BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the three parties and we have agreed to have a statement at this point regarding Remembrance Day, rather than at the usual time. Any time taken to provide for the statement this morning will be added on to the time at three o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is there agreement?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure today as Minister of Veterans Affairs, to remind all hon. members that Saturday is Remembrance Day, and this year, 1989, is a very special day in that it marks the seventy-fifth anniversary of the beginning of the First World War and the fiftieth anniversary of the Second World War.

[Translation]

This year two special anniversaries emphasize just how much is owed to those who did their duty for their country in war.

First, 1989 marked the 75th anniversary of the start of the Great War, the one that was called "the war to end all wars".

[English]

One in every 10 Canadians fought in the First World War. Historians have said that Canada came of age in the mud and the blood of the trenches of Europe. Certainly, the Commander of the Canadian Corps, Lord Byng, took that view. Recalling the Canadian capture of Vimy Ridge he said, and I quote:

> There they stood on Vimy Ridge that 9th day of April 1917, men from Quebec stood shoulder to shoulder with men from Ontario, men from the maritimes with men from British Columbia, and the prairies, and there was forged a nation tempered by the fires of sacrifice and hammered on the anvil of high adventure.

These are noble sentiments, and I think of them when I listen to cynics who sometimes question the patriotic commitment of Canadians.

[Translation]

This Saturday at the National War Memorial and at hundreds of cenotaphs and monuments throughout Canada, we will be remembering those who cared a lot about their country and were prepared to risk their lives to keep it free.

• (1010)

[English]

We will also be remembering those who made the same commitment when the Second World War began 50 years ago this year. Over one million of our men and women carried freedom in their hearts, and are still hailed as "the Canadian liberators" on our pilgrimages overseas.

We will also be honouring the Canadian volunteers who served under the United Nations flag in Korea and helped to preserve independence for strangers in a then largely unknown and foreign land thousands of miles away.

Well over 100,000 Canadians died in those three wars and many, many more returned home sick in body and mind. Even today Veterans Affairs is assisting 144,000 men and women for disabilities incurred in wartime service.

Many years ago these words were inscribed in the Memorial Chamber in the House of Commons, and I quote:

They are too near to be great but our children shall understand when and how our fate was changed and by whose hand.

[Translation]

It is good to know that the children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren of those veterans do indeed appreciate those who changed the fate of a nation. A recent opinion poll found Canadians have an impressive knowledge of what our country accomplished in war and 89 per cent of those polled think it is important to remember what our wartime role was.

[English]

They are not alone in that view. An English lady recently sent a letter to our High Commissioner in Great Britain. I want to quote from that letter. She said:

I was 15 years old when the 1939 war broke out and so I am quite well able to remember the immediate and totally generous support which Canada gave to this country 50 years ago.

Writing as one among so many, I can only send those volunteers in all the services from Canada my heartfelt thanks.

On Saturday, let us all add our heartfelt thanks to those who gained so much respect at home and abroad.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, as the official opposition critic for veterans affairs, it is my distinct honour today to rise on behalf of my colleagues to pay tribute to the more than 100,000 of our men and women who sacrificed their lives in three wars to make this country free, and to those veterans who survived, as the hon. minister said, and who are still struggling against the pain and the loneliness brought on by this conflict.

In preparing for this tribute today on the seventy-fifth anniversary, and in an effort to convey a feeling for the depth of personal sacrifice and the raw courage involved, I wish to read a short, but very poignant letter that I recently obtained from a family in Newfoundland, and I read it with their permission. It is a letter written to his mother from a young army lieutenant serving in France on the eve of a great battle on August 7, 1918. If the emotion felt is the same that one receives from reading this kind of letter, I think it will do great justice in helping us remember this occasion today.

Dearest Mother,

This is the evening before the attack and my thoughts are with you all at home, but my backward glance is wistful only because of memories and because of the sorrow which would further darken your lives should anything befall me in tomorrow's fray. Otherwise my eye is fixed on tomorrow with hope for mankind and with visions of a new world. A blow will be struck tomorrow which will definitely mark the turn of the tide. It will be one of a grand series of victories which will humble the selfish and barbarous enemy and will exalt the hearts of those who are suffering for freedom. I have no misgivings for myself in tomorrow's encounter. It does not matter whether I survive or fall. A great triumph is certain, and I shall take part in it. I shall strike a blow for freedom, along with thousands of others who count personal safety as nothing when freedom is at stake. In a few moments I shall make the final address to my men, and shall strengthen their hearts, if they need strengthening, with the language of men at war. We shall strive only to achieve victory. We shall not hold our own lives dear. The hour is all the more dramatic for me because for the first time since I came to France, I am close to the spot consecrated by the blood of our gallant dead. It was here that noble Raymond fell and Joe and Kenneth shed their blood in freedom's cause.

These were his three brothers.

I trust to be as faithful as they.

I do not think for a moment that I shall not return from the field of honour, but in case I should not, give my last blessing to father, and my latest thanks for all he did for me. Give my blessing to my brother Roland and his family and to the others who may survive me.

I have no regrets and no fear of tomorrow. I should not choose to change places with anyone in the world just now, except perhaps General Foch.

How glad I am that at last the hour has come for me to taste vengeance! I shall be my mother's and father's son tomorrow. Again God bless you all.

Your son, Hedley.

Lieutenant Hedley Goodyear, in his early twenties, was killed the following day.

As we witness from the extraordinary surges underway today freedom and peace cannot be addressed just by legislative bodies or by armies. As we have seen in this letter, these are personal matters, to which Remembrance Day is a testimonial and to the attainment of which it is a challenge.

On Saturday, November 11, we will mark our respect by wearing poppies, by attendance at church and memorial services, and parades, and by the laying of wreaths at cenotaphs. Let us remember that because these courageous Canadians conscientiously discharged their duties we have peace today. We survive because they were more concerned with their duties than they were concerned with their rights. Let the poppies be worn, let the parades march on, let the cenotaphs be visited, but let there be freedom and let there be peace.

The strength and unity of our country rests on its past. Let us remember this also in the days ahead.

We should remember, we must remember, we will remember.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me as a veteran and as critic for veterans affairs for my party to take part in this tribute to our veterans who served in three wars.

I want to start by quoting Greg Hogan who is Secretary of the Royal Canadian Legion, Dominion Command, when he was asked: "What are the veterans trying to teach today's students?" He said that the Legion made that clear when it pointedly ignored the fiftieth anniversary of the start of the Second World War last September. He went on to say: "Veterans don't mark the beginnings of wars. They celebrate their end".

Colonel McCrea's poem says, in part:

> If ye break faith with us who die
> We shall not sleep, though
> poppies grow
> In Flanders fields.

We must continue to enlarge our efforts not to break faith. Ever improving benefits for veterans and their families is an important part of keeping that faith. Even more important in keeping faith is what we do to promote and work for disarmament and peace. Peace is more than just the absence of war. Maintaining peace wherever it is achieved is a never-ending struggle.

• (1020)

Developments in Europe and between the superpowers over the past few years have opened the doors wider than ever to huge reductions in arms, both nuclear and conventional. It is past time for Canada to take a more leading role in those efforts.

Canada can keep the faith with those who died by offering to be among the first to take part in the reduction of conventional forces in Europe. We must resist more than ever those who would have us keep up the outdated thinking of its "us" or "them", that forces must be kept as large as they are as some kind of a deterrence.

Mr. Speaker, to quote Matthew, chapter 5, verse 9, in the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus said:

> Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.

I submit to you, Sir, and to this House, equally blessed are the peacekeepers: for they carry on the keeping of the faith with those who served and died in those three wars.

