he had interviewed a number of the ministers of the cabinet, said:

> While I cannot say definitely what action the government will take I am satisfied that the commissioners convinced the three members of the cabinet that the scheme was one that was needed.

If the minister would assist the Ontario government in commencing that great scheme of flood prevention and would commence with the Grand river; then if the government receives any commendation from the public, I would say more power to its elbow as long as it is doing its duty, and I am satisfied that in preventing floods on the Grand river it would be doing good work. That is only one river, but what would it mean in connection with the Grand river alone?

The area of the Grand river north of Galt, which is in the riding represented by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Edwards) is 1,360 square miles. Apparently, in submitting their figures to the minister, the Ontario government used the identical figures I used a year ago as to the cost of water conservation on the Grand river. I do not say that they used my figures, but their figures are identical with mine. I had estimated, on the records of a water conservation survey, that the cost would be approximately $2,000,000; I am not sure that $2,000,000 would do it; but the Ontario government, after no doubt going into the matter carefully, have come to the same conclusion. Their figures would likely be based on what was generally accepted as the standard when floods are bad, that is a three-day rain flood. A three-day flood would cover the whole of that area on that basis, if the water remained on the land to a depth of approximately 2·75 inches, and during the course of such flood about 8,700,000,000 cubic feet of water would fall. To provide for the retention of surplus water so that it would not cause damage at Brantford and the other towns on the banks of the river would create work for 3,700 men for four months, who would be directly engaged in the work of conservation, and I am satisfied that it would provide work also for another 3,700 men making the cement and steel and all the other materials and equipment entering into the construction of the necessary conservation works. If the minister has anything like that in mind, I say more power to his elbow. After having tested it out on the Grand river, if he finds it satisfactory, he could extend the operations to the other rivers which are in flood every year all over this country. Everyone has read of them during the last few years. I shall read only a few headlines on articles describing these floods: "Port Hope facing acute situation from flood waters"—"Port Hope faces its fifth flood this winter"—"Waterloo in danger"—"Galt main street under water." One town after another along the banks of the Grand river was in danger from floods. The same thing occurred with the Thames river. It was not the case so much with the Saugeen, but the same thing happened along the Kettle river which flows through St. Thomas and down into lake Erie. There was a flood there last spring which caused a good deal of trouble.

I believe there is a real opportunity for the sound investment of money and the providing of a lot of employment. Every one of these floods causes not only deaths as a rule but a lot of property damage, and any money which this government invests for the purpose of eliminating property damage necessarily does not cost the country anything. I do not know where you would get the money, but I am sure, if the minister directs that these works shall be done, the money will be found to do it.

There is another way in which money can be spent as a national investment, not as a matter of cost at all, and that is in the construction of good roads. I may be asked where the money would come from to do that. Money can always be found for a real investment, and money spent on good roads is a national investment. Last summer—I dislike referring to this because I do not like talking about things I have seen, except that one can always explain better something that he has seen than something he has read of—I made a little survey of road-building in Germany, and I saw their new concrete roads with eight lanes, accommodating four cars on each side of a boulevard, and with concrete so thick that the heavy tanks of the German army can speed over them at sixty miles an hour. I am not asking this government to provide roads over which tanks can speed at sixty miles an hour. We want to be free from tanks in this country. We hope that war will never occur. But what did road-building do for Germany? Just what did it mean to Germany last year? It is almost incredible but nevertheless a fact that road-building in Germany in a single year resulted in the removal of earth from the roadways on which concrete was later to be poured of a greater quantity than was removed in the building of the Panama canal. In building the Panama canal the United States engineers removed 220,000,000 cubic metres of earth. In building the roadways of Germany last year, the brawn of German youth removed 250,000,000 cubic metres of earth, so that the concrete could be poured. Subsequently they poured 10,000,000 cubic metres of concrete, and it took 260,000 cars to deliver the concrete. So in doing that work Germany did go a long way towards relieving or eliminating unemployment. In fact, I did not see an able-bodied young man on the streets of Berlin between the ages of 16 and 20. A lot of them were probably in camps, and a lot in the army and navy, but a lot of them were making roads. One of the ministers with whom I discussed road-building told me that they had hundreds of thousands of their young men engaged in building roads.

In this country we have been giving the dole and little else to our young men. A young man does not want the dole. He wants work, and if he gets work building a road, and receives fair wages for doing it, he is giving the best possible return to the country because good roads are a national asset, and if road-building is in the minister's program I am behind it one hundred per cent. If the minister will support the province of Ontario in building really good roads, going the shortest distance between two points, he will be helping to create a national asset and do a great deal in the way of providing employment.

I do not know that there is much more that I can say. I had no intention of speaking at any length. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) mentioned housing. Let me mention just one example of housing that I saw last summer, to illustrate the fine work which this country can do in improving housing conditions in this country. If the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), under whose jurisdiction the Indian department is, I believe, were in the house, he might be interested in what I am going to say. I have made a survey of many Indian reserves, but I have particularly in mind the Muncey reserve, west of London. I doubt if anybody who has not been there could believe that the conditions on that reserve are as they are. I went to one residence occupied by an Indian; I had a letter from him to-day. It was a hut, if I remember correctly, nine feet wide by twelve feet long. I could see out of every corner of it. In many places the rain could come through the roof. In the hut were two small bunks, not beds; that was the accommodation for the Indian, his wife and his four children. The day I was there his daughter, one of the four children I referred to, had returned from the Indian school, which I assume is at Muncey; it is not far from the mounted police headquarters. At that school the young woman had been taught all that white children are taught; she had received the tuition to make her an educated young lady; she had reached the age when she had to leave the school, and she returned to this hut nine feet by twelve. where you could see out of every corner and the rain could come through the roof in several places, and where there were just two bunks. The Indians were the original owners of this country. It may be that they are not entitled to any consideration through a building program; but we all know that whites require such a program, and that the aborigine, not being able now to defend and provide for himself, requires our help. I saw several huts on that reservation and other reservations where conditions are no better than in the one I have described, and I contend that conditions like that should not be allowed in any civilized country, whether the sufferer be a white man or an aborigine.

Although I intended to speak on this bill, I was unable to find time to prepare much to say because my time yesterday was taken up with a delegation from Toronto, including a returned soldier. The returned soldier had been a prisoner of war in Germany for three years. He with six of his comrades had been captured while they had been hiding in a dug-out. The division to which they belonged had been surrounded; the German army had gone away beyond their position, but in searching through the trenches some Germans came upon these men and threatened to bomb them unless they came out. The Germans, being three in number, decided that six prisoners were too many for them to take away, and were discussing whether they should shoot them when an officer came along and said "no shooting," as a German says it, and the six men were saved. That poor fellow was here yesterday trying to get some adjustment of his pension. Before he came here, so that I could make myself conversant with his circumstances and what he was up against, I visited his little cottage on Salem avenue, Toronto. I venture to say there was not more than fifty dollars' worth of furniture in the cottage. How anybody lives in it I do not know. I am sorry that such conditions are allowed in Toronto; but doubtless there are many such cases, and the municipal authorities, there as in the great city of Montreal, have a heavy task. If the minister intends to proceed with any housing scheme, such conditions would warrant and certainly would require almost any amount of money that he is willing to spend. As an hon. member remarked a few minutes ago, it is the lack of building more than anything else that is holding things back in this country. It may not be economic to spend a large amount of money; but if the cabinet, knowing the situation as they do, undertake to spend a substantial amount to provide cheaper and better homes for the average worker, they will receive unstinted praise, and the minister likewise.

That is all I can say at this time. I did not rise in any spirit of criticism, but rather I wanted to try to encourage the minister to go the limit towards providing employment for the unemployed in this country.

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) upon the excellent sequel he gave to his previous address on the resolution upon which this bill is based. This is the second reading, on which we are asked to agree to the principle of the bill. The social credit group, to which I belong, are not opposed to the principle of this bill; but we are opposed to this government's attitude of defeat concerning the underlying cause of the break-down in our economic system, of which this unemployment problem is simply an evidence. We are asked to agree to the principle of this bill, and since there is nothing better offered us we must agree to it. At the same time we are being asked to agree—against which I protest—to the principle of distributing money to people in the most morale-destroying, self-respect-destroying method yet devised by man. The group with which I am associated are heartily opposed to that. I am sure that the government itself must also be opposed to it.

Rather than let people starve, since there is no alternative, and since the people who are to receive the benefit have appetites, come by just as honestly as mine or any other hon. member's, I would urge the early passage of the bill. I have not referred particularly to that part of the bill which deals with agricultural distress, because agriculture is only one of our industries. But I should like to point out to the house and the government that an adequate economic system would absorb automatically the consequences of such unavoidable natural failures, without the degradation of relief. I submit that the government should be bending every possible effort towards accomplishing that purpose.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): We are near six o'clock; but before I move the adjournment of the debate, it is my intention to protest against the statement of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) when he said that parliament did not do its duty with regard to unemployment. Members of this house are in daily contact with the unemployed. They meet them each day in their constituencies during the recess and do all they can for their relief. Ou behalf of the members of this house, on behalf even of the hon. member for Kootenay East himself, I protest against what he has said in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, will you please call it six o'clock. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 28, 1938

TITULAR ADDRESS OF MEMBERS OF ONTARIO LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to a resolution passed in the legislative assembly of the province of Ontario on Thursday, April 7, 1938, to the effect "that in all matters of address, titular distinction, formal correspondence, official proceedings and all similar matters having to do with coming under the jurisdiction of the legislature of Ontario, the members of the legislative assembly shall be entitled to the designation 'member of provincial parliament' and its abbreviation 'M.P.P.'"?

2. Has any declaration of policy thereon been considered by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.
2. No.

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE—INVESTIGATIONS OF WRECKS IN CANADIAN WATERS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many wrecks were investigated in Canadian waters by the wreck commissioner or other officers of the Department of Marine?

2. What were the names of the ships in each case, and the number drowned or injured?

3. What were the findings of the wreck commissioner succinctly in each case?
4. What were the complete findings in the Sand Merchant case?
5. Was the said ship sea-worthy, and had it wireless equipment?
6. Were the owners of the ship "Sand Merchant" prosecuted under the criminal code?
7. How many men of the department are engaged in life-saving work under federal authority, and at what cost?
8. What aid has been furnished by American life stations to distressed ships of Canadian register in recent years on the great lakes?

Mr. HOWE: This question cannot be answered without going back to the days of confederation. To answer it in full would mean filing a number of documents which would be of no interest. Could the hon. member give me a date to which he would like us to go back in supplying this information?

Mr. CHURCH: I shall be satisfied with any information the minister can give for three years. I could give him a list of the seventeen instances when American life stations have aided his people at the head of the lakes.

SASKATCHEWAN FARMERS

REPORTED LACK OF SEED AND FEED AT CARDROSS—DELAY IN DISTRIBUTION OF SEED WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether he has any information with respect to the distribution of seed and feed at Cardross, to which I referred the other day?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I have no information with regard to individual places, but I have received a wire from the Saskatchewan government indicating that by the middle of this week the matter would likely be moving along to the satisfaction of all concerned.

RADIO BROADCASTING

PROPOSED BROADCAST ON WORLD ECONOMIC COOPERATION OVER CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES SYSTEMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the responsible minister of the government a question at this time rather than taking up the matter on the motion to go into committee of supply. Reference was made yesterday in both the Ottawa papers to a broadcast which is to take place over the Canadian broadcasting network to-morrow night, in which the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Martin) the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and Dr. T. H. Leggett are to take part. This broadcast is in connection with a highly controversial question and is to be linked up with the United States national broadcasting system. It has to do with world economic cooperation as initiated by the League of Nations Society in Canada and by the national peace conference in the United States. My question is: In view of the fact that this same society has been refused for such purposes the use of the British Broadcasting Corporation facilities by the British government on orders of the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, will this government, in view of the present state of world conditions, consider prohibiting the use of the radio system as an instrument of political power of this kind and pan-Americanism?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The broadcast in question is in the form of a discussion of two sides of a controversial question, a type of broadcast which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is disposed to favour. Whether the British Broadcasting Corporation carry this broadcast will be a matter for them to decide. There is no possible way in which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation can impose this debate upon the British people, unless the British Broadcasting Corporation feel it is a proper subject to be rebroadcast in England. Therefore, I see no objection to this debate being broadcast here.

Mr. CHURCH: Who asked for it? Who selected the speakers? Who asked for all this pan-Americanism when we have no army, navy or fleet to do anything about it?

Mr. HOWE: The program committee of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has arranged a number of debates in which speakers take opposite sides of a question. I take it that this debate is a part of that program. I have no direct knowledge of the situation, but I have no doubt that the staff of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with the consent of the board of governors, chose the speakers in this instance.

Mr. CHURCH: You had better send for a life-saving station.

Mr. BENNETT: Was the consent of the government sought?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not sought or given?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, that is right.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF MATURED, MATURING AND CALLABLE OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways and for the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada in respect of such refunding to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding $200,000,000.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: The legislation now on the statute book with respect to the refunding of Canadian National obligations was enacted in 1935. It was for the same sum as will be embodied in the bill which will be founded on this resolution. The amount of the authority remaining is just over $6,000,000, and therefore it is essential to have further authority to deal with these maturing and callable obligations of the Canadian National.

I may say that under the authority of the last act the refunding which has been accomplished resulted in an annual saving in interest charges of approximately $3,900,000. I think that is all I need say at this stage, unless someone wants specific information with respect to any particular issue. I shall be prepared, both now and during the different stages of the bill, to answer any questions regarding the refunding which has occurred.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I thought possibly the minister might give us a list at this stage of the refundings that have been made. I was also going to ask him whether any steps had been taken, and if so what, with respect to the perpetual high rate of interest obligations, both of the old Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Railway. I realize that with respect to the Grand Trunk we are under obligation to pay an annuity in the terms of the interest on the obligations that were taken over when we secured the system, but with respect to the other obligations there is a fine question, which the minister no doubt has considered. We are not guarantors with respect to some of these securities upon which interest is paid and there is a question whether or not this country should place itself in the position of guaranteeing the interest upon these securities. I am sure that this is a matter that has engaged the attention of the minister, as it did of previous ministers. For instance, certain of the income certificates were settled by the administration of which the present Minister of Finance was a member. Undoubtedly in that instance we took a course which we were not obliged to take; we assumed financial responsibilities which were not written in the bond. On the other hand there is a question whether we as owners of the properties can escape the payment of the interest. This is a matter in connection with which different opinions have been held from time to time by various people. I am expressing no opinion of my own at the moment because I desire to leave the matter an open question.

I have looked at the report a great many times in my lifetime and I have looked at it again to see whether or not these six per cent perpetual securities, for instance, might be retired. There may be a question whether or not this can be done on terms that would be sound financially, because many of these securities are not on the market and to buy them would mean having to pay a high price. Then if you bought them at a high premium you would not be making any money if you substituted for them a low interest rate security. In the main it is fair to say that the securities have been selling on the basis of the present rate for money, and therefore nothing would be gained by it. That is one of the difficulties the minister has to consider. If he has any information on the subject I think this would be a very appropriate time to give it to the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: It is rather difficult, Mr. Chairman, to give an opinion which might be regarded as official by the Minister of Finance with respect to some of these old railway obligations because any opinion expressed by me would, of course, have a significance in relation to the supposed value of the security probably out of all proportion to its merit.

The matters to which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has referred have of course engaged the attention not only of this government but of at least three of its predecessors, and I think every government has worked out the particular problem which could be dealt with during its period of office to the best advantage of the Dominion of Canada, having regard to the circumstances of the time.

There is one issue of perpetuals, four per cents, which is now callable. Obviously the only question there is one of judgment as to when and under what conditions to take advantage of the call privilege.

Mr. BENNETT: Or whether it should be taken advantage of at all.

Mr. DUNNING: Or whether it should be taken advantage of at all. With respect to the six per cent perpetuals, which are a very sore subject with me, as they have been with every Minister of Finance, the question is difficult legally as well as financially, and I would not care to express any opinion in this house at this time that would indicate to anyone that those securities are either very good or very bad. My right hon. friend will agree as to the unwisdom of taking such a course.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: I can say, however, that we are not losing sight of the desirability of still further reducing the load of Canadian National interest payments on refunding by means of calling, where calling is possible, or of the desirability of undertaking under proper circumstances negotiations in cases where we do not appear to have callable rights. I am not acknowledging in that statement that we have not callable rights in certain cases where we might be presumed not to have them. I know this is a little involved, but it is a very, very involved subject and I am anxious not to give any impression to holders of these securities which would either enhance their value in the eyes of their holders or depreciate the credit of Canada. That is about as far I think as I can go at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: Were the minister's remarks regarding the six per cent and four per cent perpetuals relative to the old Grand Trunk, or were they Canadian Northern issues?

Mr. DUNNING: I was intending to include all of the perpetuals in my statement.

Mr. HARRIS: I wonder if the minister could tell us what "matured, maturing and callable financial obligations" are at present guaranteed by the government.

Mr. DUNNING: I am inclined to think I shall have to read the whole list, which is very extensive, in order to give that.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be desirable to have it on the record If the list is very long, with the consent of the house perhaps it might be put on Hansard.

Mr. DUNNING: My statement is not precisely in the form requested by the hon. member, but perhaps if I were to make arrangements to put on Hansard the information in the form he desires it, that would be satisfactory.

Mr. HARRIS: Yes, quite. It would assist very much in considering this matter. We could then dismiss those that are at present guaranteed and give our attention to those not guaranteed.

Mr. DUNNING: We have a number of provincial securities guaranteed, particularly of Ontario, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, maturing within the next few years, prior to 1943. I will engage to put on Hansard as part of this record all of the securities which mature, say, prior to 1943. Will that be sufficient? I will put the whole list on, indicating by whom they are guaranteed if guaranteed.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would, between now and when the bill is in committee, look into the following questions and have answers for them.

On page 19 of the Canadian National Railways report there is reference made to five perpetual issues of the Grand Trunk Railway. I should like to know whether any of them are callable, and if so, when and on what terms. I have a fair memory with respect to some of them, but the question often arises and I think it might be desirable to have the information on Hansard to show that some of these cannot be dealt with by any government, however much it might desire to deal with them, in the absence of agreement on the part of the holders to have them dealt with. The five per cent stock we assumed responsibility for as a term of the transfer of the Grand Trunk to this country, and I apprehend that very little can be done with respect to it.

On page 20 of the annual report there are certain issues under the title, "Other issues," four of which are perpetual four per cents, some Canadian Northern, some Canadian Northern Ontario, some Canadian Northern Quebec, and some Quebec and Lake St. John Railway. In addition to that, there is an issue of Grand Trunk six per cent third preference bonds, but the issue is so very small that possibly it could not bear the expense of considering it, except that it is an eyesore to see it there. It is only $70,000. Perhaps the minister would also give us that information before we come to deal with the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There arises the other question which is constantly before the minister, and that is the guarantee given by the provinces. We have never released the provinces from their obligations, but in point of fact when Saskatchewan and Alberta were called upon to make payments we did repay them the money they paid. That is true in both cases. Now the obligations that mature at a not too distant date with respect to these provinces would seem to me to afford an opportunity to the federal government to treat them as a factor in dealing with the financial situation between the dominion and the provinces; because undoubtedly what we have done is to relieve the provinces of a burden that would have absolutely involved bankruptcy on their part had they been called upon to make payment.

Mr. DUNNING: Do not confine it to those two provinces alone.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the western provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: We have assumed liability with respect to all the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not assumed; we have not called upon the provinces to pay. The point I am trying to make, and it should be kept constantly in mind, is that there has been no assumption on our part of liability.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite. But no province has been called upon to pay.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point I am making. We have assumed no responsibility but the company has discharged the liability with money obtained from the federal exchequer from year to year. That is, the guarantee by the province has not been implemented, nor has any request been made to implement it, but the interest charges on the securities guaranteed by the provinces have been treated as a general continuing obligation of the system and paid for accordingly, whether it is part of the deficit or—

Mr. DUNNING: That is true of all provinces save two.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not know there were two, because I did not know that the earnings of the Canadian Northern Ontario were sufficient to enable it to pay its obligations.

Mr. DUNNING: I was thinking only of those provinces which gave no guarantees. They are, I think, Quebec and New Brunswick—no, Prince Edward Island.

Mr. BENNETT: New Brunswick did give a guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: There is only one province, then, Prince Edward Island, which did not give a guarantee.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the only one of which I have any knowledge. Under those circumstances possibly the minister may be able to give us a clear statement when the bill is in committee, indicating just what the provincial obligations are. The great bond companies have issued a pamphlet every year giving that information very fully, but I think that for the purpose of having it on Hansard as a permanent memorial for the benefit of all members of the house—

Mr. DUNNING: "Memorial" is good.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, "memorial" is good, —it may be very desirable that the minister should make that statement; and any comments I desire to make on the matter can be made later.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course the information referred to is in the annual report of the railway, but if my right hon. friend would like it on Hansard I shall see that it is placed there when the bill is in committee. In the meantime I can give some general information to the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) with respect to guaranteed and unguaranteed—that is in bulk. In 1937 the funded debt of the Canadian National Railways outstanding in the hands of the public consisted of $970,697,190 guaranteed by the government of Canada and $251,030,209 either guaranteed by provinces or entirely unguaranteed. At the moment I have not the figures separated as between the amounts guaranteed by provinces and the amounts unguaranteed by any government; but that, at all events, will be a piece of the information for which my right hon. friend is looking.

Mr. TUCKER: If, as I understood it was remarked by the right hon. leader of the opposition that we cannot deal with these perpetual bonds unless we can get the holders of them to agree to give them up, I at least should like to express my dissent from that position. I believe that under our powers to legislate with regard to railways, we can provide that they shall be callable at a date we fix, and if we fix the date at say five years from now, we could call them at that time. There is another way in which certainly they could be dealt with—a similar suggestion has been made by the leader in Saskatchewan of the party to which the right hon gentleman belongs, so I assume he would not quarrel with it—namely, that all interest over and above three per cent per annum should be taxed back again by this country. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he consider one or the other proposition; and I also ask him to place on Hansard, if he will do so, a statement of these so-called perpetual debentures and the rates of interest which they bear.

Mr. DUNNING: That will be included in the statement.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I understood. I see that the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) is not quite appreciative of what I said. I did not say that you would have to deal with all of them, because some of them are callable, but I did point out what is the main thing, to be found at page 19 of the report of the company, namely that the perpetual obligations of the Grand Trunk Railway issued from 1875 to 1883 were assumed by this country as a part of the purchase price of the Grand Trunk Railway—which is an entirely different condition from that to which reference has been made. The bargain by which we got that railway was to pay to the people who held those securities the interest on them in accordance with the terms of the securities themselves. It will be recalled that when the arbitration was before the court the evidence indicated that we made an additional offer, which they declined, which would have given them something for the common stock—which the tribunal found was worth nothing. It is not a question of our dealing with them; it is a question of their having been given an undertaking by us that we would pay a rental—it amounts to that—in the form of interest payments on perpetual securities to the holders thereof for taking over the railway from them, which we did by statute. That is an entirely different thing from the issue of an ordinary perpetual security by a railway with respect to which we have assumed obligations to service, but which might be dealt with by many methods if we so desired.

Mr. TUCKER: I fail to see why, when we made an agreement that now is proving unconscionable from the standpoint of the people of this county—

Mr. DUNNING: We did not make an agreement.

Mr TUCKER: —it can be said that we cannot do anything unless we get the other party to agree. Obviously it would be found that people who hold agreements like that are none too ready to give up the rights they have; but I do sincerely suggest that we should deal with this question at once. When this country is now paying six per cent on an obligation which is outstanding—I do not care how it arose in the past—it should be dealt with without any further delay. These obligations could be made callable at any period in the future; I would suggest a period of five years. If that is not deemed the best way to deal with it, the other proposition should be considered; anybody who has an income in this country is subject to be taxed. These people got an agreement which is a little too good to those who benefit by it, and I suggest that to tax people on income from bonds bearing a rate of over and above three per cent is a fair way of dealing with the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: Lest there should be an impression go abroad which in my judgment would be harmful to Canada, I must dissent from a suggestion of any intention on the part of this government to do anything which would involve the breaking of the pledged word of the Dominion of Canada. I want that distinctly understood. At the same time I deprecate discussion of this kind because of the fact that it does hinder bona fide negotiations between parties who may mutually desire to make an arrangement; I mean, by debtors and creditors sitting down together and working out their problems. So far as this dominion is concerned, to have any idea go out from these halls that we were contemplating deliberately breaking our word, either directly or by any device, could not possibly do any of the population of Canada any good and certainly would do the dominion as a whole a great deal of harm.

Mr. TUCKER: I take issue with the suggestion that if you tax an income that is probably unfair from the standpoint of the body politic—and I submit that six per cent on a government obligation is unfair from the standpoint of the people of this country—you are breaking your agreement with anybody.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not intend to imply any such thing. As is well known to all hon. members, we do tax income at the present time. There is no question about that. But if I understood the hon. member correctly, his suggestion was that we single out this particular income and tax it on a scale that we are not taxing other income of a similar kind. If that is the method suggested, then obviously it is an indirect method of getting out of an obligation for which we might otherwise be liable, and I deprecate any idea going abroad that any government of Canada would contemplate breaking directly or indirectly the pledged word of the country.

Mr. NEILL: I understood the minister to say that the dominion had never released the provinces from what I might call the original liability of the provinces, although the dominion had taken over these bonds in actual fact and had paid the interest on them many years ago. As far as British Columbia is concerned we have always understood there that there was a distinct arrangement, that the dominion had absolutely released the province from their liability under the bonds; the quid pro quo being that the province released the dominion from the obligation of the railway company to build a line from, I think, the neighbourhood of Red pass down to Vancouver, and agreed that the Canadian National Railway should use their own line instead of building this extension demanded under the bond, so to speak.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no recollection of any release at any time of any province with respect to its original liability under its provincial guarantee. I shall be pleased, however, to verify that between now and the time the bill is before the house.

Mr. YOUNG: This matter was before the special committee which has been sitting these last few days. As a member of that committee I said something about the interest which we found was payable on these perpetual bonds, and lest I may be misunderstood as more or less acquiescing in the opinion that we should continue to pay this interest I want to make this statement.

I quite agree with the Minister of Finance that this country should do nothing which would affect the general credit of Canada. At the same time we must recognize that these bonds that we took over were originally not between this government and certain people but between the Grand Trunk Railway and those people. Had we allowed the Grand Trunk Railway to go into bankruptcy, as it undoubtedly would have done had the country not stepped in and taken it over, the holders of the bonds would undoubtedly have suffered. In my opinion an interest rate of six per cent cannot be justified, and I would sincerely ask the Minister of Finance to explore every reasonable avenue to see that the burden of this very high interest rate is in some way removed from the shoulders of the Canadian National system and the people of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: It is unfortunate that this question should have come up without any notice. I do not blame the minister, but had notice been given of it there is a phase of the subject that I should like to have discussed. However, I will take it up when the bill is under consideration.

Considerable reference has been made to the possibility of negotiation for better terms in connection with these bonds, and reference has also been made to the arbitration and the Grand Trunk purchase by the dominion. I believe the statement was made that there had been an offer to the Grand Trunk shareholders which they rejected. I am informed, however, that those who were particularly concerned, and who ultimately suffer, did not have a proper or legal opportunity to vote upon the question whether or not that offer should have been accepted. This bill, when it comes in, will probably afford the minister a chance for negotiation in connection with these very much disputed claims.

Mr. DUNNING: Claims?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; I am not prepared to discuss that matter to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is not now referring to the bonds?

Mr. STEVENS: Not to the bonds on this list, but to other claims which were affected by the settlement made by the arbitration. I would make this suggestion to the minister. None of these securities come under the British securities act—I believe that is the name of it.

Mr. DUNNING: The trustee list.

Mr. STEVENS: The trustee list is the common phrase. It might be possible in the negotiation between the government of Canada and the owners of these bonds to arrange that the British government should place on the trustee list such as are suitable, which would immediately command a much lower rate of interest and be acceptable to the holders of these securities, and which I think would induce them to surrender the higher priced bonds for the lower rate of interest that is current in connection with trustee list securities. That is a phase of the situation that should be explored.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman means that the new bonds issued in exchange would be on the trustee list but the old ones would not.

Mr. STEVENS: The old ones would not; the old ones are not at the present time. There may be some of them but I do not think that any of them are. I repeat, it is rather unfortunate that the matter should have reached this stage of discussion without previous notice. There is one phase of it that I should like to discuss, but I will content myself with these remarks and when the bill is up for second reading there will be an opportunity, if the minister will permit it to stand long enough for us to study the list which he has kindly agreed to put on Hansard.

Mr. DUNNING: In any case the annual report of the railways will give it much more completely than I can.

Mr. HEAPS: I was pleased to learn that the minister was exploring every possible avenue in an attempt to reduce the interest load on the Canadian National railway system. I notice that by the refunding of the present loan approximately $3,000,000 is to be saved.

Mr. DUNNING: No; $3,900,000 has been saved under the authority of the act which has now been exhausted. Perhaps I conveyed the wrong impression.

Mr. HEAPS: It is so difficult to hear what is said in this chamber that possibly I misunderstood the minister. There has been a slight reduction on account of refunding operations by the government. We were informed in the railway committee that if we could reduce the total amount outstanding and convert those loans to a three per cent level the annual saving would be about $12,000,000, about one-quarter of the total annual interest charges on the Canadian National Railways. There are still outstanding some loans that pay six and a half per cent interest. These loans were negotiated in 1921 and to-day they bear a rate of six and a half per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Six and a half per cent?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes; it will be found in the Canadian National report. I believe that that represents some $25,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: There is $24.000,000 six and a half per cent Canadian Northern guaranteed by the dominion.

Mr. HEAPS: I remember there was a loan of approximately that amount bearing an interest rate of six and a half per cent. I do not think that any government guaranteed loan ought to bear an interest rate of six and a half per cent. It is far too high. The minister will recognize that. Personally I should like to see the Department of Finance use every means at their disposal in an effort to get the interest structure down to a level where there shall be no outstanding loans at more than three per cent per annum. That is a fair rate to pay. When we begin discussing questions of economy in connection with the railways, that is the first place where in my opinion economies should be effected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no desire to discuss this question to-day or to do anything that would embarrass the minister in his negotiations, but when he suggests that anyone who makes a plea for a change in existing arrangements is guilty of urging the government to break its pledged word—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —then I challenge that statement. I do not like that high moral tone assumed in the case of perpetual bonds while on the other hand the people of Canada are allowed to suffer under an injustice simply because someone speaking for the government years ago committed this country to certain obligations—call it obligations if you like—that were unjust and unwarranted. It does not seem to me that we should take the ground that simply because certain legal obligations were incurred at that time there is no way of getting out of the difficulty. A good many people are suggesting that some way must be found—

Mr. DUNNING: I agree with that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —and I do not think that we ought to be told that we are immoral—

Mr. DUNNING: I must take exception to that; I never used such a word—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know the minister did not.

Mr. DUNNING: —nor did I intend to convey any such implication. So far as I am concerned the imputation should be withdrawn.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I gladly withdraw it. But the minister took very high moral ground when he said that we must maintain our honourable obligations, and so on. That is hardly fair in a matter of this kind. We should not have had perpetual bonds. No one should be permitted, in the name of the country, to put this country under tribute as it is under tribute to-day. There are certain ways of adjusting these debts on a fair basis. We have had examples in the west, under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, in which very definite changes in arrangements have been made. If it could be done with the small mortgage holder it can be done with the larger mortgage holders that we call bondholders, whether resident in this country or outside.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend suggest that we should put the railways into bankruptcy?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The railways should have been put into bankruptcy many years ago, before they were taken over.

Mr. DUNNING: That may be so, but in order to make a parallel with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, bankruptcy proceedings are involved.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not suggesting that it is an exact parallel, but I do suggest that it is one instance in which the people of this country, finding themselves in an impossible position, discovered a way out, and we shall have to do something of the kind in connection with the railway debt. There have been revolutions in other countries; why? Simply because there seemed to be no legal way of getting justice. Not very long ago Mexico seized the holdings of the great oil companies and then the government began to negotiate with regard to what compensation should be paid. This has gone on the world over. Violent revolution, or illegal seizure, if you like to call it "illegal" has come simply because of the breakdown of constitutional and legal ways of dealing with realities. We have a right to urge that the people of Canada should not be called upon any longer to pay a tribute of this magnitude. I feel quite confident that if the ground is strongly taken—and it is a reasonable ground—that some way out must be found, then some way will be found. The minister may deplore the use of indirect means. I do not much care whether the means are direct or indirect, but we have to find a way of easing the burden under which the people are now labouring.

Mr. DUNNING: One further word, lest an impression should go abroad throughout Canada that the Canadian railway debt carries a very high rate of interest. The matters which are now under discussion represent a portion only, and a relatively small portion, of the Canadian National indebtedness. It is well for the people of Canada to know that the average rate of interest being paid to-day on the total indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways approximates four per cent. I say that lest there should be an idea that we are paying six or seven per cent on vast sums of money. But that does not lessen the necessity for any government to do everything it honourably can to reduce the interest burden. I again use the word "honourably." If the government is not the seat of honour, where are we going? I make no apologies for saying that the government should go as far as it can go honourably in making arrangements to eliminate excessive interest rates wherever they exist. I do not take second place even to my hon. friend in that regard. But I believe that the good of the people of Canada is best served by keeping their pledged word, and negotiating within that limit. I do not believe that the example of Mexico or other places is a good example for Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister has just repeated the kind of statement to which I rose to object. If we advocate some other policy it is not because we are any more lacking in honour than the minister—

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say that very distinctly. In a few minutes we shall come to the discussion of unemployment in this country, and knowing as I do of thousands of young men to-day who have no chance whatever in life, some of them being driven to lives of crime by the necessitous circumstances in which they find themselves, and knowing that this government is not living up to its pledged word on which it was elected to power, I want the minister to be very careful in claiming any higher degree of honour than the rest of us in this house.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is too adroit for me. I did not claim any higher degree of honour than anyone else; I was speaking, not of my honour or the honour of my hon. friend, but of the word of the Dominion of Canada, pledged by Canada's duly authorized representatives at any particular time. If it will please my hon. friend, I doubt whether my own standard of honour would equal his.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not a matter of personal honour; I was not in any way reflecting on the minister's personal honour. But I do protest against the conception, which is very prevalent, that a government's pledged word to one class of people is superior to the government's pledged word to another class. Take the example of a returned man who met me yesterday, asking for a hand-out. When the government asked men to go overseas and risk their lives in the service of this country it pledged its honour to care for them on their return. And I am not saying that the government has not done a great deal. But there are scores of those poor fellows to-day who have no opportunity of living a decent life. I admit that this is all part of a very involved question but I take this opportunity of urging upon the government that the care of people of that kind is just as much a debt of honour as the carrying out of the terms of any financial document to which the government has placed its signature.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a more important debt. We may differ as to the manner of dealing with some things, but we do not differ as to the relative importance of those debts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. DUNNING: Unquestionably the debt of the people of Canada, as represented by their government, to humanity comes first; there is no question about that. My hon. friend cannot put us in that position.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been so treated by all governments.

Mr. DUNNING: It has been so treated by successive governments.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, no.

Mr. TUCKER: In regard to the point taken by the Minister of Finance that there is something wrong about a special tax, I do not think there is anything wrong about a special tax if such is necessary to do justice. The Minister of Finance introduced such a bill since I have been a member of this house. At the time the civil servants had their pay reduced by ten per cent it was regarded as a breach of the country's obligation to reduce the salaries of judges, of military officers and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; accordingly a special tax of ten per cent was placed upon their incomes. I suggest it will be no more unfair to place a special tax on the holders of these railway bonds to reduce their rate of interest to a reasonable rate.

I suggest that something should be done in this resolution to give power to deal with these bonds. The wording of the resolution is:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways. . . .

I assume that these obligations which are under discussion, these so-called perpetuals, are neither matured, maturing nor callable and so are not covered by the resolution. I suggest that the government should deal with these without further delay, and that power should be taken to deal with that type of obligation.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no question about our having power to negotiate. The government have power to negotiate with respect to any matter.

Mr. LEADER: It may be a delicate matter for a farmer to venture into the realm of finance, but I could not sit here representing a part of this dominion without taking the opportunity to state here as not only my opinion but that of my people back home that we should not fail to take advantage of every chance that occurs for refunding these obligations at a lower rate of interest. I do not think there is an hon. member in the chamber who does not believe in his heart that that is long overdue. When we look back and see the hardships that the people have suffered on account of these high interest rates, the homes that they have lost, the children's educations which have been sacrificed, we are reminded that the people of Canada have kept on paying this interest through all this time of turmoil and stress. The Minister of Finance knows well that Canadian National bonds bearing as high as seven per cent interest were refunded last summer.

I am just as jealous of my word and the word of Canada as any hon. member; but is it imposible for us to make arrangements with the bondholders without violating our pledged word? We have waited many years for the bondholders to take one step towards offering to do this, and they have not offered. I say an arrangement might be made without violating that word, and I will give an example. In 1897 Canada pledged her word and paid four million dollars to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to enable them to build a railway line. In turn the Canadian Pacific pledged their word and signed an agreement to the effect that they would never charge more than a certain rate on commodities coming east, and commodities going west. In 1922 I was a member of the house when, by action of the house, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were allowed to violate that agreement. Perhaps I should not say "violate"; they were allowed to amend the agreement in such a way that we lost the rate that we had paid for on commodities going west. I give this as an example of one instance where Canada did make an arrangement with a certain company and then changed the agreement. I do not think we violated our word.

I say in all sincerity to the Minister of Finance that I know the troubles he has, but we should seize the opportunity we have here to-day to issue an invitation to bondholders to see if they will not consent to a reduction in their earnings as other people of Canada have had to do.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Mr. Chairman, has the minister communicated with the holders of perpetual bonds to ascertain their opinions? I know that the province of Alberta wrote letters to the bondholders asking for their cooperation with a view to handling the debt situation in that province, and received no answer. The bondholders of Canada, particularly bondholders in connection with provincial governments, do not wish to cooperate; they do not wish to negotiate with a view to solving the debt problems of the provinces. The same holds true of the municipalities.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) are both under a misapprehension with regard to interest rates. With respect to the six per cent interest, there is only $70,000 of principal outstanding, and the saving of three per cent on that is about

$2,000 a year which is a substantial sum, in one way. There are seven per cent securities outstanding with respect to only $86,000, so that we have with respect to the Canadian National an obligation of $156,000 bearing a higher rate of interest than five per cent. That is point number one

Number two is that this country did not issue those perpetual securities The difficulty is that member after member has suggested that we undertook to issue a perpetual security The only perpetual security which has been issued in this country, so far as I know, was one which was issued a few months ago by the Minister of Finance and is now selling at about 88 or 90.

Mr. DUNNING: A three per cent perpetual, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and that is the first one this country has issued, so far as I know. The perpetual securities to which reference has been made, and which carry an interest rate beyond three per cent, are perpetual securities issued by the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway—that is, the Mackenzie and Mann railway, and the old Grand Trunk. Those companies did issue perpetual securities, the same as the Canadian Pacific Railway four per cent perpetual debenture stock, which, of course, has been sold in the markets of the world, largely in Great Britain. I think practically the whole of these perpetual securities of the Grand Trunk are held in Great Britain, and a great many of them are held in family trusts. But it would not make any difference if that interest rate were reduced to one per cent; it would not save us a dollar—not one dollar—because we have agreed to pay the Grand Trunk the equivalent of that much money. That is the point I wish to make, and that is the whole difficulty.

Mr. DUNNING: And we did that by act of this parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, by statute of this parliament. It is not a question of interest at all; that might all be taken away to-morrow and they would have to get exactly the same sum of money. It is covered by statute.

Reference has been made to what has been done under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I may say it was the view of the tribunal which considered the question that the Grand Trunk was not insolvent with respect to these securities. That is, it was worth in any event the amount of money that was represented by these securities. Hence it was that the country, instead of going on the market and borrowing, simply undertook to pay the Grand Trunk a sum of money which serviced these perpetual obligations. And if the rate were two per cent we would still have to pay the same sum of money. This matter has come up without notice, and I will have to give from recollection what knowledge I have of it, because I have not looked it up for years; but that is the position as I understand it. This has nothing to do with common stock. It has no connection, except with these perpetual securities, and I believe this was designated in the statute which dealt with it. That is, it is an annual payment which amounts to sufficient money for the purpose of servicing those perpetual obligations.

There is one other six and a half per cent security outstanding—and I always think the people who bought those securities in New York took advantage of our great difficulty. It was a time when this country was in a tremendously difficult position, and money was demanding a very high price. I was not in the House of Commons at the time of the transaction, but I know we paid six and a half per cent for it, which was an exceedingly high rate. It matures in eight years.

Mr. DUNNING: Seven years.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that if you will compare the average interest rates of the National railway system with those of the other great railway systems on the North American continent, you will have reason to feel proud of them. As a matter of fact if you will look at the figures in connection with similar securities in Great Britain you will have good cause to hold up your heads. Leaving out the $70,000 and the $86,000, and the $24,000,000 issue of 1921, all of which pay a rate higher than five per cent, you find that some are two per cent, some are three per cent and some are four per cent, the usual rate that is being paid for these securities. That is the basis of what was to be a very valuable security, especially with respect to perpetual Grand Trunks, for the reason everyone knows, that we have undertaken as a country to pay sufficient money to service those obligations at the rate provided. If we had a rate of one per cent we would still have to pay the same sum of money.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) is a very sincere member, and I am sure he does not wish either here or in the country to give a wrong impression. I am not referring particularly to any observation he made, but rather to the trend of the discussion, and the idea that with respect to their Canadian National obligations the people of this country are paying an unconscionable rate of interest.

I would like to point out to him that it is my job to work at that problem every day. I have conscientiously endeavoured to do it every minute I have been in office. Some of the results, not only of my work but of that of other men equally conscientious who preceded me, are contained in the public accounts so that he who runs may read. But the people will not read them. In the estimates before the house is a reduction in the interest charge on the public debt of this country amounting to about $5,500,000, as a result of taking advantage of such opportunities as come in connection with money markets and in connection with maturing obligations.

Mr. BENNETT: We saved $14,000,000 on one conversion.

Mr. DUNNING: I might point out further that it is not a partisan matter. Any man who occupies this position is supposed to give of his brain and experience. He should endeavour to manage the finances of this country in such a way that the load upon the people shall be as light as possible. Any man in this position who does not do that ought not to occupy it. May I point out that in spite of the fact that the public debt of Canada is to-day one billion dollars higher than it was in 1924, the debt charges to-day are just about what they were in that year. That is not a testimony to myself alone; it is a testimony to the fact that the men who are serving us in the Department of Finance and the ministers who have sat at this desk have continuously both in and out of season, used their best business and financial judgment in managing the public debt, even though they have not been very successful in preventing its abnormal increase. I want to mark that particularly.

This house votes the increases in public debt. These are probably necessary for any one of a thousand things, particularly during such periods as those through which we have just passed. If the financial management of the country has been such as to take care of a billion dollars of increase in the public debt and it is not costing any more in interest to-day than it did when the debt was a billion dollars less, surely that fact ought to be known by the people of Canada. It should also be known that the average rate at this moment on the Canadian public debt is less than three and a half per cent. I am not speaking by the book, in fact it might be three and a quarter per cent, but it is somewhere between three and a quarter and three and a half per cent. I would like you to look at the public debts of all the countries of the world and tell me how many of them can show an average debt charge of less than three and a half per cent. Remember we have a high public debt in relation to our population. The body that creates the public debt is this parliament and the financial management of the public debt must be in the hands of the government of the day. I know my hon. friend will say that the initiation of increases in the public debt rests with the government of the day. Of course that is true, but it is also true—

Mr. CAHAN: Public pressure.

Mr. DUNNING: We all know that there is public pressure behind all of us. As a matter of fact I believe the functions of parliament have changed completely. As originally constituted, parliament was a gathering of the commoners representing the taxpayers to prevent the king from spending too much of their money. Listening to speakers from all sides, it would seem to-day that the character of parliament has been reversed; parliament gathers for the purpose of persuading the king to spend ever more and more of their money.

Mr. LEADER: I appreciate what the minister has said, especially his reference to myself, but I fail to see where the saving in interest rates during these last ten years or more has been any remarkable achievement. I should like to ask the minister this question: When he refunds a maturing public debt at a lower rate of interest, is he not just renewing our note at the current rate of interest? Is that not only a business proposition that any of us would carry out?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course it is only a business proposition. However, there is a new aspect to the matter which has arisen in recent years. This country has determined that the control of credit and currency should rest with this parliament, through the government and the Bank of Canada. That fact has an important bearing upon these great refunding operations, in ways which I cannot discuss in this house or indeed on any occasion publicly. However, it is my responsibility. I can assure my hon. friend that there is another important matter to be considered, the choosing of the market, the time and the terms.

Why have I not called these Grand Trunk fours? Perhaps I am wrong, but my judgment is that they should not be called at the present time and I have so advised my colleagues. Why? Because as a result of long experience in handling these matters I believe that there will be a more advantageous opportunity than the one at present available. If I am wrong, it will cost this country quite a bit of money and will probably bring me a lot of criticism from some of the hon. gentlemen who have been criticizing to-day. It is a matter of business judgment in handling very large and involved transactions. One cannot just go out and say, "Lend us $150,000,000." It cannot be done that way. It is not like walking into a bank where your credit is good and asking for a loan of $100. These are tremendous transactions.

As the right hon. leader of the opposition said, there was a saving of $14,000,000 in one transaction. I do not recall the particular transaction, but I know that some of them have been enormous. They have involved the mobilizing of investment funds, not by the big interests but by the people who have their little to invest. That is really the backbone of the investment market in these times. I believe we have come through 1937 with larger refundings than Canada ever undertook previously. If it were as easy as my hon. friend suggests, why do we have highly paid men with technical training in these matters to advise the Minister of Finance?

Mr. LEADER: I do not know.

Mr. DUNNING: Speaking as a farmer, I can assure my hon. friend that a group of farmers could not do the job. I have to have the best experts with technical training that it is possible for me to get.

Mr. TUCKER: In his remarks the minister dealt with the question of callable obligations. What I had in mind was the perpetual obligations and the attitude which has apparently been taken that if the holders of these obligations are not willing to agree to give them up, there is something wrong about saying to them that we are not going to pay six per cent interest, or five or four and a half per cent interest, in perpetuity, regardless of changed conditions. I protest against the suggestion that there is something wrong in taking the attitude that we may properly reduce the interest on a perpetual obligation.

The leader of the opposition has said that this parliament obligated itself to make those payments and that we cannot save anything. The first thing I would suggest in that regard is this: When parliament passed a statute twenty years back it surely did not obligate this country for all time regardless of changing conditions.

Mr. BENNETT: Then we will have to hand back the railway to the Grand Trunk.

Mr. TUCKER: That is not necessary either. This parliament runs this country, not the owners of the railway. We do not have to hand things back to anybody.

Mr. BENNETT: But if you break a bargain.

Mr. TUCKER: We have the right to legislate in regard to the railroads of this country and we are not going to hand the railroads back to anybody at the behest of anybody.

In connection with these perpetual obligations I suggest that if parliament made a mistake and entered into an obligation which in the light of subsequent circumstances, is proving to be ruinous, then there is a duty on subsequent parliaments to change that obligation. That would not be repudiation; it would not be doing anything dishonest; it would be recognizing our high duty to legislate in the best interests of the people.

The suggestion has been made that if we changed the rate of interest we would not save a cent. I submit that if we passed an act appropriating a reduced amount of money, the equivalent of a certain rate of interest, deemed fair, that would not change the essential facts of the situation—or differ from what has been suggested. We can reduce the amount of money payable just the same as we can reduce the rate of interest. That is what has been done in connection with the farmers, as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has pointed out. The people of western Canada to-day are paying money in freight rates that it was definitely agreed they should not have to pay. The Crowsnest Pass agreement was abrogated by this parliament, and if an obligation to western Canada in regard to freight rates can be abrogated by this parliament, then our obligation to pay money to the bondholders can also be cut down. One is not more sacred than the other.

I cannot sit in my seat in this house, Mr. Chairman, without protesting against the attitude that unless we can get these bondholders to agree to a change we should sit down and do nothing, that if we can not successfully approach them directly we are doing something wrong if we do it indirectly. I submit that if we have a right to legislate to change conditions in regard to freight rates and break a solemn agreement whereby the people of western Canada were promised they would not have to pay more than a certain amount of freight rates on goods shipped into that country; if we can give the right to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to charge more than that agreed rate, then we can say to the bondholders: After a certain time your bonds are going to be called; if you want your money you can take it, but if you do not, we are going to pay no more than three per cent interest. I submit that there is nothing morally wrong about that, nothing dishonest, and I cannot sit in my seat in this parliament and take the defeatist attitude that unless we can persuade the bondholders to give up the present rate, we can do nothing about it. We sitting here in this parliament of the Dominion of Canada have full legal rights over the matter. When they took these bonds they knew we had the right to tax them, cancel them—I am not suggesting that we cancel them—do what we saw fit with them. I submit that we should legislate in the light of present day conditions, and fix a rate of interest that will be fair under present conditions.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be well to remember that the Canadian people have shown a very great interest in these matters, and when they were asked to convert their high interest rate securities to lower rates they did so to the extent of $640,000,000. That at least indicates that the people are quite as well aware of the circumstances as we are in this house, and are quite as anxious as we are to do what can be done. I happened at the moment to be at the finance department, and I was told by the bankers that it was not likely that the people would do any such thing; yet the people were so willing to do it that they took $640,000,000 of their high interest securities and converted them to a lower-interest-bearing security. That indicates that the people are interested in the matter and are concerned about it. And they were not the big interests that have been spoken of. You would be amazed, Mr. Chairman, to know that they were people who bought securities in small sums, $5,000, $10,000, some $25,000 and some $100,000, and they took a lower rate of interest because they were willing to help their country at a time of great depression.

I cannot get into my mind how a member of my profession would suggest that when a bargain has been made between two parties by which one of the parties sells his property for a sum of money, and that sum of money is represented by obligations which carry a rate of interest, the other party to the transaction can suddenly say: I am not going to pay what I have agreed to pay you, but I am going to keep the property just the same.

An hon. MEMBER: Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, I put the bill through, and it was based on the bankruptcy judgment of the privy council. The foundation of it is that the man must be insolvent, and all it does is to take his assets and ratably divide them among his creditors, which is bankruptcy.

Now it is suggested that we should say to the Grand Trunk, whose property we bought: We are not going to pay the annuity we agreed to pay you, and we are not going to give you back that road, but we are going to give you a lesser annuity than you agreed to take for it. Nobody has ever suggested that the price paid for it was exorbitant. In fact the common shareholders have always contended that the price was ridiculously small and that they were not fairly treated. Please bear in mind that this was a case in which we bought a certain property and agreed to pay an annuity for it which was sufficient to carry the interest on the obligations created by the railway company; and for us to say to them now that we are going to break that bargain would necessarily involve their chance of taking back their property, if we say we will not pay what we agreed to pay. That is the story; but it is not the whole story because it involves also the Grand Trunk Western in the United States, where certain other considerations would have to be taken into account. We bought that as part of the Grand Trunk system, and the contention is that we bought it too cheap. That has always been the contention. That is what the Grand Trunk shareholders say in England, that we did not give them what it was worth and that they should have something more.

Mr. DUNNING: They want the right to sue us at this moment.

Mr. BENNETT: They are asking for a fiat, not only to set aside the Lovibond award, but they contend, as the member for Kootenay East has said, that for some reason their own directors did not enable the common shareholders to vote on the offer we made to them, and which they declined to accept. Let us keep in mind that this is not a question of interest rates at all, but a question of a bargain we made with a company with headquarters in England, the pioneer railway company in this country. We agreed to take their property and pay them an annuity sufficient to pay the interest on their securities, and if we broke that bargain, if we relieved ourselves from our obligation, we would have to contemplate their getting the property back.

Mr. JAQUES: May I suggest that this is more a question of common sense than a question of honour. You cannot pay increasing debts unless you have increasing supplies of money, and if the government would implement its pledge to issue currency and credit in terms of public need—

Mr. DUNNING: We are doing that now.

Mr. JAQUES: —we might then be able to defend not only the integrity of our honour but the integrity of our pockets.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to refer to two remarks made by the Minister of Finance. He takes the stand that the obligation entered into some years ago is still binding on this parliament, and that any attempt at a compulsory settlement is a breaking of faith. During the great war Great Britain entered into certain financial obligations with the United States, but after the war economic conditions were such that it was impossible for Great Britain to carry out its obligations. As a result for some years now Great Britain has been making interest payments not in gold, as the obligation called for, but in silver, and it has never been suggested anywhere that that was a breaking of faith. They were simply facing the realities that had to be met.

The minister also said that it was not a question of simply the big interests being involved as shareholders, but that there were people who held small blocks of bonds who must be taken into consideration. Yet in both Great Britain and Australia the governments appealed to the patriotism of their citizens.

Mr. DUNNING: So did we.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Exactly. And their people responded in a splendid way.

Mr. DUNNING: So did ours.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There is no reason why the people holding these bonds carrying a high rate of interest, 6½ and 4 per cent, should not now be prepared to show their patriotism.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend understands that these people are not in this country but in England.

Mr. BENNETT: And they are paying the highest income tax on the interest they get from these securities of any people in the world.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The fact remains that Australia took steps to compel these people living outside the commonwealth.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: Oh no, they did not compel them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They set a limit of time within which they could either reconvert their bonds or cash them in.

Mr. DUNNING: That applied to Australia, not to outside Australia.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They put a limit on people residing outside, too.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I may be misinformed, but I understood they did.

Mr. BENNETT: They made a conversion in London.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. As a matter of fact I can give the hon. member the information. The compulsory feature applied only to Australian holders; ninety-seven per cent of the bonds, to the best of my memory, came in voluntarily as a matter of patriotism, and it was necessary to apply the compulsory feature with respect to only three per cent. But with respect to the London obligations it was a matter of conversion by arrangement and bargaining in the same manner in which we proceed under similar circumstances.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But is it not true that the Australian government said that unless they accepted the voluntary arrangement it would be made compulsory?

Mr. CAHAN: There was no intimidation at all against the foreign holder.

Mr. DUNNING: There was no intimidation against the British holder.

Mr. HARRIS: If we can get back to the resolution for just a few moments, I should like to reiterate with a little more detail what I had in mind a short time ago. We now purpose to issue $200,000,000 which will have the full guarantee of the government. Our present obligations are made up in part of the $978,000,000 to which in the last two decades we have seen fit to give the government guarantee, and another $251,000,000, part of which is guaranteed by the provinces and part of which is held perhaps by individuals, corporations and financial institutions. I am one of those in this chamber who are anxious that nothing shall impair in any way the word or guarantee of the Dominion of Canada. My position is on all fours with that of the Minister of Finance when he said a few moments ago: "If this house is not the seat of honour, where shall we find it in this country?" We ought to be in the top position in that regard. I am anxious to keep it that way. But we ought to be particularly careful that we do not go on continually adding the pledge of the Dominion of Canada to securities of one kind and another. Some of these securities, twenty years ago were worth ten or fifteen cents on the dollar, but by getting them in under these guarantees by the dominion their value is raised to-day to around one hundred dollars to the extent of a billion dollars.

In this resolution are we not adding some small portion to the total, taking it out of the category of not being guaranteed by the government and putting it into the category of a government guaranteed security? That is the point about which I was trying to learn something in the early part of the discussion. Let us keep our word; let us adhere to our pledges by all means; but let us not add to those pledges more and more. I can visualize that in 1917 and on to 1921, when the holders of some of these securities wrote up their financial statements at the end of the year, they did not put much value on these securities, and they got in the hands of financial institutions of one kind and another.

I believe that if it were possible to go right through the history of the last twenty years with regard to this billion dollar's worth of debt, two distinct features would come to the surface. To quiet the fears of the people of Canada, as the minister said a few moments ago, the interest rate has been reduced; but to what extent has the principal sum of money represented in that bond become of more value? To what extent during the last twenty years has it increased on the present worth sheets of the owners of those particular securities? To an extent, I would venture the opinion, much more than offsets the reduction in the interest rate, say from six to four per cent. I merely want to put on record that in parading before the house and the country that we all with one accord are seeing to it that the interest rate on all our obligations is coming down, we should see to it that we are not, by endorsing these bonds and moving them into the category of fully endorsed government bonds, increasing the value of the original security by changing its category. I therefore repeat my question, What portion of this $200,000,000, which is part and parcel of the $978,000,000 at present guaranteed—

Mr. DUNNING: No, in addition to it.

Mr. HARRIS: —in addition to the $978,000,000—originates with the provinces, and what portion consists of bonds of a kind to which no dominion or provincial responsibility or guarantee or mortgage is attached.

Mr. DUNNING: I will see that that information is available on the bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 107, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 27, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers for the second reading of Bill No. 105, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, at page 2318 of Hansard of yesterday, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) is reported as follows:

So I say that in my opinion we have failed lamentably as a parliament; for the moment I shall not speak of the government, which is the leader of parliament and the leader of the country. I will say that parliament, including myself and every member of it—

Every one.

—is failing in this very session, as I think we have failed to perhaps a lesser degree in the past, to give leadership in these matters to this country.

I register the strongest protest against that statement. The other day, on April 7, the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding) asked, as reported at page 2112 of Hansard, the following question of the hon. member for Kootenay East:

Mr. Golding: What did the hon. member say to them for five years when he was in office? What hope did he give them?

That is, the unemployed.

Mr. Stevens: If the government and the people of this country had paid attention to what I said, they would probably have been further ahead than they are to-day, but they did not pay attention. I am going to say to-day what I said before the last election, and what I said when I sat on the treasury benches and after I left them.

Mr. Golding: Say it now.

Mr. Stevens: I am going to say it now, if my hon. friend will let me. The cause of the unemployment of fifty, sixty or seventy thousand railway men is not a falling off in external trade; it is a change in economic conditions, which has been wholly ignored in connection with this matter.

The hon. member for Kootenay East did not tell the whole story. I took the trouble to check the index of Hansard for every session including the first session of 1930, and I will read the record of the hon. gentleman, first as a heckler when he was on that side of the house before the election of 1930; in the second place as a minister of the crown from 1930 to October, 1934; and in the third place as a gentleman of leisure as he is now.

On April 1, 1930—it was April Fool's day—he opposed the fair wages and hours bill, as will be found in Hansard of that date at page 1143. On March 31, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) moved the following amendment to the motion to go into supply:

In the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment.

On April 1, the hon. member for Kootenay East, who represented another constituency at the time, interrupted the then Minister of Labour by his heckling, as will be found on eight pages of Hansard. I did not have the time to count each one of his interruptions, but the house can find them on pages 1172-3-4-5-8-9 and pages 1180-1 of Hansard of April 1, 1930. One of his interruptions at page 1179, the second column, while the then Minister of Labour was speaking, was as follows:

Mr. Stevens: Are the minister and his colleagues aware of any unemployment problem which exists in Canada at the present time or which has existed during the past three months?

Mr. Manion: Certainly not.

Let us turn to a book published under the authority of the hon. gentleman when he was Minister of Trade and Commerce in the defunct government. I refer to the Canada Year Book of 1931. At page 775 of this book, published under the hon. gentleman's authority, there appears the following.

In Canada, as in other parts of the world, there was a general slackening in industrial activity during 1930 resulting in a lower level of employment than in 1929, and also than in some months of 1928. With these exceptions, however, the general index was higher than in previous years of the record.

That is the first quotation. I quote the next paragraph on the same page:

Employment showed partial recovery at the beginning of February from the year end losses, but in the next two months the trend was downward. From May 1 till July 1, steady improvement was recorded and the situation on August 1 showed little change. From the beginning of September, however, curtailment was again indicated—

The hon. gentleman was then a member of the government at that time in power.

—and on December 1 the index was nearly three points lower than on January 1—

Mark you!

—although it was higher than the average for the years 1921-1927.

Before the hon. gentleman was informed, before the election of 1930, he said that there was a lot of unemployment, but after he was better informed he saw that he was mistaken in that statement and said that there was no unemployment at the time he said that there was.

Mr. STEVENS: That statement does not say so.

Mr. POULIOT: I have read it, and my hon. friend can learn it by heart; I have no time to read it again. In 1930, on April 3, the same gentleman heckled again during the Prime Minister's speech on an amendment to supply moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. At page 1224 of Hansard of April 3, 1930, the Prime Minister made the statement that there had been 146 interruptions on the previous day in the course of the speech of the Minister of Labour. The hon. member for Kootenay East thereupon said that the minister had invited them. Now I come to the story of the five-cent piece and I will read it to the house. On pages 1227 and 1233 there will be found some interruptions by the hon. gentleman. From page 1227 I quote the following:

Mr. Mackenzie King: May I conclude what I have to say? So far as giving money from this federal treasury to provincial governments is concerned, in relation to this question of unemployment as it exists to-day, I might be prepared to go to a certain length possibly in meeting one or two of the western provinces that have Progressive premiers at the head of their governments—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Mackenzie King: —but I would not give a single cent to any Tory government.

Mr. Bennett: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: Shame!

Mr. Mackenzie King: Do my hon. friends say "Shame"?

Mr. Bennett: Yes, shame!

Mr. Mackenzie King: What is there to be ashamed of?

Mr. Stevens: You ought to be ashamed of that.

Mr. Mackenzie King: My hon. friend is getting very indignant.

I am glad to see the hon. gentleman laughing to-day. Apparently at that time he was making a joke at which he is only now laughing. The Prime Minister continued:

Something evidently has got under his skin. May I repeat what I have said? With respect to giving moneys out of the federal treasury to any Tory government in this country for these alleged unemployment purposes, with these governments situated as they are to-day, with policies diametrically opposed to those of this government, I would not give them a five-cent piece.

Mr. Cahan: Why give it to a Progressive government?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The point is that at that time there was no unemployment at all according to the official statement published by the hon. gentleman in his official capacity. There was nothing of the sort; and was it a shame for the Prime Minister of the time to say that he would not give a five cent piece to the Tory government for alleged unemployment or for Tory propaganda? That is the point.

Let us come now to the record of the hon. gentleman on unemployment relief as a minister of the crown. It is very short. I have it on one page for the four years he sat as a minister. At the 1930 special session on September 11 he interrupted the present Prime Minister, as indicated at page 90 of Hansard of that session, and during the special session on the same day he interrupted the Hon. Mr. Ralston, as reported at page 118. His contribution during the special session of 1930 was to interrupt my leader and Mr. Ralston, a former minister.

Let us pass along. Time marches on. On June 4, 1931, the hon member for Winnipeg North, during his speech on the debate, had the honour to be interrupted by the hon. member in question, as reported at page 2320 of Hansard of that year. And there was another interruption of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who has probably forgotten or forgiven it. That was on August 1, as reported at page 4454. Therefore the hon. member was following the very good policy of making two interruptions each session. He made two in the special session of 1930, which was a short one, and he made two in the regular session of 1931, which was a long one.

Let us come to the session of 1932; March 10, pages 984-5 of Hansard. The hon. member interrupted the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), probably because he comes from his own province but does not share his political views. On March 15 the hon. member in question made his first speech on unemployment. He had been sworn in as a minister of the crown for nearly two years, and this was the first time he expressed his views on unemployment. That was in the debate on the resolution for continuance of unemployment and farm relief, just a defence of the blank cheque. At page 1124 of Hansard of that year he is reported as saying:

> The situation which confronted the government was this: Undoubtedly there was a national emergency, the nature of which a year ago it was impossible to define in precise terms.

"A year ago" was March 1931, or nine months after the government of which he was a member had taken office. Before that there was no unemployment. The crisis came when the hon. gentleman was one of the colleagues of the leader of the opposition. He could not say otherwise, on account of his official statement in the Canada Year Book for 1931; he had to be logical with himself; therefore he had to show that unemployment began from the time they were in power, and when he was so indignant with my leader for saying he would not give a cent to Quebec or the Tories for propaganda, then there was no unemployment at all according to himself. Do you know, sir, why the hon. gentleman is smiling? He may belong to the Oxford group and decided to make his confession, and, as I proceed, it brings him relief. The hon. gentleman continued:

> Indeed, in any such emergency there are bound to be conditions which cannot possibly be foreseen, and yet it is of prime importance that such conditions should be met when they arise. Therefore, I say a year ago the government was faced with a national emergency due largely to two causes, namely, unemployment and crop failure.

Twice he repeated that it was a year ago, or a year prior to March 15, 1932, that unemployment started and the government of the time was faced with an emergency.

There was no constructive suggestion in that speech. Even with a magnifying glass one could not be found.

On April 1 of the same year he interrupted a speech of my leader on the Unemployment Continuance Act, as reported at pages 1624, 1625, 1628 and 1629 of Hansard. At page 1628 the present Prime Minister gave certain quotations, and the hon. member suggested it was a distortion of the position taken by the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I could use those words to qualify his interruption when he was so indignant about the statement of my leader as to refusing to give anything for propaganda to the Tory governments which have since then disappeared.

On May 25 the hon. member gave some unemployment statistics to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as reported at page 3383. On the same date he interrupted that hon. gentleman, his deskmate, as will be found at page 3427. That is the contribution of the hon. member on the question of unemployment relief during the session of 1932, which was a long one.

Then we come to the session of 1932-33. On November 4, 1932, as reported at page 848, he gave unemployment statistics to his present deskmate (Mr. Woodsworth). Time marches on. On March 22, 1933, he answered the same gentleman, his deskmate, that he would look into the matter of unemployment statistics, as will be found at page 3283.

In 1934, during the whole session, he did not say a word about the unemployment problem. And that is the contribution of the hon. member to the question of employment or unemployment policies for the whole time he was a minister of the crown.

Let us see what his record is as a gentleman of leisure. He resigned his portfolio on October 27, 1934. On July 2 of the following year he made his second speech in five years on British Columbia relief camp strikers, as will be found on page 4143 of Hansard of 1935. This is very important, because he gave us a second edition of that speech not long ago. That was all for 1935.

In 1936, on April 20, speaking on the unemployment relief bill he said:

. . . we must make it possible for the commission and the government to act this year, this summer, immediately . . .

In starting public works, as will be found on pages 1967-8 of Hansard of that year. He spoke about the drafting of legislation as reported at pages 1984-5.

On April 6, 1936, he spoke of the employment commission, as will be found on pages 1816-7 of Hansard. And I have another reference on that matter. He spoke of the seconding of employees. Then, as reported on page 1825, he said:

I wish to warn the Prime Minister and his colleagues that, in my opinion at any rate, they are leaning on a broken reed when they depend upon external trade to solve our internal problems . . .

On April 7 he spoke of road connections from mountain parks to the boundary, as will be found on page 1882. He did not discover that suggestion; everybody knew that roads are necessary to lead to the parks; in fact the matter was discussed a long time ago; but the hon. member took advantage of it and I congratulate him upon the appropriate remarks he made.

In 1937 he said nothing about unemployment. That is the record of the gentleman of leisure who can give all his time to the matter and is not required to look after his party. He is in the position of the totalitarian states; he is a totalitarian party; the party consists of himself, and what he said about parliament was perhaps a little propaganda for Herr Hitler and Il Duce.

That is all, sir, until this year. But this year the party of reconstruction became the party of resurrection, and those who were sleeping in those years of depression awoke. On April 7 of this year the hon. gentleman made a very fine speech on unemployment on the resolution which preceded this bill. As reported at page 2110 of Hansard the hon. gentleman said:

I recall very well, and perhaps the committee will do me the honour to recall it also, that on that occasion—

That is when the act respecting the establishment of a national employment commission was brought before the committee.

. . . I warned the government that the appointment of a commission as proposed in the then bill was not a solution of the problem of unemployment or of the problems of economic distress peculiar to the country at that time. I further stated that the employment commission could not possibly report within less than eighteen months. I was too optimistic, Mr. Chairman, because it has taken two years for the commission to make its final report.

Let us see what the hon. gentleman actually said on April 6, 1936, as reported at page 1828, speaking about the employment commission bill:

I am not suggesting that this council is an unwise thing at all. I think it should have been in operation years ago; it would have been better if something of the kind had been provided, but I do not know that it is necessary to appoint a commission from outside.

It was a commission from inside that he suggested.

I think the Prime Minister, with his powers as such, could have summoned men right in the service at the present time. I could name a dozen such men he could summon who would make up just as good a commission as he will ever get anywhere. Be that as it may, this commission may be a good thing; I am not criticizing it—

Those are the words of the hon. member, and if he wishes to see them he need only turn to page 1828 of Hansard of April 6, 1936. There is no criticism in that; if it is criticism, it is indeed very mild.

Then he spoke about the splendid public service given by those who constituted the Purvis commission. If the hon. member wishes to know more about my views on the commission he has only to read La Presse of Montreal, each Saturday, and he will see what

I think of it. "Splendid service"—it shows that the hon. member is not familiar with the unemployment problem. He knows that the commission rendered no service at all to this country. I found their report rotten. I have proved it clearly and distinctly in several articles which have been published in that paper, the French newspaper with the largest circulation in America.

He goes on to say, in his speech delivered on April 7 of this year:

> The duty of the commission was to take the facts, which we knew then quite as well as we know them to-day; to study with the assistance of their experts the causes that lay behind, and then come to the government with their conclusions so that the government could present to parliament some definite proposals for remedying these problems.

"The causes of unemployment"—surely the hon. member has not forgotten that his leader, the present right hon. leader of the opposition, made the very best speech of his career when he addressed his electors in Calgary in the winter time, about Christmas, 1930, or the New Year, 1931, shortly after his election as Prime Minister. What did he say then? He said, "We must look into the causes of unemployment."

When I was on the opposite side of the house, one evening I started to read that very speech, eulogizing the hon. member's leader —at that time he was still with his leader— and that leader became furious; I do not know why. It was the first time I had any reason to compliment him. He became furious, and called upon the chair to prevent me from continuing reading that magnificent speech about the necessity of finding the causes of unemployment. At that time the hon. member was supporting his leader, and I was not given a chance to read that speech in the house, a speech which referred to the causes of unemployment.

With respect to railway men, the hon. member must learn that the humble member who addresses the committee is a friend of the labouring man; he has fought for them every time, and had regretted the way the railway men were treated when the government which the hon. member supported was in power.

Then came the second edition of his second speech in five years on the British Columbia relief camps. As reported at page 2112 of Hansard of this year he said:

> It shall not be said through any oversight on my part that I am belittling assistance to youth. I am all for it; I have been for some years and have spoken constantly in favour of it—

Yes, outside the house. But what counts is what is said in the house. To canvass or make speeches to organizations of youth whose votes anyone may wish to obtain is worth very little. It is much more important to discuss the youth problem in the House of Commons, and to give the house or the committee the benefit of one's views in the matter.

Then he spoke about unity and became a little satirical about the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the premier of Ontario. It is dangerous to throw stones at a neighbour, when one lives in a glass house. The hon. member is not very far from the seat occupied by the gentleman who was careful enough to leave the chamber when I began to speak; I mean the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I do not see how the hon. member for Kootenay East can speak of unity, preach unity or give lectures about unity to anyone, when he sits so far away from his former chief. Ah!

At page 2115 of Hansard he is reported to have said something about bankrupt municipalities, and he made the exception of the city of Sherbrooke. According to the hon. member, all other municipalities in Canada are bankrupt; he knows about all of them.

Mr. LECLERC: He might have excepted Granby.

Mr. POULIOT: Because the hon. member is the mayor and a very wise administrator; but he is a Liberal, too.

As reported at page 2115 the hon. member for Kootenay East says:

> But I disagree with the idea of the dominion government and the dominion parliament taking the responsibility, because in my opinion the whole question narrows itself down to one of economics and not to a dispute about constitutional authority.

As reported at page 2115 the hon. member is not in favour of the dominion parliament taking responsibility. All right. He has changed his views about his leader; it did not take him long to change his views about that.

Let us turn to page 2116, the last paragraph of which reads as follows:

> I am going to say quite frankly that unless some step is taken—and the leadership must come from here—there will be a serious time ahead for the cities and municipalities of this country.

On one page he disagrees with the idea of the dominion parliament taking responsibility, but on the next page he says "leadership must come from here." When was he right? Was he right at page 2115 or at page 2116? Any hon. member can check it in Hansard. I would direct the attention of anyone interested to the third paragraph in the second column on page 2115, and to the third paragraph in the first column on page 2116.

He spoke very modestly about housing:

Since 1931 I have consistently taken a strong stand on this question of housing throughout Canada.

On June 19, 1935, and never before—I have checked the indexes of Hansard and there is nothing about housing until this date—the hon. member for Kootenay East began to speak about housing. He spoke on the third reading of a bill to establish the trade and industry commission, and on that occasion was called to order by Mr. Speaker, and did not proceed further.

Then, at page 610 of Hansard of 1936 I find two-thirds of a column in the report of February 27. I find one and one-quarter columns at page 1826 of Hansard of April 6, 1936. There is nothing in Hansard for 1937.

In the speech delivered on April 7 of this year he makes some observations about the tourist business and, finally, in the peroration of his speech he said he had heard rumours to the effect that the government proposed to introduce a long list of public works to be scattered throughout the various constituencies, as a contribution towards the solution of this problem. He made this comment:

If that is done, all I can say is that it is an indication that an election is in the offing.

I do not wish to impute motives to anybody, but I assume the next Conservative convention which takes place immediately after the close of this session, had something to do with the speeches the hon. member made on unemployment.

I have almost concluded what I wanted to say, with the exception of one further point. I have given the record of the hon. member with regard to unemployment, since the beginning of 1930, including the time he was a cabinet minister and the time he has been a gentleman of leisure. I shall give my own record, not in order to boast but just to show the hon. member for Kootenay East that his statement about parliament was most unfair to each member of the house. I shall not repeat his remarks as they are already twice on record. On March 15, 1929, the select standing committee on industrial and international relations studied the problem of unemployment. At that time figures were given which interested me very deeply. I started to make a study of the minimum wages paid to men in the province of Quebec, and I found that the workingmen in my province were being paid less than those in other provinces. I considered that to be most unfair. My task was not at all interesting at first and I am thankful to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the assistance he provided at that time in helping me to compile and classify these statistics. I also had the help of the staff of the Department of Labour, especially of Mr. Ward, a very competent man who was then deputy minister.

If the hon. member for Kootenay East will look at pages 3654 to 3659 of Hansard of June 12, 1929, he will find a number of tabulations with reference to wages paid in Quebec and other Canadian cities. The minimum and maximum wages paid in Montreal and other Canadian cities are shown. On March 21, 1930, as reported at pages 853 and following of Hansard, the member for Témiscouata made a speech in connection with minimum wages paid to men. He was interrupted by several Tory members. He was interrupted by Mr. Macdougall, who was defeated in Inverness by the present member (Mr. MacLennan); by Mr. Short, who has since died; by Mr. Irvine, who was then a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member, but who changed his colours quite often; by the Hon. Mr. Chaplin, who has since died, and by Hon. Mr. Geary, the former Minister of Justice. On March 31, 1930, as reported on pages 1132 and following of Hansard, the member for Témiscouata was interrupted again by another Tory who laughed at him when he told about the misery of the unemployed. That was Mr. Ernst, who was afterwards selected as Minister of Fisheries by the then Prime Minister, probably because he was so light. That interruption did not prove a good vote catcher in Nova Scotia.

On April 30, 1930, during the debate on the third reading of the Fair Wages and Hours Act, the member for Témiscouata praised the then Minister of Labour for bringing in that legislation, against which the hon. member voted. I had a complimentary letter from Mr. Tom Moore, then president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, dated June 18, 1929. I shall not take the trouble to read it, but I keep it on my file. Mr. Moore praised that legislation.

I have in my hand a voluminous report dealing with the settlers on relief in one part of my constituency, which report I can show to anyone who desires to see it. This report concerns a number of men who have suffered considerably. These men come to see me when I am home, and I call to see them when I am in their vicinity. Such visits are a sorrow rather than a pleasure because these men live under such poor circumstances. I have been working for these men; I have been pleading and arguing their case in the house; but what happened? I was made a laughing stock by the Tory gang when I defended these poor settlers who were starving.

Not only that, but I was grossly insulted by a man now employed by the provincial government. At one time he was a member of the press gallery but was expelled because he was a drunkard and a scoundrel. He had space in a room of one of the Tory members where he wrote defamations, calumny and insults in connection with Liberal members, and especially the member for Témiscouata. I called that man by name in the house; but what happened? That man had been evidently inspired, because when I called him a scoundrel, the terrestrial almighty had my words struck from Hansard. This was against all the rules of the house, as we are free to call anyone a scoundrel who is not protected by the rules. I made this statement at that time because I was most indignant, but the hon. gentleman did not defend my action. I was doing my duty in trying to improve the lot of the poor settlers in my constituency and throughout the north, but I was insulted and laughed at by the supporters of the previous government. I am not saying that my hon. friend laughed at me on that occasion; but he knows those who did, those who jeered at me when I referred to the misery of these men. That may be the reason why he left them. If so, I congratulate him.

Your Honour was in the house at the time and will remember the trouble I had in trying to obtain the previous occupations of the unemployed. I do not know if it is true, but I have been told that an order was then given not to hand out any figures in connection with the unemployed. Figures could be given out only in connection with the employed, but that is an altogether different thing. I could not get any information until the mayors of sixty-two of the most important cities in Canada came to Ottawa. They compiled this information and sent it to me. I had it classified with the help of just one person, and I distributed copies of my report to the members of the house and of the senate. This was declared to be out of order by the chair as it did not suit the pleasure of the then government. However, I supplied this information in order that the then government and the country should be forced to know something about the previous occupations of the unemployed.

It is utterly impossible to do anything for the rehabilitation of the unemployed unless their previous occupations are known. We must know what they can do and where they can be found. That is why I found the report of the employment commission to be far from satisfactory. The hon. member for Kootenay East has said it is a splendid work, but I consider it a rotten piece of work.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. POULIOT: I offered to do this work, and the only cost to the country would have been the payment of four or five competent employees in the service. Hon. members will remember that was the only condition attached to my offer. If I had done the work, my report probably would have been less extensive; but it would have indicated the previous occupations of each class of unemployed in each important city of Canada, and even in the smaller municipalities, showing what classes of men have suffered from unemployment. That is the only way in which you can draft a sane policy for the rehabilitation of the unemployed. That is my point, Mr. Speaker, and I am not going to continue longer. I thank the committee, and if I have said anything disagreeable it is only because of the respect I have for the truth, my respect for parliament and my respect for my colleagues.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) protests very vigorously against the member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) stating that parliament is not doing its duty. I for one want to say that I think parliament is not doing its duty, and that no member of this house can return to his constituency without feeling somewhat ashamed of the small amount of work that 245 men have to show as a result of their deliberations for, now, three sessions.

Referring to the bill now before the house, one cannot estimate its value by itself. That can be done only by examining the policies of the Liberal party as advocated before the election and the policies they have pursued since coming into office.

On February 27, 1933, the leader of the Liberal party set forth in this house the policy of his party with reference to unemployment. Without quoting, one may say that it consisted of four things: (1) Unemployment was to be treated as a national problem; (2) there was to be set up a national employment commission to administer relief in cooperation with the municipalities and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed; (3) there was to be set up a system of unemployment insurance; and (4) as a permanent measure the government was going to stimulate internal and external trade.

I ask the house to look very briefly at what has been done and what is now proposed in this bill as an answer to those policies. First of all, may I point out that the question of unemployment is not being dealt with as a national problem. For the past three sessions we have been told again and again that the direct responsibility lies with the municipalities and the province, and there has been no attempt to come to grips with the problem as the direct responsibility of this parliament and the federal government.

Let us look at the second plank in their platform with reference to unemployment—the setting up of a national employment commission. The idea of a national employment commission was conceived in the mind of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1933. It came to birth in 1936, but it was not the kind of child that had been visualized by the Prime Minister. Originally the national employment commission was to be a commission that would cooperate with the provinces in the administration of relief, but the commission that was appointed had no such power, and never has had any such power. It had no power to put a single man to work, no power to administer any relief. As the minister (Mr. Rogers) himself said, it was an advisory commission whose main function was to collect statistics and submit advice to the Minister of Labour.

This commission, conceived in 1933 and born in 1936, died on February 1, 1938. Shakespeare in Julius Caesar has Mark Antony say, "I come to bury Caesar, not to praise him." This parliament has come to bury the commission, not to praise it. The commission is dead; it no longer exists. Having submitted its report, which cost the people of this country in the neighbourhood of $300,000, it now ceases to exist. Why? Is there no longer any need of advice in dealing with the problem of unemployment? Has the problem of unemployment been solved? Even the Minister of Labour would be the first to say that the fact that you have collected statistics regarding unemployment is not removing unemployment, and that an analysis of the situation is not a solution of the problem. Here we have a national employment commission that was to be the bulwark of the Liberal policy for combating unemployment, a commission that was brought into existence in 1936 and died in 1938. But what is most significant of all is that I find, in a return to an order of the house brought down for my colleague the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that the commission was dismissed before the report which it had submitted had even been considered by the government.

Mr. ROGERS: May I correct that? I know my hon. friend wants to be fair. I think he will see that the statement is to the effect that the report was considered, as it only could have been considered, after it had been submitted, and the commission itself was dissolved after it had submitted its final report—its "final report"; I emphasize those words.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The government gave consideration to the final report after its submission, it is true; but the fact still remains that by that time the commission itself had been dismissed, and, strange to say, twelve of the employees whose services with the government had ranged from one to sixteen years, four of them having served for fourteen years and over, were dismissed at the same time. That would look to me, Mr. Speaker, as though there was very little sympathy on the part of the government with the report submitted by the commission. Certainly they have shown no enthusiasm for its recommendations. I ask the house now to look at page 20 of the report of the national employment commission, where will be found a summary of the commission's recommendations. As I intend to speak for only a short time I would ask, with the consent of the house, that this be placed on Hansard.

I ask the house to look at that summary. In the third column, under the heading, "Action taken," appear the words "Approved July 4, 1936." That was with reference to the registration. Opposite "Employment service" it says: "No action" "National Advisory Committee:" "Partially met." "Homeless Adults:" "Approved." "Housing:" "Approved," so far as the first part is concerned, and as to the second part: "No action." "Training and Reconditioning:" "Approved." Then follows a long list opposite which appear the words: "No action," "No action," "No action." "Training centres:" "Partially met." "For the carrying out of training projects:" "Embodied in agreements with provinces."

The thing that impresses me is that, after having paid $300,000 to secure advice from the best commission the Minister of Labour could get in this country, we find that the term which occurs most often in the third column is, "No action," or "Partially met." I want to suggest that if we are going to bury this commission, we might inscribe on its tombstone the words: "No action," partly as a memorial of its short life, and, second, as a monument to the masterly inaction that has come as a result of its work.

I ask the house to look at some of the things which it did do. Take No. 5 on the statement, "Housing." A great deal has been said in this house about the need of a housing program. But here again we find evidence of what has occurred throughout the government's attempt to meet the problem of unemployment, namely, meeting the shadow of the problem and avoiding the substance. We have a housing problem and we have a housing scheme, but how much has that scheme benefited the people of Canada? How much has it benefited the people who live in the province from which I come? I find that in Saskatchewan under the dominion housing scheme two houses have been built, at a total expenditure of $8,200. Is it any wonder that the unemployed in Saskatchewan feel that the dominion housing scheme is not an answer to their problem? Certainly two houses will not put many carpenters to work or very much money in the pockets of the merchants and the unemployed.

I turn to another scheme, and one which was a little more successful: The farm placement scheme. Under it there were 42,633 placements and cancellations of 4,752, leaving, I assume, a balance of 37,881. In Saskatchewan, which was the province which probably most needed it and certainly took the largest advantage of it, there have been 26,858 placements and 4,559 cancellations, leaving 22,299. It is amazing that almost twenty per cent of placements in Saskatchewan under that scheme later had their applications rejected.

Mr. GARDINER: What year was that?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This past year. I have before me the answers submitted by the department on that point, relative to the year ended March 14, 1938. When I came to Ottawa last January I was convinced that the whole 4,559 that had been rejected in Saskatchewan were in my constituency, so many people having come to me in connection with this matter; but I have since met some hon. gentlemen opposite who seem to be equally convinced that the whole 4,559 were in their constituencies, because so many have been rejected throughout the province.

This was the position, particularly in communities in which there were large families. The father and mother, and one or two members of the family could carry on the farm operations quite easily. They said "Here is an opportunity to put some of our young people out to work"—young people who had been on the relief rolls for several years. They were placed, only to find later that their applications were rejected and they had to come back home. I do not wish to be derogatory of what the minister has tried to do. I appreciate very much the objective he had in mind in the formulation of this scheme. But I think that whoever in his department was responsible for the regulations should be presented with a wooden medal carved out of his own head, because some of these regulations are nothing but sheer nonsense.

I have examined the rejections—there is quite a large number of them—which have come to my hand, and they fall roughly into four classes: First of all, those who were rejected because they were not homeless; that is, their parents resided within a radius of twelve or fifteen miles. Of course that is absurd. These young people had to be placed where they could find some farmer who would take them. The fact that their parents lived twelve miles or a hundred and twelve miles away made little or no difference as to whether or not they were carrying on the work that was intended under the scheme. Others, strange to say, were rejected because they had never been employed and therefore could not be considered employable. We in Saskatchewan have had very severe conditions since 1931. Many of these people left school in that year and have been unemployed more or less ever since. How long does a young man or a young woman have to be unemployed before he or she is considered employable? If conditions like this continue, you will find young men beginning to grow a beard and yet able to say that they were never employed and are therefore unemployable.

Mr. ROGERS: How many fall into that category.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Of course I could not give the minister any statistical information, but I would say a large number who have come to my attention are in that classification. Others were rejected because, it was said, there was not enough work on the farm. I should like to see, and I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would also like to see, a farm where there is not enough work for a hired man at a time when there is stock to look after, chores to do, machinery to get ready and, in cases where they have it, seed to clean during the winter. But these people were rejected because, it was said, there was not enough work to warrant the hiring of a man.

One other classification refers to relatives. I have mentioned to the minister during this session the case of a young man whose sister lost her husband and was left with a small family on the farm. This young man left his job and took over his sister's farm, managed it; but that year he had no crop; he made application to the Saskatchewan government, was accepted, and for two years was under the farm placement scheme, the authorities knowing perfectly well that he was a relative of the employer. Last year he was cut off. He has loyally stayed with his sister and helped her manage the farm and look after her small family, but is not paid, as are other boys in the community doing less work than he does. Mr. Molloy, who is administering the act in Saskatchewan, and Mr. Parker, the minister of municipal affairs, said that there were a number of such cases and that they had made strong representations to the Minister of Labour and the federal government asking them to change that regulation in the direction of making it more elastic, but they could get no response. I suggest that the men in the several provinces who are administering the act are in a much better position to set these regulations than is someone in Ottawa who is not actually in contact with the problem.

I come now to another matter which is dealt with under this bill, namely agricultural aid, or as the bill says, "alleviation of agricultural distress." Of course the tragedy is that after three years of a bill like this agricultural distress is still present in some parts of the west in an even more acute form than before. I left my constituency last Saturday after visiting farms on which there was not a single kernel of feed or seed; the farmers had lost half of the horses—and they were not old horses—which they sent to the Carberry pasture. One man who had weighed two horses which he sent to Manitoba found that they had each lost in the neighbourhood of five hundred pounds. Farmers with moisture conditions such as they have not had for years, and with a good price, are facing the spring almost destitute, with no feed for their horses with which to get their land into shape and, prior to last Saturday at any rate, no seed at hand. One of the amusing things is the attitude of some of the men who are responsible for administering this system. I wrote to the manager of the grain and fodder branch of the Saskatchewan government, after having taken up the matter with the federal Minister of Agriculture, with reference particularly to chicken feed, and I received a letter in which this striking paragraph occurs:

> We are of the opinion that the majority of farmers should secure sufficient feed from the screenings of their seed grain to take care of their poultry feed requirements.

They are to take the screenings from their seed grain to feed their poultry; but if they have not any seed, what are they to do? One can take screenings from seed; but if there is no seed, where are the screenings to come from? That is the situation with regard to agricultural aid, a condition which is sad in the extreme. People are depending upon the government for seed which is not there, and when it gets there the benefit will not be what we have been led to believe, because we are told that repairs will have to be deducted and that the seed will have to be cleaned, this being another deduction of ten or fifteen per cent from the total amount. The result is that the farmers will face the summer with weakened horses, poor stock, and very little seed with which to seed their land.

I come now to the third plank in the Liberal policy with reference to unemployment, and that was the setting up of a national system of unemployment insurance. In this regard there is only one question that I would ask: Where is this promised system of unemployment insurance? This is the third session of parliament and we have not yet seen this national system of unemployment insurance. True, we shall be told that some of the provinces would not agree. But that was not what was said in 1933 in this house; that was not what was said in 1935 on the hustings. We were not told then that the provinces would have to agree. In fact, on the night of the election the present Prime Minister in his speech to the people of Canada over the radio said:

> The whole-hearted cooperation of the Liberal premiers and governments of eight of the nine provinces of Canada was an exceptionally significant feature of the campaign and one which may be expected to contribute in no uncertain way to the solution of many of our country's perplexing problems.

We were led to understand then that with Liberal governments in a majority of the provinces and with a Liberal government here at Ottawa, there would be no difficulty in giving the people of Canada what had been promised, namely, a national system of unemployment insurance. But where is that national system of unemployment insurance?

I have here a piece of campaign literature published by the Edmonton East federal Liberal association, entitled: "Let us get going again." There is a picture of the Liberal candidate. Beneath, it says: "Read the Liberal government's record of promises and fulfilment." On one side there appear the promises and on the other side is the fulfilment. I will not read them all; but this is No. 9, unemployment insurance. That is the promise. Here is the fulfilment:

> A national system of unemployment insurance has been introduced . . . but the Alberta Social Credit government has refused to cooperate.

A national system has been introduced! Where is it? Well, I have read through the order paper with a normal amount of intelligence, and I cannot find in it any bill providing for a national system of unemployment insurance; yet here are the people of Edmonton East being told in a by-election, in a pamphlet officially issued by the Liberal party, that the system has been introduced. We have heard a great deal this session about making politics clean, taking bribery out of it, and so on, but I want to know how you will take this kind of thing out. People were actually led to believe during the recent by-election that a national system of unemployment insurance had been introduced, when no such thing has been done at all. And judging by the indications, it does not look as if it is going to be introduced. Of course, the Minister of Agriculture, who commanded the government forces on the field of battle there, may be able to give some explanation; but certainly I cannot find any in the legislation which the government has submitted this session.

The fourth plank of the Liberal party's platform with regard to unemployment, and the one which the Minister of Labour emphasized the other day, was that as a permanent measure to solve the unemployment situation they were pinning their faith to the stimulation of internal and external trade. While there is a measure of truth in that, this is also true, that any country which to-day pins its faith to external trade as a means of solving the unemployment situation is leaning on an extremely fluctuating factor. You have only to look back over the export trade of Canada in the last six months to see how unstable a factor it is.

Mr. MARTIN: Surely it is a very necessary condition.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, but the hon. member did not tell his constituents in 1935 that that was the only condition.

Mr. MARTIN: No one has suggested that in this house.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have outlined four things and none of the first three have been fulfilled. The only promise that has been partly fulfilled is the last one, the expansion of external trade, and that is a fluctuating factor which has been decreasing in the last few months rather than increasing. But even an expansion of external trade will not meet the problem of technological displacement which is constantly going on in industry. I have in mind several men of my own acquaintance who used to earn on railway pumps between $125 and $150 a month. They had been working for from fifteen to twenty years for the railways, but the automatic pumps came in and they have been unemployed since 1931. They spent the best years of their life at that work. You cannot make them motor mechanics or radio builders or aviators.

Mr. WOOD: If a man has been working for twenty years, getting from $150 to $180 a month, has there not been some obligation on him to provide for a period such as this?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): To begin with, I said $125 to $150. But is the hon. gentleman suggesting that any man who has been working for fifteen or twenty years for $125 a month could have saved money out of that to keep him the rest of his days and to take care of his family?

Mr. WOOD: Many have done it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am sure the hon. gentleman is not suggesting that his constituents should all try to do it. The fact is that in consequence of new machinery, men are being displaced to-day and labour is not sufficiently mobile to allow them to be transferred suddenly from the industry in which they were engaged to the production of the new machines that are displacing labour. You have therefore a class of labour that cannot be absorbed through the normal expansion of trade, and nothing to date has been suggested or done by this government to meet that situation.

The cry is constantly made that certain groups in this house criticize but offer no suggestion. Without going into the matter in detail, I want to remind the government that suggestions have come constantly from this corner for three consecutive sessions. For instance, we suggested a building program, a program for the removal of slums, not only urban but rural slums. I have had the privilege at different times of visiting most of the larger cities of the United Kingdom and the United States and some of the cities of Europe. I assisted at one time in drawing up a research survey regarding the lamentable housing conditions in one of the largest cities of the United States. But I have seen housing conditions in western Canada, let alone eastern Canada, that almost beggar description. We have in Saskatchewan the unenviable distinction of having the smallest number pro rata of houses with sanitary conveniences in all Canada. In northeastern Saskatchewan, in the town of Crooked River, where they have a huge lumber mill turning out millions of feet of lumber a year, within 300 yards of where the lumber is produced there are the worst shacks I have ever seen.

We have suggested not only the clearance of slums but the building of low rental homes. We have suggested the need for building schools and hospitals. One has only to see the country schools, with cracked plaster, insufficient warmth for cold days, broken seats, dilapidated floors, to realize that people could be put to work all across Canada in the erection, not of useless buildings, or buildings that are almost never used, such as some armouries, but schools, hospitals, libraries and decent homes. Roads need to be built. The other day I came across a statement in the Liberal paper in Regina, the Leader-Post. It is not often I agree with what it says, but I am in hearty agreement with this. It is headed:

A Tragedy

Can anyone doubt the point that it would be better to spend even more money and get something in return rather than spend what is being spent to-day without anything being done except to proclaim to the world that thousands of people are living on direct relief and must take their living without working? The millions of dollars that have been spent to keep people in idleness will remain one of the tragedies of the non-production period in western Canada. It is not too late to make a start.

I recommend that to the Minister of Labour. It is not too late even yet, half-way through the term of this parliament as we are, to make a start to put people to work, to pay them wages which will enable them to buy goods at the stores and send some orders to the warehouses and factories. We have suggested pensions to take care of the aged and those physically incapable of supporting themselves and their families.

Mr. WOOD: Would the hon. member recommend that the pensions be contributory?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We can discuss the details at some better time. My friend knows I have only a few minutes left. I suggest that they be contributory where that is possible, but they cannot be contributory where people have been unemployed for seven or eight years.

We have suggested that money be paid to the farmers; that, instead of relief, a bonus be paid to a farmer to put his land into grass, or that $3 an acre be paid to farmers to strip-farm their land. During this summer, with a maximum of 250 acres set for seed, some of these farmers with one or two sections of land are going to have hundreds of acres standing idle. If that land is allowed to blow, we know what the result will be; if it is allowed to grow to weeds, the situation will be even worse. These farmers could be paid $3 an acre and supplied with feed for their horses to keep that land in condition, thus giving them purchasing power, instead of continuing to dole out relief. When I think of how some hon. gentlemen used to complain that unemployment insurance meant the dole, I wonder what they think now, when we are actually giving the dole and getting nothing for it except broken morale and a people with despair in their hearts. We in this corner have suggested putting both our agricultural and city unemployed to work on water conservation programs, the building of dams and dug-outs, projects on which the farmer and his son would be hired, and use their horses where they have horse power; in this way we would give them money which would come as wages, which would not be placed against their lands as a lien on the next crop. These are matters we have asked this parliament to consider.

