Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would simply say that our objective was to contain expenditure within the 10.3 billion level for the entire year. We have included in the estimates tabled this year, because of better forecasting, items that were included in supplementary estimates last year. So my hon. friend is comparing "mains" with "mains", and the two things are not comparable.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister say I was incorrect in believing that the estimates tabled yesterday are 8 per cent higher than the estimates tabled a year ago for the current year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that when the Leader of the Opposition asks the minister a question in this form, it is debate.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of his answer, would he guarantee to the house that no supplementary estimates will be submitted to parliament next year?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to guarantee to the house that after the supplementary estimates are introduced during the year and the year has ended, with the normal lapses that always occur, we will hit our $10.3 billion ceiling and will balance the budget this year.

Mr. Ricard: You are whistling in the dark.

Mr. Monteith: Then is the minister now admitting that he has superfluous figures in the present estimates?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the very strong representations made to the government this morning by the Canadian Labour Congress regarding Bill No. C-186, and in view of the undoubted dissension this legislation will cause, would the Prime Minister give consideration to withdrawing that legislation at this time?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. It is before a parliamentary committee, and it will be considered there.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact, as I recall it, that the Prime Minister did not include this legislation in the list of priorities he gave the house the other day, has the government changed its order of priorities and is Bill No. C-186 now a priority item for this session?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there has been no change, but we are very anxious that this bill be given exhaustive and comprehensive consideration before the committee.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether the presence of the minister of manpower at last night's meeting of the parliamentary committee studying Bill No. C-186 indicates a lack of confidence in the new Minister without Portfolio, who was also present?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I put the question in another form?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The difference in form will have to be substantial to make the question acceptable.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I can assure you that the difference will be substantial. May I ask the right hon. gentleman if the Minister of Manpower and Immigration was there on behalf of the C.N.T.U.?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Does the right hon. Prime Minister intend to see to it that Bill No. C-186 shall be considered and passed by the house before the adjournment of the present session?

[English]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, that will depend on the progress made in the committee, of course.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORTED DELAY IN RECEIPT OF SUPPLEMENTAL PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, on February 6 last, I put a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare with regard to numerous complaints from older citizens who did not receive in January the supplement to the old age security pension to which they are entitled.

Could the parliamentary secretary tell me whether action has been taken to pay that guaranteed income supplement as soon as possible? Could she answer this question today?

[English]

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the minister will be in the house later this week, and I know he will be glad to answer this question.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MANDARIN ORANGES—POSSIBLE APPEAL OF JUDGMENT IN PROSECUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; he took it as notice some time ago. Has his department yet decided whether to appeal the fines that were recently levied against certain fruit importing companies which are engaged in the mandarin orange trade in British Columbia?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the question was accepted when it was first asked. If the matter is urgent perhaps the question might be answered, but it does not seem urgent to me.

Mr. Johnston: It was accepted, Mr. Speaker, when it was first asked and the answer is basic to the entire approach of the new department to consumer protection.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have asked for and received advice from counsel. Since this involves an appeal before the courts we have asked for counsel's opinion and are considering it.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—MAINTENANCE OF PORTABILITY PRINCIPLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): My question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Since two provinces have now accepted the national medicare plan does this mean the Prime Minister has now abandoned the principle of portability?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I have a question for the Prime Minister, supplementary to the one that was asked by the hon. member for Simcoe East. Is the right hon. gentleman satisfied that a trip confined to a movement from Saskatchewan to one other province and possibly a return comes within the definition of portability in a national context?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO MEET UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the severe drop in manufacturing production, from a 20-year average annual increase of 5 per cent to 1.1 per cent last year, will the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the house the steps the government intends to take in the near future to stimulate industry and therefore stop the vast growth of unemployment in the country?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Northumberland will be as glad as I was to note that the index of industrial production has turned upward. This undoubtedly is a direct consequence of efforts made in this regard.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the figures I quoted were exact figures taken from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, I ask the minister to answer my question.

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The figures quoted were exact, but I suggest that the hon. gentleman is clearly drawing the wrong conclusions from them.

MANPOWER

REPORTED RESIGNATION OF SENIOR DEPARTMENTAL OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister inform the house whether a senior officer in his department, Mr. Duclos, and other senior officers have resigned their posts? If so, did they resign because of some differences of opinion as to policies being pursued by the department?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not received the resignation of any of the senior officials referred to by my hon. friend for York South.

[English]

INDUSTRY

NEWFOUNDLAND—CLOSING OF FISH PROCESSING PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. The $6½ million fish plant of Ross Steers Limited of St. John's, Newfoundland has laid off 125 plant workers and tied up five of its deep sea trawlers. Having regard to the assistance provided to this company by the government, would the hon. gentleman investigate and report on the reason for this shutdown, in the hope that steps may be taken to prevent any further curtailment of fishing operations in the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): I believe the hon. member is referring to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning, in which reference is made to a temporary closing of a fish processing plant in Newfoundland. This closing takes place at a time of year when fishing operations are becoming more difficult on account of climatic conditions.

The closing of this plant could have been caused by many factors, such as the operation of a number of outmoded and uneconomic trawlers, which makes such fishing activities at this time of the year unprofitable. It could also have been caused by the over-fishing of certain species such as ocean perch and flounders, causing an over-production which has affected the marketing of this particular commodity.

Mr. Crouse: I thank the minister for his answer. Would he inform the house whether an assessment of the trawlers would indicate that they were not properly designed and are unsafe for further service at the present time?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt whether the supplementary question is acceptable. It does not appear to be urgent.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): In view of the fact that one of the reasons given by the company for the cessation of its operations is its inability to sell fish in the United States market, would the hon. gentleman ask his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce to try a little harder in this connection?

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Since it has been suggested that the trawlers are antiquated, would the minister give consideration, together with his colleague the President of the Treasury Board, to recommending a return to the former system of subsidies in respect of fishing trawlers?

Mr. Robichaud: There is no indication in the article I have mentioned to the effect that an application by this company for subsidy on the construction of new trawlers has been turned down.

DRUGS

REQUEST FOR PROTECTION AGAINST INFERIOR GENERIC IMITATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): I had intended to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in his absence I will address it to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the serious situation resulting from the use of chloramphenicol which fails to produce therapeutic blood levels, endangering the lives of those taking it, and the fact that the food and drug administration of the United States has banned all but chloromycetin by Parke, Davis and Company, would the minister tell the house what steps have been taken to protect the Canadian public?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I shall look into this matter immediately and talk with my good friend the parliamentary secretary to the minister.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

[Later:]

Mrs. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, earlier to-day the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) directed a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and I would like to answer that question now if I may. The food and drug directorate has been kept fully informed of investigations carried out in the United States showing differences in blood levels of chloramphenicol in patients receiving various brands of this drug, as well as the in vitro dissolution rates of these products. Samples of all brands of this drug on the Canadian market are currently being examined in the laboratories of the directorate. When the studies are complete action will be taken if evidence is obtained that any products fail to meet appropriate standards.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question. The food and drug directorate of the United States has banned this drug for some time, and it has been proven very definitely that the blood levels have not been adequate with some of the brands that have been used. I would like to know when something will be done about this, and what action is contemplated.

FINANCE

EFFECT ON CANADIAN SUBSIDIARIES OF U.S. CURTAILMENT OF CAPITAL EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask whether the Minister of Finance has received notice that the Amax Petroleum Corporation and the Southwest Potash Corporation of Canada, subsidiaries of American Metal Climax Incorporated of New York, and both active in western mining and petroleum production, have decided to close their operations following the reallocation of funds in consequence of measures taken by the United States government to curb business spending abroad? If so, has the hon. gentleman received notice that other companies may have the same intention?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I read about this particular case in the newspapers this morning; I have not received any other direct information. I do know there is some concern with regard to the action of the United States government in curtailing the export of capital from the United States. This is, of course, a matter of concern to the Canadian government because we have said to industry and to the public generally that we shall bring cases of this kind to the attention of the United States government if they threaten to have serious effects upon Canada.

Mr. Lambert: In that case will the minister consult with his colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and ask him whether he now agrees there should not be government direction of foreign investment?

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Has he received any representations from the province of Saskatchewan in connection with the slowdown of potash development in that province?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, I have discussed this matter with the premier and with other ministers of the Saskatchewan government.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): My supplementary question has to do with the question raised by my hon. friend from Rosthern. Is the minister aware of a statement by an official of the United States treasury department last week that if any United States subsidiary were to trade with a country such as China, its management would be liable to severe fines or prison sentences for breaking the trading with the enemy act?

Mr. Sharp: I am not aware of that particular statement, but of course I am aware of United States policy in this respect.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Has the Minister of Finance pointed out to the United States secretary of the treasury that this country has a trade deficit of more than a billion dollars with the United States every year, so we are assisting them—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, further to the question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle may I ask the Minister of Finance, in view of the statement made by a United States official regarding potash companies in this country and whether or not they can sell potash to certain countries to which its sale is prohibited in the United States, has the minister or any other department of the government made it clear to Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations, including potash companies, that their responsibility is to the laws of Canada and not to the laws of the United States?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. This position has been made very clear both by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by myself; and if there are any cases of this kind where Canadian companies are not observing Canadian law I hope my hon. friend will bring them to my attention and I will have them investigated immediately.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question, will the minister make it clear to these companies that the trading with the enemy act which applies in the United States does not apply to Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations operating in Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that United States laws do not apply to any Canadian companies.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF FRENCH NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Secretary of State.

In view of the fact that subsection (e) of section 2 of the Broadcasting Act stipulates that all Canadians are entitled to broadcasting services in French and English, will the increase in the budget of the C.B.C. for 1968-69 be used to finance the extension of the French network of the C.B.C.?

[English]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): As hon. members will see, a considerable amount is provided in next year's C.B.C. budget for the extension of services in both languages to places not already served, in accordance with requests we receive from every corner of the house almost daily.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question about the estimates.

Could he tell us if the increase of $130 million a year in the interest on the national debt is due to an increase in the national debt or in the interest rate paid by the government?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that question is in order.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OPPORTUNITY FOR DEBATE ON ECONOMIC SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question based on his statement of intention that an opportunity shall be afforded to parliament to debate the general economic situation in Canada. Is the Prime Minister prepared to say emphatically that this opportunity will be provided in connection with the present supplementary estimates, and that no restrictions will be imposed which would prevent such a debate from taking place?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The only restrictions would, naturally, be those imposed by Mr. Speaker on hon. members who violate the rules of debate. Apart from this, the supplementary estimates provide an opportunity for a debate on this subject to take place, and if this is not sufficient for the hon. member the interim supply resolution certainly affords that opportunity.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Will the Prime Minister designate the item on which a full and unrestricted economic debate may take place? Will he do so before the end of the day?

Mr. Pearson: I will leave that to the hon. gentleman's ingenuity.

Mr. Hees: I have great ingenuity but I cannot figure out the Prime Minister's mind. Will he make a statement tomorrow?

AGRICULTURE

GRANTS OR LOANS FOR FAIRS AND EXHIBITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question which is of an urgent nature for local fairs and exhibitions preparing for this year's attractions. Are grants or loans available or will they be available shortly for fairs and exhibitions wishing to improve their facilities this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest this question should be put on the order paper. If the hon. member disputes my ruling and wishes to have an opportunity to discuss the matter later today I will see that he is given that chance tonight.

[Mr. Speaker.]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is it his intention to present a budget to this house before this session adjourns for an event in April in which he is greatly interested?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have no such intention.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. When will the minister be announcing government intentions relating to recommendations of the legal and justice committee, made over a year ago, in the field of automobile deaths and injuries?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my officials who have been given this responsibility are trying to work out a plan for me which is practical and which will involve full participation not only of the federal government but also of the provincial governments which, as you know, have much of the constitutional responsibility in the area. As soon as we have heard from some of the provinces and I have had a chance to review the policy I will try to make a statement to the house at the appropriate time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED NEW SYSTEM OF CONTINENTAL AIR DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I intended to put to the Minister of National Defence, but I think it is of sufficient importance to put it to the right hon. Prime Minister. The United States secretary of defence in a recent report to the United States senate armed services committee stated that the Canadian government has already indicated that it intends to continue its co-operation in the air defence of the continent. This statement was made in the light of a $13 billion new air defence system—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. Brewin: Yes; I am just coming to the question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has in fact indicated the intention stated by Mr. McNamara.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It has already been announced in the house, I believe, that we intend to continue our co-operation with the United States in the field of continental air defence, but that has nothing to do necessarily with the program referred to by my hon. friend.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—FEDERAL REPRESENTATION AT CITIZENS' MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Was the minister or any of his departmental officials invited to the meeting held at Banff last night, sponsored by the citizens' committee under the chairmanship of hon. Senator Donald Cameron, protesting national parks policies as they apply to Banff? If so, was the department represented at that meeting?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think we had observers there.

Mr. Dinsdale: As a supplementary question, will representatives of the citizens' committee be invited to appear before the northern affairs committee when it reconvenes shortly, so they might be heard?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, the committee is in charge of its own affairs, and I am not going to interfere or indicate which groups it should call.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ADVICE OFFERED TO VARIOUS COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the government giving counsel and advice to the governments of North Korea and North Viet Nam, and the Smith government in Rhodesia; and if so what is the nature of this counsel and advice? I ask this question in view of a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on February 8 to a large meeting in Toronto, where he stated that our position as friend and adviser to both sides—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is in order, but I think the hon. member will agree that it would not be in order to read the statement to which he is referring.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE REIMPOSITION OF CEILING ON BANK INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It is based on a statement made recently to a public meeting by the Minister of Agriculture, when he said that the ceiling on interest rates of chartered banks should be imposed again. Is it the intention of the government to bring in an amendment based on the policy set out by the Minister of Agriculture?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of bringing forward any legislation dealing with the Bank Act, but I always listen very carefully to my colleague the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. How soon can we expect an announcement of government policy, as a result of the study indicated by the Prime Minister a few days ago, in regard to the rising and exorbitant interest rates that have become effective since the government eliminated the ceiling on bank interest rates?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure to which study my hon. friend is referring, and I will have to examine his question very carefully.

Mr. Nasserden: A few days ago I asked the Prime Minister if this matter was under consideration and he said the cabinet was studying it. I wonder when we can hope to have an answer saying what the government is going to do.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING REPRESENTATION BY COUNSEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the lack of agreement by the provinces at the federal-provincial conference to enactment of the Canadian charter of human rights, which would have guaranteed the right of Canadian citizens to be represented by counsel in courts, is the minister giving consideration to adding a clause to his omnibus bill amending the Criminal Code, which would give such a right to counsel?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker. This question of the right to counsel will be dealt with more properly in a charter of human rights and not in a Criminal Code bill, because this right applies to many aspects of the law, not only the criminal law.

HOUSING

REPORTED STATEMENT BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister responsible for housing. In view of the recent public statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that housing is in an awful mess in Canada, has the minister conferred with the Secretary of State for External Affairs to ask whether he has any suggestions as to the type of amendments that should be brought forward to rectify the situation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Kootenay West.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING U.S. PLANES IN SOUTH KOREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Thank you for recognizing me, Mr. Speaker. I know the Secretary of State has to leave in a few minutes and has been sitting on the edge for nearly half an hour—

Mr. Starr: On the edge of what?

Mr. Herridge: In view of the fact that the senate foreign relations committee has been informed that one reason United States forces did not go to the assistance of the intelligence ship when she was seized by North Korea is that all United States planes in South Korea were equipped only with atomic weapons, has the Secretary of State any comment to make about this unusual admission?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is asking the question of me let me say I have not been sitting on the edge of my chair, and I hope he will be careful to indicate whether he is dealing with domestic or external affairs.

Mr. Herridge: I was asking the question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

PUBLICATION OF WORKING PAPERS OF RECENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the ensuing public interest in last week's constitutional conference, is it the government's intention to gather together the main working papers in some form so they may be printed and made available to the public?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question several days ago. At that time I believe I said this was something which should be done, and we are taking steps to see that it is done.

TRADE

SALT—EFFECT OF TARIFF CHANGES ON CANADIAN INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the adverse effect the Kennedy round tariff changes will have on the Canadian salt industry, will the minister consider having the special circumstances clause invoked and applied in order to renegotiate this commitment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention in a brief submitted by the Canadian salt producers that the changes being made will have an adverse effect on their operations. I should point out that the reductions in question are to be staged in five annual steps ending January 1, 1972. So far as I know there is no suggestion that injury will result from the initial reductions which come into provisional effect on January 1 of this year. I will be glad to keep the situation under review, and if in light of experience it should become apparent that serious injury to the Canadian industry is arising from the reduction, consideration will be given to renegotiating the commitment in question.

Mr. McKinley: Thank you very much.

[Translation]

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING RECOGNITION OF TWO CHINAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but due to his absence, I will direct it to the Prime Minister.

Recently, the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs seemed to question the government policy concerning its formula on the admission of two Chinas in the United Nations. Is that statement of the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs an indication that the Canadian government wishes to alter its position on the matter?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. Our policy in this regard is quite clear, and I am sure my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs would confirm that if he were not out on the telephone.

GRAIN

REPORTED STATEMENT BY AGRICULTURE MINISTER RESPECTING WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he was making a declaration of government policy or merely speculating when he stated publicly a few days ago that the cost of operation of the Canadian Wheat Board should be paid out of public funds.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he cannot ask a minister about a statement made outside the house.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, may I redirect my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Last week the Prime Minister undertook to consult with the Minister of Agriculture and inform the house whether that minister was relating government policy when he stated it was the hope that the cost of the operation of the wheat board would be paid entirely out of public funds.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I suggest that the hon. member read my speeches more carefully before asking questions about them. That is not what I said.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CURTAILMENT OF OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether the reduction scheduled for 1968-69 in the spending estimates of the Department of Transport will be reflected in the curtailment of any of Air Canada's operations or services?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that his question is not in order.

INDUSTRY

SYDNEY, N.S.—ADDITIONAL FEDERAL ASSISTANCE RESPECTING STEEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Does the inclusion of $2 million in the supplementary estimates in respect of Sydney steel close the door to further negotiations between the provincial and federal governments?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. At the moment we are in the process of drafting a reply to the most recent communication from the premier of Nova Scotia.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—REPORTED LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday and Friday of last week I brought to the attention of the Prime Minister the lay-offs that have taken place in the last week or so by the Northumberland consultants, to the extent of about 50 per cent. I asked whether this would have some further delaying effect on the construction of the Northumberland causeway. The right hon. gentleman indicated that he would find out whether such was the case, and I am wondering whether he now has that information.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could give the information. The staff of the consultants working on the Northumberland causeway has increased since last August from 88 to 94. What apparently is causing concern to my hon. friend is a reduction in the number of supervisory staff working on the three contracts which are now going ahead in Prince Edward Island, and on which work has been shut down for the winter because of weather conditions. That is the only reduction there has been. There has not been a reduction but rather an increase in the total staff working on this project.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, some months ago the minister was good enough to assure the members of the committee on public works that we would have an opportunity to discuss further developments in respect of the causeway when a report was submitted by the special advisor to the minister. How soon may we look forward to such a committee hearing?

Mr. McIlraith: When the report is received.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): When will that be?

Mr. McIlraith: I cannot tell.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE INTEREST INCREASE ON FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether it is the government's intention to revise present legislation in order that banks will be allowed to charge more than the present rate of interest for farm improvement loans?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have answered similar questions in the past. I think it will be desirable to give some flexibility in respect of interest rates in order that the sort of thing that has arisen recently will not occur again.

[Mr. MacDonald (Prince).]

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, if there is to be a flexible arrangement are the interest rates likely to go down as well as up?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—IMPORTS FROM U.S. INTO WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has received information from representatives of potato producers in western Canada outlining a further deterioration in the situation since last week; and is the government now prepared to consider the application of value for duty?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram alleging a further deterioration of price. This matter is being investigated and a review is being made as to whether the Canadian Horticultural Council, which formerly did not support the application of value for duty, has now had a change of mind. To date and to the best of my knowledge this council does not support the application of the Alberta potato growers.

PATENT ACT—TRADE MARKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

The house resumed, from Monday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner for the second reading of Bill No. C-190, to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act.

Mr. Richard Cashin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in my view the House of Commons was treated last evening to a most unusual and remarkable performance by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall). Indeed, after close examination of the text of his speech I have come to the conclusion that he was either poorly informed on the matter before the house or undertook a course of action which in my view can only be called courageous. He advocated a course of action for parliament and the government that flies in the face of 100 years of traditional sentiment and agitation from the area he represents. Surely it takes a courageous man to dissociate himself publicly from the viewpoints and philosophy of government that have been deeply embedded in the region he represents. The matter before the house, the changing of the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act, represents in a sense an expression of a particular philosophy of government.

It may be said that the situation in the drug industry is such that the framework of the industry needs to be altered. One of the major changes under this measure would lead to freer trade. The hon. member for Halifax, contrary to what may be the understandable wishes of his constituents, has attacked this legislation. He has used arguments which have been primarily used by the drug industry located in central Canada. Thus for the first time we have seen—and I think this is a good balance—a member from the Atlantic region defending the interests of another region at the expense of his own. The approach of the hon. member for Halifax was also in direct contradiction to the stands taken in this house by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) who have attempted to model themselves as particular spokesmen for the interests of their region.

Mr. McCleave: Why don't you crawl out from under that rug and stand up?

Mr. Cashin: I hear the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) making one of his usual contributions from his seat. Of course, they are most effective then because they are not heard by everybody. If I were the senior member for Halifax I would be very concerned about carrying my running mate with me the next time.

Let me point out what the running mate of the senior member for Halifax has done. He has expressed concern about 2,500 jobs which he claims will be lost in central Canada. The source of his information is the drug industry. Yet an examination of the facts and the evidence presented before a series of inquiries suggests to the contrary. The hon. member has allied himself with the drug industry against the body of evidence. I say that his stand is courageous because if the drug industry is not right, and the evidence suggests it is not, I for one could not tell my constituents in St. John's West, Newfoundland, that they must pay the considerable extra cost to support the protectionist, high-Tory viewpoint enunciated by the junior member for Halifax. If we take the evidence of the industry itself, a conservative estimate of what the present situation costs the people of Canada is $2 a head. For the constituency of Halifax this represents about $500,000 a year, and that is a very conservative estimate. So in effect the junior member for Halifax is asking his constituents to go along with him, to uphold the status quo, not to undertake any changes, and the people of Halifax together with those of the rest of Canada must pay for what I think is this unfortunate and deplorable situation.

Mr. Dinsdale: You sound like a pocket "Pick".

Mr. Cashin: I doubt very much that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) would endorse the viewpoint of the junior member for Halifax. If he did he would almost be following the dictum of Burke, that constituents may advise, that they may have their particular interests, but in the final analysis the great principles of traditional Toryism are such that they must be defended at all costs, even at the cost of the sick and the infirm in our respective constituencies.

Mr. Dinsdale: The voice of Jack Pickersgill.

Mr. Cashin: I am not faulting the individuals in the drug industry by suggesting that they are sinister in their intentions. I do suggest that the fault lies in the framework of the system and the ground rules have to be changed to lead to a lowering of prices in the drug industry. This is my concern. At the present time the effect of the patent laws is really a form of protectionism for certain vested interests in this country which are foreign owned. This is what the hon. member for Halifax, traditionally a free trade area, is defending. It would seem from the comments of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris that he also is defending it.

It is evident that there have been great changes in the Tory party under the new leadership. They are reverting to the traditional Tory position. It is interesting to note that their leader, notwithstanding the fact that he too comes from a region that would benefit from this freer trade, appears to be of the school of thought of the junior member for Halifax in that he also is terribly concerned about the traditional principles of high-Toryism, protectionism and opposition to changes in the status quo. Indeed, his recent statements on medicare would seem to put him more in line with the junior member for Halifax than with the hon. member for Cape Breton South, who appears to represent the other school of thought in the divided Nova Scotia branch of the Conservative party.

The hon. member for Halifax was concerned about the potential loss of jobs to 2,500 people working in central Canada. I am sure that the members of parliament who represent these people will be well able to fight for their interests, bearing in mind that if what the drug companies say is true the amount of subsidy the rest of us pay in the present situation is indeed high. Perhaps the junior member for Halifax is giving a new look to Atlantic provinces politics. For a long time the Atlantic provinces have sort of had their own axe to grind. They have come here and presented their particular interests. But now at long last the Atlantic provinces have produced a spokesman who is able to turn his back on the traditional approaches of those provinces. He may be the first Atlantic provinces' member who is in fact endorsing the principle that it is time the Atlantic provinces paid back the money they have received. I do not know any other member from the Atlantic provinces who could take such a position and hope for re-election. I presume that when he took this position the hon. member had the whole of his political future in mind.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he is looking for a seat in Ontario.

Mr. Cashin: Yes, perhaps he is looking for a seat in Ontario. Indeed, after his performance yesterday he may have not only jeopardized his own position but that of his esteemed senior colleague from Halifax. The drug industry—

Mr. McCleave: The only thing that has happened is that you have made me ill.

Mr. Cashin: The senior member for Halifax has just left the chamber. It is unfortunate that neither member for Halifax is here at the present time. If I were either of those hon. members I would want to spend a great deal of time in the chamber because I would not be in the house very much longer. But it is refreshing to know that principles still play a major part in politics, and if a man honestly disagrees with the interests of his constituents I think it is courageous of him to say so in the House of Commons. I think it is a noble quality.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the junior member for Halifax has adopted almost completely the position of the drug industry in this regard. Let us, therefore, examine some of the arguments which have been brought forth. First of all, the hon. member places great reliance upon the safety issue. Of course, safety is like motherhood. As I said last evening, it is good debating technique, if you are on otherwise weak ground, to attempt to find an emotional argument that will obscure and cloud the facts. This is an understandable tactic which from time to time a great many people in all walks of life find it necessary to adopt. But in actual fact the overwhelming body of evidence in a series of inquiries suggests the quite obvious fact that in patent legislation safety and quality are two different things. Patent legislation in effect gives a monopoly. It is a sort of economic device which gives a monopoly that has had an inflating effect on the cost of drugs. Safety and quality are covered by the Food and Drugs Act.

It seems to me that if there are problems with regard to safety, quality and control they must relate to the food and drug directorate. In fact, one of the ingredients of the package proposed by the government is an increase in the facilities of the food and drug directorate so that it will be able to deal with the present and future situation. So the hon. member for Halifax, together with the drug industry, has brought the red herring of safety into this debate.

The second argument used by the industry, and again used by the hon. member for Halifax in his defence of the industry, is that research and development naturally lead to higher costs and therefore since it is necessary to conduct research in a research oriented industry this in the end affects the price to the consumer, and in effect the steps the government is proposing to take through this legislation would wipe out research in Canada. It is further argued that it is socially desirable that Canada encourage research. I think everybody agrees with that. It is like motherhood, and we all agree with that. It is said further that the lack of patent protection will lead to secrecy and less courageous investment. These are allegations made by the drug industry and by the junior member for Halifax.

It is understandable that the drug industry would perhaps balk at any changes in the present framework. Under the present system their average profit in the last 12 years has been approximately double that of other manufacturing industries. In taking his courageous stand the hon. member for Halifax has asked his constituents in Halifax to live with this situation. It is understandable that the drug industry would not welcome changes that would affect the balance. This is understandable from their point of view. But it seems to me it is the responsibility of parliament and the government in this matter to lay the framework and ground rules to make this industry more productive.

In their reports the Hall commission and other commissions have pointed out that in fact very little research is actually carried on in Canada. In the evidence before the standing committee which studied this matter and in the evidence given before other bodies it was pointed out that there are other factors which determine the location where research is carried on. The drug industry is a world wide industry. The drug manufacturers are not interested particularly in the markets of one or another country; they are world wide. Therefore there are other economic factors which dictate the location of their major research facilities. In fact, the evidence given before the committee quite clearly pointed out that it is a fallacious argument to link the patent laws with research. This is the second red herring introduced quite understandably by the drug industry but not quite so understandably by the junior member for Halifax who seems to be so afraid of any change that he will support any existing system on the basis that the devil you know is better than the devil you don't know, while in the meantime his constituents in Nova Scotia and all our constituents must pay among the highest prices in the world for drugs.

The evidence which has been collected by means of the various studies shows that approximately 7 per cent of the manufacturers' dollar is spent on research. This is not a very high figure, particularly when one relates it to the fact that they spend 30 per cent of that dollar on selling. When one looks at the ratio of detail men to doctors—I heard it was ten to one and later that it is eight to one—it is quite clear that it is a higher ratio than in any other industry in Canada. This suggests that there are a great many ways in which to lay a framework or ground rules so that we will have a more competitive industry and one which will lead to lower costs. Therefore I do not believe that the argument concerning research is one that carries any weight when we consider the facts. The drug industry and one of its principal spokesmen in the House of Commons, the junior member for Halifax, have used this red herring.

The evidence presented before the special committee on drug costs and prices is to the contrary. It indicates that it is measures such as the government's fiscal policy, the policy of the Department of Industry and the clinical testing required by the regulations of the food and drug directorate which have encouraged the little research we have had in Canada. Therefore the argument does not hold water. I should also like to point out that Canadian patents are overwhelmingly owned by foreigners who in the past have found it more efficient to concentrate their research activities elsewhere. The modest increase in research in Canada has been due to government policy and the clinical testing required by the food and drug directorate. This is the reason, and it should not be confused with the existing patent laws.

It has been mentioned also that research is socially desirable. I believe we all agree with that, but if we bear in mind the evidence given by the industry before the royal commission and before the special committee of the House of Commons we find there are other ways in which to encourage research. Surely in this country we are not to be placed in the position of encouraging a minimum amount of research on the backs of the wage earners. That is not the situation. I disagree that that is the choice. I do not accept the premise that it boils down to the choice of the small amount of research we have justifying the high cost of drugs. I believe that the changes proposed by this legislation and the other steps which the government is taking and will take can lay the ground rules and framework for this industry to achieve the laudable goal of lower prices without affecting the small amount of research which is now carried on. However, if there should be any merit in the argument that the small amount of research we have is dependent upon patents, then I seriously question, certainly in the Atlantic provinces, how one could defend the high cost of drugs that the average wage earner pays to support this small, albeit sophisticated, industry. That is not the dilemma.

The junior member for Halifax had an opportunity to have his cake and eat it but he did not seize it because he is too hidebound, I presume, in the traditional trading concept of opposing change inasmuch as any change at all may be unsettling and therefore undesirable. Ninety five per cent of the Canadian patents are foreign owned. There is no reason to believe that the patent system will result in the disclosure to Canadians of any drug discoveries that would not otherwise occur.

It is also said by the industry and by the man who has championed their cause here in the House of Commons that if this bill passes there would be no reason for a manufacturer to maintain production facilities in Canada and that all they would need would be distribution houses in large Canadian centres from which to market their drug products manufactured in low wage areas. On the basis of the studies which have been undertaken I do not think this is a weighty argument. Especially in view of the high margin which exists, I believe it is reasonable to assume that it would still be profitable for them to continue manufacturing in this country. This is quite obvious particularly in relation to some of the smaller independent producers who would find it easier to import the basic fine chemicals than to import drugs in dosage form. The changes, therefore, which are permitted may lead to more of this rather than less. There are very few true production facilities existing now and at the moment importation takes the form of basic chemicals so the changes ought not to affect this procedure substantially.

It is suggested also that if this situation is brought about the people of Canada will be dependent on foreign countries for their sources of drugs. This is said with a certain amount of conviction and force on the part of the opponents of this bill. Immediately there is an emotional appeal and people say, we are going to be dependent upon foreign sources for our drugs; this is terrible. People use the word "foreigner" to suggest that something is wrong. In actual fact this situation exists today. I feel, therefore, there is no merit in this argument. Today we do import basic prime chemicals, so this argument would again seem to be one of the smokescreens employed by the industry and by the junior member for Halifax.

It is suggested also there are many life-saving products that enjoy a limited market which a company makes fully available only because they are part of a total operation. I am referring now to special and rare drugs. It is alleged that without reasonable patent protection a company may well decide it could not afford this kind of treatment of their important drugs and would not introduce new products, especially if they were used only for rare diseases. There is a suggestion here that drugs will be deliberately withheld from the Canadian market if these patent amendments are put into effect. I feel this suggestion goes against the nature of business. I believe increased competition can only result in companies demonstrating a willingness to maintain such services in order to capture their share of the market. This argument also suggests a high degree of petulance because companies would be saying in effect: If we cannot continue with the present system of making a high rate of profit we will not go into business with the new ground rules which reduce profits more in line with those in other industries; we will do something else. I am quite sure the private enterprise motive still exists and that there are many people who will want to survive in the drug industry and make money. Therefore, if it is good business practice to perform these services they will be performed.

I do not believe we should expect our private enterprisers to undertake a service for completely altruistic reasons. If they do these things they are obviously attempting to get good will for their companies, to show that they are community-minded. They will, of course, reap benefits from such action.

Mr. Rock: May I ask the hon. member a question? He has stated that 95 per cent of the ownership of the pharmaceutical industry in Canada is in foreign hands. Of course, these companies are established in Canada. Will this legislation give them the right to import from their home plants rather than service the industry from Canadian plants?

Mr. Cashin: I thank the hon. member for the question. This situation could exist under the present law. A company with a patent can import from its parent company. The only difference will be that instead of one company, the one with a patent, having that option, perhaps two companies will have that option. This suggests to me more competition. I suggest it is a comparison of oranges and apples that the hon. member is making.

Mr. Rock: I have another question if the hon. member will permit. Does he not feel that this privilege should be given to companies which are actually Canadian owned, that is, give them more patent rights rather than give foreign companies the right to import, which might cause unemployment within the drug industry?

Mr. Cashin: The intent of the legislation, as I understand it, is that this will be done, particularly for independent Canadian producers. They will be given an opportunity under the compulsory licence procedure to manufacture some drugs they would not otherwise be able to manufacture. It is certainly arguable, and with a much stronger weight of evidence, that this will happen.

I can well understand the dilemma that some members face in connection with this matter. There are members who understand that a patent creates a monopoly and gives a kind of protection. There are certain individuals, obviously, who support this viewpoint and who think this is a laudable course of action. I do not argue that there are not instances where we should adopt such an approach for the common good. However, I do not believe the drug industry represents one of them. The very strongest the opposition can say about the changes is that they provide equal chances.

If under the present system a company can have a choice of importing or manufacturing, then under the compulsory licence system there will be more than one company involved in the same choice. In these circumstances, one may manufacture in the country and one may import. I do not see, on balance, that this is a strong argument. If it is a strong argument, and I do not concede that it is, I find it unusual that the hon. member for Halifax should support it and ask his constituents to pay such a high cost for these drugs.

Mr. Forrestall: Why don't you read the evidence presented to the committee?

Mr. Cashin: It is nice to know that in the Atlantic provinces we have people who do not need to worry about these high prices. I find the hon. member for Halifax a refreshing change from the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis).

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I suggest that from time to time he has wandered from the subject matter of the bill. He seems overly concerned about the capability of the hon. member for Halifax to represent his own constituents. I am confident the member for Halifax can adequately represent his constituents, as he has done, and the hon. member who has the floor should now get back to the bill.

Mr. Cashin: I am most sorry if I gave that impression to the hon. member for Queens. On the contrary, I have been absolutely amazed that the hon. member could take what I believe to be a position which flies in the face of the traditional position of his region. I do not fault him for that; I congratulate him for it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Since the point of order has been made and since the hon. member has replied, we might return to a consideration of the bill before us.

Mr. Cashin: During my discussion of the patent I mentioned the fact it is regarded as some kind of economic tool, a form of protectionism, and as long as that is so it is quite legitimate for hon. members to engage in the argument of protection versus free trade. I am sorry the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) has been so sensitive in regard to his colleague from Halifax that he is afraid to have these ideas exposed to debate in this house. I understood that was what parliament was all about.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I invited the hon. member to return to a consideration of the bill itself.

Mr. Cashin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall attempt to limit my remarks to a discussion of the ideas that have been brought forward on this matter. One of the matters overlooked in the remarks of members of the opposition is that if the ground rules under which the industry operates are to be changed no one single measure will of itself be a panacea. In fact, there are a number of steps which must be taken to achieve the goal of lower drug prices in Canada.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is one of these steps. The first step was taken last fall with the removal of the sales tax, the alterations to the dumping laws and the reduction in import duties from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. These steps should have some effect on reducing prices at the manufacturing level.

The second part of this program or package is the proposed amendments now before the house to the Patent and Trade Marks Acts. These are important steps in the removal of some of the barriers that now exist and which create an artificial situation. For example, it has been clearly demonstrated that when patents have expired the cost of drugs has been greatly reduced.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. member to tell him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may continue only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cashin: I thank hon. members, Mr. Speaker, and will conclude my remarks very shortly. I have already said that when patents have been removed we have seen instances of lower drug prices.

The third part of the program is the provision to doctors, through the information services of the Department of National Health and Welfare, of objective material on various competing drugs that are on the market. Understandably, I think, doctors are very cautious in prescribing new drugs. Under the present system it is the drug industry, through its detail men, that does the selling. I believe that the dissemination of this type of information by an impartial agency will be very helpful and will give more leeway to doctors inasmuch as they will have more information on which to act. I think that in part at least this should deal with the very difficult problem of the 30 per cent of the cost of manufacturing drugs that is taken up with sales and marketing. I believe this figure is far too high and is a result of inefficiency. Quite clearly there is a responsibility on parliament to adopt measures to remedy the situation. I feel that the proposal regarding the information services branch of the department is a step in the right direction.

The minister also made reference to a fourth measure, the provision of certain assistance to some of the smaller Canadian manufacturers. The fifth matter was distribution, and the minister has indicated that he will be discussing this question with the provinces.

As I say, I do not think we can look to any one single measure to be entirely effective in solving the problems. However, I urge hon. members to support the legislation before the house. I suggest very strongly that the picture has become confused in the minds of some because research has been related to patents. When the evidence is examined this contention just does not stand up.

The second area of confusion has arisen because patents have been related to safety. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) asked a question of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) last night which I thought was very pertinent. According to the evidence that he had found and which I also found—I do not have it with me right now but I will send it to the hon. member for Halifax—there is strong support for the argument that we should not confuse patents and safety.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it seems that the opponents of this bill have no argument on which to base their case. They seem to be fearful of the effect on research, but I think the body of the evidence is against this. As an alternative it is a very costly price to pay. It seems to me there are other measures that stimulate research. The other argument the opposition has raised about safety has been dealt with by the minister and it will undoubtedly be dealt with by others.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, it has been interesting to listen to the amazing speech of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin). He accused us of using emotional arguments to call attention to some of the deficiencies in this bill. He seemed to think that the question of safety was not important enough to underline the fact that we feel some provisions have been left out of the legislation. The hon. member spoke about red herrings. This government is very good at drawing red herrings across the path. It is said that this legislation will reduce the cost of drugs, Mr. Speaker. But how much more welcome would be measures that would reduce the cost of living right across the board, or measures that would remove the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials.

Last year quite an issue was made of the fact that the sales tax on drugs was removed. However, on January 1 of this year a 5 per cent surcharge on income tax was imposed. And so on it goes, Mr. Speaker. Talk about red herrings. Sometimes I wonder whether this bill is not a red herring that has been brought in by the minister as a sort of sermon on the mount designed to move him ahead in the leadership campaign that is given such prominent publicity in the country today. I expect that the parliamentary secretary who has just spoken hopes to step into the minister's shoes some day and it could be that these speeches were prepared in anticipation of that event.

The effect of this bill as I see it is to allow the commissioner of patents to grant licences permitting the importation of prescription drugs on a more flexible basis than applies at present. Where there is a delay in the granting by the commissioner of the required licence for a period beyond six months, provision is made for the granting of an interim licence under a patent relating to medicine.

On December 15 last, as reported at page 5467 of Hansard, the minister indicated that the objective of this bill was to allow compulsory licences to import prescription drugs, which would have the effect of injecting more competition at the manufacturers' level in the drug industry and would beneficially affect the prices of drugs. In this connection it is rather interesting to look at the evidence given before the committee. On Tuesday, February 7, 1967, the committee received evidence from Mr. Henry, the director of investigation and research of the combines investigation branch. In connection with the competition that the minister feels is going to be injected into the industry as a result of this legislation the director of the combines investigation branch had this to say, as reported on page 2185 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence:

> Price competition during the life of the patent is found only in limited circumstances, notably in sales to institutions and governments. Instead, competition takes the form of product differentiation which requires inordinately large sums to be spent on promotion of a particular firm's product, usually by its brand name, primarily to the physicians who make the selection at the time of prescribing for the patient. Competition is therefore cost increasing rather than price reducing. The more intense the competition, the higher costs are driven. There being no downward pressure on price there is no downward pressure on cost with the result that pressures within the firm for more detail men, more advertising, etc., tend to be inflationary, and resulting high costs are used to justify high prices.

We were pleased to note the aims that the minister has in connection with this legislation. They were stated in his speech yesterday and were: lower prices for drugs, safe drugs for the Canadian people and a viable Canadian drug industry. From evidence taken before the committee we know that increased competition does not always have the effect of reducing the price of a particular article that is being sold. Nevertheless, anything that can be done to bring about a reduction in the price of prescription drugs will win the wholehearted approval of members of the house and the public at large.

As a result of this legislation we are likely to witness the importation into Canada, under interim licences in many instances, of a whole range of pharmaceutical products bearing brand names that are identical or similar to those of Canadian products which have undergone testing and inspection at the government level. This problem arises. What assurance will Canadians have that these products bearing identification similar to that of Canadian products have passed the same tests as products made in this country? This bill, so far as I can see, provides only that the food and drug directorate shall be notified of any application to bring into Canada a pharmaceutical product from another country. Does the minister feel that mere notification from one department to another is sufficient? Surely drugs imported from other countries and purporting to possess the same qualities as drugs manufactured in Canada should be subjected to exactly the same testing conditions and requirements as drugs which are manufactured in Canada.

The question of safety in the use of drugs is not merely academic. There have been numerous instances in the past few years which have indicated that, despite all possible precautions, horrible consequences can arise unless drugs meet the most rigorous conditions as to manufacturing standards. The other day some children in Ottawa ate some candy which it was thought was injurious. After careful study it was found that the candy was not the cause of the trouble. But how certain are we that the sort of thing exemplified by this candy incident could not arise with regard to drugs? If we are now to open the door to an influx of drugs over whose manufacture Canadian authorities have no control, then surely we must take steps at this end to see to it that reasonable testing procedures are followed.

No doubt the minister will recall the recommendations of the House of Commons special committee on drug costs and prices in this regard. I now wish to refer to two recommendations made by that committee which have not, I am sorry to say, been incorporated into the legislation. Recommendation No. 17 reads as follows:

> That subsection 3 of section 41 of the Patent Act be amended to indicate clearly that the granting of a licence by the commissioner of patents is subject to a report by the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare, to the effect that the applicant for the compulsory licence has satisfied the directorate that he has met the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act;

Recommendation No. 18 reads as follows:

That subsection 3 of section 41 of the Patent Act be amended to include applications for compulsory licences to import drug products in all forms, subject to inspection of manufacturing facilities by the food and drug directorate and provided such importation is in the public interest as may be determined by the commissioner; and to this end, your committee recommends that the rules under the Patent Act be amended to permit the commissioner to seek and receive outside independent expert advice in the determination of this question;

As I said, these two important recommendations by the committee do not seem to have been incorporated into this legislation. At least, there is nothing in the bill to show that these recommendations have been followed. Surely there is a responsibility on the government and on parliament to see to it that Canadians are granted an adequate level of protection. Drugs are not in the same category as other important materials. In a wide range of cases the assurance of effectiveness can mean that a person will live instead of dying, that a person will recover instead of suffering permanent and irretrievable damage. To put it succinctly, this is not an area to fool around in.

It is interesting to find that in the past there has been evidence of a little fooling around with regard to the question of safety of drugs and importation of drugs from foreign countries. This is substantiated by the evidence which was submitted before the special committee on drug costs and prices. Mr. Chapman, a witness before the committee, was questioned by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) about a report which appeared in Maclean's review of January 1, 1966. The hon. member for Verdun read a portion of that report to the witness, as found on page 2233 of the committee evidence:

The raw material from abroad is often processed and packaged by Canadian distributers lacking adequate knowhow on quality control.

A little farther on the hon. member for Verdun continued reading from the report as follows:

One example: An F.D.D. inspector found a kitchen table manufacturer putting out a drug which lost its potency within two days compared with the six-month's shelf life of the same drug producted by a reputable company. He just did not know how to stabilize it, the inspector explained. All too often these small operators simply don't know what they are doing.

As I said, the hon. member for Verdun was reading from an article in Maclean's review of January. Farther along in the evidence, replying to the hon. member for Verdun Mr. Chapman said:

Well, I might say sir, with regard to the first paragraph at the top of the third column, where it states:—

Then Mr. Chapman reads a few words from the report:

"Italy and Poland were recently removed from the U.K.'s list of suppliers in antibiotics."

Mr. Chapman then continued his own evidence by saying:

We still import pharmaceutical material from both countries. In Italy the laws call for manufacturers to assay their own products, but F.D.D. inspectors often find the test equipment dust-covered and obviously unused.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, safety in drug imports is not an area that should be fooled around in. I ask the minister whether he will entertain an amendment to the bill to ensure that not only will the commissioner of patents forward a copy of any notice of application to the food and drug directorate but that a full clinical and chemical description of the product, along with a sample for testing, will be forwarded at the same time. Needless to say, since I am not a medical man I am subject to correction on this point, but we should not ignore what the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) said yesterday in this regard. One would certainly like to hear the views of qualified medical men on the importation into Canada of drugs bearing brand names similar to those of Canadian products manufactured under the most rigid controls, since the imported varieties are manufactured under conditions which in some cases are known only to those who produce the drugs.

Most members of the committee—I know I did—received letters and information from people who are, of course, interested in the drug business. One important matter mentioned in that material was drug safety. Canadian drug manufacturers have operated with an enviable record of efficiency, safety and reliability for many years. The Department of National Health and Welfare, through the food and drug directorate, is in close and constant touch with those who manufacture drugs in this country. But what guarantee is there in the case of imported material originating we know not where? Another important point is that the country from which the material is imported may not be the country of origin.

What is to stop the entry into the pharmaceutical stream of dangerous or even toxic products when there is an almost complete absence of controls? This is not to say there will be no controls, but there will be no assurance that the controls are present in every case or even as to the nature or extent of such controls as may exist. I ask the minister to give serious thought to this matter in order to avoid the horrible tragedies to which Canadians and many thousands who live in other countries have been subjected in the past. With new drugs coming on the market every day and with each new discovery bringing a rush of imitators, it is difficult to control the situation in Canada. Once you open the door to unrestricted and unregulated importation, in many cases from unknown sources, there will not be enough civil servants on the government payroll to undertake an inventory of pharmaceutical imports.

I call attention to the evidence given before the committee to the effect that applications submitted to the commissioner had to wait many months before they could be processed. One of the recommendations made by the committee, to which in my view considerable importance attaches, reads as follows:

> That the personnel and facilities of the food and drug directorate be expanded to make possible the implementation of the recommendations of the Boyd committee, the Hilliard committee and this committee.

I maintain there is a need to incorporate into this legislation provisions dealing specifically with safety measures. Canadians are entitled to protection and surely the minimum protection to which they are entitled from this or any government is to know that when they buy drugs in Canada some attempt has been made to ensure that in seeking a cure or remedy they will not be doing themselves serious harm or injury. My own feeling is that if a system for testing and inspecting imported products cannot be worked out, then they should not be allowed into Canada. I ask the minister: Would he himself be prepared to take or allow his family to take such a harmless drug as aspirin if brought in from outside Canada and manufactured under conditions of which we knew nothing? I am sure he would have serious reservations. What then of drugs whose effects are more serious and potentially more harmful? Are Canadians not to have the assurance of government protection when it comes to the reliability of such preparations?

This is why I ask the minister to see that a provision is included in the measure before us requiring that with each import application a complete description and a sample for testing must be forwarded to Ottawa, and that no licence be granted until a clean bill of health in the form of a certificate is secured from the Department of National Health and Welfare. I do not think we can be too careful in dealing with considerations of human health. Human beings are not guinea pigs, though I believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare did refer to the people of Canada on one occasion as acting as guinea pigs over a period of time until there had been an opportunity to examine particular products.

I do not know whether the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Turner) has consulted the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) on this point. If he has not, perhaps he will do so. I hope and trust that he has consulted the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, particularly those in the food and drug directorate, for the benefit and protection of Canadians. I am sure that if he has obtained the view of his officials the Minister of National Health and Welfare must look askance at a procedure which has the effect of breaking down safeguards laboriously erected over the years for the protection of our people. I appeal to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to look into the possibility of incorporating into this legislation measures which will ensure to all Canadians the best and the safest drugs possible.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the problem we are tackling today has concerned the people of Canada for at least ten years. It is almost ten years since the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission was asked to look into the field of prescription drugs and the possibility of monopoly control existing in Canada in this important industry.

The commission reported that the price of drugs was too high. One of the examples given in its report tabled in 1961 was chlorpromazine, perhaps the most commonly used tranquilizer. It had been researched and developed in France and it was selling in Paris in that year for 77 cents while it was being retailed in Toronto for $6.25 for the same amount and the same strength.

We have had a report from the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. We have had a report from the royal commission on health services under Mr. Justice Hall, appointed by the former Conservative government, and we have in our hands a report from a parliamentary committee which has held innumerable meetings on this subject.

I have been amazed at the contributions made by the three speakers so far for the official opposition, the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall), and the hon. member for Wellington-Huron (Mr. Howe). If there is one thing which is obvious it is that they have ignored completely the advice given to the government and the committee by the head of the anti-combines branch, Mr. Henry. They have ignored completely the advice given by the head of the food and drug administration, Dr. Chapman. They have ignored completely the advice given by doctors who direct the operations of the largest hospitals in Canada. They have ignored completely the recommendations and the advice of the auditors appointed by the committee who found that the prices charged by Canadian drug manufacturers are too high. What they have told us could have been—I am not saying it was—written by the paid representatives of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada. Every word of it.

Mr. Rynard: Pretty low.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) indicates that is not so and I take his word for it. I did not say they were; I said they could have been written. The hon. member for Simcoe East says it is "pretty low" to suggest this. I want to deal with some of the things which have been said by spokemen for the official opposition. Here is what the junior member for Halifax said yesterday, and hon. members can find it reported on page 6655 of Hansard. I shall quote just a line or two.

> It is not good enough for us on this side of the house or for the Canadian people to save a few pennies, without measuring value and the safety of the users of the drug. Surely, that is poor business sense.

It is not a matter of pennies, Mr. Speaker. Take the example I just gave of chlorpromazine. It is costing Canadian consumers tens of millions of dollars.

What about safety? We have heard what Mr. Chapman is alleged to have said and what Mr. Henry is alleged to have said. Let me quote precisely what Dr. Chapman, the chief executive officer in the federal drug administration, the man responsible for the safety of drugs, had to say in this connection. What members of the official opposition are saying is that if we pass the legislation before us it will result in a flood of imported drugs which will be sold under generic names, and that drugs sold under generic names are not as safe as those sold under the brand names of the large drug manufacturing companies. In a moment I will deal with the question of how safe the drug companies are. Here is what Dr. Chapman said, and I quote only briefly from his testimony:

> There does not appear to be any significant difference between drugs sold under a generic name and those sold under a brand name. Similarly, imported drugs appeared to be of the same general quality as domestic production.

That is what Dr. Chapman said, but the junior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Wellington-Huron do not want to pay any attention to him. They would rather listen to Dr. Wigle and the other representatives of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada. I believe in the people who work for the government of Canada, who have no special interest, who are not going to make money out of their activities, and who gave the parliamentary committee their honest opinions based on the facts.

I want to deal with another point, generic drugs. From what has been said one would think there would be great danger if the people of Canada were permitted to purchase prescription drugs under their generic names. I am not a doctor, like the hon. member for Simcoe East, but the facts are very plain. We heard the evidence again and again before the committee. I am sure the hon. member for Simcoe East cannot and would not dispute what I am going to say.

There is not a hospital in Canada, whether it be the Royal Victoria in Montreal, the Winnipeg General or the Toronto Sick Children's, which, when it fills prescriptions for people who are really sick—I think it is fair to assume that people in hospital are sicker than people who visit doctors in their offices and take prescriptions to their local druggists —uses brand name drugs. There is not a doubt that the vast bulk of prescriptions filled in Canadian hospitals are filled under the supervision and direction of the best doctors in Canada. So far as I know it is the doctors on the teaching staffs of medical schools who usually staff the big teaching hospitals. They use generic name drugs, some of which are manufactured and some of which are imported into Canada.

I do not think the hon. member for Simcoe East would want this house and the people of Canada to believe for one moment that the doctors directing Canadian hospitals would order prescription drugs under generic names if they were not certain those drugs were adequate, up to a high standard and safe to use. When people talk about the use of generic drugs and warn the public that they are dangerous, I say they are creating a red herring. Consciously or unconsciously they are trying to protect the profit position of the large drug companies in this country.

This bill, when passed, will give legislative effect to some of the large number of recommendations made by the special committee of the House of Commons which dealt with drug costs and prices. It is true that not all its recommendations are being implemented. All during the committee hearings I for one agreed that the food and drug directorate must be given sufficient manpower and money so that every drug which is sold in Canada can be certified safe by the government. I do not care whether a drug is cheap or expensive. If it is not safe it ought not to be used in Canada, it ought not to be prescribed in Canada, it ought not to be sold in Canada. I do not think the government is doing enough in this respect and when we reach the departmental estimates I certainly intend to urge that the drug inspection service be expanded. But that has nothing to do with the bill which we are discussing today. This bill has nothing to do with generic drugs.

The most important change that the bill will make, if passed, is covered in that part of it which deals with trade marks. The bill will permit the importation of brand name drugs, trade mark drugs, if this is thought worth while from a price point of view. What would this mean? I suggest to the hon. member for Simcoe East that he look at the committee's report. He was a member of the committee, but I refer him to the details of its report. I refer the hon. member to page 80 which gives actual examples of the prices of drugs in this country and their prices in other countries. Here I am not talking about generic name drugs but about brand name drugs. Chloromecytin, produced by the Parke, Davis Company, the very drug which the hon. member for Simcoe East was asking questions about during question period today, sells in Canada for $23.64 per 100 tablets. In London, England, the price is $11.18. Under this bill, if a drug wholesaler wants to import Parke, Davis chloromycetin from Great Britain he will be able to buy it there, pay the duty on it, pay the freight, and bring it into Canada more cheaply than he could buy it from Parke, Davis in Canada, with the result that he will be able to offer it to retail druggists at a lower price and that lower price will be passed on to the consumer. That is what the hon. member for Simcoe East wants to oppose.

Mr. Rynard: You put a Canadian out of a job.

Mr. Orlikow: Let us take achromycin. In London it sells for $9.83 but in Canada the price is $17.62. Librium, which the hon. member for Simcoe East knows is a drug that if it is needed is not needed for a day, a week or a month but may be needed for years, sells in Great Britain for $3.02 per 100 tablets but the price in Canada is $7.20. This bill will permit the Canadian consumer to save money. The hon. member for Simcoe East says, what about the Canadian worker? I do not believe that this bill will do anything to the Canadian worker.

Mr. Rynard: You don't know.

Mr. Orlikow: It will do something for some Canadian workers and I will tell you what. We have evidence before the committee that of every dollar which a drug manufacturer spends 30 cents goes for the expenses of its detail men. For every doctor in Canada the drug companies are churning out $5,000 worth of publicity a year. They inundate the poor doctor with material which usually winds up in a wastepaper basket, trying to convince him that a Parke, Davis antibiotic is better than an Eli, Lilly antibiotic. It is the consumer who pays for that. If this bill is passed and a company like National Drugs wants to reduce the price to the consumer we will not see the Canadian drug companies go out of business. I do not believe for a minute that they will go out of business, and I will deal with the question of their profits shortly.

Listening to the hon. member for Simcoe East yesterday weeping about the poor inventor and the poor researcher and how they were going to have the bread taken out of their mouths, one would have thought we were dealing with poor people, but all of the evidence cited in the committee report shows that drug manufacturing is one of the most profitable industries in Canada. The hon. member for Simcoe East wants to give them a licence to continue stealing from the people of Canada. That is what he is saying, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rynard: But they are providing research.

Mr. Orlikow: They can operate their businesses very efficiently. They can do research, but they have been doing very little research. They do not have to lay off workers but that is what they will do if this bill and certain other measures which have been proposed by the committee and others are put into effect. These measures will force them to operate at a legitimate rate of profit and bring down the price of prescription drugs, which are basically necessary to tens of thousands of people in this country, to a reasonable level.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Before I refer to some of the evidence given before the committee, which has been so eagerly and easily ignored by spokesmen for the official opposition, I should like to deal with the responsibilities of so-called ethical or large drug companies. One would think, to listen to the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) and the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall), that these companies are paragons of virtue, never make mistakes and never produce any products which hurt the public. Let me refer those hon. members to an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on April 7, 1966. This is a report on a speech made by Dr. James Goddard, the commissioner of the food and drug administration in the United States. I should like to read the following two sentences:

> The commissioner cited examples of misleading labelling and said that during the past year a staff studying drug advertising has brought complaints involving nearly one-third of the membership of the pharmaceutical association.
> "Those of us in government who are responsible for protecting the lives of American citizens cannot look away, cannot ignore, cannot put aside any acts of irresponsibility that may occur in the market place."

Those are United States companies which are also operating in Canada. Let me read a portion of a story which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on March 1, 1966:

> The U.S. government seized 68 bottles of a heart drug called Peritrate SA yesterday and said claims made for it by the manufacturer, Warner-Lambert Pharmaceutical Co., are false.

Warner-Lambert is not some fly by night company; it is one of the giants of the United States pharmaceutical industry. I refer to another story which appeared in a labour union publication on June 4, 1966. This is what the article had to say:

> More than a third of the nation's drug makers are violating U.S. rules on false and misleading advertising. That startling disclosure came from the head of the food and drug administration, Dr. James L. Goddard. He told a house subcommittee hearing, that these violations include distortion of claims for usefulnesses, misinforming the doctor on the size of the drug test, claims of no side effects despite test evidence to the contrary and failure to modify old ads when new research indicated their message was invalid.

I am sorry the hon. member for Simcoe East has left the chamber because I wanted to indicate that one of the most flagrant violations in respect of failure to give the real information to doctors was perpetrated by the very company in respect of the very drug to which he referred, namely, Parke, Davis and chloromycetin. The New York Times of March 12 of last year made reference to another report by Dr. Goddard and stated:

> Among the commissioner's public moves have been seizure of the heart drug Peritrate SA because the manufacturer, Warner-Chilcott Laboratories, at Morris Plains, N.J., had published "false and misleading" advertising; withdrawal from the market of Elipten, an anticonvulsant drug made by the CIBA Pharmaceutical Co., Summit, N.J., because CIBA allegedly withheld unfavourable test results, and, most recently, banning the manufacture of antibiotic throat lozenges on the grounds that they are ineffective.

I have put these quotations on the record for two reasons, first, because I want the record to show very clearly that the large drug manufacturers and members of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association do not have a completely clean bill of health and, second, because they demonstrate conclusively the contention of some of us, including members of the official opposition on the committee, that we ought not leave the health and welfare of Canadians to the tender mercies of individual drug companies which have their own axes to grind and are interested—I am not critical in this regard because this is how the free enterprise system works—in making a profit. We ought to assure that the food and drug administration of Canada is given the responsibility and takes on the job of making certain that the people of Canada get safe drugs. On that basis I can agree with the hon. member for Halifax. However, that is not the issue here today. The issue is whether this bill will help bring down the price of prescription drugs to Canadian consumers.

The hon. member for Halifax was correct when he said that this bill does not do all the things the committee said it should do. Of course it does not. One of the things the committee said should be done was the removal of the 12 per cent sales tax on prescription drugs. That was accomplished months ago. There are other things which will be done, as I mentioned earlier, by various branches of government, including the food and drug directorate. The bill is a direct result of recommendation No. 21 of the special committee to be found at page 54 of the committee's report. I commend it to the hon. member for Halifax for examination. This is what it says:

> That section 20 of the Trade Marks Act be amended to make clear that no infringement can be claimed where imported drugs are manufactured by a "related" company;—

We have heard a great deal from hon. members about the dangers of unrestricted importation as a result of products being brought in from Great Britain, for example, which might not be the same as those sold in Canada under the same brand name. I find it hard to believe that the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Simcoe East really believed what they were saying. If they did they must believe that there is a difference between the brand name products or prescription drugs made by Parke, Davis, Warner-Chilcott, Eli, Lilly, Lederle or American Cyanamid in Great Britain and those made by the same companies in Canada. I have too much respect for these international drug companies to believe for one minute that achromycin, chloromycetin, gantrisin, equanil and enovid made in Great Britain are different from the same products made in Canada or different from the same drugs produced in various other countries of the world under the same brand name. I am sure these drugs meet the same standards whether they are made in Great Britain, France, Italy, Canada or the United States. Yet that was the implication of what those hon. members were saying. I suggest that it is nonsense.

We have heard a great deal about selective choices. I think I should very briefly put on the record what the witnesses did say about drugs and drug practices. I refer hon. members to the second and final report of the special committee of the House of Commons on drug costs and prices. Let me quote a few sentences from page 12:

> The committee believes that the profits of pharmaceutical companies in Canada appear about twice as high as the level of profits of the manufacturing industry as a whole.

These are the poor defenceless people the hon. member for Simcoe East attempted to defend last evening. He said this bill would take the bread from their mouths; they were going to be cast into perdition and would have to go out of business. This is what the committee said:

> The committee is not concerned primarily with reducing profit below a reasonable level but it is concerned with reducing costs of drugs to the consumer. The committee is convinced that this can be done within the framework of the free enterprise system.

Arising out of this paragraph we have the recommendation to which I have referred and the legislation we are debating today. On page 15 of the report the committee said:

> Secondly, a thorough and comprehensive comparison between Canadian drug prices and those in other countries was undertaken by the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act, which study resulted in the Green Book earlier referred to, and which comparison showed clearly the evidence that Canadian drug prices appeared to be surprisingly high. In fact, one of the conclusions reached by the director was that "prices of drugs in Canada are among the highest in the world."

I commend that sentence to the junior member for Halifax who suggested that we were talking about saving only pennies for the Canadian consumer. The report goes on to say:

> Thirdly, more up to date figures on the comparison of prices of drugs in Canada with those in other countries having relatively advanced economies were presented to the committee by the Consumers' Association of Canada. These figures likewise substantiated the conclusions of the Green Book.

Farther on in the report the committee said:

> Your committee confirms the previous findings now on public record; and it has come to the inescapable conclusion that drug prices in Canada are in fact high and that every fair and reasonable step should be taken to reduce these prices.

The junior member for Halifax was a member of the committee and I presume he endorsed this report when it was prepared. Lord knows, some of us wanted a strong report and the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley), will confirm that we spent many hours twice a week over a period of weeks reaching agreement with members like the junior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand), who wanted to be 200 per cent certain that the committee report did not say anything which might hurt anybody unfairly. Some members of the committee—this certainly applied to me—consented to things that we would not normally have agreed to in order to get the hon. member for Halifax, the hon. member for Saskatoon and the hon. member for Simcoe East to agree to the wording of the report. Yet here we have the first piece of legislation arising out of the unanimous report of the committee and we have members of the official opposition saying in effect: Let us not pass this legislation; let us send it back to some committee.

They do not ask that this matter be sent back to the committee that studied it. Lord no, because that committee understands the situation. They ask that it be sent to the committee on industry, to a committee oriented to industry because industry wants to make as much profit as possible. They make this suggestion because they know such a step would kill this bill, and that is what they want.

Mr. Forrestall: I was talking about safety.

Mr. Orlikow: Let us not draw that red herring across the trail today. I said earlier, and I say it again, that if somebody in the family of the junior member for Halifax was sick enough to be admitted to hospital in Halifax I can assure the hon. member and he knows it—if he does not he should ask his doctor—that the doctor would not write a prescription calling for the drugs of Parke, Davis, Eli, Lilly or any other drug manufacturer. He would prescribe a generic product because that is the way the hospital saves money. Therefore the junior member for Halifax should not draw that kind of red herring across the trail today.

Why are we discussing this question? What are the profits of drug companies? Are we being unreasonable? Are we being unfair? Are they a group of companies that is just getting by or are they in fact, as some of us have said for years, making exorbitantly high profits? The Kefauver committee in the United States proved conclusively, I think, that they are large, wealthy companies which are doing very well and are in fact making an exorbitant profit.

I would not expect the hon. member for Halifax, the hon. member for Simcoe East or the hon. member for Wellington-Huron to believe me in this respect. After all, I am not really a very great supporter of the free enterprise system. But I wish those hon. members would look at appendix E of the report. This appendix was prepared by W. J. Blakely, the committee's chartered accountant. I do not know Mr. Blakely's politics but I am sure that if he was appointed on the recommendation of the government and if he is like 99 per cent of the chartered accountants whom I know, he is a pretty strong supporter of the free enterprise system. Let us look at his report. I shall quote a couple of sections from it. This is what Mr. Blakely said:

It is apparent from Table 1—

In the report.

—that the operating results for 1961-1964 do not indicate any material change in trend from that shown for the period 1953-1960, dealt with by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. Although the average rate of return on sales of pharmaceuticals decreased noticeably in 1961 and 1962, there was a significant recovery in 1963 to a rate of 10.05 per cent, the fourth highest rate in the 12-year period 1953-1964. The average rate of return for this entire period was 9.55 per cent for pharmaceuticals and 5.82 per cent for all manufacturing, the former being approximately 64 per cent higher than the latter.

This is one of the highest profit industries in the country, an industry to whose defence the hon. member for Halifax and other members of the official opposition spring. Let me refer again to the report of the committee's accountant. If you look at page 73 you will see the rate of return on capital invested compared with all other manufacturers. The table shows that for the years 1953 to 1963, a ten year period and a pretty good period to consider, the percentage return on capital investment in the pharmaceutical industry was 19.71 compared with just 10.40 for all manufacturing companies. In other words, their profit margin is almost twice as high as that of all manufacturing companies.

These figures were calculated by the accountant in another way. He showed the rate of return on resources employed. For pharmaceutical companies, for the years 1958 to 1963 the average return was 13.77 per cent while for all manufacturing it was just 7.42 per cent. Again, drug manufacturers are making almost twice as much money as other companies.

I want to repeat what I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, and I shall close on this note. I showed, as did the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) yesterday and on several other occasions, from the records compiled by the experts employed by the committee the tremendous difference in the prices charged in various countries for prescription drugs. I did not deal just with the difference in price between brand name drugs and generic drugs because this is not the time or place to discuss that question. I dealt with the difference in the prices of brand name drugs as between Canada and other countries. One can look at the prices charged in London, Paris, Bern, Switzerland; Rome, Italy; Bonn, Germany and the United States and one will see that the only country in which the prices of prescription drugs are as high or higher than in Canada is the United States. I demonstrated earlier that in Great Britain brand name drugs are sold for half the price they are in this country, or even less. Who is paying these exorbitantly high prices? As the hon. member for St. John's (Mr. Cashin) said, it is the consumer who pays them; it is the poor working man, whether he lives in Halifax, Simcoe East, Winnipeg, Toronto or Vancouver.

Some persons find it necessary to take a drug such as equanil three times a day over a period of weeks or months. If a doctor prescribes equanil the patient may have to pay as much as ten cents for a tablet. When we speak of a person earning $50, $60 or $70 a week having to pay 30 cents a day for a prescription drug we are not talking about a luxury; we are talking about the kind of circumstances where a family would have to make do with one less quart of milk per day.

This is the reason that I, like the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin), was so surprised at the contribution of the junior member for Halifax. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who must have prescriptions filled every week, whether they be for tranquilizers, sedatives or antibiotics, and what is involved is an expenditure which frequently amounts to $5 or $10 per prescription. I am sure that every member of parliament over the years has received many letters from his constituents asking him to do something about this situation. They say they simply cannot afford to pay these high prices. These people are particularly disturbed when they read the profit figures published occasionally by the drug companies because these figures show the fantastic profits of these companies. They write to their members and probably to the minister asking that something be done. Finally the government has acted. Finally we have one part of the package that was suggested by the committee.

I am not suggesting for a moment that the report of the committee contained every recommendation it should have. Like my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman), I believe the best way in which to do something about the price of prescription drugs would be for the government to establish a crown corporation which would manufacture and distribute certain important and basic prescription drugs. It is the doctors of Canada who decide what prescriptions will be written which the pharmacists in the hospitals and in the drug stores across Canada will fill. As a group they write hundreds of thousands of prescriptions a day. Therefore, if we had such a crown corporation we could save the people of Canada tens of millions of dollars a year.

Unfortunately the government has not made such a proposal. I do not expect the minister will ever make such a proposal even if he and I are here for the next 30 years, because I do not think he would consider that kind of solution. However, the legislation before us today is a step in the right direction. It contains one of a whole battery of proposals made by the committee in an effort to bring down the prices of prescription drugs. I hope this legislation will be passed and go into effect very quickly. Although I suppose I am hoping for the impossible I hope that the members of the official opposition will reconsider the impossible position they have taken during the past couple of days. I do not wish to be unfair but I say they are taking a position which can bring comfort only to a very small group of Canadians, namely, the members of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada. I hope that we can complete the discussion of this bill in all stages in the next couple of days, pass it unanimously, and get on with the overdue task of seeing that drug prescriptions are filled at a reasonable cost.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Gatineau): First of all, Mr. Speaker, you will permit me to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) for having congratulated the minister who has proposed the discussion on this bill.

I must remind the hon. member that it is a Liberal government that introduced Bill No. C-190 which will certainly bring about a reduction of drug prices in Canada. This measure had been anticipated for 40 years, and I am very glad that the hon. member was thoughtful enough to thank the government for having at last introduced it.

I hope I will be permitted to take a few very precious minutes to make my humble contribution to consideration of Bill No. C-190, which will bring about, as I have just mentioned, with the legislation already passed, a substantial reduction of drug prices to consumers.

As an answer to the eloquent testimony of my colleagues in opposition and to the arguments which have been put forward, I wish to quote the following Japanese proverb: If you understand everything, you are badly informed. It is impossible to understand everything.

First of all, it is essential to understand that the drug industry cannot be considered in the same way as all the other industries in 1968. It is an industry which belongs to a public service called health, a blessing unequalled by any other on earth. As I said, this service belongs in part to the public sector, and therefore it is up to the government to take the steps necessary to normalize the excessive profits of this important—and I would even say privileged—industry by modifying the Patent Act in such a way as to allow competition in order to bring about a considerable reduction in drug prices. I think that is the whole essence of the bill.

Dealing with the normalization of profits, I find it shameful and scandalous that drug companies realize up to 27.25 per cent profit from their investments, while all the other manufacturing enterprises get an average of 13.25 per cent, according to 1959 figures. It is also scandalous to see that certain companies have spent up to 50 per cent of their annual budget on publicity and that, in 1964, for instance, 34 companies have spent $35 million in this field. On the other hand, it is hypocritically advocated that the Canadian drug industry—to be more exact, I should say 35 drug companies—has spent $9,551,000 in 1960 on research, namely 8.3 per cent of the total amount of their sales. However, what the drug industry is not saying is that it has, in fact, spent only a third of this sum, in Canada that is, $3,349,000, leaving to the headquarters of the drug companies the huge sum of $6,202,000, subscribed to their research fund although research work was done outside Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this borders on legal fraud, and I hope that the Department of National Revenue, in conjunction with the Departments of Industry and Defence Production, will take the necessary steps to check the drain of Canadian dollars or recover the sums spent by our sick when buying very expensive drugs. The money thus spent could contribute to national production or be considered as taxable capital. Since the Canadian drug companies spend an insignificant amount on research, they should, in my opinion, be made to spend the money received by their headquarters for research, in order to find a way to reduce the cost of drugs.

The drug industry in Canada makes a lot of its research through false devices which are only a publicity screen to increase its profits. I do not need to add that the drug industry in Canada is only a subsidiary of the American drug industry which owns nine tenths of our so-called Canadian industry.

We have often heard in Canada about rackets or combines in the drug industry. It has even been implied that every Canadian physician was getting up to $5,000 of advertising literature. In fact, most medical magazines are subsidized by the drug companies and they are often filled, from cover to cover, with colour photographs representing everything that the fertile imagination of publicity agents can think of to praise this or that drug. But what has that to do with the quality, the therapeutic effect of those drugs? It is false representations for a magazine to show a beautiful smiling woman, hardly dressed, merely wrapped in a wonderful oriental-coloured piece of material.

Doctors are deluged with samples. There is systematic brain-washing, always in terms of a given article. That is why the Harley committee recommended that a national formulary should be published to enable doctors to choose themselves the drug to be prescribed.

It has been claimed with great fuss that the Food and Drug Directorate was not up to the task, that, after the passage of this new legislation, its staff and the number of inspections would have to be increased.

I think that the government has done its best since it has increased the number of inspectors in that department from 93 in 1962 to approximately 200 at the present time, that is a percentage of 50 per cent. Canadians will certainly be protected, since the government has undertaken to improve its Food and Drug Directorate which is, by the way, recognized as one of the best in the world, according to Professor Blanc, a world authority in pharmacology, a professor at Geneva University and a member of the World Health Organization.

Now, nobody should try to make us believe that our Food and Drug Directorate is not working properly. I maintain that it is the best in the world, as stated by a competent member of the World Health Organization in Geneva.

For the information of those who are still not convinced, I will say that the number of inspections made by the Food and Drug Directorate gradually increased from 242 in 1963 to 551 in 1966. On November 8, 1967 the Canadian Medical Association sent to the minister a resolution it had adopted and which said:

[English]

This committee recommends that the Canadian Medical Association make known its views to the Registrar General that we are in favour of measures which will reduce drug costs to the patient but that these reduced costs must not be at the expense or safety of drugs or at the expense of retarding the continuing growth of the Canadian drug industry.

[Translation]

In this resolution signed by its executive secretary, the association states clearly that it favours measures likely to lower drug prices but is against certain measures that will lower the quality and safety of drugs. The Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) answered as follows:

[English]

It would be wrong to suggest that there is any degree of uncertainty concerning safety of imported drugs.

[Translation]

I must add that a patent has nothing to do with the quality of a drug. Quality control depends exclusively, first, on the Food and Drug Directorate, a branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and secondly, on the manufacturer's integrity. There has never been any evidence that the quality of a drug was lessened at the expiration of a patent. This brings me to deal briefly with generic drugs.

Even though the Department of National Defence and a very great number of Canadian hospitals have been buying, for a long time, huge quantities of generic drugs, and always with a view to reducing the price of those drugs, their use has never given rise to serious difficulties. As I said, it is quite definite that the government will increase the number of its inspectors in order to guarantee that all drugs coming from Europe or elsewhere will satisfy the standards prescribed by the Food and drug Directorate. This is quite a small price to pay if one considers the great benefit which will derive from this for those who must take drugs but cannot because of the high price of drugs in 1968. I must add here that the officials of the Food and Drug Directorate have been very clear in their evidence and that, according to their views, based on an analysis made by inspectors, the generic drug and the brand name drug provide the same guarantees as to their quality and security. This can be found on page 12 of the Harley report.

Having said this, I should like to make a small digression to philosophize a bit on drugs and to demonstrate that the policy adopted by our government is the best with regard to lower prices, since it takes into account the underprivileged class, the sick and the handicapped, and this is beyond value. Since 1900, and I now refer to an article from the Women's Medical News which appeared in the Montreal La Presse last August, the life expectancy of the American woman has been extended by 25 years. She can hope to live to be 73 while the average man will not reach 70 years of age.

From 1920 to this day, woman's life expectancy has increased by 19 years. Since 1920, thanks to drugs discovered in recent years, humanity benefits from what I shall call "a living bonus". Those "living bonus" years are more than added pages to one's calendar. They are productive, pleasant to live, and not only do they spare human lives but they also spare human beings from handicaps or reduced physical activity.

The invalid's bed and the wheelchair are becoming increasingly rare, which led a research specialist to say: We do not only add years to life expectancy, we add life to each year lived. Ten years ago, 80 per cent of the drugs prescribed today did not exist. As you know, the new drugs relieve arthritis, schizophrenia, pain, and allergies; perhaps that is why members can make speeches. These new drugs cure pneumonia, rheumatic fever, tuberculosis and venereal disease.

New vaccines can inoculate little girls against infantile paralysis and measles. In a few months, we will have a vaccine against the mumps. And we can expect to have a vaccine against German measles within two to five years. Yet about a decade ago, these illnesses seemed to be the common lot of all children, threatening them with possible blindness, disability and deafness. All that goes to show that we must, at all costs, find the means, as I said earlier, to lower drug prices, for when we get to a certain age, which I will call a "living bonus", that is to say years added to our life span by medical science, we can no longer afford to stay in good health, often because we do not have the financial means, or because of limited financial means, and mostly because of the high price of drugs.

It is well known that, when we get beyond a certain age, the number of prescriptions we use undergoes a noticeable yearly increase, due to the fact that we must often maintain our physical health by the use of new and efficient drugs. We must therefore protect this group of people to whom we have given this "living bonus" through our modern medical discoveries, our social security and preventive medicine programs. Through this legislation, we could add a supplement to this "living bonus".

It must be noted that this bill is practically a statement of principles to create fair competition which will lead to an administrative program designed to set the price of drugs at a level everyone can afford. It is to be hoped that the Canadian drug industry will recognize that this legislation is justified and that it will take this opportunity to reduce the price of drugs in the near future. If they are intelligent—and they have proved it in their brief—the drug people will recognize that the best competition is still the one that can be avoided.

[English]

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree with earlier speakers that this is a very complicated and important piece of legislation. This much was indicated by the minister sponsoring Bill No. C-190, because he required almost an hour and a half to explain all its ramifications. He made a well prepared presentation on behalf of his department in defence of his proposed action to allow easier entrance of foreign produced drugs into Canada.

[Mr. Isabelle.]

To make my position clear, Mr. Speaker, I want to state at the outset, and state emphatically, that I support the intended effect of the bill, which is to make drug prices in Canada as reasonable as possible. I emphasize the words "intended effect of the bill", because what might be considered short term benefits might not in turn produce long term benefits to drug purchasers, drug manufacturers or to the economy of Canada as a whole. Proper legislative enactments to provide drugs at reasonable prices for all Canadians, particularly the elderly and low income groups, will certainly receive my support and I am sure will receive the support of my colleagues on this side of the house. I have received letters from constituents in connection with the present prices of drugs and I have assured the writers that we on this side of the house will do all in our power to see that prices are set at reasonable levels. I should like to repeat the statement I just made. We want to make sure that proper pricing methods are followed and that proper legislative enactments are passed to achieve the desired results. Again I emphasize the word "proper". Perhaps we might make some improvements to the bill before it finally passes.

I was a part time member only of the special committee on drug costs and prices. I had to yield my place on that committee owing to the demands of the standing committee on transport and communications. Being on the committee for only a short time I therefore cannot speak with the authority of the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall), or the hon. member for Wellington-Huron (Mr. Howe) on all the testimony given before the committee. They have put their comments on the record and have made it clear that there are serious doubts that Bill No. C-190 will give definite assurance of long term benefits in the public interest. The hon. member for Wellington-Huron particularly emphasized the absolute necessity to ensure complete safety of all drugs that are made available to the public, especially those drugs that are imported. I will not take up the time of the house to repeat his warnings but I certainly want to bring this matter to the attention of those who will be voting on this bill later in the week.

I am mainly concerned about the words on the front page of the bill, "An Act to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act." In this connection I wish to read a short paragraph from a letter I received from the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada.

> Bill C-190 essentially would abolish normal patent and some trade mark rights as they relate to prescription medicines made in Canada. It has far-reaching implications in that it represents a serious attack on the patent system, a fundamental facet of any competitive society and a matter of significance to the Canadian economy. We believe it might set an unfortunate precedent.

That paragraph emphasizes my concern about what appears to be a dangerous tampering with patent rights in Canada. I am not an expert on patents so I consulted Webster's international dictionary, third edition, and under "patent" I found the following definition:

> A government grant of a monopoly right that gives one who invents or discovers a new and useful process, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or a new and useful improvement thereof the exclusive right for a specific term of 17 years with certain rights of extension to make, use or sell his invention or discovery.

The bill refers to compulsory licensing, and in this regard I consulted the 1965 edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Though the paragraph refers to Great Britain, what it says has application in this country.

> Since the original object of the patent laws was the establishment of new industries, the main grounds for a grant of a compulsory license are that the patented invention is not being worked within the country—

I underline the words "within the country".

> —to the fullest practicable extent, or that the demand is not being met on reasonable terms, or is being met by importation in place of home manufacture.

To be fair I must also read the following paragraph that appears in the Encyclopaedia Britannica:

> Applications for compulsory licenses relating to food or medicine may be made at any time and without alleging abuse of monopoly. Such compulsory licenses are to be granted unless there is good reason for refusal, and are to be on such terms as will secure that the patented article shall be available to the public on the lowest terms consistent with fair remuneration to the patentee.

I cannot say too much about fair remuneration with regard to patents but, according to certain testimony presented to the committee by the controller of patents, I understand that in these cases the payment of royalties would amount to a mere pittance. From what I have heard and read and received by way of comment in letters and briefs, it seems to me that patent rights are an essential incentive to adequate pharmaceutical research in Canada. I hold no brief for the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada, and I stress that. Some speakers have suggested that perhaps we are speaking on its behalf. I hold no brief for the association but it is not difficult to share its concern about the effect that Bill C-190, if passed in its present form, will have on future drug research and development in Canada. In its brief the association says:

> Bill C-190, which would have the effect of abolishing patents, could never be considered conducive to "continued and increased scientific research in Canada."

The brief goes on to say:

> Patents are generally recognized as having a twofold value. They provide an incentive to discovery and encourage the disclosure of scientific information from which other researchers benefit.

In this connection it is fitting to put on record the 1967-68 statement of policy of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. No doubt each member of the house received a copy of that document. In one of its pronouncements on policy the chamber of commerce said, as noted in the P.M.A.C. brief:

> The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, in its 1967-68 statement of policy, has urged that the government "implement a review of the Patent Act with respect to its being strengthened so as to encourage research and invention in Canada."

The legislation now before us is based on the idea that Canada can get along without its pharmaceutical industry. I am concerned about that. If Canada becomes dependent on other countries for vital drug supplies as may happen if this bill passes, her national health could be impaired in times of emergency.

I shall put on the record the extent of the pharmaceutical industry in Canada as outlined in the brief from the association:

> Canada's pharmaceutical industry makes an appreciable and growing contribution to the national economy. It employs over 10,000 Canadians—of whom 2,500 are university graduates—and helps to create jobs for an estimated 25,000 more in firms providing supplies and services for the industry. The member companies of our Association have a total capital investment of nearly $100 million.

The brief goes on to say:

> Their exports in 1966, as shown in a recent survey conducted jointly by the Department of Industry and the Association, amounted to some $20 million, a figure which these companies are continually striving to increase. The proposed legislation not only would put an end to any hopes of this export development, but would also further upset Canada's negative balance of payments.

I thought I should read those paragraphs into the record because they indicate the extent of the pharmaceutical industry in Canada.

With regard to research, I have just received a copy of the first edition of a pamphlet put out by the Canadian Association for the Advancement of Health Sciences. The pamphlet refers to medical research and health sciences, and I think the latter aspect also includes research in drugs. In one part the pamphlet says:

> The publication of this bulletin for the benefit of those involved in medical research or interested in the improvement of the research environment in Canada is in response to a growing public and professional awareness of the importance of the health sciences which has been building up in recent years.

A few paragraphs farther on it says:

> Unless a more favourable environment for medical research—

I include pharmaceutical research under this heading.

> —is provided as a matter of urgency, the skilled manpower on which medical education and health care depend will be inadequate both in quantity and quality.

• (5:40 p.m.)

In this connection, perhaps I might refer briefly to something which appears in a booklet issued in January by the Department of National Health and Welfare. It contains an article entitled "Measuring Medication Costs" which includes a whole series of price indices, founded on 1949 as the base year. The writer states:

> The drugs on the market in 1949 represented the standard of health care of that period. The price of these particular drugs over the years changed only slightly as shown by the consumer price index. Changes have occurred, however, in the drugs actually prescribed by physicians. Instead of using the same drugs as in 1949, physicians are now using many new "wonder drugs" which usually cost more than the older, more established products.

We are then given a list showing how prices have changed. The article goes on:

> If physicians did not use any new drugs but continued to prescribe the same medication as in 1949 the average prescription price would have changed very little. Now we can ask the question, why do physicians prescribe new drugs?
> The answer is that either the new products are better than the previously existing products or they control or they cure a disease for which there previously was no effective drug treatment. Within the last decade, for example, we have for the first time developed effective drugs to treat glaucoma, fungus infections, mental depression and high blood pressure. The treatment of other diseases has also improved through the introduction of new antibiotics, tranquilizers, vaccines and anti-cancer drugs.

I quote from this article because I believe it is germane to the problem we are now facing. We are bound to be concerned about the new drugs which are becoming available and the cost of research necessary to produce them.

Perhaps I might return to the question of patents. Any abolition of a patent right tends in my opinion to create a perilous precedent which might make it easier to abrogate other rights. I have had some experience in connection with copyright and I believe these two fields are to a certain extent related. According to the Encyclopaedia Britannica "copyright" is a term currently used to designate the rights secured by the laws of civilized countries to authors of literary, dramatic, musical and artistic works to protect them against unauthorized copying of those works. To bring the situation closer to us, I suggest that tampering with patent rights could open up other areas such as copyright and make them liable to infringement. We have all heard statements at the end of National Hockey League, World Series baseball and Grey Cup games that they cannot be rebroadcast without authorization because there is a copyright protecting the original broadcast. I suggest that copyright and patent laws are in the same category and that changes made in one of these fields could over the years become the thin end of a wedge making it possible to introduce changes in the other.

Perhaps I should offer some suggestions to the minister for his consideration following these remarks on patents. I am sure this matter will be the subject of discussion during the clause by clause study in committee. It has been claimed that drug manufacturers are spending too much on the promotion and distribution of their products. The figure often quoted is 30 cents on the operating dollar. I certainly agree that this is a high figure and that it does add to the cost of drugs to the consumer.

I would remind hon. members that the committee which went into this subject recommended that the food and drug directorate issue a monthly publication to medical doctors outlining the effectiveness of all drugs available at that particular time and commenting on their safety and efficacy. I believe such a publication would be of great value. It would be official and authoritative and it would list all those drugs which the directorate considered to be most effective in particular cases. It would command the attention of all doctors who prescribe medication for their patients. In my view the availability of such a publication would undoubtedly reduce the cost of promotion to pharmaceutical manufacturers. They would not have to use 30 cents of every dollar to advertise the new drugs which they have created through research. I suppose it would still be necessary to employ what they call detail men to call on doctors and talk to them. However, I believe a monthly publication outlining all these drugs would be of great assistance and would cut down the cost of drugs to the public.

I took down one quotation from the minister in the course of the hour and a half during which we listened to him yesterday. He said that during any given interval of time the incidence of disease was far from uniform and those who incurred the highest drug bills because of their disabilities were likely to have incomes substantially below the average.

I agree with this statement. I myself have been contacted by people who have had the greatest difficulty in paying for the drugs they need. In this connection I have a suggestion to make which the minister might well consider. Instead of taking action which would certainly curtail the operations of the pharmaceutical industry in Canada, I suggest that people with incomes substantially below the average should be given special consideration by the government. I am not proposing any form of means test in this connection. The government has taken the position that the plan they introduced for the payment of supplementary pensions to people with low incomes does not involve any form of means test or needs test.

My suggestion is that the minister propose to his colleagues in the government that those receiving supplementary pensions be provided with necessary drugs at minimum cost. Such a course would cost the government far less, in my opinion, than the revenue which would be lost in taxation if the pharmaceutical industry in Canada were curtailed or lost. Perhaps this proposal could be considered in more detail during the committee stage. In the meantime I leave it with the minister to ponder.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at great length this evening but I do wish to make some statement on Bill C-190. I think it very important that we as members of the House of Commons try to satisfy the insistent demand that something be done about the high cost of drugs, but I have found the public to be singularly sceptical about our ability to affect drug prices. Members of the public point to the failure of the elimination of the sales tax on drugs to reduce their price to any degree.

There is a problem and it is important that we tackle it squarely and give the public the assurance that we have their best interests at heart. The discussions in the special committee have been referred to at length. One of the most interesting things in that committee was the story, repeated over and over again, of how Canadian drug companies had become wholly owned American subsidiaries owing to the tax policies of successive federal governments, particularly inheritance and death duty taxes. I expect that later this week we will be presented with a report on United States investment in Canada, but I am sure that report will not contain one chapter showing how the tax policies of Canadian governments provided the incentive and rationale for United States investment in Canada.

Those who weep now about the effect which this bill may have on the Canadian drug industry have not paid full attention to the testimony given to the standing committee. I draw the attention of hon. members specifically to the submission of the government of Alberta to that committee. I have no intention of reading it all but I am sure the chairman and the members of the standing committee recall it well. Indeed, one member of the committee remarked that it could well have a cover slapped on it and be handed in as the committee's report. I believe the Alberta submission was influential in the drafting of the committee's final report and influenced the minister's opening statement yesterday. I suggest that if the bill is passed and the minister is given a boost by it he will on occasion, on his travels across the country, give some credit to the submission of the government of Alberta.

Chapter 3 of the Alberta government's submission specifically relates to the bill we are considering. It deals with the influence of the legal and regulatory framework on Canadian drug prices and asks why the level of Canadian drug prices is the highest in the world. It lists several of the factors that influence drug prices, whether the drugs are manufactured in Canada or imported into the country, and I quote some of these factors:

—presence or absence of process and product patents in the foreign country; tariffs, quotas, or other impediments to free foreign trade; presence or absence of price controls on drugs; the status of the existing drug industry in a given country, and similar factors.

I believe that by far the most important is patent policy, and it is not surprising that this bill deals with that aspect in an effort to provide some relief from the high cost of drugs. The Alberta submission goes on to say:

In Canada there are five major elements in the legal framework which influence the level of drug prices directly and indirectly.

It lists these as the patent and trade mark laws, tariffs and anti-dumping laws, the federal sales tax, the food and drug laws, and legal sanction for the practice of brand name prescribing. It goes on to say that the adoption of compulsory licensing in the United States would be of very great benefit to Canada but points out that this is not likely to happen. It adds:

The best solution would then seem to lie in the area of enabling those presently price competitive elements of the Canadian drug market—chiefly the small, Canadian-owned firms—to be able to compete more effectively with the major foreign patent-holding firms. Measures should also be taken to induce new entry by price competitors. If about 90 per cent of the Canadian drug industry is presently controlled by firms which do not choose to take advantage of compulsory licensing, then steps should be taken to increase the viability of the existing competitive segment of the market, and to introduce new competition, if necessary from abroad, in the interest of lowering Canadian drug prices.

To that end the submission presented a variety of recommendations. It discussed the possibility of the complete abolition of drug patents but felt this would not be the wisest course for the government to take. Some of its recommendations were:

1. Compulsory licences to import should be granted, subject to the payment of reasonable royalties.

Royalties still remain.

3. Every effort should be made to further expedite the process of acting on compulsory licence applications—

4. Section 19 of the Patent Act should be amended to allow provincial governments and their agencies as well as the government of Canada to use any patented drug, subject to the payment of reasonable compensation—

6. The schedule of tariffs on drugs should be reviewed by the Tariff Board with a view toward:

(a) Limiting the liability of drugs to tariff duties to those drugs of a class or kind actually made in Canada—

It goes on to add:

7. Liability for anti-dumping duty should be limited to drugs of a kind actually made in Canada, where "kind" is defined in terms of the active ingredient.

It ends with this recommendation:

14. If the above reforms do not succeed in reducing drug prices to competitive levels in a reasonable period of time, drug patents in Canada should be completely abolished.

We who sat on the committee know that its report was considerably watered down. Some of us who attended all the committee hearings, and were particularly impressed with submissions such as the one from the Alberta government, had cause to wonder just how much we could give away, how much we could concede and still have a report left that would produce any noticeable affect on the price of drugs. I trust that the report was not watered down so as to be without effect. I trust that this legislation, in spite of what is being said by the official opposition, will prove of benefit to the public.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the question to be raised at ten o'clock this day is as follows: The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Schreyer), Air Canada—Winnipeg—transfer of employees from base.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

PATENT ACT—TRADE MARKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner for the second reading of Bill No. C-190, to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act.

Mr. H. R. Ballard (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I rise with a certain amount of trepidation to say a few words in connection with Bill C-190, which is before the house tonight, because on occasions during this debate hon. members of this party, when putting forward what I consider entirely reasonable points of view, have been harangued by hon. members opposite. I have in mind particularly the unwarranted and ungentlemanly outburst by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin). I am sorry he is not in the house at this moment.

The speech made by that hon. member did not do him credit, nor was it a credit to the decorum usually present in this house. I should like hon. members to contrast that speech with the speech of the eminent and hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Isabelle), who this afternoon delivered a speech worthy of a man of his profession which contained a great deal of invaluable information for the consideration of hon. members during their consideration of this bill. I appreciated his speech and I have told him so personally. I think it should be placed on record that many of us consider his speech as a real contribution to the debate.

On the other hand, the hon. member for St. John's West displayed his own political philosophy, when he suggested the art of politics was to arouse public sympathy in order to obscure the merit in the arguments of one's opponents. I suggest that is exactly what he did. He tried to arouse hon. members of the house in respect of an emotional point in order to obscure the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall).

No one on this side of the house has made any pretence that the cost of drugs in this country is anything but high. No one has pretended that we would like to see anything but lower cost. We are all aware of the fact that drugs represent a very expensive commodity in this country. This is an item of cost that is felt particularly by those who can least afford to pay for them out of their budgets. I refer, of course, to the elderly and the sick. During my experience I have become aware of individuals on old age pensions who are faced almost continuously with drug bills amounting to $60 or $70 per month. Naturally these people cannot afford to meet this expense at present pension levels.

When members of the committee were considering the cost of drugs as the background of this legislation they were informed on many occasions of the high costs in this country. I remember reading a newspaper article in connection with one of the submissions to that committee. Although I do not know where it may be found in the committee proceedings, I have read a newspaper report based on it.

At this time I should like to refer to a pamphlet entitled "Sugar Coated Pill" by William Stephenson. This article appeared as an insert at about the middle of this publication and it stated:

> During the latest House of Commons committee investigation into drug costs and prices, it was revealed (on December 13, 1966) that Smith, Kline and French, a staunch P.M.A.C. member, sold 2.2 pounds of stelazine to druggists for about $57,000, despite the fact that this amount can be imported into Canada, all taxes and duties paid, for as little as $200. This would represent a profit to SK & F of a cool 28,000 per cent!

I wanted to put that passage on the record, Mr. Speaker, to indicate to the house that we in this party are not blind to the fact that drug prices in this country are high, too high. But we want to put forward at the same time a warning that price alone cannot enter into the consideration of this bill.

The Department of National Health and Welfare distributes a monthly publication called "Canada's Health and Welfare". The January issue deals with the question of the cost of drugs in this country. I found this article very interesting. It indicates that the drugs that were common in 1949 are being sold today at about the same price as they were in 1949. The new drugs that have been developed in the intervening years account for the large increase in the cost of prescription drugs. As a matter of fact there is in this article a chart covering the consumer price index, which indicates that in the year 1949, which is taken as the base year, prescriptions were at 100 and in 1966 they were at 100.4. As I indicated earlier, this covers the drugs that were in existence in 1949 but does not include the "wonder" drugs that have been added since. This article then says:

> The drugs on the market in 1949 represented the standard of health care of that period. The price of these particular drugs over the years changed only slightly as shown by the consumer price index. Changes have occurred, however, in the drugs actually prescribed by physicians. Instead of using the same drugs as in 1949, physicians are now using many new "wonder" drugs which usually cost more than the older, more established products.

The article includes a chart indicating the average price of a prescription. In 1952 the average price was $1.82; in 1964, 12 years later, the average price was $3.31. The new drugs which have been discovered and placed on the market in the intervening years are to a greater extent being prescribed by physicians than the drugs that were in common use in 1949.

Another chart indicates that family expenditures on prescription drugs in 1955 amounted to $23.60 per year, whereas in 1964 they amounted to $39. In other words, families are using more costly drugs to cure diseases than they did in 1955. Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that we are aware of the high cost of drugs in Canada today. I think it is a fallacy for the government to throw back at us the suggestion that we are not mindful of the problems of people in this country when they are faced with drug prices such as are in effect today.

We are not entirely sure, though, that this bill as it stands will have any effect on the cost of drugs. There is no assurance that the cost of drugs to the average Canadian citizen will drop as a result of the passage of this bill. The government says that theoretically, the cost will drop but there is no way of knowing for sure that this will actually happen.

I have here a copy of a letter that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press. This letter was written by Dr. George F. Wright, professor of chemistry at the Univeristy of Toronto, and says in part:

> There is no assurance that John Turner's Bill C-190 will lower drug prices on any but a temporary basis. His gambit, that compulsory licences to sell dosage forms (pills, capsules, etc.) imported from abroad will increase competition, and thus lower prices, is a fantasy in which the major drug companies of Canada are somehow to be held in chains that will compel them to produce regardless of profit.

We should pay attention to what is said by an impartial observer from the University of Toronto who has no connection with politics or the drug industry, and who is probably involved in research at that university. I would say that he has no political interest in putting forward this point. He has made a responsible statement and we should accept it as such.

The basis of my argument, Mr. Speaker, is that it is absolutely essential for the future health of the people of this country that the government assure that the quality of drugs supplied is kept at a very high standard. This is not something new that was dreamed up by the committee, nor is it something that was brought out as a red herring by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall). It is a matter that has been considered for a considerable length of time. As a matter of fact, going back as far as the royal commission on health services under Judge Emmett Hall, this question was very much in the forefront of people's minds.

I should like to quote from the report of the Hall commission at page 369 of Volume I as follows:

> The Canadian Pharmaceutical Association told us that "the degree of quality control of drug products that is mandatory under present regulations of the Food and Drugs Act is not such as to give sufficient assurance to the pharmacist that any given batch of the products of all manufacturers will meet the required specifications".

In other words, even several years ago it was recognized that the food and drugs administration could not guarantee the purity and quality of drugs being supplied to people in this country. Further down on the same page of the report we find these words:

> Dr. Morrell further expressed the opinion that in order to adequately test and check drugs in Canada the food and drug directorate would have to triple its staff of inspectors and laboratory personnel.

This brings us to the present moment when we are considering a bill that will change the Patent Act, ostensibly following the recommendations of the Harley report, the final report of the special committee of the House of Commons on drug costs and prices. But I submit that the Harley report contained 23 recommendations, and practically all of them have been ignored. It appears that the minister has picked out one and has dealt with it in isolation without giving consideration to the other recommendations contained in the report.

The members of the committee certainly were concerned about the quality of drugs in this country. Perhaps I might pick out at random a few of their recommendations. In recommendation No. 3 they felt that the food and drug directorate should publish not less than once a month an informative bulletin to the medical profession giving complete details on drugs and their actions, and reviewing major drug uses in Canada. Several recommendations were passed over entirely. In No. 16 they recommended that the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association and all provincial pharmaceutical associations, faculties of pharmacies and the provincial governments should meet to discuss the practice of pharmacy in Canada, bearing in mind the following matters:

1. Ethics of the profession particularly concerning advertising and merchandising, and the role of discount and mail order houses;

2. Qualifications and training necessary for dispensing pharmacists;

3. Promotion of competition within the profession, in the public interest;

4. Distribution of pharmacies, both in heavily populated urban areas and less developed rural areas;

5. Ownership of pharmacies by non-pharmacists;

The minister has picked out one recommendation in isolation and has dealt with it. As I said before, members of the committee were quite aware of the necessity to maintain the quality of drugs. At page 39 of the report of the special committee we find this:

Your committee believes that in no circumstances should the general policy of permitting compulsory licensing applications for patents relating to foods and medicines be eliminated.

I think it is important to pause here to say that the present unamended Patent Act does allow for compulsory licensing. This procedure under the act has not been used widely by the drug industry, a privilege which has existed since about 1923. Very few applications have been made and practically all applications which have been received have been approved. The federal government seeks to amend subsection 3 of section 41 so as to make the issuance of this compulsory licence automatic.

The quotation continues:

Indeed, your committee has four recommendations regarding compulsory licensing

(1) Applicant for compulsory licence to have food and drug directorate approval;

In the suggested new act the approval is not necessary. It specifies that the commissioner of patents shall advise the food and drug directorate that a compulsory licence has been issued. The committee also recommended the following:

(2) Extension of compulsory licensing to imports;

(3) Payment of food and drug directorate inspection services outside Canada; and

(4) Licences by right in cases of undue delay;

However, the members of the committee also felt that the patentees had some rights. The following appears at page 38 of the committee's report:

There is no doubt whatsoever that the manufacturer who introduces a new drug should be allowed certain time to promote the drug and establish his position in the market following appropriate clinical testing and satisfying the requirements of the food and drug directorate, so that for a period of time at least he retains his monopoly position.

If I might come back to the question of quality control, I should like to say that I believe that it has been overlooked in this legislation. I am supported in this view by a chemist, Dr. D. J. Marshall of Hampstead, Quebec. Dr. Marshall is employed as a chemist by one of the drug producing firms, and says in part:

One wonders, also, whether the government has given adequate consideration to the matter of quality control of drugs. I doubt if the layman has any conception of the effort invested by reputable pharmaceutical manufacturers in devising analytical procedures which can be used to verify the quality of each batch of finished product. There are no generally applicable procedures for doing this; each new drug presents its own special problems, often requiring a fairly major research effort before quality and uniformity can be assured.

Should we be concerned about quality? Here is another letter. This is from the Chemical Institute of Canada and is signed by Dr. R. L. Salvador. I shall quote part of this letter:

As a professional group composed of scientists involved in all aspects of drug research, manufacturing and quality control, we have a special responsibility to express our grave concern at the unfavourable and undesirable impact that the provisions of this bill will have on drug research, drug manufacturing, and drug safety in Canada.

The impact will be to reduce the safety of drugs, to reduce the amount of drug manufacturing in Canada, and to threaten the very existence of drug research in Canada.

I have quoted from several sources to indicate that we are not alone when we express concern about the continuation of quality drug manufacturing and importation in this country. I am now looking at a page from Hansard for October 20 when the bill to set up the department of consumer affairs was being discussed on second reading. The newest member of the administration, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), was good enough to put his thoughts on the record at that time. I think one must respect the point of view put forward by a person who has just recently been appointed to the cabinet. At page 3342 of Hansard the hon. member for Verdun said this:

I think that before making important changes, for instance in the field of patents, copyrights and trade marks, he—

The hon. member is referring to the minister:

—should discuss them with the other ministers involved, because he may find these desirable changes are not practicable and cannot be effective unless another minister brings forward necessary legislation.

In that same report it was proposed that the recommendations of the Heller report—

I believe he means the Hilliard report.

—be implemented and that before the minister decides to adopt certain recommendations of the Harley committee to alter the Patent Act, the Copyright Act or the Trade Marks Act he should make certain that the food and drug directorate is enlarged and given the proper funds to ensure that the drugs flowing into this country as a result of these changes are subjected to the most rigid scrutiny.

So, there you have it, Mr. Speaker. People from various parts of our society are concerned about the maintenance of quality in the drug industry. Who is responsible for the maintenance of quality? Is it the food and drug directorate? I am not too sure about this. I found a very interesting article in the Medical Services Journal for March, 1967, which left me in a quandry as to who is responsible for the quality of drugs. I should like to quote from this article, which was prepared by Mr. N. G. Allmark, assistant director general, food and drug directorate:

It is not, however, a proper function of the food and drug laboratories to act as a control laboratory for the industry. The first responsibility for safety and potency is put squarely on the manufacturer.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Here we are, Mr. Speaker, asking the food and drug directorate to police an industry over which the directorate claims no control in so far as quality is concerned. To whom do we look for control of quality in drugs? It is not good enough to say we are going to be able to import drugs from every country in the world, countries in which we have no right of inspection, countries that do not have the sanitary standards or supervision of manufacturing procedures as we have in Canada and the United States.

In the past we have, to a large extent, relied on the integrity of the manufacturer to maintain quality control of drugs. Surely the legislation that is proposed now should be matched with some other type of legislation in order to maintain that control. As Mr. Allmark has said, the first responsibility for safety and potency is put squarely on the manufacturer.

In the same publication another food and drug officer, Mr. J. R. Smyth points out the lack of investigation by our own officers of manufactured drugs outside our country. On page 276 of this journal, I find this:

At the present time, many of the imported products are tested outside of Canada and we have had some difficulty in obtaining satisfactory certificates of analysis which clearly indicate that the products have been sufficiently well tested.

This is my main argument, and with this I will close: It is all well and good to propose legislation to change certain facets of the laws of this country but you cannot change an act such as the Patent Act without at the same time putting forward satisfactory measures to ensure that the control of quality will be retained in the drug industry of this country. There are other ways of combating the price of drugs. One very novel way, and I thought very sensible, was put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Pascoe). This would be a far more practical solution than amending the Patent Act as this bill purports to do. I should like to see the minister give serious consideration to the proposal put forward this afternoon, rather than go ahead with Bill No. C-190. The Canadian public health should not be jeopardized from the importation of drugs of a lower standard.

Mr. Raymond Rock (Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the minister upon the interesting remarks he made concerning Bill No. C-190 as well as his explanation of the five main steps that were being taken to achieve the government's objective. One of these was the removal of the federal sales tax, and another was the introduction of Bill No. C-190. I am not too happy about this part of it. This minister also tabled an international price comparison. As Pat Burns, a radio commentator with CKGM in Montreal would say, I hope this is not another snow job.

After listening to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) this afternoon, I must say it sounded like a snow job, definitely an emotional snow job. I wonder if the hon. member for St. John's West would play the same tune if we were introducing legislation today which would permit the importation of cheaper fish from Russia or Portugal? I wonder if he would feel the same if we were introducing legislation which would stop the useless, cruel slaughter or, as many of us might say, murder, of helpless white baby seals? I believe his emotions would be different from what they were today. In fact, I believe he would play a different tune on his fiddle if he had a few pharmaceutical companies in St. John's, Newfoundland.

There are many pharmaceutical companies in Montreal, and 21 of them are in the western district of that city. These companies have employed thousands of people from this district and many graduates from the universities of McGill and Montreal. I am concerned about their future if Bill No. C-190 is adopted.

The old Canadian Patent Act, in so far as drugs are concerned, allowed one to protect the process by which the drug was made. This was called a process patent. The act did not allow the patenting of the actual product, which is called a product patent, and is something which the United States permits. This process patent is weaker protection than a product patent. In addition, under section 41 of the old Patent Act, the government had the added safeguard, in case they felt there was a monopoly on the drug, of issuing a compulsory licence to another manufacturer who applied for it. In the past, when a compulsory licence was granted the drug had to be manufactured in Canada, a provision which was felt to be reasonable since it provided jobs for Canadians in manufacturing, packing, research and quality control. Many of these people were university graduates. The inventing company usually manufactured in Canada, so the situation was stable.

The new amendments to the Patent Act would change the situation to the extent of granting a compulsory licence for imported drugs, that is drugs made in other countries, such as Hong Kong, Japan, Czechoslovakia, Mexico or Italy where labour costs are definitely lower. Perhaps these amendments will lead to a reduction in costs, but only by jeopardizing Canadian jobs, the future of many university graduates and the pharmaceutical industry established in Canada. At the moment, the industry employs 10,000 people and helps to create jobs for an estimated 25,000 more in firms providing supplies and services.

Also jeopardized by Bill No. C-190 is the development of research in Canada. The weakening of patent protection will discourage research endeavours, as well as investment and expansion. In 1967 there were 40 pharmaceutical manufacturers that spent $12 million in research, and I understand that there is a projected increase of 50 per cent by 1970. If this bill passes, I feel that this projected increase may become a decrease and that many graduates will have to look elsewhere in the future. The expansion of this industry will cease. In some instances it is possible that operations will be phased out, because as a result of this bill parliament will give the international companies the opportunity to supply Canada with drugs from their home bases.

The tenor of the amendments to the Patent Act also destroys, in effect, inventors' property rights. This, in turn, destroys incentive. What I feel is particularly unfair is that the patent changes are restricted only to drugs. In effect, Mr. Speaker, this means that a relatively minor industry is fighting for survival against regulations that are to the detriment of the established drug industry in Canada. Once the principle of interference with patent rights is accepted—and this is interference—I feel that the incentives provided by our own society will gradually be destroyed.