I want to include in this tribute those many hundreds of Canadians who have served our country and the world so well with the United Nations Peacekeeping Forces.

Beginning some 25 or 30 years ago, Canada was among the first to play that peacekeeping role. We have served in the Middle East, we are still in Cyprus keeping the peace. We have just sent several hundred peacekeeping troops to Namibia, including 100 men and women from the RCMP, to assist a new nation that is having its first election and gaining its independence and freedom.

That to me, and I think to all hon. members, is the best way to keep the faith with those who died, by working harder and harder to keep the peace.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to stand for one minute's silence.

[Editor's note: Whereupon the House stood in silence for one minute.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte) moved:

That this House approve the recommendation contained in the Second Report of the Standing Committee on Transport, calling for a moratorium in the Government's proposed cuts to VIA Rail.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not take a moment to congratulate my three colleagues in the House, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, and my colleague from Regina for their most eloquent words. In fact, they are the most eloquent words I have heard in many a year in this House from three members on the occasion of Remembrance Day.

I am pleased to speak to the motion which stands in my name on behalf of the Liberal Party, but I suspect it stands in the name of many members of Parliament from all three political parties. It is quite traditional on an opposition day when a motion is put before the House that the motion would read along the lines that the opposition condemns, or the House condemns the government, et cetera. I want members to note the way in which this particular opposition motion is written. It states:

That this House approve the recommendation contained in the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport, calling for a moratorium on the government's proposed cuts to VIA Rail.

It is a motion that is cast in the affirmative. It is a motion that does not ask for approval of the work of a particular political party. It is a motion that does not seek partisan advantage for any political party or ideology, but rather it is a motion that seeks the approval of the whole House for the work of a standing committee of this House, a committee comprised of members from all three parties, Liberals, New Democrats and Conservatives.

It is a motion that calls for the approval of the consideration and the judgment of the group of members from all three parties in this place who are charged with the responsibility to reflect upon, study and to pass comment on the transportation policy of the government. It is a non-partisan motion. It seeks no advantage for any party; it seeks to strike no blow at any party.

In the spirit of parliamentary reform, it calls upon Parliament to take note of the observations of a group of members, men and women, charged on behalf of Canadians to examine the estimates and to examine the policy of the Department of Transport.

Why am I taking the time to point that out? Why am I making such a fuss about that? I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. It is indeed a rare day in this place when a standing committee is prepared to say of a government initiative, and it takes great courage on the part of all of its members, including Conservative members, that we have given consideration to that government initiative, in this case the cuts to VIA Rail and the elimination of 50 per cent of the routes and 2,700 jobs. We have given that government initiative our consideration. We do not come out with a report that says it is an evil design, it is a brutal measure, it is an arrogant decision. We could have, but we did not.

We comment substantially as a committee, as a non-partisan group, on the cuts. We make some very compelling arguments to the government, as members from all three parties, that the decision that has been taken has been taken in haste, the implications of those cuts are not well understood, and the future of VIA Rail is, at best, and that is putting it very kindly, highly questionable, if these cuts proceed as they are ordered to do in just two months time on January 15.

Let us review for a moment what the government has put before the people of Canada. The Prime Minister has said that they have developed a plan which he believes will save VIA Rail. Intrinsic to that plan is to eliminate 2,700 jobs at VIA Rail; to eliminate every service other than the major corridor service in Atlantic Canada; to reduce the frequency of VIA Rail services on the major corridor routes between Windsor and Quebec city dramatically; to eliminate The Canadian train, historic not only in this country but renowned around the world; and to do all of that at a time when there is no new money to purchase new equipment or to revitalize VIA Rail.

The worst critics of this decision have said that it is a plan designed to fail. This is a built-in obsolescence policy. As you cut the feeder routes, eliminate the frequencies in the major corridor cities and eliminate routes like The Canadian, a great tourism draw for Canada around the world, surely that is a plan which in 18 months will result in yet a further decline of VIA ridership. Finally, the government will come to the House 12 to 18 months from now and say that the new statistics show ridership has gone down yet again, so let us now sever entirely the lifeblood of VIA Rail.

This committee, made up of members from all three parties, heard from spokespeople from right across Canada about the future of VIA Rail. The people who came before us represented every single possible political stripe. We heard from the mayors of all the major corridor cities, representing every political stripe. We heard from all of the railway unions. We heard from the major tourism associations of Canada. We heard from business organizations in Canada. We heard from provincial governments representing a variety of political stripes. The testimony we heard was almost unanimous in saying that VIA Rail, that ribbon of steel that built this country, is fundamental to maintaining this country.

As I stand to address this motion concerning the future of VIA Rail and to beg the government in an non-partisan way to listen to what members of Parliament have said, it is ironic that across the street today 10 Premiers and a Prime Minister are sitting down to discuss the economy of this country and to discuss as well the constitutional future of this country.

As they discuss legal terms defining the potential constitutional renewal of Canada, and as they look at macro and micro economic models for Canada's economic development, it is ironic that if we go across this country today and ask Canadians to give an example of something that contributes to nation building and holding this nation together, the vast majority of them will not revert to macro or micro economic models, nor will they present us with an alternate plan for constitutional renewal, but they will say that a rail service linking this country, as vast and as sparsely populated as it is, is fundamental to national unity.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, who is being hurt when the Government of Canada decides to eliminate VIA Rail? It is ironic indeed that we paid tribute today to the 100,000 veterans of Canada. A majority of those veterans are senior citizens. Together, with millions of other senior citizens, they depend on VIA Rail.

Today on the Hill there is to be a rally by the Canadian Federation of Students. It will be a large demonstration, demanding that the Government of Canada at least pay attention to their concerns. Millions of students in Canada depend upon VIA Rail. The poor and the disabled depend upon VIA Rail. For all these citizens VIA Rail is not a luxury item. It does not represent a pleasant disposal of a few hours on the train; it is a fundamental, basic and affordable means of transport.

The Minister of Transport says; "But that's okay. If they can't take VIA Rail, they can fly." Well, it may be true that the Minister of Transport can fly. It may be true that I can fly and most of my colleagues can fly. It may be true that the business community can fly because it is charging it back to the office account, but senior citizens do not have office accounts and our young people do not have office accounts to use as a tax write-off. The poor and the disabled do not have office accounts. What they have had and what they depend upon is VIA Rail.

What does this report say to the government? Does it say: "Let's maintain VIA Rail in its current form forever"? Does it say: "Let's run the deficits the Prime Minister says he is concerned about forever?" No, it does not. It says clearly that VIA Rail as currently constituted with the equipment it has is not acceptable and it says clearly that the solution is not destroying a rail passenger service in Canada. It is rebuilding a rail passenger service in Canada, building a modern, efficient, high speed, environmentally friendly mass means of transport rail passenger service.

It points out that every other nation in the western and industrialized world is entering the year 2000 with a modern, high speed, efficient, environmentally clean rail passenger service, save one. Every other nation in the world as an investment in their future says that they cannot go on congesting airports, congesting highways and polluting our environment. Every other nation in the world, it seems, understands the Haida saying: "We don't inherit the land from our ancestors. We borrow it from our children." Every other nation in the world wants to give back the land to their children in good shape, environmentally clean, with affordable means of transportation.

Canada alone among the nations of the world says: "No, we are going to go backward. We cannot do it. We do not have the resolve. We do not have the finances. We do not have the technology, nor do we have the vision". The standing committee rejects that concept by the Government of Canada. We believe we do have the vision. We do have the know-how. We do have the resolve, and Canadians are prepared to make a proper investment in their future by building a modern, efficient rail passenger service.