Mr. EVANS: Has that not already been done in southern Saskatchewan?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes; it has been done in a way similar to the dominion housing scheme; two houses for Saskatchewan. The same thing has been done in reference to water conservation; it has been done on a penny-ante basis—

Mr. EVANS: Last year there were thousands of farmers hired.

Mr. DONNELLY: If your people are not taking it up, it is their own fault.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is not being done in the hon. member's constituency. I just came through there.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, it is.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I hope the hon. member will be able to go back and tell that to his constituents.

We suggest one thing more: That is, that the minister should consider seriously the continuation of the farm placement scheme throughout the summer. Many of these men who are now being released at the end of April have no place to go.

Mr. ROGERS: In competition with ordinary farm labour?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They are not going to be hired; what are the farmers going to hire them with, in the drought area?

Mr. ROGERS: Twenty thousand stayed on last year, on a basis of being employed by farmers.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And in many cases were not paid, because the farmer could not pay them, having had no crop. Many stayed on with the promise of getting something if the farmer got something. I suggest to the minister that in view of the fact that there is a lot of work to be done on farms, keeping them in shape, trying to put them in grass, strip farming, if these men could be kept on the farms at least until we see what this year's harvest will be, they would be prevented from drifting to eastern Canada.

In closing, I say to the minister in all seriousness that I cannot feel satisfied that either this parliament or this government, if they are to be measured by the bill brought before us, are seriously grappling with this problem. Unless we do so, there will arise in Canada groups and parties advocating a much less desirable form of government. None of us want that; we want democracy; but we want a democracy which can change its methods to meet a changed situation, and has the courage to tackle a problem which is nationwide.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few observations respecting Bill No. 105, a measure to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, introduced by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). I trust it is wide enough to permit the government to do that which, in its own judgment, it believes should be done to handle the present situation.

From the experience I have had I am going to make some suggestions to-night which I would hope, if put into effect, so far as my own section of the country is concerned, would be exceedingly beneficial and would prevent handouts and bonuses. From my acquaintance with the people of my constituency I know that they want work, not doles. The lumber business, with which I was connected for many years, coupled with the pulp and paper business, gives more employment than any other single industry in Canada. I believe, if there could be some stimulation given to lumbering, and at the same time if there were a possibility of accomplishing that which I shall suggest, we would go a great way towards relieving unemployment in my section of Canada.

For several years the Dominion Housing Act has been on the statute books of Canada and, so far as it has gone, has worked splendidly. But in order to avail oneself of the privileges extended under the housing act one must have twenty per cent of the amount to be borrowed; otherwise he cannot come under the act. In that way a great proportion of the population is eliminated. There is the further criticism that in many communities almost two years elapsed before the act became effective. That condition arose because the trust companies were not keen on availing themselves of the privileges of the legislation. They realized that when they accepted the government's proposal under the Dominion Housing Act, it would mean that their interest rates on other loans would have to be reduced. Even during the depression years between 1930 and 1935 those companies still thought that interest rates of seven per cent or six and a half per cent were not too high. Therefore some time elapsed before the act came into real operation.

Otherwise it has worked well, and is possibly doing what the government had in mind when the act was passed. Now, when a good loan comes along, the trust companies take it up entirely, and it does not come under the housing act. It would seem, therefore, that the measure has only had the effect of persuading the trust companies to make more loans for housing purposes.

The other measure passed by this government was the home improvement plan. Certainly the home improvement plan has given a considerable amount of work, has stimulated business in communities and, much more important, in some measure has encouraged the banks to make individual loans. Certainly that is beneficial to the community.

But a great part of the population did not derive the benefits of either of these pieces of legislation. If you can stimulate the lumber business; if you can create homes for working men, without cost to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) or to the country, and if you can make those loans self-liquidating, the government receiving interest on its money, you will have a worth-while project. I am suggesting to-night that, under Bill No. 105 now before the house, a workman's housing scheme should be inaugurated, the details of which I shall outline.

Much of what I shall say will be confined to observations respecting conditions in my home town. Between the years 1930 and 1937, a period when we experienced the greatest depression through which we have ever gone, besides paying its way the city of Sherbrooke reduced its capital debt by $654,700. Therefore that city is in a financial position which would make it possible to cooperate under the scheme I shall suggest. A further matter to which I direct the attention of the house is that in 1937, out of a population of 32,500 people, six thousand hands were employed in twenty-eight of Sherbrooke's industries. One company which in 1934 employed 438 hands now employs 1,200; another formerly employing 570 now employs 650; another formerly employing 370 now employs 725; another formerly employing 433 now employs 500, and another formerly employing 971 now employs 1,150. I give these figures, not to boast, but to prove that a great proportion of the people of Sherbrooke are in the category of working men.

I am suggesting that we inaugurate a workingmen's housing scheme, so that people such as I have mentioned, earning from $18 to $30 a week, can build homes of their own and be enabled over a number of years to become the proprietors of those homes. Someone may say that at those wages such a scheme is impossible. May I point out that a company with which I was connected before 1929 built fifty homes, without any cash payments, and sold them to fifty home owners. The records show the results of those loans. In passing, may I state that the scheme was carried out with money drawing seven per cent interest. The principal sums were paid in monthly payments extending over eighteen and a half years. There were only seven losses on the fifty homes, and some of those losses were only partial. I shall not take time to give the reasons for the losses, but I am satisfied that in a future scheme they could be eliminated.

First, we must agree on the principle that the working man with the desire to own his own home can pay for it only on the condition that the payment does not exceed one week's wages in each month. If a man is drawing $18 a week during the year, he is able to pay up to $18 a month towards owning his own home. In other words, so long as the payments for home ownership do not exceed twenty-five per cent—they are better at twenty per cent—the scheme is perfectly feasible, without loss.

Mr. DUNNING: Is that inclusive of taxes?

Mr. HOWARD: Yes. I would fix a maximum value of $3,000. For $3,000 a frame structure, complete, with concrete foundation, can be built. In fact, including the lot, it can be done in Sherbrooke for as little as $2,300. In this connection I should like to place the exact figures on Hansard. Allow $2,300 for the house. Then, if you built a duplex on a $500 or $600 lot, it would mean you would allow $300 for the lot for each house, or a total of $2,600. I would propose that the federal government advance to the city of Sherbrooke the necessary money at three per cent. The city of Sherbrooke would guarantee the money; they would supervise the construction; they would handle the situation and charge the home owner three and a half per cent. In other words, the city would get one-half of one per cent on the money loaned for looking after things and standing one-third of any loss that might occur.

Mr. ST. PERE: What is the real estate tax?

Mr. HOWARD: Eighteen mills. Three and a half per cent of $2,600 is $91. A payment of $50 on the capital would bring this to $141. The tax at eighteen mills, eleven mills for municipal purposes and seven mills for schools, would be $36 on a $2,000 valuation. This would make a total payment of $177 for the first year, which would mean a monthly payment of $14.75 to cover interest, capital and taxes.

The mayor of the city suggested the other day that if a housing scheme could be put into effect to give employment to plumbers, roofers and carpenters, to take up the unemployment in Sherbrooke practically one hundred per cent, they would give a five year exemption from taxes on all workingmen's homes constructed under the scheme. I doubt whether they have the right to do that, but the chairman of the finance committee told me that in any case there would be a three year exemption from taxes. However, I would not consider this in the scheme. If the city was not to impose taxes for three or five years, I would suggest that the taxes be included in the monthly payments and a reserve fund created against future payments until such time as taxes were charged.

Without going into detail, if the house cost $2,500 and the lot $300, the monthly payment would amount to $15.33. On a $3,000 maximum cost house, the monthly payment would be $16. This would include interest on the money borrowed, taxes, supervision by the city and payments on the principal in order to make the loan self-liquidating.

Mr. ST. PERE: That is on houses of wooden construction.

Mr. HOWARD: Of wooden construction. This would stimulate the lumber industry and create employment in the woods and sawmills of the country. Employment would be given to tradesmen of all kinds in the cities, and the local store trade in nails, cement, roofing and commodities of that nature would be stimulated.

This scheme could be put through without costing the country a single cent. It would be a great improvement over handing out money to people who can find nothing else to do but stay at home. The people in my constituency do not want doles; all they want is a chance to work. I hope the government will put such a scheme into operation so that homes may be provided for our workingmen. I shall not go into the other side of the picture; but we all know what it would mean to Sherbrooke, to the townships and to all of Canada, when our working people have equities in their homes. After a man has made his payments for five years and his wife has fixed up the grounds by planting flowers and so on; after he becomes a proprietor instead of a rentee, the whole future is changed. You have a different condition existing when people have a stake in the country instead of being at the mercy of employers.

I have another more serious suggestion to make. In my opinion we should immediately take up the question of slum clearance. In all the cities of Canada—and Sherbrooke is no exception—we find fine paved streets and all the necessary accommodations for comfortable living. More and more as the years go by we find our cities cleaner and more beautiful. But in every one of these municipalities we find a certain proportion of homes, not only below standard but some not as good as the place where some people keep their horses. They are unfit for human habitation. We intend to spend money to create employment, so we should start immediately to do away with some of these unsatisfactory conditions in our cities.

These slum areas are not large. In the city of Sherbrooke there are possibly no more than one hundred homes unfit for human habitation. Someone will say immediately, "Oh, well, you have a statute; you can condemn these homes." I would reply that if a family is renting such a place from the owner at a low rent and you condemn the property, you will have quite a proposition on your hands. What I would suggest is that the property be condemned as unfit for human habitation. Then the owner should be supplied with a plan of reconstruction and the place either burned down or torn down. Of course, before that is done the family would be taken out. Then a new home would be built according to government plan and, when completed, the previous tenants would be moved in. The owner would be subsidized to the extent of say fifty per cent of the difference between the municipal valuation and the cost of the new construction. Before the new house was commenced, a contract would be made with the owner to provide that the rent would not be increased for the same family for from two to five years.

There is another side to this situation. It so happens that in these one hundred homes there is a greater population of children per home than in any other section of Sherbrooke. If children are to be allowed to grow up under these conditions, our future generations will have to pay. If the situation is corrected immediately, we shall be creating a future asset. I do not advocate this because I want to spend money; I do it because I want every citizen to have a chance. I feel our workmen have a right to a chance to own their own homes. The farmer has the right to rebuild his home at decent rates of interest. We could stimulate employment throughout the length and breadth of this country and, I believe, eliminate the dole system one hundred per cent.

There is one other side to this slum clearance question. Some will say that this is paternalism, but I know whereof I speak when I say what I am going to say. In each of these communities there should be appointed, in addition to the health officer, a fully qualified woman to supervise these new homes and the families living therein. The homes should be inspected for cleanliness and a watch kept over the progress the family is making. This woman would be the contact point between the family and the community. If this were done, within a few years time we would see a difference in the younger generation in our country.

I have one thing more to say and then I have finished. In every one of our cities there is a shortage of playgrounds and parks. If there is one class of work which with others could be done under this legislation to advantage, it is the improvement of city parks, national parks, and the playgrounds of Canada. The longer the hours our people work who are employed in the cotton and silk industries, and the textile industries generally, as well as other classes of industries, and the more members of the family employed in them, the greater is the need for open spaces throughout the community for recreation. So, Mr. Speaker, I leave with you the consideration of these suggestions. One plan is one hundred per cent self-liquidating; the other will not cost this country very much money; it is in any case one which will provide work, instead of the dole, and it is a work that could well be done under this Bill No. 105 of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to attempt to embarrass the government in any way or to hinder the progress of this bill. I realize that at the present time it is either this bill or nothing, but if I am in order I should like to make a few general remarks on the subject of unemployment.

Unemployment is a comparatively new thing in Canada, but it is an old story in Great Britain. It dates in its present form from the industrial revolution and the development of what is known as orthodox economics. It is not too much to say that the original orthodox economists regarded unemployment as not only inevitable but as a necessity because the industrial revolution was based on cheap production; cheap production means cheap wages, and the surest way to keep wages down is to take away all protection from the worker so that he must either work or starve. The economist Ricardo, in his Iron Law of Wages, said that the wages of the labourers must be such that one with the other they could reproduce their numbers without increase or decrease, and he thought the probability was that they would be less rather than more; but when their sufferings and privations had so reduced their numbers, then by that very decrease their wages would rise to the subsistence level. Not only was that doctrine accepted by the economists, but it was accepted by the church, by religion itself. Malthus wrote many books on the subject, and he was fully of the opinion, as were the majority of religious people of those days, that the only possible use for the labouring classes was labour, and that if they produced more children than there was a market for, the proper method of dealing with the problem was to starve them to death. That is literally true, and any suggestions that those conditions could be improved for the victims of the system were met with ridicule or contempt.

A hundred years ago in Great Britain children six and seven years of age were worked fifteen hours a day, mainly to reduce the wages of their parents, and when people objected that it could not be right to work children in that manner they were told that Satan finds mischief for idle hands to do, very much as we hear to-day.

Roughly one hundred years ago the then government in Great Britain was faced with a very nice problem of deciding the standard of relief. If they put the standard of relief any lower than the standard of wages, then the recipients of relief would have starved to death. But if not lower, then the workers would say: Why should we work when those on relief are getting as much as we are. So the government of that day set their economists to work to find ways and means of administering relief in the most objectionable and degrading way. Any amelioration of the condition of the poor of Great Britain was due, not to the economists or to the church, but to the efforts of a few men who refused to believe that any such practice was necessary to keep any system going, and that if it was necessary, then the system itself should be done away with.

I have heard many members say that what the people want is work. I should like to say that from my observations in the country, what the people want is security, and that is not quite the same as work. What they want is worth-while work and worth-while wages, and not work for work's sake.

I am perfectly in agreement with any scheme of house-building. In fact, there is no reason in the world, since we have the labour, the materials, the machinery and the knowledge, why we could not rebuild Canada from one end to the other. There is no real reason why we could not do it, although I know that according to the canons of sound finance it cannot be done because we cannot find the money. I think the experience of Great Britain over the last one hundred and fifty years is proof enough that there is no solution for the problem of unemployment under orthodox economics and sound money. In fact, the one is the outcome of the other. There are palliatives such as the dole, and so on, but there is no cure for unemployment under the existing system.

There are a great many contradictions which I have heard mentioned in this house and which, of course, one finds in all books dealing with orthodox economics. Let me emphasize that the object of industry is not work and wages; its only objects are goods and services. Anybody who ever had a job of production to do knows that he must produce the greatest possible amount of goods with the least possible amount of labour. Under the competitive system, if one is to survive it is necessary to cut labour costs. When we do that we reduce purchasing power, so that those who produce the goods are unable to consume them; hence the drive for foreign trade and foreign markets. That is one contradiction.

Then I find contempt extending even to recipients of old age pensions. I cannot see why it is that a man who has worked faithfully and steadily for a lifetime should be regarded, when he becomes too old to work, as an object of charity. On the other hand, people who have never done a useful day's work in their lives, and never intend to, but happen to be the fortunate recipients of private money, are regarded with every mark of respect. At the same time any suggestion to distribute purchasing power to the people in general seems to be regarded as a threat to the morals of the country; it is said that we want to demoralize the people. Yet the object of any person who provides his family with insurance is that his family, so far as he can make it possible, shall be granted economic security, so that they cannot be put to work but they can put themselves to work, which is a very different thing.

I might mention the quintuplets, who are regarded as the most valuable children in Ontario and perhaps in Canada, and are the objects of the provincial government's greatest and most careful regard. Everything has been done to safeguard the welfare of those famous children. Already, at their tender age, they have been provided, I understand, with a fund of $100,000 apiece. If that is good for the "quints", because $100,000 means economic freedom; if that is the best and the finest thing which the government can do for those five children, why is it the finest thing for poor children that they shall be destitute and forced to work under any conditions?

I have spoken of work for work's sake. Last summer there was a road rebuilt in Alberta from Edmonton south. In order to employ as many people as possible they scrapped a lot of machinery and put numbers of men to work with picks and shovels. They made a splendid road; but when the taxpayers saw the bill there was such a fuss made that the government was forced to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the cost of construction, because, instead of using machinery—and that is what machinery is for—they put as many men to work as possible.

We are very fond of praising thrift. Thrift is regarded as one of the greatest of virtues. People are told to save; that is, to consume less; at the same time they are told to work harder, which, of course, means to produce more. How can the same lot of people continue to produce more and to consume less?

Finally, while the government and other agencies are putting men to work, science is putting them out of work as fast as it can. The whole thing is a contradiction.

In 1931, during the time that Ramsay MacDonald was Prime Minister of Great Britain, that country was threatened with being driven off gold. In order to preserve the gold standard, Mr. MacDonald and his government approached the bankers of Paris and London for the purpose of borrowing gold. One of the main conditions of the loan was that the social services of Great Britain should be reduced, the dole be cut and the administration of it made as nauseous as possible. All social services were diminished. What was the consequence? For one thing, a mutiny of the fleet occurred, and there was such an outcry that the government was forced from office and the country driven off gold. And when the gold standard was done away with, better times and more employment followed immediately.

As I said before, what the people want is security; and as they are British people, with that security they desire freedom. But if they are driven far enough they will forego even their freedom in order to get security. That has happened in Germany and Italy, and it will happen here if we continue the way we are going.

As I see the matter, there are only two solutions. The one is enforced labour—put the people to work. That means fascism; it provides security, but also it involves loss of liberty. The other is, so to alter and adapt our financial system that anything physically possible and desirable becomes financially possible, to the end that the people of this country can consume to the limits of their desires or of their powers to produce. In that way the people will not only gain security but will retain their liberty.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier): If this hon. house will bear with me for a few moments, I shall endeavour to submit a few observations on one of the suggested cures for unemployment. It is difficult, of course, to find an absolute corrective to do away with this scourge in just a single operation. It would be so nice to launch an attack on the entire front and keep it up until the enemy had been driven out of the country. But it is evident that only the combination of the best means, where each can achieve the best results, will bring about the desired success.

It is not necessary to point out to hon. members that one of the worst causes of the depression is due to the desertion of the land. Steps must be taken first to stop this desertion and then to go on with colonization.

The national employment commission gives, on page 8 and following of its report, a list of practical measures to increase employment, and in that list, at page 12, it recommends rehabilitation through land settlement. In my opinion we have there a proposal that deserves the best consideration of the house and of the country, a proposal that should be thoroughly explored because it harbours great possibilities of permanent relief for a considerable number of people. No one will object to my statement that Canada was a good deal more prosperous when there was a better balance between the proportions of urban and rural population. Let us see just what has been the trend of population in Canada. I have here figures taken from the Canada Year Book, French edition, for 1937, the figures covering the last five census periods. In 1891, the total rural population was 3,296,141 and the urban population only 1,537,098, or about half. In 1901, the rural population had increased to 3,357,000 and the urban population had gone up to 2,000,000 in round figures. In 1911, there was a further increase in rural population but not quite so large as in the urban population, because the figures for 1911 show that the rural population in that year was nearly 4,000,000, or, to be exact, 3,933,696, whereas the urban population had gone up to 3,272,947. In 1921, conditions were still more serious because the rural population had risen to 4,435,000 and the urban population was 4,352,000. In other words, they were just about equal. The last census in 1931 showed that the rural population was 4,800,000, while the cities had risen to 5,572,000.

If hon. members will look at the increase by provinces they will find the same thing proportionately. For the information of members from the province of Quebec I shall give the figures for our province. They show that in 1891 the rural population was about twice that of the cities, whereas in 1931 the rural population was 1,060,000 in round figures and the urban population was 1,813,000. With the permission of the house I shall put these figures on Hansard in tabulated form:

Population of Canada

Year	Rural	Urban
1891	3,296,141	1,537,098
1901	3,357,093	2,014,222
1911	3,933,696	3,272,947
1921	4,435,827	4,352,122
1931	4,804,728	5,572,058

Population of Quebec Province

Year	Rural	Urban
1891	988,820	499,715
1901	994,833	654,065
1911	1,038,934	966,842
1921	1,038,096	1,322,569
1931	1,060,649	1,813,606

These figures reveal an evil situation. They are appalling and should impress everyone with the absolute necessity of stopping the desertion of the soil. In my humble opinion there should be no delay in arranging a plan of colonization more vigorous than heretofore. I do not think much can be expected in getting settlers from the cities. It is difficult to convince men and women who go to the cities from the rural districts of the advisability of returning to the land. My suggestion is that farmers' sons should be encouraged to take up land for themselves, because they would be better qualified than any other portion of the population. They have the necessary training and would succeed more easily than people sent to the rural districts from the cities, sometimes at great expense. It so happens also that in the farming districts a large number of farmers have large families, and of course one farm can be passed on only to one son. If the farmer has four or five other sons, they too should be helped to get farms; otherwise they drift to the cities and increase unemployment. They should be given every chance, and no doubt the national employment commission had that in mind, because on page 13 they make the following suggestion:

> Assistance to be given in three ways, namely in the form of:—
> (a) Roads, bridges, schools, guidance and advice in their work, to be a free gift to the communities of settlers and not repayable.
> (b) Bonuses for clearing land, and bringing it under cultivation, not to be repayable but to vary inversely with the value of the timber removed.

I submit that this matter should be gone into thoroughly and some arrangement made with the provincial governments to carry out a plan of this sort, because I am sure that in the extension of such a program we shall find a safe way of providing permanent relief for a considerable number of people.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wonder if the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) would mind if, before I begin my remarks in connection with this bill, I were to congratulate him upon the excellent and constructive speech he delivered earlier this evening. I hope the government will take note of it, because there are many suggestions in it that are worth while, suggestions that would help, not only to overcome unemployment, but also, as he has pointed out, to make this world a better place to live in.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), when moving the second reading of the bill, said that it was similar to the one passed last year. That, in my opinion, is one of the most serious objections to the bill. I have been in this house since 1930, and we have had a bill similar to this one in every session beginning with 1931. This is the eighth bill that has been introduced here to do what this bill is supposed to do—to deal with unemployment relief in its various aspects. I admit that in the earlier days of the depression there was some reason for the belief that unemployment as we then had it and as it now exists was really a temporary matter, and that the bills introduced for the first few years were to meet a temporary emergency. There was some valid reason for that, although I believe a close analysis would indicate that it was only what we could expect. But I submit that after eight years of such conditions as we have had, we ought to have something of a more permanent nature to deal with unemployment and the effects of unemployment than has as yet been placed before us. And particularly have we a right to expect something more from this government. I have, as I said, been in this house since 1930, and I remember very well that the matter for which the former government was criticized the most was the temporary nature of their measures for dealing with unemployment. To-day there is no valid reason for considering the situation brought about by the depression of 1929 as something requiring only temporary remedies. As long as our present system continues, there is every reason to consider the depression as a permanent condition.

I have been surprised, as I am sure other hon. members have, at the poverty of legislation on the order paper during this session, when so many pressing problems are facing the country. I am sure that the people throughout the dominion are becoming alarmed at the lack of any measure for dealing with their problems. A few days after I arrived in Ottawa to attend the session a newspaperman came into my office and asked about the news from the west. In the course of our conversation he made this statement, the truth of which has become more and more apparent to me as the session continues. He said, "You cannot get news or anything that makes copy these days in Ottawa. When Bennett was in office he was always doing something; you might not like what he was doing but he was doing something. This government does not do anything but sit and think. Come to think of it," he said, "they do not even think; they just sit." As I have sat here day after day since the beginning of the session and watched the order paper and its poverty of constructive legislation, I am more and more convinced of the truth of what my newspaper friend said. The government act as if nothing of a serious nature confronted us. They seem to have a sort of childlike faith that things will right themselves, if they only wait long enough; that trade conditions will improve. That is the most childish idea of all. It indicates that they believe trade is the cause of economic activity. Trade is not the cause; it is the effect of economic activity. This government, as I have pointed out on one or two occasions during the past couple of years, were fortunate in coming into office at a time when trade all over the world was increasing, and they were not slow to take credit to themselves for that increase. But to-day trade is declining. During the last six months there has been a significant decline in the trade of Canada, especially our export trade. Does the government accept responsibility for the decline? There came to me from the bureau of statistics recently a compilation of figures showing the trade of Canada by months for the last fiscal year ended March 31. I noticed in that return that there has been a substantial decline in our export trade for six consecutive months from October, 1937. In that period the aggregate decline as compared with the same six months of last year was over $82,000,000. That means an average decline of over $13,000,000 each month for the last six months.

Mr. McNEVIN: Does the hon. member think the drought had anything to do with that?

Mr. MacINNIS: I have no doubt it had something to do with it. But if we should happen to have a bumper crop in western Canada this year and they also have bumper crops in other parts of the world, prices will be so low that there will be a further decrease in our trade figures. That would not be due to the drought, it would be due to too much production. So it does not do to put too many of our burdens on the Lord, because He is not altogether responsible.

The total decline in trade has been substantial, and there is no assurance whatever that that decline will not continue. To support that contention I will quote briefly from the monthly letter of the Canadian Bank of Commerce for April, 1938. Reviewing general conditions in Canada, the letter says on page 3:

> Indeed, the seasonal gains have this year been so small and confined to such a narrow field that business activity as a whole is now about fifteen per cent below that of the early spring of 1937. A lesser rate of decline would of course be evident were it not for the new fears and uncertainties arising from the European political situation which have spread to this country, as they have to every other part of the world . . .
> It has now become clearly apparent that the hopes of maintaining business activity at its present level are pinned on domestic agricultural conditions, especially those in the western grain belt, for it is unlikely that any other important stimuli can be felt before the late summer or early autumn.

As I said before, even if conditions are good in the western grain fields this autumn, we can expect no improvement unless conditions are bad in the grain fields in some other parts of the world.

I would have waited until this bill had gone into committee before making any extended remarks on it, were it not for the fact that the situation in my own city is causing the authorities there grave concern. They have made their difficulties known to the federal government and also to the provincial government. They are greatly alarmed as to what may happen in Vancouver, because of the number of single men without employment now congregated in that city. The unemployment figures for March 1 of this year in Vancouver show that there were 6,878 cases on relief. That is about a thousand less than there were last year. These are heads of families, single unemployed men and unemployed women who are on relief, and the dependants of families are not included. When the dependants are included, the number on relief amounts to 21,094. This, again, is lower than it was a year ago. But a year ago we were beginning a very rapid economic improvement, and this year the tendencies are all the other way.

To-day there are in Vancouver about 5,000 single unemployed men who were working on forestry projects during the winter months. I am told these men will have a small amount of back pay to keep them going for a week or two. But about the first or second week of May that back pay will be used up, and so far no provision has been made for these men. The city feels that it is not in a financial position to carry them. Unless something is done quickly, trouble will ensue.

I have before me a copy of a letter I received from the acting mayor. In it is quoted a telegram sent to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). A telegram was forwarded to me about the same time, but when I asked a question of the minister in the house I was not given an opportunity to read that telegram. Writing to me on March 24 in connection with the telegram to the Minister of Labour, the acting mayor said:

On the 23rd instant, after a long discussion by the council on relief matters, the following telegram was dispatched to the Hon. Mr. Norman Rogers, Minister of Labour:

"The relief problem as submitted to the Vancouver city council by the provincial government (particularly with respect to the single unemployed), is beyond our financial power to carry out, and your government's help is urgently needed, if serious trouble is to be avoided."

Amplifying the telegram the acting mayor goes on to say:

The resolution which authorized it directed that letters be sent by air mail to the Vancouver members at Ottawa apprising them of the desperate situation which has made necessary the sending of the above telegram. The seasonal relief problem confronting Vancouver, which during the last several years has been serious due to the large number of transient single men, has been aggravated to unprecedented proportions this year by the enforcement of the terms of the new federal-provincial relief agreement. The effect of this agreement is that the provincial government, facing reduced grants in aid from federal sources, has passed participation in the financial responsibility in several new categories to the city of Vancouver. The extent of this financial burden has not yet been determined, but it has been estimated to range from between $25,000 to $30,000 a month. For several years the city, as you are aware, has been pressed to the extreme to meet its proportion of the relief load which has been carried, and now comes the addition of the categories mentioned above. . . .

Two courses of action are open to the city. That is, the further reduction of necessary public services already seriously curtailed, or the refusal to grant assistance in any form to large numbers of destitute persons which will, of course, lead to serious disorders with accompanying loss of property and possibly life. Might I reiterate to you that we are not overemphasizing the extreme seriousness of the problem as faced by the city to-day, and its utter financial inability to meet it from its own resources.

This is a situation which has periodically faced Vancouver during the last five or six years. In 1933, 1934 and 1935 men were taken to the camps, and then would either be released from them or simply leave them and come to the city. While in theory the camps have been abolished and the men put to work on other projects, when those projects are completed or closed down temporarily the men come back to the city, and the problem is renewed.

Now the city fears that the care of these men will become a permanent charge, and one which it is absolutely unable to carry. On March 8 of this year the union of British Columbia municipalities laid their case before the provincial cabinet, and I should like to read briefly from their presentation. They said:

When the provincial government passed to the local areas, through the medium of the municipal act, the burden of caring for their destitute and indigent it was transferring a duty imposed upon it by the federal government, through the British North America Act. In pre-depression days this burden was only nominal but, as a result of the eight-year period of relief, the entire problem has been changed. Contributing factors are:

I should like the Minister of Labour and other members of the government to take notice of the contributing factors in British Columbia:

(1) The influx into British Columbia municipalities of large numbers of transient families and individuals, whose previous domicile was outside of the province. Many of these whose almost entire residence in British Columbia has been established while in receipt of public assistance, are now municipal responsibilities, under the Residence and Responsibility Act.

Particularly in the case of single men, during the period of federal administration of relief camps, assistance was granted without reference to residence. British Columbia, with its more attractive climate, drew large numbers of handicapped or near unemployable types who, being unfit for camp, were maintained in municipal areas, and who will now be left in the wake of unemployment relief, as a municipal heritage.

The brief of the union of municipalities goes on to deal with other matters, but I shall take time to quote only one further paragraph:

Many of these persons who are now termed unemployable are casualties of an economic war which has taken a toll as definite as any military campaign, and their care is equally a national problem as the maintenance of "burnt-out" veterans of the great war.

That is something we must keep in mind in dealing with the question of unemployment and unemployment relief. When we speak about unemployables we must realize that the greater percentage would not be unemployable in times when industry was functioning normally. If a person is not in good condition, both mentally and physically, four years of enforced unemployment will make him in almost every case unemployable.

In dealing with this matter I suggest that the government keep this in mind and try not to put these men in the same position as that in which indigent persons would be put in normal times.

During his speech yesterday, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) referred to the fact that no leadership had been given in parliament, or for that matter outside parliament, in connection with the problems with which we are confronted to-day. The hon. member was criticized to-day for the statements he had made and I do not intend to add anything to that criticism. However, I should like to point out that if we are to provide leadership that will bring about any constructive action, first of all we must be agreed as to what is the cause of our difficulty. We may be lost, but if we cannot agree upon the path that is to lead us out of our difficulty, there is no hope of our getting out. There can be no effective leadership in this parliament as long as the government with their overwhelming majority will not be convinced that something must be done. As long as they believe that a policy of laissez faire will get us out of our difficulties there will be no use in trying to provide leadership. The hon. member for Kootenay East went on to refer to the cause of our present day difficulty in these words:

I need take only one illustration;—

He was referring to the change that had taken place during the last few years of our economic life.

. . . it is commonly known, yet nothing is done. In the last few years machinery has displaced literally tens of thousands of workers. That is a platitude; no one should be entitled to any credit for having said it, but the fact remains that neither the leaders of industry, the leaders of parliament nor the leaders of finance are paying much attention to those hordes of people thrown out of work; nor are they attempting to solve the problem of distribution or the social problem that arises therefrom. We know the situation but we are doing next to nothing to face the fact.

I quote from page 2318 of Hansard. That point has been brought to the attention of this house, not only by the members of the group to which I belong, who have continually harped upon it in the last eight years, but by members on all sides. Economic literature everywhere is full of it. However, we act as though we were living under normal conditions. As the hon. member for Kootenay East said yesterday, never again can we hope to go back to the conditions that existed prior to 1929. It would be just as easy to go back to those times as it would be for a chick to go back into the shell, once it is out. The hon. member said also that an economic revolution had taken place.

Referring again to the monthly letter of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, I note they point out that the improvement in employment during the last few years has not kept pace with the increase in the population. While there has been a twenty per cent increase in the population, I believe from 1928 to the end of 1937, the increase in employment was only seven per cent. If there had been no depression at all, we would still have thirteen per cent more unemployed than we had in 1928.

Mr. HARTIGAN: That would make it look rather bad for the type of immigrant who was coming into the country.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes; I would say it would look exceedingly bad for immigrants coming into the country, if any were foolish enough to come. There are not many coming in at the present time.

Mr. HARTIGAN: The hon. member said there was an increase as compared with 1928.

Mr. MacINNIS: In the working population.

Mr. ROGERS: Is my hon. friend referring to adult population? Otherwise his figures would not be comparable.

Mr. MacINNIS: I shall quote from my authority, as follows:

Since 1923 the number of potential workers has increased. In addition there are those who, owing to years of enforced idleness or other causes, are no longer classed as wage earners. As compared with 1933, the rate of increase in employment has been more than double that of available labour, but we are still far from the favourable situation in 1928 (when, according to the calculations of the bureau, there were 60,000 unemployed, the post-war low record) for the labour population has increased since by about twenty per cent, while the rise in the number of employed has been less than seven per cent.

Mr. ROGERS: The labour population.

Mr. MacINNIS: The labour population. I think I have made that point quite clear. I am sure that the Minister of Labour, for whose intelligence I have a great respect, is well aware of the tremendous changes that have taken place in the mechanism of industry during the last twenty years. No one can be unaware of those changes who has paid any attention at all to what has been going on around us.

During the Easter holidays I paid a brief visit to the United States, to the New England states, and browsing through an old book store in Boston I came across a diary of the date of 1837. Boston to-day is a city of about 800,000, but there are large manufacturing and residential sections surrounding it bringing the total population up to about two million. The population of Boston in 1837, as given by this diary, was 45,000. If we want to get an idea of what has happened during the last one hundred years and a clear picture of what is wrong to-day, we should realize that the population of the United States in the last one hundred years has increased from a comparatively few million to about 130,000,000 to-day. And not only has that happened, but a whole continent has been transformed from primeval forest and virgin prairie into cities with their teeming millions, belts of steel, railroads amounting to 142,000 miles, and roads of concrete—a vast network all over the country. The same thing has been taking place on a lesser scale in the Dominion of Canada; but does anyone believe that during the next one hundred years we can build on this continent cities like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia or the other huge cities they have in the United States? We cannot, and because we cannot there is no possibility of our resuming or going through a period of economic activity such as this country has gone through in past years.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Is my hon. friend not aware that at the present time in the larger cities surrounding Boston there is desperate poverty and people are pauperized owing to conditions in the cotton industry?

Mr. MacINNIS: I agree. We are all pauperized except the few who own everything, and they do not know what to do with it. I saw just as much poverty, perhaps more poverty, there than I have seen here, and I also saw more wealth there. Wherever you have great wealth you have great poverty.

Mr. REID: Is it not possible that a country like China with its hundreds and hundreds of millions of poor people may wake up and require for the next fifty or one hundred years the things that we have in our western civilization, and so bring about the situation which my hon. friend says will not arise?

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend's question is this: Is it not possible that a country like China with its teeming millions of poor, lacking many things which we have in our western civilization, may one day wake up and demand a higher standard of living and industrialize their country? That is quite possible; but let me remind my hon. friend that with world machinery in the state it is in at the present time, the building up and industrializing of China would take only a comparatively few years, and what would happen then? We would then have an industrialized China with its teeming millions competing with the rest of the world. So there is no escape in that direction. Let us not fool ourselves that we are going to better our present position by building up competitors to compete for the dwindling world markets which we are trying to get. That is the folly of the point of view of my hon. friend.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a good Tory speech.

Mr. MacINNIS: No Tory could ever possibly think of it.

I was in the relief administrator's office a few days ago, and I saw there an illuminating chart of the trend of unemployment since 1931 or 1932; I am not quite sure of the year. I would suggest that hon. members who are interested in the problem should call on the commissioner of unemployment relief and see this chart. It is ten or twelve feet long, and the lines are so striking that one cannot fail to see them. One line shows unemployment, the drought areas included. The other shows unemployment outside the drought areas. The peak was reached in April, 1933. Then there was a slow zigzag until at the beginning of 1937 the line came down, making almost a complete diagonal; but then, beginning this fall, the line starts to go up again. I have forgotten the exact figures; but the line came down to indicate approximately 500,000 people receiving relief, and now it has gone up again in the last six months until the figure of those receiving relief has reached the million mark, and the two lines make a complete "V." So long as that condition remains; so long as we are subject to these sharp fluctuations in employment, we cannot pretend that we have dealt satisfactorily or comprehensively or definitely with the question of unemployment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) says that I have not yet taken forty minutes, but I shall take your word for it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J.-A. BONNIER (St. Henry) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I do not share the views of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) on the subject of housing loans. It has always been my contention that such loans are prejudicial to the interests of present owners of houses. In the city of Montreal, there are a great number of dwellings that have been built especially for renting purposes. We had numerous owners of three or four dwellings. Not a few of them have lost their houses and those who still hold theirs find it hard to meet their obligations, which bear interest at eight, seven or at least six per cent, while the government would loan money at only four per cent. Therefore such a scheme would create competition for the existing property owners, who have laboured hard to keep their houses and would have to continue paying interest at seven per cent, while the new ones would pay only three or four per cent.

I think there would be a more logical method of doing away with direct relief. Particularly in Montreal, a great amount of work could be undertaken in the interest of the entire country. The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) appeared to be opposed, earlier in the session, to the completion of the railway terminals. I think he is wrong on that point, because such terminals should be completed without delay.

I do not think there is in all Canada such a decrepit railway station as the one we have in Montreal, the metropolis of the Dominion. In all smaller cities you will find a neat-looking station adapted to the needs of the place. Montreal is the only city to have such a terminal as Bonaventure station, built over a hundred years ago.

The hon. member for Mount Royal said the other day that the proposed completion of the terminals was an election promise. I shall tell him in reply, Mr. Speaker, that this work was undertaken many years ago, at a time when there could not possibly have been any thought of a by-election in the electoral division of St. Henry.

As to the long-projected tunnel, I think it is in 1906 that Mr. F. D. Monk mentioned the need of a tunnel at that place, and it is in 1929, if I am not mistaken, that by order in council a certain sum was made available for its construction. Therefore, it is not a new project, it is not an election promise, but a promise made as a result of reports submitted more than fifteen years ago which established the absolute necessity of such an undertaking. In Mr. Monk's time, about 15,000 persons lived beyond the canal, instead of 35,000 to-day, not including the 25,000 residents of Verdun, about one-third of the population of that city, who are obliged to cross the bridge. Is it not the government's duty to build this tunnel which the people of the neighbourhood have so long needed? Of all the bridges crossing the Lachine canal, none is more inconvenient than the one situated in my constituency. Boats drift down the stream for about three-quarters of a mile before arriving at the bridge, the current not being swift at that point because of the locks situated 300 feet from the bridge. The ships advance very slowly to enter the locks. Quite frequently there will be another boat coming out of the locks at low speed, and people have to wait at each end of the bridge. After a fairly long wait the other day I decided to pass to the left and count the vehicles waiting to cross. There were 128 vehicles and three street cars stopped at one end of the bridge.

Does that not prove that it would be possible to undertake a great amount of necessary work in Montreal, in order to do away with the famous direct relief which was initiated by the former government, but which should never have been? Would it not be possible to give employment to those who need it? Why kill their liking for work by giving them unemployment relief? If we are to maintain the present system, it will soon be impossible to find apprentices, workers, bricklayers or carpenters to undertake necessary work in future years. To my mind, such essential projects as the completion of the Montreal terminals, the taking away of railway tracks which block the traffic and the canal in St. Henry, the building of a tunnel to enable people in that district to travel to their work with more ease, should be completed without delay in order to alleviate the burden of unemployment relief, and without creating competition for certain classes of our population.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I hesitate to participate in this debate because, after all, it seems to me a shame to find fault with what is being so honestly attempted. Yet one cannot speak on this occasion without finding a certain amount of fault, and that is a habit quite contrary to my nature. Perhaps if I put the matter clearly, it will not be so objectionable.

In the first place, in my judgment this bill is a complete disappointment; it is a failure; it offers the people of Canada a stone when they ought to have bread, and I see very little excuse for it. This country is perhaps better off, better fitted for progressive action, than any other country on the face of the earth. There is no excuse for such a lagging policy with respect to our economic life as we are now debating; and I maintain that our policy is lagging; it is second rate or third rate or fourth rate or worse. This may sound rather harsh, but I believe that under the circumstances it is certainly not too harsh.

One thing which worries me, which I have mentioned once or twice in this house, is that we have become completely deceived. I came into the building this morning with a gentleman who fell into step with me and who told me that he comes from the maritime provinces. Before we parted we developed a certain measure of heat between us because he maintained stoutly that there were plenty of jobs in this country if people were ready to take them. Now, whenever a man says a thing like that in my presence, after what I know and what I think any one with sense in his head ought to know, it is beyond my power to comprehend his state of mind. I challenged him to find jobs and he said, "They are here," and with a toss of his head he went on. What passed through my mind was the supercilious, the deliberately indifferent, callous attitude which the people are reported to have taken before the French revolution, and as a result of which they ignored apparently the most obvious signs that anybody ought to have been able to see. I fear there is too great a tendency towards that very thing in our public life throughout Canada, and every bit of contact I have with it makes me anxious. I beg the minister's pardon then for making an observation which might be somewhat distasteful. I was a little displeased when he stood up, with all the intelligence which I know he has, and in all apparent sincerity endeavoured to make it appear as though the Liberal party's policy had been responsible for the recovery in Canada. I am reminded of an account which I read not very long ago of the election of 1896. The background of that election, or the economic situation attendant upon it, was something like this. For a generation or two prior to 1898 there had been a great scarcity of money in the world, and because the people had the gold mentality they thought that if they did not have gold it did not make a particle of difference how many goods and services they had; they simply had to go hungry because they had no gold. In 1896 a Liberal government was elected on this side of the line, and a Republican government with exactly opposite principles was elected on the other side.

Mr. GRAY: And a great period of prosperity succeeded 1896.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In 1896 the Liberals are reported to have used as one of their battle-cries, perhaps not the all important one, but one of their battle-cries, "Kill the tariff and trample upon its carcass." The Republicans used just the opposite battle-cry. They put their policies into operation as far as they felt they could, I suppose, and then in 1898 there was a discovery of gold in the Klondike. As a result of that discovery and of similar discoveries in other parts of the world, there was a great influx into the world's stream of gold, consequently a great increase in the world's money and consequently a rise in prices. And, would you believe it, sir, both the Liberal administration on this side of the line and the Conservative administration on the other side of the line claimed credit for the pick-up in business.

That sort of thing I look upon as a real danger. If I have not said often enough to satisfy my hon. friends that I have no desire to be political, I hope I shall impress them by saying it once more. Whether or not the Liberal party or the Conservative party succeeds makes not the slightest difference to me; what I am concerned about is Canada. Therefore, an attempt to give a twist to improvement in world conditions; to put upon it an interpretation that is not justifiable, is, I believe, exceedingly offensive to all of us because it helps us to blind ourselves to the truth.

I am going to read a quotation from a very respectable authority.

Mr. McNEVIN: Does the hon. member not think that along the line of his argument the premier of Alberta is trying to capitalize on the oil industry.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The question is far removed from the subject under discussion.

Mr. McNEVIN: The hon. gentleman was talking about the Liberal government of Canada taking credit for the results of the gold mining boom of 1896.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to give a quotation from World Finance 1935-1937 by Paul Einzig, who is an economist of recognized standing throughout the world. What he says is more respectable than anything that I might say bearing on this particular subject. Before I read this quotation, may I observe that the apparent increase in prosperity in Canada to-day is not by any manner of means due to any policies that may be applied in Ottawa or Washington. To some extent it is probably owing to the expenditure of money by President Roosevelt, and the recession which is on us now seems to be due to the fact that he is not spending so much.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Will the hon. member give credit to the government for the expansion in trade?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the hon. gentleman will give me a chance to say my say without incessant interruption, he will enjoy it better and so shall I. I am not talking social credit now; why should I be interrupted every half minute as I was the last time. On page 303 of this book I find the following words:

> Needless to say, countries which do not play an active part in the rearmament race also enjoy its beneficial effects, without suffering its disadvantages in the form of a considerable increase of their public debt. From this point of view the British dominions and Latin America have been in a particularly favourable position since the beginning of the rearmament race.

Hon. members will notice what bearing that is likely to have on Canada.

> It was mainly the large demand for raw materials in connection with rearmament that broke the back of the economic depression. All the reflationary efforts of President Roosevelt and other statesmen until about 1935—

It was just about that time that the Liberals came in.

> —did not produce any results comparable with those brought about by the rearmament during 1935 and 1936. The frozen commodity stocks which even in 1935 consituted an important problem and a major obstacle to genuine recovery have become liquidated within a relatively short time. In some instances there is now, in fact, an excess of demand, and the restrictions imposed upon production since 1929 are being gradually abandoned.
> The whole continent of South America has recovered economically and financially during 1936, far beyond the most optimistic anticipations.

Hon. members may feel entitled to credit for the pick-up in Canada; but I do not suppose anyone, even on the Liberal side would claim credit for what is happening in South America.

> Even Chile, which, after the crisis of 1931 was considered to be the darkest spot on the gloomy world, shows signs of becoming prosperous and solvent. No wonder, since her two main articles of export are nitrates and copper—

At page 304 we find these words:

> Could we view the situation without regard for its political, social and humane aspects, we might arrive at the conclusion that by breaking the back of the depression, rearmament was, in fact, a blessing in disguise.

We further learn from the same part of the book that even Brazil and Argentina, under influence of increased demand, have begun to relax restrictions against trade.

We are not discussing trade to-night; but in order to be realistic in facing the question of trade, there are one or two observations that, I think, should be made. There are many people who say that we ought to get together and break down trade barriers, because it is the trade barriers that are causing all the trouble. But the facts clearly indicate that the trouble is causing the trade barriers. Now the question as to what is the trouble is what we are engaged in answering to-night. Without an attempt to answer that question, talk on this subject is idle. I would call to the attention of the house the fact that this rearmament program has been financed, not with savings, but with new money. Hon. members have heard me declare that until I know they are tired of hearing it; but they must hear it again and again; for in that principle lies the only hope of salvation for this country and other countries of the British Empire. And that new money has been created by bankers. So I hope that next time the minister stands before us and introduces a bill, he will not try to claim for the Liberal administration all the credit for any improvement in conditions. No one in this parliament has been more ready to grant credit where credit is due than I; I think my speeches as reported in Hansard will bear out that statement. But if we are interested in arriving at the truth, let us refrain from statements which merely becloud the issue.

I shall not accuse the minister of the attempt, but it seemed to me there was an attempt to make our apparent recovery a little more glowing than it really is. I am just as anxious as anyone to see the doughnut, but it is well to know there is a hole in it, how big the hole is and how near we are to the edge of it. I grant that there was considerable pick-up in the business of the country; yet as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) pointed out by reference to a monthly letter of one of the banks, there is now such a falling off that it is alarming. Let me quote briefly from the letter of the Bank of Montreal of April 22, 1938. On the second page the economic situation of the various provinces is discussed:

> Quebec—While the volume of wholesale trade shows little change from that of last month it is below a year ago. Retail trade continues quiet. Collections are fair. The steel industries have benefited from recent large contracts for railway equipment and improved demand for mining machinery and agricultural implements. Many of the silk and rayon mills have further curtailed output. Cotton factories are operating well below capacity. Furniture manufacturers have reduced operations on account of lessening demand. Lumber markets have been dull but in general stocks are not unduly burdensome. Pulpwood is in light demand, with prices weak. Newsprint mills are still operating on substantially reduced schedules.

I leave Quebec to deal with Ontario:

Ontario—Wholesale and retail trade was comparatively quiet during March and volume was below that of a year ago. With the arrival of warmer weather, however, business has shown moderate improvement. Collections are slow to fair. Knitting, textile, woollen and worsted mills as well as canners, shoe manufacturers and rubber tire companies generally, are on shorter hours with reduced working forces, although hosiery mills and rubber footwear factories remain busy. A number of steel companies report increased activity as the result of large orders for railway, mining and transportation equipment as well as war materials, and aircraft companies are very busy. Mining activity continues at record levels.

These last statements tend to show that it is rearmament which is causing the apparent prosperity. On the third page the maritime provinces are dealt with:

Maritime provinces—Wholesale and retail volume is running somewhat below last year's levels. Collections are fair. Raw fur sales have been disappointing and prices show a sharp recession. Dried fish markets are quiet. Canned lobster is moving slowly, with heavy stocks on hand. The market for long lumber is weak and prices have declined.

I think that is sufficient; I shall not read any more. The situation in Canada is not nearly as bright as the minister seemingly has forced himself to think it is. In this house we should face conditions as they are. I do not believe the Liberal government are alone responsible for this situation. They have gone out and got more markets; I grant that. But without a change of system, the policy of neither the Liberal nor the Conservative party can cure the difficulties of this country. I am confident that this will become more and more apparent as the days go by. I only hope it will become apparent to a sufficiently large number of people before it is too late to do something. But the opportunity is passing. Conditions in many places in this country are positively terrible. That gentleman who talked with me this morning and so glibly assured me that there are plenty of jobs, came from an area not far from where this letter was written. This letter came to me personally, with no idea that it would ever be read in parliament. It comes right from the hearts of men who are in the midst of this terrible misery in a time when we are soothing ourselves into the idea that conditions are reasonably good. It comes from Nova Scotia.

Mr. ISNOR: Will the hon. member be good enough to tell the house from what city or town in Nova Scotia the letter comes?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would say to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) that I can give it, undoubtedly. It is here; but I do not think it is fair that all the details of a private and personal letter should be read into Hansard. But here they are, on my desk, and the hon. member may see them.

Mr. ISNOR: In view of the statement that 500 go to the soup kitchens in the town of Yarmouth, I think we should know who wrote the letter, and from what section of Nova Scotia it comes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not.

Mr. BAKER: Is it or is it not true?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The letter is right here, and it can be read.

Mr. ISNOR: We would like to check it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It does not need to be put into Hansard.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member cannot quote from a document without giving its source. The rule of the house is clear on that. If he reads a letter in the house he must state from whom it comes. When the hon. member makes public use of it in the House of Commons, it is no longer personal. The rule is clear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Once before I read a letter, and after a good deal of discussion it was expunged from the pages of Hansard. If that is the will of the house, it is all right with me. We will proceed with the speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: The name of the person from whom the letter came should be given. The hon. member should give the name of the person who wrote it.

Mr. ROGERS: And the address.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it is not fair to give the name of a writer, simply because of the fiendish kind of treatment people like this get, if their names are known.

Mr. BAKER: Who wrote it, then?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Only one thing can be done; if it is contrary to the rules the whole thing can be expunged from Hansard. But I refuse to give the name of this person to the house. I have it here, and any hon. member who is interested may read it; it is genuine, and it is in front of me in its original form.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member reads from a letter he ought to be in a position to disclose the name of the person who wrote it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am.

Mr. SPEAKER: But if he is not at liberty to do so, he should not read from it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All that is necessary, if it is contrary to the rules of the house to leave the letter on Hansard, is to expunge it from the record. I cannot give the name; or, at least, I do not believe I am justified in giving the name.

Mr. BAKER: He had no right to read it then.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Do I understand the hon. member is willing that the letter be expunged?

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. member to say it is his wish that the letter be expunged from the record?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If those are the orders of the house, all right.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it would be better if it were expunged from the record.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very good. I would much rather have that happen, now that hon. members have heard it, because, after all, I am more concerned with having hon. members in the house know about existing conditions than I am that the letter appear in Hansard. I am not going to expose a man who writes a letter like that to me.

All right; having said this much, I wish to pass on to another consideration. I have heard a good deal since I came to the house about those fine old virtues of hard work and thrift, and stern, stubborn self-help, faith in the future, and all those things.

On those principles our country was builded. There are a number of people who so far deceive themselves as to think that we social crediters do not believe that. No bigger piece of delusion can be conceived by man. We cannot build a state or a strong community without hard work, thrift, stern and stubborn self-help, faith in the future, patriotism, unity and democracy. I maintain that the greatest condemnation of the government in power to-day is that it is rendering those very virtues utterly impossible for a large part of the population of Canada. There is no successful contravention of what I say. We have hundreds of thousands of people throughout Canada who cannot get work at all, much less hard work, of profitable value. They will do anything to get work.

The one thing, sir, we cannot afford to lose in this country is the productive value of the human being. We are ignoring it, neglecting it, spurning it and rendering it utterly futile. We have been doing that for nine years. Surely, if this has not proved the absolute ineptitude of the present system, I do not know how much proof hon. members need. How many generations of failure must we have before we become convinced the present system cannot work any more?

Thrift! How can men save when they cannot get enough to keep body and soul together? Hon. members know that hundreds of thousands of people in Canada find it impossible to have any kind of meagre savings, from the contemptible incomes which they derive. Where, then, is the training for thrift? How is it possible? We must change this system, or no more shall we have genuine thrift in Canada.

The incomes sufficiently large to enable people to save to any great extent are being drawn by only a very small proportion of our population, and that proportion is steadily decreasing.

Stern, stubborn self-help! Men have thrown themselves against walls of reality until their bodies and spirits are bruised and broken, in their attempt to get along without assistance. Finally, they fall back in utter helplessness. How can people have faith in the future? From the very letter, a portion of which I have already read, I could read a statement indicating that these people are beginning to wonder what it was they fought for. We are building up a fine public attitude, a splendid morale, to go through another test, such as the last war! We are forcing the very kind of youth who, twenty years ago, sprang together to defend the country, into such disgraceful and degrading conditions, degrading to both body and spirit, that they have no heart whatsoever to fight. They say, "What have we to lose?"

I say if we are interested in the welfare of Canada—and I am sure every hon. member is—we simply must make a change, so as to give these people, these youth who are growing up, confidence that Canada is a land to love, and not a land to oppress them. We are oppressing them, disgracefully.

We hear a great deal about unity. We hear a great deal about the need for patriotism and democratic principles. When I hear that, I am reminded of a person who, suffering from rheumatism, applies some salve and hot flannels, and draws near the stove. He does anything and everything but try to remove the cause. The measure before us to-night is nothing but a palliative. There is no attempt whatsoever to find the cause of the difficulty, much less to remove it.

Some people would say: "What would you do about it?" In the first place, let us be sure that we must do something more than we are doing now. Just as soon as hon. members are agreed that what we are now doing is not sufficient, just that soon will we be ready and humble enough to go to the trouble of using some other methods. I shall read from the words of a man for whom I believe every hon. member has at least a measure of respect, namely Mr. Anthony Eden. If hon. members will permit me, I shall take the liberty of making comments as I read, because I believe this article contains a grave message for us in Canada, as it does for Great Britain and for all democratic countries. It has a direct bearing on what I was saying a few moments ago about unity and democracy. The Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, April 27, quotes Mr. Eden as saying:

> It would be foolish, perhaps fatal to the very survival of democracy, to ignore the stupendous achievements realized under other forms of government. A truly immense effort has been made in the last few years by autocratic states for the fulfilment of the purposes they have set before them.
> Their methods cannot be ours, but we should not fail to note the passionate fervour with which they are being realized.

Contrast the passionate fervour which they are demonstrating according to Anthony Eden with the lethargy which is manifested in this country, with the disposition to let things ride and wait for something to turn up! I continue with the quotation:

> If we are to uphold our idea, our conception of life, both national and international, if we are to see them prevail, then a comparable effort must be made by us and an equal spirit be roused. This is a time when every endeavour should be made to promote national unity, for it is only as a united nation that we can give of our best.
> Party warfare for its own sake should have no place in the scheme of things to-day. A united effort for the spiritual and material rearmament of the nation is the need of the hour.

It would be hard to find words that are more appropriate to conditions as they exist at this moment. I maintain that we are not taking such measures as will build up the spiritual and material resources of this country. We all hope it may not be so, but we all fear that we are approaching a most dreadful time of testing when practically every part of our being is unprepared. People will say, "What will you do about it?" First of all, I say that we are going to do something. Then it will be asked, "What will that something be?" I have been much interested in the proposals which have been made. I was particularly interested in the speech of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), and I think it did him great credit. I have been interested in the proposals of hon. members who have suggested that we should conduct irrigation work; that we should have extensive reforestation and road construction. These suggestions are all perfectly sound. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh) made a most entertaining and interesting speech yesterday, as did the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens).

But in each instance I am sure hon. members felt that we have only so much money; that all we can get is what we can tax from the people or borrow. It would not be wise to borrow any more. We want to balance the budget if it lies within our power, and we should begin to pay off our debts. We are taxing our people to the absolute limit. Well, then, they would say, "Hon. member, which one of the things upon which we are now spending money would you have us curtail? If we cannot curtail in any respect; if we cannot get money in any other way, then how in the world do you think we can finance these projects?" That is what it amounts to as surely as we are here in this building. Where are you going to get the money? I am not going to make any extended comments to-night. I am not going to talk about social credit in any detail as some hon. member would rise probably to a point of order and oppose my remarks. Without any reflection upon those who preside, I must say it seems strange that those who are called to order are the ones who try to offer suggestions which would really improve matters.

I want to remind hon. members that the money with which the war preparations are being financed is credit; it is not savings. Let us get that thoroughly into our thinking. Where does that credit come from? Undoubtedly the bankers all over the world are producing it. Is the Canadian banking system producing any part of it? If it is, then can we not arrange things so that our bankers will be able to produce the credit which we need to improve conditions in our country? The minute we begin to think along that line, we shall begin to see a way out of the difficulty in which we find ourselves. I say earnestly and frankly that if the Dominion of Canada would begin an earnest study of the principles of social credit, a way could be found out of our difficulties.

I think I can safely venture to say that if wisdom and industry were used in the application of these principles, the Minister of Labour would never again be humiliated by having to bring down a bill such as this. There would be no further need for a bill to relieve unemployment in this country. If anything more is needed, I am willing to say it. I have such confidence in the principles of social credit that I feel sure that would be the result. Absurd? Of course it sounds absurd, but everything new sounds absurd.

An hon. MEMBER: How long would that exist?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The new system would exist until such time as there were other changes in our economy. That might be twenty-five, thirty, forty or fifty years as things move so fast these days. The point is that we are in a hole right now and do not know it.

Mr. BAKER: When and where has your theory proved successful?

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is a lot of wisdom behind that question! You could ask with equal pertinency, when did the airship succeed before the Wright brothers proved they could fly. When was the alternating current successful before William Stanley came along? You can go back through the history of world development and ask the same question about every great advance.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has elapsed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I read just this one sentence? I should like to quote the words of R. F. Irvine, professor of economics at Sydney university for twenty-five years. I have quoted these words three times already and I shall quote them many times more. He said:

> I believe that the principles put forward by C. H. Douglas are not only sound but that they provide the only practical way of escape from the tragic fate which otherwise awaits the whole of western civilization.

I submit that is the only way out of this devastating and threatening situation of unemployment.

Mr. DUNNING: What is the proposal?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, you will note I am answering questions. There are three proposals. The first is that state-created money shall be used.

Mr. DUNNING: We have that now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish you would use it.

Mr. DUNNING: We do all the time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish you would use it more extensively.

Mr. DUNNING: You have some of it in your pocket right now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is the first principle. Next, in order to prevent inflation; in order to make sure that the money is properly distributed; in order to make up for a lack of wages when men cannot work, you have dividends. By means of these dividends you distribute money to the very people who need it in order that they may buy those goods which the industries are unable to sell.

Mr. GRAY: How?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would be just as though the government sent them the equivalent of a cheque every month.

Mr. DUNNING: You would print the money and give it to the people monthly?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No; you would not print the money; you would do it through the banking system.

Mr. DUNNING: How would the people get it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The bankers would issue it to them. Suppose it is $25 a month. The banker would put $25 to the credit of every person in the area he serves who was qualified.

Mr. DUNNING: How does the banker get the $25?

Mr. POULIOT: Might I ask a question in order to help the hon. gentleman?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the hon. gentleman in favour of stopping the sale of our gold outside and keeping it here in order to cover part of a new issue of money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, yes; that should be attended to.

Mr. GRAY: Where does the banker get the money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a very fine question. I did not expect all this questioning, but it is excellent; that is just what I am here for. Remember what I said a few minutes ago, that these great rearmament programs are not being financed with savings.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend said a moment ago that we must start with state-created bills; that is Bank of Canada bills, and he says that these bills are to be got to the people through the ordinary banker. How does the ordinary banker get the state-created money in order to give it to the people, if he is going to give it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let it be understood, Mr. Speaker, that I am not giving anything but illustrations. I am not going to set down a plan here to-night, because that would be manifestly absurd. If I were to come before this audience to-night, and none of you had ever seen a power plant where electricity could be generated—

Mr. DUNNING: It is money we are talking about.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just a minute. I know; I was not born yesterday. Suppose I wanted to prove to this audience that you could establish a power plant with which you could convert the energy which is pouring down a stream into electricity with which you could light your buildings and heat your homes and do the hundred and one splendid things that we do with electricity, assuming for a moment that we had never seen that done; just project yourself back a hundred years to a point where they never had seen it done; suppose it is our great, great grandfathers who are here, and that one of them is trying to demonstrate to the rest that it is feasible to establish a power plant to create out of this energy in the water electricity which could be used for various purposes—

Mr. GRAY: But grandfather always paid for that power.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very fine, but the hon. member has not let me go far enough yet. If that were fully demonstrated by whatever reasoning was necessary, would the men in that audience expect the demonstrator to proceed to tell them all about the fuse plugs, the stepping down apparatus, and all that kind of thing?

Mr. DUNNING: They would expect some electricity to be delivered. My hon. friend said a few moments ago what is being repeatedly said by his party: We will give purchasing power to the people in the form of state-created money. Surely we have a right to ask how that state-created money is to reach the people without the people doing anything in order to get it. That is all we want to know. It is a simple question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very good. But first of all I wish to say this, that anything which I say here which goes into Hansard without a lot of explanation might easily be misinterpreted. All hon. members know where my room is, and if anyone wants to come up to me for an explanation I shall spend hours and hours with him explaining things.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell it now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, no; we won't do anything so foolish as to tell it now. I would simply say this, just as an illustration. We established, when we were having our debate some time ago, that the Bank of Canada can take one dollar of gold and can create against that four one-dollar bills. We even had it established without any serious opposition that the Dominion of Canada could create bills without gold. It was also demonstrated and acknowledged that, having once created four one-dollar bills against one dollar of gold, the Bank of Canada could transmit one of those dollar bills to the banking system, we will say to the Bank of Montreal, and if the banks in the banking system were all working together in step, so that one would not get out of line by varying the policy the others were following, then the banking system could create ten dollars of credit against that one dollar bill.

Mr. DUNNING: The Bank of Canada does not give these bills to the chartered banks.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We know that. We do not say they give it to them, no. But the point is they can create four dollars against one, and when the banking system has got the one dollar bill it can create ten dollars of credit.

Mr. GRAY: The Minister of Finance offered you all the facilities you are speaking of, and you refused to accept them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No; I did not refuse.

Mr. GRAY: I heard him offer all these facilities, and you refused them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the hon. member will read my speech, he will find there was no refusal.

Mr. DONNELLY: Why don't you take it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: For the reason I gave quite clearly in the answer that is in Hansard, and you will not find any flaw in it. I told the house a few moments ago that if the Bank of Montreal went ahead with ten to one, and the other banks in Canada extended only five to one, the Bank of Montreal would get into difficulty. They have to go forward in step, and once they do that they can create ten credit dollars as against one dollar bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the hon. gentleman be in favour of the prohibition of the sale of our gold outside Canada, in order to have a larger gold reserve for the issuance of paper money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It should be quite sound to keep our gold at home if it is gold we need to back our money. If it is, undoubtedly let us keep our gold at home.

Mr. DUNNING: Does the hon. member think we need any more gold to back our money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to have the privilege of going into the details before making a statement on that. When the hon. minister asked me his question before, I said that we would call in the banking authorities in this country, and the question which the Minister of Finance has asked me I would unquestionably ask of these gentlemen as being authorities upon it. Suppose I said to them: I want to extend the credit of Canada $500,000,000, as being the amount necessary to put our farms and factories into operation again as they were in 1929.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very good, Mr. Speaker, but I was just answering questions. As the Minister of Finance has asked me the question, perhaps I might be allowed to finish my answer. I say I would call in the banking authorities and ask them: Do you think we ought to have more gold? If they said yes, we would surely keep it. If they said we did not need it, I would say that they are the authorities.

Mr. DUNNING: May I repeat my original question? My hon. friend concluded his speech by stating that this problem could be solved by the adoption of social credit principles and by state-created money. I have asked him how he would get state-created social credit money—that was his own expression—out to these people who need it. That is what we are here to do. That is what my hon. friend says he will do. I just want to know how. Surely, before we vote for that thing, we ought to know how he proposes to get the money to the people who need it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, I said, Mr. Speaker,—you will excuse me since I am answering the hon. member's question—having once established that the banking system of Canada can create credit enough to put the people of Canada to work, we would then arrange matters so that they could make loans—

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, "loans."

Mr. BLACKMORE: —as they used to make them. That would be the first move; loans to get your production going.

Mr. DUNNING: But these were not loans. They were dividends, my hon. friend said; that was the expression he used.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before you can safely give dividends the first thing you create is credit for loans with which to produce goods and services. Then the banking system can be so managed that working with the government it can advance credit as dividends with which to consume surplus goods and services.

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Justice says that it is against the rules for me to question the hon. member.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not mind. I shall gladly go on talking all the minister wishes, because I am simply full of the subject.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a word to explain why I said that the report of the employment commission was rotten. It is because the figures contained in the twenty-ninth tabulation of statistics at the end of the report do not indicate the previous occupations of the unemployed. They refer to the last time the unemployed had any occupation; they give some information about the ages of the unemployed, their capacity or incapacity to work; but they do not tell what those unemployed did before they became unemployed, or where they live. For those reasons the statistics published in the report are absolutely useless, although quite a lot of work may have been involved in compiling them. Besides that, what I find foolish is the calculation of the percentage to one-tenth. It was absolutely absurd.

I strongly objected to the appointment of Mr. Purvis as the chairman. My contention at the time was that no one knew better the problem of unemployment than any member of this house who has occasion to meet unemployed persons either during the session or during the recess and to be in contact with them. Mr. Purvis has no occasion to meet any unemployed. He may shake hands at times with the men who are working in the numerous institutions of which he is a director, but on the other hand he never meets any unemployed. Therefore he knows nothing about their real lives and their troubles and miseries.

There was one thing that struck me. When the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe asked the Minister of Labour two years ago what salary was to be paid to Mr. Purvis, the minister gave an evasive answer; he did not at the time answer yes or no. The member for Témiscouata repeated his offer to do the work of classification for nothing, providing that he could take a few civil servants at his own choice to assist him in that compilation. Afterwards Mr. Purvis was put to shame and said that he was not charging anything; in fact, he received, I admit, nothing apparently in gold or in paper money or in social credit money. But, on the other hand, he did something which was most unethical and for which he should be deported at once as undesirable. There are two reports, one on unemployment and one on employment. As to the large report on employment, which contains data of January, 1937, about those engaged in industry, it should not be forgotten that Mr. Purvis, the chairman of the national employment commission, is also chairman and managing director of Canadian Industries Limited, president of the Dunlop Tire and Rubber Company Limited, and of numerous other institutions. Therefore Mr. Purvis as head of the commission secured confidential information about all industries, some twenty-seven or twenty-nine of them. That report is more fully detailed than the report on unemployment, and especially on the chemical industry, the industry of chemical products, and on the industry of rubber products, in which he is interested.

Mr. ROGERS: But the data was secured from all industries for public purposes.

Mr. POULIOT: And especially those industries which are mentioned in that report. There is the rubber industry; he is president of the Dunlop Tire and Rubber Company, Limited.

Mr. BAKER: That is no crime.

Mr. POULIOT: It is a commercial industry. I wonder if my hon. friend is not a large shareholder in that industry.

Mr. BAKER: I do not hold one share, and never did, but it is no crime for that man to reach that fine position.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask my hon. friend kindly to keep quiet and shut up. If he wants to ask me a question, he will rise in his place and ask me if I am willing to let him ask the question. If not, he will sit down—

Mr. BAKER: I would not be bothered.

Mr. POULIOT:—and not say a word; otherwise I shall ask the chairman to call the hon. gentleman to order. It may hurt him; but I am telling the truth, and I know more about it than he does, because he is a capitalist.

Mr. BAKER: That statement is not true. I am not a capitalist.

Mr. STEWART: On a point of order, possibly the hon. gentleman himself might observe the rules a little more strictly than by asking an hon. member to "shut up". I think he might request—

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly. I shall ask the hon. member to keep silent; and I mean it.

Mr. BAKER: I take exception, Mr. Chairman, to the statement made by the hon. member that I am a capitalist. I am not a capitalist, and never was.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it an insult to call the hon. gentleman a capitalist? I think he belongs to the social credit group if he is insulted when I call him a capitalist.

Mr. BAKER: No. Not guilty.

Mr. POULIOT He might change his seat. He might go to the left.

Mr. BAKER: Let the hon. member go on with his statement and not bother about me.

Mr. POULIOT: No; I do not bother, but I worry a lot. Leaving aside these futilities, I must resume my argument. What I said was that Mr. Purvis, as president or chairman of the Dunlop Tire and Rubber Company Limited, was most interested to know everything, even of a confidential nature, in the rubber industry. Also as president and chairman of Canadian Industries Limited he was highly interested to know what was going on in the chemical industry. He knew it all. Perhaps that is the reason why he was exhausted after his report was tabled. I find it, sir, most unethical for a man, who stated he was asking nothing to do that work, to take advantage of his position as chairman of a public body to secure private information for which other industrialists would be ready to pay half a million or a million dollars That is one point.

Mr. ROGERS: The information was used for public purposes.

Mr. POULIOT: For public purposes. But he took personal advantage of it; and private replies, mentioning the names were sent to the commission by the industries concerned. The figures that he gave did not disclose the information that he had, because he gave them for the Dominion of Canada and for the province at large, not naming a single industry, when personally he had that information. Tom Moore said nothing on that. I objected strongly also to the appointment of Tom Moore, whom I did not name in 1936, for the reason that he has done nothing in his life and cannot teach others how to work. Moreover, the conclusions of the report are silly. One of them is to amplify the employment offices, to give a job to Tom Moore. If he was in distress he could secure direct relief. And the social insurance, which he has advocated as chairman of the trades and labour congress every time he appeared before the government, in the eyes of the national employment commission seems to be a plan to secure a job for Tom Moore—quite an expensive undertaking.

Sir, I will say nothing more for the moment on this matter than this. Why did the government have to appoint the national employment commission instead of naming a parliamentary committee of the House of Commons to study the matter of unemployment? Was it not because in the very Department of Labour the minister did not have the assistance that he was supposed to have from all his officials? I have nothing to say about the unemployment relief branch; I have the highest respect for three gentlemen who occupy prominent positions in that branch, Mr. Hereford, Mr. Houston and Mr. Carter, and some others who are doing good work in minor positions. The former deputy minister of labour was at one time a railway man, a man with a good education and a good knowledge of railway problems, and in the discharge of his duties he rendered good service to the state. Imagine that man being replaced by a man who was a former private secretary of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who had several years' experience as private secretary to ministers, and whose only experience with regard to the unemployed was six years in the remission branch of the Department of Justice dealing with convicts. It seems to me a shame that Mr. Ward was forced to resign to give place to that man, a man not qualified. The minister may deny that; but I am sure that if he had had, as deputy minister of labour, Mr. Ward, who was a very capable man, whom I knew personally, and who helped me in some work I did on behalf of the unemployed, we would have had no employment commission. That is all I have to say for the moment.

Mr. ROGERS: I have expressed at various times my admiration for the independence of the hon. member for Témiscouata, but at this time I wish to take strong exception to some of the observations he has just made. I will say this very definitely, that from my contact with the members of the national employment commission, each and every one of them accepted the responsibilities of that commission with a keen sense of public obligation. My hon. friend has referred particularly to Mr. Purvis, who was chairman of the commission. Mr. Purvis accepted the chairmanship of the commission at the request of the government. Naturally the government was responsible for his selection, and so far as I have had association with Mr. Purvis as chairman of the commission I am absolutely convinced that he gave honestly and wholeheartedly his best effort to the task in hand. My hon. friend is entitled to take exception to any or all of the recommendations of the commission; but I do not think there should be any imputation cast upon the motives either of the chairman of that commission or of other members of it, and I think that applies equally to the members of the public service of Canada. I wish to make that statement immediately so that there shall be no misunderstanding of my position.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not impute any motives; I stated facts.

Mr. BAKER: I have no brief whatever for Mr. Purvis. I have not the pleasure of knowing him; but if I have his history, he is a self-made man who employs people; and what astounds me so much is that people who, as far as I know, never employed any one at all, have the impudence to criticize a man of that type.

Mr. HEAPS: I have no desire to follow along the lines pursued by the hon. member for Témiscouata. I have nothing against any of the gentlemen mentioned, and I think it is sometimes unfortunate that aspersions should be cast upon people who are not here to defend themselves. I have never met Mr. Purvis in my life and I would not know him if I did meet him, but I believe he is an honourable man and that he acted in an honourable capacity. I might disagree with the conclusions he arrived at and with the recommendations submitted to the government, but that would not prevent me from at least giving him credit for being an honourable person. And so far as Tom Moore is concerned, I think the remarks that were made are entirely undeserved. Mr. Moore used to work as hard as any member of this house. He was by trade a carpenter until he was made a paid official of the trades and labour congress, and I cannot understand what the hon. member for Témiscouata has against him in his capacity as a member of the national employment commission.

However, I want to get down to something definite in connection with the matter before us. I do not wish to discuss personalities in a matter of such far-reaching importance as unemployment relief. I want to deal with one aspect of the question of relief which has come to my attention in the past few weeks. It is the attempt which is being made in Winnipeg, and probably in other parts of Canada, to reduce the standard of relief being given to persons who are unfortunately the recipients of public assistance. Not only is an effort being made to reduce the standard of relief given, probably in order to save costs to the national and local exchequers, but there are also new regulations being put into force, which in my opinion will have an extremely serious effect upon the general standard of living of the persons involved. In Winnipeg, those who determine the kind of relief are putting into effect certain regulations which provide that when a person is working he will be allowed to spend only so much of his salary per week or per month, and the balance is to be put away for a time when he may find himself in the ranks of the unemployed. The amount allowed to be spent in Winnipeg is not much more than the amount they receive when on relief. At the present time people on relief have exhausted practically everything that they have, and they will not be allowed to replenish anything; they will be compelled to live on a basis not much better than that which they experienced when they were recipients of public relief. It means that these people are going to be driven to a very low standard of living, so that they drag down the higher standards that others may have attained as a result of many years of endeavour. I cannot too strongly condemn regulations of that kind. I want to know if that is the policy of the government or whether they acquiesce in a policy of that kind being adopted by public authorities.

Mr. ROGERS: My answer to my hon. friend is that the dominion government has not in any way brought pressure to bear upon provincial governments with respect to any change in relief scales. We have from time to time altered our grants in aid to provincial governments; in doing so, we have been influenced by improvement in the unemployment situation in those provinces and to some extent by improvement in the financial position of certain provinces. Those have been the two factors which have always governed grants in aid by the dominion to the provinces. But there has been no pressure of any kind in respect of relief scales. That is something which, as my hon. friend is no doubt aware, is dealt with entirely by provincial governments in conjunction with the municipalities. There is no uniform relief scale throughout the dominion; there is not in the municipalities in a province; it varies not only between provinces but as between municipalities in the same province.

Mr. HEAPS: Does not a representative of the Department of Labour confer with the authorities in the different provinces and in that way control in some measure the scale of relief being given?

Mr. ROGERS: No. The only possible connection that might exist between the dominion government and relief scales is a clause in the agreements covering the last quarter of the past fiscal year which stated that the relief allowances should not compete, so to speak, with the prevailing wage in a municipality. I have mentioned that before in this house. That is the only clause of the agreement that I can recall at the moment which would have any effect upon relief scales as applied in any particular municipality.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Some time ago I asked the minister some questions in reference to the highest relief scale paid anywhere in Canada and the relief scale which was competing with wage scales in any part of Canada. Could I have an answer now?

Mr. ROGERS: I remember the question, and I think my friend will recall that I stated that I doubted the wisdom of giving the relief scales prevailing in each city. It is not a matter which is within the control of the dominion government; it is determined wholly by the municipality in question. As for the other information asked by my hon. friend, I shall be glad to take note of it and see that it is made available.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I did not want the minister to give me the locality; I just wanted the highest relief scale.

Mr. ROGERS: I can secure that information, and shall do so. I thought the hon. member wished me to state what particular locality had this high relief scale.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister says that the department has requested the provincial authorities that relief scales shall not compete with prevailing rates of wages. I think in that they are taking a dangerous step. I could understand that, assuming relief scales were extremely high, the departmental officials might think that people would not be anxious to accept work at prevailing rates. They might claim that. I do not know of any relief scale in Canada that competes with what I would call fair rates of pay. The minister and other members of the committee will understand that there is a difference between what might be called prevailing rates and fair rates of pay. The prevailing rate in some area might be fifteen cents an hour; I know of instances of men working a whole week and at the end of the week getting the magnificent sum of $9 to maintain themselves and their family. I do not think there is any hon. member who would blame a man if he would not work for fifteen cents an hour. But if that happened to be the prevailing rate of pay, it might occur that a person having no alternative but relief would be compelled to accept it or have the relief allowance reduced accordingly. The department cannot avoid responsibility for conditions of that kind. A few months ago there was brought to my attention a place in Canada where that low rate of wages was being paid. In the case of Winnipeg I know what the relief rate is; I think I referred to it just prior to the recess. For a married couple, if my memory is correct, it was about $20 a month, or even less than that. I know it was extremely low. I am afraid that the tendency will be to reduce the scale still further, lowering the standard of living and wages as well. I want to prevent that. I do not want to see people on relief in Canada; I am one of those who for years have deplored the fact that the government has been compelled to give relief to people out of work. I would far rather see the government undertake a vast scheme of public works across this country to provide work for those in need, with a scale of pay in conformity, not with prevailing rates, but with either union rates or fair wages as determined by provincial regulation.

Mr. ROGERS: But my hon. friend on one occasion condemned that solution of the problem. I take it he has not changed his mind on that.

[Mr. Landeryou.]

Mr. HEAPS: As a final solution, I still say no. But I think we agree that although a scheme of public works is not a final solution, it at least alleviates the condition. It would be far better for the people who are to-day receiving relief to be performing some useful work.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 29, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

MALTON AIRPORT

QUESTION OF JURISDICTION WITH RESPECT TO EMPLOYMENT DURING CONSTRUCTION WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. S. HAMILTON (Algoma West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) based on a press report contained in the Sault Daily Star of April 28 and coming from Toronto. This reads:

> E. L. Cousins, general manager of the harbour board, yesterday told the civic board of control that the daughter of Jack Philips, Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, engineer, who was working as a temporary stenographer during construction work on the Malton airport site, would be "through" to-night.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, a few days ago I was refused permission to read a telegram, on the ground that it was against the rules so to do. But this is on all fours with what I was trying to read, and I wonder if it is not out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. gentleman is just prefacing his question and I would ask him to put his question now.

Mr. HAMILTON: That is what I intended to do. I want to ask the Minister of Transport if employment at the Malton airport site is under the jurisdiction of the federal government. If the federal government contributes anything towards the Malton airport site, upon what basis is employment carried on?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The Malton airport is a municipal undertaking of the city of Toronto. The federal government contributes roughly twenty-five per cent, the provincial government dollar for dollar with the federal government, and the city of Toronto the balance. The city has charge of the work, but the contract with the federal government is that employment shall be given through the government employment office. We have no direct control over the personnel on the work. I may say that the city has turned the work over to the Toronto harbour commission for administration.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 105, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, before the committee proceeds further with the bill I should like to refer to certain statements made last night by the hon. member for Temiscouata. In the interval I have had an opportunity of investigating the charge made that Mr. Purvis, as chairman of the national employment commission, had obtained certain information which would be of value to him in his private business associations. That investigation has confirmed the opinion I expressed last night, that the information so obtained was used solely for public purposes. Late in 1936 and early in 1937 a form was sent out under the authority of the national employment commission to the larger employers throughout Canada. The form stated its purpose to be to secure data deemed useful in studying employment and unemployment, to be supplementary to the commission's studies along other lines, such as the registration of direct relief recipients. That form was prepared by the members and officers of the commission. At the close of 1937 a report was issued embodying the information secured from the replies received. This report was issued and was tabled as a matter of fact in this house under the title of Report on Phases of Employment Conditions in Canadian Industry.

In no sense was it the thought or intention of the commission to look into the circumstances of individual firms; in fact an undertaking was given on the form itself to the effect that nothing of that nature would be done. This undertaking read as follows:

> In so far as the individual firm is concerned this reply will be treated as absolutely confidential. Information taken from the forms will be made public only in a general way: in no case will publicity be given to the individual return nor will it be available to any other branch of government.

That promise was most scrupulously carried out.

The work of receiving the forms and of collecting the data which they contained was under the direction of V. C. Phelan, director of registration, who was serving as an officer of the commission at the time. Neither the chairman nor any member of the commission ever asked for any one of the individual returns and none was shown to them. In order to discharge the project effectively it was unnecessary for the commission even to see these individual returns, as the purpose had been to secure data by classes, and when the data was ready in that form it was carefully considered by the commissioners.

A copy of the published report was sent to each employer who had submitted a return and no one has forwarded an objection to the use made of the information which he supplied. On the other hand, the commission was in receipt of statements from some employers to the effect that they considered the facts brought to light to be of value and that they appreciated receiving the report.

To sum up: the fact is that no one has at any time had possession of or been privileged to read the individual returns except the staff engaged in the statistical compilation, and steps were taken to see that the undertaking made to reporting firms was scrupulously regarded. It is a matter of opinion whether the individual employer's return in this case would be of assistance to a business competitor, as the information sought did not deal with the financial set-up or the producing, sales or commercial policies of firms.

I should just like to say in conclusion, repeating what I said last night, that Mr. Purvis as chairman, and Mr. Tom Moore as vice chairman, and all the members of the commission, approached their task as public-spirited citizens with a keen sense of responsibility, and I regret exceedingly that the hon. member has seen fit to make accusations against public servants who have been faithful and conscientious in the performance of their duties.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, this first section is about the same as last year. Would the minister give consideration to what has been urged by all parties in the house both last year and this, that contact be made not only with the provinces but with the larger municipalities where unemployment centres? You have extended the principle to Saskatchewan, for example, where the agriculturists can deal directly with the municipalities for seed and many other things like that, and it is what Mr. Hopkins has done at Washington.

I think it would strengthen the bill if we provided for the same thing here. As I said this year, where there is a large collection of $40,000,000 of income tax from Toronto I am sure you can give back to them bonuses and subventions amounting to twenty per cent to take care of relief and to help real estate.

Last year's bill was not a perfect bill by any means, and I would urge the minister and the government to give consideration to the suggestion I have just made. At present, contact is only with the province, but you have extended it to have a second contact with industry. There was none such last year. I would suggest that it would strengthen the bill if you had in it a permissive clause to enable you in case of emergency that may come in the fall or winter to deal directly with the larger municipalities. It would meet with the approval of the mayors, and would make the bill more elastic and more effective in taking care of relief where the need for relief is the greatest. Unemployment centres in the large industrial cities. Why should you deal direct with the municipalities in Saskatchewan in seed and relief and not with Ontario, particularly when you have taken from Ontario $252,000,000 income tax in the past six years, enough to pay the relief bill for all Canada, namely $241,000,000 according to the monthly statement of the Bank of Canada. My leader handed back to the municipalities every dollar they had paid in to the federal treasury. If my suggestion were adopted it would help industry and construction, would help the administration of the Small Loans Act and strengthen the home loan act of the Minister of Finance. It would shorten the discussion if the minister would indicate that he would include in the bill a section giving him power in emergency to deal directly with the larger cities where unemployment chiefly prevails.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, I remember that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) made this suggestion when the previous bill was before the committee last year, and it received some consideration at that time. I fully appreciate the arguments he brought forward in support of his proposal. As a matter of fact I believe the Dominion Housing Act does contain a provision under which agreements can be made with municipalities. That of course is with respect to the particular project of housing. I do question, however, the wisdom of the dominion government entering into direct arrangements with municipalities in connection with the administration of relief. In the past our relations have been solely with the provinces, and as I have had occasion to mention before, it is physically possible to deal with nine provinces. When you open the door to direct negotiations, not with nine provinces but with several thousand municipalities, it will be readily understood that you place an almost impossible burden upon those dealing with relief administration from the federal point of view. I am bound to say that in spite of what has been said by the hon. member for Broadview I still think it advisable that we should not open the door in this bill to direct agreements with municipalities in connection with relief administration.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, last July the national employment commission devoted a bulletin to an article on the "unscrambling of this business of relief." In this bulletin it is suggested that we ought to have a division between unemployment relief and agricultural assistance, and in the case of the unemployed we ought to distinguish very clearly between those who are unemployed and those who are unemployable. I wonder if the minister can give any reason why various types of assistance should continue to be lumped in this way.

The other question I would ask is whether the minister could tell us the principles which are to guide the dominion government in the giving of relief during this coming season. We have had three or four years of it now on a very large scale, and we have had the benefits, whatever they are, of the researches of the national employment commission. I should like to know a little more clearly just what program is contemplated by the government, how extensive it will be, and along what particular lines.

Mr. ROGERS: First, as to the division of relief recipients into a number of classes towards which various governmental bodies should have a special responsibility, that is a question that has engaged the attention not only of this administration and of provincial governments but also of previous administrations who have had to deal with the question from the standpoint both of the dominion government and of the provinces. When direct relief was instituted in this country it was done, perhaps necessarily, without any classification of relief recipients upon the basis of their employability. It is possible—I do not wish to be dogmatic about it—that if the employment service of Canada had been used as the mechanism for dealing with relief from the beginning you might have had that division between unemployables and employables. But that was not found practicable. The result is that you have had on relief lists in practically all municipalities a mixture of unemployables and employables, including many cases which were formerly dealt with by private charity. That being the situation, we are confronted with the desirability of resolving that general problem into its constituent elements. It has not been easy, and the problem is complicated by the fact that these relief lists have been developing along the basis I have indicated within the past few years.

As I have mentioned to the committee before, in the agreements which were in operation during the last quarter of the past fiscal year we have sought to get the provinces to cooperate with us in a definition of unemployability. That again is a question which requires experience, in order to determine what your standard of unemployability shall be. We are proceeding largely upon the basis of physical and mental infirmities in determining unemployability, but we have not up to this time by our own action placed the responsibility for unemployables wholly upon the municipalities. Some provinces have done that of their own volition. As a matter of fact some provinces followed more or less that line of division from the beginning, but that was the exception rather than the rule.

My hon. friend has asked what will be done during the present year in that regard. I can tell him that we propose, with the cooperation of the provinces, to secure a more efficient division of the groups of relief recipients.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What does the minister mean by that?

Mr. ROGERS: I mean that the definition of unemployability which was in effect during the last quarter of the past fiscal year may have to be revised to some extent. In the light of experience in the last few months with the provinces, we hope to bring about a much more effective division of relief recipients, but not at the same time attempting to place the responsibility for unemployables upon any particular governmental agency. As I have mentioned, the provinces themselves in some cases placed the care of unemployables back upon the municipalities or upon private charities.

Now as to the measures which should be taken by the government for the provision of relief during the forthcoming year, that of course will be dealt with by items in the supplementary estimates as in the past two years, and in the allocation of the grant in aid to the provinces we shall be governed by the actual unemployment conditions in the various provinces, and also shall see to it that the division is one which will enable the dominion government to gain, if there is an improvement in the employment situation, in common with both the provinces and the municipalities who are equally concerned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It does seem to me that the committee should receive some further information than has been given. We are told that the amount of relief will be indicated when the supplementary estimates are brought down; the house will at least still have control over the amount. But there is something more. This bill purports to be an enabling bill under which the government can carry out certain schemes or undertakings for dealing with the unemployment situation. Surely the government has some idea of the extent to which the dominion ought to contribute during the forthcoming year. After three or four years, and after the elaborate investigations that have been made, the government should be in possession of something like adequate data on which to form at least a rough guess at what will be the requirements for the coming year. Then, secondly, it seems to me we ought to know what the plans of the government are. Are we to go ahead with various projects for young people? Are we to adopt a housing scheme? What form will the constructive measures take? As far as this particular bill is concerned we are getting back pretty much to the era of the blank cheque. We are asked to give the government power in a general way to meet an emergency.

Mr. ROGERS: Subject to parliamentary appropriations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, subject to the appropriations. But it seems to me that by this time relief cannot be regarded any longer as an emergency; it has settled down to be almost a steady thing. I think we ought to know just how the present government proposes to deal with a problem of this vast extent, involving as it does almost a million of our population.

Mr. ROGERS: This point, again, has been raised in other years, and quite properly. As my hon. friend is aware, the appropriations are governed by estimates submitted by the Minister of Finance, and in these supplementary estimates provision will be made for expenditures for the relief of unemployment in a number of directions. For instance, last year in the estimates there was a special item covering grants in aid to the provinces, another for training for unemployed young people, another for drought relief, another for works to be done in cooperation with the provinces. The same practice will be followed this year, and I can assure the hon. member that the supplementary estimates will be brought down with the least possible delay. This legislation, as my hon. friend has said, is simply the mechanism through which the dominion government is enabled to make expenditures for the relief of unemployment either directly or under agreements with the provinces. The actual amounts to be expended are set out in the supplementary estimates. The practice this year in this regard does not differ from the practice in other years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but it seems to me that the practice in this department does differ from the practice in a great many other departments. In other departments we are told what the plans of the government are. In connection with this department we have a very vague idea of what the plans are. Does the minister propose to follow the plans of the last six months? Does he propose to go no further than that? Rumour has it that the government has been considering a very comprehensive housing scheme. If so, it seems to me that at least an outline of such a policy should be given to the house. We are starting upon another twelve months with a vast number of our people unemployed, but we are not told what the policy of the government is to be. We have had the employment commission's report. The commission made a very lengthy investigation and presented quite a number of recommendations. We are not told whether the government is going to adopt any of these recommendations. I cannot see why this department should not outline to the house with some definiteness its plans for meeting unemployment during the coming year.

Mr. POULIOT: I should be sorry to be cruel to the minister, for whom I have a high regard, or to put him to any embarrassment. But here is the report of the national employment commission, and I should like to know how to use it. Suppose I am a contractor from Ottawa and I have the lowest bid for building construction of some kind in Quebec city. In going ahead, I desire to employ ten unemployed masons on relief, ten carpenters and ten painters also on relief in Quebec city. How could I use that report to locate them? It seems that the purpose of the report is to give such information to those good-natured men who are ready to be good Samaritans and help their fellow citizens who are on relief. I would be thankful to the minister if he would explain to the committee how the report can be useful in that respect.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT: Just a minute.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Pardon me; perhaps the hon. member for Temiscouata will kindly keep his seat until I get a reply from the minister. He injects himself into the discussion and then asks me not to continue my remarks.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not make any injections. The minister was not rising and I thought I could.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall do my utmost to satisfy both the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Temiscouata. As to the specific policies which will be followed by this government in dealing with unemployment and relief, the matter of housing is one which has been under consideration by the Department of Finance, as my hon. friend is fully aware. I am not in a position at this time to announce legislation with respect to housing. Legislation on housing, if and when it is proposed to this house, will appear before the committee either in the form of a new bill or by way of proposed amendments to existing housing legislation. My hon. friend knows quite well however that I am not in a position to deal with that question at the present time. As to other measures dealing with unemployment and relief, there are several directions in which we have proceeded. There is, for example, the matter of grant in aid. Supplementary estimates will contain provision for a grant in aid, but I cannot anticipate the supplementary estimates and tell the hon. gentleman the amount of the grant in aid. He will appreciate that. As regards provision for youth training, announcement has been made in the speech from the throne that the plans for the training of young unemployed will be continued and extended during the present year. Until the supplementary estimates are down I am not in a position to tell him, and he will fully understand this, how far the plans will be extended during the forthcoming year. I can tell him, however, that these plans will be continued and extended.

As to other provisions for relief—land settlement, for instance—there are agreements with several provinces and provision will be made therefor. Relief settlement agreements apply only in a number of provinces. But again, the committee is aware that our experience in connection with the settlement of families on relief in rural areas has not been of uniform success. Provision will be made also to deal with the drought situation in the western provinces, because the present provision has extended only up to the fiscal year. I would say, however, in that connection, that in July of last year, in order to bring about a more effective administration of relief in the drought areas, all relief in those areas was brought under the Department of Agriculture. In other words, that department now deals with both relief for human beings and relief in other forms in the drought area.

Mr. BENNETT: Which was a departure.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, that was a departure from the former policy. With respect to most of these expenditures on relief, we have had to work in cooperation with the provinces. That, again, is not something new; it has existed from the beginning. In other words, through grants in aid and financial assistance we deal with those who are in direct contact with the administration of relief.

I understand the desire of my hon. friend for more ample information at this time. There are two courses of action that might be followed. We could bring in supplementary estimates first and then deal with the relief bill, but that would be illogical, because we cannot make expenditures under the supplementary estimates until we have the relief legislation. It is under this authority that money is expended for the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress, and therefore we proceed first with this bill, in order to obtain the necessary authority to make expenditures either directly or in cooperation with the provinces, and then bring in supplementary estimates, for which, of course, the government will be fully responsible when they are submitted. They will be fully exposed to the criticism of my hon. friend or of any others in the house on the basis of the policies therein outlined.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder if I could impress upon the minister how illogical it is to ask us to pass this bill without telling us what it is proposed to do under the bill. The minister says it would be illogical to introduce the supplementary estimates before passing this bill. I suggest that it is equally illogical to pass the bill before we know what is going to be done under it. There is another course that could be followed. The minister could put before us the program that the government has to deal with unemployment and agricultural relief for the coming year and the appropriations that would be necessary for the purpose. It is not necessary to place before the committee at the moment any supplementary estimates, but they should be put before us before we are asked to pass a bill of this kind. When this government went to the country in 1935 they made a definite and, in my opinion, a correct statement, that unemployment was the greatest problem facing the people of Canada. This measure, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, is the government's measure for dealing with unemployment for the coming year. Once this bill is passed they can do as much or as little as they please and the house will have little to say in criticism.

Mr. ROGERS: The estimates will be brought before the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, but when this bill is passed we shall have either to pass the estimates or to refuse to pass them. If we had beforehand some indication of the government's program we could more readily consent to the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the minister aware that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver East have just stated an opinion that is held very widely in the country and in this house? I know that a resolution was brought down foreshadowing this bill. We have had the bill before us, and yet we have no information regarding the government's intentions. It seems to me that with this pressing problem, as with other pressing problems, it is in the interests of the government and of the minister himself that the house should be taken into the full confidence of the administration. It strikes me, as it does many others in this house, that there is too much secrecy with regard to the intentions of the government and the legislation to be placed before parliament, and I would therefore impress upon the minister the fact that the opinions that have been expressed this afternoon are opinions that are very widely held throughout the country and among members on both sides of this house.