I do not believe any minister in this house would suggest that we should import wheat from South America because it may be cheaper than the price of wheat in Canada, and that therefore our daily bread would be cheaper. This of course would be to the detriment of our farmers. Neither do I believe that the minister would dare suggest that we should import milk, butter or fish from a country where labour costs were cheaper than ours. Yet he is bringing in legislation that I believe will jeopardize the pharmaceutical industry in Canada. This is an industry that employs 10,000 people and supports another 25,000, but this bill will kill that industry while it is still in its infancy.

This legislation has left the rational and entered the emotional field. The latest amendments are extreme and potentially destroy initiative and incentive. I feel strongly, Mr. Speaker, that this bill may be unnecessary and that if it is allowed to go through on emotional grounds it will destroy the property rights that are inherent in our society.

We all want to see drugs sold at the lowest possible price. I think that government inquiries and surveys of this field are good if they point out weaknesses within Canada that can be corrected. However, there is a difference between constructive legislation and legislation that is punitive, and I feel that Bill C-190 as it stands falls into the latter category unless this is proven to the contrary.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that Dr. Malcolm Brown, chairman of the Medical Research Council of Canada, is preparing or has prepared a report on research in the pharmaceutical industry, which may have an important bearing on this bill. In addition, I understand that the Canadian Institute of Patents and Trade Marks, the chairman of which is Mr. H. Grey, is preparing a brief on Bill No. C-190, as is the Canadian Manufacturers Association. The Chemical Institute of Canada has sent an important brief concerning this bill to the government and has also sent telegrams to members requesting that the institute be heard in the committee. Also the faculties of pharmacy of the Universities of Montreal, Toronto and British Columbia have protested Bill No. C-190.

I have received many telegrams and letters from people connected with the pharmaceutical industry and I should like to put on record some of the short ones. I have before me a telegram addressed to me and reading as follows:

Seriously concerned with actual Bill C-190 for its negative effect on pharmaceutical research in Canada. Please withhold support.

D. Klupfel

Another one addressed to me reads:

Please see that Bill C-190 is returned to committee for study. Unfair to Canadian medical research, my livelihood.

Dr. A. J. Manson, Ph.D.

Another telegram to me reads:

Bill C-190 highly detrimental to pharmaceutical-medical research in Canada. Usefulness in reducing drug prices questionable. Writing arguments in a letter which follows. Please hold support of Bill C-190 during second reading.

Dr. S. N. Sehgal

Another one sent to me reads:

The Chemical Institute of Canada, medicinal chemistry group has submitted an important brief to Mr. John Turner on February 6 concerning C-190.

A copy is now in the mail for your attention. We believe this legislation deserves committee study by trade, finance and economic affairs, and by the industry, research and energy development committee.

Sent to Messrs. Drury, Winters, Sharp, MacEachen, Harley, Tennier.

That telegram was sent by L. G. Humber, Ph.D., the vice chairman of the medicinal chemistry group, Chemical Institute of Canada, Montreal.

I should also like to refer to a short letter received from Mr. Arnold Davis, a Ph.D. from Montreal, who writes:

Dear Mr. Rock:

The enclosed copy of letter to the Hon. John N. Turner represents both my own and many of my colleagues' opinions regarding the serious limitations of Bill C-190.

[Mr. Rock.]

As an M.P. having a Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada member in your constituency, you might wish to give this matter your consideration before further action is taken on this bill.

I also received a special delivery letter from a Dr. Carl von Seemann. The letter is three pages long, but he too requests that this bill be sent to a committee for further study.

The next letter was written by Mr. Morris L. Givner and is addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). This letter also requests that the bill be sent to a committee. Another letter from Mr. D. J. Marshall, Ph.D., addressed to the minister requests that the bill be sent to committee. Another letter signed S. N. Sehgal from Dollard des Ormeaux makes the same request.

Lastly I received a letter from Mr. L. G. Humber, the vice chairman of the Chemical Institute of Canada, who writes as follows:

The Chemical Institute of Canada feels very strongly that the provisions of Bill C-190 will be detrimental to pharmaceutical research in Canada. We have stated our feelings to Mr. Turner, and we enclose copy of this correspondence for your information.

We trust that you will take these views into account and that this bill will not be allowed to pass.

The fourth paragraph of his letter to the minister is very important, I feel, and reads:

We feel that our government should instead take steps to maintain the safety of drugs, to develop an independent Canadian capability to manufacture our own drugs, and to encourage the development of scientific research directed towards the discovery of new drugs.

Now that the bill's contents are known, Mr. Speaker, I think that all people who will be affected should have the opportunity to come before a committee, such as the committee on trade, finance and economic affairs, to air their grievances, present briefs, ask questions, etc. I believe therefore that Bill C-190 should be sent to a standing committee, since it is too important to be rushed through without giving those who are interested the opportunity to be heard.

There are some pharmaceutical companies in the Montreal area which intended to spend millions of dollars for expansion purposes. They have held back the execution of these works pending the decision on this bill. If Bill C-190 is rushed through without giving these people the opportunity to appear before a committee, I believe these works will be cancelled.

Mrs. Jean Wadds (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my contribution to this discussion on Bill No. C-190 necessarily will be brief when compared with the contribution of the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), who has had many years of practice and experience in the medical profession, and when compared with the contribution of all those who have sat long and diligently on the committee on drug costs and prices.

I have no great knowledge of the vast, complicated field of drugs and their uses; I am participating nevertheless because I have strong feelings about the effects of drugs and their possible dangers. This feeling is common to all responsible adults, especially to those who from time to time recommend drugs in their own homes and to children. No matter whether the indisposition is minor, we have learned from our general education and our education in medical matters to realize the danger of an impetuous diagnosis.

Responsible people must always realize that they carry a burden when they give any drug. This natural reaction was heightened for me by a personal experience in this house some five years ago, when one of the great tragedies connected with drugs struck Canada and the world. It was with horror that is not often experienced in our protected society that we heard about the frightening effects of the drug, thalidomide. It is when such serious difficulties arise that responsible people show their worth.

I remember distinctly the various attitudes which were displayed to the government at that time. I am pleased here to have an opportunity to express something publicly, and to put on the record an observation which I have made privately many, many times. I am referring to the highly honourable and commendable attitude of the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker). Happily, he is still sitting in this house and the high opinion that many members formed of him at that time has in no way been diminished. He realized that members of all parties were equally heartsick over the thalidomide tragedies and he refused to allow any blame to be placed for political advantage.

Remembering this occasion, it was with regret that I heard the member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) this afternoon accusing those in the official opposition of using drug safety as a red herring. The hon. member for St. John's West took particular delight in repeating over and over again his criticism of the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall).

I cannot accept the insult to the official opposition, and particularly to the junior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Simcoe East, which is inherent in the suggestion safety is being used as a political excuse, and that we in this party are not as concerned about the cost of drugs, the cost of medical protection and the cost of living, as any other Canadians are concerned. It is silly, to the point of stupidity, to imply that we care less for our families, loved ones and our fellow Canadians than those in other parts of this house care.

I did not hear the speech of the junior member for Halifax; yet on reading his speech carefully I saw nothing in it which should so incense the hon. member for St. John's West. The junior member for Halifax showed the house, clearly, that we on this side of the house agree with the intent of any measure which will lower the price of prescription drugs to consumers. As a good committee member the hon. member for Halifax asked the minister merely if some of the committee's recommendations had been carried out. The minister admitted that one of the recommendations had not been implemented, the recommendation reading:

> That the food and drug directorate publish not less than once a month an informative bulletin to the medical profession giving complete details on drugs and their actions and reviewing major drug uses in Canada.

Surely there is nothing wrong when the hon. member for Halifax brings to the minister's attention committee recommendations and reminds him that most of these recommendations have not been implemented.

The hon. member for St. John's West tried to depict the junior member for Halifax as the great exponent of high drug costs, as the protector of the drug industry. That accusation is in no way related to what the hon. member said last night in this house, and is entirely unfair and unjustified. The member for Halifax was stating what cannot be stated too often, that there is absolutely no guarantee about safety and that there is no reference to safety in this bill.

It is not only the official opposition that is insisting on high quality, safe and effective drugs. All Canadians give priority to such drugs, and the official opposition is here to make sure that the weaknesses in any bill are demonstrated. The hon. member for Winnipeg

North (Mr. Orlikow) did less than justice to the entire subject this afternoon when he accused the official opposition of trying to protect the drug industry and when he accused the hon. member for Simcoe East of wanting for the drug companies a licence to steal from the people of Canada. The reputation of the hon. member for Simcoe East is such that no one can take seriously such an accusation. This parliament would be improved if we had more members with his experience, his qualifications and his specific knowledge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Wadds: The hon. member spoke because he has great respect for the medical research that has been done in this country in the past, and because there is a continued need for research to be done in the future. It is a pity that such superficial criticisms are made of such a knowledgeable speaker. The hon. member for Simcoe East knows whereof he speaks when he questions the minister about ways and means of making drug inspections. For the young member for St. John's West this afternoon to ridicule his opinions was ill-placed arrogance.

Mr. Nesbitt: It was a dirty speech.

Mrs. Wadds: The entire question of drug uses is enormously complicated. I was interested to hear the high praise given to Parke, Davis in regard to the manufacture of chloromycetin. One of that firm's Canadian plants located in Leeds county is a highly respected and well managed unit of eastern Ontario industry.

I think it is only sensible for us to give consideration to those who possess the most qualified voices in this specialized area of consumer affairs. The minister has received a resolution from the Canadian Medical Association's committee on pharmacy. That resolution favours methods which will reduce drug costs to patients but, said the resolution, these reduced costs must not be implemented at the expense of safety of drugs or at the expense of the continuing growth of the Canadian drug industry.

On February 3 the Canadian Medical Association Journal carried an editorial about Bill C-190 and, in part, it said this:

> If there is doubt about the effects of the proposed legislation on the cost of drugs to the consumer, there is no doubt that the Canadian consumer would not have the same assurance of quality of imported drugs as he does of drugs manufactured in Canada.

We have heard a great deal about the possible savings that can be made by using generic as against brand name drugs. An independent company, International Surveys Limited produced a report dated November 27, 1967 on its investigation of the relative cost of prescriptions written under brand names compared with those under generic names. The basis for the selection of drugs to be studied was as follows: they had to be well established, they had to cover as wide a range as possible in different therapeutic fields. Controlled drugs and drugs restricted by the Narcotics Act were excluded from the inquiry. Major cities across Canada were chosen for use in the survey and pharmacies were selected at random from the yellow pages of telephone directories. Purchases were made between October 26 and November 8, 1967.

In the 11 categories of drugs studied, the differences in cost between brand and generic prescriptions were found to be negligible in nine of the categories. In one category the price of generic drugs was significantly higher and in one other the brand name prescriptions were significantly higher in price. The differences in price as between one outlet and another were found to be considerable.

Mr. Speaker, I join with members of all parties in wanting to see lower prices charged for drugs in Canada. As has been stated by a number of previous speakers, however, there are many factors involved in the price of Canadian drugs. There is little guarantee that the bill as it now stands will produce cheaper drugs and no guarantee at all that they will be as safe.

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to a lot of experts talk about the cost of drugs. I happen to come from a province where there is a social welfare scheme in operation. I am allowed $1.25 an hour yet the man who sweeps the streets in front of me gets $1.75.

People talk about generic drugs. How many can tell me what they are? It is not we who write the prescriptions. This is done by members of the medical profession. All we do is what they tell us to do. I will tell you a story. I come from a little village. Every morning I went down to the town pump, and from it I used to carry two pails of water. Some of my good friends said: "What are you doing with that, Clancy?" I said: "That is profit".

I have listened to this debate and I think a great deal of nonsense has been talked by people who do not know what they are talking about. An hon. member on the other side says we are going to lose this argument. Well, if a man can make more money driving a bus why should he take responsibility for the health of other people?

Let us get down to reality. If you want a corner laundry to fill your prescriptions, then try to get it done there. But if you want somebody to take responsibility for your health and see that you get what a particular doctor sent you in to get, that is another matter. I cannot tell you whether you need penicillin or another drug. I can tell you something else, though. Some of the women could stay home and look after the children. This would save a lot of money now being spent on drugs.

I realize it is a popular issue. I know it has aroused interest across the country; the women are yelling and all the families are concerned about the cost of living. Why pick on drugs? Go to the supermarket. I can tell you where the cost of living is increasing—and I do not set myself up as a processor. At least I can compare prices. The pure food and drug legislation provides that the net weight shall be stated for comparison with a certain price.

I am tired of this being made a popular issue. Everyone in the house thinks it will add to his or her popularity, to get up and speak on it. All right: If you want to sell it, go out and harvest. Find a scandal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we listened with interest to the hon. minister introduce the first bill emanating from his new department. I will say at the outset that it seemed to me that the minister wanted to justify the creation of his department.

When this department was set up, I think I read some comments showing that the basic philosophy of this department was simply to create a strong and powerful bureaucracy in order to watch over the interests of the Canadian people. On the other hand, one wondered who was going to keep an eye on the minister and his officials.

It was most interesting this evening to listen to the remarks of the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle (Mr. Rock), a member on the government side of the house whose riding is next to that of the minister. He criticized the minister severely saying that certain people, especially in the city of Montreal, did not support the first bill of the minister.

I should like, in my opening remarks, to support the representations made by the member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle, to the effect that the contents of this bill should be referred to the committee on health and welfare so that it might study its implications, because they exceed by far the scope of the remarks the hon. minister made yesterday and which were supported this afternoon by some on the treasury benches and other leftist members.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I shall not say that I felt the remarks of the minister were conveniently bilingual yesterday. There is a time and a place, and this, as we know, is a rather interesting time for the minister to indicate his bilingual capabilities.

[Translation]

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I think he tried to show us, in his opening remarks, that he was mod and that this was the philosophy these days. In fact, his remarks can be called demagoguery, since they appeal to the little people who could not afford the price of drugs and medication, especially the low-wage earners.

One would think, in the light of the introduction of such a bill, that most Canadians live in huts, that they lack worldly goods, that they dress in tatters and that they are the poorest in the world. Now, we know full well that this is not the case at all. Yet there are some who like to appeal to these people.

[English]

On the other hand I found the remarks of the young and brash member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) to be most repugnant. He seemed to imply that anyone who appeared to question anything the minister had to say or what this bill says—and this applies also to the comments made by some of his hon. friends in the house who have criticized this legislation—were mouthpieces of vested interests, motivated only by a desire for profit. The suggestion was that my hon. friend from Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) had debased himself by taking a professional interest in criticizing this bill.

Patent Act—Trade Marks Act

• (9:10 p.m.)

I will crave the indulgence of the house, Mr. Speaker, for being a little personal, but if the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) is so much against the profit motive and the well established motive of business concerns in this country, I would say to him that he should turn around and point at the ancestry of his own family who spent many years acquiring the fortune the benefits of which the hon. gentleman is now enjoying, when they were dealing in the economy of Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lambert: Let us not hear any more nonsense of that kind from the hon. member.

I now wish to turn to the speech made by the minister. First of all, I think he has done a disservice to this house in submitting tables of comparative prices of certain types of drugs in various countries. He said naught as to whether these had been converted with due adjustment for varying scales of living in those countries. For instance, let us take librium, as given in column 1 on page 6617 of yesterday's Hansard. It shows that in Canada the price to the retailer is $7.20 per 100, and in England the price is $3.02. That is a straight comparison, on a straight exchange rate.

The minister did not say that workmen in certain categories in Britain consider themselves well paid at £20 a week. If we were to translate that into Canadian dollars it would mean something like $55 a week. Under no circumstances would he say that a Canadian workman was well paid at that rate. I could make the same comparison with West Germany, and particularly with Italy and other European countries. These monetary scales in the tables are actually misleading, and I would say almost a deliberate misrepresentation as to the comparative price levels.

If the minister wants to limit the comparison to the United States and Canada we could make an adequate comparison with the exchange rates on roughly the same type of economy, and we would get a much closer comparison. But when the minister starts to compare monetary prices in the United Kingdom as against Canada, or in Italy against Canada, without any explanation that there should be some adjustment, then I would suggest his tables are quite misleading.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Lambert: Yes, certainly.

[Mr. Lambert.]

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): On the basis of this reverse reasoning that the hon. member is making, does this mean that he could go to India or one of the other less developed countries and buy a new Ford car for $400?

Mr. Lambert: No, for the simple reason that the Ford car is not made in those countries, and also they have other types of controls plus their costs of transportation and so forth. The hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) should know better. I am talking about drugs produced under pretty well the same circumstances in Canada as against the United Kingdom, Italy and Germany. When comparisons of prices to retailers are based on a mere exchange rate without any explanation, that is deluding the reader. If the minister wanted to make some adjustment or some allowance for this spread I would not be criticizing him as I am now. The differentials are not as wide as indicated by the minister.

As recorded at page 6616 of Hansard the minister said that a number of constructive suggestions were made by the standing committee which studied drugs, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley). In that committee members got an instructive examination of certain of the factors that go into the determination of prices and the marketing of drugs. But the point is that this bill seizes upon only one suggestion by the committee. As the minister himself said yesterday afternoon, this bill is no guarantee that prices will come down, unless he is prepared to impose price controls at the retail level.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lambert: If you will allow me to make my speech—

Mr. Turner: On a question of order—

Mr. Lambert: May I ask what is the question of order? If the minister is going to dispute what I say, that is not a point of order. The minister has a right of reply.

Mr. Turner: If the hon. member would be good enough—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order. If we take a little time to listen to the minister we will find out if he is in order or not.

Mr. Turner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have a right to challenge the hon. member if he misquotes me or misinterprets my remarks. What I said was that by itself there was no guarantee this bill would affect prices. I said it was part of a cumulative program, and the program was set out quite clearly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Actually this is not a point of order. It is more like a medium sized debate.

Mr. Lambert: I think that only reinforces my remarks. The minister convicts himself out of his own mouth. I did not say the minister said this bill was the only means—not at all. I am suggesting the minister would have to resort to many other things, many other devices to guarantee a reduction of prices. I merely said that the minister admitted yesterday afternoon that this bill would not guarantee a reduction of prices, and he has admitted that again now. The mere importation of drugs under licence—and I will explain this later—by a group of importers who will be going along for a free ride, with no guarantee as to the level of their mark-up, and the mark-up through jobbers and through retailers, is no guarantee of a reduction in price. Unless the minister is prepared to impose price controls all the way along the line he cannot guarantee that there will be price reductions.

From an economic point of view, and again I will develop this argument, whether the country will be further ahead is another question. I revert to what the minister said yesterday as recorded at page 6622 of Hansard:

> On the supply side of the market, the framework in which industry operates in such that there are high barriers to the entry of newcomers who might inject new and more vigorous competition by importing the basic drugs for processing and packaging in Canada or by importing dosage forms. The most important of these barriers arise as a result of the interaction of the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act, the Customs Tariff, the very intensive and costly program of marketing and promotion undertaken by the established firms, and the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act.

If this philosophy applies all along the line will the minister argue that the prices of all commodities in Canada which come into the market, either under domestic production or from foreign sources, are higher than they need be, because many other commodities are produced in Canada under patents?

• (9:20 p.m.)

There are many other products produced in Canada that are protected by certain tariffs and the Trade Marks Act. There are also many programs for marketing and promotion. I do not know how the requirements of the Food and Drug Act relate to this, but perhaps there is also protection in respect of food. The minister has singled out drugs as part of this program. Is this a forecast of what the minister or the government intend for the future in respect of other products? Does he intend, from here on in, that patent rights will not be applicable to any type of commodity that may be manufactured in Canada, and that the Trade Marks Act shall not apply to them? Are we to see the elimination entirely of customs tariffs and prohibitions in respect of marketing promotion?

Some of this new philosophy is expressed at the very same page, and this seems to be in line with the basic principle the minister followed in his bill. Let me read from the bottom of column two on page 6622 of Hansard for February 12 where the minister is reported as having said this:

> Since the demand and supply characteristics of the market tend to rule out price competition in the Canadian drug industry, except in sales to institutions, rivalry between drug firms takes the form of concentration on the development of minor differences in product and of sales promotion. Competition is, therefore, cost increasing. The more intense the competition, the higher costs are driven.

In spite of this the minister says that by doing away with competition and by importing under licence, set at an arbitrary level by the commissioner of patents, competition will increase, and therefore drug prices shall go down. Will the minister guarantee that there will not be his kind of competition as a result of even minor differences even under licence? According to his own principle, competition shall be cost-increasing and there shall be greater promotion. How does he think that under this new utopia some of the characteristics about which he complained will not prevail?

Let me suggest to the minister that by the provisions of this bill he will be giving certain importers of drugs a free ride, in that they will not have to do one penny worth of research; also there will be no price controls. All these importers will have to do is pay a mere licence fee in the form of a royalty set by the commissioner of patents. This decision will be beyond negotiation by the parties concerned—the exporter and importer. In other words, "big brother government" will come down to the market place and determine what shall be paid as a licence fee. This again is an example of that "do goodism" about which I spoke. This is implicit in the proposal of the minister, that there shall be this type of enforcement by the commissioner. However, there is nothing indicated in the bill or in what the minister has said on which one can base any conclusion as to how the commissioner of patents will use this authority. There is no criteria for the commissioner to follow in setting the level of licence fees. I find this a little difficult to accept in this day and age, unless the minister is disclosing a new philosophy of this government.

I am not going to go through all the details of possibilities for reduction in manufacturing by drug manufacturers in Canada. This has been more than adequately covered by my colleagues. Neither do I intend to go into the question relating to the potential elimination of almost all meaningful drug research in this country. This also has been covered by my colleagues, the hon. members for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) and Halifax (Mr. Forrestall). The hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle (Mr. Rock) has indicated his concern in respect of this implication. I am sure all members of this house have received representations from individuals and firms, including the Chemical Institute of Canada, particularly its medicinal chemistry group. Are these people so suspect, merely because they are protesting the minister's bill, that their representations are to be dismissed as mere efforts to protect mere money grubbing instincts? Some of the statements in this house today and yesterday have been based on sensational penny dreadfuls, most of them ill-founded, regarding drug prices and drug quality.

It is very distressing when one has to rely entirely upon drug manufacturers for the safety and quality of drugs, to find, that some of them are defective or of less than adequate quality. The minister might do a greater service by proposing a measure to jack up quality control on the part of drug manufacturers. Surely this would be a step forward, although on the whole the drug and medicinal producing industries in this and other countries are efficient. Of course humans are fallible, and production cannot be guaranteed 100 per cent. Such quality control measures would be a step in the right direction toward the elimination of as much error as possible. Let us not approach this subject only from the aspect of cost.

There are many other parts of the minister's speech to which I could refer, which contain flaws in reasoning. As the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mrs. Wadds) said, although we criticize this bill we must not be deemed to have no concern for the level of drug prices. No one in this house has any monopoly or concern for people who are ill and have to spend money on drugs. I do not fault the minister or the government for their concern for these people, or for their efforts to decrease drug prices.

This bill that the government advances gives us no such guarantee. We have to weigh the pros and cons of the bill. On the basis of what has been said and the criticisms that have been advanced, I have very grave doubts that Canada in the net result will benefit from the passage of this bill.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-190 purports to have as its objective a beneficial effect on the cost of drugs for Canadians. We on this side of the house agree that any measure which will have the effect of lowering the price of drugs to the consumer, and prescription drugs especially, is advantageous to the people of this country, provided any saving in price is not outweighed by other resulting disadvantages.

Two years ago a special committee of the house was set up to consider this question and make recommendations respecting a comprehensive and effective program to reduce the price of drugs. The terms of reference under which the committee was established spoke only of the price of drugs. It seems so obvious that when we as Canadians speak of drugs we mean drugs that are of a high quality and will perform as effectively as possible the function which they are prescribed to perform. Therefore we assume that these are the kind of drugs the house had in mind when it referred this problem to the committee. The committee, in its report at page 6, chapter II entitled "Background to the Report", has this to say:

> The committee's conclusions must be such that any of its recommendations, if adopted, should continue to maintain a proper balance between industry and consumer and take into consideration the importance of continued and increased scientific research in Canada. No recommendations could be considered, which, although designed to lower drug prices in Canada, might produce drugs of questionable safety or have a detrimental effect upon other aspects of the Canadian economy.

This is what the committee reasoned was its duty with regard to the responsibility placed upon it. We have heard unfortunately, a great deal of propaganda, I would say, to the effect that Canadians pay exorbitant prices for pharmaceutical preparations, and some would have us believe that the Canadian pharmaceutical industry is a grasping, evil, bloated extortionist industry which feasts on the miseries of the ill. They want to create this myth and then, like knights on white chargers, go charging against this fictitious myth, having the people believe that they are the sole protectors of the interests of the Canadian consumer.

The myth that the pharmaceutical industry of Canada is any worse than any other segment of our industry, or indeed any better than any other segment of our industry, has yet to be proven. I consider that the pharmaceutical industry of Canada has done a great deal for Canadians. We have benefited from their research. Any of us, if we think about it at all, will realize the tremendous benefits to mankind generally, and not only to Canadians, which have resulted from medical research in pharmaceuticals.

We think of the "wonder" drugs that have come into general use in the last few years, with their resulting beneficial reduction, and in some cases the wiping out, of diseases causing premature death and the elimination of prolonged illnesses because of treatment which may result in a rapid and complete recovery from many diseases which only a few years ago were often fatal.

Benefits resulting from these drugs far outweigh the total cost of all the drug research that has ever been carried out. It is true that some of these drugs have been discovered as the result of research in universities or in institutions supported by the taxpayers; but the industry, too, has made very worth-while contributions. We will always be indebted to the industry for the benefits to mankind which have resulted from this research. This type of research, of course, takes place in many parts of the world. All mankind benefits when some great, new breakthrough is made in pharmaceutical research.

Since all mankind benefits from these advances, it creates a very complicated problem as to how the discoverers of a new drug shall be adequately compensated for their contribution to mankind. The drug industry cannot be thought of as being in isolation in any one country, or indeed in any one group of countries, because when it produces a new advance in the treatment of disease our moral conscience requires that the new drug be available to everyone as quickly as possible. This of course complicates the process of adequately recompensing the discoverers of a new drug, because the sale of the drug cannot be confined to a limited market. Drug companies cannot cater, generally speaking, to the needs of just one country as far as their research is concerned.

We in Canada are a relative newcomer in the fine chemical industry. Countries such as Switzerland and Germany, because of discoveries in the past, have become world leaders in the fine chemical industry. As a result they are in a better position than Canada to make advances in research in pharmaceuticals. Take, for example, the discovery of coal tar dyes in Germany. This gave the German chemical industry a tremendous advance and they profited from the discovery to a great extent. This discovery put them in a preferred position for a long time as far as advances in this field were concerned. Incidentally, it also put them in a preferred position as far as pharmaceutical research was concerned.

Nevertheless, we should not underestimate or downgrade the importance of Canadian achievements in this field. I should like to quote from a statement by the medicinal chemistry group of the Chemical Institute of Canada, which reads as follows:

> In Canada the drug industry spent $12 million in 1967 on research and provided employment for 700 scientifically and technically trained people. Canadian scientists over the years have made outstanding contributions in drug research. These include processes for the production of insulin, for the production of steroid hormones from bile acids, and innovations in estrogen therapy. In the past decade Canadian scientists in industry have published in international scientific journals, over 200 accounts of the results of their studies. Ten drug companies maintain research laboratories in Canada, half of them having been opened in the last decade. Drug research is international in its scope. The research that is done in Canada contributes to and benefits from world knowledge. There is in Canada the necessary cadre of scientists and technicians to do research. There is the necessary scientific climate created by the presence of excellent universities, hospitals and other institutions. Canada must not become a parasite—it is proper and to be expected that Canada will make the contribution to drug research of which we are capable. Bill C-190 apart from reducing the funds available for drug research, will not help to foster the economic and political climate needed if industry is to continue to invest in Canadian drug research.

When we talk about the cost of research, I should like to remind members of the house that the pharmaceutical companies carry on research from day to day often at great cost, because they pursue what appear to be likely paths to advancement. We are told, however, that only about one of every three thousand research projects results in a marketable advantageous pharmaceutical. So it stands to reason that when a successful pharmaceutical is evolved the cost attached to it is not only the direct cost of that particular drug but also the cost involved in the research which produced the other 2,999 examples which proved to be unsuccessful. Therefore, we have a very difficult problem in determining what is a reasonable benefit under the patent rights. Then too there is the question of proving that a new drug is a safe drug. When a new drug has the status of a new drug the law requires that continuous testing of a very expensive nature be carried on in order to determine as conclusively as possible that the drug has no detrimental side effects, or that there are no other dangers attached to it when used.

The copier who comes into the picture at a later date, who is given a licence to manufacture the drug does not have to become involved in this prolonged and expensive procedure. He should be able to market his drug with less expense than it was marketed originally. In this connection I believe it is essential—and the members of the committee felt that it was essential—that the royalties paid under the Patent Act by licensees should be made more rewarding so that the innovator of the drug would be recompensed in some measure for the service he has provided to mankind in bringing this new drug into use.

There are many factors involved in the cost of drugs to the consumer. The members of the committee immediately recognized this. In addition to the cost of manufacturing there are many other factors. There is the cost of distribution, the professional cost of dispensing the drug, and the taxation involved at every stage in respect of the drug and the concerns which carry on the business of manufacturing, distributing or selling pharmaceuticals. All these factors, of course, are built into the cost of the drug, the same as in the case of other products. These costs have been increasing in recent years. This is part of the entire picture of the increased cost of living with which we are all so familiar. The federal government has jurisdiction with regard to some of these factors. Some of them, however, are under the control of other levels of government while others are under the control of the profession itself and are affected by other considerations.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

The committee recognized this fact and made a large number of recommendations, 23 in fact, some of which fall under the responsibility of the federal government and others under other jurisdictions. For example, one recommendation of the committee was that pharmacists use the cost price plus professional fee method to determine drug prices to the consumer. I believe that in some provinces the profession has already adopted this recommendation. The result of that recommendation will be that the cost of a low priced drug will be increased slightly, while in the case of the very expensive drug there will in some cases be a tremendously reduced cost. Low cost drugs are obtainable at a price which usually is bearable by the patient, but some high cost drugs can be a very great burden, especially if they must be taken over a long period of time. So I believe some progress has been made in that direction.

Then there is the question of the federal sales tax. An advance has been made in this regard, provided the savings are passed on to the consumers. Recommendation No. 16 concerns the profession and the industry. The committee made several recommendations, some of which are being put into practice. Among the recommendations there are approximately seven which seem to fall under the jurisdiction of the federal government, and I shall read them:

2. That the personnel and facilities of the food and drug directorate be expanded to make possible the implementation of the recommendations of the Boyd committee, the Hilliard committee and this committee;

11. That the patent commissioner, on assessing royalties on the granting of a compulsory licence, shall consider that the patentee who discovers and initially develops the drug in Canada should have higher royalties than the drug manufacturer who discovers new drugs outside of Canada;

17. That subsection 3 of section 41 of the Patent Act be amended to indicate clearly that the granting of a licence by the commissioner of patents is subject to a report by the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare, to the effect that the applicant for the compulsory licence has satisfied the directorate that he has met the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act;

18. That subsection 3 of section 41 of the Patent Act be amended to include applications for compulsory licences to import drug products in all forms, subject to inspection of manufacturing facilities by the food and drug directorate and provided such importation is in the public interest as may be determined by the commissioner; and to this end, your committee recommends that the rules under the Patent Act be amended to permit the commissioner to seek and receive outside independent expert advice in the determination of this question;

19. That the importer of drugs under compulsory licence pay the cost of food and drug directorate services outside of Canada;

20. That subsection 3 of section 41 be amended so that if the granting of a compulsory licence takes longer than 12 months, the commissioner, if in his opinion the delay is unwarranted, may be empowered to issue the licence subject to revocation if any appeal against such a compulsory licence is upheld, providing however that such licensee provide sufficient evidence to satisfy standards of the food and drug directorate;

21. That section 20 of the Trade Marks Act be amended to make clear that no infringement can be claimed where imported drugs are manufactured by a "related" company;

Out of all these inter-related recommendations, the drafters of this bill have selected one and taken ideas from a couple of others. The requirement that before a licensee can import drugs the food and drug directorate must be satisfied in advance that the circumstances under which these drugs are being manufactured meet Canadian standards, does not appear in this bill. Such a requirement was recommended by the committee. This is a very important point, Mr. Speaker, because the standards drug manufacturers must meet vary from one country to another. The standards required of a manufacturer of drugs in Italy, for instance, or any other country, may be lower than those imposed in Canada. The exporting country has no responsibility to ensure that the drugs meet the requirement of the food and drug directorate of the country to which they are being exported. This condition applies even in Canada. We have no responsibility to ensure that drugs exported meet the requirements of the countries to which they go.

We have heard a great deal, Mr. Speaker, about the myth—I think that is not too strong a word to use—that drugs are just drugs, that an analysis of a generic drug in a laboratory gives a certain result and all those drugs are the same. This is a fallacy. In some cases however it may be true, but when we are dealing with the question of the safety of drugs we cannot assume that it is true. It is a known fact that of themselves, laboratory tests do not prove conclusively that a drug is safe, or as safe as any other drug that gives the same analysis. It may not be as effective as another drug that gives the same analysis.

The suggestion has been made that this myth was created by a segment of the Canadian pharmaceutical industry, and therefore should be disregarded; that it is suspect or bias. In this connection, I should like to quote as a witness a United States congressman giving evidence recently before a committee in the United States. I see that it is almost ten o'clock, so I will desist from that at the moment. I do want to say to the minister, however, that although we congratulate him on his objective of lowering the price of drugs to Canadian consumers, where that can be done safely and where it can be demonstrated that prices are too high, we are genuinely concerned that the high safety standards of Canadian drugs as we have known them will be endangered if this bill becomes law in its present form. I should like an assurance from the minister, therefore, that he would consider sympathetically and favourably the amendments which we might make in committee of the whole. We would prefer of course that the bill be referred back to the special committee which studied the cost of drugs in the first place, or some other appropriate committee, in order to bring the bill more in line with the recommendations of the committee. We feel the bill does not carry out the recommendations made by this hard working committee, recommendations which the committee felt were in the interests of the Canadian public. If the minister could give that assurance, I am sure that the second reading of this bill will not take much longer, so far as the official opposition is concerned.

May I call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: I should like to ask the acting house leader if he would tell us the business for tomorrow and possibly Thursday?

Mr. Turner: I am in a position to give the business for tomorrow. We will continue with item 51, the second reading of Bill No. C-190, which we have been debating, to be followed, if that is possible, by item 55, house in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-193, an act to amend the Income Tax Act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

• (10:00 p.m.)

AIR CANADA—WINNIPEG—TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES FROM BASE

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Transport (Mr.

Hellyer) took on the portfolio of the Department of Transport he gave, I suppose one can say he reiterated, the solemn assurance of the government that the Air Canada overhaul base would not be moved from Winnipeg, at least not until 1973. When the minister went to western Canada recently he stopped over in Winnipeg a matter of ten days or so ago, at which time he repeated the intention and determination of this government that there would be no change in this undertaking.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, the course of events has been such as to throw some considerable doubt upon whether or not the government is in fact determined enough to stand by this commitment. I say this because the management of Air Canada has all the time been transferring certain of its employees from Winnipeg.

The minister was questioned about this in the house last week. My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and I tried to get some indication from the minister as to how he would proceed in persuading the management of Air Canada to agree to his intended course of action. The rules of the house did not permit us to engage in any exchange with the minister, and this prompted the debate at the present time.

The minister gives us to understand that he feels somewhat frustrated because he himself is circumscribed by the collective agreement that exists between the management of Air Canada and the employees. This is precisely the point on which I should like some clarification from him.

Air Canada maintains that it has an agreement with the employees that provides for it to continue to transfer certain of its employees, and this it has been doing. As I have already said, the minister also points to the agreement as a factor that impinges upon his freedom to take charge of this situation. I should like to put before him if he is not already aware of it, a statement that was made by an official of the employees union. I do not have the exact words before me but I have copied in longhand the essence of what he said, which was that if the employees were to take the position of not agreeing to further transfers of employees, they would have to have a definite indication from the federal government.

This is very logical, Mr. Speaker. I am unable to understand how the minister can point to the labour-management collective bargaining agreement as a factor that somehow prevents him from persuading the management of Air Canada to go along with the undertaking that he and his colleagues have given, both to this house and to the people of Winnipeg. I believe that a delegation from that city discussed this matter with the minister a week or two ago, and I am sure he has given it a great deal of thought. Nevertheless I put this request specifically to him: Would he please clarify what he has in mind when he says that the collective agreement impinges upon his ability to take action in this connection?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is paraphrasing what I actually said. The commitment that I gave in Winnipeg was that the Prime Minister's undertaking would be honoured. There has been no change in the government's position since that time. The Prime Minister undertook, as I understand, that the Air Canada base would remain open, or that an alternative solution would be found which would provide approximately equal employment opportunities in the aircraft maintenance industry. As my hon. friend undoubtedly is aware, we have made a special effort to try to reach a solution which will be satisfactory to everyone involved. A committee was formed with members of the provincial government and federal government, and they have been meeting and considering some of the suggestions which have been made. They are aware that there are at least several alternative possibilities, so far as the means which might be adopted to fulfil the commitment are concerned.

At the present time I cannot tell my hon. friend with certainty, though I should very much like to do so, which of the options that are being studied will be ultimately adopted. It is for this reason that the employees of Air Canada face a dilemma, the dilemma being whether to negotiate additional transfers under the contracts which now exist, and take advantage of the seniority rights which have been guaranteed, or whether to take their chances and remain at Winnipeg, in the hope that the ultimate solution will meet with their approval and provide satisfactory employment for them.

As I explained to the union officials, when I met them, I regret very much that this dilemma for the employees exists, but unfortunately I cannot do much about it right at this moment. I hope that we shall be in a position to announce, in the not too distant future, what the ultimate solution will be. Unfortunately I am not in a position to do that now. Negotiations between the union and the company will be going on in the meantime. It is this aspect of the situation which is beyond my control. I wish it were within my control, but it is not and I am afraid that the union and the company will have to resolve it in a manner which meets with their own general approval, notwithstanding some of the factors that will not be decided at the time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister's time has expired.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 14, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

COMMITTEE REPORT RESPECTING SALARY REVISIONS, ETC.

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a report has been received from the joint committee on the Library of Parliament concerning salary revisions of employees of the Library of Parliament, and related matters, and the library regulations.

[Editor's note: Text of the foregoing report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE RATIOS FOR INSURED LOANS

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board) moved that the house go into committee of the whole at its next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954, to increase from $13,000 to $18,000 the loan ratios for insured loans to home owners, builders, and co-operative housing associations for the construction of new housing units.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

JUVENILES IN FEDERAL PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 717—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many juveniles are in federal penitentiaries?

2. In how many cases did the court have presentence recommendations from social workers, probation officers, psychiatrists, etc.?

3. What facilities, if any, are there for segregation of these juveniles from the adult inmates?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. As of November 20, 1967, there were the following numbers of inmates in federal penitentiaries within the age group shown:

17 years and under 18 years	55
16 years and under 17 years	12
15 years and under 16 years	6
Under 15 years	0
Total	73

2. This information is not available within the department.

3. In the Montreal area, many are transferred to the Federal Training Centre. In Ontario, most juveniles are confined in the Collins Bay Penitentiary. In addition, the new institutions at Drumheller, Warkworth, Cowansville and Springhill are designed for the training of young inmates and young offenders are being transferred, insofar as practicable, to these institutions.

CANADIAN CONTENT OF PHARMACEUTICALS FOR EXTERNAL AID

Question No. 908—Mr. Brand:

1. Does the External Aid Office have requirements that services and material procured by this program have an 80% Canadian content?

2. How successful has the External Aid Office been in obtaining pharmaceuticals with an 80% Canadian content?

3. What measures and methods are used to satisfy an 80% Canadian content for pharmaceuticals if such is required by the External Aid Office?

4. Have any purchases been made by the External Aid Office which indicate that buying pharmaceuticals with an 80% Canadian content would provide a saving to the Canadian taxpayer?

5. Have expenditures been made by the External Aid Office meeting the above suggested requirements which have in fact entailed greater expenditures than if expenditures had been made on other pharmaceuticals presently on the Canadian market?

6. Have any plans been made to meet the proposed changes in the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act in relation to the importation of pharmaceuticals which are entirely of non-Canadian manufacture?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes.

2. All pharmaceuticals provided under the aid program which are available from Canadian suppliers have had a Canadian content of 80 per cent or above.

Questions

3. The pharmaceuticals are purchased from Canadian manufacturers who certify the Canadian content of their product.

4. No.

5. No.

6. The external aid office will re-examine the Canadian content requirement as it applies to pharmaceuticals in the light of any changes in the Patent Act and Trade Marks Act approved by parliament.

ARDA OFFICES, AMHERST, N.S. AND MONCTON, N.B.

Question No. 918—Mr. Coates:

1. How many employees were involved in the ARDA operation at Amherst, N.S., on January 1, 1966, what was the total staff of ARDA at Amherst, N.S., on January 1, 1968, and what is the present staff at the regional office of ARDA, established at Moncton, N.B., on January 1, 1968?

2. From whom was office space rented for the ARDA regional office at Moncton, what was the square foot rental rate and the total annual rent for the quarters in question?

3. What is the length of the lease for the rental at Moncton, N.B.?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): 1. (a) As of January 1, 1966, 32 employees were engaged in the ARDA operation at Amherst, N.S. (b) As of January 1, 1968, 61 employees were engaged in the ARDA operation at Amherst, N.S. (c) The regional headquarters of the rural development branch with a staff of 18 moved to Moncton, N.B., on January 15, 1968.

2. The office space was rented from MacSpear Investments Limited, at a rate of $6.21 per square foot per year, for 8,600 square feet, the total annual rent being $53,400.

3. The lease is for 10 years from the date of occupation.

PAYMENTS TO MEMBERS OF STATUS OF WOMEN COMMISSION

Question No. 948—Mr. Coates:

1. What amounts have been received by the members of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in salary and expenses to date?

2. How much was received in salary and expenses by those members of the Commission who resigned from their positions?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I am informed by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada as follows: 1. Amounts paid in honoraria to members of the commission to January 26, 1968, $63,087.50.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Expenses paid to members of the commission to January 26, 1968, $10,955.03.

2. Amount paid in honorarium to member of the commission who resigned November 1, 1967, $5,550.00. Expenses paid to member of the commission who resigned November 1, 1967, $655.62.

PUBLIC WORKS EMPLOYEES, CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

Question No. 951—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Is it intended to decrease the complement of positions in the Dominion Department of Public Works, Charlottetown, P.E.I.?

2. If so, when?

3. If so, by what number of positions is the District Office to be decreased?

4. If such a move is in contemplation, what are the reasons for it?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes.

2. As retirements or relocations occur.

3. Seven.

4. Reassessment of staff requirements in view of the fact that the major public works project in the area (Northumberland strait crossing) is not being handled through the department's district staff.

NEWSTART PROGRAM, SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 954—Mr. More:

1. What projects are (a) in being (b) in prospect in the Newstart program for Saskatchewan?

2. What is the total amount of expenditure by the Government of Canada involved in these projects?

3. What members of the Public Service of Canada are assuming responsibility for this program in Saskatchewan?

4. Where will such personnel be located?

5. What is the amount already expended in inaugurating Newstart in Saskatchewan?

6. What benefits are expected to accrue to the residents of Saskatchewan as a result of the Newstart program?

7. What insurance coverage has been required for Newstart in Saskatchewan (a) what coverage has been acquired and what are the annual premiums (b) in what manner was the insurance placed?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) None. (b) Saskatchewan NewStart Incorporated is at present developing its projects and a statement of the number of projects in prospect would be premature.

2. A precise estimate is not yet possible, but it is anticipated that the total will be between $2.5 million and $3.5 million.

3. No members of the Public Service of Canada are assuming responsibility. Saskatchewan NewStart Incorporated is a non-profit corporation established by the federal and provincial governments under the Societies Act of Saskatchewan. In addition to financing, it will be able to get technical assistance from the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

4. Not applicable.

5. As of December 31, 1967—$40,000.

6. The Saskatchewan NewStart Incorporated will address the training needs of some of the economically disadvantaged adults in Saskatchewan. The methods developed will help these people to secure better jobs. The primary aim is to experiment with methods of improving adult training programs generally.

7. (a) Saskatchewan NewStart Incorporated has acquired general public liability insurance with one million dollars coverage at an annual premium of $212.00. (b) The insurance was placed with a recognized company in accordance with normal commercial practice.

Questions

SON ET LUMIÈRE SPECTACLE, OTTAWA

Question No. 958—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many persons attended performances of the spectacle Son et Lumière in 1967?

2. What was the total expenditure for this spectacle?

3. What plans, if any, are there for continuation of Son et Lumière?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the centennial commission: 1. 79,216 persons paid admission to see the performance. An additional 1,200 persons attended the opening ceremony on May 13, 1967, and the July 1 presentation for Her Majesty the Queen as non-paying guests.

2. Not including the cost of the amphitheatre on Nepean Point which was used and will be used for other types of performances, the capital investment in the Son et Lumière production was $380,000. The cost of operation maintenance and administration for 1967 is estimated to be $50,000. As a gross revenue of $71,000 was realized from the 1967 operation, the capital investment is reduced by $21,000 to $359,000.

3. The matter of the future of the Son et Lumière program is still under consideration.

FEDERAL AID FOR STUDENTS, MONTREAL

Question No. 969—Mr. Godin:

Do unemployed students in the Montreal area receive more federal aid for living expenses than students in other parts of the Province of Quebec and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes. Training allowances are considered income replacement and according to the act, are related to living costs of trainees. In the case of Quebec, in co-operation with the provincial government, four levels of allowances were established, based upon the average wage levels in specified areas.

FEDERAL REPRESENTATIVES ON CAPITAL REGION COMMITTEE

Question No. 989—Mr. Schreyer:

1. Who have been named to represent the Government of Canada on the Preparatory Committee on the Capital region of Canada?

2. Are such persons to receive emoluments for this task?

3. If so, what amount and would this be additional to regular salary?

[Mr. Matheson.]

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. Messrs. A. D. P. Heeney, Carl Goldenberg and Marc Lalonde have been named to represent the government of Canada on the preparatory committee on the capital region of Canada.

2. No. The three federal representatives are already employed by the government of Canada for other tasks; no special emoluments are paid for this purpose.

3. Not applicable.

APPLICATIONS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH EQUIPMENT

Question No. 999—Mr. Fulton:

1. Under what circumstances and for what points in time are applications for major equipment for medical research considered for approval by (a) the Health Resources Fund (b) the Medical Research Council, respectively?

2. Is there any limit on the number of applications for major equipment for medical research for the same laboratory or the same investigator eligible for approval under the Health Resources Fund?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) Contributions from the health resources fund are paid to provinces in an amount up to 50 per cent of the reasonable costs of all basic equipment necessary for the operation of a facility. Applications are received from provinces at any time and are generally approved within a few days, provided the projects are included in provincial five year programs approved by the health resources advisory committee in accordance with the act. (b) Applications are received by the Medical Research Council at any time from individual investigators for the support of all research equipment not eligible for support by the health resources fund.

2. The only limits to support by the health resources fund of the costs of basic research equipment required by a new health training facility are: (a) Equipment is ineligible if it is delivered before the date on which the contract is signed for the construction, renovation or acquisition of the facility. (b) Equipment is ineligible if it is not installed and ready for use within 18 months of completion of the facility.

FEDERAL BUILDING, WALKERTON, ONT.

Question No. 1017—Mr. Loney:

1. Have tenders been called for the new federal building scheduled for construction at Walkerton, Ontario?

2. If tenders have been called, in what publications were they advertised?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I might ask when question No. 32 is going to be answered. It has been on the order paper since May 10, 1967 and for two months during the previous session.

Mr. Béchard: We shall try to answer it.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Would Your Honour be kind enough to call notice of motion No. 44?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

FISH MARKETING—IMPLEMENTATION OF MCIVOR REPORT

Motion No. 44—Mr. Schreyer:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence and documents exchanged between the Government of the Province of Manitoba and the Government of Canada, relative to the possible implementation in whole or in part of the McIvor Report of Fresh Water Fish Marketing.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Subject to the usual reservation about the consent of the province, Mr. Speaker, this motion is acceptable.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations or conditions expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—REQUEST FOR SPECIAL CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask him whether in order to carry out his stated objective of making a practical medical care program available to as many Canadians as possible and as soon as possible, he will even now take the step of calling the provinces together in a special conference on medicare to ascertain their views as to the basis on which a national, portable and practical medicare program could be brought into effect on July 1, 1968 for Canadians in all parts of the country, and particularly those who need it most.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the legislation does provide for a national, practical and portable scheme, and it will be coming into effect on July 1. If the provinces have any views to submit in writing as a group or individually concerning what they think could be done to this particular measure after it has been in effect, in the light of the operations of the act to make it more effective, we will be glad to discuss them.

FINANCE

CONSULTATION PRECEDING INCREASE IN BANK INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, and is based upon a press report today that some of the chartered banks have already raised the rate on their prime loans to 7 per cent, while others are contemplating taking a similar step within the next day or two.

My question is this. Before taking this action did the banks have consultations with the minister or with the Bank of Canada, and if so what justification did the banks give for this action, which can only compound our economic difficulties?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I do not agree with the final observation of the hon. member, but I can tell him that there was no consultation with the Department of Finance. I do not know whether there has been any consultation with the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Has the minister intimated to the banks that the government approves of this action, or has he expressed any concern on behalf of the government?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, I have had no conversations with the banks about this matter.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. Is this part of his grand scheme for the banks of the country?

FARM MACHINERY

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether the royal commission on agricultural machinery is making progress and when its report will be tabled in the house?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It is progressing with its work, but I am not quite sure when that work will be finished. I will communicate with the chairman of the committee through the Minister of Agriculture.

FISHERIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF GEOGRAPHICAL CO-ORDINATES FOR PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the continuing interest in the question, can the minister advise the house when he expects to be able to announce the geographical co-ordinates for the Pacific coast under the territorial seas and fishing zones regulations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): At the moment I cannot add to what I said in the month of November, but I shall look at the question again to see if further information can be given.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT ON TRANSPORT INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Acting Minister of Labour, which he may want to take as notice.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

In view of the fact that the Department of Labour has received the Murchison report and recommendations regarding the labour standards code and particularly the hours of work in the trucking industry, and in view of its constructive and reasonable approach to this problem, could the acting minister advise when the department will implement this report and the recommendations?

Hon. B. S. Mackasey (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the suggestion of the hon. member for Ontario that I take the question as notice. I might in the interval point out to him that the Murchison report is being analysed at the present moment by officials of the department, and that talks have already begun in their presence between union officials and representatives of the trucking industry. These talks have resulted essentially from the recommendations of the Murchison report. I shall seek further and more detailed information in the interim.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO MEET UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's refusal, expressed yesterday to the Canadian Labour Congress, to stimulate the economy, will the Prime Minister take the earliest opportunity to outline what alternative plans the government has to get the economy moving and thus combat the steadily rising rate of our unemployment.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I urge the hon. member not to put his questions in a form which makes it impossible for them to be answered on orders of the day.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am putting my question in substantially the same form as the right hon. gentleman's colleagues put their questions during six years in opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Since their questions were answered then I submit that the Prime Minister should answer this question now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is following a very bad precedent.

[Later:]

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): My question is intended for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In his absence perhaps I could direct it to the Minister without Portfolio, the Acting Minister of Labour. In view of the alarming increase in unemployment in Canada, can the minister advise the house what steps are now being taken by the government to alleviate this very serious situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking for a statement which ought to be made on motions.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—APPOINTMENT OF ARBITRATION BOARD ON PICARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Labour, of which I gave him notice. Since an injunction of the superior court in Montreal ordered the International Longshoremen's Association and the shipping federation to arbitrate their differences as to the interpretation and application of the Picard report, would the hon. gentleman inform the house whether the Minister of Labour was requested by the nominees of the parties or by the parties themselves to appoint a chairman for the arbitration board. If so, has the minister failed or refused so to appoint a chairman?

Hon. B. S. Mackasey (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour is not in the habit of failing or refusing with respect to anything that is reasonable.

I thank the hon. member for his courtesy in giving me prior notice of his question, though for various reasons I received his notice just as I came into the house. As I recall, Mr. Speaker, a request was made by the courts that certain clauses of the Picard report be sent to arbitration, that the two parties concerned name a representative and that the minister name a chairman. Unfortunately only the unions complied with the request of the courts; the shipping federation has failed to name a representative. It is thus impossible for the Minister of Labour to name a chairman. I might also point out, of course, that the wage agreement has now terminated and both parties are in the midst of new negotiations.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to understand from the minister's remarks that the shipping federation has not appointed its representative? The basis of my question was that both parties had appointed members and had asked the minister to appoint a chairman as the result of a court order, so that arbitration should take place. Do I understand from the minister that it is not the intention to appoint such a chairman, even now?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I shall make certain of my answer, since I was speaking from memory. As I recall the matter, however, the shipping federation had named their representative and immediately withdrew that representative, on the argument, valid or otherwise, that the spirit and intent of the Picard report had been violated by the unions during the Christmas holiday. Whether the minister intends to name a chairman to the arbitration board will depend—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—REPORTED CRITICISM BY HARBOURS BOARD VICE CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether in the light of remarks severely critical of winter transportation on the St. Lawrence, made in Halifax by Mr. Talbot of the National Harbours Board, the hon. gentleman might not in his wisdom reconsider the entire practice of navigation on the river during the severe winter months.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question as asked is of a very general nature and would call for the type of statement which should be made on motions.

Mr. Forrestall: Then could the minister give the house an assurance that in the light of the severity of the criticism by Mr. Talbot he will consider making a full statement on this matter at the earliest opportunity?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Perhaps I can get a transcript of what was actually said, and if a statement is warranted I could make one at an appropriate time.

AIRPORTS

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport?

Now that a subvention of $9 million has been granted for the development of the Toronto air terminal, does the minister intend to re-establish the subvention granted to the Montreal airport? Does the minister intend to make an announcement on that matter soon?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I have received a preliminary report on the 20-year plan for the Montreal airport, and it has raised certain questions which are now being investigated by the consulting engineers who were retained for that purpose. I hope to receive a final report soon and, after that, to make a statement at the earliest possible date indicating what new structural facilities will be required in the Montreal area and when we may expect work to go forward.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1966-67 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the final payments on the 1966-67 wheat crop will be made.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be meeting with members of the wheat board tomorrow. After that I shall be able to make a statement.

DRUGS

CHLORAMPHENICOLS—INQUIRY AS TO CLINICAL TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence I would address it to the Prime Minister. Would the right hon. gentleman inform the house what clinical tests are now being done to protect the Canadian public against the use of the chloramphenicols which are now on the Canadian market, but which were taken off the United States market about six weeks ago?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO PROMOTION OF FURTHER SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. During the hon. gentleman's absence in Europe and Asia we were informed that part of his mission was to try to sell wheat. Is the minister in a position to indicate to the house whether any positive sales resulted from his efforts?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think we laid some pretty constructive groundwork. There are prospects of sales of wheat to some of these countries, and we are pursuing them actively.

Mr. Korchinski: Could the minister let us in on the secret and tell us what countries he has in mind?

Mr. Winters: No, I do not think that would be in the public interest at this time. It might compromise possible sales.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—SUGGESTED INTERVENTION OF THE POPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is based on a very dramatic effort to bring peace to war stricken Viet Nam. Has the minister been advised of a message sent today to His Holiness Pope Paul, as follows:

> Humbly beg Your Holiness become hostage Hanoi so that barbarous American bombardment stop due your holy presence. This could lead negotiations and American withdrawal and put end Vietnamese agony.

The message is signed by Zaira Singh, a Roman Catholic, and is supported by a number of others. Has the minister received a copy of this telegram, and has he any comment to make on this very unusual suggestion?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Even if it is an urgent matter I doubt whether the hon. member can ask a question in this way. I doubt whether it is acceptable put in this form.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister received any information along these lines?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when I was coming into the house my hon. friend was kind enough to give me a copy of this telegram. This is the only indication of it that I have seen.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—PARTICIPATION BY YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will the minister inform the house whether he intends to cause proposals to be laid before the respective legislative councils of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories with respect to the participation by those two territories in the medicare program?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, for some time my officials have been in consultation with officials in health and welfare, and of course the advantages of medicare are available to the people who live in the territories so long as the territories acting for their people come up to the criteria set here. I understand that in the case of the Northwest Territories, principally due to the difficulties of geography, they are leaving the matter over for discussion this year, and I think in the case of the Yukon the question is going to be before the Yukon council next month.

POLLUTION

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan-Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the growing need for national control over pollution, will the minister indicate whether the Canada water act will be introduced this session?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I have already said to the house, Mr. Speaker, that being a realist I thought it would be introduced at the next session and not in this part of the present one.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

HULL, P.Q.—REQUEST FOR REVISION OF CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As reported in Le Droit yesterday, according to the estimates for the current year, the Department of Public Works will spend $84 million in Ottawa, as compared to $1 million in Hull, which has prompted a Liberal journalist to say that there is a difference—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should put his question.

Mr. Caouette: Precisely, Mr. Speaker, a horse to a rabbit ratio. Does the government intend to revise its policy and grant Hull more attention, and if so, when?

Mr. Speaker: The question of the hon. member is too general in character to be put at this time.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—POSSIBLE RECONVENING OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can give us any information as to the possible credence to be put in rumours that the suggestions being made to the Russians regarding the reconvening of the Geneva conference, have some prospect of success?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government would be happy to support any move to bring about a resumption of the Geneva conference in the hope that peace talks might be begun. However, I have no reason for believing that there is any immediate prospect that the co-chairmen together would agree to calling the members of the conference. Therefore I do not think it is possible at the moment, notwithstanding the efforts being made in this regard by the Secretary General of the United Nations.

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): As a supplementary question, can the minister tell the house when he expects to have a report available from Ambassador Ormond Dier?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I now have a report from Mr. Dier, who has returned from Hanoi. This report was sent to the government from Saigon. We are now examining the report, and consultations will be carried on in respect of it. I note in this connection the statement made by the Secretary General to the effect that he believed that if the bombing were to stop there might be talks within a period of about two weeks.

NORTH VIET NAM—PROTESTS OVER KILLING OF MISSIONARIES AND CIVILIANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has received information from Saigon which approximates the information we have been receiving from the press and radio, does he intend to send a strong protest to the government at Hanoi with regard to the slaughter of missionaries, women and children which has been undertaken by the forces which that government supports?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the report I have received I would not be in a position to modify the answer I gave on Monday.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs could indicate, as a result of his communication from Ambassador Dier, whether there is greater reason to believe that the government of Hanoi would be willing now to come to the conference table.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure my hon. friend will understand that it is not desirable or possible at this time, until this report has been fully examined and discussed with other parties, to give a reply with regard to a matter which is as important as this.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Canadian government decided to participate in a plan to give assistance to the refugees in South Viet Nam and, if so, what form will the plan to render this assistance take?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister indicated yesterday that this matter is being examined by the external aid board. That examination is under way. Dr. Vennema has been asked to go to Viet Nam to assess the situation in the hospital area which formerly was under his jurisdiction.

[Mr. Sherman.]

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

POSSIBLE RESULT OF REDUCTION IN ESTIMATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, normally I would direct this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but because of his absence with the committee on procedure I might put this question to the Prime Minister. In the light of the fact that the estimate for the Atlantic Development Board has been reduced from $60 million to $38 million can the Prime Minister tell the house whether this will have an influence on the acceptance or rejection of proposals advanced last week by the premiers of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into this matter.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POLICY OF DEPARTMENT IN PROSECUTIONS FOR POSSESSION OF MARIJUANA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Justice. Is it the policy of the Department of Justice, as expressed by the department's Toronto director, that drug prosecutors will be asking for jail terms instead of suspended sentences with probation for first offenders convicted of possession of marijuana?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): I am not aware of the statement, Mr. Speaker. I will have to look into the matter.

LABOUR RELATIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—RECOMMENDATION FOR INDUSTRIAL INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Labour. In view of the constitutional problems raised by the report by Mr. Justice Nemetz which was tabled yesterday in the British Columbia legislature and which recommended a permanent industrial inquiry commission, has the Department of Labour requested or received copies of that report?

Hon. B. S. Mackasey (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge we have not yet received the report. However, I assure the hon. gentleman that as soon as we do I will keep him abreast of developments.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

ALLEGED DELAY IN SETTING UP JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Public Works. Would he advise the house what is now delaying the appointment of the joint special committee on the national capital?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Nothing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that last September the appointment of this committee was promised for early in this session of parliament, would the minister now indicate when it is proposed that the committee be appointed?

Mr. McIlraith: Whenever the house can deal with it, Mr. Speaker. We propose putting the notice of motion on the order paper within the next few days.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, this question is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Carleton. When this committee is being set up will the minister consider my question which appears on the order paper? Will representatives from other provinces be appointed as members of this committee?

Mr. McIlraith: The setting up and the constitution of a committee of the house is a matter for the house. I believe the whips usually endeavour to give regional representation on the committees. It is not a matter for the government; it is a matter for the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

INQUIRY FOR TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON GREENHOUSE INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister advise the house, if he has not already received it, when he expects to receive a report from the tariff board in respect of the submission made to it on behalf of the greenhouse industry?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it would be unlikely that the report would come to me first, but I will make inquiries about it. I have not yet seen it.

FLOODS

ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct this question to the Secretary of State. I should like to ask her whether she has received a request from the province of Ontario for assistance in respect of the serious flood damage suffered by southwestern Ontario and, if so, what decision has been reached.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any such request. If it were delivered to me I suppose I could only supply blotting paper. It would have to go to one of my colleagues. I would think perhaps it would be a matter for the Department of National Defence.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

REQUESTS FOR EXCLUSION ON RELIGIOUS GROUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address this question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has he any answer at the present time to the question I asked previously concerning persons wishing exemption from the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan on religious grounds?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of that problem; however, we cannot do anything, because the legislation would have to be amended and this is not considered at the present time.

Patent Act—Trade Marks Act

[English]

• (3:10 p.m.)

PATENT ACT—TRADE MARKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner for the second reading of Bill No. C-190, to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act.

Mr. Harley: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege. This arises as a result of something which came to my attention late last evening. During the debate on Bill No. C-190 on February 12 as reported at page 6651 of Hansard I stated that chloramphenicol manufactured in the United States by nine companies had been allowed back on the market after rechecking. My information, Mr. Speaker, was incorrect. These products have not been allowed back on the United States market. I apologize to the house and express my appreciation in particular to the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) and the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) for drawing this matter to my attention.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking last evening I tried to stress the point that we in the official opposition agree with the stated objectives of this bill. However, we have grave concern on two main points. The first is the almost impossible task facing the food and drug directorate in attempting to assure the safety and quality of drugs for Canadians, if the drugs are easily imported from other countries without adequate supervision. Second, we are concerned that the legitimate pharmaceutical research in this country may be needlessly but seriously hindered and reduced as a result of this bill in its present form. With regard to the first point, I should like to quote a telegram which was received this morning from the president of the Canadian Medical Association. It is addressed to the president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada, with a copy to the Prime Minister and others, and reads as follows:

> Re Bill C-190; further to our previous communications to the Hon. John Turner on this subject the Canadian Medical Association continues to be deeply concerned that Bill C-190 in the form now being presented to parliament may open the door to drugs whose safety and effectiveness are below the standard expected and deserved by the Canadian public. Although we too favour the availability of drugs at a lower cost we are not convinced that the implementation of Bill C-190 will accomplish this end and we fear that the more important factors of safety and effectiveness may be compromised.
> Our concern is not restricted to the importation of generic drugs. We fear that confusion may arise due to the importation of brand name drugs some of which have ingredients, physiological activity and dosage forms different from similarly named Canadian brands.
> Under present government requirements quality control is responsibility of the drug manufacturer under the supervision of the food and drug directorate, Department of National Health and Welfare. Under this new legislation allowing the importation of drugs it will be extremely difficult if not impossible for the food and drug directorate to maintain the same degree of supervision over foreign manufacturers.
> We urgently request that this bill receive further detailed study and necessary amendments to provide adequate safeguards for the public. The association stands ready to aid in any such investigation.
> Dr. N. J. Belliveau, President,
> Canadian Medical Association

Since coming into the house I have received another telegram which is brief but, I think, very important because it comes from a large Canadian owned drug manufacturer which I think specializes in generic drugs. This telegram is addressed to myself and reads as follows:

> As a major Canadian owned pharmaceutical enterprise Empire Laboratories is vitally concerned with consequences of Bill C-190. Contrary to statements by bill's advocates, bill seriously threatens existence of Canadian owned segment of drug industry. Moreover the public health is threatened. Food and drug directorate cannot possibly ensure every import is manufactured under sanitary conditions—

And so on. With regard to the second point, I should like to point out that during the course of this debate I have heard various supporters of the bill say a great many times that the pharmaceutical industry has earnings which are twice as high as those of the average industry in the country. However, at page 12 of its report the committee says:

> Your committee believes this to be true for pharmaceutical companies generally, whether they be so called "innovators" or "copiers"; or brand name or generic producers. It should be pointed out in all fairness (as seen in table 4 of the appendix E), that the pharmaceutical industry showed (in 1963) the seventh highest rates of return on resources employed, and are exceeded by distilleries, wineries, motor vehicles, petroleum and coal products, motor vehicle parts and accessories, wire and wire products, and office and store machinery.

So there is a wide range of activity here in which the new minister can indulge. With regard to the pharmaceutical industry, it is my belief that they are good corporate citizens generally speaking, and I believe they would welcome negotiation or discussion with the Department of Consumer Affairs with regard to prices, advertising and guide lines which might be set down which would have the effect of reducing the cost of drugs to the consumer.

It seems to me that the government in drafting this bill has flailed about with a bludgeon in a situation where the deft use of a scalpel is what is required. We in the official opposition hope that the minister will see fit to withdraw the bill from committee of the whole and refer it to a suitable committee to bring it more into line with the recommendations of the special committee, while preserving its position on the order paper.

If the minister does not accept this suggestion, we in the official opposition expect that he will have the bill suitably amended or will agree to suitable amendments in committee of the whole on the points I have stressed, so that the public interest will be safeguarded. We of course reserve our position with regard to third reading until the final content of the bill is established by the committee of the whole.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few moments of the time of the house this afternoon to pay tribute, first of all, to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Turner) for having brought this legislation before the House of Commons. Both as a member for a workingman's area and as a physician, I have a deep concern for the health of our people. I believe that Bill No. C-190 is another step in the legislation introduced by this government to provide assistance for our citizens in order that they may achieve good health.

I have said in the past, and I repeat it today, that the cost of drugs to the patient who buys them at the drug store is much too high. In fact, we in this country pay one of the highest prices in the world for drugs. I welcome very much the assurances of the minister who has voiced his concern in the house about not only bringing down the cost of drugs through this legislation but also providing for the safety and efficacy of drugs. I should also like to express my concern on the question of safety and efficacy.

It is my opinion that the telegram referred to by the previous speaker, sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) by the Canadian Medical Association, should be given serious consideration by the minister. We would like to hear in the course of this debate and in the study of the bill in committee, assurances that the food and drug directorate and the minister's department will do everything possible to ensure that drugs will be not only economical but safe, and will do the job they are intended to do.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, like the previous speaker in this debate I shall be very brief. It is possible for me to be very brief because hon. members who have spoken in the debate in the last few days have gone into the technical aspects and ramifications of the bill in great detail. I was greatly impressed with the contributions made to the debate by those hon. members who are of the medical profession; in particular, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley), my colleague the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) and the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Isabelle). I listened closely to what was said by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) and then read his speech in Hansard.

With respect to the reasons which have been advanced by members of the official opposition who are opposed to the bill, I find myself completely unconvinced by their arguments. The two main arguments put forward in opposition to proceeding with this bill, as I gather from listening to them and then reading the speeches in Hansard, are that while the legislation shall bring into the Canadian drug market a greater degree of price competition, it will somehow lead to a deterioration of quality control and will make it more difficult to maintain high standards of drug safety.

They also make much of the argument that if the profit of drug companies is reduced their capability to conduct research and development will be lowered. In advancing these arguments hon. members apparently failed to take account of some obvious facts. First, as was shown clearly by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley), drug safety inspection can be taken as a fact. It must be policy on the part of any government to see that medicines and drugs put on the market, regardless of price, measure up to certain criteria or standards of safety. Any attempt to relate price to drug safety is spurious and illogical.

In respect of the argument that any reduction in the margin of profit will encourage a greater degree of price competition in the industry and lower the capability of that industry to undertake research and development, let me point out that the industry spends about four and a half times as much on promotional advertising as it does on research and development.

If research and development is a prime function of the industry, as it ought to be, there is nothing in this legislation which will reduce the capability of the industry to engage in research. The industry may have to cut back on its promotional activity but, as has been suggested by several hon. members, particularly those of the medical profession, there seems to be a proliferation on the part of the industry to seduce the medical profession, through the use of a great number of brochures and advertising gimmicks. As has been said, many doctors in this country feel the time has long passed when material emanating from the pharmaceutical manufacturing houses serves any useful purpose. Much of this material is consigned to the wastebasket. All this promotion increases the expenses of the firms, which they pass on in good measure to the consumer.

Let me refer to one other point which was brought forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). He took exception to what the minister sponsoring this bill said about the inclusion of those charts which were appended to Hansard for Monday, and which indicated that the price of drugs in Canada was much higher than in most other industrialized countries.

That hon. member suggested that these charts were misleading because they do not take into account the relative purchasing power and wage scales in these other countries where drug prices are considerably lower than in Canada. The hon. member was obviously suggesting that since wages or incomes are lower in these countries, the price of drugs should be lower. Apparently he feels there can be some reason for higher drug prices in Canada if only because of higher incomes. While there may be some validity to the argument, the hon. member has ignored one essential point.

The pricing practice used by pharmaceutical houses is obviously divorced from production costs and the cost of research. Obviously their pricing practice is not related to the cost of production as it should be, but rather to some judgment as to what the market will bear, or what the Canadian consumer will pay without complaining too much. The differential between costs and selling price is enormous. The practice over the years has been to increase the price little by little over a period of time. Whenever it is felt there is imminency of consumer price complaint, the increases are stopped.

I suggest that if it were not for action of responsible public bodies such as parliament, this practice would likely continue. Many interesting pieces of information were brought to light in evidence presented to the committee on drug costs and prices, and by evidence presented to two other investigating bodies. Inasmuch as much of this information has been aired and discussed in this chamber, I feel I would be serving no useful purpose in referring to it again.

Let me conclude by saying there is no question but that there is a direct and obvious responsibility on this government and parliament to pass this legislation, even though, taken by itself, it may not have a great impact. Together with other measures the minister has indicated this government is contemplating, this measure will have the effect of bringing drug prices in this country down to levels which can be justified by the cost of production and research. I wish to commend the minister and his colleagues for the enlightened and bold position they have taken which was not really expected.

Mr. Speaker: I must remind hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank hon. members of the house for allowing me to close the debate at this time, so that the bill may go to the committee of the whole for further discussion and elucidation, particularly in respect of some points referred to in general terms during this debate on second reading.

Let me deal briefly with those points referred to by hon. members on all sides of the house, particularly the chief spokesman for the official opposition, the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard). He suggested that the bill was confiscatory in that it took away property rights of patentees under the Patent Act. I assure hon. members that I listened to his point with the greatest interest.

I want to say to the hon. member in general terms that this bill does not, to use his words, virtually abolish patent protection. In effect, a five year monopoly under the patent is maintained because of the period that elapses under the present food and drug regulations, and thereafter the patentee, if there is a compulsory licence issued, will enjoy the protection he has gained through establishing a position in the market. This is a position he would enjoy under ordinary circumstances for five years under the patent. In addition, he will enjoy the royalties from any new rivals who may have been able to obtain a compulsory licence from the patent commissioner. This is not confiscation of property, Mr. Speaker, because what we are doing here is diluting, to a certain extent, the patent protection in a way that is analogous to reducing a tariff.

The purpose of this bill is to reduce the effect and use of a patent as an analogous economic weapon, if you will, to the tariff. I may say that the domestic drug industry will still obtain the 15 per cent most favoured nation tariff. Both the patent and the tariff are economic institutions that are designed to achieve particular economic ends. I want to say to the hon. member, through you, Mr. Speaker, that much research, innovation and invention is not patentable. I want to say also to the hon. member that patent laws vary widely around the world according to the needs of the individual economies. A patent right is not an absolute right. It is a right that has to be weighed in the balance of economic convenience. In this case, it is the objective of the bill to weigh the legitimate rights of the Canadian consumer against the legitimate rights of the inventor and the drug industry. In this sense, this bill moves Canada closer to the position already adopted by the United Kingdom and the United States.

Many members were worried about the fact that this bill, if carried by the house, would have an effect on employment. In my opening speech, sir, I recited the figures relating to the people employed by the drug industry in this country. It is my view, on the basis of the best advice I was able to obtain, that this bill will not adversely affect employment within the drug industry in Canada. About 85 per cent of the Canadian drug industry converts the basic chemical ingredients from their basic form into final dosage form, that is to say into the pill, the tube or syrups. This bill, if effective, would introduce more competition into that manufacturing process. It should not affect the amount of manufacturing done in Canada. It would tend to make manufacturing more competitive, but the amount of employment should not be affected to any degree.

Some members were disturbed by the possibility of Canada importing large amounts of drugs from Italy, Hong Kong and other parts of the world. Here again, I want to remind the house, if I may, that 85 per cent of the Canadian drug manufacturing industry in Canada really exists on importation of the basic ingredients, and conversion of those basic ingredients into the final dosage form. We already import 85 per cent of the basic chemicals into Canada. We do not expect this bill will unduly rearrange this percentage.

Then, some members were concerned, and perhaps I would share their concern if I were criticizing this bill, about the possibility of research in Canada being adversely affected by this measure. It is our view again, sir, and I hope I was able to make this point in my opening speech, that patent protection by itself is not an inducement to research. We have had patent protection in this country ever since confederation.

Until very recently only three major drug companies did any appreciable research in Canada, and the increase in research done in this country was probably attributable more to direct government intervention by way of research grants and tax incentives than it was by virtue of the patent system. The existence of a patent, therefore, is not the sole reason for research being done here. I hope that government programs for research within the competence of the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) would amply encourage the continuance of whatever research in drugs is done in Canada.

I think the house ought to recall that the drug industry is an international industry. All the major companies having 85 per cent of the business in this country are controlled abroad, either in the United States, Switzerland, the United Kingdom or some other country. When these international concerns, subsidiaries and related companies in various parts of the world decide where they are going to put research, they will put research where the market is or where available scientists can be found.

In most cases, research has to be concentrated in one place because of the highly complicated, highly specialized nature of the research and because of the expensive equipment needed to mount it. Not very much of the international research done in the drug industry has found itself resident in Canada. There is nothing in this bill, to our mind, which would promote the changing of the location of research in Canada, if that research were otherwise economically desirable here.

Finally, I want to deal with a point that seemed to be occupying the minds of most speakers who had the courtesy to enter the debate, and that is the question of safety. I was particularly impressed by the learned address by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) and by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) last evening, as well as the very respected member for Queens (Mr. MacLean). They dwelt particularly on this subject.

I want to say again that, regardless of the economic motives for this bill, that is to say, to provoke more competition, to encourage more free enterprise, to encourage competition in price rather than merely in a promotional sense, there are two other objectives. As I said at the outset, the first of these objectives is to maintain safe, efficacious, high quality drugs in Canada. There is no doubt about that. I want to restate my concern and the concern of the government on that score. The second objective is to maintain a viable domestic drug industry.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister permit a question? If the prime purpose of this bill is to affect prices, would the minister not agree that just about all manufactured products in Canada could be brought into this country much cheaper, but that is part of the price of having a Canada?

Mr. Turner: The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings is enticing me into an argument which I should like to have with him on any public platform.

An hon. Member: He is not a leadership candidate.

Mr. Turner: The relevant argument is free trade against protection. I think that this country, in terms of surviving economically, must always weigh the balance of having free trade for the benefit of the consumers, and a certain amount of protection for the benefit of a viable domestic industry. I am saying to him that indeed this measure tends to have an aspect of freer trade attached to it. By lowering the patent protection we are, in effect, lowering a non-tariff barrier to trade.

• (3:40 p.m.)

On the other hand Mr. Speaker, the domestic drug industry, even after the passage of the bill—assuming the bill gains the assent of this house and the other place—will have a good deal of protection left. For example, there will be the 15 per cent most favoured nation tariff and the advance five year period under the new drug status of the food and drug regulations. The industry will have the advantage of its high promotional and selling detailmen. It will have the advantage of having imprinted on the minds of the public the brand names under which most of the major companies sell drugs. So that the protective element in the drug industry is still quite considerable; and it is because we are able to weigh the balance of economic convenience that we have confidence that the bill will not adversely affect the domestic drug industry.

I want to get back to safety, Mr. Speaker. A number of hon. members expressed concern that the bill did not contain what they referred to as adequate safeguards respecting quality and safety of drugs. I would emphasize what I said previously, Mr. Speaker, namely that in the government's program designed to reduce the price of drugs, the need to supply the Canadian market with safe and efficacious drugs is paramount. If I or the minister of health, or if the government were not satisfied that this objective could be achieved when the program becomes effective, then I would not have introduced the bill.

The patent and trade marks legislation is not designed to deal with matters of this sort. This is primarily a question for the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare, who administer the legislation respecting safety and quality of drugs. The proposed section 41(13) of the Patent Act makes it mandatory upon the commissioner of patents to give immediate notice of any application to the Department of National Health and Welfare and the food and drug directorate.

In the preparation of this bill I had the advantage of the advice of officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the food and drug directorate, the Department of Finance, the Department of Justice and the Department of Industry, as well as the advice of senior officials from my own department, which at the time was that of the Registrar General, now the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this bill has received the consideration of the most senior men in a number of government departments.

Since we announced our intention to introduce the bill, and the introduction of the bill itself, I have received delegations from all major and smaller companies manufacturing drugs in Canada that wanted to see me. On two occasions I had interviews with the executive of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada. I also saw the Canadian Independent Drug Manufacturers Association and other bodies interested in the industry.

I want to say to hon. members that when we get into committee of the whole I will entertain all amendments that might be presented, and will look into them thoroughly. If they add to the protection accorded the Canadian public, then they will certainly meet with my approval and with the approval of the government. However, I want to say that the food and drug regulations at the moment do provide, in our opinion, adequate authority to control fully the importation of drugs.

In this regard I want to read into Hansard section C.01.055 of the food and drug regulations, which provides:

In the case of a drug sought to be imported into Canada, the director may require—

Mr. Forrestall: "May" require.

Mr. Turner:

—may require

(a) Information and evidence satisfactory to him that the conditions of manufacture described in section C.01.052 have been met in respect to such drug, and

(b) before such drug is released for sale, the testing in Canada of the drug by an acceptable method in the form in which it is sought to be imported, and if, in the opinion of the director such drug or any lot or batch thereof does not conform to the requirements of these regulations, the drug or lot or batch thereof shall not be admitted into Canada for use as a drug.

It should be recognized that the drugs at present imported into Canada—I have already pointed out that 85 per cent of the industry's operations consists of converting the imported basic drugs into final dosage forms—are already and will continue to be subject to the control of this regulation.

With regard to resources being made available to the food and drug directorate, hon. members will have seen the blue book of estimates for 1968-69 which was tabled in the house on Monday. Those estimates provide for an increase of 110 man years in the staff of the directorate, and for an increase in the budget of the directorate of roughly $2 million. Not all of this increase, of course, is occasioned by the present bill, but I have it from the director of the food and drug directorate that sufficient and adequate resources will be made available to implement this bill and to meet any extra work occasioned thereby.

I think I owe it to Dr. R. A. Chapman, who is the director-general of food and drugs, to refer to a remark that was made by the hon. member for Wellington-Huron (Mr. Howe). The hon. member attributed to Dr. Chapman certain statements that in fact were taken directly from an article that appeared in the January 1, 1966 issue of Maclean's magazine. These statements were attributed to Dr. Chapman, and yet there was no attribution in the magazine. I think it only fair to correct the record, and I am sure it was inadvertence on the part of the hon. member for Wellington-Huron.

The first statement related to the fact that an F.D.D. inspector found a kitchen table manufacturer putting out a drug which lost its potency within two days, compared with the six month shelf life of the same drug produced by a reputable company. The second statement was that in Italy the laws call for these manufacturers to assay their own products, but F.D.D. inspectors often find the test equipment dust covered and obviously unused. Dr. Chapman has assured me that these statements were not made by him; and indeed I have the Maclean's magazine article containing these two quotations with me this afternoon.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, some hon. members opposite suggested that the government might refer the bill to the standing committee of the house, for further review. It is my feeling that the suggested amendments to the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act now before the house have received very lengthy review indeed, both by the standing committee of the House of Commons and at the hearings of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. When the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission was reviewing a number of subjects relating to drug costs and drug prices, it dealt with the question of patent and trade mark protection. At that time 146 manufacturers were consulted, as well as 80 professional, trade and hospital associations, health and welfare organizations, universities and so on. In addition to this there were 25 days of public hearings and the testimony occupied 3,260 pages of transcript. Thirteen legal counsel and 78 witnesses were heard.

The standing committee of the House of Commons, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Halton, who is known professionally as Dr. Harley, produced 2,717 pages of evidence and appendices. The committee took 14 months to complete its hearings; 108 witnesses were called and the committee held 63 meetings.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is the result of the consideration of the recommendations made by that committee. Some of its recommendations have been accepted in toto. Some have been modified and some have been rejected, for reasons which I tried to set forth in my opening remarks. I think at same time it might be useful for us to review just how many of the 23 recommendations of the Harley committee have already been implemented. If this bill receives the approbation of this house, all statutory amendments which are involved in the recommendations of this report will have been implemented. That includes those recommendations which fall within the authority of the federal government. The bill deals with recommendations numbered 11, 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the house for allowing this matter to go to the committee stage. On this side we shall consider seriously all reasonable amendments which are presented during the committee of the whole stage. I suggest to hon. members that they can help us to digest amendments and to process them, if they give us those amendments at the earliest possible moment. The text of some amendments has already been suggested by members of the official opposition, and more amendments may follow.

I shall now sit down, and speak again perhaps during the committee of the whole stage.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Tardif in the chair.

[Mr. Turner.]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. House in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-190, an act to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act. Shall clause 1 carry?

On clause 1.

Mr. Richard: Mr. Chairman, I refrained from speaking during the second reading stage, thinking it would be better if I spoke when the house is in committee. Many hon. members in the debate spoke at length about the drug industry and about the price of drugs. I do not intend to speak about the necessity for immediate measures to reduce the price of drugs. That this necessity exists was fully demonstrated in the committee chaired by the hon. member for Halton.

I am satisfied that the price of drugs is excessive and that that is harmful to the economy and to the nation. I am also satisfied it has been proven that the safety and quality of drugs is not related to ownership or control of patents, or to the products of a few brand name firms. On the contrary, it is well known that certain licensees of patent owners have produced better quality drugs than the so called ethical or brand name firms have produced. I am also satisfied that a large proportion of the profits which are accumulated by our pharmaceutical industry, so called, which is foreign owned, reverts to foreign hands.

In view of recent legislation which has been enacted in many provinces and by the Canadian government, under which medical and hospital care would become a responsibility of government, I have become particularly worried about the cost of drugs. It has been said that over 30 per cent of medicare costs will be attributed to drugs and pharmaceutical products. Unless effective legislation is introduced, this country could price itself out of any scheme which will provide the medical services that it wishes to extend to its citizens. The United Kingdom met this difficulty by importing its drugs directly from Switzerland and other countries. Under its medicare plan these drugs are distributed at a very low cost.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, deals with amendments to the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act. In passing, I wish to say that it is unfortunate that we are still dealing with the old Patent Act eight years after the royal commission made a report on patents to this house. Nothing has been done since then. Had something been done we should not now be faced with the difficulties that we are faced with.

The minister has already indicated that this bill is only one step in a larger program which is to effect a reduction in drug prices. Owners of patents should realize that they are beneficiaries of a monopoly extended to them by parliament. In effect, that monopoly gives them unlimited latitude to fix prices for their products, and to control their distribution. There has been little investigation into this feature of patents. Furthermore the house knows that the term of a patent, which is for 17 years, is much longer than necessary under modern conditions.

True, certain clauses in the Patent Act which relate to compulsory licences deal with abuses, but it has always been most difficult, or almost impossible, to make a case of abuse before the courts, because of the great litigation costs in appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada, and because the relevant sections of the act are not strong enough.

In the case of patents on drugs, a great body of opinion has held that patents should not be granted for medical products and foods. Italy is one country which has subscribed to this view. I do not intend to take sides, but I venture the opinion that at the present time our large brand name firms will do as well without patents as they now do with patents, so long as they have their present unlimited resources for publicity, advertising and soliciting, and so long as they have the co-operation of the medical profession, the members of which find it easier to order drugs by their trade names instead of by their generic names.

I remind the committee also that 95 per cent of our Canadian patents are held by foreign firms that the control, distribution, quality and availability of drugs lies in their hands.

I now wish to say a few words about the legislation. In my view it is very fair legislation. It is a fact that foreign firms which hold patents in Canada have the right to import drug ingredients—sometimes they import the finished product—from their parent companies. The legislation which has been submitted to this house gives that same right to an approved importer who is other than the subsidiary of the owner of the patent, except that any new licensees will have to pay royalties. Such licensee must satisfy the food and drug directorate and must find a market for his product in the face of stiff competition. He will have to satisfy the food and drug administration that his product is satisfactory from the point of view of safety and quality.

I should like to pay tribute to our own food and drug directorate. I remind the committee that though we do not follow the United States practice, which is to publish the results of investigations and court cases, it might be a good idea to do so. Hon. members may be surprised to learn that investigations are not always direced against the so-called—and I do not know whether this is the correct term to use—disreputable companies. Somebody said that some firms which are not reputable are selling drugs. To make that suggestion is not to pay a compliment to our food and drug administration.

If the results of investigations were published it would be found that even the so-called brand name firms have been looked into. They are just as likely as other firms to produce products which are not of good quality or approved purity. The fact that a firm overprices its drugs gives us no guarantee of the quality of those drugs. True, certain sections in the Patent Act relate to compulsory licensing and to abuses but, as I have said, those abuses are hard to prove.

Not too many firms can afford the cost of the proceedings that are involved in obtaining a licence, and very few licences will be certified by the food and drug directorate. That is why this legislation will create little problem for those who sympathize with the large companies. Licences must be approved by the food and drug directorate. Firms seeking those licences must have money to obtain them and money to compete with firms which are already established.

This legislation will at least give a chance to Canadian firms to get established, in the hope of developing a Canadian pharmaceutical industry providing drugs at a competitive price. The large patent owners have only themselves to blame for this legislation. They have consistently refused licences to reliable small firms, while at the same time they have willingly licensed some of their large competitors so as to restrict the market and control prices. This is one feature which I believe should be investigated in greater depth by the combines branch.

A great deal has been said about research to be carried out by some of the large firms in Canada. I am satisfied that very little research is being carried on, in comparison with the benefits which accrue to some of the larger firms. As a matter of fact, the few discoveries we have made in the field of drugs in Canada can be attributed, not to these firms but to government agencies, universities or hospitals. A great deal of the staff involved in research comes from these sources, and the money comes from governments.

I repeat what I said earlier about the term of life of patents for drugs. I consider that a term of 17 years is far too long. It has been my experience that the commercial use of a drug patent is from five to seven years after which, for many reasons, including economic ones, a substitute is developed under a new brand name. There are some doctors present in the committee and they should know this to be true. I know it to be the case. There is the example of librium, which came out a few years ago. It had a real life of only some four or five years before it was superseded by a tranquilizer which was stated to be much better—and of course it was—namely valium. This is why I do not like the provision for a fixed five-year term in connection with the refusal of licences.

I should like to say a word about applications for licences. I am sure the minister realizes that the commissioner of patents has very heavy responsibilities and that he will not be able to hear many applications in one year. The minister should assure the committee that he will be provided with the necessary power and staff to enable applications to be heard by a properly constituted board, say three or four men, otherwise the delays will be endless.

I am against appeals to the Exchequer Court from these decisions. Under the legislation with which we are dealing, decisions by the commissioner are always followed by appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada and the cost of such appeals is excessive. Some hon. members have drawn attention to the fact that under the present practice only a few applications for compulsory licences have been heard in past years. This is the reason, and it is easy to understand. I speak as a patent lawyer. I never could find a client who was in a position to drag litigation out for four or five years culminating in hearings by the Supreme Court of Canada, to be faced in the end, possibly, by a bill of costs which could run to $7,000, even if I did not charge him one cent.

I shall not say much about the trade mark provisions in this bill, except to remind the committee that the most important protection afforded to brand name firms is the trade mark under which they sell their drugs. As long as the medical profession insists on prescribing by brand names, and if governments do the same, there is really no other protection required in order to maintain the status quo.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this legislation will achieve the desired result. But this will happen only if there are enough competent and approved applicants for licences. In any event we must remind ourselves of the fact that any reduction in prices would also be within the power of the licensee. How much will that be?

Mr. Rynard: I should like to make a few further observations on Bill C-190. I have already placed on record my views with regard to the question of patent rights, and I have described what might be the effect of these provisions on the drug industry. I have expressed the view that the main requisite when prescribing drugs is safety—that drugs should be safe, and able to do the clinical job which they are supposed to do. I have put on record what the granting of patent rights has done for the Connaught medical research laboratories at the University of Toronto.

I doubt whether any of this research could have been carried out in the absence of patent rights with respect to insulin. The number of employees there now is about 800. Sales alone amount to more than $6 million, and the export trade to just under $2 million. But the value of the work this laboratory has done is immeasurable. I could cite the names of many professional people engaged in research who are able to continue to carry out work of great value to mankind, as a result of the discovery of insulin and similar drugs. Because their lives were saved they were able to carry on with some of the most fruitful work which has been done in the University of Toronto area. Whether one thinks of all this in the terms of the suffering which has been relieved or in the economics of dollars and cents, the benefit is beyond measure. I do not think for one moment we should disregard these aspects in a country of 20 million people. When insulin was discovered, our population numbered only 10 million. Yet the discovery was made here in Canada, and nowhere else in the world.

It has been stated disparagingly that the drug industry puts only 7 per cent of its budget into research. I want to ask you this, Mr. Chairman: What does industry generally put into research? What do other industries in Canada devote to research? The figure in the case of the drug industry is higher than that of any other industry in Canada. This is a state of affairs that we must preserve. Do the people of Canada want to pay for all their research to be done in the United States or some other foreign country, as it is done today for many Canadian subsidiaries? I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that it cost us well over $300 million last year for research done in the United States—a lot of it by people who were educated in this country; we paid the cost of their education and then they went to the United States because research jobs were not available here. What a folly that is. As I have said previously, the cost of educating a medical doctor is well over $50,000. Are we going to let that go as an asset to some other country because we do not provide doctors with facilities for research in Canada? This is folly of the worst sort. The same applies to pharmaceutical research.

When our young doctors go to the United States they become American citizens. Not so long ago I was in Boston, where I met three young Canadian doctors who had been educated in this country. Consider the cost of raising them, paying the baby bonus, paying for their education, putting them through medical school, giving them three or four years training afterwards, and then consider that they went to the United States because that is where the opportunities for research are. They did not have the opportunity to do research in Canada.

Last year the drug industry in Canada poured $12 million into research. I will not say this bill will destroy our drug industry, but I wish to indicate what has happened in other fields. The government takes the attitude that so much of our drug industry is owned outside Canada that the rest does not matter. I ask how much of the oil industry and of the manufacturing industry is owned outside Canada?

How are we ever going to build a country if we do not keep our university educated young men and women in Canada? At present they are going to the United States. I could name Canadians who are top flight men not only in research but in every other field in the United States. I wonder how many hon. members know that last year we paid over $300 million to the United States for industrial research. Surely we cannot build up a country by doing things like that.

All of us want cheaper drugs, cheaper food, cheaper automobiles and lower rents. It does not faze the government, but we also want lower taxes. Our cost of living is at an all time high and I have not heard any suggestions about what the government will do in that regard. True, the government wants drug costs lowered. I am in favour of that 100 per cent, if the safety of drugs is protected. But what is the government doing about the cost of living and about high taxes? These are the things that make us non-competitive in many fields of production.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is smart. I think he is flexible, and I hope he will not be arrogant when it comes to making some amendments to this bill. He has a nice smile. He certainly leads you to believe that he is going to go along with you. I really like him, but I know he has to pilot a bad bill through this house and I sympathize with him. I hope he will show that elasticity and good judgment which will go across Canada to show the people that not only is he concerned about their getting cheaper drugs, but also that he is concerned that the drugs they get will do the job they are supposed to do. In the final analysis we will expect to make this a good bill.

One of the things which has struck me about the government, and this is something I said the other day, is that it allowed foreign imports of boots and shoes to increase year after year, until they pretty nearly put the Canadian boot and shoe industry out of business, a business which, per dollar, employs more people than most other industries. At present about 6 per cent of our labour force is unemployed. The rate of unemployment is going up and up like an escalator, but the government is not protecting the drug industry.

The same thing applies to the textile industry, and this really bothers me because there is a textile plant in my constituency. It is not a big plant by United States standards, but if the government does not move to abolish textile dumping, on July 1, 1968 foreign manufacturers will be able to dump more textiles in Canada in one month than all of our own textile firms could produce. The result will be more and more unemployment.

The same thing applies to farming. What is the government doing about the dairy industry? More and more people are being forced out of dairying with the result that we will have to buy more and more dairy products from other countries. I could also speak about the fruit and vegetable industry. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce said we have to be competitive. How can we be competitive in the drug field, or in any other field, when workmen in some other countries are being paid a third of what Canadian workmen receive? Does that make common sense? The result will be to put Canadian workmen out of jobs. We cannot have the second highest standard of living in the world and import all foreign goods. Look at our balance of payments situation.

Now the government is sponsoring this bill even though its spokesmen have said they do not know what its ultimate effect will be. They hope it will not be disastrous; but this government has done so many things that were disastrous that naturally I am a bit suspicious.

I now wish to deal with the comparative prices of drugs. Many tables which I think are not too relevant have been published during the course of the debate on this bill. I think the hon. lady from Grenville-Dundas put it very clearly when, as recorded at page 6702 of yesterday's Hansard, she said:

> We have heard a great deal about the possible savings that can be made by using generic as against brand name drugs. An independent company, International Surveys Limited produced a report dated November 27, 1967 on its investigation of the relative cost of prescriptions written under brand names compared with those under generic names. The basis for the selection of drugs to be studied was as follows: they had to be well established, they had to cover as wide a range as possible in different therapeutic fields. Controlled drugs and drugs restricted by the Narcotics Act were excluded from the inquiry.
> • (4:20 p.m.)
> Major cities across Canada were chosen for use in the survey and pharmacies were selected at random from the yellow pages of telephone directories.
> In the 11 categories of drugs studied, the differences in cost between brand and generic prescriptions were found to be negligible in nine of the categories. In one category the price of generic drugs was significantly higher and in one other the brand name prescriptions were significantly higher in price. The differences in price as between one outlet and another were found to be considerable.

I believe that is very true of the situation across Canada.

I was interested in what the hon. member for Winnipeg North had to say. I listened to him and I read his speech, and it was not too clear to me what he meant. However, I believe he said that the hospitals across Canada used generic drugs. I should like to say that I am not deriding generic drugs; there are some very good generic manufacturers. There are generic drugs which have been tested clinically and which have come up to standard. However, to come back to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North said, or what I thought he said, I checked with 12 hospitals across Canada today and found that they do not use generic drugs: They use brand name drugs. I was advised by one of the hospitals that they had at one time purchased other generic name drugs, but they found that it was necessary to test them clinically and that after testing many of them did not come up to the standards they required in the treatment of their patients. They found that the cost of testing was too high and therefore discarded the idea of buying other than brand name drugs.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member would permit a question, I should like to ask him whether when making these inquiries of the hospitals across Canada he asked what prices they were paying for the drugs they are purchasing, and how these prices compared with the prices the large drug manufacturers charge to other users of the drugs.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, that has nothing whatsoever to do with what I said. Is it not true in respect of any business that if you buy in great quantities in bulk you receive a cheaper price. If one goes to a drug store, surely the druggist must be paid his prescription fee. To have it otherwise would be nonsense. I hope what I have said deals effectively with the situation. I have taken the trouble to check into this matter. As a member of a research board I believe I am fairly familiar with the situation. I was therefore surprised to hear the hon. member say what I thought he said, and what apparently he did say. I do not think he intended to give the house false information. Probably he did not do his homework correctly.

I should like to ask the hon. member how he arrived at the figure of $5,000 in respect of the ratio per detail man and physician. I do not wish to enter into a debate on this matter, but according to my calculations that would amount to $100 million for detailing the doctors of Canada. I know the detail men have not spent $5,000 on me, and I have been in practice a long time. I know also that they have not spent it on any of the other doctors in my group. So I do not know where that figure came from. If the hon. member would like to tell us where it came from I would be glad to give him the opportunity to do so, if he has your permission, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I did not have the figures in front of me when I made the statement, but if the hon. member for Simcoe East would read the evidence given by the witnesses who appeared on behalf of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association concerning the cost of promoting drugs he would find that 30 cents out of every dollar goes into the promotional costs, the salaries and expenses of detail men, and the very expensive glossy multi-coloured pamphlets which flood the offices of every doctor in Canada. They come from every large drug company which sells prescription drugs in Canada.

If the hon. member would look at the figures showing the amount they spend, and divide that by the number of doctors in Canada he will find that if my figure of $5,000 is not quite correct it is not very far out.

Mr. Forrestall: The figure is out by $4,000.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Halifax says that the figure is out by $4,000 per physician. I think we should be careful, when saying things in the house, that we are sure of the source of our information. I do not want to suggest that the hon. member for Winnipeg North has deliberately misled this house; I would not like such an interpretation to be taken from my words.

Patent rights have now been running for 17 years. I have given some thought to this and I believe we should do something about it. The manufacturers charge a price for their drugs that would enable them to recover the research cost over that number of years. The period now has been cut to five years. It has been stated that some members of the cabinet think that perhaps it should be cut to two years. I am not sure I would agree to a period of 5 years. This would give manufacturers less than a third of the time they have had formerly in which to recover their research expenditures. It might be that the manufacturers will say that they will have to charge enough in that five year period to recover the cost of research of the drug. If they do not recover it, it seems to me they would either go out of business or would be very badly hurt.

Most of the drugs on which they have patent rights, such as chloromycetin, are antibiotics. They play a part in the saving of lives, in infections and therefore in the long run I wonder whether our action might not result in the patient paying more. I think this is worth consideration. I am sure the minister will take a look at this and reply to the question of whether the shortening of the patent right period will influence the cost of the drug. I wonder whether in this way we might be doing a disservice to the Canadian people, because it is only the worthwhile drugs that will be researched to any great extent, because of the part they play in the clinical treatment of patients. In other words, we might well be increasing the cost of lifesaving drugs to the Canadian people.

I should like to mention the clinical efficacy of drugs. I am disturbed by the statements we hear to the effect that some drugs have exactly the same components, and yet clinically will not do the same job. I believe this is one of the things many of us do not grasp. There was a very well known example of this which has to do with chloromycetin. I stated in the house the other day that chloramphenicol had been withdrawn from the United States market and that only chloromycetin was allowed to be sold. The fact of the matter is that chloramphenicol is manufactured by the Parks, Davis Company under the trade name or brand name of chloromycetin.

They had that patent for 17 years. The interesting thing about this drug is that, if my memory serves me correctly, it cost Parke, Davis something like $5 million to research and produce it. I believe my figure is correct. I am going back in my memory to information which I received at the Mayo clinic, Rochester, in the state of Minnesota.

The Chairman: Order, please. It is rather difficult for the Chair to hear the remarks being made by the hon. member for Simcoe East. Perhaps the conversations that are being carried on in the chamber could very well take place in the lobbies.

Mr. Rynard: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As I was saying, it cost Parke, Davis about $5 million to research that drug. Their patent rights lasted for 17 years. It was a valuable drug, was most often used in cases of very serious illness. Last December those patent rights ran out. In January or February of 1967 five other companies applied for and obtained a compulsory licence to manufacture the drug chloramphenicol. These companies were granted this right, manufactured the drug and marketed it. Parke, Davis continued manufacturing it also. Around June doctors started to note that they were not getting the results from chloramphenicol that they should have been getting; it was not doing the job. They started to check up in hospitals and found that Parke, Davis' chloramphenicol was doing the job and the blood levels were all right. In the case of the drug manufactured by other companies, the blood levels were at various levels and urinary output in respect of the drug varied as well.

The point with any life saving drug, or any drug used when a patient is acutely ill, is to get the blood at such a level that the components of the drug in the patient's blood are strong enough to kill the germ that has attacked the patient. Therefore the drug is life saving. I do not know whether some people died in the United States as a result of the use of the drug chloramphenicol; I did not go into all the facts. But as a result of the investigation, all those drugs manufactured under compulsory licence were recalled from the market by the food and drugs department of the United States. Chloramphenicol as produced by Parke, Davis is the only such drug one can purchase today in the United States. I thank the hon. member for Halton, the chairman of our committee, for stating that he had ascertained that the information I have given to the committee is correct. I appreciate that very much.

This is the important point. You had a drug that met exactly the requirements of the food and drugs department of the United States. It met those requirements in every detail. A compulsory licence was granted for the manufacture of the drug, but clinically the drug failed. I say to the minister that this is one of the points that must be written into this bill, namely the clinical efficiency of the drug; because nothing else matters.

The drug can be safe as far as the components are concerned, but it is not necessarily clinically efficient. We have a great example of this right now with respect to Parke, Davis. I am sure the Prime Minister will look into this matter immediately. I asked him about it today during the question period. You can go downtown in Ottawa and buy chloramphenicol of different brands. I do not think this is good enough or smart enough. I do not think this should be the situation.

I point out to the minister that, leaving out other factors that may also be of great importance, the factor of greatest importance is the clinical efficiency of the drug that will save somebody's life, instead of losing it. Once the organism or the germ gets ahead of the antibiotic and is not being controlled, you may lose your patient. I again say to the minister that this is something the medical profession demands above all things, namely that the drug doctors are using be clinically efficient.

Somebody said this is an emotional matter. If you have ever sat by the bedside of somebody fighting for his life, and you have been checking the blood level and checking the patient clinically, hoping and praying that the drug would make the blood level high enough to kill the organism or germ, you would know that this is not an emotional matter. Anybody who brands it as emotional should not be in the house; he is not mature enough to be here.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, this should be a prime consideration in the bill. Every doctor, every patient, has the right to be assured of clinical efficiency in respect of the drugs he uses. I will have more to say on this subject when we deal with other clauses of the bill.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, my remarks at this time will be very brief, because I do not have a full knowledge of this subject and I realize that the debate and discussion on this side of the house has been under the very capable supervision and in the good hands of the hon. member for Simcoe East. However, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not express my concern for those Canadians who are unfortunate enough to have to buy expensive drugs, and many drugs in some cases. I refer to Canadians with large families, and particularly our senior citizens, who can usually least afford it, who have to pay high prices for drugs. The senior citizens of this country pay more than any other group of people because they suffer from more ailments and need more drugs. Therefore I have every sympathy for these people. And the high cost of drugs with which they are burdened.

I realize that this bill has been introduced in order to bring down the cost of drugs, particularly for the people I have mentioned. Because I shall raise a few objections to the bill I hope I shall not be accused of being in support of high prices for drugs or challenging the need to reduce the price of drugs. I appreciate the minister's efforts and what he is trying to accomplish by means of the bill. His intentions are very good. But to this point

I have not been convinced that the bill will bring about lower drug prices at the retail level, nor have I been convinced that all precautions have been taken for the safety and health of Canadians.

I do not know the intentions of the department as far as policing the importation of drugs is concerned. However, I suggest to the minister and the cabinet that they should take the $10 million increase that they are giving to the C.B.C. this year and give it to this department, so it may set up a force which could police the importation of drugs and provide the safety that is needed in testing all drugs. If this were done, the money would be far better spent than the way in which it will be spent at this stage in the history of the C.B.C. I hope that consideration will be given to this suggestion.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, I am not convinced that the bill will bring about lower prices of drugs at the retail level, nor ensure the safety in this area that Canadians deserve. I am also concerned for the protection of the drug industry in general. I think of the great research fields and the great research institutions that are now functioning. I have concern for those engaged in the distribution of this product. I have concern for these people in the drug industry, and it is my belief that this bill will interfere with this great economic sector of our country. I am also concerned that this bill will abolish some of the accepted patent and trade mark rights. The provisions of this bill appear to be designed as a serious attack on our patent system, and it might set a very unfortunate precedent.

I have made these few remarks to put my concern on record. I am in agreement with the intention of the minister, but I have yet to be convinced that the bill will accomplish those things he has set out to accomplish. I will support the bill in principle, but I hope when we are discussing other clauses the minister will allow his better judgment to prevail in order that he may accept our amendments, which will be designed to strengthen this measure and accomplish those things the minister had in mind at the outset. I do not intend to labour the points any longer, but I did want to express my concern about those things I have mentioned.

Mr. Forrestall: I think several matters referred to in the past few days in respect of Bill C-190 should be clarified. I do not intend to reply to the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John's West, that the speech I made in the house was utter trash. I intend rather to address myself to those assurances the minister has given about the matters which concern other members and myself as to the absence of any relationship between this act and regulations under the Food and Drug Act.

Earlier the minister quoted from the Food and Drug Act regulations. The copy I have is dated 1965, but I am sure the pertinent part is up to date. That portion quoted by the minister is to be found at page 80B of this copy I have. The regulation is number C.01.055 and is dated March 18, 1963. I accept with one exception what is implicit in this regulation. Let me quote part of what it states:

> In the case of a drug sought to be imported into Canada, the director may require—

I do not think it is sufficient for us to state in these regulations, or accept, such a permissive word as "may". We are concerned in this regard, as outlined by the hon. member for Simcoe East. He feels very strongly about the clinical efficacy of drugs. There should be more of us in this house who are concerned about the maintenance of high standards in drugs. If the maintenance of clinical standards is not possible, the very least we should accept is a tangible relationship between this measure and the regulations of the Food and Drug Act.

There are other regulations of the Food and Drug Act which may help the minister and his officials to understand my concern. Let me draw an analogy, in the hope that I can make my point clear. It is not enough for me to satisfy my concern about safety, and it is not enough to include what is said in the regulations which appear at page 126C of the regulations, specifically number C.08.003, which state:

> Notwithstanding section C.08.002 no person shall sell a new drug in respect of which a notice of compliance has been issued to the manufacturer of that new drug if
> (a) the description of the new drug;
> (b) the name of the new drug or the name under which it is sold;
> (c) the specifications of the ingredients of the new drug;
> (d) the plant and equipment used in manufacturing, processing and packaging the new drug;
> (e) the method of manufacture and the controls used in manufacturing, processing and packaging the new drug;
> (f) the tests applied to control the potency, purity, stability and safety of the new drug;

(g) the labels used in conjunction with the new drug;

(h) the representations made with regard to the new drug respecting

(i) the recommended route of administration of the new drug,

(ii) the dosage of the new drug,

(iii) the claims made for the new drug, and

(iv) the contra-indications and side effects of the new drug—

Even with the inclusion of those requirements, and even if it were possible to spell out these things, there is still nothing that provides for safety in the use or administration of these new drugs. We have in recent years had too many cases of drugs being used before thorough and careful examination has been made. These drugs should not only be safe, but they should appear to be safe. It is not enough to say to the Canadian public that certain drugs are safe. The users of these drugs are entitled to know that as a result of regulations the drugs they use are safe because they have been clinically tested. This must be the case not only in respect of safety but in respect of purity and use. These regulations say nothing about what happens when the drug is used.

In this connection the minister has indicated that he too is concerned and is prepared to consider all amendments brought forward by members on all sides of the house. He has indicated that he will consider them and, where practicable, accept them. There are possibly three amendments that should be moved, and if I may I should like to speak briefly to them for a few minutes. Unfortunately I will not be here to participate in the introduction of these amendments, and this may be my last opportunity to make any remarks about them. Therefore I wanted to indicate to the committee, if I may, Mr. Chairman, my views on these three amendments.

If I may go back for just a moment, the first amendment would be concerned with safety. Safety is like justice; it is not enough that justice be done, because it is equally important that at all times justice must seem to be done. The same remarks apply to drugs. Drugs must not only be safe, but the Canadian public must know they are safe. If the Canadian public starts to question the safety of drugs, one reaction will be that people will not give a damn whether they pay $5 or five cents for a drug. They will buy safety.