What do we recommend in this report? We recommend that the government impose a moratorium on those cuts that are to be implemented on January 15. We say it ought not to go ahead. We say, as well, that the royal commission on transportation announced by the Prime Minister on the same day that the government announced the VIA Rail cuts ought to be given a mandate to examine the future of VIA Rail. The royal commission should tell this Parliament and through Parliament all Canadians what role, if any, VIA Rail or rail passenger service has in the future of this country.

What could be more reasonable than that? We did not establish the royal commission on transportation; the Prime Minister did. He did it on the same day that he announced the VIA Rail cuts. The Prime Minister has said he has great confidence in the chairman of that commission, confidence in all of its members, confidence in their ability to give us a blueprint for transportation in Canada.

He asks us to accept his statement at face value. Surely if you are to have a royal commission and listen to what it reports, it is foolish to cut train service first and ask a royal commission after the fact whether you have done the right thing. If the government has the confidence it says it has, if the Prime Minister personally has the confidence he says he has in this royal commission, then refer the whole question of the future of VIA Rail to the royal commission and in a year from now they can tell this Parliament what they think the role of rail passenger service is in Canada's future.

I am not used to taking that kind of non-partisan approach. I have to admit that I have a few partisan bones in my body. I have to tell you that there are other words I could use to describe this decision of the government. I will not do that today because you know I am appealing, not for the votes of the people who are watching, but appealing to members opposite. I am appealing to Conservative members of Parliament to take a stand in exactly the same way that Conservative members of the transport committee took a stand, exercised their best judgment, exercised their individual conscience, heard what their constituents, who had reason enough to doubt this decision, were saying and were prepared to buck the party line.

I am not used to saying anything nice about Tories. It is a rare day. It could cost me the vote of a few right-to-the-backbone Liberals in Newfoundland talking this way, but the issue is bigger than partisanship. The issue is bigger than merely making sure that those who are upset about VIA Rail will not vote Tory. The real issue for us here is to see whether or not we can save a rail passenger service in this country.

Across the street today at the conference on the economy the premiers of Canada, representing every political stripe, are saying to the Prime Minister this morning that they agree with the report of a lowly, humble collection of members who make up the Standing Committee on Transport. They are saying: "We think they have done good work. We think their recommendation is worth considering and we, too, call upon the Prime Minister to pay attention to the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and to declare a moratorium on the cuts to VIA Rail and to refer this matter to the Prime Minister's royal commission for consideration." I ask members in this House and, in particular, I ask members on the government side to find a way to get a message to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Transport, to the cabinet, that this decision to slash, cripple, and cut VIA Rail is wrong. It is a decision not to cut fat, not to cut muscle, but to cut beyond the muscle and into the bone marrow and bleed it dry. This decision is wrong. Canada deserves better. As a nation we need a modern, efficient mass transportation system, a rail passenger service. We have an obligation to those least fortunate among us and those who most depend upon this rail service to ensure that it continues.

I cannot help but note, as many members would note because we are politicians, what has been happening in the public opinion polls these days. I dare to offer some advice to my friends opposite. The polls are not a reflection, as much as I would like to think they are, of the tremendous and overwhelming job that we in the opposition benches are doing. They are not a tribute to the tremendous ability at Question Period, either in this party or in that party. They are not a tribute to our oratorical skills. They are not a tribute to our powers of persuasion but we do our job as honestly and as effectively as we can. The polls are a reflection of government policy. The goods and services tax is a policy being imposed upon the people of Canada despite the opposition of every premier of Canada and every region of Canada—

Mr. Wappel: And the people of Canada.

Mr. Tobin: -and the people of Canada. Then there are the cuts to VIA Rail, again a fundamental service to Canadians, that could give us a chance to go into the future confident and prepared for the year 2000. Those cuts are opposed by every premier of Canada, opposed by the people of Canada. I say to members opposite, and particularly to members who support this cabinet, the back-benchers, that the eyes and the ears of the people of Canada are on those back-benchers. They are watching them. They are weighing their words. They believe the time has come that members have to speak and reflect the values of their constituents and stand up and be counted, not in the name of opposing a particular political Party or supporting another, but in the name of the legitimate aspirations of Canada.

I say to those who choose to remain silent, and I know that many share my views, the people of Canada are becoming increasingly impatient and you ought not to try their patience too far. Make a stand for parliamentary reform, make a stand for Canada, stand for yourself because I know, in your conscience, those opposite cannot support these brutal cuts to VIA Rail.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis, I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 15 minutes.

Mr. Layton: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte has today reopened the debate relating to subsidies for VIA Rail. These subsidies totalled over $600 million in 1988 and supported travellers on some lines to the tune of hundreds of dollars per trip. The hon. member supports the motion that was passed by a committee to the extent that a moratorium be applied to the reductions in the costs of VIA Rail. My question to the hon. member would be: How does he propose to pay for it?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Layton: No, I am going to ask two or three questions. I know that the member is anxious to be on his feet and answer another question, but I really wonder about my young friend's position on this. Is he aware that every $100 million we add to the debt is one day going to be on the backs of our children and grandchildren? How would he propose, other than by fiscal management which this government is introducing, that we reduce the cost of government and reduce the debt in the future?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my "not-so-young" friend, who has been here since 1984, that in my experience since 1980 governments at the end of the day have to make choices. I find it really somewhat amazing that my colleague opposite would say: "How are you going to pay for this?" Canadians are asking how it is that when the government makes choices it has no problem displacing three million Canadians—and those are the government's own estimates, not mine—three million Canadians who rode the rails in 1988 and will not do so next year because there is no space for them. Canadians are asking how the government has no trouble displacing those three million Canadians for $600 million a year, and the government equally has no problem spending $1 billion so that we can give a couple of Canadians a ride on the American space shuttle program.

The space program cost $1 billion. I am just giving some examples. It cost $1 billion to get the Minister of the Environment elected in a by-election. To give one guy a ride, a ticket to the House of Commons, the government laid out $1 billion during a by-election. I did not hear members opposite saying: "That is an awful ungodly price to pay for Lucien Bouchard". We could ride six million people, over two years, for the cost of getting the Minister of the Environment into Parliament.

What I am saying is it is very misleading for the member to stand and say that a figure that represents 0.6 of 1 per cent of the total budget is a tremendous amount of money, and then ask what are we going to cut and how are we going to pay for it. I am suggesting and what the committee is suggesting is that the government is going to have to spend more than the $600 million. If it truly believes that Canada alone among nations must go into the year 2000 without a rail passenger service, then follow this decision. Let us follow this decision. Let us put more cars and millions more people on the highways, let us congest even more Toronto International and other airports around the country. Let us pollute this environment. The government has obviously come to the conclusion that with the destruction of the tropical jungles of this planet, there will not be a planet in 15 or 20 years anyway. Let us save our pennies in the piggy bank now.

When I go to buy a house, I expect to have to pay a great deal of money up front, more than I would like to pay of my disposable income because I am making an investment in my future and the future of my family. I believe that that kind of investment is necessary in Canada.

The reason VIA is losing money today is that the equipment is 35 years old. VIA has been raped—a strong word but I have to use it—by CN. VIA pays four to five times as much to ride CN rails as Amtrak in the United States is charged to ride American company rails. Why is that? VIA Rail has a president who is also president of CN. It is like the Liberal party having a president who is also president of the Tory party. We would be laughed out of town. This government has no problem appointing a president of VIA Rail who is also president of CN, and CN charges VIA Rail several hundred million dollars a year to ride its rails. What kind of a conflict of interest is that?

I said I did not want to be partisan but the member is sorely tempting me. I had better bite my tongue and sit down.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte for his eloquent pleading that this House approve the recommendations contained in the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport calling for a moratorium on the government's proposed cuts to VIA Rail. He argued we should have a moratorium while the Royal Commission on a National Passenger Transportation System proceeds with its study. In contrast the government has indicated that the commission will proceed even after the VIA cuts had happend.