When the minister rose first to speak in this chamber two years ago we all looked to him to give a real lead in the solution of the unemployment problem; but in two years very little of a constructive nature has been accomplished, and when we examine the report of the national employment commission it is with a great deal of misgiving that we see recommendation after recommendation either not considered, or no action or only partial action taken. Throughout this country, as those who have been across it within the last few weeks must be aware, there is a rising tide of discontent with the inactivity of this parliament. As one who believes in democracy and the maintenance of our democratic institutions I say that the present government of Canada is doing more to undermine our democratic institutions than all the subversive propaganda that can be spread across the country. Everywhere one hears criticism of the inactivity of the present parliament. Last session was closed hurriedly so that some of our members and representatives of the government could attend the coronation. This year we have been sitting now for over three months and virtually nothing has been done. In the interest not only of members of this house but of parliamentary institutions, this house should be taken into the confidence of the government more than it has been, and we should be told precisely what bills of this description foreshadow before we are asked to give approval to them.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to the defence of the minister in that respect. In answer to what the three hon. gentlemen have just said, let me state that the government must be empowered by parliament to act with regard to unemployment. This is why the bill is now before the committee. In order to do something the government must first be given the power to do it. There is a very good reason for this procedure; it is that when the bill is discussed in committee every member of the committee can make any suggestion, and I am sure that the minister has taken careful note of the suggestions which have just been made by the three hon. members who have spoken. It is after having full knowledge of the needs of their own constituencies and those of hon. members who sit here now that the government can meet in council and see what according to their judgment it is best to do under the circumstances. If this bill were passed as expeditiously as the divorce bills, probably there would be before the committee an item in the supplementary estimates dealing with the matters just referred to by the hon. gentlemen. The sooner the bill is dealt with the sooner the government will be in a position to submit concrete figures and give the information asked for by the hon. gentlemen. On the other hand, since I have been a member of this house I have repeatedly been told that the meetings of the privy council are secret, and that the ministers are pledged not to divulge anything that goes on in the council. It would be most improper for the minister to mention any discussion that has taken place in council before the quorum of council decides to give it to the house and the country. I am sure that these explanations will be satisfactory to the hon. gentlemen.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

May I make a suggestion to the minister? Until now every government in this country, every legislative body, whether federal or provincial, has paid attention only to the unemployed on relief. There is another class of unemployed deserving of equal consideration; it is the class of unemployed not on relief. Let me illustrate. As to the case of a family of five—father, mother, and three children on relief—I need not give any further explanation. But take the case of a father and mother not on relief who have to look after their children and support them just the same. Suppose there are boys or girls capable of working, say one girl and two boys of ages from eighteen to twenty-four. They have no work, and the family is looking after them. This kills their initiative. These young men deserve consideration. This morning in the civil service committee Sir Francis Floud, British high commissioner, gave most interesting information about the entry of youth into the British civil service.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It is not in order to refer to anything that has taken place in a committee of the house until the committee has made its report to the house.

Mr. POULIOT: It was just a brief reference, and I am through with it. But I am surely in order in speaking of those who should be within the scope of this bill but who are not. In those homes where the father supports his children who are unable to find work there is as much worry as in the homes of the unemployed on relief.

An hon. MEMBER: There is often more.

Mr. POULIOT: There is often more. Very often I have conversations with these people, who come to me and say, What can I do with my children? They are ready to work but they cannot get a job. That is a most serious matter, which should be looked upon from an entirely non-partisan standpoint. I know that the minister is very sympathetic to those cases. On the other hand there is no government in this country, and very few governments in the world, which look after those young men. I understand quite well that governments are interested in the question of employment for those to whom they pay relief, which would lessen the burden of taxation. That is a sane view, but they must not forget the other side of the picture, that people are sometimes very hard up because their children cannot get work.

I leave that to the consideration of the minister. I again ask him to be kind enough to tell the committee how we can use the statistics of the final report of the national employment commission according to the example which I have just quoted.

Mr. ROGERS: First I thank the hon. member for Témiscouata for directing attention to the proper relationship between this bill and the supplementary estimates which will follow. On that point I would simply say that had there not been established the practice of having annual bills, no question of the kind just raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would have arisen. In other words, the policy of the government in relation to unemployment would have been set out in supplementary estimates and debated when those estimates were before the house. But for some years we have proceeded by way of annual legislation. I am quite free to confess that sometimes I have been in doubt as to whether that was a wise policy; as to whether it might not be preferable simply to put through legislation which would extend without limit of time. However, we are proceeding in this way. This method does not differ in any respect from the way in which we have dealt with this question in previous years, and clearly the government will be responsible for the estimates submitted to this parliament to deal with unemployment and relief, and at that time there will be the fullest opportunity for any hon. member to take exception to what we are doing, to criticize us either because we have gone too far or because we have not gone far enough.

A moment ago one hon. member referred to the fact that he had expected that this government would have been able to accomplish more in the way of solving unemployment than had been the case during the past two or three years. I need hardly say that the wish to make progress in the solution of this problem is felt on this side of the house as strongly as in any other part of the house. As a matter of fact when we see the actual reduction of what might be termed the controllable unemployment in this country I think we have good reason for satisfaction. The other day I received from the League of Nations economic section a statement dealing with unemployment in all countries reporting to the league, and the position of Canada is one that at least gives us cause for satisfaction in a comparative way. I am quite sure that other hon. members of this house have had an opportunity of seeing at close range the results that have accrued in other countries with respect to unemployment policies. It is a problem that has been with us steadily since the war years. I imagine it would be fair to say that almost every proposal that has been put forward in this country has been adopted by the administration in the United States, yet the situation with regard to unemployment in that country at present is worse rather than better than it is in this country. I do not say that with any satisfaction; I merely point it out as illustrating the fact that we are dealing with a problem which appears to be inherent in the economic structure which has grown up following the great war.

At this time I am not going to attempt to deal with the immediate and remote causes of economic insecurity. That problem is with us. As I have said on other occasions, it is undoubtedly the great problem of our generation; but I am bound to say that in my most optimistic moments, when I came to the Department of Labour, I did not feel that we were going to be able to liquidate this problem completely in two or three years. I felt that by following wise policies and by assisting natural economic laws we would make definite progress, and I think we have made definite progress. I think we have some cause for satisfaction in that. I agree, however, that we have no ground whatever for that kind of satisfaction which leads to inertia. I fully accept the suggestion that this government must face this problem as it exists at the present time and as we believe it is likely to develop in the next twelve months; and I am bound to say that there are certain obscurities in the unemployment situation as it may develop in succeeding months. The government has its responsibility in connection with that problem, and I can say very definitely that we shall meet that responsibility with the light that we have when the supplementary estimates are brought down.

Now I must give a belated answer to the hon. member for Temiscouata, who has asked just what service might be rendered by the statistical compilation contained in the report of the national employment commission. I would say to him that this statistical compilation or classification of the unemployed is only one, the most recent, monthly calculation made by the registration staff of the commission. It does not represent a complete report. The registration is a continuous process, and one of the great advantages has been that the municipalities that report to the registration branch now report upon the basis of an agreed classification of the unemployed. Not all that information, of course, can be presented in press releases from time to time, but the municipalities themselves, and through the municipalities the relief offices and the employment service, can have the benefit of a more accurate classification of the unemployed on relief than existed before the registration was commenced. The results obtained under the registration are by no means perfect as yet. There are certain delays incident to the dependence of the registration branch upon the municipalities for these returns, which are longer than one could wish, but we are dealing with the registration upon the basis of its performing a very useful service, and certainly we have understood from the municipalities concerned that they appreciate the service rendered in this respect.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for what he has just said, but on the other hand it is impossible to use in any practical way the report of the national employment commission. What they have accomplished during nearly two years, at a cost of over $400,000, is worth absolutely nothing, and I should like the minister to admit it. It would be much better for him to admit that the report is no good, throw it in the waste-paper basket and start anew. That is my humble contention. Why keep it as an heirloom, this blue book which is of no use? There are waste-paper baskets in every room in this building; there must be some in this chamber. If not I will throw it on the floor. It is no good. Moreover I say that those who signed this report, instead of being praised for having performed a splendid public service, should be severely censured by this house because they did a bad job; just the same as a bootblack who does not shine your boots well; just the same as a gardener who ruins your rose bush; just the same as a cook who burns your meat; just as any other employee is censured. They were working for us.

There is one thing I have wanted to say for a very long time. It is that in this country we have a false idea about men in the public service. Mark you, sir; it has come about that a man is judged by the position he occupies, though very often it is the position that makes the man and not the man that makes the position. It makes all the difference in the world. Also if a man is very well off, if he is a millionaire, he is considered a supplementary edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica. We have a false idea about these things. A man may be a millionaire and a very able man in his own domain; a man may be a millionaire and not be an able man at all. He may be a millionaire by luck, just as a prospector may find a gold mine and sell it for two million dollars; he is a lucky man, and there are such. There are men who become millionaires because of their own brains. That is all right; they have certain experience in regard to certain things. It is true that the chairman of that commission employs a large number of men; I admit that, but among the men on his payrolls we do not find one single unemployed. This is something that certain hon. members seem to have forgotten. The report which is now on the floor deals with the unemployed, not with the employed. This man who is a great employer knows nothing about the unemployed. He does not know as much about the unemployed as any hon. member who receives them in his office or visits them in their homes.

Because a man is a leader in industry, it does not follow that he is a leader in every domain. Some think that because a man is rich he must therefore be a deep well of knowledge about everything. I do not say that such a man has not considerable knowledge, but the fact remains that those who consider that a man is a deep well of knowledge simply because he is a millionaire are worshipping the golden calf as they did in olden times. They are worshipping a bankroll. I am not against millionaires, but Mr. Purvis did not do a good job because he is a millionaire. That job was a rotten job. I have said that already and I shall repeat it just as long as I refer to this matter.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) said last night that Mr. Tom Moore was not here to defend himself. Of course he was not here. His place is not in this house and he cannot be here unless we call him before the bar to give an explanation about the way he has acted. We discuss certain things among ourselves just as Mr. Purvis and his directors discuss certain things in the board room. This House of Commons is our board room. I am always surprised when we are told not to say anything about a public servant who cannot be here to defend himself. No one is attacking these people; we are simply judging them. If I say anything unpleasant about one of my colleagues, I may be considered to be attacking him because we are both on the same footing. But on the other hand I have the right to judge a man in the public service, either favourably or unfavourably, according to the dictates of my conscience. I have not attacked anyone; I have been judging. I have judged this man severely because he has been wrongly boosted. I ask the minister to do the same thing as I did—to throw this report on the floor where the sweeper can come along and put it with the other garbage.

Mr. GREEN: Might I ask the minister the present situation with regard to the single unemployed? A serious situation is developing on the Pacific coast in connection with employable young men who are drifting into the cities, particularly Vancouver. I understand that the forestry projects have been or are being closed up and that as a result a total of about 5,000 men will be released. There are also many young transients drifting in from the prairies. Apparently the province will do nothing about caring for these men from the camps and the city must either feed them or face the possibility of riots. In other years there has been trouble of this kind; for example these men have gone out with tin cans and put on unofficial tag days, with the result that hundreds have been put in gaol in the last two years, although they are not criminals in any sense of the word. Many of the men are returned men. The city must either take care of them or adopt these drastic measures.

I do not know the situation with regard to the young men who have been placed on farms. Perhaps they have a chance of obtaining work during the summer on the farms on which they were placed during the winter, but the men from the forestry camps cannot be taken into the forest industries of our province in any large numbers. The minister has stated that the government intends to initiate works which will take care of many of these men. I suggest that the government should assume responsibility for the men coming out of the forestry camps and other transients until such time as they can be placed on these government works, as was done two years ago when men were placed on railway maintenance work. I cannot over-emphasize the seriousness of the situation. We are likely to have riots in Vancouver within the next few days, because the city simply cannot provide for these men. I urge upon the government the necessity of prompt action, and I should like the minister to tell us now what the government proposes to do about it.

Mr. ROGERS: The problem of transients and single homeless men has been dealt with in two ways in the past few years. In the prairie provinces we have provided for them by means of the farm employment plan. That plan has usually gone into operation in October and continued until the first of May, the termination being set by the normal resumption of seeding operations throughout the western provinces. During the past year we have had placements of up to 45,000, in round figures, in the three western provinces. The report suggests, and our experience confirms it, that because of the placing of these single homeless men on farms, for the time being at least there has been a relief of the pressure upon the larger cities and towns in the western provinces. As a matter of fact, an officer of the Department of Labour travelled to western Canada and British Columbia a few weeks ago to review the entire situation.

Mr. GREEN: The fact is that the farm placement scheme has hardly been used in British Columbia.

Mr. ROGERS: I quite agree. It was realized in the beginning that the farm employment plan would have a very limited application in British Columbia and it was therefore supplemented by the forestry plan carried out in cooperation with the provincial government. That plan has continued normally from either October or November up until the first of May. That has been the situation during the winter months of this year. It is true that advices have been received recently that due to the slackening of woods operations in British Columbia there has been an increase in the number of single unemployed and transients in the city of Vancouver, but we are keeping in close touch with developments. It always has been a problem to decide when these forestry camps could be suitably closed. We are watching the situation very carefully in cooperation with the provincial government. There never has been a time to my knowledge when these special plans have been continued through the summer months. They have been designed to afford employment and shelter to this particular group of unemployed during the severe winter months.

Mr. GREEN: It does not help very much to watch the problem; something should be done about it. The minister has admitted that the situation this year with regard to work in the forest industries of British Columbia is not as good as formerly. I suggest to him earnestly and with as much force as I can command that these forestry camps should be kept open until these men can be placed at other work, such as the projects which the government has in mind. The situation is serious and the city has its back right up against the wall. The federal government watches the situation, the provincial government watches the situation, but the city has to deal with these men. This means that home-owners in the city have to pay the shot. It is entirely unfair. I think the situation is far more serious in Vancouver than it is in any other city in Canada, and I would ask the minister if these camps cannot be kept open until something is done about giving the men work.

Mr. MacNEIL: With regard to the five or six thousand young men concentrated in Vancouver, and who are without employment, may we hear from the minister what provision is being made now for these men? Special provision was made by the Vancouver city council for ex-service men included in that group; was that provision supported in any degree by his department?

Mr. ROGERS: As to the special provision that has been made for single unemployed men in British Columbia, the agreement has been extended through the present month, and under the arrangement made the men in the forestry camps receive deferred pay, so that certainly the majority of those leaving the camps would have some of their deferred pay coming to them in the ensuing weeks. I am not able to say just at the present time how many of those men are in a position where they might be dependent upon the city of Vancouver or any other municipality in British Columbia to which they might go. We do not ourselves control the administration of these camps, as my hon. friend is fully aware. We contribute under an agreement with the province toward the care of the single unemployed men during the winter months. It is a matter for consideration whether it is wise to close the camps now or later. That question, as I have said, has been before us in other years, and in dealing with it we shall naturally be guided by the best opinion we can obtain as to the need for continuing these camps beyond the date now set for their termination.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not agree with the minister when he says that the war is responsible for unemployment.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think I said that.

Mr. LANDERYOU: He blamed the war as one of the reasons why people are unemployed.

Mr. ROGERS: One of the unsettling factors.

Mr. LANDERYOU: People are unemployed simply because they cannot secure work, and I want the minister to give us the reasons why they cannot secure work. He cannot tell us that there is not plenty of work to be done. There are many undertakings which this government, the municipalities or private individuals could enter into, and yet we are trying to attribute unemployment to the war. I cannot understand it. It might be due to some extent to the financial obligations that accrued to succeeding generations that have come after the war.

The employment commission has said that relief rates are competing with wages. In Calgary at the present time the unemployed are on a relief strike. They are simply asking for a living scale that will provide them with sufficient food, clothing and shelter to keep them from starving. I should like to know, and I think the committee would also, what the relief scales are in the Dominion of Canada —the highest scale that is paid, and just what is the scale that is paid anywhere in Canada that is competing with wages.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, I must express regret that I have not replied as yet to the question raised by the hon. member last night. I had a memorandum prepared on the point and intended to take it up in the course of the discussion this afternoon.

We do not have a record in the Department of Labour here of the relief scales in the various municipalities. I have already explained that to my hon. friend, and he understands it. As a matter of fact, there is a great diversity of relief scales as between provinces and as between municipalities within a province. Not only that but the relief scales change from one season of the year to the other, the highest being in the winter months because of the additional expenditure required for fuel.

Mr. LANDERYOU: In the larger cities the scales do not alter very much; they are fairly constant.

Mr. ROGERS: At the same time there is some variation of scale. We find that from the accounts submitted to us by the provinces in the different seasons of the year.

I have here the per capita monthly cost of material aid—that is fuel, food, clothing and shelter—for the nine months ending December 31, 1937, which is the latest date to which a complete accounting has been made. What I am now going to give, I want to make clear, is the per capita monthly cost. This does not mean that these are the relief scales operating in the various provinces. It includes food, fuel, clothing and shelter. The figures are: for the dominion, $6.43; Prince Edward Island, $2.24; Nova Scotia, $4.49; New Brunswick, no report because material aid is not administered in that province; Quebec, $6.10; Ontario, $7.77; Manitoba, $6.50; Saskatchewan, $5.45; Alberta, $6.78; British Columbia, $7.67.

I also have here the monthly per capita cost of material aid in the principal cities of Canada. Here again I am not giving the relief scales but the monthly per capita cost: Charlottetown, $3.22; Halifax, $4.28; Sydney, $4.46; Hull, $5.04; Montreal, $7.65; Quebec, $5.34; Hamilton, $8.61; London, $8.75; Ottawa, $9.41; Toronto, $8.45; Greater Windsor, $9.47; Winnipeg, $9.96; Regina, $10.37; Saskatoon, $9.59; Calgary, $10.24; Edmonton, $9.41; Vancouver, $9.03; Victoria, $8.81.

To get a comparative idea of the cost per family it would be necessary that the per capita cost be multiplied by the number in the family, because the per capita cost covers, of course, adult as well as child members of the family. Take, for instance, the Calgary rate of $10.24; if the family consisted of two adults and four children, the monthly allowance would be $61.44 per month. That is averaged for the nine-months period, and is simply based on the records that we have. I would like to make it clear that it is not a definite relief scale, because we do not receive the relief scales.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What is the relief rate that comes into competition with the wage rate? The minister need not mention where it is.

Mr. ROGERS: I think I made it clear before that the agreements were not designed to prevent that abuse in any particular locality but rather in general to prevent competition as between relief rates and normal earnings. The prevailing wage under the fair wage contract provision varies between cities, though not greatly, it is true. But the cases where you would have conflict would be exceptional.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A few minutes ago the minister seemed to derive some comfort from the "very considerable progress" which had been made in lessening unemployment in this country. I do not think that that expression conveys a correct appreciation of the situation. I notice that in the last year, in April, there were being assisted a grand total of 1,215,476 That dropped gradually until August, when the number assisted was 759,009. Then the numbers began to increase steadily.

Mr. ROGERS: They always do, seasonally.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, quite so. But they are up in March to 1,170,480, almost where they were in the corresponding month of a year ago.

Mr. ROGERS: Chiefly due to drought relief.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Partly to drought relief.

Mr. ROGERS: Chiefly due to that.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a tremendous increase there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister can say that, and I am not accusing him of purposely trying to slide from under, but I would say that his whole method of handling the situation makes it extremely difficult for us to know where we stand.

Mr. ROGERS: We separate the figures every month. My hon. friend can of course take the totals, but we always separate them.

Mr. DUNNING: Observe the drought relief figures, and that will show the difference immediately. The drought relief figures account for the increase.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But the point is that there is no material lessening of the problem of unemployment.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; definitely.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I fail to see it. I have been listening to the statements of the minister—

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend will permit me: he will recall that when I spoke to the resolution before the Easter recess I gave a survey of the actual improvement in unemployment figures of relief in four sections of Canada: the maritime provinces, Ontario and Quebec—central Canada, which of course is chiefly influenced by economic factors—western Canada, and British Columbia. In British Columbia, as I recall it, the improvement was thirty per cent in the two year period. In the maritime provinces, the improvement was about eighty per cent. In Ontario and Quebec, central Canada, the improvement was roughly forty per cent in the two year period. The increase in relief figures was in the prairie provinces, and that increase, as I recall it, in Saskatchewan last year was over one hundred per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right. They are all employed.

Mr. ROGERS: Of course you cannot properly speak of those who are receiving drought relief in agricultural areas as being unemployed. I am sure my hon. friend appreciates that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so. That was why I objected a while ago to including all of these classes needing assistance in one bill. I think it would aid greatly in clearing the situation if we had one bill dealing with the question of unemployment and included in that bill the definite recommendations which this government is prepared to make with regard to how the matter should be dealt with. That is what I am pleading for right along.

As far as the present situation is concerned we have had from the minister a most unsatisfactory statement as to what is likely to be done in British Columbia. Some of us had to take quite an active part in the house three or four years ago, when there was a trek of the unemployed and the Regina trekkers, as they were called, were coming east. Does the statement of the minister not mean in effect that this government is going to wait and wait and watch and wait until there are riots in British Columbia, and then when there is rioting we shall turn out the mounted police and people will be killed? Is that what it means?

An hon. MEMBER: That is what he is waiting for.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the minister waiting for that? I know the minister is a humane man; I have known him for a good many years.

Mr. ROGERS: Then why suggest he is waiting for that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hate to say that, but that is the logic of the situation, and it does seem to me that those of us who have been through this kind of thing three or four times already must point out the possibilities to the minister. I urge that he ought to take the matter very seriously and not simply "watch" the situation until some untoward incident happens and then be forced to come to the relief of the citizens.

In my own city things are hardly as bad, but about a week ago, during the Easter recess, I sat in with a special committee of the city council of Winnipeg. They were almost in desperation as to what to do. They were urging a housing scheme. They pointed out that there are 5,700 employable male heads of families on relief. Of that number, 850 are building trades artisans and 1,200 building trades labourers. They urged that the best thing that could be done was to launch some sort of slum clearance and housing scheme. What is the government preparing to do? The farm relief plan to which the minister referred, when dealing with matters in Vancouver city is not going to help either the single unemployed or these artisans in Winnipeg and their families. All the goodwill which the minister may express in this chamber is not going to help. We must have some plan worked out by which these men can be given work. That has to be done, and that, this government is not doing.

I shall make one more reference to a frequently quoted document, and then I shall have done, for the time being anyway—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the hon. gentleman just one question: did the ratepayers of the city of Winnipeg vote last fall in the municipal elections against a housing by-law?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not prepared to discuss that. I do not for the moment recall whether they did. In any case the answer would involve the whole question of the terms of the by-law. I am not going to discuss the provisions of a particular by-law which Winnipeg might or might not be able to finance; what I am emphasizing is the necessity of this government instituting some scheme by which this building labour can be employed.

I was about to refer to a statement made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the night of the general elections, October 14, 1935. One paragraph of his speech, which deals with this particular question before us, is as follows:

> In the new era which dawns to-day, the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery, are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land. They have lain in wait at the gate of every Canadian home during the past five years, and their menacing mien has served to destroy the souls, as well as the minds and bodies, of an ever increasing number of men, women and children in our land. We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that "health and peace and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

Mr. LANDERYOU: He did not blame that on the war, did he?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What do we find in this measure before us? Something which is much along the line of previous years. Remember that this government has now been in power for three years.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, this is the third session. The statement which I read was given in October, 1935, and we are getting well on into the third session. We have had a special commission dealing with the matter. The commission has reported. The government has had ample opportunity, even since this house has been in session, of drafting its plans. Yet what do we find? I am going to read one paragraph from this bill.

> The governor in council may—

Note that. You may say it is a legal phrase, but it is very suggestive.

> The governor in council may out of moneys appropriated by parliament authorize the execution of such undertakings as the governor in council may determine to be in the general interest of Canada and requisite for the purposes of this act, and for such purposes may authorize the performance of such acts and the execution of such agreements and contracts as the governor in council may deem necessary and expedient.

That is all we have in this third year. The government may do something; the government is to have power to do something. This type of legislation introduced some years ago as emergency legislation is coming to be the regular thing, and in spite of protests throughout the session, in spite of persistent protests, which perhaps the government regards as unwarranted, we cannot get anything except "Oh well, wait until the supplementaries are down." I should like to know what is going to happen then. Last year we were told to wait until we received the report of the employment commission, and the wonder is that we have not been told to-day in connection with grants in aid that we shall have to wait until the Rowell commission reports. In the meantime the people are suffering and many of our municipalities are bankrupt. It is absolutely unreasonable that this house should be asked to accept these very general statements that have been made to-day with regard to what the government proposes to do in this matter, which even the minister himself suggests is about the most important before the country at the present time.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman says that nothing has been done outside this emergency legislation. I think he will be fair enough to admit that within the last two years $30,000,000 in connection with home building and home improvement has been spent in Canada, made possible by virtue of legislation apart altogether from this. My hon. friend says that that is nothing, but competent authorities say that eighty-five per cent of that $30,000,000 went into wages, and that must have contributed something towards easing the problem.

Mr. McIVOR: It is a common practice on this side of the chamber to have a crack at the government, but that does not extend all the way across, and I hope that I shall always belong to that group of people who judge justly and give honour to whom honour is due. The statement has been put on Hansard frequently that this government has done nothing. As I see it, the function of the government is to pass legislation in the interest of the citizens. Before I came here this session I was asked most vigorously to encourage the Minister of Labour to keep on doing what he has been doing for the youth of Canada. No one can say that nothing was done last year for them. Much of the cause of unemployment at the head of the lakes, to whatever extent unemployment exists, was the lack of a crop in Saskatchewan and in the drought area in the western provinces. No one can stand up and say that nothing was done for Saskatchewan this spring, that no legislation was passed for that province in connection with fodder and feed and grain. I do not think that any man can be honest and make the statement that nothing has been done for Saskatchewan and Alberta.

What is the cause of unemployment? When we get that question clearly settled we shall be able to get somewhere. The Minister of Labour reminds me of a little fellow who used to do some boxing; when you thought you had him down he would bob up again. I am glad to see the minister coming to the top so frequently, and if I may be pardoned a colloquial expression, I would urge him to step on the gas and continue the good work he is doing for the youth of the country. He will find that they are behind him. I would also urge the government through him, or through some other source, to complete our great highway, and if possible, to do even more than has been done in connection with small houses, because in my opinion there is nothing that will create so much employment as the housing scheme.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I offer a suggestion or two to the minister in connection with this bill, so that when the supplementary estimates are brought down he will have my views before him on a certain phase of the work that has been carried on up to the present time.

Last fall I had the pleasure of joining the minister when he visited my riding and inspected the youth camps that were established in the Sandilands forest reserve. Three camps were established there under an agreement with the province. They entailed an expenditure of $100,000. There was accommodation in each of them for ninety young men. When the minister visited the riding we went to these camps together, and the boys there gave him a reception of which I think he ought to be proud. It was a reception that told him that these boys appreciated what he as Minister of Labour and his efficient staff were trying to do in order to solve a part of the youth problem. There were 270 boys in the three camps. They were paid 21 cents an hour and the work they did was really beyond anything I expected myself in the way of clearing fire hazards. That is something that is greatly beneficial to any forest reserve. The work instilled a sense of discipline in the boys and made them feel that they had some responsibility and were playing a part in the affairs of Canada. Personally I take a very deep interest in these camps, not because I expect any political advantage, but because I think they are a splendid thing. The boys were well disciplined, they had a keen sense of their responsibility, and in talking with the officials in charge of the camps I discovered that nearly seventy-five per cent of the wages they were receiving after their board had been paid was assigned to their dependents either in Winnipeg or wherever they had come from. After paying their board they had $16 or $17 left for the month and nearly seventy-five per cent of that was sent to their dependents.

Mr. ROGERS: And that was done voluntarily.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes, there was no compulsion about it. When the minister brings down his supplementary estimates, after the house has allowed him to pass this bill authorizing him to do so, I hope he will not forget to give these boys full consideration. I hope he will increase the grants in order to continue these camps and so take care of our youth. In my opinion, the plan of forestry camps is one of the best schemes for the youth of Canada undertaken by this government, and I wish to commend the minister. I would ask him not to forget to increase the amount when he brings down his estimates.

Mr. PERLEY: This bill provides that the dominion government may authorize the execution of certain undertakings in the provinces. We should have a more definite statement from the minister with regard to projects that may be undertaken in the provinces. The season is getting late and road work and other development work should start. Surely the provincial governments and the government here at Ottawa have conferred on these matters.

The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) on behalf of the minister invited suggestions. I am therefore going to make a few suggestions regarding projects which if carried out would be of benefit not only to the provinces but to the whole dominion.

I suggest that the government should undertake the establishment or development of several national parks, particularly in Saskatchewan. I shall mention only one or two, although there are many parts of the province where parks could be established. First there is the Moose Mountain district. That district is in the constituency of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), so I know I shall have his support in this anyway. The Moose Mountain district is very picturesque, well treed, with many fresh water lakes teeming with fish, and among visitors from the United States it is fast becoming a popular summer resort. Then in the Qu'Appelle valley near or surrounding the Qu'Appelle lakes is an excellent locality for a national park. The winding Qu'Appelle valley is one of the beauty spots of Saskatchewan, and is already a popular summer resort, United States visitors coming even that far north.

In order to get to these parks, when they are established, roads will be necessary. I suggest the construction of hard-surfaced roads north from the United States boundary through the Moose Mountain district, connecting with No. 9 highway and proceeding north to the Qu'Appelle valley, entering the Qu'Appelle valley at the foot of Crooked lakes, and winding right up to Fort Qu'Appelle. It should be hard-surfaced at least as far north as the Qu'Appelle valley. It would cross No. 1 highway near the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway, and tourist traffic could then turn either east or west; it would at least be in the province. Building and hard-surfacing the roads and development of the parks would provide work for thousands of men now unemployed.

I have here a statement of what the tourist trade meant last year to Quebec—$77,000,000 to that one province; so it is easy to see what it must mean to the whole country. I quote from a speech made in Regina on Monday last by Governor Langer of North Dakota, to representatives of boards of trade and the Saskatchewan motor club. It is recorded that Premier Patterson was there and Hon. Mr. Dunn, the minister of highways. The governor of North Dakota condemned the highways in Saskatchewan as disgraceful. That is something for us to consider, that the governor of a state just to the south should come to Regina and declare that the roads in Saskatchewan are a disgrace. He stated that last year tourist traffic had brought $10,000,000 to the state of North Dakota. He said it was only logical and right to suggest that the province of Saskatchewan endeavour to get this tourist traffic to come further north, but he said that when tourists enter Canada at the southern boundary they go a few miles and then turn back discouraged by road conditions. This is something that we should take into consideration. Such a project would mean much not only to Saskatchewan but to other parts of the dominion as well. I know the Minister of Finance regards the tourist trade as very important, and it would be a great help to Saskatchewan to develop tourist traffic there. The government would do well to consider this suggestion and assist the provincial government by spending money on projects such as this.

Mr. WARREN: As a new member of this house I have had very little to say, but I have listened—sometimes with interest, and sometimes otherwise—to a great many speeches since coming here. We on this side have been keeping rather silent regarding this question of unemployment, but we have heard innumerable speeches on it from the opposite side. Anyone who is fortunate or unfortunate enough to be getting copies of Hansard would form the impression that this dominion is teeming with unemployed men and women and with men, women and children who are not properly clothed or housed or fed.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Isn't that a fact?

Mr. WARREN: If it is I am not aware of it. Certainly it is not in my riding. Where are they? I should like hon. members who are always telling us of these people in dire distress to tell me just where they are.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Read the report of the welfare board in Ottawa and you will find out.

Mr. WARREN: Well, let us take Ottawa. How is it that young men from the counties around Ottawa can come right in from the farms and pick up jobs here in the summer? Why is it that girls from the counties around Ottawa can come in and get jobs any time they want, at good pay? Go into the country in the Ottawa valley and look for young men who cannot get a job. I do not know where they are. Our farm boys can get jobs anywhere in the country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WARREN: Well, take my own riding. I was elected in the spring of last year, and any time I visited Pembroke after my election I would meet numbers of men supposed to be unemployed looking for jobs. But I could go out through the farming districts and never hear a word of unemployment. Our boys go out and find their own jobs, and our girls do the same. I met two girls on the train a couple of weeks ago, and I knew as soon as I saw them that they must have come from Renfrew county; they do not grow girls like that in the cities. They told me they come in here in the fall after working on the farm in the summer and can choose jobs out of seven or eight offered and go to work immediately at $35 a month with board and lodging. I could take you to one restaurant in this city where three sisters from one of the farms out here in Russell county are working at good pay; at least when they come out of the door you see them dolled up in fine fur coats.

If you want me to I can tell you just why you have so many young people asking for relief in the cities. Here is an example. I mentioned the two girls I met on the train, who were working in the city. One of them had to go home for Christmas. Her mistress was a very fine woman to work for, and she went to a family on relief in the city where there was a girl eighteen or twenty years of age, and offered that girl $1.50 a day to come and stay with her during those two weeks. The girl came. She was no good but the woman wanted her to stay anyway. She would not stay; she went back on relief. These young people from the farms get jobs because they are not only willing to work; they are eager to work. They attack their work with eagerness, and because they have that ambition they can come right in and take jobs from under the noses of people living in cities and towns.

An hon. MEMBER: They must be Liberals.

Mr. WARREN: They are good people, anyway. I think it is a godsend to men or women to have been brought up on a farm where they learned how to work without depending on the government to support them. That is one of the curses of the situation we are drifting into; we are sending out propaganda all over the country getting people to think that the federal government should take charge of all their worries, instead of educating our people to use their own initiative to make a living.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Where can they get work?

Mr. WARREN: How do our boys get work? They just drift away and get jobs anywhere they want them. I can tell you that as far as North Renfrew is concerned there was not an employable unemployed man getting relief for the last six months of last year.

Mr. LANDERYOU: That is a small section of Canada.

Mr. WARREN: Perhaps it is, but when will we ever get rid of relief? The suggestion is that the federal government ought to assume the responsibility, and we had the mayors of the cities getting together and insisting that the federal government take over all this burden of relief. When will we ever get rid of it? Take all the responsibility off the municipalities and you will have relief forever. In the township in which I live, and in most of the townships in North Renfrew, we never went on relief; we were afraid to start it because we thought we might never get it stopped. There were times when we could have put a third of the township on relief if we had wished; they were just as deserving as a great many other people on relief, but we did not do it, and we pulled through. If we ran across needy cases we looked after them out of our own township funds, rather than have the reputation of going on relief, and I could tell you of villages that did the same thing. I remember one case in particular, where we fought for a year or two to keep a certain family off relief. Finally the man's house was burned down and he flitted away; but before he flitted away he bought a brand new Ford car to go away with. Recently that man went through our municipality with a trailer behind his car and his wife sitting at the table all dolled up with a nice new permanent, doing fancywork. Just the other day, however, I received the greatest shock of my life when, as reeve of Wilberforce township, I received a bill charging us with $192 for relief for this man, who had drifted into a city or town where he had been able to pull the wool over the eyes of the authorities. He was a young man, able to do any kind of work.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WARREN: That is what we are up against. Hon. members may laugh. They talk as though this government has not done a thing. The other night I was at a farmers' meeting. One of the farmers said to me, "Have you done a single thing since you went to Ottawa?" He kept repeating his question, asking what we had done. I said, "Well, I shipped your hogs when you got $6.20 for a two-hundred pound hog. You give us a two-hundred pound hog to-day and we will give you $20 or $21 for it. You sold your butter fat for 15, 18 or 20 cents a pound. Now you can get 38 cents a pound. Has there been no improvement?"

An hon. MEMBER: Who is responsible?

Mr. WARREN: I am not saying who is responsible, but the improvement is there. Hon. members talk about our youth and ask what we are going to do for them. We hear some of the speakers shout, "Are you going to let them starve?" as though nothing had been done for them. What was done under the youth training scheme? Some six hundred girls were given training, and every one of those girls walked into a job. We had seven girls come to Ottawa from Pembroke to take that course; they all found work. We had some fifty boys take the engineering course at Haileybury, and every one stepped into a job. There you have it, yet you say we are doing nothing, that we are letting people starve.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) talked about the terrible condition of the west; he suggested that we should create $500,000,000 of new money and lend it out. What ruined the west but too much credit? It not only ruined the west; it ruined a good deal of the east as well. They got our money—

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to be unfair. I did not mention the west at all, as he will see if he reads my speech.

Mr. WARREN: I listened to the hon. member when he was referring to the west. He spoke of farmers who once were able to write cheques for three thousand, five thousand or ten thousand dollars but who could not borrow any money at all now; and he was suggesting that the farmers of the west were suffering from lack of credit. I say that what the farmers of the west suffered from most was too much credit, and I think if the hon. member wanted to be honest he would agree that it was too much credit that ruined the farmers of western Canada. I remember that in his speech he mentioned some farmer who had five thousand lambs on which he was going to lose money. If the farmer raised those five thousand lambs how could he have a loss on them? On the other hand if that farmer bought the five thousand lambs he was a speculator; if the price went down and he lost money he was a gambler, and he was taking his chance. So I do not see any point in that argument.

There is one angle of this question that I do not think has been touched upon at all. What about the taxpayer? We have spoken of almost everything else. Nearly every speaker advocates the expenditure of money, but I want to put in a word for the taxpayer. We have to give that man consideration. If you can reduce his taxes by even a small amount you will be doing something real for him. One of the greatest burdens on this country to-day is the burden of taxation. When you talk about loading this burden of relief on the federal government you are simply suggesting that the municipalities that kept off relief should turn in now and pay the bills of the municipalities that got themselves in a mess with relief. Personally I am inclined to think that the people who were foolish enough to land themselves in a mess of that nature should themselves find a way of getting out from under. The farmers have to pay their share of this eight per cent sales tax and most other federal taxes; that is where the money comes from. That federal tax hits everybody, the hired man, the hired girl and everybody else. No one escapes it. Some of us may escape a provincial or municipal tax, but we cannot escape the federal tax. We ought to keep in mind when we advocate the expenditure of money that we are hitting the pocket of every wage-earner and taxpayer in this dominion. I am in favour of the minister continuing with the program started last year. Naturally it is an experiment, but to my way of thinking it has proven successful. I believe that these plans, carried on in conjunction with the provinces or by the dominion government alone, have proven successful.

Perhaps I may be accused of hitting the taxpayer myself when I ask the minister to consider the improvement of the trans-Canada highway between North Bay and Pembroke. This section of the trans-Canada highway is as important as any other in Canada. It leads to the home of the famous quintuplets and it makes possible a saving of five hundred miles to people travelling from the eastern to the western states, or vice versa. This section is now a gravel road, but it should have a surface of some kind. I am not prepared to suggest that it should be made a cement highway, but something should be done to provide a more suitable surface. Perhaps a tar penetration surface could be put on which would be serviceable for five, ten or fifteen years. We would thus get away from the present high maintenance costs and the dust which is so troublesome. I believe this work would be in the interests of the dominion, particularly as a great portion of our tourist traffic passes over this route.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, if I ever become wealthy I am going to put up prizes for the most patient men in the country, and when I do, I am sure they will be won by the prime ministers and the members of any cabinet. During this session and for the last twelve years I have seen prime ministers and members of the cabinet put on the grill for weeks at a time when they have been endeavouring to explain certain situations. After answering the same question a thousand times, I have seen them get up very patiently and with a smile on their countenances answer it again. I was surprised this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) accuse the Minister of Labour of not giving the required informations to the committee and of not having brought down his program more quickly. This is surprising when we consider that during the present session a certain group in this house used up nearly three weeks of our time on a new monetary philosophy. I do not say that in any disparaging way, but I think the record should be kept straight.

I want to compliment the Minister of Labour upon the wonderful work he has done in the three sessions he has been at the head of the Department of Labour. I feel perfectly free to do this. I was a neighbour of the former Minister of Labour, the Hon. Mr. Gordon, and I always took advantage of every opportunity to compliment him also upon the work he accomplished during the abnormal times through which we were passing. I never doubted for one minute the sincerity of the former prime minister when during the election of 1930 he thought he could cure unemployment. At that time we thought this problem was not deeply rooted and was possible of solution.

Before I proceed any further I want to say to the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) that he was extremely unfair this afternoon when he asked the Minister of Labour what had been done for the west. There is no sectionalism as far as the problems of the west are concerned. I remember last fall when the people in my section of the country were asked to give clothing, vegetables and fruits to the people of the west. No matter in what position of life they were, every one dug down gladly to give all they possibly could to this fine section of the population of Canada. What has been done for the west during the present session? Something like $35,000,000 or $40,000,000 has been voted. Is that nothing? When that vote was asked, there was not a single word of criticism. Not a single member rose in his place and criticized this item. Why? Because we realized the dire necessity of the people in the west and the need for that money. I know the members of this house are ready to rise as one person and vote everything necessary for the maintenance of that fine section of our country, if circumstances warrant our so doing again. It is true that no matter what this parliament may vote, this problem cannot be solved, to some extent, I grant, until the west has good crops selling at reasonable prices. At the present time the people of the west in the drought areas are existing with the barest essentials of life. Their household furniture, their farm implements and their homes all need to be rehabilitated. Again I repeat it is unfair for any member of this parliament at this time to state to the Minister of Labour and to the government that nothing has been done so far as the west is concerned.

Any one who takes the trouble to study world history will realize that unemployment has existed since the dawn of civilization. In the early days thousands of young men were kept under arms simply because they could not be fruitfully employed. We must not overlook what is happening in Europe at the present time. We must not overlook the reason why hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of men are being kept in military service. I ask hon. members to consider the reply made three years ago by Hitler to the Prime Minister of France. France was concerned about the number of men that Germany had under arms, and Hitler replied that this was done in order to keep them off the unemployment relief rolls. That may not be the principal reason why these men are under arms, but I think it is one of the reasons.

This is the situation we had in Canada prior to 1930. We always have had seasonal employment in this country. In my section and in practically all other sections we have had tens of thousands of young men employed during the winter months in lumbering operations. These men will be unemployed for one, two or three months until the driving of logs and mill operations commence in the spring. However, during this period considerable agricultural work is carried on, and a number of men are able to obtain employment in the navigation operations on our great lakes. This problem is not a new one as far as we are concerned, and we get these changes every. season.

It is all very well for people to impute sinister motives in connection with those who are wealthy people; we call them big shots and so on; speak of their greed, their intolerance, etc.; but the great majority of these people are true Canadians and their hearts are with the working men and labourers. The same thing can be said of most of our people; their hearts are in the proper place, and they will do everything in their power to alleviate suffering. At the same time there have been cases where the labourers and farmers have sinned also, with all the other classes. It is all very well for a member to mention individual cases of having met men in dire circumstances. I could mention thousands of such cases in my own constituency, even in the rural sections where they have been receiving relief for several years. I have also received several letters from farmers saying that their lot is improving. They have been selling their milk at reasonable prices and last year they made some money on their pulpwood and cattle, but you cannot build up a case for the nation on individual cases.

I might cite a sad case that came under my own experience last year, and that will illustrate what I have said. Last year during the Easter recess, on Good Friday, a young farmer with a family of seven came and told me that he had received $32 on April 1, 1937, and he said his relief was all gone and he wanted some more. I telephoned the relief officer in Cochrane and told him that this man had to receive more relief because his family was near starvation. That, as I say, was on Good Friday. Sad to relate, on Saturday night this man asked me to bail him out as he had spent all the money on booze instead of on his family, and he had been arrested for drunkenness.

All classes of our people have sinned, and therefore it is the duty of every one of us, no matter to what party he belongs, or on which side of the house he sits, or what is his place in society, to put his whole strength behind the minister and the government in helping to bring about better conditions. We are just as humane and charitable as any other men, and how unfair it is for the member of Winnipeg North Centre to rise in his place this afternoon and accuse the Minister of Labour very bitterly, saying he had done nothing for the unemployed; that he was not trying to find the solution for unemployment. I say this in all sincerity because from 1930 to 1935 I sat in opposition on the other side of the house, and I did not criticize bitterly the government of the day and their employment policies because I knew it was a very deep problem. I believe the first duty of every member of parliament is to second the efforts of the Minister of Labour, and I hope that from now on it will be possible to discuss in this house this great problem with the sole desire to help in solving it by suggestions and constructive criticism. It is a problem that is facing not only Canada but the whole civilized world. Look to the country to the south of us, where billions and billions of dollars have been spent for the relief of unemployment, and the sad truth is that at present unemployment in that country is more rampant than it was two years ago. Europe has just the same problem, and all of Europe found that the only way to help in solving it was to put the young men from eighteen to twenty-one years of age in the army. Surely we do not want to do that in Canada. We want to help our youth; but we do not want to develop in them the militaristic spirit; we want them to grow up to be good Canadians, and therefore I say it behooves every member of this house, no matter on which side he sits, to be constructive in his approach to that all important problem. How easy it would be for any one of us to go outside this house, hold a public meeting on Sparks street, for example, agitate the people by telling them not to be satisfied with the present government, and urge them to destroy the present order of things! But would that be good Canadianism? Would it be patriotic? No. My duty when I see misery is in my own humble way and to the best of my ability to help relieve it, and if we all put our shoulders to the wheel I have no doubt that by an intelligent, united effort we shall get out of our present situation.

Mr. LANDERYOU: You have the majority.

Mr. BRADETTE: A few moments ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre read the message that was delivered to the Canadian people by the Prime Minister during the last election, and I heard a member of the social credit group say that it was a dream. But it was not a dream. It was given in all sincerity, just as I believe the leader of the government who was elected in 1930 spoke in all sincerity; just as I believe the premier of Alberta spoke in all sincerity to the people of that province in 1935 when he was elected premier. He told the people of Alberta that he was going to solve all their problems; that he was going to pay social credit dividends of $25 a month and more, and I believe that he was sincere. The electors of Alberta gave him a huge majority, and at that time he told the people of the province not to worry about the rest of Canada, or Scotland; that Mr. Douglas had said that social credit might not be put into practice within the boundaries of the province, but that he, that is, Mr. Aberhart, could do this. But after over two years in office, with all his sincerity, which I do not doubt at all, has he been able to put social credit principles into practice in that province? Is there not unemployment in Alberta? There have been bad crops there, which have no doubt contributed to a great extent to unemployment in that province, but I say that with all his sincerity, and with all his big, solid majority behind him, the premier of Alberta has not been able to implement the promises he made during the election of 1935.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The Liberals disallowed all our legislation. There was no doubt of the application of social credit in 1935.

Mr. BRADETTE: There is no question that the social credit party had a large majority behind it in Alberta, and I do not say that in any critical spirit. I mention it merely because one of the members of the social credit group this afternoon said, alluding to the message delivered by the Prime Minister immediately after the election of 1935, that it was a dream. Was it a dream, then, what the premier of Alberta told the people of that province in the fall of the same year, 1935? No; I do not want to believe it. I want to believe implicitly in his sincerity; but he was not able to fulfil all his promises; he did not fulfil even one. The moment one assumes the responsibility of office, one finds that it is not so easy to do in practice what one advocated in theory.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does that not prove that sincerity is not enough; that sincerity alone will not solve any problem? Sincerity will not abolish poverty.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is obvious that sincerity is necessary because the basic principle of any society is charity, and sincerity is an essential part of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): You must have sincerity plus direction.

Mr. BRADETTE: Oh, yes. I have something to say about the sincerity of the party of my hon. friend, and I shall take a few minutes to speak of it now. I wish his party could have the responsibility of office for one or two years because it would sober them up. We on this side of the house are just the same as hon. gentlemen opposite; our hearts are bleeding for the suffering people of this country.

Mr. LANDERYOU: You have the authority; what more do you want?

Mr. BRADETTE: Your only solution is to change the monetary system, but the monetary system is only one of the factors which we have to consider before we can have improved conditions. It is very easy to criticize when one is in opposition. I was in opposition for five successive years. While some members may have gone too far in their theories, once your party gets into power you have to consider all the factors involved plus the governmental responsibilities, and I believe that all governments in this dominion, no matter what their political stripe, have at heart the welfare of the people, the human and the social factors. I say again that it is extremely unfair to build up on individual cases a case that will apply to the whole nation.

I want to compliment the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) upon his logical speech this afternoon. Democracy is before the bar of judgment in Canada, and I want to give this warning, that if the parties in this house address themselves simply to overdoing each other at election time in rash statements and in promises that would never be fulfilled, it will be the surest sign of the doom of our democracy. In the last election, in northern Ontario, I went over every section of my constituency and told the people that I was opposed to direct relief. I told them that the sooner we got rid of it, the better it would be for our country, that we had to find employment for our people, and that direct relief was deteriorating, if not destroying, the moral fibre of the nation. It was a sad spectacle to see people of another political faith getting up on the same platform as we were on, and saying that if they were elected they would not do like the Liberals are trying to do at the present time; they would enlarge direct relief; they would give more. I say that sort of thing is the surest way to destroy democracy in Canada. We cannot afford to be demagogues, dreamers, utopians and radicals; we must be good, practical Canadians.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We cannot afford to sleep, either.

Mr. BRADETTE: To sleep? Does the hon. member imply by that that I have been sleeping more than he has? Does he imply that this government has been asleep more than his group?

Mr. JAQUES: It has been put to sleep.

Mr. BRADETTE: Some days that hon. members of a certain group have been speaking we may have been almost put to sleep for a good many hours. I want this situation to be dealt with fairly. I want to be a practical man. I ask hon. members, If they were occupying the position of the present Minister of Labour, what would they do? Can they doubt his sincerity, his industry, his knowledge of the social order and his desire to remedy social problems? If not, they should be willing to cooperate with him. It is not a political appeal that I am making at the present time. I appeal to hon. members to face and to try to find a solution for the greatest difficulty we have to meet.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The hon. member has told us that the hearts of his friends are bleeding for the sufferings of the unemployed. I mentioned that poverty was the cause of their trouble. Will he tell us what unemployed and suffering people are suffering from except a lack of money?

An hon. MEMBER: Dividends.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. BRADETTE: None of the experts who support the system which the hon. member recommends, has been able to explain it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I ask, What are these poor people suffering from except lack of money?

Mr. BRADETTE: I am not here to say that the present monetary system is perfect. Perhaps it will have to be radically amended. But I repeat that the monetary problem is not the only question we are facing at the present time.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Then what are the other problems?

Mr. BRADETTE: Surely the hon. member must know more about human needs than to ask that question. What would he do, for instance, in the case of a returned man I know? Money will not cure all the ills of the present time. I have a good many returned men in my section. One I have in mind has two wooden legs; he suffers every minute of his life, day and night. Does the hon. member contend that if he had social credit money in his pocket, that would be sufficient to cure him?

An hon. MEMBER: No; but it would give him security.

Mr. BRADETTE: I have heard it said that there are people dying of starvation in this country. It may be the case that a man has starved to death in some remote district, but I have never heard of anyone dying of starvation so far as my section is concerned. And we are not going to cure all our ills by the issue of money by means of the printing press, which is simply uncontrolled inflation.

Mr. LANDERYOU: If the cause of our difficulties is not lack of money, will the hon. member tell us the reason?

Mr. BRADETTE: Has the hon. member not studied the bills of the Minister of Labour at previous sessions? Is he not satisfied that the minister has been trying to go to the root of the present problem? Is that not the object of the bill we are considering at the present moment? What would be the hon. member's solution? He has been trying to explain it to us for the last three years and we are still right up in the air. The hon. member and his group are still barking at the moon. They are the finest political Santa Clauses that any political party has ever known.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Why did the hon. member's party not carry out its own plans?

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member had his own innings. His party occupied nearly three weeks of the time of the house at the opening of the session. They have made promises to the public which I should be glad if they were able to implement, and I do not doubt their sincerity. But when they arise in their places time after time and tell this government that the only way to cure unemployment is to have social credit, and the only way to implement social credit is to get the printing press to work and flood the country with new Canadian dollar bills—

An hon. MEMBER: That is unfair.

Mr. BRADETTE: —that is no solution of our ills. That would cause an inflation worse than the ills from which the country is now suffering. Hon. members should remember the prices they had to pay for commodities during the last inflation which happened toward the end of the great war.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What solution—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down yourself.

Mr. BRADETTE: We often hear in this house—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am afraid that this debate is getting beyond this bill. I would ask all hon. members to confine their remarks to the bill before the committee.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like to know what the hon. member's solution is. No matter what social credit is offering, what solution has the hon. member to suggest?

Mr. McINTOSH: Will the hon. member explain what his solution is?

Mr. LANDERYOU: We are not in power.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. gentleman is a member of this parliament; as such he has the same responsibility as any other member of the house. He cannot get away from that responsibility. I suggest that one solution is to find a system whereby it would be possible to keep our rural youth on the farms. Until such time as any government—I refer not only to this one, but to any government in the world—can find some means of stopping the trek from the rural sections in to the urban communities, neither this country nor any other will enjoy real prosperity. We need only to read the history of the Roman empire—

Mr. POOLE: What has that to do with us to-day?

Mr. BRADETTE: If the hon. member's intelligence is not deep enough to understand that, it is not my fault. I am mentioning that era as an illustration. I was saying that we have an example in the fate of the great Roman empire when the population had been coming more and more rapidly into Rome, when the people were hollering for bread and for pleasure.

Mr. POULIOT: Ask Baker of Toronto for the bread!

Mr. BRADETTE. We have much the same conditions to-day.

Mr. POOLE: That was an age of scarcity.

Mr. BRADETTE: The more you have that sort of thing namely, direct relief, the more you are accentuating the trend of the population from rural to urban areas. After being residents of an urban centre for a number of years, or even months, in many instances those coming from the farm become pensioners of the state; whereas the farmers, generally speaking, try to maintain themselves and make a living from their own efforts without asking relief from any government.

Mr. POOLE: How is the hon. member justified in comparing the circumstances of the twentieth century with conditions in ancient Rome?

Mr. GARDINER: The policies of the hon. member's group are just the same.

Mr. POOLE: That was an age of scarcity. This is an age of abundance. To-day we are suffering from overproduction. In Rome they were suffering from scarcity. How can the hon. member dr. w a comparison between the two? It is absurd.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member is entitled to his own theories, but I say that this is no age of plenty. What would happen in the hon. member's own province if he had nothing but his coal and his wheat to live upon? How far would he go with that? Practically all that is produced in Alberta is wheat and oil and coal. Supposing you have to make a living with those resources, nationally and individually, what sort of existence would be possible? Obviously you must have intercourse with the rest of the world. You cannot get away from that fact. The "age of plenty" is only relative. The man who will say that we have solved the world's problems of production can say so only because he does not wish to take the trouble to study the situation. He does not want to study the world situation. It is true that to a great extent we have shown that we can produce the things we want, and I am willing to admit that there is probably no clear demarcation between the things we regard as necessities and the comforts and luxuries of life; but no one will make me believe that these things can be had unless one is willing to work. In this world you cannot get something for nothing. That is the law of nature. It may be broken; it may be evaded, but the man who is not willing to work for a living is not entitled to a living, while opportunities must be given to those who want to work.

Mr. KUHL: What is the man doing for a living who receives dividends?

Mr. BRADETTE: In this country one has to fight every inch of the way. I come from a pioneer section and I know whereof I speak. It was settled by splendid people, a number of whom came from the other side. In my section we have to fight every inch of the way, whether our occupation is agricultural, or commercial, or mining, or industrial. Is it any easier in Alberta? As to making it easy in all sections of the country, if hon. members visualize the situation as realists, not as men who have lost all sense of proportion, they will realize that there is no plenty in this world unless one fights and struggles for it, and that production can be brought forward only by human labour and intelligence.

That is all I wish to say at the moment. I should like to say a few words when the estimates on the back to the land movement are presented. I do not believe in simple formulae for solving the problems of the world at the present time. There is no use in talking about ending unemployment and having prosperity in our midst in Canada, or in any other section of the civilized world, unless we find it possible to render comfortable, if not prosperous, the rural population who in this land and in all others are, after all, the primary producers. In this, in my viewpoint, lies, to a large extent, the solution of unemployment.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I wish to refer briefly to a remark made last night by the leader of the social credit group and referred to in Hansard at page 2571. Referring to a letter he had received he made the following statement:

> Conditions in many places in this country are positively terrible. . . . This letter came to me personally, with no idea that it would ever be read in parliament.

I wish the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) had carried out the desire of the person who sent that letter to him. He refused to divulge the name of the correspondent, and further on, as reported on the same page, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) made this remark:

In view of the statement that 500 go to the soup kitchens in the town of Yarmouth, I think we should know who wrote the letter, and from what section of Nova Scotia it comes.

The letter was expunged from the record by the ruling of the Speaker, as reported in Hansard at page 2572. I quote from page 2572, and this is the passage I wish to deal with. After the letter had been expunged from the record the hon. gentleman is reported as saying:

> Mr. Blackmore: Very good. I would much rather have that happen, now that hon. members have heard it, because, after all, I am more concerned with having hon. members in the house know about existing conditions than I am that the letter appear in Hansard. I am not going to expose a man who writes a letter like that to me.

I do not blame him for not divulging the name. Unfortunately the morning papers carry the item in more or less detail, and the public as a whole gets the item although the letter is expunged.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What bearing has this on the bill?

Mr. POTTIER: I am discussing a remark made by the hon. member for Lethbridge in the course of the debate last evening. The effect of the newspaper item and the reference I have just given as quoted from Hansard is that there are 500 people in Yarmouth being fed at a soup kitchen, or 500 people in Yarmouth who stroll along to get a bowl of soup. I want to tell the committee that that is not a fact. There is not in Yarmouth, which is a part of my constituency, any soup kitchen to which 500 people stroll along to get a bowl of soup. When the leader of the social credit group says, "I am more concerned with having members in the house know about existing conditions," I am sorry for his group if they base all their representations on information of this kind. I contend that any member of this house who makes statements should at least be sufficiently informed to know whether they are true or not. It is all very well to read a letter and to profess to be only the means of representing facts in this house; he should strive to be accurate. I resent false representations being made about the people I represent. We are having difficulties enough without being slandered in this way to bolster up the aspirations of what we might call superpoliticians trying to picture conditions that do not exist. That will do no good to any group or member or constituency, nor will it do any good to Canada as a whole. I know of no soup kitchen in Yarmouth where—and this is the part that stings—500 people stroll along for a bowl of soup.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is there a soup kitchen in Yarmouth?

Mr. POTTIER: There is no public soup kitchen in Yarmouth. I telephoned the town clerk to-day and he confirms my understanding of the situation. We have individuals and associations that are trying to help the poor in various ways—there are such organizations everywhere—but we have no public soup kitchen. The people I represent are doing the best they can; they have a certain amount of pride, and I resent their being misrepresented in this way.

Progress reported.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I beg to lay on the table of the house the report of the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief. The statute provides that this report shall be laid on the table thirty days after the expiration of the act and it should therefore be tabled at this time. I did not have it when we were on motions earlier in the afternoon.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT PRESENTED APRIL 8, 1937

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) for concurrence in the second report of the special committee appointed to investigate farm implement prices, presented to the house on the 8th of April, 1937.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): In rising to continue this debate I wonder whether the remarks I shall have to make will meet with as much enthusiasm as the remarks we have listened to during the debate on the unemployment relief resolution. What I have to say may not be interesting to every hon. member, but to me the question of cheaper agricultural implements is of very great importance. In commencing I want to review briefly the question of the tariff on agricultural implements.

Going back to 1930, when the Liberal administration left office, we enjoyed at that time a very low tariff on agricultural implements, perhaps the lowest on record, only six per cent on binders and mowers. When the Conservative government came into office in 1930, the tariff was raised to the highest rate on record, namely, a flat rate of twenty-five per cent, including cream separators, which previously had been free. When the Conservatives left office in 1935 and were succeeded by the present administration, true to Liberal policy the tariff was reduced and cut to seven and a half per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the prices of the implements?

Mr. LEADER: I would ask the right hon. leader of the opposition to let me continue. Perhaps, before I conclude my remarks, I shall have something to say as to prices of implements.

The present tariff of seven and a half per cent is the lowest on record, if excise taxes and some other imposts put on through the regulations of the revenue department are not taken into account. But in the face of this reduction in the tariff we find the implement companies increasing their prices in 1936, and again in 1938. To me this looks like a challenge to the parliament of Canada. What are we going to do about it?

Briefly I wish to review the progress of this matter in the house. On March 2, 1936, an order of the house was passed for an immediate inquiry. At the end of that session the committee reported and suggested that the inquiry be continued by a smaller committee at the next session. On February 1, 1937, the government moved the appointment of a special committee. That committee carried on an investigation throughout the session of 1937; and the report was submitted on April 8 of that year, but at the suggestion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) it was not concurred in but left over until the present session. On March 11 of this year the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) moved concurrence, after six weeks of the session had passed. The debate was adjourned on March 11 by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) and continued on March 15 and adjourned by myself on the same day. Thus it will be seen that it is well over two years since parliament started action. To me this has been a horrible example of how not to treat a question of such vital importance to the agricultural industry of this country.

Now I am back to the position which I occupied at eleven p.m. on March 15. Before the house adjourned on that date, I had pointed out the disparity between the farmer's dollar received for his products and what he had to pay for farm implements. I took, for example, the prices of beef cattle at the Winnipeg stock yards, for 1913, 1920, 1926, 1932 and 1936, and I took for the purpose of comparison two implements, a walking plough and a binder. As I stated at that time, the committee took the year 1913 as a normal year when the farmer's dollar bore a reasonable relation to the prices he had to pay for his products. I was able to show that in 1913 we could exchange 300 pounds of beef cattle for a walking plough, whereas in 1932 it required 700 pounds to make the same exchange. In 1913 we could purchase a binder for 2,600 pounds; but in 1932 it would cost us 6,100 pounds, approximately two and a half times as much. Continuing the thread of my argument, I have a companion table giving a comparison of the farmer's dollar in terms of wheat instead of cattle. It shows the same list of implements as used on that occasion. The walking plough, for example, which in 1913 we could buy for the price of twenty-five bushels of wheat, in 1932 would cost fifty-six bushels. A binder which in 1913 was equivalent to 193 bushels of wheat, in 1932 required 500 bushels. The following table gives other examples:

Bushels of No. 1 Northern Wheat
Basis 1 Northern Fort William Required to Buy

	Walking plough	Double disc drill	Hay rake	Binder	Mower	Disc harrow	Gang plough	Wagon	Bushels of wheat
1913..	25	163	40	193	68	52	101	120	762
1920..	14	99	24	110	38	31	65	73	454
1926..	21	168	41	192	68	52	106	119	767
1932..	56	448	108	500	177	133	266	320	2,008
1936..	32	269	64	304	108	80	148	182	1,187

These tables are a true indication of what is wrong with agriculture, showing the fluctuation in the prices of the farmer's products sold on the world market compared with the stabilized prices he has to pay for his implements of production sold in a protected market. This condition must be rectified before agriculture can be put upon a substantial basis.

Leaving farm implements for the moment, let me turn to cream separators. This question was discussed on former occasions. I remember a speech made by my Liberal friend the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). He defended the twenty-five per cent tariff on cream separators. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) replied, and his speech was, in my opinion, a fine exposition of the necessity for the removal of this duty. To me it seemed unanswerable; but another Liberal friend, the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) was undaunted, and he defended the twenty-five per cent tariff on cream separators. It is true that these two hon. members were invited to cross the floor of the house and join the Conservative party. I wonder myself whether they are not in the wrong pew.

When the motion for concurrence was introduced, the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) both protested and suggested that the report be returned to the committee for more evidence, saying that insufficient evidence had been taken in regard to cream separators. But if one looks at the report one finds at least four pages of evidence in regard to cream separators. Four manufacturing companies as well as a mail order house were examined: International Harvester Company, Massey-Harris, De Laval and McLeod's Limited of Winnipeg, besides the Cockshutt Plow Company whose evidence, being confidential, was not used. So I maintain we certainly had sufficient evidence to warrant the committee in bringing in the recommendation that cream separators should be placed on the free list. The mail order house in reply to a letter stated that they had been able to place on the market a separator called the Melotte with a capacity of 600 pounds, for $59.25 at Winnipeg. That is the Melotte, which is a good machine, as anyone will agree who knows anything about separators. The Economy King, with a capacity of 600 pounds, was placed on the market at $54 at Winnipeg. At the same time the International Harvester Company were selling their 600 separator at $107.58, and the committee ascertained that the cost of that separator at the factory was $41.70. This would be about the same as the cost of the Melotte and the Economy King, because the McLeod people were satisfied with a twenty-five per cent mark-up over the cost price. We found that the Massey-Harris company were charging $97.92 for their separator. We could not ascertain the cost of that implement because the company could not produce figures that would give us an idea of what the cost would be. The De Laval people were charging $108.77 for their separator comparable with the McLeod separator at $59.25.

[Mr. Leader.]

We found also that the De Laval people could buy their smaller separators, under 500 pounds, in Sweden and import them, paying the duty, at a price which enabled the company to offer the separators for sale for less than the price at which they could be manufactured in Canada. Surely this is evidence that it is uneconomical to manufacture these machines in this country. These separators cost $13.05 in Sweden, and they were sold in Canada for $44.50 including the duty of twenty-five per cent. When the higher protection was put on cream separators, the McLeod people admitted that they could not do business, and they withdrew from the field. After the competition was elminated we find that last year the International Harvester company raised the price of their cream separator another $11. To-day their separator is selling in Winnipeg at $118.50, which is an outrageous price for the implement that must be turned by the farmer's wife, or his fourteen or fifteen year old girl after she comes home from school, or his boy, in order to grind out perhaps three or four dollars a week in order to keep the family in food and clothing. I claim that this duty on cream separators is protection gone mad, and I think it is a terrible reflection upon the mentality of those who imposed the duty.

Now I want to return to farm implements. In the first part of my speech I stated that both farmers and machine companies had suffered grievously during the years of depression, but the machine companies did not suffer to the same extent as did the farmers. I have before me the financial statements from the evidence given before the special committee. I find that the capital invested in the International Harvester company in Canada is $39,000,000, and that the profits during the ten year period under review amounted to $24,500,000. They earned approximately six and a half per cent over all, after providing for a pension fund, bonuses to employees and taxes of all kinds. I asked the president of the company, Mr. Morrison, if he did not think that was a pretty high earning rate, and what he thought would be about a proper earning rate for money. His reply was eight per cent over all; in other words, they wanted eight per cent even after the taxes were paid. So I say that in regard to this company the increase in the price of their farm implements in 1936 certainly was not justified.

Now we come to John Deere and Company. Their capital invested in Canada amounted to $16,000,000. They showed a loss of $1,000,000 in Canada, but if the profits retained in the United States on account of customs regulations had been included the profit would have been $8,000,000 over the ten year period, showing a five per cent return on the investment. Then I come to Frost and Wood and the Cockshutt Plow Company. The invested capital could not be ascertained, but the total sales in Canada amounted to $45,600,000 and their export sales to $7,772,000. These two companies showed a net profit of $20,760, so they also operated without loss during this ten year period which included the most trying years Canada has ever experienced.

There is a different story in regard to the Massey-Harris company. This is a great Canadian concern of which every true Canadian is proud. They have factories not only in Canada but also in England, South Africa, France, Belgium, Denmark and Germany, as well as two factories in the United States. Between 1926 and 1935 the losses of this company amounted to $15,000,000. But, Mr. Speaker, prior to that they had huge profits. I think it only fair to the people of Canada that they should know something about the profits made by this company in earlier years. This is taken from the evidence given before the special committee. The company had its inception in 1891, with the merging of the Massey and Harris interests. The paid-up capital of the company at its inception was approximately $3,500,000, of which $300,000 was paid in cash and the remainder given in exchange for the assets of the constituent firms. From 1891 to 1912 this original capitalization of $3,500,000 plus $1,000,000 additional cash capital received in 1911 enabled the company to return the following value to its stockholders:

1. Cash dividends amounting to. . .	$11,212,349
2. Stock dividends.	8,500,000
Total dividends.	$19,712,349
3. The creation of a rest account of.	$ 6,500,000
4. The setting up of a special contingent account in the amount of.	1,680,000
5. The retention in surplus account, unallocated, of.	1,061,000
Total.	$28,953,349

Thus it will be seen that for the twenty-one years ending in 1912 there was a return of nearly $29,000,000, of which $11,212,349 was actually paid in cash. So the four companies examined showed a net profit over the ten year period, including drought years, with the exception of the Massey-Harris company, whose losses were due to the expansion of business in foreign lands, and to the costly distribution of their implements in Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 26, consideration in committee of Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company—Mr. Damude—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 8—Power to construct bridge.

Mr. DUFFUS: What I wish to say will take only about three or four minutes of the time of the committee. I desire to refer to some of the remarks that were made by the right hon. leader of the opposition on Tuesday evening last. He was referring to what I had said on the evening of Friday, April 8, and this is what he said, as reported on page 2277 of Hansard:

Right here may I point out that the other evening the hon. member for Peterborough West in this very chamber asked the members of the committee to believe that the United States authorities had given their approval to the construction of this bridge.

Further down on the same page he said:

That statement was calculated to do just one thing and nothing else—to leave the impression with the house that the United States had agreed.

I desire most respectfully and emphatically to suggest that I had no such thought in mind. As a member of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, I was well aware of the fact that the bill had not been passed by the United States government, as that point had been discussed in the committee. When I was elected by the people whom I have the honour to represent in this house, I accepted my duties with a keen sense of duty, obligation and responsibility, and I should like the members of this committee and house to understand that at no time do I impute or intend to impute motives that are not consistent with the facts.

Here is what I said on the evening of April 8:

I have in my hand a copy of Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company, and also a draft copy of the United States act dealing with the same matter.

I draw the committee's attention to the fact that I have here both documents, Bill No. 15 as presented to this house, and also a draft copy of the United States government act, designated an act by the United States government. In other words, this Bill No. 15 is designated a bill, while the document drawn up by the United States government is designated an act. May I read section one of that act?

This act may be cited as the Niagara Falls Bridge Authority Act.

That was my reason, Mr. Chairman, for referring to that document as an act.

I again desire to draw the committee's attention to the great loss that the people of the city of Niagara Falls and of the province of Ontario will sustain on account of insufficient traffic accommodation at this point between the United States and Canada. Tourist trade is very important and profitable to the people of Ontario. Business men, storekeepers, hotels, restaurants, summer resorts, working people, farmers, truck gardeners and fruit growers will, until a new bridge is constructed, be deprived of a substantial revenue which they hitherto enjoyed from that trade.

When this bill is passed it will then be the responsibility of the government of Ontario to complete the necessary arrangements, and it is my opinion that they can be depended upon to see to it that the proper type of structure is erected, one that not only is adequate for vehicular and other traffic but will also provide ample accommodation for customs and immigration business. Whatever else may be said of the present Ontario government, these two things can be said: In the first place, they cannot be accused of being extravagant; in other words, they have given an economical administration. Second, they have given honest administration.

Mr. MacNICOL: In both cases the hon. member is wrong.

Mr. DUFFUS: The point I desire to make most emphatically, in conclusion, is that I had no intention whatever of implying that the government of the United States had passed the act or the draft bill referred to.

Mr. LOCKHART: If I may ask the hon. member a question, does he imply that because the bridge has fallen there will be a loss of tourist traffic to this country, that the tourists will not come in at other points?

Mr. DUFFUS: I say that it will be a loss to the people of the city of Niagara Falls and also to the people of the province of Ontario. It is a well known fact that there have been traffic jams at this point for the last ten or fifteen years owing to the increased tourist traffic.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I know of no reason why, because one happens to be a member of the House of Commons of Canada, he should be traduced by those who are outside this house. The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as leader of this house, on two occasions held that the privileges of parliament were not to be lightly disregarded, and when a member of the opposition with whom his relations could not be said to be cordial, the late Sir George Foster, directed attention to observations that had been made reflecting upon him in the house and made a motion, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, although the person accused was his own friend, saw that he was brought to the bar of the house to apologize for what he had said. The privileges of parliament are not of to-day's making. They represent centuries of accumulated tradition and history, and if men in the discharge of their duty are to be charged with offences and traduced in the public press by those who do not see eye to eye with them, then of course the institution itself is going to suffer. The custody of the reputation of the house is not in my hands, but I direct attention to the facts.

The other evening I directed attention, as was my duty, to the fact that because an attack had been made against this house, alleging that we had not passed legislation as rapidly as we should have, I thought it was my duty to look into this measure, and I did so and gave to this committee the benefit of the information which I had obtained—not all of it but in part—because when this house is charged with having neglected its duties or with having been overzealous in its efforts to discharge them, it seemed to me but fitting that the legislation which has been the subject of controversy should be scrutinized.

I am bound to say that I have not been able to ascertain who the incorporators of this bridge company are. So far as I can ascertain, they are not even people of substance. But that has nothing to do with the question. The question which I presented for the consideration of the committee had only to deal with the legislation as such, and I pointed out that in most bills of this kind it has been provided that when the dominion acts it shall not exercise its powers until similar legislation has been passed by the state of New York, or by the adjoining state, whether it be Michigan or New York, and, if necessary, approved by the United States of America as a nation. I point out that that provision is to be found in the very section which we are now considering, and I direct the attention of the committee very seriously to these words:

> . . . but the company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge nor exercise any of the powers hereunder, until an act of congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States of America has been passed authorizing or approving such bridging of the said river.

That is the usual clause. That is where, as the hon. gentleman in charge of this bill will say, the legislation usually stops. But this bill went further. It has this extraordinary provision:

> But the company may, in the meantime acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council, and do all things authorized by this act.

I venture to point out—and I believe it to be my duty to do so—that that is a contradiction in terms; that you cannot approbate and reprobate. In the one instance the powers are to be exercised only when the appropriate authority in the United States has authorized the company to construct a bridge from the United States territory to the middle of the stream; that is, the middle of the Niagara river, which is the boundary line between Canada and the United States.

Just here it might be well to point out that this legislation has a history. I wonder if it is known to all hon. members that this company under another name has had a bridge in that place for nearly forty years. One of the very earliest bridges to cross the Niagara was built by this company under another name, that of the Buffalo railway company. They did so under authority from the United States and then came to this parliament and obtained in 1900 legislation which enabled them to complete the structure. They also had a railway line. Those who live in that locality are far more familiar with the matter than I am, but I have taken the trouble to look it up a little in view of what has occurred. I find that a short time ago the province of Ontario took steps to acquire the scenic railway, as it is called, and there was an arbitration, the net result of which was that the province or the park authorities have now been called upon to pay something like $1,072,587. In the journals of the Ontario house of assembly, at page 229, I find this:

> Bank loan (note) (for International railway award), $1,072,587.
> (The costs in connection with the award are not included in the above amount; they amount to $136,150.09 and have been paid out of the commission's funds.)

I am indebted to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) for a copy of the journals from which that information was taken. The feeling against the International company, apparently, has been considerable, by reason of the fact that this very large sum of a million dollars had to be paid. The provincial minister of highways, Mr. McQuesten, came to this house and, speaking before the committee, said they were going to pass a statute dealing with bridges; he is also reported to have said that "it would make one more hurdle to cross." And so they did pass a statute with respect to bridges, aimed clearly at the International, for the purpose of preventing the reconstruction of this bridge. That is not a matter in which I have any concern; it is only a matter of passing historical interest. The International company, its former name, the Buffalo railway, having been changed by act of our parliament as well as that of the legislature of Ontario, did operate this bridge and this scenic railway for many years. The scenic railway has been acquired by the appropriate park authority for the province of Ontario under the circumstances to which I have alluded. There remains the question of rebuilding a structure which was destroyed by an act of God. The ice jam took the bridge out. The International people at once arranged for the reconstruction of their bridge, and plans were prepared to that end. A bill was introduced into the legislature of the state of New York—one bill in the assembly and the other in the senate. They bear date February 18, 1938, and they have to do with the construction from the United States side of this bridge. But that bill did not pass. I hold in my hand a statement signed by Senator W. H. Lee of the state of New York, who resides at Lockport, in which he refers to the conference which was held for the purpose of determining what action should be taken. These are the terms in which he writes:

> In response to your request for verification of newspaper accounts of statements reported to have been made by Governor Lehman in a conference held at Albany on February 21st last, I beg to advise that at such conference attended by Governor Lehman, Hon. Morris Tremaine, Comptroller, Assemblymen Moffat and Suitor, Hon. T. B. McQuesten, Messrs. Welby and Kaumeyer and me, Governor Lehman stated that he is deeply interested in the construction at the earliest possible moment of a bridge to replace the Falls View bridge recently destroyed by ice; that he has been advised by his counsel that International Railway Company has the right under the laws of the United States and State of New York to construct such bridge, and that the State of New York can not and will not interfere with the exercise of such right.

Since none of the statements was made in confidence you may show this letter to anyone.

Yours truly,

Wm. H. Lee.

He is the senator for the forty-seventh district of the state of New York.

That statement, it will be seen, is not new. As a matter of fact, the conference took place as long ago as February, and at it the governor made it perfectly clear what his course was. Now I point out to the committee that this legislation had its origin in the United States. They first granted the power to construct the bridge. The promoters then came to this parliament and obtained from it the power to connect up with the bridge, on the Canadian side. As I have pointed out, in the course of years they have acquired much property. They have this scenic railway, which has been sold. They have the approaches at both ends of the bridge; highways lead down to this bridge, and there were many of the amenities of travel established at both ends of the structure before it was destroyed. Also there are people with homes in the locality and such stores and shops as are always found in such localities. The value placed on the property owned by this bridge company is $500,000. This proposal is to construct a bridge at another point, which involves the acquisition of land for approaches, the diversion of highways, and the erection and construction of the amenities that have now been provided in connection with the International bridge. That is the position.

So far as what I said the other evening is concerned, and which the committee might care to read—I am not going to reread it—I pointed out that if the bridge cannot be constructed until such time as the United States appropriate authority gives permission to build from the United States side to the centre of the stream, how could we authorize a company that might never function—because the bill itself says it can function only if, as and when the United States authorities authorize a company to build from their shore to the middle of the stream—to acquire real estate and file plans for the approval of the governor general in council? Of what bridge? It is only when the two have amalgamated into a single bridge that we have a structure, and as the Minister of Transport said the other evening, it does not require an act of parliament to enable you to prepare plans for a bridge, but to prepare plans and ask for approval of them when there is no such thing as a bridge authorized, is something that I cannot understand.

Just why these last words are placed in that section I would ask the committee to determine for itself. But in view of the fact that the section dealt with the acquisition of real estate I said it could mean only one thing, the creation of a real estate boom at the point where the bridge was to be built and where a community was to be built around it—the little shops that sell fruit and confectionery and cards and things of that sort. Of course, anyone with any practical knowledge of affairs knows exactly what happens the very moment it is mooted that a new structure of this sort is under contemplation, just as in connection with the Peace bridge there were activities in that locality, and as there are activities in every locality where the construction of a bridge is contemplated.

I gave notice on the order paper that I would move an amendment that the words after the word "river" be struck out in order that this legislation might be consistent with other legislation that we have passed on previous occasions. Whenever we exercise a power that is limited, by geographical and international facts, to a point in the centre of a stream, the building of the bridge results only from the United States authorities authorizing a similar structure to be carried on from that side of the border to the centre. The two then amalgamate and you have the completed structure. That is what took place in connection with the Peace bridge. I could name many other bridges of the same kind, including the Sarnia structure. That did not cross into the state of New York; I believe it was the state of Michigan. Be that as it may, I hardly think it would be just the right thing for legislators to authorize the building of a structure by a company which is permitted to exercise its fuctions only when something else has been done in another country, and at the same time authorize it to engage in a real estate boom. That is what it means. and that is the point to which I directed attention.

There are other matters to which I might direct attention, and I am going to refer at once to one of them. The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Duffus) said, as did a gentleman who is not a member of this house, that the province of Ontario is suffering. Mr. Chairman, see what ensues from the following statements: (1) The legislature of the state of New York has declined to authorize the construction of this bridge at this time; (2) the legislature of the state of New York has prorogued for the year—you may have seen that in the New York Times ten days ago. There can be, therefore, no bridge authorized this year, and we have nothing to do with that; that is a matter which the state of New York has determined. And the condition imposed in this very bill is that the powers hereby conferred shall not be exercised until such time as the state of New York or the congress of the United States authorizes the construction of a bridge. That, I say, completely answers everything that has been said about the province of Ontario losing anything.

How can the province of Ontario lose anything when the legislature of the state of New York has risen for the year and has declined to take action? How can it be so when the condition appears in the very bill that the promoter puts before us, that "the company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge nor exercise any of the powers hereunder, until an act of the congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States of America has been passed authorizing or approving such bridging of the said river." There is a distinct and clear recognition, a recognition which has been found in all our international legislation, that there must be joint action in order to bridge an international stream, and that we cannot confer powers to be exercised by any company beyond the middle of a stream. Surely we do not propose to make ourselves absurd by authorizing such action to be taken until such time as the United States authorities have authorized the construction of the bridge from their end as well.

Why the hon. member who is promoting the bill has added the words he has, I confess I do not know, although I have looked for some reason for them. Let me read the language once more:

> But the company may in the meantime acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council and do all things authorized by this act.

"Do all things authorized by this act," notwithstanding that three lines before that it is said that "the company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge nor exercise any of the powers hereunder, until an act of congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States of America has been passed," and so on.

I put this to the committee. I have no feeling at all in the matter, despite what has been said; because, after all, I have in this exactly the same interest that I had in the legislation of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) regarding the Restigouche company. In that connection I pointed out certain things; the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) saw my point and the bill was amended accordingly. I had no particular interest in that matter, nor have I any particular interest in this, and I have been too long in public life to be concerned about attacks made against me or this committee. I do say, however, that we cannot declare in a statute that certain persons shall not exercise any of the powers conferred by the bill until the United States takes joint action to build a bridge to the centre of the stream, and at the same time, two lines further on, declare that they may do all the things authorized by this act; that they may start to buy land and to file plans—plans of what? Plans of a bridge. But there is no bridge authorized to cross the stream; so far, it stops at the centre of it. It may be that something is left out; it may be that hon. gentlemen have confused two things; and all that I suggested, in the notice of amendment which I gave, was that the section be amended by striking out all the words after the word "river," which would have this effect, that the legislation would not be contradictory in the last five lines, and would be at any rate consistent with our legal as well as our international position; for having said, as we may say, that we are not doing anything beyond our legal powers, we have gone as far as we can. I submit that we should remove any possible thought that any action taken here, even if we kill this bill, would deprive the province of Ontario of any revenue, or the Dominion of Canada of any tourists. The state of New York has seen fit not to give its approval, not to create a company and what is more, the legislature of the state has risen for the year. It follows, therefore, that as far as this bill is concerned it is a dead measure during the period which intervenes until such time as that legislature has acted.

I confess it is disagreeable to have these discussions and to be attacked in the beautiful language that always characterizes the utterances of the gentleman who used it, perhaps somewhat out of keeping with the long traditions of an ancient province. To say that something is a damnable lie is not calculated to enhance the reputation of the person who said it, or yet respect for the institution which he represents. I think I can say that at least. The facts are as I have stated them. I have nothing to withdraw, nothing to explain in any sense. What I said is on Hansard; it stands written, printed; and it is strictly in accordance with the facts. The legislation in itself denies the right to construct until the United States has acted, and then it authorizes this company, which has no valid life, to deal in real estate and file plans with the governor in council. It has no authority to build beyond the middle of the stream until the United States has acted. And then it is joint action.

I need hardly say to the right hon. the Prime Minister that it would seem that we can hardly afford to place ourselves in the position in which this legislation would place us with our great neighbour to the south. It assumes that we are to give approval to the building of a bridge in the state of New York. We would not take kindly to the state of New York passing a statute authorizing the government of that state to approve plans of a bridge to be erected in the Dominion of Canada. But this bill says that although you cannot act until the state of New York gives you power, nevertheless, although you have no legal right, no validity to your acts, we are going to let you buy and sell real estate and file plans with the governor in council of a bridge part of which must be in the state of New York. That is the position. I have done my duty by pointing it out. When the hon. member for Peterborough West was speaking the other evening, I asked him if he did not know that this legislation had not been passed. He did not answer the question; but surely when we remember that the minister of highways for Ontario was present at the conference with the governor in February last, it would be difficult for him not to know that the legislature had risen and that no action had been taken with respect to it.

Those are the facts on section 8 to which I have directed attention, and it is only necessary to add that, as pointed out the other evening, the estimate given by the engineer, Colonel Monsarrat, of the cost of the bridge to be erected by the International company is $1,400,000. At the proper time I shall discuss the financial side of this matter; for it is said that the purpose is to give the people a bridge free from tolls. The authorized bond issue is $4,000,000, and if the money were obtained at the lowest rate at which money was obtained for the Peace bridge, it would involve an annual interest payment of $200,000, apart from sinking fund and without providing for expenses of operation. The files in the department indicate what the earnings of this company have been during all these years. I had an abstract made of some of them which may be useful later on in connection with other sections.

But it is said that the province could not obtain this legislation. All you need do is to turn to the statutes of this dominion in 1931, when the province of Quebec came here and obtained authority to construct a bridge from the Isle of Orleans to the mainland. In that case it was navigable water to be crossed, and they had to secure our authority, which was given by statute, before they could construct that bridge. In the case of this bridge it is not navigable water but international water that is to be bridged, and obviously both countries must join together for the purpose of making action possible. When we have made our act contingent upon the exercise by the other party of their power, and they have not exercised that power and will not now for another year, it seems to me we are doing something very much at variance with the declarations which have been made from time to time in this house with respect to investments and company promotions and the evils that have flowed from such exploitations, unless we take the only step we can with respect to this section and leave it as similar sections have been left in dealing with other companies; namely, providing that the power shall not be exercised unless and until the competent authority in the United States has authorized and empowered a corporation to exercise its powers.

Mr. HOWE: This bill has been under discussion for several weeks, and it is not my purpose to prolong the debate. But after the forensic display to which we have listened from the right hon. leader of the opposition, on the last two sittings on which the bill has been before the committee, I feel that a statement is necessary as to just what is involved in this bill. The motives of the province of Ontario have been impugned, and gratuitous insults have been distributed to whoever has spoken on behalf of the measure.

What are the facts? The Niagara parks commission has expended large sums of money and done splendid work in making the neighbourhood of Niagara Falls a beauty spot and a tourist attraction. This commission now desires to build an entrance to the city from the United States that will be a credit to that city and to the parks commission's development. The stream to be bridged is an international one; hence in order to do what they wish to do it is necessary for the commissioners to obtain the consent of the federal government and of the proper authority in the United States. Obviously those consents cannot be obtained concurrently; one or the other must be obtained first. It was legally impossible for either the Niagara parks commission or for Ontario as a province to apply in its own name to the federal government for the requisite permission to build.

Mr. BENNETT: Quebec did.

Mr. HOWE: That was somewhat different. However, I shall not enter into a discussion about that. The provincial authorities then followed the usual procedure, or what seemed to them to be the usual procedure; they chose five men, connected in one capacity or another with either the parks commission or the province of Ontario. They entered into an agreement with these men that the five men would form a corporation for the purpose of applying to this parliament for the necessary authority, and when the authority had been obtained, to assign their interest in the corporation to the province of Ontario. A private bill was drawn up, and the legal adviser of my department who inspected the bill has advised me that it follows the exact language of the last bill passed by this parliament, and in general follows very closely the language of the bills authorizing the last several international bridges that have been approved by this parliament. The bill was introduced in this parliament, and the province of Ontario sent this government an official letter stating that the incorporators of this company were acting for the province; that their interest would be assigned to the province, and that the province would undertake responsibility for the construction and operation.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that letter available?

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. gentleman please file it?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be pleased to file it at the next sitting.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the important letter.

Mr. HOWE: The bill was introduced and discussed thoroughly in committee. The minister of highways of Ontario came to Ottawa with his staff to pilot the bill through the committee. Certain objections were taken to the bill by members of the committee; for example, the amount specified in the bill, namely, $7,000,000, seemed excessive to the committee. The minister of highways was quite willing to reduce that amount to $4,000,000. He admitted that the amount was in excess of requirements, and while there could be no harm in having the authority, if such authority were not used, he admitted that $4,000,000 would be sufficient, and the bill was amended in committee accordingly. The bill specified an amount of $500,000 share capital, which is the amount usually named in such bills. The minister was questioned as to why $500,000 was necessary and admitted that there was no necessity for it; it was only a token amount, and so the committee amended the bill, reducing the amount to $500. It was quite evident, I think, to all members of the committee that the bona fides of the government of Ontario were absolute, and that the only desire was to secure permission from this parliament to build the bridge in a form entirely legal and proper. We have heard here the suggestion that if the committee had not acted, we would have had real estate speculation on behalf of the province of Ontario, and we are told that if the share capital had not been reduced, all sorts of assets would have been turned in as part of the capital of the bridge.

Mr. BENNETT: There was provision to that effect in the original bill, and it is now out.

Mr. HOWE: The right hon. gentleman will find that it is provided in a good many bills which have passed this house. It was there because the lawyer who drafted the bill simply followed the usual form. We are told that another bridge company has land with a value of half a million dollars and can build a bridge for $1,400,000, and that the sum of $4,000,000 which is estimated for this bridge is excessive. It is just as fair for a man to say, "It is ridiculous for you to say you are going to build a house costing $40,000, because the house I am building will cost only $20,000." It is exactly the same thing. The bridge to be built by the province of Ontario is to be a monumental structure in keeping with the development of the Niagara park. It is to be wider and longer than the bridge with which it is compared. Instead of coming directly into the main highway along the waterfront, there will be a span over the highway, so that proper entrance arrangements can be made without interfering with traffic on the main highway.

Objection is taken to the section under discussion at the moment, and an amendment has been offered. I may say that the sponsor of the bill has no objection at all to the committee accepting that amendment. It is ordinary common sense that the province of Ontario does not require an act of parliament to enable it to draft plans for this bridge. It is ordinary common sense that the province of Ontario can acquire any land it needs in the city of Niagara Falls without an act of this parliament. I speak for the sponsor of the bill when I say that he is quite willing that the committee shall accept the amendment which has been offered.

I should like to say just a word as to the United States authority. This act cannot become operative in any way until that authority is obtained. As to when or how it may be obtained, that is not a matter for this parliament. One country or the other must act first, and in this instance we hope Canada will be first to act. After that the matter will be in the hands of those who are actively sponsoring the bill. I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that the filibuster is now over and that this bridge bill may now pass this committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport would advance his interest in this bill a great deal more readily if he did not talk about filibusters. In no sense have I had anything to do with a filibuster in connection with this legislation; nothing whatever.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BENNETT: I say I have had nothing whatever to do with a filibuster in connection with this legislation. But I have deeply resented this house being attacked in the exercise of its legislative powers by those who are not members of it; and in consequence of that—

Mr. HOWE: I was not referring to the right hon. gentleman when I mentioned a filibuster.

Mr. BENNETT: In consequence of that I made myself familiar with this bill and took a good deal of time to do so. The minister must remember that the other evening for the first time the statement was made that the province of Ontario had written a letter stating that they would become responsible for this undertaking.

Mr. HOWE: That was made abundantly clear in the committee. Every fact that the right hon. gentleman has discovered and presented to this committee was made abundantly clear to the sixty men who make up the railway committee of this house.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is that, not being present as a member of that committee, I cannot speak with respect to that point.

Mr. HOWE: I wrote a letter to the committee containing the information that the province of Ontario had transmitted to me, and my letter must be on record with the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has referred to that letter. It is a public document; it can be laid on the table, and I may have an opportunity of inspecting it. What I did desire to make perfectly clear was that when this bill first came up I directed the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that I thought we were making a mistake in endeavouring to incorporate a company with power to build a bridge in the United States of America, to provide for its landing in the state of New York; that that was an excess of power because we could not go beyond the centre of the stream. I was reminded by the promoter of the bill that similar legislation had been passed in the past, and I said I did not think that made very much difference. I then said that after all I was not interested in this matter and I was not going to bother about it further, having directed attention to the matter. But when the attack was launched against this committee—of which I am a member—of this house—of which I am a member—that we were negligent in our duty I made it my business to study this bill, and the reason I took the trouble to make the observations I did both the other evening and to-night is that I wanted to make it abundantly clear that no one outside this house is sufficiently powerful to prevent me from discharging my legislative duties. I have a duty from which I cannot shrink merely by saying, "Well, somebody else can do it," and I then took the trouble to make myself familiar with this matter. I had not been familiar with it beyond the general, cursory examination of the measure I made when I pointed out to the minister the other evening that I did not think we could authorize the construction of a bridge beyond the centre of the stream.

I think the acceptance of the proposal that has been suggested goes a long way towards remedying one of the defects of the bill, but there is something else which is quite apparent and for which I have not been able to find any excuse; that is, why you should approbate in the one line and reprobate in the other; why in the one case you make a declaration that you shall not do something and in the next line declare that you are able to do all things authorized by the act. Surely the Minister of Transport has given no adequate explanation for that, and I know of none.

Mr. HOWE: It was slavishly copied from the last international bridge bill passed by this parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: That may be; an astute company promoter may have gotten that in. All I can say is that I am sure the minister himself at once will regard it as nonsensical, to say the least, that in one line you should prohibit and in another line you should authorize. In the one case the words are "any of the powers hereunder," and in the other case "all things authorized by this act."

This all indicates just one thing: the desirability of the utmost care being exercised in connection with all legislation. If in days past, when we were in office, bills of this kind passed in the form to which attention has been directed, this should not have been done. Certainly, if my attention had been directed to the matter, it would not have been done; for with the many weaknesses I have at least I possess some respect for the law. I think even my most violent critic would give me credit for a little more intelligence than to suggest that I would become party to a section that would prohibit, except under a condition, the doing of something, and then two lines later authorize the doing of that which had been prohibited. The fact that something has been copied from some other bill indicates how sad a thing it is if we continue to let the dead hand of the past entirely govern every action we take in the present. That is as clear as anything in the world; nothing could be more fatal to either progress or development. When I recall the observations made in this house about companies and company promoters by one who has been attacking us from the outside, I should just like to hear his view, as he used to express it from this side of the house in those days, with respect to legislation of this kind.

The statement made by the minister as to the province of Ontario being behind this legislation and accepting full responsibility for it of course will be determined entirely by the letter which we shall read; the construction placed upon it as to terms; who signs it, and his power and authority to bind the province in the premises. It is a little difficult to understand why the original bill was prepared in the terms in which it was and why people of so little worth as the promoters should be those who are behind this legislation. Just one thing further.

The CHAIRMAN: It is nine o'clock. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. STIRLING: It is two minutes after nine.

Mr. BENNETT: My attention has been directed to the fact that it was two minutes after nine when you made the declaration that the section had passed.

Mr. STIRLING: It is not playing the game.

Mr. BENNETT: My colleague says that it is not playing the game to go beyond the hour. I think there is much to be said with respect to that. I had no idea that we had gone beyond the hour; but in view of what the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) says, it is my duty to bring that fact to your attention.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not think the right hon. gentleman was aware that it was nine o'clock. I waited some minutes and I thought he would be disposed to have the amendment carry. However, I am in the judgment of the committee.

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the Montreal Star of to-day, at page four, is an article, entitled House and Lobby, by H. M. Morden. This is a filthy article and a tissue of lies from the first line to the last. The only thing I have to say to that member of the Press Gallery is that he needs badly a strong dose of castor oil.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT PRESENTED APRIL 8, 1937

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) for concurrence in the second report of the special committee appointed to investigate farm implement prices, presented to the house on the 8th of April, 1937.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had just concluded a brief examination of the financial position of the farm implement companies. I had pointed out that the losses suffered by the Massey-Harris Company were due in a measure to their high distribution costs. The committee found that the distribution costs in connection with farm implements were altogether excessive and that the Massey-Harris costs were the highest of all. I do not intend to go into this matter extensively as I should like to conclude my remarks in the allotted time.