As one whose family uses drugs extensively, I am very conscious of this reaction on the part of a parent or husband. The piece of legislation with which we are dealing in the bill before us has nothing to do with safety or food and drug regulations. This bill seeks to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act. I believe the committee, as a result of its deliberations, was most anxious to make the point that the commissioner of patents cannot accept responsibility for drug safety in Canada. Indeed it is not the final responsibility, either, of the director general of the food and drug directorate. Ultimately it is the responsibility of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. You see, Mr. Chairman, already in connection with this bill we have two ministerial authorities involved. First there is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and, second, there is the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I suggest there is a third area of interest, if we are being guided by the spirit of the recommendations of the special committee in connection with this matter. At page 6 of the final report of the committee, chapter II, under the heading "Basic Principles", I find this:

—although your committee remained fully conscious that its responsibilities in fact exceed those of the commissions—

Here, the committee is speaking of the earlier studies carried out by commissions.

—in that the committee's conclusions must be such that any of its recommendations, if adopted, should continue to maintain a proper balance between industry and consumer and take into consideration the importance of continued and increased scientific research in Canada. No recommendations could be considered which, although designed to lower drug prices in Canada, might produce drugs of questionable safety or have a detrimental effect upon other aspects of the Canadian economy.

We were admitting in that report that we were not sure how such a balance could be struck. If any hon. members are interested in reading them, there are further comments in the report pertinent to basic principles. However, the chief basic principle is there, and I suggest it is clear there is a third area of ministerial responsibility involved. I suggest this third area comes within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Industry. These are the three areas involved; but there is no simple way, within the confines of one act, of bringing these responsibilities together.

In so far as licensing is concerned, I believe that an applicant should have his request considered by a tribunal of these three responsible ministers. Practically speaking, I suppose, the tribunal would not be composed of the ministers themselves, but rather their designees. In the case of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, his authority would be vested in the commissioner of patents. The Minister of National Health and Welfare obviously would be represented by the director general of the food and drug directorate.

I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that my lack of understanding of the Department of Industry, for which I do not apologize, is such that I am not certain who his representative would be. In any event, I suggest that on the basis of the conclusions and recommendations of the Harley committee, the Department of Industry should be concerned.

Mr. Schreyer: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Forrestall: Yes.

Mr. Schreyer: I should like to ask the hon. member whether his reference to an applicant being subjected to a departmental review would not be covered already by clause 13 of the bill, in which reference is made to the need for referring an application to the Department of National Health and Welfare or the food and drug directorate.

Mr. Forrestall: The hon. member's point is well taken. Earlier I referred to the fact that this clause is permissive. The word "may" is used, not "shall". If we were dealing with an act covering food and drugs, we might be moving an amendment to change that particular word, and perhaps this would satisfy me. I do not believe I would be fully satisfied because, in my non-professional mind, I am not insensitive to the implications of the necessity for clinical efficacy as a standard for reassurance of the user of drugs. Although the point is well taken, I suggest that it does not quite bridge the gap I am attempting to bridge.

In addition to safety, there are other factors involved in connection with these amendments. There is the question of factual and knowledgeable regard for the public interest in terms of its economic needs. Within some modification of this can be found an adequate bridge to what is essentially an amendment of the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act and the kind of protective legislation to be found under the Food and Drugs Act and the regulations made pursuant thereto.

I should like to move on to two relatively minor proposals that I hope the minister will consider and which in one form or another we will present as amendments to the bill at the appropriate stage. Again to my mind they have to do with safety. The bill provides for the granting of interim licences to applicants. It also provides for what is to be done in the event that an interim licence expires, or is for any reason denied by the commissioner. However, I am concerned about the situation that might arise if a manufacturer or distributor of drugs flooded the Canadian market with drugs or medicine while such interim licence was in force. There is no direction in the bill to withdraw those drugs or medicines from the shelves of pharmacies, medical institutions, hospitals and so on in such event.

I injected myself into a series of questions and answers between the hon. member for Simcoe East and the hon. member a little to the left of him in connection with the amount of money being spent by the P.M.A.C. on doctors' information. I might point out that I like the chairman of the committee very much, as I do all the committee members. If I may say so, it was the most non-partisan group I have ever worked with in any political matter. The chairman and I have been together in one capacity or another for two and a half to three years now, and politics has not entered into our relationship.

I should like to refer to appendix G to the final report of the special committee on drug costs and prices, which is to be found at page 81. This appendix relates to the marketing expenses of 41 companies that were members of P.M.A.C. These expenses are broken down into three categories. The first is field selling expense, which includes supervisory and representatives' salaries, living expenses, cars, meetings and equipment, and amounts to $12 million. Administration of marketing, selling and advertising function—that is to say, management and staff services, home office salaries and other expenses of the marketing department, including marketing research—amounts to $3.5 million. Advertising and promotional expenses amount to $10 million. The total spent on physicians' or doctors' information therefore amounts to about $25 million. If I understood it correctly, somebody stated that there were about 20,000 doctors in Canada. If $25 million is divided by 20,000 the answer is not $5,000. However, I am not a mathematician; I merely leave hon. members to draw their own conclusions. If I am wrong in this I apologize; if not, I stand on that statement.

I have some additional remarks to make in the form of questions to the minister. He has his officials with him and I hope he will be able to answer my questions. One or two questions involve the reprinting of a text of a speech delivered by Mr. Allmark, assistant director-general of drugs of the food and drug directorate. This speech appears in the Medical Services Journal of Canada, volume 23, No. 3 for March, 1967. I would appreciate the minister's comments on Mr. Allmark's contention that > —when violations of the law are uncovered, remedial or punitive action is taken. It is not, however, a proper function of the food and drug laboratories to act as a control laboratory for the industry. The first responsibility for safety and potency is put squarely on the manufacturer.

I appreciate that Mr. Allmark is right, but I am sure the minister will not rest until he too is fully satisfied that this type of awareness is built into the bill. Several other statements underline this point. He goes on to deal with the role of the directorate as compared with the industry in the matter of drug control. I read his statements with great interest.

I also have one or two questions about raw material control, drug availability and so on. However, I will say no more for the time being. I just wish to assure the minister and all other members of the committee that I recognize the need to find practical ways to reduce the cost of drugs to the consumer. As I said yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I support any measure that has this objective as its goal.

• (5:10 p.m.)

I cannot lightly pass over something that is most important to users of drugs in Canada, the question of safety. I know that safety is simply a word, but I should like to think that users of drugs in Canada, whether the drugs being used are obtained under their brand names or generic equivalents, may use then with an absolute assurance of their safety. I should like to think that such users know full well that the regulations under which their drugs are processed and put into dosage form are such that one's physical protection is absolutely guaranteed. We have had few exceptions to this sort of thing in Canada, and we may count ourselves most fortunate. It would be unfortunate if Canadians thought that that situation did not prevail.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I want to enter this debate very briefly to clarify a misunderstanding which arose during the second reading debate. I did not take part in that discussion; neither was I a member of the committee, though I read the committee reports.

I must confess that as I listened to the discussion during the second reading stage, instead of becoming more enlightened I became more confused. I became confused about the minister's purpose in introducing this legislaton at this time. The bill itself is described as "An Act to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act". That sounds like something a lawyer might concern himself with. Matters involving patents and trade marks seem to occupy the attention of the legal beagles in the house. Those who have not that professional background are not so preoccupied with such matters.

It seemed to me, after listening to the minister's speech the other afternoon and reviewing it in Hansard, that he was talking about a bill which would lower drug prices in Canada. That need not necessarily have anything to do with the Patent Act or the Trade Marks Act. Nevertheless the minister kept emphasizing all the wonderful things that this legislation would accomplish in terms of lowering drug prices in Canada. As father of a large family, I say that that is a consummation devoutly to be wished. We all agree that the problem of health care in Canada is aggravated by high drug prices. Unfortunately none of the multiplicity of welfare and health programs on our statute books at the present time has done anything to deal with that problem.

As I listened to the presentations of other hon. members in the house I had the impression that the actual effect of this bill would be to threaten an important industry of Canada and lower the quality of pharmaceutical products. I was impressed by the leading spokesman of this party when he spoke on second reading the other day. I thought he summarized the legislation logically, and concluded by recommending that since there is much confusion about this bill, as expressed in the various viewpoints in the house, it might be wise to send it to a committee for further consideration so that this confusion might be clarified.

This afternoon the minister indicated that he had had representations from many groups outside the house and advice from hon. members in the house. I can only conclude that if he has received such representations, he has not read them carefully. From my reading of those representations, I thought some important and legitimate points were made.

One reason that I wish to speak at this time is that I was impressed by the presentation last evening of the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle. Since he spoke from the government side of the house it is obvious that he has no partisan axe to grind. He spoke from the standpoint of quality and safety of drugs, a viewpoint that has emerged in several speeches, and also about the threat that this legislation poses to the continuing health and progress of an important part of our industrial complex. The hon. member I thought spoke with authority, representing an area which has located in it a substantial part of our pharmaceutical industry. He brought information before the house, read from letters and mentioned names, and I think he persuaded the minister that it might be wise to follow the advice of the hon. member for Simcoe East and recommend that this matter be referred to a committee.

The minister says that the purpose of this bill is to lower drug prices. It is impossible to demonstrate at this juncture whether that can be done. Also we do not seem to be sure of the end result of the legislation; it has been suggested that one effect will be the lowering of quality of drugs and the endangering of the Canadian pharmaceutical industry. It has been my experience in the house that when an important item of legislation which will have a multi-pronged impact and which is full of uncertainties and imponderables is introduced, the course of wisdom dictates that we should be allowed a further opportunity to sort out any confusion that has arisen. That confusion has arisen was demonstrated in the debate on second reading.

Unhappily we have gone beyond the stage where this matter can be referred to a committee. We are now in the committee of the whole stage. Nevertheless I shall make one final plea this afternoon. If we are to avoid some of the potential dangers which have been outlined, the minister may wish to move amendments to the bill. The necessity for those amendments has been demonstrated to him, and I think he is convinced that they are necessary. I saw him nodding his head during the course of the debate as various points were raised. I think he is convinced that the legislation, as it stands, will not necessarily accomplish its objectives. Certainly, it will have some unforeseen effects which have been pointed out by other hon. members.

While the debate has taken place at a relatively high level there have been partisan overtones from time to time. For example, the hon. member for St. John's West yesterday tried to equate the members of this group with high drug prices in Canada. That is a straight partisan approach, of course, because in Canada at this time of soaring prices and general inflation anyone who aligned himself with high prices in Canada would need his head examined. We would not need a pharmacist, we would need a psychiatrist if that were the position we took. The hon. member's approach was a directly partisan one and I believe it will be judged as such. While I was tempted to enter the debate at that time I restrained myself and was content to make only one or two comments. It seemed to me that the hon. member for St. John's West was reflecting the voice of one who has since departed from this chamber. I notice it was reported in Hansard that I referred to him as a "pocket Pick". I had to be careful in that respect because if I reversed the words they would have created a wrong impression.

Similarly the hon. member for Winnipeg North tried to align members of this group with the drug industry. This too is a partisan approach. Unlike the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle, I do not have the privilege of knowing that this important industry is established in my constituency. I come from a western constituency where we are striving mightily to broaden our economic base through industrial development. One of the encouraging developments which have been taking place in my area has concerned the drug industry to a minor extent. The Ayerst Company has established an important branch plant in my constituency and we have received inquiries from other companies which are engaged in providing this valuable service to Canadians. For this reason I would not object to a suggestion that I might be interested in the industrial developments aspects which may be involved in this legislation. But this is not special pleading; it is not a special case approach of any kind.

If it is true, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North suggested, that there is abuse in the pricing practices of the drug industry I do not think we need special legislation of the kind before us to get at it. We have at our disposal all the combines investigation procedures for dealing with any price abuses which may exist. Moreover, by a happy chance, the very minister who is interested in this bill before us also has responsibility for combines investigation. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, if he really feels there is price abuse in the drug industry in Canada, he should seek to remedy it by using the machinery already established for that purpose. If there is wrongful price maintenance or restraint of trade or any other abuse capable of correction by the combines investigation branch, let him use that machinery instead of this shotgun approach, in the hope that the legislation will have a beneficial side effect by lowering drug prices to consumers.

We all share this hope, but as I have already indicated, and as I am sure the minister has been made aware, there are other side effects implicit in this legislation which could have dangerous consequences from the standpoint of the safety of drugs and also from the standpoint of Canada's economic well-being. I am not necessarily quoting anybody from this side of the house; I am quoting one of the minister's own supporters in this respect, a man who should be most knowledgeable, the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle, who has the industry in his constitutency and who of all hon. members should know what he is talking about in this connection.

Let me make a few additional comments with regard to the fundamental points which have been raised in this debate. The minister has told us his proposals will lower the cost of drugs to consumers. He also admits that they constitute only one of a series of actions which are required. Several hon. members have said that one of the reasons for the high price of drugs on the Canadian market is the high cost of promotion and distribution—the high pressure advertising which is used. Again, if this is so, it is not peculiar to the drug industry. All one has to do is read the interesting little book by Vance Packard entitled "Hidden Persuaders" to learn about these activities in the whole marketing process in Canada. Why select the drug industry in particular for criticism of this kind?

Again, high prices are not exclusive to the drug industry. Prices are high right across the board. For example, I pay much more for my automobile bought here in Canada than I would for an automobile bought across the border or in Europe. Despite this wonderful agreement which has been arranged, I still have to pay $500 more for my car than if I had bought it in the United States. This applies to almost every product distributed in Canada, and if excessive advertising cost is the reason for the difference in price, let us direct our attention to advertising; let us not discriminate against one particular industry. I realize there are many who say that avertising costs are excessive and add to the flames of inflation. But let us make sure we are not doing the wrong thing by using this measure to solve that particular problem.

I am always suspicious when a minister wants to rush legislation through the house and bypass the committee stage of discussion. When I look at the special report of the committee and read its recommendations I find that the minister has selected only one small recommendation from a whole series of some 23 recommendations. It seems to me that the measure before us represents a panic response on the part of the government to the revolt of the ladies of a year ago, though at that time they appeared to be complaining more about the price of food than anything else. Protest groups sprang up spontaneously right across the country, and the government was under considerable pressure to do something.

This legislation is being rushed through more in an effort to create an impression than to get to the heart of a basic problem. Again referring to the hidden persuaders who operate mysteriously behind the scenes in the home marketing process in Canada, we know what they can do in the field of image creation. With this legislation the minister is attempting to create for himself an image of one fighting the villains of high prices and inflation. He is pushing the legislation through, without referring it to a standing committee, as was recommended on both sides of the chamber, and the result may be that we may end up in a worse state than we were in previously. There is a phrase in the scriptures which says something about the second state being worse than the first state, and by this bill the minister may be creating more problems than he is solving.

Several hon. members have dealt with the safety factor. The minister has assured us that the food and drug directorate will be able to do all the necessary policing, to avoid the difficulties that caused certain drugs to leap into the headlines. Notwithstanding the powers of control, investigation and licensing which the directorate has, errors have been made. If we are going to pile on to the overworked Canadian food and drug directorate the responsibility for policing drugs manufactured outside Canada, then I am afraid our second state is indeed going to be worse than our first.

From reading the evidence given to the standing committee, I understand that the directorate has admitted it cannot do the necessary inspecting and policing to ensure the safety of drugs. By this bill we are adding another almost impossible task to its responsibilities. However, the minister did point out that in the long run the quality of drugs depends on the integrity of the manufacturers. I agree with him.

We can be assured of the best quality drugs only when we deal with reputable manufacturers. I am sure that by far the greatest number of drug firms operating in Canada are in that category. They are here to serve the public to the best of their ability, to give them the best quality medicine for the treatment of disease and illness. They are not out to exploit the public in any shape or form.

If the situation be otherwise, then as I have already indicated the combines investigation machinery should be put to work; but the minister should not try to create a smokescreen through the sort of legislation we have before us. As one who is concerned about the state of the economy and the prospects for expanding industrial development in all parts of Canada, I am concerned about the suggestions that have been put forward by several hon. members, that if this legislation is arbitrarily imposed upon the Canadian drug industry it will mean a decline in that industry.

This legislation could add to the brain drain. I have received one or two letters—I will not put them on the record—from individuals, specialists in the field of research in Canada, who have written to say that if this legislation is passed they will have no other alternative but to join the brain drain, as we call it, that treks regularly across the border into our neighbour to the south, where opportunities for research are already much more plentiful than they are in Canada.

I think the minister is a responsible person. I know he is seeking even greater responsibility. If he wished to demonstrate to the people of Canada that he is serious in his current ambitions, now that he has refused to send the bill to a standing committee I trust he will seize the initiative and bring forward amendments to the bill which will remove beyond shadow of doubt the possible bad side effects mentioned by several hon. members when they spoke about safety, quality, and the impact of the bill on the drug industry.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I come from a simple school that goes right back to Plato. Some of these drugs do not go back that far. The school of which I speak asked questions and sought answers, and before saying anything about the details of this bill I would like to ask a few questions of the minister and hope he is able to answer them. Is this bill the first attempt to change section 41 of the Patent Act, which has been in existence since 1952?

Mr. Turner: In answer to the question of the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, an exception was originally made in the Patent Act, so far as it related to food and drugs, in 1923. At that time the machinery for applying for compulsory licensing was introduced. The commissioner of patents has interpreted section 41(3) as it now stands as limiting him to issuing a compulsory licence only for the manufacture of medicines and foods, not for their importation. The purpose of this amendment to the Patent Act is to extend the purview of compulsory licensing from that of mere manufacture to that of the importing of medicines and drugs.

Mr. Nowlan: If I understand the minister correctly the purport of this bill is to change a statute that has been in effect since 1923. Is that correct?

Mr. Turner: Yes, sir.

Mr. Nowlan: Then I come to my second question; but may I say that answer actually is the basis for a full blown speech, in view of some of the remarks made from the opposite side and made by my friends to the left. I do not have any drug firms in my riding. I would like to have some, but if I am to believe some of the things which have been said in this chamber within the last day or so, not too many members are going to have too many drug firms left in their ridings.

The minister's answer leads me to my next question. However, before asking it I would like to interpolate that one of the reasons I was prompted to take an interest in this debate—I was not a member of the standing committee—is because I was incensed by a few remarks made by members yesterday, members who will remain unnamed, and especially by the disposition of my friends to the left. When I say to my left, I mean hon. members sitting to my left, and a number of others opposite me. I think it is time to become interested when they join together.

Indeed it is time Canadians became interested in this unholy alliance between some hon. members opposite and those to my left.

Let us not talk any more about vested interests and about protecting the drug industry. If it is 1923 we are talking about, then members of the party opposite and of this party have formed governments and been in office for X number of years since 1923. The hon. member for St. John's West, whom personally I respect but with whom I politically do not agree, made some unfortunate remarks yesterday to which I take strong exception. He waxed eloquently but most misguidedly about a situation that has existed since 1923. Unfortunately, since 1923 one party has been in power for a long time. Certainly if there is any suggestion of there being a vested interest or a selling of a soul for the price of a drug—and some such suggestions have been made by hon. members opposite—then let us knock out that nonsense.

In view of the fact that there has been no relevant change since 1923 I should like to ask the minister why he has not awaited the report of the Economic Council of Canada in respect of the drug industry which I understand he told several groups, including the chartered accountants, he would wait for before proceeding with Bill C-190. The subject matter of this bill strikes every household in Canada. No one has a monopoly interest about trying to do something to lower the prices of drugs or to ensure their safety. Certainly all members of this house would like to see low prices for drugs. Unfortunately, there has been no change in this legislation since 1923. I should like to ask therefore why we are proceeding with this legislation with haste now, without awaiting, first the report of the Economic Council of Canada or, second, the report of the Medical Research Council on the drug industry in Canada. I understand that both reports are in various stages of preparation.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, it is true that there is a general reference to the Economic Council of Canada. This was made on July 22, 1966. It has to do with patents, trademarks and copyrights. The reason the government decided to proceed with these amendments was that an exception had always been made in the general patent act with reference to food and drugs. Therefore, this was a particular matter which could be dealt with, without affecting the general patent law. The second reason is that because of the urgent problem concerning drug prices in Canada, the government felt it should not await the report of the Economic Council of Canada, which we do not expect to have until late 1968 or early 1969.

The third reason is that on this particular subject of patents and trade marks, as they affect drugs, there have already been made a number of very profound and serious reviews. In other words, in this particular instance it was not felt that the added review by the Economic Council of Canada would in itself buttress the conclusions already arrived at, first by the combines branch of the Department of Justice in 1958 and next by the report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission in 1963 as well as by the report of the Royal Commission on Health Services—the Hall commission—in 1963. In addition to these reports we have the report of the committee under the chairmanship of my friend, the hon. member from Halton, of April last year. Therefore the subject matter under review had, in the government's opinion, been thoroughly digested and buttressed by evidence and argument, and by the opinions of witnesses from all sides of the economic picture.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister for that answer, which leads me to my next question. I appreciate his answer, and I realize that there have been several reviews of the drug industry. I remember the commission under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Ilsley. This royal commission made its report a few years ago and not very much has been done about it. I wish I had a copy of the minister's speech before me, because I understand he did tell various bodies that there would be no action on this bill until he had the report. Am I wrong?

Mr. Turner: I think the hon. member is wrong. I did say that no general review of the Patent Act would be attempted before we had received the report of the Economic Council of Canada. I do not think I went further than that.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Does the hon. member wish to direct a question to me or to the minister?

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to direct it to the minister. It has to do with this particular subject. The minister indicated that the combines investigation branch suggested there was something rotten in Denmark. I should like to ask therefore why the government did not proceed under this act.

Mr. Turner: I should not like the hon. member to confuse the issue. The combines investigation branch was looking at the structure of the Canadian drug industry in 1958, and certain aspects of the economic environment of that industry which related to the high drug prices. It was particularly interested in the monopolistic aspect which resulted from the patent and trade mark protection. I would not want the hon. member at this stage to be confused by believing that there were allegations alleging that there are sinister or collusive practices in the industry. That is not the case at all.

Mr. Dinsdale: This was mentioned several times during the debate.

Mr. Turner: If the hon. member would be good enough to review the opening remarks I made on second reading I believe he will find that I made no allegation that there was anything sinister about the way the drug industry has been conducting itself, and that it merely has been taking advantage of the economic environment. I believe I said that we wished to change that situation in order to induce more competition in a free enterprise system in order to lower prices.

Mr. Dinsdale: Even if the patient dies?

Mr. Turner: Well, now—

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member should not use the pretext of asking a question in order to enter into a debate with the minister. I should like to ask another question. The minister answered fairly well my two-pronged question. He mentioned the general reference to the Economic Council of Canada.

The second part of my question concerned the particular reference which I understand has been made to the Medical Research Council in respect of the drug industry. Does not that reference concern this whole problem of drugs, which we have been discussing here for the last day or so? If all the necessary reports in respect of the drug industry have been completed, why is the Economic Council of Canada taking so much time to review the drug problem? In particular I should like to ask the minister the purpose of the report of the Medical Research Council, and whether it might not shed some light on the problem covered by this bill.

Mr. Turner: I am advised that the review by the Medical Research Council has to do with medical research. At the moment we are not aware of any particular report affecting the drug industry. In any event we have not received one.

Mr. Nowlan: I must say, Mr. Chairman, that my information is that the drug industry as such is a specific item of the report. The minister has much better advisers than I, and they are closer to him geographically and physically. Therefore I will accept his answer on that.

In view of the minister's answers I should like to come back to what I said as an opener; that is, whenever I see such interest shown by my friends to the left, and of the left, in something proposed by my colleagues opposite I become somewhat suspicious. Despite the red herrings which were drawn across the path by some members opposite, if we take the 1923 base we are all guilty of the things mentioned by some hon. members opposite.

I have been disturbed by this bill. During second reading stage the minister said that its basic framework is an economic one. In answer to me now he has stated that it was the interest in the matter of prices and consumer affairs, as well as all the controversy which has surrounded the high cost of living, which acted as a catalyst in persuading the government to bring in this legislation now. Yet if I understood him correctly, the minister was fair enough in this debate to say that this bill in itself will not bring down prices, and that perhaps some other things will have to be done. I believe that was the purport of his remarks.

This bill will not of itself be the cure. On the other hand, we have heard all the arguments about safety that have been advanced by members on this side of the house and I know their opinion is shared by members on all sides of the house. We then get into an area that one hon. member opposite raised yesterday. It turns out that his was an economic argument. I refer to the concern shown by those now involved and those who will be directly involved when this bill passes, namely those in the drug industry.

We have heard the dispute as to the alleged implications of the bill when it becomes law.

We then get down to an area of economics. If the only premise of the bill is cheaper prices, and the minister himself says that the bill by itself will not create cheaper prices, and there is the argument about the safety issue—which is not perhaps shared by all, but the concern is obviously shared by all—I ask, why cannot we make the same argument about any product manufactured in Canada?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Good idea.

Mr. Nowlan: Certainly the hon. member for Oshawa and other members across the way could apply this argument to cars. They are made outside this country a little cheaper than we can make them. I heard an hon. member to my left say "Good idea". Where do they want to stop? Do they want any type of Canada? There is a price to be paid if we are to have a Canada. The Prime Minister, the first man in the land, the minister's political boss and the Prime Minister of all of us, said at the constitutional conference not too long ago that some adjustment and give-and-take must be applied to the question of linguistic rights and the constitutional structure of Canada. He said this was part of the price of being a country.

I do not want to get into the ramifications of free trade, or tariff walls, but when an industry is affected why should they not show their concern to members of parliament when a bill is placed before the house that they think is detrimental to them? Why should they be castigated, criticized unduly, unfairly and misguidedly when they come before parliament and present briefs in respect of matters which affect their livelihood?

The drug industry is concerned about the implications of the bill. The minister has fairly stated that the bill itself will not cut prices, although its general framework was intended to have this result. Then we get the argument on the economic side, the argument on prices. This argument can be made about any product manufactured in Canada. You can apply that argument to cars manufactured in this country. I can see my hon. friends to the left starting to wail, wallow and cry if those people manufacturing cars were put out of work, or if the workers in International Nickel at Sudbury were put out of work. Many of their friends, and the friends of many of us, would be out of work if there were not manufacturing industry in Canada. I do not know the effect of all the implications of this bill as far as the drug industry is concerned; I have not read all the evidence given to the committee. But is the government taking it upon itself to attack an industry which certain members opposite accuse us of supporting because it is a vested industry, because it is a small industry, because it does not have membership in factories, people involved and union members from coast to coast, because it does not have farms from coast to coast?

Wheat is being imported into Canada and is being sold cheaper than our wheat. You can advance the price argument to any product manufactured in this country. This argument applies to any product manufactured here, but we must take into consideration the economic position of Canada vis-à-vis the rest of the world. The argument about price could be used in respect of many of our primary products. If hon. friends to my left say they would like to see this situation in Canada, I would like to know where they will get their political support when a great many of their friends in unions and other places are out of work.

On the one hand we have the concern shown by the industry affected. On the other hand there is the fact that the minister himself says the bill by itself will not bring about cheaper prices. I fail to appreciate fully the need for this bill when the statute has been on the books since 1923. This bill is put forward as being in the interests of all Canadians. Sometimes we perhaps move too quickly. Canadians do become a little exercised about high prices. We all become exercised on this subject. However, I fail to understand why suddenly, out of nowhere, this bill should be presented to parliament and be accepted.

I should now like to refer to the members of the fourth estate. This debate has lasted two days, but the members of the fourth estate have started to criticize hon. members on this side of the house because they are prepared to debate an amendment to an act that has been on the statute books since 1923. Certainly any bill brought before parliament that will affect a material segment of our industry warrants close examination. This applies to any industry, let alone our manufacturing industry. We have in this respect had relatively good law in the past. It must have been relatively good law since 1923, otherwise an attempt would have been made to change it.

Perhaps the minister is extra courageous and is finally bearding the lion in his den, and changing the law. His party has been in government a great deal longer than mine, unfortunately, and deserves condemnation for having this act on the statute books since 1923, if the situation has been such that amendments should have been made in the past.

You have the fact of this industry saying it will be affected by the provisions of the bill, rightly or wrongly; I do not know, although I have read some of their briefs. On the other hand you have the minister's fair statement that the bill will not reduce prices. Then you have the bona fide argument on safety, with respect to which there is a division of opinion. In view of these facts, I fail to understand why the bill was not referred to a parliamentary committee before the minister moved further down the road in respect of legislation in this area.

The argument on lower prices could be made with regard to any goods manufactured in Canada. We can import these goods much cheaper from outside the country. We can import fish cheaper, in most cases, from outside Canada. I would not want to embarrass the Chairman, because he has some interest in fish. You can bring cream, butter and beef into this country cheaper than we can produce it. These are some primary products. You can certainly bring manufactured products into this country at a price lower than that at which they are produced here. This argument applies to every manufactured product. You can bring mattresses and everything else into this country cheaper than we can produce them.

We have the sincere and honest controversy about the safety factor involved in this question. We have the questionable value of the argument advanced in respect of lower prices. The minister himself says that the bill will not create lower prices in the drug industry. You also have an industry that fears it will be severely restricted and perhaps choked off or eliminated. I can see why, in the face of these facts, governments have not moved in respect of the act since 1923.

I only hope that the minister's prognosis as to the implications of the bill will prove to be correct. I hope that the advice he receives from his advisers is correct, and that the industry will not be wiped out. I say this because it appears to me at first blush that a catalyst has been created on the government side under the cloak of concern for the consumer. We all share that concern. It seems to me that this catalyst has started the machinery of government working against a very small segment of industry which really can be so identified, so attacked and so criticized that it cannot defend itself and mobilize Canadian opinion in its favour.

More morally irresponsible than anything said in the house has been the attitude of the fourth estate with regard to this legislation. Members of the fourth estate have criticized us in editorial comment. We are concerned with an industry that has given service in Canada. Members of the fourth estate have referred to vested interests in this matter and have suggested that opposition members have sold their souls in order to prevent a courageous minister establishing a landmark in respect of drug prices in Canada.

It is our duty to examine these matters. We are paid, whether we are here or not, and whether or not the members of the fourth estate are here. Quite frankly, they also are paid whether they are here or not, and they should be here and do a better job in reporting what is happening on the floor of the house. They should be here and earn their money.

One hon. member opposite is a personal friend of mine, but yesterday he was an anathema to me and I to him. He spoke according to his viewpoint but he was not speaking in an objective manner, and he almost admitted this.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Several hon. members should be commended for their objective representations, and for presenting a picture of the other side of this coin. I give due credit to the minister for this courageous move in uncharted waters, and for pointing out the serious concern held by the medical profession and the industry in respect of safety. He also is frankly concerned about the survival of this industry. I too am concerned, as are many Canadians, about the philosophy behind this bill. Hon. members opposite can laugh and chortle, but when we start to fix prices we must remember that the next thing is the fixing of wages. I ask those hon. members in this house who are prepared to fix prices and wages to stand up and be counted.

This bill involves a philosophical argument completely separate from technical practice. One could wax on and on about this measure, but I am sure you, Your Honour, do not intend to stay here indefinitely. Perhaps I should call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he can indicate the work we will undertake tomorrow, Friday and Monday?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, it is proposed that we call item 55 on the order paper, house in committee of the whole on Bill C-193, to amend the Income Tax Act, which will be followed by item 57, second reading of Bill C-197, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. If by good fortune item 55 is completed tomorrow we will call the supplementary estimates. The estimates of the Department of Finance will be the first called, in order to allow for the debate suggested earlier in the week. If these should not be completed on Friday, I expect, although I am not sure, that Bill C-197 in respect of the Unemployment Insurance Act will be considered. I must enter a caveat in this regard. I expect the government house leader will return tomorrow, at which time I will consult with him.

Mr. Starr: Did I understand the Solicitor General to say that if we did not complete the bill in respect of the Income Tax Act tomorrow we would go on with the Unemployment Insurance Act Bill on Friday? Why should we not carry on until we complete this in order that we may debate the supplementary estimates on Monday?

Mr. Pennell: I understand the Minister of Finance has a long standing engagement and it will not be possible—

Mr. Starr: On government business or in respect of leadership?

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 15, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FINANCE

TABLING OF REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON STRUCTURE OF CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Hon. Walter Gordon (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies, in English and in French of a report to the government of the task force which was set up a year ago to assist the government in examining the structure of Canadian industry with special reference to foreign ownership and control. The government has decided to release the report at this time instead of using it, as originally intended, as the basis for a white paper which would take some months to prepare. Publication of the report now should assist public discussion of this important subject.

The report is being made public as an expression of the views of the members of the task force and not those of the government. The government will undoubtedly find the work done so competently by the task force of great value and assistance as it pursues its own examination of this whole question, but the tabling of the report does not imply that the government concurs in it or has yet taken decisions regarding its specific recommendations. However, the government will be giving serious consideration to the proposals and views of the task force.

It is the intention of the government to refer the report to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs so that witnesses can be called and parliament given the benefit of the views and opinions of the many groups in the country which have an interest in this subject.

Certain of the proposals of the task force deal with subjects which are also under study elsewhere in the government. For instance, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is considering amendments to the Canada Corporations Act and the Bankruptcy Act, and is examining various aspects of securities regulations. There is also a reference to the Economic Council of Canada on the Combines Act and on patents, copyrights and trade marks.

Finally, on behalf of the government I should like to thank Professor Watkins, the head of the task force, and his colleagues for their services to the public in the preparation of this report. It will prove to be a valuable contribution to greater public consideration of these complex and many sided issues. I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, to table the report of the task force on the structure of Canadian industry.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gordon: By leave, Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the report of the task force on the structure of Canadian industry, laid on the table a moment ago, be referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRY

TABLING OF LETTER FROM NOVA SCOTIA PREMIER RESPECTING STEEL INDUSTRY

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I should like to table a letter to me from the premier of Nova Scotia dated February 6, concerning the steel industry in Cape Breton.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table this letter?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

ALLEGED DELAY IN ORGANIZATION OF HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister rather than raise what I believe is a question of privilege affecting all members of the house, which is especially timely in view of our serious economic situation and the many undertakings given by the government to exercise restraint.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I wish to ask the Prime Minister or the government house leader to account to the house for the unreasonable delay in calling an organizational meeting of the public accounts committee so this committee can get on with its important work in examining the 1966 report of the Auditor General and scrutinizing government expenditure.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take up this matter with the house leader when he returns this afternoon, with a view to getting this committee to work at once.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister to bear in mind that the minister of health and welfare gave an undertaking to the house some time ago that this would be done, but the undertaking has not been proceeded with.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—HOUSE DISCUSSION AND REPORT FROM MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the continuing worsening situation in Viet Nam and the suggestion of U Thant that cessation of bombing for a short while might enable negotiations to take place; and in view of the report of our representative on the control commission on his visit to Hanoi, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs, either personally or with his colleagues, agree to expand, as it were, the area of discussion under the item concerned in the supplementary estimates, so this house may have a debate and a report from him on the situation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government would have no objection to that.

[Translation]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Justice.

Are we to believe the news heard yesterday according to which he said in a conference given in English here in Ottawa that all Quebecers speak "lousy French", and just what did the minister mean by this term?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that he may not put a question to the minister concerning a statement made outside the house.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

May I ask the hon. minister if he feels that the French-Canadians in Quebec speak "lousy French"?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the question of the hon. member is in order.

[English]

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MACKENZIE REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, but perhaps his parliamentary secretary will be able to give an answer. In order to prevent uncertainty in the development of the dairy industry in Canada, will the Department of Agriculture be issuing a statement regarding its views on the report by Dr. William Mackenzie, prepared for the Department of Forestry and Rural Development and issued yesterday?

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that any statement on policy will be made by the Minister of Agriculture in the house.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Labour and ask him whether the government or the Department of Labour have received a final report from the maritime trustees.

Hon. B. S. Mackasey (Acting Minister of Labour): To be very sure about this, Mr. Speaker, I will inquire this afternoon and contact the hon. member.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister turn the report over or refer it to the standing committee on labour and employment for consideration, and so the trustees may appear before that committee as witnesses?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to give that information to the hon. member at the same time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REASON FOR CANADIAN FORCES IN PUERTO RICO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of defence. What numbers of Canadian forces are or recently have been in the United States territory of Puerto Rico, and what is the purpose of their presence there?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): So far as numbers are concerned I shall have to check, but the purpose of the exercise is to participate in what are called Maple Leaf—I beg your pardon, Maple Spring—exercises.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister inform us what is meant by "Maple Leaf" exercises?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I corrected myself; I said "Maple Spring".

Mr. Harkness: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are Canadian forces carrying out those exercises in the Caribbean on United States territory, instead of on Commonwealth islands, with the idea that their training should be combined with the training of United States forces so that our forces might participate, possibly, with United States forces in Korea, South Viet Nam or elsewhere in the east?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): There is no such implication, Mr. Speaker. We are only continuing practises that were staged in the past. As the former minister well knows, they are called war games.

FINANCE

REPORT OF TASK FORCE RESPECTING FOREIGN OWNERSHIP IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I wish to ask the President of the Privy Council a question about the report he has just tabled, which I understand is signed by a Mr. Watkins. May I ask the hon. gentleman what is the relationship between the cabinet committee, of which he was the head, and the person or persons who made the report? Also, does the government accept responsibility for the report?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (President of the Privy Council): I think if the hon. gentleman had heard what I said on motions, he would be satisfied on that matter.

Mr. Starr: Didn't you do any work?

Mr. Fulton: I cannot accept the implications inherent in what the hon. gentleman has said. I find there is no clarity at all to the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fulton: I would ask the minister if he could say anything about the meetings, for instance, that he had with Mr. Watkins. Was the relationship—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a question, I respectfully suggest, which the hon. member should not ask at this time.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): A supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council, Mr. Speaker. Can he tell us whether the special cabinet committee on which he sat did any work at all? Did it hold any meetings?

Mr. Gordon: Yes, it certainly did.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Starr: A further supplementary question. In view of the minister's answer that "it certainly did", how can he explain the fact that the cabinet committee does not accept any responsibility for this report?

SPORTS

NANCY GREENE—WINNING OF OLYMPIC GOLD MEDAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of this house were very proud when they learned this morning that Miss Nancy Greene of Rossland, British Columbia—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: —of the Kootenay country had won the Olympic gold medal for Canada in the women's giant slalom, and in so doing had clinched the world combined championship. No doubt the right hon. Prime Minister would like to give formal expression of the pride and rejoicing of all Canadians in her great achievement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already tried to do that in a telegram I sent to Miss Greene this morning. In it I expressed the pride and joy of the government and my own pride and joy in her achievement. All members of the house and all Canadians share in that pride. That pride is increased by the realization that my hon. friend is associated with this champion, as the member for Kootenay East—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Kootenay West, Mr. Speaker. It is perhaps particularly appropriate that the Canadian flag should have been raised today, in celebration of the winning of this first gold medal at the winter Olympic games, on the third anniversary of the day it was first raised in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MISSION OF HON. LIONEL CHEVRIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister give the house any details about the reportedly very important mission that is presently being undertaken on behalf of the government by Hon. Lionel Chevrier, the distinguished former high commissioner to the United Kingdom?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be able to make a short statement on this tomorrow. It is a mission undertaken by a privy councillor to certain French speaking former colonies in Africa, where we are interested in providing external aid and in maintaining and strengthening good relations.

AIRPORTS

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Minister of Transport in English if he will allow me.

[Mr. Herridge.]

[English]

In the light of the minister's announced plan for the expansion of Toronto international airport, could the hon. gentleman assure the house that the needs of the Montreal airport will not be overlooked?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): First of all I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question.

An hon. Member: Why not speak French?

Mr. Hellyer: I have the answer in both languages; the hon. member can take his choice.

The expansion of the Montreal airport is in no way being overlooked; it is getting just as much attention as the Toronto airport. Approximately $5 million will be expended to accommodate Montreal's immediate requirements, including facilities for the handling of jumbo jets. Studies indicate that in the next 20 years expenditures in excess of $150 million will likely be required for airport facilities at Dorval or in the Montreal area. Toronto will require similar expenditures.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether the government is considering allowing flights by international air lines to proceed on to Toronto, thus making it a truly international airport.

Mr. Hellyer: This is one of the considerations arising in connection with the 20-year plan. It is inevitable that Toronto should have international traffic as well.

Mr. Starr: In which of the 20 years will this be?

Mr. Hellyer: In one of the earlier years. As a matter of fact the new terminal which is being commenced this year to accommodate the overflow in the Toronto area is essential if there is to be an expansion of international services. It is fundamental to our ability to get on with airstrip development.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Will the minister give similar consideration to Brandon airport, particularly with reference to the new terminal building?

Mr. Hellyer: We have been thinking about that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): In view of the staggering capital costs and mounting operating expenses of Canada's two major air lines, is the minister planning any meetings between officials of Air Canada and of Canadian Pacific Airlines so they might hold consultations on the sharing of overhaul facilities, crew training and any other improvements which would avoid duplication?

Mr. Hellyer: There have been discussions in connection with some of these areas, and I have no doubt there will be further discussions in the months immediately ahead.

[Later:]

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport that is related to one which was asked earlier today. In the studies which are being made with respect to the Toronto international airport will consideration be given to using London airport as an alternative airport for international and long range flights?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the department has been giving consideration to alternates as part of its long range plans.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): As a supplementary question, in view of the statement made by the minister in regard to the airports at Montreal and Toronto would he look into the crowded conditions at Victoria international airport, B.C., and make an announcement before April 4?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest we have covered enough airports for the moment and should go on to another subject.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROPOSED PROGRAM OF RESTRAINTS TO CURB INFLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising out of an undertaking given by him on November 10 and repeated in his mini-budget address on November 30 that the government would initiate discussions with leaders of the labour movement and other main elements of the economy to organize an integrated program of restraint to curb inflation. Will the minister say whether the government has initiated these special discussions?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Preparations for these discussions are proceeding. We have been making a special inquiry into the kinds of restraint which are being practised in other countries, and we intend to bring forward a program along these lines. I hope that in all these matters, involving expenditure and otherwise, support for restraint will be forthcoming from the opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Did I understand the minister to indicate that as yet there has been no discussion outside the government?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are preparing for these meetings. We feel it is most important that the discussions should be successful, and we wish them to proceed on a sound basis.

Mr. Stanfield: As a supplementary question, can the minister indicate a date by which these discussions will start?

Mr. Sharp: No. I cannot indicate that at the present time, Mr. Speaker, but we will certainly proceed with them just as soon as we feel in a position to put our proposals before both the unions and management. This is a very serious matter, and it is one which I know is of great concern to the hon. gentleman. He has expressed his views on this matter on many occasions and I hope he will understand the most important thing is that they be successful and not be embarked upon before adequate preparations are made.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the minister give us any indication of when this program is likely to be launched?

Mr. Sharp: I have answered that question, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

APPEARANCE OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER AT JOINT COMMITTEE MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would he, despite his other preoccupations, discuss with the chairmen of the external affairs and defence committees a suitable date for his promised appearance with the Minister of National Defence to discuss with those committees recent developments in NATO and NORAD?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall be glad to, Mr. Speaker.

FLOODS

ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Middlesex West asked me about a request from the province of Ontario to assist victims of the recent floods in the southwestern part of the province, and I replied that I did not know I had any responsibility. After leaving the chamber yesterday I found a letter had been received from the Ontario minister of municipal affairs, making such a request.

As far as my department is concerned the only agency which might be of some assistance is the Canadian Disaster Relief Fund, for which I have about the same kind of responsibility as I have for the C.B.C., which isn't very much—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Miss LaMarsh: —particularly since this disaster will be a shared responsibility. Because this is an area with which the Prime Minister and I had personal connections in earlier days—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Miss LaMarsh: —I was born there and he used to play baseball there—I have asked the disaster relief fund to look into the matter as early as possible. If my hon. friend wishes to pursue the matter further I suggest he be more direct and go right to the right hon. Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance.

[Later:]

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement by the Secretary of State in answer to my question yesterday, has the Prime Minister been informed of the Ontario government's request for federal assistance for flood relief in southwestern Ontario? If so, has a favourable decision concerning such relief been reached?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I do not recall receiving any such request, Mr. Speaker, but I shall look for it as soon as I get back to my office in case it came in today.

[Mr. Brewin.]

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENTS FOR 1966-67 CROPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has he been in communication with the Canadian Wheat Board today and, if so, has he some very important information to relay to the house regarding final payments for the 1966-67 wheat crop?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I met with the wheat board this morning, and I can inform the house that the 1966-67 pool accounts for oats and barley were closed on January 31. The final accounts are being prepared at the present time, and it is expected that final payments for these grains will be mailed to producers commencing early in March.

The board has advised me that the 1966-67 pool account for wheat will be closed on February 29. Cheques will be distributed as soon as the necessary accounting and auditing are completed. It should be possible to mail them to producers commencing toward the end of March. I am unable to anticipate the level of these final payments until the accounting is completed by the wheat board. However, the total amount to be distributed will be quite substantial.

OIL

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING U.S. IMPORTS FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Did the minister or other members of the government discuss with the United States government the level of Canadian crude oil imports into the United States for the first seven months of this year; and did they agree with the estimated levels which Mr. Udall, the Secretary of the Interior, has announced as 415,000 barrels a day, which is 25,000 barrels a day less than the actual exports from Canada to the United States during the past year?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, these are figures given out by the Department of the Interior of the United States. I had nothing to do with them. This is their responsibility. I might underline the fact that the figures given yesterday or the day before were for the first seven months only, so one cannot judge the whole year on the basis of seven months only.

May I repeat that I do not intend to indicate the exact figures we have reached with the United States within the framework of the agreement to which I have already referred on many occasions.

Mr. Harkness: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister perhaps did not catch the first part of my question concerning whether he had discussed, with Mr. Udall or otherwise, the level of these imports for this present year.

Mr. Pepin: I have already said we have, but not in the context of the publication to which my friend is making reference.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister had a discussion, and if there were Canadian negotiators in the United States, did they agree to reduce the quota in consideration of obtaining permission to build the interprovincial pipe line from Chicago to Canada?

Mr. Pepin: The building of the interprovincial pipe line was within the framework of the agreement to which I referred two or three weeks ago. I shall be glad to send my hon. friend copies of the answers I made at that time.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister misunderstood the question. In the agreement or in any negotiations which the government had with the United States did they agree to reduce the quota in consideration for building the interprovincial pipe line to Chicago?

Mr. Pepin: Certainly not.

AIR TRANSPORT

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY INTO C.P.A. PLANE ACCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask the minister whether as a result of the investigation so far conducted into the crash of the Canadian Pacific Airlines jet liner at Vancouver airport it has been determined whether in fact the emergency exits from the central part of the plane were inoperative at the time. If so, what steps is the department taking to ensure that a similar situation will not exist in any future incident of this kind?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be better if my hon. friend would agree to wait until I have received a full report, at which time I could cover the whole investigation of the accident at one time.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister when he expects he will be able to give the house a full report on this accident.

Mr. Hellyer: I cannot say for sure, but I will ask that the report be speeded up, and will make a statement just as quickly as possible.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORTED DELAY IN RECEIPT OF SUPPLEMENTAL PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week the hon. member for Chapleau asked a question regarding the guaranteed income supplement. I have a reply which is rather lengthy, and I should like permission to table it for printing in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Does the parliamentary secretary have permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer above referred to is as follows.]

There are two reasons why the guaranteed supplement was not paid in January 1968 to certain old age security pensioners:

1. The law requires that a new application for the supplement be made each year since the amount of the supplement is based on the income of the pensioner in the preceding year. Accordingly application forms were mailed on January 2, 1968 to pensioners who received a supplement in 1967. In order that payment of the supplement not be interrupted pending the receipt and processing of the application for any year, provision is made in the legislation that payment may be continued for up to four months in that year provided the pensioner notified the minister by December 31 of the previous year of his intent to apply for the supplement in the succeeding year.

At the beginning of November 1967 a form to be signed and used for such notification was sent to all recipients of a supplement. In December a follow-up letter was sent to the relatively few persons who had not returned the notice of intent. In those cases where the notice was not received by December 31, 1967, no supplement could be paid in January 1968 unless the new application was received and processed before the January cheques were printed, and no supplement can be paid for subsequent months until the new application is received and processed. Retroactive payment may be made at that time.

2. A large number of persons became old age security pensioners for the first time in January 1968 when the eligible age for the pension was reduced from 68 years to 67 years. On January 2, 1968, such persons were sent an application form for the guaranteed income supplement. If that application was not returned and processed prior to the date on which the January pension cheques were printed, the pensioner could not be paid the supplement for that month. Applications in such cases when received, will be processed and, where he is found eligible for the supplement, the pensioner will be paid same effective January 1968 in a subsequent month.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I am interested in the implication in the remarks he made yesterday to the effect that if the house committee on labour relations holds up Bill C-186, the government will then proceed with it. Is it the government's intention to defy a house order which has committed this bill to the committee?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Speaker.]

HOUSING

MONTREAL—COMPLAINTS TO RENTAL AND HOUSING AUTHORITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board in his capacity as the minister reporting to the house in respect of housing matters. Has the minister been informed that the Montreal rental and housing authority is now receiving over 2,000 complaints a day, which constitutes the greatest housing crisis in the city's history?

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker, but I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. Grafftey: No government supporters have brought this matter to the minister's attention? That is interesting. In view of that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: I did not say that.

Mr. Grafftey: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the crisis that is affecting the citizens of the island of Montreal, will the minister announce to the house as soon as possible the federal initiatives which will be taken to relieve the situation?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, this year we will have more than 175,000 housing starts, and the federal government will put substantially more funds than ever before into public housing.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister would bring forward the resolution on the order paper as the first item of business today we would be prepared to pass it without debate.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to do that if the house leader will agree.

LABOUR RELATIONS

SUGGESTED DELAY IN CONSIDERATION OF APPLICATIONS BEFORE BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Minister of Labour. Does he intend to ask the Canada Labour Relations Board to postpone the study of certification applications which could be affected by passage of Bill No. C-186?

[English]

Hon. B. S. Mackasey (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Labour Relations Board, a body independent of parliament, has an obligation to carry on its function despite what legislation is contemplated in the house. I do not intend to interfere with that autonomous organization. I am sure the hon. member for Lapointe will be pleased to know that the rights of the C.N.T.U. are fully protected in view of the fact that they have been notified by the board of their opportunity and privilege to intervene in these two applications which are now before the board.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the minister.

Since he intends to intervene in this field, could he tell us whether the enactment of the legislation now under consideration in committee will be retroactive, if the legislation is passed and in the event of a decision to the contrary on the part of the Canada Labour Relations Board?

Mr. Speaker: The question as put by the hon. member is hypothetical.

[English]

INDUSTRY

SYDNEY, N.S.—ADDITIONAL FEDERAL ASSISTANCE RESPECTING STEEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the many representations I have received and which I am sure many other members of the house have received from members of the united steel workers union, can the minister say what further steps the government intends to take to assist the Nova Scotia government in respect of the problems facing the Dosco steel plant?

Hon C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as I believe the house is aware there is an exchange of correspondence on this subject being conducted between the premier of Nova Scotia and the Prime Minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO MEET UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of figures recently released which indicate that there are half a million unemployed in Canada, can the minister tell the house what steps his department is taking to alleviate this very serious problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is repeating in the same terms the question he asked yesterday. He is asking the minister to make a statement which should be made on motions.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A matter which deals with the lives of half a million people in Canada is a very serious matter, and I do not intend to be held down by silly house rules.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Skoreyko: I have asked this question twice. What is the government doing about this serious problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

MANITOBA—ARDA AGREEMENT RESPECTING INTERLAKE REGION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. Now that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has placed a ceiling on capital cost expenditure under the vocational training school program agreements, will he give the assurance that this will not in any way affect the vocational school program covered by the ARDA-FRED comprehensive agreement for the interlake area of Manitoba which was signed in May 1967?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I will have to investigate this matter, because I do not know whether or not it affects this program.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RESTRICTIONS ON SALE OF CANADIAN URANIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, this question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell the house whether the government is giving consideration to restricting the sale of Canadian uranium to those countries which are willing to sign the non-proliferation treaty?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the policy in the sale of uranium has been previously outlined by the government. Uranium can be sold only for peaceful purposes, and then only with the application of international safeguards.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Will the minister now direct himself to the question as to whether certain countries presently receiving Canadian uranium may be cut off as the result of refusal to sign the nuclear non-proliferation treaty?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any connection between the application of safeguards in respect of uranium for peaceful purposes only and the position any country may take regarding the treaty of non-proliferation. This treaty does not necessarily deal with the supply of fuel, but deals with the undertaking of non-nuclear powers to restrict expansion in the nuclear club by not developing or acquiring nuclear weapons.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POLICY OF DEPARTMENT IN PROSECUTIONS FOR POSSESSION OF MARIJUANA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he now has an answer to the question I asked yesterday, regarding an apparent change in procedures for prosecution of individuals found in possession of marijuana.

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I missed the question, but I will read it and try to give an answer to the hon. member.

[Mr. Sauvé.]

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

I would like to ask him if he always answers in English because his French is lousy.

TRANSPORT

EXTENSION OF RAILWAY LINE IN NORTH-WESTERN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is prompted by the urgent need for better means of transportation in northwestern Quebec.

I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Transport whether his department is now considering extension of the Chibougamau railway to the iron ore deposits at lake Albanel; could he also tell us whether other studies are now being made elsewhere in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest to the hon. member that he should put his question on the order paper.

[English]

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING WINNIPEG BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which is not related to the series of airport questions asked earlier. This question arises from a communication I received today from my own provincial government. Is the minister in receipt of a telegram from officials of the Manitoba government urgently requesting clarification of his latest talks with Air Canada on the subject of the Winnipeg air base?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge. This may have been received by my office since I have had the opportunity to communicate with my officials.

GRAIN

REPORTED STATEMENT BY AGRICULTURE MINISTER RESPECTING WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which is of utmost importance to farmers in western Canada. Has the right hon. gentleman checked whether the Minister of Agriculture was advocating government policy when he said publicly that the Canadian Wheat Board should become an agent of the federal government instead of an agent of the farmers?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Again I would recommend that the hon. gentleman read my speeches with more care.

Mr. Starr: No copies are available. You make them off the cuff.

Mr. Greene: Copies are available in my office if they are required.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is aware of the fact that all the newspapers in the west have reported that he has said this in various places in western Canada. The farmers want to know whether this is a fact.

Mr. Greene: Let me suggest again, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. gentleman will read my speech he will see that I suggested a discussion of this topic. I never recommended this policy, nor did I suggest it as government policy.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture suggested to the hon. member for Assiniboia that he should read his speeches more carefully, as he suggested to me, I should like to ask whether he will accept the assurance that we will read his speeches with more care if he will speak with more coherence.

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO RENEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENT WITH CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether China has requested or does the wheat board anticipate renegotiation of the present wheat agreement with that country.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the present wheat agreement has another year to run. At the end of that time I hope conditions will be favourable for the negotiation of a new contract.

Mr. Korchinski: I based my question on the report of a statement made by Mr. McNamara. If this should be the case, will the government undertake to see that a greater volume of the grain produced—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that his question is hypothetical.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could rephrase my question. In view of the fact that China is taking only a bare minimum under the present wheat agreement, will the government undertake to ascertain whether a greater volume can be sold before negotiations are undertaken during this period of depressed prices?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, the premise is not correct. China is taking more than a bare minimum.

FLOODS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence, who I understand has seen a telegram directed to the Minister of Labour from the minister without portfolio of the British Columbia government, whether his department has any plans to put into effect emergency action in the Bella Coola valley as the result of a flood which may take place there at any moment.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this telegram sent to the Minister of Labour. There was some delay in this regard; the telegram should have come directly to the department from the attorney general of British Columbia, but we have taken action as requested by the minister without portfolio.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE RATIOS FOR INSURED LOANS

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, having regard to a question asked earlier this day I should like to ascertain whether it is agreeable to the house to adopt item No. 64 on the order paper without debate.

This is the resolution in respect of an amendment to the National Housing Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954, to increase from $13,000 to $18,000 the loan ratios for insured loans to home owners, builders, and co-operative housing associations for the construction of new housing units.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Benson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-202, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

• (3:20 p.m.)

INCOME TAX ACT

The house in committee on Bill No. C-193, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-193, to amend the Income Tax Act. Clause 1.

On clause 1—Special table.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I spoke on the resolution stage and in the budget debate with regard to the income tax proposals generally of the government. I did not speak on second reading of the bill. I do not know whether it will be the practice of the Chair to allow a general discussion on later clauses of the bill. The first clause is highly innocuous and would not normally call for any comment.

My comments are really more directed to clauses 4 and 5 of the bill. I am wondering how Your Honour proposes to conduct the business. I shall have some remarks to make with regard to the surcharge and to the corporate tax. Perhaps the committee would consider whether more general remarks might be made on clause 1 rather than on clauses 4 and 5. I should like guidance from Your Honour in this regard.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that clauses 1, 2 and 3 are of a purely technical character and if there are to be remarks of a general nature such as has been suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton West they could quite appropriately be made on clauses 4 and 5. The first three clauses are merely technical in character.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The Chairman: The usual procedure, of course, is to have the general debate on clause 1, assuming that clause 1 is not just a short title. However, if it is the wish of the committee to have a general debate on the bill under clause 4, there is no reason at all why that should not be done. If the general debate is to be on clauses 4 and 5, or either of these clauses, I would ask members of the committee to confine their remarks in connection with clauses 1, 2 and 3 to those actual clauses.

Mr. Lambert: That is fine, Mr. Chairman. I wonder whether I could get a little more clarification in respect of clause 1 than is contained in the explanatory notes. I know the clause has to do with the use of tables on the income tax forms but perhaps the minister, guided by his officials, could tell us briefly what is the real, shall we say, housekeeping change that is being made here.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the amendment contained in clause 1 is to the subsection of the act which authorizes a table for individual tax return forms to assist taxpayers in calculating the amount of tax payable. This table combines the federal, provincial and old age security taxes and permits a taxpayer to ascertain the combined tax payable on an amount of taxable income without having to make separate calculations using the rate schedule, the provincial rates, the old age security tax rate and the special 20 per cent tax reduction for small incomes. It is intended that this table on the 1968 forms will include the new 5 per cent surtax. The proposed changes in the wording of the present subsection are necessary so that it will authorize the table planned for 1968.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—"Tax otherwise payable under this part."

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, perhaps it would assist the committee if I were to make a short explanation of clause 2. This is a technical amendment to clarify the interrelationship of the subsection which authorizes the construction of a table for use on tax return forms described in connection with clause 1 and the definition of "tax otherwise payable under this part". Only subparagraph (i) in the amendment to paragraph (c) is new. Subparagraph (ii) repeats the present definition of the expression "tax otherwise payable under this part".

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, is this a loophole-plugging? Did the administration find that there were cases where it could be argued that there was some doubling-up on the averaging provisions in so far as farmers and fishermen are concerned? Just how equitable is the plugging of the loophole?

Mr. Sharp: This amendment is not prompted by any cases. During the review of the section to determine how the 5 per cent surtax should be applied, the officials decided that the section was not as tightly drafted as it might have been.

Mr. Lambert: In other words, they found a loophole but they plugged it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Corporations.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, clause 4 is what might be termed a sleeper clause because its impact was not noticed too much at the time of the budget presentation, the budget debate and the resolution stage. It is purely an acceleration clause in so far as the paying of corporate income tax is concerned. This provision really puts a tight squeeze on corporations, which are now having to pay taxes almost on the same basis as individuals, by monthly instalments, and completely within a very short time after the completion of their taxation year.

• (3:30 p.m.)

As we know, there was a change made about two years ago, if my memory serves me correctly, whereby corporations were required to pay up the balance of their income taxes within three months of the close of the fiscal year, notwithstanding how complicated were their operations. This change was a device adopted by the minister of finance of the day as a one-shot proposition to net him some $250 million, if I remember rightly, in order to hide what had become a rather disreputable deficit for an administration that had come into power priding itself that they would soon put the fiscal house in order. They alleged it was in disorder. On the other hand, we saw them continue the same practices. Therefore if they adopted them, and they were such saintly people, there must have been legitimacy to the practices which had existed.

In any event, the extra $250 million was gathered in order to gild the lily, a one-shot proposition to help in the attempt to balance the budget. I suspect this is a similar operation because, as we can see from the note, the amendment would require corporations to pay their corporation income taxes over a period which commences two months closer to the beginning of their taxation year than is the case at present. As a matter of fact, if my calculations are correct corporations will only be one month away from paying these taxes one month at a time.

Today, corporations are finding it exceedingly difficult to borrow money. There is no doubt that money is tight and getting tighter. As the result of a move by the government and the Bank of Canada to deal with the balance of payments problem the bank rate has gone up to 7 per cent. This is having a negative effect with regard to the domestic economy. It is in part a legacy of arrangements that were made by the minister's predecessor during a disastrous period of office in which Canada was caught by the interest equalization proposals of the United States. Those proposals were, in effect, retaliation for some rather foolhardy proposals put forward by the present government in 1963 and 1964. The ripples from this disaster will come to shore for many years, and this is one more of those ripples.

Corporations are faced with problems of liquidity and working capital. On the one hand the government is saying, it will make it more expensive for you to operate. After all, it was only this week that the banks again, quite naturally in view of the action by the Bank of Canada, moved their prime rate up to 7 per cent. This action was expected to follow as night follows day. If the bank rate should go to 7½ per cent, and there is a suggestion this might happen because the steps the government has taken with regard to the encouragement of foreign investment in Canada are not paying off at the hoped for rate, then one might expect that within the next few days after the event the chartered banks would increase their prime rate. This is the way the economy is tied together at the present time.

After all, the corporations provide the backbone of business activity in this country. I do not have the same views about the word "corporation" as do hon. members to my left. They believe that as soon as two people in business form a corporation they become big, bad wolves. The word "corporation" covers any company in a business operation, from two or more people to the largest enterprises. They are all corporations. They all pay their income taxes on the same scale. This new section 50 will require the two-man operation, perhaps a husband and wife, to pay their taxes on the same basis as, say, General Motors of Canada, the Canada Cement Corporation or any other large corporation which in most instances has adequate sources of working capital.

The Income Tax Act is now going to make sure that the majority of the medium-sized and smaller incorporated businesses will be right up against the collar of cash requirements all the time. But somehow they will have to find the cash, notwithstanding the fact their working capital may be tied up in inventory or in receivables. The Income Tax Act says they will have to pay one-twelfth of their estimated taxes each month and will have to clean up the balance within three months of the end of the fiscal year. Individuals are allowed four months in which to pay their taxes but corporations will be allowed only three months. The corporation may happen to be a service station operator and his wife who have incorporated the business, or two men operating a trucking service who have incorporated. This is precisely what they are going to have to do.

I suggest that this provision results from the desire of the government for money. It is not anti-inflationary in any way at all. The purpose of the change is to bring in some money quickly in order to cut down the swollen deficit of this administration. Up until this moment I have not been able to ascertain the additional funds the government will get within the next 18 months or two years as a result of this provision, but I would say it is just as nefarious and perhaps even more pernicious in so far as the Canadian economy is concerned than the 5 per cent surcharge on income tax. I will have something to say about the surcharge on personal income tax when we reach clause 5.

This is an acceleration of the payment of income tax by incorporated businesses. It is an attempt to siphon off more money. Is this for an anti-inflationary purpose, Mr. Chairman? I suggest to the minister that it is not. Taxation is used for the purpose of combating inflation, to eliminate funds that are chasing too few goods and services. But would anybody suggest that in this country today there are too few goods or services available? Certainly there are not. If we reduce the demand for goods and services in this country, this will bring about, first of all, unemployment as a result of fewer services and a decline in the production of goods that are produced in Canada for Canadians. This again will lead to further unemployment.

It is all right to impose taxes as a means of combating inflation or inflationary pressure in time of war, when we all know that it is desirable not to produce certain goods and engage in certain services because others have higher priority. But income in the hands of the populace as a whole which is chasing too few or fewer goods and services tends to drive up prices. That is classical economic theory, and we do not need to go into the details of the theory of supply and demand in this debate. In this day and age, however, such theory is not applicable. I suggest that in fact the very converse situation will occur. I am wondering whether this is part and parcel of the minister's expressed intention, on behalf of the government, to bring about a little slackness in certain sectors, a slackness that might be tolerated and even encouraged.

What will be the result of some of these consequences, Mr. Chairman? These consequences flow not only from this acceleration of the payment of corporate income tax, which will make things more difficult for businesses, but also for the surcharge on personal income tax. We realize that the government does face certain problems. There is relatively galloping inflation. For example, there is an increase of 4.5 per cent in the cost of goods and services, according to the consumer price index last month. There may have been a couple of years during the early fifties when higher rates of inflation occurred, and we know what the consequences were of that.

This administration also faces the problem of balance of payments on international account. Recently there was the beginning of a run on the dollar owing to a lack of confidence in the international money market. At that time the government had to take steps to reduce its expenditures, put its own financial house in order and take measures to combat inflation. Since the budget there has been a greater increase of inflationary pressure in that some of the new excise taxes are reflected in the cost of living index. And before long, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the minister that the income tax surcharge will also result in a further increase in the cost of living. This will be due to demands for higher wages. After all, Mr. Chairman, practically every individual who is paid a salary or a wage today has income tax deducted at source. What he is interested in is his take-home pay. Even when he is being paid $250 a week, if $75 income tax is deducted, and now the minister proposes to deduct a further $5 or $10, this individual will be interested in maintaining the status quo and will consequently seek to recover that extra $5 or $10. He too wants to hedge his future against inflation, which is quite a natural reaction.

The government also needs more funds to meet its program of expenditure. I think we could suggest that in certain areas this program could be cut back, but let us just look at some of the remedies that the government proposes to take. For example, Mr. Chairman, as a result of pressure the government stated that it would cut back on expenditure, and with the greatest of fanfare introduced estimates a week ago totalling $10.3 billion. The government stated that this was but a 3.6 per cent increase over last year. However, when we compare estimates with estimates it is, as the Leader of the Opposition rightly pointed out the other day, an actual increase over last year of about 8 per cent. This, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the protestations of the President of the Treasury Board who said: "Oh, well, you are really not comparing the same things. Since we are now using computers we can guarantee fewer supplementary estimates this year."

Even if we make some adjustment and include some of last year's supplementaries with the main estimates, which would make the situation more comparable according to the President of the Treasury Board, the increase amounts to about 6 per cent. In actual fact I suggest this 3.6 per cent figure was a big sell-out. Unfortunately many of the communications media bought it and we saw big black headlines declaring, almost as though a miracle had occurred, that the government was holding itself to an increase in expenditure of 3.6 per cent. Of course, Mr. Chairman, that is nonsense; there will be further supplementary estimates. It is just as though I were saying to my neighbour, Mr. Chairman, that I owe him $100 but this does not take into account the $25 I lost to him last night at poker and other liabilities that I have.

We know that there is going to be a further item in connection with the Expo deficit. We are not quarrelling with this at the present time but we do say to the government: Do not tell us that you are going to keep your expenditures within 3.6 per cent of last year's. That was an exercise in misleading the public completely. Then for the government to say that the public service would be limited to an increase of only 5,000 persons a year as against the normal increase of 15,000 a year is to camouflage the matter. The increase has been 15,000 a year only since this administration has been in power. We have had a fantastic increase in the numbers of high-priced jobs in the civil service, but that matter may be gone into on another occasion.

Yet there is not a penny in all these estimates to take care of civil servants who retired many years ago and who today, as the result of inflationary pressures and increased taxes, are facing truly difficult times. As a matter of fact one might say that this government espouses increases for the rich and decreases for the poor. That has been one part of this government's policy, especially as it applies to the public service.

It was strongly suggested to the government that it should set aside some of its more expensive programs. I shall not go into the arguments which were advanced the other day by the Leader of the Opposition about the implementation of medicare but I endorse those arguments wholeheartedly.

With regard to the wise counsel which the Minister of Finance gave to the provinces and municipalities to cut back their spending and save money, may I say that I agree with the minister and support him in those pressures that he is putting on the provinces and municipalities. Some provinces and municipalities have taken heed of that counsel. Over the years some of them have become very fat and lax, I think, in the matter of watching their expenses.

Now we come to the options which are open to the minister. I have spoken about what I think is the inequity and wrong usage of the income tax surcharge. It may be anti-inflationary but certainly it hits every wage earner today who comes within a taxable bracket. Surely the minister could have mitigated inflationary pressures by giving private taxpayers the same consideration he gave the corporations some time ago when there was a refundable surcharge, assuming that there was a necessity for any increase in personal income tax. I do not think there was any such necessity. I do not think the government needed to increase personal income tax and I do not think it should have entered the corporation income tax field either.

I have previously expressed myself about excise taxes and about the relative luxuries of tobacco and liquor. Only now, having allowed the provinces complete liberty in this field, has the government of Canada seen fit to move into it. The provinces had complete liberty so far as liquor was concerned to increase revenue without resorting to their legislatures. They merely ordered an increase in liquor prices. Those remarks do not apply to tobacco since provinces must take legislative action to impose an additional tax on tobacco. In any event, I think the populace generally is prepared to accept taxes on these two important items and might have accepted more. I am certain that the minister might have looked toward an extension of excise taxes on certain services as a result of which there would have perhaps been greater equity. In any event, I feel that the acceleration of the payment of corporation taxes which the minister has proposed is a retrograde step.

I hope that in the estimates and in the budget for the forthcoming year these matters will be considered. I am not sure that the present minister will deliver that budget; that question is in suspense at present. I think he would prefer not to have to deliver it, because if he does his hopes with regard to something else will go by the board. In any event, I think the provision I have mentioned is a retrograde step, and the next provision of the bill is even more repugnant to me. I believe that these two steps with regard to income tax are not necessary in any way.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I must say that it is impossible for me to be enthusiastic about this bill for a number of reasons. The first reason is obvious. No one likes higher taxes. Not many, and no doubt this includes the Minister of Finance, can react as philosophically to paying taxes as Oliver Wendell Holmes who said that paying taxes did not bother him since they were simply the way that he helped to pay for civilization.

There are fundamental reasons for condemning this bill which are to be found when we look at the state of our economy and at the state of our tax laws generally. Unlike the minister, I have no professional expertise in the fields of fiscal and monetary management. I have never really participated in any previous debate having to do with a review of the Canadian economy or the budget, the reason being, as I have said, that I have not the expertise that the minister and such hon. members as those representing Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, Waterloo South and Edmonton West have in this field. They have repeatedly taken part in debates of this kind. Like many Canadians, in the field of economic and fiscal matters I am an amateur in the general and original meaning of the word.

I have followed with keen interest the policies of the government and its attempts to manage the Canadian economy fiscally and monetarily. This bill amends some aspects of our tax laws. I am not enthusiastic about it because it seeks to amend a tax law that has been condemned, after long and painstaking study on the part of the Carter commission, as inequitable. There can be no more damning indictment of a taxation system than is contained in the verdict of that single word "inequitable", a verdict arrived at by the Carter commission. Not only has the government failed to give any clear indication of where it stands relative to the main recommendations of the Carter report but it has also failed to indicate whether it will even bring forward a white paper or a position paper setting forth government thinking in connection with these proposals so that hon. members can begin to understand what the government has in mind by way of tax reforms.

This is why many of us approach the bill before us with a negative attitude right from the start. We are continuing to use a tax system riddled with loopholes and anomalies brought about by tax deductions and concessions which discriminate against those who earn their income and favour those who acquire it by way of capital gains. In short, our tax laws continue to be basically inequitable. They allow for the deduction of all kinds of expenses incurred by corporations, including not only such necessary items as office equipment, fuel and so on but also such things as luncheon expenses and the cost of hunting lodges. You name it, and it is likely to be deductible somehow. I am sure the minister is aware that the late President Kennedy made a serious attempt to get the United States Congress to agree to tax reforms to cut down expense account living which is becoming a way of life among a certain element in society. If I may speak in the Jeffersonian idiom for just a moment, I should like to say that our present tax law in connection with expense account deductions appeals to the baser instincts of man and cultivates such instincts.

Our present tax law is inequitable because it tends to profit a few people greatly while discriminating against the many. This can be seen simply by looking at the way in which certain elements in our society reacted to the recommendations of the Carter commission. Through their briefs and their tax counsel they got their message over very quickly. They were opposed in essence to what the commission recommended. These people and their spokesmen were articulate, influential and powerful. They have succeeded in petrifying the government into inaction even to the extent that it refuses to give any indication of its attitude toward the basic proposals contained in the report.

The really sad thing is that hundreds of thousands of Canadians, the majority, in fact, who would receive more equitable treatment if our tax laws were reformed were led to believe by reason of these submissions and subsequent publicity in the press and elsewhere that they would somehow suffer a disadvantage ultimately if the principal proposals in the Carter report were accepted. I believe a hoax of epic proportions has been perpetrated on the Canadian people by those who submitted briefs almost completely in opposition to the major recommendations of the commission. The result is that the government has been paralysed by fear.

Throughout the past three years private bills have been brought forward seeking changes in the income tax law to allow for the deduction of expenses by men and women who in the ordinary course of their employment must incur expense in order to acquire special clothing or tools necessary to carry out their work. This is a simple proposition and one which is fair in every respect. My hon. friend from Sudbury has spoken eloquently about the need for bringing about a change in our present tax law which would make this possible. If this law is to be around for a few years yet, and it looks as though it will be, let us at least remove from it the more objectionable of its provisions.

Among these must be considered the non-deductibility of the cost of clothing, equipment and tools used by people in the ordinary course of their employment. Up to the present there has been no indication on the part of the government that it is prepared to accept arguments that such expenses should be deductible, and the basic unfairness of the law continues. Deductions in respect of such items as safety boots, hard hats and tools are not allowed, though deductions for entertainment, recreation facilities for clients and so on are allowed. It is hard to imagine how such a situation could be allowed to continue.

Instead of a proposition to remove some of this basic unfairness we have before us now a proposal to levy a miserable 5 per cent surtax on existing income tax. The minister has presumably taken this course because he feels it is an anti-inflationary measure. If it is an anti-inflationary measure it must somehow dampen consumer demands. But when my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands spoke on this subject last November he pointed out that the present inflation syndrome does not have the characteristics of ordinary inflation. The minister said he agreed, and I think both hon. gentlemen are correct. It is not the kind of inflation with which we have been so familiar in the past.

If the bill before us does dampen demand to some extent it will be operating as though we had the kind of inflation which the minister himself has consistently maintained we are not experiencing. Thus it is difficult to see any logical basis for the course the government is taking. There would indeed be some logic attached to it if prices were rising as a result of excessive demand. But it is generally agreed we are not experiencing this kind of inflation. If anything, this is a cost push, a form of inflation with which we have been unfamiliar during the past few years. If anything the tax increase proposed here is ill suited for the purpose of combating it and will simply aggravate the inflationary trend. How can it avoid adding further to the factory cost of goods produced? It will give a further push to the inflationary factors which are at work. Perhaps this bill is simply a way whereby the government can raise revenue, but it has nothing to do with counter-cyclical management of the economy. As I have already tried to say, it will act perversely on the inflation we are facing.

There are many other major problem areas deriving from the government's policies, equivocation and indecision. Obviously rising costs must have some connection with misdirected fiscal policy and with drifting monetary policy. Since I became a member of the house parliament was persuaded to amend the banking legislation and remove the ceiling on interest rates. We were given some very persuasive reasons for taking that course of action but looking back in retrospect, with hindsight, it is quite clear that the reasons we were given were entirely spurious and it was quite wrong for parliament to take that course of action on the recommendation of the government. The government's advice was wrong. One of the main arguments put forward in favour of removing the ceiling on interest rates was that it would help check the growth of near-banks and other undesirable forms of lending institutions. That seemed like a powerful enough argument, but there were other ways to take care of that problem. In the meantime the cure has been shown to be quite disastrous, with a round of increases in the cost of money to all productive sectors of our economy.

The minister now comes before us with a bill that will have the effect of dampening demand. The government is looking on with equanimity as unemployment passes the 4 per cent mark. This measure will not have a remedial effect in any case because a cost-push inflation requires a different kind of surgery from that which the government seems prepared to undertake. Some of the basic economic problems that tend to aggravate the inflation problem require more major surgery than the government is prepared to undertake.

Quite often we are told about the importance of attracting foreign capital to Canada. Yet in recent weeks we have seen the development of a phenomenon in which Canadian investment capital in the form of mutual funds is flowing southward at a rate which shows a ratio of about three to one in investment by those funds in the United States compard with their investment in Canada.

A few days ago the minister was asked a question in the house about this matter, and the posture he adopted was that this was simply part of the ordinary transaction of business, part of the ordinary movement of capital, and the government contemplated no special measures with regard to this development. If Canadian investment moneys are flowing across the border at the rate recorded in recent months the question should be asked, is it simply a case of capital seeking a higher return elsewhere? Is that the main reason? Or could it be due to the relative shortage in this country of stock offerings in Canadian enterprises? Is it the practice of Canadian subsidiaries of foreign parent firms to make available significantly large blocks of shares to Canadian investors or Canadian investment funds? When there is an outflow of investment funds to another country it may well be due to the relative non-availability of equity stock in Canada and is not so much a matter of looking for a higher return. It should certainly be within the power of the government to react to this kind of problem and try to do something about it. My colleague from Waterloo South will have something more substantial to say in a little while about the availability of equity stocks in Canada.

The rising cost of housing has been a persistent problem within our economy. The cost has been surging for the past two years and more. All the time the government has been dithering. I use that word deliberately because while we have heard ministerial statement upon ministerial statement we have heard nothing of substance that would come to grips with the essential part of the problem.

Land speculation in urban centres and on the periphery of urban growth centres is a major part of the problem. This is becoming a social evil and not just an economic problem. I realize and admit quite readily that one course of remedial action does not involve federal power but has to do with provincial and municipal powers. Our provincial and municipal authorities should be showing a little more curiosity about how this problem is being dealt with in other places.

I understand that in the state of New Jersey and in other states within the last two or three years a real property assessment law has been devised that seems to go a long way toward dealing with the problem of land speculation which has caused the escalation of land prices in and around urban centres. Since the matter does not involve federal jurisdiction I hesitate to try to describe the nature of the changes that have been made in New Jersey in its real property law whereby there is no incentive whatever for speculators to get into the act. Property taxation is based on land use and productivity to resident users. At the time that such land passes from primary production use, or whatever its use, to commercial development it is taxed retroactively for two or three years. As a result those who own land on the periphery of cities are able to retain it without suffering confiscatory penalties. They hold on to it longer and when it is passed on to commercial developers it is likely that the commercial developer will not hold on to it for one or two years before actually developing it. I believe that such a method of approach, which contains an incentive, would prevent a speculator getting in on the act.

The other factor which bears directly on the problem of escalating costs in housing construction is one that relates directly to this government. It is indeed a matter of exclusive federal jurisdiction. I am referring to interest rates, the cost of money and the availability of funds for housing. The response of the government over the past months and last few years has been to act as though, while possessing sovereign powers, it cannot find any means to deal with the problem of high cost money and relative non-availability of mortgage funds.

The National Housing Act interest rate has been increased again in the hope that this will encourage the investment of more money in this field. While on the one hand it may have this effect it also has the effect of pushing up the price to such an extent that housing is simply beyond the reach of the majority of potential home owners. When that point is reached any kind of action that is taken becomes irrational. For the majority of the people in this country who are interested in and need housing the National Housing Act interest rate now is already such that it is of only theoretical concern to them. As we go on from day to day and from week to week we find that the National Housing Act interest rate has increased once again, the bank rate has increased and the prime lending rate has increased.

It is surprising to note the rapidity with which one bank follows another in increasing the prime lending rate. This almost gives one cause to wonder whether it might be of some value to have the anti-combines people look into the operations of the banks when they take concerted action such as this. I realize that the anti-combines legislation was never intended to be used in respect of banking operations or at least the operations of the chartered banks. However, it would be more than just an academic exercise for the anti-combines people if they were to interest themselves in the operations of our banks and study the way in which it just happens that an increase in the prime lending rate by one bank leads so quickly to a similar increase by the others. In a sense I am rather sad that I allowed myself to be persuaded to go along with the legislation last year which eased the limitations governing the banks in respect of interest rates. Since then there has been a chain reaction of escalation always upward.

There is another matter which I should like to discuss very briefly. It has to do with housing and the problems with regard to residential construction. One of the minister's colleagues, the Minister of Transport, on a number of occasions has advocated the concept of the building of satellite cities. I do not have too much to say in that regard except that I believe this sort of thing will have more and more merit in the years ahead. I do not intend to be offensive to the minister but perhaps the fact that this idea is being proposed by one of his rivals for the leadership may tend to make him somewhat less enthusiastic about it. There has been such pressure on the metropolitan areas in terms of land and land prices that I believe any action which can be undertaken by government to reduce this pressure would be beneficial. For example, the Department of Industry now has a program to encourage the decentralization of industry in this country.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but the time allotted to him has now expired.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I could complete my remarks in a few minutes if I might have permission to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, the Department of Industry has been promoting a program to encourage decentralization of industry in this country. I suppose the prime purpose of that program is to cope with the problem of regional disparity in income. However, there is also an incidental benefit to be derived from it. To the extent that the program is effective and successful in reducing regional disparity in respect of income it should help at least a little to reduce the trend of the population to move to the bigger metropolitan centres. In this way it would help to reduce the pressure in these centres with regard to land prices, cost of housing and so on.

This government, however, is inconsistent, and this is unfortunate. In the past year there has been quite a move—it cannot be called insignificant in degree—of government offices from towns and smaller cities to the larger cities where they are centralized. This really does not help anybody except perhaps those who form the office staffs. For example, a town of moderate size in my area had three government offices of three government departments. Two of these offices have been moved out of that town into the metropolitan area of Winnipeg. One might ask why these offices have been moved. The move has caused inconvenience to the people whom the offices were intended to serve. It has also meant an increase in the cost to the government and the taxpayers in maintaining these offices. The rental per square foot for office space in the bigger cities is two and a half or three times as great. Who is behind this kind of reversed economic move? I doubt that the minister intends such a move to save rent, but the principle is important.

I object at this time, when everyone is talking about inflationary pressures, the need to cut back on essential public programs and services, and whether or not we are capable of launching and sustaining a national medicare plan, to the determination on the part of the government to build headquarters office space.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do not consider his remarks to be relevant to the clause under discussion. I understand that we are considering clause 4.

Mr. Schreyer: Having regard to your suggestion, Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that at the request of the minister we did not make general comments on clause 1 but are making them on this clause. This obviously was the attitude taken by the hon. member for Edmonton West. With your indulgence I should like to conclude by saying that at this time, when we are talking about the need for economies, it is difficult to understand why we should go ahead with the construction of office buildings in this capital area at a cost of $41 million. Many demands are being made for cut-backs in government programs and services, many of which are expensive but necessary. They are necessary and we must support them, and if economies are to be effected I suggest that the priority should be in respect of government office buildings.

I had intended to make some reference to the efficacy of this cost-push influence and the establishment of a prices review board advocated by my colleagues in past months. I will refrain from doing so at this time, but I should like to point out to the minister that he should prevail on his colleagues in the cabinet to look seriously and closely at the savings of several million dollars which can be made by withdrawing our forces in Europe under the NATO command. I do not wish that comment to be taken as an indication that we are advocating a change in Canada's commitment. At this time, when the United States is lowering its commitment to NATO and Britain is reducing the strength of its armed forces, I think we should have regard to the necessity of maintaining our air squadrons for an indefinite period of time. Tuesday the Canadian Labour Congress presented a brief to the cabinet and yesterday members of the C.N.T.U. made a submission. On one important aspect of policy they were in agreement. They asked the government to cut down favouritism in respect of tax laws. The C.L.C. stated that it has been a long time since a government has shown a propensity to satisfy the wishes of the rich and the powerful equal to that shown by this government. The C.N.T.U. may not have used the same words but the same message was clear. I agree wholeheartedly with both organizations.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the last speaker a question. He mentioned that we do not have ordinary inflation. I agree with him. We do have a price-wage spiral. Is it correct that the major surgery he suggests would be similar to what is taking place in the United Kingdom, that is, a ceiling on wages, prices and profits?

Mr. Schreyer: I realize the question is not intended to embarrass me and I will try to answer it. If the government lets things go too far and for too long it may be necessary, in order to cope with a crisis, to impose that type of limitation on prices, wages and profits. However, when such a crisis is building up it seems logical, since we have review processes through collective bargaining, to maintain a price review. If that is not enough, then the next step obviously must be one of limitations.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): The hon. member apparently supports the philosophy of the Carter report. He believes that if a man invests $10,000 and receives $800 interest he should be taxed but if he puts $10,000 into a house he should also be taxed to the extent of $800. I do not understand that.

Mr. Schreyer: The hon. member and I have had some very interesting discussions at lunch-time and I am sure we will have more very soon.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister one or two questions. As pointed out earlier by the hon. member for Edmonton West, the minister's predecessor brought in a one-shot windfall in respect of corporation taxes. At that time final tax payments had to be made within five months. I understand this period has now been decreased to three months but that the actual tax return must still be filed within six months following the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Sharp: That is right.

Mr. Monteith: I assume there are always adjustments when the final tax returns are filed six months after the end of a fiscal year. Is there any indication whether those adjustments are refunds or allowances on the next year's taxes or are extra payments made following the final estimated payment? I may not have made myself clear, but as I understand it the final return must be filed within six months after the end of the fiscal year. There would be adjustments in respect of that return despite the fact that the final payment of tax was supposed to be made four months following the end of the fiscal year. Does the minister have any figures as to how many adjustments might have been made, either additional tax paid or refunds allowed?

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the question of adjustment arises very much in the submission of the final return. It is expected that corporations will make the adjustment in the course of paying the final instalments. The purpose of giving time is so they are not in default when carrying through their ordinary accounting practice and filing their returns.

Mr. Monteith: In other words, Mr. Chairman, the minister is indicating that there have been inconsequential adjustments to the final returns that are made six months after the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. Sharp: That is right.

Mr. Monteith: Is it expected that with the moving forward of the final payment to three months following the end of the fiscal year there will be more adjustments, or will there still be comparatively few?

Mr. Sharp: I think it follows, Mr. Chairman, that there is a greater chance of adjustment. But I think the companies will be able to calculate their tax liability pretty closely and adjust it during the instalment period even though that is now shorter.

Mr. Monteith: I have one further question, Mr. Chairman. Does the minister feel that we have now reached the minimum period at which any final tax payment can be expected or is he looking forward on some other occasion to again moving the date forward?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am not planning to bring forward the date of payment any closer to the end of the fiscal year, but I certainly would not want to give any undertaking that some government would not do it in the future.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, in view of the minister's answer I should like to ask him a question. Would the minister give consideration to paying sooner to corporations and individuals money that the government owes them so that they in turn may advance their payments?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I think the government of Canada is considered to pay its bills about as rapidly as they are customarily paid in the commercial world.

Mr. Starr: Then why are there so many complaints?

Mr. Germa: Mr. Chairman, Bill No. C-193 is a result of the introduction of the mini-budget by the minister on November 30 last. One of the objects of the mini-budget was stated in the first paragraph of the minister's speech wherein he said:

—first, to restrain the inflationary increases in prices, costs and the cost of living—

I believe it is a well known fact, one that is accepted by the establishment, that when the economy becomes overheated it needs a little grease. The budget indicated that, as in the past, the way in which an economy is greased is by allowing unemployment to rise. This has been the traditional grease on which our private enterprise economy has functioned for many years. This bill seeks to remove from the consumer certain amounts of money which will, in the minister's words, allow a little slack to take place within the economy. We have interpreted this action, and I believe it is a true interpretation, as being designed to create unemployment and ease the supposed overheating of the economy. The minister has failed to realize that prices can be controlled by other means than reducing consumer income.

Since this statement was made by the minister several matters have been raised in the house. Suggestions have been made to which the minister could have applied his mind. One example is the increase in the price of copper which has taken place since the minister introduced this piece of legislation. It was shown that the profits of the copper corporations, Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company Limited, Noranda Copper and International Nickel Company, were such that the four cent increase per pound in the price of copper was not necessarily required at this time. I fail to see what could be more inflationary in our economy than this increase of four cents per pound in the price of copper.

There is also the case of Bell Telephone Company which increased its profits beyond what was allowed. The rate of profit of this company was set by the house but when Bell Telephone went beyond what had been dictated by the house the government saw fit to introduce a lot of doubletalk to justify these excess profits. The government did this instead of taking action and demanding that Bell Telephone return to the consumers the moneys Bell had stolen from them over the past few years. I say "stolen" because it made these excess profits in contravention of what had been laid down by this house. But the government did not see fit to take any action in that regard.

In the last few days we have also seen an example of profiteering in Canada that has no equal. I refer to the profits being made by Canadian drug manufacturers. The government seems unwilling or unable to deal with this profiteering. I believe it is in this area that inflationary trends are taking place. Excess profits must be curtailed, I believe, as well as taking extra money from Canadian consumers.

The hon. member for Edmonton West, without any provocation from this quarter of the house, at every opportunity levels criticism against this party. He seems to take a delight in misrepresenting our position with respect to certain items of legislation that we propose or wish to have rejected.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? With regard to the matter of misrepresentation, would the hon. member not concede that a moment ago he may have misrepresented the position of Bell Telephone by the ill-considered allegation he made against that company in this chamber?

Mr. Orlikow: He was 100 per cent right.

Mr. Sherman: The hon. member has added his voice to that scandalous allegation.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may be permitted to say something since the hon. member for Winnipeg South has brought my name into this matter. I agree completely with every word which the hon. member—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes, I am, Mr. Chairman. I agree 100 per cent with every word the hon. member for Sudbury has said about the unconscionable profits Bell Telephone has made. The record will show—

Mr. Cantelon: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, that is hardly a question of privilege. I asked the hon. member for Sudbury a question.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Will the hon. member state his question of privilege.

Mr. Orlikow: My question of privilege is a very simple one. When I made my interjection I think I was stating the fact.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Sudbury.

Mr. Germa: Mr. Chairman, I do not know exactly what the hon. member is alluding to but my information, and I believe it is correct, is that the Bell Telephone Company has consistently exceeded the allowable profit margin as dictated by this house. If it is not stealing when it goes beyond the dictate of this house I do not know what stealing is. The Bell Telephone Company should have been required to refund that portion of profit which it made above that dictated by parliament. If that is not the case I have been misinformed, but to the best of my knowledge that is the situation. It is not the first time Bell Telephone has done this; it has done it consistently over the past ten years. I believe that every year the Bell Telephone Company has exceeded allowable profits but at no time has this government ever demanded that it return that money. The Bell Telephone Company seems to dictate to the government. It goes ahead and does what it wants and then the government passes legislation so it will be protected.

Mr. Sherman: May I ask the hon. gentleman another question? The point of my question was his use of the term "stealing" which I suggest has a scandalous connotation, especially in the way he used it. If he is talking about exceeding certain minimums, perhaps there might be an academic application of the term he has employed. However, when he talks about stealing by a company that is almost totally Canadian owned and operated and which has functioned for the benefit of the people of this country for many years as a good corporate citizen, then I suggest that term should not be allowed to remain on the record.

Mr. Germa: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is splitting hairs. The government has since legalized the position of the Bell Telephone Company but prior to the legalizing of its position it must have been theft because the company did not fall within the four corners of the legislation enacted by this government. The government has retroactively cleared the company of theft. The government has pulled up the protective blanket of legislation around the company. I do not feel I should withdraw that term merely because the position of the Bell Telephone Company has been legalized or because the company happens to have a large proportion of Canadian shareholders. This still does not give the company permission to steal from the rest of the population of Canada. I care not what the nationality of the thief is. If he is a thief I think he should be called that.

Mr. Allmand: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member realize that only a few weeks ago in the transport committee several members of his party agreed to the Bell Telephone bill which permitted the company to do many of the things of which he is accusing it? He is accusing the government of being the only party to this approval, but does he realize that two members of his party approved the Bell Telephone bill?

Mr. Peters: If this is true and you can prove it, we will not pass that bill today.

Mr. Germa: There was never any intention on the part of members of this party to recognize the excess profits of the Bell Telephone Company. In fact, if you would like to know the party position on the Bell Telephone Company we feel that as a public monopoly it should be grabbed by the government. If there is anyone in the house who does not believe the Bell Telephone Company eventually will have to be nationalized, then he is living in a dream world. This company should have been grabbed long ago. It has exploited the population of Ontario and Quebec, with the permission of the government, to a degree unseen anywhere.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is utter nonsense.

Mr. Germa: If you want some more I will give it to you. These are all the free enterprisers talking.

Mr. Orlikow: There is no Bell Telephone in other provinces.

Mr. Germa: The telephone companies are government controlled in other provinces but in Ontario and Quebec we have to suffer the Bell Telephone Company which does as it pleases with government protection.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is just total rot.

Mr. Germa: I did not intend to get into a long discourse on the Bell Telephone Company, but I hope I have made my position and the position of this party clear.

Mr. Byrne: That is nothing new.

Mr. Germa: Mr. Chairman, I was talking about—

Mr. Nowlan: We like to hear about this. Keep on talking. Let us know your true position.

Mr. Germa: If you people believe in the free enterprise system, come out and say so. We would like to hear it. What about Ontario Hydro? You are getting the cheapest electricity possible and it is a government owned agency.

Mr. Nowlan: What else does the hon. member want to nationalize besides the Bell Telephone Company? I should like to hear your true position.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I could ask the hon. member to proceed with his remarks and to confine those remarks to the clause before the committee.

Mr. Germa: I shall try to abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman. These interjections must not go unanswered, of course, because they would leave wrong impressions on the record. I believe they have to be corrected. I will continue in the vein you have suggested, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sherman: I would rather be stuck with our members than yours.

Mr. Germa: There are a few unruly people here, Mr. Chairman, who do not like to hear the truth. They know that their system is falling apart at the seams and when someone makes constructive proposals all they can do is jeer.

The hon. member for Edmonton West took some pains to defend the corporate cause. He said corporations were going to be hurt a little by this legislation because they will have to make their final tax payments by the end of the third month after the close of the year instead of the fifth month. This is certainly a hardship. There will be no increase in the amount of money they will have to pay. This is just an updating of the due date.

Let us compare the situation of a corporation with that of the average individual. The average individual who is paid by the week pays his taxes within seven days of receiving his money, so the corporation still has a 60-day advantage over the individual taxpayer. I cannot see that it is any hardship on the corporation merely because it has to meet its taxes by the end of the third month instead of the fifth. When the act provided for a five month lag in the payment of taxes this amounted to the government lending corporations money without interest.

The hon. member for Edmonton West said that these corporations will now have to go out and borrow operating capital. Certainly they will have to go out and borrow operating capital. Why should they use money which rightly belongs to the citizens of Canada? Why should they be able to use this money interest free? If you believe in the free enterprise system then you have to pay what money is worth. Why should these people be unwilling to pay for the capital they use, just as you and I do when we have to go out and borrow capital to meet our operating needs?

There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Chairman, and this fact has been documented within the past four years, that the tax system as we know it today is very unjust. I do not believe that merely patching it up with this type of legislation is going to alter the situation. I believe that the morale of the Canadian people is being lowered by the perpetuation of a system which does not bring equity to the people of Canada in their support of the country through the present tax system.

When Mr. Carter was given the job of studying the tax system he had broad terms of reference. I believe he did a very good job. I was sorry that the minister, in his statement on November 30, more or less rejected the Carter commission report on the flimsy ground that the report was written in 1964 and therefore would not necessarily apply to 1969. I am sure that the figures are going to change between 1964 and 1969 but I feel that principles go on forever. If a principle was right in 1964 I feel quite sure it will be right in 1969. If the principles are wrong now, and I believe they are, they are going to be wrong 100 years from now. I believe we have to take steps to correct these inequities so the people of Canada will have faith in this government which, as you are well aware, Mr. Chairman, is losing the support of the people at an alarming rate. I suggest that the government look at some of the objections that have been made to the Carter recommendations. Almost 100 per cent of the objections comes from the elite of the corporate and monopolistic enterprises, the 2 per cent that controls the Canadian economy. If suggested legislation of that kind is bad for them then it must be good for us. After all, I do not think any legislation could be bad for everybody.

In their submission to the government these companies condemn any kind of social spending. They care not for the humanities.

All they want is to maximize their own profits. Industries that are foreign owned show very little concern for the citizens of Canada. Most of the objections that have been made to the revamping of our tax structure should be rejected by the government on the ground that they are put forward by selfish interests that have no concern for Canada or for the citizens within its boundaries.

The person who bears the brunt of taxation change in this country is the wage earner. His sole source of income is easy to tap because his earnings are known to the minister. So far as the minister is concerned, such a person is naked. He cannot take advantage of any legislation to offset part of his income. He is the man whom the minister is more prone to attack; yet he is least able to pay a 5 per cent surcharge in addition to the tax he normally pays.

The Chairman: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but perhaps I should remind him that the remarks he is now making should be made on clause 5 rather than on clause 4.

Mr. Germa: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of this debate the minister said he would like to see a general debate on both clause 4 and clause 5. If that was not the correct interpretation of the minister's request I should like further guidance.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to confirm that I indicated to the house that I thought a general discussion could take place most appropriately on clauses 4 and 5. As long as these comments are not repeated on clause 5 I do not think any objection should be taken.

The Chairman: May I say that I was in the chair when this agreement was reached. If the committee wishes to have a general debate on a clause other than clause 1 or clause 2, as the case may be, then the Chair would have no objection. However, the Chair does take the view that any comments made by members, even though they may be of a general nature, should relate to clause 4 when clause 4 is before the committee and to clause 5 when clause 5 is being discussed. Perhaps I should invite the hon. member to continue.

Mr. Germa: Thank you for your indulgence, Mr. Chairman. Clause 4 deals with payment of income tax by corporations and the date of commencement of such payments, so I will confine my remarks to this clause as closely as I can. To my mind corporations have enjoyed a privileged position in our tax structure. They have been treated more like human beings than have human beings themselves. Concessions granted to corporations throughout the years have allowed them to become powerful to the extent that they dominate us economically and apparently politically. More and more legislation seems to be designed to favour those who are in this privileged class and they become more and more privileged.

Let us consider the anomalies within our income tax structure in the development of our natural resources by these corporations. I do not think the minister or any Canadian should be inhibited in his demands for a fair share of the wealth extracted from our natural resources by these corporations. As Canadian citizens we own these resources. There is no doubt in my mind that we should have priority over those who perhaps have their names on a paper. Everything in Canada belongs to the citizens of Canada. Every tree in this country, Mr. Chairman, belongs to you and me collectively. So does every ore body in Canada. It is incumbent upon the minister to extract from corporations that are depleting these resources a fair share of their profit.

It has been shown many times in the past that after mining companies have depleted bodies of ore the taxpayers' money has to be spent on alleviating hardship in the area concerned. Mining companies enjoy a three-year tax holiday. As I said a week or so ago, this law is 40 years old and it is time it was updated to meet the present-day techniques of exploration used by mining companies.

Another anomaly in the tax law of the country is the depletion allowance. The law provides that as the value of an ore body is reduced a mining company can reduce its capital cost by a like amount. However, take the case of the miner who has bought a house in the community. As the value of the ore body is depleted so is the value of this man's home; yet he is not allowed a depletion allowance on his home. This is one area where the minister should have introduced legislation to assist people who take the risk of working and living in a mining community. There is no equity in a system that allows a mining company to depreciate its capital cost at the rate the ore body reduces in value but does not allow home owners to depreciate their properties at the same rate.

Income Tax Act

There are several myths in Canada propagated by the press and various business associations to the effect that too much security will kill initiative. This is interpreted by the minister to mean that we must levy a tax on those we have chosen to be the work horses in the community. If we do not keep them a little hungry and lean they will lose their initiative. If the government were to follow this argument to its logical conclusion it would mean that the government would have to levy a 100 per cent tax on inheritances, since one-fifth of our business leaders inherited their positions. And who are we to say that they have lost their initiative? They still have initiative. Therefore this measure involves a contradiction in principles.

Mr. Cantelon: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he consider that a farm which may have taken a farmer a lifetime of work to acquire should be appropriated by the government through 100 per cent inheritance taxes?

Mr. Germa: To be clear, Mr. Chairman, I did not propose a 100 per cent inheritance tax. I merely pointed out to the committee that if the argument about incentive were taken to its logical conclusion we would have to introduce a 100 per cent inheritance tax in this country because otherwise we would ruin the incentive of so many people. Surely there is an inconsistency in, on the one hand, keeping the workingman's incentive high by keeping him hungry and, on the other hand, allowing others to live off inheritances. Those who live off inheritances do not have the same inducements as those who have no inheritances. I think the hon. member misinterpreted my intention, as is evident from his question.

The Carter commission made various recommendations to the government and, without being solicited, the mining companies presented some abusive briefs which I believe pushed the government into a corner. The government quickly promised the mining companies that not until 1974 would it consider removing the three-year exemption that the mining companies now enjoy. That shows the degree to which this government is controlled by the corporate elite of this country, that 2 per cent of our population who have the rest of us by the throat.

Had the minister really wanted to do something for Canadians, and I think the Minister of Finance is the man who can best control the country and best correct many inequities, he would have raised the income tax exemption for our people. The basic exemption of $1,000 for a single person has been in our tax law for goodness knows how many years; it has been there ever since I have been paying taxes. It is completely out of line with present-day needs. I think the exemption for a single man should immediately be raised to $2,000 and for a married man to $4,000, if it is to come anywhere near meeting today's needs.

The Chairman: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Would the hon. member permit a question? He spoke about the mines and what would happen to the miners if they were forced to close down. We know that because the price of gold has not been increased for many years, gold mines all over the country have been closing down. Does the hon. member believe that the minister should advocate an increase in the price of gold in order to keep the gold mines open and thus keep the miners from losing their houses?

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member would require unanimous consent of the committee to continue.

An hon. Member: No.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this bill.

It is not always pleasant, not always satisfactory, to Canadians to see their income tax being raised. But I feel that, in the present system, the way we raise taxes is patently unjust. The little man is still going to pay for everything. There is no end to the little man's taxes. He is taxed on all sorts of things: on production and on consumer buying. He is also taxed by the federal and provincial governments, the municipalities and the school boards, to such an extent that he is left with nothing to live on.

Our citizens find it very hard to make a living, especially the poor and those belonging to the middle class. The middle class is now in the process of disappearing, because it is overtaxed. Here in this house, we are unable to administer. We cannot do anything without raising taxes and the rates of interest to financiers.

When the money lords raise their rates, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) does not blame them. One would think that he is pleased when the financiers come and raise their rates on capital, stocks and debentures. Everywhere, this is accepted with open arms.

Bonds are renewed, thus increasing capitalization from $500 to $700 million or any other amount, each time raising the interest rate. Now, those gentlemen have done nothing to receive much more than their capital, while the individual has to work and reduce his own capital. The person who lends his capital sees his income and his capital increase as a result of various increases, including interest rates.

I have here, Mr. Chairman, a table which could make the minister and the hon. members understand.

It is a comparative table for the years 1944 to 1967.

The gross national product amounted to some $11,400 million in 1944, while it reached $62 billion in 1967.

Consumption and expenditures amounted to only $10,120 million in 1944, compared to $40 billion in 1967.

During the same period, capitalization and profits increased from $1,280 million to $22 billion. This means, therefore, that capitalization and profits have increased 17-fold from 1944 to 1967, while the gross national product increased five-fold and consumption and expenditures, four-fold.

Mr. Chairman, I could also mention the number of cheques in circulation; it went from $60 million in 1944 to $600 million in 1967, that is 10 times more.

Increased capitalization reached, in 1967, $18 billion; yet it seems we do not know where to find the necessary income to finance the various departments and the government administration. Indeed, we do not even touch the capitalization. I am not against capitalization but if, under the present system, capitalization has every right, if it can increase its capital, its rate of interest, I feel the people should have a say. It is imperative to do something for the people, to have a look at their income.

For instance, the banks' assets totalled $6 billion in 1944 and $28 billion in 1967, that is five times more. The stock of 800 large companies was worth $7 billion in 1944 and $102 billion in 1967, that is 14 times more. A Royal Bank share sold for $10 in 1944 and $80 in 1967, that is 8 times more; its dividends amounted to 6 per cent or 60c. in 1944 and to $3 or 30 per cent in 1967, that is five times more.

Everything has increased like that in high finance, in the financial system; while personal income keeps decreasing, that of high finance increases continuously and brings in a hundred times more.

In spite of salary increases, strikes, steps to enable the middle class to live a little better, the opposite always happens; taxes go up and so does the cost of living. There is no end to it; there is no stopping it. High finance always gets the most out of it, because the purchasing power of the citizens is diminished through taxes levied by the federal and the provincial governments, in short by all levels of government.

I feel that the minister should open his eyes and take such a situation into account to avoid an increase in taxes. In the present system, he should take them in capitalization, in the profits on capitalization which are hardly taxed.

It is always the little man that is taxed. Our present system is a system of taxes. If it is impossible to change it, at least let us tax the rich and stop taxing those who have nothing. Let us stop taxing those who do not have enough to live on but let us tax those who have too much. By so doing, everybody will be taxed and everything will turn in circles, everything will come to nothing through too much taxes, the little man will disappear, and when the rich is taxed, he will disappear also. In fact, we will all disappear from earth. With our present system, we will all disappear in the near future. Our system is a system of taxes, increases here and there; in short, it is a system which turns in circles and which, finally, settles nothing, balances nothing. It is a complete, anti-social and anti-human imbalance, and the problem cannot be solved.

We offered you a solution on many occasions; we suggested financing public assets at administration costs, but that has always been refused. We proposed many amendments designed to finance public goods at administration costs, which would have accounted for a savings of $3 billion the first year, but they refused to do that, they closed their eyes and ears, saying: That is a Social Credit theory; we will not consider that.

On the other hand, where does the minister's theory lead us? Where are we going with this complete imbalance, with this outdated system, with this "anti-arithmetic" system? We cannot go forward, we cannot go very far with such a system, and the minister knows that. If he wishes to do something, for want of solutions better than his own, all he has to do is to come and see us, as we could suggest him some. We have often let him know our solutions, but he refuses to consider them, he refuses to apply them. If the present system continues, we shall soon see revolutions, massacres and general discontent, strikes will multiply and we will not be able to settle any problem.

Our economic system is fundamentally wrong and must be reformed. There is no question of destroying everything, breaking everything down, criticizing everything; it is simply a matter of improving what is wrong. We must keep what is good, but what is wrong must be reformed. That is what we have to say and that is what the minister should do, I think, because it seems to me it would be more logical to do that rather than always increase taxes, in short, rather than always taking away the purchasing power of individuals, who do not have enough already, for the people are suffering from a lack of purchasing power. Proof of this assertion is that we have a $18 billion capitalization in 1967, and we may have one of $22 billion in 1968, according to statistics. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is abnormal to capitalize all the time and to deprive citizens of their purchasing power.

[English]

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Temporary surtax.

Mr. Monteith: Before this clause carries I should like to say one or two words about it. The clause has to do with a surcharge on income tax. It imposes an increase in the personal income tax of people who can ill afford any reduction in their incomes.

I understand the minister will be in my constituency on February 24. Of course I would not know the purpose of his visit, but I think he may find some difficulty while he is there in explaining to the people of Perth why he had to impose this increase in the income tax. It is obvious that it goes back some time. On December 6 I pointed out to the house that this government in its first full year in office had increased expenditures by 4.6 per cent, that in the following year, 1965, there was an increase of 5 per cent, in 1966 an increase of 7.1 per cent, in 1967 an increase of 13.7 per cent and in 1968 an increase of something like 12 per cent.

In connection with the estimates presented to the house the other day an attempt was made to tell the people of Canada that the increase in expenditures amounted to only 3.6 per cent. However, a correct comparison made with the estimates presented a year ago would show the real increase to be approximately 8 per cent. The President of the Treasury Board did say that because of the use of computers more accurate estimates could be made and there would be no need to ask the house to approve supplementary estimates. I suggest, however, that a cushion of some kind has been included in the figures presented to us and that the computers have not in fact done a true job in estimating likely expenditure.

As hon. members know, the cost of living has been increasing at the rate of some 4.5 per cent a year during the last two years. This simply indicates that the average person in Canada is no longer able to meet these vast government commitments which make it impossible for him to lead the kind of life he is entitled to lead here in Canada.

The inflationary trend which is developing under this government has been admitted by the minister. Indeed, he has attempted to do something about it by means of this tax increase. It has certainly failed to make any impact up to now, according to the most recent figures issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. This tax was announced on November 30 and came into effect on January 1, 1968. People have been paying this increase since that date but so far it has done nothing to assist in halting inflation.

The minister has to do something about this matter. Either he or a possible successor will have to bring down another budget almost immediately. The other day when answering a question the minister said that no budget would be introduced before the Liberal convention is held. I can understand that, because we are not going to be around here too much longer. Nevertheless, we should have a budget introduced prior to that convention. A budget will have to be introduced immediately after the Liberal convention to let the people of Canada know where we are going and how we are going to meet the increased estimates which were tabled at the beginning of this week.