I am reminded of the story about asking an orthopaedic surgeon to first amputate the legs of a patient and then do a study as to whether the operation was required to begin with. That is the wrong approach. I can see from the member's presentation that indeed this government has a policy of annihilation of VIA for this country.

Could the member indicate to the House the composition of the Standing Committee on Transport as to who constitutes the majority on this committee in terms of the representation from the three political parties? Second, is this very issue on the top agenda of the First Ministers' Conference now ongoing?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the member asked about the composition of the standing committee. The standing committee is made up of eight Conservative members, four Liberal members and two New Democratic Party members. So the Conservatives have a clear majority. All of the votes that could have been exercised that day were exercised. A full complement was in place when the committee took this vote, and it had a clear majority. I do not want to say which Conservatives voted for or against. I do not think it is appropriate in the spirit of reform. The meeting was in camera. It was private. I do not seek to embarrass any individuals, but it should be clear to everybody that this report, which was laid before the House yesterday, and this debate which is occurring today, could only have occurred if Conservative members of Parliament joined with opposition members in saying that the decision of the Government of Canada was wrong.

I want to re-emphasize that this is not a partisan statement. This is a statement from the members who have been charged by Parliament to examine transportation policy. These are people who make it their business every single day to be involved in transportation issues, people who have on many other occasions approved of government initiatives, people whose first role in Parliament in terms of their obligations beyond their constituency is the transportation policy of Canada. That is the group, with the majority Conservative members, that has said this decision to proceed with cuts on January 15 is wrong for Canada.

All I can say is now is the time for Canadians right across this country to get out their pen, get out their paper, to write their members of Parliament to once again tell us how you feel because I think there may be a thaw occurring across the way and perhaps as a consequence there is some chance for VIA Rail.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will entertain a question from the hon. member for Nepean and then the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona, and if we could get in with the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona, we will, before eleven o'clock. Point of Order, the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have raised this many times in the House. The instruction with respect to the question and comment period is clear. The Chair is advised to recognize members of parties other than the person who is speaking, if such members are rising. In the absence of members rising from parties other than the person who is speaking, the Chair is free to recognize people from that party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Generally it can be that practice, but the hon. member for Winnipeg—Strathcona was not in the House, then sitting there and not rising. The hon. member for Nepean was rising. The hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona was rising. I said if there is time I will call upon the hon. gentleman.

Mrs. Gaffney: First of all, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte for a very compelling speech on the reasons for relooking at VIA Rail and the needs of Canadians right across the country.

My question arises from the statement from the member on the government side of the House and I would like my colleague's opinion on how we would propose paying for VIA Rail. We have all known that the manufacturers' sales tax—and the government side of the House has known this since 1984—that there is a $350 million loophole annually where moneys were being lost in revenue to the Government of Canada. The government has known this since 1984 and has not plugged this loophole.

I would like my colleague's comments with regard to the deficit for operating VIA Rail. Does he see that this money could have been moved over toward the VIA Rail deficit and it could have reduced that in some manner?

Mr. Tobin: I want to point out that the committee—and I do not have time to go into details—does not believe the government will save one penny on the deficit by cutting VIA Rail. We had some very noted economists come before our committee—again non-partisan contributions—who said that when you have taken the loss of tourism dollars, the loss of jobs, the loss of direct and indirect spin-offs to the economy, the pay-out in social welfare programs and unemployment insurance, the additional cost in having increasingly clogged highways and airports and building new runways, you are not going to save a cent. All you are going to do is spend more money in other areas and in the process congest highways, congest our airports, and most shocking of all, pollute this fragile environment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 35, the House will now proceed to statements by members under Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, according to an article in today's edition of The Gazette of Montreal signed by Andrew McIntosh, a Granby engineer would have been given assurances by the Office of the Prime Minister that an RCMP investigation in the Gravel case would not result in any charges being laid against the individual in question. Those are very troubling allegations, particularly in view of the fact that this House has heard of similar accusations as a result of incidents earlier this week. Because of the sub judice rule, I cannot describe those incidents in any great detail.

In the space of a few days we have heard of possible political interference by the government in two separate RCMP investigations. The independence of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police from any political interference or possible political interference is of paramount importance to the proper administration of justice in this country.

These allegations must be looked into. If they are unfounded, so much the better. If they turn out to be true, the House will have to deal with this issue and more particularly the government should respond as soon as possible.

S. O. 31

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the situation in Lebanon I am pleased that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has accepted a number of recommendations proposed by the immigration committee.

Yet, by refusing to accept that a special designated class be created to assist the Lebanese with resettlement, the Minister of Employment and Immigration sent a clear signal that the government is not seriously prepared to extend a hand of welcome to those afflicted by strife. Her outright rejection will certainly further the 80 per cent rejection rate of Lebanese trying to escape the hardships of civil war.

Clearly, by accepting only Lebanese with family members in Canada, the signal the minister and her government is sending out is that those Lebanese without family members need not apply. The minister's mixed response to the report and her rejection of the special designated class is truly perplexing since, after all, it was the high refusal rate of Lebanese citizens to Canada which initially triggered the standing committee's report.

In light of her actions I urge the minister and the government not to reject categorically the option of creating a special designated class, should the fighting resume and intensify and should the accepted changes not ameliorate the situation in Lebanon significantly.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, northern and isolated Canadians could soon be gouged and screwed twice over, not only by the upcoming goods and services tax but also by the savage cuts to their northern tax benefits. The task force on these benefits has recently recommended that the Minister of Finance simplify the northern and isolated benefit system. The task force has drawn the northern line across this country in such a way that 83 per cent of all communities now receiving benefits will lose them.

On behalf of these communities and the caucus of northern New Democratic members of Parliament, I say that this is completely unacceptable. We do not need a so-called simple benefits system. We need a fair system that takes into account the extremes of isolation and climate in Canada.

New Democrats have initiated a petition campaign against this unfair government tax grab. Canadians from northern B.C., Alberta, northern Ontario and elsewhere who do not have a New Democratic Party MP can call or write any of our offices to receive this petition and to fight this government tax grab.

ECONOMIC REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENTS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Agriculture for the effort they put into the signing of the recent ERDAs in my province. Both agreements total approximately $50 million.

I know that I speak on behalf of the minister of fisheries and the minister responsible for agriculture in the province of New Brunswick as well as the Premier.

These are very important agreements for the province of New Brunswick, so I do thank the federal government, the Minister of Agriculture, and our federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for expediting these very important agreements.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, Friday is the tenth anniversary of the great train derailment in Mississauga in which 250,000 residents were evacuated from their homes.

CP Train 54 was carting a shipment of toxic chemicals and the accident had the potential of becoming one of the most devastating man-made disasters in history. Ten years later a similar accident could still occur.

According to the union representing railway car men and train safety inspectors, CP and CN railways have laid off more than 2,000 safety inspectors since the 1979 derailment. When this government made the decision to deregulate the Canadian transportation industry, it accepted a responsibility to increase the emphasis on monitoring safety standards.

On the anniversary of the Mississauga derailment and after hearing the preliminary conclusions of the Dryden inquiry, the minister should assure this House that the Royal Commission on Transportation will set a priority on establishing new national safety standards for the industry.

KIDNAPPINGS

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Michelle Duquette of Val d'Or is under great stress today because she is trying to get her son back who was taken away by her ex-husband, a U.S. citizen of Egyptian origin living in the United States.