It was found that the distribution cost of the International Harvester Company for the ten year period under examination was 22.13 per cent of the net sales. The distribution cost of Deere and Company was 22.57 per cent of the net sales. We were not successful in obtaining the costs of the Cockshutt Plow Company. The distribution cost of the Frost and Wood Company was 20.36 per cent, while the cost of the Massey-Harris Company was 33.46 per cent, more than ten per cent above the average of the other companies. The committee came to the conclusion that while the Massey-Harris Company suffered in Canada a loss of $5,800,000, if they had distributed their products as economically as the other companies, they would have made a saving about equal to their loss.

I do not wish the house to think I am making an attack upon the Massey-Harris Company, as that is absolutely foreign to my purpose. I suggested in my opening remarks that they were a great Canadian concern of which we were proud. If I may be allowed to refer to my own family, in the sixty years that my father and I have been farming we have paid the Massey-Harris people thousands of dollars. We have always thought that no other machine company in the world could make better machines than the Massey-Harris Company. The committee arrived at the conclusion that the cost of distribution was altogether too high and makes a recommendation that the government take into serious consideration the possibility of assisting cooperative organizations in the handling and servicing of farm implements.

I should like to say something about freight rates on agricultural implements. This matter was mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). This is of supreme importance to the western provinces as two-thirds of the machinery sold is sold in the west. Nine per cent of the farmer's dollar is absorbed in freight rates. In 1913 the freight charges on a binder to Regina was $17.80, whereas in 1935 this cost had risen to $25.87. The freight charges on machinery going west to-day are forty per cent higher than they were under the Crowsnest pass agreement.

Yesterday I stated that this Crowsnest pass agreement was an agreement made with the Canadian Pacific railway, and that it had been amended so that we lost the benefit of the Crowsnest pass rates on machinery and other products going westward. In the speech he made over six weeks ago the hon. member for Qu'Appelle stated he was in favour of the restoration of the Crowsnest pass rates on machinery. I do not see the hon. member in his seat to-night, but his statement appears on Hansard. It is just too bad that we did not have similar Conservatives in the house in 1922 when the Crowsnest pass arrangement was lost. I well remember the bitter and determined fight the Conservative party, led by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, put up at that time. Had it not been for the Liberal party, the Crowsnest pass agreement would have been abrogated entirely. I want to compliment the hon. member for Qu'Appelle upon coming out and stating that he is in favour of the restoration of the Crowsnest pass rates on products going westward. I wonder how many of the Conservatives whom I see sitting in front of me at the present time would take the same stand.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has misstated the facts, I am sure unconsciously. He stated that the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was against the Crowsnest pass agreement. The fact is that he said the rates should be settled by the railway commission. That was his position. The legislation was allowed to pass in this house, but it was altered in the senate. It was brought up by one of the members of the senate in the form in which it was subsequently dealt with.

Mr. LEADER: When the matter passed this house, the Crowsnest pass rates were completely abrogated, and it was only by accident that our own senator from Portage la Prairie discovered that fact. He asked that they be not abrogated entirely, but be suspended for a period of three years. That suggestion was agreed to in the senate, and it was brought in as an amendment to the bill, to which the house agreed. Had it not been for the action taken in the senate, I think the right hon. leader of the opposition will agree with me when I say that the Crowsnest pass rates would have been abrogated.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not abrogated.

Mr. LEADER: Reference is made to the ugly word "repudiation" when we ask for a refunding of our public debt. I dislike to think it is repudiation in this connection. An arrangement was made by the people of Canada, and I cannot see why a different arrangement cannot be made when the boot is on the other foot.

I should like to touch briefly upon the cost of repairs. The committee examined this and found it was a great factor in the high replacement cost of machinery, especially in those tough years when we were not able to buy a complete machine and found it necessary to buy repair parts and patch up the old machine. Repairs, as everybody knows, are sold for cash, and there is no loss or bad debts. The mark-up in the price of repairs, in comparison with the complete machine, is 66 per cent. I have further information in regard to that, but I must hurry on as there are other matters perhaps more important.

Now, as to the effects of the tariff on the cost of machinery, we went into that thoroughly, and I want to say right here that I believe the dumping act is the most diabolical weapon ever devised by man for the strangulation of international trade. The present government, I believe, are not using the dumping act to a very great extent. They have practically relieved the people of Canada from the use of that deplorable weapon. But in the ten year period under examination, under both governments, the dumping act was responsible for the implement companies of the United States retaining in that country $17,000,000 by the International Harvester Company and $9,000,000 by Deere and Company. By that action the treasury of Canada lost $400,000 which they would have been able to tax these companies on their profits had the profits been retained in Canada where they were earned. It may be said that this has nothing to do with increasing the price of farm machinery, but I doubt if that is so. I maintain that it has had something to do with it. I am going to read an extract carried by the Canadian Press over two years ago when we were discussing this question in the house:

Ottawa, June 12—Due to what Hughes Cleaver (Liberal, Halton), called the "silly tariff policy" which permitted the revenue minister to fix values for duty purposes, the International Harvester Company was obliged to charge Canadian importers $200 more on a $1,000 tractor than the price to United States farmers, Charles R. Morrison, vice president of the company, told the house committee on agriculture Thursday.

It goes on to say:

The company was accustomed to give a discount of 25 per cent to its United States selling organization and had always been willing to give the same discount to the Canadian company. However, in attempting to apply it, the implement manufacturers ran up against the Canadian customs regulations which empowered the national revenue minister to fix the fair market value of importations.

Here is an extract from the committee's report:

The policy of the Department of National Revenue has indirectly introduced a factor unfavourable to the maintenance of low prices in Canada in the case of these two companies, one of which sells one-third of the total requirements of the Canadian farmer while the other occupies a strong position in the western Canadian market.

The committee, therefore, feels that this whole matter has an important bearing on the question of retail prices on farm implements in Canada.

And a recommendation from the committee was:

That indirectly this retention of profits in the United States affected the price level of farm implements in Canada as the true profits arising out of their Canadian operations were not properly appreciated by the United States companies.

As regards the effects of the tariff, does a reduction in the tariff mean a reduction in the cost of imported products? It did not mean that in the case of farm machinery. I remember how my Conservative friends seemed jubilant at the fact that after we had lowered the tariff on farm machinery the price went up. I remember clipping out at the time an item in the Winnipeg Tribune, a supporter of the Conservative cause, which, speaking of the reduction in the tariff and the increase in the price of machinery, says:

Along came Mr. King and lowered the tarff protection by approximately one-half.

This was before they lowered the tariff five per cent, bringing it down to 7½ per cent.

The western Liberal members of parliament sat back expectantly waiting for prices to fall, instead the new catalogue shows higher prices. The western Liberals have been howling to high Heaven ever since.

They seem to think there is some magic about the words "lower tariff." There is not.

We maintain that there is a great difference between the two old political parties on the tariff. The Conservatives stand for high protection, and the Liberals for low tariff; if there is no difference between a low tariff and a high tariff we should know it, and the way to find out is to strip these companies, who have defied parliament, of all tariff protection, and let them stand on their own feet.

Some will say that a combine exists. Well, if a combine does exist, we have the machinery to take care of the situation. I remember sitting in this house and listening to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) in the opening session in 1936. I forget what he was discussing at the time, but this is what he said in reference to the Combines Investigation Act. It will be found at page 510 of Hansard of that year:

> But I emphasize again that there are occasions—and they exist to-day, I believe—when it becomes the duty of government to intervene if a great business organization takes advantage of its power to oppress its workers or exploit the consumer.

I claim that is exactly what the machinery companies have done, and not only have they exploited the consumer but they have defied parliament.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEADER: If I may be allowed, I am not critical just for the sake of being critical, and I am not condemning the government which I support because I like condemning them; I am condemning them, if I must, because I am a friend of the government and I would like to see them follow the paths we think they should follow.

I am going to give the house the record of this government in regard to the duty on farm implements. The Liberal party have been pledged to the abolition of the duty on farm implements since 1919, when they drafted their platform. We are told in this house that we should take a long range vision when we are legislating and to see what is ahead of us. Surely, Mr. Speaker, twenty years is a long enough vision in regard to removing the duty on agricultural implements. The Hon. Charles Stewart, Liberal member of this house in 1935, in opposition at that time, but who, if he had been reelected, would have no doubt been sitting on the treasury benches to-day, moved a resolution in 1935 as follows:

> Hon. Charles Stewart (West Edmonton) moved:
> That in the opinion of this house the best interests of Canada demand that the burden of customs taxation be lessened on the instruments of production in the agricultural industry and to this end, farm implements and machinery should be free from custom duties.

He said:

> Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the house at any length on the introduction of this motion. I think, however, it would be of interest to recite briefly the history of customs duties as applied to farm machinery, and to point out their detrimental effect upon the farming industry of this country. I do not think there will be any disagreement with the statement that agriculture is the most important occupation of the Canadian people.

I quoted this resolution during the campaign, and was proud to do so. This government has a splendid chance to practice reciprocity with the United States. We know that for years Canadian farm machinery was allowed to enter the United States duty free, and it would be only an act of justice to the farmers of this country, without hurting anyone, if we allowed United States farm machinery to enter Canada duty free.

I want to say thit to the Prime Minister. At Easter time when I was home I found, along with the information I received while I was here, that a bitter feeling prevails in western Canada in regard to the government's action respecting farm machinery. I have two letters here signed by the secretary of the United Farmers of Manitoba, from which I should like to make two short extracts. He encloses a copy of a letter directed to the chairman of the special committee. He says:

> We are very much concerned about this situation. The implement people appear determined to over-ride the conclusions and recommendations of last year's committee and to press still more extortionate prices in 1938.
> We think this is a challenge to Canadian democracy and we are looking for unified action on the part of representatives of rural Canada. We respectfully urge that our plea in this letter be given your personal attention.

And he writes this significant postcript:

> Surely the western rural members acting together should be able to get action.

That letter was written on March 16. I have another letter dated April 21, which is a copy of a letter that was directed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner); he has this information. The writer says:

> The executive of the United Farmers of Manitoba meeting on April 11th and 12th, were deeply concerned in regard to the present situation re prices of farm implements.
> The report of the special committee of last year, they feel, is a call to action which ought not to be ignored, and there seems to be no action in sight just now. They view this with extreme disappointment. That a widespread injustice should not only be permitted to continue but actually be allowed to increase creates a very grave situation.

I see that I have exhausted my time. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the house for having given me this extra time, and I shall conclude with very few remarks:

I want to say that the machine companies have forfeited any right to tariff protection which they may have had. They have not played fair with the farmers and working men of this country. They have combined on a squeeze play to boost prices at a time when higher prices were not warranted. Their action has hindered the progress of agriculture, and in my opinion it is high time that this parliament should institute measures which will compel a reduction in the prices now being charged for agricultural machinery. What I have said is not inspired by malice towards the manufacturers of farm machinery or any other individual or group; its object is rather to present the viewpoint of the farmers who must and do purchase this machinery. We as a class have not been blessed with legislative protection—notwithstanding some remarks that have been made—nor do we need or desire any special privileges; but we do object, and our voice is becoming increasingly articulate in demanding that others get off our backs so that we may live and provide for our families. Furthermore, we wish to pay our fair share of tribute to the state, but insist, when so doing, that we be allowed a fair recompense for our labours.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is not my intention to present either an analysis or a synopsis of the evidence and report of the committee. That has already been done ably and succinctly by most of the previous speakers. I wish to give a short historical resume of this entire inquiry into the causes underlying the high prices of farm implements.

First, on March 2, 1936, an order was issued in this house for an inquiry into the high price of farm implements Second, on April 24, 1936, a question was asked, as reported on page 2127 of Hansard, regarding the response of the implement companies to the agricultural committee's request that during the course of the inquiry the prices should be reduced to their former level. May I quote that from Hansard? On the orders of the day I asked the following question:

I would ask the government if it has drawn to the attention of the agricultural implement industry the motion passed by this house asking that industry to keep the price of farm implements at their former level until the present investigation has been completed; what assurance has been received from the agricultural implement industry, and why has this request not been complied with?

The Minister of Agriculture replied:

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, letters were sent to the implement companies calling their attention to the resolution passed by the committee. So far as I know there has not been, down to the present, information received in reply from all the companies. I think a letter was received from one company, but I would prefer when the information is produced to have it brought down as a whole.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell: Does the government contemplate bringing down any legislation or taking other action to bring the implement companies to a reasonable frame of mind regarding these prices?

There was no answer.

On February 1, 1937, the agricultural committee reported and suggested the setting up of a select committee of this house to continue the investigation into the high price of farm implements. On April 8, 1937, the report was tabled in the house by the chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston), but no discussion followed and no action was taken. Of course the government was anxious to expedite the business of the house in order that the parliamentary committee might attend the coronation. On March 11, 1938, the report was discussed on a motion of concurrence moved by the chairman of the committee. The time between the tabling of the report and the moving of the motion of concurrence was so long that the chairman felt that something ought to be done about it, and so he added seven suggestions of his own. It should be remembered that these suggestions are not a part of the report and have no bearing upon the report. The strangest thing of all is that one of these suggestions was the institution of a system of crop insurance, a matter over which this committee had no jurisdiction, and which was very largely a sop to soothe the disappointment of those who had expected the government to take some action as a result of this inquiry.

The motion for concurrence was moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre on March 11 of this year. Now, six weeks later, on April 29 we are still discussing a report that was tabled over a year ago regarding the investigation into the high price of farm implements. One cannot too strongly condemn the dilatoriness of the entire procedure with regard to this inquiry. It looks to me like a grand farce, with the government stalling for time. May I point out first of all that it is two years since this investigation began, and now, after two years, we are only at the stage of discussing a report which, even if it is passed, is no guarantee of legislative action regarding the committee's recommendations, let alone the chairman's suggestions. Let me point out further that so much time has been allowed to elapse during the present session that it is altogether unlikely that we shall get legislative action during this sitting of parliament. This means that it is not likely we shall have legislation dealing with this matter until next year, which will probably be the session prior to the general election. In other words, the entire term of office during which the present government has ruled will have been taken up with an inquiry into a question regarding which the government's duty was clear from the was beginning. I believe it was Disraeli who said that commissions were set up to find out things which everybody else knew already. Certainly this committee has succeeded so far only in presenting excellent material, but not in getting the government to implement any of the recommendations that were made.

Mr. GOLDING: The committee did more than that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): During this entire period of two years the farmers have continued to suffer the injustice of high farm implement prices, which have placed an additional burden of $4,000,000 per annum upon the backs of the prairie farmers.

Mr. MASSEY: How does the hon. member figure that out?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I shall give the basis for that in just a few moments.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member is a great figurer.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): An examination of the facts will show that the implement companies have totally disregarded the wishes of the committee and of parliament. First of all, the companies did not accede to the request of the committee that the prices should be reduced to their former level until the investigation had been completed. I have here a copy of the correspondence passing between counsel for the committee and the different implement companies, and in very polite language the committee was told by the companies that it ought to mind its own business. Again, these companies during the investigation absolutely failed to substantiate their claim that the increase in the cost of implements was due to an increase in the cost of raw materials and labour.

An hon. MEMBER: That is your opinion.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is not my opinion. Let me quote from the evidence at page 386. Mr. Morrison, the head of the International Harvester Company is on the stand and Mr. Graham is legal counsel for the parliamentary committee. I quote from the evidence.

Q. So that these pig iron prices are going down in that period?

A. Yes, all right.

Q. Now we will take scrap—in 1930 it was 17·60; in 1931 it was 19·31; in 1932 it was 12·36; in 1933 it was 10·22 and in 1934 there was a slight increase to 11·23; but again in scrap there is the same reduction in the period isn't there? In steel, steel in 1930 was 2·37; in 1931 it was 2·37; in 1932 it was 2·44; in 1933 it was 2·31 and in 1934 it was 2·33; if anything there has been a slight drop—isn't that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. You will recall that lumber, which comprised about 10 per cent of the raw material costs, in 1930 was 99·98; in 1931 it was 102·87; in 1932 it dropped to 88·82; in 1933 it dropped to 82·20; and in 1934 it dropped to 73·82—so that there was a decided drop in the cost of lumber to you. Isn't that correct?

A. According to these figures.

Q. Well, these figures are supplied by yourself, Mr. Morrison. These are the big items; pig iron, scrap, steel and lumber; so that you will agree with me that in the prices you had to pay for raw materials entering into your product in the period from 1923 to 1935 there was a decided drop rather than an increase, except in steel, which seems to have held just steady; would not that be correct?

A. That would be correct.

Q. So that I submit again, Mr. Morrison, in the light of that, that when you suggest to your answers to me last spring that increase in the cost of materials was an element that jusified the raise, surely you cannot uphold that now in the face of this information—dealing with materials alone, I will go into the others with you later—but dealing with material costs alone?

A. All right, let us concede the material.

Q. You will concede the material?

A. Yes.

On page 387 the question of labour is discussed:

Q. Well, then, I do not know that I need go much further on that particular point, if you agree with that. It refutes the suggestion that you made in your statement that increased labour costs justified the increase in price?

A. Well, I think Mr. Graham you are being just a little liberal; I said, material, labour and burden; what I meant was collective material, labour and burden.

Q. Of course, it is my duty, Mr. Morrison, to separate them, naturally. You would agree with me then that labour costs during the period have decreased rather than increased; and that therefore labour treated as a single element does not justify the increase?

A. That is true.

Q. That is true?

A. Yes.

I say, therefore, that the evidence shows that the increase in costs of material and labour did not justify the increase in 1936. The committee showed further that they had no doubt in their minds that an injustice had been perpetrated upon the purchasers of farm implements. I do not wish to quote extensively. Let me quote two statements from the recommendations at page 1216:

The companies, having during the depression years maintained, relatively, their price levels, the committee suggests that now they are approaching a period of normal or above normal volume of production and sales, the companies can well afford, comparatively and actually, to lower their prices and still make satisfactory financial returns, because of the great saving in overhead per unit of production. This policy would be of particular benefit in the period in which the farmer is making necessary replacements.

The results have been very confusing to those studying price trends over this period. During the period 1913 to 1936 the price of tractors declined by about fifty per cent. On the other hand prices of the general line of horse drawn implements and machines showed a level in 1936 between fifty and sixty per cent higher than in 1913.

Mr. MASSEY: Does the hon. member realize he is comparing incomparables? It is as if he were comparing the price of bicycles with that of motorcycles.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not aware that either motorcycles or bicycles are farm implements. The hon. gentleman has had a long experience in such matters, and he may be able to get the committee to regard bicycles and motorcycles as farm implements.

Mr. MASSEY: The hon. gentleman knows quite well what I mean. He is dodging my question.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The committee went on to point out at page 1217, that in Canada only one farmer out of every seven possesses a tractor. Then, on pages 1294 to 1296 are set out thirty-six recommendations. I shall not take the time of the house to read them; most hon. members have already gone through this. But five things that the committee proved to their own satisfaction at least are worth noting. In the first place they prove that farm implement prices from 1891 to 1936 had consistently been too high. I suggest a reading of recommendation No. 30:

That over the period 1891 to 1936 retail prices of farm implements have been maintained at too high a level as shown by the financial returns to the companies engaged in the industry during that period.

Second, they maintained that the increase in 1936 was unjustifiable. I refer to recommendation No. 29:

That the increases announced by the companies in January, 1936, were not justified by an increase in manufacturing or distribution costs or by the financial results of the companies in so far as these were affected by the price level of farm implements.

Third, the committee was convinced that the cost of distribution was too high. I refer to recommendation No. 33:

That the committee is of the opinion that the cost of distribution of farm implements is unnecessarily high and constitutes an important factor in the prices to the consumers.

[Mr. Douglas.]

They pointed out also that the cost of machinery bought on time was so excessive as to constitute usury. I refer to recommendation No. 27:

That the cost of credit to the farmer purchasing farm implements on time is excessive and the companies should take immediate steps to reduce these credit charges.

The fifth thing I want to draw to the attention of the house is that this committee was of the opinion that unless the companies themselves took some action, the government would be justified in encouraging the cooperative distribution and servicing of farm machinery. I refer to recommendation No. 34:

That the companies themselves should make every effort to reduce these costs or farmers should be encouraged to organize for the cooperative distribution and servicing of farm implements.

This is an investigation which began two years ago. During the investigation the companies refused to lower their prices to the former level. One year ago a report was tabled proving conclusively to the satisfaction of the committee five things:

1. That the prices had been too high.
2. That the increase was unjustifiable.
3. That the cost of distribution was too high.
4. That carrying charges were too high.
5. That if the companies themselves did not do something, a cooperative organization should be set up.

Mr. SENN: That was not unanimous.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is the report of the committee and I am reading it as such. The members of the committee have the right to point out to what extent they disagreed with the report. But it was a majority report.

After these conclusions had been reached and the report tabled in this house, instead of the farm implement companies then acceding to the request to lower prices to the former level they brought about a second increase on November 1, 1937, an increase of 7·8 per cent, which in addition to the three per cent increase in January, 1936, made an increase to the primary producers of almost eleven per cent. It is apparent that the farm implement companies have no intention of cooperating with the committee; that they have defied the request of the committee to the extent not only of refusing to accede to their request, but of actually bringing about a second increase in prices. That is why, when this session opened, I placed on the order paper a resolution which reads:

Whereas the price of farm implements is too high in relation to the price of farm products.

And whereas the cost of distribution of farm implements is too high and is a major factor in the cost of farm implements;

And whereas the credit charges to farmers buying machinery on time is excessive,

Therefore be it resolved,—That this house recommend to the government that they encourage farmers to organize in provincial units for the cooperative distribution and servicing of farm implements.

I had hoped that during this session we should reach that resolution, in order that parliament might have an opportunity of taking some action, since it is quite apparent that the implement companies do not intend to take any.

When he was moving his motion of concurrence, the hon. member for Lake Centre read a letter from the United Farmers of Manitoba which was somewhat commendatory. But I have here a letter written by the same organization since this motion for concurrence was presented. I agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) that these farmers are becoming suspicious and impatient. This letter, which is dated March 16, 1938, is addressed to the chairman of the committee; it is a circular letter. I shall not take time to read all of it, but I should like to read two or three paragraphs:

I am sure there are few who realize as your address shows that the implement companies' reply to the committee report of last session was an increase of 7·8 per cent on top of the 3 per cent increase of 1936, and that it means a fresh and utterly unjustifiable levy of $4,000,000 on the farmers of the prairie for the benefit of the makers of the tools they use.

We note the seven suggestions made in your address—but feel that coming simply as suggestions and not being included in your motion they are not likely to be fully effective. I must add that apart from some definite pressure upon the implement people with a view to securing equitable rates, the suggestion of a commission such as you have in mind in No. 7 is not likely to be regarded as enough. Our people are increasingly suspicious of commissions involving fabulous fees and expenses and their reports being filed away without any action resulting. There ought to be immediate action by the government before any such commission is thought of. . . .

There must be more than concurrence in the report of last session and more than a commission to report a year or two from now. I can very definitely assure you that the farmers of the prairies will not be satisfied with these.

That is signed by Wm. R. Wood, secretary, United Farmers of Manitoba.

I therefore say that at this time concurrence in a report which is now a year old is idle and futile. Since the tabling of that report the situation has completely changed. Another increase in prices has taken place. In my opinion, which I think is shared by many people who are buying these implements on the prairies, we cannot escape our responsibilities by pious wishes and wishful suggestions; this parliament must be prepared to do something, and something of a constructive and helpful nature. I therefore move an amendment seconded by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell):

That the second report of the special committee of the house to inquire into the causes underlying the high prices of farm implements be not now concurred in but be referred back to the committee with instructions that they may add the following:

Whereas the agricultural implement companies have disregarded the recommendations of the committee and have failed to reduce their prices since this report was presented to the house on April 8, 1937, but on the contrary have announced an increase in prices which took effect on November 1, 1937, that the government carry out the recommendation of the report by taking immediate steps to assist farmers in the organization of cooperatives for the distribution and servicing of farm implements.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the address just delivered by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and also to the suggested amendment. I doubt very much, however, whether it is in order; I suggest that it is not. It deals with a matter of policy, instructing a committee to dictate government policy, something which I doubt that this house would care to do or has power to do. While you are considering the question of whether or not it is in order, Mr. Speaker, if I have your permission I shall proceed with the discussion of the original question.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has relieved me of the necessity of reading paragraphs 29, 30, 32 and 33 of the report of the committee, all of which bear directly upon the findings as this house has been called upon to consider them. It has been stated that two years ago some discussion arose in the house as a result of the increase in the prices of farm implements. That discussion arose largely because of opposition which came from the western part of Canada. I know the house does not consider the fact that the question was raised by hon. members from the west means that the objection to the increased prices of farm implements is purely a western one. The only reason the first objections came from the west, as compared with any other part of Canada, is that the west, more than any other part of Canada, depends upon machinery for successfully carrying on the industry of agriculture. However, that is not so true to-day as it was ten or twenty years ago.

Farms in eastern Canada are becoming more mechanized than they were a few years ago, and as a result of the evidence presented to the committee and the discussions which have taken place in the committee, I think it is fair to say that the objections to the two increases in the price of farm implements since this government came into power have come just as strongly from the eastern part of Canada as from the west. For that reason I would say that a discussion of this question to-day is not a sectional matter in any sense of the term, and anything I have to say is spoken on behalf of farmers whether they live in eastern or western Canada.

At page 1229 of the proceedings of the committee there is something which bears upon the method I intend to follow in dealing with the report:

> That these implements are truly representative of the industry is evident from the fact that in the case of the International Harvester Company information supplied thereon covered seventy-five per cent of its implement production at Hamilton, exclusive of parts . . .

That is, after having reported the list of implements to which special consideration was given.

> As in other branches of the inquiry the information submitted by the International Harvester Company of Canada was particularly valuable in that its cost accounting policy and system has been consistently followed since 1913 and in that its costs are all-inclusive. This company has, in the final analysis, only two kinds of expense, i.e., manufacturing and distribution, and every expenditure of the company eventually finds its way into one or the other of these categories.

In other words, in the evidence submitted by that company all costs in connection with farm implements were in one or the other of two classes, factory costs or distribution costs. The report continues:

> The companies agreed that all information submitted with regard to a binder could be placed on the printed records of the committee in order to give concrete information as to manufacturing costs and selling values in the industry. The binder was found by the auditor to be in most particulars close to the average of all the smaller typical implements selected by the committee. For this reason the undernoted tables as to the binder can be treated as truly informative.

Following that statement are three tables, one having to do with the eight foot binder of the International Harvester Company, the second having to do with the Massey-Harris binder and the third having to do with the Frost and Wood binder, and these statements are said to be typical of the costs, both distribution and factory, of all small farm implements sold in Canada. The report goes further and indicates that these delivered costs are at one particular point in Canada, and again that is a point which illustrates very well the costs to the farmers of western Canada. That point is the city of Regina, in the centre of the farming area that requires and uses more farm implements than any other agricultural area in Canada.

I am going to content myself by dealing with the International Harvester Company binder, rather than attempting to deal with all three companies, in view of the fact that it is typical of other farm implements, and it will be noted that the price of this binder to the farmer at Regina in 1913 was $167.02; in 1936 it was $281, an increase of $113.98 over the period under review. It has been said by some hon. members that labour had a great deal to do with that increase, and that where labour is concerned we should not criticize; that in this house we should attempt to do those things which will make it more profitable for men to be engaged in industry. I am prepared to defend labour's claim to consideration as strongly as any hon. member of the house, but I would direct attention to the fact that the cost of labour entering into the construction of an International Harvester binder in 1913 was valued at $11.97. In 1936 it was $22.62. The difference in the cost of labour as between 1913 and 1936 was only $10.65, but the increase in the price of the binder was $113.98. So we can make all allowance for the increased cost of labour and still discuss the question of whether or not the price of the binder is too high. Then let us look at the cost of material.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall require practically all my time, but if the question is not too long I shall try to answer it.

Mr. MASSEY: I shall put it very briefly, but I just wanted to ask if the minister was prepared to take into consideration the difference in the machines themselves. After all, you could not compare the price of the cloth for a suit of clothes to fit him with the price of the cloth for a suit of clothes to fit me.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been operating binders since 1901, and in reply to the suggestion of my hon. friend I would say that the binder in 1901 cut just as many acres—if it was the same size—and did the job just about as efficiently as the binder we are using in 1938, and in most cases it lasted longer.

Some hon. members have maintained that there has been an increase in the cost of material. There has been. In 1913 the material cost $45.56; in 1936 it cost $71.06, or an increase of $25.50 over that period of time. Some members have maintained that there has been an increase in freight costs. There has been. In 1913 freight costs were $17.80; in 1936 they were $26.08, or an increase of $8.28 in that time. So we have labour costs increasing by $10.65; material costs increasing by $25.50, and freight costs increasing by $8.28, or a total of $44.43. So I repeat that after having given consideration to these three items, we find that the price of the binder was increased by $113.98, not by only $44.43. In other words, the price of a binder could be reduced by $69.55, to sell at $211.45, without affecting increases in labour, material or freight costs, still leaving the same mark-up as in 1913. These are factors over which the companies have little if any control. They have probably no great control over the cost of labour; they have probably no great control over the cost of materials, and they have very little if any control over the cost of freight.

But there are two other items that enter into the cost of placing a binder at the disposal of the farmer. The first is the overhead or burden, the difference between the two years being $18.18. The second item is the sales cost, and in this instance the difference is $15.05. These two increases amount to $33.23. Even if the companies have no power to adjust these matters, the total increase in cost is $77.66, whereas the increase in price is $113.98. Therefore, a binder could have been reduced in 1936 by $36.32 without the companies having to adjust any of the items of cost submitted in the table which appears on page 1230. If that were done, they would still have as a mark-up exactly the same amount as they had in 1913, when they sold a binder in Regina for $167.02. If overhead costs were maintained at the 1913 level, a binder could be sold for $52 less without reducing any of the other costs and still leave the mark-up of 1913.

Someone may ask, Why compare 1913 with 1936? Nineteen thirty-six is not the year of highest cost of materials entering into the factory costs of farm implements. According to this table, the cost of delivering a binder to a farmer in Regina in 1921 was $262.53. This was the year in which binders sold at the highest price in the history of our country. The cost of delivering the same binder in 1936 was 201.74. A binder sold for $326 in 1921 and for $281 in 1936. The mark-up in 1921 is $63.47, and in 1936, $79.26. Labour received $9 more from the binder in 1921 than in 1936, whereas materials cost $41.06 more than in 1936. In other words, on the basis of 1921 a binder could have been sold for $16 less than it was sold for in 1936, and the companies would have been left with the same mark-up as they had in the year of the highest cost.

Let us take the year 1922 and compare it with 1936. According to this table the cost of delivering a binder to a farmer in Regina in 1922 was $204.91, which is $3 more than it cost in 1936. The binder was sold for $15 more in 1936.

Mr. MASSEY: You cannot compare the prices of those two years at all.

Mr. GARDINER: We shall make the comparison later. In other words, a binder could have been sold for $12 less in 1936 and have left the companies in exactly the same position as they were in 1922.

Let us look at 1926. According to this table it cost $215.61 to deliver a binder to a Regina farmer in 1926, and $201.74 in 1936. The mark-up in 1926 was $67.39, whereas in 1936 it was $79.26. On the basis of 1926 the binder could have been sold for $12 less. Let us come down nearer to the present time and consider the year 1932. According to this table it cost $236.17 to deliver a binder to a Regina farmer in 1932, and $201.74 in 1936. The mark-up in 1932 was $36.83 as compared with $79.26 in 1936. On the basis of 1932 a binder could have been sold in 1936 for $42.43 less. In other words, there was an increase in the 1936 price as compared with other years and an increase in mark-up over and above the actual costs in other years, running all the way from $12 in the lowest year to $42.43 in 1932. I contend that a binder could have been sold at a lower price, and my contention is backed up by an examination of the cost basis in any one of the years with which I have dealt.

The binder is the average implement among all the implements used by the farmers in the Dominion of Canada. Therefore, I think we are safe in saying that all other small implements could have been reduced an equal amount without putting the companies in any worse position than they were in during any of the preceding years. There is another way in which this matter may be looked at. The table shows that the cost of placing an eight foot International Harvester Company binder in the hands of a farmer in Regina in 1936 was $201.74. This binder was sold for $281 cash, which is close to a 40 per cent write-up on the total cost, which includes factory costs, distribution costs and sales costs. I think it would be more correct to figure the mark-up on factory costs alone. Why should a company draw 40 per cent on the freight, on the cost of hauling an implement from eastern Canada to Regina? It would be more correct to figure the mark-up on factory costs alone, leaving out freight and sales costs. The factory cost is $130.16, and calculated on this basis the write-up is 55 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: That would include overhead.

Mr. GARDINER: The factory costs would include overhead or burden, and labour and material. Why should not any industry base its write-up upon these factors? If the company was satisfied with a 20 per cent write-up on the actual factory costs, even though that is high, this International Harvester Company binder would have sold in Regina in 1936 for $227.61 instead of $281. That would have meant an actual reduction to the western farmer of approximately 19 per cent. As I say, the binder is an average implement, and similar reductions could have been made on all other implements, which would have meant a saving of 19 per cent on the full line of implements used by the farmers of western Canada.

I think it is apparent from an examination of the evidence placed before the committee that there is no good reason why the implement companies could not have reduced their prices in 1936 instead of increasing them. It will be said that there is a reason; that we have been passing through difficult times, but the times for the farmer in 1936 were not as difficult as the times for the farmer in 1932. With a higher cost of production the implement companies were able to sell a binder at a lower price in 1932 than in 1936. They have not been satisfied with the write-up of 1936; they have added another nine per cent to the 1936 price of binders. When I was home the other day I priced a binder in my home town, and I found that a binder that cost $295 a year ago would cost me $322 to-day. This is an increase of $27 between the time this committee first presented this report to the house and the present time. I suggest that there is no reason to be surprised that those who are interested in the implement business should cry out on occasion that these implements are different and that—

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I have no interest whatsoever in the implement business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not referring to the hon. gentleman at all. Why should he be so touchy?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is making a point of order, and has the floor.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, I interrupted the minister a few moments ago with a statement which he repeated and prefaced it with the words "those who are interested in the implement business." I—nor is any member of my family—am not interested in the implement business and have not been for six years.

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact, I did not have the hon. gentleman in mind at all at the moment, but if he thinks I referred to him I am quite prepared to withdraw the remark.

Mr. MASSEY: Thank you.

Mr. GARDINER: I was going on to deal with another matter, and was simply prefacing it with that remark. Again I say I am not at all surprised that those who are interested in the implement business in Canada called our attention from time to time to the fact that the implement is not the same implement, although again I repeat, as I did to my hon. friend a moment ago, that I have found the implement served the purpose just as well in the preceding years as it serves the purpose at the present time if you are buying a small implement to operate with horses.

But there is another matter to which they referred, and that is the cost of credit. Sometimes we are led to believe that the cost of credit is the reason for the great increase in the price of farm implements, and that the cost of credit is to be charged back to the purchaser even in the cash payment on an implement to make up for bad debt losses. If that were true, I would be justified in saying to the house that the implement companies which were practising that kind of business in this country are charging up bad business practice to the cash price of implements rather than charging up bad business practice to the shareholders who are responsible for the management of their company. But I find, on examining the evidence which was placed before the committee, that it was clearly shown that the costs of credit are not charged up in the cash price; that this cash price stands pretty clearly on its own legs, and that there is no reason for our saying that the bad debts in any way affect the increase in the cash price. The committee says, at page 1256 of its report:

> In the case of farmers purchasing on the terms set out on Table 1, it is shown that the credit expense expressed as an annual interest rate ranges from 24·7 per cent on the unpaid balance in the case of a 6-foot heavy mower to 42·5 per cent in the case of a W-30 tractor.

In Table 5 the credit expense expressed as an annual interest rate ranges from 22·4 per cent on the unpaid balance in the case of a 6-foot heavy mower to 34·9 per cent in the case of a 7-foot single disc.

Those rates are sufficient to indicate that there is no reason why any company that can borrow money from five to six per cent should lose anything in a mark-up price on account of credit, together with interest charges for carrying that credit, amounting to the figures I have just given.

The committee points out that in increasing the initial payment the companies have not decreased the amount of loading in the time prices. Thus the credit charges stated in the terms of a per annum rate of interest have increased appreciably as the amount of the down payment has been increased.

In order to explain the meaning of that I would say that we have in western Canada, in particular, implement acts, and they state the conditions under which implement companies shall sell their implements. One of those implement acts in one of the provinces was amended recently in order to say that the implement companies have a claim only against the implement itself if they undertake to repossess it. It means there has been an increase in the cash payment on the implement when the implement is purchased, but in spite of the fact that there has been an increase in the cash payment required, the farmer who buys on credit pays exactly the same amount over cash price that he paid when the implement company gave him time for three-quarters or all of the price of the implement. So the cost of carrying the unpaid part is up to-day rather than down.

The committee also says:

Two different points of view were expressed by members of the committee in the discussion over the credit policy pursued by the companies. Some members were of the opinion that the cash purchaser of farm implements has been paying some of the cost on the credit sales. Other members of the committee were concerned with the cost of credit to the purchaser who found it necessary to purchase implements on time. After consideration of these two points of view, and evidence relating thereto, the committee is of the opinion that the cash and credit purchasers have been paying too much for implements and the credit purchasers too much for the credit extended to them.

The last evidence submitted from the committee's report to justify the conclusions I intend to draw is the paragraph and table headed "Expenses incidental to the granting of credit," to be found on page 1257 of the report. It states:

Bad debt losses have, of course, been an important factor in the distribution expense and the auditor to the committee has compiled the under-noted tabulation showing the ratio of losses to net sales for each of the principal companies in the industry. This covers the period from 1926 to 1935, inclusive.

If the house will permit the few figures I have here, other than the totals, to be placed on Hansard without my reading them, it will save me perhaps the time I have lost in answering the few questions up to the moment. The figures are as follows:

	Approximate net sales in Canada	Bad debt expenses in Canada	Per cent of net sales
International Harvester Company (including trucks but excluding twine)	$117,000,000	$ 6,625,000	5·7
Massey-Harris Company (excluding twine)	58,000,000	3,452,000	5·9
Deere and Company	37,530,000	1,256,000	3·3
Cockshutt-Frost and Wood:—
East of Peterborough	6,132,000	147,000	2·4
West of Peterborough	28.078,000	1,246,000	4·5
Total	$34,210,000	$ 1,393,000	4·0
Total all companies	$246,740,000	$12,726,000	5·2

The total approximate net sales in Canada of all companies is $246,740,000 for the past ten years; bad debt expenses in Canada for the same period, total $12,726,000, or 5·2 per cent. That is, the actual bad debt losses are 5·2 per cent.

The three points which I wish to submit as a result of examining into this particular evidence in regard to credit are these:

First, the companies are not doing a losing business or they would not continue the volume of credit business they are doing in Canada to-day. The volume of credit business which the companies are prepared to do in Canada is an indication that they are doing fairly well in the credit business in this country.

Second, the high annual rates charged for credit which would be secured by the company at a fraction of the rate charged the farmer is an indication that they are not losing on their credit business.

Third, the comparatively low ratio which bad debts bear to total sales over the worst ten year period in the history of the business is an indication that they are not losing.

I think, after having considered these points, we would be justified in concluding that the credit business does carry itself. If it does, then we are justified in contending that no part of the cash price charged for an implement is made necessary by bad debts. It is, however, maintained by the committee that the cost of giving credit should be materially reduced, and hence the price to the farmer who must buy his implements on time be reduced. On page 1256 of the report the committee states:

> The committee concludes, therefore, that there is in the implement industry, an inclination to believe that a large volume of sales on such terms of credit is profitable. Both the farmer and the industry will be benefited if credit is more carefully scrutinized and the saving to the industry resulting therefrom passed on to the farmer by way of a price reduction and by a reduction in credit cost.

I think I can pass on to deal with two other matters which are of considerable concern to the house. It would appear from the evidence submitted and from the findings of the committee that there are four factors entering into price which over the period inquired into have resulted in increases in prices of farm implements delivered at the farm. They are costs of material, labour, overhead and distribution. Two of these factors may be said to have unreasonably increased. They are: (1) Overhead costs, including (a) costs of management, (b) costs of financing; (2) distribution costs, including (a) freight, (b) commissions, (c) credit, (d) sales organization.

In so far as overhead costs are concerned I can say this, that it would be difficult to imagine a more courteous, capable and energetic management for any business than those who appeared before the committee to present evidence on behalf of the implement companies. It cannot be said that the increased overhead costs are the result of poor management, and I think anyone who sat in that committee and listened to the managers of those companies who are doing business in implements in Canada to-day present their evidence, will agree with me when I say that no more efficient management could be found for any industry which is operating in this way. So any remarks that I have to make with regard to cutting down costs do not apply to the present management of companies in the Dominion of Canada or in the United States who appeared before the committee that heard the evidence. It was apparent and is a matter of common knowledge that the factories are equipped with the latest machinery with which to turn out implements. Surely the people have a right to expect, when the argument is used constantly by industry, that up-to-date machinery must be placed in the hands of those who are carrying on the industry in order that they may be able to compete with other countries, that this up-to-date machinery which is placed in the factories would produce our implements at lower costs of production. If so, the lower costs of production should result in lower prices to the consumer.

An examination of the history of machinery development and price levels from 1913 to the present reveals the anomaly of increased efficiency resulting in increased prices. I should like to suggest to the house that the people of Canada are not prepared longer either in this or in any other industry to have it represented to us constantly that in order to produce more efficiently you must have newer machinery, newer factories, and must do away with hand labour in your factories, and that, after that argument has been presented, we are going to stand for increased costs on everything turned out from those particular factories. Businesses which made wealthy men out of reputable citizens two generations ago left those wealthy men reputable citizens honoured by the whole community because of their success. The names of those citizens were household names in Canada in the eighties and early nineties of the last century. While they remained in control, prices were much more reasonable than they are to-day. How many of them control the businesses which bear their names to-day? Too many industries are controlled by corporations which have been well described as soulless. Those who have established industry in Canada have in all too many instances sold the names they made to corporations which financed upon those names in a manner which left whole families out of the industry. Instead of a man as head of an individually developed, owned and controlled factory being satisfied with a reasonable earning on his invested capital, we have organizations financed on a basis which, in order to pay what appears to be reasonable profits on invested capital, must have twenty, thirty or forty per cent on the materials, labour, overhead, sales, distribution and freight costs. Certainly the committee is right when it states that agriculture or no other primary industry can continue to pay the price of that kind of thing. It is just possible that the methods used to regulate industry when based upon individual investment and management are not suited to regulate industry based upon corporate investment and management. If the law of supply and demand is to continue to govern the price of the products of the farm and cannot be made to govern the price of the farmers' necessities, then I am afraid governments will have to assume greater control over the organizing of corporations. If government cannot find ways of establishing at a reasonable level prices of farm products, it may be necessary to find ways of preventing industry from so organizing as to drain the last dollars out of our basic industry to pay for a business set-up which does not appear to be making an unreasonable profit on capital invested in it but establishes a group of individuals in luxury, while those contributing to that luxury exist in poverty. The people of the country are sick and tired of that kind of business control and organization. If the cost of the financial set-up of the implement business necessitates the present prices, that cost ought to come down if agriculture is to continue to be practised in that part of Canada which depends upon machinery for its continuance.

But some people may say that distribution costs ought to come down and other costs might stay up. The question the farmer is asking to-day is, if a binder could be hauled to Regina for $17.80 in 1913, why does it cost $26.08 to-day? Why have we the exceedingly high credit costs of to-day? Why is it necessary for a farmer to be bothered by three or four agents in a single day attempting to sell him farm implements when he is busy trying to seed or harvest his crop with the implements he already has? It would appear from the evidence that there is an understanding among manufacturers of farm implements that any effort put forth to sell the volume justifies the increase in price necessary to cover the sales cost. The industry seems satisfied to keep out an army of men to sell and collect, at enormously increasing cost, for the results of mass production rather than attempt to sell at the actual cost plus reasonable profit upon the machinery and implements the farmers must of necessity have. Distribution costs must come down. The agricultural industry of this country cannot pay them in the prices of implements.

Then we say this, that competition reduces prices. There would appear to be only two ways of directly reducing overhead and distribution costs. The first would be by assuring that the law of supply and demand will operate. One only has to follow closely the evidence before the committee to realize that not only does the law of supply and demand not operate in setting the price of farm implements but the industry does not think it should. If the law of supply and demand operates when the demand is down, the price will be low. It is quite evident to anyone who sat in the committee that no member of the industry believed otherwise than that when the demand is down the price ought to be up. But that is not in accordance with the law of supply and demand. The whole trend of the evidence submitted was that because the demand is low and the investment remains constant, the price should remain high or be increased. The evidence also clearly shows that some power has been able to arrange that the law of supply and demand should not operate. It is submitted that there is no ground for permitting an industry so necessary to the prosperity of a primary industry to operate if controlled other than by the free operation of the law of supply and demand. They maintain that if the industry to-day is fixing prices at a level sufficiently high to take care of organization costs resulting from a financial set-up and distribution system based upon the idea that the machines of mass production must be sold, then they are justifying putting into effect the only other means of keeping prices reasonable, namely price control.

After having heard much of the evidence and read the report of the committee, I am more convinced than ever before that the farmers of this country in common with other consumers of the products of industry are being deprived of the financial advantages which invention and scientific discovery should have made possible. I prefer to see the law of supply and demand operate through competition to keep prices reasonable rather than depend upon price fixing by governments, and I think I am enunciating Liberal policy when I make that statement. But the law of supply and demand has never been able to operate in any country in the world for any considerable time under high protection. I think that can be stated clearly. I believe I can say, in answer to statements which were made in this house in early discussions of this question, that generally speaking the reducing of tariffs from time to time has reduced the price of farm implements. There may be exceptions, but there are exceptions to all rules. Let us review for a moment the history of the matter. One has only to turn to page 516 of the evidence before the special committee of 1937, and read the testimony of possibly the outstanding authority on implement manufacture and sale, Mr. C. R. Morrison, president of the International Harvester Company of Chicago, to be assured that increased tariffs tend to increase costs. I asked Mr. Morrison the following questions:

Q. I understood you to say to Mr. Thorson a few moments ago that you could supply implements from the Chicago plant to western Canada at the present rate of duty at a lower cost than from Hamilton?

A. I believe that to be the case.

Q. If the duty were 25 per cent instead of 7½ per cent could you?

A. I am not sure. We would have to do some figuring on that.

Q. It would make a difference?

A. Oh, to be sure. The amount of duty you have to pay on importation is, of course, a factor in determining which point would be most economical from which to make the distribution.

Q. That is a factor in the cost?

A. Decidedly.

In other words, there is no question in the minds of the men in the industry themselves as to whether a duty paid on implements coming into the country is a factor in the cost of delivering to the farmer, and therefore a factor in the setting of the price itself. If one has any doubt that a reduction of tariffs reduces prices, one has only to compare the table appearing at page 246 of the evidence of 1936 with the table appearing at page 1230 of the report of 1937. The duty was 12½ per cent on binders coming into Canada from 1914 to 1921. During that period, partly because of increase in costs and partly because of a relaxation in vigilance during the war period, prices rose from $167 at Regina to $326. The tariff was reduced in 1922 by 2½ per cent and there were general reductions all along the line which reduced costs of material, resulting in a $60 reduction in the price of binders. For some reason or another, when that reduction was made in 1922, during the very year in which it was made, although the reduction was only 2½ per cent, the price of the binder was reduced by $60 as compared with 1921.

Immediately following this experience, another attempt was made to bolster prices; by 1924, with an increase of less than $2 in costs, price of a binder was increased by $42. The government reduced the duty by another four per cent, leaving only six per cent. The price of binders dropped by $25 although the costs dropped only $1.65. Imagine! The duty is reduced by 2½ per cent in 1922 and the binder goes down $60, whereas inside two years the companies, with an increase in cost of less than $2, succeed in putting up the price again to $308, an increase of $42. They did not increase prices again while a Liberal government was in power. During the rule of the Conservative government and a twenty-five per cent duty, they agreed to maintain prices, and even at the risk of loss with greater costs of production than existed in 1936 they reduced prices. They maintained prices at a dead level from 1924 to 1930 when the new government was placed in power, and for a time after that government came in. The cost of production increased from $138 in 1929 to $164 in 1932, or an increase of $26, and during that period the price of a binder decreased by $10. The cost of producing a binder in 1936 was $130 and the duty, 7½ per cent, and they charged $18 more for it than they did in 1932. I venture to say that the cost of producing a binder to-day is not as high as it was in 1932, and they are charging us $322 for it. I do not hesitate to say that in spite of those two increases, one of $18 and the other of $27, the cost of producing a binder in Canada to-day is not as high as it was in 1932.

I say that in the light of these facts either this industry was playing with the propounders of high tariff during the previous government's period and is now reading a political lesson to the supporters of Liberalism, or they have been the victims of the inevitable results of high protection. What are the inevitable results of high protection? They are those that were learned during the last generation in the United States of America. High protection, by inducing competitors into a field already provided with sufficient industry, forces prices down to a point where industry cannot pay and compels price fixing to remain in business and to gain back profits. When you impose a high protective tariff and induce into industry more by way of labour, more by way of capital and more by way of industry than the demands upon that industry require, you by that very means force an unnatural competition into the business, which forces prices down. The only way in which companies have ever found it possible to overcome a condition of that kind has been through monopoly and price fixing, and it is only while they are permitted to do this that companies can increase prices in spite of the fact that there is a reduction in duties on commodities coming into the country. For that reason I repeat the statement that high protection, by inducing competitors to enter a field already provided with sufficient industry, forces prices down to that point where industry cannot pay and therefore compels price fixing in order that it may remain in business and regain profits. That is the kind of argument we hear to-day. Which ever course is being pursued by industry to-day must be brought to an end.

The industry has paid no attention to the complaints of farmers and the warnings of the committee. If they persist in this course action should be taken which they would fully understand and appreciate. Agriculture, which is the greatest primary industry in Canada, refuses to be bled any longer by half a dozen manufacturing plants which give as their only real reason the fact that they are employing 4,159 men.

We as a farming population have thousands upon thousands from Halifax to Vancouver and Victoria, and those thousands upon thousands should not be called upon to pay enhanced prices for farm machinery such as we have been asked to pay during the last two years, merely for the purpose of keeping a comparatively few people engaged in the industry. Every man employed in Canada to-day should be kept employed, but I suggest that the figures that I have submitted to the house, which will carry us back into the years when twice as many men were engaged in the agricultural implement industry, will bear me out when I say that every time better conditions under which to produce have been brought to bear upon the agricultural industry, the implement industry has prospered.

It has done better; it has been able to employ more men, to sell more machinery. The Liberal party with its policies is the friend of industry in Canada, and we are asking them to cooperate with that policy in helping this country back to a time of greater prosperity.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I submit to my hon friend Mr. Douglas (Weyburn) and the house that his amendment is not in order, because it suggests referring back the report of the committee to the committee. The committee has ceased to exist, and therefore it is impossible to refer the report back to it. The committee has ceased to exist for the simple reason that the rules provide that where a committee has submitted its final report, its proceedings are assumed to have ended, and unless the committee is revived it ceases to exist. I refer Your Honour to standing order 66 on reports from committees, citation 664:

> If a committee at the conclusion of their inquiry make a final report to the house, the sittings of the committee are assumed to have been closed, and if further proceedings were desired it would be necessary to revive the committee.

Also prorogation has the effect of ending the work of all committees and dissolving them. If a committee is to continue its work at a subsequent session, it must be revived by special motion to that effect. On that I refer to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, page 103:

> In like manner a prorogation has the effect of dissolving all committees, whether standing or special.

In the circumstances I submit that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I ask the Prime Minister why we should be considering the report of the committee if the committee has been dissolved?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What we are doing now is considering the matter of concurrence in the report of a committee. The committee had submitted its final report, and in so doing it is assumed to have ended its proceedings. As I said, prorogation itself would have ended the committee. If it were the desire of the house to revive the committee, that could be done by a motion, and then any matter could be referred back to the committee, or the report itself referred back. But at the present time the committee is non-existent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the point of order taken by the Prime Minister is correct, that there is no body now existing to which we could refer the subject matter of the amendment of the hon. member for Weyburn. I therefore declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I wish to discuss very briefly some aspects of the report which is now before the house, and to comment upon some of the statements and arguments advanced by those who have spoken to the motion. The house has been quite lenient to-night in allowing hon. members who have already spoken to overstep their time to a certain extent, and I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, May 2, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO RIGHT OF ACTION AGAINST THE BOARD

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 108, to amend the National Harbours Board Act.

He said: The purpose of the bill is to permit action against the National Harbours Board in any court having jurisdiction to adjudicate upon claims, in the same way as against individuals.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

CLAIMS AGAINST THE CROWN ARISING OUT OF NEGLIGENCE OF OFFICERS OR SERVANTS OF THE CROWN

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 109, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

He said: Subsection (c) of section 19 of the Exchequer Court Act gives jurisdiction to the exchequer court to hear and determine claims against the crown arising out of any death or injury to person or to property resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the crown while acting within the scope of his duties or employment upon any public work. The purpose of the bill is to strike out the four words "upon any public work".

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SHIPMENT OR TAKING OUT OF FURS WITHOUT PROPER AUTHORITY

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 110, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the session of 1926-27 an amendment was passed to the Northwest Territories Act providing for the levying of a tax on furs shipped from or taken out of the Northwest Territories. Under the provisions of that act appropriate regulations were passed by the Northwest Territories council. There is reason to believe that furs are now being taken out without the necessary permit having been obtained under the act, and the purpose of the present measure is to provide the appropriate means to protect the public interest in this respect.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WAR DISABILITY PENSIONS TO IMPERIAL VETERANS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What representations, if any, have been made by this government to the British government with respect to an increase of war disability pensions payable to imperial veterans of the great war now residing in Canada?

2. If any such representations have been so made, what were the nature and character of same?

3. What has been the attitude of the British government with respect to such representations?

4. Will this government consider the arrangement of a conference with the British government for the purpose of further discussing the above matter?

Mr. POWER: During the session of 1936 there was set up a committee on pensions and returned soldier problems. During the course of the hearing before the committee strong representations were made by ex-soldiers who had served in the imperial forces, at present residing in Canada, to the effect that representations should be made on their behalf to the British government. During that summer, while on the trip to Vimy, I had occasion to discuss with officers of the British Ministry of Pensions the situation with respect to these ex-members of the imperial forces. I made certain informal representations. As a result of these representations I came to the conclusion that no particular encouragement would be given to the idea that there should be special recognition for ex-imperial soldiers now residing in Canada. The British government, or representatives of the British government with whom I discussed the matter, felt at that time that it would not be fair to ex-service men residing in other dominions that special favours or special privileges should be accorded to ex-members of the forces in Canada.

As to the fourth question, this is a matter of government policy, and I do not think it has a place on the order paper.

OVERSEAS SERVICE OF CANADIAN TUNNELLING COMPANY

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. When the Canadian tunnelling company was formed in 1915, for special service overseas, were the members thereof promised extra pay?

2. Was extra pay promised them as an inducement to join said company?

3. If so, have these men been paid this extra pay?

4. Did the imperial and Australian companies, engaged in similar special work, receive extra pay? If so, at what rate?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. No extra pay was authorized to be paid to personnel enlisted in, or transferred to Canadian tunnelling companies, and no officer was authorized to make any promise as to extra pay.

2. and 3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Personnel mustered as tunnellers in British tunnelling companies in 1915, received certain special inclusive rates of pay, ranging from 6s. 0d. to 8s. 1d. per day, depending on rank—from Sapper to Sergeant.

Tunnellers' mates received working pay at the rate of 1s. 0d. per day in addition to the pay of their ranks.

No information as to rates of pay in Australian tunnelling companies is available in the department.

*REPORTED REVOLUTION PROPOSED IN QUEBEC BY FATHER GRAVEL

Mr. CHURCH:

What action will be taken by the government to prevent or suppress the revolution proposed by Father Gravel as the means for the people of Quebec to recapture their own province as reported by the press of Quebec city in articles published on April 6, 1938.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This question serves to show the soundness of the rules of the house to the effect that a question should seek to obtain information, not to supply it to the house. The government is not aware of the facts mentioned by the hon. gentleman, but I know personally that he has been wrongly informed, at least in some important particulars. I may add that the fears of the hon. gentleman are groundless. There will be no revolution in Quebec.

REPORTED ILLEGAL IMPORTATION OF ARMS INTO QUEBEC

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has an investigation been held by the government into the alleged smuggling of arms and ammunitions from the United States by fascists in the province of Quebec, as recorded in a special dispatch from Montreal to the weekly Toronto Star of April 23, 1938?

2. What action will be taken in the matter?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. Yes.

2. It is not considered in the public interest to answer this question.

NEW WESTMINSTER HARBOUR

EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES OF HARBOUR AND REMUNERATION OF COMMISSIONERS OUT OF HARBOUR REVENUES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister—for the Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce amendments to the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners Act to extend the boundaries of the harbour and to provide remuneration for the services of the commissioners out of harbour revenues.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Friday, April 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. 105, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, this bill is along the lines of the legislation of previous years. I should like to get the minister if possible to state whether the administration is to be along the line of previous years. Since the discussion on Friday the report of the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief has been distributed. Surely it is not too much to ask the minister whether he proposes to proceed along similar lines next year. When legislation of this kind was first introduced it was confessedly emergency legislation; it included drought relief and unemployment relief. Drought is due to natural causes—according to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), due to an act of God. Unemployment, on the other hand, is undoubtedly due to the blundering of man. I do not know why the two should again be put together this year.

Since unemployment can no longer be regarded as an emergency, it should not be dealt with by an emergency measure. Let us take the figures—and I am speaking now of relief apart from drought. I notice that in March, 1934, the numbers assisted, as reported by the provinces and the federal departments, excluding the drought areas, totalled 1,205,863; in March 1935, the number was 1,172,246; in March 1936, 1,240,074; and in March 1937, 1,045,766. Then unemployment dropped until in September of that year the number assisted was 543,336; but since that time the numbers on relief have been steadily increasing until we are back again in March to 848,497. So that the problem, far from having been solved, seems to be again on the increase.

I submit that this type of relief is haphazard. It bears every mark of an improvised scheme and is wholly inadequate; there are many gaps and many people are suffering. Take transients. The development of this country called for a large number of unskilled or semi-skilled workmen, a huge mobile army that could be readily transported from one province to another. This army still exists, but its members cannot establish residence in any one province. That is the difficulty. There are some 4,000 of them now roaming the streets of Vancouver; many of them belong no more to Vancouver than to Ontario or Saskatchewan or Alberta. They are part of that great army. Vancouver city ought not to be called upon to take care of them, nor should the province of British Columbia, and yet this government looks to the province to do this sort of thing. It will be said, of course, that the difficulty is inherent in our constitution, but it seems to me that we must find some way to get around it.

Since the discussion on Friday two memoranda have been sent to me from my own city of Winnipeg, one pleading for highway construction, and the other for help in the repairing and erection of school buildings. It may be said that under the British North America Act school buildings are obviously a school responsibility; but the province is almost bankrupt; and after all, why should we have expenditures on unneeded barracks, and not have expenditures on needed homes? Why should we have ornate public buildings in one part of the country, while in another part of the country we are not able to provide even for schools and hospitals?

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) in the discussion the other day spoke in favour of projects for youth training. I quite agree with him, but I would point out that the training of youth is worth very little unless it is supplemented by work for the young people so trained. Are we going to have to wait and wait until possibly a war breaks out or some other catastrophe of that kind overtakes us before granting to our youth what seems to me to be their inherent right, an opportunity to work?

There is another matter I wish to mention in this connection and that is unemployment insurance. It ought to be an integral part of any scheme of this kind. The government promised that measure very definitely at the last election. They are pledged to unemployment insurance. I do not think they can very well escape responsibility by saying that one or two provinces object to the scheme. The problem is still there. Ways and means were found, in regard to old age pensions, whereby the measure was actually put into operation even though a number of the provinces were opposed; and now even the provinces that were opposed at that time have fallen into line. We have a right to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who is now in his seat, to tell us whether the government proposes at this session to bring down unemployment insurance.

We hear a great deal from members of this house about the pioneering spirit. We are told that a great many of the unemployed ought to get out and work as the pioneers did. But surely anyone who makes this statement must realize that conditions are very different now from the conditions under which our pioneering forefathers came to this country and established homes for themselves. They were able to push into the wilderness, to conquer new territory, to discover new resources and to invent new methods. Why should not we in this house exhibit the pioneer spirit? It seems to me that it is our duty in these days to do pioneering in our modern industrial, commercial and social environment. What is the use of following along day after day, week after week, year after year, the old principle of giving doles to beggars? If we had one-tenth of the spirit of the pioneers we in this house would invent some new way of dealing with unemployment.

As I said on Friday, I hesitate to criticize the Minister of Labour in this fashion, because there is no member of the cabinet for whom I have a higher regard; but I must insist that the government must be held responsible for this situation. The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) I believe it was, pleaded for cooperation. We are very willing to cooperate, but every member of the house knows that members in opposition—for that matter any private member—cannot bring in a money bill. We know that according to the composition of the house the government has an enormous majority, and the government in taking office takes the responsibility of dealing with this situation. I do not think the minister is justified in simply bringing in an enabling bill without giving us a very much fuller explanation than he has hitherto done of what the department and the government propose to do with this question, which he himself admits is one of the most important questions before the Canadian people to-day.

Mr. HEAPS: Before the clause carries I hoped that the minister might have given an answer to my hon. friend's question. The other evening I discussed the question of relief allowances, and the minister informed me at that time that the government have very little control over the amount of relief that is granted. I do not know exactly what methods are adopted by the department to control the amount of relief granted in the various municipalities. But in introducing this measure a few weeks ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) referred to the fact that there are certain districts in Canada where it was claimed that the relief scales were too high, or were competing in recent years with the labour market. When I raised this question the other night I had in mind the fact that in the Winnipeg district those in charge of the granting of relief were laying down certain scales of expenditures to apply to persons who, previously in receipt of relief, were working either on public projects or in private undertakings. I gave figures showing how much the recipients of relief were receiving. Now I am going to give the amount that a person working is allowed to spend. I want the committee to understand the importance of the implications of an organization laying down limits to the amount which persons who happen to have been in receipt of public relief may spend.

In Winnipeg the amount allowed to a husband and wife on relief was $12.76 for food and $14.17 for rent, light, etc., making a total of $26.93 per month. Of course this does not include a great many things which are necessary to existence, such as clothing. According to the rules being laid down for the Winnipeg district it appears that if the husband is working the couple will not be allowed to spend more than $50 per month. If they do, and if they go on relief again, they will find themselves penalized. For a household of five persons the maximum expenditure allowed is $80 per month. If they spend more and subsequently have to go on relief—and such greater expenditures may be unavoidable by reason of sickness for example —they will not be given public relief unless they can show to the relief commission exactly how that money has been spent. Now in this a vital principle is involved, and the government cannot absolve itself of responsibility. The minister claims that in some districts the scale of relief is too high, so he must have had something in mind. And when relief bodies lay down regulations as to how much a month a person who has received relief may spend, they are interfering with the standard of living in a way in which I think it ought not to be done by any public body. I should like to know whether the government are in any way responsible for these regulations. If they are not directly responsible I would ask the minister whether the government have approved of any of these regulations by control over the amount of money that is spent in any municipality.

Mr. ROGERS: Taking up first the question raised by the hon. member who has just spoken, the determination of relief allowances has always remained with the municipalities, subject to provincial regulations. In the agreements between the dominion and the provinces covering the grants in aid, as I indicated last week, provision was made during the last quarter of the past year that the relief scales should not exceed the normal earnings of the individual or family. The intention of that was to prevent relief scales competing with the labour market. Apart from that we have not exercised any control whatsoever over the relief allowances in the various provinces and the municipalities within the provinces, nor do we approve the specific regulations made in the municipalities. My hon. friend will understand that those who are closest to the situation are in a far better position to do that than any officials of the dominion Department of Labour would be. There is a great diversity of relief allowances across this country from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver, and, as I pointed out before, even within the provinces there is great diversity. I know of no way in which you can deal with that satisfactorily under existing conditions except to leave it with the municipalities who are primarily concerned.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the minister approve of these municipal or other bodies associated with the granting of relief laying down rules as to the amount a family may spend during the time they are off relief?

Mr. ROGERS: There is also a provision in the recent agreements with the provinces whereby there may be assistance through budgeting during the time they are off relief, in order that those who had been on relief may be helped to spend their earnings in the most provident way. The whole intention is rather to give assistance to those who have been on relief, not to embarrass or handicap them in their reestablishment.

May I return to the series of questions raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I have no doubt they will be raised again in another form after we get beyond the title clause of the bill.

The first point he raised was with regard to the wisdom of separating agricultural relief from unemployment relief. In that connection he referred particularly to relief in the drought areas. He may not have been in the house the other day when I pointed out that when we were obliged to meet a recurrence of the drought situation in the autumn of last year it was decided that it would be preferable that the administration of direct relief in the drought areas should be placed where the administration of other forms of relief in the drought areas had already been placed, namely with the Department of Agriculture. That has been done, and will be continued.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understood that, but why bring in an omnibus bill which includes these very diverse types of relief in one measure?

Mr. ROGERS: The reason lies in the fact that we proceed under the broad provisions of this bill to enter into agreements with the various provinces concerning the administration of particular forms of relief. For instance during the past year we would normally have had as many as five agreements with the western provinces covering direct relief, youth training, joint works projects, and the various forms of drought relief. Under the broad provisions of this bill we enter into agreements with the provinces covering the various measures of relief.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about transients?

Mr. ROGERS: We have dealt with the provinces. We have recognized that transients ought not to be a direct burden upon the municipalities. At the same time there has been during the past ten years a constant movement of transients back and forth across the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For the past twenty-five years or more.

Mr. ROGERS: I am willing to agree that it has gone on much beyond ten years. It has been a feature of the growth of this country, as my hon. friend has said.

But in other years these transients might have been regarded as seasonal workers. They were usually able, at least they were willing, to find seasonal work which would carry them through the year without having to depend in any way upon state assistance. During the very severe years of the recent depression provision was made for these single unemployed transients by means of the relief camps established under the Department of National Defence. As many as 25,000 of these single unemployed were sheltered in these camps during the winter months. As my hon. friend is aware, that number was reduced very much during the summer months. in fact many of the camps were closed during that period. We prepared for that situation in a way which is fully understood by hon. members of the committee and I shall not go into it in great detail at this time.

We provided that the dominion and the provinces would assume responsibility for caring for these single homeless men during the winter months. This has been done by means of the farm employment plan in the prairie provinces and the forestry conservation camps in British Columbia. In all cases these plans have operated within restricted seasons of the year, normally from mid-October until April or May. When the severe winter season had passed many of those who had found temporary shelter or employment under these plans for transients went to various occupations of a seasonal nature. By means of these plans we have stabilized the problem, at least during the winter months, at which time it used to be very severe.

I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will agree that the provisions made during the last two or three years for the single unemployed under the farm employment plan have certainly reduced the number who would have been receiving meals at the centres where meals were given out in Winnipeg. I have seen the figures and I am sure he is fully aware of that fact, regardless of what opinion he may have of the plan. We have undertaken that burden in conjunction with the provinces and naturally we have followed the advice of the provincial authorities as to what plans were best suited to their needs.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With regard to the situation in British Columbia, I do not think it was adequately dealt with by the minister's statement. Why should the province in which a man happens to find himself when up against it have to be burdened with his care when he is not able to establish residence? The various offices having to do with social work generally insist that a man must establish residence before he comes under a certain scheme, but I do not think these men are any more a responsibility of a particular province than they are of any other province in which they may have happened to be for the last two or three years.

Mr. ROGERS: That principle has never applied to any of the projects intended to care for the single homeless unemployed men. We have never applied a strict residence qualification. In British Columbia there has been a restriction as to the date beyond which a transient entering the province would not be employed on a particular project. That restriction was applied with the full approval of the provincial authorities. We have applied the most liberal residence provisions in connection with the employment of transients, either on the special projects or under the farm employment plan. As a matter of fact it is very difficult to determine the domicile of many of these transients in British Columbia. According to the latest report I have seen, of a total number of, say, 4,000 previously employed in the forestry conservation camps in British Columbia, possibly 1,800 came from outside the province. The presumption is that the remainder could establish domicile in British Columbia. However, there are two forms of transiency, transiency within the province and that which might be termed interprovincial transiency. There is a movement from city to city within a province and a movement from one province to another. That is why in dealing with that special aspect of the general problem we have tried to meet the provinces upon the basis of our accepting with them the responsibility for the care of these transients through the severe winter months. Our past experience has shown that during the summer months, when seasonal employment is available, it is not necessary to provide this type of employment.

There is another thing which has been made perfectly clear from our experience and to which I am sure my hon. friend will agree. If you establish more favourable conditions for employment for a certain type of transient in one province than for another, you at once aggravate the problem in that province. You cannot give preferential treatment to a particular group of unemployed. In other words, you could not readily defend the establishment of works projects which would be confined exclusively to a particular group. That is why in suggesting works projects in other years we have made them as readily available to married heads of families on relief as to the single unemployed.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why the city of Vancouver should be forced to care for these single unemployed transients who are not from Vancouver? As the minister has just said, a large proportion of them are not even from British Columbia. Is there any reason why the citizens of Vancouver should have to pay for these men during the few weeks in the spring after the camps close and in the fall before the forestry camps are open?

Mr. ROGERS: My impression is that the municipalities generally have not been held responsible for the care of these men apart from special projects. Assistance is given by the dominion to the provinces through grants in aid which are supposed to cover relief generally within the province, in no way excluding what may be done for these single unemployed men.

Mr. GREEN: These men cannot be allowed to starve. They go out with tin cans to collect money and many of them have been put in gaol. They have developed quite a technique in collecting money in the city. The result is that the citizens have to pay. Surely the dominion government should be able to make some provision to prevent the placing of this burden upon the citizens of the city. This condition is worse in Vancouver than in any other part of Canada. I believe we have more transients who drift into the city. I urge the minister to endeavour to find a solution for this problem, which arises every year.

Mr. MacINNIS: When I spoke during the debate on the second reading of this bill on Friday last I drew to the attention of the house the situation existing in Vancouver. I pointed out that at the end of March this year there were approximately 6,900 persons on relief, that is, heads of families and single unemployed transients, but not including dependents of heads of families. I pointed out also that that was about one thousand less than at the same time last year. To take effect either on March 15 or April 1 the provincial government is compelling the cities and municipalities of British Columbia to take over the burden of the relief of a considerable number who heretofore have been cared for by the province. I received yesterday from Vancouver a statement of the number of cases and the monthly expenditures in connection with their keep. While at the end of March of this year the number of cases was one thousand less than last year, beginning with the first of April 3,445 new cases have been placed on the relief list in the city of Vancouver. I presume that other cities and municipalities had additions to their lists as well, but I am not conversant with that.

It is quite impossible for the city of Vancouver with falling revenues to take care of the increasing numbers of relief cases. The monthly cost for these 3,445 persons is computed at $34,072; that is for food, clothing and shelter, and does not take into account medical attention and other incidentals. The method that is now being followed in my opinion will never deal with the unemployment situation definitely or satisfactorily. We have to realize that the people can get their sustenance only from the industries of the country. It does not matter how it comes to them; it comes from industry in the last analysis, and this government will have to tell the owners of industry that either they must so operate their industries that they will support the people of this country, or the government will organize industry for that purpose.

Mr. EDWARDS: How can they do it?

Mr. MacINNIS: How otherwise are you going to end unemployment?

Mr. EDWARDS: How are you going to operate industry if you have not any business?

Mr. MacINNIS: If it is not the business of industry to operate their industries to support the people of this country, what is it?

Mr. EDWARDS: To make money.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am glad to get that answer. I have been telling this house for the last eight years that under the capitalist system the function of industry is to make profits for the owners of industry. But to-day industry cannot make profits for its owners and at the same time supply the people with the goods they need. That is the very thing that the government of this country and of every capitalist country has to face. I do not say that it is an easy problem to solve, that it can be taken care of offhand by just making a statement in this house or anywhere else; I am satisfied that it cannot be taken care of until we reorganize industry to perform the functions that industry was intended to perform. In the solution of that problem I am prepared to assist either by saying nothing or by helping in any other way that I can.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that the best way to do that sort of thing is to put a little money into industry and hire some people, and try it out.

Mr. MacINNIS: This is not the time to go into that point. It does not make any difference how much money you put into industry unless industry distributes the means of purchasing the goods produced. The difficulty we are met with to-day is that too much of the fruits of industry or of the income created by industry go to people who do not need it and cannot use it, and they cannot put it into new industry. There is any amount of money available in the Dominion of Canada and any amount of money available in the United States to double our industries, but we cannot dispose of the products because the people have not the means to buy them.

The Minister of Labour said a few moments ago that in dealing with the unemployment situation the government had to be careful that they did not give a scale of relief higher than the wages paid in industry, because otherwise there would be a tendency for people to go on relief and keep away from work. Would my hon. friend examine the payrolls of industry and the relief rolls and then express his opinion as to whether or not the people of this country, with the very small wages they are getting, or the very inadequate relief they receive, are able to buy the products of mass production industry? It simply cannot be done.

Mr. COLDWELL: The preamble seems to indicate to me the utter bankruptcy of this parliament in dealing with the problem. It states:

> Whereas it is in the national interest that the dominion should continue for a further period to support and supplement the measures of the provinces and other bodies to establish certain unemployed persons in gainful occupations, to train other unemployed persons for like establishment and to assist those in need.

And so on. The word that I should like to emphasize is the word "continue." For some nine or ten years now we have been dealing with this problem exactly in this way. Month by month of late we have seen the unemployment figures mount, and now we are faced apparently with another period of distress similar to the period through which we thought we had passed. My friend from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) a few moments ago pointed out some very salient facts. I was lately looking at some returns of corporations which have to some degree a monopoly in our country. International Nickel, for example, last year made a net profit of between $52,000,000 and $53,000,000. I saw the balance sheet of Consolidated Smelters of Trail, British Columbia, the other day, which reported a profit last year of some $16,000,000. They placed $3,000,000 in reserve to assist them in the paying of profits this year, and then they declared a dividend of $2.50 on every five dollar share. That may be due to good management, and I think probably it is, but the point I am making is that the people who to a large degree are receiving the dividends from these corporations either cannot or do not spend this money in consumable goods in Canada. We are building up giant financial corporations, giant monopolies, and every year more and more their dip into industry is greater. We all saw a short time ago the representations that were made to the textile commission, wherein it was shown that Dominion Textiles on an original capital of $500,000 paid out in dividends, and so on, during a period of thirty-one years, over $14,000,000, an average return on the original investment of over 96 per cent.

The other evening we heard an excellent address from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), in which he pointed out the exactions that have been made upon the producers of Canada generally, and of western Canada in particular, by the great agricultural implement industry. What I should like to have asked the minister at that time was this: What does he propose to do about it? How does he propose to meet the situation? What are his concrete proposals? For years we have heard criticisms respecting the accumulation of wealth, the growth of monopolies and the exactions made by them. To the present time this parliament has done nothing about it.

As I said last week, there is a growing feeling of discontent throughout the country. People are moving from place to place in a vain endeavour to find work. This afternoon just before I took my seat in the chamber—indeed, after I had taken my seat—I was called out by a young man who had come down from my constituency looking for something to do in Ontario. There is nothing to do in western Canada for young men of that type. All I could tell him was that unemployment is increasing, and that every week-end in Montreal business men were talking about the lay-offs which are being made. The same condition exists in Toronto.

Here we are in the year 1938, attending the third session of this parliament, in fact getting on towards the end of the session, and all we have before us is a bill saying that we must continue to assist the provinces in providing relief and in endeavouring to train our youth. Yet everywhere we have trained men and partly trained men seeking jobs. As a former teacher of youth may I say that in my opinion probably the greatest tragedy we are witnessing in Canada is the frustration of these hundreds of thousands of young people all across Canada. In order to better their condition they are ready to turn to almost anything. Unless we wake up and do something we are going to be faced with a very serious situation.

These things have been said before. Before rising to speak I said to one of my colleagues that all this discussion seems so futile. I feel the futility of it all, because until we are prepared really to examine the fundamental basis of our economic and social structure and grapple with the problems which have arisen in that social and economic structure, we are not going to find the solution to the problem.

Two or three years ago I read the report of the Hoover committee in the United States, a very conservative committee set up by President Hoover in 1932, and reporting in 1934. While I speak entirely from memory I recall that that very conservative committee reported that if the industrial equipment of the United States, the labour then available, and the natural resources, were properly organized and utilized for the good of the American people, they could provide goods and services which would give to every family of five persons an average standard of living such as was then enjoyed by those who received incomes of over $4,000 per year.

That was a startling statement. We too have the resources; we have the equipment; we have the labour. Yet, under our present economic structure, leaving it to competitive industry—which, as the Minister of Agriculture showed, does not exist any more because another factor has entered into the economic structure which has set aside the old law of supply and demand—there is no cure. Perhaps if we could go back to that old law we might get a new start; but we cannot go back Society never does.

My purpose in rising is to emphasize the fact that fundamental changes must come, a fact with which I believe the minister must be familiar. I urge upon the minister and government to consider these matters in the light of new conditions which have arisen in the last twenty-five years, and to bring before us proposals not for the continuance of relief but for the elimination of unemployment and of the necessity of continuing to provide relief for persons who are able-bodied and ready and willing to work on the land, in the forests, in the mines, or in industry and elsewhere.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is an exceedingly able speaker. The house listens to him with rapt attention and then—I believe I am safe in following him and saying what he said—it agrees to do precisely nothing.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

For a moment or two I should like to go back to 1930, and attempt to analyse the differences existing between 1930 and 1937. These, in my view, are the main causes of the unemployment we have to-day. In 1930 we had a one per cent sales tax, while in 1937 we had an eight per cent sales tax. In 1930 we had no excise tax, now we have a three per cent excise tax, in reality a tariff of that amount, upon all goods coming from foreign countries. In addition to that we have a tariff which has reached heights never before approached in Canadian history. It is so high that I feel quite certain neither the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) nor the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) could by any possibility look over the top of it.

We now have a tariff framed upon a new basis. Our customs tariff, which records the rates for the Dominion of Canada, is now distributed with blank pages interspersed here and there throughout the book. The object of the blank pages is to provide a place on which one may write the real tariff, because the tariff schedule as it stands does not reveal the true situation. One must get the true rate from the customs branch by a special statement. Even then I venture to assert that if to-day I were to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) the tariff on certain items of cotton goods from the United States he would have to tell me, "Well, it is recorded in the book." But one must then add three per cent to the tariff, and a further eight per cent sales tax, and then if one wishes to follow it through to the last he would be told that in addition section 36 of the Customs Act has to be considered, through which special values are imposed upon products coming from the United States. To a certain extent that value depends upon the humour of the man who makes the valuation or, to go back to an old phrase, the rate of customs duty depends upon the length of the chancellor's boot.

I venture to suggest to the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister that if we were to return to the tariff and taxation levels of 1930 our unemployment problem would be solved. We are diverting a large amount of the earnings of our people from the purchase of consumers' goods to expenditures upon relief, railways and other things, and there is not left a sufficient sum to provide a normal purchasing power for the people of Canada.

When we consider these problems what do we do? The suggestions are many and varied. One man says we ought to provide unemployment insurance. Not long ago in the house I explained that after careful calculation I had found the earnings of the farmer amounted to $362 per year while the earnings of the labourer in industry amount to well over $900 per year. And so if we provided unemployment insurance we would be setting up further taxation upon people receiving less than $400 in order to provide insurance for those receiving more than $900. You are proposing to expend money upon public works, but I ask, when you have expended money upon public works, unless they render a direct serviceable value, unless they have an exchange value to the community, unless they assist in the movement of commodities or in some way in improving the efficiency of our services in the Dominion of Canada, what have you? You have men temporarily employed in a particular business and as soon as that is over they have no employment. But if on the other hand we made some effort to reduce taxation so that we could free some of this money which is now spent upon taxation, I venture to assert that your unemployment would dissolve like the early cloud in the morning dew.

But, as the previous speaker has said, we hear all these things but parliament never comes to grips with them. No one will answer the statement that I have made now. No one will meet me and try to disperse—if I may use that term—or deny or meet the arguments that I have made. I do not agree with my hon. friend the previous speaker; I do not accept his conception that we can abolish unemployment by nationalizing industry or anything of that kind; but I should like to see his arguments met and I should like to see parliament actually consider this problem instead of going on as we are doing day after day—discussing, listening, many of us, perhaps all of us, in earnest, but very few, I am sorry to say, perhaps none of us knowing where to go.

I turned over to-day by chance the last page of The Count of Monte Cristo. It is, I think, the strongest closing of any novel I have ever read: The Count sends his message and he says, "The greatest of all human wisdom is to wait and hope." Well, it may be something by way of a philosophy to go through life with charming ease and patience and say, "We shall wait and hope. We shall not do anything to solve the problems. We shall simply wait and hope." But I want something just a little different. I want something done to-day. I want some consideration of these problems in order that something may be accomplished in our own time. This is what I ask the house. This is what I know the country asks of us.

Mr. PELLETIER: As I rose to speak a moment ago I intended to say that the remarks I was about to make were to supplement the observations of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), but having listened to what has just been said by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) I believe I should add something to supplement the remarks made by both hon. members.

Yesterday was May 1, and upon that occasion throughout the world many workers united in order to discuss their various problems. But what appeared to me most striking was the news which came from Germany of a speech made by Hitler on the occasion of his addressing hundreds of thousands of persons. This is what he said, in effect. "The so-called democracies of the world have been laughing at fascism for the past five years. They have thought that what we were trying to do was a ridiculous thing. Well, I say to them that there are no idle hands in Germany; there are not sufficient hands to do the work that we wish to have done. Meanwhile, although the so-called democracies have yet to solve their problem of unemployment, they presume to laugh at us." I say, because I believe it is a timely matter to mention, that in various parts of Canada we are seeing the rise of fascism. Why? Simply because of inaction. It is because these democratic institutions that we should like to preserve are represented by people who are either unable or unwilling to grapple with the problems we have to face. It is unquestionably true that in the so-called democracies of the world—and I speak particularly of Canada, the country I know best—the problem of unemployment has not been solved, nor has any attempt yet been made at a solution. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has stated, the preamble to this bill is ample evidence that the present situation will be permitted to continue.

We set up an employment commission, and amongst the recommendations that that commission submitted I find these words:

> Unquestionably—

"Unquestionably" is quite plain.

> —however, the immediate effects of the introduction of labour-saving devices in particular geographical areas or in particular industries are often such as to deprive special groups of workers of their livelihood through no fault whatsoever of their own.

I believe that the employment commission has there given us a ray of light, at least some hope as to where we may look for the solution of the problem which faces us to-day. Many hon. members laugh at some of the arguments advanced by our group. We have favoured the payment of a basic dividend in order to remedy the displacement caused by technical and mechanical developments. I do not care how ridiculous the people who laugh at this theory may think it is; at least it is a concrete suggestion made in an earnest endeavour to meet the problem, and not the type of "policy" which says, do nothing at all.

I rise to-day not to defend fascism but, because I believe in democracy and would like to retain democratic institutions, simply to point out that if fascism has been able to gain the hold it now has in Germany and elsewhere it is because democratic governments were content to let things slide and to do nothing. So in Germany to-day, when the youth of that country have bread instead of the announcement of some individual that he is "watching the situation," they can at least claim that they have got somewhere.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend say that the youth of Germany are getting better bread to-day than Canadians on relief? Let us in this discussion stick to some facts.

Mr. BENNETT: They are getting as good bread—rye bread.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am not discussing the quality of the bread. I said that in the speech made by Hitler in Germany yesterday he maintained that there is no unemployment in that country.

Mr. GARDINER: How many are in the army?

Mr. DUNNING: Can the hon. member tell us how many are in the army?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There was no unemployment, either, among the slaves in the south.

Mr. PELLETIER: Hitler maintained that there were not sufficient hands to do the work which had to be done. The fact is that the situation in this country has come about because of the inactivity of so-called democratic institutions. I have no desire to see such a form of government in Canada. I should like to see this government do something; even if it is a Liberal government I would support it if it would do something concrete to alter the present state of affairs, to give the people of this country bread, not merely to tell them that the situation is being watched. I might bring a specific case to the notice of hon. members, but I do not see the use of doing it; however, I definitely know that the Minister of Labour has been compelled to contribute out of his own pocket for the subsistence of a family who cannot qualify under any governmental scheme. Of course we were told that nobody was responsible; we agreed that it was a sad case but what could we do about it, there were no laws to take care of it, so we had to dig down in our own pockets and provide for the maintenance of that family. That is not meeting the problem; it is letting things drift, it is shifting responsibility from one place to the other. Unless we face our responsibilities the prospects of the fascist movement in this country are greater than perhaps we are willing to recognize at the present time.

Mr. BARBER: I think it is quite apparent to all that the government has failed to meet Canada's greatest problem, that of unemployment and relief. The bill before us is merely to provide that some relief will be given for a certain period. This is now the third session of the present parliament, and the figures which have already been furnished this afternoon demonstrate that not much improvement has been made. Under this bill, I believe, provision will be made for some undertakings in the form of public works about which we shall learn later when the supplementary estimates are brought down. I suggest that instead of constructing public buildings a considerable sum might be devoted to the construction of homes. I have just returned from British Columbia and during the Easter recess I came in contact with representatives of municipalities and of some of the cities of the coast. I find that under the Dominion Housing Act no further action is being taken. On the lower mainland of British Columbia they are at present prepared to construct something like 1,000 homes, in my particular district over 100. They were given some encouragement at first but now they find that they cannot make any arrangement whatever with the loan companies or with those with whom the government cooperates. Whether that is the fault of the government or of the loan companies we do not know. I promised to bring the matter to the attention of the minister and through him to the attention of the Minister of Finance and to point out that this is the state of affairs that exists in connection with the housing scheme under that act.

Mr. ROGERS: Is that on the mainland of British Columbia?

Mr. BARBER: Yes. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that it may be the fault of the loan companies. At the beginning when this scheme was being put into force in the early days of the administration of the housing act, the loan companies gave some excuse for declining to take any part in the scheme or to advance money. The Minister of Labour might make provision under the bill, in cooperation with the Minister of Finance, whereby, should these companies continue to act as they are doing at the present time, some arrangement could be arrived at with the municipalities and the smaller cities to carry on this scheme. It is true, some of the municipalities in our province are not in a very good financial position, while others are in excellent shape. Some have no debt whatever. The municipalities and some of the smaller cities have conducted their affairs along business lines, having balanced their budgets for years, and are therefore meeting the emergencies that confront them in these days. I would suggest to the minister that he and the Minister of Finance might consider something in the way of advancing moneys through the councils of the municipalities and the smaller cities to citizens who wish to build homes. The municipality would be, in my opinion, the proper body because they could collect it when they are collecting the taxes, and remission could be made direct to the department.

I note that there will be continued cooperation with the provinces in certain undertakings. I do not know whether all the provinces carry out these works along the same line as they do in British Columbia, but I had what I regard as a sad experience in the last couple of weeks. I refer to the practice termed patronage, and I believe it was the rankest example I have seen during the twenty-five years I have been in public life. In the Fraser valley district there is a provincial riding in which there will be a by-election very soon. I drove through that riding and talked to a large number of unemployed on relief and to others who were on the brink of relief. I found that some of the straw bosses had called a day or two before and asked them if they would like to get some work, and they replied that they certainly would. They were told, "Well, if you will sign up as a member of the Liberal Association we will see that you go to work on the twenty-fifth—" that is, last Monday. Two men on whom we called told us that they had come from Saskatchewan. They had been living there some time and were not on relief; they were doing their best to keep off relief. They declared to the straw boss: "We will join anything to get a job; that is the condition we are in." And they joined up. The man pulled a paper out of his pocket and they signed up, and they were to get a job commencing on the twenty-fifth, which will last until election day.

Mr. ROGERS: They were not dominion-provincial projects.

Mr. BARBER: It was road work. I found in travelling through the district that these men would not even dare to attend a meeting in opposition to the government. I was informed that a man is posted outside, their names are taken, and they are blacklisted as far as employment is concerned if they attend such meetings. More than that, there is almost intimidation being practised, for the men seeking employment were told, "We know how you will vote because the ballots are numbered." I explained that though the ballots and the counterfoils were numbered no one would know how they voted, but they were convinced that they had to go to the polls and vote Liberal. Men were being taken out in trucks. On Monday morning, the twenty-fifth, one of the straw bosses left in a truck with thirty men to work on a road. He is going to see that they vote, and vote right.

There was another matter I discussed with the minister before recess, and that was in regard to settlers from the dried-out area settling in municipalities. That has continued and no relief has been given. The municipalities carry these families until they have resided the required period, when the provincial government will contribute. I believe the minister said this afternoon that farm relief in the drought areas came under the federal Department of Agriculture. That means that a direct contribution is being made through that department. What I have suggested, and what the reeves' association of the lower mainland suggest, is that that relief should follow these people until they have put in the period of ten or twelve months, or whatever is required by the provincial authorities before they contribute. As it is, they are the sole charge of the communities in which they settle. I believe that ninety per cent of them would make good citizens if they were given a chance. But some of the municipalities have been compelled to buy transportation for them and ship them back to the dried-out areas, and therefore they go back on government relief; whereas if the relief followed, with the cooperation of citizens and different organizations, these people would become settled and would make good citizens.

These are a few of the suggestions I have had to offer and I can assure the minister that he will have my cooperation in any effort he makes to relieve the situation that exists in British Columbia. We would like the minister to make some statement in regard to a general solution of the whole problem; that is whether the government intends to meet this problem in some heroic manner this year, or, as one hon. member expressed it this afternoon, follow a "wait and hope" policy.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am quite sure that this committee and the whole country will agree with me when I say that there is no one solution which can be applied by this or any government for the difficulties facing so many people in Canada at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: There was in 1930-35.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There was no solution but a panacea was adopted which made the situation very much worse than before.

Mr. BENNETT: And that is being followed to-day.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Oh, no; it is not. I will give the best evidence that it is not being followed to anything like the same extent: the tremendous improvement which has ensued in the last three years by departing from the panacea that was adopted and is still advocated by some, and allowing the people of this country a greater degree of freedom, even though the sales tax was increased, to increase production. The situation has been improved to an extent that my friends opposite and those in the corner are not always willing to admit. It is true that it is not as good as we should like it to be, nevertheless it is substantially improved. As to the crazy measures that my right hon. friend introduced, whereby he was determined to limit the production of wealth—why, he even sent his emissaries to London deliberately to agree to limit by law the production of wealth in this country, something which when it results from acts of Providence is a cause of mourning and distress. And he supported others who would limit the production of food so there would be less available for consumption. Surely no one can object to the use of the word "crazy" to characterize a policy such as that.

Mr. BENNETT: There were only fifty-five countries concerned; they were all crazy!

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Fifty-five or a hundred, none carried it out.

Mr. BENNETT: They all did.

[Mr. Barber.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And still it was crazy.

Mr. BENNETT: They were all out of step except my Jock!

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): More than Jock were not in step. The wise countries of the world did not do it.

Mr. BENNETT: They all did. Name one that did not.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The great country to the south agreed to do it, but Providence came along on the day the final decree was signed in Washington—

Mr. BENNETT: Nevertheless they did it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In this country I was going to say my right hon. friend did not have the courage to enforce this law, but rather he had the better judgment on second thought not to try to do so. But Providence did it for him, and that is one of the main causes of the trouble which we are facing to-day. What did the other countries do? Russia paid no attention to it; Australia walked right through it; Argentina laughed at it, and Canada was left holding the bag, the surplus wheat that was needed in the world and that she would not dispose of. That policy brought about some of the conditions from which we are now suffering.

Mr. BENNETT: "Surplus" the hon. member said.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, surplus as far as Canada was concerned, because the Canadian people could not eat it. My friends in the corner say we have in Canada so much; why cannot our people get it? But there never was any hunger for wheat in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There was always all the wheat our people could consume for food, but by law those who owned it were prevented from exchanging it for other things.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does the hon. member say that all the people in this country who wanted flour could get it?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Anyone who wanted to buy wheat—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Oh, who wanted to buy it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Well, what did my hon. friend expect? My hon. friend not long ago was pleading the cause of the big farmers who had a thousand acres and were limited to seed for 250 acres; of course they could not give it away.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I asked the hon. member a question and he avoids it very adroitly. He said there was no lack of wheat. I asked the hon. member if there were any people in Canada who wanted flour and could not get it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I say this, and I think it will be clear even to the hon. member for Weyburn, that the lowest income people of this country during the past eight years, whether through their own earnings or through the relief given by public authorities, had no difficulty in buying all the wheat and all the flour they could use, because that was the cheapest form of sustenance possible, and among the best they could get. The difficulty was not that they were unable to buy wheat and flour, but that they were unable to buy the other things which other people had been producing, because they could not sell their wheat in the markets of the world. Wheat was selling at one-third of a cent a pound; it was not difficult for even the poorest people of the country to get sufficient wheat. I admit that wheat has not been used to anything like the extent that it would have been wise to use it; there has been considerable change in the use of foodstuffs in recent years, and wheat has been largely neglected. But I have got off the track in talking about wheat.

It is necessary under the circumstances to introduce legislation such as this, in spite of the fact that no single cure can remove all the troubles from which Canada is suffering at the moment, and that there is no panacea. My friends the socialists had a panacea three or four years ago. They were going to dominate and control the instrumentalities of production and distribution and all natural resources; they were going to control land and produce crops, control the forests and produce lumber, and distribute the crops and the lumber and the minerals. I should like to know if they would distribute some of the nickel they talked about so much to the people of this country. How much good would the nickel do them?

Mr. COLDWELL: They could use the profits.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But the nickel would have been disposed of elsewhere in the world, and the goods that came in would belong to the people who developed the nickel properties and paid the cost of producing them, who owned the properties and paid the wage earners and all that. My hon. friend's philosophy is to take over all the successful industries—

Mr. COLDWELL: Why take over the unsuccessful ones now?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): —which are being run more efficiently than any government could run them. But my hon. friend was not going to run them himself even, he was going to bring in experts from England.

Mr. COLDWELL: Permit me to correct that statement. It is not true.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I accept my hon. friend's word, but in his written and public speeches he advocated bringing someone like G. D. H. Cole. Can you imagine bringing a theorist, or some university professor—

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I said I did not advocate that, and my hon. friend persists in saying I did. I ask him to accept my statement.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I readily accept the hon. member's statement, but I say that in literature appearing over his name and in speeches attributed to him in the public press he was credited with that design, so if any injustice is being done to him I am not the guilty party.

Mr. COLDWELL: Again I rise to a point of order. I said nothing of the kind. I said that men with economic knowledge of the type of G. D. H. Cole were readily available to advise any government—not necessarily men from England, but in Canada as a matter of fact.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I think the explanation is of the kind that makes confusion worse confounded. However I am satisfied with it. Unquestionably the promise made by the hon. member's party at that time was that experts of that type would be brought in. Fortunately the electors had the good judgment not to give him the opportunity.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Was not my hon. friend's party going to give us the panacea of free trade?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If the hon. member for Weyburn, who occupies so much time airing his knowledge, will allow me to proceed, I have told him already that there is no panacea for this trouble by which we are faced. Seeing that he does not understand it, and I think he should, I shall tell him again. He comes from a part of the country where there has been an object lesson always in front of him every day of the time he is there, provided he has not been there more than eight years. He must have seen the lack of results that have been achieved in trying to produce new wealth. If he does not recognize this as one of the major difficulties facing our country at the present time, then he is indeed more foolish than I ever gave him credit for.