The government has been extravagant in the extreme. This has been shown in the way it has disregarded expenditures. It has been shown in the way it has disregarded the people of Canada by increasing taxes. The government has introduced two budgets a year and with each one has taken another bite out of the cherry. I am sure the people of Canada now realize exactly what the government has been doing and how it has been hoodwinking them by claiming they have had prosperous times. Now the whole thing has come home to roost. It is plainly on the government's doorstep. We certainly deplore the imposition of this additional 5 per cent surtax on the income tax of the average Canadian.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a few words on clause 3 of Bill No. C-193 now under study. It is wished to insert the following heading in that clause:

Temporary surcharge

I wonder why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) is not more straight-forward with the Canadian people. Has the minister ever imposed a temporary surcharge or any temporary tax that he has subsequently abolished? It is clear that, in view of the present financial situation in Canada, the minister will not be able to abolish that surcharge he is asking us to approve.

He knows very well that the average Canadian citizen is unable to pay more taxes than at present. He is already paying too much. Even though it is provided that a person must now be paying $100 in income tax to be subject to that surcharge, anyone paying $100 in income tax cannot afford to pay that additional surcharge, and the minister knows it.

Instead of taking the money he needs where it is to be found, the minister always asks the little man to make a sacrifice and to give more. Clause 5 indicates clearly the attitude of the minister and of the present government.

The people are never promised increased taxes or new surcharges during election campaigns. Ho no. In 1963, or in 1965, both sides of the house, Liberals and Conservatives, accused each other of raising taxes too high. They said "Give us the power, and we will reduce taxes". But each time we changed government, taxes were increased instead of diminished.

We now face again the very same problem. The Canadian worker is asked to pay higher taxes and is told, for example, that it is only a temporary measure. In a few days, we will be studying supplementary estimates which will ask the Canadian taxpayers for more money still, and we will go and get in their pockets what we refuse to get through the financial means at our disposal. Efforts are being made to help the whole world to make interest-free loans to various countries, but here, in Canada, those who are building the country are asked to pay surtaxes.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is time for the Minister of Finance to be a minister of finance and not the "Chief Tax Collector" in Canada. It is time for him to examine our physical possibilities, the present number of unemployed who could increase our national productivity, and the financial possibilities offered by the Bank of Canada, an all-powerful institution in the field of finance.

I see that the hon. member for Bonaventure—

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Caouette: Certainly, Mr. Chairman. The parliamentary secretary can ask me ten questions if he wants to.

Mr. Béchard: Who, according to the hon. member for Lapointe, would be an ideal minister of finance?

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member for Lapointe?

Mr. Béchard: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I meant the hon. member for Villeneuve. How would the hon. member for Villeneuve see an ideal minister of finance?

Mr. Caouette: My ideal minister of finance, Mr. Chairman, would be somebody who would be a good enough accountant to balance our economy and to maintain a monetary system in keeping with the physical conditions of our country. This is the ideal minister of finance we should have in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. member a question? Do I fulfil the qualifications?

Mr. Caouette: I think the minister would be able to fulfil the qualifications if he were a good Social Crediter.

Mr. Lambert: He and the other members of the Liberal party even voted for Social Credit theory once.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: They have already voted for a Social Credit motion; that is a fact.

Mr. Chairman, the minister knows very well that the difficulties he is facing just now are entirely due to the monetary system, the financial system. The Canadian workers, the farmers or the voters of the electoral district of Bonaventure are not to blame, they have not failed to keep their word or take their responsibilities. The members all know that. What is wrong is that the Minister of Finance is at grips with the financial system. He is the one who is remiss in his duty.

At a time when we have about half a million unemployed in Canada—75,000 in the city of Montreal alone—people who beg leave to earn their own living, the government pays adults to take courses and to make them trained unemployed instead of untrained unemployed. We do not have jobs for them because the restrictions imposed by the government compel industry and even agriculture to slow down, and this at a time when every one must tighten one's belt because of a monetary system which is outdated and inadequate.

The solution the minister has to offer us, a temporary surcharge, is a poultice on a wooden leg. I understand the unemployed will not have to pay that temporary surcharge. I understand too that those who now are paying $100 in income tax will have to pay $105. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is not a solution. This will not solve the economic problems of Canada, this will not help to restart our economy. Not in the least.

Mr. Chairman, we should deal frankly with the Canadian people and not try to fool them with a temporary surcharge, when we know very well that this surcharge, if ever it is abolished, will be replaced by higher taxes or a new tax, and the minister knows it very well.

Can anyone tell me what taxes have been abolished by the present government or by the Tories? They can pass the buck to each other all they like, but this is no solution.

The solution which we propose can be laughed at, of course. It has already been ridiculed in the past and it can still be. But the fact is, Mr. Chairman, we are still struggling with the same problem. To solve it, we are laying down restrictions on construction, not because of a shortage of materials, manpower, engineers, abilities, but due to a shortage of financial means.

If a world war were to break out tomorrow, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) who is now at his desk, would find the necessary billions to purchase guns and shells, to enlist the Canadian youth, to dress, feed and lodge them properly. There would not be any financial problem then. In peacetime the minister of finance is powerless to develop Canada, to build something in Canada. Only in wartime can our ministers of finance do something.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I feel the time has come to think of setting up in our country a financial system which would make possible the economic expansion of our country, the development of our natural resources, the building of roads, schools and hospitals when we need them, in short, a financial system adjusted to our physical possibilities. Then, no more temporary surcharges, as provided in clause 5 of Bill No. C-193, would be introduced.

Mr. Chairman, let us consider logical solutions instead of always listening to those who fleece the people. The individual's income tax is increased by 5 per cent. A few months ago, financiers were authorized to increase their interest rates by 2 and 2½ per cent, and now it is 3 per cent. Such an increase in interest rates was designed to boost the Canadian economy and enable the little man to borrow.

Can the little man borrow more today than six months or a year ago. When we borrow these days, we get deeper into debt and pay interest. The Quebec government is now borrowing millions of dollars at an interest rate of 7½ per cent. Provincial authorities should normally be able to borrow from the Bank of Canada, instead of going to New York on hands and knees in order to be able to build a road, a hospital or schools. But no, they go to New York.

If we borrow a million dollars at 7 per cent, for a 20-year period, the interest will amount to $1,400,000. If, at some point, we were required to reimburse the capital and the interest, I think we would not even be able to pay back the interest. That is where the present situation comes from. It is from this system that everybody suffers in Canada. It is this system that created misunderstanding and disunion in Canada.

Provinces complain to the federal government that they lack money. The federal government replies to them: we do not have any either. They are penniless in Ottawa, in Quebec, in Alberta, everywhere, in all the provinces. We are governed by a clan of penniless people. It is not surprising to see additional taxes and temporary surcharges.

Mr. Chairman, the problem is entirely financial. Instead of solving it, they are making the little man pay again. Let us exploit him even more, that is this government's answer.

We object to this tax increase, because we consider that the Canadian people, the worker, the miner in my area, and the farmer, pay enough taxes; indeed, they are now paying too many taxes.

Taxes are not what the people need at the present time. If we want to start up the Canadian economy, we must increase the purchasing power, through the distribution of a national dividend. Then, stores can sell the goods they have on their shelves, and manufacturers will see to producing more, to fill those shelves.

There would then be less unemployed in Canada. New industries would crop up, because consumers' needs would be met, at least to a great extent. That is the solution to the present problem. It is not by reducing the consumers' purchasing power that a new impetus will be given to the Canadian economy, but rather by increasing it.

We shall then succeed in striking an economic balance which will enable every Canadian to live decently in a country as rich as ours in natural resources.

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry? The hon. member for Winnipeg South—the hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to allow the hon. member for Winnipeg South to proceed if he so wishes. Otherwise I shall proceed.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to allow the hon. member for Broadview to proceed. I shall proceed later.

Mr. Gilbert: This, Mr. Chairman, indicates the degree of courtesy which prevails among members of this house. The first thing I should like to do is move an amendment to clause 5. The amendment reads as follows:

Delete subclause (b) of clause (1) of clause 104A of Income Tax Act.

While copies of the amendment are being distributed I might explain its purpose. It will be noted that in subsection (1)(b) of section 104A the amount set out is $600. This is the income tax ceiling limitation. The tables presented by the Minister of Finance indicate that the top range of income involved is $50,000. Any person earning over $50,000 would not be subject to additional tax in an amount greater than $600. We in the New Democratic party feel that this is unfair and unwarranted in respect of most Canadians. It will be noted also that the minister has imposed the 5 per cent surcharge on people whose tax is above $100. We do not feel it is fair that there should be a limitation of $600 on the surtax and that persons with incomes over $50,000 should have the advantage of this limitation.

It may be that the Minister of Finance feels he is in an awkward spot in having to attempt to get Bill C-193 passed at this time prior to the leadership convention on April 5. He may want the Minister of Justice to bring forward his bill containing amendments to the Criminal Code so that that minister would be placed in an equally embarrassing position. He may want the Secretary of State for External Affairs to call for a full debate on the Viet Nam question so that all leadership candidates will be in the same position in respect of criticism. It is my belief that any leadership aspirant who holds the portfolio of finance has literally the kiss of death on him in respect of his chances of success at any leadership convention. There is no doubt that he still has his friends on Bay street who will give him full financial support during his leadership campaign, but he does not have the support of the rank and file members of his own party. He certainly has no support from the average Canadian for the amendments he is proposing in this bill.

It might be said that the minister is the author of his own misfortune because he has made a gross miscalculation as indicated by his mini-budget of last year. He allowed taxes in the amount of $73 million to be repaid with the hope of curbing inflation and high interest rates. That mini-budget of last June was unsuccessful. We then had the minister coming back in November of last year with another mini-budget. There certainly is one thing about the Minister of Finance. He does not lack the ability to come forth with mini-budgets which prove to be something other than solutions to Canadian monetary problems. It could also be said that the minister is the author of his own misfortune because he has failed to direct the economy. He has placed reliance on so-called economic tools for fiscal and monetary policies. His sole aim has been to adjust the present-day market economics in the hope of achieving price stability and employment. He has also failed miserably in this regard.

It may also be said that he has failed to give any serious consideration to the implementation of the main recommendations of the Carter commission. He has tried to slough these off with the flimsy reason that the Carter commission report related to revenues in 1964 and has no application in 1969. He is also the author of his own misfortune because of the scare he attempted to create in the minds of many Canadians regarding the implementation of medicare. He pulled a $1 billion figure out of a hat and refused to give any indication as to how he arrived at that figure. He ignored the Minister of National Health and Welfare who said a few months previously that the total cost of medicare in Canada would be $680 million, that Canadians now pay $600 million by way of insurance premiums and other payments and the difference would be $80 million. He completely ignored that statement and will probably continue to ignore it even though, with the increased figures given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, there remains a difference of only $80 million in respect of a total medicare program for Canadians.

The Minister of Finance recognized in his budget speech on November 30 the two main problems affecting most Canadians today. I refer to inflation and high interest rates. The minister brought forward a traditional remedy by imposing a 5 per cent surtax on Canadian workers, with a base limit of $100 and a ceiling of $600. He has tried to explain this away by saying that out of 6,600,000 workers only 1,300,000 will be affected by the surtax. Surely this indicates how low is the income of many Canadians today. When I came to this house a couple of years ago I was surprised to find that the average annual per capita income in the maritime provinces ranged between $1,300 and $1,600. This lends support to the statement that the basic income of most Canadians is far below a reasonable level.

The minister is imposing a 10 per cent tax on liquor and tobacco and accelerating by two months the payment of income tax instalments by corporations. He tried to offset the latter action by saying that the refundable tax payments to corporations will be accelerated so they can get their 5 per cent repayments within a shorter period of time than under previous legislation. One wonders why Canadian corporations should be given 5 per cent interest on 5 per cent refundable taxes.

The minister has attempted to fight inflation by bringing forward the proposals I have outlined. When one compares inflation now with the inflation which existed last November one realizes that every measure taken by the government has been ineffective. The cost of living has continued to climb and is continuing to affect most Canadians. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the following questions will be raised at the time of adjournment: the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather), Health and Welfare—measures to combat problems caused by alcoholism; the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Pascoe), Agriculture grants or loans for fairs and exhibitions.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, private bills, public bills. As there are no notices of motions for papers on today's order paper the house will proceed to the consideration of private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 8, consideration in committee of Bill C-104, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada—Mr. Honey—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Thursday, February 8, old clause No. 7, renumbered new clause 6, with an amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South, was under consideration. The committee will now consider clause 7 of the original bill, renumbered clause 6.

On clause 7 (renumbered clause 6)—Power to operate communication system.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Honey: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last week we were considering, as Your Honour has indicated, old clause 7, new clause 6. At that time there was before the committee an amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South. I have had conversations with the hon. member for York South and other hon. members on the other side of the chamber who have considered with me a form of amendment to this clause that would be acceptable to all hon. members.

I make this suggestion now because I think we may be in something of a procedural difficulty in this connection. I suggest that, provided hon. members agree, the amendment proposed last week by the hon. member for York South might be withdrawn, if we are able to do so—I notice that the hon. member for York South is not in his seat—so that we could then proceed with the consideration of the amendment which I understand is agreeable to all hon. members.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I expect the hon. member for York South to be in the chamber very shortly. He has been attending one of the standing committees all afternoon. I have just come from that committee. If I understand the suggestion correctly it is that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South last week be withdrawn in order that it may be replaced by a new and somewhat modified proposal in respect of the whole clause. On that understanding I think the hon. member for York South would agree to this procedure being followed.

Mr. Honey: That is my understanding, Mr. Chairman. When the hon. member for York South is here and is able to withdraw the amendment I will then be prepared to place before the committee an amendment which I understand is agreeable to all hon. members of the house.

The Chairman: Order, please. It is, of course, irregular for an amendment moved by an hon. member to be withdrawn without the consent of the member moving the amendment. If, however, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is prepared to state that it is the wish of the hon. member for York South to withdraw his amendment and the committee is prepared by unanimous consent to accept such a statement, the Chair would have no objection.

Mr. Barnett: Perhaps we could reach an understanding in this respect, Mr. Chairman. As was suggested, we could leave the matter in abeyance temporarily and let the hon. member for York South formally withdraw his amendment. I thought I should indicate to the committee that my understanding is that he would be quite agreeable to doing that. The hon. member should be here very shortly. Perhaps in the meantime we could consider another aspect of the matter. While we are waiting for the hon. member to take his seat perhaps we could have an informal discussion on the proposed replacement amendment. Then we could clear up the procedural aspect of the matter.

Mr. Honey: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Comox-Alberni for his suggestion. I was going to suggest that I place on the record the amendment which I understand has the concurrence of all hon. members in order that the committee might consider it. We might do that on the understanding that when the hon. member for York South is able to take his place in the house and withdraws his amendment we will then have this amendment before the committee for consideration. If I have the concurrence of the committee to do so, I would move, subject to the withdrawal of the amendment of the hon. member for York South:

That all of old clause 7, new clause 6, from and including subclause (4) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(4) For the protection of the subscribers of the company and of the public, any equipment, apparatus, line, circuit or device not provided by the company shall only be attached to, connected or interconnected with, or used in connection with the facilities of the company in conformity with such reasonable requirements as may be prescribed by the company.

(5) The Canadian Transport Commission may determine, as questions of fact, whether or not any requirements prescribed by the company under subsection (4) are reasonable and may disallow any such requirements as it considers unreasonable or contrary to the public interest and may require the company to substitute requirements satisfactory to the Canadian Transport Commission in lieu thereof or prescribe other requirements in lieu of any requirements so disallowed.

(6) Any person who is affected by any requirements prescribed by the company under subsection (4) of this section may apply to the Canadian Transport Commission to determine the reasonableness of such requirement having regard to the public interest and the effect such attachment, connection or interconnection is likely to have on the cost and value of the service to the subscribers.

The decision of the commission is subject to review and appeal pursuant to the Railway Act."

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I was attending a parliamentary committee meeting and happened to be questioning the witness. We did not finish until just after six o'clock. I apologize for being late and perhaps causing some inconvenience to the committee. As I understand it, the sponsor of the bill has indicated the amendment that he is now ready to move. In view of this, with the permission of the committee I shall withdraw the amendment that is on the table and which I moved a week ago.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the committee to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Lewis) withdrawn.

The Chairman: Would the hon. member for Durham request one of his colleagues to move this amendment.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lincoln:

That all of old clause 7, new clause 6, from and including subclause (4) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(4) For the protection of the subscribers of the company and of the public, any equipment, apparatus, line, circuit or device not provided by the company shall only be attached to, connected or interconnected with, or used in connection with the facilities of the company in conformity with such reasonable requirements as may be prescribed by the company.

(5) The Canadian Transport Commission may determine, as questions of fact, whether or not any requirements prescribed by the company under subsection (4) are reasonable and may disallow any such requirements as it considers unreasonable or contrary to the public interest and may require the company to substitute requirements satisfactory to the Canadian Transport Commission in lieu thereof or prescribe other requirements in lieu of any requirements so disallowed.

(6) Any person who is affected by any requirements prescribed by the company under subsection (4) of this section may apply to the Canadian Transport Commission to determine the reasonableness of such requirement having regard to the public interest and the effect such attachment, connection or interconnection is likely to have on the cost and value of the service to the subscribers.

The decision of the commission is subject to review and appeal pursuant to the Railway Act."

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this amendment relates to the circumstances I mentioned the last time the bill was under discussion. I realize that to provide efficient service in the field of telephones you have to have a public or private monopoly. The last time the bill was discussed I referred to the fact the British Columbia Telephone Company had failed to recognize the need for service in isolated, rural communities. We had to provide our own service and our own equipment, some of which did not coincide with what the B.C. Telephone Company was using at that time. However, conditions have changed in British Columbia, although we still have the B.C. Telephone Company which is privately owned. In recent years this company has accepted its responsibility to the isolated rural communities to a much greater extent than in the past. In fact, now you only have to communicate with the president of the company and indicate the services that are required. The situation is very much improved over what it was years ago.

I should like the sponsor of the bill to explain the practice in Ontario with regard to the provision of service to isolated, rural communities. Years ago in British Columbia the company was willing to skim the cream off the telephone business and leave the skim milk to the rural telephone companies. My first question of the sponsor is, can he explain to us if these isolated rural communities are receiving service at this time and what the practice of the Bell Telephone Company is in this regard?

I have another matter I should like to mention. We intended to support this bill in the interests of the patrons in Ontario and the employees, or what one might call the general interest. However, this afternoon I was shocked to the very foundations of my being when I heard that this telephone company was guilty of thievery at public expense. We were going to support this bill. When you see the officers of the company you find they look very reasonable, well clad and well fed. They do not look like people who would commit criminal acts. When I heard these charges this afternoon I was really shocked. This is the first time I have heard such a charge made against a company of this type for a good many years, that these responsible looking gentlemen, responsible to this parliament, are guilty of thievery, roguery and things of that sort.

An hon. Member: Stealing.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, that is right, stealing. This charge really shook some of us. We really cannot support this bill unless the sponsor is willing to give an explanation. We understand that the bill legalizes the roguery and stealing. This is what we were told. How can we honestly support a measure in this house which legalizes criminal acts? We were told these acts had been performed by this company over many years. There may be some misunderstanding, Mr. Chairman. The facts may not be quite as stated. I do hope the sponsor will give a very clear explanation of how this company was allowed to continue stealing over a long period of years. We are now asked to approve a bill that legalizes these criminal acts. I shall look forward to the sponsor's answer.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am not so concerned about that aspect because I think there is a difference of opinion about the terminology. I think the facts are fairly clear. Over the years the company did exceed the permissive level of earnings set by the Canadian Transport Commission. Finally the company was able to persuade the commission, after a number of hearings, to raise the permissive level of earnings. Of course, during the period in which the Bell Telephone Company obtained profits to which they were not entitled there was no penalty imposed on the company so far as I know for having done this. In fact, the company seemed to be very successful in persuading the commission to raise the rate from something like 6.5 per cent to 7.2 per cent.

What shocked me, and I think it must be clarified, was the statement by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce in which he indicated that our members on the committee had agreed with this decision of the Canadian Transport Commission. If that is so, then I draw the conclusion that we were double-crossed, sold down the river, and all the other things connected with that type of arrangement. I have read the reports and I do not gain that impression from them. However, the hon. member is much closer to the telephone company since its headquarters are in his riding, and something may have happened in committee about which I do not know.

The implication is that the transport commission made the change and that our members on the committee were aware of it. Either the hon. member is badly informed or our members are going to have to answer to us after we have a further discussion of this bill. However, the matter may be clarified. Since the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce knew we would be discussing this matter I had hoped he would take the opportunity to clarify the situation. However, I would certainly appreciate some guidance from the sponsor of the bill in this regard.

Mr. Honey: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Kootenay West and the hon. member for Timiskaming for their remarks on this clause. I shall try to be brief so that I do not take up too much of the time of the committee. I recognize the authority of the hon. member for Kootenay West because he is president, I think, of the Nakusp Telephone Company. It is a company with which I am familiar, I might add, because it serves an area that I visit quite often. It is probably a little more difficult to get in touch with the presidents of some other telephone companies if a line breaks down than it is to get in touch with the president of the Nakusp Telephone Company. He is always readily available to his subscribers. Perhaps it is because they are also his constituents that he wants to give them good service.

I think I am correct in saying that by and large the smaller telephone companies in eastern Canada, so far as their relationships with Bell and the services Bell supplies to them are concerned, at least try to give the sort of service that I am sure is given by the Nakusp Telephone Company and the other small companies in Western Canada to which my hon. friend from Kootenay West referred. They probably try to provide the sort of service that we would reasonably expect from utility companies that are doing their best to serve the public interest.

With regard to the second matter to which the hon. member for Kootenay West referred, I was unfortunately not in the house this afternoon when the subject of the Bell Telephone Company was brought up. Therefore I do not want to attempt to assess the remarks of hon. members on either side of the house in this regard. I think those remarks were made in the context of the debate that was taking place at that time and I do not think they should be transposed into this debate. Whether that be or whether it not be, not having heard the remarks I do not think I should comment upon them. I believe that by and large hon. members make statements with the conviction of belief and we either accept them or we do not. Certainly I would not want to pass judgment on that. With respect to the comments of the hon. member for Timiskaming I can only repeat that I did not hear the exchange that took place this afternoon and therefore my hon. friend will excuse me from trying to interpret the remarks that were made.

One thing I should like to say is how much I have appreciated the work of the members of the standing committee on this bill, as well as the work of the committee of the whole. There may be other aspects of the bill that other hon. members wish to explore, so for this reason I will leave some time available to them.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I do not draw the likeness between the hon. member for Kootenay West and the officials of the Bell Telephone Company that the hon. member for Durham drew. I have met officers of the Bell Telephone Company on a number of occasions and generally they were clothed in that dark blue, silky type of raiment that is so common to the modern boardrooms of today. As anyone can see from a casual look at the hon. member for Kootenay West, he has that down to earth, tweedy, pipe-smoking style that indicates there is a vast difference between his approach to world communications and that of the officials of the Bell Telephone Company. Perhaps it is because of his background, because he classifies himself as a gentleman farmer or something of that sort—

Mr. Herridge: Peasant farmer.

Mr. Howard: I am sorry, peasant farmer—and because of his closeness to the soil and the people that he felt as strongly as he did about the remarks of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce on the income tax bill which the hon. member injected into the debate in the form of a question. It really is a rather serious matter.

The hon. member for Durham indicated that he was appreciative, and knowing him I am sure he is, of the work that all members of the committee put into the development of this bill. However, there is still a large degree of concern that should be expressed about the implications behind the question put by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. Perhaps the hon. member's question was directed to the party to which I belong and was designed to be embarrassing. Indeed, that was obvious.

However, the fact is that in the broader sense the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has cast a reflection upon the activities of the members of that particular committee, having indicated that their work on the committee was not of that responsible nature required of members of parliament when they serve on committees. Certainly it has put my own party in a particularly awkward light to have it implied that we, in working on that committee, endorsed a particular attitude taken by the Bell Telephone Company so far as its earnings picture is concerned. The hon. member for Hamilton-West shakes his head, I take it in disagreement with what I am saying.

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Chairman, if I may assist the hon. gentlemen, I shook my head not because of disagreement. As chairman of the standing committee perhaps I can assist the hon. member. Since the hon. member for Durham was not present when the comments of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce were made, perhaps I could indicate that I completely disagreed with the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and I conveyed that disagreement to him. There was no discussion in the committee at any time of the subject of profit, which was brought up by the hon. member for Sudbury. Members of all parties conducted themselves in the committee, as they always do, in the fairest possible way. They brought forward amendments to the bill that were constructive. I just wanted to make that point for the assistance of the committee.

Mr. Howard: That is an extremely kind and generous statement.

Mr. Lewis: Truthful, too.

Mr. Howard: I did not doubt that it would be otherwise, coming as it did from the hon. member from Hamilton. I say that even though I have had some doubt as to his intentions as chairman of the committee in regard to other bills. However, I will deal with that on another occasion.

The fact that the hon. gentleman has voluntarily made this statement indicates that he too came to a conclusion in regard to the implication behind the remarks of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, knowing that the matter had been mentioned to him by one of his colleagues and knowing that the chairman of the committee had read into his remarks the same sort of implication that we read into them, it seems to me all the more important that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce should have made himself available during this hour. He knew the Bell Telephone bill would be coming forward and that some offence had been taken at what he said. Undoubtedly he could be absent because of a previous commitment—

Mr. Macaluso: Could I help the hon. member again?

Mr. Howard: Yes, I would be glad if you would.

• (6:30 p.m.)

Mr. Macaluso: I advised the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce of my views before he left. If anyone is to be chastised for his leaving the house; if anyone is to be blamed for his not being here, that person ought to be myself.

Mr. Howard: Then the hon. member should take all that is coming to him, because I think the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce ought to be here. Obviously, he acted on the advice of the hon. member for Hamilton—

Mr. Macaluso: Hamilton West.

Mr. Howard: I am afraid I get lost in Hamilton. As I say, the hon. member obviously acted on the advice given to him by the hon. member for Hamilton West. Usually that advice is sound; in this case it was not sound, with respect. We still do not know what the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce meant by his question.

Mr. Macaluso: In heat of debate, Mr. Chairman, we all get a little hot sometimes. No offence was intended.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce is noted to be an extremely kind and gentle member. He, perhaps more than the Leader of the Opposition, is one of those who keep their cool, as the saying goes. I doubt whether his statement, which was introduced by way of a question, was introduced as some "in the heat of the moment" statement. The hon. member for Sudbury, who was speaking immediately before the question, also approaches these matters in a gentle and low key manner. There was nothing provocative or evocative about his remarks.

An hon. Member: You are having a tough time.

Mr. Howard: As the hon. member for Timiskaming said, we wonder whether we should proceed with a particular bill when a doubt with respect to it exists. I know that we cannot ask the Chairman to suspend matters until someone can find the hon. member, so that he might clear the air. The only course available to us is to examine this bill in some detail, until the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce returns to the chamber and in a formal and public way indicates what he meant by his statement.

I am not trying to be difficult, Mr. Chairman but this is a matter of some consequence and difficulty to the members of this party. I submit that the question of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce was directed with the specific aim of causing embarrassment. I do not deny him that right, since it is part of the game of politics in the house. Nevertheless the implication, foreseen or unforeseen, that are inherent in his question are too large for us to, sort of, escape them by laughing the matter off as some comment that was made in the heat of debate.

Mr. Herridge: Would the sponsor of the bill kindly explain what is intended by the amendment, beginning with clause 4.

Mr. Honey: Clause 4 provides for the protection of subscribers of the company and has to do with what might be called foreign attachments to Bell Telephone equipment. The Bell Telephone Company may require, with respect to these attachments, that they be used in conformity with the regulations of the Bell Telephone Company, as they may be prescribed by the company.

Clause 5 provides that the Canadian Transport Commission may determine as a question of fact whether the requests of the company are reasonable, considering all circumstances. Clause 6 of the amendment provides for a right of appeal for any person who is affected by the regulations prescribed by the company under clause 4 of this amendment. It provides for the right of appeal to the Canadian Transport Commission in order that the reasonableness of the requirements may be determined, and so on. The last sentence provides that the decision of the commission is subject to review and appeal, pursuant to the Railway Act. The rights of review and appeal are fully set out in that act.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the sponsor for his explanation. What sort of attachments are meant in the clause? What sort of foreign attachments are indicated?

Mr. Honey: I thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for his interest in the matter, because this is of some concern to individuals who like to attach extra, different or extraneous pieces of equipment to the service that is available to them from the Bell Telephone Company. A good example would be an antique type of telephone, which I am sure my hon. friend has seen. Another example is a piece of equipment that is known, I think, as the Ericaphone. It is named after a Swedish engineer, and is of reasonably good design. Any such pieces of equipment might loosely be called foreign or extrinsic to the Bell equipment, and it is with respect to such pieces of equipment that the right of appeal is provided. An application may be made to the Canadian Transport Commission to determine whether Bell's request to the subscriber is reasonable, and to determine whether that request is in the interests of that subscriber or of subscribers generally. That sort of thing is meant by the clause with respect to foreign attachments.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Macaluso) agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 8 (renumbered clause 7)—Power to invest.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to do anything in particular about this measure, but I wish to point out that this is the clause that has caused us all a great deal of trouble. Certainly, in its dealings with the Canadian Transport Commission the Bell Telephone Company, as a result of similar wording in the legislation, has had a great deal of difficulty. In brief, this clause will limit the power of the company to invest in other companies. That limitation has brought problems to the Bell Telephone Company and to its subsidiary, Northern Electric.

I think that most people look with sympathy at Bell's problem as it relates to its subsidiary, Northern Electric. Everyone, I think, will agree that Northern Electric has done exceptional work in research and development in order to maintain Bell in a position that is envied by other companies across the North American continent. The Canadian Bell company has been able to do things that the United States Bell company has not been able to do, and here I am talking about the various technical systems which are being used in this country. The development of Northern Electric has been helped by the Bell Telephone Company. Northern Electric helps Bell, and Bell helps Northern Electric. They are complementary organizations, so to speak.

One of the problems that faces the government of Canada is the close relationship between Northern Electric and Bell. Since in this country we have private ownership of a public utility and since we have decided that the Canadian Transport Commission shall judge how much the private owner of the public utility shall charge for its services—in short, since there is to be a measure of public control over the public utility—might it not be legitimate to ask Bell to divest itself of Northern Electric? Could not Northern Electric shareholders be given the right to buy all the shares in their company? Surely, it will be only a matter of bookkeeping to establish a separate identity for the company. If the company were independent of Bell there could be no accusation that funds are transferred between the companies or that there is any juggling of any rules or rights.

On the other hand I believe that much could be gained by Bell if it were to divest itself of a third part, namely the manufacturing end of Northern, which is a large producer of cable and wire and of other facilities on the fringe of telephone operations which are not necessarily part of a telephone complex. It seems to me that this large manufacturing section could be sold to employees, or distributed to shareholders on some basis to which the company would agree. If a stockholder had five shares of Bell it could be decided that he would be given so many shares of Bell, so many shares of Northern, and so many shares in the industrial section of Northern, thus making three separate companies.

While clause 8 may be good for the company it may also add to the problem which hon. members who have read reports of the hearings before the transport commission are aware of, namely that decisions by the board are complicated by the number of companies concerned.

I understand that the committee did not go into this matter at any great length, but I raise the problem because I believe it inevitable that some consideration will have to be given to it. As everyone knows, Bell and Northern are a totally integrated operation. Although a financial statement is put out separately for Northern Electric this can be arranged in such a way, and I am not suggesting there is anything dishonest about it, that a greater proportion of expenditures could be made from one pocket than from another, simply because the pockets belong to the same set of shareholders.

In my opinion Bell should seriously consider various methods by which it could divest itself of this type of control, so that its public utility section can be separated from manufacturing and research. If clause 8 as now worded comes into effect Bell's problem will be complicated by any other research it does, or by the acquisition of any other company whose interests do not lie in the telephone field.

If Bell were to buy R.C.A. Victor in order to acquire that company's research facilities, it could end up with a radio and television manufacturing section, and the charge could be made that some of its television production revenue was subsidizing wire which Bell itself uses, R.C.A. Victor then being a totally owned subsidiary of Bell. I do not make an issue of this. I am merely giving advice to the Bell Telephone Company, and saying it will be in trouble with parliament in the future if it does not do something to divest itself of Northern Electric and of any other companies of that type in which it may be interested.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, there was an amendment agreed upon in the standing committee that is not before this committee. We certainly will not agree to clause 8, renumbered 7, going through without the amendment agreed upon by the standing committee.

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York South is correct. There is an amendment to clause 8, as presently in the bill. I move, seconded by the hon. member —but Mr. Chairman, I think that procedurally this does not have to be moved. It is before the committee as amended now.

The Chairman: The original clause 8 of Bill C-104, as examined by the standing committee on transport and communications, was amended by that committee and is now presented to the committee of the whole in an amended form. It is, of course, competent for this committee to decide whether to accept that amendment or not, but it is the clause as amended which is now before this committee.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We are talking about the amendments which are in Votes and Proceedings of February 7. These were the amendments that were duly made in the committee.

The Chairman: Did the hon. member ask where the amendments were?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): No. I just asked if the amendment now, and the previous amendments, are the ones that were shown in Votes and Proceedings of February 7, as being the amendments that came out of the committee.

The Chairman: Yes. The amendment to which the Chair referred, when it referred to clause 8 in the original bill as being amended, is the amendment which is referred to in Votes and Proceedings of Wednesday, February 7.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8, renumbered clause 7, as amended, carry?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Chairman, I would like to rise on a question of privilege because I understand that remarks I made this afternoon were brought into this debate, and I would like to explain to the committee. This afternoon when the hon. member for Sudbury was speaking in debate he made some strong remarks about the Bell Telephone Company. It was my understanding at the time that he accused the government of trying to push a bill through parliament in a way that would prompt the accusation that it was trying to foist something on the Canadian public. I rose in the house and asked him if he realized that when the parliamentary committee on transport and communications had passed this bill at its final sitting, the bill received the consent of all members of the committee, including two members of his party.

• (6:50 p.m.)

I sat down. He answered the question in some way, and then I left. I asked him whether he knew that the bill as it came out of the committee had obtained the consent of all the members of his party—I was referring to the bill as a whole. I do not know what was discussed here this afternoon, but that was what I meant when I spoke in that debate.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (renumbered clause 8) agreed to.

On clause 10 (renumbered clause 9)—Director indemnified in suits respecting execution of office

Mr. Herridge: Can the sponsor give us any information as to the salaries received by the directors of the Bell Telephone Company for their services?

Mr. Honey: I do not have that information available now, but I would undertake, if it is proper to do so, to get that information for the hon. member and convey it to him.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (renumbered clause 10), clause 12, (renumbered clause 11) and clause 13 (renumbered clause 12) agreed to.

On clause 14—Prospectus

The Chairman: Shall clause 14 in the original bill be deleted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 15 (renumbered clause 13) and Clause 16 (renumbered clause 14) agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Herridge: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Barnett: I wonder whether it might not be convenient, now, to say it was seven o'clock and suspend our sitting.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Honey: Before Your Honour calls it seven o'clock and before we leave Bill C-104 could I make a suggestion to hon. members —that if there is any question of this bill losing its place on the list of private bills for third reading I would ask the house to agree to give it priority when it comes before us next week.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I could clear up the hon. member's difficulty by referring him to standing orders 20 and 21. If third reading had been considered in part today, the bill would then go to the bottom of the list. Since third reading is just beginning, the bill retains its place on the order paper.

Mr. Honey: Thank you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the house would agree to resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-193, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Batten in the chair.

At seven o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at six o'clock Bill No. C-193 to amend the Income Tax Act was under consideration. During the dinner hour the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview was studied and found to be unacceptable for the following reasons.

If it were adopted the clause would be unintelligible. In this regard I should like to draw the attention of the house to citation 203(1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition. I should also like to draw the attention of hon. members to citation 269 of Beauchesne's fourth edition which reads as follows:

> No augmentation of a tax or duty asked by the Crown can be proposed to the committee, nor tax imposed, save upon the motion of a Minister of the Crown; nor would an amendment to extend the imposition of a tax to persons enjoying an exemption therefrom be now permitted.

I would also point out to the committee that the proposed amendment exceeds the limits agreed to in the resolution of December 14, 1967.

Shall clause 5 carry?

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I will accept your ruling and reluctantly proceed with the remarks I wish to make. What strikes me particularly is the limitation of $600. It does not seem fair to the Canadian taxpayers that people earning under $50,000 should be subject to the surtax and that people earning over $50,000 should be relieved of any further payment over $600. I would have thought that perhaps the Minister of Finance would have been inclined to accept this argument, but he probably finds himself in the unfortunate position of representing the establishment, and finding that it is very difficult to appease them.

Prior to the dinner adjournment I had set forth the proposition that the Minister of Finance found himself in the very unhappy situation of approaching the leadership convention, and having to present to the house Bill No. C-193 which contains the amendments to the Income Tax Act. I pointed out that he really is the author of his own misfortune in that he made a gross miscalculation in his mini-budget of June because he failed to direct the economy and placed too much reliance on the so-called economic tools of fiscal and monetary policy.

I also pointed out that the minister had not given any consideration to the recommendations contained in the Carter commission report. I mentioned in particular that he had been highly critical of the medicare scheme which will become law on July 1. Therefore he now finds himself in the position of being much down the line with regard to gaining the leadership of his party. In his November budget he pointed out that the main culprits in causing a serious economic problem were the cost of living, inflation and the high interest rates. I said that he set forth the usual remedies that the Minister of Finance is so capable of, in striking hard at the workingman and treading easily on the corporations of this country.

With regard to the problem of inflation, it is obvious to most Canadians that whatever steps he has taken have not been very successful in coping with the high cost of living. Even though he recognizes the difference between the traditional inflation of too many dollars chasing too few goods, and the type of inflation that we are suffering from now, which is the cost-push inflation, he seems to pay little heed to the necessity of bringing forth any economic measure that would combat the problem. The striking thing is that the type of cost-push inflation from which we are suffering today strikes hardest at the persons in our society who are most unprotected such as our old age pensioners, the veterans, and persons on fixed income who must pay high prices for food, clothing, maintenance, rent and so on. Yet in the mini-budget he brought forward he did nothing for these people.

The second problem is the matter of the high interest rates. I believe I would be safe in saying that we have the highest interest rates in the history of Canada. From reading yesterday's paper it would appear that the chartered banks of Canada have now raised their prime rates to 7 per cent. We all know that the prevailing rate on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation mortgages under the National Housing Act is 8⅝ per cent. On conventional mortgages you have an interest rate of 9 or 9½ per cent, and it is expected by most Canadians that this interest rate will increase to 10 per cent. That represents the approach taken by this minister regarding high interest rates. When we had the amendments to the Bank Act before us the minister came up with a formula for applying a rate of 1¾ per cent for a quarterly average on short term Canadian bonds. We studied this in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs. With the help of members of several parties we changed this drastically. We in the New Democratic party now find that prime interest rates are up to 7 per cent.

Not long ago I remember somebody suggesting that an individual who purchased a house for $18,000 with a C.M.H.C. mortgage would eventually pay $42,500 on the basis of an interest rate of 8½ per cent. With an interest rate of 8⅝ per cent this cost will increase. If things continue as they are, an individual will soon be paying $50,000 for a $18,000 home. This is what the chartered banks, finance and insurance companies want to prevail in Canada.

The government has failed to take into account the high interest rates which add to the cost of homes. The greatest contribution it has made to the solution of this problem is the initiation of a housing conference, and the resolution now before us to increase the ratio of mortgage loans. At the time the budget was presented, certain members of my party indicated that the basic reasoning behind the minister's budget could be related to an increased unemployment situation as a result of a slowing down in the economy. We now find that prediction to be accurate. Unemployment figures have reached almost 500,000, with a tremendous disparity in the maritime provinces, Quebec and on the west coast. Several hon. members predicted that this situation was bound to occur, following the minister's budget.

The Minister of Finance has ignored some very basic principles in respect of inflation and high interest rates. He has ignored the plight of those people who are affected by these rates, and the increased cost of living. Yesterday's newspapers noted that the contribution of the Liberal women of Canada took the form of a recommendation in favour of the rejection of a guaranteed annual income and a negative income tax. That was their best contribution. They also suggested that the tone of parliament should be lifted without giving consideration to the economic problems facing the country today.

The Minister of Finance also ignored other tax resources he could tap to meet certain problems with which we are confronted. He has completely ignored the Carter commission report and the application of its recommendation regarding a capital gains tax. When we talk about capital gains we are not talking about the individual who sells a home for something more than he paid for it, because we know the profit he makes will be absorbed by the price he pays to replace that home. We are talking about those individuals who make vast sums of money on the stock exchange or through major transactions. We think, like Mr. Carter, that these people should be taxed heavily.

The Minister of Finance has also ignored the depletion allowances. As a member who has received a tremendous number of briefs from the resource industries of the country, I am fully aware of the fact that 5 per cent of the population controls this country financially, and that the same 5 per cent are not taxed proportionately as high as the other 95 per cent. This 5 per cent screams the loudest about the Carter commission recommendations, whereas the other 95 per cent would welcome them because they feel a reduction in their taxes would result.

The Minister of Finance has also ignored the life insurance companies so far as taxes are concerned, and has given them preferred treatment, to which they are not entitled. If these companies had been taxed in the ordinary way we would be in a position to more than pay for the medicare scheme going into effect on July 1. Having listened to several speeches of members of the Conservative party, I find it very difficult to distinguish between the philosophy, as presented by their spokesmen, and the philosophy of the Minister of Finance. I listened today to the hon. member for Edmonton West speak on behalf of corporations and the time limitations for payment of corporation taxes. It seems to me that he, along with other members of his party and the Minister of Finance, has totally ignored the economic planning this country needs to solve its economic problems.

For some time we have advocated the establishment of an investment advisory board to direct the economy of the country, and our investments. The minister has totally ignored his opportunity to direct the investment of the savings of Canadians. The most flagrant example we have had in this regard is the minister's failure to act in a positive way in conjunction with the Canada Development Corporation, which would provide an opportunity for Canadians to invest in Canada. The minister has totally ignored the recommendation of this party to establish a review board which would indicate to the Canadian public the government's interest in offsetting high prices. Such a review board could study the situation, just as trade unions do during the complex process of negotiating increases in wages.

• (8:20 p.m.)

It is very obvious to us why we are in a state of economic plight today. This is the result of a lack of imagination on the part of the Minister of Finance in coping with today's economic problems. He wants to represent the establishment and he fails to use the new and exciting economic tools which are necessary to combat today's problems. It may be necessary to bring forth new measures to combat these problems. We in the New Democratic party feel that the Minister of Finance is not able to bring forth the proper solutions to these problems.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with clause 5 which provides for a temporary tax.

That beats everything, Mr. Chairman. If I did not know the minister, I would say that he is naive. What a wonderful expression: temporary tax. Temporary but for how many years?

Temporary, Mr. Chairman, that may mean for the next century of confederation.

Mr. Boulanger: It is temporary in order to increase it later.

Mr. Grégoire: The hon. member for Mercier says that it is temporary in order to increase it later.

This is the heading, Mr. Chairman: "Temporary surtax". Some will believe that it will be for a short time only, but I have never seen a tax already levied that was abolished later. No, once it is levied, it is there to stay.

That is so typical of the present government. They call it temporary to mitigate the blow. Taxes are increased by 5 per cent and that will bring in more revenue to the government, of course.

When I look at the government's estimates for the year ending on March 31, 1969, which the minister tabled not too long ago, I notice items which strike me, among others the interests to be paid by the government on the public debt.

Last year, the interest amounted to $1,273 million.

An hon. Member: That is only temporary.

Mr. Grégoire: And this year, it amounts to $1,406 million, that is an increase of $133 million during one year. The largest increase in government expenses for next year is the interest on the public debt.

I now come to another item, the following one, that is family allowances. It is quite a considerable increase, Mr. Chairman, since the estimates will rise from $614 to $615 million, that is $1 million next year for all the Canadian children compared with a $133 million increase for a few capitalists.

Well, it is precisely to foot that increased interest on the public debt that the government is now compelled to levy a 5 per cent surtax on personal income. If taxes are increased, it is because money is needed, and if more money is needed, it is precisely because the interest on the debt has gone up. I suggest that the yield of the surcharge will be used to try and balance the budget in order to pay the higher interest on the public debt.

When I was elected to this house in 1962, the first thing I did, when I was first given a copy of the blue book, was to look up how much Canada was paying in interest on the public debt. At that time, the interest stood at $780 million. Six years later, it has reached $1,406 million. While the rate of family allowances has not even increased by 8 per cent, the interest on the public debt has almost doubled in the last six years.

We have come to the point where the interest on the public debt is the second highest expenditure of the federal government, amounting to $1,406 million. The two largest expenditures of the federal government are: first, the amount appropriated to national defence, that is $1,800 million; second, the interest on the public debt, in the amount of $1,406 million, which makes a grand total of $3,200 million.

Mr. Chairman, when I look at those astronomical figures representing the amounts spent on national defence and interests on the public debt, I cannot help telling myself that were Quebec independent, it would save a lot of money on such expenditures since it pays yearly $1 billion in taxes for those two items only. The budget of national defence and the interest on the public debt amount to $3,200 million and the share of Quebec in this expenditure, which is about 30 per cent, amounts to $1 billion a year. Should Quebec withdraw from confederation, it would not contribute any more to these expenditures for national defence and it would leave Ottawa to straighten out its war debt.

That means that Quebec would be, overnight, richer by a billion dollars which, at the present time, is collected in income tax and other taxes and spent absolutely uselessly.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose this temporary tax increase because the budget proves this increase in taxes will be used to pay financiers.

The Canadian people will pay 5 per cent more income tax. And why? Because the interest which the federal government will have to pay next year will be increased by $133 million. This increase in income tax will be used to pay the increase in the interest rates. Had it not been for higher rates of interest, the hon. minister would not have been forced to raise the income tax, and he would have $133 million less to pay in interest on the public debt; but as the interest has gone up, he has had to find the amount of $133 million, and that is why income tax has been raised by 5 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that instead of always digging into the pockets of the low-wage earner for taxes, the hon. minister should revise his system in order to let the little man, the worker, the low-wage earner, keep the money that would enable him to buy Canadian products and benefit a little bit from the wealth of the land.

But the minister prefers to sacrifice the people of Canada to a few financiers who are the only ones to get rich with the new budget and new taxes; these taxes are a tribute to high finance, which has succeeded in obtaining from the minister increases in the interest rates.

The minister would like to govern the country. Since he is the minister of the Department of Finance, he is perhaps the one most responsible for the increases in the cost of living, the inflation we are having now through the raise in interest rates and the continuous increases in taxes. Now, he would like to govern the country. If the Liberal party puts the leadership of the country into the hands of the minister, I say that the Liberal party will be placing the country in a state of depression and crisis, and I hope the Liberal party will save us from such a catastrophe.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore oppose this raise in taxes, because I realize that it will only be used to pay the higher interest rates demanded by financiers.

• (8:30 p.m.)

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Mr. Saltsman: I have a very straightforward request to make of the minister tonight, and I hope he will accede to it. I should like to ask him why he does not listen to his speech writer. He seems to have an excellent speech writer, and I am referring in particular to the speech given to the luncheon meeting of the Canadian Club at the Royal York Hotel, Toronto, on January 8. There are some excellent statements in that speech, and I should like to quote some of them:

> What can be done? I agree entirely with those who deplore the deliberate creation of unemployment as a means of checking inflation.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, this is what seems to be happening. The budget proposals we have before us seem to be designed to create unemployment. If they were not designed to create unemployment, they seem to be having that effect at any rate. Our rate of unemployment has increased substantially over the past few years, and this is happening at a time when the United States economy is experiencing the lowest level of unemployment within the last five or ten years.

It seems difficult to understand why we should inherit inflation from the United States and yet not inherit the full employment situation as well. In the speech to which I have referred, the minister, or his speech writer, went on to say:

> It unquestionably involves new techniques and new attitudes on the part of those who wield market power, both labour and management. The traditional instruments of fiscal and monetary policy must be employed with courage and skill, but they are no longer sufficient, in my view, to ensure that desirable combination of prosperity and stability which we all seek.

Those are admirable words. I wish the minister had taken some action to back them up.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he know who did write those words, both what I uttered and what was written?

Mr. Saltsman: No, I am sorry, I do not know the name of the speech writer, but I would be pleased to learn his name if the minister would care to offer that information.

Mr. Sharp: It was the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Saltsman: In that case, I congratulate the Minister of Finance and simply say to him: Why don't you listen to what you are saying? This was a very good speech, but I think the minister should pay some attention to his words and back them up with some action. This excellent speech writer, whom I admire, then had this to day:

> We must work out a Canadian solution.

I heartily agree with that; this is the very thing we must do. I think perhaps the minister should spend more time looking for a Canadian solution instead of going down to the United States and praying for events there to change. We do need a Canadian solution, and we need it desperately. Up until now we have not had measures proposed that will solve the economic problems of this country. Such measures as have been proposed have involved the old fashioned unproductive bromides. We need new measures. The minister talked about new measures, but we have not seen any of them.

We are faced with a need for increasing our social capital. Even the minister will agree that there is a need for medicare. There is a desperate shortage of housing in this country. We need revenues to correct the disparities between individuals and help raise the level of income. With 20 per cent of our population living in poverty we need to redress the difference between the rich and poor sections of this country. For that purpose we need revenues. However we see no real evidence that the minister understands the problem.

It seems to me a proper course of action for the minister would be to suggest a means of increasing productivity and wealth in this nation. If we did this, we could generate the revenues required for the kind of society to which we aspire in this country. If we look at our productivity, we realize it is 20 per cent to 30 per cent lower than it need be. Even if we did not close the gap of 20 per cent to 30 per cent, but if we simply increased productivity by 10 per cent we would increase our gross national product by $6 billion. If you calculate that 30 per cent of that increase goes in taxes to the various municipal, federal and provincial governments, there would be another $2 billion available to help the people of this country. This represents a far greater amount than the minister hopes to collect from this 5 per cent surtax.

The minister seems to be making the same mistakes as the previous government made.

Mr. Monteith: Oh no, worse.

Mr. Saltsman: I do not know whether they are any worse, but they are certainly not any better. I should like to quote from the report of the Economic Council of Canada which refers to the year 1960. Someone has said that was a bad year. You are right; it was a bad year. Unfortunately this year is not any better. It does not seem to make any difference in this country which one of the old parties forms the government, we wind up with the same results.

I am quoting from the report of the Economic Council of Canada:

> For the year 1960, the economy was capable of producing over 8 per cent more production and income than actually occurred. The increases in the major federal tax revenues stemming from an attainment of potential output, however, would have been considerably greater than the implied rise in output itself. It has been calculated that personal income tax yields at the given rates would have been 12 per cent, and the corporation income tax yields by more than one third. In the aggregate such calculations indicate that at potential output levels in 1960, federal tax yields at the rates then in effect would have been over 18 per cent higher than the actual collections in that year when the economy was operating substantially below capacity.

The present minister should have been aware of the kind of problem created when there is slack in the economy. I should like to put on the record a further quotation from David W. Slater, "Economic Policy and Economic Research in Canada since 1960":

> But the high unemployment and extremely disappointing productivity experience in this "five year stretch"—

The period referred to is between 1958 and 1962.

> —still stands out as one of the major failures of Canadian post-war economic performance. Canada's gross national product was at least 8 per cent below potentials during these years. The cumulative five year loss of output would sum to $15 billion, or more, in current prices.

This is a sizeable amount. One would have hoped the present Minister of Finance would have learned from experience when the nation is faced with high levels of unemployment. It is bad enough in the central provinces, but it is much worse in those provinces that seem to suffer most under circumstances of this type. I understand that unemployment levels in the maritimes are somewhere around 11 per cent. This is a catastrophic level for that area. Unfortunately the minister seems prepared only to raise taxes and diminish the gross national product. Then, he moralizes about the need to pay as we go.

Earlier today my colleague from Springfield referred to the banking policy of the government and indicated that he reluctantly supported the policy because of the persuasiveness of the Minister of Finance, who offered some excellent reasons for removing the ceiling on interest rates charged by banks. I recall his assuring the country that setting the level of interest rates was the direct responsibility of the Minister of Finance and that he accepted that responsibility.

I think that tonight he must answer for that responsibility. I remember voicing my concern at the time, Mr. Chairman. As reported at page 7320 of Hansard for July 7, 1966 I said:

> If the bank rate in this situation is freed from restriction or permitted to increase, I have no hesitation in saying that Canada will face the highest interest rates, the highest cost of money, in all history.

I also recall some rather unpleasant noises that came from the government benches at the imputation that such a thing would happen. Then later, as reported at page 7321, I said:

> To remove the interest ceiling without proper safeguards is to raise the cost of every single thing in this country. It is to put the cost of money in Canada at a height it has never achieved previously, and one that no one at this point can calculate.

I then went on to say that interest rates of 8 and 9 per cent on commercial lending would be possible through this type of approach, and there were hoots and shouts from government benches, incredulous that interest rates could reach 8 or 9 per cent in this country. That was not very long ago, Mr. Chairman. Now interest rates have not only reached that level, but exceeded it.

The minister has a lot to answer for. He poured oil on the troubled waters. As reported at page 7237 of Hansard, he said:

> I should like to re-emphasize the determination of the government that the fresh winds of competition shall permeate our system of banking and finance.

Here I should like to recall to the committee the great aplomb with which the minister on that occasion made this announcement to the nation. He continued:

> We are determined that the system shall operate in the interests of the greatest number of Canadian consumers and businessmen. We are determined, in particular, that the interests of the small borrower and the small businessmen shall be protected and furthered.

Perhaps the minister will tell us whether this has eventuated.

> We believe that the most effective way to achieve these ends is to encourage and to enforce competition. In this view, the government is supported by the royal commission on banking and finance and by the Economic Council of Canada. If there are many competing sources of loan funds and many institutions freely competing for the custom of the consumer, we are convinced that he cannot help but benefit.

I think that the policy of the minister has proven to be a failure. Perhaps no one should blame the Minister of Finance for this because many of us were persuaded at the time that this approach had a good possibility of succeeding. I do not think there was any conspiracy or any malice on the part of the minister when he made that speech. I think he believed at that time that the removal of the interest ceiling would be beneficial.

However, Mr. Chairman, since it has not, I think the minister will have seriously to consider making an admission that his policy has not worked, whatever the reason for it is. Unless he finds other measures to control the rapidly escalating cost of money in this country he will have to reimpose the ceiling on interest rates. I believe that he or one of his officials assured us that it was quite possible that this would be the case if the measure did not work out as anticipated.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the problem that is ailing the economy is not lack of money. Canada has one of the highest rates of saving in the world. I think almost 20 per cent of our gross national product goes into savings. It is not that we do not save enough but that we misuse the savings that are at our disposal. We simply spend them wastefully. I sometimes think there is no other country in the world so wasteful with capital as this country of ours. Perhaps we have acquired capital too easily and therefore have not had to conserve it or invest it as well as we should.

I should like to put on record the situation that exists in many of the industries in this country that are over capitalized. These industries have used far more capital than necessary. This is a bad state of affairs and cannot and should not be allowed to continue. The minister must give consideration to taking measures that ensure that the capital and savings at our disposal are used in better fashion than has been the case in the past.

I should like to quote from an article that appeared in Time magazine on February 2, 1968 which carried a statement by Robert Fowler, president of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, who warned the annual meeting of that association that "growth is fine but an epidemic of elephantiasis could be serious." The article continues:

> "It is more than clear that Canadians have made a creditable contribution to their own misfortunes," Fowler told the association. Fowler blamed excessive rivalry between companies eager to get the jump on each other, and between provinces only too happy to offer loans and tax inducements. As a result, he said, "there has been a misuse of public and private capital at a time when capital is scarce. There must be better ways to order our affairs."

I should also like to refer to part of an article written by Ron Grant that appeared in the Gazette on November 8, 1967:

> Expansion in the pulp and paper industry has created a situation where companies are reaching into every corner of the world market and sometimes coming up empty-handed. It's no longer a seller's market.
> New mills coming onstream in Canada, along with similar expansions in other countries, have resulted in excess capacity, increased depreciation, start-up problems—

One would think, Mr. Chairman, that with all this excess capacity and evidence of competition—and, after all, there should be competition if there is excess capacity—prices should come down. But no, prices are not coming down, and will probably have to go up as manufacturers seek higher mark-ups on their volume of production.

I should like to quote from the Financial Post for July 17, 1967, which had this to say:

In spite of current softness in the pulp market, there is little indication of a general break in price among B.C. companies. "Most of us think it would be a mistake to reduce prices. It would not get us anywhere," one company's spokesman said.

This comment appeared in the Globe and Mail for August 4, 1967:

Despite excess capacity in newsprint, prices have been firm. A $3-a-ton price increase went into effect July 1. Analysts say it is unlikely that the industry will retreat from the new price level, even if mill operating rates decline further.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, this excess capacity has benefited no one. It has not benefited the pulp companies, it has not benefited the public and it certainly has not benefited the nation.

• (8:50 p.m.)

One of the industries that most glaringly displays a misuse of capital is the oil industry in this country. In Alberta production is rationed out among the various fields, pools and wells. For some years total production was about 45 per cent of capacity but now it has dropped to 37 per cent. At the current rate of production, according to Charles S. Lee, president of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, the impact of the Rainbow Lakes discovery could be to reduce this to 25 per cent of capacity. The investment in this industry has been calculated to be somewhere between $7 and $14 billion. We do not know the exact amount because only those in the oil industry can supply the answer. Nevertheless we must again ask how much of this money has been totally wasted? How much of this money, and it is mostly United States capital, have we imported for no good purpose? How much of this money have we brought in simply to pay interest and dividends on unproductive capital? How much better would it have been had the oil industry used the capital it needed, instead of spending the money in this way?

In a recent report by Walter S. Levy, prepared for the Independent Oil Association of Canada, we find this comment:

Nonetheless, there is little doubt but that present relatively low utilization of capacity imposes a heavy cost burden on the Canadian producing industry, which could seriously impinge on exploration incentives if it persists. For Alberta, in particular, production is very much below capacity; the ratio of production to capacity improved from 41 per cent in 1960 to around 47 per cent in 1963 and 1964, but has since declined to under 44 per cent in 1965.

What are we doing with all this oil exploration? Canada now has almost twice the proven reserves of the United States.

Mr. Bower: Would the hon. member permit a question? What is the source of his last statement about proven reserves?

Mr. Saltsman: I shall again read from the report. Referring to Canada it says:

Canada's 1965 ratio of reserves to production of 23 years compares with 12 years in the United States; and Canada's 1965 ratio of production to productive capacity of 55 per cent compares with 73 per cent in the United States.

In other words, our reserves to production are 23 years, as compared with 12 years in the United States.

Mr. Bower: Would the hon. member kindly talk about this matter in ratios, and not talk about absolute proven reserves?

Mr. Saltsman: The point I am trying to make is that we have explored and created more reserves than we could possibly use in the foreseeable future. There is all kinds of oil lying around that is not being tapped. The tar sands are hardly being touched for fear of what full production from them might do to upset the entire marketing arrangement in Canada.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Pepin: If the ratio were to be 12 years, what would the hon. member say?

Mr. Saltsman: I would not argue with the minister.

Mr. Pepin: Think that one over.

Mr. Saltsman: If the minister assures me that that is the figure, I shall not quarrel with him.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member indicated that in the United States the life index figure stood at 12 years and he tried to compare that with the 23 year figure in Canada. That was all right. At the same time he intimated that we are not using our reserves well. I would ask him what he would say if the figure were to be only 12 years.

Mr. Saltsman: I should say that 23 years is almost twice as much as 12 years.

Mr. Pepin: I suggest the hon. member would say that the period is too short, that we are short of reserves.

Mr. Saltsman: I am delighted to see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources entering this debate. Perhaps he could say something about potash, because it seems that we are doing with potash exactly what we have done with oil.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Saltsman: A news report of February 10 of this year says that we have overloaded potash production, just as we have oil production. In other words we have spent more money on this commodity than needed to be spent; we have brought about all kinds of improvements in production and we have no place to put the potash. It seems to me that the industry has jumped far ahead of its sales and markets, and that constitutes a gross misallocation of capital.

The Carter commission is concerned about this factor. Members of this party have spoken of the inequity of our present tax system. They have pointed out how Carter has called for equity in our system of tax allocation. But he made another point also. He said that our present tax system bonuses many industries in this country that do not need bonusing. Not only do they not need to be bonused, but they are bonused for the wrong kinds of production. Our system is not neutral; it distorts the capital markets of this country and other countries and puts money into production efforts that should not be bonused. The report says that we should return to a more neutral tax system. If we believe, truly, that capital has a way of going where it is required, then let us do something about that belief. Let us stop bonusing our primary resource industries. Carter was talking not only about our tax system of bonusing but of depletion allowances, forgiveness grants and tax holidays.

We started off admirably in this country with programs such as the designated areas program, which were to bring industries into certain areas. Nobody quarrels with the aims of such programs, except where they have had bad effects, as evidenced by the electrical industry. For example, recently R.C.A. announced that it would open a $25 million tube plant in a certain area. The government contributed $5 million to that. The news report in my hand says:

> The federal Government put up an estimated $5-million toward the cost of the plant under its area development program...
> Mr. Drury later saw dozens of automated cradles hanging empty because of a drop in the demand for color T.V.

This plant has a capacity to manufacture 300,000 tubes annually, yet demand in Canada only requires 190,000 tubes annually.

Another news report, dated May 9 of last year, says:

> A Sylvania official said:
> "We are quite concerned at the situation, since sales are about 50 per cent below expectations."

The official was talking about his own plant. He continues:

> "Our plant alone could supply the whole of Canada's market at the moment—and there are still the other two manufacturers."

That statement shows that one plant can supply the entire Canadian market. This being so, we must again ask, can we afford to use capital in the way we now use it? Our capital use is tantamount to capital misuse. In the long run we shall derive few benefits. Instead we shall see chaos, which will not be good for our industry, our consumers or our nation.

There is evidence of severe overcapacity in other industries, and particularly in the heavy electrical equipment industry. A news report of February 13 of this year says:

> A recent survey of manufacturers of power transformers and allied equipment showed that some companies have spare capacity as high as 40 per cent for later this year and early next year.

The same situation prevails in companies making furniture and in companies making pipes for pipe lines. It applies to refineries, and I could go on enumerating industries.

I should now like to say to the speech writer who wrote about the need for a new approach to Canada, that he should do something about that new approach. He must realize that we cannot go on as we are, using general fiscal and monetary policies alone to regulate our economy. Desirable though fiscal and monetary policies may be, new instruments of regulation must be found. Perhaps he is thinking of some new instruments; if so, he should tell us about them.

Personally, I think we should establish some form of capital priorities board. I do not know what form such board could take, neither am I unaware of the difficulties in creating such a board. But in the light of the evidence of the misuse we have made of capital, especially imported capital. I think we ought to establish such a board.

I think the minister should consider whether the tax benefits now conferred on holders of equities should not be given to the holders of government bonds instead. Let us reward those who are contributing their money to public purposes, rather than to private purposes alone. I think this should be considered, especially in the light of the difficulty in financing government expenditure. Public expenditures are valuable and helpful. In the foreseeable future there will be a great deal for public financing. If we are to depart from neutrality in our tax legislation, let us do so in favour of public expenditures rather than private expenditures.

I believe also, as many speakers from this group have said, that we must have a price review board to examine the changes which are taking place in this field and find out what kind of restraint could be exercised by such a board. Unless we can be given some hope that the government is entertaining ideas along these lines it is impossible for anyone to support the entire, useless and damaging measures contained in this bill.

Mr. Sherman: I should like to put on record one or two thoughts I have in connection with this clause, and to say a few things about the subject under debate at the present time. I bring to this no professional, fiscal or economic expertise and I bring to it no volume of statistics or documents. I bring merely a sincere and steadfast opposition to clause 5 and everything it stands for, and a sincere and steadfast feeling of sympathy with the thousands of people who write to hon. members of this chamber every week of the year asking for some relief from the effects of the critical cost-price-tax juggernaut under which they are crushed at the present time.

I ask the Minister of Finance where he thinks the ordinary people of Canada will find the money to pay this surtax which he proposes to levy. I ask where he thinks the elderly people will find the money to pay this tax. They are hard put now, to keep body and soul together, to keep off the blasts of winter and buy the drugs necessary for their health and well-being. I ask him about the retired people, those living on fixed incomes who have been seeking relief ever since this government was elected, and who have sought it in vain. They asked for relief and help, and what did they get? They found themselves poorer than ever. It was an exercise in total frustration.

The Leader of the Opposition made reference this week to the fact that a very large group of pensioners in this country, those living on federal superannuation payments, is still looking to the government for long overdue assistance. My hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition also drew attention to what he felt was the folly of such government programs as medicare, in the light of the needs which beset many categories of people in this country at the present time. The public service pensioners are only one of the classes who are in need. All pensioners come into this category because all of them need help in coping with the cost of living today.

Who will speak for the widows of this country with children to support, or for all who have limited incomes, limited means of livelihood? When the minister proposes to levy a surtax of this sort, I ask him: Who on the government side has given thought to these classes of people? What about the position of those in the lower income groups? What about the position in which great numbers of wage earners find themselves? Those who are fortunate enough to be in the upper income brackets may be able to pay this surtax without too great difficulty; but these are a minority.

I need not remind anyone of the dire economic stress which a great many Canadian families face today. I am sure the mail of every hon. member is filled with pleas for relief, for some form of escape, for some hope of an improvement in the context of the cost-tax-price squeeze felt by most Canadians, particularly by those in the lower and middle income groups, those on fixed incomes, those on pensions, those who are retired and those who are widows with young children to raise, educate and support.

Who on the government side speaks for these Canadians when the proposal is made to impose an additional financial burden upon them? I do not accept the suggestion which may be made from one corner of this chamber that the socialists speak for them, because members of the N.D.P. have demonstrated in some of their utterances today, if they have not done so before, that they approach this problem only in a doctrinaire manner; their hypothetical panacea for these ills is nothing but a series of superficial arguments based on hoary socialist principles which represent a creed outmoded and outworn, a creed which has never delivered anything by way of progress or constructive prosperity in the marketplace of Canada and which has never, fortunately, had an opportunity to do any damage of a major nature—and I trust it will never have a chance to do so in the future.

The N.D.P. makes a great pretence of speaking for Canadians in difficulty but they have never been called upon to deliver; they speak from a protective segment of the political scene. They have never had to deliver in the context of the practical difficulties attached to running a country or a government. The hon. member for Waterloo South said it did not seem to make much difference which of the two major parties were in power so far as the financial difficulties of the people was concerned. We all know he was referring to the Conservative party and the Liberal party. I suggest to him it would make a tremendous difference if his party were in office. And the Canadian people know it; and that is why his party has never been in office. I would ask the same hon. member, and those of his colleagues who have spoken in the same theoretical, hypothetical vein, what about the situation in Great Britain where finally the people seem to have come to their senses with respect to the panacea of socialism? I would ask him, what about the situation in Denmark where the people not only seem to have come to their senses but have articulated that fact by throwing out a socialist government?

The hon. member for Waterloo South presented a typical, classical socialist argument, but it contained the depth and degree of reasoning, and the strength and substantiality of most socialist arguments, that is to say, it was totally flimsy, and collapsed on examination. That was demonstrated by the fact that he was confused by questions directed to him by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

That party is not speaking for the people in this country who are in financial difficulty at the present time, and I suggest that the minister through the measure he has introduced is not speaking for them either. I ask who is speaking for people who are in these straits? This is the reason why, without any financial, fiscal or economic expertise I have risen to inject my observations into this debate.

The average wage earner in this country, if he has a family to support, has an extremely difficult time meeting his economic needs. You know that, sir, from your mail, as well as I know it from mine, and as well as anybody in this chamber knows it from his or her mail. With the pressure of taxes, living costs, food costs, all the costs that go to make up the spectrum of survival and existence, the average wage earner has all he can do to keep his head above water. He is asking for some relief, not for an additional burden or penalty such as that exemplified in the measure the minister has introduced.

[Mr. Sherman.]

The difficulties that I refer to do not even begin to take account of the situation with respect to the elderly, the pensioners and all those on fixed incomes. The average wage earner has a difficult enough time, but this does not begin to take account of the extreme hardships of those in the latter three categories I have mentioned, the elderly, the pensioners, and all those on fixed incomes.

This, sir, is a mean and cruel tax. It is hitting at a segment of society already pressed almost to the breaking point. The critical fiscal and financial situation in which these Canadians to whom I refer find themselves, indeed all Canadians find themselves, is not of their own making. They should not be held to account for it, and should not have to find the way to pave the government's avenue of escape out of it. The critical fiscal and financial situation in which the government finds itself is of its own making.

Some 18 months ago the government established a pattern of 30 per cent wage increases when it intervened in three labour disputes and ordered settlements to be made on that basis. That was only one example of fiscal and financial irresponsibility on the part of the government, but it was one of the most graphic. It has continually come back to haunt the government and to hurt Canadians time and time again in the 18 months since then. You cannot go about making outlandish settlements like that without paying the piper, paying the price somewhere down the line. Who is paying the price? It is the average Canadian wage earner, the pensioner, the Canadian in all those categories to which I have referred. He has to meet his grocery bill, his rent bill, his mortgage bill, pay for his children's education, pay for drugs in an effort to stay alive in this economic situation in which all factors seem to be arranged and arrayed against him.

When wage increases of that outrageous size are implemented, and with the rapidity and in the sequence in which they were implemented, they cannot help but have an effect on the marketplace which will militate against the economic well being of all Canadians. They cannot help but have an effect which takes the form of a situation that ignites a further spiral of costs and prices. These settlements could not help but touch off a new spiral in costs and prices, and could not help but reflect those in the marketplace.

The small wage earner is the man who has suffered. He has had to pay the penalty, and now he is being penalized again with this so-called temporary surtax on his income tax. What I would like to know from the Minister of Finance tonight is where and when these penalties stop? When does it become possible for a man to be rewarded for ambition and energy, rather than penalized? When does it become possible, realistic and practical for a man to be rewarded for being Canadian, for devoting his life's work and energies to the improvement of the state of society in this country, instead of being continually harassed from a financial point of view and subjected to penalties by a professional socialist undertaking?

I would like to move an amendment to clause 5 of the bill, but I understand, sir, it would be ruled out on technical grounds. Therefore I do not intend to move an amendment at this time, but I set myself firmly on record as being in steadfast opposition to this clause, and I am prepared to vote against it.

What we need in this country are tax incentives, not tax penalties as provided by this clause. Tax incentives are necessary as a means of increasing our productivity from coast to coast, both on an individual and on a collective level. Only if we increase our productivity will we find our way out of the morass into which we have stumbled under the present administration and its inept economic policies, policies which seem destined to lead us into fiscal disaster.

It pains me, on the strength of what I have said in the last few minutes and on the strength of my philosophical commitment as a Conservative, to support any measure put forward by the N.D.P., but I must say that I agree with the sentiments behind the amendment proposed earlier today by the hon. member for Broadview when he suggested the elimination of clause 5(1)(b), the requirement stipulating that $600 would be one of the brackets surrounding the new temporary surtax.

I support the sentiments behind that amendment, because I agree with the hon. member's argument that the prescription in the clause as now worded militates most severely against the small wage earner. Actually it militates against all wage earners, but I had admitted in my earlier statements this evening that there are some Canadians to whom the additional surtax would not be so great a financial burden. However, the people with whom I am most concerned are those in the lower and medium income brackets, to whom it would be a great financial burden.

That is why I, despite the philosophical conflict I have to overcome in my own mind, do support the sentiments behind the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview, because he has put his finger on the nub of the difficulty, the nub of the weakness, the flaw and the unfairness of this legislation, namely that it militates most severely against the man who is the backbone of this country, the small and medium sized wage earner, with a home and family that he has to support and children he has to feed and educate. I must say that I found the entire speech of the hon. member for Broadview a refreshing return to sanity, after the remarks made earlier in the afternoon by his colleague, the hon. member for Sudbury.

Like many other members in this chamber I felt that the remarks of the hon. member for Sudbury represented the most outrageous socialistic polemics I have had heard in this house since I came here. I am given to believe that many members, with much greater seniority in this chamber than I, would argue that it was the most outrageous dissertation of an unsupportable nature in the area of socialism and left wing thinking they have ever heard in the years they have been in the house. So, it was extremely gratifying to me to hear a voice of sanity come from that corner of the chamber in the person of the hon. member for Broadview. I reiterate my support for the sentiments contained in his amendment.

In a final reference to the contribution made from that corner of the chamber I should like to say that the remarks delivered by the hon. member for Sudbury represented to me a dredging up of some of the most hoary old chestnuts of socialism and left wing politics. His party could not get anyone to swallow those chestnuts in the past and will not have any success now. The hon. member for Sudbury no doubt is still convinced that it is practical to peddle them, but I doubt that he will have much success in his attempted sale of such outrageous ideas.

It is admitted that the nation is in a fiscal financial situation which requires financial and economic assistance where the federal purse is concerned. But there are many sources available from which to obtain the money, without going to the oppressive extreme of levying this kind of unsavoury penalty on the middle and low wage earners of Canada who form the majority of the people of this country. There are two areas of public spending to which members from this and other parties have referred in the debate today. I should like to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Perth and also that of the hon. member for Villeneuve. I would also cite the current example of Hon. Lionel Chevrier, who I understand is on a tour of the French speaking nations of Africa, investigating the extent to which we as a nation might participate in external aid to those countries.

I have no quarrel with any exercise in external aid to any countries in the world of any political or ethnic extraction or persuasion. However, I would simply like to ask the Minister of Finance and his colleagues why we expand our contributory function in areas of this type, when on the other hand in order to raise the necessary money to keep the economy turning we must levy additional penalties on the taxpayers of Canada. This has been my experience every year since I came here a little over two years ago. Surely economic charity should begin here at home in Canada. Before we attempt to expand ourselves too far into these other areas of finance and fiscal support we should think of financial fiscal support and relief for our wage earners and taxpayers in Canada. I see no justification for the kind of spending to which I have just referred, and the kind of public spending which is projected for example for the immediate future in the Ottawa area. I see no justification for this, when we turn around and levy additional taxes and penalties on the hard pressed wage earners, pensioners, widows, elderly and retired persons of this country.

In his remarks earlier today the hon. member for Villeneuve spoke with scorn about the terminology used in clause 5. He referred to the words "temporary surtax" and suggested that they were a sham. In the lifetime of this government there is nothing in the field of taxation that is temporary. This is about as temporary as the location of the national capital here in Ottawa. This is a permanent addition to our tax burden, and there should be no attempt to dissemble that fact before the hard pressed wage earners and taxpayers of this country who will have to supply the money this government has run out of.

I have cited some exercises in the general area of public expenditure which I feel are inadvisable in the light of the steps the government is taking here in the form of this income tax surtax. There are two or three other exercises which could be added. One is the expense of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, which I find in my part of the country, and in other parts of the country which I have visited, has outraged most people who are knowledgeable about the work of the commission and the amount of money it is costing the taxpayers of Canada. This no doubt is a very worth-while study, but is it as worth-while as the stabilization of the financial life of this country would be?

I suggest that expenditures of this type should be deferred or postponed, at this time when public money is so short that the taxpayers are being asked to make up the deficit, until the time arrives when public money is available as a result of the general productivity of the nation. I suggest that this surtax will have precisely the opposite effect on the economy of this country to that which the Minister of Finance hoped to achieve through its implementation. I suggest that it will force people to cut back on their purchases and participate less in the exercise of oiling the machinery of the economy of this country. They will tend to participate less in the general function of keeping the economy moving, alive, energetic, productive and progressive. I suggest further that the effect of this type of slow-down and cut-back will be so serious that I would not attempt to give a prognosis at this time. I believe the effect of that cut-back and slow-down would be serious enough to merit a separate full scale debate in this chamber.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest to the Minister of Finance that he think back to the thirties, when there was a cry from those who were on relief which could be heard across this land. I submit to the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the government that today across Canada from coast to coast it is not the cry of those who are on relief which can be heard, but the cry of those who seek relief from the oppression of the cost-price-tax squeeze in which they have been caught for the past four years.

Mr. Fawcett: Mr. Chairman, as a member who represents to a very large degree the type of citizen who it has been suggested has been carrying an unfair tax burden for many years, I feel it is incumbent upon me to take strong exception to this proposal of the Minister of Finance, which would perpetuate and add to the injustices that now prevail in our present tax laws. I should say in passing that I was very happy to hear that the hon. member for Winnipeg South recognizes the voice of sanity in our ranks. It is very evident from the speeches this afternoon that one will not hear a similar voice in the area to our right.

• (9:30 p.m.)

We have been told that there are two things we can be sure of on this earth; death and taxes.

An hon. Member: And Liberals.

Mr. Fawcett: I would be the first to agree that taxes are necessary. If we accept and expect services we must pay for them, and there is only one way to pay—through taxes. The government has a responsibility to see that taxes are levied on an equitable basis. It is in this respect that the government of today and previous governments have failed miserably. I do not pretend to be an expert on economics or monetary and fiscal policy and, like the hon. member for Winnipeg South, I intend to stay away from a discussion of that side of the coin. Some of my colleagues have done an admirable job in presenting our feelings in respect of economic aspects.

Surely no one will contradict me when I say that governments from the municipal level, up, are trying to high heaven to find additional finances. Municipalities in particular are having a very difficult time to finance their operations. I attended a meeting in a mining municipality in northern Ontario not long ago. The paramount concern of this group of people was that not enough revenue from the mining industry was being returned to the municipality to cover the cost of providing municipal services and educational needs. The only suggestion this group could make was that it should pressure the province into providing more financial assistance.

Who would pay for this increased assistance provided for northern municipalities by Queen's Park? This money must come from the same source, the taxpayers. The taxpayer, as has been suggested by the Carter commission and others, has been overburdened through taxes. We can solve nothing until we establish a new tax base. There is no point in transferring tax imposition from one place to another, because in the long run the taxes come from the same source.

I found something else which was of interest when I attended that meeting, namely the minutes of a previous meeting. They had passed a motion opposing the recommendations of the Carter commission dealing with the elimination of withholding tax and depletion allowances regarding mining and oil companies. I can only suggest that the municipality was panicked into taking this stand because of threats on the part of these companies. This is understandable, because these municipalities are totally dependant on the income from the production and primary processing of natural resources or raw materials. I am sure they felt that the adoption of these Carter commission recommendations would result in the destruction of their economies.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fawcett: Certainly.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Has he read the Carter commission report?

Mr. Fawcett: I have read the summary, sir.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Does he believe the recommendations should be implemented in their entirety?

Mr. Fawcett: I know exactly what the hon. member has in mind. If mining companies and insurance companies paid the taxes they should be paying the tax rate for the average individual would be much lower. It would not make much difference to these companies, if these recommendations were implemented.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Do you believe that all the recommendations of the report should be implemented?

Mr. Fawcett: I think perhaps there should be some modification in certain areas, but I do not intend to identify those areas. If Kenneth Carter did anything, he emphasized the fact that too many have been getting a free ride for too long. Unless these recommendations are implemented and unless we develop a new tax base, the greater proportion of taxes will still come from that group of people who are now overly tax burdened.

Let me comment briefly on the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West in respect of corporation taxes. There is more than one kind of corporation. We have many small corporations, with as many financial difficulties as have the wage earners. These corporations do not wield any great power. There are other corporations, to which I have alluded, which greatly influence our economy. To a great extent they control economic factors. I suspect that some of these corporations hold our governments in the palms of their hands.

It was interesting to note that immediately after the Carter commission recommendations became public our desks were covered with briefs and submissions from members of that 5 per cent of our population who exercise this control. It is time the voice of the other 95 per cent was heard.

We have often heard from members sitting on the front benches across the way about our high standard of living and our affluent society. I am the first to agree that our wage earners are living in nice, modern homes with all, or most, available appliances. They are living quite comfortably. The thing that has escaped the attention of most people is that this affluent society picture is a myth. Even though these people are living in modern homes, and even though they enjoy comfortable lives with a reasonable amount of security, they live from pay day to pay day. I speak with some authority in this regard because I spent most of my lifetime working among these people. I am not being critical of this situation or the people who live in this way; but it is only because of credit buying that they at this time enjoy a reasonably comfortable life. But the fact still remains that their security begins and ends with the pay cheque. If anything happens to the pay cheque, if a person becomes unemployed, the security finishes, the home is lost and, in many cases, a good portion of what is in the home also disappears.

My colleagues have referred to the discriminatory aspects of tax exemption. They have referred to the need of exemption for tools, clothing, etc., which are a necessity in most cases for these people in their mode of employment. I believe there is another matter to be considered in this respect, namely the question of transportation expenses. In this day and age it is a practical impossibility for any employee to live within a short distance of his place of employment. He is practically forced to live 10, 20, 30 or even 40 miles from where he is employed. This is particularly true of the area from which I come. As a result, transportation costs take a great bite out of the pay cheque of the employee; yet they cannot under any circumstances claim exemption for transportation expenses.

Another example of this was brought to my attention recently. I refer to the situation of professional fire fighters. I believe this matter comes within the jurisdiction of the emergency measures act. These people are compelled by law to be available to go anywhere within reason in case of emergency. Penalties are involved if they do not go to the place of emergency; and if they do not go, they must have a very good excuse for not going.

However, Mr. Chairman, there is no provision for the transportation of these people. In the case of dire emergency they are sometimes required to travel great distances. In some cases, in order not to violate the law they must have transportation, usually by means of a car, and they must keep up the insurance on the automobile, and so on. I believe this is another very glaring example of where tax exemptions should be provided. While wage earners are having this difficulty, we find there are those who claim exemptions for wining and dining and living high on the hog, so to speak. This is one of the things that very much bothers the average working man.

With regard to the tax holidays for mining corporations, as far as I am concerned I do not think they are necessary; in fact I would class them as an evil. But in addition to this, I think the minister should take a long look to see whether there are not abuses of the exemptions already provided. I suggest this is a matter well worth looking into. It appears to me that some of these exemptions go far beyond what should reasonably be considered as applicable.

As far as depletion allowances are concerned, I think it is a sad commentary on our whole economic process when large companies are granted depletion allowances for depleting expendable resources that, after all, are the heritage of every Canadian citizen.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like once again to prevail upon the minister to take a serious look at the tax policy of the government and the effect it is having on the average Canadian citizen. I believe the time is long overdue when we should come up with something entirely different in the way of a tax base. It is high time that the 95 per cent of this nation who suffer from our tax policy were given a little consideration.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I should not like this opportunity to pass without giving the minister the benefit of my advice, which he has never taken in the past. I should also like to refer to some of the minister's statements when he introduced this rather disastrous budget. It may be a little unkind on February 15, 1968, to quote what the minister said on November 30, 1967, as appears at page 4901 of Hansard. Here is our Minister of Finance looking in his clear, crystal ball with regard to the future. He has a somewhat different role than I have. Mine is a rather invidious one. I have never got much satisfaction out of being able to say, "I told you so", because Cassandra was never the go-go girl of the party. However, there is a contrast in the views expressed by the minister and those which I expressed a few days later. This is what the minister said when introducing his budget on November 30:

> Looking ahead, in 1968 a somewhat greater increase in production than this year in real terms and a somewhat smaller increase in prices is indicated. This appraisal anticipates a revival in economic activity in the United States and a continuation of growth in production in Europe and Japan, all important markets for us. Consequently, I expect to see a resumption in the growth of our exports. We can certainly expect a continuing increase in the expenditures of Canadian consumers, probably at a greater rate than this year. Housing expenditures can be expected to rise next year. Mortgage funds should be more readily available as a result of the more flexible interest rates on insured mortgages as well as a reduction in the competition for funds and the entry of the banks into the market this year. Already, as hon. members know, there has been a very substantial increase.

Alas—

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Oh, it was a Pollyanna, the Minister of Finance. But perhaps the sun was shining brightly on November 30 and it was not until the middle of February, 1968, that the frost of reality came down.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member which of these predictions I made has not been fulfilled.

An hon. Member: All of them.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We will just take the last one, to start with:

> Mortgage funds should be more readily available as a result of the more flexible interest rates on insured mortgages—

Where are the more flexible interest rates?

Mr. Sharp: They certainly are.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Really, Mr. Chairman, I wonder that the minister can sit here and have the effrontery to say this, when we have heard of the great number of people in Canada who are desperately in need of housing. These people require mortgage funds, which are not available. Interest rates are continuing to rise. The other day, when I pointed out the effect of the sharp increase in interest rates, the minister considered that it was a matter of so little consequence that he had not even spoken to the banks or suggested to them, apparently, that this was not in accordance with the prognostications he had made at the time we had the revision of the Bank Act.

I suggest that when he told us there would be a somewhat greater increase in production this year he must have forgotten that in a moment of rashness when he introduced the budget he said there would be a slight decline in production. He told us this was necessary in order that we control inflation. If the minister does not remember that, he had better look at his speech of November 30, when he said he was looking forward to a slight decline in production, regrettably, but because of the economic situation he felt this would take place.

Quite apart from this, Mr. Chairman, I think this bill contains fundamental implications that are much more important than the 5 per cent surtax on income, which we say is merely the revelation of the bankruptcy of this government's policies. This government has several obsessions. One is the necessity of maintaining simultaneously two contradictory and incompatible policies which tie their hands, and have tied their hands steadily for some time. The minister laughs. I can assure him the people of Canada are not laughing. I can assure him, too, that the economists in Canada are not laughing. I am so tired of economists coming to me, as if I were responsible, and saying to me: Is that man Sharp crazy? I say: I do not think so; what is he doing? I have to say I am not a miracle worker, so I cannot unscrew the inscrutable. If the minister thinks the individuals of this nation support him, then I suspect he will find the answer on April 6, because there will be a lot of people telling the delegates to the convention that they have been talking to businessmen who are not in support of the Minister of Finance.

There is only one way in which the minister can reach the objective which he told us he wanted to reach, namely to contain inflation and at the same time expand and develop the growth of our economy. However, he will not take it. He turned a deaf ear to the suggestions we made to him about the incompatibility of his policy of maintaining a fixed exchange rate and at the same time maintaining a ceiling on exchange reserves. This is continually causing him trouble.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is only one way in which we can reduce interest rates. There is only one way in which we can expand the economy and that is by taking action to do so. When the minister is tied to the necessity of maintaining the dollar at 92.5, when he is tied to the necessity of keeping our exchange reserves below a certain ceiling, then he is unable to expand the economy. Instead of that, he contracts it; and he admits himself he is contracting the economy. The steps he took were designed to contract the economy. The words he used, of course, were the euphemistic ones of allowing a little slack to develop in the economy. This is not a phrase, Mr. Chairman, that will appeal to those who are the victims of that slack, because in order to be effective there must be a decline in employment; there must be a contraction of the economy. There must be an increase in interest rates. Of course this reduction is being deliberately pushed at the present time.

Because of the position of this government, Canada's future depends on a continual inflow of capital from outside. In spite of that fact, Mr. Chairman, more and more informed voices are being raised in Canada expressing great anxiety with regard to the out-flow of capital from Canada. On December 8 I quoted from a release by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Apparently the minister did not either read my speech or consult the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, so I will just put it on the record again. The quotation is from a current review of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, which reads as follows:

> Canada's current account deficit with the United States in the second quarter of 1967 (excluding gold production available for export which is conventionally attributed to the United States account) was $544 million. Net capital movements between the two countries produced an inflow of $58 million as an influx of $239 million of long term capital was in part offset by an outflow on short-term account of $181 million.

Now, again and again in recent months we have been hearing the statements of financial analysts who tell us in effect that we are getting almost nothing in the way of net inflow of capital. It is balanced by the outflows. The minister, however, still persists in going to New York and praying for the stability of United States markets, because he feels that will preserve our economy. He begs them to continue the inflow of capital here which will be offset by what is going out on account of previous inflows. I suggest to the minister that eventually he will have to take some steps to expand the Canadian economy to reverse the trend toward rising unemployment and rising prices, by accepting not my advice but the advice of competent economist after competent economist throughout the country. They say he should seek to return to the floating exchange rate and seek to stem the outflow, to control the inflow of capital from abroad and permit the Canadian economy to develop in the way in which our resources would certainly warrant.

I have wondered, Mr. Chairman, just why the minister took the action he did, because he told us he was going to control inflation. At the same time he told us that he knew quite well the inflation was not the usual, classical, too much money chasing too few goods, and obviously he could not sustain that idea. Nowhere could he point to a shortage of goods. On the other hand, he said it was the cost-push type of inflation. What does he do? He takes the idiotic step, the ineffective step which, if designed to do nothing more than control the classical type of inflation, would be an ineffective one. He puts on his 5 per cent surtax on income, which is a nuisance to a lot of people. This measure according to his own estimate, is only going to bring in $185 million. He increased the tax on liquor and tobacco, which is only going to bring in $95 million. He is going to get corporations to advance their tax payments so he will get them a little sooner than otherwise; but this is a one shot affair.

Then the minister tells us that the total tax yield for 1968-69 will be $9,700 million and expenditures will be $10,300 million, with a deficit of $600 million. In the light of the fact that the other day the President of the Treasury Board uncautiously promised this parliament the government was going to balance the budget next year, I would have thought the minister would have taken more decisive steps if he felt that this type of inflation could be controlled by withdrawing purchasing power from the hands of the people. Instead of that, he does not even withdraw enough money to make any difference. He takes no steps whatever to control the actual excess of inflation at the present time.

I do not know how long ago it is, Mr. Chairman, but it must be about six weeks ago that we asked the minister if he was going to investigate the rise in the prices of copper and nickel. He assured us he was going to look into it. Subsequently, when we have asked him, he has still been looking into it but he has not done anything about it. We have not heard anything from him about the famous guide lines that were going to prevent these unseemly and completely unjustifiable price increases which of course enter into all other costs and add to the inflationary pressures.

He does not do anything on that side. Instead of that, he takes away a bit of purchasing power, but more important still he creates unemployment. No matter what the minister's brave words of November 30 may have been, or his equally rash, brave words tonight, he has made it almost impossible for people in Canada of medium or even fairly sizeable incomes to build houses today.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Sharp: I wonder if there is any possibility we might conclude consideration in the committee this evening?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: It being ten o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Monteith: Will the house leader tell us what the business will be for tomorrow and Monday under these circumstances?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to call item 57 second reading of Bill No. C-197, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. I cannot be definite about the business for Monday. I had hoped that the Income Tax Act amendments would have been completed, and we did propose to go on with the supplementary estimates. Having regard to the fact that the bill has not been carried I will be unable to advise the house on Monday's business until tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—MEASURES TO COMBAT PROBLEMS CAUSED BY ALCOHOLISM

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I attempted to raise on the orders of the day the question whether the government was considering doing anything more with regard to the very important health and welfare problem caused by alcoholism in Canada. Mr. Speaker ruled the question out of order, so I have of course availed myself of this evening's late sitting to bring the matter up again. In support of the importance of the matter I hope in a very few minutes to put some facts on the record.

There can be no question at all that alcoholism causes, and has caused for a great many years, grave damage to the health and welfare of individuals, to families and to the state. Also in these days it carries with it modern problems, such as those evidenced by the fact that 50 per cent of fatal automobile collisions are caused by people who have taken alcohol to an extent far beyond the normal. This one instance alone, namely the toll taken by alcoholism in traffic accidents, accounts for hundreds of preventable deaths in Canada every 12 months, thousands of preventable casualties and millions of preventable economic losses.

I have cited this one particular aspect of the toll taken by alcoholism in Canada, but this is only one part of the whole sad story. There are also countless broken homes and marriages both in this city and throughout Canada as a result of alcoholism. We all know this is so. My question is: What is the government, and specifically the Department of National Health and Welfare, doing to help those people, and organizations that are actively engaged in trying to combat this evil?

As some hon. members know, I—and there are other members as well—have for years urged that the federal government and all other governments do something to combat the evils of cigarette addiction. I am pleased to commend the government for having done something to combat smoking. It has not done enough but it has done something to help prevent diseases such as lung cancer, heart trouble, emphysema and so on.

But, Mr. Speaker, what is the government doing about the problem of alcohol, a problem that is growing? The latest figures indicate that while the federal government raised revenue in excess of $275 million in the last fiscal year from the sale of alcoholic beverages, it contributed nothing, or nothing material, to any anti-alcoholism or temperance program in Canada. Why not? Surely this is a field in which there is a national problem of health and welfare. This problem has seen the emergence of different organizations at the provincial level and at the semi-public federal level who devote their efforts to solving the problem of alcohol.

For example, the pamphlet which is put out by the Canadian Federation on Alcohol Problems says that the purposes of the federation are to bring about enlightenment and understanding with regard to alcoholic problems and, generally, to do everything possible to improve the lot of those suffering from this cause. The organization is national and has the support of such organizations as the Anglican Church of Canada, the Canadian Baptist Church, the Pentecostal Church, the Presbyterian Church, the Roman Catholic Church, Seventh-Day Adventists and the United Church of Canada. I think that the government should consider augmenting the work that is done by these bodies.

Since the government derives a revenue of approximately $275 million a year from the sale of alcohol and since excessive use of such alcohol brings about disease, social problems, an increase in crime, increasing traffic accidents, and so on, would the government not consider seriously devoting a small part of its annual multimillion dollar revenue to meeting the problem of alcoholics? I suggest that the government consider allocating one half of one per cent of that revenue every year to aid in the work being undertaken by this federation.

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): As stated in this house on January 23, 1968, and as reported in Hansard at page 5900, the Department of National Health and Welfare has no specific program on this subject but has assisted provinces in a variety of ways for many years. For the general co-ordination carried out by the Canadian Foundation on Alcoholism, a grant of $15,000 is made annually.

The problems of the alcoholic are indeed matters of real concern to the individual, his or her family, and to all who come in contact with them. Alcoholism is primarily a personal problem, and must be combated at the personal, family and local level. It has however, a relationship to crime, traffic accidents and to costly health and welfare programs that receive public concern.

In recognizing this situation, the Department of National Health and Welfare is at all times ready to consider requests from provinces for assistance with research or services that seek to diminish or prevent the problems of alcohol. In addition to this provincial interest, the department keeps under continuing review the available statistics and other information on this subject, with a view to formulating whatever co-ordinating effort may seem likely to be effective.

AGRICULTURE—GRANTS OR LOANS FOR FAIRS AND EXHIBITIONS

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I asked the Minister of Agriculture a question about possible long term government loans to fair boards and exhibition companies, for the construction of multipurpose buildings and facilities which would be suitable for local fairs. Mr. Speaker ruled that the question was not urgent; yet, with due respect, I do consider that question urgent and therefore I bring it up again at this time. I might explain that by "multipurpose buildings" I meant exhibition buildings that could be used for community purposes all year around.

The urgency of the question arises from this. Plans for summer fairs and exhibitions must be made now and if building loans are to be available this year the minister should announce that immediately.

• (10:10 p.m.)

I wish to put on record why fair boards and exhibition companies have the right to expect loans to be granted. In June, 1965, in answer to my question, the then minister of agriculture, Hon. Harry Hays, stated as reported in Votes and Proceedings of June 4, 1965:

> The development of a program of long-term loans to exhibitions for major construction programs is presently under consideration.

On December 14, 1966, the present minister answered a letter I had sent regarding exhibition loans. Here is the last paragraph of his letter:

> The Government, as you indicated, has under consideration a program of long-term loans. I am hopeful that we can move forward on such a plan within a reasonable period. However, you will appreciate that this will take legislative action and as soon as a decision has been reached an announcement will be made.

During consideration of his departmental estimates on March 2, 1966, in answer to a question about these loans, the minister replied as follows, as will be seen from the report in Hansard on page 2077:

When the loan bill is ready it will be presented to the house, but it will show no change in policy. Since I took office there has been no change in policy in regard to long term loans for multi-purposes.

Early in May, 1967, the minister is reported to have said, at a meeting in Lethbridge that long term loans to fair boards may soon be a reality. I have the press report here under a Canadian Press dateline. After reading this report I asked the minister for a comment. Here is the reply he gave me in a note sent across the floor:

I explained to them it was in our platform, and in view of the way house business was proceeding I hope the government will see fit to bring it before the house this session or early in the next.

This was in 1967. I believe the minister recently had a meeting in his office with certain officials of the Canadian Association of Exhibitions. Perhaps he will indicate whether any discussion took place at that meeting with regard to the pressing need for long term loans. If he can assure the house that the loans will be available this spring his statement will be welcomed by fair boards and exhibition companies across Canada.

I have spoken of fairs and exhibitions generally but I speak particularly for the Moose Jaw exhibition, the president of which wrote me last year to say:

We have been endeavouring to raise funds to erect a multipurpose building which will be a credit to the community and which could be used the year round.

It is to meet situations such as this that I am asking the minister to make a clear statement of government policy.

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): I wish to thank the hon. member for again bringing forward this important matter. I think the hon. member has not only asked the question but answered it by quoting from the very explicit letter of the minister dated December 14, 1966 when my hon. friend expressed the hope of this government that a program of this type would be brought into being at the earliest possible opportunity.

Perhaps I may review briefly what has happened. We did, of course, have a system of making capital grants to agricultural societies in this country, but this program was discontinued by a former administration of which the hon. member was a supporter. It is probable that if this system had not been discontinued we would still be providing this type of assistance to agricultural societies. It was the intention of a former minister of agriculture to introduce a different type of program, whereby extensive loans would be made available to municipalities for the construction of multipurpose buildings. However, since there was a break in the program, some interruption has resulted.

I should like to refer the hon. member to two quotations, the first of which appears at page 2481 of Hansard. In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) the Minister of Agriculture said:

There is no intent to bring it in at this session but subject to the economic and financial dictates of the nation it is hoped we can bring it in during the spring session.

I think that is quite clear. The minister has said it will not be brought in this session. He is hopeful that it may be brought in during the spring session, but certainly it will be brought in at the earliest opportunity.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.22 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 16, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

[Translation]

VACANCY

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, in conformity with section 10 of the House of Commons Act, I wish to inform the house that a vacancy occurred in the representation in the House of Commons of the electoral district of Matapédia-Matane, in the province of Quebec, following the death of Hon. René Tremblay, the former member for that riding.

NATIONAL AND ROYAL ANTHEMS

FIRST AND FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first and final report of the special joint committee on the national and royal anthems. In view of the occasion may I repeat my remarks in French.

[Text]

Monsieur l'Orateur, j'ai l'honneur de présenter le premier et le dernier rapport du comité mixte spécial sur l'hymne national et l'hymne royal.

[Editor's note: Text of the foregoing report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[English]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, as a member of the national anthem committee who has attended meetings regularly I should like to state that I received no notice of yesterday's meeting of that committee and consequently did not attend. I subsequently have had an opportunity to read the report, and I concur with its recommendations regarding the official anthems.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, on the point of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a question of privilege. Perhaps the matter might be cleared up between the chairman and the hon. member.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CONCURRENCE IN COMMITTEE REPORT RESPECTING SALARY REVISIONS, ETC.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That the report of the joint committee on the Library of Parliament concerning salary revisions and other matters, presented to the house on Wednesday, February 14, 1968, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE COMMISSION PROGRESS AND PROGRAMS

On the order: Government notices of motion:

February 14—The Minister of Public Works:

That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to examine the progress and programs of the National Capital Commission in the development, conservation and improvement of the national capital region;

That twelve members to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of the said committee be designated at a later date;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records, to sit while the house is sitting, and to report from time to time;

That the said committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and that standing order 66 be suspended in relation thereto;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON FOREIGN INVESTMENT IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister and ask him whether it is proper for us to assume, from the statement made by the President of the Privy Council yesterday, that the government has not given active consideration to the formulation of any policy which might arise from the recommendations of the report on foreign investment, as tabled in the house yesterday.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Starr: The question was directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Gordon: So many people are aspiring for that position that perhaps I might as well join them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, replying to the question, I think I made it clear yesterday that the government is considering the report and will be formulating a policy. It has not arrived at its conclusions yet, and that was the only inference that I wished to be drawn yesterday.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the President of the Privy Council whether he can indicate to the house when the government will be reaching any new policies which may be arising from the report.

Mr. Gordon: I should think at a very early date, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE TO U.S. OF ARMS FOR USE IN VIET NAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government asked for written assurance from the government of the United States that none of the Canadian war material being sold to the United States is being used in Viet Nam? If such a request has been made, what was the nature of the reply?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, Canada has a defence sharing agreement with the United States that goes back to 1945. There is no written request, but there have been consultations from time to time with the United States in this matter.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering the minister's reply, I ask him on what he bases the assurances he has given the Canadian people from time to time that no Canadian war materials are being used in Viet Nam.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have said repeatedly that under the policies of the government of Canada no one can buy arms and ship them from Canada to any sensitive area, whether that be Viet Nam or anywhere else.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister to give that assurance with respect to materials which may go indirectly to Viet Nam through the United States?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have just said that we have a defence sharing agreement with the United States which goes back to 1945. That was very fairly dealt with, I may say, by my hon. friend's seatmate in a television interview one year ago, in a way that put this matter in perspective and with fairness.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he means to leave the impression with this house that he has asked the United States not to use in Viet Nam any arms shipped from Canada to the United States under that agreement. Is that the impression he is seeking to leave with the house this morning?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs assure the house that no Canadian nickel is being used in Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am glad the hon. member asked that question, because when we think of how to assist a country the export of nickel, the export of wheat, the export of many other commodities which do not normally constitute what are called armaments may be of great assistance.

Is anyone in the house recommending that Canada should not export nickel?

Mr. Starr: You are not allowed to ask questions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INTERCEPTION AND IDENTIFICATION OF RUSSIAN BOMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has any information to give the house on the reported appearance of Soviet bombers over Canadian territory.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My colleague the Minister of National Defence will deal with that question.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): We are aware that some foreign aircraft have been operating well off our coasts in international air space. We have used these opportunities to exercise our air intercept and identification procedures.

Mr. Patterson: I wonder whether the minister would care to comment on the report that Soviet bombers have been over Newfoundland territory.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I have to repeat that according to my information they were well off the coast—I am talking of the foreign aircraft.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether our intercept and identification procedures were successful and, if so, what was the identity of the foreign aircraft in question?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): The most I can say is that our intercept was successful.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister unwilling to tell the house the identity of the aircraft?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question and received an answer to it.

Mr. Fulton: I was wondering whether the omission was an oversight or whether it was deliberate, and I am giving the minister a chance to rectify it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: On reflection I wish to press the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to whether he will not tell the house what was the identity of the foreign aircraft intercepted; because I believe in all seriousness that it is unacceptable that parliament and the country should not be given this information.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I have no objection to giving the information. They were Russian aircraft, Bear D.

[Later:]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question directed to the Minister of National Defence by the hon. member for Kamloops. Because of the serious nature of the incident could the minister inform the house whether the intercepted aircraft was a military aircraft; and if it was intercepted in international air space would he tell us by what right the interception was made? If it was not intercepted in international air space, has the government lodged a protest with the government of the U.S.S.R.?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether we are not going a little far afield in respect of this incident. I hope the hon. member understands that if we do intercept we follow our own procedures and perform the same function we are performing all the time. If this is done in international air space we are limited to identifying the aircraft. That is all there was to it.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, this matter is serious enough to warrant the house being given full information. I am asking whether the aircraft which was intercepted and identified was a Russian military aircraft and, if so, was any protest lodged?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, because of the important nature of the subject matter I suggest that the minister should inform the house fully with regard to it.

Mr. Speaker: Even in respect of an important matter the rules are the same. The hon. member has a right to ask the question, and when the minister answers that must be the end of the matter.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the Canadian aircraft which intercepted the Russian aircraft requested that aircraft to turn back.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): No, Mr. Speaker. As far as the question of the hon. member for Yukon is concerned, I did identify the aircraft. I said it was a Bear D, which is a military aircraft.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has any official protest been lodged with the government of the U.S.S.R.?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the minister pointed out, some foreign aircraft have been operating well off our coasts in international air space. We have used this situation, as the minister has said, to exercise our air inspection and identification procedures. That is the reply the minister gave a moment ago and that is the situation as it exists at the present time.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs answer the question as to whether the government has lodged any official protest with the government of the U.S.S.R.?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The member has asked his question and the minister has answered.

Mr. Neilsen: I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs requested an explanation for the presence of the aircraft referred to? If so, will he inform the house what reply he has received to that request?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, only because the matter is of great importance do I repeat what I have already said, and what was said by the Minister of National Defence. Some foreign aircraft have been operating well off our coasts in international air space. Canada has the right to do the same thing, and does.

Mr. Nielsen: Nobody disputes that fact, Mr. Speaker. My question to the minister was, has the government requested any explanation?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Did the operation of these foreign aircraft—I don't know whether there was more than one—interfere with the ordinary flying routes of international air companies between this continent and Europe?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I have no way of knowing that, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

[Later:]

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence with regard to the incident of the foreign aircraft flying off Canada's coast. Is the minister aware of the radio news report of today which said that this incident involved an encounter between United States and Russian planes?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will keep it very simple. Has there been any exchange of communications between this government and the government of the U.S.S.R. relative to this incident?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows perfectly well that there could not have been.

HOUSING

AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS FOR SINGLE FAMILY DWELLINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. President of the Treasury Board who is answerable for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

We know that increasing pressures are being brought to bear on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with a view to having it approve the construction of only high-density residential buildings in Canada. Can the hon. minister assure the house that steps will be taken to continue allowing the construction of single-unit family dwellings?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are concentrating their funds this year on public housing, limited dividend housing, urban redevelopment and so on. Present forecasts are that adequate funds will be forthcoming from the private sector to take care of single family dwellings to create a total level of about 175,000 housing starts.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON MISSION OF HON. LIONEL CHEVRIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in reply to a question of mine concerning the mission of Hon. Lionel Chevrier, the Prime Minister indicated that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would reply today. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman is ready to do so.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister indicated, the former high commissioner for Canada in London is on a visit now on behalf of the government to certain Francophone countries in Africa. For a long time Canada has been giving external aid to certain English speaking countries in Africa. Two years ago the government decided that it was desirable to expand our assistance to the Francophone countries. We now have total external aid of $12 million to Francophone countries, and the former high commissioner is now engaged in consultations, on behalf of the government and the department of external aid, with regard to programs to assist these French speaking countries in Africa.

Mr. Nesbitt: As a supplementary question, during the earlier part of hon. Mr. Chevrier's visit did he have an opportunity to discuss any matters with U Thant in Paris?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker, he was not instructed to see U Thant.

SHIPPING

BAY OF FUNDY—POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF SUPER PORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Could he tell the house whether the government of Canada has participated in, or if it has not participated to what extent it has been kept informed, discussions between the province of New Brunswick and the state of Maine with regard to the construction of a super port in the bay of Fundy area?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ACTION TO MEET SHORTAGE OF MEDICAL MANPOWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have had an opportunity to question the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that the government has apparently made up its mind as to the future course of medicare, can the minister inform the house whether any federal initiatives are being considered to offset the increasing shortage of doctors facing the country?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the information he is seeking now is of a general nature which normally should be given by a minister at the time of the calling of motions.

Mr. Grafftey: May I rephrase my question. Now that the government has reached a decision on medicare—

Mr. Gordon: That was done a year ago.

Mr. Grafftey: —increasing demands on medical personnel, can the minister inform the house what detailed provisions have been made to face this challenge? It is a very serious situation.

Mr. Speaker: I would think that even the rephrased question does not qualify under the rules.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SHERBROOKE, QUE.—REPORTED MISTREATMENT OF ARRESTED PERSON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of a report in this morning's press that an accused person in Sherbrooke was denied counsel on arrest, and was mistreated by the officers who arrested him, has the minister ordered or will he consider ordering an inquiry into the matter?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the administration of justice is a matter of internal jurisdiction for a province, and it is not proper for the federal government to interfere in this as a general proposition. Whether in this particular case there was some action under federal authority I do not know, but the administration of justice is something with which we do not interfere.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer was not entirely unexpected. As a supplementary question, in view of the fact that the proposed bill of rights to be entrenched in the constitution is now delayed —I hope it is merely delayed—will the minister consider an amendment to the Criminal Code to assure people arrested the right to counsel?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his support of our proposition for an amendment to the constitution in the form of a bill of rights. As regards this latter proposition, I am prepared to examine it. I must say I am very hopeful with the progress being made in the matter of a charter of human rights. The hon. member will probably agree that that is the proper place to enshrine this kind of protection so it applies to all the law, but if that is not possible I will examine his very valid proposal.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

REASON FOR APPARENT REDUCTION IN AVAILABLE FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare as the minister responsible for the Atlantic Development Board. Is he in a position to inform the house of the reasons for the very substantial reduction in the funds available to that board in the coming fiscal year?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to give the details to my hon. friend. The suggestion that there has been any cut-back in the availability of funds to the Atlantic Development Board for the forthcoming fiscal year is totally unfounded. What has been done is an attempt to estimate as accurately as possible the requirements for the board's activities within the next fiscal year. My hon. friend will recall that the estimate last year was much greater than the actual expenditure because of the inability to get ahead with joint shared programs with the provinces. This year we are hoping to estimate accurately and go forward with available projects. If there are further requirements they will be met from the fund.