Last May, the Superior Court of Quebec gave Mrs. Duquette custody of her six-year old son for the duration of the school year. On June 24, Mrs. Duquette, acting in good faith, sent Kareen to his father's home in New Jersey for the summer holidays. The child was supposed to come back in time for the new school year, but his mother has not seen him since.

Mr. Speaker, I know this is a legal matter, but it is above all a human tragedy. Will the decision of our Canadian courts be respected, in accordance with the Convention of The Hague in effect since July, 1988, between Quebec and the United States?

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, today the Canadian Federation of Students is converging on Parliament Hill. Students are here from every part of Canada to protest the frontal attack this government has made on post-secondary education.

Education is not just a concern for students. Canada's future prosperity is dependent upon a highly educated workforce, trained men and women who are prepared to confront the rapidly changing world economy and ensure Canada's place in international markets.

Yet the response of this government is to slash spending on education. The government has introduced Bill C-33, which together with cuts implemented by the government three years ago will cut nearly $7 billion from education over nine years.

This follows the disgraceful record of the Liberals who slashed university funding in the infamous 6 and 5 program of former Finance Minister MacEachen. This is a full retreat from education by the federal government. The regions are being hung out to dry and the groundwork is being laid for privatization of universities.

Education will soon be out of reach for ordinary Canadians. Along with student representatives from across Canada, I and the New Democratic Party demand a return to fair and adequate funding for post-secondary education.

Rhetoric from the Prime Minister is not enough. The government needs to commit itself now to Canadian students, to Canadians in general, and to the future of the country.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the Minister of Justice for his decision to extradite the suspected mass murderer, Charles Ng. This decision will send a strong message that Canada is not a safe haven for criminals from other countries.

In a survey of my constituents they massively supported the position that criminals like Ng be returned to their own countries. It is clear that Canadians will not tolerate our laws being used to shelter foreign criminals.

It is clear to me that discretionary power granted to the minister under Article 6 of the Canada-U.S. Extradition Treaty serves to protect Canadian interests. It is also clear that the decision to block extradition must be carefully considered.

In this case the decision to allow extradition was a proper course to follow. I am still disturbed that Mr. Ng may yet remain in Canada for some time to come. I trust the minister will take whatever action is necessary to ensure that in the future the extradition process will proceed much more quickly.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, for two weeks now 1,500 parole officers have been on strike. The salaries of these parole officers are 14 per cent behind those of their counterparts in Ontario and 24 per cent behind those in Quebec. Is it any wonder they want a better deal?

For two and a half years the government has been negotiating this contract. It took until this week to put a serious offer on the table and get the unions back to the bargaining table. Tension is building in the prisons across Canada. There are 8,000 parolees out in our communities without normal supervision. Tempers are rising and patience is wearing thin. Inmates are being denied family visits; absences for Christmas may be jeopardized. People eligible for parole are being kept in prison.

Just as important, included in this group of workers are those who provide services to our veterans and their survivors. They ensure that they get the social, health and financial assistance they need. It includes those who serve native Indians across Canada with alcoholism treatment programs and child protection programs. All are being denied services while the President of Treasury Board plays games.

I urge the minister and the government to ensure that these negotiations conclude quickly so that these people can get back to work.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of a very important First Ministers' Conference here in Ottawa. It is obvious that there are serious problems and disagreements across our country. We would encourage all participants to look at our nation as a whole rather than as individual provinces or regions, because it is only as a whole that we will be a strong and viable nation.

I would encourage the Prime Minister to maintain his position of strong national leadership and policies of reconciliation and fairness to all Canadians. As a proud British Columbian I am firmly convinced that we need Quebec and Quebec needs us.

Thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, for your hard work and leadership in keeping us together.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the most important industrial investment in Drummondville's history. CDM Laminates Inc., a branch of Uniboard Canada, intends to set up a new plant in my riding that will produce decorative paper facings for low-pressure panels. This is part of an industrial project that will cost over $81 million and is expected to create 145 new jobs in the next few years.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted with the plans for these new facilities, whose production will be mostly exported to overseas destinations but will also help replace imports.

The activities of this company will result in a major transfer of technology from Europe, which will benefit not only Drummondville but the whole country.

This project represents new industrial activity in Drummondville that will have a very positive impact on current economic development, thanks to the involvement of the Canadian Government.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I told the House that the best estimates of the amount of new carbon dioxide that will be produced by the OSLO and Hibernia projects range from 20 to 35 million metric tons. That is an increase of between 4 per cent and 7 per cent of Canada's current total CO_2 emissions.

Unfortunately these estimates are necessarily vague because as incredible as it may seem no one has yet undertaken anything approaching a thorough study of probable CO_2 emissions from OSLO and Hibernia.

The environmental impact study done on the Hibernia project in 1985 does not even mention CO_2 emissions. And, so far, no government department has yet begun a serious assessment of CO_2 emissions from OSLO.

We are tired of hearing the environment minister utter pious platitudes about the importance of the environment in government decision making when every major action undertaken by the government shows a literally breathless disregard for the environment.

As a bare minimum the government must now commit itself to a thorough assessment of CO_2 emissions from both projects before they proceed.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to those Canadians who sacrificed their lives for our country during war. While many brave soldiers did not return, many others did, and to the ones who did return I want to thank people like my father and thousands of other Canadians who fought for Canada so that I and many others of my generation would not have to experience the horrors of war.

Yes, this is a great country, strong and free, one of the greatest societies in the world. On behalf of all the people in Elk Island, I wish to recognize the tremendous sacrifice of the previous generation for my generation.

Let us all teach our children about the futility of war so that they will also experience a Canada of peace.

FINANCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, Canadians awoke this morning to the news that the Canadian dollar has reached an all time 10-year high.

Some people think the strength of the dollar is a good thing. The fact is that the stronger the dollar, the weaker the economy. That can be seen in the deplorable state of our export markets. Our current accounts are now at the lowest rate they have been in 10 years. The fact of the matter is that for every additional cent added to the dollar we lose $1.3 billion in exports.

I know members opposite do not care about our export market because they have already sold out that market, but the fact of the matter is that every time the dollar rises it is the regions that produce our resources, our export earners in wood, fish, grain, potash and minerals, that suffer.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker: it is about time the Minister of Finance forgot his foolish obsession to the goods and services tax, his ill-begotten attempt to force this country into bankruptcy, and started to really manage the economy, to get the interest rates down and get the dollar down so that Canada can begin competing again in world markets.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, on November 7, the Minister of Agriculture released a discussion paper entitled Growing Together. This paper incorporates the concerns expressed by farmers over the past four years and lays the foundation for an effective dialogue among partners in agriculture—the producer, the federal government and the provincial governments.

This paper outlines pillars essential for growth in the Canadian agri-food industry. These pillars are market responsiveness, self-reliance, regional sensitivity and environmental sustainability. They are essential to Canada and Canadian farmers maintaining the leading edge as producers of high quality foods.

I encourage all producer organizations, individual farmers and politicians from all levels of government to examine this document carefully. Now is the time for communication on this important issue. Let us get our thoughts on the table so that fruitful discussion can take place and a new comprehensive agricultural policy can be put in place for the 1990s and beyond.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. There is a great deal of confusion with respect to the goods and services tax, and it is becoming a question now of who Canadians can believe on this matter. I think they deserve to know the truth about the goods and services tax.

In an interview that we have referred to in this House this week the Minister of Finance was asked about the province's position on the goods and services tax and he said: "They have agreed. Behind closed doors, they will say you've got to go ahead with this, Mike; no question of that."

The minister has said federal studies show that the effect of the goods and services tax on nine of the provinces would be neutral to positive. The provinces, as the Deputy Prime Minister will know, released a report last night in which it is stated that the goods and services tax could cost the provinces in this country $6.9 billion and result in the loss of 434,000 jobs between 1991 and 1993.