There is another matter I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Labour. He knows it well enough himself, but because of the circumstances under which he finds himself it is necessary that it be brought to his attention time after time in order to overcome the panaceas and solutions which so many would-be saviours of the country and of democracy are ready to make, in spite of the fact that they should know if they pursue their studies far enough their solution will make things worse than they were before.

Mr. PELLETIER: May I ask a question?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I shall come to the hon. member for Peace River in just a moment. He should not be in too big a hurry. We have in Canada vast natural resources which have been properly and efficiently developed to a great extent.

Mr. MacINNIS: Whom does the hon. member mean by "we"?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I mean you, myself and the other fellow.

Mr. MacINNIS: There are not many of them over here.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is because you have neglected to do what so many of us have done, what the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture and many hon. members who sit around me have done. All you had to do was to go to a land office and plank down ten dollars to obtain the right to move on to a quarter section of the resources of this country. Any man who did that and made a good job of it owns some of the resources.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He might get a job as road inspector.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member for Weyburn talks about getting a job as road inspector, but I say to him that the shoemaker should stick to his last. The preacher should stick to his congregation if it is worth sticking to. Apparently my hon. friend has lost faith in his occupation and seeks to get into a higher and better class. No government of this country has placed obstacles in the path of anyone who wanted to get hold of some of the resources of this country. Neither the government of my right hon. friend nor any other government has placed obstacles in the way of getting some of these resources. By the adoption of unwise policies, by the building up of artificial communities, by the creating of artificial industries many people have been induced to move into the cities and to leave alone the resources of the country. The only way wealth can be created is from natural resources; that is where the production of wealth must start. A short time ago my hon. friend referred to something that Mr. Hoover said, to the effect that if people were more efficient, if they made better use of the country, they would be able to produce more wealth. However, they might do what Mr. Hoover and his successors have done, prevent that wealth from getting into circulation.

I want to say a word or two about the pessimism exhibited by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He and his party contended that there would be no hope unless the people of Canada put themselves into the hands of himself and his friends. There would be government or public ownership of our natural resources. The hon. member referred to one or two corporations and the profits they had made. I think everyone will agree that those profits did not come from the workers in those industries, because they are the most highly paid in the dominion. I think it will be agreed that they were not due to the conditions under which these men work, because they are about the best in any industry. If the profits came from anywhere, they came from the prices obtained for the products produced. However, the government has a remedy against that condition by way of taxation. In that way this wealth is being redistributed to some extent.

One of these companies is spending millions of dollars in northern Canada, much of it in Saskatchewan, in developing new mining prospects and setting up mining plants. I do not know where the company could have got the money to do this work except out of the profits that had been accumulated at other times. This is just an example of what must be done to solve this problem. There is no panacea for our troubles.

I come now to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) who was in such a hurry a little while ago. So far as I know, for the first time he and his party have come out in their true light by holding up Mr. Hitler and fascism as an achievement for our edification. A large number of people in Germany are under military rule, and if my hon. friend and his party once have power and carry out a similar rule in this country, they will have to import men to fill the vacancies created in industry by taking men out in order to build up an army.

Mr. PELLETIER: That statement is incorrect and I ask the hon. member to accept my version of what I said. I said that if this policy of laissez-faire were continued, fascism would develop in the country. I did not advocate fascism.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I still contend that the hon. member held up Hitler and fascism to our admiration. He told us that there were no unemployed in Germany.

Mr. PELLETIER: It was as a warning.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There would be no unemployed in Canada if we adopted the same system.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Eden said the same thing in England the other evening.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I have no objection to Mr. Eden or anyone else saying it. That does not prevent my using my own common sense in connection with unemployment in this country. Many of the people in Europe did not understand freedom and democracy. They were not ready to accept the benefits of democracy when the opportunity was offered after the war. They did not understand these institutions as we do.

Mr. POOLE: What would we do with our unemployed?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Not so long ago there were no unemployed in this country and that time will come again when the resources of this country are developed as they should be.

Mr. POOLE: What freedom is there for the unemployed?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If my hon. friend asked that question of his friend Hitler he would soon be taken out and disposed of in some way. Instead of encouraging the production of the wealth which is so necessary to our country, instead of bringing about the development of our natural resources, our hon. friends offer some mythical scheme by which real wealth can be taken out of the pockets of the people and distributed to other people without its costing anybody anything. They offer a magic formula by which everyone will have wealth without doing any work for it.

An hon. MEMBER: Ask the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The Minister of National Defence knows that if he is going to get appropriations for his department for defence purposes, he is not going to get it simply out of a drop of ink. My hon. friends over there are rather smart, but they do not like questions to be asked of them. They want to spend their time reading quotations from books they do not understand or have not thought their way through. They have not yet come to the conclusion which is held by reasonable and intelligent people that two and two always make four. They have always some magic formula to make two and two eight, or sometimes three. If they would devote a little more time to thinking and a little less to reading quotations they would get along better.

It is not within the responsibility of the Minister of Labour to make easier for us at the moment the means of exchange of wealth or the bringing into this country of goods to pay for goods that go out, and so on this bill I am not going to advise the minister as to that. I do not think it would be in order in any event. I should like to back up the plea of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) that as quickly as possible reductions should be made in taxation for the purpose of leaving that wealth with people who can make better use of it than any government can do. Let it stay in the hands of private individuals who will use it for productive purposes, rather than have it collected and spent by the government.

I should like to say to the minister, and I am sure he will agree with me, that in the disbursement of money in accordance with the terms of this measure every effort should be made to see that the money is spent for the most useful public works—works that will be of value and available for the enjoyment and profit and pleasure of all people. I do not think that buildings in large cities fall within that category. I do not think housing schemes carried out by the government fall within that category. The government cannot build houses for all the people; they must select the recipients of the houses they build. It is all right for the government to help housing schemes under strict regulations so that anyone who comes within the regulations and meets with the requirements can get the benefits of the scheme, but to say that the government should step in and provide houses for all the people of Canada, well, that is not the spirit that built up Canada or will continue to build it up from now on.

There are works that can be done to advantage at the present time. Labour is plentiful, and there is no great demand for excessive wages for the necessary labour to take care of these improvements that would benefit all the people. Equipment is reasonably plentiful. It has not been in use for a long time, and not much equipment would be needed. The original Hudson Bay railway was largely built by men with wheelbarrows and shovels.

That was all the equipment they needed. Furthermore, I believe it was built at about as low a cost as it could be done to-day with much more modern machinery. The difference in cost between doing work by that method, which looks antiquated, and by the most modern machinery, is not so great as might appear on the surface. In any case the money spent in that way went directly into the pockets of labour, which was better than having the work done by machinery and using machinery supplies, the benefit of which would go elsewhere. I am not one of those who believe that machinery does away with the opportunities for labour, but it does dislocate the demand for labour and causes additional work to be provided in some other part of the country rather than in the part where the machine is actually working.

So Mr. Chairman, I believe that on highway construction and road construction through new territory, in our mining country, and in the building of parks around our cities and towns, and in other works of the kind, much help may be given. Those not on relief should not be prevented from getting work of this kind. Many who are not on relief have kept off the relief lists simply by their own efforts and determination, and encouragement should be given to them to stay off by providing them with some of this work at wages comparable to those paid in similar industries in the district in which the work is being done. That wage policy would also help to ensure that those who have jobs shall not quit them to get government work.

It might possibly help the minister if I gave him more advice, but I am reminded of the wise man who prayed something like this: Oh Lord, save me from my friends; I can look after my enemies myself.

Mr. PELLETIER: As the hon. gentleman has stated or implied that I have tied up this party with fascism I should like to point out that the illustration I used to-day was in the form of a warning—and not at all an endorsation of Hitler of Germany—that if something is not done to save democracy in Canada, it is in danger.

My hon. friend stated that wheelbarrows and shovels were used to provide more employment on the Hudson Bay railway. I might ask him, why not use smaller and smaller shovels and wheelbarrows to give more and more employment?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No; they used wheelbarrows and shovels, not to give more employment, but to get the work done more efficiently.

[Mr. M. McLean.]

Mr. BENNETT: Because the ground was frozen—that is the reason.

Mr. REID: I think some of the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) are worthy of the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and of the government. I was very glad that he mentioned the housing program in British Columbia, particularly in the Fraser Valley. I too was home during the Easter recess and I heard a good deal about how this program is being carried out. It brought home to me the truth of the statement which is often made that the east does not understand the west and that the east is somewhat discriminatory when it comes to the matter of loans, especially in British Columbia. I found that orders had been issued by some of the loan companies to their agents in the city of New Westminster and the Fraser valley not to grant loans in certain towns and in certain parts of New Westminster. For instance, in that city there are two districts, the east and the west. The west is fairly well built up with sidewalks and schools, and the loan companies, instead of doing everything possible to assist in carrying out the guarantee of the government, that is providing 70 to 80 per cent of the loans, have of their own volition been discriminating against applicants in certain cities that have not been able to procure a loan. They have sent investigators out and picked out certain cities in a rather crude manner. I think that should be drawn to the attention of the government, and I would ask the Minister of Labour to join with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in order to induce the loan companies to do everything possible to encourage loans for houses in New Westminster and the Fraser Valley.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, there are districts which are house poor; that is, where houses are really scarce, and the Dominion Housing Act would be one of the finest things for putting men to work and providing industry with some business if only the loan companies could be jacked up and made to loan more freely in British Columbia. It might interest the committee to know that in the matter of mortgage loans British Columbia is one of the best provinces in the whole dominion. Speak to almost any bank manager and he will tell you that there are very few delinquent mortgages in British Columbia as compared with other provinces. Therefore, there is no reason at all why the loan companies should discriminate against our province, and I would join with the hon. member for Fraser Valley in urging the minister and the government to see if something could not be done to change the viewpoint of these companies.

He mentioned one other matter, and that is what is taking place in the Fraser Valley on the eve of a provincial by-election. It was rather a surprising story, and I do not think any member would condone any such action by any government official as to inform those seeking work that they must obtain a ticket from the party before they would be allowed the opportunity to give of their labour. That, however, is a provincial matter. I could not help wondering, while that story was being told to the committee, of the difference when I was on the other side of the house and we were dealing with the camps which were under both the provincial and the dominion governments, when I rose in my place and offered to lay my seat at stake if the statements I made regarding graft and corruption were not true. And while the leader of the opposition joined—at least nodded acquiescence—in the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, I just thought there were times in this house when even he was not so concerned over the expenditures; because when an investigation took place during those days and an investigator went through the camps, the information I have is that the leader of the opposition was sent a copy of the padded payroll and refused to take any action.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is in error; what does he say?

Mr. REID: I said the information I had was that when an investigation took place—

Mr. BENNETT: What investigation?

Mr. REID: —under the late Tolmie administration—that a copy of one of the padded payrolls of the camp was sent to the right hon. gentleman, and that no action was taken by him.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say for the hon. member, and he knows this to be so—

Mr. REID: I do not know it to be so.

Mr. BENNETT: —that with respect to any complaint which was made as to wrong expenditures of public money I directed the auditor general at once to deal with it; that action was taken by the auditor general to deal with it, and that recoveries have been made during all that period. And this report we now have indicates recoveries are continuing to be made of wrong expenditures.

Mr. REID: It was a padded payroll, and the man who made the charge about it was brought to Ottawa and then fired.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no knowledge of a particular padded payroll, a specific one; but I do have knowledge of the fact that complaints were made, and I have knowledge of the fact that we passed an order in council and directed the auditor general to deal with it; further, that moneys were recovered back, and that those who were guilty of either padding the payroll or doing anything else with respect to the public purse were at once put out of employment. And the minister's report, which I have in my hand, indicates that they are still recovering moneys

Mr. REID: There was something like $72,000 which could not be accounted for.

Mr. BENNETT: If that is so, why does the hon. member not do something about it?

Mr. REID: I have been endeavouring to do something about it. I have endeavoured to bring pressure to have it collected. The right hon. gentleman was not very much concerned in those days, as he seemingly is now—

Mr. BENNETT: I hurl that back at the hon. member. No man has ever held public office who has been more concerned about every dollar of public money than I have. What is more, we took the proper steps to see that action was taken; if the hon. member were just as zealous in looking after expenditures in his constituency, it would be a great deal better for the public interest, and there would be less patronage in connection with what I was speaking about. I have not spoken on the matter before the committee this afternoon. When the hon. member for Fraser Valley was speaking, I said "Hear, hear"; for I was thinking of a question which is nearer this city of Ottawa that I am going to bring to the attention of the house in connection with patronage and the expenditure of public money.

Mr. REID: I will do what the leader of the opposition has done. I will hurl it back at him when he says that if I were as zealous about the expenditures of money in my constituency things would be different; for I certainly am. I will go back and hunt up that padded payroll, because, while he was Prime Minister, I carried a copy of it; I will go back and hunt it up.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be very glad to see it.

Mr. REID: So far as the expenditures in my constituency are concerned, I am not ashamed of any of them. I have been successful in keeping patronage out of the road work, and all other work, so far as my ability goes. I am against a system of a man having to pay a tax or having a party ticket before he can earn the right to work. Any time it is brought to my attention I shall certainly take steps to see that it does not happen in the riding of New Westminster.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Undertaking of measures.

Mr. PELLETIER: This section deals with the power to appropriate moneys for the purposes of the act. There is one subject I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour, and it is this: When a similar measure was up for discussion last year, I remember speaking to the minister with respect to the Monkman pass project, a project which concerns approximately 70,000 people located in the Peace River country. As we find out we can get no assistance from any government whatsoever, I should like to tell the minister what has been done in that particular instance. I should like, too, to answer the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) who maintains that if people want to go out and work, they can easily find it. May I point out that this is one occasion where people have already tried to help themselves.

It is a known fact that there is no outlet to the Pacific coast from the Peace River district. For many years we have sought an outlet by railway. We have come to realize slowly, but nevertheless reluctantly, that at the present time such an outlet is not to be expected. The people of that country realize that if they cannot get a rail outlet, they should at least have proper motor transportation facilities towards the Pacific coast. When we found out we could get no assistance whatsoever from any government, regardless of promises in the past, the people of that country got tired and fed up waiting for the fulfilment of promises, and they themselves proceeded to cut through the wilderness and the virgin land of that country a highway which would meet the existing highway system, commencing at Hansard, in British Columbia. So it was that last year hundreds of individuals throughout the Peace River country, of their own accord and by public subscription, cut through fifty-five miles of bush, as a first step towards fulfilling the demand for an outlet from the Peace River country.

I mentioned the circumstances to the minister last year, and I felt this year that under the same measure some financial assistance might be given to help the project along.

He knows as well as I do that the Peace River country is undoubtedly the last great empire in western Canada. Such things as crop failures are unknown in that country, and the only difficulties we encounter are from frost, which lowers the grade of our product. We have never yet had to ask for the expenditure of money because of drought or anything of that kind. I am thankful that it should be so. A population of 65,000 or 70,000 people is certainly entitled to some consideration. The minister knows there is no outlet from the Peace River district to the Pacific coast, and I suggest that moneys spent in carrying out the project to provide a route to the Pacific would help unemployment and agricultural distress.

I understand that at the present time the government is supporting a project to build a highway, known as the Turgeon route—or possibly some other name—to the Pacific coast. It is my further belief that funds for this purpose are being provided by the Department of Mines and Resources with a view to assisting mining development in that part of the country. I understand the hon. member for Cariboo is enthusiastically supporting that project. May I point out to the minister, however, that no more than five per cent of the people in that part of the country could have any possible use for that type of route. I should like to point out, further, that the people of Prince George, which is in the southern part of the Peace River block, and within the constituency of Cariboo, are one hundred per cent in favour of the route proposed by the settlers in the Peace River district, and recently have joined with those settlers and have organized a Monkman pass highway association. I believe this must prove to the hon. member for Cariboo that they desire an outlet to the Pacific coast and not a trail which will help the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company to develop their interests in that country, to the detriment of the 65,000 or 70,000 people living in the district.

I know the minister is busy, but I should like to have him pay some particular attention to the project I have indicated, and to inform himself with respect to it. I mentioned it to him a year ago, but possibly he has not yet had time to go into the details. I hope that he will be able to do so in the near future, and that, of all the governments, out of all the promises, out of all the assurances that have been given, the minister will be the first to make possible an outlet to the Pacific coast from the Peace River country. There are many who would enjoy the benefits of such an outlet. We could obtain fresh fruit from British Columbia. We desire to trade with the people of that province. We need what they can supply. But at the present time produce to and from Vancouver must be hauled around by the city of Edmonton. If there were a motor highway from the end of the present highway in Alberta to Hansard, in British Columbia, the Peace River country would benefit immensely. It cannot be said that the project is impossible. Not even a ferry to cross the river is required. The people who started this road built fifty-five miles one year by their free personal contributions without one cent of financial assistance from any government. It is quite a level trail. It would not need any expensive machinery in order to build a decent road, and it is only 155 miles away from a graveled highway in British Columbia. I suggest that it is the minister's duty to pay some heed to the sixty-five or seventy thousand people in the Peace River country who have been located there for many years, who have been promised time and time again that consideration would be given to their demands, but who have not yet received any satisfaction.

I notice that the hon. member for Cariboo is at present in his seat, so I should like to repeat what I said a moment ago concerning the road which it is proposed to build as an outlet for the Peace River country. The people of his constituency, particularly in the region of Prince George, have now formed what is called the Monkman pass highway association to join hands with the Peace River association, and are solidly behind the Monkman project. The other road proposed would benefit only perhaps five per cent of the population of the Peace River country; nevertheless I do not say that the road should not be built. I think we need as much transportation as possible in order to develop our vast national resources. At the same time the most feasible, the quickest and the best way to bring some measure of assistance to the people of the Peace River country is to give the Monkman pass highway association some assistance or for the government to take over the project and provide the Peace River area with that outlet. There is no difficulty in the way; it is an easy route to follow, and it leads to a graveled highway in the northern portion of British Columbia. In this manner an outlet to British Columbia could be provided for the people of the Peace River country in a very short time.

Mr. DUNNING: Before we go further, I should like to give some information which I have obtained in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) relating to the operation of the Dominion Housing Act in British Columbia. He was rather critical. I take it, that certain of the lending institutions who operate under agreement with the government under the terms of the Dominion Housing Act were not active in British Columbia.

I think I should say, in fairness to all those who have entered into agreements under the Dominion Housing Act, that what might be called the larger institutions of Canada, both insurance companies and other forms of lending institutions, have dealt far more widely with loans under the Dominion Housing Act than have those localized lending institutions, trust companies and the like, which we find throughout the dominion. In fact, it may very well be said that the larger institutions operating all over Canada are performing a much wider and much more useful service under the Dominion Housing Act than these localized institutions which one would think would be more ready to enter into agreements to meet their own local needs, being so much more familiar with those local needs and being so much closer to the people. That criticism is one not merely of British Columbia institutions; the situation is characteristic of the more localized institutions the dominion over.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for New Westminster says that those companies are discriminating against some towns.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall make inquiries, of course, with respect to those allegations; but I can say that British Columbia is now well in the van with respect to the number of housing units provided for by loans under the housing act. I got the April report just now, and I find that eighty-six units were approved for loans in British Columbia during that month, bringing the total in that province up to 593 units as at the end of April, 1938. Judging from the amount of prospective business reported through the housing branch of the finance department, British Columbia is taking advantage to an ever-increasing degree of the provisions of the Dominion Housing Act. One must remember, however, that the lender is investing sixty per cent of his own money or the money of his institution, or the trust moneys he is administering, and the department is in no position nor does the act give the minister power to compel any lending institution to lend in any particular locality or to lend on any particular housing security, but every effort is made under the auspices of the housing branch to thresh out problems which arise by reason of allegations that certain municipalities are blacklisted or that loans will not be made to certain areas. We endeavour to take the matter up with the companies most likely to be concerned, and if one does not see its way clear to make loans in a locality we endeavour, through approaches to others who may be interested, to meet the need. It is not always possible to do so, I would advise my hon. friend. There are some municipalities in which the current tax situation, the assessment situation, the financial situation of the municipality, are such as to cause lenders to hesitate in making loans because, even with the dominion proportion, they consider the element of risk too great. We can never get completely away from that difficulty. But the Dominion Housing Act is gradually coming into ever-increasing use with every month which passes. In the two years of active administration of the law some fifteen million dollars worth of housing has been authorized under the act.

In reply to the criticism that it applies only to the higher cost houses, I would point out that the average loan per unit is down to something in the neighbourhood of $4,200, and it is constantly coming down as the housing act is being used for an ever-increasing number of lower cost houses. I admit, of course, that there is a field of housing which the Dominion Housing Act cannot possibly meet. Mention has been made during this discussion of the man who has not the twenty per cent to invest in the house in order to provide him with that initial equity, the balance being provided by the lending institution supplemented by the dominion government. In my view that is a separate problem. The low cost housing problem as developed in the report of the employment commission is much more largely a problem of low rental housing than it is a problem of low cost homes to be owned by the inmates of the homes. However, there will be a later occasion to develop that.

The government is not unmindful of the fact that the present legislation does require supplementing. I do not say that it requires change. I believe that by pursuing the course we are now pursuing with respect to this type of housing, owner housing, and profiting by the experience which we are having—after all the act is only a little over two years in active operation—we can evolve an economical, satisfactory and sound means of providing at one and the same time low cost homes for people at a low interest rate cost and producing a very considerable volume of employment. During the period the act has been in operation the volume has been around fifteen millions, and I am advised by many members of the house that there are many cases within their knowledge in connection with which loans have been accepted by the lending institutions, but not made as loans under the housing act. That is, the initial impulse towards the building of a home came from the housing act and from the publicity and information supplied in connection with it, but because of various circumstances the loan was not made under the housing act but was made by the lending institution otherwise. So that there is an indirect benefit from the operations of the act which I think it well to preserve and to continue to press. I give this information in response to questions asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and others in the course of the discussion.

Mr. BARBER: I thank the minister for the information he has given. In the particular section to which I refer, a number of houses have been constructed under this act, but I do not believe they exceed $6,000 —they range from $3,500 to $6,000. There has been no criticism or suggestion from the lending companies that the taxation in the smaller cities is excessive or would in any way interfere with operations. In fact, they have acted in a number of cases; but all at once this has ceased, and I suggest that a representative of the department should look into the matter. Is there not a representative under this act at the coast?

Mr. DUNNING: I intended to send Mr. Nicholls, the housing officer in the department, to the coast because of the apparent need for advising many localities and many interested lending bodies as to just what the position was with respect to the act. A visit by Mr. Nicholls will probably do much to clear up existing difficulties in British Columbia and I am endeavouring to arrange for such a visit.

Mr. BARBER: That will be quite satisfactory. If the matter is taken up with the lending companies through an officer of the department, there is no reason why the difficulty should not be cleared up, so that many of those who have applied for loans will be able to proceed. I wish to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River in regard to the construction of the road from the Peace River district to the coast. I believe the present government is pledged to that road and it would give considerable employment. As has already been pointed out, a great deal of voluntary work has been done by the citizens and some encouragement should be given. I was wondering whether the Alaska highway, which the premier of British Columbia is at the present time so anxious to construct, could be brought in under this act. I understand that he has made a well-beaten trail between here and Washington in his effort to persuade Washington that it would be a fine thing to construct a military road through our province. I was surprised that a provincial premier should undertake something international in scope, some agreement with a foreign country, without going through the federal government. Perhaps the minister could enlighten me on that. There may be some understanding, perhaps a contribution under this act towards the Alaska highway, known as the military road, through our province.

Mr. ROGERS: I am not able at the moment to add to the information already possessed by my hon. friend with respect to the Alaska highway. I should like, however, to discuss the references made to the importance of a Peace River outlet. Highway connection with the Peace River is, I believe, appreciated on all sides of the house. It has been brought forward by the hon. member for Cariboo on a number of occasions, and also by the hon. member for Peace River, they being the two members most directly interested in this highway communication. As a matter of fact, in the joint arrangement with British Columbia last year there was provision for the construction of a road in the Peace River district.

Mr. PELLETIER: Does the minister refer to the grants given by the mines branch to develop mines?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, there has been a contribution from the mines branch.

Mr. PELLETIER: No money has been expended on a direct outlet from the Peace River district to the Pacific coast. I was referring to the Monkman pass highway, which is the quickest and most direct route.

Mr. ROGERS: There has been no expenditure on that section of the proposed highway. I might also refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley with regard to discrimination in giving employment on highway work now in progress in British Columbia. I said at the time that I did not believe it was a dominion-provincial project to which he had reference. As a matter of fact, in all our agreements with the provinces covering joint works, there is a clause, which was in effect under the previous administration and which has been continued, providing that in the granting of employment there shall not be discrimination by reason of race, religion or previous political affiliation; and wherever we have received complaints that there has been discrimination in these joint projects we have had them investigated immediately and attempted to rectify any irregularity that has occurred. I can say with assurance that the work to which the hon. gentleman has referred, now in progress, is not work to which the dominion is contributing.

Mr. BARBER: It is on the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. ROGERS: That may well be, but there are sections of the trans-Canada highway to which the dominion is not contributing.

Mr. BENNETT: We contribute for the purpose of bringing it up to standard.

Mr. ROGERS: The sections to which we contribute are assisted to the extent of fifty per cent. Actually, our agreement with British Columbia expired on March 31 of this year, so that at the present time we are not contributing to any highway work now being carried on in that section.

Mr. BARBER: In connection with the highway, will there be an agreement with the province, as in the past, under which the work will be distributed?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. That has been the case in the past, but I cannot say what will constitute the form of the new agreement with the province in the coming year.

Mr. BENNETT: There are two or three matters about which I wish to speak briefly, first with respect to the Monkman pass highway. It was common ground by all parties in this house that there should be an outlet from the Peace River area to the coast. The former Liberal government was committed to finding an outlet. The late government appointed a commission which made a report and they were in favour of an outlet being provided when financial conditions permitted.

Mr. STIRLING: A rail outlet.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. It is quite clear that under present economic conditions the government is not in a position to undertake a rail outlet. At least that is the view which has been expressed by members of the administration, and I believe it is not an unsound one. Certainly during the years from 1930 to 1935 there was no possibility of money being found for that purpose. But there is no reason why a decent highway should not be provided, having regard to the number of people who are without opportunity to get to the coast, and who certainly cannot reach the Atlantic coast and the prairie communities under any reasonable conditions. There has been a rough survey made of what is known as the Monkman pass location extending over a distance of about 131 miles from Rio Grande to Hansard. That is Rio Grande in Canada, not the Rio Grande between Mexico and Texas. It would cost a substantial sum of money to make that into a passable highway. But I really think that the people who have made their home there and carried on development and made an annual contribution to our national wealth very large in proportion to their numbers, should have some way of getting out.

I think I could indicate from the records that we do incur some substantial responsibility when we permit people to locate in such areas and build up communities. That has been so in this case. The number of people, given as sixty to seventy thousand, is a little larger than I expected, but I am told that they are actually dependent upon some form of vehicular transportation other than by rail or water for the purpose of getting to the coast. They cannot get out by our merely giving some little assistance to open up a mining claim or connect them with some locality a few miles distant, because they are scattered over what is known as the Peace River area, and there is no way I can conceive of from my investigation by which they can market their products except by coming down to Rio Grande and from there a distance of 131 miles to a place called Hansard. There are no large streams to bridge, no great difficulties to overcome. I am speaking now from the reports which were received, which may or may not be wholly accurate; it may be that a survey has been made since.

Mr. ROGERS: That was for a railway?

Mr. BENNETT: No, that was not for the railway; that was for a highway, because when we felt that a railway was impossible from the standpoint of cost we had investigation made with respect to the possibility of a highway. I commend to the minister a careful consideration of that situation. I believe these people have a claim upon us, and it would afford work for a large number of people in a territory with a fairly reasonable climate, and would have the merit of being an expenditure for an extremely desirable if not necessary project. I say to the minister frankly that had the late government had the opportunity with improving revenues, provision would have been made by highway to give these settlers an outlet to the coast, until such time as it became possible to construct a railway. How much time will elapse before that is possible, I do not know.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was the highway survey ever tabled in the house?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: No; what was tabled in the house was the report made by the representatives of the railways and the province.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not seen the other report at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it could hardly be dignified by the name of a report. It was an indication that, failing any other method, it would be possible to traverse the area from Rio Grande to Hansard with a highway at not too great an expense. In the building of every railway you have what is called a reconnaissance survey; someone makes a preliminary reconnaissance before a survey is made for the line. This would be a reconnaissance, and it indicated that the task of constructing a road would not be too difficult.

The second point to which I wish to direct attention arises out of observations made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I confess I am sensitive upon that question and perhaps I indicated it too readily. The truth is that when we made agreements with the provinces we did not make them with the municipalities, and we insisted on three—not one, or two, but three—methods being followed to protect the exchequer. This had never been done before. I think it is still continued. They were: (1) The certificate of the municipality or spending authority; (2) the province had to give its certificate or there was no money payable; and (3) we insisted on the auditor general making a pre-audit before a dollar was paid. I was able to produce in this chamber original documents showing the method pursued with respect to pre-audit by the auditor general, stamped with the initials of an official of his department, and the comptroller of the treasury informed me definitely that no cheque issued in any case unless and until those prerequisites had been observed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was after my right hon. friend had been in office a couple of years.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no couple of years about it; just as soon as we saw that the expenditures were not emergency expenditures we called in the auditor general, and finally passed an order in council—he did not think otherwise he had the authority; the question did not arise out of the British Columbia situation at all; it was in the east—and it then became apparent that the auditor general was satisfied that unwarranted payments had been made notwithstanding the certificate of the provinces. That is the reason that to-day the dominion is making its claim against the provinces for these moneys, and there will be found in the report made by Mr. Hereford which just came down on Friday, these words:

Considerable progress has been made during the past year in bringing about satisfactory adjustment of claims as computed by the auditor general against the provinces.

Mr. ROGERS: That is post-audit.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but against the provinces, because the provinces had given their certificate. We would not have a claim against the provinces at all if we had not insisted on the conditions mentioned. But they gave their certificate over the signature of, usually, a responsible minister.

The balance shown as pending settlement in the province of British Columbia is due to a report recently made by the auditor general, which is at the present time receiving the province's attention.

Explanatory correspondence is being continuously carried on with the respective provinces to bring about satisfactory settlement of claims as reported by the auditor general.

In addition to examinations conducted by the auditor general investigations have been carried out by the Unemployment Relief Branch and the provincial authorities which have resulted in refunds being made to the dominion in adjustment of various overpayments.

On page 15 of this report there is an indication of the amounts still unpaid, about which claims are made, and in British Columbia it amounts to the enormous sum of over $2,000,000. The circumstances to which the hon. member for New Westminster has referred are in part responsible for that. It did not all arise under one administration either; it was apparently a definite effort on the part of some persons to obtain money and use it for purposes that were not authorized, and notwithstanding that certificates were given they were given without an analysis of the figures to the extent that was proper.

The last point to which I wish to direct the attention of the minister is this: Section 3 with which we are now dealing contemplates the expenditure of large sums of money. I think the minister should give us some indication of how these moneys are to be expended, at least more than is indicated in the section itself. I think the committee is entitled to some explanation as to how these moneys are to be utilized. All that is said at the moment is:

The governor in council may out of moneys appropriated by parliament authorize the execution of such undertakings as the governor in council may determine to be in the general interests of Canada and requisite for the purposes of this act, and for such purposes may authorize the performance of such acts and the execution of such agreements and contracts as the governor in council may deem necessary and expedient.

Then follows a provision with respect to the utilization of the services of those who are on relief. I have a large volume of correspondence directed to the fact that patronage has become almost an intolerable evil with respect to these expenditures. I have had sufficient experience to appreciate and realize the difficulties that the minister has to meet, and it was for that reason that I welcomed so warmly the statement made the other day by the Prime Minister with respect to public expenditures. If these were normal times; if the buoyant revenues were being obtained by slight taxation instead of taxation as heavy as in most countries—notwithstanding what may be said, we have a multiplicity of taxing authorities and the aggregate of taxation, direct and indirect, upon the individual in Canada is very heavy—conditions might be different. It is unfair to say that those who contribute largely shall have their money used for the purpose of providing employment for their political opponents, while their friends are debarred from thus being employed. There is no adequate answer that can be made to that argument, and I therefore applauded the observations made the other day by the Prime Minister.

However, I was a little disappointed to receive a communication on Thursday last indicating that in connection with the cleaning up of the old camp at Long Branch, instead of employment being given to those on relief or to returned men, the head of the Liberal party in that locality was allocating work to individuals while others could not get it. These gentlemen wrote me complaining vigorously that they were thus being passed over, especially in view of the observations that had been made in this house. During the course of his estimates I shall give the minister a considerable number of cases that have arisen during the past year, some of which I think merit the use of strong language. It seems to me to be manifestly unfair that when we are dealing with the problems of relief and poverty and hardship, the taxpayers of the country should be told that their taxes can be used only for one purpose, that is for providing employment for those who support the government. I hope the minister will see to it that the declaration which was made the other day—which after all does not go much further than the provisions in the agreements which the hon. gentleman inherited; with respect to expenditures jointly by the provinces and the dominion the agreements contained a provision inserted by the former government that there should be no discrimination—

Mr. ROGERS: That has been continued.

Mr. BENNETT: I am subject to correction, but so far as I recall there has been no modification of that provision; it still stands.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall not anticipate the discussion on the estimates, but perhaps I might refer to one instance in the hon. gentleman's own city. There was a large expenditure involved in connection with the old Fort Henry repairs and a certain number of the people who were unable to get work were scrutinized closely. I noticed in some of the papers that have been brought down the name of one who has to do with the corporation that had the contract, the Frid Construction Company. I notice that his signature was good enough to secure employment, not only in connection with this work but in connection with the airport at Trenton. I shall speak of this at the appropriate time, but I hope the minister will take such steps as may be necessary to make it understood that this is something which is meant, if I may use that word.

Do not for one moment think I have no understanding of the difficulties that a minister of labour in particular has to overcome, especially a minister of labour who is serving his first term in the House of Commons. I know his difficulties; but I suggest to him that if he takes a firm stand, while he may lose a friend or two he will at least go to bed at night with his own self-respect, which is very important even though one is a minister. I think that will be found to be so, and I do ask the minister to look into these matters because I feel great unfairness has been done in many cases. That is why I think we are entitled to rather fuller information than the minister has given us thus far in connection with the contemplated expenditures under section 3. His answer is that they will be apparent when the estimates are brought down. That is true, but it is true only in part. That will not indicate in any sense what is in the mind of the government, except with respect to the extent of the expenditure. The complaint was made very vigorously from this side of the house in days gone by that the information was not forthcoming to the extent to which representatives of the people should have it in connection with expenditures of this kind. There is one other matter to which attention might be directed, but I think it can stand this afternoon to be dealt with when the estimates are before us.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROGERS: There are one or two questions which have been raised by the leader of the opposition with which I should like to deal. The first was as to the information which might now properly be given to the committee with respect to expenditures to be made under this bill when it becomes operative. Obviously we cannot present at this stage the estimates which will cover the expenditures under this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite agree as to the estimates, but the minister could give the details of the general purposes and policy of the government.

Mr. ROGERS: I indicated the other day, so far as it was possible, the general directions of the expenditures.

Mr. BENNETT: Pretty general.

Mr. ROGERS: Some were announced in the speech from the throne, and others will be continued because they are inherent to the problem itself. I refer particularly to grants in aid to the provinces. As to the works to be carried on, all one can say at this stage is what I have stated already on a number of occasions. Under this bill and in the estimates of the various departments provisions will be made for works, not essentially as relief works but rather for the purpose of conservation and development. The precise amounts that will be spent in this connection will be made available when the supplementary estimates are brought down. I may remind the leader of the opposition that when his own legislation was in force we were under the greater disadvantage of not having even supplementary estimates which set out the direction in which these various expenditures would be made.

Mr. BENNETT: There is not much difference in governor general's warrants.

Mr. ROGERS: They have been confined to drought relief.

Mr. BENNETT: No, for other purposes.

Mr. ROGERS: Very largely, so far as the larger amounts are concerned.

The next point is that employment is provided on relief works only to the friends of one political party. I think it is and has always been common ground in this house that there should not be discrimination in the employment given on works carried out under this legislation. It is quite true, as he has stated, that the clause providing against discrimination under his own administration has been continued under the present administration, and I think I can assure him that that clause has been observed as scrupulously in the one case as in the other. He has referred to one or another of particular cases, and I would say this to him, that I have never failed to make inquiry into any charges which have been brought to my attention, and for that reason I have not failed to sleep in the manner he has mentioned. But if he has further information I wish he would give it to me, and I shall be very glad to make the necessary investigation at once, the more so if the charges relate to my own constituency. The work done at Fort Henry, as a matter of fact, is not in the city of Kingston, but it does affect the employment in the city of Kingston, and I do not raise that point at all because the work is being done so close to Kingston that obviously it affects employment in that city.

The work done is under the joint works agreement with the Ontario government. The contract is let by the Ontario government and approved by the representative of the dominion government. The work is done under the provision which requires that at least fifty per cent of those working on the project shall be taken from the relief rolls, and I have given explicit instructions to all our inspectors in all provinces that that provision shall be carried out scrupulously. So far as I know, there has not been any examination of the political allegiance of those who have been taken from the relief rolls. Otherwise the agreement provides that those employed shall be taken where possible through the Employment Service of Canada. The Employment Service of Canada, as my hon. friend is fully aware, is effectively under provincial administration.

Mr. BENNETT: Although we maintain it.

Mr. ROGERS: Although we maintain it to a limited extent, actually our expenditure for the employment service is only about thirty per cent of the total cost. I am giving that figure offhand, but I do not think it is in excess.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as that is concerned, what we provide is equal to supplying the requirements of the service.

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, yes, but I am speaking of the provisions of the agreement under which employment is given on these joint works. Certainly any information which may be in the possession of any member of this house and which ought to be brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour, I shall be glad to receive, and I can assure the leader of the opposition that I shall not hesitate to follow through any investigation of that kind.

Mr. BROOKS: It is gratifying to me to hear the remarks that have just been made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Coming as I do from the province of New Brunswick, where we are working under a different arrangement from that in any other province of the dominion, I think the minister's remarks are more apropos to New Brunswick than to any other part of Canada. As he knows, in New Brunswick we have not had relief as it has been given in other sections of Canada. We have been working under special grants, not grants in aid, but special grants for works. In 1936 I called the attention of the minister to the fact that in my province there were discrepancies so far as the spending of money for relief purposes or for aid was concerned. Speaking in a general way, in my own constituency it has been almost impossible for men who have not been supporters of the present government to receive work of even the most menial kind, such as pick and shovel work on the road. I call the minister's attention to this, and I am well satisfied that if he could give these matters his personal attention, such things would not be; but it is left mostly to the local politicians or the head of a local committee, who select their own party followers to do all this work, so much so that this state of affairs has become notorious in different parts of New Brunswick, and certainly it is notorious in my own constituency. Conservatives have not been allowed to work on the highways. We have hard-surfaced roads in the province, in the surfacing of which we have been assisted more or less by the dominion government, and the large construction companies get lists of men from the head of the Liberal organization in the different sections of the province where the work is being done. This has been quite general throughout the province, and it is most unfair, particularly in New Brunswick, where there are no relief rolls from which to select the men.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Reverting to the statement of the Minister of Finance with respect to the extension of facilities under the Dominion Housing Act into British Columbia, is the minister able to tell us if any of these facilities are being extended into Vancouver island?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say offhand. I think there are loans on Vancouver island, but I shall ascertain that for my hon. friend.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Will the minister instruct Mr. Nicholls to extend his services into Vancouver island?

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly.

Mr. GREEN: Arising out of the statement made by the Minister of Finance, is it the opinion of the government that a low rental housing scheme would be covered by this unemployment act, or would special legislation be necessary? I refer more particularly to a scheme such as that recommended by the national employment commission.

Mr. DUNNING: The question is a little difficult because it involves government policy.

Mr. BENNETT: The question was whether the work could be done under this section.

Mr. DUNNING: A certain type of scheme could, but other types could not. It is largely a question of the type of scheme that is decided upon.

Mr. GREEN: Would a scheme such as that recommended by the national employment commission be covered by this act?

Mr. DUNNING: I am doubtful.

Mr. PELLETIER: The leader of the opposition mentioned three projects, and in reply the Minister of Labour mentioned only two. I would like to point out that the leader of the opposition mentioned the Monkman pass highway association. Much as I appreciate the remarks of the minister that the government was very much concerned with the plight of the people of the Peace River country—

The CHAIRMAN: It is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Chairman, just before the committee rose at six o'clock, I had begun to say a few words on the Monkman pass highway association. One thing I want to make clear at the outset is that in discussing a highway outlet to the Pacific coast it must not be thought I have overlooked the fact that we have long been pressing for a railway outlet from the Peace River country to the Pacific coast. But the remarks I am making now are applicable to the legislation before us, which is designed to alleviate agricultural distress and relieve unemployment. The people of that part of Canada look forward to the day when their dream of a railway outlet to the Pacific coast will be realized, and in that connection I might say that I have brought down to the chamber resolutions passed by various boards of trade, particularly the Peace River board of trade, the whole tenor of which is this: After a great many "whereases," if I may use the phraseology of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), here is one resolution which says:

> Be it further resolved that it is now high time that our parliament be advised that Vancouver is not the only spot on our Pacific shore at which an ocean liner can dock, and that the people of the north are quite impatient of being told there is no money for our enterprise while we watch the slow conversion of Montreal into the Jerusalem of Canada with its jasper walls, pearly gates, streets of gold and transparent glass, and the shores of that hallowed St. Lawrence being paved with gold bricks from this New Jerusalem to the sea.

Similar resolutions have been passed by various boards of trade in the Peace River country, and once more I want it clearly understood that the remarks I am going to make regarding the Monkman pass highway association in no way alter my position in regard to the need for a railway outlet to the Pacific coast.

I would point out to the Minister of Labour that the leader of the Liberal party is definitely committed to providing the Peace River country with a railway outlet to the Pacific coast. I have in my hand a report of a speech made in Vancouver by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), dated as far back as July 8, 1930, in which he says that the construction of an outlet from the Peace River district might furnish employment for many now out of work. So, as far back as 1930, the minister's own leader was under the impression that an outlet to the Pacific coast might furnish employment for many now out of work. I realize that the present Minister of Labour may not be fully acquainted with what has taken place in the past concerning an outlet from the Peace River country to the Pacific coast, but I may tell him that the Prime Minister is very well acquainted with the various projects that have been discussed from time to time, and I feel sure that the minister, after consulting with the Prime Minister, should be in a position to give us a definite statement as to what our people in the Peace River country may expect.

With reference to the highway which it is now proposed should be built, I mentioned the matter to the minister as long ago as last year, when Bill No. 80 was under discussion. Perhaps the minister has not all the information before him, so in order to make sure that the information is laid before the committee and that the minister may know what the people of that part of the country want, I have brought with me a fairly large map showing the proposed outlet.

This is a map of that part of the Peace River block which shows the need of the present highway in British Columbia, in the northern part of the province, and also shows the highway which comes from the southern part of British Columbia and runs as far north as Hansard, in that province, on the Canadian National railway. The gap to be built is a stretch of 132 miles between Rio Grande on the north and Hansard on the south. The construction of the road does not present any difficulties. People have already been over that road many times in wagons, and as the leader of the opposition said, it is not a question of attempting any engineering feats. It is quite easy to build the road, and I should be very happy to offer this map to the minister on behalf of the people of the Peace River country so that he will be in a position to know exactly what we in that part of the country desire.

Last year, when Bill No. 80 was under discussion, we were given no more idea of what was going to be done for unemployment than we are being given to-day, but supplementary estimates were later brought down and by item 302 the sum of $7,331,000 was appropriated as a federal contribution to provincial and municipal relief projects. That was only part of the moneys which were spent, and as the minister said this afternoon, not a single dollar of that was spent, I believe, to assist in the construction of an outlet from the Peace River country. It is true that the government has supplied some moneys for what will eventually become an outlet. I have before me a sketch of the proposed highway to which the present federal government has been contributing in some degree through the Minister of Mines and Resources. I believe it is called the Turgeon route. Instead of going eastward from Prince George, it goes westward and from Manson creek north to Finlay Forks, and then swings to the east to Hudson Hope. The proposed route, on which moneys are already being expended, is 600 miles long, but you know, Mr. Chairman, just as well as I do, how long it will take to build 600 miles if we are going to build only from thirty to forty miles each year as a measure to assist in giving employment.

I repeat that all those who are interested in the development of the Peace River country, no matter where they live, realize that the best and shortest route to give us an immediate and direct outlet from the Peace River country is the so-called Monkman pass highway. It is needless to go over the arguments that have already been presented, but I should like to point out that nowhere else have people had the courage to get up and do the work of road building themselves when no government funds were coming from any quarter. The people themselves went about the country collecting food, money, axes and equipment; they volunteered to work and volunteered the use of equipment, and then of their own accord they got busy and began to build an outlet to the Pacific coast because the people of the Peace River country are determined that eventually we are going to enjoy the benefits of being able to trade with British Columbia. There is not a member of this committee who comes from that province who does not desire to see this project brought to a successful conclusion. Why? Simply because we in the northern part of Alberta offer a market for the fresh fruits and garden stuff of British Columbia, which is at present closed to us. To-day it is impossible for us to bring in these fruits and other products over the present route. We have to ship the stuff from Vancouver around by Edmonton or Calgary and then north again four hundred miles to the Peace River country, and all we need is a highway 132 miles long to give sixty-five to seventy thousand people the advantages which such an outlet would confer upon the Peace River country.

In addition to these arguments I should mention that for several weeks past I have been receiving a large volume of correspondence from that section of the Peace River country. Letters have poured in from the Peace River block in British Columbia. All the residents in the Peace River areas in British Columbia and Alberta are united in their desire to have an outlet to the Pacific coast. They hope that before long the Monkman pass highway will be an accomplished fact. I repeat that it is the most direct and the best outlet at the present time. It is not a matter of expending millions of dollars; we are not talking in millions. We are content —at times—to let other portions of Canada get the millions if we can obtain only a few thousands. We have waited long and up to the present we have waited in vain. The people in that particular part of Canada are not people to whom only one provincial government can be held to be responsible. As the leader of the opposition said this afternoon, the settlement in that particular part of the country is made up of people who come from eastern Canada and of French Canadians who left the industrial centres in the eastern United States to come west and settle this land. The country produces each year upwards of twenty million bushels of wheat.

It is exporting all kinds of products, and it certainly deserves consideration by this committee and particularly by the Minister of Labour when he makes out his list of moneys to be voted to help the provinces in respect of unemployment relief. At a later date I hope to be in a position to thank the minister sincerely for having listened to our earnest pleas and given us some assistance. If he does so he will be, as I have remarked before, the first man in Canada to recognize the needs of that area of the Peace River country; and I am sure that, regardless of our views on other matters, we shall all be grateful to him. After all, all we seek is a little justice.

Mr. TURGEON: I know that hon. members for many years have been listening to speeches in favour of the construction of what has become known as the coast outlet from the Peace River district. Quite frankly, I would not have spoken on this subject during this debate were it not for the occurrences of to-day, because I am of opinion that works of this nature are more readily secured by quiet endeavour on the part of the members backed by the endorsement and the agitation of the men and women who are particularly concerned. I am glad that the right hon. leader of the opposition raised his voice to-day in favour of this general outlet and particularly in favour of the Monkman pass highway, because by doing so he lifted the whole question of the Peace River outlet out of the slough in which the hon. member for Peace River placed it. The terms used by the right hon. gentleman were so different from those used last year and this year by the hon. member for Peace River that I decided to take part in this debate. I recall the speeches made by the hon. member for Peace River. I remember questions which were placed by him on the order paper last session and I was reminded of the words he used to-day in describing another road built through the cooperation of the federal government and the government of British Columbia; this government spending a portion of the funds voted by this house each year since and including 1936 to assist in the construction of mining roads, in consequence of this government's then new mining policy, which was designed to open up new areas where mining was a possibility. He said to-day, in speaking as an advocate of the Monkman pass construction, that this government would be better off helping to build the Monkman pass rather than spending money—for what? What was the interpretation placed by the hon. member for Peace River upon the work which has been done in that part of British Columbia lying north of the Canadian National railway line running from Jasper into Prince Rupert, the railway line which was the dream of those who tried to open the northern part of Canada and especially the northern part of Alberta and British Columbia years ago when the old Grand Trunk Pacific was designed and constructed, a branch of railway which unfortunately, although certainly not through the fault of the people who lived along the line, has been operating in the red for many years? He said that this road work carried on regularly during 1936 and 1937 was designed to give a road to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

Mr. PELLETIER: I repeat that.

Mr. TURGEON: The hon. member knows that is not correct.

Mr. PELLETIER: I repeat it.

Mr. TURGEON: Then the hon. member is repeating what he knows is not correct. One question on the order paper which was asked by the hon. member last year was, "Are there any mining properties in the vicinity of Manson Creek, B.C., within a hundred mile radius?" The hon. gentleman did not take the pains first to find out whether there was anything, before he commenced to throw a slur upon the work itself. He asked, not if there was anything there, but if there was anything "within a hundred mile radius." He received an answer from the Minister of Mines and Resources which I shall not take the time of this chamber to read, two-thirds of a page of typewritten figures, giving him the names of the companies which are operating in that district; and he rises in his place here to-day and says that the road is built simply to provide a road for the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

While I am referring to this matter, let me say that one of the large companies, other than the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, which are operating in the district is Northern Ventures Limited of East Africa. Within a few months after the construction of that road from Fort St. James into Manson Creek, or rather, towards Manson Creek, Venture Exploration Company (East Africa) Limited decided to throw their lot in with that country because they recognized there a mining area; and from that date, September, 1936, to some months ago, this company has spent in that area in mining exploration over one mililon dollars. In addition to this and the Conosolidated Mining and Smelting Company, there are several other smaller companies, including a number of interests whose location is Vancouver. Discussing this very question last year the hon. member for Peace River spoke about my interest in that north country. It just happens that this does not mean anything. I know that when I say this members will say right away, "Oh, patronage." It so happens, however, that practically every mile of country through which any one of these routes would go is in my constituency; and I ask you, Mr. Chairman, not expecting an answer from you, but looking for one from the people of the north country, if the hon. member for Peace River—

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the reason the hon. gentleman is speaking so loudly?

Mr. TURGEON: Thanks very much for reminding me.

Mr. GARDINER: It is better to have somebody who can be heard.

Mr. TURGEON: It is one of my faults, and I appreciate the reminder.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a good one.

Mr. TURGEON: Incidentally, may I tell the leader of the opposition that although I am going to lower my voice here I am not going to still it in the north country with regard to the hon. member for Peace River or with regard to the right hon. gentleman himself, because I remember that in the session of 1936, while I had meant not to speak on this particular project at that moment, I rose to discuss the Peace River highway. I did so because while sitting in this house, I listened to the leader of the opposition warn this government against spending any money on highways within the bounds of provinces, and you cannot build into and out of the Peace River area without spending money within the bounds of provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is mistaken, but it does not make any difference.

Mr. TURGEON: No, I am not mistaken, because before mentioning it to-night I looked it up.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member will find that we were constantly spending money within the provinces but not on highways, without the provinces assisting and aiding.

Mr. TURGEON: I am not sure that the right hon. gentleman mentioned that. If he says that is what he meant, that he had no objection whatever to an expenditure by this government of moneys on highways so long as the provincial government joined in the venture, then I certainly withdraw without hesitation what I said a few moments ago concerning his statements.

Mr. BENNETT: But we did that in 1930 to 1935.

Mr. TURGEON: Yes, but the right hon. gentleman drew upon his vast experience and warned this government against making the same mistake that he had made during the period of which he is now speaking. Be that as it may, my words will be heard within the bounds of the Peace River district and in other parts of British Columbia. This road work which the hon. member for Peace River has been so violently condemning was done during 1936 and 1937 by this government and the province of British Columbia jointly upon the basis of $2 of federal money to every $1 of provincial money. Let me tell the hon. member that I have strongly recommended to this government that that work should be continued during this year 1938.

I return to the Peace River highway itself. The hon. member mentioned the name of this other route; he said he thought it was called the Turgeon highway. I have before me a newspaper and a map showing the name "Turgeon" highway. The use of the name "Turgeon" on that occasion was the first time that I had ever seen or heard of that name being applied to that particular route.

An hon. MEMBER: There is nothing wrong about that.

Mr. TURGEON: The only thing wrong is that in this particular article the writer who called that route the Turgeon route condemned it and asked for construction of the Monkman pass highway. May I digress here to say one word in an entirely different vein? This newspaper—

Mr. McIVOR: Louder.

Mr. TURGEON: It is hard to please everybody. This is the Prince George Citizen, under a different management entirely now from what it was when this article was written. The fine old gentleman who then owned the paper and penned this article has passed to his reward within the last few weeks, and to his family and to those with whom for so many years he was associated I wish to say a word of respect to his memory. This particular newspaper article which calls this route the Turgeon highway has this to say. They are advocating the Monkman pass and the writer says "Unfortunately, Mr. Turgeon, the member for the district, is committed to this other route." He makes this proposal—and I have in mind what the hon. gentleman just said in the closing words of his remarks to which I shall refer again: If only we could have Mr. Turgeon support the Monkman pass and make a deal with the Prime Minister of Canada, and relieve the Prime Minister of Canada of his obligation and the obligation of all political parties to build a railroad into Peace River and substitute the Monkman pass, then we would all be satisfied.

The hon. member must have read during the dinner hour a resolution prepared by the people of Peace River town, or Peace River Crossing as we used to call it in the old days in Alberta, which town is in the hon. gentleman's riding. According to that resolution the people there are not enthusiastically supporting the construction which he is asking for to-night. There are different ports on the Pacific; there is Vancouver, there is Prince Rupert, and there is Stewart; and the people of the Peace River district—I am referring now not to the riding generally, but to Peace River Crossing, or town—are rather inclined to favour construction through the Peace pass on to Stewart or to Prince Rupert. Just within the last few weeks they passed a resolution to that effect. While the hon. gentleman did not say so, I rather think that is the resolution which he is now reading in order that the people of the north country, having read all the other speeches he has made to-day and on other occasions with respect to this matter, will not think he is neglecting them altogether, will not think he is forgetting about the length of time that the people of the Peace River district have asked for a railroad into that country. And so he comes here to-night and reads us what I fancy—I may be wrong and he will correct me if I am—is an extract from a resolution passed by the board of trade of Peace River Crossing in his constituency.

Several things must be borne in mind when one is talking to this government—and when I say "this government," I mean the government of Canada—in connection with the construction of any highway, whether from the Peace River area or not. One of them is that up to this very hour all works of this kind have been done jointly by the dominion and the province involved. The dominion could not say to the province, "We want to build a road here and we will not give you our money if you want to build it in another place." The works had to be done jointly or they would not have been done at all. What was done was done on the strength given to the Dominion of Canada by the new mining policy initiated by this government now in office under the prime ministership of the right hon. gentleman whose words the hon. member for Peace River quoted to-night and quoted in the speech he made a year ago, trying to throw something back into the right hon. gentleman's face. The pledge he quoted, which was made some years back, was for the construction of a railway from the Peace River district to the coast. This government, having in mind not necessarily pledges but the necessities of the people of that northern country, were glad to aid the province of British Columbia in the development of the project which they wished to push out from Fort St. James towards Manson creek and which might run to Finlay Forks, and one result of that road work, leaving out altogether if you wish what it might mean to the people of the Peace River district, was that, while up to and including the first part of the mining season of 1936 the largest number of men ever employed in that whole Omineca area by private industry in the search for gold was about seventy-five, certainly not more than one hundred, last year, only twelve months after the commencement of work, the number of men employed by private industry had increased from under one hundred to over six hundred. Is that not something for the Minister of Labour to be proud of? Is that something which must be held up against him in this house and it be said that the government of which he is a member are doing this only for the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company?

Let me tell the committee something more. We have running through the province of British Columbia what is called the Pacific Great Eastern railway. I think every hon. member has heard of that railway. In years past the Alberta government—I remember this well because later on I was a member of the Alberta legislature—voted money towards the construction of the railway called the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway, the intention of the Alberta legislators being to have that railway extended through the province of British Columbia to the coast. But the Pacific Great Eastern was constructed, or partly constructed, in British Columbia, and for years the dream has been cherished that eventually these two railway lines would be connected. From that several results would follow. The people of the Peace River district both in Alberta and in British Columbia would obtain that outlet which they have so earnestly desired for many years; and the province of British Columbia would be relieved of the burden resting upon it by reason of the fact that the Pacific Great Eastern, while doing excellent work in the small area which it serves, is not on a paying basis owing to the smallness of that area.

Is there anything that would do more to bring about the construction of a railway in the future than the development of the natural resources of the country through which that railway would run? What are the natural resources of that country? The right hon. leader of the opposition to-day mentioned an engineering survey made some years ago by a commission consisting of a representative of each railway, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, and a representative of the provincial government who was the chairman. I have here a summary of statements prepared by the chairman of that commission. I shall not weary the committee by reading much of this, but he advises that of all the passes observed by the commission and their employees the one most suitable for the construction of a highway is that from Prince George almost directly north and a little west, down the waterways which commence thirty-five miles north of Prince George at Summit lake, to Finlay Forks and down the Peace river as far as you might have to go. I found it impossible to secure money directly to build a highway into the Peace River block, so as the member for that district I did the next best thing that was possible, helped to bring about the development of some of the natural resources which the chairman of that engineering commission told me would unquestionably be found in that country. And that mining development in Omineca of which I have told the committee is simply a demonstration of the foresight displayed by the chairman of that commission away back in 1934 when he made his recommendation to me. His report stated:

> The bulk of the timber and mineral resources will be directly tributary to this route and the largest area of agricultural lands, in the lower Parsnip and Finlay valleys and north of the Peace river in British Columbia, will also be best served by this location of the highway. This highway will afford access to 2,800,000 acres of cultivable lands largely suitable for mixed farming, 6,862,000 thousand board feet of merchantable timber, 4,800,000 cords of pulpwood, and 7,000 square miles of mineralized areas, especially deposits estimated of over 600,000,000 tons of semi-anthracite and semi-bituminous coal.

Mr. BENNETT: A great market for that.

Mr. TURGEON: I do not suppose the right hon. member means the gold I mentioned, or even the timber or pulpwood I mentioned, so I suppose he means the coal. We have in that area adjacent to Hudson Hope three things in combination. There is without question 600,000,000 tons of anthracite and semi-anthracite coal—

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the Skeena field?

Mr. TURGEON: No; that is another coal bed entirely, mainly along Carbon creek, but along the Peace river generally. That coal has been analyzed here at Ottawa and it tests ash free. There is a market for that. If we can produce in Canada anthracite coal which the government analysts find ash free we have a market for it, especially when running right through that coal bed is one of the greatest undeveloped water powers in Canada. There is running through that coal area twelve to fourteen miles of canyon through which the Peace river rushes with all its force. And right alongside of it—although I am not quite so sure of this as I am of the other resources—is evidence of iron ore. You have your coal and your water power and the possibility of iron ore all within the same area. And right on up the river you have gold and base metals. Just beyond the junction of the three great streams, the Parsnip river, running northeast, the Finlay river running southwest and the Peace river, which is gouged out of the rocks by the other two streams, you find your gold in the Omineca country, which I described a little while ago.

The hon. member for Peace River said that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company are interested in this north country. Of course they are. I am inclined to think that for many years that great corporation, like other large corporations, was not anxious that the great potential value of that area should be known. I do not blame them for that because they wanted to develop that country quietly on their own. They were not demanding the building of roads at that time, and it was only after we started a road and other companies came in and began to find gold in paying quantities that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company made a request for that road. Prior to the time that I had a recommendation made through the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), the minister from British Columbia in this government; prior to the time that a recommendation for the construction of the road was made to the government and accepted, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company had never said one word to me, orally or by letter, asking for the building of that road. Since then they have and they have been anxious to have it continued. I am glad that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company are there.

It will be remembered that in the session of 1936 applications were made by the two railway companies to obtain permission to build a railroad into the Rouyn district of northern Quebec. As the hon. gentleman behind me knows, the people in that district had been trying for years without success, perhaps as long as the people in the Peace River district, to obtain transportation facilities. As soon as it was shown that there were mining possibilities in the section, there was no more difficulty in obtaining the construction of a railroad. Both railway companies were anxious to build and vied with each other for the privilege of serving the people in the Rouyn district. Although I have nothing upon which to base a hope, I am hoping that before long one of the great railway companies, at least the one that is directly interested in the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, will see its way clear to commence negotiations for the acquisition of the Pacific Great Eastern railway and its extension into the Peace River district. My hope is based upon the success which has attended the efforts of this government to develop that northern country.

While this roadwork has been going on, another thing has taken place. I mentioned the Canadian National Railways branch from Jasper to Prince Rupert. That branch has always run in the red; it is still running in the red; but its operating income has increased very materially in the last two years due to the mining operations that have taken place in the Omineca country following the expenditure of these few thousands of dollars. I know that the leaders in the Monkman pass association will not thank the hon. member for Peace River for the manner in which he has brought this matter to the attention of the committee. I know the hon. member is a member of that association, of which I had the honour of becoming a member in the last thirty days.

I am proud to be a member of that association and I want to compliment its members upon the way they have gone about their work. However, I do not think I need tell hon. members that there are other men and women in other areas who should be considered. Let us deal in facts. A road cannot be built into the Peace River country for a few thousand dollars. Such a thing is utterly impossible. To build a highway through the Monkman pass or by any other route will cost over a million dollars. It is easy to say there are no bridges to be built, but how are you going to cross the Fraser and some of the other rivers? The same thing is true of the other routes, which will cost more than the Monkman route. The Monkman pass route cannot be built for less than a million dollars.

I do not want to detain the committee any longer except to say that I am not opposed to the construction of the Monkman pass highway if funds can be secured. However, I am most bitterly opposed to those who are throwing cold water upon the efforts of this government based upon the recommendations, largely of myself and the minister from British Columbia, to develop the resources of the north country. I ask the hon. member for Peace River, as I asked those who are concerned directly with the association organized to bring about the construction of the Monkman pass road: In order to make certain that you have a short route over which automobiles can travel from the grain growing section of the Peace River district of Alberta to the Cariboo highway, are you going to sacrifice the interests of those people who live contiguous to the Peace river? Are you going to sacrifice the interests of nine-tenths of the people in the Peace River block of British Columbia who want another outlet and who want their country developed? What are you going to do with the people at Fort St. John and Hudson Hope? What are you going to do with the people who live all along the Peace river?

It has been said that a road by any route other than the Monkman pass would be longer. Last year the hon. member said it would be six hundred miles longer, but that is just a flight of his imagination. It is not anything like six hundred miles in its entire length, let alone being six hundred miles longer than any other route. The people at Fort St. John are just as much entitled to an outlet as the people at Grande Prairie, and I say this without having anything against the people in that community. When you are estimating distances, where should they be estimated from? Why choose Grande Prairie rather than Fort St. John? Why choose Grande Prairie rather than Hudson Hope? Why choose one point rather than another? If you are estimating the distance from an area to an important point, say Vancouver or Prince Rupert, you must take some central point in the area.

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand it, it was not proposed that this would be a solution of the transportation difficulty. It provided only a temporary outlet for a given population in a given area. My support was directed to it entirely on that assumption.

Mr. TURGEON: I appreciate that. I am glad the right hon. gentleman mentioned that and, with his permission, I should like to ask a question. He has had serious responsibilities placed upon him. For five years he was Prime Minister of this country, and he knows, of course, of the crying need and the necessity for an outlet of some kind for the people of the Peace River country. I would ask the right hon. gentleman this question: If without further consideration a government of which he was the head built a highway over the Monkman pass, would there be any use whatever for myself or anybody else to go to his government again and ask for another outlet from the Peace River to the coast? There would not be. That is the trouble.

I fully recognize and appreciate the feelings of the right hon. gentleman in this regard. Of course it is all right to say that this is just a temporary thing; it is all right to say that the idea is to give them an outlet, but the minute we give the people of the Peace River country one outlet they will never get another. There is no question about that. Therefore we must be careful in our decision as to what outlet we may give them. Therefore I say it is the supreme duty of the government concerned with that project, and especially the minister from British Columbia, to do just what he has been doing, namely to help in the development of the natural resources of that great north country. I know the people in that area have given a great deal. As I have pointed out to the Prime Minister and to other ministers, they have given so much that they have almost lost faith in the institution of government. I have asked this government—and to a limited extent they have acceded to my request—to do something not only for Omineca pass, but for the whole outlet, so that the thousands of people who live in the north country will regain their faith in man and in the institution of government. I have asked for that, and I hope their day is coming.

I was about to say, when the right hon. gentleman asked his question, that within the next few weeks—if they have not already started—a company will be drilling for oil in the Peace River district in Alberta, right outside the British Columbia town of Pouce Coupe. I am inclined to think they will be successful and will secure oil and gas—certainly gas, if not oil. If that takes place, all the conditions surrounding the question of Monkman pass will have changed. If those resources are found, a great natural resource will have been discovered, one which would be well worth tapping. But even if they do not succeed there are, in addition to the other natural material resources I mentioned, two known structures where, according to geologists, oil and gas are most likely to be found. Those structures have never been touched, and nobody knows actually whether or not oil and gas are there. Geologists go so far as to say that they are. These two gas and oil structures are in the south western portion of the Peace River block, contiguous again to Hudson Hope.

It is not my fault if most of those natural resources, other than cattle and grain, are in that part of the Peace River district. I did not put them there. I am simply trying to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that they are there, and to see that whatever can be done by governments is done, so that those resources may be properly developed. That is all I am trying to do, and that is all that need be done. As I pointed out in the beginning, almost every dollar spent in the construction of the Monkman pass highway, if undertaken, and every other highway in that section of the country, would be over my constituency.

I have been in the house for a long time. Before making his attack last year, certainly before making it to-day, and before trying to tie it up with the requirements and the necessities of a great mining company, I suggest the hon. member might have spoken to me, and ascertained whether or not we could get together. If what he had in mind was not a grievance against the government but simply the desire for construction, and if that desire could have been accomplished by a thorough knowledge of conditions, then I suggest the hon. member should have discussed the matter with me with a view to seeing whether or not we could get together and give relief to the people in the Rio Grande valley, Grande Prairie and in other parts of the Peace River district of Alberta. He should have ascertained whether or not by getting together we could help to get them the relief of which they are deserving, just as deserving as the people in the Omineca country, at Finlay Forks or at Hudson Hope.

I take my seat now in the hope that acrimony will be dissipated; that all bitterness may be dispelled, and that this government will continue to develop the resources and make surveys such as I have requested them to make. I have requested that the mining road through the Omineca country be continued, and that in the meantime a thorough observational survey, having regard to the natural resources, and all matters to which consideration should be given, be made. I do not refer to a survey costing thousands of dollars. My request is for an observational survey which would be done in addition to developing the natural resources of the country. The best route would be decided upon, and then this government and the government of British Columbia, if they worked together—if they do not work together this government should proceed to provide the necessary expenditure of between one and two million dollars—could build that highway out of the Peace River district to the settled portions of British Columbia, thereby giving the district the transportation system it deserves.

Mr. PELLETIER: I was not aware that parliamentary practice required the people to act behind the scenes in order to accomplish anything; otherwise I might have spoken to the hon. member. What he has said this evening is simply a reflection of the thoughts I have respecting the Peace River country. True, there are vast resources in the north country; true, we need a coast outlet. I have said so, and I shall continue to say so. I shall not say it behind anybody's back, but shall say it right here on the floor of the House of Commons, and keep on saying it.

I mentioned the project to the Minister of Labour, because the measure before the committee is sponsored by him. These are not the estimates of the Department of Mines and Resources. When the time comes to deal with the estimates of the Department of Mines and Resources I shall have something to say on the matter, and I shall say quite frankly and fearlessly that I am not looking for praise from the hon. member for Cariboo, or from any other hon. member. I am looking only for justice.

I am satisfied with these few remarks to leave the case to those who know it best in the Peace River country; I feel definitely that they are in a position to judge. I am not interested in praise, or anything of that kind, but I am interested in a definite statement from the Minister of Labour. That is all we want. We have been receiving promises since 1930; we have listened to patriotic pledges; we have listened to platform speeches, but that stuff does not go any more. We want to have an answer. We would like to know what can be done about it. I am interested more in a statement from the Minister of Labour than in the praise of the hon. member for Cariboo.

Mr. TURGEON: I should like to point out that when the hon. member who has just taken his seat spoke in this house on April 6, 1937, he said:

> I have made inquiries in the matter and I have found that the idea of attempting to fulfil the promise by building a coast outlet was allegedly begun last year through certain grants. They have attempted to provide a coast outlet by building a road—

The hon. member said that he had been making inquiries last year and found the first effort to carry out a promise.

[Mr. Turgeon.]

Mr. HEAPS: If you do not mind, Mr. Chairman, I shall try to deal with clause three. We have had a long discussion on the Peace River outlet, and while I am very much interested in the Peace River country and the building of a road through Monkman pass, and in many other matters discussed by the two previous speakers, the unemployment problem, extending as it does from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is, I think, a little larger than the question of the Peace River country.

The reason I wish to say a word or two is that the minister seems to have developed in the last session or two, a very wise habit of saying as little as possible, which is an exceedingly prudent attitude for a minister who is trying to get his legislation through the house to adopt. But we are thirsting for information. While the newspapers seem to be able sometimes to make intelligent guesses as to the intentions of the government along certain lines, we in the house are unable to obtain any information whatsoever. For some time past it has been stated in the press, for example, that the government intends spending $40,000,000 on public works projects. I do not know whether that is correct or not, and while the minister may inform the committee that the proper time to discuss that aspect of the question is when the estimates are before the committee of supply, I think when we are discussing unemployment and the methods to be adopted for relieving it we might well have a statement from the minister in regard to the policy of the government. It is all very well for the minister to inform the committee that he is following precedent or the action of the previous government, but really I do not think the present government ought to follow in the footsteps of its predecessor because we well remember what happened to the previous government in 1935. So I should think it was a risky policy when the policy of the present government follows exactly the course taken by the previous one. I should like this government to go the previous government one better. I would ask the minister to state frankly to the committee what program the government has in view for dealing with this problem of unemployment.

I think it is well to point out to the committee that this unemployment problem has been with us for the past eight years, during which time we have had three governments in power. In 1929 we had the commencement of what we might call the unemployment situation which is still with us. In 1930 the present government dissolved parliament, and we know what the result of the election of 1930 was. Another government came into power and stayed in power until 1935. Then, from 1935 to 1938 we have had another government in power, and yet the position in regard to unemployment is exactly the same to-day, in 1938, as it was in 1930. In other words, I would ask the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister if we have made any progress towards solving the problem of unemployment when we are still doing in 1938 what we were doing in 1930 and onwards. What we are doing to-day is simply to grant relief to those who are out of work, and probably evolving a scheme of public works.

Mr. MARTIN: We have recognized the youth problem and have done something about it, though not enough.

Mr. HEAPS: The government have recognized the youth problem, but the fact that they have recognized a problem does not indicate that they have solved it.

Mr. MARTIN: I did not say they had. I said they had recognized the problem and had begun to do something about it, but not enough.

Mr. HEAPS: They have recognized the problem and are doing something about it, I admit, but what they are doing is training youth for positions that do not exist. That is the important point.

I am anxious for the government to leave the old methods that we have followed for a number of years and to do something more fundamental and constructive. I have been urging that upon the government now for a number of years. While I acquiesce in the policy of relief and in the policy of building public works to alleviate the unemployment situation, I think everybody in the house is agreed that neither of these two methods of dealing with the unemployment problem is in any way a solution of it.

I wish hon. members would speak as frankly and openly in the house as they do when they speak privately. I am not directing my remarks at anyone in particular. The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) said this afternoon that he would like the government to come out with a definite policy for meeting the unemployment situation, but evidently the government are not anxious or are not in a position to do so. Possibly they have no policy.

I think when we are discussing in this chamber this problem of unemployment and its implications, we sometimes treat the whole question a little too lightly. We have unemployed in this country to-day to the number, I believe, of 400,000, and if that is the case—and I do not believe I am overstating it—it is a tremendous problem from the standpoint of the industrial population. When this government came into power in 1935 they came into power on what one might call a rising tide of industrial recovery. We were in a period of improving times, just as in 1930 industrial production was on the decline. This matter cuts right across government activities because, if you take the last few years, we find that when the government left office in 1930 we were in a decline so far as industrial production was concerned, which decline continued until we reached the bottom, about 1932, and from 1932 or 1933 until 1937 we were on a rising tide of industrial recovery, with improvement continuing all those years. In 1937 we again reached probably the peak of industrial development, and we are now on the decline again.

Are we going to say in this house that we are going to be dependent upon what is done in the United States? Are we going to be told that if the United States spends a few more billions of dollars we in Canada may reap some benefit from what is being done in other parts of the world; that if Great Britain spends billions of dollars for armaments, some of which may be manufactured in this country, we may derive some benefit from her expenditures? Do you not think, Mr. Chairman, that the right and logical thing for us to do in this country is for the government to give us a policy of its own, distinct and apart altogether from anything that is being done by any other government outside this dominion? I am anxiously looking for the government to give its policy to the house. It was all right when they came into office in 1935, in a period of expanding trade, to say: We will depend upon foreign markets and trade treaties to improve economic conditions in this dominion. But now the position is reversed; we are in a decline, and I would ask the government at this stage to come forward and give us a definite policy of what they are going to do in regard to the whole unemployment situation. I think it is most unsatisfactory, after we have had an unemployment problem for eight years, still to think in the eighth year of the depression that we are going to cure unemployment by giving relief to those who are out of work and occasionally providing a scheme of public works projects, such as public buildings, and so forth.

The minister told us this afternoon, if I heard him correctly, that so far as public works projects were concerned, what the government had in mind was public works projects having to do with conservation.

Mr. ROGERS: Conservation and development.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, but I should have liked the minister to state to the committee that the projects the government was interested in went far beyond conservation projects. For many years there has been advocated from all sides of the house a comprehensive housing scheme.

Mr. ROGERS: I think this would certainly be a measure of conservation and might very well be included in such a program.

Mr. HEAPS: Can I take it from the minister that in the measures of conservation he referred to this afternoon he had under consideration the question of a dominion-wide, low cost rental housing scheme?

Mr. ROGERS: I have already told the committee that the whole question of low cost or low rental housing is receiving very careful consideration. I believe the Minister of Finance has made a similar statement. As I said before, I am certainly not in a position to announce such a policy at this time. That would require a bill or an amendment to existing legislation.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. The Minister of Finance stated this afternoon that if the government were to consider favourably a dominion housing scheme, it would require separate legislation apart from the legislation we are considering at the present time. But while I should like the government to proceed with a housing scheme, I believe that in dealing with the problem of unemployment we have to go even beyond public works projects, and I think the government as yet has no definite policy in hand to meet the economic conditions which now prevail in the dominion.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member has said that he thought the government should go much beyond such projects as low cost or low rental housing. Personally I should be interested in knowing what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. HEAPS: I have not the least objection to mentioning briefly what I have in mind. I have referred to these matters dozens and dozens of times in speeches I have made in this chamber. I should like to see the government take in hand the question of hours of labour, increased purchasing power for the masses of our people, so that wages are at a level—

Mr. MARTIN: How would the hon. member increase purchasing power?

[Mr. Heaps]

Mr. HEAPS: By seeing that wages were maintained at a fairly high level. I believe this could be done. I would see that we had minimum wages and that they were maintained at a high level. I would see that hours of labour were regulated, and I would be in favour of having a fairly low maximum working week so that we could absorb in useful productive industry many of the people who are out of work at the present time. I would be in favour of reducing the pensionable age. I would favour following to a very large extent the policies which have been carried out, I think fairly successfully, by the government of New Zealand. While we in Canada are finding difficulty in carrying out many projects we should like to see carried out, in New Zealand the government is capable of doing what we say here is impossible of achievement. While we talk about the difficulty of maintaining old age pensions even at seventy, in New Zealand the age limit is reduced to sixty-five and may go down to sixty years of age. Other parts of the empire provide pensions for old age. I should like to see our people at sixty years of age taken out of industry and allow the youth of the country an opportunity to be employed in some useful capacity in the economic life of Canada. I could enumerate many other things which the government could do or which, if it became interested, it could investigate with a view of making them part of the economic life of the dominion. Evidently, however, the government is not interested in the suggestions to which I have referred.

Mr. WARREN: Can the hon. member suggest, with, say a five day week and a six hour day, and a high rate of wages in industry, how anybody could be kept working on the farms?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. I should like to see the condition of the farmer improved as well. In New Zealand, where some of the reforms I have mentioned have been put into effect, nobody is very anxious to leave the farm and come into the industrial areas. They try to maintain on the farms the same economic levels as apply in the industrial sections.

Mr. BENNETT: They have no industrial life worth speaking of in New Zealand.

Mr. ROGERS: Very little industrial life.

Mr. HEAPS: I would say there is a fair percentage.

Mr. BENNETT: Practically none at all.

Mr. HEAPS: Then, if there is no industrial life, the question my hon. friend asked is more easily answered perhaps by the Prime Minister than by myself. I would point out that New Zealand has a labour government which was determined to bring about these social and economic changes. I should like to see the government, and particularly the Minister of Labour, who I am sure is interested in these social problems, go a good deal beyond where he has gone so far during the past three sessions. Personally I am much disappointed at the little progress which the government has even attempted to make in dealing with unemployment. The session following this one will probably be the last of this parliament, and I do not wish to see the house become busy all of a sudden next year attempting to pass, on the eve of an election, legislation which might be looked upon as advanced social legislation. I would sooner have it this year than next. I do not care to see projects of public relief work postponed to the eve of an election. If they are to be started, let them be started right away, because a great many people who need them are out of work at the present time. But what I wish to emphasize more than anything else, and the reason I rose to take part in the debate at this juncture, is that I feel the government ought to enunciate a policy which will give a little hope and encouragement to the vast number of people who are out of work.

Mr. GREEN: Has the government done anything to modernize or to extend the Employment Service of Canada? In reading the report of the national employment commission I was struck by the emphasis they place on the need for a better employment service in Canada. Apparently that is also the viewpoint of the different provinces. The report shows further that the commission have been stressing this need with the government ever since August, 1936. In the interim report dated July 21, 1937, we find at page 17 these words:

> Early in the commission's investigation it became evident that the first and most vital step necessary to the successful handling of employment, re-employment and aid administration problems is the development of more efficient employment services throughout Canada. The present provincial employment services are in practice unfitted to meet the exigencies of the situation.

Then we find in the final report made in January of this year that even stronger language is used at page 15 dealing with the machinery to carry out recommendations summarized in the interim report:

> The requirement here, as pointed out on page 19 of the interim report, is the prompt modernization and extension of the Employment Service of Canada, this with a view to a better linking together of employer and employee; to providing focal points for attacks on local employment problems, and as a means of gauging the relative degree of employability of those in receipt of aid. In discussions which the commission has had in recent months, general agreement has been expressed by all provincial governments—

Which seems strange.

> —as to the unsuitability of the existing set-up, and of the restricted services, of the provincial employment services in fulfilling these vital functions.

My understanding is that the provincial governments operate the service, but they are subsidized by the dominion.

Then the recommendation goes on:

> The commission wishes to emphasize the urgency for action. It recommends that the service be placed immediately under the direction of the dominion government, both as to controlling principles and broad policies, but with provision for the appointment of strong regional directors, and regional advisory councils, to whom certain decentralized powers would be given, so as to ensure adequate weight being accorded, and attention being paid, to the problems peculiar to particular regions. The success of any nation-wide program of local plans developed in order to disperse the remaining problem is undoubtedly dependent upon such reorganization.

I understood from what the minister said, in discussing the resolution which preceded this bill, that he was not prepared to accept this recommendation at the present time. Would it not be possible, at least, to improve the situation at the present time by arranging with the provinces for these advisory committees to be set up in each province to aid the provincial employment agencies, and would it not be possible also to strengthen the employment agencies by a larger subsidy from the dominion? It does seem to me that there is need for better employment agencies in Canada. Surely this government could do something at the present time to meet the need at least in part.

Mr. ROGERS: This question of the Employment Service of Canada is one that has been discussed before in this chamber. As my hon. friend may recall, I dealt with it at some length during the discussion of the resolution preceding the bill. The national employment commission did recommend that the Employment Service of Canada should be brought under national direction and control, and the suggestion was that by being so brought under national direction and control that service would be improved and modernized. I did not hesitate to say to the house some time ago that I fully agreed with the desirability of improving the Employment Service of Canada, but that I did not agree it was desirable that that service should be taken over piecemeal; in other words, I did not believe that it would serve to create efficiency in the employment service, having regard to the task confronting it, to take over the employment service in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and establish it as a national service in those provinces, leaving the service as it now is in the remaining provinces.

Despite the phrase quoted by my hon. friend a moment ago to the effect that the provincial governments agreed as to the unsuitability of the existing service, I am in a position to say that the provincial governments generally did not agree and do not now agree that the service should be taken over as a dominion service. That is particularly true of the more highly industrialized provinces of the dominion. The provinces that are willing to have the dominion take over the service are the provinces where the service is of the least importance; the provinces that are most unwilling for the dominion to take it over are the more highly industrialized provinces. I did suggest when the matter was under discussion before, and I think it is a correct view, that in the long run it would not be sound policy to have a national employment service in three, or four, or five provinces, and to have the existing system perpetuated in the remaining provinces.

I also mentioned, when the matter was under discussion before, that if and when we were able to proceed with unemployment insurance, the problem would be solved in the most effective way, because through unemployment insurance you have to set up, as a necessary part of the organization, employment offices in all the large centres of population, and those employment offices, by reason of their very continuing relationship with industry, would be in a position to render service superior to that of any provincial service, if, indeed, under those conditions a provincial service would be maintained.

That is the situation with regard to the Employment Service of Canada at the present time. I agree that if we are not able to change the situation immediately, there is much to be said for the improvement and modernization of the service. I am not prepared to say that the provinces, which themselves have expressed the view that the service does need improvement, are not in a position themselves to provide that improvement. In other words, I would not go so far as to say that improvement, particularly in the large industrial provinces, is contingent upon a larger contribution from the dominion government. As a matter of fact, the contribution of the dominion government to the Employment Service of Canada does not run very much above twenty per cent of the total cost. Our contribution is $150,000 a year. The service is not an expensive one at the present time, and it could be improved in a number of provinces without a very great increase in expenditure.

If I might refer briefly to the points raised by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North, I would assure him and the committee generally that with respect to any program to deal with unemployment, I have given to the press no information which has been withheld from the house. Any stories that have appeared in the press have been speculative. There should not be and there will not be any official announcement of expenditure in relation to unemployment in advance of the submission of the supplementary estimates to the house. My hon. friend may say that I should at this time at least give an outline of what we propose to do in relation to unemployment. I think it not unreasonable to suggest to him that he might read the supplementary estimates of the Department of Labour and of other departments in the two preceding years. He will find there that provision has been made in a number of directions to deal with unemployment and agricultural distress. There have been grants in aid to the provinces. As he has said, that simply provides sustenance during a period of urgent need. There is also provision for works to be done jointly with the provinces. There was provision last year for training projects for unemployed young people, and there has been provision for relief settlement or what might be termed agricultural rehabilitation. There also has been provision in the Department of Agriculture for assistance to farmers in connection with feed and fodder. He will find that in those items in the estimates under the Department of Labour and the Department of Agriculture, regardless of whether the emphasis or the extent of assistance has been as great as he would wish, we have at least been proceeding along the lines of proved experience, and we have been touching this problem at the very points where it has been touched by unemployment policies in other countries.

We have lacked here—and I regret it—what exists in other countries, namely, an unemployment insurance statute, which after all enables a country to set up a statutory method and to establish an organization to deal with the problem as it may vary from one area to another or from one period to another. In other words, with unemployment insurance you at least have a flexible organization to deal with what may be a changing situation with respect to unemployment. But this government has sought so to arrange its fiscal policies and its assistance to industry in other directions as to assist towards greater collateral and ultimate employment.

I do not wish now to retrace ground I covered during the discussion of the resolution; but I think my hon. friend will at least agree that the policies pursued by this government with respect to the stimulus to the mining industry, and the gaining of foreign markets for our produce, have been policies with which he is in entire accord, and which certainly, in their successful working, have provided additional employment in Canada. There is no question about that; the figures prove it beyond contradiction. So that, although my hon. friend is perfectly entitled to say that we have not done enough in this direction, or perhaps too much in that direction, as far as the policies themselves are concerned, I would be interested to know from him in what other directions we may proceed than expansion of trade, stimulation of private industry, rural rehabilitation, public works on a limited scale, provision through direct relief for those who are actually in need, and, in addition training schemes which we trust will ultimately lead to the reestablishment of many of those in the lower age groups who are now unemployed. These after all are policies which experience has approved, and I submit that criticism should be directed rather to the application of the policies than to their merits.

Mr. MacINNIS: In the light of present day developments, does the minister think the policies which he has outlined, supposing we admit that they have been effective in some measure, touch the fundamentals of the unemployment problem?

Mr. ROGERS: As to what the fundamentals of the unemployment problem are, this house might debate for many days without reaching any common conclusion. I find myself largely in agreement with some things said this afternoon by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman). If we can employ our fiscal policies in this country so as to lighten the burdens on the agricultural industry particularly, that would be a move in the right direction. I believe something may very usefully be done in the direction of conservation and development works to improve the assets of the country and lead ultimately, one may hope, to greater employment in that direction. Expanding trade, gaining foreign markets through trade agreements, is most certainly a means of providing additional employment. But I shall not deceive my hon. friend with the thought that as far as I am concerned I have any faith that there is any single solution. I believe we have something to learn in connection with control of credit. No one can reasonably say that with respect to that matter we have learned all that there is to be learned. We are living in a progressive society. But in all these things we must move forward step by step, making sure of our way as we go. There is no single panacea. I have before me the report of the international labour office on unemployment. It relates to all countries which are members of the international labour office, and all of them are suffering from unemployment. I suppose if one took the various devices and plans adopted in all these countries and put them together, it would include every suggestion put forward in this chamber in this and the preceding two years; yet unemployment continues in greater or less measure in these countries. And it must be remembered that in this country there has always been seasonal unemployment. In 1929, when we thought we were at the peak of prosperity, there were about 150,000 people reported by the bureau of statistics as unemployed during the winter months.

Mr. BENNETT: That is at the seasonal height.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; but in 1929 we thought we were prosperous; yet there were about 150,000 unemployed. They were not on relief—

Mr. HEAPS: They did not require it.

Mr. BENNETT: Their savings enabled them to live.

Mr. ROGERS: Exactly. And they were moving from one seasonal occupation to another. I think it is true that the people of this country in the lowest income group, taken by and large, are better cared for than they have been at any previous period in our history. We should recognize that. My hon friends may well say that here and there relief allowances are not what they ought to be, but one cannot draw conclusions from individual cases of that kind.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is that not a strong indictment of the system under which we live?

Mr. ROGERS: Well, I wonder if it is. What is happening is that we have been providing what my hon. friends would term a measure of social security, in an improvised and perhaps haphazard way during the past few years. I am far from suggesting that it is satisfactory; I agree absolutely with what has been said in this chamber, that we ought to look to employment as the real solution.

But the experience of all the countries, members of the international labour office, does not suggest that we are likely to be able to absorb all who are at present unemployed unless there is a very marked improvement in economic conditions. During the last few years this country has had a large portion of its agricultural area out of production. It is difficult to measure the effect of that upon our economy. I doubt whether we can measure it until that agricultural area has come back into production. When it does, as we all hope it soon will, I believe we shall find that the unemployment properly so-called which now exists in western Canada will be materially reduced, if it does not entirely disappear. I am now speaking not of unemployables but of those in the larger cities of western Canada who are out of employment. In the last few years the whole economy of western Canada has been thrown out of adjustment by the fact that a large part of the potentially productive area of that section of the country has not been producing.

Mr. WOOD: The remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) impel me to offer some contribution in this debate. First, I wish to express my appreciation to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) for his splendid explanation and his defence of his department. I often marvel at his patience and the careful way in which he listens to all the criticisms; he must have a very gracious disposition to take it with such good nature. But it is fitting that he should take this opportunity of defending the department of which he has the honour to be the head.

The remarks and suggestions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North regarding the solution of our problems were extremely interesting. I congratulate him; whether they were sound or otherwise, he did at least to the best of his ability offer suggestions for the approach to these problems. But, as the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) remarked, I do not see how the high level of wages that the hon. member advocates could solve our problems, because after all in Canada the agriculturists are the greatest consuming group. How are you going to harmonize high wages with low cost of goods, so that the purchasing power of the agriculturists will be in reasonable balance with that of industry? These are some of the difficulties we have to face. You cannot have your cake and eat it too. There must be a reasonable exchange of services among the different elements of society. I am inclined to the view that many of our difficulties are traceable to the fact that we have been giving too large a reward for the labour of those who live in the industrial centres, and thus curtailed the purchasing power of the greatest consumers of their goods in this country. Thereby we have aggravated a situation that has been responsible to a great extent for bringing about the condition of affairs which exists. We have created a magnetic influence upon the farmer boys to attract them into the cities to obtain the higher wages and live under higher standards. All this has been done more or less at the sacrifice of the agricultural industry.

If the Minister of Labour will permit me, I should like to take this opportunity to offer a suggestion. I do not claim to be an economist in the general sense of the word, but I do claim to have at least a reasonable amount of common sense. I do not see how it will be possible to accept the many recommendations made by hon. members opposite without finding some source from which these things can come.

Mr. KUHL: Source of money.

Mr. WOOD: Yes, source of money. I have never been able to get money except in exchange for services. In my experience of life I have never discovered any other way of getting money. It is true that I may have established a certain amount of credit after living in a community for a period of years, but I am sufficiently jealous of that credit to be anxious about making use of it too elaborately for fear that I may live to reap the whirlwind as a result of my folly.

Mr. KUHL: Where did the banks get their money?

Mr. WOOD: From people like you and me who have been sufficiently frugal to live within our means and have a little left over.

Mr. KUHL: How much money is there in the whole of Canada?

Mr. WOOD: I shall not attempt to match wits with hon. members of the social credit group. They might carry me into that state of coma in which they are themselves and I might not come out.

Considerable credit has been given to the government for initiating a youth training program. I hope there have been some results from this program, but I must say that I do not believe it is incumbent upon the state to train the youth of the country. After all, we as parents should have some obligations in the matter. The tendency is to ask governments to do many of the things which I think could be better done by ourselves. I do not want to imply for one moment that I am against academic training. Unfortunately I did not have an opportunity of obtaining that particular kind of training, but I have noticed that many of the prominent men in this country and the United States are in a similar position. I would direct attention to the fact that Mr. Farrell, the head of the United States Steel Corporation, the heads of the Standard Oil companies and many other leaders of industry were poor boys who were raised on the farm. Many of them were not blessed with an abundance of this world's goods and had received only a limited public school education. But they have risen to be masters in their own particular line. I would also direct attention to the fact that many of the members who sit on the ministerial benches have risen to their present positions without the benefit of a great deal of academic training. Even without that training they have been able to come a long way in this world. I do not expect as much from this youth training as others seem to do, but I have no particular objection to it.

I was glad to hear the minister make a reference to unemployment insurance. When that plan is brought down I hope the farmer will be kept in mind, because after all he represents a large portion of the population of Canada. I hope that measure will provide some benefits for the agricultural worker. I do not think the citizens living in our industrial centres should be the only ones who are to be protected from unemployment, who are to be given the means of weathering the storms of our economic difficulties.

I think we must all admit that our attempts to solve the unemployment problem have not been as successful as we hoped they would be. I wonder if it would not be better for the government to subsidize employment instead of unemployment. We are paying out relief funds to those who are in the unfortunate position of being unemployed without getting any value in return. I do not think we can continue to do that without reaching financial disaster. I am inclined to the view that we should subsidize industry. I shall not suggest what this subsidy should be, but for the sake of argument I would suggest that some pump-priming, to use that term, should be done.

Mr. KUHL: Where will you get the money?

Mr. WOOD: I do not know whether that will suit our social crediters.

Mr. KUHL: It all depends upon where you get the money.

Mr. WOOD: We shall come to that later. I can show you how you will get it back. I believe too much pump-priming of a sort has been done. We have been trying to prime the pump without working the handle, and I think we should start now to work the handle to see if we cannot get back some of the water. During this last year industry has enjoyed a fairly good period of prosperity. Most industries have expanded; but the unfortunate thing is that industry has increased prices and has reduced the purchasing power of the consumer, especially in the United States, to such an extent as to bring about another recession. More than anything else, this has been the cause of the recent recession. Industry has taken advantage of the present situation and has increased prices to such an extent as to reduce the purchasing power of the people. The result has been another recession and increased unemployment. It will be noticed that when it rains in the United States, it is generally cloudy in Canada. Canada has not been affected to the same extent. According to the last returns I saw, the decrease in trade in the United States amounted to 26 per cent, whereas the decrease in Canada amounted to only around 6 per cent.

How can we increase employment? In view of the fact that in the last year industry has enjoyed prosperity, I believe men engaged in industry are in a reasonably sound financial position, and if they were given the right to distribute certain government funds we might get results by way of a solution of some relief problems, and might obtain more in this way than by handing out moneys in direct relief. I would suggest a survey of all industries, asking them to increase employment. So that hon. members may follow my observations, I shall use the unit of five per cent as indicating the desired increase in employment. We would pay the relief moneys to the experienced men who would be taken on. We would consider the agricultural implement business, for instance, as one of the basic industries. I mention that industry because the customers of it are the farmers, those people engaged in our primary industry. The government would subsidize purchases from the agricultural implement firm to the extent of twenty per cent. When the firm received an order from a farmer the purchase would be subsidized to that extent, on condition that the industry would reduce the price by a similar amount as the increased demand for goods would have a tendency to lower cost of production in industry. The scheme may look somewhat far-fetched, but I believe it is workable.

Then, along another line, we know that many buildings in Canada are greatly in need of paint. If the same scheme were applied to paint companies, a great many men would be employed and at the same time we would be protecting national wealth. The same scheme could be applied to the textile industry, through the distribution of clothing. Furniture companies could benefit in the same way. I should be inclined to extend the scheme for a period of time to every young married couple, giving them the advantage of the subsidy in setting up their homes. The housing problem, the forestry problem, and all other problems which have been pointed out could work in conjunction with the scheme I have in mind. Then, I trust the minister will not overlook the extension of farm credits, because I believe a great deal more can be done along the line of extending credit to farmers, and especially to those farmers who have sons. The farm loan board would be well advised to give a little extra credit to the farmer who wishes to place his sons on farms. The family could be organized into a unit to work together. In my view it is much better to keep on the farm those boys who are already there, because the farmer who has come from the city has proved to be a failure. I hold the view that after the boy leaves the farm and goes to a city, there is not much chance for his ever becoming a successful farmer. For these reasons it would be wise to try to keep him on the farm.

As a consequence of the pump-priming scheme I have suggested, and after the return of greater prosperity, we would introduce a general welfare act. In the operation of the act there would be an assessment on every man's pay, which would be held out as payment for his own social security when he reaches an age when he cannot work. That, in itself, would relieve the burden of taxation upon land and buildings which to-day is militating against the building trades. Because of the extreme taxes people are reluctant to erect new buildings. The time has come when, no matter what station in life a man may hold, it is his duty to contribute, according to his ability, to his own general welfare, and I would suggest that when the minister brings down his unemployment insurance scheme he keep that fact in mind. I would suggest that such a measure include every man, whether he be on the farm or whether he be a labourer. A general welfare act would include farmers as well as labourers. From experience I have learned that a system of insurance equivalent to an old age pension would give security to those people who have reached the end of their working period, and would place them in a position whereby they could live along the standards to which they are entitled. To-day they may have their living, but that is about all.