Mr. Coates: Would the minister indicate that every possible action will be taken to provide initiatives for the board and to see that increased amounts of money are spent in the Atlantic provinces in order to help reduce the substantial economic gap which exists between the people of that area and the people in the rest of Canada.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker; the board will be encouraged in every possible way to carry on with its activities.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. On December 1, as recorded at page 4929 of Hansard, I asked the minister whether there had been any cut-back in the funds to be made available to the Atlantic Development Board for the next fiscal year. At that time the minister said he expected that in the next year there would be considerable resources available to assist the economy of the Atlantic provinces. Is this decrease of $20 million providing considerable resources to the Atlantic provinces under the Atlantic Development Board?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he is entering into a debate.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he has yet made appointments to the Atlantic Development Board, or whether he is in a position to announce appointments to replace those whose terms have expired?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the governor in council has acted on the recommendations which were made during the past week. Recommendations have been made to the governor in council to fill these vacancies.

FINANCE

REPORTED DECREASE IN PUBLIC MONEY SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would have liked to address to the Minister of Finance. I presume there is an acting minister of finance. It is rather difficult these days to find the person to whom to address a question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might ask the question.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Finance, whoever he may be. The question arises from a statement which appears in this morning's paper from the Bank of Canada to the effect that there was a further decline in the public money supply during the seven days ending February 7. Later in the story some of the consequences of this are listed, such as a continuing rise in interest rates in certain categories of loans and shortage of lending funds on the part of the banks. I should like to ask whether this is a result of policy decisions on the part of the Bank of Canada and the government. If so, does the minister consider this to be a desirable development in the Canadian economy at this time.

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the article in question, but on behalf of the Minister of Finance I should like to take this question as notice.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON ADMISSION OF ITALIANS FROM SICILY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, some time ago the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) asked whether we might accelerate the processing of applications for immigration from residents of the areas of Sicily affected by the recent earthquakes.

I wish to advise the hon. member and the house that all immigration offices in Canada and our immigration office in Rome have been instructed to give priority to all applications already submitted by, or on behalf of, any resident of Sicily. During the emergency period, we shall also give priority to additional applications submitted by Canadian residents for their relatives in Sicily.

The immigration staff in Italy will be increased in order to implement these priorities.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEDICAL INSURANCE PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board when the government intends to announce the future nature of the public service surgical and medical insurance plan, in light of the fact that on July 1 medicare will not be operative in parts of Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we will be making an announcement very soon as to the future of the plan.

Mr. Chatterton: Could the minister say at this time whether public servants living in provinces participating in medicare will forfeit their entitlement under the public service surgical and medical insurance plan?

Mr. Benson: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question should be placed on the order paper.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have representations been received from several provinces pointing out the need for certain amendments to the Canada Pension Plan? If so, are amendments to be proposed during this session?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It is not proposed to introduce any amendments of this kind at this session, Mr. Speaker.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO PRIORITY POSITION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, will the Acting Prime Minister advise the house whether Bill C-195, to amend the Criminal Code, is being considered by the government on its priority list to be dealt with during this session of parliament?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am not sure whether the Prime Minister dealt with this the other day, but I will look at his statement. If he did not, I am sure he will deal with it next week.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO PROMOTION OF FURTHER SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whoever is acting for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, since he has left the chamber, whether in view of his discussions with officials of the Canadian Wheat Board yesterday there has been any improvement in the prospects for wheat sales abroad, the lack of which in the past few months has created widespread concern among western farmers and farm organizations.

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has just left the chamber. I will bring this to his attention and perhaps he will make a reply later today.

Mr. Southam: What action is the government taking to increase our hopes in this respect on behalf of the western agricultural community?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT ON ELECTION EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as government house leader. In order that important reforms to election laws may be considered and perhaps become effective before another general election, will the government house leader consider bringing before the house at an early date the resolution, which I think is item No. 63 on the order paper, to refer the report of the committee on election expenses to the privileges and elections committee of this house?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If there is any disposition to send this resolution to the committee without debate I should be glad to call it at any time.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, if the government would consider bringing this on as the first item of business today we in this party are prepared to pass it without debate.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, will the minister assure members of this house that the committee on privileges and elections will be called immediately so it may begin work during this session?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

DRUGS

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO STUDENT USE OF HALLUCINOGENICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. L. Klein (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, in view of the anxiety of parents of high school and college students concerning the use of marijuana, l.s.d. and other hallucinogenic drugs, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the government will appoint a special parliamentary committee with specific powers to look into this problem, and with authority to adjourn from place to place in Canada for the purpose of hearing evidence and to make appropriate recommendations.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As my hon. friend knows, Mr. Speaker, there is at this time on the order paper a bill having to do with the control of l.s.d. and similar drugs. This bill has already received consideration in the Senate. The Senate committee on two occasions heard evidence in respect of this matter. When we have an opportunity to consider the bill it may be useful to consider whether an advantage might be gained by referring this matter to a standing committee of the house.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, can the Solicitor General inform the house whether the R.C.M. Police are stepping up activities in order to do everything possible to prevent any proliferation in the use of these drugs in Canadian communities.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I believe an answer to this question can be found in the substantial increase in the number of prosecutions.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN METHOD OF PAYING ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, because of allegations of hardship for those participating in manpower retraining schemes as the result of rather stringent accounting procedures which led to certain cheques being withheld last month, will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration assure us that such procedures will stress humanity rather than bookkeeping?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have improved this situation considerably through the new program.

Formerly, under old program 5, allowances were only paid at the end of three weeks. Now we make the first payment during the first week, and then every 15 days.

On occasion, because of absence, we have had to make an adjustment. This happened during the holidays, and I think that was a very bad period. However, I think that the people undergoing training will be satisfied in future.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED EARLIER RETIREMENT OF MEMBERS OF NAVAL FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the government has now decided to retire those serving in the sea environment of the Canadian armed forces five years earlier than those serving in other environments and, if so, for what reason.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this question could be placed on the order paper.

DRUGS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT FROM MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, and I have given the minister notice. In view of the concern of the drug industry over Bill C-190, could the minister advise whether he has received a report from the Medical Research Council on research in the pharmaceutical industry? If so, will he undertake to table the report before the debate resumes on Bill C-190?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether this question should not be asked when the house is actually considering the bill.

Mr. Nowlan: I thought the question might be asked at this time, Mr. Speaker. The minister was in the chamber the other day for part of the debate in committee, but he may not be in the chamber when the debate resumes and—

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Industry.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the Medical Research Council has undertaken a very extensive survey of all medical research facilities and potentialities in Canada. This has been done in connection with the government laboratories, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the universities and the Canadian pharmaceutical industry. The results will not be available for about another month, at which time I would hope to make them public. But I can assure the hon. member that the aspects relating to the pharmaceutical industry will constitute only a very small part of the conclusions.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The answer was not unexpected. I appreciate that the survey is in the whole medical research field. I am informed, and would ask the minister to check with his officials about this, that the report on research in the drug industry has been completed and is available.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his representations.

Mr. Nowlan: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—and I very rarely rise on a question of privilege—from an opposition point of view or from a back bencher point of view, at the best of times it is very difficult to get reports on technical and involved subjects. There have been so many confusing and conflicting points raised about the research value of the drug industry in Canada that I believe a government report would certainly clarify the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that there will be ample opportunity later to clarify what he considers to be a very important matter. This should not be done during the question period.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, without pressing the point too far but just a little further—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: —I do not think there is much disagreement between the minister and myself. The point is that this debate could start again on Monday, and I am advised that the report pertaining to the drug industry is now complete and will shed a fantastic new light on the question of research, which is part of the very heart of Bill C-190. Certainly as a backbencher in the opposition, and this applies to some backbenchers on the government side of the house, we would like to have a government report, an independent report, on this subject.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his point, as I said a moment ago.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry. Will the minister examine the material to see whether it is possible to segregate and table promptly an interim report having to do with drug research?

Mr. Drury: I would be glad to do that, Mr. Speaker, on the understanding that the interest of the house is particularly in research related to the pharmaceutical industry. I would take this occasion to indicate that in co-operation with the Canadian pharmaceutical industry a survey, which is rather more quantitative than qualitative of the efforts being made by the members of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada was carried out. The information was provided on a confidential basis. If it would interest the house, I would be glad to ask the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association whether they would have any objection to making public, in global terms, the results of this quantitative survey.

Mr. Nowlan: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for that information, because that was going to be the subject of a supplementary question. There are two different reports. I understand that the minister is prepared to table the joint report if he has the permission of the pharmaceutical association, which I think he will be able to get pretty easily.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POLICY OF DEPARTMENT IN PROSECUTIONS FOR POSSESSION OF MARIJUANA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, a question was put a while ago concerning marijuana. It gives me the opportunity of replying to the question put two days ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North concerning the policy of the government and the officials of the Department of Justice in this regard. The best answer can be found in a few lines concerning government policy as stated by the crown attorneys in Toronto:

[English]

Department of Justice drug prosecutors in Toronto will henceforth ordinarily suggest jail terms for young persons without criminal records convicted of the possession of marijuana when asked for their views as to sentence by local judges and magistrates.

The communiqué goes on to say there has been an increase in the use of marijuana. It indicates that judges of the superior courts have recently increased sentences, and that we are guided and inspired by those sentences.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure whether I fully comprehended the reply of the Minister of Justice. Do we understand from what the minister has said that in all cases advice will be given by the representatives of the crown against a suspended sentence being imposed where marijuana is involved?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker; only when asked, and in view of the circumstances of the particular case, as the statement says. The crown prosecutor will recommend that the court follow the precedents set by the higher courts across the country in recent judgments.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT ON ELECTION EXPENSES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Secretary of State) moved:

That the report of the committee on election expenses, tabled on October 11, 1966, be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO BROADEN COVERAGE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-197, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) is not in his seat this morning in order to open the discussion on second reading of this bill. I hope he will be able to return to the house later in the day.

I believe there is a general awareness of the important and very significant changes that have occurred in the economic environment in Canada since our Unemployment Insurance Act came into effect in 1941. There have been periodic amendments to the act and regulations for good and sufficient reasons, but undoubtedly there is a need to consider an up to date plan of unemployment insurance in Canada as a result of our experience with the present legislation and in terms of new and progressive ideas.

It may be of interest to state in passing that serious thought has been and will continue to be given in the months ahead to the merits, and indeed to the possibility, of a greater degree of administrative co-operation in the various segments of social security in Canada, a process which has been followed with no small success in other countries. With our changing times and circumstances there has been some overlapping of resources, and it is quite within the bounds of possibility that the concept of an integrated scheme might be drawn up in the future which could serve as a frame of reference for the revision of the unemployment insurance program.

I might say also that another valid reason for an updating, indeed for a new act, lies in a need for the modernization of administrative procedures to take advantage of the new and more sophisticated business methods in vogue today. A co-ordination of collection, for example, would be of great benefit to employers as well as for the insured population.

Perhaps it might also be well for me to mention that of late members of the public have been expressing their concern more and more frequently about alleged or suspected abuses of the unemployment insurance system, fraudulent abuses. Unfortunately, as in most if not all social security programs, there have been abuses. One very significant area of fraud has been, and still is, failure while drawing benfits to declare earnings in excess of the amount allowed by law. Under the act a person drawing unemployment insurance may earn up to one half the maximum weekly benefit without deductions being made from the benefit he is receiving. The commission is greatly concerned with this area of abuse, as is the general public.

The matter of alleged abuses and known abuses has been discussed frequently between the Minister of Labour and the new chief commissioner. The new chief commissioner has given assurance that utmost efforts will be made to control these abuses. A stepped up program to meet all forms of fraudulent behaviour has already begun with very significant results. In the last fiscal year the enforcement division of the Unemployment Insurance Commission uncovered no less than 24,486 detected cases of fraud and illegal withdrawal from the fund. These represented a total of $1,114,816 in overpayment of benefits. These figures, Mr. Speaker, speak for themselves. They provide full justification for strong measures, and these the commission intends to pursue. Every possible step will be taken to ensure that the funds which the people and government of Canada have invested in unemployment insurance shall be put to the proper and effective use that the Unemployment Insurance Act provides.

I might also say that when the general revision of the act comes before this house, changes will be put forward directed toward eliminating or at least correcting possible abuses. It should be mentioned here, however, that while the commission is taking new and stronger measures to control abuses, this is not to suggest that there is any intention of interfering with the inherent rights of insured Canadians to receive benefits as and when they are entitled. The appeal process, which is an essential part of the Unemployment Insurance Commission's machinery, will continue to serve its purpose, protecting the insured wherever there is an element of doubt.

But while a comprehensive revision of the act is a matter of deep concern, and one which should be followed as soon as practicable, nevertheless the updating of the existing program cannot be postponed. There is an immediate need for a change in the ceiling and for an upward adjustment of the rates of benefit and contribution. It is proposed in the bill, Mr. Speaker, that the coverage ceiling be raised from $5,460, the established figure since the last amendment was made in 1959, to $7,800. The purpose of this is to bring back under the umbrella of coverage large numbers of Canadians who were included originally but who, because of sharply rising incomes in recent years, have gradually become excluded from the scope and benefit of the plan.

Indeed, because of the marked rise in the level of salaries in recent years, a trend of which we are all aware, many who were formerly insured under the act have not had any unemployment insurance protection in recent years. This figure now represents such an appreciable proportion of the labour force, estimated at upwards of 400,000, that the urgency of raising the ceiling is clear. The last amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act were made in 1959, and as hon. members are aware there has been a very sharp rise since that time in the level of the industrial composite average weekly wage. Indeed, our booming economy has seen this weekly average wage increase from approximately $73 to approximately $103 a week. As a result the $5,460 ceiling and the schedule of benefits, which has invariably been established on the basis of 50 per cent of a claimant's average weekly wage, have lost their proper proportion. In fairness and in equity it needs to be adjusted to meet present circumstances.

To explain why the ceiling for insurance coverage has been raised to the figure of $7,800, I should like to point out that from the onset it has been the established principle to set the ceiling at one and a half times the industrial composite weekly average wage. In accordance with this principle, and in view of the rise of the composite weekly average wage to $103, it is only fair and reasonable that the ceiling be adjusted to the higher figure.

In this amending bill, Mr. Speaker, we are proposing also in clause 4 a new schedule of rates of benefit. As I have pointed out, the rates of benefit in the past have been established at approximately 50 per cent of the normal earnings of a claimant with one or more dependants, and 37 per cent of the earnings of a claimant without dependants, subject in both cases to a maximum. Since 1959 the rates of benefit have been $36 and $27 respectively at the maximum levels, though the average weekly wage in Canada in 1959 of $73.47, on which these rates were based, has now climbed to more than $103. Hence the proposed new maximum rates of benefit, using the same criteria, of $53 for a claimant with dependant and $42 for a claimant without dependant.

The immediate purpose of the amendment in clause 5 of the bill is to restore the benefits to earnings ratio of 50 per cent or more for all those whose wages are not above the current composite weekly average wage. You will note that the scale of benefits schedule in the clause has been amended in accordance with current earning levels, and thus conforms to the percentage relationship of the earnings of claimants which was set when the act was passed and has been reaffirmed in previous amendments, the last of which was in 1959. The principle has been to maintain the 50 per cent standard established by past legislation for claimants in higher income ranges, although it is interesting to note in passing that the ratio of benefits to earnings in the lower ranges of the table is higher because of the obvious need of this group. Incidentally, the number of benefit classes will be fewer than at present and this will also simplify administration.

This recommendation also includes $10 earnings ranges to reduce the multiplicity of contribution stamps. The addition of further $6 earnings or classes, as used now in the act, would have greatly increased the administrative burden for employers.

Concurrently we are proposing in clause 2 of the bill a proportionate increase in the schedule of contributions to the unemployment insurance fund by the government, by the employers and by those who will be benefiting under the act. The reason for this proportionate increase in contributions is to maintain the stability of the fund in the face of the more substantial weekly benefits payable. It is good business to keep the Unemployment Insurance Commission fund in balance and on a sound actuarial basis. It is the government's responsibility to see that the fund will be able to meet all eventualities which may arise.

In considering clause 2, hon. members will note that in computing the number of contribution weeks and the average of weekly contributions for any purpose under the act, a contribution week during which the earnings of an insured person are less than $20 shall be counted as one half a week. The purpose of this provision is to reduce the effect on the fund from claimants whose earnings in a week are minimal compared with the average composite weekly wage level. It is in accordance with the principle now in the act and merely adjusts the minimum earnings level from $9 to $20.

• (12 noon)

Finally we are proposing, Mr. Speaker, to substitute a new schedule of allowable earnings based on the criterion of the last amendment in 1959. Anyone receiving unemployment insurance benefits may earn up to 50 per cent of benefits payable in a week without a reduction.

As hon. members may recall, since the idea was incorporated in the act in 1955 experience has shown that the amount of allowable earnings should be high enough to encourage claimants to take casual work. The proposal, then, is to allow a claimant to earn one-half of his weekly benefit rate, rounded out to the nearest dollar, without a reduction of his benefit. By doing this, two desirable results will be achieved. In addition to creating a greater incentive among claimants to accept casual work there will be less temptation, particularly with increased benefits, to withhold advice of earnings, an area which constitutes the largest source of fraudulent withdrawal from the fund. The change with respect to allowable earnings preserves these principles.

In general, the purpose of the amendments covered by the bill is to fill the immediate need of adjusting upward the rates of benefit and contribution to place them in the current context of the considerably higher Canadian average of normal weekly earnings.

As has been stated on more than one occasion during recent months, the government is convinced of the need for the changes proposed. We believe that this adjustment will be very timely in its effects. The unemployment insurance fund has contributed immensely over the years to the stability of the Canadian economy, particularly in times of recession, and will continue to do so in the future. The purpose of these amendments is to bring the contributions and benefits in line with current wage conditions.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to commence my remarks with some general pleasantries directed to the newest appointment to the cabinet. I wanted to wish the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Mackasey), who I thought would be piloting the measure before us, a short but happy tenure of office. However, the presence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) as the acting sponsor gives me and others an opportunity to say hello to him during his visit to the house. He has been away in London on government business and in other places in the country on his own business. We welcome him back, however short his visit today and perhaps next week.

In his speech the minister referred briefly to the actuarial basis of the fund but did not deal with how the fund will fare in a country with over 500,000 people out of work. I found this passing strange especially since the minister, like myself, is a maritimer and comes from an area where one person in every nine is out of work. The minister did not deal with the closure of unemployment insurance commission offices across Canada at a time when there will be greater demands for service by those who have been thrown out of work. I found this passing strange as well. Other members of this party will elaborate on this theme in their contributions to the debate.

Neither did the minister mention the Gill report which was issued in November, 1962, though he did concede that a general overhaul of the Unemployment Insurance Act should be made at some time. Five and a half years ago a thoughtful report was presented to the government; yet five and a half years later no action has been taken on it with the exception of some of the Gill recommendations regarding manpower training and retraining.

I will get around to saying something about the Gill report in a moment, but first of all I should like to deal with an obvious weakness in the amendments that have been presented to us. When we go into committee I shall seek to find out how anyone can justify on an actuarial basis giving an even worse deal to people with dependants than what they now receive. This is precisely what the measure will do, Mr. Speaker.

I took the trouble to examine the weekly rate of benefits under the 1959 measure and compared the ratio between benefits paid to a person without dependants and those paid to a person with dependants. Generally I think the ratio was 1.33 to 1. That is to say, for every $1 received by a person without dependants, a person with dependants in the same general category would receive $1.33.

In the schedule that is before us as set forth in clause 4 of this measure the ratio varies, but it does discriminate against the person with dependants. For example, if we start at the top of the table we see that the weekly benefit rate for a person without dependants is $13 and for a person with dependants it is $17. The ratio between these two figures is 1.30 to 1. In other words, the person with dependants would receive $1.30 compared with $1 received by the person without dependants. If we move to the bottom of the table the two figures are $42 and $53, which produces a ratio of 1.26 to 1.

So it will be seen that in the measure the government is seeking to repeal the married man had the benefit of a ratio of 1.33 to 1 over a single man whereas in the proposal now presented by the government the ratio is from 1.30 down to 1.26 to 1. In my opinion this is a definite indication of discrimination against people who, by and large, need greater help than persons who have no obligations to others. When the minister closes the debate I hope he will give some reason for this rather unusual approach on the part of the government which in effect discriminates against married workers. If this matter is not dealt with adequately in the reply of the minister, then it will certainly be dealt with when we move into committee study of the bill because to me this is a shocking discrimination.

I made mention of the Gill report that was commissioned on July 17, 1961 and completed with the volume issued in November, 1962. Perhaps it is a good idea to refresh our minds on some of the points made by that report. However, before I do so may I say that the minister has given some reasons for bringing a more comprehensive measure before us at this time. For example, there are the 24,000 plus cases of fraud. That example, with others, shows the dilatoriness of this government in coming to grips with a contentious public issue. I think the government might have introduced the amendments which have been suggested to it. The measures which have been introduced are tantamount to a confession by the government that inflation is rampant in this country. The government could have made this measure more palatable to the public had the competent and conscientious suggestions of the Gill committee on the Unemployment Insurance Act been heeded. At page 103 the Gill report says:

> A plan of unemployment insurance should therefore confine itself to payment of indemnity for wages lost by reason of the failure to obtain employment where the person concerned could, in the light of his previous employment record, reasonably expect to have obtained it.
> It is another general insurance principle that the event insured against must be outside of the control of the insured person or, if it is within his control, it must be undesired so that there is no inducement for him to bring about the event of his own volition. Unemployment insurance suffers particular difficulties in this regard because the event insured against—unemployment—is not always undesired by the insured person. He may bring it about personally (voluntary quitting) or, once unemployed, he may prefer that state to employment. Thus it is important to see to it that the amount of indemnity is not so large in relation to wages as to encourage insured persons to prefer unemployment to employment. On the other hand, from the viewpoint of the social effectiveness of the plan, it is desirable to have the indemnity as nearly as possible equal to the lost wages.

On page 105 of the report the following point is made:

> The present unemployment insurance plan, although satisfactory enough in its basic structure, has by reason of amendments over the years departed unduly from insurance principles appropriate to such a plan. Undoubtedly each such amendment appeared justifiable at the time in terms of the social problem that the amendment was designed to meet, but as such amendments have accumulated, the insurance concept has been pushed more and more into the background. The existing situation is one where, in attempting to assess the validity of any proposed amendment, it is impossible to determine any consistent set of principles by which the amendment can be judged. The plan is neither a valid insurance plan in its present form nor is it a socially desirable type of income supplement, since in many cases the income supplement goes where it is not needed and fails to go where such supplement should go.

In his report Mr. Gill and his confreres dealt with what may be the most vexatious problem in the field of unemployment insurance, the matter of seasonal unemployment and seasonal benefits. I read from page 129 of the report:

> The benefits are "seasonal" in that they are confined to a certain season of the year and no doubt they are availed of to a very considerable extent by persons who are in seasonal occupations and who find themselves unemployed in a regular pattern during the winter months of each year. The payment of seasonal benefit is not, however, confined to persons who are occupied in seasonal employments in the normal sense in which that term is used. It might be more appropriate, therefore, if this program were referred to as a program of "winter benefit" rather than "seasonal benefit".
> Under the program that we recommend, seasonal benefit in its present form would disappear. It would be replaced to a substantial extent by the plan of extended benefits to be described subsequently, and the existing unemployment assistance plan.

In that paragraph there is reference to a later part of the Gill report. I continue reading:

> We may say that the existing seasonal benefit was the subject of more criticisms in briefs that we received than perhaps any other single feature of the existing plan. It appeared to us that the criticism rested on two points. The first was that to a substantial extent the recipients of seasonal benefit are persons who are engaged in seasonal employment and expect to become unemployed during the winter months of each year as a regular pattern. Thus the critics complained that the benefit is not an "insurance" benefit at all but is, instead, a subsidy to persons who are engaged in insured employment for only part of the year as a regular pattern. The objection was not so much that persons who work in insured employment only part of the year receive a subsidy during the off season, but rather that the subsidy is drawn from the insurance plan and is financed by insurance contributions.

In other words, Gill is saying that in its dealings with seasonal or winter unemployment there is a departure in the act from the ordinary insurance principle, which strikes at the actuarial soundness of the unemployment insurance fund.

Another major criticism that is made in the report is about the qualification for seasonal benefit. Near the bottom of the page is found this comment:

> Many persons seemed to feel that the payment of seasonal benefit would perhaps not be objectionable in itself if it were financed by the general taxpayer rather than by those who were contributing to an insurance plan.

The next point to be dealt with in the Gill report has to do with abuses. I shall read the entire paragraph under the heading "Abuses" which appears on page 133 of the report:

> The principal classes of alleged abuse that were drawn to our attention in representations made to us, apart from the question of payment of benefit to seasonal workers during their off season as just discussed, related to (a) the drawing of benefit by married women who are not in fact seeking employment; (b) the drawing of benefit by persons who have retired on pension and who are not in fact seeking employment; (c) the taking of too narrow a view by claimants and possibly by the administration as to the types of employment that constitute "suitable employment" in any individual case; (d) the failure by some claimants to disclose earnings during weeks of partial unemployment; (e) the failure by some claimants to disclose the true facts concerning their availability for employment; and (f) collusion between employers and employees in failing to give adequate information respecting the reasons for termination.

The report makes a strong case for an overhaul of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The public would be in sympathy with such action. But instead of doing any such thing the government has presented a measure which seeks, as I have said, to atone late in the day for the increase in inflation which this country has suffered since the current schedule of benefits was enacted by parliament. This has been done by increasing the salary level below which a person is eligible to pay for unemployment insurance and by increasing contributions and increasing benefits. Because of the social good that will flow from increased benefits I think the attempt is reasonable and worth while. Nevertheless, it is an attempt by the government to atone late in the day for the inflation it has unleashed on the country during the last number of years.

• (12:20 p.m.)

It fails to come to grips with several important things. It fails to come to grips with the insurance principle which should lie at the heart of unemployment insurance, and it certainly discriminates against the married worker, the man with obligations. I hope the minister and his advisers will at least look at the schedule in clause 4 to see whether a better arrangement can be made for persons with dependants so they may enjoy at least the same ratio of benefit as those who do not bear the awesome responsibility of dependants. I hope the minister and his advisers will make a quick check on this point and correct what in my view is a most obvious injustice in this measure.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) in welcoming back to the house the former minister of labour. His absence has been so noticeable that we wonder—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will permit me to say at this time that it is against the usage of this house for hon. members to comment on the presence or absence of other members. It seems to me this is a practice which is creeping into our debates. Last week we heard members of the government side referring to the absence of members on the opposition side. Today we heard similar comments from the opposition. I suggest to hon. members that it is not a good practice.

Mr. Barnett: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In spite of the somewhat unusual circumstances which prevail at the present time I will defer to your wishes in this regard. One of the points I had in mind was that I wished to indicate that the minister now in charge of this bill is a former minister of labour and this being the case we can assume he has sufficient knowledge and experience to deal with points raised in relation to unemployment insurance as this measure proceeds through the house.

In his opening statement the minister referred both to matters dealt with in the bill and to matters related to the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act which perhaps lie outside the scope of the bill. I find it much easier to deal with what is contained in the bill rather than with what is omitted. As I understand it, this measure is simply a repeat performance of a bill which was brought into the house by way of an amendment to the act in 1959. To this extent it underlines two points, one of which the minister has referred to. First, the current levels of contributions and benefits have become outdated and, second, the main body of legislation dealing with unemployment insurance has not been touched since 1959. Indeed, one will find upon checking the legislation that it has not been touched to any noticeable extent since 1955 when some of us, including the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), sat on a committee of this house that gave detailed consideration to the act.

The changes proposed in the levels of benefits and contributions and in the ratio between the two could perhaps be better analysed and discussed in detail in committee. The minister indicated that according to his estimate the ratio between wages and benefits payable will be roughly 50 per cent in the higher brackets and perhaps a little more in the lower brackets. The bill maintains a somewhat weighted formula in respect of lower wage earners. This is true of the act as amended in 1955 and I believe it is a principle which was incorporated in the act which preceded the 1955 version.

Consideration of what has happened to wage levels and their relationship to real income does, of course, raise a wide area of debate and covers a field far beyond the immediate scope of this bill. It is a subject which has attracted considerable attention in other debates in this house recently. I shall not enter into such consideration so far as the principle of the bill before us is concerned. I shall merely repeat the expressions of concern which have been forthcoming from many of my hon. friends about the drift that now seems to be evident with regard to the whole matter of the relationship between wages and real income, and between unemployment insurance benefits and the decreasing purchasing value of the dollar.

As we see it, in this important area about all the government is prepared to do directly is attempt from time to time to bring benefits into some rough relationship with what is happening in the economy. The unfortunate result of such an approach is that over a period such as has elapsed since 1959 a great many people have been receiving benefits obviously out of line with current wage levels or the purchasing power of the dollars they receive. This is really not a satisfactory method of coping with the situation, especially if the general drift in the economy to which many members in this group have referred is allowed to continue. Perhaps there should be greater flexibility within the act itself.

I realize that the ratio of benefits to contributions involves an important matter of public policy, but I certainly feel this house should consider whether or not, instead of a haphazard and spasmodic attempt to readjust this relationship, a more satisfactory way of achieving this result ought to be sought. Bearing in mind the needs of the people who are to receive unemployment insurance benefits, should not some mechanism be written into the act whereby necessary adjustments would take place more automatically?

I should like the minister to tell us, if he can, what the effect of these proposed changes is likely to be upon the fund itself. I do not think this aspect was covered in his opening remarks. This leads, of course, to the question of what is likely to happen to the level of employment in the economy. As I read the last annual report of the fund for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1966—I believe this is the last report available; at least it is the last I was able to find—it showed an excess of receipts over disbursements amounting to over $100 million. As a result the balance in the fund increased fairly substantially that year.

When the minister closes the debate on second reading I hope he will be able to give us more recent statistics concerning the present status of the fund, and related to them should be his projection of what is going to happen to the fund. That projection should be based not only on the present level of applicants but also on what might happen to the fund if some of the policies which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) has been putting forward continue to be the policies of the government.

The question of what happens to the fund when even a fairly modest increase takes place in the percentage ratio of unemployed is something about which we have to be concerned when we are considering the establishment of a new schedule of contribution rates and benefits. I am sure the minister recalls the days when the fund had a comfortable balance of close to $1 billion and what happened to that balance very quickly. I realize that development with respect to the fund's assets did not occur when he was a member of the government, but I suggest to him that if the present course of action of this government continues there could easily be a repeat performance and parliament could be called upon, as in the past, to replenish the fund out of consolidated revenues.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) made fairly extensive reference to the Gill commission report which, as we all know, was tabled in 1962. I must admit it has been quite some time since I really looked at that now rather hoary document, but I notice that my copy appears to be fairly well worn and therefore at some point I must have spent some time looking through it. If I have not looked at it recently it is because it has now become such a hoary document that one wonders whether it is worth looking at. One wonders whether we may have another commission of inquiry into unemployment insurance which will completely negate the recommendations of the Gill commission. In any event, for a long period we have had no indication from the government of what it is prepared to do about the Gill commission recommendations, and so it seems hardly worth while bringing the name of that commission into the debate on a bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare referred to a general revision of the act. Some of us are getting a bit sick and tired of hearing references to a general revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act when year after year goes by and nothing even remotely related to such a revision appears on the order paper. One thing we should take into account is that while there has been no general revision of the act some rather radical changes have been made in recent times in the manner in which unemployment insurance is administered. These have been made without any real reference to parliament and have resulted from reorganization by the minister. Undoubtedly they created problems across the country in the application of the act.

The problems that have arisen in providing benefits must be taken into consideration. The minister made reference to the uncovering of abuses in drawing from the funds provided under the act. More than once I have stated to gatherings of working people that the unemployment insurance fund belongs to the working people of Canada and anybody who draws money from it to which he is not rightly entitled is in exactly the same position as a person who reaches into the pocket of the man sitting beside him and removes money from that pocket.

In his references to a stepped-up program to track down and eliminate abuses it seems to me that in effect the minister was admitting that many people in Canada have become so disgusted with the delay in making changes in the arrangements under the act that they have become accustomed to regard it as a form of welfare payment to which they have entitlement if in need, whether or not they meet its technical requirements. Enough of them have encountered frustrations in trying to secure what they thought was rightfully theirs under the act that they have been encouraged to short circuit some of the administrative procedures, rules and regulations. I cannot recall exactly the figure which the minister gave as the amount of money garnered from the fund illegally, but the responsibility for that must not be placed solely on the people who have been successful in getting it. Rather it should be attributed to the general state of mind which has been allowed to develop toward the fund and its purposes, caused by government inactivity in bringing about real, useful and meaningful changes in the unemployment insurance program.

When the minister referred to a general revision of the act he said this was a matter of great concern and that a proposal would be introduced as soon as practicable. That was a statesmanlike phrase in the great Liberal tradition. In fact I could not help but think that perhaps in the light of certain developments within his own party the minister was trying to wrap the cloak of Mackenzie King around himself and express the kind of concept developed by the Liberal party which is sometimes said to have begun in 1919. I suggest to the minister that in the light of 1968 that kind of cloak is becoming a bit hoary and that even among the members of his own party there are those who are not too satisfied with this slow and measured pace toward the millenium.

I suppose I could attempt to incite the minister into indicating when he thinks it will be practicable to introduce a general revision of the act, but quite frankly I do not know whether it would be worth while. I realize that unless the minister has something in his mind different from the language he used when introducing the bill the answer I would get would be evasive. In any event the question of when it will be practicable to bring in a general revision of the act has become an academic exercise at best as long as the present government remains in office because it always seems to be a question this year, next year, some time, never, proposition. One merely has to hold up the antiquated, well-thumbed report of the Gill Commission in order to emphasize the point I am trying to make. Without going too far beyond the scope of the bill I believe I have indicated the general dissatisfaction some of us have about the manner in which the government has been approaching this particular aspect of our social life. After all, this administration has been in office since 1963.

In closing I should like to deal with one other point which may be discussed in greater detail by one or two of my colleagues. I have in mind the administrative change which has resulted in the closing of many local offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. We have seen the development of a hodgepodge of miscellaneous programs with which the Minister of National Health and Welfare is familiar, such as the supplementary benefit, the Canada Assistance Plan and so on. Coupled with these we have the other plans which come under the provincial sphere of jurisdiction such as unemployment assistance, social welfare and others. We have now reached a point where an increasing number of people just do not know where to go in order to ascertain the benefits to which they are entitled.

I believe some sort of functional administration should be established so that some person would be available who could advise people, for instance, that while they are not entitled under the rules to unemployment insurance they may be entitled to something else. This person would then advise them to what assistance they might be entitled. In this way we might be able to reduce some of the attempts to abuse the fund. When people are unemployed, ill or in need of funds with which to purchase groceries it is not unnatural that they should want to have those funds available. The very existence of the unemployment insurance fund, as well as the publicity about the Canada Assistance Plan and a guaranteed floor under which the income of no Canadian will fall, is an indication that there is some governmental responsibility in this regard. Therefore it is not surprising that many people believe they are entitled to benefits from this fund. It is a public fund in any event, whatever its source.

The division of services between the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the manpower branch of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, whereby the employment office function and unemployment insurance have been separated, means that in many communities there is no place to which a person can go in order to discuss his unemployment insurance with someone who is officially charged with the responsibility of providing such information. He must obtain such information by letter, long distance telephone or by driving 50, 100 or 150 miles. He will have access to an office of the manpower administration but is unlikely to find anyone there who can give him information concerning unemployment insurance. A recent letter I have received would seem to indicate that in the opinion of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) and the commission it is not considered necessary to have even an agent at such offices who could assist in the preparation of application forms.

I appreciate any efforts which are made to reduce the administrative costs in respect of any of these plans. I suggest, however, it is not proper that people should be left sitting high and dry in increasing numbers and then have to write to their members of parliament to ask where they should go in order to make application for unemployment insurance or for assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan. I believe the idea of having someone located in a district who could give advice in respect of these various plans should be seriously considered because they have grown up more or less like Topsy. By this means we would be able to reduce the administrative overhead not only in respect of unemployment insurance but also in respect of a great number of other plans. While I realize that this point may not be directly related to the principle of the bill I believe it is a matter of importance in respect of the operation of the unemployment insurance scheme, the collection of contributions and the determination of whether or not these contributions are collected properly by an employer, as well as establishing that the application is in order to determine whether or not a person is qualified.

When the minister closes the debate I hope he will comment on whether or not such an idea has occurred to him or has been considered by the government in discussions with the provincial administrations. The basic changes in the concept of unemployment insurance have been such that they have created a good deal of confusion. One may ask whether it is merely a transitional confusion or a confusion which is inherent in the situation that is being developed at the administrative level. I believe this is an important question and one on which the minister might make some comment before this debate concludes.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the additional assistance which Bill No. C-197 will give to the great number of unemployed in our country. However, I think that this bill will bring about no improvement for Canadians as a whole because, once again, our manufacturers, our industrialists, in short, all our employers and workers will have to spend more money.

You will recall the increase in the sales tax on building materials which led many businesses to bankruptcy and caused a decline in the rate of construction.

It is obvious that an increase in the unemployment insurance contributions paid by workers and employers will cause serious difficulties. It is unfortunate that they will be called upon, once again, to pay the price of automation since, on the whole, the problem we face is due to automation, the consequence of many centuries of efforts and experience.

New inventions and technological progress should make it possible to reduce the working hours of Canadians who could have longer hours of leisure and use them for their own development. It is true that the blue or white collar workers depend a lot on all kinds of machines, from small motors to electronic computers and heavy machinery operated by oil, electricity or electrons. The results in that field are wonderful but, at the same time, the worker feels a growing uneasiness.

The worker who should be happy about those satisfactory results, who should be proud of the methods he has developed to earn his living, is worried and his happiness is replaced by fear. In his work, he depends on the machine, but he is afraid of being displaced by it. Workers have never been so worried. Our unemployed fall in two clearly defined groups: Some who would willingly do anything to keep their jobs and others who are desperately seeking work.

The present act is a mere palliative, in that it only enables workers to earn a bare living. Both groups are handicapped. Those who keep their jobs must pay more and those who lose them must manage with $30 or $35 a week to support their families decently, when under normal conditions, they could be earning from $100 to $125 a week.

The officials who have to administer the Unemployment Insurance Act are also faced with serious problems, because they are caught, on the one hand, between a limited amount of contributions and, on the other hand, an unlimited number of unemployed. A large number of citizens are also cornered by rules requiring a certain number of weeks in a given period to be eligible for benefits.

The problem grows more rapidly than the legislation improves. The bill now under study was thought out two years ago, or last year, and it will be obsolete when it becomes law, because it will have been overtaken by the higher cost of living. I also maintain that the present legislation is incomplete, since it does not cover all workers, all Canadians. Thousands of people are unemployed and go to the welfare bureau; thousands of people who have not had a chance to work regularly in the last year or so are forced to go to welfare bureau. Thousands of young people who are 19, 20, 21 years of age and who left school last year or this year with grade 6 or 7 diplomas, or trade certificates, are up against the same problem because, all in all, the act does not protect them.

These men did not work long enough and did not contribute enough to be eligible for benefits or for the training program. They do not have the right to register for the so-called retraining courses, simply because they have not contributed quite enough. Unless they have been unemployed or seeking work for three years, they cannot obtain help to improve their lot.

Unemployment insurance, which is financed jointly by the federal and provincial governments, is therefore financed through indirect and hidden taxes. In short, the unemployed finance themselves with their own assistance through the taxes they pay on all the products they consume.

Too many people are forced to resort to unemployment insurance, which is paid only after investigations have been made, and the officials responsible for them are overworked. Since the unemployed increase in numbers from week to week, one must often wait—regrettably—two or three months before obtaining anything.

Nevertheless, I shall take this opportunity to congratulate the department; we may not like to admit it, but there are, in the manpower centres, honest and respectable employees, people who truly work and are sincere, who want progress and try to help their fellow-men, people with good understanding. However, these people are human and they may have different ways of interpreting the law.

Mr. Speaker, may I remind you that it is one o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): The hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at one o'clock, I was extending congratulations.

This morning, I brought to the attention of the minister who is sponsoring the bill, that the employees of the manpower centres were working seriously, conscientiously and intelligently. But there are a few who, because they are human beings, may interpret the law in different ways, and even though these are isolated cases, I can say that some individuals who present themselves to some of these centres may be wronged.

I have before me the file of one of these unemployed and I take it upon myself to bring it to the attention of the minister. He is the head of a family, 57 years of age, who has always worked and who applies at the manpower centre. He draws benefits during 15 days. Afterwards, the centre writes to him as follows:

The amount of benefits has been reduced on account of the days where you stated that you were unavailable and where we considered you to be unavailable.

Our man returns to the centre and he gets a letter a few days later.

We have reconsidered your application for benefits. On the strength of information obtained, you are excluded from obtaining benefits for the following reasons: You have not proven that you were in a position and available to work, as prescribed under section 54(2)(a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Then, the man asks to be heard by the referees of the commission at the regional office. After the hearing, he is informed that:

The claimant, invited to appear at the hearing of his case before the board of referees, was present—

I will spare you the rest.

The claimant has brought forward no new evidence which would have allowed the members of the board of referees to change the decisions already taken. Therefore, the board of referees unanimously confirms the two decisions taken by the insurance officer and rejects the appeal made by the claimant.

This is rather strange. "The claimant has brought forward no new evidence which would have allowed the board of referees to change the decisions already taken". I suggest that this short sentence is quite important, Mr. Speaker. It is quite obvious that the man could not come up with something new, being a worker and not a lawyer. He is unable to invent new evidence. He has always argued his case and exposed the facts in all sincerity. Since he does not belong to any association or union, he is a little uncomfortable. He decides to meet his member of parliament, who asks the authorization to appeal to the regional office of the commission, as he is allowed to according to a commission rule which reads as follows:

RIGHT TO APPEAL

The act provides that an appeal from the decision of the board of referees can be submitted to the referee in Ottawa:

(1) by the insurance officer in any circumstances;

(2) by an association of employees of which the claimant was a member during his last period of employment preceding his application, and of which he remained a member until the date on which the appeal was made;

(3) by the claimant, if the decision of the board of referees is not unanimous;

(4) by a claimant whom the chairman of the board authorizes to make an appeal.

This paragraph gave the member the right to make his request to the referee in Ottawa.

All appeals to the referee must be filed with the office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

All these requirements had been met.

• (2:40 p.m.)

The answer goes on like this:

Following your letter—

That is the office of the commission which advises the member that a form has been sent to the claimant.

Following your letter in which you ask for the authorization which will enable you to take the case of the above mentioned to the Canadian referee in Ottawa, we must tell you that we have sent that gentleman a form he must complete and return to us as soon as possible.

Upon reception of that form, we will send his request to the chairman of the board of referees for study.

And the file includes the answer to all that, and I quote:

Following your letter about the above-mentioned, we must tell you that the chairman of the board of referees does not grant the authorization to appeal to the arbitrator. He feels that his case does not include any essential factor or any special circumstance which would warrant the authorization to appeal.

The case of a man unemployed for five or six months seems insignificant, but that is not the main point. It is not an unusual occurrence either, but that chap is waiting for his money. This does not count so much. All this because the man, a worker on the labour market, is totally unprotected, that is, outside the scope of arbitration boards or labour unions.

Since the implementation of the Unemployment Insurance Act, he has paid his contributions but has never withdrawn any benefits. It was the first time he has ever applied to the manpower centre. He always had a job and his last one required him to work thirteen hours a day. Therefore, due to his advanced age, being 57, he was forced to stop working. I think it is rather hard for a man of 57 to be working 13 hours a day. He told the official at the manpower centre that he was no longer able to work thirteen hours a day, but that he was willing to work eight hours a day, like everybody else.

Now, I claim a man has the right to be tired without being considered an outlaw. We have proof of that in the correspondence exchanged between the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. minister of transport. That correspondence can be found on page 2472 of the Hansard for September 25, 1967. Allow me to quote a few excerpts because they are really amusing.

September 5, 1967

The Rt. Hon. L. B. Pearson, M.P.
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mike:

Some time ago, I discussed my possible retirement from public life with you and you were good enough to assure me that if I wished to be president of the Canadian Transport Commission when the time came to set it up, you would recommend my appointment.

—after a good deal of reflection, I have come to the conclusion that, if you are still of the same mind, I would like to become president of the commission... While a demanding and responsible position, it would not involve the same pressures as there are upon a minister of the crown. Though my general health seems to be excellent, I have, as you know, found these pressures very great in the past three years.

—I feel that I should accept the opportunity for somewhat less strenuous public service offered by the presidency of the Canadian Transport Commission and, if you agree, ask you to accept my resignation as Minister of Transport as soon as it is convenient for you to have the commission established.

And it is signed by the Minister of Transport Mr. J. W. Pickersgill.

We know the results. It did not take long. All the minister, exhausted by a $35,000 a year job, had to do was to send a simple letter to find himself a $45,000 a year job. But, for the ordinary guy, who has worked all his life for a small salary, who has paid unemployment insurance for many a year, who has struggled along, and spared no effort for 45 years, I would consider that it means destitution. Because that builder said he was tired, he is considered an outlaw. On the simple decision of a civil servant at the manpower centre, he is treated like a mangy dog.

Now, that man will not go without food, will not die of hunger either, because we have many welfare laws in our country. He need only apply for help. He has the right to go to the manpower centre. We know unemployment insurance helps the man who is out of work, but only after an investigation. If a worker manages, in spite of a small salary, to save a few dollars during his years of work, the civil servants at the manpower centre first advises him to spend those savings and, then to come back again. There again, the simple decision of an employee of the manpower centre will force a fellow to spend the $1,000 or $2,000 he has managed to save during his 45 years of work before he becomes entitled to receiving a few cents from unemployment insurance.

I regret to say those things to the minister, the sponsor of the bill. He is not abreast of the situation, and it is too bad that the one actually responsible is not here today. In the case I mentioned, I am convinced he should not be forced to spend all his savings. It is a simple matter of honesty, justice and common sense.

If a minister is entitled to be tired and rest at $45,000 a year, I suppose a worker should have the right to withdraw what he is entitled to and expects. He has earned unemployment insurance benefits by paying thousands of dollars in dues throughout his life, and if he found a job first thing tomorrow morning, the government would find a way of catching up with him, and every week he would have to pay his unemployment insurance dues. He has been classified as "no good" to enable him to receive benefits, but he is totally unqualified to pay his dues. Yet, he simply said that he did not want to work thirteen hours a day but just eight.

Unemployment Insurance Act

Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the house to a somewhat similar case. This concerns a married woman, a widow with three children aged eight to fifteen. She had earned $85 a week for 4 years as the manager of a firm. Following a change in administration, she was fired. So she went to a manpower centre. After waiting a month, she was offered work at $35 a week. Try as she might to explain that she cannot think for a second of making both ends meet on $35 a week, that she could not possibly take that job, she is outlawed, she no longer receives unemployment insurance benefits. She goes before the board, which again rules against her. She tries to appeal to Ottawa and there again, the district office denies her permission to appeal.

That is nonsense to me and I should like the responsible department to deal with problems such as this one. I maintain that it should be easy enough to settle it, as the Unemployment Insurance Commission has all the personnel it needs. I believe it could be solved by appointing to the pay office the employees who are good collectors and to the collection office, the ones who pay badly. The whole problem would be solved overnight.

Now, all decisions of that kind are not always made in a natural way. I believe some officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission come to decisions for fear of being short of money. They realize there is not much left in the Unemployment Insurance Fund. A mere look at the Montreal area would convince anybody of that. When we consider that there were 67,771 unemployed in January 1968, it is obvious that this is disheartening for the workers, for those who are waiting for their benefits. It is also disheartening for the commission employees. They are overburdened with work and it is difficult for them to answer everyone, for they are unable to do all that work from one week to the other. It is only natural that unfair decisions should be made in some cases.

There is the case of another person in the Montreal region, a Canadian citizen who had been working for two years in an ironworks plant. One can imagine what happened there. As soon as road construction slowed down, this man was fired. That happened on January 6. A few days later, he received a letter which said:

> We have examined your benefit application. According to the information obtained, you are ineligible for benefits under sections 146 to 148 of the unemployment insurance regulations, and payments will therefore be suspended as from January 7, 1968.

It was easy to suspend payments since he had never received any. This worker was fired on the morning of the 6th; he went to the manpower centre in the afternoon of the same day. His case had already been examined on January 7, and he had been struck off the list. It was done quite quickly and easily. He has come to the manpower centre every week since then. We are now in the middle of February, and he has not yet touched a penny. In my opinion, this is very unjust, because a person who is unemployed needs that money.

I notice that when public servants want to be pleasant, they can. For example, the members who are paid $18,000 a year were supposed to get their mid-December pay on the last day of the month, the 31st, but they received it ten days earlier, on the 21st. We, members of the house, who get $18,000 a year, are paid a week and a half in advance, but those who lose their jobs have to wait month and a half to get a scanty $30 a week.

Mr. Speaker, I would like such matters to be taken into consideration. I understand that the problem nowadays is one of automation, but we are moving in a vicious circle. We are taking money out of the pockets of those who are lucky enough to still have a job, in order to give it to those who are unlucky and do not have a job any more, but both, the working man and the unemployed, have less and less money to spend in stores. Therefore, stocks are building up in warehouses, manufacturers are laying off more employees. We are moving in a vicious circle and we do not seem to be willing to find a way out of it. From one day to the next, the gap grows wider between the purchasing power and the large supply of goods for sale.

If there are so many unemployed while stores are chock full of goods, it is because production plays its role very well, and with fewer employees at that. It is obvious that everyone should be able to do his share of work in the national production. The whole system must be restructured, first of all by reducing the hours of work. The industrialist who now has three shifts working eight hours a day, for a continuous 24-hour production, should consider, it seems to me, hiring a fourth shift and have everyone work six hours a day. That alone would mean that 50 per cent of all the unemployed in the land would be rehired in one fell swoop.

If that procedure were established, it is obvious that even tomorrow morning, the industrialist would play his part. The state would then have to play its own role. As fewer hours of work would give less money to the worker, the state would compensate for this reduced income by increasing family allowances, and granting a substantial subsidy to mothers who have to stay at home to take care of their family.

I should like the cabinet to study those questions, because unemployment figures prove that the present government has failed. Moreover, the government should study the possibility of making necessary improvements.

I am sorry that I have to direct some blame to the new minister, whether the regular minister or the new minister appointed last week. They are two hon. members whom I should not like to blame in the least. Let us take the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) except for blaming him because he has accomplished little in the field of family allowances, we owe him nothing but congratulations. It is unfortunate that he had to replace today the one who is absent, but, in any event, it is a fait accompli. Today's situation is due to the minister's absence, just like other situations are due to mass resignations. We are living through a period of resignations. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has resigned. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) is considering his resignation. The Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) is thinking about leaving politics. In order to resign, Mr. Speaker, I presume it is necessary to have well-lined pockets.

Nevertheless in spite of all those departures, I hope there will be enough goodwill left in the cabinet to look after those who have empty pockets indeed and lack the necessities of life.

[English]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks in connection with this bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. This is one more of a series of bills that are confessions of failure on the part of the government to tackle inflation adequately. Amounts of money that seemed sufficient a few years ago to provide for the temporary needs of people are now grossly inadequate because of the spiral of inflation, and it seems unfortunate that as each of these confessions comes along it has a tendency to add to this spiralling effect.

We in Social Credit have for a long time advocated various changes and reforms in monetary policy. We have advocated various moves which would lower interest rates in this country but have always been subjected to a great deal of criticism as a result. It has been said that the system now in operation is the best of all possible systems, that everything will work out all right in the end and it cannot be tampered with. Yet, Mr. Speaker, over and over again we see that the present system is not adequate to meet the problems of the day and that parliament is constantly called upon to patch up, to amend, to provide a stopgap or fill-in in an effort to try to do something to ameliorate the situation. Parliament attempts to do these things without any guarantee or assurance that the government is really moving to solve the basic economic problems that confront the country.

We have had no assurance even that the whole Unemployment Insurance Act will shortly be reviewed or, much more important than the review of a single piece of legislation, that the act will be reviewed in the light of the Income Tax Act as well as a whole host of proposals for taxation reform. I speak not just of the Carter report but of the reactions to the report, some of which have produced extremely constructive proposals that merit a great deal of study on the part of the government. They are proposals that should be studied along with the policy in relation to welfare payments, pension payments and the whole vast network that has been built up piece by piece through the years, each piece having been added without relation to the rest of the system.

Let me mention the minimum wage laws we have today. Even now members of the house are advocating that the minimum wage provided for be increased considerably. Just because such a move is advocated does not mean it will necessarily be put into practice. Nevertheless that suggestion has been made. We realize, of course, that the minimum wage legislation tends to increase the pool of unemployed, of whom we have a great many in Canada, because we have failed to develop our educational facilities. We have never had any adequate proposals in relation to providing the necessary finances for this kind of non-profit, public institution. We have lacked any sound system of public financing through the years.

Unemployment Insurance Act

We hear criticisms about seasonal labour and the impact that seasonal labour has upon the unemployment insurance fund. Any abuses in this regard should be taken care of. However, to those who criticize seasonal labour I direct this simple question: How would they like to change places with the people who must rely on seasonal labour? From the labour point of view a season in Canada can be extremely short, often extending merely from early to late summer or early fall. This means that people who depend on seasonal labour face a long winter without income, which is a serious consideration indeed. The Unemployment Insurance Act functions at the present time in a way that aids and assists these people. Whether it should function that way is another question. Until there is a major review of the entire system and until some other way is found to put a floor under such people and to provide the type of economy that will reduce that pool to a minimum, the present plan is the next best thing.

The Carter commission speaks well of unemployment insurance, saying that unemployment insurance gives us a method of injecting money into the economy when it is slowing down. Though Carter had high praise for unemployment insurance one wonders whether, instead of being an insurance scheme, it is not a scheme to redistribute income. So long as its function is to redistribute income and so long as it is sold to the people of Canada as an insurance scheme—here we see two incompatible elements of the scheme—we are bound to have difficulties in administering the scheme and in making its purpose effective. Such a scheme will hinder the adequate development of a more comprehensive system of providing a guaranteed income to Canadians.

I could cite examples of what I mean. One example involves a gentleman who is not quite eligible for the old age security pension and whose wife suffered a severe stroke some years ago. She is almost completely incapacitated. By making heroic efforts they have managed between them to maintain a home and to function as normally as they possibly could. Because of his wife's disability the man had to give up a job which paid an adequate income. He devotes a great deal of time to taking care of her. Of course he could have abandoned her completely, I suppose, to the arms of welfare assistance by disappearing. But he did not do that. He did not choose the easy way but chose instead to keep his family together and to take the high road of duty and consideration.

He thought that his wife obviously would qualify for assistance, and after all we heard about the Canada Assistance Plan one would think he would have had no problems in securing assistance after that plan came into effect. His inadequate income from his seasonal employment is supplemented by unemployment insurance payments. The welfare people do not consider these payments as insurance payments; they regard them as income. His fluctuating income from work, added to what he receives by way of unemployment insurance payments, brings his income to the point where the welfare people, who must dutifully follow their regulations, frequently cut off the assistance that is granted to his wife.

And so this game goes on. He is involved with three possible sources of income. To those three possible sources has now been added a fourth source. His wife has become eligible for old age security income and she now gets $75 a month, the result being that the extra assistance has disappeared. At the same time she was also sent a form which asked her to apply for the guaranteed annual income supplement. We know, of course, that this is not a true guaranteed income to her since the husband's income must be considered at the same time. This highlights a basic fault in the guaranteed supplement program that drives many to despair. The husband's and wife's incomes are considered together, whereas they ought to have a choice of lumping their incomes together or treating them separately according to which course of action will give greater advantage to each of them as individuals. The over-all amounts would not be too great, even when one considers the kind of pennypinching that goes on.

Yet another factor must be considered. The wife wonders whether she should apply for the guaranteed income supplement. She may be eligible for it when her husband is not working but she wonders whether she will be eligible for any part of the extra $30 a month when he is working. The difficulty is that he cannot estimate his income for the coming year as there is always the possibility that it may be greater than the amount which will make her eligible for the extra supplement. Should he earn more than he anticipated, will this couple have to repay their so-called overpayments? It would take one who is conversant with higher mathematics or is an accountant to determine whether his unreliable income from work, when lumped together with government payments, would bar her from applying for the guaranteed income supplement.

These remarks illustrate what I mean when I say that these programs ought to be completely and totally reviewed. Couples ought not to be placed in the baffling predicament of not being able to determine by themselves the course of action to take. Our welfare officers ought not to be restricted by regulations whose application they themselves describe as harsh. Our welfare officers would much rather not have to write to people and demand repayment in whole or in part of any moneys that have been paid out. I think the answer in part is to simplify procedures under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Instead of thinking of unemployment insurance payments as income, as our welfare people seem to do, they ought to be considered as true insurance payments and should not be considered as income. After all, an insurance payment is paid for a loss; it does not constitute a gain. If you insure your house against fire and it burns down you have not gained. You have lost something, and when you are indemnified you receive only partial payment for what is lost. Similarly if a person becomes unemployed he has lost his job and the insurance payment he receives is only a partial payment to compensate him for the full salary he has lost. Even if the amendment is passed and the new figures are introduced the unemployment insurance payment will still constitute only a partial payment of what most individuals would have earned had they not lost their jobs. I wish that federal and provincial welfare authorities would look at these payments in that light. Also, I wish that those responsible would see to it that current practices carried out under the unemployment insurance legislation are simplified.

We should also bear in mind the situation faced by those who have no pension plan and are still working. Though they may have reached pensionable age they cannot quit of their own accord because the old age pension would be so much lower than what they could make if they continued to work. If they did quit, no unemployment insurance benefit would be available to them. It would be withheld because they would have left their jobs of their own accord. But if they were employed by a company which had a pension plan they would be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits over a period of time because they would have been laid off or retired by the company concerned. I suggest we could improve the act by writing into it a system whereby persons who have paid into the fund over a certain number of years would have a right to benefit in such circumstances.

Our attention has also been called to the situation of older people who lose out partly because they have never learned the ropes so far as the unemployment insurance administration is concerned. They have been too busy working steadily throughout the years until they have to quit through no fault of their own. The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) gave an example of the kind of case I have in mind. I have had such cases brought to my attention on a number of occasions. All possibility of collecting at any time in the future is lost. Yet it seems to me that if this scheme is to function as an insurance scheme a person who has paid into it over a long period of time and never drawn anything out should have the right to benefit. If any private insurance company in Canada functioned like this plan does it would be quickly run out of business by government inspectors. It could not get away with collecting money for a long period and then refusing to pay anything back in the end.

I should like to refer now to a point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) concerning the consolidation of the offices and the inconvenience suffered by Canadians who find themselves many miles away from the nearest office. I used to receive numerous letters bringing this and other matters to my attention before the consolidation of the offices. The nearest one has now been moved well outside my constituency and in the last few months I have not received a single specific complaint. I would like to think this means everything is going well, that the consolidation has worked well and that people do not have any more problems. I suspect, however, that the office is now so far away that people who might otherwise write to me despair of finding any redress for their complaints. They are hesitant to spend money on a trip to the office if they lose their jobs and they hesitate to hire someone else to do it for them because that would cost even more. When their savings are dwindling and there is no prospect of another job they hold on to what they have as long as they can.

I hope the greatest care is given in this consolidation of offices to seeing that people who live at a distance receive the utmost consideration. I agree entirely with the suggestion that we should appoint people whose task would be to investigate special cases. I am afraid that far from everything being marvelous at the moment, very real problems still exist.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we are dealing with a measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act so as to increase the benefits payable to the unemployed and extend coverage to new groups of persons.

While generally I support these principles I have a few reservations I should like to bring to the attention of the house which I believe disturbed many Canadians when they heard this bill was to be brought forward. I refer mainly to people who are to be included in the plan for the first time and who feel they will never have an opportunity of benefiting from the program though they will be obliged to pay into the fund. Their feeling is that the scheme is riddled with abuses and that their payments will only permit those abuses to continue. I do not agree with these criticisms but I feel they should be dealt with.

In general the criticisms we receive from our constituencies can be classified in four categories. First, there are those who disapprove of any unemployment insurance whatsoever. Second, there are those who while accepting such a program feel that abuses have been too widespread and that we should correct these abuses before extending coverage or benefits. Third, there are those who merely disagree with the proposal to pay increased benefits at this time and, last, there are others who disagree with the proposal to extend coverage.

I should like to deal with the first objection, the contention that unemployment insurance is unnecessary. When unemployment insurance was first introduced the intention was to provide income for those who were really out of work and who honestly could not find employment. To this extent it was certainly most worth while and useful. There was another important reason for introducing it. It was brought in so as to maintain purchasing power during periods of unemployment and recession with a view to limiting the extension of that recession. Again, this was a most valuable objective and one which in my opinion was justified. During the great depression men were laid off and once they were laid off and deprived of purchasing power the effect of their unemployment spread to the merchants who would normally sell them goods and services.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Unemployment insurance is in many respects like other insurance. Just as we insure ourselves against fire or automobile accidents we insure against the risk of losses resulting from unemployment. Just as we pay premiums for other types of insurance we pay premiums for unemployment insurance coverage. There are some people who believe that because they pay unemployment insurance premiums they have the right to collect at some time in their life. I find that this feeling is rather widespread, but it is hard to understand. People who hold other types of insurance do not think this way. Many of us pay high premiums for automobile insurance—I think much too high—but we do not expect or want to collect on that insurance. We take it out to protect us against costly, unforeseen automobile accidents, and we certainly do not look forward to the day when we have to collect on it. The same attitude should be adopted toward unemployment insurance. We pay it merely to protect ourselves against the possibility that we will be out of work against our will and cannot honestly find new employment. I think it is worth while to put forward these arguments from time to time because I believe there are a certain number of people in Canada who dispute the need for unemployment insurance. It is a very necessary program, for the two very important reasons I have mentioned.

I now wish to deal with the abuses that have been mentioned by other hon. members and that are referred to in more detail in the Gill commission report. Some of the more flagrant ones involve people who draw unemployment insurance while having part time jobs or other income, and people who draw unemployment benefits but are not honestly looking for work and who use those benefits to subsidize their laziness. Then there are married women whose husbands are making rather good incomes but who draw unemployment benefits when they are pregnant. There are people who are retired on good pensions and have no intention of going back to work but also draw unemployment insurance benefits. There is also the problem of seasonal workers, and the large group of people I have mentioned who feel they have a right to draw on this fund just because they have paid into it.

When the bill was introduced I had intended not to support it until I received a commitment from the government that it would do something concrete to correct these abuses and bring the act completely up to date. This afternoon I was pleased to hear the minister say that some steps have already been taken to correct these abuses and that others are in the works. However, I would like to have more detail on these measures to correct the abuses, and I would like a definite commitment from the government that it will soon bring the act completely up to date. When the minister is summing up on second reading perhaps he will give us more detailed information on what the department is doing to correct the abuses, and let us know what other measures will be introduced soon.

Some hon. members have referred to the fact that certain economists say that unemployment insurance encourages unemployment. I think this is a false argument. I do not believe that the small benefits we give to our unemployed encourage unemployment among those who are healthy and able to work. The vast majority of Canadians want to work. They enjoy working and only fall back on unemployment insurance benefits when they are honestly unemployed.

Speaking of the two specific matters dealt with in this bill I wish to say there is no doubt, if unemployment insurance is a good thing, that the benefits must be reasonable and must be sufficient to maintain a man and his family when he is unemployed. The present rates were introduced several years ago when incomes, rents and the standard of living were much lower than they are today. All these things have gone up. Nobody denies that they have gone up in recent years, and we must increase the benefits to make the unemployment insurance program reasonable and workable.

With respect to the provision in the bill extending coverage upward to include some people in the higher income groups, some people in these groups argue that they are in areas of employment, are receiving incomes, and are at stages in their lives when they are most unlikely to be unemployed. All I can say is that the statistics show that this is not so. Many people in the groups covered by this bill have been let go at advanced stages in their lives, men in their forties and fifties who had supervisory positions or who worked in clerical positions. This has been due to automation and technical innovation in Canada, factors which will progress more rapidly in the future. People in this category must also guard against the eventuality that they may become unemployed. It is not something we want but, just as we insure ourselves against fire, theft and automobile accidents, since statistics show that men in this category could be displaced by technological change and automation they should be included in this program in order to protect their incomes against unemployment.

During consideration of this bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act we must ask the question, how does unemployment insurance and a revision of unemployment insurance relate to the new concept of a guaranteed minimum income? Many people have suggested that there should be one comprehensive program to maintain incomes in the nation, to provide a minimum income to people who either cannot work or are unable to find work, to people who are blind, to the crippled and the elderly. There are a great many arguments in favour of this concept. I would hope the government will plan an over-all review of unemployment insurance and other social welfare programs. It seems to me that there might be very real benefit, and a saving through efficiency, if these programs were co-ordinated so that they would provide income to people who are honestly unemployed and honestly unable to work.

I conclude by saying that this measure is certainly needed. The rates of benefit must be brought up to date to correspond with today's cost of living. We must protect those people who are likely to be unemployed. I think it is worth while that we do so and that we pass this bill. However, I repeat that I want a statement from the minister when he closes the debate on second reading, giving a commitment that something will be done about the rampant abuses with regard to unemployment insurance which disturb many Canadians. If that is done this bill will be accepted by the Canadian people in good spirit and with good support.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the amendments in this bill because, as has been mentioned previously, it is time they were made. We are also grateful that certain amendments will be made to the regulations in order to clarify some of the anomalies in the Unemployment Insurance Act. I hope that the minister who is piloting this bill through the house will be like a good judge sitting in his first court and will look favourably and leniently upon the proposals I intend to make.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Having listened to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), we know there is much scope for abuses of the benefits which can be derived from the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, as is the case in respect of most legislation I believe there are people who become expert at finding and taking advantage of loopholes. Therefore I hope that the mere fact that there are loopholes will not justify anyone taking a stand against this bill. I too welcome a measure which will put some teeth into the regulations so that the act may be administered properly either in Ottawa or in the field. I should like to repeat, however, that many of the persons who apply for these benefits are neither scholars nor college graduates and sometimes do make mistakes which are not intentional.

I should like to be assured that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) would not vote against this legislation because he lives in the affluent society of Montreal. I would hope that he would think of the fishermen in some areas of the country who practice a very dangerous trade and who live with uncertainty because they can neither see the crop grow nor see it deplete. The area in which they must search for their product is such that their trade is an uncertain one. They work as hard as many others who are employed in other industries and I believe should be rewarded for their efforts. I am sure the hon. member would agree that if these fishermen are able to build up sufficient benefits they deserve to draw from the fund.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) has drawn our attention to many of the problems involved in the administration of the act. I will limit myself to a reference to one of the most important of these problems. I have in mind the closing down of unemployment insurance offices across the country. I have been assured that this was done after serious study and concern in respect of those who are involved either in paying contributions to or receiving benefits from the fund. However, it would seem to me that a great amount of poor judgment has been exercised in these deliberations. I believe that those who have made these decisions certainly have not been in contact with the persons who must do business with the unemployment insurance offices. I am sure the correspondence which has been received by members of parliament recently from their constituents establishes the fact that the act is not being administered as well as it was in the past before the closing down of these offices. The recent increase in unemployment may cause more problems in this regard in the future.

I should like to ask the minister to take another look at the situation which has arisen as a result of offices having been closed down across the country. I would hope he would do this in order to determine whether or not the decisions which have been taken were justified. There is always the danger, of course, that we are becoming too much involved in computerizing and centralizing the offices across the country. This no doubt is done for the purpose of bringing about efficiency. However, from the experience of the provincial governments and other agencies I am sure we realize that computer systems have not yet reached the stage where they are completely reliable, especially when it is important to make sure that those who need their unemployment insurance benefits on a certain date receive them on that date.

One of the greatest problems seems to be that we have lost contact with the people. As I said before, we must realize that we are dealing with all classes of people not all of whom are able to understand all the implications contained in this bill and in other legislation. The people who are entitled to these benefits should have offices close to them so they would be in a position to have a personal contact. I was very surprised to hear that the nearest unemployment insurance office to Whitehorse is 1,300 miles away at Prince George. When there are 20,000 people in the labour force in an area this would seem to be a rather long distance away for the nearest unemployment insurance office to be. It sometimes takes eight or ten days for a letter to go back and forth and sometimes four or five months before the benefits are received. It seems to me that in this instance the administration has gone a little too far.

In my region, which is a peninsula, two offices were closed down. The two most distant ones were closed down and the central one was retained. This has meant that the people must in some cases travel 250 miles in order to have personal contact with the office. Because of the mail situation during the past winter owing to storms and weather conditions generally the people in this area who are entitled to benefits sometimes have had to wait two, three or four weeks before receiving them. I am sure the minister realizes that the recipients of these benefits cannot afford to wait that long when it is necessary that they have this money in order to be able to purchase their groceries.

As I said before, this bill which amends the rates of contributions and benefits is very welcome. There is no doubt that the actuarial studies of this insurance plan have been seriously considered. I have reservations, however, about the ceiling of $7,800. I believe we have gone beyond the original intention of the bill by extending the ceiling to $7,800 a year. I believe that the majority of the people earning over $6,000 are never unemployed and yet they will now be required to pay into the fund. These people have college degrees, technical training or are employed in a trade and because there are plenty of jobs available to them they are not likely to be unemployed. This is very much like an individual insuring his house in case of fire, when he knows for a fact that the house will not burn. Surely such a man would not insure his house under those circumstances. I am sure this bill goes beyond the wishes of the people when it includes those who earn over $6,000. There is nothing in the bill about the new categories of individuals to be included, and I wonder whether this will be covered by the regulations or subsequent amendments. I hope people such as teachers and nurses will never be included in this category in relation to this unemployment insurance scheme.

Two months ago I spoke about fishermen. I would not dare suggest that fishermen should not receive unemployment insurance benefits, but perhaps we should look at the act to see whether there is another method to assure an appropriate income in relation to their labours. These people are not rewarded according to their efforts. We should set up some kind of study of this sector of our economy in order to understand properly how to convince the people in some parts of Canada that others are proportionately unrewarded for their hours of labour. I would certainly welcome a study of this kind.

I have a great deal of praise for the officers of the unemployment insurance commission, because I have always received courteous replies and attention to my requests. It is obvious from their letters they make an endeavour to get to the bottom of my problems. This helps me to answer queries posed by my constituents.

In 1966 I drew the minister's attention to what I thought was an anomaly. Workers in the forestry or lumbering industry are not allowed to contribute an amount to the unemployment insurance scheme equivalent to that contributed by other labourers. Let me give an example. Before certain amendments were brought forward to this act, workers in the lumbering industry were not allowed to contribute more than 78 cents on an income of $69 per week. Such individual was also limited in respect of the benefits he may receive. I suggest there should be some equalization in this regard, so that the contributions he makes are directly related to the benefits he receives. There should be some method of relating the payments made by individuals working in the forestry industry to those working in the general labour field. At this time there is an artificial ceiling on the benefits to which these people are entitled.

At the request of the forestry industry in my area I took this matter up with the minister. I also discussed this with officials of the unemployment insurance commission. As a result I discovered that the regulations were changed in July of 1966. Not being actively engaged in the lumbering industry I am not sure whether they have been applied since that time. I suggest to the minister that amendments should be made to allow those engaged in the lumbering industry to benefit on an equal basis with those engaged in other labour. They should be allowed to make proportionately higher contributions, and certainly higher than the maximum now allowed.

Let me refer to an individual who owns one truck, which he may use in the forestry, mining or fishing industry. This individual may be working for someone else. He should have the same advantage as an individual who owns a mechanical saw. I am not referring to someone who owns a number of trucks, because under these circumstances, having regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act, such person is an employer. These people who own one truck and operate it themselves should be entitled to the full benefits of the act. Their allowable contributions should be related to their incomes on the same basis contributions are calculated for other labourers.

The study to which I referred earlier should also take into consideration the situation regarding persons working in the forestry industry, particularly those who own equipment which they operate on forestry or construction jobs. These people should be entitled to the same benefits as others. They should be in the position to draw benefits if and when they become unemployed.

There are several other points I should like to raise in relation to this legislation, but I think I should wait until we reach the consideration of the bill at the committee stage.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak about these proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am pleased to note that in the absence of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) a fellow maritimer has stepped into the breach. I refer of course to the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), who has taken over the sponsorship of this bill.

I listened very carefully to his remarks this morning regarding the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. According to his remarks the ceiling in respect of contributions is to be raised from $5,460 to $7,800. Anyone making $7,800 or less will be required to make contributions. I understand that employers' contributions are to be increased proportionately, to the extent of $1.40 per week for those earning $100 per week and over. The former ceiling on employers' contributions was 94 cents on earnings up to a maximum of $69 and over.

Employees' contributions are increased. They range up to a maximum level of $1.33 per week, compared to the former level of 90 cents. Allowable earnings are raised to $27.00, so that a maximum income of $80 per week is permitted: that is, the $53 plus the $27 allowable earnings. The act comes into effect on June 30, 1968.

I realize that these changes are required, and I support them; but surely it is a fact that it is the incompetence of this government that has made the changes necessary. How are these changes to be considered? The Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson)—I regret that he is not in his seat at the present time because I intend to refer to him, although not in an uncharitable way—stated in his speech at Kingston in July that the reason for the increase was inflation. The sad fact is that inflation has already eaten away the increase that is proposed. It hardly does more than compensate for the rise in prices since the last increase in 1959.

Speaking of inflation, who can live on $53 a week when meat is selling at $1.30 a pound?

[Mr. Keays.]

Second, I believe the increase itself will create still further inflation. A third point—and this was covered quite well by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) when he spoke today—is that although the Gill commission brought in its report on the Unemployment Insurance Act on December 21, 1962, nothing has been done by this government, in the almost five years it has been in office, to implement the recommendations of that commission.

The major proposals of the Gill commission were as follows: benefits for fully insured eligible unemployed to be fully financed by contributions from employers and employees; second, benefits for long term unemployed and seasonally unemployed to be financed from general tax revenues, and these people were to be removed from the fund; third, those who are unemployable or largely outside the labour force to be regarded as social welfare cases.

If the Gill commission recommendations were implemented, the effect would be to remove freeloaders from the fund and remove from wage earners the burden of paying for those individuals who are in reality welfare cases. This bill adopts none of these proposals and continues to operate the fund as a welfare proposal, with employed workers largely paying for those who are not employed or even employable.

The philosophy behind this bill is quite obvious. To find the answers, one has only to look at the speeches made by the Minister of Labour, and especially his speech at Kingston last July. The most authoritative declaration in this regard was made by the minister at Kingston—and again I apologize for referring to him in his absence, but I was unaware when I prepared these notes that he would not be in the house today—at a conference of unemployment insurance officials in July, 1967.

In his speech at that meeting the minister advanced the concepts of universality and integration, and although he later tried to back away and water down his statements there is no doubt that they represent an accurate reflection of government intentions. Basically, the minister made it very plain in his speech at Kingston that this government was abandoning, or had already abandoned, the insurance concept and the concept of actuarial soundness, and was now in the process of turning unemployment insurance into a straight welfare scheme.

The Minister of Labour described the major objective of unemployment insurance as "an economic stabilizer or, if you like, a flywheel". It seems to me, in view of the present approach, that the flywheel under this government has got out of control. The government's economic policies are going to burn out the motor, strip the gears, bust up the crankshaft and throw the propellor out of alignment.

After the flywheel approach, the minister's next major objective was universality. I want to quote exactly what he said when talking to unemployment insurance officials at Kingston on July 17, 1967. I quote from the official text distributed by the minister's office:

> I have already touched briefly on what I believe to be the second major objective of present day unemployment insurance policy: that is, universality.

Nobody in this party has any objection to covering as many people as can possibly be covered, in line with the capacity of the program to support such coverage. Unfortunately, the bill—and this can be determined when we get into committee—does not completely define the new classifications that may be covered. Speaking as a member from the Atlantic region, I would say that we are happy with the coverage that has been provided to fishermen and agricultural workers.

However, we must be very careful before we in parliament undertake any action that will destroy the actuarial soundness of the unemployment insurance scheme. I want to say very bluntly that if we are going to turn it into another massive welfare program under this government, we will be playing false to the millions of workers who, over the years have invested their hard earned money and that of their employers in this program.

If unemployment insurance—which up to now has been an insurance program based upon actuarial considerations—is to become another welfare program, we must face the fact that the taxpayer and the economy will be called on to provide more millions of dollars to finance non-productive programs, adding to inflation, higher prices, rising costs and the continual depreciation of our dollar.

The whole capitalistic system is built upon faith in our dollar as a unit of exchange. If this government persists in implementing policies that destroy the faith of Canadians and foreign investors in the value of our dollar, it will bring about the economic destruction of our nation.

The Minister of Labour is fully aware, I am sure, of the effects of the principles and programs he is putting forward. Speaking at Kingston—and this must have been one of his days for speaking frankly—he said:

> The rates have not been changed for several years and inflation has made them woefully inadequate in many cases.

We can all agree with that. Let me say that never have I been in more wholehearted agreement with any statement made by any minister of this government than when the minister said that inflation has eaten away the benefits. Let us face the fact that since this government took office, which in my view was a black day for Canada, there has been an unbidden and uninvited guest at every Canadian table. That uninvited guest has been inflation. And that guest was invited into Canadian homes as a parasitical boarder by this government and its policies. Inflation reminds me of a lamprey eel: It sucks onto its victim, first draining the victim of its blood, then its vitality and finally its life.

Canadians have been paying, in indirect taxation levied by inflation, for the follies and incompetence of this government's policies. Since the government took office prices have risen over a wide range that is almost impossible to compute, but the general level of the increase has varied between 10 per cent and 15 per cent right across the board. This is the indirect tax that Canadians are paying for policies that are non-productive, that do not contribute to the economy or its expansion. The only effect has been to reduce drastically the purchasing power of our dollar.

A certain degree of inflation, say 2 per cent a year, is tolerable; it is not desirable, but it is tolerable in a highly industrialized economy. This was the figure when the Conservative party was in power, led by Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker. Under this government, prices have ranged and are still ranging, two to three times the 2 per cent figure. The minister is aware of this and the government is aware of this. The labour minister has said we must raise rates because of inflation. Does he not stop to think, or does the government not stop to think what has brought that inflation into being?

I am not in a position to give, nor do I want to give the government or the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) or even the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr.

MacEachen), who is piloting the bill through the house, a lesson in economics. I have to tell the minister the policies of his government have worked greater hardship on the working men and women of this country than have the policies of any government in our history. Some may say that is an exaggerated statement, but what has happened? Since this government took office, Canadians are paying 15 to 20 per cent more for necessities—not luxuries, but for food, lodging, houses, gasoline, clothing and so on. Medical supplies and drugs are costing a great deal more. The cost of automobile insurance has gone up, as has the cost of building materials and supplies.

The cost of every single thing that the ordinary Canadian needs to live and support his family has gone up, and away up, since this government came into power. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, there have been ten price increases in the food and lodging category in the last ten months. The price change from only one year ago amounts to 4.5 per cent, which indicates there is no slackening of inflation facing consumers. The rise in prices in Canada during the past three years has been considerably higher than in the United States. I should like to point out that we are not fighting a war in Viet Nam; we are not fighting the race in space with the Soviets. We are not supporting a massive anti-poverty program. In fact it is difficult to see where Canadians have received any benefit from the enormous amounts this government has spent.

Now we come to unemployment insurance. Canadians are paying a 4 per cent payroll tax for old age pensions. They are paying enormous income tax deductions. They are paying unemployment insurance deductions, and these are now going to increase. Does the minister and this government not realize that each time payroll deductions are increased for the employer and the employee, two things happen. The first thing that happens when the employee loses 10 per cent from his pay cheque in added tax deductions is that he immediately requests a salary increase in order to catch up. Surely the government has not forgotten the number of wage demands that took place following the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan and the deductions that were made in January, 1966. In quick succession we had the seaway workers, the dock workers, the railroad employees, and I don't know how many others, asking for salary increases.

Some comment was made by the new Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Mackasey), and I am glad to see him in the house. As a matter of fact, I thought he would be piloting this bill. I wish him a happy, and short, term in his new office.

[Mr. Crouse.]

Apparently the government has not learned the lesson that what you take away from people they will immediately try to get back. The second thing that happens as soon as you impose matching contributions, which simply amount to a reduction in buying power, is that the companies pass on their contributions to the public in the form of increased prices. Who does the government think pays for this? Certainly it is the worker who pays for it. The company contribution is passed on in the form of increased prices, but never the exact amount, it is always a little bit more. The same worker who has been subjected to yet another payroll deduction reducing his buying power, is also subjected to another price increase, thus further reducing his buying power. In the next few months, the government comes along with a tax increase, always on the little people, and buying power is further reduced. The immediate consequence is yet another demand for wage increases. If that demand is granted, then that too is passed on in the form of increased prices, as it has to be, and once again the same worker pays the shot.

Neither the minister nor the government can understand how we can have such inflation. This government, deliberately or otherwise, has created inflation right across this country in every field of economic activity. They have moved in and stripped away the prosperity of Canadians. Today Canadians are running faster than ever before, just to stay where they are. Of course ministers are now so busy shining up their images that they do not have time to worry about what is happening to ordinary folk. Like the wicked stepmother in Snow White, all that comes out of ministerial offices these days is the refrain: "Mirror, mirror on the wall, who is the fairest of us all?" We will soon know the answer to that.

In the meantime, what is happening in Canada? This government is not helping the working men and women of this country by introducing measures that bring about higher prices in costs and reduce the purchasing power of the dollar. The best thing it could do at this time, and Britain has proved this, would be to declare a holiday on government expenses, to give the economy a chance to catch its breath. Never in history have we seen a government jacking up its expenditures by 14 per cent and 15 per cent from one year to the next—that is, never until this government stumbled and fumbled its way into office.

In 1963 the battle cry of the Liberals to the electorate was, elect us and we will get the economy moving again. We knew, and the Liberals knew, that the economy was rolling at that time as a result of the impact of the devalued Canadian dollar in 1962. This statement is now endorsed by history. But despite this fact the Liberal party deliberately implement policies and programs in an effort to be all things to all people. The result has been a situation in which we have inflation, rising prices, a stagnant economy and rising unemployment, all at the same time.

That is the situation. This government's measures, starting with the tax on building materials, and on through high expenditures, high taxes and the like, have created a situation where the consumer cannot buy with his dollar those things he needs to maintain a reasonable standard of living. It may be difficult to get this across to those whose annual income is in the $37,000 bracket. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, this is the situation.

My next point, Mr. Speaker, is that this government's policies are taking us along the road to socialism and regimentation. Some people are not worried about socialism any more, because it has become so watered down it is almost respectable. It is a little bit like the rum down in Lunenburg county: It gets watered down sometimes, and it may not be as dangerous. It loses its appeal; but if you take enough of it, even though it is watered down it still packs a wallop.

Regimentation, however, is something of which we must all beware. Regimentation means a loss of initiative and a loss of dignity. There is social regimentation in this country today. This is the kind of regimentation where they give you a card with a number on it, tell you to fill out forms, tell you where you are going to work, how much you are going to get and what you will do with your money. This kind of regimentation is here now, under this government.

Then there is economic regimentation where they allow you to work hard, make a little money and then take it away from you in order to provide for others. We are rapidly coming to that stage under this government. The Minister of Labour in his speech at Kingston last July referred to integration. He described as a prime example of the need for integration the duplication, even triplication, in unemployment insurance, Canada Pension Plan and federal income tax. He foresaw a time when, through the numbered social security card, an individual would be processed for his Canada Pension Plan, income tax and unemployment insurance. By the time he paid his income tax, no doubt he would be looking for unemployment insurance. This is the kind of national regimentation which Liberalism is bringing upon us. It is socialism by the back door method. This kind of system, so proudly put forward by the Minister of Labour at Kingston, in my view will reduce Canadians to nothing more than a nation of ciphers.

The Liberal party has attempted to lull Canadians into believing that these costly programs do not have to be paid for. We are paying for them now, and we are paying for them in two ways—through higher taxes and through the indirect tax of growing inflation. After all, Mr. Speaker, there is no way of getting something for nothing. The governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Louis Rasminsky, put this in words that I should like to paraphrase and which went something like this: There is no way known to man of getting a quart out of a pint jug. You either pay through direct taxes or higher costs and prices. Under this government we are doing both.

The government is committed to an extremely costly medicare program which will add hundreds of thousands of dollars to our annual budget. In his anticipated budget deficit for this year, the finance minister did not even dare include medicare or Expo. Of course, if that sort of budget was the financial statement of a private firm, it would not be passed by any auditor. How a government can put out a budget leaving out two major budgetary items is hard to understand. When the ordinary citizen files an incomplete tax return which does not reveal his true financial picture he goes to jail. But when the minister does this he pats himself on the back as the inventor of a new budgetary technique. It is a technique that in my opinion smacks too much of "Sharp practice".

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) says that there will be a balanced budget next year. If he were in his seat I would ask him how he knows. The Minister of Finance will not say when he plans to introduce another budget, or whether he will even be Minister of Finance in a few months. The sad fact is that when the President of the Treasury Board announced that we would have a balanced budget next year no one seemed to believe him. His statement had absolutely no effect on the stock market or the value of the Canadian dollar, both of which continued to go down.

We now have to provide for medicare, Mr. Speaker, which will add to the burden of the ordinary citizen, will increase income taxes once again, will diminish purchasing power and will probably set off another round of price increases. On top of this the government plans to bring in unemployment insurance changes, scrapping the insurance principle and turning unemployment insurance into yet another uncontrolled welfare scheme. The government also wants to increase deductions from pay cheques of workers, along with contributions made by industry. All of these things, I claim, tend to have an inflationary effect, being passed on in the form of price increases, which in turn give rise to further wage demands.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is time for the government to call a halt. The economy is being crippled, prosperity is being drained off and the incomes of Canadians are being confiscated by these massive welfare schemes. If I read my mail correctly, Mr. Speaker, Canadians cannot and do not want to pay any more. I really do not know what we have to do to bring this fact more forcefully to the attention of the government. It is taking income from the pockets of Canadians simply in order to buy for itself a little extra time in office. Canadians know that the critical point has been reached; they can feel a distinct loss of confidence in the economy. Canadian exports are meeting resistance abroad and imports are picking up. The government has been warned about this situation over and over again. Surely the time has come to return to reality and to drop these undermining measures, which can only hurt the economy without benefiting those for whom they are intended. The government should put a rein on spending and follow policies that benefit Canada's economy.

While the government is tossing the taxpayers' money right and left, the essential needs of the economy and of society are not being looked after. What about housing? No money is available for housing, except at exorbitant interest rates.

[Mr. Crouse.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member will realize that I have to remind him that we are dealing with amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Perhaps he will attempt to limit his remarks to the bill now before the house.

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought I was doing that when I made direct reference to the minister's statement that the reason for these changes was brought about by economic inflation. In my view—and I stand corrected—my thoughts are related to the expansionist programs that have contributed in no small measure to the inflation referred to by the minister. However, my remarks are practically finished, and if you will bear with me for a minute I shall have concluded my speech.

I ask the government, Mr. Speaker, what about development? No action is being taken to develop this nation. What about bringing our resources to market, starting new industries and providing new sources of income for Canadians? Nothing is being done to maintain the high level of economic expansion which is vitally necessary. In my view this government should be concerned with policies to provide employment instead of policies to look after unemployment. This government, intoxicated with welfare schemes, is letting the economy of the nation run down, like a watch that somebody forgot to wind. I wish to warn them, Mr. Speaker, that unless they return to reality they will find that time has run out on them as well.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, one disadvantage of speaking at this stage of the debate is that it is very difficult to find a field not already covered in one form or another by other hon. members.

Mr. Reid: Why not try talking about the bill?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): As the minister pointed out when he introduced the bill this morning, these are the first amendments to the act since 1959. If a piece of legislation as important to the people of Canada from coast to coast as this is amended only once every nine or ten years, more thought should go into those amendments when the time does arrive to put them in legislative form.

For example, I wonder why some attempts have not been made to correct some of the evils that have developed since the passage of the bill in 1959. I think one of the most evident evils that has become apparent is that by their own action the government have made a farce out of the insurance principle that underlies the Unemployment Insurance Act. During the term of office of the previous government, and the past five years that this government has been in office, no attempt whatever has been made to correct this particular evil. However, I will have more to say about that later.

I also wonder why some efforts have not been made to cure some of the evils that have crept into the picture, not in the form of legislation but more as a result of policy, regulations and so forth. The most evident of these is a matter that has been touched on by one or two other hon. members. I am referring to the policy making and decision making functions that have been taken away from people in the field, the people who know the local situation, local conditions and local problems. I should like to ask the minister why this has occurred; what was the reason or purpose for it. Was this purely an economy measure, or did the government believe that these people were not properly qualified to make decisions?

I have my suspicions about this step that has been taken. Most of the complaints that have come to my attention in this regard were made at a certain time. I suspect that the purpose was to enable the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to use the unemployment insurance fund as an instrument of fiscal policy.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I notice that when the minister declared that there would be a clamp-down and that spending would be cut back, by a strange coincidence the number of complaints that were received with regard to unemployment insurance suddenly mushroomed. Shortly after that, the authority for making decisions about unemployment insurance was taken away from the Timmins office. Decisions were to be made in Toronto, which is about 500 miles away.

Most complaints which have come to my attention have come about as the result of a very carefully worded form. When a man loses his job and has to apply for unemployment insurance, he must fill out this carefully worded form, which seems to contain some carefully laid traps for the man who is filling it out. No doubt officials, in common with members of chambers of commerce and various hon. members of the house, maintain that in this country we have a great horde of people who are professionals at getting moneys they have no right to from the unemployment insurance commission.

I suppose a few in this country spend all their time in seeing what they can get out of the unemployment insurance fund. But these forms present no problem to such people. They know everything in it by heart. They know how many stamps they need in their books and how to fill out the form so as to avoid delays or problems. The men who fall victim to these forms are those who have never drawn unemployment insurance. They are men who have worked for 20, 25 or 30 years and, when the mine closes down, when the job folds up or when the business goes under, are forced to apply for assistance. They fill the form out and, not knowing what to avoid, often disqualify themselves on pure technicalities. The form must then go to Toronto, 500 miles away, for a decision. When the decision comes back the men may want to appeal it, and as a result they must go to Toronto. The legislation does provide these men with the right of appealing such a decision; they have to appear before the referee. But if a man is unemployed and looking for unemployment insurance, how can he afford to go to Toronto, 500 miles away, to appeal? If the appeal machinery were in the local area that would be fine, but it is not much good having it 500 miles away. The men are precluded from appealing because of the distance involved.

I just wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the objective behind all this is to enable the government and the Unemployment Insurance Commission to chisel from the workingmen of this country, who are entitled to certain benefits. I wonder if this has all been worked out deliberately with that end in view.

I have also run into the problem of language difficulty in this field. I represent an area in which half the population is French Canadian. Many French speaking Canadians work in the lumbering industry and mining industry. These are the men who are most often affected by unemployment insurance regulations. When a mine shuts down or a wood cut is finished and they become unemployed, they fill out this form I spoke of. To them it is in a foreign language. As a result they are more vulnerable to making errors which can disqualify them. If they make a mistake, away goes the form for a decision in Toronto, and back comes another form with a great big letter that they cannot read or understand, and they must go to a lawyer, a chartered accountant, to their member of parliament or to others for assistance in getting their rights. I think the minister will agree that the procedure I have outlined is grossly unfair and inefficient. It should be looked into and corrected.

Another point also warrants the minister's attention. I find that the staff of the local offices are prohibited from giving any assistance to men who wish to fill out these forms. If the staff is not allowed to do that, why are they there? Why have a trained staff in the field if it cannot use its experience and training to help others who need that help? This matter should be reviewed and something should be done about it.

Another point is worthy of consideration, and that is the attitude of the general public to the unemployment insurance fund. Many people who have retired have come to me saying that they are going to apply for unemployment insurance. Some of them may have had to retire because of health or other reasons. They come to me and say, "You know, I paid into this fund for 30 years and I should be able to get back what I paid in."

You see, the general public does not look on this as an insurance fund. In a way, it thinks it is a sort of insurance fund; but at the end of their working lives our people want their money back. In other words, the fund provides protection, but in people's minds at the end of everything it becomes a savings fund. The idea is that you should get back what you paid in. There is good reason for this frame of mind, and I spoke of this earlier in my remarks. The fault lies with the government that introduced the legislation, and with the government of the past ten years.

In 1959, when the last amendment to the act went through, I remember speaking in the house and pointing out that people such as fishermen and bush workers traditionally hold down seasonal jobs. If they were to be brought under the unemployment insurance fund, the fund would no longer work on the principle of an insurance fund. I did not say then, and I do not say now that men in these brackets do not need assistance and attention. My point is that by including them in the fund the government destroyed the credibility of the fund as an insurance fund.

I remember saying that, as a result of the government's action, the people in the country would say, "Well, the fishermen never did work all year; they can't fish for 12 months; they only fish for six or eight months of the year, and during the other four months they claim unemployment insurance. If they do that, why can't we do the same thing? Why shouldn't we work for eight months and go on unemployment insurance for the other four months?" That thinking developed from the actions of the government of 1959. No effort has been made by the government to "sell" the idea to the public, that this is an insurance fund available for the protection of people who are no longer able to protect themselves.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

One last word with regard to the increases in the cost to employees proposed under this bill, and the increased benefits which will apply. Over many years a situation has developed in which, unfortunately, more and more people live from pay to pay. The young generation has been raised in this atmosphere. From the time they are out of the cradle and big enough to watch television or read magazines and newspapers they are tempted to buy goods which are beyond their means. It takes a strong minded individual indeed to resist all the lures of advertisers today. The result is that when a man becomes unemployed for whatever reason, his expenses do not decrease; they remain constant because there are usually a number of payments to meet. This is why it is a good thing in this day and age to increase these benefits, so that the problems affecting a family are at least diminished when the breadwinner finds himself suddenly out of work and without income.

I was listening to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) talking about regimentation. The regimentation which bothers me—I do not know whether it bothers him or not—is the way the working people of this country are regimented in connection with payments to finance companies, furniture companies and mortgage companies. This is the regimentation which should cause us all concern. At least to the extent that this bill tends to reduce the effects of this regimentation, I believe it warrants support from all members of this house.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): I am glad to have an opportunity to say a few words on this legislation. I listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches made by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse), and the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) who has just resumed his seat. Each of them brought out sound and excellent points in connection with the bill before us. Each of them drew attention to the "bugs", so to speak, which exist in the act at the present time and which should be corrected. This is where we are up against some serious difficulties. I would venture to say there is no act on the statute books of Canada which has more "bugs" in it than the present Unemployment Insurance Act.

The first thought of the government should be to eliminate these deficiencies. I see nothing in the bill before us which will do so. In fact there are certain implications in it which might be more harmful than otherwise. I am not opposed to the principle of insurance against unemployment through a scheme which is in fact an insurance program, but I am opposed to features in the legislation which make it a welfare program rather than an insurance program.

Those who put forth the effort to establish the legislation in the beginning never intended that it should become a welfare program. However, this element has crept into it and it is unfortunate that it should be present.

One of the problems faced by the stockmen and ranchers of western Canada is this: They want more labour for their ranches, but now they are likely to find it more difficult than ever to get labour. They did not ask for unemployment insurance to apply to ranch labour. Now, having experienced its effects, they are asking that it be removed from coverage by the act. Inclusion of ranch labour was supposed to increase the amount of labour available for ranches. The present bill, instead of helping to increase the supply of labour, will actually diminish it.

What I have just said applies not only to the operators of these big ranches; the workers themselves have approached me in delegations asking that they be removed from coverage by the act. If a worker on a ranch in western Canada is to receive 50 per cent of his summer wages in unemployment insurance, when winter comes the stockmen out there who have cattle to feed will not be able to hire anyone to do the work. No one will want to work out in the open in the cold weather if he can get half his summer wages in unemployment insurance. Indeed, I know of many who would take the course of least resistance and try to rig things in such a way as to obtain unemployment insurance benefits. All of them seem able to do it, and this is what is being done. People are getting around the act. So instead of more labour being available to stockmen, less is available. This is why both on the labour side and on the management side there are requests for exemption from the operation of the act. The stockmen never asked to be covered by it and now they would like to be exempt.

I want to get this across to the government and to all others concerned. At the present time the Western Stock Growers are in session in Calgary. At past conventions this subject has come up for discussion and members have expressed their views in no uncertain words. Delegations have come to me privately asking that ranch workers be excluded from the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. They want labour to help them on their ranches. In addition, the labourers do not want these deductions to be made from their wages. On occasions when ranchers have made deductions in respect of insurance they have lost their hired help. The labourer gets sore and says: "The other fellow did not deduct it, so I will go and work for him, or someone else".

The stockman is faced with a problem of paying the total amount out of his own pocket in order to come under the scheme and be within the law. He must provide the worker with the stamps or else he loses his labour if he deducts the cost of the insurance from the workers salary. This is not working out. What I have described is just one of the "bugs'. There are hundreds of others in the unemployment insurance program. Surely the government will take a careful look at these things. It will not have to go far to find somebody who will give other illustrations. I hope that the one I have mentioned will receive serious consideration and that the government will eliminate these ranching people from the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, because they do not want to come within its provisions.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister a question before he rises to close the debate. Has the interdepartmental committee, which has been studying the needed broader amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, completed its work, and can we expect the introduction of those amendments early next session? Perhaps I may be allowed to sum up in one statement the essence of the remarks I would have made had I chosen to make a speech. From the contributions made by other hon. members it is quite clear that there is a feeling abroad in this land that social security and welfare plans do not mix with an insurance scheme. In making a broad revision of the act I hope the government will see to it that the unemployment insurance fund is returned to its original structure, namely an actuarial plan based on sound insurance principles.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I know there is a general desire to have this bill passed this afternoon and so I will be very brief. I think most hon. members were disappointed that at least a number of the recommendations of the Gill commission report are not being implemented at this time. As the previous speaker said, we hope this will be taken care of early next session. We have been promised it for years.

As other hon. members have said, the reason for our concern is that there is no piece of legislation at the federal level that has more "bugs", in it, if I may use the expression, than the Unemployment Insurance Act. The evils one could list are clear, to say the least. I do not wish to catalogue them this afternoon because I have done so on other occasions. I shall mention only one or two.

The first concerns the enforcement of the act in recent years and the virtual reign of terror conducted among the farmers of the country by the officials of the commission. Where people have employed independent contractors for two or three hours a week, officials of the commission have been running about trying to match the efforts of the income tax department of years ago, sometimes going back ten years to see what they can dig up merely because an employee is alleged to have worked for a couple of hours a week and was unaware of the fact that he had to fill out a form to be exempted.

I commend the officials of the commission for trying to do their duty. They are very much in the same position as policemen. But if every policeman in this country enforced the letter of every municipal by-law and every federal and provincial statute, 95 per cent of the people of Canada would be in police court every day. I think a little horse sense might be exercised by the officials of the commission.

One specific feature which has affected a great many members of this house has been the division made between manpower offices and unemployment insurance commission offices. In some parts of the country this division does not make much practical difference, but in areas such as southern Ontario, southern Quebec and the lower mainland of British Columbia it makes a great deal of difference. Formerly every small industrial city, and here I speak of cities of 25,000 to 100,000 population, had their unemployment insurance commission office and manpower office in the same place. Then some persons got the idea that they would divide the departments administratively in government, and they carried this through by dividing them everywhere, at the lower level as well.

In my constituency there is an unemployment insurance office in London, Ontario, but no unemployment insurance office in St. Thomas, to serve Stratford, Brantford, Galt and other cities in between. People have not yet got used to this division. If they apply for unemployment insurance they assume that the manpower centre is automatically informed, but this is not the case in most instances.

I know that in changes like this there are administrative problems which will likely be worked out with the passage of time, but meanwhile most members of parliament, already heavily engaged, are given a vast amount of extra work. In the 15 years that I have been in this house I have had one or two complaints each year about the administration of the unemployment insurance fund, which speaks very well for the commission. But since the division of offices, with the removal of the unemployment insurance office from the local area, I have had six times as many complaints in three months about the administration of unemployment insurance as I had in the previous 15 years.

The government may say what it likes, and offer all the excuses it likes, but the fact of the matter is that the public is not being served. I do not know how many people who have encountered trouble have not written to me but, as I say, the number who have written me has increased. What may be required is more staff at the local level. Most people do not know how to fill out the necessary forms. This work may be easily done by members of parliament and civil servants who are accustomed to forms ad nauseam. We have learned by experience to make out forms, but if an individual is confused by a form he should have the assistance of someone at the local office to help him fill it out.

I have been able to clear up a great many of the complaints I have received, because they were due to misunderstandings. Only the other day I had two cases before an umpire, and one was a matter of misunderstanding. In the other the officials just would not change their minds, something which is human nature, something we all share to a greater or lesser degree. These things could be avoided with more efficiency.

In heavily industrialized areas which have a lot of labour the government should carefully examine the possibility of reinstating a combined unemployment insurance and manpower office. As I say southern Ontario is a good example. The area of Quebec south of Montreal is in the same category. The public is not being served, except very badly. I have one or two other things to say, Mr. Speaker, but will reserve them to another occasion.

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I am happy this afternoon to say a few words with respect to Bill No. C-197.

According to the statistics, we have 500,000 unemployed in Canada. I think this is sufficient reason to talk about it. In my opinion, the situation is alarming. In a country like Canada, where there are so many things to be done, where every citizen could be employed, 500,000 Canadians are not participating in the production and depend on others for their livelihood. Indeed, those who receive unemployment insurance benefits are getting the contributions paid by the employers or the workers themselves to the Unemployment Insurance Fund. This money has contributed to the rise in the cost of living, and we talk of increasing benefits.

I think benefits should be raised, because of the great increase in the cost of living. No matter how much they are raised, they will never compensate for the increase in the cost of living, which is so high lately that a man can no longer make ends meet with his salary. Senior citizens whose pension has just been increased to $105 per month complain that it is not enough, that they cannot manage, because the cost of living is too high. All the old age pensioners, and especially the veterans, complain that they do not have enough money, because prices are always ahead of the increases they receive. The unemployed are in the same situation.

There are 500,000 names on the unemployment insurance list, but there are many workers who are being retrained or who are employed on winter works and, therefore, are not on the list.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that the situation is more alarming than we think in Canada. We have here terrible problems. Unemployment is increasing steadily and there are surely causes for all that. One of the causes of unemployment, Mr. Speaker, is that there are not enough investments. Employment of labour depends upon investments and they are insufficient. Why? Because there are too many taxes, too many surcharges at all government levels, because the citizens have no more money to invest. As they have no more money to invest, unemployment and poverty prevail everywhere. Such are the causes of the economic situation we are experiencing at present.

In order to grasp a little better the unemployment problem and the incidence of the slowing down of investments on labour requirements, one may proceed in this manner and state that, according to statistics, there is available labour and unavailable labour; there are voluntary unemployed and a readily available labour. Once again, labour requirements depend on investments. Investments and labour are interrelated in a certain ratio which varies from one sector to another. Labour requirements are greater only when investments increase and, on that score, the Canadian economy has not done too well.

In the past few months, there have been surplus outputs, high interest rates and a shaky situation in the United States; the trends are not likely to be reversed in the next months. On the other hand, production has decreased in some areas, or is slowly increasing throughout the economy, due to the labour requirements brought about by the present level of existing investments.

Circumstances being what they are, unemployment is assuming larger proportion than usual. An upsurge in economic and non-seasonal activities would only eliminate seasonal unemployment, widespread in Quebec, and unemployment resulting from structural rigidity. A lasting reduction in unemployment will depend more upon fiscal measures designed to increase the size of the labour force and upon constructive measures designed to improve the volume as well as the size of private investments in this country.

Can we increase investments in this country when governments at all levels, are increasing the taxpayers' burden by every means at their disposal? We have direct taxes, indirect taxes, surtaxes. Then, the federal government sells bonds and proclaims in countless newspapers that those who buy federal bonds will double their capital within 13 years.

The same thing is true for the provincial governments, the school boards and the municipal governments. It is the same thing for several large institutions in Canada.

Therefore, how can we expect that there will be something left, some economic blood to enable Canadians to invest, to develop new industries, new natural resources? We lack capital. The present government and the present administration take it all. There is none left for the citizens.

[English]

Mr. Mackasey: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member. I wonder, however, whether he might be confusing this debate with the debate we expect to have next week on the supplementary estimates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): I think the hon. gentleman probably has strayed from the bill under consideration, but I believe he meant to refer to the matter of unemployment as it relates to this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I know that nobody likes to be told what is now happening under the present system and what causes unemployment. I am speaking about unemployment, and its causes. If there were no causes, there would be no unemployment and it is precisely why I am dealing with the problem of unemployment, exposing its causes and all the factors which compel citizens to remain idle and to live at the expense of others.

Those who are now working are robbed, in order to give to the unemployed. We have reached a point where the worker does not get more than the unemployed drawing welfare allowances. Such is the present system and we are led to believe that it is good and that the present economy can be maintained.

There are two prominent economists who are trying to find all kinds of solutions to our problems, but they are never in a position to apply them. The problem remains the same: it is always unemployment, misery in the midst of affluence. There has never been a balance in Canada between production and consumption, between misery and affluence.

I could go on much longer but other hon. members want to speak. Besides, I think I have said enough. Several people have made pretty speeches, but more than speeches are needed to solve the problem of unemployment. We should take concrete steps to remedy that situation. If there is a surplus of products, we should be able—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, while on the surface this bill may appear to be rather minor in nature I should like to point out that before the increased benefits to workers can become effective many weeks of contributions will be required. Therefore I should not like to jeopardize the unemployed people this winter as a result of this bill being held up. If hon. members agree I might suggest that we forgo private members hour so that I might speak on second reading in order to answer many of the questions which have been so eloquently raised this afternoon.

Mr. Monteith: We would be agreeable to this, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the desire of the minister to secure a relatively early passage of this bill, but I believe the hour set aside for the consideration of private bills and public bills is one of some importance. I am sure the minister will be able to arrange with the house leader to have this matter brought forward early next week, at which time he would have an opportunity to make his remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Is there unanimous consent that the house forego private members hour?

Mr. Barnett: No, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, possibly the house would like to know the order of business for Monday. It will be as follows, the committee stage on the income tax bill, the supplementary estimates—

Mr. Monteith: Would the minister mind giving the name and the item number?

Mr. Mackasey: I do not have the item numbers. I will repeat it more slowly. The committee stage of the income tax bill, supplementary estimates, second reading of the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, and then the Patent and Trade Marks Act.

• (5:00 p.m.)

RADIO ACT

AMENDMENT TO DEFINE "BROADCASTING" TO INCLUDE COMMUNITY ANTENNA TRANSMISSION

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-20, an act to amend the Radio Act (community antenna)—Mr. Peters.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, if I could have the unanimous consent of the house I would withdraw this bill because the subject has been covered by the broadcasting bill recently passed by the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Does the house give unanimous consent to the hon. member to withdraw this bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

MEASURE TO ENSURE ACCURACY IN WEIGHTS AND MEASUREMENTS OF PACKAGED GOODS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-23, to amend the Weights and Measures Act (truth in packaging).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill which I have introduced on other occasions is to try to give the consumers of Canada the kind of information which would permit them to make meaningful and intelligent choices in the purchase of necessary merchandise. The problems of the consumer have been giving increasing concern to the people of Canada. To realize this one has only to consider that various provincial legislatures have studied the problems of consumer credit and have come forth with recommendations upon which legislation has been based. Also this parliament established a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to study the problem of consumer credit and other problems of consumers. This committee held meetings which extended over a long period of time. It held close to 50 meetings and made recommendations dealing with various aspects of consumers problems.

The principle of this bill was endorsed by an organization which I am sure most members of parliament know and I think all members respect, namely the Consumers Association of Canada. At its annual meeting in June, 1962, this association passed a resolution which I should like to place on the record. It reads as follows:

Whereas there appears to be an increasing number of packages on the market whose contents are stated in fractions of ounces; and

Whereas consumers are experiencing difficulty in determining readily, while shopping, the comparative values of many products, due to the varying weights of packaged goods;

Be it resolved that the Consumers Association of Canada requests the Department of Trade and Commerce and the food and drug directorate to standardize the weights of packages of food and other items weighing four ounces and over, in units of quarter pounds, half pounds and pounds.