Will the government now at last make public its studies so that Canadians can determine exactly what the impact of the goods and services tax will be on them? In other words, let us find out who is telling the truth about the goods and services tax.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, this morning described the analysis which was made yesterday as a ridiculous distortion of reality, and I stand by that. It is based on a study made by the Conference Board, and I would like to remind the hon. member that over the last few weeks the Conference Board has been all over the place.

A few weeks ago it said that the GST would probably result in a loss of 200,000 jobs. Then later it said: "Oops, we've made a mistake. It will not be 200,000 jobs. It will be 40,000 jobs." Now it comes back with a new number, so this analysis is flawed. I would like to inform the hon. member that we have made public this morning a document which will be very helpful to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the question still stands. To whom is the government listening in this debate on the GST? They now tell us the provinces don't understand. They say the Conference Board of Canada did not provide realistic figures, but it has been months since we first asked the Minister of Finance to produce the figures to justify his claim that only Alberta would be punished by the GST. My question is this: Considering that the House of Commons, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Consumers Association of Canada and Canada's ten Premiers are opposed to the GST, to whom is the government listening in this debate on GST, if it disagrees with the data produced by all the intervenors I just mentioned?

Mr. Loiselle: The government has been extremely attentive to all the information it has received. When you say that Alberta will be punished—-we never said that. All regions in Canada will benefit under this reform. I would advise the Hon. Member against taking at face value, positions that just before a conference or negotiations are probably used by the provinces as a bargaining stance. I may recall that every time this Government announced economic measures in its Budget, Members on the other side of the House have said they were a disaster. His leader said—

An Hon. Member: They should know about disasters! That's what it was like for 20 years!

Mr. Loiselle: —when we brought down our 1985 Budget: "Your Budget, this $4 billion cutback, will put between 125,000 and 150,000 Canadians out of work". Mr. Speaker, this Government created jobs in 1985, and in fact, since 1984 it has created 1.5 million jobs, and we intend to keep up the good work.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we cannot seem to get any clarification on the confusion around the goods and services tax, maybe because we have the support of a considerable number of Conservative members on this issue, the Minister of Transport might be able to address this question that I would like to put to him.

We have heard mayors from all over Canada, representatives from the handicapped in Canada, and representatives of students and senior citizens discussing the cuts to VIA Rail. I wonder if the Minister of Transport would tell us today whether or not he is prepared to accept the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Transport which includes a majority number of members from his own political party?

Will he recognize the motion that has been put and accepted by the transport committee that a moratorium should be put on the cuts that he proposes to VIA Rail? With respect to the cuts to VIA Rail, will the government at least listen to its own members if it will not listen to us?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, parliamentary reform has been done in a way that members can express their views to the government. I think that is what the transport committee did yesterday. Unfortunately it is a sad way to express their views, using the transport committee as a place to play political football. If new views have to be presented, they should have been presented to the ministers yesterday.

I looked carefully at the report. Nothing is new in that report. The per passenger kilometre cost for air, considering international flights, is absolutely wrong. I challenge my friend to contest figures which have been presented by my department. For that reason I repeat what I have already said. We will not have any moratorium on VIA Rail.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that the provincial governments of Canada are here today to discuss the economy, including the premiers of the major provinces of Canada. They are saying that they agree with the report of an all-party standing committee in its request for a moratorium on VIA Rail cuts. The mayors of all the major cities are saying that they agree. The disenfranchised millions of Canadians who are losing VIA Rail service are saying they agree.

My question to the Minister of Transport is straightforward. Given that a standing committee, operating in the spirit of reform, has said it is not convinced by the government's environmental assessment, is not convinced by the government's numbers with respect to the deficit and is not convinced that VIA Rail can survive at all if these cuts go ahead, why will this government in the spirit of conciliation it promised when it came to power not listen to Parliament and members from all parties, declare a moratorium and give VIA Rail a chance?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I met the same mayors my colleague met this week. This morning I heard the Premier of Ontario say that he was in full support of the report tabled yesterday, and I have respect for the Premier of Ontario. Neither the mayors nor the premier this morning could say that they were ready to put up $100 million for a moratorium.

The committee does not say that we should have a moratorium of such and such a length. It could be open to three or four years. For three years it would cost over $500 million. Once again, when I asked the question of the mayors of Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal this week "are you ready to put money into VIA Rail", there was total silence in the room.

When I heard the Premier of Ontario this morning, he did not say that he was ready to put the money in. If I may, I would like to say what was said after the cuts the Liberals made in 1981, by one of the Liberal members:

"No one wants his or her favourite program reduced or eliminated. The government's deficit will be reduced through the elimination of highly unprofitable services and unfortunately will hurt the travel facilities of a few. But what else in the end is to be done?" I quote the Liberal member for Etobicoke North in 1981. That is the same rationale today. We do not have the money. We will not have the money. We will not have any moratorium.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the cuts of 1981 were restored in 1984 by the member for Winnipeg South Centre who was then Minister of Transport.

My question to the Minister of Transport goes to the heart of this government's credibility. On the same day that this minister opposite, the Minister of Transport, announced the VIA Rail cuts, the same minister announced the Royal Commission on Transportation in Canada. The minister and the Prime Minister have said they have confidence in the members of this royal commission, have confidence in their integrity and in their ability to do a job, and will listen to their advice.

How can the minister expect Canadians to believe that he has that kind of confidence if he is going to destroy, gut, terminate, assassinate VIA Rail first and ask for advice on the decision later?

If the minister believes in what he says, he should accept the recommendation of an all-party committee, listen to Canadians, give the royal commission a chance to do its job and put an end to this bare-faced hypocrisy on VIA Rail.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the member could understand the mandate of the commission. We have been very clear about the mandate of the commission, which has been set up by the Prime Minister to determine the vision of integration of all transportation modes for the future. Exactly what we are trying to avoid is the short view proposal made by the member.

If we deal, as the Liberals did for 20 years, for three or four months, if we deal for another three or four months without any kind of vision for transportation, we make a decision for the day and the day after. We just wake up with a $300 billion debt with the deficit that the Liberals created. This is what we can avoid. The Royal Commission on Transportation has been set up to deal with the future of transportation. The mandate is clear. The members have been selected and the commission will work in the way that we have decided that it will work.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, and it too is on what the chairman of the finance committee has called the gouge and screw tax.

What I want to know from the Deputy Prime Minister today is: What are the federal government figures in terms of the impact on the provinces? We saw the study released yesterday in which the provinces say that they will lose some 400,000 jobs and $7 billion worth of provincial revenues. We know the Minister of Finance has now confirmed that Alberta will certainly be a loser.

I want to know how many jobs will be lost. How much money will be lost? Is the minister really saying in this House today that 10 Premiers representing about three or four political parties are wrong and that he is right, that he knows it all? Can he put up or shut up in the House today?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, what we are saying is not that 10 Premiers are wrong. We are saying that their analysis is wrong, the analysis that has been produced for them. They did not produce it themselves. The Conference Board study on the same subject has varied tremendously over the last few months.

I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that the same accusations were made of us in the past by his leader. In 1984 he said that the Minister of Finance knew that his program would lose between 50,000 and 100,000 jobs. He said of the minister, "Rather than admit it, the minister is trying to keep the truth from the people". We are not keeping the truth from the people, Mr. Speaker. We created jobs in 1984. We created jobs in 1985, 1986, 1987, and we will continue to create jobs this year and next year, thanks to the GST which is a modern way of organizing our fiscal system.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that even you will remember that a year ago the Minister of Finance was saying that the world was beautiful, the economy was booming, and jobs were being created. Yet they will not even give us the documents on which they base those statements.