On the statute books of Canada to-day there is a Government Annuities Act. Any young person who will contribute $20.62 yearly, from the age of twenty-one years, may, at the age of sixty-five years, have the equivalent of an old age pension. In the event of his death before the required age, all the money he has paid in, plus four per cent, will be returned. It would be impossible to have an unemployment insurance scheme which would give the proper treatment to the farmer; but by incorporating the Government Annuities Act in the social security plan I have outlined, the benefits would be extended to each and every citizen. I feel the time has come when, no matter what one's circumstances in life may be, it is necessary for the government to legislate for each and every one so that we may all go abreast, share in one another's joys and in one another's sorrows.

I remember that while I was a boy the insurance scheme was brought into existence in England, and I am sure there was great hostility shown towards it. I believe that was probably the beginning of my interest in public affairs. I read with a great deal of interest the observations made by Mr. David Lloyd George in connection with the insurance bill. He was then Chancellor of the Exchequer under the able leadership of Mr. Campbell-Bannerman. It was at that time he introduced the insurance measure, and the famous Lloyd George budget, at a time when industry in England would scarcely tolerate the suggestion of an insurance scheme. I believe hon. members will agree that nothing has contributed more to hold the people of Great Britain together than has the scheme of unemployment insurance brought down at that time despite the greatest opposition and hostility. I am not suggesting the figures I have indicated to-night are actuarially correct; but it is my belief that if we are to have security, it is the duty of every man to make some contribution towards it. I believe that is sound social credit. The only difference is that you supply the medium from which you get the benefit, instead of getting the benefit and then, like Micawber, hoping something will turn up.

Mr. POOLE: How would the unemployed contribute?

Mr. WOOD: I have already dealt with that. We hope by good, sound judgment we can relieve the unemployment situation.

Mr. POOLE: How would the unemployed contribute?

Mr. WOOD: It is to be hoped that at some time in the future they will not always be unemployed.

Mr. POOLE: That is the hope they must live on.

Mr. WOOD: There are some people who are still pretty well employed. I rather enjoyed the remarks of the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) on Friday night last. I am of the opinion that it is not wholly the responsibility of government to go out and find jobs for people. If people would be a little more self-reliant they could assist themselves and assist the government. I am not so sure that it is the function of government to do some of the things we are doing. That is what I honestly believe.

Mr. POOLE: What are we doing?

Mr. WOOD: I think we may have done too much, and if we deleted statutes for the next two or three sessions it might be better than adding to them.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the hon. member agree with the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) that industry is producing only to fifty per cent of its capacity and that if you could increase the effective demand of your people, conditions would be greatly improved?

Mr. WOOD: There is already a great demand for goods and services in this country. People need many things which industry can supply, and we have the men who can produce and supply them and the materials with which to make these goods. It is all a matter of confidence; but confidence has been destroyed more or less by reason of the fact that for the last few years in civilized countries people have been getting on soap boxes and trying to expound some kind of ism, instead of getting into the boat of life, taking hold of the oars and pulling their own weight in the boat. They would rather be a big shot in some ism than contribute something to help the old ship of state along.

I hope I have not taken too long, and I do not know that in my contribution to this debate I have made myself clear; but I should like to throw out the suggestion that if we are going to get back to prosperity, every man must do something to contribute to his own social security. True, there are difficulties to surmount; but I believe that if we can relieve the burden of taxation on industry and lands and buildings, industry will forge ahead. Certainly industry cannot continue to bear the burden it is bearing to-day. Industry is supporting itself and helping to support a large proportion of these people who ought to be contributing something towards the national wealth of this country.

While I believe with the Minister of Finance that Canadian people enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the civilized world, one of the difficulties under which we are labouring to-day is economic indigestion. Science and invention have flooded our civilization with so many of the luxuries of life that as a people we are often unable to resist accepting luxuries instead of being content with essentials, and a good deal of the product of our labour is ill spent. We are not putting it directly into the channels in which it will provide the necessities of life. We are spending a good deal of the product of our labours in luxuries instead of spending it upon the necessities of life, and that is responsible to a great extent for many of our present difficulties.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the hon. member say there is a scarcity of necessities?

Mr. WOOD: No; there is no scarcity of necessities, but there is a scarcity of intelligence in people who purchase luxuries instead of necessities.

In closing my remarks, I would say that I believe the people are expecting an honest attempt to approach these questions, and I congratulate the government upon appointing the commissions which have been condemned by our hon. friends opposite. But it is just as necessary in the field of science, I am led to believe, to ascertain that a thing cannot be done as that a thing can be done, and I believe that as a result of their labours we shall ascertain what it is possible to do and that we shall forge ahead, having found a place to put our feet on the ground, rather than blundering into some abyss. There is a tendency, as I have felt while listening to hon. members opposite, to want action for action's sake. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Poole) in his contribution a couple of weeks ago said: "For heaven's sake do something." I cannot agree with that attitude. I think it is much better to know just where you are going than to take a leap in the dark just to do something, and those who are responsible to the Canadian people for the government of this country must be very cautious and not just do something that might bring about disaster.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not deal with my suggestion that at least a portion of the report of the national employment commission might be implemented by arranging with the provinces for honorary advisory committees to help the employment agencies in each province. The dominion is contributing quite a large sum towards supporting these agencies, and I think we should be able to arrange for the appointment of these committees, such as we had in connection with the home improvement plan and the veterans' assistance commission. I think they could help greatly in dealing with the placement of unemployed persons.

Mr. ROGERS: I assure my hon. friend that it was an unintentional oversight. I agree that it would be an advantage to have advisory committees attached to the employment service. They do exist, as a matter of fact, in some of the provinces, but it has been found in experience that to make them effective these committees have to be focused on some particular task. In other words, simply to set up an advisory committee to help the employment service has seldom been found to be helpful in practice; but if the committee could be concentrated on some particular task, then I think it might serve some real purpose. That was the real advantage of the special committee set up to deal with the home improvement plan. They were dealing with one particular job, and they did it. I shall certainly bear the suggestion in mind.

Mr. POOLE: I had not intended to say anything on this subject, but so many divergent views have been expressed that perhaps I might say a word. I was interested in hearing the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) the other day, give as a reason why we should not criticize the Liberal government too strongly, that ancient Rome had an unemployment problem. He asked us to go back into history. Perhaps he would like to have Julius Caesar as Prime Minister and Mark Antony as Minister of Finance. But civilization has progressed since the days of ancient Rome until the Liberal party came into power, and now things seem to be at a standstill.

The hon. member who spoke last (Mr. Wood) told us that unemployment could be solved; that it was up to the people who are unemployed. I wonder whether it is an epidemic of laziness that has afflicted this country. What was it that struck this dominion in 1929? Did many Canadians then decide to go on strike forever? The Minister of Labour has already told us that the solution of our problem is the expanding of trade, although the evidence in every part of the world shows the trend is towards contracting markets. I was also struck to-night by members of the Liberal party turning to members of the opposition and asking for suggestions. When the Liberal party were elected, surely they had some idea as to how they were going to solve this problem, or did they, as an hon. member who has just spoken seems to think, just come here to sit? That is all that has happened in the last three sessions. They still have the problem before them. I do not know why the Minister of Labour hides the government's policy. I do not know what there is to hide. As a representative of the Canadian people I should like to know what the policy of the government is to be during the coming year. There are still unemployed in this country; there is still a lot of work to do.

I might be asked, of course, where the money is to come from. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) to-day told us that we could not operate with pen and ink money from the social crediters. May be the pen and ink money advocated by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) will do. He suggested the issue of $500,000,000 new money to put people to work. That was not our suggestion. On this side of the house not one member has asked the government to do one thing outside of keeping the promises made by the Prime Minister in 1935. He recognized then the need for public works. His words are on record and have been quoted many times in this house. The Liberal party recognizes the need for money. The Minister of National Defence, when he spoke in Vancouver, made that quite clear. Why, he said, if the Liberal party were returned to power they would issue $500,000,000 of new money. But since we have come down here we are told that when social crediters propose using national credit, that is inflation. But it is not inflation if the Minister of National Defence proposes it. A lot depends upon the kind of ink you use, I guess.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And what is back of the ink.

Mr. POOLE: Well, there is one thing behind that money; that is, the efforts of the people.

Mr. KUHL: Correct.

Mr. POOLE: The hon. member for Melfort spoke this evening in glowing terms of the liberty we enjoy in this country, and he accused my colleague from the Peace River area of advocating some kind of fascism. I wonder what liberty the unemployed and the poor people of this country have. There are thousands of people who have never known what it is to have a holiday. There are thousands to-day who are unemployed and have no kind of security. This is not because we cannot produce the wealth. We have in this dominion everything which is necessary to an abundant life. We have the natural resources. These are facts which I want the Liberal party to note. When they criticize the social credit group, let them remember that these are questions which they must answer. Have we the natural resources in this country? Have we the labour? Tell me the purpose of an economic system. Is it to find employment? Why is it that all through the ages man has striven to produce greater abundance, to produce plenty of goods of every variety with as little human effort as possible? That has been the history of the human family—to get away from the age of scarcity. What the Liberal party in this house has been and still is doing is endeavouring to apply the age-old policy of scarcity in an age of abundance. The hon. member for Melfort shakes his head, but I fear no intelligent contradiction of that statement. Now, if we have no resources in this country to feed the unemployed, why have we people unemployed? Why not put them to work to produce the goods they need?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who is to put them to work?

Mr. POOLE: The state. Who else?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): A fascist state.

Mr. POOLE: You do not need a fascist state. Why does my hon. friend emphasize a "fascist" state? Will he accuse me of being a fascist? I know this afternoon he told us that Hitler put his men to work by drafting them into the army and producing armaments. Of course they carry the arms, but I want to remind the hon. member that what degree of prosperity we have enjoyed in the past two years has resulted from the activities of these same fascist states.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No.

Mr. POOLE: They carry the arms, but we in this country are the people who manufactured them.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No.

Mr. POOLE: Yes. Look at the nickel industry in this country. Consider the exportation of metals. I will go further. If the Liberal party thinks there is a depression now, just let the international situation cool down a little; let the armament race stop for a few short months, and they will find out that the depression of 1932 was just a preliminary to what is to come. I do not think very much of a government which seems to require all its members to make excuses for it. That is what is happening in the debates this year; we have seen almost every hon. member who supports the Liberal party jumping to the defence of the policy of the government. Really the government has no policy. It has not yet arrived at that stage of progressiveness where it is prepared to step out of its traditional apathy and move along paths which will lead some place for the good of the people. In my opinion the promises which this government made in 1935 should be carried out. We need homes, almost any number of them. We have the tradesmen; we have the mechanics; we have, according to the Minister of Finance, control of our national credit. Why do we not bring together these factors and use them? I want to be quite candid with the government. I think it is the dumbest government that ever was elected in this country.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member should know about "dumbness."

Mr. POOLE: I would not have to be very smart to know that. All Canada should know it.

Mr. ST-PERE: How long has the hon. member been in this country?

Mr. POOLE: I have been here long enough to know how dumb the Liberal party is.

Mr. ST-PERE: The hon. member should go back where he belongs.

Mr. POOLE: I belong in this country just as much as the hon. member does.

Mr. ST-PERE: No, sir. My ancestors came to Canada in 1642.

Mr. POOLE: Well, that was not the hon. member's fault.

An hon. MEMBER: This hon. gentleman is one of those fellows who want to live without working.

Mr. POOLE: I may be a better Canadian than the hon. member, because I chose this country and adopted it. The hon. member did not choose Canada.

Mr. ST-PERE: We certainly made a bad bargain when we let in the hon. member.

Mr. POOLE: Yes, a bad bargain for the Liberal party.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemount): The hon. member chose this country because it had had Liberal administrations before he came.

Mr. WOOD: When he chose this country he must have thought it was better than some other countries or he would not have come here.

Mr. POOLE: I think it is the best country in the world, but I am here to make it a better country.

An hon. MEMBER: Another Mussolini.

Mr. POOLE: Well, we are starting in the west, and it must be admitted that we have made a good start. We have taken one province, and next year we shall do more. I believe that the social credit forces in this country represent the hope of economic democracy in Canada.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In the hon. member's opinion.

Mr. DUNNING: And the promise of twenty-five dollars a month to the electors.

Mr. QUELCH: What were the Liberal members elected on?

An hon. MEMBER: Your group did not intend to keep their promise.

Mr. POOLE: The present government promised to issue $500,000,000, but they did not do it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Oh, no.

Mr. POOLE: The Liberal party promised to issue credit for the public need and they did not do so. Let them be fair. Alberta is merely one province in the dominion, and if the social credit party of that province had the necessary power there is no question about what it would do. But the Liberal party has the power. My hon. friends opposite said that they would do certain things and they have not done them. For many years in this parliament there is one body of citizens who have not been represented and that is the poor people of Canada. I have always felt that the members did not understand the conditions under which the people were living. We have a tremendous debt which is being added to every year, every decade. In the last twenty years we have spent from all sources pretty close to a billion dollars for all kinds of relief. What could we not have done with that money in building useful public works and homes for the people? Have the government any vision of a future when unemployment will be a thing of the past, when once again there will be a demand for the youth of Canada in industry? If the government have not that vision, have they made provision for the youth of the country?

[Mr. Fournier.]

The Minister of Finance emphasized the fact that we promised $25 a month. I do not think there is any harm in promising $25 a month to every citizen. I believe the country is rich enough to provide every man, woman and child with food, clothing and shelter, but the Liberal party does not share that belief. I do not know why any child born into this world should not be assured a living the same as the birds of the air. I do not know why anybody should not benefit by the technological improvements that have been made by science, and certainly the great mass of the people who have helped through the generations to bring about that improvement are entitled to share in the benefits. I do not know that the Almighty gave the monopolists of Canada an exclusive right to all the benefits accumulated through the generations. I have heard many eloquent pleas in this house for people who are always well defended because they have plenty of money. We are told not to touch sacred rights of bondholders, but when it comes to the unemployed it is a different matter entirely. If they send a delegation to some place in Toronto or to the capital city of Ottawa, they are only thrown into gaol.

I want to make this plain to the hon. gentleman who accuses me of being a fascist. If there were ever any party in this country that has done more than another towards creating unrest and discontent, it is the Liberal party. They have done this by the simple method of doing nothing in parliament; they have simply drifted down stream. Quite often when I speak in the house I have the same feeling that was expressed by an hon. gentleman this afternoon—it all seems so futile. It seems that we are dealing not with human beings, but with units, something abstract that does not concern parliament. But there are none so blind as those who will not see. A government that refuses to give the people of the country a living, a government that sits by and waits for something to happen in some other country, for another world war to absorb the unemployed, is not a government that can be commended. Such a policy does not speak highly for it. The government of this generation should be a planning government; it should know exactly where it is going; it should be planning from one five year period to another, and as the nation becomes wealthier every individual in the country should share in the benefits of that wealth.

There has been much criticism of social credit in this house, but I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that it cannot be criticized out of existence. I should hate, however, to belong to a social credit party that advocated the sort of social credit that hon. members opposite understand and interpret. Social credit does not mean redistribution of existing purchasing power; it does not mean taking from one and giving to another. Social credit in its simplest form means this: that you cannot, under the present system, provide sufficient purchasing power at any one time to purchase total production as represented by prices. There is a difference between what it costs to produce and what the consumer is asked to pay for the product. Social credit represents the difference between what it costs to produce goods and the ultimate price of them. That is social credit in its simplest form.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My hon. friend has been telling us what social credit is not; what we are waiting for is a definition of what it is.

Mr. POOLE: I have just told the hon. member. It is the difference between total cost of production and the ultimate price of the goods produced. I know that one of the ministers, speaking in the west recently, referred to the weird ideas of social credit. Well, you do not have to go beyond the Liberal party to find weird ideas; in fact, some of their ideas are real nightmares. They talk in this house about solving the unemployment problem, while the national credit they leave in the control of someone else. The Minister of Finance tells us that we control it, but we are not getting much of it. The people are not enjoying it even if we do control it. Nor is social credit scrip. Scrip is recoverable by taxation, and that is a different thing entirely. While on the subject of unemployment, I wonder if as Canadians—never mind where I came from—

Mr. ST-PERE: According to the parliamentary guide the hon. gentleman came here when he was three years old, and he said he chose this country to live in. He was pretty precocious.

Mr. POOLE: I was in this country and in this city twenty-nine years ago.

Mr. ST-PERE: But the hon. member did not choose this country to come to.

Mr. POOLE: No; in fact I went back.

Mr. ST-PERE: He should apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. POOLE: At the age of two years I left Canada, but I came back in 1928, so I did choose the country. I am sorry my hon. friend did not have the same privilege. But this subject of unemployment is not something you can laugh out of existence. We need some money to deal with it. We need some public works. It makes no difference what hon. members opposite or on this side suggest, you cannot do anything without the instrument with which to do it, and in this case the economic instrument is national credit. I hope that in future in this house the Liberal party will not go as far back as ancient Rome to find a precedent for unemployment. Unless this government change their tactics and really do something, they will probably be the last democratic government in this country; democracy will pass from Canada as it passed from Europe, because governments refused to do the things which they knew were essential for the national welfare. People will not be found desiring change or dictatorships when they are contented. This government is responsible for making Canadians a contented people. The only way to make them contented is to absorb our youth into industry, once again imbue them with the spirit of Canadianism, make them feel that they are a part of society, doing their part in the building of a great nation.

Mr. ST-PERE: Hear, hear.

Mr. POOLE: I do not know what my hon. friend finds funny about that.

Mr. ST-PERE: I said "Hear, hear." I congratulate the hon. member.

Mr. POOLE: I wish my hon. friend would come out to my riding some time—

Mr. ST-PERE: I invite the hon. member to mine.

Mr. POOLE: If they would visit the soup kitchens of Canada, hon. members would not find this such a light subject. If they would forego their sessional indemnity and bankbooks for a few weeks and go to the soup kitchens of Canada, they would understand these problems better. There is a job to do, and the people of Canada sent this government here to do it, not to wish away the problem of unemployment, but to do away with it. The way to do away with unemployment is to put people back to work, absorb them into building and construction. Unless a start is made, the outlook is poor for the people to enjoy the security which they have known even in these days of scarcity. So the slogan of this party now, while in office, should be: Work and wages; not relief and dole. Unemployment insurance does not appeal to me; it is only a palliative, something to string along with for another decade and get by without doing the real job that should be done. In Great Britain they have had unemployment insurance, but has it solved the problem there?

Mr. MARTIN: Do I understand that the hon. member is against a scheme of unemployment insurance in this country?

Mr. POOLE: I am very much opposed to unemployment insurance as suggested by this government.

Mr. MARTIN: Is the hon. gentleman opposed to a scheme of unemployment insurance as he understands this government is considering it?

Mr. POOLE: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: Or any scheme of unemployment insurance that is known to us?

Mr. POOLE: Yes; it is so unnecessary. It is nothing new; they have had it in Germany, in Great Britain. It is only a palliative.

Mr. MARTIN: Is the hon. gentleman speaking for himself, or his group?

Mr. POOLE: I am speaking for myself; the group is able to speak for itself.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The group agree; they were prompting him.

Mr. POOLE: The government propose that, whether it is reasonable or not, as long as it is a vote-catcher. It would be only a redistribution of purchasing power, not a solution of the problem; only taking something from the person who is working so that the person who is not working may get some of it, making a man who may be getting $10 a week contribute part of that for the unemployed. The problem is the lack of purchasing power; if you redistribute the whole income of Canadians in terms of cash, it would not solve the problem. It is not a problem of redistribution.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My hon. friend is opposed to the payment of $25 a month to people without any return given to the state?

Mr. POOLE: But the return has been given by generations past. Let me explain, if my hon. friend would like an explanation. The greatest, the most important factor in the economic system is the consumer. Unless he is getting and using goods, industry slows down. You must place in the hands of the consumer effective demand. There is of course a difference between demand and effective demand; a million people in Canada to-day demand things but they do not get them because they have not the tokens or the effective demand in their hands. If the consumer is recognized as the greatest factor, you must realize that they are short of purchasing power. To redistribute that which is already in the hands of people would not make up the deficiency in purchasing power; you must have more; you must begin with the consumer so that he begins to buy and drag goods from industry.

To-day we have arrived at the point where governments are stimulating industry. In the United States they are "priming the pump," giving loans to industry. But the managers of banks in Canada tell you that their problem is to make loans. Why? Because industry to-day has developed to a high degree its power of production so that it can produce more than the purchasing power which goes out in wages, salaries and dividends can absorb. So the social credit proposal is very simple: Begin with the consumer. It is because of the consumer that there is any economic activity at all. If a machine is put into a factory, this is done for only one purpose, to produce goods. The only reason for producing goods is that people may use them. To-day goods can be produced in great abundance; the reason we have a depression to-day is not because we cannot produce enough, but because the consumer has not the wherewithal, the effective demand, to take the goods from industry. It is of no use to pay it in wages, because that would increase prices. So you have to do two things: First, to give out purchasing power which does not pass into the cost accounting system, in other words, does not go into the cost of production, but begins with the consumer. The second thing is to stop the rise in prices. To do that you apply what is called a discount rate; you compensate the retailer or producer if he sells below the cost of production.

Mr. THORSON: How do you do that?

Mr. POOLE: By paying the difference directly to the producer.

Mr. THORSON: What with? Where do you get it?

Mr. POOLE: National credit.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. POOLE: Do not laugh.

An hon. MEMBER: It is impossible not to laugh.

Mr. POOLE: If hon. members want to know about social credit, we will tell them. The hon. member for Melfort asks where the money comes from. Let me ask him where any money comes from.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Money, as my hon. friend knows, is promissory notes. He knows that if he issues promissory notes beyond his capacity to pay, he will not get further credit. And the state would be in the same position.

Mr. POOLE: Money is not a promissory note. No matter what money is made of, provided it has arrived at that degree of acceptability that you can exchange goods and services for it, it is money. It is valueless unless it has a demand quality, unless you can exchange it for goods. A few moments ago my hon. friend asked me what was behind it and where it came from. The credit which would be used in social credit would be exactly the same as you use to-day, and the very same things would be behind it—goods and services. We have said already that there is an insufficient purchasing power and that we want to increase that purchasing power. The goods and services behind that increase would be just the same as what is behind your money to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend admits that there would be a natural rise in prices as a result of the initial application of this principle and he acknowledges that unless there was effective price control, things would get out of hand. The just price or price control is an essential feature of his theory. I gather it is the intention to bring about that control by paying to the seller the difference between what he would have to charge as a result of the higher prices and what would be regarded by some authority as a just price. Am I correct in that? There would be paid to the retailer the difference between what the goods cost him as a result of the price enhancement, on the one hand, and what was determined by some authority to be the just price, on the other.

Mr. POOLE: I would say that is correct.

Mr. DUNNING: Then I am correct so far. My hon. friend then says that the money to be paid to the retailer under these circumstances is to be national credit; that is, it is to be based upon the production of goods and services. However, already we have produced those goods at too high a price; we have already used the national credit in producing them and in creating the just price which we are going to bonus the retailer for charging. What would be the basis for the credit which would be issued by the state for that secondary purpose? Two and two still make four.

Mr. POOLE: There is a logical answer to these questions.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would suggest that the Minister of Finance carry his question just a point further. He should point out that the additional credit which would be paid to the retailer would further increase inflation.

Mr. POOLE: The Minister of Finance suggested that in the initial stage prices would rise. That is natural. To-day some goods are sold for which fair prices are not received. We would have to arrive at a price level which would give the seller or the producer his cost plus something else, commission or profit. I think the idea that the world can never operate without a profit is absurd, because to me anything over and above cost is profit. I think the minister is overlooking one thing. He said that when you have produced goods you have used up your national credit. That is not true.

Mr. DUNNING: To that extent.

Mr. POOLE: To the extent of the cost, but not to the extent of the price.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend made a point of the fact that the cost would be too high.

Mr. POOLE: The price.

Mr. DUNNING: He proposed a bonus to bring down the price resulting from the too high costs.

Mr. POOLE: Let me put it to the minister in this way. An article might be selling to-day for a dollar which might be considered a fair price which a retailer receives under the present competitive system. With a social credit scheme in operation, that article would sell for seventy-five cents. We would be increasing the value of money on the one hand, and we would be giving the consumer more money, on the other. That is true, is it not? If I sell an article for seventy-five cents which sold previously for a dollar and the state compensates me as the retailer, I would lose nothing. However, the consumer would be able to purchase more goods with his money. That does away with your theory of inflation. You could not possibly have inflation if prices come down to the consumer as you produce more.

Mr. MARTIN: I should like to ask a question in connection with what the hon. gentleman has just said. There would still be countries in the world in which social credit would not be in operation. Having in mind our economic interdependence, how are you going to deal with the inevitable variation in price? How are you going to deal with the price level?

Mr. POOLE: As we deal with it to-day. Theoretically in international trade we deal in terms of cash, but actually we deal in terms of goods. All we do in foreign trade is to exchange goods for goods. I know that we have sold goods to China, but I have never seen Chinese money in this country. It is true that there will be a difference between the price of goods here and the price of goods in other countries, but there is a difference to-day. Adjustments will be made in exactly the same way. We do not intend to interfere with anything internationally; this is a scheme which works internally.

Mr. MARTIN: Assuming that this social credit state was a debtor country, how would you meet your obligations to creditor nations?

Mr. POOLE: We are a debtor nation to-day and we meet our debts in the old-fashioned way, by exporting more goods. We pay in terms of goods and services. We have possibly one of the finest examples of that in the manner in which Germany attempted to pay her debts to the United States. She paid with boots and shoes and the United States worker who came back from France found that he was out of a job. We do that now and we shall do it to-morrow. Under social credit our national debt would be reduced because we would have more goods for export. We would be producing more because the demand would be greater. The demand for imports would be greater because we do not produce that variety which is necessary to national need.

Mr. MARTIN: How would you pay for your imports?

Mr. POOLE: The same as we do to-day, with our exports. There is no other way in which you could pay for them.

Mr. MARTIN: Supposing citizen "A" wanted to buy shoes from Czechoslovakia, how would the transaction be carried on under social credit?

Mr. POOLE: In exactly the same way as it would to-day. His cheque would go into the clearing house and be charged against this country.

Mr. MARTIN: Supposing the shoes cost one hundred dollars. How much would the citizen in the social credit country have to pay to the exporting country?

Mr. POOLE: I do not understand.

Mr. MARTIN: The state is going to increase the purchasing power of the citizen; the state is going to pay a portion of the cost of that commodity.

Mr. POOLE: I did not say that.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. MARTIN: That is what the hon. member has said.

Mr. POOLE: No. We were discussing placing money in the hands of the purchaser. You pay it into the hands of the consumer.

Mr. MARTIN: The man who buys the shoes is the consumer.

Mr. KUHL: The man in this country.

Mr. POOLE: In international trade we would pay for things just as we do now. Does the hon. member suggest there is no difference between the prices of goods produced in Canada and the prices in some other countries? They are not the same in any other nation of the world.

But that does not enter into the argument with respect to social credit, and I shall discard it. We are talking about national credit which will make up the difference in the cost of production and ultimate prices and which will supply the consumer with things which could not possibly be purchased through the cost and price system as we know it to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: At this point could we not get back to the section under discussion? Everybody has had an innings. I admire the courage of the hon. member who has just spoken. He has gone further than most of his colleagues in the development of the social credit theory, but after all that discussion does not really fall within the four corners of the section before the committee.

Mr. POOLE: I would remind the minister that we claim the problem cannot be solved without social credit. Hon. members opposite have asked certain questions which I have been only too pleased to answer.

In conclusion, I say that until we recognize that there is a deficiency of purchasing power, and that all our industrial activity is for one purpose and one only, namely to supply the ultimate consumer with the goods of production, we shall not reach a satisfactory solution. That is the purpose of the economic system. If it is not, then I want hon. members opposite to tell me why we produce goods.

Debate on the question of money cannot be had too often. It is the first and most important question which can ever come before parliament in this day and generation. Until a political party which will deal with money and credit sits on the right side of Mr. Speaker, we shall never get out of the present economic chaos. As one of the youngest men in the house may I say that I fear the future, under present governmental policy. I can see no hope and I can see contracting markets —the very thing which will destroy all the doctrines of the old line parties. We find Japan making inroads into China, with the result that industrialization takes place and less is bought from us. Germany goes into Austria, industrializes it and buys less from us. Italy goes into Abyssinia, industrializes it and buys less from us. We are faced with a greater paradox than ever. Here is a nation choked with wealth and the machinery to produce vast quantities of the very things which people want, but they cannot buy.

That is all I have to say on the matter. I thank hon. members for the questions they have asked. I am so convinced that the monetary system is wrong that I avail myself of every opportunity I get to go to any county or school district to tell the people something about this monetary system which keeps humanity shackled to poverty.

Mrs. BLACK: It is eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I suggest we call it a day.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 3, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) presented the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ALASKA PACIFIC HIGHWAY

NEGOTIATIONS BY UNITED STATES WITH CANADIAN GOVERNMENT FOR CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY THROUGH BRITISH COLUMBIA AND YUKON TERRITORY TO ALASKA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): There is a matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), arising out of a report in the press of this morning to the effect that—

The United States House of Representatives passed and sent to the senate to-day a bill to authorize the president to appoint a five-member commission to negotiate with representatives of the Canadian government "on the prospect of arrangements for building" a highway from the Pacific northwest to Alaska through British Columbia and the Yukon territory.

The committee is also reported to have said:

Canada's desire to aid cannot be questioned.

Can the Prime Minister make a statement to the house at this time with regard to the matter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): All I can say is that I have seen the press dispatch to which the hon. member has alluded and it is the first and only intimation that I have had of the matter. I have not made any representations as to what Canada's attitude will be if the subject should come before us for consideration at the instance of the United States.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CHURCH

STATEMENTS OF FATHER GRAVEL AND ILLEGAL IMPORTATION OF ARMS INTO QUEBEC—ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON MAY 2

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I rise to a question of privilege and to correct, under the rules of the house, a report regarding two replies by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to two questions I asked and placed on the order paper. I wish to call Your Honour's attention to the fact that the privileges of a member have been taken away by the answers given by the minister. In the first question I complained of a large public meeting held in Quebec city on April 6 and reported at length in the three newspapers of that city, L'Evenement and Le Soleil and another, in which the speaker referred to in the question, Reverend Father Gravel, said:

There must be a revolution. There is no good saying it can't happen here....I am for revolution. I will support a revolution that will fight for the independence of this province. Our people must unite and retake the soil which belongs to us.

A lengthy report appeared in L'Evenement of April 6. Practically the same report appears in Le Soleil of the 6th:

When a nation is as sick as this, there is only one way to save it, revolution....That is the only remedy which will save us.

Other papers, fifteen in all, had lengthy reports along the same lines, and more details.

Under standing order No. 44, material facts may be cited in order to make a question intelligible. The rule then goes on to refer to the privileges of members; it refers to misquotations. In my question I simply drew attention to a report of a large public meeting in Quebec, and in order to make the question intelligible I referred to certain facts—the reports of the meeting. I submit that I was quite within the rules of the house. I did not seek to supply any information to the house but simply to ask a question based on the reports of a meeting which became an unlawful assembly, and therefore the question as I worded it was, I submit, in order. My other question was based on a long report in the Toronto Star Weekly of Saturday, April 23, in a dispatch from Montreal and quoting L'Autorité, in which a scheme to seize Rideau Hall, Ottawa, and the public buildings here was set out at length under a heading Fascist Scheme to Seize Ottawa by Force. These matters I complained of were in many other papers including all our leading Canadian dailies.

Under the rules I was prevented from reading a verbatim report of what the reverend gentleman said. I waited for the government or for some responsible minister to raise this question of public importance and get the real facts and to take action, but nothing was done.

At page 2431 the minister is reported as having made this answer to the first question I asked:

> This question serves to show the soundness of the rules of the house to the effect that a question should seek to obtain information, not to supply it to the house.

I repeat, my question did not supply information, but I sought government action; for the information is contained in a two-column verbatim report published in many newspapers. I supplied no answer, only a reference to lengthy press reports. The minister went on to say:

> The government is not aware of the facts mentioned by the hon. gentleman—

The occurrences and the meeting to which I have reference in the question were in the minister's own constituency or city and were reported in his own city press. He continued:

> —but I know personally that he has been wrongly informed, at least in some important particulars.

I did not make the statement myself which I quoted in the question I asked; it appeared in three newspapers published in Quebec and in others throughout Canada. The mere fact that the minister says that my fears are groundless does not make it so. I simply stated the facts, and as a further question of privilege, I object to untruthful comments in this morning's Citizen and reflections on me. It is in the public interest that in times like these the government should find out what address this gentleman did make, and examine the press reports and comments, and decide whether any action will be taken in the matter under the law. Section 98 was repealed, but other sections of the code are there with regard to unlawful assemblies and threats of force and revolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to state the point of privilege which he is raising and to do so in terms as brief as possible.

Mr. CHURCH: I have received certain information through the mail also, sent to me by revolutionists and others. Am I as a private member to get all these particulars while no one in a responsible position will take any action? I should like to have an answer from the minister as to what he intends to do.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have nothing to add to the answers I gave the hon. gentleman yesterday.

Mr. CHURCH: What about your padlock law?

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUESTION AS TO CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES REGARDING APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I desire to ask the government a question based upon a report which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of Monday, May 2, of an address by the premier of Ontario before the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. I quote:

> "And now may I express a long, deep note of discontent," the premier continued, stating the first notice he received of the appointment of the commission, "came at the breakfast table, from a morning newspaper"....
> He suggested the objective of the commission bore so directly on the affairs of provincial government that all provinces should have been consulted about the commission appointment. "And I suspect several of the provinces were consulted," he said.

My question is: were some of the provinces consulted regarding the appointment of the Rowell commission?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that as far as I am able to recall none of the provinces were consulted as to the intention of the government to appoint the commission. The decision of the government was reached by itself after careful consideration of the whole matter and announcement regarding the intention of the government to appoint the commission was made in this house, if I remember rightly, in the middle of February. The commission itself was not appointed until August. The personnel of the commission was made known at that time. In the interval representations were made to the government from many sources as to persons who might be considered and these representations were considered. I cannot say at the moment just what these various representations were, but I would say that no single province was treated differently from any other. All were treated exactly alike. I speak subject to correction, but my recollection is that representations were made by a member of the government of Ontario as to a person who might be appointed to the commission, and the name of that person was considered along with other names which were submitted. The Hon. Mr. Rowell was subsequently appointed from Ontario.

NIAGARA FALLS BRIDGE

LETTER FROM ONTARIO MINISTER OF HIGHWAYS TO MINISTER OF TRANSPORT REFERRED TO IN DEBATE ON BILL NO. 15

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) whether or not the letter he referred to the other evening in the discussion on the Niagara Bridge bill has been laid on the table.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I was out of the city yesterday, but this morning I made inquiries regarding the letter. My files indicate that the letter was sent to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, but I am arranging to locate it and will undertake to lay it on the table this evening or possibly this afternoon.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Monday, May 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 105, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 3—Undertaking of measures:

Mrs. BLACK: It has seemed to me that in the last week or two a great many speeches have been made that would not have been made if the speakers had more sense of responsibility. We in opposition have no responsibility but to criticize, or possibly offer suggestions. I had no idea of speaking on this bill, but perhaps because I am a woman and have had children I have received letters from women from one end of Canada to the other saying to me: "School days are ending; my boy is coming out of school, what am I to do with him? I have two daughters leaving school; what faces those girls? You as a woman should be able to tell me."

This is quite a responsibility to put on my shoulders, because I do not know what to do with other people's children. As I have watched the minister and listened to the criticisms showered upon him I felt that if attrition could wear a man down he would not be in the house to-day. I do not know that I have ever seen anyone look more exhausted than did the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) when I spoke to him last night. He was tired, he was worn out. I have enough faith in him to believe that he is honestly and conscientiously trying to do his best.

I have watched from the gallery since 1921 government after government; I have heard the same questions asked by the various oppositions: What are you going to do? Why don't you tell us when you bring down your bills what you are going to do? No government I have ever heard of has taken the general public into its confidence until it has fully made its plans; therefore I should not expect the Minister of Labour to take us into his full confidence at the present stage. But when he is employing men to spend the amount of money that is to be voted to him —and it certainly will be voted to him by practically all hon. members of the house, whether they approve of his policy or not— I suggest that he be very careful to place the spending of that money in the hands of men who know how to deal with it. It is easy enough to give to a political supporter the spending of enormous sums of money; and I understand as well as anyone that to the victors belong the spoils. But surely among the ranks of any party there are good men, conscientious men, who in spite of their affiliations with the party in power will do what is right and what is best for the general public.

I want our boys and our girls to have a chance. In the city of Vancouver there are two women well known there who in their own way, small though the scope may be compared with the thousands that are out of employment, have done wonders towards helping the young people of that city. One of them is Judge Helen G. MacGill. Speaking from this side of the house, I am sorry that I must say she is a Liberal. She has been for a long time the judge of the juvenile court there. With the help of friends she organized the training of girls for housework. Each year she has exhibitions. The shopkeepers there have helped her place these girls as best they could. Mrs. MacGill organized and has done that work herself. She drew her friends of all shades of politics with her, and has done a wonderful work. The other woman—I know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) knows her—is Mrs. McKay. She organized the Arts and Crafts Association—although I believe that is not the correct name—but she has brought from all over British Columbia men and women who were immigrants or are the children of immigrants, into an organization in which they have done the work in which they or their parents were skilled in the country of their origin. Each year men and women all over British Columbia come to Vancouver for that show; thousands of people attend. Mrs. McKay has trained the women, shown them how to bring their work to public notice, and helped many who otherwise would not have been able to show their work and sell it professionally to the general public.

This may be a small thing in relation to the thousands who are out of employment, but every little helps. The constant dropping wears away the stone. If more of us did what we could in that way, and if more women and the men themselves were encouraged by the government to help, irrespective of politics, we might in time solve part of our great problem of unemployment.

Yesterday afternoon I heard one hon. member say that every child born had just as much right to a living as the birds of the air. For the last month or six weeks I believe the birds of the air have been pretty busy on the grounds in front of this building, and it has been my experience with the birds of the air that they hope to scratch gravel or pull worms; nobody is going to do that work for them. I have stood and watched the robins brace themselves and pull until they get out a nice fat worm. I have watched the robins hopping around from bush to bush and tree to tree gathering the material to make nests. The birds of the air have a right to a living, but like human beings they have to work for that living.

[Mrs. Black.]

To the minister may I say, will he do the best he can to give our young people a chance for a living, a chance to work? The young man or young woman who is brought up without the discipline of work is no good to the community, no good to himself or herself. I look around on the hon. members of this house, young and old; the successful ones, the large majority of them, came from stock which forced the children out of the nest in early life; they are the ones we look up to. There have not been many men in this house during the time I have been watching since 1921 who had everything laid before them. So I say, if we can only give our young people that chance! Road building is good; we need good roads. Last spring, after the house adjourned, my husband and I motored to California. As we travelled through the states of Washington, Oregon and California I frequently made the remark: Your worst road that I have travelled over is better than the best we have in Canada. That may have been a little harsh to Canada. When I came east again this spring, I found the roads down there marvellous. Our best crop is the tourist crop. We want to harvest that crop every year. To do so we have to have good roads, and we must have good and sanitary accommodation for the tourists who come. The tourist from the south demands more than we in the north; I know full well, because I have lived practically half my life in both countries, or a little more than half my life here. I would say to the hon. member that I chose this country; I was not born here, but I chose it, and I have never regretted my choice. It has been a good country to live in; it has been good to me and my children, but I want to make it better for those who are to come after us. I feel sure that when he speaks of roads, housing and so on the minister wants to do all he can, but on the west coast—and I know Vancouver and that coast very well, since I have been going there for forty years—there are many people with monthly incomes of $150, $200 and up to $400, though they are not always sure how long they are going to last. I ask hon. members here how those young people can raise their families of two to four and sometimes six children, and pay the taxes they would have to pay on the homes they would like to build. From my own experience I know that in the long run on that west coast it is much cheaper to rent than to build. That is too bad, because personally I would much prefer to live in a one, two or three roomed house that was my very own than be able to pay rent for a ten, twelve or fourteen roomed house. But the taxes are almost prohibitive; they prevent people from owning their own homes. That is another thing that must be looked after. We want our homes; we want our gardens; we want every chance we can possibly have.

Then I should like to make just one suggestion to the minister. I do not intend to offer advice; God knows I am not fit to give anybody advice on this matter. When we think of the unemployment question and the matter of relief it seems to me that we are a good deal like the dog chasing its own tail. Just as we get hold of it the end slips away and we do not really know what to do. I have yet to meet a man or woman whom I could pin down, who could conscientiously say to me, "Mrs. Black, I know what should be done," and then go on and tell me. They cannot do it. They can offer plenty of theories, but we do not want theories. The minister has a fearful task before him. A family may have lived in Quebec for twenty or twenty-five years. There may be illness or some other reason for a change. That family may come to Ontario, having run up against evil days. Are they going to receive relief here? No. They are Canadians, but Ontario is not going to help them. A family may have lived in the far north for forty years, grubbing away, working and living a dog's life. They come down to British Columbia, Alberta or Saskatchewan. Will they be helped? No, they can starve, unless they are helped through the generosity and kindliness of their neighbours. That is not right. We who vote these allowances do not belong to Quebec, Nova Scotia, the Yukon or British Columbia; we belong to all Canada. I firmly believe that the time must come when Canadians, as Canadians, will be helped if help is necessary, or will be given work—which is better than any relief that can be given—whether they come from the east or the west, the north or the south, so long as they are Canadians.

I wish to thank the minister especially, Mr. Chairman, for having listened so patiently to what I have had to say.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. member for Yukon both for what she has said and for the very genuine and kindly manner in which she has said it. I am very sure her speech is one that ought to be recorded and preserved in the debates of this house. She has referred particularly to the importance of the work done by individuals in making easier the lot of those who have suffered during recent years. I am very glad that she did so. Obviously one who holds the position of Minister of Labour cannot refer to individuals engaged in this work without making invidious comparisons; but certainly anyone who is aware of what has been going on during recent years will testify to the fact that without this voluntary work done by individuals, much of it by women, the policies of governments certainly would not have their full effect. I should like to thank the hon. member also for her other suggestions, and to assure her that I shall keep them in mind.

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Chairman, before we leave section 3 I should like to make a few observations which I hope the minister will receive in the kindly spirit that has been exhibited already this afternoon, and which I hope I may make in the spirit with which the previous speaker initiated the debate this afternoon.

I recognize the tremendous task with which the minister is confronted in connection with a problem of this nature. I know it is a complex problem, not easy of solution; and I for one would not wish to complicate the problem any further. But I should like to offer a few observations and suggestions in the hope that by some means the multitude of contributions made in this house during this debate might eventually prove of some assistance in at least partially solving the problem. We recognize the magnitude of this question. When I consider the matter of unemployment in this country I often pause and compare it with our effort during war time periods. I consider that when we are faced with the problem of unemployment we are faced with a war within our own borders, and I feel that the question of unemployment should be approached in the same way and with the same spirit that we would approach the problem of a real war. I know that if we were brought face to face with the question of going to war we would immediately plunge into that difficult task and see that it was successfully accomplished in the shortest possible time. There would be enough money properly and effectively to prosecute that war; we would not appoint a commission or committee, nor would we hesitate a moment in trying to bring to a successful conclusion the fight then on our hands.

I feel that the problem of unemployment might be approached in a somewhat similar fashion. We might throw ourselves into this fight within our borders with a great deal more vigour, and try to bring about a condition that, if it would not eliminate unemployment, at least would make it less severe than it is at the present time. We are now engaged in a war upon a social condition which has been very much aggravated by the recent depression. Talking about it will not eliminate it. Action must be undertaken, and I feel that we have been rather slow in undertaking that action.

I have already spoken on this question when the minister introduced the resolution on which this bill was based. On that occasion I brought to the attention of the government certain conditions with which I was not satisfied. To-day I want to approach this same subject from another angle, and I am asking the indulgence of the minister and of the committee if I seem somewhat tiring in the presentation of the facts and figures I want to place on Hansard. I wish particularly to place them before the minister and the government.

It is my view that the government should work in very much closer cooperation with the provinces, and I might add, although this might not meet with favour, with the municipalities. I know it is almost a recognized principle of government for the federal government not to deal too closely with the municipalities. But in a matter of this kind we are confronted with such serious possibilities that we must recognize the fact that municipal governments have a much more direct contact with the problem and with the people most concerned than either the provincial or the federal government. For that reason I do not believe the minister or the government in Ottawa should be adverse to receiving suggestions or delegations from municipalities, and particularly from those municipalities which have been most effective during the depression through which we have recently come in dealing with the unemployment which arose somewhat as a consequence of that depression.

I feel, too, that the government should not bear in mind the complexion of any provincial government with which it might be dealing. I am afraid there is sometimes the tendency in government to consider suggestions from the provinces in the light of the provinces from which the suggestions may come. I am afraid that provinces having governments which politically do not bear the same relation to this government as those in other provinces may not receive the same reception. In fact, that might be the reason for the attitude indicated in section 3 of the bill now under consideration, which is somewhat different from the measures introduced last session and the session before.

Last year we discussed in the house the subjects of housing and slum clearance, problems which might adequately be faced at this time. Housing is a difficult problem, but one which offers a solution to unemployment, and a field to which we might go with some degree of hope for the eventual alleviation of distress through unemployment. I have in my hand a pamphlet read before an organization in Montreal by Professor Percy E. Nobbs of McGill university. Professor Nobbs, as most hon. members know, is recognized as an authority on town planning, slum clearance, housing and problems of that kind. At the beginning of his address he quoted from the observations of Henry Vivian, also a world recognized authority in the same field. Mr. Vivian's concluding observations were that in most Canadian towns—> —less science and forethought are given to the care of human beings than the modern farmer gives to the raising of his pigs.

That is a strong statement, but I believe it is a good introduction to a discussion of housing and slum clearance. I should like to quote further from the observations of Professor Nobbs. What he states has direct reference to Montreal, but would apply equally to any large city in Canada. He said:

> As I have been pointing out for years, Montreal is notably deficient in low rental dwellings when the numbers of low wage earners in the community are taken account of. There has never been any concerted attempt to house our workers. Now we find that while rental values for superior accommodation are still going down, or are still as low as they ever have been since the war, the rental values of the poorest accommodation in the city are rising. During the first years of the depression, the Montreal proprietors housed the unemployed rent free. With the institution of unemployment relief, the unemployed were accommodated in $25 a month dwellings at $12 rents. Those dwellings are now better rented and the Unemployment Relief Commission has entered the market for lower rental property. I shall not say whether the next fact to be disclosed is a matter of cause or effect, but there is a notable tendency to the consolidation of this class of property, rented to the Unemployment Commission, in fewer hands month by month. So if ever there was a case for large-scale, low rent housing operations, that case exists in Montreal to-day, for there is a shortage of dwellings of all classes, from $50 a month rentals, downwards, and the shortage of dwellings renting from $14 to $9 is most acute.

That is what Professor Nobbs said after a very careful study of conditions existing in Montreal. With what he has to say I am in hearty agreement; in fact, I am in complete accord. It was my privilege to spend some time in the office of the metropolitan commission in Montreal where, with one of the directors, Mr. George Mooney, a gentleman well known to my friends immediately to my left, we studied the problem of slum clearance and housing. He pointed out definite spots on the map of Montreal where projects could be commenced immediately to the advantage of the city, the workers and those at present unemployed. He deplored the fact that nothing of a concrete nature was being pushed forward at the present time in the larger cities.

While I speak with direct reference to Montreal I have in mind that there are other large cities and towns in Canada. I have no doubt that what has been said respecting Montreal could be said with equal force about Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver, or any of the other larger centres. It is my hope therefore that under section 3, where the minister contemplates certain works of a public nature, slum clearance and housing with rental values from $10 to $15 per month may be undertaken, so that people who are forced to live in accommodation of that kind may obtain it and may live as decent human beings desire to live.

Reference has been made to unemployment insurance. My recollection is that one of the first speeches I made in the house was concerning that subject. I am just as strongly in favour of unemployment insurance to-day as I was at that time, although I do recognize certain weaknesses. I make that statement despite the tirade against unemployment insurance lodged by one of the social credit members last night. He did not convince me in any way that the workers of Canada were making any mistake in urging the institution of unemployment insurance. I know the difficulties with which the minister has been confronted in connection with this question. I know, too, it has been decided by the courts that unemployment insurance is within the provincial field of jurisdiction. But I know he recognizes, I recognize and every hon. member recognizes that it is a question with which it is quite impossible for provincial governments to deal. It is a question of national importance; it is a question that will have to be faced eventually and solved by a national government sitting at Ottawa.

I have in my hand a report that was issued in the United States of America in connection with the social security act recently passed in Washington. I notice that this report refers to a possible solution of the unemployment insurance problem. It states that the social security act can be divided into two distinct parts, the first being the old age retirement benefits, which are contributions collected from both the employers and the employees, and the second being the unemployment insurance benefits, which are provided for employees out of contributions paid in those states which have unemployment insurance laws. The social security act is designed to induce the states to adopt such laws. I know the minister is as fully conversant with this document and with that act as I am. After reading certain sections of the social security act as passed in the United States and as adopted by many of the states of the union I feel that there is a possibility of solving our problem along that line without the necessity of altering the British North America Act in any way.

I know that certain provinces are not opposed to unemployment insurance as such, but they are opposed to anything that might be interpreted as an easy way to amend the British North America Act. They like to feel that that act is almost impossible of amendment. For this reason we should try to find another means of approach so that unemployment insurance can be brought into being and put into effect without causing any offence to any provincial government, whether it be a Social Credit government in Alberta, a Union Nationale government in Quebec, or a Liberal government in New Brunswick. I feel sure the minister is giving serious thought to the possibilities of action along this line.

I have also in my hand an extract from an article written by a great friend of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who is personally well known to the Minister of Labour. I refer to Mr. Bernard Rose, K.C., a prominent lawyer in the city of Montreal. Writing in Le Monde Ouvrier under date of April 23, 1938, he states:

> Mr. King positively pledged his party to adopt a national contributory system of unemployment insurance if he was elected. Having the utmost confidence in the word and pledge of the Prime Minister, hundreds of thousands of voters throughout the dominion cast their ballots in favour of his party's candidates.

He continues with his article and towards the close he states:

> I would hazard the opinion that the government, in view of the situation and promoting public welfare, is constitutionally justified in enacting the measure under the "peace, order and good government" clause of the British North America Act.

Remember, this article is written by a lawyer in Montreal who has always been a supporter of the Liberal party. It sounds rather strange to hear the words "peace, order and good government" mentioned as a foundation for an enactment by one who pretends to be of Liberal persuasion. Nevertheless he uses these words in good faith and I refer this article to the minister. It continues:

If any one or more provinces were dissatisfied the onus of constitutional attack would be upon them.

That is written by a gentleman who presumes to be and who is I believe an authority on the matter. He is known to the Minister of Labour and has done special work for the Department of Labour from time to time. He has been actively engaged in labour movements from the time he was able to take part in any movement. He gives it as his opinion that unemployment insurance can be brought into effect by this government should they desire to take action under that oft-repeated clause of peace, order and good government. He believes that should this action be challenged in the courts, the decision would be that the point was not well taken and that the government was within its rights in passing legislation under that particular clause. I refer this to the minister for what it may be worth and I am sure he will give it the consideration it deserves.

To continue the argument further with particular reference to the city of Montreal, I do not desire to burden the committee with all the facts and figures that I have before me, but I might state that the metropolitan commission gave me, in tabulated form, certain facts and figures in connection with Montreal. I know that we have before us many tabulations with reference to unemployment in Canada, but I thought these figures were illuminating and interesting, dealing as they do with one city and showing the conditions that prevailed in one unit of our population. With the permission of the committee I should like to place on Hansard certain figures which were compiled by the department of unemployment relief showing the persons given relief, employables and unemployables, during September, 1937.

The CHAIRMAN: It will have to be with the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. WALSH: Figures are given for heads of families, single cases and dependents, both employable and unemployable, and then there is a recapitulation. With the consent of the committee, I should like to place these figures on Hansard. They are as follows:

Mr. DUNNING: Where are the figures from?

Mr. WALSH: From the department of unemployment relief of the city of Montreal. They were given to me by the metropolitan commission. I have also before me a recapitulation for the months of January, February and March. I should like to quote these figures to show that in the city of Montreal there has been a steady and appreciable increase in the numbers of unemployed during the past three months. In the month of January, 1937, there were 35,875 heads of families on relief. That figure dropped to 25,167 in January, 1938. In February, 1937, there were 35,890 heads of families on relief as against 25,636 in February, 1938. In March, 1937, there were 35,322 as against 25,867 in March, 1938. There had been an increase in the number of heads of families on relief from 25,167 in January, 1938, to 25,867 in March, 1938. This increase can be accounted for only by the fact that conditions in that city were not what they had been a few months previously. Apparently another recession has occurred. Whether that recession is of a permanent or a temporary nature, we are unable to tell at the present time. There were 5,433 single cases on relief in January, 1938, and this number had increased to 5,769 in March. The total for January, 1938, for all persons on direct relief was 125,015, and this had increased to 128,742 in March, 1938. These figures show that the number on relief was steadily on the increase.

For my own information and that of those who are particularly interested in Montreal, I also found out the racial origins of those who were unemployed in that city. We have French Canadians unemployed to the extent of 78·5 per cent. Of course we must bear in mind that over 70 per cent of the population of Montreal is French Canadian. Other percentages are: English Catholic, 6·25; English Protestant, 6; Italian, 3; Jewish, 1; other nationalities, 5·25,—all on direct relief in the city of Montreal.

With the unanimous consent of the committee I will place before hon. members the figures obtained through the same source, namely the department of relief through the office of the metropolitan commission. These statistics show the ages and the causes of certain incapacity when it is referred to as "incomplete capacity," with categories of married, single, widowed and so on. I have this statement before me. If the committee would give me permission to place it on record it would save me the trouble of reading the figures.

These figures show that the greatest amount of unemployment is in the building trades. That is why I have emphasized the desirability of a slum clearance and housing program. Most of the unemployment in Montreal, as well as, I understand, in the other large cities of Canada, comes under the classification of those engaged either directly or indirectly—mostly directly—in the building trades. Of the total number, 38,707, of the family heads and their dependents over sixteen years of age who are listed as employable, in receipt of direct relief during September, 1937, the last date with respect to which I was able to obtain data, 8,298 are normally engaged directly in the building trades; that is 21·4 per cent of the total. In this connection it is interesting to note that at the present time—I am speaking of April, 1938—the basic costs of direct relief are borne by the federal, provincial and municipal governments, each paying one-third. I wish to point out and to emphasize that although it appears that the municipal government is paying only one-third of the cost of unemployment in Montreal, that is not exactly the case. In reality it works out that Montreal is paying approximately fifty per cent of the total cost of the unemployment situation over which they are at present trying to take control. Montreal assumes the full cost of administration expenses as well as certain supplementary costs such as medical and dental services, electricity, returning unemployed to their place of legal domicile, surplus rent, etc. The department of unemployment relief estimates that, including the supplementary costs referred to in the foregoing paragraph, Montreal is now paying approximately fifty per cent of the all-inclusive cost of direct relief.

It is a question in my mind how long a city like Montreal, with its tremendous debt burden, can bear the excessive expense to which it is being put. I have here statistics prepared by Mr. Lactance Roberge, director of finance for the city of Montreal. He prepared a statement to present to a meeting of aldermen in that city, and the following indicates what he is reported as having said in introducing it:

> In special caucus called to listen to complaints from aldermen and others on dole administration, councilmen yesterday heard director of finance Lactance Roberge warn the city that if present dole payments by the city continue, in the next few years Montreal will be facing a financial hole, with fixed charges of sinking fund and interest for dole eating up as much as the dole itself.

Then he went on to give the actual figures compiled as from the year 1930 and carried them on through to the year 1950. I shall not read all the figures, but I want to read the concluding part of his statement. It shows that the interest on the amount of money that the city of Montreal has borrowed for dole or relief purposes from 1930, and will borrow, if the present system is continued, down to the year 1950, will together have amounted to $32,508,966, and the sinking fund which is necessary to look after that would amount to $20,401,509, making a total of $52,910,475 required for interest and sinking fund alone at the end of 1950. And whereas in that year the total amount required for the actual expense of the dole will be $5,985,000, the amount of $5,780,066 will then be needed for sinking fund and interest on the amount borrowed up to that time. Probably Montreal is only one city which is handling its dole or relief system in that way. Many other cities also are borrowing to meet these payments. How can they continue to do so? The municipalities simply cannot stand the financial strain and burden which are being placed upon them. It is for that reason I urge that the municipalities should be taken more into the confidence of the minister and be given a larger say in the matter, to explain what they think should be done; for in the end they are the people who will find it hardest to pay for what is being done. They are accumulating a huge debt, with an enormous sinking fund required annually and huge interest obligations, which they will not be able to pay and meet the other ordinary expenses which are incurred by a city such as Montreal.

In clause 3 the minister refers to the fact that he proposes to undertake certain public works. I would urge that the minister, in giving consideration to these works, should not fall into the error that the authorities in the city of New York fell into in not seeing that at least fifty per cent of those given employment under these public works programs were taken off the direct relief roll. It seems to me that fifty per cent is rather a small percentage to expect to be removed from the relief rolls; I should look to see a much higher figure. I was examining an article written about the city of New York wherein it was said that with all these huge public expenditures in and around the city they were able to take off the public relief rolls only fifteen to twenty per cent of those actually on the rolls. We in this country, I think, should attempt to go very much higher than that and to take off at least fifty per cent, so that these people should get back into a state of employment; for I notice that if a person once gets back into employment he is more likely to stay in that position and keep off the rolls than if he is continued on the rolls, merely looking for a position and not able to find one.

I read with a great deal of interest in to-day's Hansard the remarks of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) and also those of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and for the most part I am in accord with their particular reference to unemployment and their suggestions along that line. They are rather vigorous in their criticism of the policies of the present government and the lack of anything definite or concrete actually before us. In discussing this bill, I for one cannot see why the Minister of Labour cannot stand before parliament and, instead of telling us to wait for the supplementary estimates or to wait for something before disclosing the whole program, give us in concise terms exactly what his department proposes to do in order to carry out the provisions of the bill that we are now studying. I do not think it is asking him to do too much to take the members of the house into his confidence, because they are deeply interested in what the government are going to do in the immediate future. I know he proposes to make that statement before the house rises, probably when the other estimates are before the house; but here is an important bill, and many members have expressed a desire to know exactly what the government intends to do. The minister should be in a position now to express an opinion and to give the house very definite information as to what he has in mind at the present time in regard to employment relief in Canada. I hope that before the debate concludes he will have a detailed statement ready to present to us.

It was rather gratifying to listen to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) last evening. He brings with him into debate a wholesome atmosphere, and in my opinion, if there were more solid, staid Canadian citizens like him this country would be better off and we would have less unemployment. I rather like his complimentary remarks to the Minister of Labour and his sympathy with him as he listens from day to day to the debates in this house, particularly on this measure, and I hope that the minister will take cognizance of what the hon. gentleman had to say, especially the commonsense point of view he gave to the house in reference to many of the suggestions that are indirectly referred to in this bill. I have already referred to the fact that the building trade was the one most seriously injured. The member for Brant last evening made reference to higher wages being paid in the city, and he did not think that was a cure for unemployment. I want to assure him that the country is always more prosperous when higher wages are paid in the cities. Thereby more purchasing power is put into the cities to relieve the agricultural population of their produce at a higher price than they would otherwise obtain.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Real wages, or money wages?

Mr. MacINNIS: Wages add to cost.

Mr. WALSH: Yes, but they benefit the farmer. If the hon. gentleman will study Canadian history from the point of view of our economic progress he will notice that the most prosperous times have been when wages were higher in the cities.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Real wages, or money wages?

Mr. WALSH: Money wages.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Money wages and real wages are two different things.

Mr. WALSH: I prefer to talk in terms which the workingman can understand. I am referring to the money that is put into the pay envelopes of men who are employed for seven, eight and nine hours a day. When those wages are high you put greater purchasing power into the hands of the workers and they are able to use it to advantage, and as they use it agriculture and other industries develop and thrive. On the other hand, if you put low purchasing power in the worker's hands it depreciates the products of other people who are engaged in either primary or secondary industry. That is a well-recognized fact.

Mr. THORSON: It is the other way round.

Mr. WALSH: No, it is not; you have to look at it from the broad point of view of the workers.

Mr. MUTCH: The hon. gentleman should distinguish between wages and purchasing power.

Mr. WALSH: Wages and purchasing power are very much the same thing. If I have a thousand a year with which to make purchases and that is reduced to five hundred, my purchasing power is restricted by $500

Mr. MUTCH: We have had the experience of possessing $1,000 and finding it worth only $500 or $700.

Mr. WALSH: You have to take the wage of any particular class and compare it with what is paid for the services of other people in similar walks of life. It is no use arguing the point; it is obvious to anyone who will give it proper attention. The question must be looked at not from any narrow point of view, not only from the point of view of the workers, but from the point of view of every Canadian citizen who is interested in the maximum distribution of money, wages paid in the country. If we can get that maximum distribution there will be little or no unemployment.

I have in my hand the "Report of the Investigation Committee re Unemployment", in the city of Montreal, and I notice certain very broad features in connection with the building trade. I see that from 1925 down to 1936 there was at first an increase up to the year 1929 from $25,000,000 to $46,000,000, in the total amount of building being done in the city. Then it gradually decreased until in 1936 it had gone down to $6,905,323. I read these figures in order to emphasize the tremendous decrease in building operations in the city of Montreal alone, and that accounts for a large part of the unemployment, and hence the number on direct relief. That is why I urge slum clearance and a cheaper housing program for the larger centres in order to stimulate industry in the building trades. If we make a comparison between January 1 and May 31, we find that there was an increase from $1,698,067 in 1936 to $2,992,235 in 1937. On the same page, under the heading Loan Facilities, the statement is made:

> Statistics of the last three years show that while savings are gradually increasing by 900 millions per year, loans to business and money in circulation are constantly decreasing. Means shuld be taken to prevent this decrease.

Again looking at the "Report of the Investigation Committee re Unemployment", city of Montreal, page 29, we find that in 1936 deposits in bank savings amounted to $18,218,588,511; loans to business in the same year amounted to $8,384,277,880; money in circulation in the same year amounted to $1,434,067,677. If we compare that with 1935 and 1934 we find a decrease in loans, showing that we are gradually receding as far as loan facilities are concerned. And that is not in any way helping to make matters better as far as Montreal is concerned. These observations are not made in the spirit of political criticism; I did indulge in that when the minister first introduced his motion covering this bill, and I felt I was justified in doing so on that occasion. But to-day I wanted to put before the minister these facts with particular reference to the city of Montreal, not only because I am particularly interested in that city but also on account of it being a centre from which I could get direct and authentic information, and knowing that conclusions drawn from that authentic information could be applied to other large centres in Canada. I urge upon the minister the necessity of giving serious consideration to a slum clearance program in the larger cities, and the building of low rental houses.

Have we had tabled in the house any report of the employment commission in connection with low rental houses, or slum clearance, or both? If not, will such a report be tabled? For I understand that the employment commission made a very complete study of general conditions not only in Canada and the United States but also in Great Britain and some European countries. I know there is reference to it, but I wonder if a complete and detailed report, making certain suggestions and recommendations, has been before the government but has not yet been placed before this house, something on which we could base an argument for immediate action which would bring alleviation to the building trades of this country.

Mr. ROGERS: The report of the national employment commission does contain what in the view of the commission itself was a summary of their plans with respect to low rental housing. I am speaking now not of the earlier references to housing, but of the statement of the plan as set forth in the appendix to the report. That does contain to my knowledge the entire plan submitted by the national employment commission with respect to low rental housing.

Mr. WALSH: Then the full report of the national employment commission has not been placed before the house?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not able to say at the moment from recollection how much more extensive was the recommendation made to the government on low rental housing, but certainly this contains the summary, and was submitted as such by the commission.

Mr. STEWART: The debate on this bill has extended over a considerable length of time, and been characterized by repeated demands and continued pressure upon the minister for more information and for details of the program he has in mind. We have had before this house seven or perhaps eight bills for the relief of unemployment. Reviewing them all and looking now at Bill No. 105 at present before this committee, I fail to find in any of these bills very many differences in the general scheme and outline and plan proposed for the relief of unemployment. I recall that in years gone by when bills such as this were first introduced there was strong pressure, carried to extreme limits, for details, estimates, statements of policy. I submit that after this lapse of time, and after the setting up of an employment commission whose investigation covered at least a year and cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, hon. members are not unreasonable in pressing the minister for a more detailed and more expanded program than has been presented in the past. I submit in all seriousness that at this stage we have a right to ask the minister for much more information, much more detail, much fuller explanation of the plans of the government for the coming year—if they have any—than hitherto we have had.

One criticism in particular of the bills brought in from 1931 to 1935 was, as the minister well knows, that they were in the nature of a blank cheque; that they gave to the governor in council authority and discretion to do practically anything and everything. I ask the minister to compare this bill with the others and to point out, if he can, how it materially differs in that respect from any of its predecessors.

Mr. ROGERS: The matter of parliamentary appropriations, of course, is a material difference.

Mr. STEWART: I do not think that makes a bit of difference.

Mr. ROGERS: It bears directly on the blank cheque question.

Mr. STEWART: I think not. I expected the minister to make that point. We have parliamentary appropriations with respect to certain items, not all. But where do parliamentary appropriations come from? They come from the governor in council; it is the governor in council who places before this house estimates of what is to be expended.

Mr. ROGERS: But there is a limitation upon them.

Mr. STEWART: This bill says that the governor in council shall determine what expenditures shall be made out of moneys which are provided by the governor in council. What authority has any hon. member of this house to increase or modify by one dollar the appropriations made by the governor in council?

Mr. ROGERS: The appropriation is a limitation. With a blank cheque there is no limitation. Surely that is a material difference. Under the blank cheque legislation there was no limitation of any kind, with respect either to the amount or to the direction of expenditure.

Mr. STEWART: It is a distinction without a difference; for there is no limitation now upon what the governor in council may place in those estimates. The estimates for this purpose may be $20,000,000, $50,000,000 or $100,000,000; there is no limitation. So in the end it is fixed by the governor in council, and it is the governor in council that has control of it. In section 3 I find these words:

> The governor in council may out of moneys appropriated by parliament authorize the execution of such undertakings as the governor in council may determine—

Then in subsection 2 of the same section:

> In the execution of any such undertaking provision shall be made, so far as it may be in the opinion of the governor in council practical and consistent with reasonable efficiency—

And so on. Then in section 4:

> The governor in council may enter into agreements—

Then follow two or three subdivisions. Then section 5:

> The governor in council, where necessary, may out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund grant financial assistance to any province—

And so on. Then in subsection 2 of section 5:

> The governor in council may renew or consolidate for such periods and upon such terms as the governor in council may determine, loans, advances—

And so on. Then further on in the same section:

> —may accept such treasury bills, bonds, debentures or other securities as may be approved by the governor in council—

Then in section 7:

> The governor in council may make all such orders and regulations as may be deemed necessary or desirable to carry out the purposes and intentions of this act.

Section 8 provides:

> All orders and regulations of the governor in council . . . shall have the force of law and may be varied, extended or revoked—

Then section 10:

> Subject to the approval of the governor in council the minister may appoint such officers, clerks and employees—

So it is my contention that in all essential respects and for all practical purposes, considering that the estimates in the first instance are determined and settled by the governor in council, the administration of the act and the amount to be expended under it are within the control of the governor in council. In that respect it does not differ from previous bills, and I do not see how it could well differ. It is difficult to ascertain or anticipate what may be the requirements, and under the circumstances the governor in council must have a wide discretion. I am simply mentioning this in answer to the criticism of years gone by in regard to the policy that was adopted.

As I have said, the minister has been pressed for information. It seems to me that if he had adopted the course that was followed last year his position would have been much better to-day. Last year the special supplementary estimates which accompanied a similar bill were tabled in the house at a comparatively early date. According to the journals of the house they were brought down on March 3, and from that time on the members of the house had before them details of the expenditures proposed by the government for these purposes. A summary of those estimates shows that $19,000,000 odd was included for grants in aid. In going through these estimates one finds large items, such as must be expended under the terms of this bill. For instance, there was item 302, under the Department of Labour: To provide for federal contribution to provincial and municipal relief projects, $7,000,000 odd. Item 304: To provide for federal contribution to farm employment and supplementary plans, $3,000,000 odd. Item 308: To provide for development and training projects for unemployed young people, $1,000,000. Item 309: To provide for direct relief in the dried out areas, $2,000,000. Then: Grants in aid: amount required to provide for monthly grants in aid to the provinces, $19,500,000. So, as I have mentioned, every member of this house had information as to the amount which would be available for expenditure during the coming year under the provisions of the bill.

The second reading of the bill similar to the one we are now considering did not take place until March 31, 1937. Now, for some reason which the minister may be able or may desire to explain, a different course has been followed. This house is asked to consider and pass this bill in this blanket form, without information similar to that which was furnished last year; without any estimates before it and with the knowledge that when the estimates do come down they cannot be increased by one dollar. Under these circumstances I ask the minister if he thinks the members of this committee are acting unreasonably in pressing for this information. Here we are in the month of May. We ought to be beginning work for the relief of unemployment, but we have not the estimates before us. Last year we had them on March 3, and it was possible to consider the bill in the light of those estimates. Why was not a similar course adopted this year? Cannot the government make up their minds, with the report of the employment commission before them? Why are they withholding from this house their plans, their program, their intentions, and a statement of the amount of money that they expect to expend for the relief of unemployment during 1938? That is what the members of this committee wish to know. That is what they are pressing for, and I do submit to the minister that the position they are taking is fair and reasonable, and the only one that will enable the committee to come to a conclusion as to whether the plans proposed are adequate or inadequate; whether they are sufficiently broad and comprehensive.

I had hoped that in view of the statements of the minister on previous occasions we would have had presented a plan covering more than one year. The minister has spoken of a long range program, but here we have the same old proposition. This act expires March 31, 1939. There is no provision, no plan, no scheme, no program except a temporary makeshift one for the year 1938. There is no housing plan, so far as we know. I do suggest to the minister that we might embark upon a program to cover more than one year, for the construction of highways, particularly in connection with secondary roads rather than main highways, of which we have perhaps enough for the time being.

Mr. ROGERS: Would not my hon. friend think that secondary roads, even more than main highways, were principally a provincial responsibility?

Mr. STEWART: That may be so, but each year it is growing more difficult to draw the line between federal, provincial and municipal responsibility, and to divide the work and the cost of unemployment relief. I do suggest that at this time there is less cooperation among the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion than there ever was, so far as unemployment relief is concerned. All one has to do is to take note of what he reads in the press. There we find evidence that some of the provincial authorities criticize the dominion government for evading responsibilities, and the municipalities criticize provincial and federal governments for the same reason. To my mind it has become at least to a certain extent—and I do not use the term offensively—a process of chiselling, where each one sees how much it can get from the other.

I believe we are driven to find any field of employment in which men can usefully be set to work. We cannot draw the line too finely as to whether it is municipal, provincial or federal. Reforestation and works of that kind might be undertaken as a program not for one year—that is the point I am impressing upon the minister—but extending over several years. In view of the statements made by the minister respecting plans, and in view of the visions he had outlined of a program covering a long-range attack, I had expected something greater than a program for only one year. I would suggest that it be laid out for a number of years, and that enough money be appropriated to make available a certain amount over a period of five years to overtake the work. There is enough useful work to be done in Canada to extend over that length of time, and I would urge the minister to consider something of the kind.

Almost every criticism has been advanced, and it is not my desire to take up further time. I do not wish to embarrass the minister in connection with the problem before him for solution, but I do say that if he had adopted the course followed last year and had brought down estimates much time would have been saved, much information would have been available and we would have had some understanding of the plan the government intends to follow, a plan which at present is obscure and about which we know practically nothing. We are asked to pass the bill, and then when estimates are brought down—which we cannot increase and the points concerning which the governor in council will settle and determine—it is out of these and these alone that anything can be done.

I suggest the minister might well leave the bill in committee until he places the estimates before the house as he did last year. I would ask him to make clear in what respects this measure is an expansion or extension or development of or an improvement upon any of the plans submitted in the last six years. Wherein is it wider or more comprehensive? Wherein is it better than any which have been proposed previously, and to what extent has the report of the employment commission influenced or expanded the program? Is anything to be done as a result of the recommendations of the employment commission?

I repeat that the minister would make better progress and would receive greater support from hon. members if he would bring down the estimates to which the bill refers and out of which all the activities here outlined must be provided for. Otherwise we are giving a blank cheque and cannot come to any intelligent conclusion as to whether or not the program is sufficient or will really meet the requirements. Under the present procedure, when the estimates are brought down we will be in the unfortunate position of having our hands tied by the passage of this measure, and will be unable to increase the amounts appropriated. If the amounts are insufficient we shall have committed ourselves in advance. I do not wish to say more with respect to section 3.

Mr. ROGERS: I assure the hon. member that there has been nothing deliberate or sinister in the fact that the bill has been introduced in advance of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. STEWART: I did not suggest there was anything sinister.

Mr. ROGERS: I understand that; but I want to remove any possible misgiving in that regard. It is true that last year the bill was introduced at about the same time the special supplementary estimates were brought down, and those estimates were before the house when the bill was under consideration. I believe I am correct when I say that in the previous year that was not done, and at that time we were in a position somewhat similar to that in which we are to-day.

As to the reasons, I would point out that this year, as already indicated by the Minister of Finance, it is the intention to combine the final with the special supplementary estimates. Last year there were three sets of estimates, namely the main estimates, the special supplementary estimates and the final supplementary estimates. This year it is the intention to combine the last two sets, and to dispense with the final suplementary estimates which were brought down just before the close of the last session. Of necessity that has entailed some delay in the submission of the estimates with which presumably this measure will deal.

May I point out, as I have done before, that the provisions of the present measure are as wide as the provisions of any bill could be in enabling the government either directly or in association with the provinces to make expenditures for the relief of the unemployed.

Mr. STEWART: Is it wider than any of the other bills?

Mr. ROGERS: Precisely the same in that regard.

Mr. STEWART: Exactly.

Mr. ROGERS: My point is that I can conceive of nothing in the consideration of the supplementary estimates to follow which might affect what the house might wish to do with respect to the present measure, because it simply gives authority to the government to make expenditures to deal with unemployment and agricultural distress.

Mr. STEWART: That has always been the practice.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I agree that has always been the practice, and I also agree that if, as the hon. member suggested, instead of having this as an annual bill it had been submitted without any date of expiration indicated, no possible question would have arisen here with respect to the authority under which we might act. All the discussion of the past two weeks would have taken place, and properly so, in the consideration of the supplementary estimates. If the hon. member will look back at the special supplementary estimates of last year he will find items 301 to 311 listed, and under each of those items he will find provision for specific expenditures in relation to unemployment and agricultural distress.

I have taken occasion to say to the house that with respect to at least most of these matters the experience of the preceding administration and that of this one has suggested that these forms of aid should be continued. I refer particularly to grants in aid, grants for drought relief, for farm employment, for youth training and for agricultural reestablishment.

Last night I said that any legislation with respect to housing would have to take the form either of new legislation or of amendments to that which now exists. That is not a matter which under the present distribution of legislation in this government comes under the Department of Labour. It might be dealt with under the bill now before us, but I feel it could be dealt with more suitably under special legislation. Both the Dominion Housing Act and the Home Improvement Act were dealt with in that way, and both are administered by the Department of Finance. They are concerned almost wholly with financial provisions in the form of loans.

I do not know that I can say anything more in answer to my hon. friend, who has made what I think is a perfectly fair criticism from his point of view. I have tried to point out why this bill precedes the supplementary estimates. I wish it were otherwise, but that is how it stands. It is the intention to have two sets of estimates instead of three as we had last year, and this has involved rather more delay in the presentation than might have been the case otherwise. I cannot see that the action to be taken on this bill, which after all confers general authority upon the government, would be influenced in any degree by a discussion of particular items of expenditure which might appear in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. STEWART: Perhaps I did not make my point clear enough. My point was that the housing act or anything which might be designed for the relief of unemployment in any way should have been before the committee before this bill was introduced or pressed to a conclusion. What the minister says about the items for the relief of unemployment is perfectly correct, but the supplementary estimates contained a large number of items for public works. I did not refer to them, but there was a long list of large appropriations.

Mr. ROGERS: I was correct in saying that there were three sets of estimates last year.

Mr. STEWART: Quite right, but the final set of supplementary estimates was for a comparatively small amount, $11,000,000. The special supplementary estimates to which I have referred amounted to $96,000,000 odd. Those estimates included some items which should not have been included because they were for government-owned enterprises and should not have found a place in supplementary estimates in connection with the relief of unemployment. There was $36,000,000 voted for government-owned enterprises. I can understand that it would be well, as a matter of bookkeeping, to have these estimates brought down together. I suggest that it would be well to have many items of the supplementary estimates included in the main estimates, but I submit that this unemployment relief measure should have the right of way over everything else. It is the most important measure before the House of Commons this year, and any minor convenience in connection with the preparation of a second set of supplementary estimates should give way to the greater need of having the program complete at the earliest possible date. I think the minister will agree with me when I say that it is rather late in the year. We should be working on these things. We are into the month of May and we ought to be putting men to work.

Mr. ROGERS: That is why I was anxious to get the bill through as soon as possible.

Mr. STEWART: Quite so, but your estimates are not down. Getting this bill through cannot help you.

Mr. ROGERS: This bill would give us authority.

Mr. STEWART: The moneys must be appropriated. If the minister got his bill through to-night he could not expend a dollar of the money until parliament had voted the money under estimates which have not yet been brought down.

Mr. BONNIER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the observations of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) prompt me to say a few words in order to show his inconsistency. About a month ago, the hon. member criticized the ministers for their methods in stating during the St. Henry by-election campaign that the unemployment situation in Montreal made it necessary to complete certain works undertaken in that city. To-day he seems to contradict himself, since he admits that there is grave distress in Montreal. But he forgets to say that the expenditure for relief in the city of Montreal has greatly diminished during the past year. From $10,526,000 in 1936 it has fallen to $8,600,000 in 1937, a decrease of approximately $2,000,000. While not entirely satisfactory, this decrease is quite substantial.

As the hon. member for Mount Royal now claims that the situation is serious in Montreal, he should not have objected the other day to the completion of the tunnel and of the central station which are indispensible to that city. I am still of the opinion that direct relief should never have been initiated by any government, but, in the present circumstances, we are compelled to suffer the consequences of the acts of his friends who were in power at the time.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister may think me rather insistent, but I should like to refer him to the statement he made last night. He said:

> I should like, however, to discuss the references made to the importance of a Peace River outlet. Highway connection with the Peace River is, I believe, appreciated on all sides of the house.

The minister has had time since yesterday evening to formulate some plan about this project; he has had an opportunity to discuss the references made to a Peace River outlet, and I should like to know if he is willing to make a statement.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend is optimistic if he thinks that I have had sufficient time to consider the matter or that I have the authority to commit the government to the expenditure of the amount he has suggested. I am sure he is aware of that. I did tell him deliberately that I felt that the importance of having a Peace River outlet was appreciated on all sides of this house. But surely he understands that even though I had the authority to say here in connection with his representations, "Yes, on behalf of the government I say that this road will be built," that would not be a satisfactory method of conducting government in this country. He knows perfectly well it would not. I suggest to him that his question is really not a relevant question at this stage.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) put the situation very well. After this bill passes the house the estimates will be brought down, and the minister himself has stated that they are to be consolidated, that there will not be three sets as there were last year. How are we to know what is to be undertaken? I did not expect the minister to commit himself to a definite project, but if he could say--

Mr. ROGERS: I thought that was what my hon. friend was asking me to do.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am sorry if I conveyed that impression. I wanted to know if the minister was in a position to say that he was favourable to such a project. I did not expect him to commit himself definitely and say, "Yes, it will be done." I realize that that is not possible.

Mr. ROGERS: Suppose I were to say that as Minister of Labour I was favourable to the project, and subsequently the matter was considered by the government, as all matters of expenditure must be; if it was not agreed to then I would be in the position of appearing to favour something which the government could not undertake. That would not be a tolerable situation. That is why, when any of these representations are made with respect to expenditures of public money, decision has to be reserved until they can be considered by the government and supplementary estimates brought down, which after all represent the considered opinion of the government as a whole. As my hon. friend is aware, when estimates are brought down they are preceded by a message from His Excellency the Governor General, and these formalities are desirable in order that there shall be a satisfactory control over expenditures. I could not say more to him with respect to this particular project than I said to him last night. I am quite sure that upon reflection he will appreciate that.

Mr. PELLETIER: I quite agree, except that the remarks of the minister may have led me to believe that possibly he would have had more to say about the matter than he has at this time. However, I see the minister's position and quite accept it.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not want to hold up this matter, but as the representative of a constituency which has a great population of unemployed in the urban centres, I feel that I should make one or two observations, and it is particularly the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River which bring me to my feet. I may be doing his project and other similarly proposed projects a great injustice; but my impression is that the area from which he comes is not, in terms of unemployment, at all comparable with the great industrial centres where unemployment exists in very serious proportions. If one were to carry out the program suggested by the hon. member who has just spoken, there would not result in any substantial measure any real relief. I suggest to the minister that when he comes to consider what shall be done by way of works for those areas which find themselves in the greatest distress he should bear in mind, as undoubtedly he will, the need of providing work in those centres where work in temporary form is required most. A great road scheme, meritorious as it may be, would not be of very much assistance to the city from which I come. I cannot speak for Toronto, Hamilton and other industrial cities; but my impression is that a large road building scheme, while it may give work to many who probably need it, will not provide the same opportunities for others who undoubtedly need it most. I do not think one can stress this point too much.

I have sat through this entire debate; I do not believe I have left the house for ten minutes; and my earlier intention was to say something which now has already been said by many hon. members. I therefore wish merely to make this suggestion. The problem is particularly acute at this time, although not so acute as some have made it out to be. This condition exists, not so much because of what this government has failed to do, not so much because of what the previous government failed to do, but because when this country enjoyed prosperity we failed to take precautions to deal with a state of unemployment which has been traditional with us almost throughout our history. The right hon. leader of the opposition yesterday interjected a remark that in this respect unemployment was essentially a seasonal matter. That I think is true. I mention this, not with the purpose of suggesting extenuating circumstances for the minister or for the government, but as a fact which must be borne in mind in trying to meet this problem.

I suggest to the minister that either we are going to do something about this problem of unemployment or we are not; either we are going to spend the people's money in an effort to temporize with this problem or we are not. If we are going to take out of the public exchequer funds with which to provide in an artificial way employment for those who do not have it, we should do so in an effective manner; otherwise the economic waste, let alone the disastrous results which must follow from an attempt to impress upon sections of the unemployed that the government intends to take care of them when in the final resort the government for some reason or none finds that it cannot, will have more serious consequences than the attempt which has already been indicated.

I have tried, as I sat in this house during the last few days, to think of something to suggest to the minister that he does not already know, but I am afraid there is nothing I can say that he does not already know. The speeches that have already been given probably cover the entire ground. But I do suggest, in view of the brief presented yesterday by the Ontario government, that the record of practically every country in the western world in respect of unemployment insurance should convince this country of the need for it. The question arises whether we are to have unemployment insurance at the initiative of the provinces or of the federal government. My view is that unemployment is a national problem and that it is for this parliament to deal with it. I quite appreciate the attitude which will undoubtedly be taken by areas wherein the population is essentially rural and not urban. But I suggest that the economy of Canada is such that we cannot make distinct differentials in respect of geographical divisions. It is true one can speak of the western provinces, but in doing so one must not forget that that region contains cities. In British Columbia, of course, is the great city of Vancouver; in the maritime provinces there is Halifax as well as other large centres. To talk of unemployment insurance in terms of only two provinces will not, in my judgment, adequately meet this problem of unemployment. I am particularly interested in unemployment insurance, for this reason. The workers in many of the factories of Windsor, for instance, are not employed for the full year. They will work for five, six, seven or eight months and then they are thrown out of work. In many cases they have to be maintained by the state, through the agency of the municipality or otherwise. That condition cannot go on forever. The longer we postpone action the more difficult it is going to be. Fully appreciative as I am of the great labour and sincerity the minister has put into his job, I suggest to him that it will be a matter of deep satisfaction to the people of Canada, and certainly to the area from which I come, if before this parliament rises we shall have at least taken steps to initiate a scheme of national unemployment insurance.

Mr. HEAPS: How can it be done under present circumstances?

Mr. MARTIN: I venture to suggest that this is the way to do it, that if we cannot get the provinces to agree to it we should assume that power. We have to face sooner or later the question of jurisdiction. We have to face sooner or later the continual shifting of responsibility from the provinces to the federal government and from the federal government back to the provinces and ultimately to the municipalities.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that not exactly what parliament did in 1935?

Mr. MARTIN: Well, parliament did it in 1935; but the situation to-day is altogether different. There are provinces that have already signified their willingness to accept a system of unemployment insurance, and in regard to those provinces you could have a scheme. I suggest, just as the hon. gentleman himself last night suggested, that if one or two provinces had the benefit of unemployment insurance, as in the case of old age pensions, the others would ultimately come in. But someone must make a start, and I suggest that if we postpone this question too long we shall find it will be too late to make the necessary start.

I want to commend the minister as strongly as I can for the work done on behalf of youth rehabilitation. It is all very well for some hon. members to say that nothing has been done by this government. That is not so. I say that the initial work done by the minister in ascertaining the scope and the nature of the problem, the registrations and the surveys that were made, is a work that was necessary, work that should have been done earlier, and if that work was not done it would simply have magnified the problem. With regard to youth rehabilitation there is in some provinces an inclination not to take the matter seriously. In my opinion this government has made a great contribution. First of all, there was the appropriation last year based upon similar appropriations from the provinces. That has already brought results and I would mention one illustration. In my own community the home training centre, while at the moment it affects only sixty young ladies, is nevertheless something that will prove of great consequence not only to these young ladies but also to others who will have the same opportunity later on; and I am glad to note that the minister hopes it will be possible to extend this work. I suggest that if it is in his power, those provinces which have not taken full advantage of the appropriation made by parliament should be asked to do so.

Mr. HAYHURST: In regard to these youth training centres, has not the province to take the initiative?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, the administration is for the province; but if this parliament had not taken action it is fair to suggest that the provinces would not have acted. This parliament has made an appropriation of $1,000,000.

There is another observation I wish to make. We have heard a great deal about low cost housing. I do not think the minister requires from me, or anyone else, at this stage, arguments for or against this proposal. These, I am sure, are before him. I suggest to him, however, speaking in a representative capacity for an area where there is now a shortage of houses, that a wide embracing scheme of low cost housing would be a most effective measure of providing for the time being work in a city like Windsor. I also suggest that in considering the question of increasing our tourist trade, a city like Windsor, bordering as it does on the city of Detroit and on the great republic of the United States, presents opportunities for river front development and so on. This matter has already been discussed by the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) and myself with the minister and his department. Schemes like that will prove of great assistance to that area.

I am fully conscious of the fact that I have merely made a few observations which will in no wise really help the minister. I am frank enough to admit that in trying to consider this problem I find that the proposals put forward by the hon. member for Huron North and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar represent the two ends of this great question. We are passing through difficult times. Many of us believe that we are perhaps passing from one form of economic society into another. My own view is that certainly we are going through a transformation of our economic society. What the ultimate form will be I do not know and I do not believe that anyone does; but I do suggest, by way of brief comment upon what the hon. member for Huron North said, that a mere reduction of taxation, which I am sure is necessary, and a mere change of fiscal policy, will not take care of this problem of unemployment. Let us face that reality. On the other hand, in reference to what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, I do not believe that socialism or the cooperative state, if established, would take care of the problem, because in those areas where the cooperative state exists, where there is socialism, you are still confronted with the problem of unemployment.

An hon. MEMBER: Not to the same extent.

Mr. MARTIN: The problem of unemployment in Russia is an acute one. I was reading only last night in Current History an essay on the cooperative state, and while I believe that offers perhaps more opportunity than the socialist state, even there you find the problem of unemployment. So that we are faced with two alternatives—one, a laissez-faire world, and the other a world in which the state has complete control of industry to the extent of ownership. In any event, whether the utopia of my hon. friends opposite is realized or not, the fact is that it is not here, and we are consequently compelled to deal at the moment with a very practical problem.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can the hon. member suggest a middle way?

Mr. MARTIN: I am trying to do that. I have been frank enough to admit that I find the problem fraught with all sorts of difficulty. We can spend millions for the time being to provide work, but we cannot go on doing that forever. In my opinion, an effective scheme of unemployment insurance, somewhat along the lines of the system in England, would take care of the unemployment problem, and during the period of transition those great sections of the unemployed not provided for in that way would be taken care of more effectively.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How is it possible to build up a fund in Canada under existing conditions?

Mr. MARTIN: That is a perfectly proper question. If we were to adopt the English or the United States system, it would mean that there would be a period when unemployed individuals would not receive the benefit of it and thus we would have to take care of them in some measure. I think we would have to see that until such time as the scheme began to operate men would have to be provided, as they are now, with the necessities of life. We would have to face that aspect of the problem. It would mean the expenditure of a considerable sum of money, but we would have to do it. We must face the problem ultimately.

While the constitutional problem is a great one, and while there are indications now that some of the provinces regard unemployment insurance as essentially a provincial matter, my own view is that it is a national question and that it is for this parliament, while admitting the constitutional difficulty, to make a start. This whole question of conflict or jurisdiction might be treated compositely, that is by taking all questions in which it arises, lumping them together and making an issue of it. I have no doubt that if that were done public opinion in this country would subscribe to the view that in respect of essentially national problems this parliament should have the necessary authority. However, I believe that we can deal with unemployment insurance now. I venture to suggest that while one or two provinces might put obstacles in the way, the others would come in.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is charged with a great task. Any criticism made by myself, or I am sure by any hon. member, has not been against the minister personally—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not think there is anyone in this house or this country who could hold the portfolio of Labour with greater distinction and render greater service to the country than the present Minister of Labour. It is all very well to criticize his academic background and the like, but I would prefer to see my problems or the problems of the country in the hands of a man whose intellectual training is such as to give him some ability to determine rightly the courses he is taking. Some hon. members, I am sure, will appreciate the force of that statement. I say that not merely by way of empty compliment, but because I think this slight tribute is due to one who has an extremely great task on his hands. I only hope that when he faces this parliament again he will receive credit for a ministry in which he has already displayed great ability and energy; that he will be able to show greater and greater results, and that not only because of what is done in this parliament; for, after all, this is not only a governmental problem but a problem in which industry and private enterprise have their share. If we could come to a basis of cooperative effort and aggressive leadership in this house I am satisfied something would be done.

Mr. HEAPS: Just a few remarks in reference to some statements made by the last speaker. In regard to unemployment insurance he said he favoured the idea of the government enacting legislation and taking a chance to see whether it was constitutional or otherwise. The hon. member, who is a lawyer and a student of constitutional problems, knows that is exactly what was done in 1935; upon the change of government the party now in power tested the validity of that legislation, and it was declared by the highest court in the empire to be unconstitutional. So if the present government followed that suggestion, we should be in the same position as we were at the beginning of 1936.

The hon. member, however, suggested other alternatives. He proposed that this government enact legislation along the lines of the Old Age Pensions Act, making it permissive for the various provinces to come in. If the government would make an act of that kind sufficiently attractive, I think many provinces, if not all, would elect to come under the operation of such an act. Whether or not it is advisable to do so, I cannot say. Another alternative is along the lines of legislation enacted in the United States, where they are confronted with the same constitutional difficulty. That country has also adopted permissive legislation, and I observe that at the present time nearly all the states have come within the provisions of the social security act enacted there. Then there is another alternative which I suggest, although I have not given it very serious consideration. In view of what was said by the premier of Ontario before the Rowell commission, there seems to be a good deal of conflict as to jurisdiction, as to which authority should undertake certain legislation. In certain provinces the idea seems to be that more power should be given to the provinces. But in regard to such questions as old age pensions and unemployment insurance I think it would be admitted on all sides that they are federal matters. Perhaps it would be well for us in this parliament to consider whether there should not be a national referendum on the question whether such problems as this should not be entirely under federal jurisdiction, and this federal parliament have the right to amend the constitution, giving to the federal authorities the right to legislate on such matters as unemployment insurance. I think if such a referendum were held it would show that the overwhelming sentiment of the electors of Canada is in favour of giving to the federal authorities the right to legislate on such matters. If that were done, we might once and for all do away with the conflict as to jurisdiction in matters of this kind.

Personally I am anxious to see the government enact legislation in regard to unemployment insurance. But even that is not in itself a sufficient remedy for the difficulties facing us at the present time. As pointed out so ably by the speaker who preceded me, in the city of Windsor many men work for only eight months in the year. It would be almost impossible to keep a scheme of unemployment insurance actuarially sound under such conditions, maintaining those people for the other four months of the year. Consequently, we have to go far beyond the mere question of insurance, and provide public relief works or private sustenance, as at present. However, I just rose to say that I am extremely anxious to see if the government cannot now find ways and means of doing something towards bringing into being a scheme of unemployment insurance. I fully realize the constitutional difficulties in the way, but if the government, even at this late date, with all the knowledge they have at their command and their skilled experts, brought in a comprehensive scheme, I am sure that ultimately the people of this country would commend the government for such action.

Mr. STIRLING: The section which we are now considering makes reference to financial assistance which may be given to projects under provincial jurisdiction. I understood the minister to say yesterday that it should not be taken for granted that the arrangements with the provinces would be identical with those of previous years. Would the minister elaborate a little on that? I should like to know whether the initiative will come from the provinces, as on occasions at least it has done in the past, by their submitting to the dominion government certain pieces of work which they would like to have undertaken with the assistance of the dominion government, after which of course, the dominion government has to say whether that particular piece of work is suitable for the purpose or not.

Mr. ROGERS: I might refer back to what I said in this connection during the discussion of the resolution before the Easter recess. I pointed out that it would be the policy of the government to concentrate its expenditures on projects within federal jurisdiction. I am not in a position to go beyond that statement at the present time except to say that, in the expenditures to be provided for in the supplementary estimates, we propose to emphasize projects which will be within federal jurisdiction. It may be that there will still be some measure which will provide for joint works with the provinces; there may be a continuation of existing projects for which there will be a revote in the estimates, but in general the intention is to concentrate expenditures under federal jurisdiction and to avoid the difficulties—and to some extent the abuses—that have occurred under joint works programs.

Mr. JAQUES: Might I suggest that the problem is not so much one of unemployment as one of getting paid for employment. There is no difficulty in finding work; the difficulty is in finding money to pay for the work. In that connection I should like to read a short extract which throws some light on what I have just said. It is from The Art of Central Banking, by Mr. R. G. Hawtrey, who is a secretary to the British treasury. He says:

> The common factor in pre-war, and post-war, experience is the intimate association of the state of trade with the enlargements and compressions of consumers' income and outlay effected by central banks. If this fundamental casual sequence were understood, the public would hardly acquiesce in the central banks proceeding from their position of complacent detachment to generate depressions, unemployment, bankruptcy, budget deficits and defaults, with all the resulting political and social convulsions while government after government is broken because it can neither stem the flood of ruin nor even provide tolerable palliatives to alleviate the consequences.