Since that resolution was passed there have been, as I mentioned a moment ago, extensive hearings by a joint committee of parliament, as a result of which we have passed legislation establishing the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and a minister to head the department. The joint committee looked into the question of packaging which is dealt with in my bill, and in its report the committee made a number of references to the problem. Hon. members can find the report in the Proceedings of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Consumer Credit, No. 41, of Tuesday, April 25, 1967. I wish to place on the record a few of the references made in the report to the question dealt with in my bill. On page 3452 the committee said:

Your committee perceives the need for an expert group within the department to investigate any merchandising practices which take advantage of or mislead consumers.

On page 3454 of this report recommendation (c) reads as follows:

That packaging and weights and measures be designed to inform the consumer as fully as possible;

On page 3470 of the report, dealing with the problem of consumer standards and consumer protection, the committee says:

(3) packages should be designed in terms of size, shape or dimension in a way that will not deceive or mislead retail purchasers;

(4) the net quantity of the contents in terms of weight or measure should be expressed as simply as possible and in terms which can be easily interpreted;

(5) the essential information about a packaged product and its physical contents should be stated in a prominent place on the label.

Another recommendation is that there be established a department of consumer affairs headed by a minister, which has been done. The next recommendation is:

That immediate steps be taken to promote standardization and simplification of grades, nomenclature and packaging for commonly purchased consumer items.

I have had occasion, as I am sure other members of parliament and husbands and fathers have, of going with my wife or daughter to do the shopping. I suggest to hon. members that if one wants to shop on the basis of unit price—I am not saying that many people do, but there are those who do, and we should encourage it—he would have to carry with him a computer in order to be able to calculate the price per ounce, for example.

I did some comparative shopping recently and found a very popular peanut butter packaged in a 12-ounce jar and a one pound jar. The prices were of an odd nature and one would have to have a computer, as I say, to calculate which size was cheaper. I found mustard in a 6-ounce jar and a 16-ounce jar. I found ketchup in an 11 fluid ounce bottle, a 15-ounce bottle and a 20-ounce bottle. I found salmon in a $3\frac{3}{4}$ ounce can and the next size was $7\frac{3}{4}$ ounces. I do not know how anybody could calculate whether the larger size was a cheaper buy than the smaller.

I found canned corn in a 10-ounce size and a 15-ounce size. I found soups made by different manufacturers, one next to the other. One soup was in a 10 fluid ounce can, another in a $10\frac{1}{2}$ fluid ounce can and a third brand was in an 11 fluid ounce can. If one wanted to buy soup on the basis of which brand was cheaper per ounce, it would be impossible to do so by looking at the fluid content of the can.

I now come to the question of soaps. Hon. members know that probably more money is spent by the manufacturers of soap than anybody else in advertising and trying to convince us that one soap is better than another, that one soap will wash the clothes cheaper than another and one detergent will do a better job than any other product. Looking at these products, I defy any person, including a trained mathematician, to calculate which brand is cheaper by the ounce. Spic and Span comes in three sizes; $3\frac{1}{2}$ ounces, 2.8 ounces and 4.6 ounces. Joy comes in similar sizes. Surf comes in various sizes. In addition to this we have experienced the practice of manufacturing companies printing on their labels that the product is being sold for 10 cents or 20 cents less than regular price. It is against the law in Canada for a manufacturer to direct a retailer to sell a product for any specific price, yet the manufacturer states on his package that the product is being sold for so many cents off regular price. These manufacturers do not have the right to do this. They do so, I am sure, in order to confuse the consumer. It is the retailer who decides the cost or selling price of a product.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Having regard to size, I suggest there is only one reason for this strange packaging practice, and that is to confuse the consumer. There is no other reason for the manufacturer or packager to put out these various sizes. I am satisfied that this bill would be of great assistance to the new minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Turner) in protecting the consumer. It would give the minister a tool with which he could persuade the manufacturer, processor or packager, to give some meaning to size information on labels. Nothing in this bill would create difficulty for manufacturers of these packaged products. It would require only that manufacturers or packagers use standard sizes, such as referred to by the consumers association report of 1962, to which I am referring.

It is obviously difficult for one manufacturer or packager to give the consumer a minimum sized product if his competitor has the authority to change the advertising in respect of size. That is the type of thing that is happening. The new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will have the right under the law to set out clearly regulations in respect of packaging. This will lead to equitable requirements. I suggest that is what this bill is intended to do.

This bill was not drafted by me. It is based essentially on a similar bill introduced in the United States Senate by Senator Hart of Michigan, and which has the enthusiastic support of consumer organizations in the United States.

Let me close by summarizing what the bill now before this house will do. I am sure most hon. members are familiar with the issue of Consumer Reports for May, 1963. That issue summarizes what this bill will do, in that it stipulates the following requirements:

The statement of the net weight content on the front panel of a package.

The establishment of standards with respect to the location and prominence (size of type) of the net weight declaration.

The prohibition of the use of quantity descriptive words such as "giant", "big", and "jumbo" in the net weight declaration. "Big gallon" or "jumbo quart", for example, would not be acceptable.

The prohibition of "cents-off" legends as an integral part of a package's label.

The prohibition of deceptive pictures on packages.

The establishment of reasonable standards of weight or size—the use of such odd sizes as the 13-3/7 ounce package of dry cereal, for example, would be outlawed.

The prohibition of sizes, shapes, or dimensional proportions which may deceive consumers—the bigger pack.

This all boils down to the fact that the package shall not bear false witness. It has been a long time since the consumers of this country have had a fair shake. The farmers have their organizations; the labourers have their organizations; the manufacturers have their organizations; the retailers have their organizations and the banks have their organizations. With the establishment of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, we now have a government department with the responsibility of protecting the interests of the consumer.

With the passage of this bill the minister would have the legal right to do many of those things we intended when we approved the legislation establishing his department.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21, now under discussion, deals with a statute which has been around for 15 years, and to my knowledge has not been amended since that time. In view of modern technology in respect of prices and packaging, sales of products are now being made by package advertising rather than by direct advertising. The traditional manner of selling has changed. At one time the customer went into the store, saw what he wanted to buy and made the selection, which was put into a package. Now one goes into the store, finds something already packaged, and purchases it in that form.

Women have problems because there is almost no way to make a meaningful judgment as to what is contained in a package. Advertising of prices, quality and quantity has little or no meaning. As an example, one could take the pre-mixed cake packages. One cake mix may be a pound and a half and another may be one pound. Both may contain the proper amount and weight of ingredients to produce a cake of the specified size.

So when you come to the regulation of weights and measures, there is not only the question of getting accurate, meaningful measurements on the package but also consideration of the use to which the ingredients can be put. It is not the simplest thing in the world to evolve a policy or a series of policies which will make this obvious to all. When dealing with the question of weights and measures, we also have to consider the related problem of quality, which varies considerably and which to some extent this bill does not take into consideration. I use this not as an argument against the bill but merely to point out the complexity of the undertaking when you are dealing with this very important subject matter.

The other aspect to which I should like to refer before going into other considerations is the constitutional question. I understand from the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) that much of what is in this bill has been based on a truth in packaging bill presented in the United States Senate by Senator Hart. There have been a large number of hearings held on this bill. I might say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North that these hearings have been fully covered in the consumer reports to which I subscribe.

I find these consumer reports very interesting and useful publications. It is a pity that, in many cases, the private brands we have in Canada, such as those of Eaton's, for example, are not fully covered and sometimes the model numbers we have are a year behind those in the United States. As a result, it requires a great deal of homework if one is to use these publications properly. Nevertheless the senate hearings have been reasonably well covered in this excellent publication.

The difficulty we have in Canada in attempting to bring forth similar legislation revolves around the fact that at the moment we do not have, nor are we likely to have, the power to cover the whole area in the way that can be done under a different jurisdictional set-up, such as the United States. Repugnant as it may be, therefore, it is necessary for us in Canada at the federal level to proceed step by step without having any over-all co-ordinated plan, because we do not have the power in all areas. If we are going to be successful, therefore, and provide legitimate protection for the consumer, the new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will have to engage in an ever increasing number of conferences with the provinces in order to work out proper programs. Only in this way will legislation at the federal and provincial levels not be in conflict. There are other areas in which the same situation holds true.

We certainly do not want to find ourselves in a situation where there is a conflict in jurisdiction, where the legislation passed by one level of government may be made null and void by another level of government. This is quite possible. Nothing less than a fully co-ordinated attack on the problem will suffice. I feel that the bill put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North is valuable because it does direct public attention to a particular problem, perhaps even to the problem as a whole. I believe it could be a very useful tool for stimulating public debate in this area.

A little earlier I mentioned the problem of quality in connection with weights and measures. I believe I should also come to the point of how you can find out just what the ingredients are that are going into many of these packaged products, particularly foods, which we are using now. Unless one is a chemist, it is almost impossible to tell what is in these packages. In most cases the ingredients are listed under their technical names and not in terms that we can understand. I do not have any examples to give at the moment. However, I am sure if you go down to your friendly grocer and look at any of the food packages, you will find it is almost impossible to say what has been added to the original product.

I really do not have any suggestions as to how this problem can be eliminated, or as to how the doubt many people have about the quality of the product going into these packages can be relieved. This problem of protecting the consumer is not peculiar to Canada, it is a world wide problem. Perhaps we feel it more because increasingly the products we buy are coming to us in a highly developed form. In other words, we are not buying raw fish, we are buying processed fish. We are not buying the ingredients for a cake mix; we are buying ingredients that have been combined so that very little labour on our part is required. Because of the complexity of this process, we have not educated ourselves to know precisely what we are buying. In other, less developed countries where people go to market on a daily basis, they see and buy precisely what they want. It is on view for them. However, we are buying highly processed products, and we are not all aware of the precise methods of processing, nor are we aware of what has been put into the product.

[Mr. Reid.]

One criticism which can be levelled against this bill is based on the legislation which it seeks to amend, and that is that the Weights and Measures Act does not, in itself, provide a framework which is adequate to meet current practices in packaging. In many cases we are told the very requirements which the act has already laid down produce inflexibilities, prevent experimentation and improvements. This not only hampers the producer of the product but also the packager. It hampers as well any new, meaningful weights and measures reservations.

It is my information that the Department of Trade and Commerce, weights and measures branch, has had this matter under consideration for some time and is seeking, in concert with the provinces and in concert with the new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, to evolve new standards which will be effective nationally. They are seeking to co-operate with provincial standards which have applicability in this area. I am further informed that it is hoped within the next year the government will be able to recommend to parliament a new approach covering the whole area, with provincial approval. It is hoped this new approach will prove to be a flexible and equitable means of providing this type of measurement protection which is desired and needed by all.

One aspect that has to be borne in mind is that there is no sense in changing the present regulations unless you are certain the new legislation will work. We have seen examples in this house of new legislation being proposed, but with obvious flaws in it because it had not been cleared with the people who had a vital interest in the subject. In the case of measurement regulation, we are dealing with a highly technical aspect of a very limited subject. If the new measurements which are presented are not workable, or have not been properly thought out, then their impact will be to throw the whole situation into chaos. If you adopt new regulations which do not work or do the job for which they are designed, then it will be almost impossible to revert to the former ones which, despite their limitations, some of which I have mentioned, did provide a useful measure of control. I am sure that the investigations undertaken by Senator Hart and the United States senate, as embodied in the bill of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, will be given consideration by the appropriate authorities when we come to develop new legislation and regulations. I hope this legislation will be debated in the house in the new session, though of course there is no guarantee that that is going to happen.

There is one other aspect to which I should like to return, and this is the question of jurisdiction in the field of packaging. I am sure hon. members are aware that this jurisdiction does not lie solely within the Weights and Measures Act, but in fact extends over a broad area. I am informed that the act includes an exemption in the form of recognition of the activities of other agencies. These are other than retail premises that pack food, but those which pack specialised products, such as pesticides, which are of course the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare, food and drug directorate, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Fisheries.

To enact legislation dealing with aspects of this sort, Mr. Speaker, would require co-ordination among many government departments, which would not be difficult, given the proliferation of interdepartmental committees that are supposed to be dealing with these questions. Somebody once defined a committee as a group of the unfit to do the unnecessary. However, with the complexities of modern government these committees perform valuable services, even though the speed with which they make decisions and process information is very slow indeed, to say the least.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, all legislation having to do with various aspects of weights and measures and packaging would have to be amended. Other provisions in provincial jurisdictions that carry specific requirements in regard to certain products and which are valid only to the extent that they do not offend federal responsibilities would have to be amended as well. This would probably require some federal-provincial conferences so as to deal more generally with the whole concept.

I hope that the new department of consumer affairs will have primary responsibility for this problem, instead of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which is more technically oriented. Their interest, their scope, their constituency if you will, is much broader than that of the Department of Trade and Commerce when it comes to protecting the rights of the consumer. How successful the new department will be largely depends on whether or not the consumers of Canada are able to take advantage of the educational information which, we are told, the department is to produce, as well as on how impressive are the legislative changes that we are able to make at the federal level to deal with these problems.

I think it is fair to say that the reduction in drug prices which we had hoped would take place with the repeal of the sales tax on drugs has been very small indeed. The powers which the federal government has within its jurisdiction are limited; largely, they can only attack the problem indirectly. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Turner) is seeking, through his bill to amend the Patent Act and Trade Marks Act to do this. The idea is that by removing some of the protection the drug industry has enjoyed, competition will be encouraged and drug prices will be forced down. Again, the government's attack in not direct but indirect. Whether that government measure will succeed will depend on two things, of course: the vigilance of the government in publicizing the lack of success it has enjoyed through following direct methods, and the ability of the consumer to take advantage of competition, to pressure companies and, if necessary, to boycott products on a national basis. I do not contend that the government has the responsibility of protecting the consumer; the consumer is responsible for his own protection. But I do think that the government should ensure that the consumer gets all the facts that are available so that he can make his own decisions.

Many tools are at hand to help consumers, and here I am referring to Consumer Reports magazine, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) referred. Or, the consumer could join the Canadian consumers organization, which publishes a monthly booklet. Similarly the consumer can use his God-given intelligence. Also he need not buy on time; thus he can avoid being locked in with a finance company.

Another difficulty our consumers are faced with stems from the attitude of regarding as necessities certain items which are luxuries. Often people spend much money unnecessarily. One cannot blame the business firms for that; to a large extent consumers are to blame for allowing themselves to buy things which are not necessary. That has always been a problem and will always continue to be one.

I conclude by saying that I find this bill interesting since it focuses our attention on the problems of our consumers. Nowadays the consumer moves in a highly technical field of packaging and it is very difficult to exercise judgment about weights, measures and that sort of thing. The bill highlights the problems which we face and I hope that the government will take heart and try to improve matters, even if that improvement is marginal only.

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about the over-all principle of the bill. Certainly the objectives of Bill C-23 are good, but they do not go far enough. The explanatory note says:

> The purpose of the bill is to ensure that a retail purchaser of goods, packaged in a wrapper or container, be fairly informed of the weight or measure of the contents; and to control competitive trade practices—
> It is possible that the government presently has a general power under the Weights and Measures Act, section 35(1), to remedy the grievance mentioned. That section, in part, provides:

And so on.

I doubt, if the legislation is examined carefully, whether the government has the power necessary to meet the present day advanced techniques of manufacturing and selling. Nevertheless I am heartily behind the idea of this bill.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Whether we like it or not, these days us men seem to be pulled into the business of shopping; and more than anything I do not like shopping. All the same, going shopping with our wives may do us good because we can become educated to know just what they go through when they try to choose among products which are being sold in many of our chain stores. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) spoke well on this subject.

One piece of merchandise always gets my dander up, and that is a package of bacon. The packaging may have improved, but it has not improved much. Hon. members may remember those nice packages of bacon with a nice lean strip right along the top. At one time you only saw the lean strip but now you might just see a little fat. Once, when shopping with Mrs. Roxburgh, I debated with her which package of bacon we should buy. I said we should buy this package and she said we should buy that. We had an argument about which was the leaner package. In the end we bought both packages and we both got caught, because the bacon in neither package was lean. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) gave us a few similar examples some minutes ago.

[Mr. Reid.]

I happen to be in the fruit business and I want to speak of a practice that has been diminishing gradually, that of putting coloured coverings over packages. In my district we had a great old peach grower; in fact, he was the leading peach grower in Canada, with something like 600 acres of peaches. This man put on quite a campaign against coloured covering, calling it a veil of sin. I can only say that we have many veils of sin in our chain stores. They may not sin so much with coloured packages, but as has been demonstrated, they do sin with their packaging.

You know, Mr. Speaker, we cannot protect the consumer against herself—and women are the hardest of any people I know to protect. Our housewives talk about the high prices of goods, and about the money they spend to fill the larder for the coming week. I have followed Mrs. Roxburgh in some chain stores and watched her pick up a package of this and a package of that, only to realize afterwards that had she looked a little, had she shopped around a little, she could have got a similar product at a much lower price. Everybody wants everything done up in a nice little package. Our women want to reach for this and to reach for that, and to serve pop when he comes home from work with the least possible work. That is all very nice, but that sort of thing costs money.

I think that the over-all idea behind the bill is excellent, and I feel that the government should take another look at this matter of weights and measures and see if something cannot be done to make the task of the housewife easier, as she goes into the store to buy. At least she should know what she is buying.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to say that I endorse what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) said this morning when he announced officially that he would be a candidate for the leadership of the Liberal party. He said then that, should he get the position he was seeking, he was determined to proceed with parliamentary reform.

Through the presence of our colleagues here and in view of the futility of the debate which has been going on, I notice that it is more and more imperative to reform the institution that is parliament and to put an end to the frivolousness of debates such as those we have heard, not because the speakers did not display great ability and knowledge, but because fundamentally we are discussing things which have already been discussed, and nothing is decided, in short nothing is settled.

[English]

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit a question? If he considers this a frivolous debate, why is he taking part in it?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I took care to mention that the members had made a useful contribution, but it is the situation itself which is unprofitable. What are we considering? A bill already introduced in this house in 1964 and in 1966. The hon. member has been harping on the same string for several years. The question has been referred to a committee which reached the conclusion that the bill, as worded, in spite of its very commendable intentions, did not cover the whole situation. As pointed out by a previous speaker, I believe, other jurisdictions, apart from the federal jurisdiction, could be affected and should help in achieving the aim sought by the sponsor.

Mr. Speaker, other acts, such as those governing imports and exports, should also be amended, if the purpose of the hon. member is to be fully achieved. He certainly knows it.

In spite of all this, the discussion goes on; a whole hour is lost really, simply in order to put this bill off indefinitely. I say that in all good faith, not in order to minimize the contribution of those who have spoken, but to show clearly and definitely that our parliamentary institutions are in need of reform, so that we may stop wasting needlessly the valuable time and energy we could use on other things.

Now, Mr. Speaker, since I must deal with the subject—otherwise you would call me to order—I must say that as a member of the committee known as the consumer credit and cost of living committee—Crédit à la consommation, I was in a position to consider the many problems faced by the consumers, for they are subject to all kinds of exploitation. They are likely to be dazzled by tinsel, by labels that do not clearly state the contents, by some wording that may lead the buyer to think that some benefit will accrue, in short by words such as "10 cents off", "20 cents off".

The committee discussed these matters; it heard several witnesses, including managers of large businesses, presidents of the largest chain stores in Canada.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, almost everybody agreed on the necessity of giving more information to the consumer, of warning him concerning the quality and the actual quantity of foodstuffs or goods which he buys.

One of the main recommendations of the committee suggested precisely the creation of a department of consumer affairs. As we know, this recommendation has been considered favourably. Today, the department is headed by a young, dynamic and brilliant minister, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Turner), on whom we found such great hopes, and rightly so.

The hon. minister and his officials intend to set up throughout Canada organizations whose task will be to inform the public, to undertake an information campaign as extensive as possible, in order to give the consumers all the relevant data, all the necessary information so that they will not be taken in when buying goods.

In my opinion, that is one of the most efficacious measures and one of the most likely to meet the objectives set out by the mover of the bill now under consideration and to prevent the abuses we have deplored in the past.

Mr. Speaker, the Criminal Code provides that all false representation is an offence, but it has been discovered that it is very difficult to enforce those provisions.

Quite seldom have proceedings been lodged against large firms or chain stores on account of false representations, because basically, commercial advertising has developed so much, the strategy of publicity firms has improved so much that there would always be some means of finding devious methods to attract the consumer, without misleading him or being charged under the Criminal Code.

This is the reason why, without detracting from the merits of the sponsor of the bill or rejecting his commendable intention, we are entitled to express our reservations and say that the bill is not exhaustive and does not cover the necessary fields to give it the efficiency which we would like it to have. I believe it might be advisable, outside of a strictly administrative point of view, to consider measures likely to be more effective, rather than to merely limit ourselves to this type of bill.

I feel that the reforms would be more administrative than legislative in character, and that is why, although I accept the principle as stated, we cannot readily accept the passing of this bill.

It is our duty to advise the house of our reservations concerning the bill. Besides, Senator Hart in the United States introduced a similar measure expressing very much the same point of view as the one we are now studying, and its application proved the extreme complexity of the problem, as well as—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Choquette: —the inevitable difficulties.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that it is six o'clock.

[English]

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 19, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the house that consequent upon the notification of a vacancy in the representation given in this house on Friday, February 16, 1968, by the hon. member for Gaspé, and pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member for the electoral district of Matapédia-Matane.

FINANCE

TABLING OF REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like permission of the house to table two copies in English and French of the report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967. As the house is aware, the Financial Administration Act requires that the report of the Auditor General be laid before the house on or before December 31 or, if parliament is then not in session, within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

The Auditor General has asked me to express his apologies to members of the house for the delay which resulted from circumstances over which he had no control.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF VOLUMES I, II AND III

On the order: Government notices of motions:

February 16—The Minister of National Health and Welfare:

That the Public Accounts Volumes I, II and III for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, laid before the House on January 22, 1968, be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21, this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

R.C.M.P. HORSE FARM

Question No. 723—Mr. Reid:

1. How much did the R.C.M.P. pay for their recently purchased horse farm?

2. Did the R.C.M.P. contact the N.C.C. about the possibilities of using greenbelt farm property for this purpose, and (a) if so, what answers did they receive (b) if not, for what reasons?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. $30,000.

2. Yes. N.C.C. offered to seek authority to lease acreage in the western green belt to the R.C.M.P. However, it was decided that from a standpoint of long range cost to the R.C.M.P., it would be advantageous to purchase rather than lease the required acreage.

REMARRIAGE OF WIDOWS RECEIVING ANNUITIES

Question No. 894—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. During each of the last three fiscal years, how many widows of public servants or of retired public servants have forfeited entitlement to annuity under the Public Service Superannuation Act by reason of subsequent remarriage?

2. In each such year (a) what was the total annual dollar value of all annuities so forfeited by such widows (b) were any calculations made of the actuarial benefit to the Fund by reason of such forfeitures due to remarriage of the annuitant (c) if so, what did such calculations reveal?

3. In the calculation of the actuarial basis of the Public Service Superannuation Fund, was any consideration given to the presumed rate of remarriage of widowed annuitants?

4. If so, upon what precise basis was this calculated?

5. What would have been (a) the actual loss during the last three fiscal years (b) the actuarially calculated loss, to the Fund, if the pension annuity to a widow of a public servant or of a retired public servant were to be vested in her without penalty or loss resulting from her subsequent matrimonial activities?

Questions

6. (a) Would this require any increase in contributions to the Fund by public servants (b) if so, by how much?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. The number of widows who have forfeited entitlement to annuity under the Public Service Superannuation Act by reason of their remarriage is:

Fiscal Year	Number of Widows who Remarried in Each Year
1964-65	73
1965-66	75
1966-67	104

2. (a) The total annual dollar value of the annuities forfeited by the widows referred to in 1 above are:

Fiscal Year	Total Dollar Value
1964-65	$44,785
1965-66	$50,495
1966-67	$59,827

(b) Yes. (c) See answer to question 5.

3. Yes, the actuarial basis of the Public Service Superannuation Act includes provision for the remarriage of widowed annuitants.

4. The rates of remarriage, varying by age and duration from widowhood, adopted for purposes of the last two actuarial valuations were developed from the experience during the period from January 1, 1940, to December 31, 1957, of widows awarded pensions from August 4, 1914, to December 31, 1957, under the Pension Act and previous government administrative orders.

5. If widows' allowances were payable after remarriage the loss to the account in respect of the three fiscal years ending March 31, 1967 would have been: (a) Approximately $1.5 million on a cash basis in respect of all widows' allowances not paid because of remarriage. (b) Approximately $2,600,000, expressed in terms of actuarial value in respect of widows who remarried during this period.

6. (a) Yes. (b) The required increase in contributions and government credits combined is estimated at approximately 0.1 per cent of salaries.

STAFF HOUSING ACCOMMODATION, SPRINGHILL, N.S.

Question No. 939—Mr. Coates:

1. Has any action been taken to develop new housing in the Springhill area to provide accommodation for employees of the Canadian Penitentiary Service who are locating at Springhill, N.S., with the staffing of the Young Offender's Penal Institution?

2. Has C.M.H.C. initiated any special action that would be of assistance in providing the required housing for the new personnel that will be associated with the Penal Institution in Springhill?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of the Solicitor General and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. No.

2. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have assured officials of the town of Springhill that the full provisions of the National Housing Act are available to meet the needs of the community. In December 1966 approval was given of a federal contribution of $10,500 for an urban renewal study in Springhill. On November 2, 1967, approval was given of a federal loan of $262,292 to the Nova Scotia Housing Commission for the construction of a 20-unit public housing project in Springhill.

IRON ORE PRODUCTION

Question No. 946—Mr. Tucker:

What was the total production of iron ore, in dollar value and in tons, in each province of Canada, from January 1 to December 31 in each year, from 1960 to 1967 inclusive?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce):

Questions

*SUPPLY OF LEATHER DESK CALENDARS

Question No. 973—Mr. Irvine:

1. Regarding the 1968 leather desk calendars purchased by or supplied to the Department of Manpower and Immigration (a) what parts of these calendars were made in the U.S.A. and at what cost (b) what parts of these calendars were made in Canada and at what cost?

2. Why were tenders not called?

3. What was the purpose of the purchase?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The answer to this question is as follows: 1. (a) Calendar backs were imported from the U.S.A. for 4,606 of the 5,606 calendars in question, at a cost to the Canadian company of $350.75. (b) 1,000 calendars were completely made in Canada at a cost of $404.25. For the balance of the calendars (4,606) all embossing, die cutting, finishing, printing date pads and envelopes were supplied from Canadian manufacture at a cost of $1,403.01.

2. The initial order involved 1,000 calendars at a total cost of $404.25. The second order was for 4,606 calendars at a total cost of $1,753.76. Price quotations appeared reasonable for these purchases and therefore formal tenders were not invited.

3. The calendars were purchased as a convenient reminder to employers about the services of Canada manpower centres.

ARMED FORCES HOUSING FACILITIES SOEST, GERMANY

Question No. 983—Mr. Skoreyko:

1. Who is in charge of housing facilities for the Canadian Armed Forces personnel in Soest, Germany?

2. What procedures are followed to insure adequate housing facilities for Service personnel and their families, what are the rents paid, and are the rents checked to see that they are fair?

3. What medical services, doctors, hospitals, etc., are provided for Service personnel and their families, by whom and at what cost to the family unit?

4. What facilities are provided to the Canadian personnel overseas by Maple Leaf Services, and does Maple Leaf Services operate at a profit or a loss?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. The commander, Canadian Forces Base, Soest, Germany, who administers a housing office to assist Canadian servicemen to obtain accommodation of a suitable standard. A high percentage of the off-base economy housing occupied by Canadian families is retained within the Canadian inventory and passed on to incoming families. However, the housing staff are continually seeking suitable accommodation on behalf of the servicemen. When a new acquisition is available for rental the housing supervisor assesses the rental value and negotiates a fair rental price with the landlord. This has served to control rental prices and prevent servicemen from bidding against one another for accommodation. Off-site accommodation is classified as follows: Class A—Good accommodation, well furnished, all normal facilities. Maximum rent $27-$30 per room. Class B—Average accommodation, suitably furnished, normal facilities. Maximum rent $24-$27 per room. Class C—Poor accommodation, adequately furnished, basic facilities. Maximum rent $18-$24 per room.

3. Service personnel are provided medical care by their unit medical officers. When necessary, x-ray, laboratory investigations or minor hospital care can be provided within the garrison area by the medical reception station. Definitive hospital care, including major surgery, is carried out at the British military hospital, Iserlohm, where approximately half the professional and nursing staff is provided by the Canadian Forces medical services. In so far as dependants are concerned, medical care is provided at the Soest dependants' clinic which is staffed by Canadian Forces medical service personnel and civilian registered nurses employed by the Department of National Defence. In addition a duty medical officer is on call at all times for emergencies, and a 24-hour ambulance service is available. Complete general hospital inpatient facilities are provided at the British medical hospital, Iserlohm. However, dependants have a choice of accepting the care provided by the department or seeking medical care from civilian German doctors and undergoing hospitalization in German hospitals. There is no charge for care received by a Canadian serviceman from the Department of National Defence medical facilities. Charges for dependants are levied in accordance with a scale provided by the group surgical medical insurance plan. A married serviceman without children pays $1.36 monthly for the GSMIP and $3.25 for the outside Canada coverage plan. A married serviceman with a family pays $2.04 monthly, plus $5.20. A serviceman with this coverage is normally left with only a small portion of the hospital charges, if any, for the hospitalization of a dependant.

4. Maple Leaf Services operate the following facilities: 10 junior clubs (corporals and below); One mobile canteen; Two town clubs; Three Groceterias (patterned after supermarket style found in Canada); One milk delivery service (to married quarter areas); Three family shops (general range of family clothing); One laundromat; One holiday shop (general range of sports equipment, etc.); One gift shop; One dependants' restaurant.

Maple Leaf Services is a corporate body incorporated under part II of the Companies Act and as such is managed in accordance with sound business practices and does not operate at a loss. Funds are generated to the degree required to meet overhead expenses, development and improvement of required services, and to provide funds to assist in the development and provision of recreational facilities in the interests of the well-being of servicemen and their dependants.

SUGAR IMPORTS FROM CUBA

Question No. 984—Mr. Hales:

1. Is Canada importing sugar from Cuba and, if so, how much was imported in each of the years 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966 and 1967?

2. What percentage is this of our total import of sugar?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1 and 2. Canadian imports of raw sugar from Cuba and the percentage they represent of total Canadian imports of raw sugar for 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966 and January to November 1967 (the latest import statistics available) are as follows:

Year	Quantity cwt.	% of Total Imports of Raw Sugar
1963	1,483,143	9.0
1964	5,600	0.04
1965	1,445,737	7.9
1966	1,441,167	8.5
1967 (Jan.-Nov.)	1,541,806	8.5

SLIPWAY RECONSTRUCTION, HIBBS COVE, NFLD.

Question No. 987—Mr. Tucker:

Has the government any plans to reconstruct the slipway at Hibbs Cove, Conception Bay, Newfoundland, this year?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Yes.

Questions

REPORT OF PRINTING BUREAU

Question No. 1018—Mr. McCleave:

1. Is the Canadian Government Printing Bureau required to table an annual report?

2. If so, what was (a) the year under review (b) the date of tabling, of the most recently issued annual report?

3. If not, why did the annual report for 1964 of the Department of Defence Production state on Page 11, "The General Manager of the Printing Bureau reports to the Minister of Defence Production and the Bureau issue its own annual report"?

4. When may the House expect to receive annual reports for the years since the twelve months last reported?

5. Can these reports be printed commercially if the Bureau is experiencing serious delays in production?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): In so far as the Department of Defence Production is concerned: 1. Section 36 of the Public Printing and Stationery Act, Chapter 226, R.S. 1952, requires that an account be laid before parliament each year by the Department of Public Printing and Stationery.

Order in Council P.C. 1963-1254, dated August 21, 1963 provided for the separation of the publishing and printing sectors of public printing and stationery. Since that time the Queen's Printer has filed an annual report in parliament and, in addition, the Canadian Government Printing Bureau has filed an annual review of its operations.

2. (a) The year under review was the calendar year 1966. (b) Tabled on February 16, 1968.

3. See answers to 1 and 2 above.

4. The annual report of the Canadian Government Printing Bureau for the calendar year 1967 will be available by April 15, 1968.

5. Yes.

DISTRIBUTION IN ONTARIO OF LEATHER DESK CALENDARS

Question No. 1026—Mrs. Wadds:

For what reasons was the Province of Ontario singled out as the only region to receive, for distribution to industries and businesses in that Province, leather desk calendars supplied by the Department of Manpower and Immigration?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Regional directors have the authority to take such action within limited budgets approved for promoting employers' knowledge of the department's services.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, who has already indicated to the house that he does not intend to present the budget before April 1. Can the hon. gentleman inform the house when we may expect the presentation of the budget?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. I expect this is a decision which will have to be made by the new prime minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED MISTREATMENT OF PRISONERS AND NON-COMBATANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having regard to the films which were shown on C.B.C. television last night depicting ill treatment of prisoners and the suffering which has been occasioned to non-combatants in Viet Nam, I wish to ask the government whether it will consider making representations to all the participants in this barbarous war, particularly to those who, like Canada, are signatories to the international convention regarding the treatment of prisoners and non-combatants, in the hope that these atrocities may be prevented.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think in the circumstances all I can do is take the question as notice.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, while an answer is being prepared, as a supplementary question may I ask whether the Canadian government has ascertained through its various channels whether there has been any firm commitment by the government of North Viet Nam to the effect that it is prepared to begin negotiations and consideration of de-escalation of military activities once the bombing of North Viet Nam has ceased?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED OPERATION OF RUSSIAN SPY SHIPS OFF EAST COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of reports that two Soviet spy ships have been operating off Canada's east coast, could the minister advise the house whether these vessels were operating in Canadian or international waters?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): They were operating in what we consider international waters, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Patterson: As a supplementary question, in view of the statement by a United States representative that information on this subject had been transmitted by General Allard, and the fact that General Allard has denied the allegation, is the minister instituting an inquiry to ascertain where the information originated?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I had a talk this morning with General Allard, and he told me he had never mentioned that the ships were actually approached by Canadian ships, or taken over. That was the implication. A story had been going around, and actually it was accurate, that an Argus aircraft had taken pictures of the ships while they were being refueled by a supply vessel. General Allard has denied that he ever said this, as correctly stated by the hon. member.

INTERCEPTION AND IDENTIFICATION OF RUSSIAN BOMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister now determined whether the Russian planes which flew off the coast of Newfoundland flew through commercial air lanes?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): I have not, Mr. Speaker, but I know they were 60 nautical miles off Newfoundland. That is as far as I can go.

Mr. Harkness: In view of the fact that the commercial air lanes extend from Newfoundland to the United Kingdom surely the minister would be in a position to know whether the Russian planes were in these air lanes, thus endangering commercial air traffic.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister looked into this matter to see what infraction of international air agreements, if any, took place as a result of the flight of these Russian planes?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): No, I have not, Mr. Speaker, but in co-operation with the Minister of National Defence I would be pleased to do so. I would be very surprised if they were flying in one of the commercial air lanes. To the extent that information is available, we will check.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO WHITE PAPER ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the President of the Privy Council in the house on Friday that he expects that in the very near future the government will be presenting new policies based on the findings of the Watkins report, does the government intend issuing a white paper before these new policies are presented to the house?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think that is a matter that remains to be determined, Mr. Speaker. This was simply a report submitted to the government. It does not necessarily set forth the government's views, and won't necessarily be acted upon in this form. It will be a matter for study by the government and a determination after that study has been completed, I would think, as to whether or not there should be a white paper.

Mr. Hees: As a supplementary question, was the President of the Privy Council expressing the view of the government when he said he expected the new policies, based on the findings in this report, would be presented in the very near future?

Mr. Winters: I think that would require a determination of what the very near future is.

FISHERIES

POSSIBLE RADIOACTIVE CONTAMINATION FOLLOWING PLANE CRASH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the statement made last evening by the premier of Newfoundland on a C.B.C. television program, that in his opinion the Russian planes intercepted last week were surveying Atlantic coast waters for possible contamination; and in view of the possibility of such contamination of these waters as a result of the loss of nuclear bombs near Thule, would the minister indicate what steps his department or the government are taking to clarify the matter, particularly because of the tremendous impact that such statements could have on fish consumption and on the entire fishing industry in the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I listened last night to the statement by the premier of Newfoundland. He was expressing a personal opinion. So far as the federal Department of Fisheries is concerned, I gave our position on Wednesday, February 7, when I answered a similar question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. The situation is the same today as it was when I replied to that hon. member.

Mr. Crouse: As a supplementary question, in view of the large research base we have at Halifax I would like to ask the minister has any action been taken to determine whether there is any contamination as a result of this incident?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I gave the assurance on Wednesday, February 7, that there was no radioactive contamination and that according to a report from the head oceanographer of the Fisheries Research Board, who had discussed this matter with members of the Atomic Energy Control Board, we had the assurance that there was no radioactivity.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask either the Minister of Fisheries or the Minister of Industry whether a team of experts from Atomic Energy of Canada has been sent to Thule to find out on a first hand basis whether there is any danger of contamination of the adjacent waters which might have an adverse effect on Canadian fisheries, particularly at the Grand banks.

Mr. Robichaud: I am not in a position to answer this question, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRY

REVIEW OF DESIGNATED AREA POLICY RESPECTING ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry. Is it the intention of the government to review the designated area policy of the Department of Industry in so far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman will recognize that a periodic review is made in respect of all the designated areas as well as the non-designated areas.

Mr. Coates: Could the minister be more specific so far as Halifax, Dartmouth, Saint John and Fredericton are concerned? Is any consideration being given to including them?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, a review of these particular areas was made as recently as last November.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister indicate whether the change of attitude regarding a review of this policy so far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned is in effect only until April 6?

SPORTS

SKIING—FEDERAL REPRESENTATION AT CHAMPIONSHIP MEET IN B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in addressing a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that for the first time in Canadian history the top skiers of the world will compete in the du Maurier international world cup championship in Rossland, B.C., the home of Nancy Greene, from March 25 to March 31 inclusive, and in view of the minister's particular interest in physical fitness and amateur sports and the wishes of the people in the district, would the minister consider representing the federal government on this very historic occasion?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I would be delighted, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—CHARGING OF TOLLS ON NEW ACCESS BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. In connection with the new access route which is proposed for the air terminal building at Vancouver international airport—now under construction—is the federal government contemplating the charging of tolls on the new Fraser river bridge that will be involved?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): If you are referring to the Middle Arm bridge from Lulu island to Sea island, it is proposed that this will be part of the over-all toll structure for access to the airport, but this matter is still under negotiation with the provincial government. It could be that they would have a new proposal which, because of their contributing in some way, would make it unnecessary for us to charge tolls on that particular bridge.

Mr. Fulton: In my question I was referring to the new bridge which is to be constructed, and asked whether there will be charges. Is that the bridge to which the minister referred?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister whether he will immediately reconsider the government's position in order that the Vancouver international airport may not become the only one in Canada which is subject to tolls in respect of access routes.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I think it is about the only place in Canada where the provincial and municipal governments are unwilling to carry out the responsibilities which would normally fall within their jurisdictions. The only solution I know of is the one proposed by the government of Canada under my predecessor, namely providing an access road to recover on behalf of the Canadian taxpayers the expenditures involved.

Mr. Fulton: Is the government proposing the acquisition from the province of its interest in one of the existing access approaches in order that tolls may be imposed in respect of that structure as well?

Mr. Hellyer: There is only one access at the moment, and this is the subject of the negotiations currently under way with provincial authorities.

EXPROPRIATION ACT

DISCUSSIONS WITH FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE RESPECTING AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice of which I have given notice. He is not here at the moment, so I will address it to the Acting Minister of Justice. Is the minister giving serious consideration to meeting with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to discuss ways and means of improving the present Expropriation Act, and has he reached any decision as to how soon this meeting will take place?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): I have taken notice of the question, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When he met recently with officials of the Canadian Wheat Board did the matter of extremely low delivery quotas in western Canada receive consideration, and can the minister tell us when it is expected that this situation will improve?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have no specific information in respect of this question.

[Later:]

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is related to the one regarding low quotas put a few moments ago by the hon. member for Rosthern. Did the minister in his discussions with the wheat board receive information with regard to future wheat sales which may result in higher quotas for Canada?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, I could say the report I received is realistic. I told the house before that prospects for the sale of wheat this year are not as good as they were last year. It is a difficult selling market, but in the face of these difficulties the wheat board is making progress.

Mr. Southam: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate what countries may be interested in the sales and what are the possibilities? We have heard the same answer for some time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could the minister inform us whether the wheat board has arrived at an estimate of the total wheat sales in this crop year?

Mr. Winters: I said a few days ago at a hearing before a committee of the other place that I expect the total wheat sales this year to be between 350 million and 400 million bushels, but that it will take hard selling and some favourable circumstances to reach the higher figure for which we are striving.

Mr. Nasserden: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the pessimistic report he has given us, does he think he could speed up the final payments on wheat, oats and barley to the producers to enable them to take care of their seeding operations?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, I answered that question last week, but we will expedite the payments as much as we can.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED INTENTION TO REDUCE DELIVERY SERVICE TO FIVE DAYS WEEKLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the intention of his department to discontinue the Saturday delivery of mail?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question some time ago.

[Translation]

On that same occasion, I said that the abolition of mail delivery on Saturday had been recommended by Judge Montpetit and that the department was still studying that recommendation.

[English]

SUGAR

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING RESPECTING ONTARIO REFINERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture perhaps I could direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. Would that hon. member indicate whether any progress was made at the joint meeting on Thursday regarding the Ontario sugar refinery problem, and whether a solution is expected in time to permit 1968 contracting?

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is my information that there will be a meeting of all interested parties tomorrow to pursue this matter further.

FINANCE

ACTION BY U.S. TO ATTRACT INVESTMENT CAPITAL FROM ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, who appears at the moment to have vanished into the woodwork. Perhaps his parliamentary secretary will take the question as notice and pass it on. This question arises from a dispatch from Washington which appeared in the local press this week end. It was headed "United States steps up drive to attract investment capital from abroad". The article outlines efforts being made by United States authorities to attract capital from abroad to the United States to safeguard its gold reserves. Has the government taken cognizance of this program on the part of United States authorities and its possible stimulating effect on the outflow of scarce Canadian capital? Does the government propose to do anything about this?

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of the Treasury Board): The Minister of Finance will be making a statement later on this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure whether this particular matter will be referred to. If it is not I will take the question as notice on his behalf so he may answer tomorrow.

MANPOWER

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR AMENDMENTS PROPOSED BY EDUCATION ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in his absence perhaps the Acting Prime Minister will take it as notice. Has he received the report to the Canadian people on manpower development by the Canadian Association for Adult Education? In light of this report will the government give serious consideration to amendments to the present manpower program?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will be glad to take the question as notice.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY FINANCE MINISTER RESPECTING AID TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Finance expressing the views of the government when he said in Moncton on Saturday that government plans for assistance to the Atlantic provinces are too independent of each other? If so, why has this lack of co-ordination been allowed to persist, and does the government have any plans for correcting it?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is reporting on something I am not aware of. I have not seen the report. I would have to discuss this matter with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister give an answer tomorrow?

Mr. Winters: Either I or somebody else, presumably, will.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLAIMS FOR DAMAGE CAUSED BY SONIC BOOMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Are claims for damages caused to buildings by sonic booms from military aircraft referred to the Department of National Defence for compensation or, if not, to which department of government are they referred?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): To the Department of National Defence, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

REPORTED DELAYS IN PROCESSING MILK SUBSIDY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In his absence the minister's parliamentary secretary might have an answer. Will the minister inquire into the recurrent delays in processing milk subsidy payments to dairy farmers, delays which cause acute difficulties to those farmers who have payments of their own to meet?

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I will be happy to bring this matter to the attention of the department and provide an answer for the hon. member.

EXPO '67

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FEDERAL INVOLVEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Last week the minister indicated to me that he would shortly be making a statement on the financial affairs in so far as Expo '67 is concerned. I wonder when we might expect this statement.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been discussing this matter with the officials of Expo '67. I hope shortly to be able to make a statement. It will be in an unaudited form, but I presume that will be acceptable to the hon. member.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO ARREST OF KILLERS OF POLICEMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Early in the month of January Detective C. R. Jeary was murdered, while on duty, by bank robbers who were thwarted by him in their plan to rob a bank in Greenfield Park, province of Quebec. Can the Solicitor General tell the house whether these murderers have been apprehended?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question should be placed on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION TO PARENTS OF THALIDOMIDE CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the manufacturer of thalidomide in Great Britain has announced that it will pay compensation to the families of children born deformed as a result of the use of that drug, will the minister take up with the Canadian manufacturer the possibility of its paying compensation in a similar way to Canadian families?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would also want to put that question on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE FOR SICK AND WOUNDED

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in the minister's absence I direct it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the very heavy civilian casualties in Viet Nam and the need for massive and immediate hospital facilities and medical supplies, will the government take emergency action to help the sick and wounded in this disaster area?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice and I will refer it to the minister.

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR MEETING TO DISCUSS SUMMERSIDE BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister tell the house whether he received this morning telegrams from the premier of Prince Edward Island and the mayor of the town of Summerside requesting an urgent meeting with himself and other cabinet ministers later this week?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that it is not good form to simply ask whether a telegram has been received.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Perhaps I could rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker, and ask the Minister of National Defence if he has informed the premier and the mayor of Summerside whether they could have such a meeting this week, at which they might consider the future of the Canadian forces base at Summerside.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): I have not so informed them, Mr. Speaker, because I have not yet received such a request.

[Later:]

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the Minister of National Defence indicated that communication perhaps was not functioning too well between himself and the premier of Prince Edward Island. I wonder whether he could assure the house that no steps have yet been taken which would permanently affect the future of the Canadian forces base in Summerside.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): No steps have been taken yet.

FINANCE

SMALL BUSINESSES—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF LOAN INTEREST RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister indicate to the house when he might consider amending the interest rate on loans pertaining to small businesses, so that applications for loans by these people might be given favourable consideration?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me this is a repetition of a question asked last week.

MANPOWER

SUPERVISORY JURISDICTION FOR STURGEON FALLS AND TRI-TOWN CENTRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has a decision been reached as to the supervisory jurisdiction for the tri-town and Sturgeon Falls manpower centres?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question should be placed on the order paper.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HEATING OIL AND GASOLINE—REPORTED PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bud Germa (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of certain disturbances over the week end at gasoline retail outlets in the city of Sudbury and is related to a question put to the minister earlier regarding an increase in gasoline prices. At that time the minister said his department was investigating the matter. Is the minister now in a position to make a report to the house regarding the increase in gasoline and fuel oil prices?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been following the situation with some care. I am not really in a position yet to report to the house. The inquiries are still continuing; it is a very complicated situation.

AIR CANADA

WINNIPEG—TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES FROM BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In view of the great anxiety in Manitoba and the many transfers still taking place from the Air Canada base there, can the minister tell the house what he meant by his recent reference to "alternatives" for the Winnipeg overhaul base?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question as put is not in order.

Mr. Sherman: I will rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Minister of Transport whether his department has in its possession new information regarding Air Canada's future plans or possible alternatives for the Winnipeg base.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have up to date information at all times. I did not think it would really be helpful for me to comment further, beyond what I said last week. As a matter of fact even what I said then caused some misunderstanding in the area. I can only reassure my hon. friend that we are making every possible effort to see that the commitment that was made is honoured.

Mr. Sherman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the minister whether he will consider convening at the earliest possible date a meeting of the joint federal-provincial committee that is riding herd on this problem.

Mr. Hellyer: I think there will be a meeting in the not too distant future.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the Minister of Transport that he has up to date information on the problems at the international airport at Winnipeg, would he answer before the end of the month the two questions I have on the order paper, because the problems set out there have been before him now for several months? I know he is diverted by other activities these days.

Mr. Hellyer: It certainly sounds like a reasonable request, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister bring in for first reading a bill setting out the government's proposals for amendments to the Indian Act at this session, so the Indian people might have the opportunity of studying the government's proposals between now and the time of proceeding further with the bill at the next session?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): That would be quite impossible, Mr. Speaker, because the fundamental basis of the changes is being discussed with the Indian people over a period of two and one half months beginning about March 1, before the bill is printed. I hope then to have the bill printed and presented to parliament, and it will then have to be again discussed with the Indians after printing.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister be prepared to make available a schedule of the times and places of these meetings to which he referred, and those who will be participating in this examination prior to the introduction of the bill?

Mr. Laing: I think that would be fair enough, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister also, following the precedent set by himself and his colleague the Solicitor General, distribute to members of parliament the discussion draft which will be distributed to the Indian people and will form the basis of these discussions?

Mr. Laing: This would also appear to be reasonable, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF INCREASE IN BANK INTEREST RATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Could the minister advise the house whether the increase in the bank rates from 6 per cent to 7 per cent has attracted any appreciable flow of funds into Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this question is much too wide in scope to be asked at this time. The hon. member is asking for information which in my view should be given by the minister by way of a statement on motions.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN CRITERIA RESPECTING DESIGNATED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry and ask him whether any steps are being taken to alter the rules under the designated area program of his department in order to take into account the factor of seasonableness of industry in one-industry areas.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of the program unemployment was related to seasonality.

Inquiries of the Ministry

However, in view of the many representations which were received on the inadvisability and unfairness of this approach, we switched to an over-all annual look, and this has been the policy of the department since.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry. I should like to ask him whether a review has been made of the criteria for designation in the Kelowna-Penticton area in British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INCOME TAX

INCLUSION OF GRATUITIES PAID TO RETIRED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the statements made some time ago by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I should like to ask the minister how he can justify the inclusion for income tax purposes of gratuities paid to retired miners.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take that question as notice and I will answer the hon. member tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My translating equipment is not working, so would the minister mind repeating his answer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might tell the hon. member that the minister indicated he will take the question as notice.

AIR TRANSPORT

APPLICATION FOR SERVICE TO NORTH SHORE OF NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. As the air transport board meets tomorrow to license an air carrier to serve the north shore of New Brunswick, will the minister make sure that modern, daily passenger service is made available from the already established Charlo airport at Dalhousie and other airports in the area?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making a representation.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-193, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose on Thursday, clause 5 was under consideration.

On clause 5—Temporary surtax.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I realize there has been considerable discussion on clause 5 of the bill, and many of the things I might say about it have already been said, so I do not intend to repeat them at this time. However, I have been looking at the clause rather carefully and it appears to me there is an obvious inconsistency in its drafting. Of course I do not know just where this oversight has taken place, but perhaps the minister may be able to explain it.

I should point out that clause 5 contains part IA, and that immediately below the heading there appear the words "Temporary Surtax". A good deal of publicity has been given to the idea of a temporary surtax, but I find on reading the clause that it appears to have a misleading title because subclause 2 at the bottom of page 4 makes it clear that this is by no means a temporary surtax. The subclause reads:

(2) This section is applicable to the 1968 and subsequent taxation years.

In my view this clause provides for a permanent tax which can only be changed by a further amendment of the act by parliament.

I am drawing this to the attention of the committee and the minister because I believe that somewhere along the line an error must have been made in the drafting of the bill, particularly in view of the emphasis the minister has placed from time to time on this being a temporary surtax. Yet the subclause as drafted makes it quite clear that this is a permanent tax subject only to some future amendment of the legislation by parliament.

I need hardly remind the committee that in the original income tax act this was called a temporary tax for wartime purposes during world war I. Yet all the events that have taken place since then have made it clear that it is not regarded as a temporary tax. Obviously a mistake must have been made in the drafting of the legislation, and I believe it should be corrected by the committee.

In view of this I move:

That clause 5 be amended by deleting from subclause 2 thereof the words "and subsequent taxation years" and substituting therefor the word "year".

This would bring the clause in line with the subheading "temporary surtax".

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to question whether this amendment is in order under the rules of the house. It does not affect the level of tax for the year 1968, of course, but it does seem to me to affect the balance of ways and means for any period after December 1, 1968. Therefore it would be beyond the rules as I understand them.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, in the light of what the minister has just said on the point of order he has raised, it would appear that he regards this new clause as one that is going to impose this taxation for all time. It seems to me that the point raised by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni is well taken, namely, that the legislation we are passing should be consistent. It should hold together and not just make nonsense.

Here we have a new section entitled "temporary surtax". The minister says we cannot change that part of it that makes it permanent because that would upset the balance of ways and means in 1969, 1970, 1971 and so on. It seems to me that at some point in this discussion we have to get it clear—and we have to say so—whether this taxation is temporary or permanent. In effect the minister has said that he does not want to accept the amendment because he wants the tax to be permanent.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitation in arguing the main point that has been made in this amendment, but I do not think I should do so until you have made a ruling whether the amendment that has been moved is within the rules of the house.

The Chairman: Order. I should like to point out to the committee that the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni appears to the Chair to reverse a decision already taken by the committee. On November 30 the resolution was introduced and first reading was given to the bill on December 18. The first paragraph of the resolution commences with the words:

That for the 1968 and subsequent taxation years—

Paragraph 2 begins with these words:

That for the taxation years commencing after November 1968—

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would appear to be contradictory to the resolution already passed. Therefore I would have to rule it out of order.

Mr. Barnett: I am not going to question your ruling, Mr. Chairman, though since you have drawn attention to the terms of the resolution I suggest that had the minister been prepared at this stage to make his bill consistent and to adopt and move the amendment I have just proposed it might well have been in order. However, the minister appears to indicate no interest at all in removing the inconsistency in the bill in this regard, and by making the statement he did on the point of order he has in effect confirmed his intention to make this tax permanent.

I should like to remove this inconsistency in another way so as to bring the provision more in line with the resolution passed earlier by the house. May I again refer to the heading to the amending part of clause 5 where following the words "Part 1A" the words "temporary surtax" appear. If it were the intention of the minister to impose a temporary tax and to bring in a bill to do so, then we could have argued that point on its merits. On the other hand, the bill as drafted and, indeed, Mr. Chairman, as you have pointed out, the resolution itself indicates that the proposal is that there be a permanent tax. Obviously the sequence of events makes the phrase "temporary surtax" redundant.

Certainly it would be within the minister's rights to stand up and state that it is his intention as Minister of Finance, if he remains in that position, at some later time to introduce a further amendment to the bill. But I would suggest that would be merely a statement of personal intent on his part or on the part of the government and at most could not be regarded as anything more than temporary.

Quite wide publicity has been given to the idea that this tax is temporary. Indeed, I heard it referred to in those words only yesterday or the day before on a C.B.C. national newscast. It appears that this is nothing more nor less than a piece of window dressing on the part of the Minister of Finance. He is quite at liberty either in the house or anywhere across the country to peddle the propaganda of the Liberal party. After all, we are all politicians and consider ourselves free to espouse any particular cause we wish or to indicate our intentions in this manner. However, I suggest it is quite another thing to introduce the propaganda of a political party into a piece of legislation to be enacted by the house. As the phrase stands in the legislation, and the minister has just confirmed this, it is a piece of misleading propaganda and I think it should be removed forthwith. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 5 be amended by deleting where it appears immediately following words "Part IA" the word "temporary".

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I assure members of the committee that it is the intention of the government that this surtax be temporary. If the opposition wants to make it permanent it will help to do that by taking the word "temporary" out of this wording.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: I have no particular objection to the removal of the word, though perhaps I should explain the sense in which this surtax is temporary. The surtax was designed not to affect the revenue of the provinces and to give us, the federal authority, the full benefit. I fully expect, however, that we shall have to discuss with the provinces taxation reform and the incorporation of all our taxes, whether federal or provincial, in a new tax structure. We shall be bringing down our views on this matter this coming spring, I hope.

As I said previously, this surtax is not intended to be a permanent feature of our taxation system. I am not suggesting by that statement that we will not need revenue which is the equivalent of this revenue; I am only suggesting that this surtax is intended to be temporary. It may become incorporated in a new tax structure in which there will probably not be a surtax at all.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, the minister has been contradicting himself on the one hand and confirming my remarks on the other hand. I have no objection to his announcing, as Minister of Finance, his objective but I point out it is a matter of public knowledge that the present government, in the technical sense, will be far more temporary than this piece of legislation. It is all very well for the Minister of Finance to state his present intentions, but they fool no one.

[Mr. Barnett.]

We all know he will not be Minister of Finance for long or, in any event, that he hopes not to be. In the technical sense, if he continues to be responsible for finance it will be in a different manner. His statement of intent is all very well and good but in my view it does not alter my argument. I submit that a misleading phrase ought not to be included in the legislation.

The minister spoke about the tax being made permanent. In this connection I might point out it is a matter of record that I first sought to rectify what I considered to be his error of judgment. I said that until parliament takes a different course from that being taken at the present moment I would oppose putting into law a measure such as this.

Mr. Sharp: I do not think that the committee intends, by an amendment of this kind, to make the surtax permanent. Yet it seems that by removing the adjective "temporary" members of the hon. member's party and of other opposition parties want to make this surtax permanent. I do not. I think it should be temporary and it will be replaced in due course. Whatever the hon. member's intention may have been, I suggest that the proposed amendment can only backfire on those who have made the proposal.

Mr. Knowles: The minister cannot get away with that statement. He said he does not want this surtax to be permanent. If that is so he could have worded the legislation so that it would not be permanent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I think it is in accordance with good practice to have taxes of this kind remain in effect until they are withdrawn or amended. If the hon. gentleman will examine the matter he will see that the tax could not be put on just for the taxation year 1968 because if we were in the middle of our tax reform proposals at the end of 1968 we should face a most difficult situation. We looked at this question carefully and it seemed to us that we should enact this tax in such a way that it would remain in effect until amended. There is no other satisfactory way of bringing this tax forward, except to say that it is for two years. But that does not make it any better or more acceptable. It seems better from the administrative point of view to have the tax in its present form. I see no satisfactory alternative. Certainly the first alternative suggestion that was made, that the tax should be for the taxation year 1968, would have introduced into taxation administration most difficult problems, and that is why we did not employ that method. We finally concluded that it would be best to enact it for an indefinite duration and to indicate by the heading and otherwise that it is intended to be temporary.

Mr. Patterson: We have heard the minister say it would be difficult from the administrative viewpoint to make this tax applicable for one year. Nevertheless I suggest that in applying this tax the government will inconvenience many who will find it difficult to meet the increased tax. Had the first amendment which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni moved been accepted we would have supported it. We recognized from the reference in the legislation to "subsequent years" that the tax could be imposed in perpetuity. I agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that it is contradictory for the government to enact a tax which will apply to 1968 and subsequent years and then claim it is only temporary.

We shall not fall into the trap set by this amendment. We do not want to help the government to sell this tax to the public. To prevent people saying that the opposition insisted on deleting the word "temporary" and therefore making the tax permanent we prefer to have the word "temporary" left in the legislation. We therefore oppose the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there are a variety of offices in the cabinet in which the word "general" is used—Attorney General, Solicitor General, Receiver General and the like. After reading the bill and after listening to the Minister of Finance, and comparing his words with what the hon. gentleman has said on other occasions it seems to me we should change the name of his office to deceiver general. I say this because he has set out precisely to deceive the Canadian public.

It seems to me fairly obvious that the minister is acting in a deceptive way in trying to explain the intentions of the government with respect to this tax and that he is also showing clearly that he is disposed to treat his Bay street and corporate friends in a different manner from the way he intends to treat the general public. A couple of years ago he and the government introduced a special levy on corporations called a special refundable tax. The refunds carried interest and presumably the tax was levied for a purpose similar to that of the surtax with which we are now dealing, namely, to help control inflation.

I point out that in the special tax proposal affecting corporations it was spelled out, because corporations are so friendly to the minister and undoubtedly he will be looking to them in the next week or two, if he has not done so already, to see whether he can find some sustenance to maintain an effective campaign, that the special tax was to apply only for a certain specified period and that it would be paid back with interest. The paying back with interest was another aspect of that tax. The first was that the period in which the special corporation tax was to be levied was spelled out precisely in the act; no subsequent taxation was involved. The minister guaranteed that his buddies in the corporate world would not be liable to pay the tax on an open-end basis. However, when it comes to dealing with the wage earners, the farmers and the ordinary citizens of this country the minister comes up with the concept that this special tax is to be imposed on a permanent basis.

The other aspect, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from York South and my national leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, was that the special tax applicable to corporations was to be repaid after the government had kept the money for a certain period of time. But when it comes to the special tax levied on the people of this nation the minister has no intention of giving it back either with or without interest; it is to be made permanent.

It is noteworthy that the hon. member for Fraser Valley at least told the committee he would have supported the original amendment moved by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, which would have made the tax applicable only to this current year. That is what the minister said would happen when he made a public announcement about this matter. I should also like to point out that when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni moved that amendment he indicated clearly what his intention was, and his subsequent amendment was put forward with the idea of finding out from the minister precisely what intention the government has in mind. However, if there is any doubt in anyone's mind about the attitude taken toward the whole tax structure as reflected in this clause he should pay attention when the vote is taken and see who votes for or against this taxing provision in its entirety. I would be interested to see where the hon. member for Fraser Valley stands on that issue. I do not think the hon. member for Fraser Valley has any question of privilege to raise or anything else to talk about. If he has a question of privilege he should raise it at the appropriate time. He may not be as impatient as I am but then, of course, I am not as consistently friendly to the government as he is.

Mr. Patterson: The record will show.

Mr. Howard: If the hon. member wants to talk about the record I shall be tempted to deviate from the purpose of my remarks. As for my intentions, I have stated them on many occasions, but knowing he is a Social Crediter I realize that no matter how many times I explain them to him he will probably still distort them to suit his own convenience. In any event I do not wish to be diverted from the item now before us. The Minister of Finance has clearly proven that he has a large element of deception in his make-up and he exhibited it when drafting the legislation now before us.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to stoop to the level of debate exemplified by the hon. member for Skeena. I simply want to state that I was not suggesting that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had deliberately set a trap. I believe it was done inadvertently. I pointed out that if we moved in the direction he proposed the government would be able to use the amendment as an argument for imposing this tax on a permanent basis. It could be said that the committee had insisted on this being done. That is all I was implying in my statement. Regardless of the position the hon. member for Skeena wishes to take, this is a statement of fact. I do not believe I have given him too many occasions on which to question my honesty or my veracity.

Mr. Barnett: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I wish to assure the hon. member for Fraser Valley that it was not by inadvertence that I set a trap, and I think the Minister of Finance has fallen into it very nicely.

Mr. Sharp: First of all I should like to say that I do not feel myself particularly entrapped. The undertakings I have given to the house I have carried out exactly as I said I would, and I have never misrepresented or deceived the house as the hon. member for Skeena suggests. I hope the hon. member, when he looks at Hansard, will have second thoughts about accusing the Minister of Finance of deliberate deception. I do not take objection, however, on parliamentary grounds. I do not consider the matter serious enough for that, though I do think the language is most unfortunate.

May I first of all set the record straight so that the committee may at least be aware that I have never at any time attempted to deceive it or to deceive hon. members. When I made my statement on November 30 I said:

> My first proposal relates to the personal income tax. I am asking the house to approve a special surtax of 5 per cent of the amount of the basic tax assessed on an individual in excess of $100. This surtax will take effect January 1 and would remain I expect until we have completed the transition to a slower rate of growth of expenditures or until economic and financial conditions call for a change in our fiscal policy.

That was the statement I made. I indicated the temporary nature of the tax then. I think there is nothing misleading either in the way the bill has been drafted or in the heading over the clause. I did not say it would be for only one year, as has been alleged, nor did I say it would be permanent. I think the way in which the clause is drafted, setting out that the surtax relates to 1968 and subsequent years, carries out the effect of what the government proposes.

May I go on to speak about two or three other things said by the hon. member for Skeena. He referred to the fact that there had been a special refundable tax on corporations, and he seemed to feel that somehow we were discriminating in favour of corporations and against individuals in this particular case. I would point out to him two things that have been pointed out on a number of occasions. The first is that the rates of corporation tax in this country, including provincial and federal, are amongst the highest in the world. There are very few countries in the world, indeed I cannot think of any, where the corporate rate of tax is higher than it is in Canada. Moreover, in this bill which we are now approving the government requires corporations to pay another $290 million during the 1968-69 fiscal year and a further $50 million the following year, or the equivalent of a special levy of $340 million which they can never recover. This is an additional levy that a corporation can never get back as long as it remains in business. This bill is adding $340 million to the taxes paid by corporations, which is a very substantial amount of money.

I am not suggesting that this is not appropriate. Otherwise I would not have proposed it. But the burden of the measures proposed in this bill is heavier on corporations than it is on individuals.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister a question? I just do not understand what he is saying. He must be referring to the fact that he is now requiring corporations to pay their taxes two months earlier.

Mr. Sharp: That is right.

Mr. Lewis: Surely they are going to pay the same taxes which are due in a year except that they start paying them earlier.

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps the hon. gentleman, who has been in legal practice, has not acted on behalf of corporations on many occasions.

Mr. Lewis: I have not at any time.

Mr. Sharp: If he had he would realize that the amount of levy we are placing on corporations by advancing the date of payment amounts to a permanent addition to the amount of taxes they pay for a year. They can never get it back because their payment dates are always advanced permanently. If we advanced the date another month they would have to pay another month's tax. In the bookkeeping of the companies there would not be any difference. They would show the same tax liability, but they have to put up $340 million as a result of the advance of two months in the date of payment, which they can never recover and which is additional to the amount of taxes they have to pay as long as they remain in business.

Mr. Lewis: I am sure the minister is trying to enlighten everybody since he asserted with great conviction that he was not trying to deceive anybody. Will the total tax that a corporation pays for a tax year, let us say over the next five years, be higher than it would have paid if it did not start paying it two months earlier?

Mr. Sharp: Yes. In that five year period, if there is no further advancement of the date, all of the corporations will pay $340 million more in taxes. This is a fact. I would not bring this forward if it were not so.

What has surprised me very much during discussions on the budget and on these bills has been the position taken by the New Democratic party about the Carter commission report. With the exception of the hon. member for Skeena, who made the most devastating attack on that report ever made in this house, other members of that party have suggested that they accept the Carter commission report without qualification. However, one of the main effects of that report's recommendations, if we were to accept them, would be to reduce very substantially the total tax paid on corporation profits because they propose that the ceiling rate on corporate tax paid to federal and provincial governments should be a little lower than it is in some provinces today. They also recommend that the tax paid by corporations should be regarded as a tax paid on behalf of the individual shareholders when they pay their individual income taxes. Moreover, if the hon. member for Skeena suggests that the tax upon rich individuals would be raised I point out that this is not so. What Mr. Carter and his commission have proposed is that the marginal rate of tax should not be higher than 50 per cent. On the other hand, what he does propose is a tax on capital gains.

In the case of corporation taxes the effect of the Carter commission report is to reduce the burden of taxes resulting from our present system of taxation. The commission suggests that this be done by reducing the overall rate of corporation tax and giving as a credit to the individual taxpayer the tax paid by a corporation. In making the arguments they have made, members of the N.D.P., are really contradicting the position they have taken in unqualifiedly supporting the report of the Carter commission.

I have no objection if the committee wants to take the word temporary out of the heading to the clause. However, I would not be in favour of it because I do not think it would then give an accurate presentation of the purpose of this surtax, which I say with great confidence is a temporary surtax. If the committee were to agree to delete the word temporary there would in fact be the suggestion that it is a permanent surtax.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, the minister keeps saying that this is a temporary surtax merely because he states that it is his intention to terminate it at some time or other. We are not dealing with the minister's intentions. We are dealing with legislation. The minister can state his intentions, and he may be perfectly sincere in his wish to carry them out. But the minister of finance can change. The government can change. And the government can do in the future as it has done in the past; it can change its mind. All we can deal with is the legislation actually before us.

We would like to see this surtax temporary. As a matter of fact we would like to see it not imposed at all, but the only way the minister can make the surtax temporary in legal terms is to place a termination date in the legislation. That is what he did in respect of the refundable tax which applied to corporations. The minister should know approximately how long temporary is. He should know whether he needs this temporary surtax for one year, two years or three years. If he finds that the length of time he has estimated is too short then he, or whatever minister of finance is in office at the time, can bring in an amendment to change the date.

So far as this committee is concerned we are dealing with a piece of legislation and the legislation imposes this surtax for 1968 and subsequent taxation years. It does not say how many. Therefore, under the clause which is now before the committee, legally this is a permanent surtax. It is for 1968 and subsequent taxation years, and putting the word "temporary" in the heading has no legal significance at all. The only thing that is binding upon the treasury is the clause which says that this surtax is applicable to 1968 and subsequent taxation years.

If the minister really wants to convince this committee and the country that this is a temporary surtax I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the only thing for him to do now is to have an amendment moved to the clause setting a specific termination date for the surtax. If he does that, then of course we can withdraw our amendment because the surtax would then actually be temporary. But if he will not insert a termination date and the words remain as they are, namely, that this surtax is applicable to 1968 and subsequent taxation years, then of course the tax is permanent until such time as parliament changes it as it might do in respect of any other tax. Therefore the word "temporary" which the minister wishes to have left in the bill is meaningless and misleading.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct two questions to the minister. First, how did he arrive at the calculation of the extra taxation he spoke of a moment ago that corporations would pay? Would he also tell us whether there is anything which defines the word "temporary" because it seems to me the word "temporary" is entirely relative. It could be one's life or the years of the universe. I should like the minister to give us some idea whether there is anything which defines the word "temporary" so that it may be brought into some context.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, in respect of the first question asked by the hon. member I might say that the calculation of the additional revenue from the bringing forward of the payment of corporation tax was based on two months' revenue as we have calculated it in the Department of National Revenue. The effect of bringing forward the payments two months is to add $290 million or $145 million for each month we bring the revenue forward. It also has the effect of adding another $50 million for the subsequent fiscal year so that altogether we would get $340 million extra revenue out of bringing forward the payments by two months. This was based upon our collection experience with the corporations.

Mr. Leboe: Will it have anything to do with the interest calculations on the amount of money that is paid to the government?

Mr. Sharp: No.

Mr. Leboe: In the final analysis it seems to me it is difficult to understand how it can be said, just because the money is received that much sooner, that it costs that much more. It must have some connection with the interest on the amount of money that will have to be borrowed because it is being paid to the government.

Mr. Sharp: At the present time corporations are permitted to pay their taxes in instalments. They can now pay them over a period of five months after the end of the fiscal year. We are now bringing that forward so that they must complete their payments within three months of the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Douglas: How does that compare with the personal income tax?

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps I might first be permitted to complete the explanation of how it brings extra revenue to the government which we never lose again. At present corporations pay tax by monthly instalments but the payments for a taxation year do not begin until the fifth month in that taxation year. For example, under the present law a company with a fiscal year that coincides with the calendar year would begin to pay its tax for 1968 in May, 1968 and complete its payments in April, 1969. As a result of the proposed change such a company will pay its 1968 tax in the ten-month period from May, 1968 to February, 1969. Any further amount necessary to bring instalments based on estimates of tax into line with actual tax liability will be due in March, 1969. For 1969 and subsequent years the payment period for such a company will run from March to the following February with any adjustment based on actual tax liability being due in March. If I may describe the change in general terms, for 1969 and subsequent years the payment period will run from the third month of a corporation's fiscal year to the second month of the following fiscal year with any adjustment based on actual tax liability being due in the third month.

There seems to be some scepticism about the bringing forward of payments. I might remind hon. members that when individuals were put on a pay as you go basis some time in 1942 the process was completed by forgiving individuals a part of their tax liability so that they did not have to pay the extra amount of money. We are not forgiving the corporations; we are requiring them to catch up and bring their payments up to a more current basis. In the process we receive an extra $340 million which we never lose because the corporations will continue to be on the new basis and in the next year will pay as much in the form of taxes as in the past. The only way in which a corporation may avoid that extra liability is by going out of business. This is a permanent addition of $340 million to our revenue. To be fair to the house, because it is never my intention to mislead it I should say that this is not a continuing permanent $340 million a year. It is a once for all additional payment of $340 million and it is never recoverable by the corporations.

Mr. Peters: If they were brought up to date would the amount increase by two and a half times?

Mr. Sharp: Yes. This would bring the corporations on to the same basis as individuals. It is something in the order of $150 million a month for each month we bring it forward. We decided that the effect upon the liquidity of the corporations should not be too great considering the need to promote business expansion and otherwise encourage business corporations to make investments for the purpose of creating new employment. So we decided on a two month advance for this year, which involves a substantial amount for the corporations to raise in addition to the regular amount of their taxes.

Mr. Leboe: I still think, Mr. Chairman, that this is just like daylight saving time. I should like the minister to go back to the second question I asked. How is the word "temporary" defined. It seems to me that "temporary" is an elusive word and that all legislation is temporary. There is no permanent legislation. I should like the minister to explain what is meant by the word "temporary" and how it is defined in the bill.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, It is very difficult to define the word "temporary". Perhaps I should say that my aim is to be a temporary minister of finance at the present time. It is very difficult to say whether or not I will attain this aim. Temporarily this is my aim. I understand to some extent the difficulty the committee is having in respect of this section. We did not feel that we could impose a terminal date without creating other difficulties. We did wish to indicate by the heading, however, that the government does not look upon this as a permanent part of our taxation structure. Therefore we use the heading "Temporary Surtax". With that heading I believe there is a clear indication to the public and to parliament that this tax is not intended to be a permanent part of our taxation structure.

Mr. Schreyer: Is it the minister's intention that the tax would last no longer than his position in the Department of Finance?

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the minister on his ability to channel the debate in the direction he desired rather than dealing with the substance of the matters raised. The minister objected to some comments I made earlier. I did not say, however, what the minister claims. Obviously he misunderstood me or has deliberately misrepresented my remarks. I suggested that he did something deliberately. I gladly withdraw that remark as I would not want to be misunderstood as suggesting that the minister or this government ever did anything deliberately. Most things they do they do by accident or because of circumstances.

Having listened to what the minister said, particularly in respect of what I am supposed to have said, I am more confused than I was at the beginning when I suggested there was some element of suspicion attached to the action of the government. The minister suggested that I made the most devastating comments about the Carter commission report ever made in this house. Let me state categorically in the most generous way I can that the minister is mistaken. If he persists in his feeling about what I said I suggest he should check the record. Perhaps that is what he is doing now. I am sure he will find that I did not attack that report in that way.

When I referred to the course of action taken by the government being different in respect of corporations from that taken in respect of individuals I was referring to the special refundable 5 per cent tax imposed on corporations in 1966-67. The minister deliberately ignored that reference and referred instead to some obscure amount like $140 million which will be paid back, or will be like daylight saving, as the hon. member for Cariboo said.

The minister is deceiving the house when he tries to suggest that he will receive extra tax income from corporations. Let me place again on record what I pointed out to the minister when I made the comparison between corporate taxes and taxes on individuals. I understand that the refundable tax was imposed for the same reason as the so-called temporary surtax. The minister said that the refundable tax would be imposed for the period from May 1, 1966 to October 31, 1967. The legislation provided that every corporation should pay additional tax in an amount equal to 5 per cent for each taxation year. However, the minister was able to provide that that tax would only be applicable for the period from May 1, 1966, to October 31, 1967, and also that it would be paid back with interest after a certain period of time.

The difficulty is that this surtax on individuals will be paid by people who cannot avoid paying their full amount of taxes because they are salaried and their employers deduct the tax at the source. These people will pay the full 5 per cent surtax. The minister says he cannot set out a definite period of time over which the surtax will be payable because it is administratively difficult to do so. I suggest that the minister is unable to define "temporary" in respect of this tax and that in effect the 5 per cent surtax will go on forever. That is precisely what the legislation suggests.

[Mr. Howard.]

I do not intend to ask the minister to comment on what I have said, but if he feels he should make some answer I hope he will stick to the facts and not adopt a course of action which suits his position but one which will be more acceptable to members of the house.

Mr. Leboe: Have fiscal arrangements been made with the provinces in respect of this surtax and how much of it, if any, will revert to them?

Mr. Sharp: The surtax will not be shared with the provinces. This is one thing the provincial authorities will want to discuss with us in due course. This surtax was established in such a way that all the revenues will come to the federal government. If it had been imposed as an ordinary increase in income tax it would have been shared with the provinces.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Amendment (Mr. Barnett) negatived: Yeas, 15; nays, 99.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this clause because I am opposed to the 5 per cent surtax whether it be of a permanent or temporary nature. I am glad the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is in his seat because I should like to draw his attention to certain comments by an organization which he headed for a long time. They are contained in a memorandum submitted to the government by the Confederation of National Trade Unions. This is what they think about the 5 per cent surtax. This organization suggested, as we have, that this surtax is damaging to the welfare of people in the lower income brackets. Let me refer the minister to this sentence which appears on page 11 of their submission:

> The measure providing that the 5 per cent surtax would not go beyond the sum of $600 clearly protects those with large personal incomes.

• (4:20 p.m.)

That is the complaint we have been making about this proposal since the minister put it forward. The C.N.T.U. and the Canadian Labour Congress have been differing very sharply with regard to Bill C-186, but on the question of the policies adopted by the government through the Minister of Finance they are in complete agreement. I should like to quote one or two sentences from the Canadian Labour Congress brief presented to the government and dated February 13:

> We question seriously the economic wisdom of imposing a deflationary tax increase, as the Minister of Finance did in his November 30th budget, at a time when the economy's forward momentum is obviously faltering. Furthermore, there is every likelihood that the recent tax increases will serve to aggravate, rather than to ameliorate, the already unsettling cost and price pressures on the economy.

There is no quesion that this is precisely what the minister's tax proposals have done. I do not know whether the minister set out deliberately to create a larger pool of unemployment when he proposed this tax increase in November, but that is exactly what has happened. The C.N.T.U. in its brief makes it very clear that since the minister introduced the tax increases there has been a very marked increase in the number of unemployed. Between November and December the number of unemployed in Canada increased by 64,000, or 22.1 per cent. This increase was 60 per cent higher than the average increase in the number of unemployed between November and December in the past five years. The result of this measure, together with the cut-backs in government programs, is that the total number of unemployed in Canada in December was equal to 4.6 per cent of the labour force. This is the highest figure for many years and compares with 3.6 per cent in December of 1966 and 3.5 per cent in December of 1965.

The increase in unemployment has been particularly marked in Quebec and the maritime provinces. While, as I mentioned, the number of unemployed jumped to 4.6 per cent of the labour force of Canada as a whole, it jumped to 5.9 per cent in Quebec. Quebec now has almost twice as many unemployed, percentagewise, as the province of Ontario. This is the effect of the tax increases proposed by the Minister of Finance. Who is asked to pay these tax increases? The wage earner and the salaried person. Together with the restrictive economic policies of the government, the cut-backs in programs and the increase in the cost of living, these increases have accentuated the difficult situation of people in the lower and middle income brackets.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this surtax which the minister introduced last November. It is interesting that in his discussion of "temporary" versus "permanent" the minister said in effect that it was impossible to specify the date to which this surtax would continue. The minister had no difficulty in setting out the date to which the refundable 5 per cent tax on corporations would continue. As a matter of fact, the corporations are already beginning to get their money back.

The minister put forward a very specious argument when he said that bringing forward by two months the date on which corporations pay their taxes meant a permanent increase in taxes. He did not say that our tax policy treats corporations in an entirely different way than it treats the individual taxpayer. Ordinary citizens working for wages or salaries are required to pay their income tax immediately. They pay income tax at each pay period. We in this country, as the Carter commission said so ably, have traditionally favoured the corporations and the wealthy people. We have permitted corporations to pay their taxes late. We have permitted them to keep for some months money they owe the government of Canada, during which time, of course, they have the use of that money. During that time they do not pay any interest to the government of Canada.

When the minister, because of temporary difficulties, advances the date for payment of taxes by corporations by two months he tries to tell the people of Canada that he is increasing the taxes imposed upon corporations. I do not often agree with the hon. member for Cariboo, who said this was like daylight saving, but I agree with him in this instance because if there was ever a phony, specious argument it was that argument advanced by the minister.

I am not prepared to vote for a surtax on income tax that hits the ordinary taxpayer and has a ceiling of $600. I believe this is completely unfair. I think it shatters the whole idea of progressive taxation. The minister has denied again and again that he has rejected the recommendations of the Carter commission. The minister has again tried to suggest that some members of our group who have urged the implementation of the recommendations of the Carter commission are in fact recommending increases in taxes for the ordinary citizen.

The minister was the first to reject the suggestion of Mr. Carter that his proposals should be implemented in a package. The minister did so when he told the mining and oil companies that the recommendations of the Carter commission to correct the completely unfair way in which they are treated would not be implemented for four, five or more years at the earliest. The minister rejected the whole package approach of the Carter commission when he did this.

The minister again today tried to suggest that those of us who are urging the implementation of the bulk of the recommendations of the Carter commission are in effect urging increased taxation on the ordinary taxpayer. The minister said that our suggestion would have this effect. I do not know how the minister can say this with any degree of honesty when the whole point of the Carter commission recommendations is that up till now people in the low and middle income brackets have been paying more than their fair share of taxes and the people in the upper income bracket have been paying less than their fair share. The whole problem the Carter commission attempted to meet was the unfair approach to taxes in this country which it said should be reversed so that people in the upper income bracket would pay their fair share of taxes.

Surely the fact that both the C.N.T.U. and the Canadian Labour Congress urged in their submissions to the government this month that the government implement the recommendations of the Carter commission is proof enough that they recognize, as we have, that the implementation of the Carter commission recommendations would benefit the people in the lower and middle income brackets. Both these organizations called for that. Let me bring to the attention of the minister, although I think he was present when these submissions were made, what the C.N.T.U. said. He can find it on page 11 of their submission. They said:

> The C.N.T.U. supports the objectives of the integrated tax plan proposed by the Carter commission. According to this plan, the maximum rate of taxation on personal income would be reduced to 50 per cent and the present tax credit of 20 per cent on dividends would be abolished.
> As the commission pointed out, taxation of all revenue at the same rates would end certain procedures employed because they reduce taxes and not because they increase the total revenue of the enterprise.

If the minister were to look at just this recommendation of the Carter commission, he would be right in saying that it reduces taxes. However, the minister conveniently forgot to refer to the other recommendations of the Carter commission such as the one that a tax on capital gains should be imposed. I think the minister knows better than most members of parliament and better than the ordinary citizens of Canada just what the failure of past Canadian governments and of this government to implement a capital gains tax has meant. It has meant that the mining and oil companies and all the resource industries have been able to save tens of millions of dollars a year in taxes.

The Carter commission said that mining and oil companies should have their depletion allowances removed because 85 per cent of the benefits of such allowances go to eight mining companies, most of which do not need this incentive. The removal of these exemptions would provide a minimum of $150 million a year to the treasury. If the Minister of Finance is worried about meeting some of the bills of the federal government I suggest that instead of putting a 5 per cent surtax on income tax he should go after the people who have the money, namely, the mining and oil companies. Some members of parliament will say that if this is done the rate of growth of these companies will be slowed down. I notice the hon. member for Yukon is nodding his head in agreement.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he is referring to the hon. member for Skeena in these remarks?

Mr. Orlikow: I do not have to refer to the hon. member for Skeena. He has been here long enough to establish a reputation of being able to look after himself. He does not need protection by the member for Winnipeg North. If the Minister of Finance has an argument with the hon. member for Skeena they should debate in their own time what the hon. member for Skeena is purported to have said and what he did not say. I will let the hon. member for Skeena look after himself.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member should argue with him, not with me.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not think so. I want to say this with reference to the mining companies. Almost unlimited amounts of potash have been discovered in Saskatchewan and the potash industry is growing very quickly. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that what we have done by our wayward treatment of the mining companies is to encourage them to develop at a much faster rate than this country needs. The result has been that the price at which the companies can sell potash has dropped from $30 a ton to $18 a ton. Consequently the royalties paid to the government of Saskatchewan, to that great, free enterprise government headed by a Liberal very much like the Liberals on the other side of the house, have dropped very substantially.

I suggest that if we had not given this kind of preferential treatment to the mining companies the potash industry in Saskatchewan would have developed at a somewhat slower rate and could have sold the new production it brought in from year to year. This applies also to the uranium industry. On an investment of a quarter of a billion dollars it made a profit of over $250 million or 100 per cent on its investment up to 1964 but only paid $30 million in taxes. Members of parliament know what happened when the bottom dropped out of the uranium market and who was left footing the bill in Elliot Lake. It certainly was not the uranium companies.

Similarly, the Carter commission pointed out that we have let the insurance companies of Canada get away with murder. They have paid much greater taxes on the small percentage of their business that they do in foreign countries than what they have paid in taxes on their business Canada. So we find a situation where the insurance companies are freeloading on the Canadian taxpayer. In 1964 the insurance companies had assets of $12 billion. They collected $1.3 billion in premiums. They earned $600 million net in investment income but they paid out just $800 million in dividends or benefits and just $2 million in corporation taxes. If they had been taxed in 1964 at the same rate as other corporations were they would have paid taxes of $77 million instead of just $2 million. This is the kind of situation which the government permits to continue.

It is true the minister said that he hopes, not this year but probably next year, to digest the recommendations of the Carter commission and to discuss them with all the interested parties. We know what those favoured few corporations in the mining and oil fields and in the insurance business will recommend to the minister. I have not much faith that the minister will implement the basic recommendations of the Carter commission.

I want to say in closing that I have no intention of voting for this proposal to implement a 5 per cent surtax on income taxes until the government brings some equity into its tax policy and until it starts to collect from those who can afford to pay a fair share of the tax burden. If the government does that and it still needs money and proposes an increase in income tax or a surtax on income tax, I might look with a good deal more favour then on that kind of proposal than I am prepared to do now when the government has done nothing, despite all the protestations of the minister, to implement some of the basic and what I consider to be simple changes in the tax structure which the Carter commission recommended and which the minister does not have to study in great detail or depth before implementing.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word. I am not seeking to make an issue out of anything the hon. member said but having been associated so intimately with the uranium business I cannot sit here and say nothing. The hon. member asserts that the uranium companies got off scotfree when the slackening in the demand required them to take drastic action which bore quite heavily on them as well as on their employees. Under arrangements made at the time, which can be looked into by the hon. member, he will find that the uranium companies accepted a great measure of responsibility for housing in the area and paid continuity bonuses to the employees. They assumed heavy expenses in closing down the uranium mines so as to rationalize the industry. All in all I think they showed a very large measure of responsibility in very difficult circumstances.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to enter the debate until I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have been very interested in the role of the Carter commission which considered many of the matters we have discussed in the last few weeks, particularly the matter we are now discussing. I thought the hon. member for Nickel Belt gave a very good answer to the minister the other day when he suggested we implement the recommendations in the Carter commission report. He said he would be in favour of that and certainly our party would.

Over the years municipalities have discussed changing assessments on property in order to bring them up to the proper level. Whenever this is suggested someone always says that if housing assessments are changed it will affect business, which is undesirable. Apartment building owners also object and instead of adjusting assessments uniformly across the board a lot of exceptions have been made.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just been speaking about the uranium industry. I come from a mining area. I worked underground for many years and am familiar with some of the mining operations that are carried on. I think it can safely be said that never has so much money been given to so few corporations as is the case in the uranium industry. The people of this nation never intended that the three-year tax free exemption for companies developing oil and mineral resources should be permitted in the case of operations such as those in Elliot Lake in the uranium field. These companies extracted all the minerals from the area. For example, if Rio Tinto had operated the Hollinger mine I doubt that it would have lasted three weeks whereas in fact it has been in existence for 40 years. Certainly it would not have lasted more than a year.

I completely agree with granting a tax concession to a small company which probably will not make much money anyway. Such companies do not cost the Minister of Finance one red cent because he never has to meet his part of the bargain when he offers such inducement. However, in the case of Inco, Falconbridge and some of the other mining companies this concession is gilt-edged. Obviously they are not going to go into production unless they can reap the full benefit. They teeter and totter and do not open the mine until the most advantageous period, and then they give it hell for three years. At the end of that period they close it down, the Canadian taxpayers having provided them with their profit from the operation.

The Minister of Finance is doing the same sort of thing in other taxation fields. This surtax seems to me to be hitting those who are unable to fight back. Very often the only people who protest increased assessments are the corporate entities. They are sometimes joined by smaller businesses in the community but seldom by more than five or six. However, the small people of the nation are not equipped to make any kind of fuss. The big corporations do not need a spokesman here, though they have many. They are quite capable of making their own representations. When some of the major companies in my area disagree with me they come to Ottawa and make representations in person and do so very effectively and efficiently. They try to educate me to their point of view.

So I do not think this kind of concession should be granted the corporations of the nation. Their only objective is to make as much money as possible, which probably is the way it should be. However, the small taxpayers should get more representation. It has been said that those in the low income groups are least likely to object to increased taxation, and certainly they receive very little consideration from the Minister of Finance. During the ten years I have been here I have requested ministers of finance to raise the basic exemption of $1,000, but this suggestion has received no consideration.

When a miner buys a pair of mining boots he cannot offset the cost against his income tax. The cost of these boots is out of all proportion to the cost of boots used in other industries. The same may be said of other equipment miners have to buy. However, businessmen are permitted to wine and dine their customers at expensive restaurants and charge the cost of the meals as a deductible item. Not very long ago I visited a restaurant in Ottawa and the prices on the menu shocked me. I noticed one man who I knew was in charge of a department in a large store. He told me he was there because a buyer at the store was wining and dining a whole group of people as a business expense. I am sure the bill came to $400 or $500. People at other tables were all on expense accounts and their meals were in effect free. If they were not, then in view of the cost of the meals no one in their right mind would have eaten there.

Although we have been prepared to make all kinds of concessions to these people and allow all kinds of exemptions for their benefit, how many have we allowed the small taxpayers in the last five years? These are the people who will be faced with this temporary tax for many years to come. The tax will remain in effect for longer than the minister seems to anticipate. Most of us will pay the extra tax. The maximum additional amount of tax will be $600 and those in the top brackets will get off almost scotfree.

We have reached the stage in this country where many employees, instead of seeking higher wages in terms of money, would like to have free meals provided under expense accounts. Many would like their firms to provide them with a new car instead of the money for that car. They want to get in on the big-time kick the minister is giving his friends.

This surcharge will not do for the government what the minister thinks it will. In any event, it will not be temporary. I do not expect any government to remove it during the next ten years. If anything, the tax will be increased. I remember the many times the government has promised us that automobiles would be cheaper. Yet every time I go to my automobile dealer he want $200 more for a car. Similarly, this tax will increase slowly year by year. As the tax increases, so will the difficulties that our people face.

I heard the minister's explanation regarding the $340 million which is to be raised from corporations and this brings to mind another question. Why should the government not give some advantage to those who pay their taxes early? If I pay my taxes at the beginning of the year instead of at the end, should not the government compensate me? After all, the government gets its money early and is able to use it. Should there not be some sort of rebate to those who pay their taxes say at the end of six months instead of at the end of the fiscal year?

The minister has not shown how this temporary tax is to be replaced by other taxes. I suspect any taxation reform will be on a piecemeal basis. Certainly the minister has not clearly said whether he endorses the Carter report. A number of my colleagues have asked him about his stand with regard to mining concessions and about his intentions with regard to oil concessions and so on. These matters are brought up in the Carter report and I have not heard the minister say whether he adopts the recommendations made in that report. Would this not be a good time for the minister to say what his intentions are with regard to the Carter report, whether he intends to accept or reject, say in five years, the proposals contained in the Carter report?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I will not prolong the debate but I wish to put on record a statement made by the hon. member for Skeena on May 9. I do not wish to misrepresent his words. As recorded on page 15 of Hansard for May 9 he said:

> —I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the disastrous effects of the Carter commission report on the mining industry, particularly in British Columbia, will the minister be making an announcement soon regarding the government's intentions in respect of that aspect to the commission report relating to taxation of mining companies?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I was hoping that the minister would have read those remarks at the beginning when he made his untruthful accusation that those words represent a devastating attack on the Carter commission report. As the minister knows, it is not. This is another example of his distortion of a factual picture. He attempts to paint an incorrect picture.

The minister read correctly what I said. One reason the Carter commission report had a disastrous effect on the mining industry of British Columbia was that after it had been made the minister sat like a dumb bunny on his fanny and did not say "boo". He did not say what he was going to do. The result was that huge mining corporations in this nation, Noranda being one, used the Carter report as an excuse to pull out of potential development. They said, "Oh, we can't go in there because the Carter commission report has recommended that we lose our tax free period of three years."

The minister gave in to the pressures by subsequently making the announcement that the implementation of that section of the Carter report would not have any effect—I stand to be corrected on the year—until 1974. The question I directed to the minister arose from that situation. Noranda in particular used the Carter report as an excuse to pull out of potential development in a particular area. The real reason they pulled out was that they did not find a sufficient ore body to make development worth while. But they had sucked in the people of the area and in the Carter report they found a convenient way of getting out of the difficult prospect of putting more money into a particular development. It seems sad that a high and mighty Minister of Finance who seeks to be prime minister of this nation has got to degrade himself to the extent of so distorting something that is factual.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Howard: As on other occasions when I and other members of this group have been speaking, the minister is reading newspapers and magazine articles. He was doing that while I was making my representations about this matter. I remember some comments I made apropos of something the hon. member for Timiskaming had said about tax allowances for loggers, for instance, who have to buy logging boots, logging clothing and tools for their trade. But the minister paid no attention. If the minister will not pay attention I wonder whether it is worth while putting my remarks on the record. Ah, I see the minister looks at me. I see he is going to pay attention to this aspect of my remarks. That surprises me. He should have paid attention before.

One of the minister's friends in the Liberal party, Hon. Walter Harris, said when he was minister of finance in 1956, as recorded in Hansard—he was replying to a question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—that there was a discriminatory aspect in the Income Tax Act with regard to working men not being able to deduct for taxation purposes expenses they had to incur in buying special clothing, equipment, tools and the like that they needed for their occupations. Ever since then the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and I have continued our compaign with a persistent barrage of letters, briefs, speeches in the house, introduction of bills and so on. I merely want to say that the issue is not dead but is very much alive. The only thing that is perhaps dead is the sympathy of the Minister of Finance.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I wish to put on the record that what the hon. member for Skeena has just said with regard to proposed changes in income tax legislation is completely endorsed in the Carter report from my reading of it. It endorses the hon. member's view of the current discrimination in clause 5 of the bill.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman. Please call a vote.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sharp: Before you call a vote—

An hon. Member: Stalling.

Mr. Sharp: I wish to say to the hon. member for Skeena that I did not attempt or intend in any way to misrepresent his remarks. When he directed the original question to me the word that attracted my attention more than any other was "disastrous". I took his meaning to be that he viewed the recommendations of the Carter commission as disastrous in so far as they affected the mining industry.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Starr: Call a vote.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Howard: Before the vote is called I have one or two further observations to make. The minister took my words "disastrous effects" and deliberately read into them something which had not been intended in order to make a political point. Instead of playing about with what words mean and what they do not mean, I wonder whether the minister would mind addressing himself to the substance of the question which has been raised. I think it is clear. I have indicated my position with respect to it. If the minister wishes to continue suggesting that I mean something else, that is his privilege and I do not wish to press the matter.

The argument has been presented by my hon. friend from Timiskaming in a most forceful way. Miners have to wear protective clothing, including hard-toed boots. Similarly, loggers are required to wear special clothing. I mention these two occupations because one of them has been referred to directly and because I myself worked in the logging industry and am familiar with the requirements. These examples are not exclusive. Workers in other industries require of necessity, and in many cases by provincial laws in order to comply with compensation regulations, special clothing, some of it for reasons of safety.

Can the minister not indicate the prospects of making some provision of the kind now asked for in order that working people may have an opportunity to deduct necessary expenses from their incomes before they pay tax? I am talking now of those engaged in heavy industry, those who cannot in any way avoid taxes because before they even get their cheques the bookkeepers or accountants have docked the tax and sent it to the treasury. Are they to have no hope of concessions such as are granted to the mining corporations or to the insurance companies and others paying special refundable taxes? Can the minister give us no hope that the wage earners and salaried people who have no opportunity to make any adjustments affecting their taxes are to receive any of this favoured treatment?

Mr. Sharp: As the hon. member for Skeena says, the Carter commission does recognize the principle that people ought to be able to deduct from their income the expenses necessarily incurred in earning it and there is special reference in the report to the kind of expenses incurred by miners and others employed in industry. We have been studying this aspect along with other recommendations made by the Carter commission. The problem, as the hon. member concedes, is a difficult one because everyone who works must incur some sort of expenses in earning his income. Even a bookkeeper probably wears out his clothes in a rather special way because of his occupation. It is a question of degree.

The other problem which arises in connection with this proposal is that to the extent expenses of this kind are accepted the general rate structure has to be adjusted to make up for the loss of revenue. If this is generalized too far, what we are really doing is something along the lines of the practice presently followed when we allow an extra hundred dollars as a deduction for charitable and medical expenditures, and it is possible to move in this direction very quickly if the precise expenses allowable are not defined very carefully. Having gone through such a process, the result is simply a change in the basis of the exemptions, and the decrease in revenue has to be offset by a corresponding increase in taxes.

For these reasons we have yet to reach a conclusion on the recommendations of the Carter Commission, not only in this particular respect but with regard to a number of other subjects dealt with in the report. Taxation is an integrated whole and any change in one direction makes changes in another necessary unless the general level of revenue is to be affected.

The hon. member again talks about a difference in treatment as between corporations and individuals. This is a question we had to examine carefully when we were determining the changes to be made in order to bring the budget closer into balance next year. The choice we made, as will be seen from the bill, was to impose a group of increases which would cause, we hoped, the minimum undesirable effect on the economy, that is, the minimum effect upon the spending power of the public or of business. We selected these revenue measures so as to distribute them in such a way that the effect on levels of employment would be minimal. To this end we put on excise taxes, a small surtax on individual incomes, eliminating it at the bottom of the scale and tempering it at the top, and then a very large cash drain upon the corporations.

We concluded we could do this without disturbing business investment too greatly, and we wanted to keep business investment at a maximum because it is not rising very quickly now in this country and it is very desirable in the interest of employment that it should. We had to raise revenues in some way in order to reduce our demand on the capital market, which is the central problem facing the government in the coming year, and we decided that the mixture to which I have referred would produce the maximum amount of revenue while causing the minimum undesirable effect upon the economy.

This is all a matter of judgment. I do not think it is ever possible to satisfy all the criteria. We have been going through a most interesting and unprecedented series of incidents related not so much to domestic affairs as to world conditions. We have been living in the most troubled period internationally that the world has seen, I think, since the twenties, and the problem in these circumstances is to take measures which do the least damage to the Canadian economy while producing the maximum benefit.

There is no ideal way of doing this. Members of the New Democratic party seem to suggest that we can meet present circumstances by continuing the kind of policies which were followed for a number of years when we were living in a relatively stable international environment, when interest rates were low and when it was easy to obtain foreign capital. These are no longer the circumstances. We are today living in a world where capital is short, and as long as the war in Viet Nam continues this will probably continue to be the situation. We have to choose our policies accordingly. I do not say we have found the ideal combination, but the opposition should recognize the nature of the problems which face us and not base their arguments upon a world which does not exist. I suggest, therefore, that the proposals made in this bill are appropriate, however undesirable they may be from the point of view of the taxpayer and of each of us as members of parliament.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to embark on another speech but when I heard the nonsense uttered by the Minister of Finance I felt something had to be said. I notice he did his usual trick in dealing with a very serious and substantive problem to many workers in this country. My colleagues, the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Timiskaming, both mentioned the heavy expenses incurred by many workers, but the Minister of Finance decided, as he always does, to reduce the matter to the level of buffoonery by drawing an analogy to a bookkeeper who wears out the arms of his jacket.

While there may be some substance in the minister's argument that it is difficult to draw a line, I would ask him to look at another place in the economy where relief is given. For the last few years I have been struck by the fact that I never stay at a good hotel any place in Canada but a desk clerk says to me, "You will want a receipt for this." I never buy a meal in a good restaurant but I am offered a receipt for my meal. It is taken for granted that anybody who eats at such places and stays at such hotels is living on an expense account, but this minister never does a damn thing about it.

People are allowed to put in their expense accounts all manner of items that should be considered as part of their personal expenses. I notice that the other day one gentleman, I suppose encouraged by the minister's generosity, tried to get $241 for his wife's expenses in going to Saskatchewan. I was very glad to see that the Tax Appeal Board turned him down and said that obviously the lady was there largely in his service and not in the service of the corporation which employs him.

I suggest to the minister that before he plays his usual split, cracked record of how very difficult the times are in which we are living and how much this is part of a tremendous international dislocation, he should pay some serious attention, as I asked him to do the other day, to the views of competent economists in this country who are appalled and mystified by the idiotic policies he is pursuing, which can only be designed to tighten up the Canadian economy, to cause hardship to the Canadian people and rob them and the government of any opportunity of expanding the economy.

Despite the fact that we have the largest per capita store of natural wealth in the world and despite the fact that we have rising levels of unemployment, the minister has deliberately tied his hands so that he can take no action at all. Why he has done this, God only knows. I cannot find an economist in this country who has a reasonable explanation for his idiotic policies. I do not want the minister to tell us again that we are living in such vastly complicated world circumstances, never seen before. What utter nonsense. I suggest that he read the history of previous economic crises in the world if he wants to say that there is a dangerous, complicated international situation in the economic area. As I said, Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak in this debate again, but once more I have to express my dismay at the fact that this country has been saddled with probably the most incompetent Minister of Finance in the whole history of Canada.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, as one of those who raised the matter of other expenses I point out that in his offhand way the minister said that if a bookkeeper wore out the sleeves of his jacket possibly we should allow him an expense deduction for a new jacket or for patches on his old one. I would be very happy if the minister brought in such a measure. If this is necessary for him in his job we should be happy to pay for leather patches on his jacket.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said that he never stayed at a good hotel without being offered a receipt, and I noticed one of the ministers shaking his head when the hon. member said this. It may be that I look like the travelling salesman type but this almost always happens to me. Inevitably I am asked if I would like a receipt. Some people even go farther and ask me, "What name do you want it in?" Maybe there is a market in such receipts.

I really believe the minister does not see the difference between a bookkeeper with a worn-out sleeve and a mine worker or pulp cutter. The pulp cutter must own a chain saw which costs him $200 to $300. Such a man may be out of a job. When he finds one he must have a chain saw. That saw, as I say, will cost $200 to $300. He has to make an outlay to get the job. If he borrows the money to buy a chain saw and pays it back while working on the job his outlay of $200 to $300 is not deductible. But such an outlay by anybody else is deductible. The fisherman who has to go fishing obviously has to have a boat. To farm the farmer must have a farm. We allow these people to deduct certain capital costs, but we make no such allowance for the poor worker who works by the hour. He is the forgotten man in the income tax structure.

This is a problem which has been considered by the minister for a long time. It was considered by the minister before him and by the minister before that again, but I suggest it was not really the ministers who considered it. It was their officials who looked into it and they looked at it in the same light as wanting a deduction for themselves every time they go somewhere. They always want a deduction for their cars or for something else. It is very easy for them to understand that employees of big corporations must operate on expense accounts. We allow this type of deduction in the civil service but we do not allow it to the many workers who have to make a capital outlay in order to obtain a job. This outlay is not put in the same category as the $100 deduction for medical and charitable expenses. Most hon. members have made representations about this matter during the ten years I have been a member of the house. However, nobody has listened to the representations that have been made.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few comments, because I was somewhat irritated by the intervention of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron). Usually he is rather composed. I have never seen him so nervous than this afternoon when he attacked the tax policy of the government. It is probably due to the nervousness now existing in his party and because the New Democratic party has some embarrassing cousins in the province of Quebec who apparently are separatists. Therefore, I understand why the members of this party are all at sea.

However, the public is not entirely stupid and if there is a party in the house asking for expenditures, it is the New Democratic party. Its members are always ready to ask for an increase of all the services but when it is time to pay for them, they are the first to complain.

Economics have no mystery. Every time the government spends money, it takes it out of the taxpayers' pockets. It is easy to say that this legislation is aimed only at individuals. It is true that there is an increase of 5 per cent on income tax but the President of the United States at the present time is trying to get a 10 per cent tax increase. The British labour party which shares the same ideology as the members of the Canadian New Democratic party was forced to impose economic measures even more drastic than those we experience in Canada. We must take comfort in the fact that this government was the first, among the governments of the western hemisphere, to tackle the problem of inflation in an attempt to find reasonable solutions.

It is true that this is not easy and that the taxpayers must participate. However, it must still be recognized—and I hope that my hon. friends will admit it—that we are going through the seventh consecutive year of expansion in Canada. Our country has never experienced an expansion period of that duration. But when we experience an expansion period such as ours, it is normal that, at a certain time, necessary means have to be taken in order to maintain the progress which ensures that expansion, and the action taken by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) is that of a responsible man. We are not here to make presents to anyone; we are here to manage the taxpayers' money and it is imperative, in order to balance our budget, to call on the taxpayers.

My honourable friends said that we had left the corporations alone but the $240 million which will be levied this year, that is for the fiscal year 1968-69, on the corporations come from taxes which they would not have had to pay if we had not moved forward by two months the tax payment period. It is true that, in doing so, we are perhaps correcting an existing deficiency. However, in past years, we have regularly shortened the period of tax payment for the corporations and I hope that, in the near future, we shall continue to follow that course of action.

I would have hoped that our hon. friends, instead of blaming us for taking such a concrete step, would at least have appreciated the fact that we took a step in the right direction.

Naturally, I am sorry that the taxpayers have to pay 5 per cent more in taxes. However, I think that the Canadian taxpayers are happy and appreciate the fact that the situation in Canada is better than in the United States, and still better than that of the taxpayers in England who are led by a socialist party.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, we must keep a certain perspective and, if we are responsible, we should be able to explain to the Canadian taxpayers that they must bear their part of the burden and that they should be happy to do so, because we have never known such a long period of prosperity in our country and it seems to me that the government must take the necessary steps to preserve that prosperity.

This bill is in line with this fiscal responsibility. We have been and we still are in an adjustment period. But instead of acting irresponsibly, we must face the difficult facts and situations. We experienced a difficult situation in 1959, 1960 and 1961, and we do not want that to occur again. That is why we want the present Minister of Finance to act responsibly.

That is why I say that we are happy to support him in the circumstances and that we do not fear to assume our responsibilities.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this subject. It was not my intention to speak until I heard the remarks of the Minister of Finance. There are certain things which arouse the members of this party. When I hear the minister give a long dissertation about how at this time it is impossible to draw a line in respect of the subject of income tax deductions it seems to me it is time that a few of us pointed out some things. I know that in this country there are wealthy people and members of corporations who are permitted to make deductions from their income taxes for a great many things far beyond the bread and butter necessities of many other people.

I do not intend to be diverted from this situation by the minister's learned discourse about the difficult economic circumstances or by the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue about countries which are in an inferior position to Canada at this time. There are people in this country who are now permitted to deduct many items from their income tax. Ever since I have been a member of the house I have been trying in vain to point out that there are other people to whom no consideration is given who are in a much less favourable position. The other day I pointed out that there are a great many parents who live without a partner and are the sole support of their families. These people are obliged to go out to work in order to earn a living to provide for their families. The minister does not give them the opportunity to deduct from their income tax the wages they must pay to a housekeeper or a babysitter. This situation exists in spite of the fact that other people are allowed to deduct entertainment and actual living expenses from their income tax. No one can tell me that it is difficult to draw lines in a matter of this nature.

We have heard about the workers who are not permitted to deduct the cost of necessary equipment such as boots, tools and safety helmets. Seventy per cent of the married women who are gainfully employed have preschool children at home. It is necessary for these women to secure employment outside the home because in many cases they are married to men earning less than $3,000 a year. If we had a government which was genuinely concerned about seeing that all the people paid their fair share of income tax, we would not have a situation in which the lower income group do not have the income tax exemptions they should have while the rich and powerful groups have permanent income tax deductions. This is discrimination. It is discrimination against those people who are endeavouring to take care of themselves.

I should like to remind the Minister of Finance that the Minister of National Revenue suggested that the Canadian people are not imbeciles. They certainly are not. A great many people are realizing that the present income tax is inequitable and unfair. The members of this party do not intend to vote for a 5 per cent surcharge which will fall most heavily on those people who are least able to pay it.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Revenue came to this house with a label which suggested that he is a liberal with a small "l". It is obvious there is truth in the rumour that he is a supporter of the present Minister of Finance in his bid for the leadership of the Liberal party. I have never seen a minister react so sensitively to what I believe were pretty reasonable suggestions on our part. No one in this group suggested that the situation is not serious. No one suggested that the government does not need money. We have merely suggested that the government should apply some principles of equity.