The minister has said that the analysis that was done for the provinces is wrong. The Minister of Finance has also said publicly that many premiers agree in private with the GST, yet every single premier has said no. I want to know today whether the minister can get up and identify those premiers who agree with the GST. If he cannot do that, will he stop misrepresenting the premiers of this country. Put up or shut up.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recognize that for practically two years, the provinces worked with us very closely on preparing what is the GST; a very similar tax, the same model. The fact that it is provincial and federal does not change the basic issue. On that subject, we stand by that.

As far as the analysis is concerned, I would like to advise the hon. member that we have, and we are very proud to have, a very sophisticated method, which has been explained in more detail publicly today, which takes into account the IMF and OECD inputs and which has given results which indicate, without any doubt, that in the short term, and even more in the medium and long-term, this will be beneficial for the economy.

The Minister of Finance, my colleague, said it is a nice world because job creation is a nice thing.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who once was a staunch defender of rail passenger services.

Today at the First Ministers' Conference the premiers are raising with the Prime Minister their request, which parallels that of the mayors and that of the Standing Committee on Transport, for a moratorium on the cuts to VIA Rail until such time as the royal commission has had an opportunity to review rail passenger services and report, in order that the government, rather than the biased information it has been working with, has a clear and independent review.

Will this government finally listen to the will of the provinces and the Canadian people it represents and declare a moratorium on the VIA Rail cuts?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I said before. As he knows very well, the reason why VIA Rail has been rationalized in terms of the support we give financially is that we could not afford any more. We could not afford to put much more money into a system which basically people do not use.

I asked the mayors this week if they were ready to put forward the money necessary to keep the service. That question was asked of the mayors at the committee, at which my friend was present, and unanimously the mayors said "No".

If we do not have the money we have to cut services. The reason we do not accept any moratorium is that we have to apply the decision by January 15, 1990.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Mikolaj Kokakiewicz, the Speaker of the Polish Sejm.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The report released last evening by the provincial governments indicated that more than 400,000 jobs would be lost as a result of this goods and services tax. Put that together with the Minister of Finance's budget speech on April 27 when he said that next year unemployment would increase to 8.5 per cent. Then we have the report of the Bank of Montreal which says that next year unemployment will increase to 9 per cent. As well we have a recent report of the Conference Board of Canada which says we are on the brink of a recession.

In these circumstances, why is the government proceeding with this goods and services tax which is going to hurt so many Canadians? Why is the government putting its right wing Tory agenda ahead of jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, for the very simple reason that the agenda we have had has worked very well. It has produced the best job-creation rate of the industrialized world, the best growth rate, the best increase in productivity and the best climate for investment. A million and a half new jobs have been created since this government assumed office. The unemployment rate has been brought down from 11.7 per cent to 7.3 per cent and it is declining. We have just gone through a period that has been reported as one of the strongest periods of growth in the last six months.

What is the hon. member complaining about? Is he complaining about the fact that jobs are being created and there is growth in the economy? If that is what he is complaining about then he is on the wrong side of the issue.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, unemployed Canadians will not be happy with that answer. Canadians no longer believe this government when it talks about the jobs it has created and the economy it is managing, and that is evident from the poll released this morning which indicates that 69 per cent of Canadians do not believe that this government is doing the job that it should do.

If the government does not accept the report of the provinces that 400,000 jobs will be lost as a result of this goods and service tax, why does the government not put on the table in this Parliament its impact studies? How many jobs does it think will be lost as a result of the goods and services tax? Tell us the truth.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I can tell my hon. friend that the people who have jobs today who did not have jobs in 1984 are a lot happier than they were when the Liberals were in office when there was stagnation, high unemployment, high inflation and a feeling of desperation across this country. That has changed. Ask the young people, within whose group the unemployment rate has dropped by about 7 or 8 per cent in the last four or five years.

The fact is that the figures do not lie. There has been an outstanding performance by the economy. In 1984 when the Minister of Finance outlined his program for economic renewal, this member's leader said that we were going to lose 125,000 to 150,000 jobs. They were wrong then and they are wrong today.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, only this government would claim recovery from a world economy as it professes to do.

My question is to the Minister of Transport. VIA services in Ontario are the most used and supported and vital to the economy of Ontario and Canada in the areas of tourism, business and jobs, not to speak of the well-being of our seniors, students and travellers.

Municipal leaders, the transport committee, the premiers and millions of Canadians have called for a moratorium. The minister knows that a moratorium for one year will not cost hundreds of millions of dollars, as he has just professed, if you do not have to lay off those people.

I ask again, will the minister wake up, see the light, listen to the people, listen to his own piece, and invoke this moratorium?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, first of all, that the trains will continue to run in Ontario as in any other province except Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. We will have passenger train service everywhere in the country.

I know that Canadians want the train, but Canadians have agreed too that for the last five years this country, for once, has been managed by expending the money we have. We do not mortgage our money for 25 years as was done before. We want to expend the money we have.

I want to manage the transportation system in a way in which we can consider all modes of transportation. To do that, we must consider cuts where necessary in order to have a balanced, fair, good and efficient service in the country.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Transport. Does the Minister realize that his decision, which is also his government's decision, may cause the province of Quebec to lose 10,000 jobs? Why does he keep saying no to the Premier of Quebec, the mayor of Montreal, the mayors of Quebec, the former and the present mayor of Quebec, the mayor of Trois-Rivières, the municipal councils of 300 towns and municipalities in Quebec, including the City of Chicoutimi which is represented by the Chairman of the Quebec Caucus, and no as well to the Front Commun des Syndicats du rail-FTQ, all of whom want a one-year moratorium? Is the Minister prepared to put his credibility as Minister of Transport on the line and keep saying no to all these people who are asking for a one-year moratorium?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am sure the Hon. Member did not intend to be unnecessarily alarmist, but when he talks about 10,000 jobs in Montreal, that is just not true—

Mr. Ouellet: In the province of Quebec.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): —in the province of Quebec, but the Hon. Member, who is from Montreal, knows perfectly well that 95 per cent of the railway jobs in Quebec are in Montreal. So whether he says in Quebec or in Montreal, Mr. Speaker, it is still not true. We have given the exact figures. Exactly 962 jobs will be abandoned in Montreal, but these lay-offs will be handled with all the resources available under collective bargaining agreements, as the Hon. Member is well aware. Second, both in Quebec and elsewhere, and this applies to the Premier of Quebec as well as to the Premier of Ontario, to the mayor of Montreal and to the mayor of Toronto, none of these people, when they approached the government, were able to tell the federal government that they could invest the necessary funds. On the contrary, this morning the Premier of Ontario talked about technological development in connection with high speed trains. We agree with that, provided we do not support services that are scarcely used today by Quebecers and other Canadians.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as the minister responsible for the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada. At 12.45 p.m. last Tuesday, Cameco Corporation reported a spill of 440,000 gallons of untreated mine water containing arsenic and radium 226 from its Rabbit Lake mine in northern Saskatchewan.

I understand that preliminary tests indicate that the danger is presently contained but some serious questions need to be answered. Why did a spill of this magnitude go unreported for 11 hours, even when the monitoring equipment was functioning? Is this spill related to the layoff of 96 workers since June in preparation for privatization? Were Atomic Energy Control Board personnel on the scene at the time this was happening and what was their role? And will the minister immediately call a public inquiry to look into what looks like a total breakdown of the nuclear regulatory system?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for asking the question. We have been examining the matter at the Collins Bay mine, located near Rabbit Lake, Saskatchewan, very carefully. The first point I would like to make to the hon. member is that the Collins Bay mine had been shut down for approximately three months. Pumping was taking place so that the mine would not be flooded. Second, the water in question is primarily seepage and rainwater. The AECB has a person on site.