When I previously read this quotation in the house, on February 28, I went on to say:

> The fact is that neither side can do anything until parliament regains control of the issue of currency and credit. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) can shake his head—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say anything.

Mr. JAQUES: I am merely reading a quotation:

> Mr. Dunning: We have control of it right here. That is why I shake my head.

Since that was said, I cut a quotation out of the Financial Post. This is a report of what was said by Mr. J. A. C. Osborne, deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, when speaking in this city recently to the junior board of trade. The report states:

> He outlined to them the functions of the central bank. He pointed out that in many countries the policy of the government was the policy of the central bank, and declared "no respectable central bank would accept from its government a policy with which it differed fundamentally."

I might suggest, since we have an ultra respectable central bank in Canada, I have no doubt that they differ most profoundly with regard to policy. I have not the slightest criticism to make with regard to the ability of the right hon. Prime Minister or the members of his cabinet. With regard to the Minister of Finance, who of course has a thankless task, if I may risk being personal I sometimes think his manner is able to charm money out of the public. I confess that sometimes when I observe the minister smile—

Mr. DUNNING: I thought I had the reputation of being hard-boiled.

Mr. JAQUES: Well, sometimes when I observe the hon. gentleman's smile I confess that I find my hands straining towards my pockets. It is a pity they are so empty. I should like to pay the same tribute to the right hon. leader of the opposition and the late government. There is no one in Canada who does not realize the extraordinary ability and industry which the former Prime Minister brought to the conduct of the affairs of the nation. I say that simply because we in this corner believe that the trouble is not with governments; it is with the system which governments administer, just as Mr. Hawtrey says. That system breaks government after government; more than that, it is breaking the institution of parliamentary government itself. People are losing faith in the power or ability of parliament to achieve anything. There is no doubt of that, and the question is whether we are going to put the needs of the people first or whether we are going to put the needs of the financial system first. No man can serve two masters; neither can a government. They cannot serve the people and at the same time serve the financial interests.

When we come to unemployment we know, because we have recent history to back us up, that if we wanted to we could abolish unemployment to-morrow. We did it once, and no member of this house can deny it. During the war there was no unemployment, and if war came again there would be no unemployment at that time Why? There is only one answer; it is that in the danger with which the country is confronted in the face of the enemy, all other considerations are put to one side; they must give way to the supreme duty of preserving the safety of the nation. In such times money is put to its proper use, and the financier is put in his proper place. Parliament asserts its real authority, and the money is found. It does not matter where or how it is found; it is found, and we could do the same in regard to unemployment if we wanted to. But we cannot do it and still preserve what is known as sound money, or, in other words, scarce money. That, as I see it, is the issue before the country. We can either preserve what we call sound money and sound economics, or we can adapt our economic system to a different age so that the people of Canada may be able to consume all they care to produce. When we do that we shall solve unemployment, and not before.

As for unemployment insurance, I am not going to say much against it. If the people want it, let them have it; but to my mind you might just as well take a case of smallpox and send it to a beauty parlour. Unemployment is not the disease; it is the symptom of a disease, and until we attack the disease, itself I do not think we can get very far with the symptom.

Those are all the observations I wish to make at this time. I know hon. members in this section of the house are laughed and jeered at, but I have heard nothing in or out of the house to check my belief in what we in this corner of the house say. If there are other remedies I should like to hear them, but so far I have not heard anything which offers a real remedy to the problem with which this and other countries are confronted to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: To the future student of history there will be nothing more interesting than the study of Hansard during the last seven or eight years. When I hear hon. members opposite talk about the terrible strain and anxiety they have to carry, and when I hear the fulsome adulation with which followers refer to the government and to the ministers, I recall days when those same hon. gentlemen, sitting to the left of the Speaker, could not find time enough in which to express themselves, or language strong enough to express the condemnation of those who were endeavouring to do the very thing that the present government is now endeavouring to do. Let there be no mistake: Except with respect to one insignificant expenditure there has been not the slighest change in everything that has been done by the department in connection with unemployment and relief. Every single thing that is being done to-day was being done by the late administration, except the work in connection with the so-called youth movement, about which we will speak when the proper time comes.

Yet the student of history, in reading Hansard from 1930 to 1935, will find that the men now occupying the treasury benches were then spending their hours, days and weeks in condemnation of the then government for doing what they now do. As I hear these observations, and the sympathy that is being extended; when I compare the buoyant revenues of to-day with the revenues of those days, and when I think of the changed world conditions as compared with the conditions of those days, I wonder where their milk of human sympathy and kindness was to be found. I bring that fact to the attention of the committee this afternoon. There is no reason why the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) should look sadder than anybody else, although I must admit he was one of the chief offenders.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was smiling.

Mr. BENNETT: But he was not the only one. It is just a matter for the historian to think about. Day after day and week after week in one year we had our efforts prevented from being realized, and condemnation was hurled from this side of the house against the very measures which are now said to be the very best possible of production. Born out of wide experience and great knowledge these measures which, after all, simply follow what had been done—excepting the one instance I mentioned—are presented. We are told we must accept them as the great contribution of far-sighted statesmen in dealing with these problems.

If it ended there, it might not be quite so bad. But the historian of this country will also find that the present government when in opposition was going to take this whole problem out of the realm of politics, and that an independent commission was going to administer relief; an independent commission was going to correlate the activities of the provinces and the dominion; an independent commission was going to deal with the municipalities, and their difficulties with relation to the provincial and federal powers. That commission came into being with powers very much restricted, when compared with those with which it was expected it would be clothed.

The commission has gone out of business, and the same political administration which marked the administration of the days in which control was vested in the government still prevails.

The great evil that we face to-day in the administration of unemployment relief is found in political patronage, about which, at the proper time, I propose to say much. There is not a day which does not bring me letters from men who are unable to find employment because they have not the proper sanction, the sanction of those who sit in authority either as defeated candidates, or otherwise, for the purpose of determining whether men shall or shall not have jobs. One park in this country is run by the Liberal party executive, and men are dismissed from their positions and other men put in their places for the purpose of enabling them to circumvent the law. That is what is going on. I spoke yesterday about Long Branch; I could name other places as well. I could mention place after place in which either the defeated candidate, the head of the Liberal association in the locality, or someone else, must be consulted before it is possible for a man to find employment, for which he is paid with my taxes and the taxes of other taxpayers in this country.

That is the reason that this thing fails—and it is failing. Of course it is failing. The hon. member who just took his seat referred to the fact that we are not dealing with the disease. In my place yonder between 1930 and 1935 I pointed out that these measures were palliatives, not cures. They do not cure the disease; they are but palliatives. Every thoughtful man knows that is so. Everyone knows perfectly well, sir, that with respect to the problem of unemployment we must realize it can never be dealt with in the manner which is being followed.

Who, listening to the political speech in connection with farm implements the other evening, but must realize that in this country we have a population over one-half of which is in urban areas. Remember that. No longer is half or more than half of the population in rural communities. This means that unless we supply that urban population with employment measures there will be constant unemployment. There is no thoughtful member of parliament who does not realize that the essential obligation resting upon the house at this time is to provide employment for our people by submitting policies which will ensure that there is work to do.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes, but the "hear, hear" which finds a responsive echo in every part of the chamber can be realized only by doing something which apparently some of the people do not wish to have done. In other words, a substantial part of the population believes it is better to have immediate benefit in contemplation—not reality—than to have some measure of cure effected with respect to the disease from which we are suffering.

You cannot have your goods manufactured for you in another country, give employment to people in that country and at the same time not put out of employment those who are doing the work here. Let there be no misunderstanding about that fundamental. You may differ from me on the particular problems connected with the fiscal policy of a country. We may differ; but we cannot differ about this, that if the consuming population of Canada requires for its use and sustenance a million dollars worth of goods, and those goods can be made in this country, then unless we afford the opportunity for the people who have now flocked to the cities to engage in industrial life they will be unemployed, while people somewhere else will be employed. They will make the very goods that we consume. There can be no misunderstanding about that. It was all right when you had the great majority of your people on the land; it was all right when the major part of your population was rural, but our population has shifted. The other evening the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Mallette) referred to the population that had shifted from the soil to the city. This has brought about a condition which we must face. That condition involves action being taken of a kind that apparently some of our friends dislike.

This government is in a position to make its choice. It has behind it a majority that enables it to make any choice it pleases and to give effect to that choice. It has made its choice. It has balanced the probabilities. It has selected one particular way of dealing with the matter. What has been the result? This is not the time, or the place perhaps, to deal with it in detail. There has been this result. The national railways for three months of this year have not been earning sufficient money to pay the cost of operation. There has been no lessening of employment in the large sense so far as they are concerned, and yet to earn a dollar, to earn one hundred cents on that great system for the last three months, has cost more than one hundred cents, more than a dollar. Mark you; that is without interest on the capital invested. It is merely the cost of operating, fuel and labour and upkeep.

Mr. DUNNING: That has happened frequently in the past.

Mr. BENNETT: It has not happened frequently in the past.

Mr. DUNNING: In the early months.

Mr. BENNETT: It has not happened frequently in the past.

Mr. DUNNING: We differ.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not the figures with me, but it has not happened frequently in the past. It has happened in the past, but not frequently. During the dark days of the depression from 1930 to 1935, bad as conditions were, I ask hon. members to compare the results then with those of the last three months. Remember, there is not a cent for interest. Let that thought come into our minds and see what it means. Let us ask ourselves, why? I shall be prepared, when another debate is precipitated, to deal with that in greater detail. I shall deal with it in detail then, not now. These are palliatives; that is all they are. What is the sense of trying to call them anything else? Why not be frank about them?

Mr. ROGERS: Who is calling them anything else?

Mr. BENNETT: I have heard the adulations of the warm and loyal friends of the minister on the other side describe them as something else. I have read in the public press of this heaven-born vision of the minister, of his looking out upon the troubled world and bringing peace and happiness to all the unemployed. There was the great vision that came to him during his academic life which enabled him thus to deal with the matter. Then I contemplate the patronage in Frontenac and Kingston. After all, the results of an academic life do not fit a man for public life any better than would life in a sawmill. It has been said that the solution is to be found in a housing program.

Mr. ROGERS: Expansion of trade.

Mr. BENNETT: "Expansion of trade." Well, I thank thee, Roderick, for the word, to quote Sir Walter Scott. If there was one term calculated to make ridiculous the whole performance in connection with this matter, it is just that statement, "expansion of trade."

Mr. ROGERS: Is my right hon. friend opposed to it?

Mr. BENNETT: He has a record of effort in that direction which will compare favourably with that of the minister. That is all he has to say. That is the record in connection with which every Liberal, except the Liberal who sits behind the minister, the Minister of National Revenue, (Mr. Ilsley), rose in his place to vote against empire preference. He also knows that the minister in his eulogy of his leader vindicated his position. Now he sweetly talks about expansion of trade.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend favours it, then?

Mr. BENNETT: That anyone with the attainments of the minister should find it possible to ask such a question indicates the extent to which politics can destroy the vigour of an intellect.

Mr. GARDINER: The right hon. gentleman has been in them since 1898.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the Saskatchewan oracle spoken?

Mr. GARDINER: Probably the explanation of the right hon. gentleman's attitude toward public questions is the fact that he has been in politics since 1898.

Mr. BENNETT: I have been in politics since 1898 with the exception of ten or twelve years, when I was not. But I have not yet found it necessary to follow other than a consistent course with respect to the matters to which I have referred.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the same on this side.

Mr. BENNETT: I have never prostituted such talents as I have for place or power.

Mr. ROGERS: Against whom is that aimed?

Mr. BENNETT: I referred a moment ago to the observations that were made in this house with respect to a housing program offering a solution of these difficulties. I do not intend to do more at this time than merely point out what a strange thing public opinion is. One would think that everyone in this chamber believed that all that one had to do was to engage in the housing business and the matter would be settled. For instance, I have in my hand a plan of action suggested by the Vancouver youth council. It is divided into five sections. The first refers to a survey of housing conditions; the second refers to publicity; the third refers to by-laws, and the fourth, which refers to a building program, reads:

Building program: Consideration of concrete proposals to effect a low cost housing scheme to be financed with the assistance of the dominion government and administered on public utility lines, through a civic housing commission.

The fifth part reads:

Education: Simultaneously, a systematic policy of hygienic education to be made available to all who will occupy the new houses provided.

That was passed at a slum clearance rally held in Vancouver.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the date?

Mr. BENNETT: It was held on Tuesday, February 15, at 8 p.m., in St. James parish hall under the auspices of the greater Vancouver youth council. The opening remarks were made by John Jopson, first vice-president, and there was an address by Alderman Halford D. Wilson. The resolution, which was drafted and endorsed, reads as follows:

Whereas:—The investigation of the Vancouver civic housing committee, with the cooperation of many interested organizations, have revealed an acute housing shortage and the increasing prevalence of slum areas in Vancouver.

And whereas:—Private building stimulated by funds available through the Dominion Housing Act has been unable to provide adequate housing facilities, particularly to the low income groups.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, April 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company—Mr. Damude—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I desire to draw the attention of the committee to Hansard, April 29, 1938, page 2414, when this bill was under review, and I quote from Hansard as follows:

Mr. Stirling: It is two minutes after nine.

Mr. Bennett: My attention has been directed to the fact that it was two minutes after nine when you made the declaration that the section had passed.

Mr. Stirling: It is not playing the game.

Mr. Bennett: My colleague says that it is not playing the game to go beyond the hour. I think there is much to be said with respect to that. I had no idea that we had gone beyond the hour; but in view of what the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) says, it is my duty to bring that fact to your attention.

The Chairman: I did not think the right hon. gentleman was aware that it was nine o'clock. I waited some minutes and I thought he would be disposed to have the amendment carry. However, I am in the judgment of the committee.

I take exception to the remark of the hon. member for Yale, namely, "It is not playing the game." I would have taken exception at that time if I had heard clearly the remark of the hon. member. Apparently Hansard correctly reported him. His remark is a very grave reflection on the chair. It implies that the chairman was partial, biased and unfair in the conduct of his duties. The hon. member for Yale is an old parliamentarian and is familiar with the rules governing debates, and I now ask him to withdraw the remark to which I take exception.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, I used the phrase I did because it accurately expressed my opinion of the incident. It appeared to me that, the hour for private bills having passed, it was not in accordance with the rules of the house to move that an amendment be adopted or a section passed. There was fresh in my memory at the time an incident which had occurred four or five days before, when an hon. member to my left, a new member, was called upon by certain supporters of the government, when there was but three minutes to go, to proceed with his speech, and not the least strident voice that I heard was that of the chief Liberal whip. I did not think at the time that was in accordance with the amenities of the house, but on that occasion the government desired to adhere closely to the rules. On the occasion on Friday evening you, Mr. Chairman, saw fit to suggest at 9.02 o'clock that we should do something which, in my opinion, could properly be done only prior to nine o'clock. That was the reason why I used the phrase which I did. I regret that you have taken it in the way you have. It has not been my custom in this house ever to make reflections upon the occupant of the chair, and so far as I am concerned I have no desire in any way to insult the chair or detract from the honour of the chair. If it is the wish of you, Mr. Chairman, that the phrase should be deleted from revised Hansard I am quite agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not entirely satisfied with the withdrawal. I take it from the remarks of the hon. member for Yale that he withdraws the remark. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BENNETT: He does not withdraw, but correctly states what took place.

The CHAIRMAN: I am addressing my remarks to the hon. member for Yale.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I respectfully point out to you that under the rules you have no right to make any such request at this time. You have directed attention to the incident, and the hon. member for Yale has indicated exactly what took place, which is in accordance with what you yourself have stated, namely that at two minutes after nine o'clock you took action which under the rules should not be taken. The hon. member is reported to have said, "It is not playing the game." That is a correct statement. That is perfectly clear. He says he regrets that you have taken offence at what he has said, which was intended not to give offence but merely to state his appreciation of the fact; and if a man does not intend to give offence and uses some expression which is not in itself offensive, surely the chair has no right at this time, whatever its right may have been at the time in question, to do more than direct attention to the incident. It seems to me the incident is closed when the hon. member has stated that he had no intention of insulting the chair, that the remark will be deleted if it is thought desirable, and the circumstances under which he made the observation he did are not disputed. There is no question as to the fact and the circumstances in connection with it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My own opinion is that the incident does not deserve the great importance which seems to be given to it. At the time I thought the objection of my friend from Yale was not very well taken, because it happens quite often that we ignore the clock for a minute or two in order to conclude some debate. However, the hon. member having explained the matter as he did, I am quite satisfied that his request that his words should be deleted from Hansard is better than any possible withdrawal.

Mr. HEAPS: On a point of order, I should like to ask who has the authority to order a deletion from Hansard.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, we all accept it.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. HEAPS: I know. I am just querying, as a point of order, how that is to be done. I should like to know. Perhaps the chairman or the deputy chairman has the right.

The CHAIRMAN: I may inform the hon. member that the Speaker has the right. However, the incident is closed. We shall proceed with the bill.

Mr. HOWE: I desire to lay on the table a letter dated March 5, 1938, and signed by the Hon. T. B. McQuesten, provincial minister of highways, regarding the Niagara Falls bridge.

On section 9—Construction subject to governor in council regulations.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before clause 9 carries, I should like to tell the Minister of Transport that if, on the occasion when this bill was last before the committee, he applied his remarks about a filibuster to me, I want him to withdraw them. Any time I say anything in this house or in committee I say it after having made a careful study of the matter; if I oppose anything I am not filibustering, and there is no power in this country sufficient to change my mind when once I make it up. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) knows what the Scotch are like; when once they make up their minds, it takes a good deal to move them. I hope the minister will rise in his place and say that those remarks did not apply to me, because what I have to say on this bill or any other before the house is said with sincerity. I had in my mind nothing but to do the best I could for the country. If the minister is as good a sport as I am—

Mr. HOWE: I would assume that when my hon. friend makes a statement the first time, he expresses his opinion; when he makes the same statement a second time, he is confirming the opinion; I have some doubts about the third time. However, I shall accept my hon. friend's statement that he is incapable of conducting a filibuster.

Mr. BENNETT: The other evening, when we were discussing one of the sections of this bill, the Minister of Transport said that he would produce the letter which had been written to him by the minister of highways of Ontario. He was good enough to send me the letter to-day before it was laid on the table, and I think it well that it should be read, because it deals with an important factor which has to do with this legislation, and one to which I think the attention of the government has not been sufficiently directed:

Ontario.
Office of the Minister of Highways.
Toronto, March 5, 1938.

Honourable C. D. Howe,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Re—Niagara Falls Bridge

Dear Mr. Howe:

Mr. H. J. McNulty, K.C., has advised me that I should write you as to the position of the province in this matter. W. G. Welby, et al, are applying to the dominion for a charter in the name of the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company. These applicants have executed an assignment, which I have not seen, but which I understand is filed, to assign their rights, as directed when the charter is granted, to the Highways Department of this province or to the Niagara Falls Parks commission. In any event they are acting as trustees for the province.

The purpose of the province is to bring about the erection of a new bridge at or about the location of the International Railway Company's bridge which recently collapsed. A week ago I visited Governor Lehman of the state of New York with Mr. Suitor, the representative of the city of Niagara Falls, New York, in the New York state assembly. Mr. Suitor, in co-operation with us, has brought in a bill in the state of New York assembly to create an authority similar to that which constructed the bridge at Sarnia and the Thousand Islands bridge last year. This authority is to contain an equal number of representatives from the state of New York and Ontario. It is proposed that it follow the practice already established to issue bonds and erect the structure with the approval of the federal government at Ottawa. The bonds will be charged upon tolls and when the same are retired the bridge will become a free bridge. This is a similar arrangement to that in the two cases above mentioned and in the additional case of the Peace bridge at Fort Erie over the Niagara river.

The procedure followed on this side is the same as in the cases of the three bridges above mentioned. Private applicants obtain the legislation and assign all their interests to the state authority of the state of New York. This includes the approval of the dominion government to the construction of the bridge which has to be obtained.

The province of Ontario would be willing to finance the structure directly and build it directly, either as a work of my department or through the Niagara Parks commission, of which I am chairman. This latter commission, as you may know, administers a part extending from lake Ontario to lake Erie and including practically the whole water front along the Niagara river. Unfortunately we are advised that we cannot, as a highway department of the province, either enter into an agreement with New York state or the New York state authority, nor build a bridge directly. Moreover the state of New York does not wish to use its funds, but prefers that private funds should be used as outlined above through a public authority which would ensure the ultimate public ownership of the structure.

This province is very much in favour of working towards the elimination of all tolls on these international bridges, as we realize it is greatly to the advantage of this province to have as many points of access as possible to the great population to the south without any charge for entry.

May I also add that Mr. H. J. McNulty, K.C., is acting for this department and for the Niagara Parks commission in bringing this bill before parliament.

With kind personal regards, believe me,

Faithfully yours,
T. B. McQuesten,
Minister of Highways.

The important part of that letter is the following statement in the second paragraph; it is of the utmost importance:

The purpose of the province is to bring about the erection of a new bridge at or about the location of the International Railway Company's bridge which recently collapsed.

I have already pointed out, in the letter which I read the other evening from Senator Lee, that this matter had been brought to the attention of the governor of the state of New York; that Mr. McQuesten had been present at the conference; that the governor stated he had been advised by his counsel that the International Railway Company has the right, under the laws of the United States and the state of New York, to construct such bridge, and that the state of New York cannot and will not interfere with the exercise of such right. We now have before us a letter for which the Minister of Transport becomes responsible, asking parliament to pass an act which will destroy the vested interest of an existing enterprise, to which procedure the governor of the state of New York says he will not consent.

It was for that reason I was the more anxious to see the communication in question, because I had been informed that the real purpose of this legislation is to destroy the International Railway Company's rights. I pointed out that they had $500,000 worth of property at the two ends of the bridge; that they have had a bridge there for some forty years or thereabouts, and that this bridge is now to be replaced by one which is promoted by the province of Ontario for the direct purpose of destroying the vested rights of that enterprise. It seems to me strange that a representative of the crown in the right of the province of Ontario should say that the purpose of the province is to bring about the erection of a new bridge at or about the location of the International Railway Company's bridge, which recently collapsed. In other words, this is a bridge promoted by the province for the purpose of destroying the vested rights of an existing company. I make no pronouncement, obviously, as to whether they have or have not a valid right to construct. I can only read the documents I see before me. The letter of the senator .ndicated that Mr. McQuesten, who signed the letter which has just been read, was present at Albany when they met Governor Lehman on February 21, 1938, and this letter is dated March 5, 1938.

Mr. HOWE: It states he was present in New York.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but I was not quite sure whether it might be said to be the same conference or not; I was desirous of fixing the date. Senator Lee says it was February 21, and the letter, as a matter of fact, is dated March 5. I do not know if this is an accurate statement of the situation—and you will observe, Mr. Chairman, obviously I must say, "if it is," because I have no personal knowledge of the matter. I do know where that bridge used to be; I have been there a sufficient number of times to know exactly where the bridge that was destroyed was located, but what I do not know is the exact location of the proposed bridge in relation to that. I therefore accept Mr. McQuesten's statement that the purpose of the province is practically to destroy the vested rights of the existing company. We have now a matter which I really think the federal government, the government of this nation, should consider, that the governor stated he was advised by counsel that the International Railway Company has the right, under the laws of the United States and the state of New York, to construct such a bridge, and that the state can not and will not interfere with the exercise of such right.

A vested right in the United States is a constitutional right; in this country a vested right is not necessarily a constitutional right. The provisions of the United States constitution were imposed to meet, among others, just such difficulties as you have here, that is, that a right existent could not be destroyed by legislation without the consent of the parties affected. And what we are doing on this side of the Niagara river is, in the language of Mr. McQuesten, to destroy the right of the International Railway Company to construct a bridge. That was the point which I was not in a position to establish clearly the other evening, until I had seen the exact terms of the letter. I did not care to make the statement without seeing those terms. But Mr. McQuesten's statement puts that beyond peradventure. Unfortunately or otherwise, the province of Ontario has nothing whatever to do with respect to that matter at all; the nation speaks through its central government, not through the government of one of its provinces. It will perhaps be remembered that reference was made by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) to the opinion given by the deputy minister of justice which I think should at this point be referred to. His letter is in these terms:

JR 3380/38

Re Bill No. 15, An act to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company.

Dear Sir:

I have had under consideration your letter of the 18th instant and beg to advise you as follows:

I am of opinion that it is not competent to parliament to authorize the crown in the right of the province to build the bridge in question, and that as the Minister of Highways and the Niagara Parks Commission are agents of the crown in the right of the province parliament is equally incompetent to vest the necessary powers in them or either of them. In order that parliament may effectively control the construction and maintenance of the bridge, which is a work or undertaking exclusively within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament, in relation to both its national and international aspects, it is in my judgment essential that the powers should be conferred upon a body, corporation or person answerable to parliament and amenable to the courts.

Yours faithfully,
W. Stuart Edwards,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

If we read those three communications together, it does seem to me that it would be a very unfriendly act for this parliament to act until such time as the legislature of the state of New York has acted. The Minister of Transport very properly said the other evening that it was a matter of indifference as to which acted first; that inasmuch as one legislature could not authorize the construction of a bridge in a country other than its own, one or the other would have to act first in bringing about a condition where there might be a unity of interest for the purpose of construction. Now we have the opinion of the deputy minister of justice that this is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. We have the letter of the senator from the state of New York in which he points out that the governor says that the International company has the right under the laws of the United States and the state of New York to construct such bridge, and that the state of New York cannot and will not interfere with the exercise of such right. I take it that the term "cannot" refers to the constitution of the United States, that constitutional provision which does not permit the state to destroy a vested right or to pass ex post facto legislation. Under these circumstances, together with the statement made by the responsible minister in Ontario that what he proposes to do by this device is to destroy the International company—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He does not say that.

Mr. EULER: He does not use the word "destroy."

Mr. BENNETT: I did not suggest that he used the word "destroy."

Mr. EULER: A few moments ago my right hon. friend used that very word.

Mr. BENNETT: I used the word because that is what it means, if it means anything.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend said, "in the words of the minister."

Mr. BENNETT: I did not.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend will find it in Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend will find I did not. These are the words:

> The purpose of the province is to bring about the erection of a new bridge at or about the location of the International Railway Company's bridge which recently collapsed.

In addition to that, the other evening I pointed out that when Mr. McQuesten was here before the committee the records show he made a statement that when he returned he was going to introduce legislation dealing with bridges, and that would be another hurdle for the International company to cross. That was the sense of the words; I am not quoting the exact language. Here in my hands is the bill he passed. This has been assented to. That bill in terms would, if the legislature had jurisdiction, prevent the construction by the International company of its bridge. It is designed for that very purpose, in view of what took place. I direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to the language used:

> 1. This act may be cited as the Bridges Act, 1938.
> 2. This act shall apply to,—
> (a) every river or stream or part thereof of which the bed is vested in His Majesty in right of Ontario; and
> (b) every place upon a river or stream where His Majesty in right of Ontario, or any board or commission constituted under any act of this legislature, is a riparian owner.
> 3. (1) No bridge or other structure shall be built, placed or constructed over or across any river or stream or part thereof, nor shall any bridge or other structure over or across any river or stream or part thereof be rebuilt, replaced or altered where the cost of such building, placing, constructing, rebuilding, replacing or altering will exceed $2,000, except with the approval of the lieutenant-governor in council.

Against that I place the opinion of the deputy minister of justice to which reference was made the other day, in which he uses these words:

> . . . in order that parliament may effectively control the construction and maintenance of the bridge, which is a work or undertaking exclusively within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament, in relation to both its national and international aspects.

In view of that, can we proceed further with this legislation without doing violence to the friendly relations that exist between us and the neighbouring state of New York and the republic to the south of us? That is the position I wanted to make clear the other day, but could not until I had all the documents before me.

Mr. McLARTY: Might I ask the right hon. gentleman whether the amendment he moved the other night did not specifically provide that we could not do anything without the consent of the appropriate jurisdiction in the United States? If that be so, what violence could we possibly do, when nothing can be done until those powers are conferred upon the corporation incorporated under this act?

Mr. BENNETT: It is just that point that I desire to make, if my hon. and learned friend will permit me to say so, that as a matter of international comity, this bridge having originated from United States legislation, not Canadian, and we having acted seconding it, after they had acted in the first instance, it would be doing violence to our understanding of friendly relations, in the light of what was said by the governor—assuming he did say it, as for my purpose I have done—to proceed to pass this legislation which assumes that we are willing to do something which under the laws of the state of New York cannot be done.

Mr. McLARTY: Without their express permission.

Mr. BENNETT: But which they cannot give without the consent of the International company.

Mr. McLARTY: Might I remind my right hon. friend that this corporation, clothed with the powers provided for in this bill, cannot do anything without the consent either of the state of New York or of such other appropriate authority as has the right to give it the power of extraterritorial jurisdiction.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad my learned and hon. friend directed attention to that. Unfortunately we do not purport to deal only with that part of the bridge which is on our side; we undertake to deal with the bridge in New York as well, to provide where it should land. How can we deal with a location in another country?

Mr. McLARTY: Subject to the consent of the state of New York.

Mr. BENNETT: But how can we say where that bridge is to be placed in New York state? That is the point I am putting, in view of what the governor said. How can we undertake to say what we do? These are the words:

> . . . to a point in the city of Niagara Falls in the state of New York, one of the United States of America, north of the present upper steel arch bridge. . . .

That is, it is located. And with the letter of the minister stating that the purpose is to bring about the erection of this new bridge "at or about the location of the International Railway Company bridge which recently collapsed," you have a situation in which the parliament of Canada is undertaking to do something which the state of New York says cannot be done.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to interrupt the right hon. gentleman or to be tiresome by reiterating remarks which I have made. The purpose of this bill, I think he will agree, is to clothe a corporation with capacity to build a bridge between two certain points. One point is in the state of New York. It can build to that point only subject to the approval of the appropriate United States authorities. If that approval is not granted, irrespective of any capacity with which we clothe the corporation, the bridge cannot be built.

Mr. BENNETT: The provision, as I have said, is this:

> . . . but the company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge nor exercise any of the powers hereunder until an act of congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States of America has been passed authorizing or approving such bridging of the said river. . . .

I have pointed out what the governor has said with respect to that, namely, that there is a vested interest which neither he, the state of New York nor the congress of the United States, under the constitution of that country, can take away. I take it that is the reason for the reference to the United States. That being so, should we defy that authority?

Mr. YOUNG: This bridge is not going to be built on that site; it is to be six hundred feet away.

Mr. BENNETT: But six hundred feet away is the same site. That is what the minister meant when he said you could not put these two bridges within six hundred feet of each other. The hon. member must know that. The real fact is that this is an effort to destroy the other bridge, to prevent it from being rebuilt, and I have pointed out the legislation which was introduced and passed a few days ago to bring about that end. That is the story, and I cannot do more than direct the attention of the committee to it, having exhausted every means at my disposal for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, which I think may be definitely stated as lying within a very narrow compass indeed.

May I restate them? 1. By appropriate legislative authority the International company was authorized to construct a bridge from the state of New York towards the Canadian shore. 2. Nearly forty years ago the Canadian authorities arranged with the United States authorities to complete a bridge which has been known as the international railway bridge. 3. The international railway bridge was destroyed by act of God in January, 1938. 4. A petition has been presented to the parliament of Canada praying that certain gentlemen now alleged to be trustees for the crown as represented by the province of Ontario—trustees, mark you—may be empowered to build a bridge. 5. The governor of the state of New York has stated that he is advised by his counsel that the International company has the right to rebuild this bridge; further, as a corollary, that under the laws of the United States and the state of New York it has the right to construct such bridge and that the state of New York cannot and will not interfere with the exercise of such right.

These are the facts. I direct attention to one other relative fact, which we cannot overlook whether we would or not, namely, that the deputy minister of justice, speaking for the Department of Justice, has said that it is not competent for this parliament to authorize the crown in the right of the province to construct this bridge. He went further; he said that we could not authorize a commission to do it, because they would be the agents of the crown in the right of the province. We now have a statement made by the minister himself that not only are these men the agents of the crown; worse than that, they are trustees for the crown. Here are his words—

Mr. YOUNG: It is not in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: But I am reading the language of the letter produced by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. YOUNG: It does not state that in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point exactly.

Mr. McLARTY: I think my right hon. friend will admit that trustees can do certain things which the direct party is not capable of doing. Is that not the effect of this assumption of trusteeship?

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is that the opinion of the deputy minister of justice with respect to that phase of the matter is in certain terms. I do not want to mislead anyone. The hon. member for Saskatoon is not a lawyer, but let him just read the way in which this is put by the deputy minister of justice:

> I am of opinion that it is not competent to parliament to authorize the crown in the right of the province to build the bridge in question, and that as the minister of highways and the Niagara parks commission are agents of the crown in the right of the province parliament is equally incompetent to vest the necessary powers in them or either of them.

Now I turn to Mr. McQuesten's letter, in which he says these people have already assigned any interest they have to the crown. He says he has not seen the assignment, but that is his understanding, and he uses these words:

> In any event they are acting as trustees for the province.

Then, if the deputy minister's opinion is sound—and we must be bound by it—parliament is incompetent to vest the necessary powers either in the commission or in anyone else as an agent of the crown. If that is so—and those are his words, not mine—then it follows that parliament is incompetent to vest in these trustees the power which they seek, they having disclosed the fact that they are trustees.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not think my right hon. friend would suggest that it is outside the capacity of trustees to act in a way in which the principal could not act.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to that I can only say that I am expressing no opinion about any of these matters; I am merely taking the documents which speak for themselves. I did not prepare these documents, but listen to the language used by the deputy minister of justice:

> . . . and that as the minister of highways and the Niagara parks commission are agents of the crown in the right of the province parliament is equally incompetent to vest the necessary powers in them or either of them.

That being so, I submit with all deference that this is equally true with respect to those who, as Mr. McQuesten says, are trustees for the province, to which they have assigned their rights. It therefore follows that the crown in the right of the province is acting in this matter in a manner in which Mr. Edwards says they cannot act. That is the story at the present moment.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this bill should not be proceeded with further at this session; that it should be proceeded with in the proper course, namely, when the authorities in the United States have dealt with the vested interests which have arisen, and given them that consideration which, under the constitution of the United States, is required to be given to them. Then this parliament could deal with the matter. It is quite clear that the legislature of the state of New York has risen, as I pointed out, and will not meet again this year for the purpose of dealing with these matters. That being so, I put to you, Mr. Chairman, the question as to whether or not we are doing what would be called a reasonable thing if we proceeded with this legislation before such time as that question, which has been raised by the minister of highways of Ontario, has been dealt with for the purpose, in the first place, of ensuring the active cooperation of the state of New York, and in the second place, of ensuring that what we do has not the effect of endeavouring to destroy a vested right which, mark you, is no longer a vested right in that country only.

That is the last point I desire to make, and I direct the attention of my learned and hon. friend to this fact. The vested right is no longer a vested right in the United States only. It is a vested right that attaches to a company which owns property on both sides of an international stream. It is a vested right in the United States which cannot be taken away by any act of the legislature or of congress, except by consent of the parties.

Mr. McLARTY: Does my right hon. friend suggest that there is anything in this act taking away any vested right from any other company?

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly say there is, because, first of all, there is the bridge act of the province of Ontario.

Mr. McLARTY: That is not in this act.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but that is one thing. Second, there is the fact that you cannot maintain two bridges at that point. No one knows that better than the gentlemen who have put the project forward. It is impossible to maintain two bridges within six hundred feet of one another.

Mr. YOUNG: It would not be financially a good thing to do, but it could actually exist.

Mr. BENNETT: I am told that even that is questionable, whether any engineer could be found on this continent who would locate these two bridges within six hundred feet of one another. I do not know personally. I express no opinion upon the fact, but that is the view which has been expressed. But the effect is, undoubtedly, to endeavour to destroy the vested rights of people not in this country. I am sure that there is no member of my profession who does not realize that the vested right, which was once a right in the United States only, is now a vested right in Canada as well, because we have become a party to the merging of two companies into one. The rights on both the United States end and the Canadian end are now united and vested in one corporation, and the vested right is the right of the International Railway Company which owned the land and bridge and cannot be taken from them without adequate arrangements.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask if the right hon. gentleman implies that a vested right may take the form of a perpetual monopoly? I cannot understand that.

Mr. BENNETT: I said to the committee that this is a complex and technical question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BENNETT: But I shall answer the question directly, if the hon. member will permit.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I submit that those of us who are not "legal gentlemen" are nevertheless members of this House of Commons, and while it is a common practice for those who have had legal training to look down on other members not so qualified, I do submit I have a perfect right to ask a question, and expect that it be replied to in terms which can be understood by non-legal members of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I need hardly say I am wholly in accord with the hon. member; and had he possessed his soul with that Job-like patience for which he is noted, there would have been no difficulty at all in having received an answer long ere this.

A vested right is a right which continues until it is disposed of by due process of law. I wish to make that clear. The constitution of the United States is explicit with respect to the point. A vested right may be lost by expropriation, for instance. That is one way in which it may be lost. Then, it might be lost by agreement between the parties; that is the usual method by which it is disposed of. I am pointing out that in this case a vested right in the United States is a right which, by action of this parliament, extends beyond the boundary of the United States. That is, our parliament has become a party to the union of rights that enabled the bridge to be built on the Canadian side, with the power exercised in the state of New York that had to do with its commencement in that state. Under the law of the state of New York they cannot, if they will, according to counsel's opinion—and in my judgment that is the law, but that does not add to the weight of it—interfere with the constitutional rights of those who possess vested rights. The state may take it. That right is called the power of eminent domain in some countries, the power of expropriation in others. The arrangement and agreement for compensation would dispose of vested rights satisfactorily. The power of expropriation is a power which I believe has been exercised by Ontario on more than one occasion.

It is for these reasons I have ventured to bring these salient facts to the attention of the committee, after a great deal of difficulty in getting the papers together. I have felt that where you have an existing enterprise that has built a bridge across an international stream, with the legislative aid of this parliament, and a willingness on the part of that company to rebuild and reconstruct, and then have a statement by the responsible minister in the province that the purpose is to do so and so, which means the destruction of a bridge from the standpoint of its value as a bridge, we should not proceed until such time as the original creating authority, namely the state of New York, has again acted. I understand they say it is not necessary that there should be any action taken for the purpose of rebuilding it; that the company have a right anyway in the state of New York to rebuild it.

Having regard further to the fact that Mr. Edwards has said that this is within our exclusive jurisdiction, I say we should not act, especially in view of the fact that nobody is being injured and nothing is being lost. Not a dollar is being lost, for the simple reason that the legislature of the state of New York has declined to pass the necessary legislation, which was different from ours. And until such time as that legislature reconvenes, no such action will be taken. Therefore, by delaying the action until the next session of the New York legislature, we shall not have imposed upon the nation—and mark you, this is a case where the nation is now concerned, as Mr. Edwards has said, not the province of Ontario —a difficulty arising out of a private venture which should not be brought to the attention of the federal power until such time as the neighbouring power have said that some arrangement has been made with respect to the bridge which has gone out, or that they have found some method, which is convenient to all parties concerned, of dealing with the situation.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the committee before which this bill came. I was very much interested in it because I took the view that if the international bridge was going from the province of Ontario to the United States, and Ontario wished to become responsible for building one-half of the bridge, there should be no question at all that the province should have the right of way over any private concern. I brought that matter to the attention of the committee, and as has been stated over and over again, as a result of my urging the matter was called to the attention of the deputy minister of justice, and his opinion was sought. That opinion was received. I am very glad to-night the leader of the opposition has seen fit, himself, to quote that opinion as an authority that nothing further should be done. But I am obliged to say that when I made that suggestion the other night with respect to the opinion of the deputy minister the leader of the opposition was not quite so sure, on that particular occasion, as to the worth of the opinion.

Mr. BENNETT: Because we had not the opinion before us.

Mr. YOUNG: It was not any different from what I stated it to be. There was an old bridge at the site of the bridge which has recently gone into the river. I am informed that authority had to be sought in the United States, as well as in Canada, for the former bridge. For some reason or another it was destroyed. I am further informed that a similar type of legislation had to be sought for the bridge which has recently fallen into the river.

We have no opinion in the house to-night to say what the governor of New York actually did. All we have is a letter from some senator which states that the governor of New York said something. Right there I am of the opinion that it is a violation of the rules of the house to quote that opinion in order to influence or attempt to influence the vote of this chamber.

But the salient point is that the leader of the opposition and every hon. member opposite who spoke has been endeavouring to seek—

An hon. MEMBER: Do not look this way.

Mr. YOUNG: I was referring to the Conservative members. They have been endeavouring to uphold the rights of some United States concern. There is no Canadian connected, as I understand the matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member including me in upholding anybody's rights? I am trying to uphold the rights of Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: Hon. members opposite who have spoken have been endeavouring to see that this bill would not pass. They have endeavoured to lay before members of the house the information that there was a vested right or a vested interest in the United States, and that that vested interest, which has existed for forty years, must be maintained over there. The province of Ontario owns all the roads in Ontario, and it now wishes to build this bridge across that river to connect the roads of Ontario with the roads on the other side. We have this wonderful spectacle of Conservative members from Ontario doing their best to see that their own province cannot build a bridge which it desires to build. I should hate to be in their shoes when they go back to Ontario to ask the people for support in the next election. I think I know what the people will say should they find that those hon. members have been successful in blocking this bill.

I ask the committee to look at the other side of the matter. Of all the persons who might come here to ask for the right to build a bridge, who would be the most logical? The province of Ontario. Why does not the province of Ontario ask directly for this right? Apparently it cannot. Certain individuals are named in the bill, and these individuals have shown their good faith and intentions by giving an assignment to the province of Ontario or the Niagara parks commission. If that is illegal, as has been inferred by the leader of the opposition, then it would have no effect. So far as this bill is concerned, there is no assignment in its provisions. According to the best legal advice at our disposal, this bill could not be drafted in any other form.

This committee has listened to objections to the province of Ontario constructing a bridge to connect its roadway system with the other side of the river. After all the debate we have had, I think this bill should be allowed to pass in order that the province of Ontario, in so far as it has the legal power. may be enabled to construct this bridge.

Mr. STEWART: As I understand the situation, we are now considering section 10.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 9.

Mr. STEWART: We have not made as much progress as I thought. This section reads as follows:

Subject to the provisions of section eight as to location, the said bridge shall be constructed and located under, and be subject to, such regulations as the governor in council prescribes, and to such end the company shall submit to the governor in council for examination and approval, a design and drawing of the bridge, and a map of the location, showing the location of other bridges, and shall furnish such other information as is required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plans and location are approved by the governor in council, the bridge shall not be built or commenced, and if any change is made in the plans of the said bridge during its construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the governor in council, and shall not be made or commenced until it is so approved.

I submit that that brings up the whole question of the purpose and reason for this undertaking. The preamble of the bill is very interesting.

An hon. MEMBER: Dispense.

An hon. MEMBER: Only a few minutes to nine o'clock.

Mr. STEWART: I could read this in half the time taken up in interruptions by hon. members.

The preamble reads:

Whereas a petition has been presented praying that the persons hereinafter mentioned may be constituted a corporation for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and operating a bridge across the Niagara river from a point between a point north of the present upper steel arch bridge and the north limit of Bender street in the city of Niagara Falls, in the county of Welland, in the province of Ontario, to a point in the city of Niagara Falls in the state of New York, one of the United States of America, north of the present upper steel arch bridge, for passage of pedestrians, vehicles, carriages, electric cars, street cars and other like purposes across the Niagara river and to charge a toll: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

I submit that that preamble is misleading. It suggests that this is an entirely new undertaking, whereas, as is known to every hon. member of this committee, the fact is that until quite recently there existed in this immediate locality a first-class bridge which was handling traffic between these two points. That bridge was destroyed by an act of God during the present year. That is something which should be taken into consideration. The company that owned this bridge maintained it efficiently. Parliament is said to be the highest court in the realm and, as has been pointed out already, the effect of this bill is to prevent the rebuilding of a bridge by the company which owned the one that was destroyed—

Mr. YOUNG: In what way?

Mr. STEWART: —and which had a vested right. I said it practically prevents it, because if this bridge is built there would be no need for the other one. The effect of the construction of this bridge would be to destroy the investment of the company.

Mr. YOUNG: Is my hon. friend aware that it became abundantly clear in the committee that not only had this bridge been paid for, but that for forty years it had paid handsome dividends? Surely there is nothing more coming to them. Is it not time that the province of Ontario should be given the right to build a bridge?

Mr. STEWART: That is an absolutely irrelevant and unsound statement. It does not in any way touch the point which I am raising. No matter whether the investment has been profitable or unprofitable in the past, there is a vested right. The fact that great dividends have been earned is no justification for ruthlessly destroying the investment without compensation and without negotiation. The fact that the investment has been profitable has nothing to do with the legal rights, has nothing to do with the inherent justice of the case.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 105, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 3—Undertaking of measures.

Mr. BENNETT: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was reading a portion of a resolution that had been adopted by the greater Vancouver youth council with respect to slum clearance in that city. I had concluded reading the second recital of the resolution. The third recital proceeds:

And whereas:—This conference, here assembled, representing a large cross-section of public opinion is unanimously agreed that there can be no solution to the problem without government intervention.

And whereas:—A large scale economically sound housing program under government restriction and supervision would be the means of stimulating the building construction trade and providing a substantial increase in employment.

Therefore be it resolved: that the federal parliament now assembled be urged to give this matter immediate consideration and to enact legislation necessary to provide adequate housing for people with low incomes.

And further be it resolved: that this resolution be forwarded to all B.C. representatives in the federal house and the responsible authorities at Ottawa.

I read that merely for the purpose of directing attention to the fact that throughout Canada there is a widespread impression that if we embarked on a large low priced housing scheme we would do something for the solution of the problem of unemployment. It is a resolution similar in terms to that which has been passed in most of the great cities of the country, in somewhat different terms, according to the city in which it was passed or the group which sponsored it.

But there is another view also to which attention might be directed; and as that view has not been presented to the committee, I thought it might be well for me to do so, as indicating that the dearth of houses in some of our cities is said to be because of the change of style with respect to our houses. The following letter received by me from British Columbia directs attention to this:

We wish to very strongly protest against further government competition in home building, especially low rental ideas.

It is not fair to penalize one class for the benefit of others.

Hundreds of people have worked very hard and saved their money, investing it in homes and rental property so that they and their families would not become public charges in ill health and old age.

It used to be work and save. Now it is do little and spend. This is gradually becoming a nation of mendicants. Poverty used to be a disgrace and people hid it—now it seems to be something to brag about.

Certain interests—some selfishly, others thoughtlessly—are fostering ideas of a housing shortage without regard to the eventual outcome. Regardless of what they report there is no acute shortage. One has only to pick up the papers to see plenty of houses for sale and for rent all the way across the dominion. Rentals are greatly reduced, it is becoming increasingly harder to get renters and they are demanding more and more.

These people who have built up the country and are its very backbone built at high prices and have had to spend thousands of dollars in increasingly higher taxes and maintenance (labour and material) all through these trying times. Now they are to be sacrificed in order that the great lending companies can get a safe outlet for their hoarded millions, and with government backing; and that the lower class might be properly housed—a class as a whole who has contributed very little in actual dollars to the upkeep of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which part of British Columbia is this from?

Mr. BENNETT: It came from Ladner. As a matter of fact, I may say to the hon. gentleman, I think it represents the views of a group.

The trust companies are violating their trusts. There are many rental properties left on their care for widows and orphans and the growing old. Now these very tenants are being enticed to build as per propaganda and solicitations—"Why are you paying for a house which you will never own? You are—if you live in a rented house! And maybe you rent because you think that you cannot afford to either buy or build a house. But have you ever figured out just how amazingly your rent is mounting up over a period of years?" Etc., etc., but they forget to state that there is very little profit and that these properties have kept up the structure of the country.

The spirit of fear has entered private initiative; they are trying to unload and refuse to further invest. You surely must realize that private enterprise is what actually makes a healthy prosperous country.

If all this subsidizing, etc., actually and permanently helped employment, one could not kick so much but they are merely stop gaps. They have not actually helped in England or France or the United States as facts and figures show. "The French government has been prodigal in its expenditures. Legislation galore has been enacted to take money from those who had accumulated savings and to hand it over to those who had not saved. 'Redistribution of wealth' is a fine-sounding phrase. It appeals strongly to those President Roosevelt calls the 'under-privileged.' But, carried far enough, such a policy inevitably ends in disaster.

Governments earn nothing. They can only rob Peter to pay Paul. And unless restraint is exercised, the day comes when the plundering process becomes no longer possible."

Let me quote from a letter from a New Yorker who is very well informed and who has been in business there for years. I think that it very adequately gives the facts.

Really I am reading this part of the communication because of that quotation, and it is an amazing quotation: I have not before seen it:

"You mentioned housing shortage, but there just isn't any such thing. The truth of the matter is that style trends in houses are partly responsible for a peculiar situation. New York anyway is overstocked with old-fashioned houses and apartments. No one wants to buy an old-fashioned type of house, without the latest in tiled bathrooms, modernistic kitchen and oil or gas heating plant. The same is true with apartments. Large ones of five, six or seven rooms are a drug on the market, and all the older type are large. Consequently people keep vacating the houses, and in many cases being unable to sell them, board them up, and the older apartment houses that aren't salable are being boarded up. Why isn't there a wholesale pulling down of old houses and putting up what people want, you will say. Because those who own the old property want to get something out of it—they want to sell it for whatever cash they can get and apparently there is no disposition on the part of those who lend to do so until they unload their holdings. Families are living with their relatives in increasing numbers because jobs are so difficult to get that a young man can't think of getting married and going out and buying a house. It is true that if all the young people living with relatives were to go out and want to buy a house, there would be a housing shortage. But the trouble is they haven't got the money and in the second place they would be afraid to buy a house right now if they did have it. So in New York at least there is a great deal more property idle than I have ever seen, including business property. In downtown New York, whole buildings are vacant and the trend is toward the merger of two firms because neither is making money, with the consolidation of both in one office, leaving the other vacant. Uptown there is plenty of office space available too. It is a standing joke about the inability of the Empire State building to rent most of its space."

There are plenty of public works crying to be done—roads for tourist traffic and our own travelling public. Etc., etc. Give people jobs and food and clothing and housing will take care of themselves.

You are the opposition, of course, but politics must be forgotten when it comes to cancers starting to eat at the very vitals of our country. If the great middle class is forced to give up, what then?

I have read that so that the minister may see there is at least something in the point that styles in houses and sizes of houses have had to do with the situation in the larger cities. In the smaller towns and communities that is not so, but I noticed a few days ago in New York that large numbers of houses were marked "for sale."

Mr. DUNNING: That condition is nowhere more apparent than in London, England.

Mr. BENNETT: As the Minister of Finance says, that condition is nowhere more apparent than in London, England. I point it out only because it indicates that there may be two sides to what seems to be a one-sided question. I confess that until such time as my mind had been set thinking along the line indicated by that communication, I would have wholly agreed with the view that there was room for large numbers of low priced buildings. But after reading that communication and setting my mind to think about some of the conditions to which my attention had been directed, I did not find it difficult to realize that there are two sides to this question.

With respect to highways, I think we should bear in mind that tourist trade in this country has become one of the most important if not our most important medium of securing moneys for the stabilization of our exchange. Last year, according to the figures presented to us, our tourist traffic amounted to more than our exports of gold. Every time a tourist tears off a ten dollar express order on New York, this means that a contribution of ten dollars has been made towards the stabilization of exchange, and every dollar that we spend which results in large tourist expenditures in this country does much not only to stabilize exchange but to give value to our dollars in other parts of the world as well as in the great republic to the south. But may I direct attention to the fact, referred to this afternoon, that in most places our roads are in an unsatisfactory condition. I know that steps have been taken to improve the situation at the entrances to our parks, and yet—I do not want to anticipate a discussion which must take place later—the truth is, because of the condition of our roads, that hundreds of people turned back last year at filling stations rather than come into Canada. They were told that the dust was such a nuisance that it would be inadvisable for them to go into our country, and they turned back and went somewhere else. I know that was so in some parts of our western country, and I believe that in one section of the maritime provinces the same was true, although to some extent it is being remedied.

With respect to the objection which was raised yesterday that we should not spend money upon provincial roads, I think there was some misunderstanding on the part of the hon. member for Cariboo, or he would not have made the statement, because it was the settled policy of all governments since 1930 to assist the provinces in the construction of these very roads. The hard surfacing, for instance, of the road west of Winnipeg, for the purpose of enabling traffic to get to the parks without travelling through dust areas, was assisted by the federal government. Right here I should like to make this observation with respect to the road between Rio Grande and Hansard. I had not known yesterday that the matter would come up in the committee and I had not the papers with me, but on looking it up I find the position to be this. There was no survey of this road. The minister asked me a question, as did the hon. member for Cariboo, and I indicated that I had no memory of a survey. I looked the matter up and there was no survey of the proposed road in this direction, but this is the position. What is known as the Northern Alberta Railways extend into the north country until they reach well up past Sexsmith and other points, Grande Prairie and various other small stations; and it was and is still believed, that from Rio Grande a road of 130 miles would take the settler down to Hansard without crossing the Fraser river but reaching that station on the Canadian National on the north side of the Fraser river, and thus he would be able to find an outlet to the coast with as little inconvenience as possible. I cannot think that the hon. member for Cariboo misunderstood me, for I would be the last man in the world to suggest that such a highway would be a solution of the transportation difficulties of that country. All it would do would be to provide a main highway from a point connecting with the Northern Alberta Railways at Rio Grande, which is not on the railway itself, but is a nearby station on the Northern Alberta Railways. When I say "nearby," it is not as much as fifty miles; according to the figures I have it is under thirty, though possibly distances are measured in different ways in western Canada. At any rate, it is within reasonable distance of the Northern Alberta Railways. And the only point in the construction of the highway would be that it would travel west and south so as to connect with the Canadian National at Hansard station on the north side of the Fraser river. The communities having their small highways, not very good ones, would be able from the north to move south and connect with this highway, thus getting access to the coast.

That was the story which was put up by the settlers who desired this temporary solution of their difficulties. The hon. member for Cariboo is quite right when he suggests that it would not offer a permanent solution of the transportation difficulty in the Peace River district. It would not, but it would be helpful in enabling the people of that area to find access to the coast through connection with the Canadian National railway at Hansard some 130 miles distant from Rio Grande. The hon. member for Cariboo overlooked one fact. Rio Grande is in Alberta and Hansard in British Columbia, and there has never been any question about our assisting interprovincial roads, because that has been done usually by the dominion itself with the co-operation of the two provinces for the purpose of providing what might be known as pioneer settlers' roads. That is all it would be in any event, and it would take the place of a railway for a little while at least, and enable these people to reach their markets through the Canadian National at Hansard without being driven back as they now are to Edmonton and the prairie country. In other words, they have no close rail connection that enables them to get out to the Pacific. As it stands now, that block of settlers who are settled north and east of Rio Grande have to find their way out on the Northern Alberta Railways to Edmonton instead of to the coast, which is nearer and through to which they cannot hope under present economic conditions to secure a railway. I lend what support my voice can give to their request that they be given some little assistance for the purpose of enabling that road to be built as a joint enterprise on the part of three governments for the purpose of enabling them to get to the coast.

The other suggestions that have been made, it seems to me, resolve themselves into answering the difficulty to which attention was directed yesterday and to which my colleague beside me referred at length this afternoon. I was called out of the chamber and did not hear the whole of his address, but it is clear that last year we had the appropriations before us and then the legislation at the same or at about the same time. Now we do not know what the appropriations are, and until such time as the appropriations are voted by this parliament the minister cannot do anything. This legislation does not enable him to do anything; it must be done under the appropriation. This only indicates that an appropriation is to be made and authorizes him to do certain things; but those certain things can be done only if he has the money, and he cannot get the money until the supplementary estimates are passed. That is the sequence of the movement of legislation, and as I said yesterday, I think we should have had before us, if it were possible, some idea of these appropriations, so that we might link appropriations and authority together and thus understand something of the picture.

It is not seemly that we should find the press and the populace engaging in guessing contests as to whether or not the government proposes to expend thirty or forty millions in a given way, when we know that until the appropriation is brought in they cannot spend a single sou. The minister at the present time has no authority to make payments of any kind because the appropriation of 1938 lapsed on March 31, and a new appropriation has not been made. Until such time as it is made, he has no financial authority to make payments, and so far as this bill is concerned it confers upon him only the right to do something with money when it is voted. But until such time as it is, this legislation is a dead letter and serves no useful purpose at all. It is therefore, I submit, important that we should have our appropriation measure before us at the earliest possible moment. I think it would have served to expedite the passage of this measure.

Mr. ROGERS: I should like to refer briefly to a number of points raised by the leader of the opposition, both before and after six o'clock. He made a number of statements before six o'clock, some of which I suggest that he himself will not regard with great satisfaction when he reads the report of what he said. The leader of the opposition spoke in somewhat contemptuous terms of what he described as the "academic mind." I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that it is perhaps some vindication of the academic mind that since coming to this house I have never indulged in the kind of vicious partisan attacks of which he has been guilty on more than one occasion during the present session. I also say to him, and he will confirm it, that not since coming to this house have I ever raised the unemployment question in a manner which would emphasize its political aspects.

He has also referred on more than one occasion to what he described as the scandal of patronage in the constituency of Kingston. I am going to speak of this matter moderately but in very definite terms. Two types of employment have been offered in the constituency of Kingston. On the one hand there have been temporary vacancies in the ordinary departmental services operating within that constituency. As a minister of the crown I have left the management of my constituency pretty largely in the hands of my local executive. In that respect I believe I have not departed from a practice which has been followed in other years. I am not hypocritical enough to suggest that with respect to these temporary appointments, not under the control of the civil service commission, the executive have not nominated, and I in certain cases have not recommended, supporters of the present administration. The other type of work afforded in the constituency of Kingston has been under joint works programs with the provinces, to which my right hon. friend referred the other day. One type of work has been the restoration of Fort Henry in the neighbouring constituency of Frontenac-Addington. That work is done under agreement with the provincial government and in conjunction with that government, the dominion government contributing fifty per cent of the cost of that work. In the agreement there is a provision that in the employment so afforded there shall be no discrimination because of race, religion or political affiliation. I stated the other day, and I repeat now, that as far as that type of work is concerned I have given explicit instructions that this provision shall be observed and carried out. If it has not been carried out, I wish it to be distinctly understood that any departure from it has not been with my connivance, approval or consent. My right hon. friend has not hesitated from time to time to make these indefinite and reckless charges, regardless of the effect they may have upon the reputation of individual members of this house. I hope he will accept what I have said as a statement of my position in relation to the employment afforded in the constituency of Kingston. I assure him that whenever I have had any complaint of any kind I have seen that such complaint was properly investigated, and I shall do so as long as I hold my present position as Minister of Labour.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the sale of the equipment of camp 42?

Mr. ROGERS: I have no present knowledge of the sale of camp 42.

Mr. BENNETT: Of the horses and equipment?

Mr. ROGERS: As far as I am aware that was done through the Department of National Defence. I have no present knowledge of how the disposal operations were carried out. As far as the huts are concerned, I do recall that a number of organizations engaged in welfare work both in Kingston and in neighbouring constituencies applied for those huts, and they were given to those various organizations at a nominal price. I am speaking now from memory, because, as I say, these operations were conducted through the Department of National Defence which had charge of the camp.

Mr. BENNETT: I had reference not to the huts, but to the equipment in the storehouse.

Mr. ROGERS: I have told my right hon. friend that as far as I am aware that particular operation was conducted by the Department of National Defence. I suggest it is high time, in the interest of this house and our institutions of government, that these vague and indefinite charges cease to be made. I have no hesitation whatever in making that statement, because it is well known to hon. members that this is not the first time the leader of the opposition, upon the basis, I assume, of certain information which has come to his hands—

Mr. BENNETT: Of returns made to orders of this house.

Mr. ROGERS: —has made these charges without sufficient grounds. I am sorry to have had to raise this point. I fully understand that one should not overemphasize anything of a personal nature in a debate of this kind. I have no desire to do so, but the committee will confirm me when I say that I was not responsible for raising this question. It was raised on two occasions by the leader of the opposition. I repeat that if there has been any departure from the clause in the agreements regarding employment on relief works, it has not been done with my connivance or approval or consent.

I wish to touch very briefly on some other points raised by the leader of the opposition. He referred before six o'clock to the matter of expansion of trade as being of little importance in relation to any permanent solution of unemployment, as I understood him.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what he said.

Mr. ROGERS: If I misunderstood the right hon. gentleman I am sure he will correct me.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said. The hon. gentleman knows what I said.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps the leader of the opposition will state what he did say.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the hon. gentleman has undertaken to state what I said.

Mr. ROGERS: Well the leader of the opposition stated definitely that expansion of trade was not a serious contribution to the improvement of unemployment conditions in this country. He went on to take some credit to himself for the trade agreements concluded with Great Britain and other British dominions. I do not for a moment withhold from him a measure of credit for what he did in that direction. But he cannot have it both ways. If it was an advantage to expand trade with Great Britain and the dominions and thereby increase employment in this country, surely it is equally an advantage to expand trade in other directions and increase employment in this country. And that has been the policy of this administration from the beginning. Perhaps my right hon. friend will recall that there were other measures taken by him, which he suggested might again be applied in this dominion, which did not have the effect of expanding trade, but which he sought to apply as a remedy for unemployment; I refer to the emergency tariff of 1930. That emergency session was called ostensibly for the purpose of dealing with unemployment—

Mr. BENNETT: And to save this country from bankruptcy, as was known to everyone.

Mr. ROGERS: The more my right hon. friend saved the country, the worse it became. There is nothing in our experience to suggest that to go back to the remedies which were tried and found wanting in 1930 is a course which we should follow at the present time.

As to the further points raised by the leader of the opposition, which were also raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) this afternoon, I would point out once more that the decision to bring in this bill in advance of the supplementary estimates was by no means one made with a view of depriving this committee of adequate information. But it was decided that, instead of having three sets of estimates this year, as we did last year, the special supplementary estimates and the final supplementaries should be combined. That entailed a certain delay in the submission of the supplementary estimates. But my right hon. friend will surely agree that in its present form, even without the information with respect to parliamentary appropriations, the bill is precisely on all fours with the bills which he introduced year after year when he was in office. Even at the close of the session in those years parliament did not have the information which we propose to bring down in the supplementary estimates. Under the bills which he introduced there was no restriction whatsoever on the amount which might be expended or the direction in which those expenditures might be applied. So I suggest that there is nothing which should in any way delay the passage of the bill now before the committee. When the supplementary estimates are presented there will be full opportunity for criticism of them. This bill simply gives us the authority to deal with such moneys as are appropriated by parliament for the purposes set out in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. TREMBLAY (Translation): Mr. Chairman, may I offer a few observations on the question which the house has had under consideration for the past few days. Honourable members have voiced criticisms and protests against the manner in which the moneys voted by this house have been expended in the various provinces. I may be permitted to take a few minutes to state what is being done in this regard in the province to which I have the honour to belong.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) stated from his place in this chamber that he would not allow the money voted by the House of Commons to his department for unemployment relief to be used for political purposes. I shall quote to the minister and to the house, without adding any comments of my own, cases where, in the province of Quebec, sums voted for unemployment relief have clearly been used for purely political purposes.

Last summer, I took the trouble to visit several parishes in my constituency, in order to ascertain whether the amounts granted to Quebec province were really being used for the purposes for which they had been voted. I should like to draw the attention of the house and particularly of the Minister of Labour to the manner in which the money voted by parliament was used in the parish of St. Benjamin. This parish received relief grants to which the dominion government contributed and I investigated among others, the case of a recipient of relief who had a wife and six children, several of which were old enough to help their father. One of the sons was 25 years of age; another, 23; another, 21 and another 17, all employed in lumber camps and earning wages sufficient to enable them to support themselves and to help their father. They were all living with their father in the same house. I could give the name of this man whose three eldest sons earned $780 during six months and who received at the same time unemployment relief during six months, from November to April. This man was the sole owner of his farm which was clear of debt and equipped with rolling stock fully paid for. He had a horse, nine cows and other farm animals. His crop had consisted of 300 bushels of oats, 3,000 bales of hay, 100 bushels of potatoes and 400 pounds of maple sugar. He was therefore able to maintain his family. Moreover, he had three sons living with him who turned over to him the wages they earned in the lumber camps. In spite of that, he received unemployment relief. And I take upon myself the responsibility of stating that he received this relief solely because he was regarded by the inspector appointed by the government of the province of Quebec to supervise the distribution of unemployment relief in the parish in question as a friend of the party which is at present administering the affairs of Quebec province.

Here is a well-to-do farmer with an income sufficient to maintain his family, with three sons helping him and bringing him their wages, who receives relief allowances during six months, while another man, living in distressful circumstances, cannot obtain any relief. In the same parish, Mr. Chairman, a man with a wife and nine children, the eldest of whom is 16, has been refused relief. The provincial government inspector reported to the authorities charged with the administration of the funds voted by this parliament to Quebec province for the care of the indigent that this man has no need of unemployment relief. But see the difference! This man has only six cows—I am giving you the result of an investigation I made myself, I therefore know whereof I speak—he had harvested only 90 bushels of oats—you will recall that the other man had had a few hundred bushels—2,000 bales of hay and 50 bushels of potatoes, and he was living in a hut measuring 16 feet by 17. This family was undoubtedly in dire need. The local inspector saw all these things with his own eyes. He told me personally that he was acquainted with the situation of this farmer.

He even admitted, Mr. Chairman, that the man had a right to relief, and, after having denied him relief allowances during two months, he gave him a recommendation to that effect. However, when I went there in May, he had received nothing yet. He had a larger number of dependents than the other man, and he was destitute; and, yet, relief was denied him. Useless to say that he was not known as a supporter of the present government of the province. And that is the only reason,—no other can be seen,—why he was denied relief allowances, while such allowances were given during six months to the man who had no need of them.

I do not want to trespass on the time of the committee, but, as the minister has been good enough yesterday to ask all members to bring to his attention instances of political favouritism, I was anxious to mention those few cases, but I may add others at a later time. I will acquaint him with what I have noticed myself in my constituency.

Mr. Chairman, as I was saying a moment ago, we hear complaints from other provinces. It would appear that in those provinces, provincial governments insist that their friends be put in charge of the administration of moneys and favours provided for the relief of the unemployed. As far as Quebec is concerned, I think no representative from that province in this chamber would contradict the following facts: For instance, the federal government contributes substantial amounts for the Trans-Canada highway project and for the construction of the Berthier-Trois Rivières highway. I do not want to shock those on your left, Mr. Chairman, who have been objecting to political patronage in other provinces, but I want to acquaint them with the fact that for the reconstruction of that part of the Trans-Canada highway no tenders were invited. Instead, the provincial government just asked four of his staunch friends to quote prices and one of them got the contract.

It is a matter of common knowledge that a friend of the provincial government—I might ask the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Francœur) to confirm this, for the gentleman to whom I refer used to live in his constituency, and is now employed by the provincial government—has been entrusted with a contract on a cost plus basis, the cost of which is partly borne by the federal government. In Carlesbourg and Beauport was not Mr. François Nolin given work to do without tenders being called for, and at cost plus 10 per cent? The contractor stood no risk of losing anything.

Construction work on the Maniwaki-Senneterre highway has been allotted to Mr. Hector Moore, without tenders being called for. Again, it is a matter of common knowledge that Mr. Moore lives in Maniwaki and that he is the brother-in-law of Mr. Auger, the member for the constituency of Gatineau in the Quebec legislative assembly. Patronage has been their sole concern. I am sorry to note that they would like to continue this same system, and I object to the further payment of moneys which, undoubtedly, are being used merely for political and patronage purposes.

I could mention other instances. I need not refer to Mr. Hermann Barrette's gravel pit, for that is known all over the province of Quebec. Here we see one of Mr. Barrette's organizers buying for $400 something which is afterwards sold for $4,000 to the government, for use in connection with work upon public roads to the building or repairing of which the federal government contributes an important share.

If I may be permitted, I also wish to bring to the attention of the minister, the persecution suffered by needy unemployed; a few instances of which I mentioned a moment ago, a persecution arising solely from political partisanry, and, as I say, no honourable member of this house will deny it, whatever party he may support. Things have come to such a pass that one is wondering whether he should continue to give his approval to the estimates whereby the minister wants us to put money at the disposal of the Quebec provincial government for so-called relief work. The minister has generously given his adhesion to the scheme of the Committee on the employment of Youth in the Province of Quebec. Again, I wish to bring to his attention this well established fact, that in all constituencies of the province of Quebec, not a single one, I think, of those who have been recommended by government supporters in this house to the provincial employment commission which was supposed to help these young people, has received the consideration he deserved, and it is also well known that in all constituencies those who were favoured had been recommended by local organizers or by candidates who were defeated at the last provincial election, or else by members who are on friendly terms with the Quebec provincial government. If any hon. member of this house can show me a single case where a young man he recommended was favoured by the provincial authorities, I will gladly admit that there is no political partisanship in the administration of the funds voted by the house for the youth of our province.

It was my privilege to take part in several by-elections since the present government came into power; in Bonaventure—the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) as well as several other hon. members who were there, could also tell you that voters in these various counties were told in plain terms that if they voted for the candidate of the Ottawa government their names would be struck off the relief lists. I will point out to the minister specific cases that will prove definitely to him that such things happened in Bonaventure and Lotbiniere as well as in other counties.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to keep the house any longer on those questions, but I wish to point out that without a closer supervision of the funds voted by this house for relief in Quebec, the present government of that province will be left free to employ systematic persecution against certain groups of people on relief who are not sympathetic to that government.

Mr. Chairman, since we claim to have responsible government, since we from the province of Quebec are proud to think that our forefathers fought for responsible government, I ask the minister who is presently responsible for the administration of public funds if we can retain any longer the present system and still claim to have responsible government.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to speak to one particular case, and no more. This afternoon the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Bonnier) took exception to certain remarks which had been made by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) with respect to works which had been promised during the by-election in St. Henry. A tunnel was promised under the Lachine canal at Côte St. Paul, which is the ward that gave an absolute majority to the hon. member for St. Henry out of the four wards in his constituency. The hon. member for St. Henry inferred that as the hon. member for Mount Royal was opposed to these projects, the other hon. members on this side who represented constituencies on the island of Montreal were also opposed. As far as I understood the remarks of the hon. member for Mount Royal, he said that the tunnel in Côte St. Paul, the abolition of a number of level crossings and the completion of the terminal station in Montreal, would involve millions of dollars. Those were election promises, and the inference has been that we are opposed to any projects for the alleviation of unemployment. That is a dangerous thing to have on Hansard as we are not opposed to any works provided they can be accomplished. However, we are opposed to promises and mathematical impossibilities.

The hon. member for St. Henry is not in his seat this evening. I want to say that he is a neighbour of mine and one of the most respected citizens of Montreal. He is an alderman for the ward that gave him the majority which has permitted him to sit in this house. The three other wards in his constituency voted against him. I am for the tunnel; the hon. member for Mount Royal is for the tunnel, as is the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White). We are for the building of the terminal and the abolition of level crossings. The inference to be drawn from the remarks in French this afternoon by the hon. member for St. Henry is that the members from the island of Montreal who sit on this side are against these projects. We are not against them; we are for them.

Two ministers of the crown—I do not know to what extent they are responsible—have sponsored a project near my constituency and I would be silly if I said I was against it. The hon. member for St. Henry must not forget that if Dame Rumour is correct, only $40,000,000 is to be provided for the construction of public works to relieve unemployment. If the promises made by the two ministers of the crown on a memorable occasion are fulfilled, there will be nothing left for the rest of Canada. My constituency is a bulwark for the constituency of the hon. member for St. Henry, at least for that ward in his constituency which gave him the necessary majority to be a member of this house. His remarks this afternoon were not correct as the other members from the island of Montreal are sympathetic with him. The hon. member has said that if these projects are not completed, the other four members from the island of Montreal should be blamed. I want it to be on Hansard that we are for his projects just as soon as they leave the field of imagination.

The Minister of Labour who is sponsoring this bill knows that the city of Verdun has done the best it could to carry out the provisions of the agreement under which certain works were constructed. We have acted according to specifications, or according to Hoyle, so to speak. Verdun is situated on the beautiful St. Lawrence river opposite the Lachine rapids, in the most picturesque spot on the island of Montreal. For twenty-two years the international highway to New York, via the lake St. Louis bridge and Malone, has been threatened with floods. During that time the city of Verdun has paid out $555,000 from its budget to protect this highway by increasing the height of the dyke. The dyke at this place is made of clay, whereas at other places, not so vulnerable, it is made of concrete. The employment commission has laid great stress upon the importance of the tourist traffic. We have been doing all we can to bring in tourists. They love to come to Verdun, the same as the Minister of Labour. When he came there he was received like a prince, and I believe he was satisfied with the work that had been done for the small amount of money which was provided, fifty-fifty, provincially and federally. With due respect to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay) I give the minister all credit for what was done.

Nevertheless, since 1906 we have had floods in Verdun. We have spent $550,000, though it was a federal proposition, due to the harbour works, the docks, and the Victoria bridge. In the thawing season ice banked up against the bridge, creating a reservoir by which the level of the water in the early spring was increased. We have endured this flooding. We have never asked for any compensation. Perhaps I should not say that we did not ask; we bothered the life out of the Minister of Public Works between 1930 and 1935, as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), who is now in his seat, will recollect. He went so far as to send engineers into our municipality to find out whether we were right or wrong. The reports are in the archives or the vaults of the Department of Public Works to the effect that Verdun needed a protection wall, for the protection of its population, for the protection of the city of Montreal, which was at the same level, and for the protection of Côte St. Paul, which gave a majority to the hon. member for St. Henry. We have protected them by our own finances. Now the hon. member for St. Henry comes along this afternoon and takes exception to certain words uttered by my colleague the hon. member for Mount Royal, who is not opposed to these works, but who, like the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St. Père), who is in his seat now, will not say where the wharves and the harbour are situate or where the cause of the danger and the threat against our city is located. They cannot say that we have opposed any of their projects; we have never done so, although the hon. member for St. Henry this afternoon indicated that we had.

I shall conclude my remarks by asking if, after all these sacrifices on the part of the city of Verdun, which has doubled its population in the last twenty years, which has a record in Canada—if I can be contradicted I shall be pleased to hear the facts—of having enlisted during the great war the largest number of men in proportion to population, which has made great sacrifices, and which can still balance its budget, our people should be punished because they have managed their affairs in a patriotic way. Let it be understood, Mr. Chairman, that we do not regret our sacrifices; but we say this, that the industrial centres must be taken care of, and ours is an industrial centre. We have done our best. We have controlled our population. Our population is made up fifty per cent of English from the other side of the ocean, good people, and fifty per cent French, also good people. They have been patriotic and should receive consideration. In the industrial centres, according to my experience, unemployment is worse than anywhere else. I hear of such projects as roads to be opened up from the Peace river. I hear of various reforestation schemes. But why throw our money in the bush? Why throw our money into rivers? Why expend our resources on places where the rivers can be used only with canoes to search for lost aviators? Why not take care of a population which, coming from the old country, has grown up with us, has benefited Canada and is willing to stay with us? If, as is rumoured, a sum amounting to $40,000,000 is to be spent, for heaven's sake let us spend it in places where sacrifices have been made for the upkeep of our civilization and the maintenance of our rights. I observe that the hon. member for St. Henry is on my side now.

Mr. MICHAUD: The hon. member is for the tunnel?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: It is better to spend less money in a number of places, to distribute it in a thrifty way so as to satisfy everybody, than to put the whole $40,000,000 in one place to build tunnels, even if the election was a tough one to win.

Mr. MALLETTE: Inasmuch as I am one of the members for the island of Montreal, I was glad to hear our friend the hon. member for Verdun support us in our demand for a tunnel at Côte St. Paul. That makes it about unanimous, because he said that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George favoured it, the hon. member for Mount Royal was for it; but he said, I believe, nothing about the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, he did.

Mr. MALLETTE: I take it for granted that the hon. member for Verdun would not make such a statement if he were not sure of his ground. He is a friend of mine, and I have known him for some time; he does not take a chance but says what he knows to be the facts, and it is gratifying to us to know that he is supporting us in our request. During the St. Henry by-election I was one who helped our hon. friend the present member. My contribution was not very large, but it was given heartily because I believed that his cause was a good one. The hon. member for Verdun, so far as I know, did not come out at the time to oppose these expenditures, so I have no doubt about his sincerity, and I am sure that the people of Montreal, especially the Liberals, will be very glad to hear the statement which has been made to-night.

As regards the objection voiced by the hon. member for Mount Royal, inasmuch as the hon. member is not in his seat at the moment I shall read from the Hansard report of the debate of February 8 last. On page 276 the hon. member for Mount Royal is reported as saying:

> Is there anything of political significance in the increase in the amount of money required by the present government as shown by the estimates? Do they contemplate an election? Do they contemplate fulfilling some of the rash promises they made in Victoria, St. Henry, and other parts of the country? I would ask the hon. member for St. Henry to go through the estimates carefully. If he does so he will not find in them any reference to a tunnel under the Lachine canal; he will not find any reference to the removal of railway tracks from his division of St. Henry; he will not find any reference to an appropriation to be used to fill the hole on Dorchester street; nor will he find anything that will lead him to believe that the present government is going to build a bridge from the lower St. Henry division to the section of Notre Dame de Grace.

Knowing what took place during the election, is it to be wondered at that the hon. member for St. Henry took objection to this statement, no matter in how friendly a spirit it was made? I for one, notwithstanding my friendship for the hon. member for Mount Royal, have no hesitation in supporting the hon. member for St. Henry in his contention.

It was not my intention to speak on this particular occasion, but there is one item besides my answer to my friend the hon. member for Verdun which I think should come up. If I understood this afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), he advocated having unemployment insurance whether the provinces agreed to it or not. As I understood his remarks—he is within hearing distance and can correct me if I am wrong—I think he said the government should take about the same position as was taken with reference to the Old Age Pensions Act, namely, pass an act and then let the provinces which are interested apply it. That may have looked wise at the time; but I feel that it should not be contemplated now, because I am convinced that it would lead to trouble. If this or any other government were to pass an unemployment insurance act against the will of one or more of the provinces, and proceeded to apply it to all the provinces which were in favour of it, leaving outside those provinces which were not in favour of it, I am afraid that those provinces which were left outside would make claims upon the government for compensation. I am sure that past governments were lucky to avoid situations of that sort under the Old Age Pensions Act, and I have no doubt that if the present government were to go ahead and put into effect an unemployment insurance act and carry it out in the manner I have explained, there would be trouble. The hon. member for Winnipeg North suggested that a referendum be taken. There is merit in that suggestion, but I am afraid that it would land us in a good deal of trouble. Just as you find that provinces are unwilling to come under a general act, it might be found that certain sections of a province, or certain provinces, might express unwillingness through the referendum, and then what would the government do?

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. gentleman think that one province should hold up the rest of Canada in regard to necessary social legislation?

Mr. MALLETTE: I do not think that on principle any province should oppose the rest, but if one province acted as I fear it might act, it would be entitled to compensation.

Mr. HEAPS: Apart from the question of compensation, does the hon. gentleman think that one province should hold up the rest of Canada in regard to necessary social legislation?

Mr. MALLETTE: It seems hard, but if you passed such a law you would be inviting trouble.

Mr. HEAPS: Inviting trouble from the majority or the minority?

Mr. MALLETTE: I am speaking not of majorities or minorities but of provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: I am speaking of the majority of the provinces. Does the hon. gentleman think it is fair that one of the provinces, I do not care which, if it did not wish to come under a general scheme, should prevent the rest of Canada from taking advantage of it? Is that what he means when he speaks of inviting trouble?

Mr. MALLETTE: If such an act were passed, notwithstanding its legality or otherwise, and some provinces did not wish to have it applied to them, they should be entitled to compensation

Mr. HEAPS: Would they be satisfied if the rest of Canada wanted the legislation?

Mr. MALLETTE: An hon. member says that I am not the minister. The hon. member for Winnipeg North addressed me not as a minister but as a colleague and I am answering him as a colleague. I say that if such a law were passed and one of the provinces opposed it, that province would claim compensation.

Mr. HEAPS: What does the hon. member mean by compensation?

Mr. MALLETTE: If it were done on the basis of population; then the province claiming compensation might make its claim on the basis of population.

Mr. HEAPS: It is a question not of principle but of money?

Mr. MALLETTE: It is a question of principle which involves money.

The leader of the opposition made reference to certain political dismissals. I know the right hon. gentleman is busy and he may not be able to listen to me. I should like to know whether a number of the letters to which he referred did not have to do with dismissals in Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: Those were questions of employment.

Mr. MALLETTE: Those fellows who were dismissed were looking for employment. This afternoon the leader of the opposition referred, not unkindly, to the adulation which was showered upon the Minister of Labour in this debate, and which I am glad to say, did not come only from our partisans or satellites, as the hon. member for Mount Royal called us. The right hon. gentleman also said that in the days when he was in office there was no such kindness shown to those who were then on the treasury benches. Perhaps there was not, and I am sorry. I can assure him that if my electors had seen fit to elect me five or six years earlier, I would have been one of the kind ones. But the fact was that there was then no reason for adulation because in the country everyone thought there was only one man in the government, and that was the Prime Minister, so that there was no need for compliments.

May I say that the electors of Jacques-Cartier are thankful to the government and to the Minister of Labour for what was carried out in the way of unemployment relief work in our constituency. We have been greatly benefited in Lachine and in other parts of the constituency. It may please my friends to my immediate left to know that in the matter of unemployment relief expenditures in my constituency I had no difficulty with the provincial administration. My secret was simple. I told my supporters, men of good will like myself, to go ahead and meet other organizations, not to look for trouble or to make trouble but to arrange things in the interests of the people of the constituency. That was the suggestion which I made to them and which they followed, and there was no trouble. In that part of the constituency which lies in Montreal I did not have such good luck; but I hope that with the experience gained in the last few months in Montreal, when the next works are carried out the results will be better.

The provincial government is at last going to build a highway for which I have been fighting so long in the house and outside. The construction of highways is a purely provincial matter, and I suppose I shall be told that it is not a concern of the federal government. May I point out that the construction of a road through the western part of the island of Montreal in which the constituency of Jacques-Cartier lies, will necessitate the abolition of several railway crossings. I hope that when they are abolished the government will act generously towards the electors of the constituency, who, I am sure, will be grateful.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to make but a very few observations in reply to what was stated by the Minister of Labour. In no sense did I wish to depreciate his academic training or his high record of scholarship; but where much is given, much is expected, and when he came to this house it was expected that at least his concern for democracy would be in keeping with one of his attainments. One of the curses of democracy to-day is political patronage in the manner in which it is administered in Canada at this very hour. If I made the observation that the conduct of the department indicated that the academic mind had brought nothing better to bear upon it than the untrained and unskilled mind, I but stated what is at this time the view of very many people in the country. The minister has said that he cannot personally be responsible for what takes place all over the country. I agree with what he says in that regard and on several occasions have so stated. But I would expect that when the Prime Minister of this country made the declaration he did the other evening, and when the Minister of Labour declared that he has followed those provisions of the agreements which provided that there should be no discrimination, some little effort would be made to see that this was done.

The minister selected a very bad illustration indeed. The Fort Henry work was done under contract, and the contract was let by the provincial government. It is all very well for the minister to say that he asked the provincial government that there should be no discrimination. But the contractor, the Frid Construction Company if I remember aright, had as one of its officers, according to the letterhead I have, the president of the Kingston Liberal association. And in answers to questions put upon the order paper, not one, two or three, but many of them, we have it indicated that men were given employment on the recommendation of that very man. Those were men who had no more claim upon employment than others unemployed. They were not selected by their names being taken out of a hat; they were not called; but this man sends a letter and on the strength of it we are told by the return filed in this house—not veiled insinuations of the leader of the opposition—that these men went down to Trenton and other places and were given their positions on the recommendation of that man.

Mr. ROGERS: At Trenton, does my right hon. friend say?

Mr. BENNETT: I think Trenton was one of the places.

Mr. ROGERS: But this was not relief work.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, then there is a distinction between the two?

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly there is.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister made it clear that there should not be discrimination, but we will leave it that they were not all on relief work. Fort Henry was a relief undertaking in part at any rate. But the statement of the minister is wholly beside the question. What does it boot that he should say to the government of Ontario; "There must be no discrimination"? The contractor who got the job has no such condition imposed on him. His job is to do the work, and he responded, as the return made in this house indicates, to the political necessities of the situation. The same thing is true in other parts of this country. Yesterday I mentioned Long Branch, and I might mention Banff. I might go all across the continent to Victoria. I might mention work in the provinces by the sea; there is the same sort of thing there. That is what is destroying confidence.

If the minister will look at the cost of administration, he will find that, according to the return, during the last fiscal year the cost of administration went up to $225,000, excluding the $17,000,000 disbursed by the agriculture department. That percentage is nearly twice, and sometimes much more than that, the percentage expended by the preceding administration. How is that accounted for? Why is it so? Would you not think something would have been learned with respect to it? This is not the time or place to take that up at length, as it will be taken up. But if we turn to the report made, it will be found that the cost of administration is stated in the table in the report of the dominion unemployment relief commissioner, and it shows that on a total expenditure of $17,000,000 under the 1930 act the cost of administration was $43,000; the next year, with $42,000,000 expended, the cost of administration was $85,000; the next year the cost was $67,000 on a total of $26,000,000 in round figures; the next year, $87,000 on an expenditure of $41,000,000, or about two per cent. The next year on an expenditure of $40,500,000 the administration cost was $88,800. For 1935, on an expenditure of $49,500,000, the administration cost was $140,000. The next year, 1936, administration cost $179,000 for an expenditure of $47,000,000; and this last year, despite all the talk of economy, and all that has been said as to the desirability of exercising the utmost care with respect to our expenditures, $225,000 was spent for the administration of $27,000,000; or between eight and ten per cent, compared with two per cent in days gone by. Why is that? The answer is obvious. All one has to do is to read the reports in every part of this country, not one part only. The minister says, "I assure you I had nothing to do with regard to these particular matters." "Even in Kingston," he says, "I left it to someone else." I quite agree that he cannot be expected to deal with all these matters, but there are broad questions of policy for which he must answer. There are broad questions of administration for which he must be held responsible. That is one of them: The expenditure of $225,000 for administration cost on an expenditure of $27,000,000, relatively four times as much as spent by the preceding government for the administration of expenditures under their control. To talk about blank cheques and appropriation control having regard to a cost of from eight to ten per cent on the one hand and between two and three per cent on the other—well that is the position.

I asked the minister about camp No. 42 at Barriefield. It is not a question of an insinuation; there were statements in the public press and from the public platform as to what was realized for Bain wagons, horses and other articles which were in that storehouse which was burned. The minister says they have had the return to an inquiry with respect to that affair, about which I hope we shall learn something further presently. Those are facts, not my statements; they are in the returns brought down in answer to inquiries. Remember, we are few in number, scattered all over the vast area of this country. We have been endeavouring to ascertain some facts. It has been a slow process to get at them. But the facts disclose, first, increased cost of administration, nearly four times as much as the former government expended on administration. Second, did members of this administration tell the people of Canada in 1935, when asking for their support, that they would not have a commission to deal with the matter but were going to deal with it in the same way as that which they had condemned? We remember the kind of speeches made by Mr. Peter Heenan in this house and others of that type, their condemnation of the government of that time for expending moneys, the charges made of political administration, and the holy attitude taken by the opposition of that day: Let us have power, we will see to it that this is conducted in a manner which will reflect credit upon our fairness, our impartiality, our desire to serve the body politic. That is what happened.

I think I hear the present Prime Minister, standing in this very place in the house, pointing out how sad it was that in this great country there was political administration of relief moneys; how desirable it was that we should have a great commission to coordinate and cooperate the work so that the provinces, the dominion and the municipalities might work together. One was almost moved to tears, hearing the pathetic tones in which the right hon. gentleman referred to what was taking place. Suppose he had gone out and told the electors of Kingston and other places that they had no intention of doing that; that all they intended was to appoint a commission to make some investigations, and then not adopt the commission's reports. Who will say that the report of the national employment commission is the final word they had to say about it? That is what we want to know. This commission that was to administer has not administered; the commission that was to deal with these matters has not dealt with them. There has been no change in administration, except to impose an administration four times more costly than we had before. That is what we have.

Then the minister referred to expansion of trade and tried to assume or make it appear that I and other members on this side of the house were opposed to trade expansion. The trade agreement negotiated with the United States of America came into being because of proposals which had been made under the previous government and because every step that the law required in the United States had been taken before the present government came into office. The hearings before the tariff commission; the complaints; the opportunity for representatives of industry in the United States to present their case; all this had been done before hon. gentlemen opposite ever saw office or heard of it. Why, sir, when the minister says we are opposed to the expansion of trade, only the other day we heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), with a couple of trade agreements, say, "Well, this is no change from the practice that exists to-day or from the practice that existed before we came into office. It is the same thing; only we have signed an agreement with them now, or the British consul did it for us down in some remote section of the world." The same thing may be said with respect to other countries, such as Australia and New Zealand, for example. It is true that the government varied the agreements they found when we left office, giving those two countries greater opportunities to sell their products here without any corresponding advantage to this country in those markets. It is true that there has been discussed the question of a new trade agreement with the United States which involves the motherland as well. But when the hon. gentleman says that this opposition has been opposed to the expansion of trade, he must know that the facts are entirely at variance with that statement.

I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, what we are opposed to. We are opposed to trade that renders it so easy for other countries to place their products in this land that they dispossess Canadian workmen from their jobs. That is what we are opposed to. We have lived long enough to see the Minister of Labour, who prepared a statement that has been thrust before the Rowell commission in every province in which it has sat, with the possible exception of Ontario—I do not know whether it has reached there or not—stand in his place and say, "Oh, do not do away with tariffs after all." And these compensating advantages, to which reference has been made, I suppose are nothing more or less than the statement made by the present leader of the opposition in the Walker theatre in Winnipeg in 1930 with respect to compensating adjustment; not compensating advantages but compensating adjustments.

Those are the facts. Trade? Of course, but trade on fair terms; trade that will not hand the Canadian market over to the stranger, to dispossess the Canadian workman of his job; trade, sir, that will do more, that will expand within our own markets, so as to provide additional employment for our own people. You may call it economic nationalism or anything you please; but there will be no solution of your unemployment problem in the cities and towns of Canada until, by industrial expansion, every Canadian is afforded the opportunity to find a job in his own country. Let there be no doubt about that; whether it be an agricultural implement factory or a textile factory matters not.

When the minister talks about trade expansion, let him keep in mind one thing further. The conditions under which the emergency tariff of 1930 was passed were conditions the like of which this country had never before seen. What is more, it was the direct result of what had been done by the preceding government, following 1929, when the United States, as the figures show, had entirely shut us out of their markets and left us the dumping place for their surplus products. We did put on an emergency tariff, and we saved this country from absolute insolvency and bankruptcy. What is more, the strongest testimony in that regard has been given not by Conservatives but by Liberals themselves, dispassionate, disinterested patriots who have looked about and seen the conditions, and who have realized that the steps which were taken, difficult though they were, had to be taken because of then existing conditions.

In connection with the sales tax we had the budget speech of the Minister of Finance a few short months before the election of 1930, cutting the sales tax in two in the face of a deficit amounting to millions of dollars, and imposing upon his successors the necessity of taking the steps they did take with respect to revenues. These are the facts with respect to that, and the sales tax has now risen to eight per cent, a figure never before reached and maintained in this country. I repeat, sir, that when the minister says those on this side of the house are opposed to the expansion of trade, he knows that is at least at variance with the record. Whatever else he may know, he can find from reading the records that his statement is at variance with the facts. What is more, the upward trend had begun long before this government took office. All one has to do is read the reports of the banks and financial institutions of the country; the upward movement had commenced and, what is more, the reduction in tariff imposts had also commenced. I sometimes wonder that any hon. member sitting on the other side of the house would have the hardihood to talk about tariffs in view of what followed after we imposed an exise tax of one per cent. That was condemned. We raised it to three per cent. I wonder if there is anybody in this chamber who read the debates or heard what was said who has forgotten the condemnation of that excise tax by the present Prime Minister. And it is still there at three per cent. We took it off Great Britain and empire products before we left office, in accordance with our promise that just as soon as economic conditions permitted we would make reductions. But that excise tax is still three per cent, sir, and the sales tax is eight per cent, two per cent higher than the highest it was under the late administration. The corporation tax is fifteen per cent. I think the income tax on individals has not been changed, but there are the facts.

I repeat that the expansion of trade is important; but the kind of trade that creates unemployment, that deprives Canadians of a limited market of only eleven million people, that makes us the dumping ground for the products of countries which deny us the opportunity of selling our goods in their markets, will not restore prosperity to this country.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Is there trade of that kind?

Mr. BENNETT: It exists to-day in connection with some commodities in this country. I suggest that the hon. gentleman take the trouble just to read the trade and commerce reports for the last few months. If he will read the reports for January, February and March, he will have no difficulty in the world in finding out exactly what I mean.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the minister makes a clear distinction between relief and non-relief works. I have not in this house raised the question of appointments to casual vacancies, which right governments have exercised from time immemorial. I have made no complaint about that, and I have said in this house that I had no complaint to make in that regard.

Mr. ROGERS: That was why I made that distinction.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that was with respect to what one might call the casual vacancies in the public service. For instance, I do not object to the Minister of Labour, if he finds it necessary to appoint a stenographer, to take some one who is friendly to his party. He has never heard me raise such a complaint But when it comes down to the question of public moneys that are to be utilized for the purpose of keeping people from being in the bread line and on relief, then I think it is clearly the duty of the government to see to it that men are not prejudiced by reason of their political belief.

If I say it has been done, I merely state what is known to me personally to be the case in my own community. I can speak only with respect to personal knowledge concerning some few communities. For instance, in Victoria a man came to see me. It is true he may have been telling an untruth, but my investigation indicated that it was the truth. I certainly did know in Calgary how the Banff national park was operated, a matter we shall discuss when the estimates are taken up in committee of supply. I certainly know how other western communities have been treated. I have a large volume of correspondence about the matter which at the proper time will be made available. Whether or not I have been misinformed is another question altogether. But the statements have been made, and that at least I believed them to be warranted I believe goes without saying. I do not for a moment suggest that the minister can personally oversee all these matters, but I do say that a strong minister can see that it does not happen. All you have to do is to have it clearly understood by your officials that they will suffer the penalty of disobedience if they fail to carry out your orders.

Mr. ROGERS: Is it fair to ask my right hon. friend if that did not happen under his administration? Would he be prepared to say that camps 42 and 37 in Frontenac-Addington were conducted along the lines he has suggested?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a fair and proper question. I say to the minister at once that I believe there was an effort on the part of some people to use political means with respect to those matters. I know that at Calgary, where they were carrying on an undertaking in connection with the Currie barracks, I received a letter the other day from a man who is now no longer there, giving his experience as to the way in which men were taken on. The names were put in a hat and drawn out, regardless of what their political faith may have been, under the direction of the mayor. He said that when last spring he went up to try to get employment, it was no longer possible to get it unless you had a letter from a man called Hyde, who was my opponent in the recent election, or from Joe Shaw, who ran in Calgary East. He said, "I object to that. And, what is more, I have a solemn declaration I took with respect to some of these matters, because I felt they might be questioned."