The members of this group have mentioned the fact that miners and construction workers are not permitted to deduct as an expense for income tax purposes the legitimate expenses they must incur in the purchase of hard hats and other equipment of that type. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway referred to married women who must have help at home in looking after their children and the fact that they are not permitted to deduct the money expended in this matter from their income tax. There are construction workers in my constituency who must drive 30 miles each way every day in order to get to and from their employment. They cannot deduct the cost of this transportation but a lawyer or a businessman may automatically deduct 50 per cent of the cost of operating his car even if he drives his car only a mile or two from his home to his employment. This is the type of situation that is being allowed to continue by the Minister of National Revenue who was a liberal before he became a minister accustomed to the nice things one has when in power. This is the type of situation we have been trying to get the government to change.

We are always told that further study is required. Of course this is a complicated situation, but why does the minister not take a look at the recommendation of the Carter commission? The commission recommended that there be an automatic ceiling—I admit that the recommendation may be a little too tight—in respect of a businessman who travels to another district and has hotel and meal expenses. It is not essential that every businessman patronize the most expensive restaurants every day in the city he happens to be visiting. This, however, is the kind of system we have and the kind of system which the Minister of National Revenue defended when he spoke. He shakes his head, but I suggest we are entitled to assume this is the position he takes until he does something about the inequitable situation as between those who can afford to pay but get away with murder and those who cannot afford to pay but are forced to do so. The members of this group do not intend to vote for this measure which the government wishes to impose, nor will they listen without reply to the type of lecture we have just had from the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

How can he explain to us that less than 48 hours after the presentation of the Carter report, his party was ready to have it passed by the House of Commons while a few days after, several members of his party, including an hon. member for British Columbia, who is seated behind his leader, I have forgotten the name of his constituency—

An hon. Member: Skeena.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and other members of his party asked that certain recommendations of the Carter report be not applied as regards the mining industry and the development of natural resources. Could the hon. member for Winnipeg North explain that to me, since he seems such an expert as far as the explanation of the Carter report is concerned?

• (5:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: At this time I do not intend to go into details as to why we support the basic principles of the Carter commission report. I suggest to the Minister of National Revenue that he take home a copy of that report, in English or in French, and study it tonight. He should also take a copy of the submission to the government by the Confederation of National Trade Unions from which I quoted earlier. That organization supports and endorses the principles of the Carter report and explains how the ordinary citizens of this country would benefit by the adoption of certain recommendations. It is apparent the minister wishes to defend big business. I suggest that he read their submission and the report in order that members of this party will not have to lecture him at length in this chamber.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the Carter report, I should like to make a correction.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North would have us believe that we oppose its recommendations. Generally speaking, we do not oppose the recommendations of the Carter report. Only, we know something about it, having studied it for months, because we took the time to analyse it, whereas the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas) already had general views about it and accepted them all less than 24 hours after the voluminous report was brought in.

Only, we have spent a few months studying it and we were about to present the white paper on fiscal reforms some time during the winter. Unfortunately, certain incidents forced us to postpone it for a few months, because the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) saw fit to retire. We have been working on the Carter report for almost seven months. We are in the process of formulating fiscal reforms for Canada which will surprise my hon. friends of the New Democratic party; they will lose nothing by waiting a few weeks more to know the views of a progressive party, that is, the party that sits on this side of the house.

[English]

Mr. Germa: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Revenue was misrepresenting the facts when he said that members of the N.D.P. were always in favour of spending money and opposed to taxation. That is not our position, but we question the equity of present taxation. We recognize the fact that taxation is a great equalizer of revenue.

The minister suggests that we in this country are very lucky because President Johnson is proposing a 10 per cent increase in taxes. If this government is attempting to mimic the United States I suggest it is making a mistake. We should not match our financial position with that of the United States. I suggest that the financial position there is worse than that of any government in the history of the world. The minister should not try to lead us down the garden path by making comparisons with United States financial measures.

The minister also made reference to economic measures being taken by Great Britain. Obviously such measures are necessary to correct the 400 years of poor administration by governments in that country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the plight of the mining companies at Elliot Lake. How many millions of dollars did Rio Tinto and Rio Algom take out of Elliot Lake mines? Who has been left to pay the bills? Who has been heating the 400 houses in Elliot Lake since the mining companies left? Hon. members know as well as I that the bills are being paid by the Ontario Housing Corporation. Who is supporting the hospital there built to serve a population of more than 30,000 but now amounting to about 8,000? We all know that these costs are being paid by the taxpayers and have been paid by them since the uranium mining companies moved out.

The average citizen of this country is not enjoying a higher standard of living because of higher wages. Every time there is an increase in his wages there is an increase in taxes. I hope hon. members are aware of the fact that mining companies enjoy special privileges at the federal and provincial levels. It is a mystery to me how these companies have seduced various governments. They are in effect perpetrating a rape of provincial and municipal governments. There is only one industry in the province of Ontario which does not have to pay municipal taxes and that is the mining industry.

We must have remedies for all these situations before we increase the tax burden on individuals in this country. We in this party cannot support this measure to increase the tax burden in order to bail this government out of the financial mess in which it finds itself. I suggest that the government should seriously consider adopting certain recommendations of the Carter commission.

Let me remind the minister of his statement of November 30 in which he suggested that the Carter commission recommendations could not be applied to the financial situation in 1969. We all agree that financial positions change, but basic principles do not. We in this party believe there must be a change in our tax structure but the change must be based on equity. Until an equitable tax policy is adopted we in this party will not support measures of the type now under consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this question of the tax increase, because I was surprised a while ago to hear the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Chrétien). It is the first time I hear such a statement from a minister: The people of Quebec, the taxpayers will be happy about the increases. That is precisely what I heard. The minister said it at least three times and the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) can testify to that because he was next to me when we listened to him. He said that the taxpayers would be happy about that increase. I have never heard anything like that.

If an increase of 5 per cent makes the people happy, let us make them really happy by increasing the income tax by 15 to 20 per cent. I have never known anyone to say that he was happy about a tax increase, in spite of what the Minister of National Revenue said earlier. I would like to see him tell the people: Be happy, we are increasing taxes. When have the taxpayers been happy because the government was increasing the income tax? The minister could at least have used another word. Increases in income tax do not make a man happy. If I am mistaken, taxpayers can be made happier by increasing their taxes by 10 or 15 per cent. I, for one, find that diametrically opposed to public opinion.

I heard the minister say that for the seventh consecutive year we are experiencing an expansion. An expansion of what? One thing has been progressing for the last three of four months: unemployment. In fact, that is what is progressing the most in the province of Quebec, in the province of the Minister of National Revenue, where the unemployment average has reached 7.5 per cent of the labour force. That means that 7.5 per cent of Quebec citizens suitable for work are unemployed, and the Minister of National Revenue says that we are in a period of expansion. Is that what the minister means by expansion? Expansion of taxes, that is true; expansion of taxes of all kinds, nothing else.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) has been in office for at least three years, and taxes have increased. That is an expansion which has not decreased. Expansion of unemployment and decrease in construction, those are the facts.

The minister seems to say that we are in the midst of a period of prosperity and expansion. If we are, why is unemployment increasing at that rate? It seems to me that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue should realize that the period of expansion has come to an end, and it is now time to take steps so as to give new impetus to our economy, instead of hindering it by further tax increases.

When I look at the government's estimates for the next fiscal year and I realize that the interest on the public debt has increased by $130 million, I conclude that taxes are raised simply in order for the government to be able to face the increase in the interest charges on the public debt.

The other day, on the orders of the day, I asked the Minister of Finance and Receiver General whether that increase was due to an increase in the rate of interest or an increase in the debt itself. The Minister of Finance refused to answer. I should like to have an answer.

If taxes are raised, it is because expenses are increasing and the item that shows the largest increase is that relating to the interest on the national debt. Is that due to an increase in the debt or in the interest rate? This question should be answered. I, for one, am convinced that it is due to an increase in the interest rate. In that case, the thing to do is not to raise income tax but rather to see to it that the interest rate paid by the government on its debt is lowered. All our difficulties arise from the fact that two years ago, the Minister of Finance raised the ceiling on the interest rate charged by the chartered banks. This has resulted in a considerable increase in the interest rate.

In the construction field, the rate of interest is now 8¾ per cent. This is the highest interest rate the construction industry has ever experienced since confederation. We had to commemorate the hundredth anniversary of Canada to see the interest rate soar to 8¾ per cent. Never before had we seen such a thing in Canada. People who want to build a house must pay an interest of 8¾ per cent. Furthermore, the government is also a victim of this interest rate increase since this year the estimates show an additional $130 million, due to the fact that the government will have to pay a higher interest rate on the public debt.

If tax increases are only meant to pay big financiers a higher interest rate on the public debt—previously it was somewhere between 5 and 5½ per cent, which is high enough—if this is the only reason for increasing the income tax this year, I say that the Minister of National Revenue should refrain from telling us that the Canadian people are happy. It is known that those increases will only serve one purpose finally. According to the 1968-69 main estimates submitted to us, we find that next year, we shall simply be paying a higher interest rate to some big financiers and capitalists.

The minister also added at one point that not only the people but Liberal members too will be happy. Well, I would like to hear Liberal members from Quebec tell their constituents: We are happy about the taxes because you are happy about those increases. Once again, it is realized that they will only serve to pay a higher interest rate on the public debt. There is nothing to be happy in that but, on the contrary, much to be sad about and even very sad. I find this deplorable and I am convinced that the Canadian people will agree with me and that they will get rid of the present Liberal administration very soon.

I wish to join those who spoke before me in protesting. Above all, let no one tell us that we are going through a period of expansion at a time when the only expansion is in the field of unemployment. The government should take steps to help the people and to give an impetus to the economy, instead of the measures it is taking now which harm the people and create poverty and unemployment.

The Chairman: I declare clause 5 carried.

Clause agreed to.

• (5:50 p.m.)

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. It is generally accepted that once the Chair calls a vote no member is allowed to enter the chamber from behind the curtains. This happened on the other side. The Minister of National Health and Welfare came in after the vote was called and so did another hon. member in the back row.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order—

The Chairman: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order.

The hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) remained standing while his colleagues in the same row had sat down, in order to be counted with those in the fourth row.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that the hon. member for Mercier remained standing to be counted twice.

[English]

The Chairman: Will the hon. gentleman please be seated.

Some hon. Members: Recount.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

On some occasions, I thought that the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) had dignity, was a serious man and had some respect for his colleagues, but his accusation against me is unworthy, vile and false.

[The Chairman.]

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, a point of order was raised and two members of the house have drawn your attention to the fact that members entered the chamber after the vote was called. I specifically named the Minister of National Health and Welfare as one of those members. The hon. member for Lapointe identified others. This is not supposed to take place.

Mr. Orange: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder about the eyesight of the hon. member for Cape Breton South because the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been sitting beside me for the last ten minutes trying to convince me about something that is outside the purview of the house.

An hon. Member: I wonder what.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, an hon. member has just drawn to your attention the fact that there may be something wrong with my eyesight. May I draw your attention to the fact that there is nothing wrong with the hearing of the Minister of National Health and Welfare who is capable, I think, of speaking for himself. If he was here when the vote was called he would have been the first to rise in his own defence. The minister found it necessary to leave his seat and he probably got caught on the way.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the hon. member for Northwest Territories. I want to assure the committee and the Chair that I was sitting in that part of the house for a considerable length of time and when the vote was finished I came over to congratulate the whip, not only for winning the vote but for his unerring accuracy in counting it.

The Chairman: Order, please. Perhaps I should read to the committee standing order 12 (2) which applies in this case. It reads as follows:

> When Mr. Speaker is putting a question, no member shall enter, walk out of or across the house, or make any noise or disturbance.

This is the applicable standing order, and I would hope that hon. members would be governed by it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, further on the point of privilege, I should like to refer you to a precedent in the house when the Speaker referred to the bringing up of a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Lapointe was involved at that time. The Speaker said the question of privilege should be brought up immediately and he reminded him that he had not done so. I would also draw your attention to the fact that when I first brought up the subject the Minister of National Health and Welfare had the opportunity to defend himself. He passed it up, and when he finally got to his feet he did not state that he was in his place or in the house when the vote was called. All he said was that he left the seat he had been occupying to come over to congratulate the whip on winning the vote. He did not say he was here when the vote was called.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, had I voted I would have voted for the bill.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

On clause 6—Refund of tax.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I have two minutes left in which to speak. When this measure was brought in it was brought in as part of a method of controlling the economy and, in particular, controlling inflation. At that time I objected to the way in which the minister had bound his hands with regard to the refunding of the refundable tax because, as will be recalled, the money was to be held for 18 months and could be repaid at the end of 18 or not more than 36 months. Now it is proposed that the 18 months provision be taken out and that the money be repaid not more than 36 months after the payment of the tax. It seems to me, if this sort of tax is to be of any value, that some discretion must be left to the government with regard to the time when they can re-inject the tax money into the economy.

At the time the tax was introduced I suggested that the minister had read rather carelessly reports of the measures that were taken in Sweden along similar lines. Had he read them more carefully he would have realized that in Sweden it is left entirely to the government of the day to decide in its discretion when such funds shall be re-inserted into the economy. May I call it six o'clock?

Income Tax Act

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), The Canadian Economy—steps to meet increase in cost of living; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), Criminal Code—suggested amendments respecting representation by counsel; the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), Industry—possible change in criteria respecting designated areas.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee on Bill No. C-193, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Tardif in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at six o'clock it was considering clause 6 of Bill No. C-193.

On clause 6—Refund of tax.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose for dinner I was suggesting that the effectiveness of this particular piece of legislation as contained in the bill—that is to say, section 105J of the Income Tax Act—was rendered largely ineffective by the limitations that were placed upon the discretion of the minister with regard to refunding the amounts paid by those who qualified under the refundable tax scheme. It seemed to me that if this measure was to be of any use it would have to be left to the discretion of the minister when to return those funds to the economy. We were told that in large measure this was part of the government's policy in relation to the control of inflation. Presumably it was an economic weapon to control the economy.

Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I should like to move the following amendment:

That clause 6 be amended by deleting all the words after "prescribe" in the ninth line.

In that way, Mr. Chairman, the minister will be able to judge when the economy will benefit by having the funds that have accumulated under this tax returned to the economy.

I might also point out that the minister has been repeatedly telling us that the government finds it necessary to go to the market for funds. It may be useful in the near future for the government to be able to retain the funds they have on hand on which they are committed to pay 5 per cent, considerably less perhaps than the amount they have to pay if they go into the market. Therefore, for that reason I move this amendment, which I think will make this tax, ineffective though it was to start with, slightly more effective than it would have been in this measure.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I would remind the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and also the members of the committee that when I presented my budget statement to the house on November 30 I announced government policy on the repayment of this refundable tax. I said at that time that we now proposed to begin the refunding process in June 1968, refunding then the payments received before June 30, 1966. Every second month thereafter we will refund one month's receipts. In August 1968 we will refund payments received in July 1966 and so on.

Therefore, I did give a declaration of government policy in relation to how we intended to refund the amounts that we had collected. The purpose of the amendment that is before us is to enable us to carry out another of the policies that I announced at the same time, namely that in order to reduce administrative costs we should refund with our first payments in June the total amount received from those corporations whose aggregate refundable tax did not exceed $1,000. I said we will be asking parliament for authority to do this, and that is the purpose of the amendment now before the committee.

It would not have been necessary, Mr. Chairman, to ask for that amendment had it not been for the limitation that required us to retain the money for 18 months. This amendment enables us to refund in the first payment the very small amounts that have been collected under this tax.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

I find it difficult, for several reasons, to agree with the proposed amendment of the hon. member. First of all, when we introduced the legislation we stated the policy of the government, and parliament approved it, namely that the amounts collected should be repaid in not less than 18 months and not more than 36 months. To amend the law now so as to remove the limitation of 36 months would be to change the conditions under which the money was first raised. I know of course that in all taxation statutes it is always possible to change the burden of taxation, which in effect is what the hon. gentleman is proposing. He is proposing we should retain the money somewhat longer at a relatively low rate of interest and refund it at some other time. However I do not think it would be good public policy to change the date.

In the second place, Mr. Chairman, the government itself decided and announced that it would not wait 36 months but would in fact repay the amounts two years after the date, this being appropriate policy under present financial and economic circumstances. So I do not think that the government needs the additional period of time that would be made possible by this amendment. For these reasons I feel I should reject it.

I am not certain whether this is a valid amendment for a private member to move, but I am not raising that question at the moment.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, unlike most of the minister's arguments I find this one quite persuasive and with the permission of the committee I will withdraw my amendment.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give the hon. member the right to withdraw the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Benson, moves that Bill No. C-193, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be now read a third time and do pass.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Starr: Call the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sharp: I think the hon. member misunderstood—

Mr. Starr: Order, please. Mr. Speaker, please call the yeas and nays.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member addressing his remarks to the Chair?

Mr. Starr: Your Honour called third reading and we should like you now to call the yeas and nays. I wish the Clerk would sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall I put the motion, as moved by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Starr: That is right, yes.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Starr: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour called third reading and we have asked for the yeas and nays to be called. Let us proceed now, and not retract.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have put the motion for third reading as moved by the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: But it was not seconded.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance has not moved the third reading of the bill, and the motion has not been seconded.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes, it has.

Mr. MacEachen: With respect, it has not been.

Mr. Starr: What is the minister trying to do?

Mr. Sharp: Nothing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Do I understand that the Minister of Finance does not want the bill to be read a third time now?

An hon. Member: At the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Sharp: No, no.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You asked the house, "Shall the bill be read now a third time," and the answer of the house was, yes. That put the matter in the category of where Your Honour must put the motion, and you were proceeding to put the motion. It automatically follows that the Minister of Finance, who is the mover of the bill, has called for or is moving for third reading, and I do not see how any retraction can occur at this time.

The house was specifically asked by Your Honour whether the bill should be read a third time, and the answer of the house was, yes. Your Honour should proceed with the instructions of the house. The Speaker carries out the instructions of the house always; that is what the Speaker does. Your Honour knows what the house has instructed you to do and we should proceed to third reading.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I was sitting next to the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: —and when you stated that the Minister of Finance moves the third reading of the bill, the Minister of Finance, from his seat, said "No".

Mr. Starr: The minister is mistaken, surely, because it did not happen that way.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to third reading. I did not move the motion, and I am sorry if Your Honour misunderstood. I was trying to catch your eye. If it is the wish of the house, I am perfectly happy to have third reading.

Mr. Starr: Then why is the minister trying to hold up parliament?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the house would allow me a moment to clear up the difficulty. When I asked whether there should be third reading I understood that there was no objection.

Mr. Starr: That is right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I then proceeded to put the regular motion. In the meantime, I understand that there was some objection to third reading. If there was, I apologize, because I did not hear the objection.

Mr. Starr: Would Your Honour call the yeas and nays.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house wish to proceed with the motion for third reading?

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Division

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

An hon. Member: On division.

Mr. Starr: No, no, Mr. Speaker. Please call the yeas and nays.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Sharp) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Some hon. Members: Resign, resign.

And the order having been read: Government order No. 1, house again in committee of supply:

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Supplementary estimates for 1967-1968, the Department of Finance.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

4c. Administration—Grant to the endowment fund of the Vanier Institute of the Family—L'Institut Vanier de la famille, $236,869.

Mr. Fulton: In the circumstances I would move that the committee rise and report progress, and Mr. Speaker resume the chair, in order to enable the government house leader to move the adjournment, which is, I think the appropriate course in the circumstances.

Mr. MacEachen: We have called the business for the rest of the day, supply, Department of Finance, and there is no motion.

Mr. Fulton: Then I move that the committee do rise and report progress.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do you remember February 5, 1963? It was a long road.

Motion (Mr. Fulton) agreed to: Yeas, 79; nays, 78.

The Chairman: I declare the motion carried.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Progress reported.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to call item No. 64 on the order paper.

Mr. Starr: I rise on a point of order. I think that in view of what has transpired this evening there should be no more motions put before this house. The house should adjourn at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize that it is not the responsibility of the Chair to adjourn the house at this time. It is the responsibility of the government to propose the business even at this late hour. It is always possible for the opposition to propose a motion for adjournment.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are always reasons to break rules and on this occasion I rise for the purpose of placing before you, Mr. Speaker, the position of affairs in which this house now finds itself. It is a long road that has no ash cans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I remember so well February 5, 1963, when the decision was made that the government was out. These were the people opposite who said that. Now let them live by their own words.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the Conservative party has finally got a leader.

Mr. Crouse: Don't you wish you had one?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure hon. members will agree that there should be some measure of order in the house for the next few minutes. I still believe that my point was well taken when I suggested to hon. members that the procedure was clear, that if hon. members want to adjourn before the ten o'clock hour a motion can always be made for adjournment of the house. This I still suggest to hon. members is the correct procedure.

Order, please. The leader of the government has the floor.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we have called item No. 64 on the order paper, the second reading of Bill C-202, and the minister is prepared to make a statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I should be allowed to put the motion first and then we can proceed and it will bring us a little closer to ten o'clock.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE RATIOS FOR INSURED LOANS

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Benson, seconded by Mr. Sharp, moves that Bill No. C-202, an act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954, be now read a second time.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre on a point of order.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think under the circumstances, the government having been defeated and obviously quite leaderless, with a lame duck Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) who is holidaying in Jamaica, it seems to me the only course open to the government is to adjourn the house now and have whoever is the leader take the appropriate action tomorrow. But there is another point I want to make, sir, and that is that when the house has reached a situation such as this it is within the competence of the Speaker himself to adjourn the house. It is obvious, sir, that no useful business can be carried on tonight and I suggest you exercise your authority.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is suggesting that I take the powers vested in me to adjourn the house when there is disorder in the house. I suggest to hon. members that I should not be placed in this position.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I raise a similar point of order to that raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). These occasions arise, whether happily or unhappily who knows, but there are precedents for them, and the most recent was in February, 1963. I put it to hon. gentlemen opposite that on that occasion when a defeat was suffered in the house the government accepted its responsibility to parliament and the country and immediately moved the adjournment of the house, so that it might consult with itself and find out what the appropriate thing was to do. We now have three minutes left tonight. My point of order to you and to the government is that the appropriate thing for the government is to move the adjournment of the house so as to not make it impossible to carry on in an orderly fashion the business of the country, because I say if the government insists on proceeding there will be disorder. The situation is clear. I suggest the government move the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the President of the Treasury Board rising on a point of order?

Hon. E. J. Benson (President of Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker. I wish to proceed with the order of business which is before the house.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Starr: You have not got the authority.

Mr. Benson: We have a bill before the house—

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order—

Mr. Benson: —to reduce the payments for people—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Yukon rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nielsen: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have not checked the precedents in a case of this nature but I well remember, as will hon. members in the house who were here at the time, the circumstances that occurred in February 1963, and surely it is a hollow mockery of the democratic form of government, after a government has been defeated, that it should have the arrogance to insist on placing business before the house which it has no hope—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: Surely, sir, these people across the way do not rule by divine right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: They should resign.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is raising a point of order which was made previously.

Mr. Monteith: It has to be driven home.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I can honestly say, if I can just continue for a few words—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benson: —that hon. members opposite do not want—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benson: —to make it easier to own homes in this country and—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benson: —I would be quite pleased—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to hon. members that it is ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I take it that it is not the desire of the house to proceed with the adjournment business?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock this house stands adjourned until two thirty o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 20, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I move:

That this house do now adjourn.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Stanfield: I think in the circumstances I might be permitted to say something.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure hon. members wish to proceed in an orderly fashion. I have to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition that the motion is not debatable, though by consent he might be allowed—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Ricard: It is a rotten Grit trick.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 2.37 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 21, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSED MOTION RESPECTING HOUSE VOTE ON BILL C-193

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a motion has been submitted for the order paper in the following terms. I move, seconded by Mr. Martin (Essex East):

That this house does not regard its vote on February 19th in connection with third reading of Bill C-193—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: What does this government regard?

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friends seem a little excited.

Mr. Starr: You are more excited than we are.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I might be allowed to read this motion which has been submitted to the order paper. It continues:

—in connection with third reading of Bill C-193 which had carried in all previous stages, as a vote of non-confidence in the government.

Without going into the substance of this motion at this time, and in a purely procedural way I ask for unanimous consent—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pearson: —that notwithstanding the 48 hour regulation this motion may be considered at once by this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we take the position that this government has no right to put any business before this house—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: —including a motion of confidence. It was defeated on a bill to raise taxes, a fundamental part of the government's program, a defeat clearly involving a loss of confidence of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The constitution and the constitutional practice must be respected. It is fundamental to our constitution that such a loss of a fundamental vote of confidence involves resignation or a recommendation for dissolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The government, to try to place any business or any substantive motion before this house, would make a mockery of the vote that took place on Monday evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: There is no precedent for a government defeated on such a fundamental matter as this to then try to do further business with the house, as it tried to do on Monday evening following that defeat—actually being defeated twice on that occasion —and again now trying to do so by putting this motion before the house.

I say, sir, that the government is flouting the constitution. It is flouting parliament. It has no right to present such a motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: We therefore cannot agree to waive notice. To do so would be to make light of the vote that took place on Monday night. Furthermore since we believe and are convinced the government has no right to make such a motion, we certainly cannot agree to waive notice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic party take the position that while the government may have a constitutional right to ask the house for a vote of confidence, it has no moral right—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: —to ask this house for a vote of confidence in view of the fact that one of its major fiscal measures was defeated in this house last Monday night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: In our system of parliamentary government the most important right is the right to impose taxes. This government has been denied that right by a majority of members voting on Bill No. C-193.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: However, Mr. Speaker, the defeat of that measure and the ineptitude of the government in dealing with it are merely symptomatic of the ineptitude of the government's handling of the entire Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The vote which was held on Monday night is merely the culmination of a long process of disintegration of a government which is not only inept but so badly divided that it cannot make any decisions on major matters of importance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: This party therefore takes the position that the government's only real option is to seek a mandate from the electorate and ask the voters of this country—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: If you had any principles that is what you would do.

Mr. Douglas: —whether they are willing to have a government impose a 5 per cent surtax on personal incomes at the same time they are handing back millions of dollars to corporations as the result of a refund tax that was imposed on these people. As the Prime Minister said last night, the government needs the money; but the Canadian people have a right to know whether the government needs it so badly that it should turn over tens of millions of dollars in the form of reimbursement to the corporations of this country. That is the issue on which this government should go to the electorate. That is the question on which members of the government should ask the voters for a mandate.

With reference to the motion which the Prime Minister has asked that we give consent to having debated today, I should say that while we think the government has no moral right to ask for a vote of confidence, we do not deny its constitutional right. Had the government brought in a straight motion of confidence we might well have agreed to proceed with the debate today. However, the motion which the Prime Minister has sent to the Clerk's office is not a motion of confidence; it is a motion asking this house to repudiate a decision it has already made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: It is a motion asking this house to turn back the clock.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Douglas: It is a motion which is so unprecedented in its arrogance that we have the right to ask for time to study it and assess its implications—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: —because I suggest to this house that this motion could be the prelude to the government seeking to reinstate Bill C-193, which otherwise it would be unable to do under the rules of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: In my opinion this is the first step in an attempt to do something which the rules of the house prevent them from doing. This is an attempt to reimpose a tax which the House of Commons by vote denied the government the right to impose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are compelled to ask ourselves whether we are now to have a repetition of the pipe line debate; whether we are to have another attempt to wipe the slate clean and start all over again; whether we are to have an attempt by the government to rewrite history and make the House of Commons reverse a decision that has been made in order to allow the government to then force another decision on this House of Commons and force a tax upon the Canadian people.

Therefore we cannot consent to proceeding with this motion today. If the government insists on placing it on the order paper of course it will come up on Friday. In our opinion the government ought to do what is the proper thing to do; that is, having been defeated, the government has the right to go to the Governor General and ask for dissolution of parliament. If it is not prepared to do that, this house ought to adjourn until the motion the Prime Minister is going to move can be debated.

Mr. Woolliams: That's right.

Mr. Douglas: I do not think this house has any right to proceed with any business until this matter has been settled. It seems to me, therefore, that the government should have a little time to make its decision as to whether it wants to seek the dissolution of parliament or wants to proceed with the motion the Prime Minister has read.

With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is little value in trying to continue with the business of the house. The house ought to adjourn until Friday. If at that time the government wishes to proceed with this motion we cannot prevent it from doing so. In the meantime, I hope the government will take the decision of last Monday night as an indication that it has lost the confidence of this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I deplore the interventions of some Conservative members when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) rose to read the motion he is introducing today and which reads as follows:

> That this house does not regard its vote on February 19 in connection with the third reading of Bill C-193 which it carried on all its previous stages as a vote of non-confidence in the government.

Mr. Speaker, as the previous speaker just said, only the government, and nobody else, is to blame for the situation in which it finds itself at present. In fact, on the evening of the vote, the government did not have to move the third reading of Bill No. C-193; it did so, and the motion was defeated by a majority vote of the house.

If we believe that, in a democracy, parliament is the real sovereign of the country, we may say, in the present circumstances, that the government has been defeated by a parliamentary majority and that it should resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: The motion of the Prime Minister is to the effect that, on third reading, the bill had passed all the previous stages. It should be added that it was on division, since the various motions and the clauses of the bill were passed by the house on division, precisely because the government had a majority. We objected to Bill No. C-193 at the resolution stage. We are still opposed to it, and if the motion for third reading has been rejected by a vote in the house, I see no other way out for the government than to go to the people and ask for their opinion on the way in which the business of the country is to be dealt with.

• (2:50 p.m.)

I said earlier that the government alone is responsible for the situation in which it now finds itself. That is a fact. Monday evening the Deputy Speaker read the following motion:

> Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Benson, moves that Bill No. C-193, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be now read a third time and do pass.

The vote was taken. Much importance is being attached to the word "now". At that time the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) could have objected to third reading and deferred it for a day or two, or even a week. This was not done. Instead, the Minister of Finance said arrogantly: Yes, let the motion be put to a vote. We voted, and the government was defeated. Under the circumstances there is but one way out, and that is to go to the people.

With regard to the motion, we all know it is to be debated in 48 hours. The Conservatives are opposed to debating it today, as well as the New Democratic party.

As far as the Ralliement Créditiste is concerned, we would have allowed the government to discuss the matter today, in order not to waste any more public funds, through costly adjournments today and tomorrow. The Canadian people will be paying for that. We will probably be adjourning in a few moments to meet again only on Friday. In the meantime the Canadian people will be footing the bill.

Mr. Speaker, we would therefore have no objection to discussing the motion now, to throw light on the situation, to tell the government what we think, and to let the Canadian people know what is going on.

I feel that if all the members assumed their responsibilities we would allow the motion to be debated immediately to clear up the situation and straighten things out.

Motion Respecting House Vote

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, last evening in a statement to the Canadian people the Prime Minister outlined what he anticipated would be the procedure today and the position of the government with respect to this crisis in which they find themselves.

In the course of that presentation to the Canadian people reference was made to the fact that this is a situation which minority governments face constantly, but I suggest that this has nothing to do with a minority government situation, in view of the fact that when the vote was taken the other evening a great percentage of government supporters were not present in the house. Therefore had the government seen to it that their members were present and voting, there would have been no situation develop as we find it today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: Therefore I cannot agree that this situation has anything whatsoever to do with the minority position in which the government finds itself. The Prime Minister also referred to the fact that the bill had previously passed all stages and had been supported by the House of Commons, and therefore brought into question the position that was being taken that the vote on third reading was actually a vote of non-confidence.

However, Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention this morning that the vote on third reading was a heavier vote than any that were taken during the committee stage or any other stage of the bill. Therefore it seems to me that the logic hardly carries through, because in the heaviest vote that was taken the government was defeated. So it appears to us that the vote was in effect a clear repudiation of the economic program of the government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: —in view of the fact that the bill was based upon the budget resolutions which were presented to the house last fall.

Had the Prime Minister seen fit to introduce a straight motion of confidence today I think the situation would have been much easier to understand. However, he has seen fit to couch the motion in such terms that it actually implies a repudiation of the decision taken the other evening on third reading.

[Mr. Caouette.]

We would not have objected to waiving the 48-hour requirement on this motion in order to get it before the house and find a solution to the problem. However, in saying that may I point out that the government could not in any way expect to get a favourable vote even had the 48-hour requirement been eliminated.

Therefore it seems to me that the only course the government can follow, since apparently it is not going to get the consent of the house to waiving the 48-hour limitation, is to move that the house adjourn until we have an opportunity to discuss the motion which has been introduced by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, since there does not seem to be unanimous consent to go ahead with this important measure now, naturally it has to be reserved until Friday when we can proceed with it. I hope that tomorrow we will be able to go ahead with our constitutional debate as planned.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pearson: This is a very important discussion on constitutional changes.

Mr. Starr: You should have kept that in mind last Monday.

Mr. Pearson: Hon. gentlemen opposite are not interested in the constitution. They are interested in throwing out this government and having an election. Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the right hon. leader of the government has moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before the Prime Minister moved the adjournment of the house he made a suggestion as to what the house might deal with tomorrow. In other words he was implying that the adjournment he moved would be effective only until tomorrow rather than until Friday.

My point of order is that the Prime Minister is asking that the house deal with a matter of government business tomorrow before we have dealt with the question as to whether or not the government has the confidence of the house.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is out of order, that the house should not be asked to vote on a motion which implies that we come back tomorrow to deal with another matter before we have dealt with the question of the confidence of the house in the government.

In support of my contention that at this moment the government does not have the confidence of the house may I refer to the Prime Minister's proposed motion. It is a matter of constitutional understanding in this country that we do not proceed with business unless the government has the confidence of the house, and the motion—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is debating the constitutional position now. This is not what is before the house, although I must bring to the attention of the house that I have not received a written motion with a seconder. The Prime Minister should put this in the hands of the Chair before the motion can be put.

Mr. Starr: They don't do anything properly.

Mr. Knowles: May I continue with my point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that perhaps we might allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to finish his point of order pending receipt of the motion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We will not be throttled.

Mr. Knowles: My point of order is that the government has no right to place before the Chair a motion which implies that we shall deal with other business. The government has admitted by its motion that there is a question as to whether it has the confidence of the house. We contend that it does not have that confidence. A motion that we adjourn which merely means that we adjourn until tomorrow implies that tomorrow we will deal with other business before we have settled the question of confidence. I suggest that the motion is therefore clearly out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pearson: May I repeat my motion? I move, seconded by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), that this house do now adjourn.

An hon. Member: You are not a dictator.

Mr. Speaker: Is the right hon. gentleman speaking to the point of order?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am on a point of order. This is a most unusual proceeding. A government, having been defeated, now endeavours to get a second chance. I am reminded of 1956—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thought the right hon. gentleman was about to remind me of the rule that there could be no debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; I want the opportunity of rising. Let that be clear.

Mr. Speaker: The matter is very simple. A motion to adjourn the house is always in order and has been submitted by the Prime Minister. The only thing I can do is put the motion to the house, although if the house wants to give consent I certainly have no objection to hearing what the right hon. gentleman may want to say.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With or without consent—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise to a question of order.

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the question? Is parliament to be throttled again as it was in 1956 by the same party? The particular point of order is this. In 1956 the government endeavoured to wipe out one day, Friday. What they are trying to do on this occasion is wipe out a decision of parliament, which is an unjust, unfair and unconstitutional proceeding.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I ask for a ruling on my point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I heard the point of order, and I submit to the hon. member that he is raising a constitutional question upon which I cannot rule. I cannot accept the point of order. I have to put the motion to the house.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): What is the motion?

Motion Respecting House Vote

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will read the motion again.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Peace River on a question of privilege, but some members did not hear the motion so I will put it again. The Prime Minister, seconded by the Secretary of State for External Affairs moved:

This house do now adjourn.

This was the motion I read a moment ago.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Any such motion must be taken without prejudice to the right of myself and other hon. members to say to the government that it is no longer the government so far as the House of Commons is concerned and cannot put any motion.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 3.06 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 22, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FULTON—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER IN TELEVISION INTERVIEW

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which involves the privileges and rights of members of this house and of this house itself. This question of privilege arises out of words used by the Prime Minister in the course of a C.B.C. national television interview which was broadcast last night. The words to which I refer, among others which are a reflection upon this house, upon the members of this house and the proceedings of this house, are the following:

> That's the way elections should be brought about. Not by this kind of trickery—

Hon. members will find these words recorded at page 22 of the official transcript of the broadcast interview. Then there is the following phrase:

> Are you going to let these people manoeuvre you by this kind of trickery into a general election at this particular time?

Those words are to be found at page 14 of the same transcript. There are other related phrases to which I will refer during the course of my remarks. My point of privilege is that these words have reference to the proceedings in this house on Monday night and to the participation of members in those proceedings as well as the conduct of members therein. Second, they constitute a slander on the members of the house and the Deputy Speaker with regard to his conduct of those proceedings. Third, they are contrary to the truth. Fourth they are therefore a reflection on our proceedings and as such are a breach of privilege.

I should like briefly to develop and establish these points. First, with regard to the word "trickery", I do not intend to detain the house at any great length by a reference to long definitions. I should like to refer hon. members to the Shorter Oxford English dictionary where they will find the word "trickery" defined as:

> The practice of tricks; deceitful conduct or practice; deception, artifice; imposture.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the terms the Prime Minister applied to the conduct of members of this house, including especially all members present on that occasion in all the opposition parties in this house. The implication also embodies, of course, all members of the government and the Deputy Speaker. I do not think there is any question that these terms, in any proper understanding of them, are a slanderous reflection upon what took place here.

• (2:40 p.m.)

In the second place, there is no doubt that the reference is to the proceedings of last Monday night. The words by their very nature refer to those proceedings, as does the broadcast itself. If there were any doubt I would refer to the words used by the Prime Minister in this broadcast as they are to be found at page 3 of the transcript:

> There is a crisis being manufactured because we lost a vote in third reading by 84 to 82 on a measure last Monday night.

So it is clear that the whole reference is to the proceedings in this house on that occasion. As such the reference constitutes a slanderous attack on every member who voted and, as I say, on the Deputy Speaker; because we are accused of the practice of tricks, deceitful conduct, deception, artifice, imposture. The Deputy Speaker is therefore, by inference, necessarily either a dupe of such a trick or else an accomplice. This is the necessary inference from what the Prime Minister has said with respect to an officer of this house.

I have described the words and the conduct of the Prime Minister as amounting to a slander directed against our proceedings and against all hon. members, a slander not only because of the meaning of the word itself, as established by its definition, but also because it is contrary to the truth as well as because everything the Prime Minister said in this broadcast as to what took place and as to the background of what took place, is contrary to the truth. It is contrary to the truth because it is contrary to what actually happened at every stage.

As background to what I wish to say in this respect let me read what the Prime Minister said as reported on page 8 of this transcript:

I know what Monday night is like. Nobody thought there was going to be a vote.

I can only put this down, in generous excuse for the Prime Minister, to the fact that he was not here on Monday; he was holidaying in Jamaica.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Fulton: That is a statement of fact. The Prime Minister was not here on Monday; he was holidaying in Jamaica. But he was telephoned in Jamaica at 6 p.m. on Monday, so he tells us, according to the transcript, and was told that everything was quiet; everything was under control. This was the message he received in Jamaica at 6 p.m. according to his own testimony, after the government had narrowly avoided defeat in a vote that afternoon by a majority of 3. Everything was quiet. Everything was under control.

Mr. Speaker, this was no snap vote. This was no trick. Members did not suddenly spring out from behind the curtains. Contrary to the Prime Minister's statement that no vote was expected, this is what occurred. We in the opposition opposed this measure at every stage. We opposed the budget last November, when we voted against it. We voted against the income tax bill on second reading, contrary to the impression left by the Prime Minister in the course of his broadcast. We voted against it in committee on Monday; as I have said, on Monday afternoon the government narrowly avoided defeat in a vote of 65 to 62. On Monday evening it was the government which called for third reading.

There was no surprise. I am outlining here the course of events as they actually happened in order to demonstrate the extent of the untruths contained in the Prime Minister's statement and, therefore, the extent of the slander upon members of this house and the extent of the breach of the privileges of this house.

Contrary to what the Prime Minister said, it was perfectly clear that there would be a vote on third reading. And let me point out that we did not call the third reading, nor was it sprung upon the government by surprise. Indeed, under the normal practice of this house, when second reading has taken place on a previous day and on another day the house completes committee stage, it is normal to go on at once with third reading. But the matter still rested within the control of the government. They could have deferred third reading if they had wished. But they did not; they called the third reading stage, which we accepted, and the opposition voted on third reading, and that is the way the government came to be defeated on Monday evening last.

The opposition voted knowing full well what was the effect and the implication of their vote, and one must assume that the government accepted the vote also knowing full well what was the implication of the vote. So it is contrary to the truth when the Prime Minister says that no one expected a vote on Monday night. It is contrary to the truth when the Prime Minister says this was a species of trickery. It is contrary to the truth when the Prime Minister says this is a manufactured crisis. At least it is certainly contrary to the truth when he implies it was manufactured by anybody else but the government itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: So, sir, this being the situation I submit to you that the only course that can properly be followed now is for this house to take the matter under advisement, and to do so in realization of the fact that the members of the house have been slandered, the proceedings of the house have been called into question by words of the Prime Minister of Canada himself, the first member of this house, reflecting upon its proceedings; and I suggest to the Prime Minister that he be careful of his use of language, because if there is any trickery whatsoever involved here the trickery is in the backhanded, extraordinary and deceitful motion placed on the notice paper yesterday by the right hon. gentleman himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness):

That the words used by the right hon. the Prime Minister on a C.B.C. national television interview broadcast on February 21st, 1968, to wit:

"That's the way elections should be brought about. Not by this kind of trickery situation last Monday night."

"Are you going to let these people manoeuvre you by this kind of trickery into a general election at this particular time?"

and other statements of a like nature, as reported in the official transcript of the said broadcast, constitute a reflection upon the proceedings of this house, a reflection on the conduct and honour of members of this house, and thus constitute a breach of the privileges of said members and of the house itself, and that this house take such action in respect thereof as may be in accord with the practices and conventions established for the protection and safeguarding of the said privileges.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will look into this matter and not much time needs to be taken up on the statement—

Mr. Starr: The motion has not been put.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Ontario submits that I should put the motion. I will put the motion only if I rule that there is a prima facie case of privilege. This is the way the matter is to be considered. Before doing this, I am sure hon. members will agree that it is always in order for a member who is criticized to be given an opportunity to make an explanation.

Mr. Pearson: I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that you would no doubt want to take under advisement this matter proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) at a session which his party has been arguing does not exist, when we have no right to bring any business before this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: No government business.

Mr. Pearson: However, he managed to make a little speech before the House of Commons, not on the matter of constitutional reform which was put forward as a desirable subject but with regard to a broadcast made outside the house in which I said the following, which I will quote exactly. The hon. member left out the first part of this paragraph, which appears at page 14 of the transcript. It reads as follows:

I am getting a lot of messages saying: "Are you going to let these people manoeuvre you by this kind of trickery—?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pearson: When these people have been telling me we should not be manoeuvred by this kind of trickery they may have been thinking about a statement made by a Conservative member of parliament, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates), who was quoted by the Ottawa Journal, an unimpeachable source, as having said—this was copied from the Mail Star of Halifax—that "It was an organized plot by the Conservative opposition that resulted in the government's defeat".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Now, Mr. Speaker, it is up to you to decide whether the word "trickery" constitutes a breach of privilege of the house or not, even though I quoted it from another message. While you are deciding that I would call your attention to page 6901 of Hansard for February 20 when there was a motion to adjourn the house. After the motion had been called the following appears:

Mr. Ricard: It is a rotten Grit trick.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has involved me directly in this matter, and since I have before me the Ottawa Journal, I should like to say first of all that I did not see this article in the Mail Star of Halifax but I read a similar article in the Chronicle-Herald of Halifax which did not quote me as saying there was an organized plot. That was the opinion of the correspondent who wrote the article.

Mr. Pearson: It was an accident.

Mr. Coates: If hon. gentlemen do not mind, what I should like to do is state my personal privilege. At the same time, if the article in the Halifax Mail Star does in fact quote me as saying there was an organized plot, then I must say that the article is incorrect. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I should be given the opportunity to explain the circumstances relating to this allegation.

The circumstances are these. On Monday afternoon it was very apparent to the Conservative party, if not to the Liberal party, that the government could be defeated. The government in fact, had survived a vote on clause 5 in committee. While the clause was not defeated, it passed by only 65 to 62.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Coates: I think it is only fair to allow me to continue because the Prime Minister has accused me personally of plotting. He referred to something which I am sure he has not read himself, personally, because I have not seen the article. However, quite gratuitously he is willing to accuse me of plotting, or the Conservative party of plotting, so I think I should have the right to explain the circumstances.

In the evening third reading was called by the Minister of Finance. At the time Mr. Deputy Speaker, acting on Your Honour's behalf, called for the yeas and nays and stated "The nays have it". As a result the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) immediately rose with his colleagues and asked for a vote. When that took place the Conservative party, not in association with any other political party in this house but by itself, organized to get every member who was in Ottawa in this house to vote. The result of that vote was a defeat of the government, something that my leader and every member of this party has been dedicated to do ever since this financial measure was brought down; and we did it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought it was in order to allow the hon. member some words of explanation in view of the fact that he had been brought personally into the discussion. As hon. members know, the duty of the Chair at this stage is to decide whether a prima facie case of privilege has been made out. I have no intention of stifling debate, however. If hon. members have something to contribute to convince me there is a prima facie case of privilege or there is not, I will listen, but I insist that any contribution be directly relevant to that particular point.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly like to point out to you and to the house that there is a prima facie case of privilege. I listened to television last night between 9.30 and ten o'clock and again at 11. I heard the Prime Minister talking to two members of the press gallery. I wrote down what he said, and if this is not correct the Prime Minister can make the necessary correction. I heard him say these words, and he was talking about bringing on an election: "Not by this kind of trickery situation on Monday night".

Now, sir, the burden of what he had to say in the press conference was that on Monday night when the vote was held on third reading of Bill No. C-193, some trickery took place. I was very careful to jot down these words. I said to myself, what did the Prime Minister mean by trickery on Monday night?

[Mr. Coates.]

This, sir, is a reflection on every member who was in the house on Monday night. There was no trickery. There was no deceit. The members who were here on Monday night were doing their duty to their country by being here.

• (3:00 p.m.)

We had participated in the debate in the afternoon and were prepared to continue after the supper hour, to complete the bill and go on with third reading, as is normal under the circumstances. There was not any deceitful action on the part of any member of the house to my knowledge; we were doing our duty. We were not staying away from the house. We were not holidaying.

If there was trickery, sir, it must have been on the part of those members of the Liberal party who were not here to cast their votes and support the government. Possibly that is where the trickery was. Perhaps that is what the Prime Minister was referring to. However, his remarks to the country indicated to the people of Canada that by some trick or some deceit the House of Commons had defeated a government motion. I, sir, as a member of this house find fault with that action and that statement of the Prime Minister. It is a reflection on each member who was here that night, and I will not stand for that type of reflection on my conduct as a member of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: This statement was a reflection on the House of Commons as an institution, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister of this country, who is responsible for the conduct of the House of Commons, speaks to the nation and says there is trickery afoot in the House of Commons, that the government cannot get the business through because the House of Commons is deceitful and is using trickery to defeat their purpose. That is the impression the Prime Minister left with the people of this country, and that makes this a valid point of privilege.

As the hon. member for Kamloops has pointed out, Mr. Speaker, in casting a reflection on individual members and on the house as a whole the Prime Minister is also casting a reflection on the Speakership of this house. It so happened, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Deputy Speaker was in the chair on that occasion. If you will refer to page 6894 and the following pages of Hansard you will find that Mr. Deputy Speaker carried out the instructions of the house. He abided by the rules of the house and put the motion in the proper order; and when the vote was called it was properly conducted.

If there was trickery involved, sir, the Minister of Finance, I would point out, stated that he wanted to proceed with third reading.

Mr. Sharp: No; read the whole paragraph.

Mr. Churchill: All right. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will explain his position. Let me show the house that there was no trickery.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Read Hansard.

Mr. Churchill: I intend to read it. I refer to page 6895, the bottom of the first column. There we read:

> Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Do I understand that the Minister of Finance does not want the bill to be read a third time now?

To which the Minister of Finance replied:

> No, no.

Then an hon. member interjected:

> At the next sitting of the house.

The minister's answer to both these comments was:

> No, no.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the minister was saying he wanted to go ahead with it.

Mr. Sharp: I was objecting to third reading.

Mr. Churchill: Then as reported in the second column of the page, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said this:

> Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to third reading. I did not move the motion, and I am very sorry if Your Honour misunderstood. I was trying to catch your eye. If it is the wish of the house, I am perfectly happy to have third reading.

The Prime Minister tells the country that there was trickery in the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker. He is accusing the Minister of Finance of using trickery.

Then, Mr. Speaker, to show the attitude of the government on that night let me recall this to your mind. When the yeas and nays were called Mr. Deputy Speaker correctly interpreted the will of the house and stated that the nays had it. And who then called for a recorded vote, Mr. Speaker? None other than the Minister of Transport, who jumped to his feet, flapped his arms wildly like this, and encouraged his reluctant members to stand up and have a recorded vote.

I conclude, sir, by saying there was no deceit, no trickery, unless it was on the part of the government. Certainly there was no trickery on the part of individual members or any of the parties on this side of the house. I say, sir, this is a valid question of privilege for this house to decide.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must caution hon. members to limit their remarks as much as possible to the very limited question whether there was a prima facie breach of privilege in the words alleged to have been used.

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): I will confine my remarks to the question whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. I am sure we are all familiar with the rule that no member in an ordinary speech may reflect upon a decision taken by the house, whether in the ordinary course of proceedings or by a recorded vote. When on occasion we have had to refer back to decisions taken by the house, as the government do frequently in connection with the decision taken on medicare, in support of their contention that it must proceed, the excuse is given that it is the will of parliament. They say parliament has voted on the matter; therefore we must proceed because parliament has expressed itself. That is the only type of comment allowed on previous actions of this house. There is no need, Mr. Speaker, to look for specific authority for this. Nearly every day Mr. Speaker listens to hon. members who are dissatisfied with a decision of the house, whose remarks indicate they are not happy either with the decision itself or the manner in which it was taken, and the Chair is always quick to point out that this might be a reflection on a decision or action of the house and hon. members are quickly brought to order.

One of the things on which we pride ourselves as members of this house and as hon. gentlemen is the sincerity of our motives. There can be no suggestion that any member of this house acts otherwise than as his duty as a member of the house impels him to act in considering the matters before him. He acts as his duty to his country and his constituents dictates.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the Prime Minister, which certainly have not been explained away by the facetious manner in which he answered the hon. member for Kamloops this day, must be looked at in the sum total of our duty to this house, the duty of each member, no matter his station, to uphold the principle that enables each member of the house to refer with surety to each other member as an honourable gentleman. I refer to the remarks on page 12 of the transcript, for instance:

Reference to Statement by Prime Minister

> • (3:10 p.m.)
>
> And then we came up against this income tax bill on a Monday night by, according to this Conservative member, a plot engineered.

I refer also to the remarks on page 14:

> "Are you going to let these people manoeuvre you by this kind of trickery into a general election at this particular time?—

Also the remarks on page 22:

> That's the way elections should be brought about. Not by this kind of trickery situation last Monday night.

These are three quotations from the Prime Minister's speech, and each one seeks to indicate that there was something improper about the proceedings in this house last Monday. The proceedings of this house are recorded in Hansard and Votes and Proceedings, and the situation that was developing all day is plainly to be read. That day's procedure was exactly the same as the procedure that has been carried on in this house for many, many years by many governments, and that is the way in which bills have been voted on, sustained or defeated.

Unquestionably, in the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for example, the duty of the opposition is to criticize. Those who now sit opposite me have been heard to say in the past that it is the business of the opposition to defeat the government.

An hon. Member: At all costs.

Mr. Nugent: Surely anyone in this country who considers the impudence of this government will think it the duty of the opposition to get rid of this government. Since the allegation has been made that trickery was involved in the long accepted, standard and honourable procedure of this house, a procedure which clearly says that the duty of the opposition is to oppose, criticize and, if possible, get rid of an incompetent government —there need be little argument to show that the allegation touches on the privileges of members of the house.

If a course of conduct which we deem to be in the best interests of our party and this country is undertaken, and if we who honourably pursue our duty in this house are to be smeared with the label of "trickery", then surely the rule having to do with reflections being cast on hon. members of the house ought to be invoked. I ask Your Honour to allow us to debate the matter, to determine the extent of the insult that hon. members have sustained because of those uncalled for words on the part of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if much is to be served by having repetitions of the argument which was so well put originally by the hon. member for Kamloops. On the other hand, I do not want any suggestion that hon. members have not had an opportunity to support the point of view that there has been a breach of privilege. I recognize the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I do not think much needs to be said on the point. Unquestionably the Prime Minister of this country suggested to the public at large that trickery was involved in Monday night's vote. It has been clearly demonstrated in this house that there was no such trickery. The only way the Prime Minister has supported his position is by quoting from a newspaper which attributed some remarks to one member or several members of the house. The Prime Minister was not quoting any hon. member, in fact, he was quoting something that had been decided by a newspaperman.

The Prime Minister has not seriously attempted to deny that he made the offending remark. He has not seriously attempted to justify himself for what he said. To have made the remark on the spur of the moment, as he said my hon. colleague had done, is one thing. But this was a deliberate statement. It was repeated on a number of occasions, and it reflected on the members of this house in a completely unjustified manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Clearly the remarks cast a reflection on this house and constitute a breach of privilege. I may say that I was very sorry to hear my right hon. friend make those remarks.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house for any great length since you have heard many expressions of opinion about this motion. I am prepared to leave the determination as to breach of privilege to Your Honour. I rise to read some brief remarks from the transcript of the Prime Minister's interview on television. On page 2 of that transcript the Prime Minister is reported to have said, in part:

—which is probably one of the reasons why this crisis has been manufactured by the opposition.

On page 3 he is reported to have said:

There's a crisis being manufactured—

On page 5 he is alleged to have said:

—when the opposition will organize a plot on the third reading of a vote of this kind to defeat a government,—

Finally I shall read the remarks from page 22 which have already been drawn to Your Honour's attention. The Prime Minister is alleged to have said:

That's the way elections should be brought about. Not by this kind of trickery situation last Monday night.

I do not think I need to advise Your Honour whether this is a matter of privilege. But, because I want to make it abundantly clear, on behalf of the members of this party, that we consider these statements to be inaccurate and contrary to the facts—

Mr. Stanfield: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: —and to be a complete distortion of what took place in this house last Monday, I have risen to make my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: Whether inaccurate statements giving a misleading impression of what happened in the house constitute a question of privilege, I am prepared to leave to Your Honour. I wish to say that whatever Your Honour's decision may be, these inaccurate statements will be answered when we have the opportunity to debate the motion of confidence tomorrow; because, since we were merely carrying out the duties of members in this house, we do not propose to have improper motives attributed to us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: We were trying to oppose with all the powers at our command a piece of legislation which in my opinion was abominable and not in the best interests of the people of Canada. We have a right to oppose such legislation. This was not something that happened just last Monday; we have opposed this legislation ever since the Minister of Finance announced it in his mini-budget before Christmas. Almost alone last Thursday the members of this party fought this bill in committee. We fought it all last Monday afternoon. The government measure survived a vote in committee by a bare margin of 3 votes.

An hon. Member: After a filibuster.

Mr. Douglas: The government had ample notice that members of this party and of other opposition parties, as a result of the committee vote of 65 to 62 which carried the government measure, had taken strong exception to this measure. The government had ample opportunity to delay the debate on third reading until the next day, to continue the debate on third reading until the next day, or to see that it had sufficient members here to express its point of view in the vote.

I am rising solely to say that we consider the Prime Minister's statements to be unfortunate. They may have been made by the Prime Minister in a moment of hysteria or excitement.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Pearson: The hysteria is all over there.

Mr. Douglas: But the statements are inaccurate. We propose, Mr. Speaker, if you allow a debate, to discuss this matter at this time. If not, we certainly intend to debate it at the earliest opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say a few words about the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and accusing the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of having used rather strong words regarding the opposition, by suggesting, for instance, that there was some collusion and agreement among the various opposition parties to defeat the government.

There was no agreement or collusion among opposition parties. The only thing that happened Monday evening was that the motion introduced by the government with regard to Bill No. C-193 was defeated. That is what happened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: It is the privilege of the right hon. Prime Minister to say on television that the Conservatives or the opposition are not assuming their responsibilities as they should, just as it is our privilege to reply to the Prime Minister, either on television or here in the house and I feel that he has obtained a good number of replies this afternoon.

But to conclude, Mr. Speaker, that there is really a question of privilege is an entirely different matter. I feel that the people on both sides should be free to say what they think, and that goes even for the Prime Minister of Canada.

The right hon. Prime Minister wanted to justify his stand, and he argued his case. The Conservatives argue theirs by saying that had the Liberals been here Monday night this situation would not have occurred. Indeed, approximately 45 Liberals were absent, but let us not forget that 42 Conservatives, 7 members of the New Democratic party, 3 members of the Ralliement Créditiste, 2 members of the Social Credit party and two thirds of the Independents were also absent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: Nevertheless, we must be frank, we must set the facts straight.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this question of privilege could be discussed tomorrow during the debate on the motion of the right hon. Prime Minister. We will then have complete freedom to debate this question and to blame the Prime Minister for the things he said on television. However, I do not think it is in order to discuss this afternoon the speech made by the Prime Minister on television, nor any comments made by any member today or in the past few days.

I think we will have plenty of time to discuss this matter at length tomorrow, to say everything we want and to tell the government exactly what we think.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion moved by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). The only defence the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made this afternoon, if it is any defence at all, was that he said he quoted certain words in the television interview. This is going to be my first point. He may feel that is some defence to the charge of slander in the sense that the word "slander" has been used by the hon. member for Kamloops, but I suggest to him that it is no defence. Let us look at what the Prime Minister said. He said:

> I am getting a lot of messages saying: "Are you going to let these people manoeuvre you by this kind of trickery into a general election at this particular time?"

In defence the Prime Minister says he was merely quoting somebody. I say he has left the wrong impression this afternoon, as he has done on many other occasions not only in this house but on television and radio, because if we turn to page 22 of the transcript we will find there are no quotation marks around these words which I am going to quote. They are clear, they are concise, and they are the words of the Prime Minister himself. But before quoting them I wish to say that the reason the Prime Minister adopted this defence was to introduce an element of comedy in reference to the serious motion moved by the hon. member for Kamloops. He thought he could say, "Oh, well, I just quoted somebody." But the words to which I will draw attention are his own words. They in themselves, so far as I am concerned as a member of the house, and indeed I am sure many hon. members will agree with me, constitute a matter of privilege involving every hon. member.

The Prime Minister used the word "trickery". The word "trickery" means some kind of fraud or dishonesty. As I say, these are the Prime Minister's own words. They are not in quotation marks. These are the words that went forth to probably a million people watching him on television. His defence today is not very sound and he knows it. In fact in my opinion, with the greatest respect to the Prime Minister and his position, he is trying to mislead the house today as he tried to misrepresent the situation on television. These are his own words to which I refer. He said:

> Not by this kind of trickery situation last Monday night.

I repeat that those are the Prime Minister's own words, not a quotation. In his defence today, and I think it was because he thought no one would read all the 22 pages of the transcript, the Prime Minister picked out a passage on page 14. However, the hon. member for Kamloops dealt adequately with both phrases complained of, and so did the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill).

The only defence which the Prime Minister had today was that he was quoting somebody. We do not know whether he was quoting somebody. He is using this method to get across something he knows in his own heart and every member of the Liberal party knows was untrue. There was no trickery. They did not have enough members in the house to uphold the government. That is why he was defeated. Why doesn't he tell the truth? I repeat that these are the words of the Prime Minister. They are not in quotes. That point must be made because his defence today is a false defence.

Not by this kind of trickery situation last Monday night.

Those are his own words. So I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, that the motion of the hon. member for Kamloops is completely in order because the Prime Minister did malign and slander everyone in this house over television by leaving the impression that this good government —that is what he thinks it is but we think it is the opposite—was tricked into defeat on that occasion. I might end with this phrase. This is a new rule. It is a rule by King Pearson I. He won't quit until he is fired.

Miss LaMarsh: That sounds more like Dief the Last.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to become particularly involved in the debate taking place at the moment. I simply want to state very clearly, with regard to the suggestion of trickery in connection with the vote on Monday night, that the members of this group voted according to the dictates of their consciences and without any reference whatsoever to any other member or any other party in the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: I want to add another word to clear up what I think is a misunderstanding. There was just one member of this party who was absent the other evening when the vote was taken. Although I did not have the translation system turned on I understand that someone said there were two of our members absent. Mr. Speaker, we realize it is your responsibility to decide this issue and we leave it in your hands.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the main conclusion I have drawn from this debate so far is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made a mighty effective television performance last night.

Reference to Statement by Prime Minister

• (3:30 p.m.)

The hon. member for Kamloops complains of two allegations or statements contained within the Prime Minister's telecast. He refers to the expression "a trickery situation" and the expression "a manufactured crisis". Surely hon. members are becoming extremely thin-skinned when they rise on a question of privilege in objection to these two expressions. Those of us who have been in this house for any length of time know that these are relatively mild expressions—

An hon. Member: Not when principles are involved.

Mr. MacEachen: —especially those of us who have listened to and enjoyed the thunderbolts delivered at times in abusive and torrential language by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I notice, Mr. Speaker, that he had the good judgment not to line up on this rather ridiculous and manufactured question of privilege.

The other day when I moved the motion to adjourn the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) said, "It is a rotten Grit trick".

Mr. MacEwan: It was.

Mr. MacEachen: I wish to refer in general terms—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It was.

Mr. MacEachen: Well, Mr. Speaker, I rest my case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Surely it is open to members of the public to say that the House of Commons is incompetent, that it lacks judgment and that it does not do its job efficiently. Surely this is a comment that any member of the public could make. Are our privileges thereby violated? Are we not ready to receive criticism? Surely hon. members opposite are not today saying that our personal privileges, our integrity and our station as members of parliament are in any way violated by the expressions "a trickery situation" or "manufactured crisis". Surely they have no more entitlement to that position than we on this side would have if we were to say that we have been maligned or slandered by two hon. members of the opposition who just the other day and now today have said that we have been guilty when moving a normal procedural motion of a dirty—I am sorry, I should say "rotten"—trick. That is the accepted word. Surely that is not a sufficient reason to say that we have been guilty of a rotten Grit trick.

Let us not get upset over this incident. I should like to repeat the words of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert—perhaps he borrowed them from another great political figure—"If you cannot stand the heat, stay out of the kitchen".

I say that it was a trickery situation. The hon. member for Kamloops said it was not a trickery situation. I say it was a manufactured crisis. The hon. member for Kamloops said it was not a manufactured crisis. When I say that it is a trickery situation and that it is a manufactured crisis the leader of the New Democratic party is entitled to say that I am inaccurate. He is entitled to say that what I have said is contrary to the facts. He is entitled to say I have distorted the situation. Of course he is entitled to say that. That is debate; that is what the House of Commons is for.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Every time an hon. gentleman on this side says something and another hon. gentleman on that side disagrees violently and passionately, is there then a question of privilege? Of course not. Beauchesne makes the point very clearly. He states that a dispute arising between two hon. members as to allegations of fact hardly fulfils the condition of a privileged question.

An hon. Member: That is in this house.

Mr. Lambert: Do you mean to say that television is this house?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, this interjection by the hon. member for Edmonton West does not change the situation in any respect. It is not a matter of privilege. It is a question of debate between hon. members. We say it was a trickery situation and you say it was not. We say it was a manufactured crisis and you say it was not. Is that a question of privilege? That is debate, and let us get on with the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat made reference to a most effective speech. It may well have been, but I should like to say that it was not the kind of speech we on this side would make. On this side we have the handicap of saying only what the facts are.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baldwin: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), with a skirl of the bagpipes, has attempted to lead us into a detour. This is not a question of a conflict between two members of this house. As Your Honour indicated in the few comments you made, this is a question concerning what is the pith and substance of a statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on a television broadcast which has been referred to by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I should like to repeat the definition of the word "trickery" which the hon. member for Kamloops has read into the record. It is:

> The practice of tricks; deceitful conduct or practice; deception, artifice; imposture.

Your Honour said something about the words recited by the hon. member for Kamloops. I suggest that Your Honour must go beyond these words and examine the entire transcript. I think this is essential. Your Honour, as I was, was brought up in an honourable profession. I am sure you will agree that libel is the clear and simple issue here. I should like to quote from citation 108(3) of Beauchesne, fourth edition:

> Libels on members have also been constantly punished: but to constitute a breach of privilege they must concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity—

I suggest to Your Honour that the simple issue is whether an examination of the entire transcript would indicate that any person listening to the speech would think that members of this house when engaged in their duty on Monday night indulged in disreputable conduct. I believe this is the simple issue. There is an innuendo. I do not think it is sufficient for Your Honour simply to consider the words to which the hon. member for Kamloops referred. He referred to two like statements which were made during the broadcast.

• (3:40 p.m.)

I suggest that any reasonable examination of the entire transcript would bring us to but one conclusion. It would indicate to any person examining or reading the transcript, or who listened to the remarks, that the members of this House of Commons who were here in this house on Monday night engaged in deceitful tricks or in conduct in which they ought not to engage in their capacity as members of this honourable house. This is the charge which has been made. No other reasonable conclusion can be drawn. I therefore submit that this constitutes a prima facie breach of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for the advice they have given the Chair. I might say that after listening to all the arguments I am perhaps a little more confused than I was at the beginning, and I was confused then.

I shall not deal with all the arguments which have been advanced by hon. members who have taken part in the debate. I think I should point out that I have allowed more latitude than usual on such occasions when normally, I think, the Speaker should rise as early as possible after the motion has been raised to rule whether or not there is a prima facie case of privilege. However, I felt this to be a matter of such importance that there ought to be no suggestion that all hon. members who wished to give advice to the Chair or explain their positions had not been given an opportunity to do so. Having taken this position, I think that to a large extent we have already had a debate such as we might expect to take place were the motion itself allowed and perhaps a debate such as would have taken place were the hon. member's motion, of which notice has been given to the house, proceeded with later in this current session.

What we have before us in the motion of which the hon. member for Kamloops has given notice is a suggestion that the use of certain specified words and expressions by an hon. member, in this case the Prime Minister, is in breach of the privileges of the house. I think I have to say, in spite of what the hon. member for Peace River and others have said as to the need to look at the complete record, that I am not in complete agreement with them. Certainly there is a specific motion before the house which claims that certain particular words are objectionable. These are the words which I think should be examined by the Chair and upon which a determination should be made.

The claim made by the hon. member for Kamloops is that there is a breach of privilege in the use of the word "trickery" as contained in the statement:

> That's the way elections should be brought about. Not by this kind of trickery situation last Monday night.
> Are you going to let these people manoeuvre you by this kind of trickery into a general election at this particular time?

Those are the words.

Mr. Fulton: May I direct Your Honour's attention to the fact that the motion goes on to say "and other expressions contained in the transcript".

Mr. Speaker: The expressions which have been referred to include the expressions "trickery" and "manufactured crisis". I would doubt that the hon. member could reasonably claim that the use of the words "manufactured crisis" is in itself libelous or slanderous, which I should think is what we should have to find here.

Hon. members might refer to citation 113 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, which reads:

> Members often raise so-called "questions of privilege" on matters which should be dealt with as personal explanations or corrections, either in the debates or the proceedings of the House. A question of privilege ought rarely to come up in parliament—

Then later—and this is what I wanted to read in particular:

> Libels upon members and aspersions upon them in relation to parliament and interference of any kind with their official duties, are breaches of the privileges of members.

So whether the statement made by the Prime Minister is true is not at issue at all. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam made this point. He said: Well, we claim there was no manufactured crisis and there was no trickery and we intend to prove this in the course of debate. That is quite right, and that, I suggest, is the position which should be taken by anyone who claims or feels that the statement made by the Prime Minister is inaccurate or untrue. The fact that a statement is untrue does not necessarily form the basis of a question of privilege. The only way in which there could be a breach of privilege would be for the word "trickery" itself to be considered as slanderous. My suggestion is that having regard to the manner in which the word was used on this occasion in a general way in the course of a general statement, it cannot be considered by any hon. members as a personal offence against their integrity as members of parliament.

In view of all this and in view of the circumstances and the authority to which I have referred, I cannot agree that there is a prima facie case of privilege here.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be very unprovocative. Because of the views expressed in the house yesterday as to the proposed debate on the constitutional conference, and in the light of further communications received today, I move:

That this house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 3.48 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 23, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING HOUSE VOTE ON BILL C-193

On the order: Government notices of motion:

February 21—The Prime Minister—The following proposed motion:—That this house does not regard its vote on February 19th in connection with third reading of Bill C-193, which had carried in all previous stages, as a vote of non-confidence in the government.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister. Order, please. Before the Prime Minister can proceed this order has to be transferred.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that under the terms of the standing order this government notice of motion be transferred for consideration at the same sitting of the house later this day.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day.

Order, please. Orders of the day.

Mr. Pearson, seconded by Mr. Martin (Essex East), moves:

That this house does not regard its vote on February 19th in connection with third reading of Bill C-193, which had carried in all previous stages, as a vote of non-confidence in the government.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —the procedure would have been so much simpler if we had been given unanimous consent to discuss this motion last Wednesday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion I am not concerned at this time with the nature and purpose of the income tax bill which, on third reading, was defeated last Monday. I am concerned with the circumstances of the vote last Monday and the question of confidence. That is what the motion is about. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, it was of course an important bill that was defeated last Monday. There is no doubt about that. It was a money bill. It could have been rejected by the opposition at any of the previous stages.

An hon. Member: We tried.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend says "we tried". The resolution stage of this bill was carried by 61 government supporters. That does not represent much of a try on the other side. On second reading, which dealt with the principle of the bill, it could have been defeated by 85 members from the opposition. In committee on clause 5, which was such an important clause, it could have been defeated by 66 members of the opposition.

Mr. Starr: Tell us where your members were.

Mr. Pearson: On third reading it was defeated by a vote of 82 to 84.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You are changing the rules in the middle of the game.

Mr. Pearson: I hope, Mr. Speaker, I may be given the same courtesy in moving this motion, which is a very important one, as we expect to extend to speakers opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: The decision taken last Monday night, in relation to confidence, was on the question that "this bill be now read a third time." That, as I said, was defeated by 84 votes to 82. I would like to assure all hon. members of the house, if the assurance is needed, that on no occasion and by no words outside the house—because I have had no opportunity yet to speak in the house about it—have I suggested in any way, shape or form that there was any collusion among opposition groups in that vote. Each group voted in accordance with its conscience and as it saw fit, and I have said nothing to the contrary. There was no suggestion of collusion of any kind made by me or anybody else. We, as the government, accept the fact of that rejection.

Motion Respecting House Vote

• (11:10 a.m.)

This confidence motion now before the house does not seek to alter or question that rejection, nor does it ask parliament to reconsider that decision. Nevertheless the requirement for money to be raised by taxation to balance the budget remains, and the government must meet that requirement and intends to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By a new budget?

Mr. Pearson: That is our responsibility, and it is an especially heavy responsibility in the circumstances, economic and financial, which we face in this country at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: In doing so—and we will be explaining to the house after this vote is finished, sometime next week, I would hope, how we are going to do this—naturally no taxpayer who in accord with administrative procedure that has been followed for many, many years has paid taxes under Bill C-193 will suffer financially because of that fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: What is in issue now is not the income tax bill or the merits of that bill; it is simply whether the vote on third reading last Monday was a vote of confidence, a vote which, as the official opposition have held, required the immediate resignation of the government or dissolution of parliament and a general election. That vote on third reading, the official opposition claim—or they claimed it until this morning—prevents a specific motion being made later which would be strictly one of confidence or non-confidence and, as such, related to that particular vote last Monday night. The Conservative opposition up till this morning had said it was a vote of confidence last Monday on third reading, and that there was no appeal from it. That is the position they have taken.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Appeal to the country.

Mr. Pearson: They claimed—and I am not quarrelling with their claim; I am putting their position—that parliament could do nothing until the government resigned or there was a dissolution, except perhaps to discuss opposition criticism of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we are discussing this motion now, and I am very glad indeed that the opposition have come to the conclusion that it is quite proper to discuss it.

[Mr. Pearson.]

The motion of the government is based on the position that last Monday's vote on third reading was not a vote of confidence. We are appealing to the house to reject the official opposition stand that nothing can be done now by parliament, that the issue has been decided; at least that was their stand until this morning.

We do agree, however, that the defeat on third reading of the income tax bill, while not involving automatic and obligatory resignation or dissolution, does put the issue of confidence into question and that this should be cleared up. We would have cleared it up at once on Wednesday last but we could not get consent for that purpose. We are doing now what we would like to have done on Wednesday to clear up all this uncertainty. If this motion now before the house is defeated, then all doubt will certainly be removed. The government will resign or the house will be dissolved if this motion is defeated; let there be no doubt about that.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): What guarantee have we that you will not put another motion before the house?

Mr. Pearson: I know how strongly my hon. friend feels about everything in the house, but I wonder whether he would let me carry on for a few minutes. Then he will have a chance to make his speech. If the motion carries, then the government carries on with its program of legislation, though a new leader of this party will become prime minister after the convention in April.

Mr. Churchill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I am inclined to echo that "hear, hear".

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Will he immediately go to the people?

Mr. Pearson: I cannot answer that question. He will have to answer it immediately after the convention which will choose him, and of course if this party remains in power at that time.

I hope the vote on this motion can be taken without any unnecessary delay, and I am encouraged by the charge made against me in this morning's press by the Leader of the Opposition when he said I have been trying to provoke the Tories into a filibuster and indicated that they would not fall into that trap. So I am encouraged in my hope that we will be able to have an early vote and that the opposition will be able to avoid a filibuster. If indeed I had been trying to lure the opposition into that trap of a filibuster, I certainly would have been guilty of trickery.

There are two forms of confidence motion that could have been submitted to clear up this matter. The first would have been a simple statement that this house has confidence in the present government.

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Pearson: An hon. gentleman opposite says "never". Perhaps that is the reason we did not introduce that particular motion in that form. That would have been simple but perhaps a shade provocative in its simplicity.

The second motion relates the matter of confidence strictly to the vote on which the government was defeated, and asks the house to decide whether that vote was or was not one of confidence entailing resignation or dissolution. That is all. It does not ask the house to rescind or reconsider any vote. In this form the issue is restricted in one sense, but it is unequivocal and clear in its relation to the question of confidence.

It is in the second form that the motion is now before the house. It is perfectly clear. It reads:

> That this house does not regard its vote on February 19th in connection with third reading of Bill C-193, which has carried in all previous stages, as a vote of non-confidence in the government.

This motion recognizes that the government at all times must retain the confidence of the house to exist; that the question must now be determined whether or not the government does in fact retain the confidence of the house, and that the government has the right to ask explicitly for such determination by the house after the vote we had on Monday night.

Let us look at the constitutional justification for such a motion, which I have no doubt will be attacked by the other side as unconstitutional. I suggest it is universally recognized by constitutional authorities that there are two ways in which the house can express its desire to dismiss a government; either by a strict, clear motion of non-confidence, such as that produced in February, 1963, or by a motion clearly understood to be a motion of non-confidence.

The law of the constitution makes it perfectly clear that a government defeat does not necessarily involve a vote of non-confidence, and there is ample evidence to support this statement. I should like to quote one or two authorities who I think will be recognized by the house as objective and expert. Professor Ivor Jennings, at page 493 in his book "Cabinet Government" writes:

• (11:20 a.m.)

> It must not be thought that a single defeat necessarily demands either resignation or dissolution.

Then a couple of pages later, at page 495, he writes this:

> What the government will treat as a matter of sufficient importance to demand resignation or dissolution is, primarily, a question for the government.

Then he ends with this:

> Whenever the government is defeated, even if on one of the traditional occasions of confidence, the speech from the throne, the budget and the granting of supply, for example, it is still up to the Prime Minister and his colleagues to make the decision as to whether the issue upon which they were defeated was of sufficient importance to entail resignation or dissolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You could perpetuate yourself forever under that principle.

Mr. Pearson: I hope the former leader of the opposition will not intervene in this debate until I am finished. Then we will look forward with the greatest possible delight to hearing him.

Those are authorities which should be respected. They are not partisan political authorities. So far as third reading is concerned they are more emphatic. Erskine May, whom we hear quoted a great deal in the house, has this to say in his seventeenth edition at page 571:

> If the question "that the bill be now read a third time"—

This was the question dealt with last Monday night.

> —is negatived, such a vote is not only not necessarily a matter of confidence but is not even necessarily fatal to the further progress of the bill.

We have made it quite clear we are not going to ask for further progress on that bill, but according to this constitutional authority that could have been done. Canadian authorities could be quoted along the same lines. For instance MacGregor Dawson, in his book "The Government of Canada" with which all students of parliament and the constitution of Canada are familiar, writes at page 390:

> Finally, the bill comes to the third reading, which is usually perfunctory with little debate and rare amendments. The principle of the bill is not debatable nor are the detailed provisions, for these have already been settled. The only debatable point is whether the bill should now be read a third time.

Dr. Beauchesne agrees with this. All the authorities I have been able to consult agree, whether it concerns third reading or some other stage, that the government can avail itself of its undoubted right to judge what is or what is not a matter of confidence.

Perhaps the greatest authority on parliamentary procedure in the English speaking world, Professor Berriedale Keith, in his book "The British Cabinet System"—and we follow in these matters the principles and practices of Westminster, writes:

> It rests, therefore, with the government to decide what issues it shall treat as vital, and as demanding that it must resign or dissolve if it is denied support thereon.

He adds that a sudden upset of the government without warning is not equivalent to a vote of confidence, particularly when the government is in a minority position. Other authorities confirm this view, and I am thinking of Carter and Jennings as well as Dr. Eugene Forsey, a recognized Canadian authority on these matters. They all agree that when a government is a minority government it is likely that it may suffer defeats without resignation which might lead to the fall of a majority government.

Dr. Forsey, Mr. Speaker, made some interesting observations on this matter in an article in the Journal of Political Science and Economics in 1964, concerning the problems of minority government in Canada. I quote from his article:

> There are certain habits of thought or feeling which we will have to change.
>
> The first is that any government defeat in the House of Commons necessarily means either the government's resignation or a fresh election. This is not so. Of course, defeat on a motion of censure, or want of confidence—

We have one before us now.

> —or on any measure which the government considers vital to its policy is decisive and any government is free to consider even a very minor defeat decisive. But the history of British governments in the XIXth century is studded with defeats which the government simply accepted.

Dr. Forsey concludes:

> We shall certainly have to get rid of the notion that every defeat in the house means a fresh election.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to our own house and the constitutional authorities; and we do have some in our own House of Commons. I am being very sincere when I say that that great constitutional and parliamentary authority, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), agrees entirely with Dr. Forsey and the other authorities I have quoted, and I am glad to call him to witness. In his remarks to be found in Hansard on January 21, 1966 at page 129 the hon. member developed at some length a position which he thought would permit members of the House of Commons to support amendments to the speech from the throne calling for old age security to be increased to $100 a month and old age security to be payable from age 65, both of which at that time were not government policies but were very important changes. The hon. member contended that these steps should be taken by the House of Commons without at the same time, in voting for them, expressing any lack of confidence in the government and thereby forcing an election, even though the government were opposed to the amendments. The hon. member outlined his position as follows, Mr. Speaker:

> We intend...to vote...for the amendment that calls for old age security to be raised... In casting these votes, Mr. Speaker, we are not voting for an election. We are not saying that dissolution must necessarily follow. We are voting for what the words say—

And later:

> If anyone wants to bring before parliament at any time the issue of an election, the issue of dissolution, and if it stands by itself—

And it is standing by itself today, Mr. Speaker.

> —we will take our stand on this issue.

The hon. member marshalled very impressive evidence to support that position. His studies in Canadian parliamentary history led him to conclude that Canadian governments had, and I quote, "received adverse votes dozens, perhaps scores of times" without resigning. He went back to Sir John A. Macdonald, and that is really going back to the father of our country. Nine times in four years his government was defeated without resignation. Indeed, in 1869 they were defeated on a money bill and Sir John, while carrying on, is reported to have been enraged by the result. I can understand how he felt, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Sir John explained his defeat in this year as due to the fact that he had, according to his own words, too many "loose fish, shaky fellows" on his side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Dr. Forsey had something to say about this. He said:

In a House of Commons where no party has a clear majority while the "loose fish" may be practically extinct—

And they are, of course.

—his place may be taken by loose shoals of fish, shaky groups of fellows... which cannot be depended on by any government.

Those are Dr. Forsey's words. Of course there are groups that cannot be depended upon by any government because they are independent groups, and the government has no right to depend on them. It has a hope that it can depend on their intelligent understanding and good sense. That is all it has the right to hope for. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre's exhaustive analysis of Canadian precedents right down the years led him to the firm and unshakable conclusion—

• (11:30 a.m.)

An hon. Member: Which you rejected.

Mr. Pearson: —and I hope it remains, the firm and unshakable conclusion—

An hon. Member: Which you rejected.

Mr. Pearson: —that in cases where a government measure were defeated or amended in parliament—and I quote from page 132—

Then...it is up to the government to decide whether it wants to go to the country...or whether it wants to come and ask parliament whether we should stay here and do our job.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) took exactly the same stand, and indeed the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) had some wise observations to make in that debate along exactly the same lines.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I believe the Prime Minister refers to some points having to do with a proposal I made for changes in the constitution. Since those proposals have not been accepted, is he not proving himself wrong under our present constitutional practice?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I was not referring to that; I was referring to some general observations. I wish I had the hon. member's remarks at my finger tips; I could get them in a few moments. I am referring to remarks in which the hon. member said that the defeat of a government need not, on certain occasions, require dissolution or resignation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister permit a question? Since the Prime Minister is quoting with approval the position I took on January 21, 1966, will he indicate what his attitude was on that occasion toward the stand I took?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I will indeed, Mr. Speaker. I took the attitude and our government took the attitude that in an important matter of this kind, since increasing pensions by $25 was against government policy at that time, if that measure were carried it would be a vote of no confidence in the government and we would resign.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: And, Mr. Speaker, that decision was made clear in advance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Prime Minister permit a further question? Is it a case, then, that he agrees with me only when he is in a corner and needs to get out of it?

Mr. Pearson: I only agree with my hon. friend when he is right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: He knows what great respect I have for his knowledge and judgment in these constitutional and procedural matters.

Getting back to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, on page 75 in this debate on January 20, 1966, he also emphasized the importance of "expression of opinion from the house on vital and essential questions." He said the New Democratic party did not believe that an expression of opinion contained in an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne or an amendment to the budget or a supply motion, even one that defeated the government, necessarily or inherently constituted a motion of no confidence. Then he went on to say:

—if any amendment which merely seeks to get an expression of opinion from the house as a whole were passed, the government—

That is the government which has been defeated.

—has three choices. It can, if it chooses, interpret the passing of the amendment as a want of confidence and can act accordingly. Second, it can accept the amendment as reflecting the views of the majority of members in the House of Commons. Third, it can if it chooses—

And this is the pertinent point on this particular occasion:

—submit on its own initiative a motion of confidence to ascertain whether the house wants a dissolution.

This is what we are doing. I assume therefore that hon. gentlemen will accept the correctness of our procedure in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, who I mentioned a moment or two ago, said as reported on page 446 of Hansard for January 31, 1966:

It should be a normal and accepted practice that parliament should have the right to amend or reject legislation proposed by the government, or any other official act, without the risk of a general election.

Mr. Aiken: But it is not an accepted practice. I merely proposed that it should be.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to summarize. We believe, Mr. Speaker, on this side that we had no obligation to resign or ask for dissolution on Monday night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: We believe, Mr. Speaker, that we had every right to carry on the business of government after Monday night's vote, as indeed we are carrying it on today and were not allowed to carry it on Wednesday or Thursday.

We believe that the position taken by the official opposition that no parliamentary business was possible until there was a change in government by resignation or dissolution was untenable, and they have admitted that themselves today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: It is too bad it was not admitted last Wednesday. We believe we have every right to introduce a specific motion of confidence, which we are doing, and to ask for the verdict of parliament on that motion, which will determine the fate of this government. And parliament will decide after the case for and against confidence has been put.

We are not, as the Leader of the Opposition said on Wednesday night outside the house, if the press reports him accurately, setting aside the rules and conventions of parliament to suit our convenience. On the contrary, this motion is evidence that we are operating within the rules of parliament. If this motion carries, we carry on with our program of legislation because we shall have been authorized by this House of Commons so to do. If this motion is defeated—

An hon. Member: You will ask for another vote.

Mr. Pearson: —that decision, of course, leads to a general election. I ask, Mr. Speaker, is this the time, are these the circumstances, is this a situation in which a general election would help our country—

Mr. Woolliams: It certainly would.

Mr. Pearson: —as it faces immediately, not next month or next year, but as it faces immediately grave financial and constitutional problems which affect our future as a united and stable confederation. That is the question which this House of Commons must decide, and I hope it will decide quickly.

• (11:40 a.m.)

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the Prime Minister for some time, and after listening to him came to a number of conclusions. The first was that he was completely unable to cite any precedent where a government under our parliamentary system had suffered such a crushing defeat on a matter of such fundamental importance to government policy as this government suffered on Monday night yet continued to try to do business with the House of Commons.

The second conclusion I came to, and I say this with some regret, is that the right hon. gentleman seems to be taking quite a different line outside the house than he appears to have been prepared to take within the house in the past few days. We agree, of course, that the government could choose to consider even a minor defeat to be decisive. That is not the question. The question is, can the government choose to ignore a major defeat on a major matter of policy? We say that according to constitutional practice this government has no right to place business before us or to place this motion before the house. We have not waived this stand in any respect—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: That is still our view, and we are still confident we are right. We are prepared to let the only forum in which this matter can be judged eventually, namely the electorate, the people, settle the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Two days ago, Mr. Speaker, you said you were not in a position to settle questions of constitutional law; that you had no authority to do so. What does the right hon. gentleman challenge me to do? Obstruct the business of the house to prevent this motion coming before hon. members? We are content, as I say, to leave it to the judgment of the electorate.

The government was twice defeated on Monday night. It was defeated first on a matter involving the very essence of its financial program. Everybody in the house with the exception of some hon. members opposite voted against the measure. Mr. Speaker, if any member of that front bench, including the Prime Minister, had been asked before that vote was taken whether or not it was a vote of confidence, every one of those hon. gentlemen would have said without any hesitation: "Certainly it is".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Not only did they believe this before the vote was taken, but you could see in their faces after the vote had been taken that they knew it was a vote of confidence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: Including the Clerk of the House.

Mr. Stanfield: I see in his place the government house leader who, more than anyone else, is responsible on the other side for this particular act of bungling.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps the hon. gentlemen will listen to what I have to say. All this week the Prime Minister has tried to give the people of Canada the impression that it was a snap vote, that it came without warning and that sort of thing. Mr. Speaker, these proposals were opposed during the budget debate which took place before the end of the year. The measure was opposed in committee by the opposition parties. Indeed, the only real filibuster I have seen conducted since I have been here was conducted by ministers of the crown last Monday when this bill was in committee, to try to keep the discussion going until the whip could inform them that there were enough of their supporters present to carry the thing.

Furthermore, why was this bill dealt with on Monday at all? It was dealt with on Monday because the acting leader of the house told our house leader and myself last week that before we could get on with supplementary estimates we had to dispose of this income tax bill.

Mr. Starr: What happens to the supplementary estimates now?

Mr. Stanfield: We were told it had to be dealt with before we could move on to supplementary estimates and that we could proceed with supplementary estimates after the bill had been disposed of. The bill came up on Thursday but it was not completed because—and I say this without offence; I am very sincere about this—it was not completed because the Minister of Finance had to visit a very fine part of Canada in connection with other affairs which have nothing to do with this house. I am not making anything of this; he had every right to do that, but because of this the house went on to other business on Friday. Why did we go back to the tax bill on Monday? It was because the government intended that the bill be dealt with on Monday and disposed of before we could move on to anything else.

This is the situation in which the Prime Minister talks about a snap vote, trickery and so on. The measure came before the house because the government intended that it should, and every member on the other side knew it was to be dealt with before we proceeded to consider supplementary estimates.

Thus the carrying of this measure was regarded as a matter of the greatest importance to the government. It was an urgent matter which had to be dealt with before we could get on with other business. It was not a minor measure. It was the principal fiscal measure in the government's budget presented to the house last December, involving the raising of individual and corporate income taxes. It was the central part of the government's fiscal and economic program, a program of management or mismanagement, whatever your point of view happens to be, intended to raise more money from the Canadian taxpayers and to slow down the economy, to fight inflation by creating more slack in the economy and by creating more unemployment.

This was the measure before the house. I am directing my remarks at the moment, Mr. Speaker, in such a way as to indicate the importance of this bill to the government. Far from being a minor measure it was treated by hon. gentlemen opposite as a measure of the greatest importance. I might say it was so treated by the opposition parties, certainly by this opposition party.

• (11:50 a.m.)

Our principal criticism of this government has been in respect of its economic mismanagement, its fiscal mismanagement, the degree to which it has permitted our competitive position to be eroded in terms of export, the slow rate of economic growth in recent times and, particularly, the growing rate of unemployment. We have been insisting that because of this mismanagement this government has lost the confidence of the country, and that the lack of confidence has been a matter of the greatest importance in respect of the growing difficulties of the country. Indeed, it is a very central factor in the growing economic difficulties of the country. We have emphasized this point for some time, and we had an opportunity to express our point of view in a very tangible way on Monday evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, for several months we have taken the position that these taxes which the government has been trying to impose on the people are a very high price for the Canadian people to pay for the general lack of confidence in this government. We have taken the position that this bill would not cope with inflation; that it would add to the amount of unemployment; that it would bring on a further slowdown in our rate of growth and would therefore bring about further unemployment. Since the debate in December events certainly have confirmed my view and the view I then expressed.

I say this now only to indicate that the wrongness of the bill that was before us last December has become more and more obvious to the members of the opposition parties. So this bill was regarded by the government as a very important and basic part of its program, and was regarded by the official opposition as an essential part of the government's mistaken fiscal and economic mismanagement.

For the government to try to put any business before this house, as it tried to do on Monday evening following two votes, is to make a mockery of voting in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The government has chosen to try to ignore that vote. It is now asking this house to ignore that vote. It is making a mockery of the House of Commons. These are matters which relate to our constitution. They reach to the very heart and essence of our constitutional democracy. They relate to the very essence of responsible government or government responsible to parliament.

On Monday evening last the members of this house spoke on a very important matter. The government was defeated on a question which undoubtedly was one involving confidence in the government. The constitution and constitutional practice cannot be flouted. The defeat of the government on a measure of such importance must, under our constitution, be accepted by the government as an indication of a loss of the confidence of this house. This is part of our constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It is part of our constitution, and the constitution cannot be flouted. I say again that neither the Prime Minister nor anybody else has cited any precedent in which a defeat on a matter of such fundamental importance has been ignored by the government and not treated as defeat on a matter of confidence. The government was defeated on Monday night by the unanimous opposition of the house; that is, by every member of the opposition voting against this measure. It was defeated because of that; and also, I guess, because of a certain amount of bungling on the other side of the house.

I say in all sincerity that we are accustomed to the bungling on the part of this government. I suggest, however, that some of the remarks which have been made by the Prime Minister are a matter of another sort. I do not enjoy attacking or criticizing any man, especially one who has enjoyed a long and distinguished public career; but I cannot explain simply in terms of strain some of the things my right hon. friend said outside the house. He has spent his time charging the opposition with everything he could think of. He has portrayed the opposition, especially the Conservative opposition, as being irresponsible in pursuing a course which he suggests would endanger the future of the country, and for taking advantage of a leadership situation in the Liberal party. My right hon.

friend seems to have been saying things wildly. I can only assume, therefore, that he said these things because he really did not think there was very much he could say about the merits of the constitutional matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister chooses to argue that the government has the right to interpret a vote of confidence. I say he is in error, but I do not dispute his right to make this argument. If he chooses to argue that I am wrong concerning the significance I attach to the Monday defeat of the government, then I say I disagree with him; but I do not dispute his right to differ from me in public, or in private so far as that is concerned.

What are we to think when the Prime Minister of this country tries to tell the Canadian people that the opposition is irresponsible because it takes a straightforward and sincere stand on the constitution, a stand which is sincerely taken and clearly based on the best expert opinion concerning what is the right constitutional practice? The Prime Minister attempted to persuade the Canadian people that we are obstructing business. I wish to say that since I have been Leader of the Opposition I have afforded every reasonable accommodation to the government in respect of the conduct of the business of this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the process of accommodation has been all one way. I believe the Prime Minister will know what I mean when I say that. Let me give an example. I do not do this because I make anything of this personally, but upon his return to the country on Tuesday I reached an understanding with the Prime Minister that it was reasonable that the house should adjourn for 24 hours in order to give him an opportunity to review what had happened and consider the situation so far as the government was concerned. Then on the motion to adjourn the house I asked for permission to make a very brief statement. In order to make that statement it was necessary that I have the consent of my hon. friends opposite. That consent was refused.

An hon. Member: By the Prime Minister.

Another hon. Member: The Prime Minister was the first to say no.

Mr. Stanfield: It is strange that the government should take the attitude that it is perfectly all right to refuse this accommodation to me, and then the next day come before this House of Commons to seek unanimous consent to waive notice regarding a very important matter. I can only believe, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friends opposite have a very strange view as to how matters should be accommodated in this house.

• (12 noon)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I hasten to add that this was not the reason we refused permission to proceed on Wednesday, and I hope I never allow any attitude of this sort to influence any attitude I may have toward a matter that is brought before this house. We refused that permission because we took our stand on the constitution. But I do say that I find it extraordinary that in view of the accommodating attitude we have had toward the government and the conduct of business, the Prime Minister at the first opportunity should charge me in public with a desire, or a willingness at least, to obstruct the public business of this country.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Starr: He will stoop to anything.

Mr. Stanfield: And if it becomes necessary to conduct business as between the parties at arm's length I hasten to assure the house that the fault is not mine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has also tried to suggest to the Canadian public that we have to accept the consequences of what we are doing and that we may bring about economic calamity in the country. I am very well aware, as are most Canadians, of the precarious condition of the country, very well aware of the precarious condition to which this government has brought this country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: —a condition to which the government has brought this country through bungling, through politicking, through irresponsibility. Some might go so far as to say through stupidity—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: —and a stupidity which has brought the government to the verge of catastrophe. I am very well aware of this, and I have every intention to behave responsibly, as do my colleagues. But what are we to think of a government that says it is irresponsible of the opposition to take a stand on the constitution because the government through its own unimaginable incompetence has so undermined the economy that everybody must keep perfectly quiet and not rock the boat, everybody must stay quiet and not disturb this hopelessly incompetent government because if they did it might mean catastrophe?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister has said, as I understood him, that there are few things this country needs less than a general election. I am not insisting on a general election, Mr. Speaker. I have never since this difficulty developed insisted on a general election. I have made it very clear to the right hon. gentleman, through media which I am sure he reads, what my position is and what his alternatives are. I have also said that if the Governor General were to invite me to form a government it would be my duty, which I would carry out, to try to examine the possibilities. I say that I am not grasping for power, although the government is clearly insisting on holding on to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to be the Prime Minister of this country unless I have the approval of the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: But I am sure that most people in this country feel very much like Cromwell did on a certain occasion when I believe he said: "In the name of God, go".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton: That chicken came home.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister says there are fewer things this country needs than a general election. Of course this did not deter him in 1965—

Some hon. Members: Oh no.

Mr. Stanfield: —only two years after the previous general election. My hon. friends opposite seem to have a double standard. We are not insisting that the country should have a general election right away but I do say that in fact a general election before too long may be the only way of achieving stability. It may be the only way the people have to get rid of this government. If the Prime Minister says there are few things this country needs less than a general election, I say there are few things this country needs less than this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend has suggested outside this house to the Canadian public that there was something underhanded, that there was some trickery involved in what happened on Monday night. I notice he takes a different line here in the house where people can answer him. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that we have offered every reasonable accommodation to the government and to the ministers of the government who are candidates for the Liberal leadership, as they should be and as I agree we should. The order of business of the house has frequently been changed in order to meet the convenience of ministers of the government who are candidates for the Liberal leadership and who need to be absent from the house on that account. I mentioned one example in connection with the finance bill. In fact we have frequently done so. We have been prepared to go along with this although it has made the conduct of the business a little haphazard and disorderly. We have absolutely no wish to interfere with the leadership convention of my hon. friends opposite and will certainly go a long way to accommodate them and make certain they can pursue their leadership convention in peace and tranquility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: But I do say that no matter how willing we may be to accommodate our hon. friends opposite in this regard we are certainly under no obligation to vote for every measure this government may put before the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: We do not have to pass every bill. We have an obligation to the public to scrutinize every measure carefully. As I say, we voted against this bill on second reading, in committee and, of course, as everybody knows, on third reading. Yet the Prime Minister has given the Canadian people the impression that somehow or other we have taken advantage of the fact that there is to be a leadership convention, that somehow or other we have not afforded the Liberals the same kind of accommodation that they afforded us. I say in all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, that it was the Prime Minister who decided, it was his decision, when he was going to resign. It was the government's decision as to when the house was going to sit and what business would be put before it, and it is our duty to deal as sincerely and as honestly as we can with the business that comes before the house. Yet when a government measure of this sort is defeated the Prime Minister suggests there is something underhanded and that somehow we have taken advantage of the Liberal party.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stanfield: I am going to get off this subject, Mr. Speaker, because I do not enjoy it particularly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: But I must say I was a little upset when the Prime Minister attempted to give the impression in the house yesterday that he had not said there was trickery involved in the proceedings on Monday night, when he tried to give the impression that he had only quoted somebody else who had suggested that there might be trickery involved. I must say I was a little upset that the Prime Minister of this country would tend to slough off such a matter in this way.

Why has the Prime Minister flung charges so wildly since the defeat on Monday night? Why has he attacked the opposition in such a way—I do not know whether "vicious" is too strong a word; certainly he is not a vicious man.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: I think he must be seriously disturbed by the serious condition into which his government has brought the country, and no doubt he was humiliated by the defeat suffered by the government on Monday night. I think that above all he has been very much aware of the weakness of his case and because of this has tried to distract the Canadian people. To my mind it is a little pathetic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and enlarge to the house on why we believe this government does not deserve a vote of confidence quite apart from the issue on Monday night. There is a question of economic mismanagement, the slow rate of economic growth, the attempt to increase taxes, the increasing rate of unemployment and the mounting degree of inflation. Quite apart from anything else, if there was ever a government that deserved a vote of non-confidence surely it is this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Although the tax measure was defeated, the indications to the Canadian people are that the government is going to continue to collect the tax. It has no legislative authority to do this. It did not have any in the first place. If it was entitled to assume that the bill would pass and collected the tax, certainly the government has no justification at all for its high-handed decision to continue to collect this surcharge, these additional taxes, without any authority at all from the parliament of Canada. There is no need for me to use the usual words in connection with this kind of conduct. It speaks for itself.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that the introduction of this motion of confidence is contrary to our constitution and a violation of constitutional practice. I say to my hon. friend the Prime Minister that this is the sort of thing that tends to destroy parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It is an unfortunate precedent and if it passes it will suggest to governments in the future that they can ignore votes in the house on matters of fundamental importance. It would be a most unfortunate precedent if this should take place. If by any chance it does take place I am sure the Canadian people will correct it at the first opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I also suggest in all sincerity that the motion has been put in as inflammatory a way as it could be. It is not a simple confidence motion, which the Prime Minister first indicated he was going to put before the house. We say, of course, that he had no right to put forward a simple motion of confidence.

Mr. Woolliams: Pickersgillian.

Mr. Stanfield: I really believe that this motion was not drafted in anger. I assume that my hon. friends think through what they are going to do, and I can only assume that the motion is designed to provoke some sort of reaction by the opposition. We respect parliament, Mr. Speaker, even if the government does not seem to do so. We will say what we think is necessary in this debate. We will take the time that we believe to be necessary—we will not apologize for that—but we will take no more.

My hon. friends opposite are asking the house to swallow itself, to declare that what was clearly a vote of confidence was not a vote of confidence. I do not know what the house will say on a vote, but I say that whatever the house may say the vote on Monday night was a vote of confidence on a fundamental matter and that every hon. member opposite knew it was a vote of confidence on a fundamental matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: They still know it.

Mr. Stanfield: Whatever the outcome may be on this vote when it comes, it will not change the constitution of this country and it will not be allowed to change constitutional practice. Whatever happens, the government was defeated; the government is finished. The government is trying to hang on to power. As I say, Mr. Speaker, the electorate will be the final judge. The electorate sooner or later, and I am a very patient man—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: —will have an opportunity to express its views. I do not think there is any doubt as to the verdict it will pass on this government, particularly on the behaviour of the government this week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in introducing this motion of confidence the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has done what every good debater does, namely, when one has a weak case one tries to switch the grounds of the argument. The Prime Minister has spent all his time this morning arguing the government's right to introduce a motion of confidence and he spent no time at all giving the house reasons why it should vote confidence in the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: As I said in the house on Wednesday afternoon, we in this party have never denied the government's legal and constitutional right to ask for a vote of confidence. The Prime Minister took a lot of time quoting my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and myself with respect to the things we said in 1966. We stand by what we said. We suggested then that, particularly when there is a minority government, members should have complete freedom as to how they vote. They should have a right to vote on amendments to the budget and in the speech from the throne debate so as to get an expression of opinion without necessarily voting no confidence in the government.

We made it clear that at any time the government could say that a particular measure was a vote of no confidence, and the government's right now or at any time, to ask for a vote of confidence is beyond dispute. We do challenge their moral right to ask for a vote of confidence because, as I pointed out, the vote last Monday night was not an expression of opinion but a vote on a specific piece of legislation having to do with the fundamental right to impose taxes, which is the very basis of democratic government.

Did any member on the government side think that the vote on Monday night was not a vote of confidence? Did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), who was piloting Bill No. C-193, get up at any time and say that the government would not consider the defeat of the bill as being a vote of no confidence? Did the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters), who was Acting Prime Minister, get up and say on behalf of the government that they did not consider the vote one of confidence or no confidence? Did the constitutional expert, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau), rise in his place to give us the benefit of his vast knowledge? The minister has just gone to enlarge that knowledge. Did he get up and assure the house that even if we defeated Bill No. C-193 we were not voting no confidence in the government? Of course these ministers did not. The government knew that it was a vote of confidence and that defeat of the measure would be a vote of no confidence. Therefore we contend that while they have the constitutional and legal right to come before the house and ask for a vote of confidence, they certainly have no moral right to do so. The house expressed its lack of confidence in the government last Monday night.

The Prime Minister has made much of the fact that if the opposition parties had agreed to proceed with this confidence motion on Wednesday we could have saved a great deal of time. In the first place I would point out that if the Prime Minister was so anxious to save time we could have proceeded with this motion on Tuesday. It is true that he only got back from Jamaica an hour or two before the house opened, but surely there are some people on the treasury benches capable of drafting a confidence motion. After their display of incompetence on Monday night probably the Prime Minister did not trust them to draft a motion. In that I heartily concur.

The Prime Minister, I think properly, did not consult me about the matter, but I think he had a right to have 24 hours in which to think the matter over. But if he was entitled to 24 hours to think the matter over, surely the opposition parties were entitled to some time to study a motion which, if hon. members will take the time to look at it, is not a straight confidence motion but a very tricky motion. Now that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) has elevated the word "trickery" to the status of a parliamentary term which is not slanderous, I want to say that this motion is a piece of trickery.

I can tell the house that the members of the New Democratic party agreed in caucus last Wednesday that if the Prime Minister introduced on Wednesday afternoon a straight vote of confidence we would be prepared to waive the 48 hours notice and proceed with the debate. But instead we got a motion which asked us to repudiate the decision we made on Monday night. It asked us to lie in our teeth and say that when we voted no confidence in the government we did not mean we were voting no confidence. It asked us to say we did not know what we were doing. It was the government that did not know what they were doing.

However, we sense a much more sinister implication in this motion. I have good reason to believe that originally the government intended to bring in a double-barrelled motion which would not only ask for confidence but would put Bill No. C-193 back on the order paper. I am convinced still that the motion now before us was intended to be the first step to bring that about and that if the government had not been caught out on it the motion now before the house, if it had been passed on Wednesday, would have been followed by a motion to put the tax bill back on the order paper, which is contrary to our practice and our rules. The government would be fooling no one if they said now, we will not reintroduce the bill, because they have been caught with their hands in the cookie jar. They were hoping that on Wednesday they would slip this motion through and then today they would introduce another motion to put Bill No. C-193 back on the order paper.

Mr. Woolliams: They might try it yet.

An hon. Member: Their hand is in the till.

Mr. Douglas: Their tail is in the gate. You can describe it any way you like. The fact is that they are in a bad situation.

Not only do we have this very tricky motion before us—it is because this motion was tricky that we insisted on sufficient time to study it and we make no apology for that —but it is important now that we deal with this motion of confidence quickly and expeditiously. So far as the members of this party are concerned we can see no reason for a protracted debate. We are prepared to debate it and to take a vote on it today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: If the government is sustained in the motion of confidence we can get on with the business of the country. If the government is defeated we should go to the electorate as quickly as possible. But we see no reason for a protracted debate. We make no apology for asking for time to look into what is not a simple motion of confidence but a very sly attempt to circumvent the expressed wish of parliament by putting back on the order paper a piece of legislation which the members of this house have defeated.

In addition to what has been happening inside the house, a great deal has been happening outside. As a matter of fact, the government has been carrying on most of the debate on television because I have come to the conclusion that the government is under the impression that it governs by divine rule and the news service of the C.B.C. There are times when it is very difficult to distinguish between the two. The Prime Minister goes on television and says that there is an organized plot, a manufactured crisis, that there is trickery in this situation.

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: Shameful.

Mr. Douglas: He comes before the house today, however, and assures us that there was no collusion. The difference is that today he is going to have some speakers following him. I invite the Prime Minister or anyone on that side of the house to indicate that there was trickery or any manufactured crisis or any organized plot on this side of the house with reference to the vote last Monday night. What the government has tried to do has been to cry foul to cover up its own ineptitude and incompetence. The government has botched the handling of this bill from the very beginning, and they know it. Now the Prime Minister has to find somebody to blame so he has been trying for the past three or four days to blame the opposition. He knows better than anyone else that the responsibility lies with his own ministers. I hope the Prime Minister has learned that never again can he afford to leave the awkward squad in charge when he goes on a holiday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: So far as the members of this party are concerned we have made it clear from the time the Minister of Finance introduced his mini-budget that we were opposed to this measure. We opposed it in the mini-budget debate. We opposed it at every stage of the discussion of the bill. We contested it in committee last Thursday and again on Monday. The government had adequate warning that there was going to be opposition. The government narrowly averted disaster in a vote in committee by three votes. In spite of that it was the government that went ahead with third reading. It was the government who, instead of prolonging the debate on third reading, allowed it to go to a vote. These are the people who must accept the responsibility if they were caught with their trousers in a nether position. These are the people who botched and bungled the situation.

If the Prime Minister, on returning to Canada, had castigated his ministers, that would have made sense. Instead the Prime Minister endeavours to cook up the concept in Canada that there has been some deep, sinister plot on the part of the opposition groups to take advantage of this poor, defenceless, inept government. The fact is, as everyone knows, that this government has been disintegrating for weeks. The Prime Minister is the one who made the decision to try to carry on a leadership contest and parliament at one and the same time. I think this was a mistake, but it was the Prime Minister's decision. For weeks we have seen members of the cabinet absent a good part of the time. Cabinet ministers who have been here have had to say to most questions, "I will take it as notice", not being completely in touch with their departments. We have seen the economic situation in this country deteriorating steadily. The government has been so preoccupied with the leadership convention that nobody has been minding the store. This has been the situation. If the Prime Minister wants to lay the blame for the embarrassing situation in which he now finds himself, let him put the blame where it belongs and not manufacture some sinister plot which does not exist.

The members of the house who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, as members of Her Majesty's opposition have a right to oppose measures which they believe are not in the best interests of this country. They have a right to vote against those measures, indeed, they have the duty to vote against those measures, without having to wait and count how many government members there happen to be on the other side. It is not our responsibility to see that the government has been able to muster enough forces from the politicking for the leadership convention to make sure the government can survive. This is not our responsibility. Our responsibility is to vote as our conscience dictates irrespective of whether the government has enough troops here to sustain its own measure.