What is true there is true with respect to some other sections of the country, because I have made inquiries in the same way. The minister is quite right when he says that in all parties at all times there are those who will endeavour to do the very thing about which I complain. But the Prime Minister the other day declared his opposition to that. Frankly, I believe that if one takes sufficient time and makes it clearly understood to his officials what he intends to be the result of disobedience, he can accomplish his purpose. I say that to the minister.

I certainly do not expect the minister to run around and look at every John Smith and Peter Jones who may be employed, in order to ascertain whether or not he had a card or did not have a card, or whether he did or did not belong to this or that association. I believe the minister will credit me with not expecting him to do that. But I do say only one thing, something to which I had reference this afternoon—and I still stick to it—that it is one of the dangers which threatens this very democracy about which, in the language of one of our former members in another place, we talk a good deal about but which we are only bringing nearer to its own end by giving our approval to conditions such as these.

If you have a large part of the population who feel, as many of them do, that this is an unfair exercise of power, you create a condition which has an extremely injurious effect upon your institution. We are living in times which are very much different from the buoyant days of long ago. When I first came to this House of Commons in 1911, conditions were entirely different. I remained in it until 1917, when I was not again a candidate. I recall distinctly the circumstances under which, when war came, there had to be an entire change. It was no longer a question of war effort being limited to just one class of people. An effort made in that direction certainly brought about most difficult and dangerous consequences.

We are now fighting a greater war in one sense than we have ever been engaged in. It is a war against unemployment; it is a war against poverty; it is a war against conditions the like of which, despite our richness as a new country, we have never known before. I could not help thinking, as I am sure the minister must have been thinking this afternoon and this evening, of the promise made in Montreal by a minister of the crown when he said he spoke for the government, and when he gave a promise which is the exact negation of the present policy of the government. He said that the government would deal with the municipalities, if need be, despite what might be done by provincial and other organizations. That cannot but be injurious to the body politic. The question of promised public works projects stood in the same position.

I suppose no hon. member has a wider academic knowledge of the historic side and setting of this situation than has the Minister of Labour. From what I know of his attainments I believe that is so. He must know that even with our limited knowledge, we know we are living under conditions which are tremendously different from any we have ever had before. The other day I was reading of what happened in this country in 1875. In that year there was a bread riot in Montreal. Alexander Mackenzie wrote a letter trying to still the agitation which existed regarding public works and matters of that kind, and saying that an engineer was looking into the situation. This happened, although a few months before Lord Dufferin had told the Canada Club in London that conditions were excellent. That was the condition in 1875. It was not anything approximating present conditions.

If I might be pardoned for saying so to the minister, I am greatly concerned about present conditions in this country. I am concerned because of the disharmony among the provinces. One finds it manifested in the briefs that have been presented to a commission which never should have existed, which has brought out differences on a scale never before known—a scale not expected—and never before manifested. We have here to-day a great and rich province making complaints about its contribution to the exchequer—and seriously, mark you. This is not as though it was some kind of spasmodic expression of opinion in a newspaper. It is a solemn and serious declaration by the first minister of the province, and by his responsible officials, in the greatest and most populous of our provinces. We have manifestations of disharmony and disunion in public statements in the other provinces.

It was that sort of thing which the present Prime Minister, when leader of the opposition, pointed out he desired to meet by appointing a commission for the purpose of dealing with this vast question of unemployment and relief. I was opposed to it because I felt we could not get a federal commission which would deal with it adequately. I believed we might be able to bring about through the provinces and the dominion a condition which would ensure some measure of harmony. Despite all that may be said, during a period of four or five years we brought the provinces together here year after year. The first suggestion of direct relief in Canada came from a representative of one of the two largest provinces. That is strange, but it is the fact. They felt that conditions were such that it had to be done and they pressed that it should be done. We said that we could not undertake this ourselves and we made them grants in aid. That was not the first or second year, as the minister will remember from the records. I realize, and I have never failed to realize; the late government realized that this was a very serious matter; that we were embarking on something which we believed would not last long. We said it was only a palliative. We believed that the upward trend would overtake the conditions which existed and we acted accordingly.

The minister knows that the improvement went up and up and up, and to-day there is a recession which was brought about in this country largely through what one might call the sympathetic feeling that has pervaded the whole world by reason of conditions which came into existence in the great country to the south. World trade, export trade, has diminished by hundreds of millions, according to the League of Nations. That is a great deal of money. That condition has been brought about through what one might call the impelling force of fear upon the minds of men who otherwise had vision and confidence and grasp and grip and the ability to deal with problems. The reaction in this country was later in setting in. We did not get the full force of it, and I am not sure that we have yet felt the full force of it. But we began to get it in the latter part of last year. It might be said that we began to feel its increasing weight somewhere about October. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) knows how it was reflected in the volume of exports and unfortunately in an increase with respect to some of our imports.

Look at the condition with respect to the cattle industry. We have been driven to sending our cattle across the Atlantic ocean to utilize a market which we have made just a market of convenience. We issued a warning that if this market were used only as a market of convenience, you could not expect to have the facilities to send your cattle there when you needed them just because it was convenient. They cannot be sent into the United States. With the quota against us exhausted, we are trying to find a place across the ocean to which to send our cattle.

We might mention other matters. In my opinion that state of affairs necessitated a very bold course being taken at once by the government. Something is needed to restore the confidence of the people, to lift them out of the thought that they have to go through a depression just because our neighbours to the south of us have to; that this 11,000,000 of people must necessarily suffer as 125,000,000 or 130,000,000 of people are suffering. I expected some action, but it has not been taken as yet.

Mr. KIRK: Blast ourselves into the markets.

Mr. BENNETT: It was Disraeli who once made some observations about the volcanoes that might be found on the coasts of America; that they belched forth just occasionally, and that was all they were capable of doing.

Mr. GARDINER: That is an old chestnut.

Mr. BENNETT: As he pointed out, that condition was not entirely free from danger to those who were in the immediate vicinity. I pointed out that we did expect and we do expect and that this country expects some action. It is not good enough to say that we have repeated here what we did last year. I have looked at the preamble and I shall discuss it at the proper time. There has been a little difference in the preamble each year. The mosaic has been differently shaped; the words have been cast about in much the same way as was done in the agreement of 1937 as compared with that of 1932. It was the same in the end, but the pieces were placed a little differently. The preamble to this bill is in that position.

May I say to the hon. gentleman I think he will find that something more heroic is demanded; not heroics, something more heroic. Something more striking is needed, something that will do a real job to restore a measure of confidence in the minds of the people, that will induce Canadians to rely more upon themselves, that will make them understand that the government is an instrumentality and not in itself an end, that the government which is here is here to help, that it is here not for the purpose of affording, shall I say, a living for all the population, but rather to assist the population in getting a living. I think it will be found that you must embark upon bold policies that are at variance with those which the bill now under consideration expresses, and this section in particular, contemplates.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Agreements with provinces and others.

Mr. PERLEY: The section under which the government are given the power to use a blank cheque has been passed, so I think it would be well for them to sleep on the matter and digest the statement they have just listened to, made by the right hon. leader of the opposition.

Section stands.

Beef type is desired and good conformation essential.

GRAIN AND GRAIN TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT OF GRAIN COMMISSION AND REVISION OF CANADA GRAIN ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Before the Easter recess the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), assured the house that we might expect the report of the Turgeon grain inquiry commission soon after the house reassembled. Can he now inform the house when we may expect that report? Also, I notice a report in the press that the government propose to have a general revision of the Canada Grain Act this session. Will the minister inform us whether we may expect to get that measure soon?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I hope to be able to table the grain commission report this week, perhaps to-morrow.

As far as the revision of the grain act is concerned, I cannot speak positively, but it has been and is still the intention to introduce an amendment to the grain act this session.

Mr. CRERAR: But not a general revision.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 105, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 4—Agreements with provinces and others.

Mr. HEAPS: I want to make a special plea to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in regard to the position of many of the municipalities in Canada. This has been repeatedly drawn to the attention of the government, but so far without result. We all realize that the government is carrying a great financial burden in connection with unemployment, but the burden is falling far too heavily upon many of our municipalities. Yesterday an hon. member from Montreal gave some figures in regard to the metropolis of the east. I wish to draw particular attention to the position of Winnipeg, mainly as a result of the great load it is bearing as a result of the unemployment situation.

The figures I quote were supplied to me recently by the city clerk of Winnipeg. In 1929, when we were not troubled with the unemployment problem as we are now, Winnipeg spent on unemployment relief $25,914. In the succeeding years Winnipeg has been obliged to bear an almost unbearable load. In 1937 the total cost of unemployment relief in Winnipeg was $3,711,331. Of that sum the city had to pay $1,530,015, approximately forty-one per cent of the total cost. I believe a similarly large figure could be quoted for any other large industrial centre in Canada. So bad has the financial situation become in Winnipeg as a result of unemployment relief that the city is on the verge of bankruptcy, even though it can show an excellent balance sheet as far as its general financial situation is concerned. But the load she has been compelled to bear through no fault of her own is almost breaking the back of the city.

I believe all hon. members recognize, as it is recognized outside of the house, that unemployment is not a result of the activities or policies of our municipal bodies; therefore it is most unfair that municipalities should be called upon to bear the greatest part of the burden of unemployment relief. As has been already pointed out by myself and other hon. members, the present policy of the government in dealing with unemployment is no different from that of seven or eight years ago, no different from the policy of 1930 and succeeding years. If the government have no other policy than that of dealing with the relief problem from the purely administrative standpoint, instead of trying to do something from the legislative standpoint, the municipalities should not be burdened with this unbearable load by reason of the shortcomings of the federal government.

The wording of the preamble of the present bill is somewhat different from that of bills of former years. The words used are:

> Whereas it is in the national interest that the dominion should continue for a further period to support and supplement the measures of the provinces and other bodies. . . .

The government, instead of assuming responsibility for the unemployment situation, say in this preamble that they will "supplement the measures" of the municipalities and provincial governments. I should expect any government under the circumstances of the present time not to supplement the efforts of the municipal and provincial governments but to initiate measures which the municipal and provincial governments might perhaps supplement. But the government is reversing that situation and going back to the old theory that unemployment relief is entirely the responsibility of the municipalities and provinces. If the municipalities or provinces were in any way responsible for the unemployment situation I would say that the responsibility for relief should rest upon them. But I think it is admitted by all that unemployment is the result of policies over which our municipalities have no control whatever, policies for the most part initiated and carried out by the federal government; and such being the case the federal government ought to assume a much larger share of responsibility, and cease driving many of our larger municipalities into bankruptcy. I appeal to the minister and the government to do something to alleviate the situation of our municipalities and relieve them of the burden of bearing over forty per cent of the cost of unemployment relief.

Mr. PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, you have allowed considerable latitude in the discussion which has taken place on this bill. Practically every line of industry in Canada has received some attention. Some of the discussion I think was not altogether relevant; therefore I trust that if I should transgress a little you will be lenient with me. I do not think I can be accused of unduly taking up the time of the committee, and certainly I have not tried to hold up any measure of importance.

I might remind you of the fact that when the seed bill, No. 78, was before the house, it was introduced and given first reading on March 25 and it passed before the end of the fiscal year. Of course the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) asked us to permit it to pass quickly, assuring us that we would have opportunity later, on some item in the estimates, to get the details which we no doubt would have asked for then if he had not given us that assurance. Also the supplementary estimates passed, I think, at one sitting of the house, in which were included some $14,000,000 for relief to Saskatchewan. These also were permitted to pass with the understanding that at some future time or on some other estimate we would have an opportunity of discussing certain details.

On Monday last, in reply to the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Heaps), the minister stated that the administration of relief in the drought area of Saskatchewan rested with the Department of Agriculture. Subsection (a) of section 4 of this bill provides that the governor in council may enter into agreements—> —with any of the provinces respecting the alleviation of unemployment conditions and of agricultural distress therein, and to assist those in need.

I therefore desire to bring to the attention of the government the very serious situation of the farmers of Saskatchewan, particularly with regard to the lack of power and machinery of all kinds with which to carry on their farming operations, both now and during the summer. There is no doubt that there will be a great deal more summer-fallowing this year than usual, owing to the policy adopted by the Department of Agriculture last fall, for which the minister is responsible, with respect to not supplying the feed and fodder necessary to winter the horses in that district. As a result of this policy the farmers will not be able to continue their spring and summer work as they ought to, which is a very serious matter. On Friday last, dealing with the report of the farm implements committee, the minister stated—

Mr. GARDINER: Might I ask the hon. gentleman whether he is speaking of the provincial or the federal minister of agriculture?

Mr. PERLEY: I said the Minister of Agriculture, speaking in this house on Friday last—

Mr. GARDINER: I am referring to the previous statement, that the Minister of Agriculture was responsible—

Mr. PERLEY: I meant the Minister of Agriculture in this house.

Mr. GARDINER: Then I should say that the Minister of Agriculture in this house had nothing whatever to do with that.

Mr. PERLEY: I have a statement, which I can produce, to the effect that the Minister of Agriculture approved of the rules and regulations drawn up by the government of Saskatchewan, so it was with his approval that those regulations were carried out.

Mr. GARDINER: Those regulations have nothing whatever to do with the sending of horses to the Carberry pasture.

Mr. PERLEY: The first regulations had to do with the quantity of feed and fodder that would be supplied to the farmers to carry them through the winter. Then there was a further regulation issued by that government dealing with the shipment of horses to pasture in Manitoba. I think the minister must agree that he had something to do with providing those pastures and permitting horses to be taken there. Certainly he is responsible for what happened there and the condition of those horses when they were returned to Saskatchewan.

As I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, on Friday last the Minister of Agriculture in this house made a speech dealing with the report of the farm implements committee, in which he expressed some concern for the farmers of the west and in fact for the farmers of all Canada in regard to the high prices they are called upon to pay for implements. He appeared to be indefinite in regard to how he proposed to remedy that condition or what he proposed to do about it. I would judge that perhaps he had some concern as to how his speech would be received in Saskatchewan and what use might be made of it in the provincial campaign that is now pending. At any rate, his remarks received considerable publicity in the west. I have before me the Regina Leader-Post of the day following, in which there is a heading in block letters, as follows:

Machine Firms Warned
Tariff Cut, Price Curb Threats Made
Gardiner Speaks Bluntly to Farm
Implement Companies

Hon. J. G. Gardiner received unanimous applause of the house Friday night with the exception of a handful of high protectionist Conservatives, and warned the farm implement industry what the government contemplates.

1. Price control of farm implements.
2. Removal of the tariff on farm implements.
3. Control of farm implement company organization.

As far as the tariff goes the farmers of the west know that there has been a considerable reduction already, from 25 per cent to 7½ per cent. They also know that since that has taken place there have been two substantial increases in the prices of farm implements. I think perhaps the minister was taking more or less of a bold chance, in the hope that the inquiry now taking place in the United States into the agricultural implement industry might result in some control of prices there, and that Canada might follow suit.

Now I wish to suggest some immediate ways of assisting the farmers with respect to power and machinery. Under this act I think arrangements might be made with the provincial government to assist the farmers to finance their cash payments on tractors and other machinery. This is important in view of the lack of power in that area at the present time, in order that the farmers may be kept on the land and the acreage not seeded this year kept cultivated, free of weeds and so on. There is no doubt that there will not be a normal seeding this year, with a consequent increase in the acreage to be summer-fallowed. If this could be arranged it would create employment in the implement industry. There would be a certain amount of freight carried into that province, which would also help the unemployment situation, and if the farmers could be assisted in carrying on their work, as they will have to be, many thousands of men would be employed as farm labourers this summer. This would be of very considerable assistance in relieving unemployment.

There is another matter which I think is important. I refer to the live stock industry. The policy adopted last fall by the provincial department of agriculture, with the approval of the federal minister of agriculture, resulted in the depletion of the herds in that province. As you know, under the regulations anyone who wanted assistance in regard to feed and fodder had to reduce his herd to not more than four cows. Certainly that will mean a restriction of production. The other evening the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) made a speech in which he charged the late government with being responsible for a policy of restriction of trade. Then he launched an attack on the stabilization operations of the late government under Mr. McFarland. I might tell the hon. member that if it had not been for those operations, and a certain amount of grain which accumulated under that system, the province of Saskatchewan would have been in a sorry plight this spring, because there would not have been any seed. On July 31 last they had seven million bushels left, which was held for seed purposes; and it was that wheat that had been accumulated by the previous government that made it possible to supply seed wheat. A little later I may have something more to say with respect to what has happened in that connection. However, that has been the policy of the present government with respect to the distribution of feed, fodder and seed. Then, the policy carried out last fall with respect to the cattle industry, when the farmers were forced to reduce their herds, has meant a compelled restriction of production.

While I was home representations were made to me on behalf of twelve or fifteen farmers in the Alexander district of Saskatchewan. They stated they had formed themselves into a group and had made application to the provincial government to secure a bull, under the bull loaning policy. They were advised to take the matter up with the federal authorities. Upon doing so they were informed that the federal government could not consider their application. I was asked to bring the matter to the attention of the government when I came to Ottawa, and upon doing so I received the following reply:

> I regret very much to have to advise that it is not possible to encourage the farmers in the Alexander district to organize an association to apply for the loan of a pure bred bull from this department this year. We have already received from Saskatchewan applications greatly in excess of the number of suitable bulls which it will be possible to purchase, and have been under the necessity of refusing consideration to nearly two hundred inquiries received from Saskatchewan alone.

Certainly the department was not exercising a policy of foresight when it permitted those animals to be shipped out as they were last year. I would impress upon the minister the necessity of paying attention to this serious situation, and to make a statement with respect to it. Surely there are sufficient animals in Canada to supply the need. This is a matter which should be attended to immediately.

I believe under the section it is permissible to discuss the present situation in the province with respect to seed, feed and fodder. In his statement to the house on April 26, and again on April 28, the minister said, in effect, that he expected seed would be released for seeding in the middle of that week. That is not an answer to the question as to what has really been the delay in the release of the seed. For the last two months this matter has been a live one in the province. The farmers were looking for seed in March, because in some parts of the province they were ready to seed by April 5.

I have a clipping from a weekly paper dated April 28 which states:

> Local farmers are still waiting for their full allotment of seed grain. There was apparently a sufficient supply of wheat, purchased by the wheat board and held in local elevators for the past six months, but for some reason much of this was shipped out during the past couple of weeks, and now, wheat will have to be shipped in to meet the local requirements.

It goes on to say that on April 28 a number of farmers were still looking for their seed. In March the provincial minister of agriculture made a statement in Saskatchewan, as did the premier of the province, to the effect that wheat was then moving to points where it would be required. It was stated that out of 1,100 points 900 had received wheat.

Then we have the statement on April 23 in which the provincial minister of agriculture stated that the farmers could not understand why at Radville wheat was sitting on the track in cars for four days and could not be released. The statement goes on to say that every time a train went by the station the farmers would go to town to see if any wheat was ready for release. The situation became desperate, and the delay was serious. It means a very serious reduction in what the farmer will realize next fall from his crop. Wheat which should have been seeded three or four weeks ago will, if seeded now, run a great danger of being frosted. It will be more subject to rust, too, and as a result there may be a further extensive loss taken by farmers in the fall.

At this time I am not going to discuss the question of the quantity of seed being released. It is my intention to-day more particularly to find out why there has been delay in the release. I do not believe the excuse given by the provincial minister of agriculture, that it was due to the wheat board, is sufficient. We know the wheat board have efficient experts and accountants who could handle several millions of bushels of wheat easily, and in a very short time. We know, too, that wheat was accumulated last October. For instance, an order in council was passed by this government on December 15 last authorizing the board to convert their futures into cash wheat. We have proof—I have it right here—of cash brokers' notes, dated even in October, where the option was exchanged for wheat, and giving the points in the province in which the board took delivery in exchange for options.

Then, the municipalities were asked last December to make a survey of their requirements. We have reports from municipalities where surveys were made and sent in to the government. Applications were made and the amounts required in the municipalities indicated. On April 23 I had a statement from the reeve of one municipality in which he stated that the wheat had not been released.

Mr. GARDINER: What date is that?

Mr. PERLEY: April 23.

Mr. GARDINER: It is likely all in the ground now.

Mr. PERLEY: It is not all in the ground yet. We can produce a statement right here that wheat has not yet been released in certain parts.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There has been too much rain and cold weather to put it into the ground.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister says it is in.

Mr. PERLEY: The government has tried to place responsibility upon the municipalities and upon the wheat board. Certainly that responsibility cannot be placed on the municipality, so far as the distribution of feed and fodder is concerned. We understand that the winter allotment expired on March 5, and the spring requirement was supposed to be distributed. I have a statement from a reeve of a municipality showing that on April 22 they were short by thirty per cent the amount of their seed allotment.

I say we cannot accept the statement from the Minister of Agriculture, when he charges that the responsibility is that of the wheat board or of the municipality. I have before me a statement by Mr. Taggart, the minister of agriculture in the province. This interview dated April 23 is very interesting because he makes the following statement:

> The farmer finds it hard to understand why there should be grain in the elevator right next door, and yet he cannot have it released.

The article goes on to say:

> He did not have knowledge—

Said the minister of agriculture, Mr. Taggart:

> —that down in the northeast corner of the province more than 35,000 bushels of grain were ordered moved out by the wheat board to another point, when that grain was definitely needed in the area where it was to supply requirements. He explains this by stating that it may have been a clerical oversight due to limited knowledge of geography of that area.

What a lame excuse for a responsible minister of any government to make, when asked to give an explanation that there had been an oversight on the part of some official who did not know his geography. We want to know the reason for the delay. It may be that the wheat has not yet been paid for and the grain companies who sold it to the board were not prepared to release wheat this year until the provincial government had paid for it.

Mr. GARDINER: It may save time if I say to the hon. member that there is no possibility of my answering that question in connection with this bill. Special legislation to provide for seed and feed and fodder went through this house and these matters were all discussed during the debate on that bill. I do not think it would be proper for me to enter into another discussion on this bill.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister should have knowledge of this because a similar bill was passed last year guaranteeing to the provincial governments what was required in order to supply seed. Surely he has some knowledge of that.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not saying I have no knowledge of it. I am saying that the rules of the house prevent my discussing it.

Mr. PERLEY: When I visited the grain exchange last October I had a conversation with three or four of the members. Another member came up to our group and I was introduced as having come from Ottawa. Evidently this gentleman thought that I was a supporter of the government, because he said to me, "When are you fellows going to pay us for the seed we gave you last spring?". I said, "Oh, have they not paid you for that seed?" He said, "No, they have not, and we are getting pretty well fed up with it." I said, "You ought to see about it; the money was voted and you should have been paid." He said, "The government owes our company $17,000 for seed supplied last spring, and I am only one of many here." If that is the situation prevailing this year, it might be possible that that is the reason for some of the delay.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What was the amount that was claimed to be owing?

Mr. PERLEY: He said $17,000 for that one firm alone. I have before me an article which appeared in a paper which has just come to me from the west, in which the secretary of the municipality of Perdue takes exception to the fact that the premier of Saskatchewan and the provincial minister of agriculture have charged the municipalities with responsibility for the delay. He states that that particular municipality made the requisition in good time. They had made a survey last fall, which was followed up in February and March, and requisitions went in in plenty of time. Even at that late date, April 28, he said that the seed had not been distributed.

I shall not delay any further the passing of this measure. However, I think it is due to the committee that we should have a definite statement from the minister. I trust that he will give consideration to the two or three proposals that I have made, because there is a serious situation existing. I think he should make some statement and see that the farmers have sufficient power and machinery with which to carry on their farming operations during the next season.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) referred last night to the fact that the roads in Saskatchewan are in a very poor state of repair. There should be a lot of road work done. It may seem funny to the government that I am advocating this with an election pending, but the work is necessary. I would suggest that No. 1 highway from McLean east to the Manitoba boundary should be hard surfaced this year. This work is needed very badly. If the cross roads leading into that highway from the United States boundary were properly gravelled it would encourage tourist traffic from the states. I make these suggestions to the minister and I trust he will give them favourable consideration.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, I missed the early portion of the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). I think it is only fair to tell the committee of some of the conditions that exist in Saskatchewan at the present time. The hon. member was lamenting the possibility, on account of the delay in distribution of seed, of frost and rust damaging the crops in the fall. Only last Wednesday I passed through the constituency represented by the hon. member, and not only was seeding not possible at that time, but no preparatory work on the land was being done because of the wet condition of the soil. Frost and rust are always to be feared, but these things could not occur because of delayed distribution of seed. There has been considerable snow and cold weather during the last couple of weeks and it has not been possible to do much seeding.

A few days ago a press dispatch stated that not more than five per cent of the wheat land in Saskatchewan had been seeded. That was not due to the fact that no seed had been distributed; it was due to the existence of conditions that prevented farmers doing their seeding. The hon. member said that the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan had said that he was not aware that 35,000 bushels of wheat had been shipped out of northeastern Saskatchewan at a time when it was needed there. I do not think there would be 5,000 bushels of wheat needed by government distribution in northeastern Saskatchewan. The farmers in that part of the country had a fair crop of wheat last year and the most of them have made their arrangements. There was a small area where the farmers had to get wheat locally. During the time I was at home farmers were coming into the municipal office and getting orders for seed. Those orders had to be sanctioned by the rural council. The reeve and the secretary of the municipality were appointed a committee by the council and they were carrying on negotiations with the farmers up to the time limit which had been established for giving out these orders. I met many farmers going into and coming out of the municipal office and not one of them had any complaint to make about any delay. Some might say that the municipality was a little hard on them; that they were not getting enough seed, but most of them were satisfied that they were getting reasonable treatment.

The hon. member said that he heard a complaint on the grain exchange that an amount of $17,000 was still unpaid out of the total assistance voted by this parliament last year. That is small potatoes when we consider the amount voted for the assistance of farmers in Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY: That was just one of many.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There were not very many firms on the grain exchange who sold seed to the government. A tremendous amount of assistance was given and apparently this is the worst case of which the hon. member heard. I do not imagine he would give us the least troublesome case that came before him. He probably knows of the large amounts that were owing to elevator and oil companies when his friends went out of power four years ago. I did not hear his voice raised at that time in complaint about their negligence or lack of business acumen or business efficiency. They left about $17,000,000 of unfunded debts floating around, which has made it more difficult for the people of Canada and of Saskatchewan to assist the farmers in that province.

What the hon. member says about the roads being in desperate condition during the past few days is quite true. However, this condition has been brought about by the large amount of rain and snow that we have had this year. I have no doubt that not a single farmer will disagree with me when I say that the finest thing that could have happened to the country was that this moisture should be present at this time. I am sure the farmers were quite willing to put up with a little discomfort. It would be far worse if the roads to-day were in the condition in which we would expect to find them in July, if there were not sufficient moisture in the ground to germinate the seed that might be planted.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) said that in fairness to the committee certain corrections should be made, but I am going to say that I think the criticisms made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) with regard to the delay in the distribution of seed are justified in part.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In part.

Mr. COLDWELL: In part. I was not going to mention this as the minister was good enough to say yesterday that he would rectify the situation. However, I have received a message from Surbiton in my constituency stating that on April 30 there was no seed and that none was in sight. There were over twenty farmers in that community who were dependent upon this seed grain. So there has been delay. I am not laying the blame at the doorstep of the Minister of Agriculture in this house because I believe it is largely a matter of provincial responsibility. But the criticism is justified to that extent. Moreover, it does jeopardize the early sowing of the crop and jeopardize the reaping of the crop in the fall because of the danger of frost and rust.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): How could it jeopardize early sowing when weather conditions had made the land unfit to seed?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the hon. member will understand that all parts of the province are not in the happy position of having had the large amount of moisture that the districts to which he refers have had.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Rosetown-Biggar has probably had more moisture so far this year than northeastern Saskatchewan.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the hon. member is perhaps to some extent misinformed, because in Rosetown-Biggar we happen to be just a little bit short of moisture this year.

Mr. GARDINER: Around Surbiton.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. As a matter of fact, they could have seeded around Surbiton. But perhaps neither my statement nor that of the hon. member for Melfort is true for the whole province of Saskatchewan. It is with the desire of speeding up the distribution that these matters are being raised in this chamber, because, after all, we guarantee the funds that are being used for this particular purpose. I rose to make these remarks in order that we might have before the committee at this time all the information available.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to answer the hon. member for Melfort. If the seed had been there we would have had it all in the ground in the eastern part of the province before the fine rain and snowstorms which the hon. member has been telling us about came along. Last Sunday we had an excellent rain, and, the Sunday before, snow and rain. The reeve of Indian Head municipality had all his wheat in the ground on one farm of 500 acres on April 22, and a lot of wheat was seeded on my farm on April 23. In the Indian Head and Wolseley districts, had the farmers had the seed, they could have had it in the ground between the 10th and 20th of April. I never saw the land in better condition to receive seed than on the day I arrived home and drove over my farm. I drove down to Whitewood, in which district they were all working on the land, and many of them had seeded on the 12th of April.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the hon. member's farm seeded?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, sir. I told them to get the seed in. That is the only policy—get it in the first day you can in order to derive the benefit of the splendid rains we have had.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not the only policy.

Mr. PERLEY: I say that seventy per cent of the land that will be seeded to wheat could have been seeded before the 25th of April had the seed been available, and I stake my experience in that regard certainly against that of the hon. member for Melfort.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On the 10th or 11th of April, in passing through the territory represented by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I saw not a sign of any work having been done on the land anywhere in the Qu'Appelle or Wolseley district. I bow to my hon. friend's superior knowledge of some phases of farming but not in my desire to present a true picture to the committee. I would say that it is not yet too late to sow seed. In the next thirty days plenty of seed will be sown in Saskatchewan if other conditions are satisfactory and likely to produce good crops.

Mr. PERLEY: Why were the farmers not on the land?

Mr. GARDINER: Because it was not fit to go on.

Mr. PERLEY: Because they had not any feed to feed their horses. Fifty per cent of the farmers in the district I speak of had not enough feed to give their horses two good feeds of hay; the horses were not in a condition to go on the land until they did get feed and fodder, and in that district it was not released until about the 15th of April.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Not even on the gravelled highways were many cars running on that day, and it was a very fine day.

An hon. MEMBER: Hire a hall.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The people who sent me here have paid their share of this hall for me to speak in, but I really think my hon. friend's remarks were addressed to his colleague behind him (Mr. Perley).

Mr. PERLEY: I have not taken up as much time as you have.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member has taken up three times as much of the time of the house as I have, and he has used up a good deal of paper in putting partisan complaints on the record, which I think everyone will admit is something of which I have not been guilty. But when, even in fine weather, cars cannot run on the highways because of too much moisture, it is certain that implements cannot work satisfactorily on the land.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member for Melfort is going from the particular to the general. He cannot say that seeding has been delayed in Saskatchewan generally because of weather conditions. From the 11th to the 23rd of April I travelled by car through the southern part of the province from Moosomin to Swift Current, and the horses were not in fit condition. That is why they were not on the land.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What about tractors?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But even if we assume that snow and rain had kept the farmers off the land, the seed should be available so that the moment they can get on the land they can put the seed in. I went through most of the constituency of the minister, through Wood Mountain and Swift Current districts, and not more than half a dozen towns had the seed in the town ready for distribution. In the other towns the seed was not there.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you have seed in Swift Current?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, but it had not been released.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Perhaps the horses had not been able to go for the seed because they were so thin.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member for Melfort says that orders for seed had been given. They had been given for a month in my constituency, but there is not any seed. You must have seed; you cannot sow the orders.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In the district of which I spoke there was plenty of seed for which orders had been given out.

The CHAIRMAN: I think this discussion is taking in too wide an area. It is concerned with local conditions in regard to seeding, and while considerable latitude has been allowed, as I think it should be, I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the bill and not to continue to discuss local conditions in regard to seeding.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am quite agreeable, Mr. Chairman, but I think the minister might make a statement.

Mr. HARRIS: Now that we have the bread-basket of the world, our west, all seeded down and the grass has become green and the horses are out to pasture, another recommendation might be that we send out to pasture all those who are taking up so much time in this house on the problem out west, which I understand has already been more or less solved, so that some of us who have a real problem which is not merely local may have an opportunity to say a word or two.

I am a little concerned whether section 4 is wide enough to include the problem which I should like to discuss in two or three short sentences, namely, the problem facing all municipalities due to the dearth of employment in the construction industries. If there is to be an expenditure of money under this bill, I hope the minister will see to it that the construction industry is stimulated in order that all the other industries which are part and parcel of it may also be stimulated as a result of the passage of this measure and the voting of the necessary moneys later.

I have in mind one or two distinct problems which I should like to place on record, and in doing so I wish to make this reservation. In the consideration of these particular problems —and they concern Toronto more especially— the government should be very careful to see that whatever is done does not too greatly involve the taxpayers of Toronto who are at present overtaxed, particularly those who are unfortunate enough to own real estate. Let me state the points I wish to bring up.

First, we have a real problem with regard to our sewage. There are many millions of gallons of raw sewage going into lake Ontario within two miles of the water supply of Toronto, the sewage going out at Morley avenue and the city water supply coming in at Victoria Park avenue, a distance of less than two miles. Hon. members who have had the privilege of being in municipal life know something of the sewage problem, and they must be well aware of the gravity of the situation when a statement is made in this chamber that a very considerable portion of the sewage from 750,000 people is finding its way into a body of water from which is drawn the water supply of a city. The municipality of Toronto realizes the difficulty and the danger, and so does the provincial government; the danger from this particular condition is recognized on all sides. The municipal government have charged their department of health with the responsibility of seeing to it that the water supply is chlorinated. Some days, depending upon the wind, it is chlorinated to such an extent that the water itself is not palatable; indeed, it is scarcely potable. They are ready to go on with a work which will bring relief to the situation, but they have not the money. It is work of a kind which, I think the minister will agree with me, would absorb a great deal of unskilled labour. The cost of the original plan was $25,000,000, but that was revised and brought down to $20,000,000. A study of the plan has been going on for five years. They can give relief for the next ten or twenty years without undertaking the $25,000,000 plan, which is a fifty year undertaking. They can give relief for the next ten years by an expenditure of some $13,000,000. I expect that in due course the representatives of Toronto, who discussed the matter with the provincial representatives on Saturday last, will be making representations through the province to the dominion, in the hope that they can come within the confines of Bill No. 105 in this particular regard. I merely put these few observations on record for the minister's consideration, and I hope he will see his way clear, when he makes his reply, to say a word or two in regard to a problem of this kind. There would be considerable construction work.

I come now to the second point I had in mind, namely, the possibilities of absorbing labour in the construction industry. The city hall in Toronto was built some forty years ago. I am not one that wants to see too much government, too many city hall employees, too many provincial government employees. As some of the older members will recall, some fifteen years ago I rose in my place in the back benches and suggested to the Prime Minister that even this chamber should be reduced to one hundred members and that each one of us at that time should represent 100,000 constituents, each one of us going to work and doing a job instead of half loafing as now. I am still of that opinion, and it applies not only here but right down the line, as far as the municipality of Toronto is concerned. However, I approach this problem of a new city hall for Toronto from another angle. The building is more than thirty years old and it is not safe. I say to the mayor, the board of control, and the people of Toronto that in my opinion the present city hall, from the standpoint of fire hazard, is not a safe place in which to house employees. I know this is a local problem; I inject it into the discussion with your permission, Mr. Chairman, in order to approach the general problem, and I suggest that the city of Toronto, in taking some action to give its employees a safe building in which to do their work might be assisted under the provisions of this bill. In the building there are wide corridors; it is not fireproof, and there are great open stairways. Any hon. members who have been in the building will agree with me when I say that if a fire ever started there we would have to have a new city hall. The employees are housed in the attic. There is a sprinkler system there, but no sprinkler system down below, and I do not know how the employees would get forty or fifty feet to the ground level if anything happened. I cite this as affording an opportunity of spending to advantage $5,000,000. It would assist the construction industry.

The third point I wish to mention is this. We have in the city of Toronto a home for incurables. I do not think there is anything that touches our civilization so much as for people to know that for friends of theirs who are only incurables, but also indigent, no place can be found. At present there are 380 on the waiting list for admission to the home for incurables. The institution must be extended. As I stand here I am thinking of certain indigents in my riding. I know of one couple, both of whom are seventy-four. They live in East Toronto. I have known them for forty years. The lady is mentally unbalanced but not dangerous. The husband is paralyzed on one side from the hip down, but is able to drag himself around. The daughter is a good, Christian girl who some ten or fifteen years ago was struck by infantile paralysis but who drags around through that home and manages to look after the parents. I visited them last Sunday; I was in the little, wee parlour about eight by eight, and the wife was in the dining room holding the door against me, owing to her mental condition. We citizens there have to provide for that and other families because we cannot get them into the Home for Incurables. If a request should come to the minister by way of the province for aid in building an extension to that institution, there is another opportunity of spending some money, not in the backwoods but right in a centre, where it is necessary, at the same time giving considerable work to the great construction industry which we all admit is in need, perhaps to a greater degree than any other.

Let us consider our hospitals. Some say the hospitals have empty beds. I had a canvass made in Toronto a week ago Saturday; there were not enough empty beds available in Toronto at that time. One hospital in the eastern part of the city had a waiting list of eighty-three. On Sunday five people were injured on Dawes road and taken to that hospital; there were only two emergency beds available, and the other three people had to be transported across the city some fifteen miles, two others being put in the Women's College Hospital and another having to be taken to St. Joseph's on the western edge of the city. On the same night two others were injured in accidents, one with a fractured hip and the other with a fractured skull, and no bed accommodation was available. The emergency department, in a room some sixteen feet square, is trying to handle emergency cases which come from a surrounding population of about 150,000 people. The men charged with the responsibility of the institution to which I refer are ready and willing to go out and raise from their friends and the people of the district at least one-third of the cost of an extension. A project of that kind, giving service to the community, might quite properly be the subject of a request to the minister. This would be a work in the general interest of Canada, as the bill 105 reads here. Inasmuch as the labour cost in the construction of the half million dollar building planned would be a large proportion of that sum, money might well be voted under this bill, provided the project had the approval of the municipality and the province. In order that it may be on record, the project I refer to is the Toronto East General hospital, presently housing 160 patients; although it was built to accommodate 110, it has many more in it than it should have. Whether or not we are able to get any assistance by way of this measure, a body of men and women of the district east of the Don river are going to raise that money and put the enlargement through. Twelve years ago, starting without a dollar, they gathered together $800,000 in assets and have kept the institution out of debt. In 1932, they found themselves operating that institution with some seventy undergraduate nurses housed here, there and yonder in the district, and out of control. Recognizing their responsibility, notwithstanding the difficult times, they built a nurses' home at a cost of $110,000 and properly housed these young students. In like manner, realizing the problem facing them now, the same body of something over 100,000 people are going to see that this half million dollar extension is put through. I put this on record so that the minister can give consideration to such a work.

I come now to the next problem which faces us. I preface my remarks by expressing appreciation to this chamber for the assistance given with regard to the elimination of the Victoria Park avenue level crossing. You will soon have before you the Jones avenue level crossing, in the riding represented by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). It was my privilege to represent that riding in this house in 1922; I know it very well, and I expect the minister will be receiving representations with regard to the necessity of eliminating that very dangerous level crossing on the main line of the Canadian National Railways right down in a thickly populated section of Toronto.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Orders and regulations.

Mr. HAYHURST: As I have listened to the discussion on this bill it has brought one fact to my mind, that the people of Canada are sometimes unable to get the information necessary to carry out the projects which they desire to carry out. Suppose we take the Department of Agriculture; we know that they issue many publications of vital importance to agriculture, but many farmers are unable to get these publications, or do not know what publications are available. Therefore it seems to me that some system of indexing or documentation should be carried out. This could be done by the Department of Labour. It would apply to the indexing of all knowledge and books, so that people all over Canada could get the books they desire. It is said that we live on an ascending scale if we live happily. We know that some countries, like Great Britain, are using an indexing system for books. This should mean the employment of a few people who would index not only the knowledge of certain departments of this government, but all knowledge, whether it be scientific or otherwise. This work should be properly done in collaboration with the indexing system of books of other countries such as the United States and Great Britain, so that people could get the books they require.

The other day one member of this house said it was the blundering of man that caused this unemployment situation. I would suggest that it was not the blundering but rather the progress of man. If we are to face new problems as they arise we need new solutions, and in facing these new problems we should bring the discoveries and inventions of recent years to the knowledge of the people. We all know there is something wrong in the situation that exists to-day. Most of us think that probably the trouble is in the distribution of wealth, but in this case it is in the distribution of knowledge. If a person can afford a radio or a car surely he can afford an adequate summary of human thought and knowledge. We should make good knowledge cheap and easy to obtain, and we should know where to find it. What is the use of being educated to read if we do not know what to read? So I am pleading with the Minister of Labour that some index or documentation be brought about so that a bibliography of the works dealing with the knowledge of the world of to-day may be properly compiled and made available to everyone, just as railway time tables are available to the public. In that way knowledge may be spread over the earth more readily than is the case to-day. It really means nothing more or less than indexing all that has been written in the world, with Canada contributing its part, so that one could quickly and easily learn what has been done and by whom.

This, of course, applies to all branches of learning. If we are to proceed and make progress; if, as Stevenson says, we live in an ascending scale if we live happily, then with modern civilization advancing as it is it seems to me that records of this sort should be prepared. Many of our intellectual people in Canada to-day are looking for jobs. You would almost think the poor labourer on the street was the only one who could not get the wherewithal to live, but many of our most intelligent people are wondering where they can get food, clothing and shelter. Yet we need documentation and a proper bibliography of our knowledge. So, Mr. Chairman, I offer this suggestion to the Minister of Labour who, as a professor of economics in ordinary life, should know something about this matter. Out on the prairies books are available on various subjects, but we do not know what books adequately deal with these subjects. Suppose you are a horticulturist. Do you know what books are published in the world to-day on that subject? Probably you do not. If you had access to those books you might become an excellent horticulturist. The knowledge may be available, but no one knows where it is. If you want to travel to Toronto you can pick up a time table and immediately obtain all the information as to the trains, and it seems to me that information with regard to the knowledge, investigation, invention and progress that is going on in the world to-day should be made as readily available to the citizens of this and other countries so that they might know where they can lay their hands upon books which would help them cope with their own problems.

At the present time I have on the order paper, as you know, a resolution dealing with books and the spreading of knowledge, but this idea has come to me from various sources. Men who have been broadcasting in England and Canada have suggested that though the English speaking world numbers some three hundred million people, only about a million ever read books of any kind. There are millions more who are interested in various subjects and who would read books if they knew what books to get. I believe if we are to expand our civilization or if we are to live in an expanding civilization these books should be made available. Then books would be printed more cheaply because of the demand for them, and employment would develop. Civilization has not grown, and unemployment problems have not been solved, without new ideas. When the motor car industry was in process of development in the United States, for instance, there was a tremendous influx of people into the cities, creating new problems which had to be solved. I believe that in the English speaking world, of which Canada is part, there is altogether too much reading of trash, of rubbish. If knowledge were made more easily available, through a proper documentation of the worth while books, more people would read these books; they would become better citizens, and democracy would survive.

That is my reason for offering this suggestion to the Minister of Labour. I do not know whether it is of very great value, but I feel that something has to be done in order to preserve democracy and save mankind.

Mr. COLDWELL: This section has to do with regulations approved by the government in regard to the alleviation of unemployment relief. I have before me a telegram concerning a matter about which I have no personal knowledge, but I would ask the minister to look into it because it deals directly with regulations. The telegram states that in order to break a strike the city of Calgary is imposing a penalty of $3 per week per family, which means the withholding of dominion and provincial grants. This telegram is signed by E. C. Hopper of the central council of the unemployed. Since we are dealing with legislation for the alleviation of unemployment, if steps of this kind are taken to discipline, shall I say, the unemployed, thereby penalizing their families, I think it is a suitable matter for the department to look into. Therefore I am taking this opportunity of bringing it to the attention of the minister, in the belief that he will investigate and see whether or not this charge is justified. I may say that I do not know anything of the circumstances.

Mr. GREEN: The reports of the Department of Labour and of the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief show that the federal government has been helping in the construction of the trans-Canada highway in every province of Canada. I wonder if the minister could give us an idea as to what progress has been made; how many miles remain to be completed and when the highway will be finished.

Mr. ROGERS: I wonder if my hon. friend will be willing to wait for that information until the supplementary estimates are before the house. I do not have it before me at the present time and I am quite certain that it would have to be secured from the provincial governments in order to bring it up to date. As I recall it this information was brought up to date about a year ago; as my hon. friend realizes we have contributed to the provinces for the construction of certain sections of the trans-Canada highway, but we do not have that highway constantly under view and are not always aware of just what stage of completion it has reached at a given time.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will obtain that information for us?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall make a point of having that information available if possible when the supplementary estimates are before the house.

Mr. GREEN: Then has the minister any information as to the trends of transiency in Canada, both for families and for single men? I understood information of that type was being secured by the national employment commission and also by the Department of Labour.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to make a note of that question also. I have not the information available at the moment.

Mr. CHURCH: I want to ask the minister a question with respect to section 7. Last year in returns to orders of the house I noticed a list of works undertaken in the various provinces, authority for which was given by the governor in council. Sir Robert Borden used to describe the governor in council as a political body. In my opinion there is altogether too much regulation by that body. In every bill brought down we find authority given to the governor in council. I suggest that the minister should himself take the responsibility for making these rules and regulations. That used to be done.

An applicant asks for relief. He may have to go to a provincial authority, and then he is referred to municipal authority or the federal authority, and goes round in a circle. For example, an application for relief was made by a widow in Sudbury. For the last three weeks, the press say, she has been unable to get relief and cannot get a loaf of bread. Outside the city of Toronto there are similar cases of the difficulty of municipalities getting proper aid. In my opinion the governor in council is a political body, and the minister should himself handle these proposals. Why should this parliament hand over its power to some political body known as the governor in council? The most important part of the work of parliament is done in that way. This is what Lord Hewart refers to in his book, The New Despotism. We are simply taking control from the hands of the committee of supply and giving all control to an outside body; we have no check over these expenditures.

To-day I received four or five letters from Long Branch with respect to relief, along the same lines as the complaints my leader referred to. More workmen could not be taken on because of some local rules with respect to membership in some political organization before relief work demolishing a camp there can be got. I do not say the minister has anything to do with that; in fact I think he has not. But there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the cumbersome procedure to be followed under the measure, right down to section 7.

As I pointed out the other day there are no orders in council in the United States. One man, Mr. Hopkins, draws up his standard plan, and through that plan he has distributed to the 15,000,000 on relief and spent 8 billion dollars. There is no doubt the present measure will pass. If as I suggested the other day the minister had power to make agreements with the larger municipalities where there are emergencies the condition would be far better. It would rid him of all this political work, if there is any.

Section 7 states:

> The governor in council may make all such orders and regulations as may be deemed necessary or desirable to carry out the purposes and intentions of this act.

The last list of returns brought down in the house showed many public works which were not at all necessary. Some of them—roads—were up near Hudson bay, where there is very little need of them.

I should like to learn from the minister if the section is broad enough to give him power to deal with an emergent case in a municipality, or will he continue the old policy of referring those cases to the provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe the question put by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is summed up in his closing observations. As a matter of fact the dominion government from the beginning has never dealt with individual applications of municipalities for relief. Obviously those applications must be dealt with by provincial governments. In saying that I am in no way suggesting that the dominion government should evade its proper responsibility. In connection with the administration of relief, municipalities deal directly with the provincial governments. The federal authority gives grants in aid to the provinces to assist them and the municipalities in connection with the administration of relief.

Recommendations with respect to the regulations which may be issued under section 7 would be made on the authority of the minister. But in order to give them the requisite authority under the proposed legislation, they would be dealt with by the governor in council. Although some exception may be taken to the governor in council functioning in that regard, I believe that procedure is clearly preferable to leaving the matter of regulations entirely in the hands of a minister who, at some time, might be tempted to act in an arbitrary way.

Mr. DONNELLY: As I understand the situation, the care of those needing relief is entirely a municipal matter, and has been looked upon as such by the present government and the preceding one. When relief burdens become so great that the municipality cannot look after them, those burdens are referred to the province. When the province is unable to look after them, then I understand application is made to the federal government which, in turn, gives relief or grants in aid, as has been done in the past number of years.

Last year many municipalities, unable to look after those who needed relief, applied to provincial governments, and practically all the provincial governments applied to the federal government for help. The federal government in turn gave grants in aid in order that those who needed relief might be cared for. At the end of the year we find that after giving grants in aid this government has a deficit of something like $70,000,000, while on the other hand Ontario has a surplus of $6,000,000. I wonder on what grounds Ontario can come to this government and ask for grants in aid when it has a surplus of that amount. Surely if a surplus is declared they are able to look after their own needy, without applying for help or assistance from the federal authorities. I want to know on what authority or why the government finds it necessary to give Ontario grants in aid, or why Ontario thought it was necessary to ask for that assistance, in the face of a surplus of $6,000,000 in the province, and a deficit of $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 in the dominion.

The difficulty in western Canada in connection with relief is the difference between the schedules for city and country relief recipients. The city schedule is out of all proportion larger than the schedule for the people in the country. The result is that many people living on farms are desirous of leaving the farms and going to the cities. Some of them have sold their machinery and their horses to get money to go to the city. They look after themselves for a year and in that time qualify for relief. After going on relief some of them never come off. I know men in my own constituency who have sold their horses, their machinery, their household effects and everything they could get hold of to get enough money to move to the city and live there for a year so as to qualify for relief. Some of them have been living in the cities for the past five or six years and have not done a tap of work.

If that condition is permitted to continue, the people will keep on leaving the country; they will be driven from their farms to the cities. I have looked through the report of the employment commission. I have been endeavouring to find some information which would show what the men on relief in the cities were earning for the period of five or six years before they went on relief. That is important information with respect to a man drawing relief in a city or anywhere else; we should know what his income has been for the previous five years. I am told that many of the people in the cities who are now getting $70, $80 or $90 a month never earned more than $50 or $60 when they were earning their own living. If we had information as to what these people had earned for the four or five years before they went on relief, it would give us some measure of the extent of the relief which should be given. I should like to ask the minister if he has any information or if anyone has collected any information bearing upon this phase of the subject.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know at the moment of any information that is available for the country as a whole, although there may be some municipalities that could provide it. If so, I shall be glad to obtain it and make it available when the supplementary estimates are under discussion. As to the relief scales in Saskatchewan and other provinces and the disparity between relief paid in the cities and in the country, that is wholly a matter of provincial administration. From this distance we could not suitably control a matter of that kind. We could not lay down relief scales to apply in the many municipalities of Saskatchewan.

Mr. STEWART: Is not the explanation to be found in the fact that relief includes fuel, shelter, food and clothing?

Mr. ROGERS: Undoubtedly that would be an important factor.

Mr. STEWART: In most cases the man in the country would have his fuel.

Mr. DONNELLY: The man in Saskatchewan has to buy his coal just the same as the man in the city.

Mr. STEWART: Many of them have wood lots.

Mr. DONNELLY: There are no wood lots in our district.

Mr. STEWART: Perhaps not, and perhaps not much of anything else. But he would likely have his shelter, he would not have to rent a house. He would also have some of his food.

Mr. DONNELLY: Where would he get his food?

Mr. STEWART: He would probably produce some of it.

Mr. DONNELLY: There has not been any produced.

Mr. STEWART: Not in the dried out area, but on the average farm a man would produce some of his food.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am talking of conditions in my district.

Mr. STEWART: I think the explanation would be found in the basis of relief and the different conditions that prevail.

Mr. DONNELLY: Could the minister give us any information as to the basis upon which the grant in aid is made to Ontario?

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. ROGERS: The grants in aid to all the provinces have been affected by two factors, the extent of unemployment and the financial position of the province concerned. No mathematical formula has been worked out which could be applied to the conditions in the various provinces in order to determine just how grants in aid should be allocated among the various provinces. Broadly speaking, those are the two factors that have determined what has been paid by the dominion government to the provinces.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Appointment of officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. STIRLING: I notice that under this section the minister keeps in his own hands the appointment of officers, clerks and employees. The civil service commission does not come into the picture at all. In connection with the appointments that the minister will make, can he assure the committee that there will be no reference to the principle that to the victor belongs the spoils? I am referring particularly to the remarks of the Prime Minister the other day when he said:

> I would say that the government would deplore moneys appropriated by parliament being used, directly or indirectly, for political partisan purposes, no matter for what purpose they have been appropriated.

Could the minister tell us how these officers, clerks and employees will be selected, and if it will be necessary for them to have their names on particular lists? As he is not using the civil service commission, from what source will he get the names? Perhaps the minister would consider also the remarks made yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) with regard to the increased cost of administration.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be very glad to deal with both these points. The staff of the unemployment relief branch of the Department of Labour has been beyond the scope of the Civil Service Act from the beginning. It was so arranged by the administration of which my hon. friend was a member and it has been continued on the same basis. Although that staff has always been a temporary staff, there have been no dismissals of any kind from the staff in Ottawa since the present administration came into office. There have been certain changes made in the outside staffs, referring particularly to the inspectors in the various provinces. There have not been many additions to the staff, but it has always been my desire to secure the best man available to do the work in view. I shall not suggest for one moment that all the positions have gone to those who were opposed to the present administration, but I will say that that has not been the determining consideration in every case. As a matter of fact, I have had a long list of applicants for any vacancy that might occur in the unemployment relief branch and a considerable number of these vacancies have been filled with those who were previously unemployed.

The hon. member referred to the statement made yesterday by the leader of the opposition as to the increased cost of administration of the unemployment relief branch. The statement made by the leader of the opposition was substantially correct, but the inferences he drew were substantially incorrect. I would point out that for the last year for which the previous administration was responsible, namely, the fiscal year ended March 31, 1936, the total cost of the branch was $140,067.67. Next year it rose moderately to $179,031.80 and the next year it had increased to $225,488.43. The increased expenditure was due to the fact that services which had been rendered formerly by other departments of government, or which had not been rendered at all, were carried out by the unemployment relief branch of the Department of Labour.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister indicate what services?

Mr. ROGERS: There is one service in particular with which my hon. friend is familiar. The relief camps were previously under the Department of National Defence and, as my hon. friend knows, the administration cost of those camps was very high. I think it would be useful to have the administrative costs placed on Hansard. They are as follows:

1932	$ 25,031 18
1933	509,179 04
1934	726,844 54
1935	988,394 18

Mr. STIRLING: What would that include?

Mr. ROGERS: That is the cost of the administrative staff. Those figures were obtained from the adjutant general's office of the Department of National Defence. I think the statement has been made before that the administrative costs reached a figure of about $80,000 a month. I am not suggesting, at this time at any rate, that that figure was in excess of what was reasonable, having regard to the particular organization of the camps, but I do say that if the leader of the opposition refers to the increased costs in connection with relief he should make due allowance for the fact that a portion of the expense has been taken from the Department of National Defence and placed under the Department of Labour. In other words, our organization to deal with farm placement and forest conservation plans in connection with transients and single homeless men is an additional expense on the unemployment relief branch.

Mr. STIRLING: If I may interrupt, surely no part of that item goes into the figure for 1937 where the biggest increase was.

Mr. ROGERS: I am coming to that. I am dealing with the points one by one.

Then there is the youth training branch. We have set up what I regard as an extremely economical branch to deal with training projects for unemployed young people, but that again has involved some addition to the expenditures of the branch.

Then finally we have increased the number of inspectors in the different provinces owing to the fact that the work done under joint works programs has covered a wider field than previously. I am sure that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) will appreciate the fact that under the late administration the bulk of the work was concentrated on the trans-Canada highway. We later changed that policy in order that the work should be done so far as possible near the centres of population where unemployment was most severe. There were more projects undertaken, in other words, in a greater number of places, and that required a larger inspectional staff.

These are the items which account almost wholly for the additional expenditure of the unemployment relief branch, and when that increase in the expenditures of this branch is compared with the elimination of the administrative costs of the relief camps, amounting to some $900,000 in 1936, it will be appreciated, I think, that the work of the Department of Labour with respect to unemployment and relief is being done in a very economical way.

Mr. STIRLING: It would appear to me to make the increase more glaring if in 1937 there is no expenditure for relief camps included.

Mr. ROGERS: In the figures I have given there is no expenditure for relief camps, but our substitute plan for dealing with single homeless men and transients under the farm placement plan and the special forestry conservation work in particular has necessitated a small staff being attached to the Department of Labour to deal with that aspect of the unemployment problem.

Mr. STIRLING: What has been the total cost of the national employment commission?

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend will find this information in the report itself. I think it is in the neighbourhood of $300,000, including the registration.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire at all to delay the passage of this section of the bill and I shall be brief, but I do not know that the few remarks I wish to make could be more appropriately made in connection with any other section of the bill. The suggestion I am going to make has to do with the home improvement legislation, which is one of the acts that was dealt with by the national employment commission in its report. It is not necessary for me to go into facts and figures in that regard, but I may say that I had the opportunity of considering the extension which was recently made to the United States act to include loans up to $2,500 for the purpose of building new homes. Has the minister given any consideration to that?

Largely responsible for the success of our home improvement plan has been the voluntary work of many committees in various municipalities in Canada. Those committees, while they have not actually dissolved, have necessarily ceased to function as a result of the dissolution of the national employment commission. In connection with the staff contemplated under section 10, would it be possible to establish some department, not an official department of the government, which might as a permanent proposition encourage and extend the use of the home improvement plan? I suggest that for the consideration of the minister.

Mr. ROGERS: As my hon. friend is aware, the administration of the home improvement plan is with the Department of Finance, and I believe that consideration is being given by officials of that department to the suggestion which he has just made.

Mr. McLARTY: I am not at all critical of the consideration that is now being given to the matter, but may I suggest that the effort should be rather to promote and stimulate the use of the plan than merely to give information to those interested enough to ask for it.

Sections 11 and 12 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. ROGERS: I should like to refer very briefly to a matter that was raised before adjournment last night by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I had hoped to make this statement in his presence, but at the same time I feel that it should be made without delay. At page 2527 of Hansard the leader of the opposition is reported as follows —and the reference is to the work that was done in the restoration of Fort Henry, and his statement that the contractor for that work, the Frid Construction Company, had for one of its associates the president of the Liberal association of Kingston. The statement of the leader of the opposition is as follows:

> It is all very well for the minister to say that he asked the provincial government that there should be no discrimination. But the contractor, the Frid Construction Company if I remember aright, had as one of its officers, according to the letterhead I have, the president of the Kingston Liberal association.

I have made the necessary inquiry and am able to say to the committee that there is no basis whatever for the statement made by the leader of the opposition. The president of the Kingston Liberal association has no connection whatsoever with the Frid Construction Company. That applies equally, I am informed, to any other member of the executive of the Kingston Liberal association. I felt that I ought to deal with that question at once, in order that there might be no misunderstanding whatsoever.

Mr. STEWART: Just to clear the matter up, is the minister referring to the present president of the Liberal association or does he mean president at any time?

Mr. ROGERS: Or his predecessor; I know that. I did not feel it necessary to go further back because the leader of the opposition referred specially to the president who now holds office. In any event the statement is absolutely without foundation.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Departmental administration, $112,655.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the increase for? There is an increase of $15,234.75 as shown in the statement, and on page 54 the details are given with regard to the different expenditures. It is shown there that the increase is the amount set out in the item under discussion.

Mr. BARBER: Is this due to the reorganization of the department? The minister might give us some details with regard to the set-up.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): It is due in part to reorganization. The number employed this year is twenty-five as compared with twenty-three last year, or an increase of two. There are also the ordinary statutory increases which take place from year to year; they account largely for the increase. The reorganization of the department can be best described by taking the estimates as they have been prepared and reversing the order of them. In the estimates themselves marketing services come first, production services next, then experimental farms and science services. The basis of the reorganization is largely this. In our opinion the logical way in which to consider the activities of the department is to take research work as the beginning; experimental work as the next; promotion of production as the third activity, and marketing as the fourth. We believe that the activities of the department proceed logically along that line, and the department has been reorganized on that basis. We have placed in charge of the science services a director of science services; in charge of experimental farms a director of experimental farms; in charge of production a director of production services; and in charge of marketing services a director of marketing. These four report directly to the minister or to the deputy minister, and all branches of the department are organized under one or another of these four heads. That, generally speaking, is the reorganization of the department

Item agreed to.

Publicity and extension division, $133,620.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister elaborate this other question? There is a small increase and I notice that under the publicity and extension division the estimate for supplies and materials is $41,000.

Mr. GARDINER: The publicity and extension division of the administration branch undertakes the responsibility of servicing the whole department. The work is divided into administration, editorial, exhibits, press and publicity, and lantern slide services. These are the different services given in connection with publicity work. Under administration and editorial is included general administration of the division, editing and proofreading of publications, distribution of publications, duplicating, mailing lists, assembling and mailing of duplicated material, including market reports, and directing postal and express services for all departmental offices located in the confederation building, which is the main office in Ottawa. The statistics covering 1936-37 indicate in round figures that 83,000 personal requests were received for publications; 1,036,000 publications were mailed on written request; 353,739 publications were mailed in bulk; 1,542,410 copies of marketing reports were mailed on request—that is, reports which go out daily with regard to prices; 149,120 copies of press notices; 74,560 clip sheets; 173,480 farm notes; 7,903,075 copies of miscellaneous articles; 9,148 stencils cut for mimeographing; 6,140,847 copies printed from mimeograph stencils; 657 multigraph jobs; 2,564,271 copies printed on multigraph; 1,904,194 envelopes addressed. These are the activities in connection with publicity work. During the year one hundred new publications were revised and proofread, consisting of twenty-nine farmers' bulletins, eleven household bulletins, five technical bulletins, twenty-three circulars, thirty-four reports, acts, orders and regulations. That covers largely the publicity work. There were exhibits carried on, press publicity, lantern slide services, and general publications sent out in response to personal requests, which increased 21·6 per cent.

Mr. STIRLING: An admirable film was shown in British Columbia last winter in connection with the annual meetings of the fruit growers associations. It shows what happens to the apple in England, the production of apples in England, and so on. I do not know whether that came under the minister's jurisdiction. Perhaps it was under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. GARDINER: It may have been.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has referred to such films, and I suppose they are informative. Can he tell us the range of subjects covered and how they are made available to the public? Is it possible to borrow or hire them for use in various parts of Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure that I can give detailed information with regard to the different films available, but the information I have is to the effect that sets of lantern slides are supplied on request for use at agricultural meetings and short courses and in high schools and horticultural societies. Last year 308 sets were lent, and at the meetings where they were shown the attendance was 39,000. Requests for these films are received from all provinces. They are available for exhibition in the different parts of Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Free for the use of the public?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I think they are exhibited free. I do not think there is any charge.

Mr. STIRLING: But are they sent out to western Canada express paid?

Mr. GARDINER: That is my impression.

Mr. STIRLING: And the user undertakes to return them.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to find out something about this publicity campaign. It seems to me that since the present minister took control of this department there has been a large increase in publicity for agriculture. Every little new improvement is spread on bill-boards, films, photographs and advertisements in the papers. There must be some overlapping with the provinces. When you look at the details of this item on page 54, with an increase of $7,000, you see that there is nothing less than a standing army in the department. There is a director, an assistant director, a chief of the administration and editorial division, a chief of the exhibits division, an assistant chief and a publicity assistant, an exhibits decorator, clerks, stenographers, office appliance operators, and so on. This overlapping in departments was referred to the other day, where the dominion and the provinces have concurrent jurisdiction, by witnesses before the Rowell commission. There is considerable overlapping between the extension and publicity work done by the federal department and the provinces; I have seen it myself at the Winter fair, and many summer fairs as well.

This department is costing a very large sum, ten times the amount spent on the health of the community. Next summer and fall we are likely to have another poliomyelitis epidemic, and nothing done about it by this parliament, but we sit here and vote increases for the Department of Agriculture and health of animals, spending some $3,500,000, and about $400,000 for health of humans All the improvements I can see seem to have been largely done in England in this publicity and extension campaign. The minister went over there and got a good deal of publicity in the papers; he was going to show the farmers of England how to farm, and to sell our produce. Almost every minister we have in this department immediately gets a small standing army of officials around him. No wonder the estimates go up. If we want to vote increased money, let us vote it for public health and let this other stand until the Rowell commission makes its report.

I can tell the minister that there is as much suffering among the farmers of Ontario as in his own province of Saskatchewan. Ontario seems to get very little of this publicity and extension work; it is largely devoted to the other provinces. I ask for some equality of treatment. Last session the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) complained about lack of equality of treatment of all provinces in regard to the expenditures of this department. The Minister of Finance desires to cut down controllable expenditures; but if we are going to increase all these votes for this department, how can the tax rate be brought down? Is there no other province than Saskatchewan where the farmers are suffering? They are suffering all over the country; so are the industrial workers. There is no publicity department to tell us about the poor industrial worker driven out of his home or how he suffers without any aid at all. I am always glad to vote assistance to the agricultural people, but the details given on page 54 show that instead of some retrenchment in these expenditures this publicity expense is growing.

Every year in almost every mail the members get heaps of literature regarding live stock and other matters. I fail to see any coordination with the provincial departments. I think this increase should be struck out, and the department given the same amount as last year. The time is coming when we shall have to change the method of considering these estimates. there should be an estimates committee to meet with departmental officials, as under the municipal system, and where there is an increase in the vote the department heads should be there to justify it. I would not mind this increase if times were good; but having seen the line-up of people the other day who had to pay income tax, and could ill afford to do so, I protest against this increase in this item.

Mr. McIVOR: I wish to say that the Minister of Agriculture has been doing something. In my constituency, at the request of the chamber of commerce, a service club and a young farmers' club, we have had an experimental substation established. Also in our district we have been trying for years to get a test of our cattle for tuberculosis. This test was put through this year, with splendid success. These are two things I know of that have been a splendid success for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to have an understanding with the minister. He has opened up the estimates rather suddenly; I do not think the committee was really prepared for it; there are very few hon. members around. When the supplementary estimates with respect to relief in Saskatchewan were passed before the end of the fiscal year, an understanding was given that when we came to the minister's main estimates opportunity would be afforded for discussing the whole administration of relief in that province. If the minister will state under what item that may be taken up on another day, I am quite prepared to allow this item to pass. In reply to something I said earlier this afternoon the minister stated that the legislation providing for feed, seed and fodder went through this house and these matters were all discussed during the debate on that bill. I hope he did not think that was conclusive. I think we should have a statement from him now on what item we shall have an opportunity to discuss this matter at some other sitting.

Mr. GARDINER: The proper place to discuss it will be on the supplementaries, when money is being provided for that purpose. I did not intend to infer this afternoon that there could not properly be further discussion of the question of seed. The proper place to discuss feed and fodder and relief matters of that kind is when the items for that purpose are going through. This will come in the supplementary estimates, not the general estimates; there is nothing in these estimates which has anything to do with relief.

Mr. BROOKS: In connection with this item I would understand from the minister's remarks that a great many publications are sent out. I should like to ask how these lists are made up throughout Canada; whether these publications are distributed generally in all the provinces; what revisions are made, and at what periods.

Mr. GARDINER: The figures I gave a few moments ago indicate fairly well the way in which the lists are made up. I might just give an illustration again, and what I said a moment ago will be found in Hansard tomorrow. There were 83,182 personal requests received for publications. That list will contain the names of individuals scattered from one end of Canada to the other. There were 1,036,398 publications mailed on personal request and 353,739 publications mailed in bulk. Those would be to organizations of one kind or another. We have on our mailing lists members of parliament and senators, for example; members of provincial legislatures, agricultural organizations of one kind and another, from one end of the country to the other. You can enlarge upon a list of that kind and pretty well make up the mailing list of the department.

Mr. BROOKS: The point I wished to make was this: In connection with dairying, for example, has the department a list of the dairy farmers in this section and a list of the potato growers in another section, and so on? Does the department send out this literature on these particular branches of agriculture to these various sections? I want to know whether there is a list in the department or whether they wait for personal requests.

Mr. GARDINER: All the lists they have are in this particular branch. The first explanation I gave with regard to this expenditure was that this division undertakes the responsibility of servicing the whole department. All the lists that are compiled, for the dairy and other branches, naturally would be in this particular branch, and they would be made up from those who have made personal application and also from official organizations that are known to the department from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. SENN: I am sorry I was not in the house when the minister made his explanation about these publications. For instance, I am not sure whether he said how many publications there were.

Mr. GARDINER: I did.

Mr. SENN: Then are all these publications free on application? I imagine there are some that have to be paid for by private individuals who desire to obtain them. While I am on my feet I should like to ask one more question in this regard. What method is followed by the department to inform the public that these publications are available? I know there are a good many farmers who would like to get the information if they knew that it was available, but unfortunately very often they are not aware of that. I think a good deal of the usefulness of the publications is lost by reason of the fact that farmers and others who would like to obtain them do not know just what publications are available and the matters with which they deal. I should like to ask if any method is followed to acquaint the general public with these up to date circulars, dealing with new matters, as they are published.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to state offhand just what proportion of the publications is paid for, but in connection with a certain number of them a charge is made. Information as to what publications may be available is usually given by means of publicity such as was criticized a moment ago; that is, announcements in the press, particularly in the agricultural press, and also by sending out copies to official organizations.

This information is also given when officials of the department may be addressing public gatherings of one type or another in which they happen to be interested. For example, if one of the men from the dairy section should be speaking to the dairy farmers naturally he would mention the different publications that were available to those individuals, dealing with certain subjects with which he himself might be dealing at that meeting. Every legitimate method is followed in placing the information before the public.

Mr. MALLETTE: A moment ago the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) said the Minister of Agriculture was bringing his estimates on rather suddenly. I just wish to point out that on April 27, referring to the matters to be taken up the following day, the Minister of Justice said:

If we get into supply we will take up agriculture.

Then on April 28, the Minister of Justice again said:

. . . and if it should so happen that we reach supply, agriculture.

Again on April 29 the Prime Minister intimated that these estimates would be taken up. I think sufficient warning was given so that parliament should not be under the impression that the minister is trying to railroad his estimates through the house.

Mr. SENN: In reply to that statement may I say that it just goes to prove what was stated by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. Each evening the business for the next day is stated, but last night nothing of this sort was indicated; no supply was to be taken up to-day. Had I known these estimates were coming up I would not have been out of the house, because I did want to ask some questions on an item which I think has been put through already.

Mr. GARDINER: That is quite proper; I would not object to any questions. I might say that this is the first item to be taken up apart from administration.

Mr. SENN: It was the matter of administration about which I particularly wanted to ask the minister. He will recall that last year a statement appeared in the press indicating that there was to be a thorough reorganization of the Department of Agriculture. It was to be divided into new divisions, with an official at the head of each. The first time the estimates were up after this statement appeared in the press I asked the minister to give us some idea of what was contemplated and what reorganization was to take place. At that time he told me he would rather have the question brought up under another item, having to do with marketing. Unfortunately that item did not come up until the dying days of the session, when it was impossible to discuss it or get any information from the minister. It seems to me that this is a most important matter, which the minister should explain to the committee right now. This year the estimates appear under entirely different headings, which would indicate that there is an entirely new set-up in the department, and I think the committee should be made acquainted with that new set-up, why it was brought about and just how far the minister has gone in his reorganization.

Mr. GARDINER: I regret that this was one of the matters with which I dealt before the hon. member came in. The question was asked by another member of the committee and I answered it just a few moments ago. However, I have no objection to repeating the answer, if the hon. member so desires.

Mr. SENN: If the minister has given the explanation, that is sufficient. Had I known that I would not have asked the question.

Item agreed to.

Advisory committee on agricultural services, $5,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What persons are on the committee?

Mr. GARDINER: The executive is constituted according to the resolution that was adopted at Regina on July 22, 1933, at the second national conference on agricultural services. The resolution reads:

Moved by Mr. F. H. Auld, seconded by J. H. Evans, that the national advisory committee on agricultural services appoint an executive of nine.

That executive of nine is then appointed, composed of Doctor Barton, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Doctor G. I. Christie, Reverend Father Leopold, Doctor W. J. Black, Mr. J. B. Fairbairn, Doctor E. S. Archibald, Doctor J. A. Grenier, Doctor R. Newton and Mr. H. L. Trueman. The appointment of the chairman was left to the members of the executive. I presume the chairman is the deputy minister of agriculture. This conference was composed of provincial and federal representatives.

Mr. STIRLING: Do they give their services?

Mr. GARDINER: These are nearly all members of the public service, either provincial or federal.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the $1,320 for payment of a secretary?

Mr. GARDINER: It is for work carried on by the organization.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the meaning of the item of $1,320 for temporary assistance? There is also the sum of $3,680 for "miscellaneous services including travelling expenses."

Mr. GARDINER: The temporary assistance would be for temporary secretarial work and activities in connection with the matter.

Mr. SENN: What are the functions of the committee and the matters with which they deal? Are they matters affecting the provinces and the dominion jointly? While the minister is answering, would he name the secretary of the committee, and tell us whether or not the committee has met in the past year, and if so how often?

Mr. GARDINER: The following is a resolution moved at the conference setting forth the functions:

(a) It was also moved and carried at Regina that "the executive committee of the national advisory committee on agricultural services be asked to nominate for the approval of the national committee such special standing committees as they may deem necessary to study conference matters in their several fields, and to aid the executive in the preparation of conference agendas, and that each such special committee consist of three members, who shall be empowered to add to their numbers.'

(b) Discussion of relation of executive to subcommittees. The following set-up is suggested:

(1) "Standing committee" as specified in the resolution above should be small committees assigned to regional or sectional problems, and should be responsible to the executive of the national advisory committee.

(2) It should be the function of these standing committees to coordinate the activities of problem committees now in existence and to arrange for the appointment of additional problem committees where needed.

That work of course, in the first instance will chiefly concern all these special committees, discussing activities which might be undertaken in different parts of Canada, and so far as possible seeing that there is no overlapping as between provincial and federal activities, where one department is taking care of one line of work. There will be an effort to see that there is no overlapping on the part of the federal body where a provincial body is undertaking the work.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How often does the committee meet?

Mr. GARDINER: Twice a year as a rule.

Item agreed to.

Contributions to empire bureaux, $32,337.

Mr. STIRLING: Where are the bureaux situated?

Mr. GARDINER: The following is a list of the bureaux and the points at which they are situated:

The Bureau of Soil Science, located at Rothamsted Experimental station; Bureau of Animal Health, located at the Veterinary Research Laboratory, Weybridge; Bureau of Animal Nutrition, located at Rowett Research Institute, Aberdeen, Scotland; Bureau of Animal Genetics, located at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland; Bureau of Plant Genetics (crops other than herbage), located at the Plant Breeding Institute, Cambridge; Bureau of Plant Genetics (herbage crops), located at Aberystwyth, Wales; Bureau of Fruit Production, located at East Malling Research station and Bureau of Agricultural Parasitology, located at the Institute of Agricultural Parasitology, Winches Farm Drive, St. Albanas.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Is a similar sum contributed to each of these bureaux?

Mr. STIRLING: The bureaux the minister has named are not indicated at page 55. At that point I find reference to Farnham House Laboratory, Imperial Agricultural Bureau, Imperial Bureau of Entomology and the Imperial Bureau of Mycology.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): And they make up the full amount, too.

Mr. GARDINER: The proposals were accepted by empire governments in 1928, and the bureaux I indicated were organized to deal with the special subjects. Those are the Imperial Agricultural bureaux set-up to which the larger grant may be made, and the other ones indicated in the estimate are associated with the Imperial Agricultural bureaux.

Mr. STIRLING: They are branches of the other bureaux?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: What benefits have we received from these contributions?

Mr. GARDINER: The object of the contribution is to make available to the Department of Agriculture here the research activities of the bureaux at these different points. Because of the nature of our agriculture, it has not been thought wise to set up similar bureaux here. It would not be economical to do so in view of the fact that the activities in connection with these bureaux are centralized and the results are made available here. The countries of the empire held their meeting and determined upon this line of activity. The benefits we receive take the form of access to all publications and information made available as a result of the research work carried on. It is cheaper to do it in that way than to try to do it ourselves.

Mr. STIRLING: Do we receive similar information from any world bureau? Do we receive information from the United States and France for instance?

Mr. GARDINER: That would come under the next vote dealing with the International Institute of Agriculture.

Mr. BROOKS: Are any Canadian scientists employed by these empire bureaux, or are they all English?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to state definitely. In all probability some of those engaged would claim Canada as their birthplace.

Mr. BROOKS: Were they sent over to England to take part in this work?

Mr. GARDINER: Meetings are held from time to time. In 1936 we sent over three or five representatives of our department to take part in the discussions. They brought back to the department all the information obtained.

Mr. STIRLING: There is an interchange of scientists. Scientists come from England to Canada, and scientists go from Canada to England.

Mr. BROOKS: Would the minister explain what is covered by the bureaux of mycology.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry, but I have not that information with me.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister was not quite clear as to the benefits we might expect from this expenditure.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I had better give the full details of the whole organization. The imperial agricultural research conference of 1927 recommended that eight bureaux be established to collect, collate and disseminate information on research in selected branches of agricultural science, and generally to assist research workers in the empire with information on their subjects and with introductions to other research workers. These proposals were accepted by empire governments, and in 1928 a number of bureaux were organized, each to deal with a special subject and to be located at a recognized institute dealing with that branch of agriculture. Then follows the list of bureaux which I gave a few moments ago.

Since 1929 this service of common empire interest has been maintained from a fund jointly subscribed by the governments of the empire and administered by an executive council composed of representatives directly appointed by the governments for that purpose. The functions of the bureaux have to do with the distribution of information; they do not themselves undertake research. In 1933 the imperial institute of entomology and the imperial mycological institute, which had previously been organized along similar lines were brought under the general supervision of the executive council of the bureaux. The British commonwealth scientific conference of 1936 recommended the establishment of two additional bureaux, one of dairy research and one of forestry, to meet the needs of research workers not served by the existing bureaux and institutes. On the general acceptance of these recommendations by the governments, an imperial bureau of dairy research was established in 1937 at the dairy research institute at Shinfield near Reading, the Canadian contribution being provided in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, and an imperial forestry bureau is being established at the Princes Risborough forestry research station, the Canadian contribution to it being provided for in the estimates of the national research council.

The activities of the institutes and bureaux vary somewhat; but the chief and common purpose of them all is collecting, indexing, and abstracting all information in the world as it becomes available in its own branch, and its distribution to the research workers in the empire interested therein. For this purpose each institute or bureau publishes an abstracting journal which is placed on sale. Also, from time to time the bureaux issue special monographs. These are either reviews, with bibliographies attached, on the state of knowledge on some special subject at the time of issue, or descriptions of technique. In the years from 1930 to 1936 over 110 of these special publications have been issued, covering subjects such as soil erosion, vernalization, the arrangement of field experiments and the statistical interpretation of results, the technique of artificial insemination, vegetative propagation of tropical and sub-tropical fruits.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister has mentioned tropical and sub-tropical fruits. What contribution has our own research made to the main bureau, and what application has been made by Canadian agriculture of the results obtained by the empire bureaux? We are living in a different zone from many of the countries in which research is being carried on and I should like to know what benefits have accrued to Canada, or what benefits may be expected from the application of the knowledge obtained. There are in this country many agricultural districts that might be termed late agricultural districts, due to cold climate, and early maturing varieties are most essential. In my opinion this amount of money would permit research to be made here that would be of great benefit to the dominion. I think we should have some indication as to the general application of this information to Canadian agriculture. I realize that from the technical standpoint an application can be made of the general knowledge that might be secured, but I am more concerned about what has been done so far as Canadian research is concerned, in cooperating with the other countries and disseminating the information obtained.

Mr. GARDINER: The question of what results have been obtained by Canadian research might better be discussed under science services administration.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Probably I have not made my point quite clear. Do we contribute anything besides our cash contribution? Do we do anything along this line in order that special knowledge obtained in connection with our climatic conditions might receive due consideration?

Mr. GARDINER: All research work done here is available to these bureaux to be distributed elsewhere, and the research work done in other parts of the empire is available to us here through these bureaux. My statement of the activities of the bureaux indicates that all research work is tabulated, divided into different classes and distributed to the different countries of the empire that contribute toward this set-up. Our own research work is not provided for under this vote. This vote simply provides for the distribution of information gathered.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I notice this contribution is an odd amount, and I should like to know upon what basis the amount is arrived at.

Mr. GARDINER: I would assume that the amount of the contribution is based upon the value of the service we obtain.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A division of the cost is made?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is it on a percentage basis?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to state upon what basis the division is made.

Mr. HAYHURST: I referred to an indexing system. This is needed so that students in Canada may know what is being done in other parts of the world with regard to agricultural investigation and experimentation. Consequently in western Canada they know practically nothing of what is going on in other parts of the world with respect to these matters, and there is a need for this type of work. I think it should be further extended, to bring knowledge to all the people from all sources. Proper bibliographies should be prepared by the Department of Agriculture so that we in Canada would be able to get information as to what is being done in other parts of the world, whether it be in forestry, horticulture or any other field. The publications should be properly indexed so that we should be able to tell immediately what book we wanted, and publicity should be given to the index, to lead to the dissemination of the different pamphlets.

Mr. GARDINER: Mycology, by the way, is the study of fungus.

Mr. SENN: Mr. Chairman, hon. members are asking these questions not for the sake of criticism but to find out what the value of this vote is. I can appreciate what the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hayhurst) has just said, that the information may be very valuable, but I can see no reference in the report of the Minister of Agriculture to what is being done under this vote in the interests of agriculture in Canada. I suggest that if in the future some explanation of this vote were made in the annual report it would be in the interests of everybody.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): May I ask if this information is made available simply to the Department of Agriculture, or also to the provincial departments and the universities? Just what are the advantages we receive? The minister said that the publications were sent out, but I do not suppose there is sufficient money to make a very wide distribution. Who receives these publications?

Mr. GARDINER: What I intended to convey when I said they were sent out was that they are sent out by the bureaux to the different countries that have joined the organization and are contributing towards it. The information is available then to our research men here and is applied in our experimental work and elsewhere. Any information that would be of assistance at the agricultural college in Ontario, for example, would be made available to it and to experimental stations throughout the country, and through our list of general publications would be available to people who receive them.

Mr. LOCKHART: Our junior farmer organizations are becoming very active, particularly in Ontario, and are anxious to learn more about the things with which this vote is concerned. I think it would be of advantage to them and to the older established groups to learn more of what is going on in world markets, in the United Kingdom, and that should be stressed in connection with this vote.

Item agreed to.

International Institute of Agriculture, $12,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this just the foreign version of the imperial bureaux, the item we have just passed?

Mr. GARDINER: It is similar to it. The International Institute of Agriculture held its organization meeting at Rome in May, 1905. At this meeting about forty countries were represented. The representative of Great Britain was present but Canada had not then been invited either to join the proposed international institute or to send a delegate. This invitation was transmitted to the Canadian government some weeks previous to the first annual meeting, which was held in May, 1906. Canada has belonged to the organization from that time down to the present. I have here the different donations that have been made from 1907 onward, running all the way from $579 in 1907 to $2,322 in 1908, and rising gradually until it was $7,730 in 1934, $21,535 in 1935 and $11,510 in 1937.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): This seems to be one of the largest amounts ever contributed by Canada. The institute meets once a year, does it not?

Mr. GARDINER: The general assembly meets every two years.

Mr. SENN: Just what information does this type of institute furnish? Is it along research or statistical lines, having to do with the production of wheat and other farm products, and who reaps the benefit? If statistics are sent out, who receives them? Are they sent abroad or to the dominion Department of Agriculture

Mr. GARDINER: Answering the question previously asked, the general assembly is held every two years, and it has been held every second year from 1908, with the exception of the war years. I have here the list of those who have represented this country at the different conferences, but I do not think the committee would wish me to read it. During the years prior to the war a considerable number of publications was furnished free of charge and distributed widely among Canadian readers, but after the war, owing to financial difficulties, the institute required that each publication sent out be paid for by the government. As a consequence the list of readers supplied with free copies in Canada was reduced to a minimum and the persons to whom such publications were sent were carefully selected in order that proper dissemination of the data might be made to those most directly interested. The publications subscribed for include the following: International Year Book of Agricultural Statistics; Annuaire International de Legislation Agricole.

Motion agreed to.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT PRESENTED APRIL 8, 1937

The house resumed from Friday, April 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) for concurrence in the second report of the special committee appointed to investigate farm implement prices, presented to the house on the 8th of April, 1937.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): The motion which is now before the house has already been discussed on three separate occasions. It is to be hoped, in the interest of all those interested in this report, that the debate may now be allowed to continue until the matter is finally disposed of.

If the Canadian farmer is to produce economically and to compete successfully in the home market and the markets of the world he must have his farm adequately equipped with modern machinery. The price he has to pay for such machinery is of very great importance to him. It constitutes part of his capital investment, and it has a direct bearing as well upon his cost of production. It will not be denied, that the price which the farmer has to pay for his implements is out of proportion to that which he receives for his own product. Unfortunately, however, the same may be said with equal truth about what the farmer has to pay for nearly everything he has to buy. The remedy for such a condition lies not in asking or requiring industry to sell at unprofitable prices, as the farmer very often has to do, nor in opening our markets wide to goods manufactured by the cheap labour or mass production of other countries, but rather in taking steps to place the farmer on an equality with other industries as far as his own price structure is concerned.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was perfectly justified in implementing the pledge, which he made during the dying days of the last session, to revive this report, and I hasten to commend the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) upon the moderation of his address in moving concurrence in the report. I cannot, however, agree with many of his arguments, and certainly not with a number of the recommendations which he added to those which appeared in the report. But I am in hearty accord with the closing paragraph of his speech, wherein he described the plight of agriculture and pleaded that the government should take steps for the rehabilitation of the farming industry.

In my judgment it was unwise and regrettable that concurrence should have been asked in this report at this late date. It was tabled over a year ago. The evidence upon which it was based is some of it over a year old, some over two years old; and in the meantime conditions have very largely changed. The price of implements has again advanced, the cost of raw material and labour entering into the manufacture of farm implements has also risen very materially, and I fully agree with the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) who stated to the house the other night that this report is out of date and of little practical value under present circumstances.

This was not at all a unanimous report. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson), speaking on this motion the other day, read the recommendation in regard to cream separators and stated that it was passed unanimously. I am sorry that I have to deny that statement absolutely. I certainly protested, not only against that recommendation, but a number of others. The hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) was not in accord with many of these recommendations. I might also say the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Fraser) protested against many of them, and other hon. members of the committee whom I might name felt in the same way. But my chief reason for saying it was unwise to ask concurrence in the report at the present time is this: I do not believe that the committee as it was constituted was in a position to bring down a disinterested and unbiased report. I felt that I was in that position myself. Like many other members of the committee, I am a farmer, and the price of implements is of vital importance to me financially and otherwise. Several members of the committee, while it was in session, stated very frankly that they were interested in the price of farm implements, that they were in the market for farm implements, but were unwilling to buy as long as prices remained at their present level. As I listened to those statements I could not help but wonder just how long one of those members would have been allowed to remain on a jury if he made such a statement in a court of law.

In addition to that I believe this whole investigation originated in the Liberal propaganda during the last federal election campaign. Candidates all over Canada said the prices of implements were too high and laid the blame on the Bennett administration for raising tariffs upon farm implements in 1930. They told the electors frankly that if a Liberal government were elected the duty would be removed or at least reduced and that the prices of farm implements would be lowered accordingly. Some of them even went so far as to carry along lists of farm implements, and they told the farmers that they would be able to buy a mower for ten or twenty dollars less, a binder for forty dollars less, and so on all down the line. So it was not to be wondered at that after the duty was lowered and the prices of implements advanced Liberal members of this house and gentlemen who had been candidates throughout the country were very much embarrassed and even resentful in regard to what had happened. That resentment showed itself from time to time in the committee, and I am sure it was very apparent the other night while the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was speaking. So I think I am well justified in saying that this was not a disinterested report, from either a personal or a political standpoint.

I stated previously, Mr. Speaker, that I am anxious, in my own interests and in the interests of agriculture generally, that implements should be made available at the lowest possible price compatible with the prosperity of this great country. However, I believe that one of the greatest assets of the farmers is the home market. I live in close proximity to two centres of population where farm implements are manufactured on a large scale. The workers in the factories thus engaged consume large quantities of all kinds of farm products which are produced in that area as well as everywhere else in Canada. The advantages to the farmers in having such industries employing large numbers of men, thus providing a market for their products, far exceed any advantages which might come about through any reduced duties on farm implements. Less than $2,000 will purchase sufficient implements and up to date horse-drawn machinery adequately to equip the average farm in Canada. The life of this machinery is at least twelve or fifteen years. If the duty of 7½ per cent, which still exists, should be entirely removed and agriculture should get the full benefit of that reduction the average farmer in Ontario would not benefit to the extent of $10 a year, an amount which seems to me absolutely negligible when compared with the value of the home market.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to come to the first finding of the committee, which states that the prosperity of the farm implement industry is dependent upon the prosperity of agriculture. I think everyone will agree with that; it is a self-evident fact. Beyond question the farmer is the only customer of the implement company. On the other hand, the farmer must have a source of supply, and the implement manufacturers constitute that source of supply. So these industries are mutually dependent upon each other. The history of the implement industry in Canada is very interesting indeed. At the time of confederation, and in the years following, the farmer's implements were very crude and inefficient. He used a plow that was hammered out in the local blacksmith shop; he cut his grain with a cradle and threshed it with a flail. However, as time went on better implements began to make their appearance. Men of initiative and foresight, such as the Masseys, the Harrises and the Cockshutts saw a fertile field for invention and enterprise, and the period from the eighties up to about 1910 or 1912 saw horse-drawn implements reach a very high state of efficiency. At the same time there was a development and consolidation of the agricultural implement industry.

The other evening the hon. member for Lake Centre emphasized very strongly the profits made by the implement industry as a whole between 1890 and 1912, but I do not think it is reasonable to base an argument in favour of lower prices of farm implements at the present time upon profits which these companies enjoyed during a period which ended a quarter of a century ago. If the hon. member had so wished he could have told the house the profits that were made over the whole period, from 1890 to date; the figures are among those furnished to the committee by the auditor, and they are very interesting indeed. They indicate that from 1890 to 1935—and those were the years under review—the implement companies of Canada made an actual profit of 3½ per cent on the average stock issued during that period. That was paid by way of cash and stock dividends. Eliminating the stock dividends entirely it will be found that during this period the implement companies made a profit of 8·8 per cent on the actual cash originally invested in the industry. I do not think anyone will say that these were unreasonable profits over that long period of time; it seems to me they might be called very reasonable.

Immediately following the hon. member for Lake Centre the hon. member for Brantford City gave to the house figures showing the losses incurred by the implement companies, with one exception, in both the last ten year period and the last fifteen year period. I do not intend to repeat those figures, but I tried to check up on them, and I believe they are approximately correct. However, if any confirmation of the hon. gentleman's statement is needed I should like to refer hon. members to the price spreads report. It is well known that the price spreads commission also investigated the agricultural implement industry, and on page 64 of the report of that committee there is a paragraph dealing particularly with this very question which, it seems to me, confirms the figures stated by the hon. member for Brantford City. The paragraph is very short, and I should like to read it:

> Evidence shows that of the four large companies, two obtained a small return on investment over the ten year period 1924-33 inclusive, the figures being 2·6 per cent and 1·0 per cent. The other two companies failed to earn a return and made losses of 2·6 per cent and 1·1 per cent.
> In considering these results—

And I want particularly to direct attention to this phase of the matter.

—we inquired as to whether any of the capital had been placed upon their books without the receipt of adequate and proper consideration. No evidence of this was found, at least in the years under review. That there was no undue expansion of manufacturing facilities in the years of prosperity has already been shown and we therefore do not believe that the investment upon which the returns have been calculated is greater than was justified.

The first two sentences of this statement I suggest corroborate to the full the statement made by the hon. member for Brantford City that most of the companies had incurred losses during the last ten or fifteen year period. But in addition to that, and of equal importance—perhaps of more importance—it also shows that there was no over-capitalization in the companies, that there was no watered stock, and that there was no distribution of stock melons in any reorganization of the companies which took place. That is the sense of the findings of the price spreads commission. It seems to me that this adequately proves that certain of the recommendations and findings of the farm implements committee, and statements which have been made by several hon. members regarding undue profits, are hardly in accordance with the evidence.

In view of the relationship existing between the farming and agricultural implement industries, and in view of the fact that there were no undue profits made during this period, it is very difficult for me to understand the charges made the other evening by the Minister of Agriculture against the implement companies when he spoke of soulless corporations not satisfied with reasonable earnings. Because of the minister's position he is peculiarly situated to speak with authority for agriculture. One cannot condemn too strongly language the effect of which is to arouse bitterness and enmity between these two great industries whose interests should be mutual and who are so dependent upon each other. It would have been much better if he had attempted to encourage harmony and cooperation between them, rather than stir up discord and ill-feeling. I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he states that the minister should have announced the government's program the other evening, when he spoke as a member of the administration, rather than make vague and indefinite threats against the industry. By not doing so he has left himself open to the suggestion, more than once repeated, that the speech was made for use in the impending election in Saskatchewan.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who made the suggestion?

Mr. SENN: I would refer the hon. member, since he has asked me, to an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail, the great Liberal organ of the province of Ontario. If he cares to hear it I shall read it to him.

Mr. STEWART: Read it all.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I do not think it is a very Liberal organ since the marriage of the Globe and the Mail, is it?

Mr. SENN: I think it is. I do not think I shall take the time to read it; I have insufficient time as it is to say all I wish to say. However, if the hon. member wishes to hear it, I shall certainly place it on Hansard.

During the period to which we are referring the price of implements has advanced greatly in the United States and I believe that at the present time in that country an investigation is taking place into the question. One cannot help wondering if the government is waiting to see if any action is going to be taken over there before taking action themselves in the matter. Under the circumstances I do not believe the government will take any action. In fact, standing in my place this afternoon I feel I can assure the implement companies that at the present time no action detrimental to their interests will be taken by the government.

I should like to refer to a recommendation made by the mover of the motion. He appealed to the government to remove entirely the duty on agricultural implements, on the ground that Canada's market for wheat has been lost through increased tariff protection, exchange control, quotas and price-fixing by European countries, and that therefore the cost of production in Canada should be lowered by removing the duty on agricultural implements. I wonder if the hon. member realizes how small an effect such action would have.

The average sales of agricultural implements in Canada in the ten year period between 1926 and 1935 were approximately $39,000,000. During that time the average wheat production was $377,000,000. If the 7½ per cent duty were removed, and if the farmer received the full benefit of it, it would amount to only about four-fifths of a cent per bushel. That would have been the amount if the implements had been used only in the production of wheat. But when you consider that they were also used to produce oats, barley, rye, flax, hay, fruit and vegetables, and even dairy products, I am sure the committee must agree with me that the effect on the cost of production of farm products would be absolutely negligible.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): The period to which the hon. member has referred was one when the purchase of farm machinery in the country was not normal.

Mr. SENN: That is undoubtedly true. At the same time I do not believe it was a normal period so far as the production of wheat was concerned.

I should like to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Needham). I do not believe he intended to convey a wrong impression to the house, but at page 1341 of Hansard, he stated that between the years 1920 and 1935 the value of farm implements at the factory was $492,250,-017, and that during that same period they were sold for $660,737,871, leaving an amount of $168,487,854, which I am afraid conveyed to some people the idea that implement companies had benefited in profits to that extent. He did not tell the house, however, that from this $168,487,854, the difference between the two figures, there should have been deducted $52,000,000 for freight; nor did he tell the house that from that amount there should be deducted approximately $100,000,000 as agents' commissions, and cost of distribution. That leaves an amount of about $16,000,000 to take care of profits and other expenses incidental to the business, which were not included in the factory cost. That makes an entirely different picture.