I should like to discuss, Mr. Speaker, not the relevance of the motion but the motion itself. The Prime Minister really gave no reasons at all to the house why we should vote confidence in his government. He has entirely avoided the fact that the measure about which we are talking is a measure which, in the opinion of this party, was designed to further the inequitable burden of taxation placed upon the middle and lower income groups in this country. This is the real issue. It is the measure itself that the government is asking us to support and to repudiate our vote against it last Monday night.

Let me briefly remind hon. members of what has happened with respect to the government's fiscal policy. In 1966 the Minister of Finance reimposed the personal income tax which the government had taken off just before the 1965 election. At the same time he imposed a refundable tax on corporations which was to be paid back, plus 5 per cent interest. Then in 1967 the Minister of Finance decided that he had put the brakes on too much and he had to put his foot on the accelerator. The difficulty with the Minister of Finance is that for the last three years he has had his foot on the brake at one moment, his foot on the accelerator the next moment, and now he has ended up with his foot in his mouth.

In 1967 he decided he had to put his foot on the accelerator, so what did he do? Did he cancel the tax on personal income? No, he rescinded the refundable tax on corporations.

Then last fall he brought in a mini-budget. Now the foot had to go on the brake again. Did he put the tax back on corporations? No, he put a second tax on the personal income taxpayers, with a ceiling on it, and the proceeds of that tax will go in large measure to pay back the corporations their refundable tax plus the 5 per cent interest.

In the fiscal year 1968-69 this 5 per cent surtax on personal income will yield a revenue of some $185 million, according to the minister's estimate. However, he is going to pay out $230 million in refunds to corporations, plus $14 million in interest, a total of $244 million. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the salary and wage earners of this country, at a time when the cost of living is going up and their purchasing power is being curtailed, will be taxed so that the Minister of Finance can turn around and pay out some $244 million over a period of time to the corporations of this country.

• (12:40 p.m.)

There is an old saying about robbing Peter to pay Paul. The Minister of Finance is robbing Lazarus to pay Dives. He is robbing the poor to pay the rich. This is the measure that the Minister of Finance is now asking us to approve. This is the measure that the Prime Minister is now saying we should in all humility say we are sorry for voting against last Monday night, that we do not want the government to consider that as a vote of no confidence.

I say to the government that this is an unjust tax, that it further accelerates the inequity in our tax structure, that we were opposed to the measure last Monday night and that we are still opposed to it, and that if the government tries to reimpose it we will fight tooth and nail against it. I say to the government that if they try to reimpose that tax or any similar tax which will further widen the gap between the wage and salary earners of Canada on the one hand and the corporations on the other we will fight it and, if possible, force the government to do what they ought to be doing now, take this issue to the voters of the country.

The Prime Minister said on television the other night—this was not in the house, Mr. Speaker, because that is not where debates are carried on any more—that the government must have the money to carry on the business of the country. If the government needs this $185 million badly, then instead of taking $185 million by means of the 5 per cent surtax out of the pockets of the people with modest incomes the government has the power to postpone the refunding of the tax to the corporations. That is quite within its power. If the government needs money, surely the place to get it is from those who have it rather than from those who do not have it.

Not only has the government been trying during the last few days to divert public attention away from this tax by talking about a sinister plot but the Minister of Finance is now trying to arouse public fears by saying that the dollar is on trial. I copied down what the minister said on television last night and I think I have it accurately. He said that the opposition has deliberately created a crisis and the money markets are waiting to see what will happen. I suggest it is not the dollar that is on trial, Mr. Speaker; it is the Minister of Finance who is on trial. It is this government that is on trial, and it has been tried and found wanting. Why is the dollar in a difficult position? Why are investors and the money markets apprehensive? It is because this government for months on end has failed to grapple with the problem of inflation and has failed to bring forward any realistic solution to the present financial crisis in this country. Here is a government that sits in office while unemployment in the month of January went up over 6 per cent.

According to the Economic Council of Canada, a reduction of one percentage point in unemployment would increase our total wealth production by $2 billion a year. A reduction in unemployment to the figure that the Economic Council of Canada said should be a normal figure would increase the gross national product of Canada by billions of dollars. It would result in hundreds of millions of dollars of extra revenue coming into the treasury of Canada without any change being made in the present tax structure. If the country is in bad shape I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he look at the unemployment figures which are the highest we have had since 1964.

I also ask him to look at the high interest rates, for which he must accept responsibility. The government removed the interest rate ceiling from the Bank Act last year. We were assured that competition would have the effect of keeping down interest rates. The prime interest rate of the banks has now been raised to 7 per cent, which I believe is the highest rate since the early twenties.

If the minister is worried about the money situation, let him look at the slowdown in the rate of economic growth in this country. In constant dollars the per capita increase in the gross national product in Canada in 1967 compared with 1966 was almost nil. There was virtually no growth at all on a per capita basis.

If the minister wants to know why investment circles are apprehensive he has only to look at the cost of living, which has been spiralling. The cost of living increased 4.5 per cent during the last year. In the last four years the cost of living has gone up 14 per cent. What does this mean, Mr. Speaker? It means that a man with a salary of $5,000 a year has had his purchasing power reduced by $700. The reason we are in the present situation is that we are suffering from a cost-push inflation. Both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who have talked a great deal about restraints, have done absolutely nothing about some of the unwarranted and unjustified increases in the cost of living.

If the minister wants to know why the Canadian dollar may be in trouble, he should look at the fact that ever since he has taken office he has endeavoured to maintain a fixed exchange rate on the one hand and to keep a ceiling on Canada's foreign reserves on the other—a complete contradiction in policy.

The minister might also take a look at the Canadian capital that has been going across the border to the United States largely as the result of the appeal by the President of the United States to U.S. subsidiaries in Canada to return their profits to the United States. I admit that this is a serious situation, Mr. Speaker, but what did the Minister of Finance do about it? One would have expected the Minister of Finance to call in representatives of these foreign subsidiaries and to say to them: Gentlemen, you are operating under Canadian law, with all the benefits of living in a Canadian society; you are operating with Canadian labour and Canadian raw materials; we expect you to conduct your investment policies and financial procedures with the best interests of Canada in mind, not the financial concerns of any other countries. The minister should have told them he would like them to do this on a voluntary basis but that if necessary he would be prepared to introduce legislation in parliament to ensure that they conduct themselves as good corporate citizens of Canada.

[Mr. Douglas.]

• (12:50 p.m.)

Did the minister say this to the corporations, Mr. Speaker? No. While millions of dollars were flowing from Canada into the United States the Minister of Finance got on the telephone to the secretary of the treasury in Washington and said: "Will you please tell these companies doing business in Canada to behave like Canadians rather than Americans?" This is the kind of leadership we have had. This is why the Minister of Finance is now worried about the position of the dollar. If the dollar is in trouble, this government must accept the responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: We in this party do not want to see a financial crisis but I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, that a financial crisis is much less likely to come from an election than from continuing with a government that is floundering around in a morass of its own ineptitude. This government is like a ship without a compass, without a chart and without a rudder. And last Monday night it was without a skipper. As a matter of fact, while the skipper was off the bridge the crew was shooting craps over who was going to wear the captain's hat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The Prime Minister worries about having an election. He was not concerned about calling an election in the fall of 1965, even though only a few months earlier he had told parliament that we would be reassembling after the parliamentary recess. That did not bother him at all then.

The financial soundness of this country will not be as adversely affected by an election as it will be by the continued incompetence and ineptitude of the government. This government has no unity of purpose and no unanimity of opinion. Almost every major issue that has come before them has been set aside because they cannot agree among themselves about what they should do.

Last year the Carter report was presented and the Minister of Finance promised us that we should have a white paper by the fall. Then we were to get it by January 1. Now the Prime Minister has announced that the Carter report is to be put on ice until after the leadership convention—

An hon. Member: It is too hot.

Mr. Douglas: —because he does not want leadership candidates taking opposite positions on the Carter report. Everybody knows that the cabinet is split down the middle on the Carter report.

The other day the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) brought down the Watkins report on foreign control of the Canadian economy. The speech from the throne said that the government would bring in a white paper about what the government proposes to do about foreign control of our economy. Did the President of the Privy Council bring down that white paper? No. On the contrary, he had to announce that the government accepted no responsibility for the recommendations of the Watkins commission.

For five years this government has been promising us that we would have a Canada development corporation. At the beginning of this session, on May 8 last, the speech from the throne indicated that a Canada development corporation was to be set up. But has it been? The legislation is not even on the order paper. And why is that, Mr. Speaker? This government is divided about whether we should have a Canada development corporation and what kind of corporation it should be.

This government is like a blind Samson with its hands tied. It cannot agree on what it should do. One part of the government wants to go one way and one part of the government wants to go the other, and in this process of indecision they have brought the country to its present state. How, therefore, can the government now ask us to vote confidence in it, to vote confidence in fiscal, monetary and economic policies that have brought this country to its worst state in several years? The government's stock has not been lower since it took office nearly five years ago. Unemployment is higher, interest rates are higher, the cost of living is higher, and the dollar is much more vulnerable and much weaker.

In this state of affairs I say to the government: You have no right in all conscience to ask us to vote confidence in you and to ask us to repudiate our vote of last Monday night. Our vote last Monday night indicated that we would not and will not support any taxation measure which will further aggravate the present inequities in our taxation structure. One can only say to the government these words, and I paraphrase what Cromwell said 300 years ago to the Long Parliament: "You have sat here too long for any good that you have done. For God's sake, go."

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, must we adjourn at one o'clock? If so, I move the adjournment.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. MacEachen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might suggest to the house that we dispense with private members' hour today and also agree to sit from 8 to 10 p.m. with the normal dinner adjournment.

Mr. Starr: That is agreeable to us.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously the minister needs unanimous consent and there is no such consent.

Mr. Starr: We agree to the proposal made by the leader of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that the hon. member has agreed on behalf of his party but I definitely heard "nays". However, I will ask the question again. Is there unanimous agreement?

Mr. Douglas: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, you put both propositions together and maybe some of those who said "nay" did not mean they were opposed to both propositions. If Your Honour were to put them separately it would be possible to clear up this point.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that. At the moment, however, one proposition has been put to the house and there is no unanimous agreement. However, the minister could well put a separate proposition forward.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): How often is the house leader going to be told how to do things?

Mr. MacEachen: Every time it is necessary. I am glad to learn. Possibly we could agree to waive the private members' hour and continue this debate during that period.

Mr. Howard: I understand there was a disposition to proceed between 5 p.m. and 6 p.m. with a bill relating to the control of air pollution but possibly it would not be appropriate to do so today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Maybe we could get a decision now on the proposition to sit from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous agreement. This proposition is not accepted.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, before lunch we heard a very eloquent speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) who expressed his views about the motion he put to the house on Wednesday.

Later, the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Stanfield) gave his objections. Then the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas) talked about the present parliamentary situation.

Mr. Speaker, Jean-Paul Sartre said one day: "When the rich wage war, the poor are always the ones who die." I could say today that when politicians fight each other, the poor are again those who suffer, get poorer and look on, powerless, at a parliamentary spectacle which does not correspond at all to the aspirations of the Canadian people.

In fact, the situation where the parliament now finds itself is due directly to the government managing the national business. Nobody prevented government members from being in the house last Monday. Both the leader of the official opposition and the leader of the New Democratic party are right in blaming the government and even holding them responsible in the circumstances.

However, Mr. Speaker, the Ralliement Créditiste does not want to be any part of parliamentary games involving purely political interests.

It is nice to hear about the good intentions of the leader of the Conservative party when he says that the government has failed dismally in the administration of national business. I would have liked him to propose his solution to the present problem.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Last Monday, the government was defeated. It is a real and actual fact. It was defeated by a vote of 84 to 82 on third reading of Bill No. C-193 designed to amend the Income Tax Act or providing for an increase in the personal income tax. If the government had then introduced Bill No. C-193 with a view to reducing taxes instead of increasing them, it would not find itself in the present situation.

When the government introduced its resolution designed to increase taxes, we opposed it through all stages of procedure and discussion. Since the government, through its Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and all the ministers, has been telling us that Canada was in an alarming economic situation and that inflation was eroding our economy, we felt it was ill-timed to increase personal income tax. As a matter of fact, such an increase would contribute more or less to reduce the purchasing power of Canadian consumers in the face of the abundant riches existing in Canada. If the government had introduced a bill designed to distribute more evenly the actual wealth of Canada, it would not find itself in the present difficult situation of its own making.

Mr. Speaker, since last year, the ministers have been telling us over and over again that the country is in an awkward and dangerous financial situation which should cause us great concern. At the same time, the government has increased interest rates and yet, inflation is being feared. Nevertheless, this is inflation.

Loan companies have been allowed to do likewise. As a matter of fact, they have been allowed to increase their interest rate on housing loans, on pretext that there would be more money available for the construction of homes for the Canadian citizens. However, after the passage of all those measures by parliament, we are not only at the same point, but we are more bogged down than ever.

Some experts of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have established that if a Canadian wanted to build a small $15,000 house, he would have to pay $46,058 spread over a 35-year period. In view of this, how can one declare that such legislation is beneficial to the Canadian people?

While the Minister of Finance and this government allow those increases of interest rates and those tax increases, they are granting loans throughout the world on extremely easy terms.

I have in hand a document which was tabled in the Senate on January 31 last—not so long ago—following a question of Hon. Jean-François Pouliot who had asked what were the countries of the world which had benefited from Canadian loans and at what interest rate. Mr. Speaker, it is worthy of notice that, at the very moment the Canadian people are being burdened with new taxes, at the very moment when the government says that it is unable to restart the Canadian economy, we have been lending, under the Colombo plan, an amount of $3 million, at an interest of ¾ of 1 per cent, for a 50-year period, plus 10 years of grace, which means 60 years. The Canadian government is lending money at a ¾ of 1 per cent, when it is unable to find money at a lower rate than 5, 5½ and 6 per cent. When provincial governments are compelled to borrow at 7½ per cent, the Canadian government manages to lend money at ¾ of 1 per cent for periods up to 60 years.

To India we made a $70 million loan, of which more than $50 million were at zero per cent interest, not ¾ of one per cent interest, but zero per cent, under the pretext that we must give aid to underdeveloped countries. We do not have to go to India to see people in misery. You can see whole poverty-stricken families not only in the city of Montreal, but in every place in Canada where there are unemployed who must live on $36 a week. No need to go to India to see misery when we have plenty at home, but we do not have the courage and we are too heartless to settle those problems.

To Korea, we have made a 37-year loan of $1 million at 3 per cent interest for the development of the dairy industry.

To Pakistan, we have made a loan of $44,263,000 at zero per cent interest for a period of 50 years plus 10 years of grace, that is 60 years.

We lent Thailand $1 million at no interest for a period of 50 years.

We lent the Caribbean Islands $1.8 million at no interest for a period of 60 years.

We lent Jamaica $8.25 million at an average of ¾ of 1 per cent for the construction of rural schools, a bridge, a seaport, a radio system, to buy equipment, to undertake public works, to build small bridges and low-cost housing. Will we have to ask Canadians to go live in Jamaica in order to obtain loans at ¾ of 1 per cent interest?

These are government responsibilities and yet we are asked to raise the income tax.

In 1966, in the space of a single year, we lent Trinidad and Tobago $4.89 million at ¾ of 1 per cent interest.

To the easternmost West Indies, to help the development of the dairy industry, we loaned $250,000 without interest for 60 years.

In Latin America, to Argentina, we loaned $756,000 at ¾ of 1 per cent interest for 60 years.

We loaned Malaysia $1,720,000 at ¾ of 1 per cent for 37 years.

The Central American Bank for Economic Integration was loaned $3,780,000 at ¾ of 1 per cent interest for 60 years.

We loaned Chile $8,640,000, at ¾ of 1 per cent for 60 years for part of the loan, and 3 per cent interest for 37 years for the balance of the loan.

We loaned the Republic of El Salvador, for port facilities, the sum of $3,240,000 at ¾ of 1 per cent for 39 years.

We loaned Mexico $540,000 at ¾ of 1 per cent for 60 years.

To African members of the Commonwealth we loaned $3,500,000 at 6 per cent for 30 years, and $1,600,000 without interest for 60 years.

Those are the official figures of the Department of External Affairs on the loans approved by the Canadian government.

And here is the Canadian parliament discussing whether or not personal income tax should be increased. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said in the course of his explanations to the house this morning: "We will find another way of making up for the funds we are losing." We shall surely find another way to raise the money which we lost by the vote taken on Monday night.

• (2:50 p.m.)

The Prime Minister promises, however, that Bill No. C-193 has been definitely set aside, and that it will never come again before the house. However, plans are being made to move another bill in an effort to recuperate the sums of money which the department will lose an account of Monday's vote.

Last night I asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Chrétien): When shall we start paying back the Canadian people the amounts of money collected by the government since January 1 last?" It is not known. However, one thing remains: since the defeat of Bill No. C-193, all the amounts which were paid to the government have been collected illegally.

Motion Respecting House Vote

Mr. Speaker, should the Prime Minister tell us that he will present another measure in order to raise funds, I shall answer him that the Canadian people cannot afford to consider another way to be subject to taxation as advocated in the measure defeated last Monday night.

At this stage I say to the leader of the official opposition who contends strongly that the government exceeds its powers and does not respect tradition, that it was defeated and that Monday's vote is a non-confidence vote against the government, that the members of the Ralliement Créditiste who voted that evening against Bill No. C-193—as they had done on second reading and in committee—voted against the tax increase and not to show their lack of confidence in the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: Why, Mr. Speaker? I hear "Oh, oh" from the Conservative side. Precisely because we do not have any more confidence in the Conservative party than we have in the Liberal party. We would not want, at any price, to see the present Leader of the Opposition replace the Prime Minister, because he does not have a solution. It is all very well to tell the government: You are not doing your job, you are giving evidence of irresponsibility. It is all very well for the Conservative party to say that when it sits in the opposition, but I shall remind the Conservatives that when their party had 208 federal members in this house, it was at that time that Canada experienced its highest level of unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: When the leader of the official opposition says: the government asks us to ignore Monday's vote, it is not at all what I understand. The leader of the official opposition and myself probably did not attend the same school, but I do not understand the motion in that way at all. The motion does not say that we must repudiate the vote taken on Monday, and we agree that the government can introduce this motion. The other day, the leader of the New Democratic party stated that the government had the constitutional right to present its motion but that it did not have the moral right to do so.

Does that mean that the Canadian constitution is immoral? Does that mean, Mr. Speaker, that we must always follow traditions, even if they are not solidly established? Must we always follow the same beaten track as in the last 100 or 200 years? Are we not able in 1968 to take our responsibilities ourselves?

On the one hand, Mr. Speaker, the opposition admits that the government has a right to present its motion. On the other hand, and according to tradition, as soon as a government is defeated, it must go before the electorate.

Reference has been made to events dating back to 1869, 1872, 1876 and 1926, when a government was defeated on a vote and did not call a general election anyway.

If it is true, Mr. Speaker, that on those occasions, according to tradition, the government did not resign and that the Macdonald government, for one, was defeated eleven times and did not resign, then the present government could very well not have moved a motion such as we have before us.

The opposition says that Monday's vote was a non-confidence vote. That is the position of the official opposition and the New Democratic party. On the other hand, the government says this was not a non-confidence vote. In these circumstances, what should we do, what should we say?

The government, through the Prime Minister, says: "We are going to introduce a motion in the house in order to determine whether or not you have confidence in the government".

If the motion asked: Do you have confidence in the government, our group would vote directly and completely against the government. We do not have confidence in the government, and we want them to know it.

However, that is not the text of the motion. It says, and I quote:

> That this house does not regard its vote on February 19th . . . as a vote of non-confidence in the government.

It is a vote of non-confidence with regard to the income tax increase, and I have no sympathy for the government. But I want it to be clearly understood that I do not have any sympathy for the Conservatives either, nor for the New Democratic party.

I sympathize with the Canadian people who witness, at the present time, a political acrobatic game masterminded by the official opposition that refused on Wednesday afternoon to discuss that motion in which a vote could probably have been taken then. But no, the official opposition stood firm on the 48-hour notice, so that yesterday and the day before yesterday we could not do anything, and it is the taxpayers' money which the Conservatives say they want to save that we spend lightheartedly like that.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Who are those who are afraid of assuming their responsibilities? Let the leader of the official opposition answer that.

Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic party said at noon that the government was asking us to repudiate Monday's vote. I do not understand very well what the leader of the New Democratic party meant by that. There is nothing in the motion asking us to repudiate Monday's vote. On the contrary, the Prime Minister stated at noon that Monday's vote will not be put again, that Bill No. C-193 will not be re-introduced in the house. He merely asked that Monday night's vote be not regarded as a vote of non-confidence.

Mr. Speaker, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, we do not want to play into the hands of the older political parties, even if the press in general tries to have everyone be a party to the same game.

I was reading in Le Devoir this morning an article signed or written by Mr. Pierre-C. O'Neil, and I quote:

Mr. Réal Caouette in a rather ambiguous statement said that he did not consider as a vote of non-confidence—

—It seems to me that this is not ambiguous—

—the vote taken on Monday night and that consequently he reserved himself the right to vote for the government when its motion of confidence is put to the house within a few days. And while he was saying this, some members of his party were still giving to understand that they might be away on voting day.

We are eight in the house today, I believe, and we will be eight when the vote is taken.

As soon as this indecision among the members of Ralliement Créditiste was known, after its leader Mr. Réal Caouette reportedly had an interview with Mr. Jean Marchand the day before, the Conservative and N.D.P. members intimated that they would not drive the government against the wall.

This is the information given out to the public, which will come to the conclusion that the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste had a meeting with the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I had a meeting last night with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on the television program "Tirez au Clair", and that is the only place where we met or had any discussion at all.

Mr. Speaker, these are news which certain unscrupulous journalists give out to the public. I realize that I have never been a great favourite with the press, but I do not care about that. I do not ask for preferential treatment from the press. Since we managed to play them a trick in 1962, we will play them another trick at the next opportunity, perhaps within the next three weeks, perhaps in the next five or six months.

Mr. Speaker, such a piece of news broadcast through the province spreads confusion. Now, we are here today to clarify the situation.

At this stage, I will quote from the speech delivered on Wednesday, February 21, by the leader of the New Democratic party, as reported on page 6904 of Hansard:

In our system of parliamentary government the most important right is the right to impose taxes.

"To impose taxes". Then, the leader of the New Democratic party agrees with the leader of the Conservative party as well as with the leader of the government. Our most important right is the right to impose taxes.

Then, further on, and I quote:

This government has been denied that right by a majority of members voting on Bill No. C-193.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: And this morning, Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic party suggested the following: Instead of taxing the low wage-earners, let us tax the large undertakings, the large corporations, the contractors, such as those, for instance, who are prospecting for oil in the Canadian north and will spend $11 million without knowing whether or not they will find anything. Let us tax those people, let us tax the producers, the large producers and we shall see an immediate increase in prices, as happens generally. Then, it is the little man who will have to pay; instead of paying a 5 per cent tax, he may have to take a 10 per cent price increase. Will he be better off then?

The leader of the New Democratic party was during 17 years premier of his own province. When did he remove a single tax? Of course, he tried to tax large corporations; only he drove them out of his own province and they set up business elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the solution suggested or submitted by the New Democratic party is not very much different from the one suggested by the Conservatives or the Liberals. Only the solution advocated by the Créditistes differs from all others.

Instead of compelling the low wage-earner to dig deeper in his pockets, let the Minister of Finance go to the sources of money; not to circulating money, but to the source itself, namely the Bank of Canada, of which we should make full use in order to develop our natural resources. By so doing, we would respect the corporations and workers. But no, the Conservatives and the New Democratic party will not consider that solution. The Créditistes alone advocate it, and yet it is accessible to parliament and to the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, that is the heart of the matter we are now discussing and trying to clarify. Basically, is it not a monetary question? It is not merely a fiscal matter. If we go to the bottom of things, it is a monetary matter, which the fiscal question follows.

Now, that is precisely the question—I must wait for the interpretation, Mr. Speaker, because I am told that I am doing well at this point—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the fiscal question follows the monetary question and that is the one we should face. I feel that if we faced seriously the real problem that exists in Canada, it would be possible to find a solution instead of fooling around and saying: Is it a vote of confidence or non-confidence, etc, etc.?

At this stage, and because we are now facing a problem that concerns the constitution and our parliamentary traditions, I would suggest that the government should add the words "confidence" or "non-confidence" to the bills introduced in the house. If the government did that, we would not encounter the kind of difficult parliamentary situation we are dealing with now.

Mr. Speaker, I shall close my remarks by repeating the wish of the Ralliement des Créditistes. The Canadian people need their government. The Canadian people deserve a more responsible management of their national affairs than they get at the present time. Recently, a federal-provincial conference was held which dealt with bilingualism, the recognition of the French language in the other provinces, as we recognize the English language in the province of Quebec. All the premiers of the Canadian provinces deserve congratulations and the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada ought to be congratulated for having proposed and suggested that linguistic policy in the other provinces.

I shall point out that during my early visits in western Canada, in 1962, I said in Vancouver, in Victoria, in Alberta, in Saskatchewan: give our French minorities the same treatment that we give the English minorities in the province of Quebec, and then it will be easier to talk about national unity or national understanding.

• (3:10 p.m.)

During the last federal-provincial conference, that progressive idea was supported by all provincial premiers as well as by the Canadian Prime Minister.

Now, ladies and gentlemen—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, everybody will agree with me that there are charming ladies in the galleries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: We also realized during the federal-provincial conference that the question of prime importance was, all in all, the economic situation. The province of Quebec and all the other provinces are asking for increased powers. Mention has been made of a special status, a special treatment, etc. In that connection, the federal government has a great part to play, because it is also true that financial matters come under federal rather than provincial jurisdiction. On the other hand, the main problem of the provinces concerns precisely financial matters.

The premiers of Quebec and Ontario as well as those of the western and maritime provinces told us: We do not have the capital needed. Only the central government can do it because it is the only one which has the right and the power to legislate in that field. When the provinces secure financial powers, they will be able to administer their own business as they please, according to their aspirations and then all talk of a special status will die down. On the other hand, to reach that stage, we need the authority to administer ourselves.

Again that is a matter of finance. If the provinces could borrow at an interest rate of ¾ of 1 per cent today, as India does, if our municipalities could do the same thing, we would have fewer problems to face. All the problems of the municipalities, the provinces and the federal government are the same, that is to say financial problems.

Therefore, we must deal squarely with that problem. If taxes continue to be levied and increased as they are now, when the people lack purchasing power, the federal government will have to assume its responsibilities to the Canadian people, the provinces and the municipalities.

That is why I repeat that the last two or three days have been a complete waste for the Canadian parliament, while the people long for objective and constructive legislation, legislation which would give impetus to our economy.

It is not normal for a country such as ours to have 500,000 unemployed. It is not reasonable, it is even unthinkable, that there should be 75,000 to 80,000 unemployed in the city of Montreal alone. It is unthinkable to see people at grips with extreme poverty in a country of affluence when there is a great surplus of clothing, food and electric appliances. It is not normal to force part of our population to live in abject poverty.

Therefore, I ask the government to introduce legislation capable of alleviating poverty in Canada. It is a good thing to help under-developed countries; we have no objection to this. But let us start by helping those who need it here at home, let us start by putting our own house in order. Since Monday last, the Canadian parliament has been in a turmoil.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this motion will be put to a vote as soon as possible. Like our friends of the New Democratic party, we have no objection to the motion being put to a vote today so that we can get on with the ordinary business of the house on Monday. The money spent when the house engages in terrible discussions on matters that are devoid of interest for the people as a whole increase inflationary pressures which we should be fighting.

If we want our attitude to be meaningful, let us face up to our responsibilities as members of the Conservative party, the New Democratic party, the Liberal party; in short, as members of parliament, let us stop wasting the time of the house and let us proceed with legislation, and the implementation of policies which will help the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part briefly in the special debate this afternoon may I say I am fully aware of the fact that it may be difficult to present arguments which have not already been presented by the preceding speakers. However, I feel we would be remiss if we did not participate in this debate, outline our views on the motion before us and also indicate the position we intend to take on the vote. We in this party are prepared to vote today on this motion or at the earliest possible time because we believe that uncertainty and indecision are not only harmful to this institution but are also doing a disservice to the people right across the nation. Therefore it is not our intention to deal at any length with the motion or to outline our views with respect to the various details of the bill which provided the occasion for this debate.

I should like to refer to some of the statements that were made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), some of which were refuted the other day, and also to say a word or two about them this afternoon. Once again reference has been made to the dangers which face minority governments and to the fact that in such a situation we have to make allowances vis-à-vis our ordinary practices and the constitutional position. But once again let me say very clearly that we do not consider that the crisis precipitated by the vote on the tax measure was in any way related to the minority position of the Liberal government. I think it has been amply demonstrated and clearly set forth that although there were absentees from other parties only two-thirds of the members of the Liberal party were present in the house on that occasion. Had the Liberal members been present in force there would have been no doubt as to the outcome of that vote. Therefore I believe that the Prime Minister and his government will have to accept full responsibility for the defeat of the government on that issue and not lay it on the doorstep of the electors of this country because they did not elect a greater number of Liberal members.

The Prime Minister indicated that the vote we took the other evening should not be considered a vote of non-confidence. But I would like to say again that so far as our group was concerned, and I believe I can say so far as every member who was present in the house was concerned, it was a want of confidence motion and everyone who voted expected it would be looked upon in that way. The suggestion is that we were not voting non-confidence on that bill because of the situation which existed and the fact that it was not declared to be a want of confidence motion. I say again that we all expected it would be considered as such and therefore the motion before us today in effect is asking us to set aside our understanding of the situation at that time, to set aside what we believed to be the true situation with regard to the bill, to set aside the objective we had in mind when we voted on the bill, to do away with all of that and in the vote on the motion now before us to imply that we did not intend the previous vote to be one of want of confidence.

Unfortunately the impression has been left across the country that on every stage of the tax bill the house in its entirety voted in favour of the measure. Last night I had a telephone call from one of my constituents. This gentleman said, "Is it right that all of you people supported the government on all of these stages of the bill and then voted against it on third reading?" I said, "most definitely not." He said, "Well, that is the impression we have out here in this part of the country." Whether it was intentional or not, I believe the impression created was that members on the opposition side voted in support of that measure during its various stages. This was certainly not so. As has been pointed out by other speakers, the opposition was consistent throughout the various stages of the bill.

There has been considerable discussion about the constitutionality of that vote and whether the government has a right to bring in a want of confidence motion over and above that vote. This reminds us somewhat of events that took place several years ago. The present Prime Minister was leader of the opposition at that time and he did not even believe that a vote of non-confidence in the government was necessary. He said, "You ought to move over and let us form a government." I believe this position was a little more out of line than that taken by the opposition in the house today.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, reference has been made to the Prime Minister's allegation that there was a plot to defeat the government on the tax issue. I say categorically once again that there was no plot so far as we were concerned. There was no collusion. The Prime Minister said he was not implying that there was collusion. There was no collusion with any other party on that vote. We voted as we believed we should vote. Let me ask the Prime Minister this question. Even if the opposition had combined deliberately to defeat the government, what would have been wrong with a situation like that? I cannot see anything wrong with it. I recall that when the right hon. gentleman was leader of the official opposition the Liberals, in order to upset the government of that day, voted for an amendment submitted by the Social Credit party in which they stated they did not believe but they voted for it to get rid of the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Patterson: How can the right hon. gentleman now imply there is anything dastardly about the opposition getting together in order to defeat a government when it is felt that government has lost the confidence of this country?

There is another question which I think is fundamental. How would the government have regarded the vote on Bill No. C-193 had they been looking for an excuse to call an election? I do not believe there would have been any discussion about it. I do not believe there would have been any argument. I do not believe they would have thrown up any defence or tried to introduce another confidence motion. They would have gone happily on their way because they would have been anxious to have another election.

The Prime Minister said that the government had to decide whether or not it was in the national interest to have a general election. I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman considered it was in the national interest or in the interest of the Liberal party to have an election in the fall of 1965? I do not believe that entered into their consideration when they made a decision to call an election just two years after the country had experienced an election.

We all know that it is traditional for a government to resign when it loses a vote on an essential measure such as the one which was presented to us the other evening. The Prime Minister brought forward a lot of constitutional experts to give testimony on this matter. Once again I say that had it been the desire of the government to have an election he would not have dragged in all these constitutional experts to say that we ought to do this or we ought to do the other thing. They would have simply gone ahead and called an election, forcing the country into another period of adjustment during an election campaign merely for the advantage of the party in power.

It is easy to rationalize, Mr. Speaker, but it is difficult to reconcile the position the Liberal party took when they were in opposition and the position they are taking now they are in office. It has been stated today that the government fully intends to balance its budget. Well, that is a new one coming from this government. They have not bothered about the national debt for a long time and it has been increasing until we are now paying about $1,300 million just in interest. They have not been very much concerned about balancing the budget up until this time. They say they are going to balance the budget this year and they state categorically they are going to get this money. There is no question about it; they say they are going to get the money. I do not know whether they are going to bypass parliament or how they are going to do it. However, they say they are going to get the money.

I should like to know how they are going to get the money. Are they going to increase taxes or are they going to cut back their expenditures? I feel this is a fundamental issue. There has been a great deal of talk about cutting back expenditures but there has been more lip service to the idea than practical application of the policy. I believe we have a right to know just how the government is going to handle the situation. Is there going to be a further increase in taxes or a cut-back in expenditures? If there is an attempt to increase taxes further after the defeat of the tax bill the government will face the same opposition that it has faced on this particular issue.

So far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, we cannot vote confidence in the present administration. Looking back over the past months we find confused priorities. The government has forced the house to deal with measures and issues that were not fundamental to the economy of this nation. Those measures had nothing to do with the material well-being of this great nation of ours. The government always had some particular plan it was interested in bringing before us, thus taking up time which should have been spent on the discussion of the serious problem the Prime Minister now states is upon us. Because of the confused priority list which we have been forced to accept during the past months we cannot have confidence in this administration. Because of the contradictory policies that have been submitted we are unable to support the government.

Perhaps I could give one or two illustrations. I think of the housing program. The attitude of the government was that we ought to see to it that every Canadian can have his own home. They held out this ideal and then promptly introduced additional taxes on building materials. They promptly made possible a substantial rise in interest rates on mortgages through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They adopted policies that are making it impossible for Canadians to own their own homes.

The government was going to fight inflation. They said: We have to do this, that and the other to fight inflation. Then the government introduced a bill to increase taxes. We all know what effect increased taxes have on the cost of living. It is not the opposition that is fighting them; they are fighting against themselves. A house divided against itself cannot stand, we are told. I believe that even if we did not oppose the government they would collapse on their own because of their inability to face and to solve the major issues that confront us.

We in this group have constantly recommended monetary and fiscal policies that we believe are necessary to meet the needs of the present day. We have presented them in good conscience. We have presented them as our beliefs and in a way that would commend them to the consideraton of the government. It is acknowledged that the present policies are not solving the problems; yet the government will not accept or follow policies that might lead them out of the woods and once more into the light. Therefore I say that in face of the monetary and fiscal policies of this government we cannot vote confidence.

The entire program of the government over the past months is evidence that the government does not know what to do in face of the urgent problems confronting us. We are told today that we cannot have another election, that we cannot upset the government because the country is in a critical position and Canada faces serious economic problems. We are told that an election might upset the balance and tip us over the precipice. I believe it was said today that if the government stays in office it will push us over the precipice anyway. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this is any reason for voting confidence in the government. All I say is: What a confession to make to this house. The government, having been in office all these years, comes to this house and states that Canada is facing a very difficult situation, that we are facing a crisis and had better not try to change horses at this stage of the game.

The government has brought in this motion, Mr. Speaker. I know the Prime Minister is a great sportsman. He has proven that and we all appreciate that he is interested in these things. However, I do not think the Prime Minister would want to change the rules of the game halfway through the course of the game. He is now asking us in this crisis to change the rules of the game halfway through and allow him to bypass the traditional position of a government in the face of defeat. Many of us agree that some fundamental changes are desirable in our rules of procedure and other matters, but until the rules are changed I say, let us play the game according to the rules.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the members of this party have fulfilled their promise to endeavour to provide a measure of stability in a minority government situation. The government has failed to produce the goods so we cannot express our confidence in the government in this crucial vote.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McIntosh: Sorry about that, chief.

Mr. Sharp: May I say to the gentleman who made that opening remark that at any time the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) feels I am not discharging my responsibilities to the government or to this parliament I will gladly resign.

Some hon. Members: When?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Why wait till spring?

Mr. Sharp: I should add, of course, that I am not anxious to keep the job indefinitely.

This debate, Mr. Speaker, takes place at a critical time in the affairs of our country and in the interests of the nation I urge a speedy and favourable decision on the motion before the house. This is not the time for a prolonged debate that will paralyse this parliament as well as the public business of this country. Nor is this the time to plunge the country into an election. If there seems to be some other alternative available then I should like to say, speaking personally, that I know of no one else in this house who can discharge the function of Prime Minister of this country better than the present Prime Minsiter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): He is a lame-duck Prime Minister.

Mr. Sharp: My only regret, Mr. Speaker, is that he has decided to move on to better things after April 6. However, that is a decision he has made personally without consultation with any of the rest of us.

I listened with incredulity to the speeches today of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the leader of the New Democratic party. In the first place I listened to the Leader of the Opposition expecting that he would produce some precedents to bolster the constitutional position that he placed before the house today. However, I listened in vain. The Prime Minister certainly won that particular engagement hands down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: The Prime Minister quoted authorities which have been recognized throughout the British Commonwealth and in all British parliamentary institutions. The only authority that the Leader of the Opposition could quote was himself, and under the circumstances I really think he was outvoted.

The Leader of the Opposition poses as a reasonable and responsible man. He certainly has the manner; he is very quiet and very dignified. But nowhere in his remarks did I detect the slightest recognition of the nature of the problems facing this country. I have come to the conclusion that what the Leader of the Opposition wants at any cost is an election. He wants an election regardless of the consequences. I suggest he wants to have an election as soon as possible before the image that was created at the Conservative leadership convention fades away entirely, and I do not blame him.

I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that the Liberal party has no fear of an election and certainly no fear of the party that is led by my hon. friend. However, this is not the time for an election. Unlike hon. members opposite, the people of Canada do not want an election.

Mr. Churchill: How do you know?

Mr. Sharp: All they want is to have this parliament, which was elected less than two and a half years ago, go about its business and deal with the urgent matters before it. The Leader of the Opposition did speak at considerable length about the problems facing the country. But what did he propose to do about those problems, Mr. Speaker? He proposed either to paralyse parliament or to call an election. They were the two practical alternatives that he put before us, unless, of course, he wanted to suggest that he himself wanted to be prime minister. He was not very enthusiastic about it; he was rather modestly reluctant. In any event I do not think that this would add greatly to the stability of government under the present circumstances. I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition would be better employed carrying on his job as Leader of the Opposition for a little longer. As he went on he might get to like it and would not want to change.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Starr: You hope.

Mr. Sharp: There are serious problems facing this country, problems of an unprecedented character.

An hon. Member: You made them.

Mr. Sharp: They have arisen for reasons which are mostly beyond the control of the parliament of this country.

Since becoming Minister of Finance I have never hesitated to lay before this house and before the people of this country the nature of the problems that face us. I have done that clearly; indeed, I have been criticized for being so frank. Nor do I think—and I want to make this clear—that the measures the government has proposed have invariably been right. In this very complex world you cannot always be right; you can only hope to be right most of the time.

An hon. Member: What about Monday night?

Mr. Starr: That only applies to the minister, I suppose.

An hon. Member: What about the President of the Privy Council?

Mr. Sharp: And I make no apologies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: I thought the minister was supposed to be an improvement over the previous finance minister.

Mr. Sharp: I make no apology whatever for having, during the time I have been Minister of Finance, altered the direction of our financial and economic policy. Had I hesitated to do so I could have been open to censure. Our circumstances have been changing rapidly. They will change rapidly and as long as I am Minister of Finance I shall try to fit our policies to those circumstances.

An hon. Member: From day to day.

Mr. Sharp: As I listened to the leader of the N.D.P. I came to envy him. I envied his self-assurance. It is quite clear that he knows he has all the answers. Clearly he knows that invariably he is right. He spoke with that self-assurance that has been so pronounced in his demeanour in this house. As I say, I envy him. It must be very pleasant to be happy with oneself and to know that one knows the answers.

An hon. Member: Boy, oh boy.

Mr. Sharp: It must be pleasant to go on in this comfortable fashion. And today we had a magnificent example of that supreme self-confidence, a self-confidence that was so supremely unwarranted.

The hon. gentleman expressed his great concern about inflation, but how does he want to deal with it? I listened very carefully to the remedies he put forward and he suggested that we should deal with inflation by following inflationary policies. We should spend more and tax less. That was the remedy he put forward, apparently as the result of that self-assurance that goes with his economic doctrines.

Mr. Grafftey: Some think this might be a time for humility.

Mr. Sharp: It is this kind of talk that helps to undermine confidence. Of course, it may be that the hon. gentleman never expects to be in office and sees no harm in being so completely irresponsible. He said among other things, for example, that Bill C-193 would impose a tax on individuals in order to repay the refundable tax to corporations. Surely the hon. gentleman knows that such a statement is inaccurate.

Mr. Douglas: Not at all.

Mr. Sharp: Yet he persists in repeating the misstatement as if it were the gospel truth. Perhaps that is a carryover from the years when he was a minister of the gospel and not a member of parliament.

An hon. Member: Cheap.

Mr. Sharp: As I was listening to the hon. member—

An hon. Member: How cheap can you get?

Mr. Sharp: —I could see him building up his platform for the next election by making charges of this sort.

Mr. Starr: What about the minister and the leadership?

Mr. Sharp: And if the Leader of the Opposition is hungry for power, the leader of the N.D.P. positively drools at the prospect of an election. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam knows that the repayment of the refundable tax was provided for in Bill C-193 by way of a prepayment of corporate tax. All the money for that purpose was provided for in the bill, and I hope that he will correct this inaccuracy. But I suspect that he will go on uttering these statements as if they were gospel truth, even though all the facts are to the contrary. What concerns me about the leader of the N.D.P. is his general attitude of irresponsibility.

An hon. Member: How pompous can you get?

Mr. Sharp: I hope the hon. member has been following events in the United Kingdom where a government of his persuasion is in office. That government has had to devalue its currency. That government has had to go in for tough taxation measures, tough measures of restraint of expenditure. These measures are of unequalled toughness. Why did the government of that country not take the advice of my hon. friend? Or perhaps that is why they got in trouble. Perhaps they got into trouble because they listened to him when he met with them at Chequers when the leaders of the social democratic parties got together to discuss these problems. I know that if the government were to take the advice of the leader of the N.D.P. there would be an economic crisis of major proportion in this country.

Mr. Douglas: There is now.

Mr. Sharp: It would set back its progress for years, and we do not intend to take that advice.

An hon. Member: You did in 1962.

Mr. Sharp: We intend to continue to propose policies to maintain the stability and prosperity of this country. I remind the house that never before in the history of this country has there been such a prolonged period of expansion, such a prolonged period of prosperity and such a period of unexampled increase in the living standard of Canadians.

Mr. Starr: Starting in 1961.

Mr. Sharp: The record of the progress of Canada since this government took office is without precedent and without parallel. I defy anyone on the other side of the house to find a period in the whole history of this country—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): When the government has been so bad.

Mr. Sharp: —which will compare with the record of the economic progress of this country since this government has been in office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: We are now facing a period of difficulty which has been brought on largely by reasons that are beyond our control.

Mr. Stanfield: Well, now.

Mr. Starr: What was the minister doing all the time?

Mr. Ricard: That is irresponsible.

Mr. Sharp: This will require from the government tough decisions and it will require from the people of Canada a high degree of co-operation and restraint. This government intends to do what is necessary and I, as Minister of Finance, intend to discharge my responsibilities.

Mr. Stanfield: You should resign.

Mr. Sharp: The Canadian dollar, as I have said on several previous occasions, is on trial.

An hon. Member: So are you.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, and this government is on trial. I admit that.

An hon. Member: It is not going to survive.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, it is, and it is going to pass this test just as the Canadian dollar is going to pass its test. The world is watching the performance of the Canadian economy—

Mr. Starr: And shuddering.

Mr. Sharp: —and the markets and the prices of Canadian government bonds are reacting to every development here in parliament. How we act and how we discharge our responsibilities will have a profound effect on the jobs, on the cost of living and on the standard of living of all Canadians.

In my view it is essential that during this session of parliament we should take the fiscal action that is necessary to maintain confidence in the Canadian economy and in the Canadian dollar. If we adjourn or prorogue this session or, as the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the N.D.P. want, dissolve parliament without making provision to raise additional moneys to pay our bills in the coming fiscal year, the results could be serious. Look at the world around us. The devaluation of the pound sterling is still echoing in the financial markets of the world.

Mr. Pearson: And this is supposed to be our fault.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: The United States is having to take most extraordinary measures, some of which were referred to by the leader of the New Democratic party today. Why? To spite us? No. Because of the drain of gold from that country. The most powerful, the most important nation in the world is under attack. And here we are in Canada sitting next to the most powerful country in the world in these circumstances. Interest rates are at the highest levels throughout the world, not just in Canada. Not since the 'twenties have international financial markets been so disturbed and so jittery. These are the circumstances in which the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic party want to project this country into an election. I think it would be the least responsible action that parliament could take.

In the financial measures I placed before the house on November 30 I proposed a limitation on our expenditures and additional taxation designed to bring the budget into approximate balance in the next fiscal year. The estimates brought down by my colleague the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) demonstrate the government's determination to live within the ceiling on expenditures. Some of the tax proposals, those in the fields of excise taxes and excise duties have been approved by this house and are now before the Senate.

Last Monday the vote on the third reading of the income tax bill was negatived. The government accepts that decision, whatever may have been the circumstances of the vote. The government will put before the house further financial measures. It is essential that our proposals be such as to finance our expenditures in a non-inflationary way and reduce the pressures on the capital market. This is the only responsible course that a government in office can take, and I urge upon this parliament acceptance of that responsibility.

In conclusion, I suggest that we should stop this posturing and bickering as political parties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: If we do not, we shall certainly be deserving of the censure of the people who have elected us, and I prefer to listen to the voice of the people—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: I prefer to listen to the voice of the people rather than to the voice of Oliver Cromwell, who has been quoted by both the Leader of the Opposition and by the leader of the New Democratic party. And what is the voice of the people saying today? It is saying: Get on with the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): We have all listened with great interest to the speech just delivered, or performed, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp). He began by telling us he was incredulous. This is not news to us. The Minister of Finance has always been incredulous to us, and never more so than today when one considers the speech he has just made.

He told us the world is watching with interest the performance of the Canadian economy. I grant him this. I have just come back from a trip abroad and I can confirm it. Mr. Speaker, the world is also watching with shock and amazement the horror show which masquerades under the form of the Canadian government today.

The hon. gentleman was humble and modest in his speech. That is understandable, since his government has so much to be modest and humble about. He suggested that the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the speech made by my leader was a demand for an election. I challenge the correctness of that statement. If the Minister of Finance had listened carefully, if he had read what has been stated in the press and reported from our discussions, he would realize there is no such indication that the Conservative party is demanding an election.

The statement which has been made is that the government should follow the responsible, respectable and proper course of action by offering its resignation after having been defeated on a vote which can be interpreted in no other way than as a vote of non-confidence. This is what the Leader of the Opposition has said. This is what the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) has said. I think it should be made perfectly clear at this time. The Minister of Finance has urged: Let us finish with this business and deal with the problems which face us. Mr. Speaker, that is what parliament did on Monday night. It got rid of the problem which faces us and the country—the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister made much of what the government's accomplishments have been. For my part I should like to paraphrase a remark once made by a distinguished statesman: Never have so many ministers done so little for so many people.

In the first instance I think it must be made absolutely plain that Her Majesty's loyal opposition has not changed and will not change the position it originally took with regard to the status of the government following the events of Monday evening, irrespective of what might be the position of the ministers pursuant to statute. The government has certain privileges and it has certain responsibilities in this house. Those privileges include the constitutional practice, hallowed by hundreds of years, of submitting its resignation following defeat in a vote which can only be interpreted as a vote of no confidence. This is the attitude we took from the beginning. We are taking part in this debate, as we should as responsible and reputable members of parliament, but our position has been made clear as reported in Hansard of Wednesday last when I, on behalf of this party, entered a caveat as to the rights of the government with respect to further proceedings in this house.

The vote on Monday night represented a major defeat and cannot be redeemed. The government lost the confidence of the house at that time and I would say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in the words of the ancient Persian—

> The Moving Finger writes: and, having writ,
> Moves on; nor all your Piety nor Wit,
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line,
> Nor all your Tears wash out a Word of it—

Miss LaMarsh: Just a Jug of Wine and Thou.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Baldwin:

> —A Loaf of Bread—and Thou
> Beside me singing in the Wilderness—
> Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow!

Nor, I might add, any of your allegations of trickery or subterfuge.

I regret very much that the statement made by the Prime Minister today did not constitute a complete and unequivocal repudiation of the remarks he made during the television broadcast on the C.B.C. national hook-up the other night. I admit that all of us in this house hold and express strong views from time to time. We were elected by our constituents to represent them and to put our views before hon. members strongly and firmly. And from time to time we say things particularly in the house, that we ought not to say. But in this case the right hon. gentleman made a series of statements before an audience of millions of people.

To examine the purport of what was said on that occasion one must look at the entire transcript of the broadcast. No other interpretation could be drawn from it but that members of this house who took part in the proceedings on Monday night were guilty of subterfuge and were engaged in conduct which would bring them into disrepute and contempt.

• (4:00 p.m.)

I suggest that the right hon. gentleman review what he said today and review what he said the other day. Then I am sure he would come back into this house and make a full and frank repudiation of the text and intent of what he said the other day. Until he does this I believe a blot or a cloud will stand over the names of all hon. members who participated in the proceedings of this house and who voted last Monday.

There has been some discussion concerning the position of the government on votes of this kind and other votes. The Prime Minister has attempted to set out what in future, no doubt, will be referred to as the Pearson principle on confidence motions. Before dealing with this I think it is essential that the members of the house examine the background and have a look at the present situation concerning democratic processes and the machinery of parliamentary government.

It is becoming increasingly clear, and is becoming a matter of a great deal of concern to all of us who believe in this system, that the powers and rights of the legislature are being steadily diminished while the powers and rights of the executive are growing at an alarming rate. I do not say this necessarily in respect of the rights and privileges of hon. members as such. However, it is the members of parliament who represent the people of Canada, and it is the rights and individual freedoms and liberties of the people of Canada which day by day, week by week and year by year are being whittled away, cut down and destroyed by the massive monolithic structure of big government. I honestly believe that all members of the house feel this way. Surely it is a matter of the greatest concern that we should examine the position the government has taken in respect of the proceedings of Monday night.

Surely one of the few remaining rights we, as representatives of the people who sent us here, have, is to challenge the government when in the opinion of hon. members of this house, and in particular in the opinion of hon. members of the opposition, the government has embarked upon a course which we consider to be improper and incorrect. The issue in question on Monday is of such magnitude that it involves the very heart and core of the government's spending proposal in respect of the fiscal year and the mini-budget introduced by the Minister of Finance last November. Surely, when the government is defeated on that issue it has no other honourable course than to resign. This is a matter which involves the collection of taxes and seeking to dig deeper into the pockets of the taxpayers of this country.

It is said that during budgetary proposals it is the custom and practice for taxes to be imposed prior to the passage of the legislation. I accept that as being the practice of this parliament. But when a government does this it stakes its life on its ability to obtain from this house and this parliament the legislation which is necessary in order to legalize what heretofore it had been doing illegally. This is not a situation in which one finds it necessary to quote precedent. I suggest that here we have a set of circumstances which are unique and unknown in parliamentary history, for the simple reason that never before has a government which has been defeated on a financial measure of this kind failed to resign. This is the reason hon. members cannot find any precedent.

I am glad to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) in the house. When my leader a short time ago was making a very strong point with regard to the position of the government he said that any cabinet minister who had been sitting in the house prior to the vote on Monday night must have accepted the fact that the vote was a vote of confidence. The only hon. gentleman I could see who shook his head at that was the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, the Canada Year Book, 1967. The hon. gentleman has much to do with this publication. At page 86 I find these words:

> When the cabinet (the government) suffers defeat on a government bill or a vote of censure or on a motion of want of confidence in the Commons, the existing government or cabinet must either resign or request a dissolution from the Governor General.

Now, this document is the "family bible" of my hon. friend and a great many people in Canada. Possibly he might see fit to correct this particular passage because as it stands now it is of no value; it is worthless.

Let us examine with clarity, Mr. Speaker, what the result would be if the motion which the government is asking us to accept should be passed. I should like to refer to a very pertinent point made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson). This motion contains within its four corners superfluous and gratuitous phrases which seek to suggest, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley said, that all members of this house who participated in the previous proceedings with regard to this bill had accepted the bill. In part, the wording of the motion is as follows:

> That this house does not regard its vote on February 19th in connection with third reading of Bill C-193, which had carried in all previous stages—

Mr. Speaker, there was no necessity to include these last words in this motion. If these words are to be included, then why not also include the further words, "which in all its previous stages had been opposed vigorously by all members of the opposition parties"? Why not include a statement to the effect that this party and some of the other opposition parties had vigorously and consistently opposed the financial program of this government initiated by the mini-budget of the Minister of Finance last November, and that this party and other opposition parties had consistently advanced the proposition that the government has mismanaged the affairs of this country and has not been able to do those things which need to be done in order to advance the interests of the people of Canada? Why not include those words in the motion? I suggest this is a deliberate attempt, a sly and cunning attempt to deceive the people of Canada with respect to what will be the result of this motion, if passed.

Let me conclude on this note, Mr. Speaker. What will be the effect if this motion is passed? It permits the government to make a decision after the event and not before, as to confidence. We will be breaking new ground. It will then be incumbent upon the government, if this motion is accepted, with respect to any bill placed before the house to state prior to its being put before the house whether or not it is a matter of confidence. Certainly the opposition will insist that this be done. This is the only and inevitable result which comes from the passage of this motion.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, going down through all the years in our parliamentary history, with parliament now being entrusted with the only limitations which can be placed upon the government, surely when a matter of this kind, of this importance, of this consequence has been brought before the house and has been defeated, what other reasonable, honest and logical conclusion can there be but that it is a matter of such gravity that the government has no alternative but to resign?

People have said that there is no difference between members of this party and members of the party which now provides the government. I say there is, and this issue indicates it. Hon. members opposite believe they have a divine right, that they constitute the managerial elite who have the right to govern this country under all conditions and under all circumstances; and if the law, if the rules and regulations of this house, or if the constitutional precedents of hundreds of years interfere they can say, "Oh, we will jump over this law, we will jump over this precedent, we will ignore them." That is the difference.

We in this party believe in the rights of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: We abide by the practices and traditions of parliament, and there is illustrated the difference between hon. members opposite and the members of this party. I would hope under those conditions all members who have any regard at all for the privileges and for the traditions of the House of Commons will vote down this motion which is now before the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin this afternoon by reassuring the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on two points: First I want to say to him that there was nothing offensive to him personally intended by any member when unanimous consent was not given to him to speak on Tuesday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stewart: If unanimous consent had been given it would have applied to all members, and we might then have had a general debate on the matter which is now being debated.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The Prime Minister refused.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order please?

Mr. Stewart: We might then have had a general debate on the matter which is now before the house, a debate far earlier than the hon. gentleman evidently wished.

The second point on which I wish to reassure him was that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) was not being unfriendly to him, the Prime Minister did not wish to upset him, when he used terms such as "trickery" and "manufactured crisis". Those terms are mild, even insipid, when compared with some that have come across the floor of this house from the quarter in which the hon. member now sits.

Mr. Monteith: The Prime Minister did not use those terms in the house.

Mr. Stewart: It is well to remember, sir, that other people have used expressions outside this house since last Monday night. For example, the Leader of the Opposition himself accused the government of trying in a "high-handed and presumptuous way" to make a "farce of parliament".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stewart: I can assure you, sir, that that harsh and inaccurate statement made outside the house and applauded within the house will not be regarded by the Prime Minister as something that should upset him greatly.

This morning the Leader of the Opposition insisted that last Monday two questions were decided by one vote, and decided conclusively. The first of these questions was whether or not Bill C-193 would then be read a third time, and the second question was whether or not the government had lost the confidence of the house. I think, sir, that there is no dispute on the first of these points.

The motion for the third reading then of Bill C-193 was defeated. It was defeated by a vote of 84 to 82.

But there is dispute on the second question. The Conservative opposition says, and my hon. friend from Peace River has just now reasserted, that the vote taken last Monday night was conclusive as to the attitude of the house toward the government. We on this side of the house take a different view. We believe that the Conservative opposition is taking what I will call a mechanistic view of our constitution.

Members of the Conservative opposition are insisting that in this one vote recorded Monday night the whole attitude of the house was reflected conclusively and ultimately. They are suggesting that in this one vote the whole view on the government of all the membership was summed up. I do not think that this is accurate. I think that to endorse this view of our constitution is really to be just a little fatuous. They say this, and they say they are adducing the precedents of the centuries. But I say they have not yet adduced a precedent. What we have heard is a quotation, by an unnamed writer, a quotation from the Canada Year Book. That may be an excellent source for statistical information, but I have never before heard it quoted as a great authoritative source in the field of constitutional law and practice.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Bob Winters endorses it.

Miss LaMarsh: That is all the Globe and Mail could find, too.

Mr. Stewart: When we come to this matter of how a vote in this house shall be interpreted, there are, I suggest, two parties who are principally involved. In the first place the question of the interpretation of a vote is a question for the prime minister. The reason for this under our constitution is perfectly evident. A prime minister, holding office, has certain great and heavy responsibilities, and sir, it is for a prime minister to decide what support he must have, what co-operation he must enjoy, in the house if he is to continue to sustain his responsibilities. That is why over the years the first decision as to the significance of a vote taken in the House of Commons has been for the Prime Minister to make.

I have brought along an authority with me, sir. It is not the Canada Year Book. It is not a book endorsed by any member of the present government or even by any member of the shadow cabinet opposite. It is a book by Arthur Berriedale Keith, entitled "The British Cabinet System." Although the quotation I wish to put before the house is somewhat long, sir, it is so germane to the discussion before us that I hope you will bear with me. I quote from page 215 as follows:

> It rests, therefore, with the government to decide what issues it shall treat as vital, and as demanding that it must resign or dissolve if it is denied support thereon. It is, however, more and more the practice for ministries to restrict the freedom of the members, by insisting on making the vote a matter of confidence.

• (4:20 p.m.)

> The days are gone when the Melbourne ministry suffered repeated defeats with equanimity, and dissolved only when an actual vote of non-confidence was carried by a majority of one, after it had refrained from resignation on a defeat on the sugar duties. The coalition ministry in 1853 accepted minor defeats without serious difficulties. Lord Rosebery's ministry treated a defeat on the address in 1894 with calm, but the vote was a snap one, and though such votes discredit a ministry, or at least suggest that its members are slack in their allegiance, or the whips rather below par, still resignation is by no means essential. On this occasion the government subsequently secured the rejection of the amended address and the passage of the original version. In June, 1895, the same administration was defeated on an amendment in supply reducing the appropriation for the parliament buildings. The vote was small and the government remained in office. But when they were defeated again, a week later, on the army estimates they resigned. This second vote was also a snap vote, but appears to have been taken seriously, not on its own merits, but because it came at the end of a period of very small majorities. It was more striking, when in 1905 Mr. Balfour was defeated on an Irish issue in committee of supply, without resigning or dissolving.

Then the author goes on to discuss the position of minority governments. He says this:

> The position, of course, is different when a government is distinctly a minority government, as in 1886, when Lord Salisbury advised Lord R. Churchill to make it clear that the government would not treat private members' bills as raising issues of confidence. But he did not suggest indifference to the fate of governmental proposals. On the other hand, Mr. MacDonald in 1924 announced that his government would not go out—or, we may presume, dissolve—on defeats, not on principle, but would do so if a vote of no-confidence was carried. In fact it was defeated ten times between January and August, and the defeat, which it deemed decisive, was one on a comparatively minor issue, which the Liberals were most anxious not to treat as one demanding resignation or dissolution.

There, sir, is a genuine authority. By saying that I do not wish to denigrate the statistical authority of the Canada Year Book.

If the question of the significance of a vote is in the first place one for the Prime Minister and the government, in the second place it certainly is a matter for the House of Commons. On this occasion which we are now discussing, brought on by the vote which took place here last Monday, the Prime Minister has not, as did other prime ministers as suggested by the passage I have just read to the house, decided to ignore what has taken place. He has realized that the House of Commons is directly involved here because the motion before the house last Monday dealt with a bill of great importance.

Consequently, the Prime Minister has now come to the house asking the house to interpret the meaning of its vote last Monday. This is not unusual. I refer you to another example, sir. As recently as 1944 in Great Britain the government of the day lost a measure by a vote in committee of the whole, as we would say.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, in committee of the whole.

An hon. Member: That is different.

Mr. Stewart: It lost a measure in committee of the whole by a vote of 117 to 116. The following day the prime minister, Mr. Churchill, had this to say:

> It would not be possible for His Majesty's government to leave matters where they stood when the motion to report progress was accepted. At this very serious time in the progress of the war, there must be no doubt or question of the support which the government enjoy in the House of Commons. Accordingly we have decided, as the first business on the next sitting day, to resume the committee stage of the education bill, and to delete clause 82, as amended, entirely from the measure. This act of deletion will be regarded as a vote of confidence in the present administration. If the government do not secure an adequate majority, it will entail the usual constitutional consequences. Should the house agree to the deletion of the clause, the government propose to move to reinstate the original clause, without the amendment, on the report stage, and to treat its passage throughout as a matter of confidence.

I should add, just to complete the story, that the motion was carried by a vote of 425 to 23. What the prime minister of Great Britain, Mr. Churchill, did on that occasion was not only to put aside a decision made in committee of the whole on a bill, but also to insist, under confidence, that the committee of the whole reinstate the clause as put before the committee by the government. This is going far, far beyond what the present government is asking in this instance. All the present government is asking in this instance is that the house make a distinction between two questions: first, the question on the third reading of the bill that was before the house last Monday and, second, the question of confidence. It is the second question that is now being debated in this house.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stewart: If I have time, Mr. Speaker, when I have concluded my speech.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Don't take him away from his notes; he will never get back to them.

Mr. Stewart: The course the Prime Minister has taken is the one counselled by various constitutional authorities and counselled also by certain newspapers. I have here a quotation from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. In this editorial, which has some unflattering things to say about this government, we find these words:

> Mr. Pearson can ask for a vote of confidence in his government.

This is what the Prime Minister is doing. It was suggested this morning by the Leader of the Opposition that the motion that has been put before the house is inflammatory. I think if we read the motion we will see that this is not true. The motion is not asking members on this side or members opposite to confer a kind of blanket blessing and endorsation on the policies, past actions and future expectations of the present Liberal government. It would be foolish, I think, to propose to embarrass hon. members opposite in that way. The government has put before the house a motion which is very carefully drawn to one question, namely the significance of the vote here last Monday. It is essential for hon. members to decide whether or not the taint of non-confidence pertains to the vote that took place. There is no question as to the effect of the main decision; but the question is, does it also bear the taint of non-confidence? That is what the house now has to decide. That is what is in dispute here this afternoon. I think there is really nothing very deceptive about the motion.

The Conservatives have said that the vote that took place last Monday is parallel to the vote that took place here on February 5, 1963. I think they are wrong in saying that. In the first place, what was then before the house was a supply motion to which an amendment had been moved, and as if to make the matter doubly sure there was a subamendment submitted by hon. gentlemen in the Social Credit party which spelled out—if it had not been a brief amendment and subamendment I would say, in chapter and verse—non-confidence in the then government. Second, as has been suggested, the motion that was defeated here last Monday was preceded by the successful passage of earlier motions.

I think it would be very unfortunate if anyone thought there was any suggestion that all these motions were carried unanimously. These were decisions of the house, just as the decision on the motion for third reading was a decision of the house. There is no suggestion that all hon. members on this or on the other side unanimously acclaimed each of the several clauses, or indeed the bill at the resolution or the second reading stage. But it is true that just as the motion for the third reading of the bill was defeated by the house, so the motions for the earlier stages of the bill were carried by the house.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising from what the hon. member has just said about the earlier motion being carried in committee. I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that following the vote a question of privilege was raised regarding the fact that some Liberal members had walked in from behind the curtain and had thus abused the voting procedure of the house.

Mr. Stewart: The third point I want to submit brings our attention to the attendance and to the mood of the house on that occasion. I think we have only to read the record to see that there were elements of comedy and tragedy about it which we need not now review. It is all these differences which make it impossible and improper to draw a parallel between the vote last Monday and the vote which took place on Tuesday, February 5, 1963. I am suggesting that the genuine parallel is between the vote taken in 1963 and the vote which will take place on the motion now before us.

There is another point which I want to make. It is that the Conservatives have adopted a really untenable position. They say that the house has no confidence in the government. This is a perfectly reasonable position for them to take, in view of their interpretation of the vote. They insist, however, that in their view there should not be another opportunity for the genuine attitude of the house to be tested. So one is driven by inexorable logic to the conclusion that they think that either their reading of the vote last Monday was incorrect or that since that day there has been a change in attitude of the house toward the government.

They cannot have it both ways. If they believe, as they say, that this government has lost the confidence of the house, then I should have thought that it was incumbent upon them to take whatever steps were necessary to bring about the expulsion of this government immediately on Tuesday. Let me correct that, sir and say, on Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. Crouse: It is we who accommodated you. Get your facts straight.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): The Prime Minister begged for 24 hours.

Mr. Stewart: Presumably also they would want to expedite the vote today. If on February 19 the opposition had defeated the government and if the government had not then taken cognizance of this vote in the house and had insisted on going on with business, the opposition would have found a remedy. The remedy they would have found would have been a vote of non-confidence or vote of censure. This is what they would have done.

But, the Prime Minister has brought in a motion, and consequently they will have nothing to do with it. They are not happy because the proposal to test the confidence of the house comes from this side rather than from their own side. If this were their remedy, they would rejoice in it. On the other hand, because it comes from this side of the house they boggle and buck.

The people of Canada do not want an election at this time.

Mr. Crouse: That is what you say.

Mr. Stewart: I am submitting this as an argument. I believe that the Prime Minister should not inflict an election upon the people of this country at this time, in view of the uncertain nature of that vote. Consequently I say that it is the duty of the Prime Minister, not just his right, to test the attitude of the house. I am sure that the house will speak with an unequivocal voice.

If the house is prepared to let the government continue, then the government will continue and there will be no immediate election. On the other hand, if the house decides it is not prepared to let the government carry on, then there will be an election. It seems to me that this important question should not be decided by what one or the other side of the house says is its interpretation of the vote which took place here last Monday. This is why I say, supported by better constitutional authorities than the Canada Year Book, that the Prime Minister is fulfilling his duty when he brings such a motion before the house to give the house an opportunity to state its view unequivocally, and I say it will be the responsibility of the house in every quarter and through each of its members to decide what shall be done.

As I look back over the events of this week I have the impression of a kind of high fantasy. It started on Monday night, but I will not detail the things which happened then.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): It's too painful.

Mr. Stewart: It is on the record, and anyone who reads can refer to the record.

Mr. Hales: You would like to change the record if you could.

Mr. Woolliams: He is trying to change the record now.

Mr. Hales: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he recall the situation on Monday night? After the vote was taken, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) rose to bring in further business. We said, no, we would not do any further business. The house then took a vote, which was a vote of confidence, on a motion by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) which resulted in 79 to 78 votes against the government. That was a vote of non-confidence.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. gentleman is entirely free to develop any argument that he wishes in his own time. I certainly do not dispute that he can use the record to support his argument. I would hesitate to do so because there are certain other things which appear on the record such as, for example, the suggestion that there was no unanimous consent. As I said, we get the impression of high fantasy.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You are reflecting on Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stewart: Then, after Monday, we find that the opposition takes the view that the government should be thrown out, and yet from day to day it delays the final test which could have the effect which it so ardently desires.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, which again arises from the remarks made by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough who keeps insisting on describing what the opposition did from day to day. Let me pound it into his head, and let it be understood clearly, that it was the Prime Minister who requested a 24 hour recess.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should be allowed to suggest that this is not really a point of order, but more a point of debate, and the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough should be allowed to continue his speech.

Mr. Stewart: I am very anxious that the hon. member for Cape Breton South be at ease. Let me say to reassure him, that there is no doubt in my mind, or that of any hon. member, that it was agreed we should not proceed on Tuesday, and that it was gracious of the Leader of the Opposition not to wish to go on with the regular business on Tuesday.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You are twisting it. It was the Prime Minister's wish.

An hon. Member: What about Wednesday and Thursday?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You keep getting into trouble.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): You always put your foot in your mouth. Be more careful.

Mr. Speaker: May we have improved order, please.

Mr. Stewart: I have the greatest sympathy for the hon. member for Cape Breton South and also for his leader.

• (4:40 p.m.)

An hon. Member: You are going to need it.

Mr. Stewart: I think, sir, the time has come when the House of Commons should focus its attention upon the nation's business. I do not dispute that there is room for argument as to the interpretation of the vote last Monday. I think it is well that we should have this argument and settle the matter conclusively. However, we should not have, as the Leader of the Opposition has suggested, an election precipitated in this country because of what certain hon. members think is the effect of the vote recorded last Monday.

I believe the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had a question. If he still thinks it is worth while, I shall be happy to try to deal with it.

Mr. Nielsen: I should like to put the question because it is nice to have a reply from an expert in constitutional matters. The hon. member cited an example in which a decision was made in committee of the whole and the house sent the particular clause back. I presume the house acted on the basis of a motion to do so. If the house had defeated that reference and the government had been defeated at that stage, would the hon. member think that would have been a motion of confidence?

Mr. Stewart: I think the answer to that is a matter of record. The Prime Minister had risen in his place and said that not only the expurgation of the amended clause but also the reinstatement of the original clause would be treated by the government as a matter of confidence. This was clearly stated in advance.

Mr. Nielsen: That being so, does it not follow that the motion in the house last Monday night would have the same effect, its having come from committee of the whole?

Mr. Stewart: No, Mr. Speaker, the vote which will come on the motion now under debate is the one which will reveal the genuine attitude of this House of Commons.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the motion we have before us claims that a vote taken in this house last Monday on a money bill, the most important kind of bill that any parliament can have come before it, does not constitute a vote of confidence. It is the government that claims this is not a vote of confidence. I believe therefore it would be a good thing to ascertain exactly what this government, by the printed word, says ought to be the procedure in cases of this kind. I have before me the Canada Year Book for 1967.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: The Canada Year Book is described in its frontispiece as the official statistical annual of the resources, history, institutions and social and economic conditions of Canada. It is published—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: You are not going to be so happy when you hear what it says. It is published each year under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is now Hon. Robert Winters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should be allowed to make his speech.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

This volume is produced by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. This is the government's bible of what is done in Canada each year, how it is done and how it should be done. If that is not the case, then the government has no right to publish a book of this kind, making the claims that I have set out. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows exactly what I am talking about. This book was produced under his authority. I know, because at one time it was produced under my authority. I know the care that goes into the publication of it, and I know that this book contains an outline of things as they are and as they should be in this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is what this government which, unfortunately, has been in office for five years and has had an opportunity to change anything in this book, has to say. I have the last installment, 1967, and when you turn to page 86 line 6, you find this is what the government says is the proper procedure in this country of ours in 1968:

> When the cabinet (the government) suffers defeat on a government bill or a vote of censure or on a motion of want of confidence in the Commons, the existing government must either resign or request a dissolution from the Governor General.

That is what this government says should be its course of conduct after the defeat of a government bill. There is no mention of a money bill; but money bills are the most important bills that come before this parliament. Having said that, and having specified exactly what the right procedure should be, this government refuses to call an election and refuses to resign. This government demands the right to stay in office, to cling to power. This Liberal party loves to cling to power. They know quite well, as a result of the last two Gallup polls, that if an election were held the country would indicate it had lost confidence in them. They would no longer be the government.

In contrast to the attitude the Liberal party adopts when in power, I should like to outline their attitude when in opposition. The Liberal party is in power today and will not resign, as its own publication indicates it must. I should like you to turn back some ten years, to January 20, 1958, when this Liberal party was in opposition. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) had just been elected as leader of the opposition, and had moved his first motion of non-confidence in this house. That motion is set out in the right-hand column of page 3520 of Hansard for 1957-58. The present Prime Minister outlined a number of reasons he felt the Conservative government should not hold office, and then he finished up with this classic phrase:

> His Excellency's advisers should, in the opinion of this house, submit their resignation forthwith.

The government had not been defeated in the house on any measure. We had won every vote that had come before the house during the eight or nine months in which we had been in office; yet this Liberal party leader demanded that, without even a vote going against us, without even going to the people, the government should submit its resignation. This made the then leader of the opposition the laughing stock of the country and of the House of Commons, when he had the stupidity to put forward a motion of that kind. He did, and the party was behind it.

This was the attitude they adopted at that time. Today, when they have been defeated on a money bill on which a vote was called by a Liberal Deputy Speaker, a vote which was agreed to by a Liberal Minister of Finance, a vote which was called by a Liberal Acting Prime Minister, we are accused of trickery. It is claimed that this is not a vote of lack of confidence that we have won, but that it is some kind of trickery, some kind of buffoonery, and they refuse to give up the office to which they so desperately cling. They know that it will not be long before the people throw them out.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is about time we made it very clear we were serious in what we did on Monday night. I want to reiterate briefly why it is we voted against that money bill. First of all, Mr. Speaker, we felt that this was a completely unjustified measure. This was the imposition of an additional 5 per cent tax on the backs of the people to pay for the overspending indulged in by the government. Just to give the house an idea how the government has overspent, Mr. Speaker, during the first four years it was in office the government increased expenditure by no less than $3 billion. This represents an increase each and every year of 12½ per cent.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Last year, Mr. Speaker, the government told us that they were retrenching, that economies were going to be made. They had been advising everyone in the country to pull in their horns and to practise economies. The government said they would give the lead and show how this should be done. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, you would have expected that, with all this talk going on last year and all this free advice given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), he and the government would have been economizing. You would have thought that they would be cutting down.

I should like to put on the record what in fact transpired. The only figures available to me so far are for the first nine months of 1967, and they show increased expenditures during that period over the previous year. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures show an increase in the first nine months of 1967 over the first nine months of 1966 of no less than $1 billion. This is an increase, not of 12½ per cent a year, which was the rate of increase for the first four years of the government's occupation of office: That increase was not good enough. These figures represent an increase of no less than 15 per cent. That is the kind of economy that this government has been indulging in, Mr. Speaker.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) and the Minister of Finance told us very gaily last fall that we could expect all kinds of economies, not only in the next budget but also a great many cut-backs in the present year's expenditures. We pressed them about this and discovered that they made no cut-backs whatever in the present year's spending.

What is the position in the next fiscal year, Mr. Speaker? The government are making a great to-do about spending, they claim, only 4½ per cent more than this year. If you add the main expenditures and the supplementary estimates together and compare the two years, Mr. Speaker, you will find that this coming year the government is planning to spend 8 per cent more than they have spent during the present year. That is the actual figure—8 per cent more.

Miss LaMarsh: Surely the hon. member, who was once a member of the privy council, realizes—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I have a question to pose to my hon. friend, who I know is always so willing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister can ask a question only if the hon. member who has the floor will allow one.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as I expect to use my time I will be glad to answer the hon. and charming lady's question later.

Miss LaMarsh: Perhaps over lunch, then?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of ever asking the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) to lunch, or anything else.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, on a matter of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Sit down. Order.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ricard: Don't you know you should sit down when the Speaker rises from the chair?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister should know that she should resume her seat when the Speaker has the floor. Would the minister kindly indicate for what purpose she wants the floor at this time?

Miss LaMarsh: I rise on a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman has demonstrated that there is only a certain kind of woman that he knows would have lunch with him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I remember during the last election campaign, when I had the pleasure of running against another charming lady who was a member of this house, she made the same kind of remark; and in reply I will make the same kind of comment about the Secretary of State as I made about the other lady. Every time I was asked what I thought of my opponent, I said—and I say it of the Secretary of State—"She is a very nice lady".

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I may continue, the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board claimed great credit for the so-called cuts that they were going to make in next year's budget, and we have seen those expenditures listed in the papers we have already received. But all they have done, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what every minister of finance has done, when every year the various departments come before him to have their estimates examined. The estimates are inflated to include every item that every department would want to put forward. Naturally the minister then cuts them down to size.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what has been done this year. There has been no reduction whatever in expenditure over and above the reductions that are made in any normal year. If I may give an example, the position is the same as that of a man who goes home in the evening and whose wife says to him: "Jim, I've great news for you. I'm going to save us $500 next year." The man says: "Well, that's a wonderful thing. This is great news and I'll take you out to dinner to celebrate". Then the man asks his wife how she is going to save the $500 and she replies: "I decided to go out and buy a fur coat and then changed my mind. Therefore I save you $500. However, I must tell you that I am going to increase our expenditure by 8 per cent during the coming year, so you must think I am a very good housekeeper". That, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what this government has done, and that is all it has done.

This overspending, Mr. Speaker, this refusal to cut your coat according to your cloth, has resulted in massive deficits. It is the reason that as taxpayers we are being called upon to increase our payments to the government by an extra 5 per cent. The original measure was defeated. The proposed measure, when it is introduced in some other form, is going to be fought tooth and nail by the opposition. We are going to give it exactly the same treatment that the other measure received last Monday night, because we believe that this sort of tax increase is completely unjustified.

The second reason we oppose the measure is because it is inflationary. You and I know, Mr. Speaker, that the only way we can provide jobs in this country for our people and increase our standard of living is by being able to sell our products in Canada and abroad and meet competition. If costs go up our chances of selling our goods are reduced very materially. Nobody is going to buy something just because it is made by Canadians. It must be attractive and be reasonably priced.

What this tax increase will do, Mr. Speaker, is raise the cost of the goods that we buy and sell. We all know very well that organized labour will simply add the extra 5 per cent tax increase to the increase they were going to ask for anyway. Their demands, as we know, are always granted by management, and this will make it that much more difficult to sell our products in the export and home markets.

Third, Mr. Speaker, we object to this 5 per cent tax increase because once again it increases the already very high cost of living in this country.

Our main reason for opposing the measure is because we have no confidence in the government, in view of what they are doing to the economy of the country. On many occasions during the past two years we have made speeches and asked questions about what the government is doing. We produced figures that are given to us by the government's own statistical agency, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Let us see exactly what this government is doing and you will see why some members in this house have no confidence in the government and why the people in the country, according to the Gallup polls, are losing confidence increasingly every day. Let us look at the cost of living. Today it costs exactly $1.05 to buy what could be bought one year ago for $1. That is the extent of the inflation that has gone on in this country for the past 12 months. In the past four years the cost of living has gone up by 14 per cent. Could anyone have confidence in a government that permits such a thing to take place? My answer is, no, you cannot have confidence.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Unemployment has reached its highest point in four years, having gone up to 6.1 per cent of the labour force. On various occasions I asked the Prime Minister what new policies he would introduce to combat unemployment, and he simply laughed the matter off, as did the Minister of Finance and as did all those other ministers who were asked that question. We bring this situation to their attention, only to be given the same smirking answer. They duck the question; obviously they are not interested. The only people who are interested in the unemployed seem to be the members on this side of the house and the unemployed themselves, who are very interested indeed.

Take the question of productivity: A country can only stay competitive if it can keep its costs level with those of its competitors. Great Britain had to devalue its currency a short time ago simply because that country's productivity was not increasing at the rate that its main competitors were increasing their productivity. Competitors' products sold more cheaply not only in the export markets but in Great Britain itself, and Great Britain was forced to devalue her currency.

Exactly the same thing will take place in this country within two years, at the very outside, if this government does not do a great deal more to combat decreasing productivity. Let us see just how much it is decreasing. In the 20 years between 1945 and 1965 our productivity increased each year by an average of 3.4 per cent. This kept us level with the increased productivity of our main competitors. But in 1966 our productivity increased only by 2 per cent, and in the first nine months of this year, as compared with the first nine months of last year—and these are the latest figures that are available—our productivity increased only by four-tenths of one per cent. Our rate of increase in productivity is steadily going down. That means that our chances of selling our goods against competition, both in Canada and in the export markets, are decreasing every day. I pointed this out to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of Industry. I have asked them what they are going to do to increase productivity. I have suggested taxation incentives to encourage industries to buy new machinery, new plant and new production systems that will make it possible for them to increase productivity in the way that our main competitors are increasing theirs.

When I mention these matters to the Minister of Finance, he just laughs. He says that what we are doing is satisfactory, that it is good enough, that our policies will give us increased productivity. He started saying that nearly two years ago, and ever since he started giving me those kind of answers, our productivity has gone down, and down, and down.

Let us look at what this government refuses to do to increase our productivity. One way to increase productivity is by training manpower, by giving our people greater skills, by training them to adapt to the new technologies. There is no place in today's world for a person who is mentally or physically unskilled. People must have the new skills. We knew that, and so the Conservative government in 1961 and 1962 established the manpower training program. In conjunction with the provinces, we enabled to be built no less than 224 new training schools. We enlarged 130 others and we provided an additional training facility for 140,000 young men and women every year.

What has this government been doing, Mr. Speaker. That program continued quite successfully until last April 30, and then the Minister of Manpower and Immigration brought in a brand new program with brand new rules. The proof of the pudding is in the eating so let us look at the results of this training program. When the minister changed the program to bring in the new rules, in Ontario there were 19,500 people who were enrolled in the training program and learning new skills to make them better able to do a job and to increase their productivity. Seven months later, after the minister had brought in his new program, you would think that the enrolment numbers would have increased by 50 per cent, or something like that. Instead we find that there was a decrease of 43 per cent in enrolment. It was down to 11,200 persons, and it is going down every day.

Enrolment is decreasing because the program is impractical. This minister does not know what he is talking about and neither do his officials. They will not listen to the Ontario authorities; they will not listen to the people who had a good program going. So the one program that can increase this country's productivity is going down the drain. That is why we have no confidence in this government; that is why we voted non-confidence the other day.

Take a look at manufacturing production, something on which we rely to a major extent to give the people of this country employment. In the 20 years between 1945 and 1965 manufacturing production increased in this country at an average of 5 per cent per year. According to the figures we have for last year, the increase last year over the year before had dropped from the average of 5 per cent a year to 1.1 per cent a year. That was one fifth of the average increase for the previous 20-year period. And what is being done by this great Department of Industry, which is spending hundreds of millions of dollars each year to do a job which was done for a fraction of that sum previously? Back in the days when the party to which I belong formed the government, we had the department of defence production, and the industry section in the Department of Trade and Commerce. We had productive industries then. Now this government has set up this fantastically expensive Department of Industry, and manufacturing production has dropped. The increase has dropped to one fifth of what it was.

We have no confidence in this government because they are mishandling the economy of the country—and this includes the employment of our people and the prosperity of the country—and are taking it downhill at an ever increasing pace.

To sell our goods we must keep our costs low; we must keep our production costs competitive. Let us look at what this government has done to our main costs of production, costs that affect the ability of Canadians to sell goods and provide jobs. First let us look at the cost of money. It is the highest in history. And why is it the highest in history? Because the cost of money is directly influenced by the rate of interest on government bonds. If the people have confidence in the government, the interest rate charged or paid on government bonds is low. If the confidence that the people have in the government is low, then the cost of the money that the government must borrow is high. Today the rate of interest charged on government bonds is the highest in the history of this country. What is the result? The cost of the money that farmers, businessmen, storekeepers and individuals need to produce their goods is the highest that it has ever been, and the rate is going up every day.

Let us look at labour costs, since these are an integral part of our costs of production. Everybody would like to see people who work for a living get a very good increase every year. The more they can get, the happier we would be. But again, whenever we price ourselves out of the market by raising our costs, our goods are not sold and there are no repeat orders. Workers are no longer employed in the factories to make more goods, and unemployment develops. So by paying higher increases in wages each year than our competitors, we are simply denying jobs to our people. It is as simple as that.

• (5:10 p.m.)

What happened last year? Due to the fiscal, economic and other policies of this government the cost of labour in Canada increased by 8.7 per cent as compared with 4.4 per cent in the United States. It is not possible to double the increase in one of our prime costs without losing sales or jobs. Why did this happen? It happened because of something this government did 18 months ago when it intervened in three labour disputes—the longshoremen's strike in Montreal, the threatened C.B.C. strike and the threatened strike on the St. Lawrence seaway. In each case they saw to it that a 30 per cent wage increase was awarded. Well, everybody would like to get a 30 per cent wage increase every year; but you cannot do it and remain competitive.

This began the fashion. Workers said that if the government insisted on 30 per cent wage increases they would take no less.

Another thing the government did was to make an illegal strike legal, by dealing with a union in circumstances of an illegal or wildcat strike. They dealt with the Montreal dockworkers who were out on an illegal strike. Were the dockworkers penalized? No; they were given a 30 per cent wage increase. This undermines the position of any labour leader who is conscientious and tries to do an honest job. If he goes to his union and recommends workers to seek a reasonable increase in wages or tells them not to go out on an illegal strike because they have a contract which requires them to stay on the job until a certain date, his members say to him: Don't talk that way to us; if you cannot take us out on a wildcat and get a 30 per cent wage increase, we will get the fellow who did the job in Montreal. Any honest labour leader finds his position undermined, and this is one of the reasons labour costs have gone so high today.

Finally, on July 1 we shall face one of the most severe economic threats this country has ever faced, due to the wholesale dumping of cheap foreign goods which will start in the most unprecedented volume any of us have ever seen. What is dumping? Dumping is carried out because in the big producing countries they have massive runs and cannot afford to start up again, even if a product has been well received. However, lest retailers should demand more than had been expected the manufacturers overrun to the extent of 5 or 10 per cent and then, at the end of the season, if there is no demand for these goods, they look for a market in which they can dump them.

So far, we have been protected in Canada by provisions known as fair market value legislation, which we refined while in office. This makes it necessary for an exporter to show that the goods he is sending into this country are offered at the same market value as they possessed in his own country. This government threw all that protection out the window when it signed the agreement in Geneva. The new agreement will allow people to send goods to this country in any quantity, unless it can be proved that damage is done to our whole industry as a result. This has to be determined before a board in Ottawa, and anyone with experience knows it would take months before such a board would reach a decision on whether an industry was injured or not. Meanwhile whole industries, whole sections of the country would be obliterated. This is what will happen starting on July 1.

I could go on and on but time does not allow. I think I have given the house an idea why practical men in this country have no confidence in this government, one composed of men who have no knowledge of business affairs and who, what's more, don't give a damn about business affairs; all they want is to stay in government. They want to hang on to power because they love power, they love to govern, they think they govern by divine right. The measure upon which they were defeated was a money bill involving taxation and there is nothing more important in our national life than the determination of the taxes the people shall pay. In their own Canada Year Book hon. members opposite say that when the government is defeated on a money bill it has no alternative but to resign.

Are they resigning? No, they are hanging on because they are desperately seeking to hold on to power as long as they can, knowing that the last two Gallup polls say they are deader than the dodo. When the people of Canada learn what they have been doing to the economy of this country, what they have been doing to parliamentary rights and procedures and for the protection of individuals against tyrants and dictators such as themselves, the electorate will look after them in a very effective manner—and very, very soon, I hope.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, it has been said repeatedly for some time that the person who wanted to destroy the country and harm parliament was the member for Lapointe. Well, after hearing what the Liberals said about the Conservatives, and what the Conservatives and the New Democrats said about the Liberals, I am led to believe that I am the only member who does not wish to destroy parliament. It is rather the two old-line parties who intend to destroy it by the charges they have been hurling at each other—to the effect that their role is not to destroy parliament—and all kinds of charges that have never been levelled against me. Since the Tories and the Grits, the Conservatives and the Liberals, want to destroy parliament, I shall therefore leave it to them to do so.

As for me, I adopted right from the start a very well defined and clear attitude on the meaning of the vote last Monday night. From the start, I said, and I repeat it, that when we voted on Bill No. C-193, we defeated that bill and nothing else. We did not vote on a motion of confidence in the government, but on Bill No. C-193.

Because this bill was intended to increase taxes, we are told that it becomes a vote of confidence or non-confidence. Mr. Speaker, if one consults the standing orders of the house, one realizes that there is nothing, absolutely nothing in the standing orders which stipulates that voting against a bill constitutes a defeat for the government.

The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) referred to the constitutional right. He said that, constitutionally, after having been defeated on a money bill, the government should resign.

I am now holding the constitution of Canada. I shall send it through a messenger to the one who represents the Leader of the Opposition. I challenge anyone to find in that constitution a section, a line, a paragraph—the member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) is sitting besides the Leader of the Opposition, he can check—that stipulates that the government is overthrown when a bill is defeated.

I am sorry, I sent the French copy. It is a supreme insult.

Mr. Lewis: It is an accident?

Mr. Grégoire: It is only by accident. It is the copy which I looked at.

I challenge the hon. member for Ontario to find anything in the constitution which says that a government, which is defeated on any bill must resign.

In fact, the provisional reprint of the standing orders of the house dated May 8, 1967—it is all very well to remind us what happened in 1868, 1887, 1920 or 1930, however there is one thing which has priority, and it is the standing orders of the House of Commons—does not specify anything on this subject. However, one standing order relates very closely to the case under consideration at the present time.

Standing order 56, paragraph 4, subparagraph (e), reads:

> When a motion "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair" is susperseded by the adoption of an amendment at any time before the expiry of either the said two days or the time carried forward from a former debate, as the case may be, a like motion may be forthwith made by a minister of the crown.

Which means that if a supply motion is put forward and defeated, the government is not necessarily defeated. It says that a minister may rise forthwith to move a like motion, that is to move once more that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair.

Under that standing order, if it is a financial matter, if the Speaker is requested to leave the chair for the house to meet in committee of the whole and to discuss supply, and if the proposal is not accepted by the whole house, it is superseded by an amendment duly voted on. Then, it is not necessarily a want of confidence vote, but a minister—and it is specified a minister of the crown—may make forthwith a like motion and then, it becomes a matter of confidence.

• (5:20 p.m.)

That is exactly what happens at the present time and nothing further is provided in our standing orders.

Mr. Speaker, for a much deeper reason, I think that it is intentionally that our standing orders do not provide anything more specific and that there is no mention thereof in the constitution. In fact, if we accept the principle by which, when a government bill is defeated, the government itself is defeated and a new election must take place, all members are forced to let their party's interests come before those of their electors. If, for a Liberal member, the fact that he votes against a bill, means that he votes against his party, then he has to choose between his party or his electors, and an hon. member should not be placed in a position where he would have to put a political party before his electors.

He is elected first by his constituents; if he belongs to a party, it is accidental but that is not the main reason why he was elected. He was elected first of all by his constituents and that case should be used to establish a very clear precedent, namely that each time a bill is introduced by the government, even a member of the party in office, that is, in the circumstances, a Liberal member, can vote against it without that being taken as a vote against the government. In my opinion, we have now striking evidence that the Liberal members, who are in office, can vote against a bill introduced by the government if they feel that it does not please their electors or if it goes against their conscience without running the risk of defeating the government or forcing an election.

Before what happened this week, no member of the party in office could be assured of that, but with the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), all Liberal members now have the assurance that defeating the government on a bill does not mean defeating the government itself, but rejecting the bill only. So, if in 15 days, the government comes back with a bill to increase another tax, and if a Liberal member feels that his constituents are against such an increase in taxes, he may say: My constituents do not want me to vote in favour of the bill, but that does not mean that I vote against my party; that means I vote for my constituents.

If I asked all Liberal members here: Are your constituents approving an increase of the income tax? They would all answer: No.

In the circumstances, it is their duty to vote against this bill.

Since our situation was not yet clear, and since the Liberal members were not sure that it would necessarily mean another election, they put the party above their constituents.

Therefore, we are now creating a precedent which will prevail for a long time, according to which the members commonly known as back-benchers, who are too seldom asked for their opinion and too often stopped from expressing their ideas and convictions, will be able to vote at any time against measures introduced by the government without it meaning that they are beating their own party, a minister, the leader of their party or the government, and without it necessarily leading to an election.

As for the members of the official opposition, the Conservatives who hope one day—I am not sure when—to come to power, the precedent set today will give them the same opportunity to vote against a measure presented by their government if they decide that the measure is a bad one and that it is contrary to the interests of their constituents.

This does not mean that the government is bad. It merely means that the bill introduced by the minister and the government is bad.

I shall give an example. Three or four months ago, the United States President, Mr. Johnson, asked the American Congress to vote a 10 per cent tax increase. Congress refused. Mr. Johnson is still President of the United States. The American congress voted against the 10 per cent tax increase asked by President Johnson. It was not any more serious than that. Mr. Johnson is still President of the United States.

It is the same thing in the present case. Democracy only exists when each and every member can actually vote on every piece of legislation as they see fit, according to their conscience and the interests of their constituents, rather than according to party lines.

It seems to me that the experience resulting from the precedent in the United States and the one we now have in the house should show us that true democracy is not a matter of supporting the party first, but rather the people we represent. But that was not clear in the minds of hon. members.

I am convinced that before the vote on Monday, 95 per cent of the Liberal members who voted for the bill were convinced that voting against the bill meant voting against the government and that an election would follow. But today it has become an extraordinary power for the Liberal members. They will now be able to vote against any estimate, motion or amendment introduced by the government without it being a vote of non-confidence.

It is as simple as that. You can vote against a measure, a bill, but not necessarily against the government. Hon. members should try to benefit from the lesson, and direct their vote in the future, not towards a minister of the government—he will stay there, a motion of non-confidence is necessary to defeat him —but thinking of their constituents. In 1963, that is what took place. The motion ended by those words: This government no longer has the confidence of the people. That was specific. But defeat a bill, that is not specific. The interests of the people must come before the interests of the party; we can defeat a measure without defeating the government, and we now have the best example of that.

Monday we defeated a finance bill, a bill asking for a tax increase. But this did not indicate a lack of confidence in the government. It simply meant that we objected to a tax increase.

That is how I understood it, Mr. Speaker. When I voted on Monday evening, I did not vote for or against the government. Every time I am asked to vote on a bill, I study it. If I think it is a good one, I vote for it; if it goes against my ideas or principles, I vote against it. I am not concerned whether the government is Tory or Grit. I examine what I am voting against or what I am voting for. On Monday, I voted against Bill No. C-193 which asked for an increase in personal income tax, and that is all I voted against.

A new measure was introduced in the house today. Because there was some doubt, we are asked to show our confidence in the government. The Conservative party said no, we do not have confidence in the government.

Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, and as the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) said, whether or not the Grits or the Tories, the Liberals or Conservatives are in power, it is pretty well the same thing. I have seen them in office. I have seen the Conservatives in office, and the Liberals in the opposition. Now, the Liberals are saying exactly the same thing the Conservatives said when they were on this side of the house. And the Conservatives on that side of the house are saying and doing exactly what the Liberals were doing when they were on that side. As far as I am concerned, it is the same thing. Put them all in the same bag and then pull out, two of them, you can not tell which is which. It is the same thing for me.

Then, whether we renew or refuse confidence to the Liberal party, depending on what the Conservative party will do, will we be any better, Mr. Speaker?

• (5:30 p.m.)

I am proud of that choice, very impartially. I do not intend to destroy parliament or the economy of the country. No. I shall try to reason out my problem; in the first place, there is no difference between the two old line parties. However, I say to myself: still, there is a slight difference. When a political party, as is the case with the Liberal party at present, is cornered, with its hands up in the air, and its pants down, it feels badly, and it is willing to say: No, I shall never do it again.

An hon. Member: So, let it pull up its pants.

Mr. Grégoire: That's just it, it pulls up its pants and says: I shall not do it again. That is the difference.

But if the Conservative party were to come back to power—suppose there was an election and it should be returned to power with a good majority—it would say: This is the legacy we took over from the Liberals. It would be in no hurry to get a move on, because its position would be secure.

But the Liberals are now cornered whether we like it or not.

There are 129 Liberal members plus one, namely the member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) who said he would vote for the Liberals, which gives 130 members. On the other side of the house, there are 130 other members. This gives us even numbers. In addition, there is my vote; the Speaker votes only in the case of a tie.

Now, this is the way I reason it out. I say to myself, one party is no better than the other. Under the present circumstances, the Liberal party is cornered and as it has to struggle a bit more, we may stand a chance of getting it to shake a leg a bit more than the others. The Liberal party knows it is in a difficult position. We do not need elections, and it knows it. It will be defeated and, now, it must be ready to accept a compromise. If not, nothing will work. If it agrees to make concessions, then I am willing to co-operate. Why? Because I tell myself that under the present circumstances, they will try a bit harder than before. They are cornered, they do not want to move. There is no need for elections, they are crying "Uncle", no more no less. So now all is well, they are saying "Uncle".

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact, there are 130 of them. They are saying, "Uncle". I am willing to help. That, in truth, is the present situation.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I have a very clear amendment to move, which does not hold any grudge against anyone, which will harm no one, but which, if passed, will at least force the Liberals to act.

My amendment reads as follows:

I move—

I have found someone to second my amendment, Mr. Speaker. I asked my friend the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) to second my motion. Further after he has seen my amendment I am convinced that the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) will also support me, to allow a debate on the amendment since I am alone against 130.

With his British fair play, my friend from York-Humber agreed; all I asked him to do was to support me. He is free to vote against the amendment, Mr. Speaker. All he is doing is to enable me to move my amendment and to discuss it. I am convinced that some other members of this house would have done likewise if I had explained the problem to them. Furthermore, the hon. member for Kootenay-West (Mr. Herridge) who is not here at present, would have also seconded my amendment. I am sure that the hon. member for Villeneuve would have done the same had he known.

So, I propose, seconded by the hon. member for York-Humber:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words following the word "that" and by substituting the following therefor:

Motion Respecting House Vote

"The house, while recognizing that the rejection of Bill No. C-193 on third reading forbids the government to increase the personal income tax for this year, is nevertheless disposed to renew its confidence in the government provided that it takes immediate steps to restore the economy of the country and to alleviate the serious unemployment problem, in particular by the following means:

The immediate reduction of interest rates for housing construction.

Mr. Caouette: Three quarters of 1 per cent.

Mr. Grégoire: You will approve that.

To continue:

The reinstatement of a 6 per cent ceiling for interest rates charged by banks.

An hon. Member: That is still too high.

Mr. Grégoire: Third, and I insist on this one:

The guarantee that everything will be done to keep the St. Lawrence and the Saguenay continually open to winter navigation.

Mr. Speaker, there is unemployment in my riding. I also thought of my riding.

The construction, to be undertaken as soon as possible, of a supporting wall from Rivière-aux-Sables to Jonquière.

I thought of the hon. member for Villeneuve; it is always possible to become allies. His air terminal is known to be unsatisfactory.

The building of an air terminal at Rouyn airport, in the riding of Villeneuve.

Now, I also tried to obtain the co-operation of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), and that of the hon. members for Quebec South (Mr. Cantin) and for Lévis (Mr. Guay), and of all those residing in or near Quebec city.

Harbour improvement work to be started as soon as possible in Quebec city harbour, as requested by the Quebec city municipal council.

Here is another matter that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration wishes to discuss:

The increase in the number of months of eligibility for the manpower training course, under the Manpower Retraining Act.

Those are very specific requests, Mr. Speaker.

Furthermore, the Government undertakes not to interfere again in the field of educational television which comes under provincial jurisdiction.

This government will also see to it that Bill C-186 is passed during this session.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

With that, I made enemies of my friends of the New Democratic Party.

This government will also see to it that the Quebec government, be handed back its authority over all measures of social welfare with tax compensation, according to the requests made by the Quebec government.

I thought of mentioning the monarchy, —which would have pleased the hon. member of Lotbinière (Mr. Choquete)—but I changed my mind.

If the government agrees to all those measures, this house will renew its confidence in it.

The Speaker: The hon. member knows that his motion must be seconded. He indicated that the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) was prepared to do so, but inasmuch as I cannot see anything in the motion which refers to the York-Humber constituency, I assume that the hon. member will decline to support the motion of the hon. member for Lapointe.

• (5:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Cowan: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I continue speaking on my amendment?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member be so kind as to wait for the decision of the Chair as to whether or not his amendment is in order. I believe the hon. member himself must have had some doubts when drafting the amendment; perhaps he could indicate to what degree he believes this motion is in order.

Mr. Grégoire: I do not believe at all I should have to explain it, since you have read it to the house. You said: "The hon. member for Lapointe, seconded by the hon. member for York-Humber, moves.. Shall I dispense"? So it is before the house and you cannot reverse your decision.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that the motion has to be read before the house so as to give the hon. members the opportunity to help the Chair decide whether the motion is in order or not. If any arguments are to be raised on that point, I shall hear them and shall be able to give my ruling afterwards.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, in the circumstances I believe the motion speaks for itself and should be accepted.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. For obvious reasons the motion is clearly out of order. It is as much out of order, as frivolous and as vexatious as the government motion appearing on the order paper and which is now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I had invited the hon. member for Lapointe to indicate whether he had any arguments to make on the point of procedure.

[Translation]

The hon. member who is an expert on matters of procedure will recognize that this amendment goes far beyond the very limited scope of the motion now under consideration. It is a substantive motion or proposal which could be discussed only after notice or unanimous consent of the house. For those reasons, I deem the motion out of order.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, convinced that my amendment was in order, I had not finished my remarks. If you had read it in full instead of dispensing with it, I feel that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I gave my ruling on that matter and I did not have to read the motion, because I heard it while the hon. member read it slowly and clearly. That was enough to enable me to reach the ruling I have just made.

Mr. Grégoire: Then, Mr. Speaker, as there remains a few minutes, may I continue my remarks?

I think that my program would restore confidence in the government. I am of the opinion that they should say something, state clearly what they advocate. But we have heard nothing at all on that subject. They should tell us exactly what they intend to do to justify the confidence of parliament. If they do not do so, I will not be ready to vote for them. If they have intentions, let them say so and we will then form an opinion. But if they say nothing, as did all Liberal members who spoke today—we see that they want to continue as in the past—I am not ready to support the government.

Moreover, if they want to tell us, to specify why they deserve the confidence of parliament, and what they intend to do, instead of telling us: If there are elections, there will be a dollar crisis—which is to frighten us, and I am no longer afraid of that—we will be able to reach a decision. Let them tell us exactly what they intend to do and why we should renew them our confidence. So I ask them this question: Do they intend to restore the economy, to lower unemployment in the country? Do they intend to act, to do something? If they answer yes, I shall support them. However, if they are not ready to tell us why we should put our confidence in them, I am not ready to support them.

That is why, in the end, it is up to the government to tell us what they intend to do, and on that we shall judge whether we should support them, not on what they have done in the past, for that is none too brilliant, none too outstanding. Besides, if we must judge on past record it is not worthwhile changing governments.

If they intend to improve the situation, to take measures to lower unemployment and restore the economy, let them say so, and we shall judge them according to their intentions and not in any blind fashion.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, after listening to this somewhat lengthy debate, I would with your permission read the motion that is before the house once more so as to get the motion before hon. members in such form that the points I intend to make in reference to it will be clear on the record. As has been said by other speakers, this is a very unusual motion. It is a sort of left-handed method of bringing something before the house after the government has been fired. The motion reads as follows:

> That this house does not regard its vote on February 19th in connection with third reading of Bill C-193, which had carried in all previous stages, as a vote of non-confidence in the government.

First of all, when you analyse and read the motion it seems to me that if the government felt it was on sound ground it would have brought in a simple motion of confidence or no confidence. What the government is trying to do—and if there are any tricks of the trade at all, they are on the other side of the chamber—is to revive a tax which has been voted down by the opposition, in total. That is what the government is trying to do. If they sneak this motion under the wire, they will try to bring back the tax in question.

I think at this stage it would pay to repeat our position, as far as the constitutional question in this situation is concerned. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we take the position that the government was defeated on so vital and fundamental a matter embracing their whole program and fiscal policy that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) now has a constitutional duty to the country. What is that constitutional duty? I suggest that the constitutional duty which he has to the country is the same constitutional duty that my party had on February 5, 1963, at which time the then prime minister, on his government's defeat, asked that the house be adjourned. I think the gentlemanly thing to do at this time would be to follow the same procedure.

I should like to refer to page 3463 of Hansard of February 5, 1963. However, before doing so I should like to say, after listening to government spokesmen today, that the impression is left that they think the mere terms of the bill or the mere statement that it is a vote of confidence or non-confidence alters the situation. I suggest to you, sir, that words in that regard do not alter the situation. If a bill is of such importance as this one, then the vote on it constitutes a vote of confidence in the government and it does not require a statement to this effect.

As I said, the situation last Monday was identical with the situation on February 5, 1963. At that time the main question before the house was that of nuclear weapons. Government supporters, who were then in opposition, voted down the Conservative government of that day. It is true that the motion before the house at that time was worded in such a way that it was only a motion of confidence. The point I want to make is that is a bill before the house is voted upon, regardless of whether it is on second or third reading, and is then defeated, that is the end of it. If it is a vital matter, it is a motion of confidence, and if it is defeated, the government should consider itself defeated just as effectively as if there were a straight motion of confidence before the house. I might point out that last Monday night the acting Prime Minister seemed to be completely lost. What did the prime minister and Conservative leader do on February 5, 1963? He said the following:

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I shall advise His Excellency the Governor General tomorrow.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), the adjournment of the house.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

The house was then adjourned and the leader of the Conservative government went to the Governor General and asked for dissolution. If this government gets away with what it wishes to do, I say it will destroy the very institution of parliament; it will destroy representative and responsible government. As my good friend behind me said, the government is setting up a dictatorship. We now have a king reigning in Canada for the first time, king Pearson I. He will not abdicate, nor will he quit when he is fired. He is like a tenant who will not leave when he is ejected.

That is exactly the position of this government. Surely there was an onus on the Prime Minister to go to the Governor General. If he did not wish to dissolve the house and go to the country, he should have asked the Governor General to ask someone else to form a government, someone who would have the confidence of the house and of the country.

As did all hon. members, I listened with interest to the Prime Minister speaking in the house today, and I listened to him on television. He gave us the impression in his appearance on television that he would quote from certain authorities to show that he had the legal and constitutional right to do what he was attempting to do—and which I and my party say his government has no constitutional right to do. Yet he never quoted from any authority. He merely referred to Jennings, who deals with situations when amendments are moved in a speech from the throne or on a budget and there is some question as to whether or not, when the government is defeated, the vote is to be considered a vote of confidence.

Ever since the government took office we have opposed their financial and economic policies. We have opposed the Gordon budget, we have opposed the sales tax, and we have opposed all the economic programs of this government. We have warned them that they would get into the financial debacle they face now.

The government takes great pride in Canada's image overseas. The house will recall that in 1962 and 1963, when the Liberal party which was then in opposition tried to blast the Diefenbaker government, its spokesmen referred to Canada's image abroad. I would like to read now an article in The Economist of September/October 1967. I believe it expresses the view of this party and of the Canadian people as a result of which the government has been fired, and is out. It has been defeated, not only on its tax bill but because the vote on the bill was a vote of confidence, since the bill deals with the whole economic program of the government. The article to which I refer appeared in an independent magazine which is recognized throughout the commonwealth and the United States as an authority on economics. This is what appears at page viii of The Economist for September/October 1967 and we agree with what is said here with reference to the policies of the Liberal government. It reads as follows:

Mr. Sharp, alas, cannot avoid the responsibility for inadequate fiscal action, the need for which he now seems belatedly to have realized. His budget did not revive last year's expansion, but it did nothing to stem the rise in costs and prices. Worst of all, it pushed interest rates higher, because the public was unwilling to absorb bonds, and generated a further increase in the money supply. There have been few examples of such a violent swing of the levers of economic control. Policies that would have been admirably suited to cope with a state of excessive under-utilisation of resources were continued well after demand was clearly pressing too hard on the limits of supply. This was not the fault of business, which was trying to cope with its own cost squeeze, but the fault of government,—

Why do they not come to grips with the question when every national newspaper in Canada has said to the government in the last few months that it has overspent, and that it has run the country into blue ruin. The article continues:

—but the fault of government, which ought to have been far more sensitive to the signals that the economy was making to it. When the governor of the bank was warning Canada against the impossibility of getting a quart, Ottawa seemed to be going for half a gallon.

This is a half gallon government. When they only had a quart of milk they asked for a gallon.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a half pint government.

Mr. Woolliams: As my friend says, it is a half pint government. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock this house stands adjourned.

Mr. Woolliams: Before adjourning, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) made some remark about a half wit. I would say to him that the reception he received from 2,000 ranchers in Calgary proves they know who the half-witted Minister of Agriculture is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock the house stands adjourned until 2.30 p.m. Monday afternoon.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