The only thing the hon. member said in his question that is at variance with the information I have received is that the monitoring system was functioning. The information that I have received is that it was not functioning and that is part of the question the AECB is trying to determine.

As to the level of arsenic, nickel and the radioactive materials, the information that he had in his question, namely that preliminary studies show that it is well within the Saskatchewan limits, has been given to me today, but obviously I want more questions answered with respect to this issue.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his answer. As he knows, there is a real question as to whether those limits in fact are safe in this day and age, knowing what we do.

My supplementary question is to the same minister. As he knows, this water is now in Wollaston Lake. Twelve hundred people depend on Wollaston Lake for their food, their livelihood and their drinking water. Why were these people not informed immediately? Why did Ed Benoanie, the chief, not get a straight answer until 20 hours after the spill was discovered, 18 hours after he flew over the site, and 14 hours after he phoned the mine for information? Was it the recommendation of the AECB personnel on the site that the chief be stonewalled?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, in response to that second question I will refer my friend to the last part of my answer. I cannot answer the allegation that was in the question. My position as minister is that AECB in fact discovered the leakage. As I said, the information I received was that the monitoring system was not working for between 15 and 17 hours. At the present time AECB is on site.

We have met with company officials and the province of Saskatchewan. The Minister of the Environment and I have discussed this issue today as well. We want answers for what has happened. We want that fully aired, fully investigated. I am sure my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, and I would be very interested, not only in having that information but in making it public to assure people what happened, what the danger level, if any, was, and how it can be corrected in order that we do not have the incident repeated.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The previous Liberal government gave an unprecedented 49–year lease on the Boundary Bay airport in Delta when it was re–activated in 1983. Since the lease was granted there have been many complaints both from individuals and companies who utilize the airport. Until recently all of these complaints had been essentially stonewalled in the political and bureaucratic system.

In order to clarify the situation at Boundary Bay, would the minister consider an inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the granting of the lease and the operating record of the lease holders? In view of the fact that a new group wants to take over that lease, would the minister consider either cancelling or renegotiating the lease so that the municipality of Delta would be involved in the operation and management of this very important economic generator in Delta?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my friend for his question. I know that he is a former alderman for the city of Delta. The airport of Boundary Bay represents one of the key factors in the development of air transportation in the Vancouver area.

I know that the officers of the department are working particularly on this file but I would like to undertake, on his request, to make my own investigation about this lease. I will report to the member later.

FORESTRY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Forestry. Given the fact that forestry is the single largest sector of the economy in New Brunswick, employing approximately 38,000 people and accounting for 47 per cent of the total exports in the province of New Brunswick, I am interested to know from the minister when the ERDA, the economic agreement between the federal and provincial governments, will be signed. Given the fact that the fisheries and agricultural agreements have already been signed, can the minister expedite this as quickly as possible?

• (1150)

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I am able to confirm that sufficient resources have been identified to construct and negotiate an agreement with New Brunswick. In fact $91 million has been earmarked for a new agreement. Such an agreement will satisfy the needs of the forestry community as well as accommodating certain important national objectives.

I want to thank the hon. member for his constructive input and I can tell him that negotiations are going very well. I should be in a position very soon to announce and sign the agreement.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State. The Canadian Federation of Students is here today in Ottawa from all across Canada. Representatives from colleges, universities and other institutions of higher learning are here to fight the brutal attack of government on higher education. There has been a $7 billion slash of transfer payments over eight years, less money for training and retraining, and the government has not honoured its promises in research and development.

What will the minister and this government do to ensure that we do secure the future of our youth, that we protect our competitiveness, that we not put the nation at risk, that we have the human intellectual capital to be leaders and not followers?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, we recognize this as a very high priority; it is a national priority. Our human resource development is very important for our international competitiveness. It is not necessarily the amount of money that is being put into the program. We now have the second highest public sector spending in the world, from what I understand, second only to Sweden.

What is important to note is that there is a desire by many Canadians to examine the full system and see whether we are effectively getting the maximum use of the resources available.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not question the Minister's comments, and in fact I think he makes some very good comments, but I question the action that was taken. You know perfectly well that the Federation objects to this government's brutal attack on the quality of education and on the access our young people have to colleges and universities. Does the Minister agree that students are Canada's future and that we must invest more in order to ensure that we have the knowledge and skills we need to become leaders?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, on November 21 I intend to meet both students and professors for an in-depth discussion. I am very much aware of the situation. I merely want to repeat that this governement has introduced a number of initiatives.

[English]

—the network of Centres of Excellence, $240 million; the Canada Scholarship Program, $80 million; the literacy program; the increased funding to the granting councils. There is absolutely nothing this government has to be ashamed of in the area of the development of human resources.

In addition, there is a desire by Canadians to have a full examination of what we are doing. I hope that the member who has just raised the question will be able to participate in the dialogue and that, in a co-operative fashion, we can find out how we can deliver a fully effective system for the resources that are now available.

JUSTICE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, in a hearing before a Quebec disciplinary committee of the Engineers' Order, we learned that a Granby engineer paid former Conservative member of Parliament, Michel Gravel, $5,000 in cash in exchange for helping him to win federal government contracts.

During the hearing yesterday the engineer in question indicated that the former chief of staff to the Prime Minister, Bernard Roy, contacted the engineer in question while the RCMP investigation was under way, and I quote the engineer: "He told me this would only be a little in-house investigation and Gravel would quietly resign. There was not supposed to be any charges or any big scandal".

Could the Deputy Prime Minister explain to the House and to Canadians why the former chief of staff of the Prime Minister was involving himself directly in an RCMP investigation, an investigation which ultimately led to charges and a guilty plea on corruption on the part of a Conservative MP?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been before the courts. The charges were fully investigated by the police and a court hearing was held. The individual has been found guilty and served his sentence. As far as we are concerned, justice has been served.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the question was not whether justice has been served with respect to Michel Gravel. The question was why on earth was the Prime Minister's former chief of staff directly involved at the level of an RCMP investigation into serious charges of corruption? That is the question. Particularly in light of recent allegations, who in fact directs the RCMP in this country today? Is it the commissioner of the RCMP, is it the Solicitor General or is it the Prime Minister's office. Who runs the RCMP?

Mr. Lewis: The commissioner of the RCMP runs the RCMP. If my colleague has any evidence which he wishes to bring before the RCMP he should do so.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Finance. In his absence perhaps his parliamentary secretary could try to give me an answer.

With increasing tuition fees and higher costs of living, more and more Canadians are finding it difficult to attend post-secondary educational institutions. Yet maximum student loan levels have not increased since 1984, funds for aboriginal post-secondary students have been capped and the GST will hit books and other educational materials. According to the Canadian Federation of Students, who are in town today, less than 1 per cent of Canada's 450,000 part-time students found student aid adequate for their 1987-88 needs.

If millions of dollars were made available to sell Canadians through daily newspapers, a tax that they do not want, why can the government not increase funds for student financial aid?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, we have a Canada student loan program which this year, from what I understand, will have about $400 million available. Some 42 per cent of all post-secondary students are now taking advantage of the Canada student loan program.

We do make a significant contribution to post-secondary education. From what I am advised close to 58 per cent of the dollar is our share of the contribution.

As far as comments on whether more can be done with the existing program, there is a current examination of the plan. We are trying to see how it can more effectively meet the needs of the part-time students, the disabled and women. Hopefully, we will have the advice of the member and all members of Parliament in seeing that we help those who really need the help.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Youth since the Secretary of State does not answer questions. It is in relation to the government's inaction on the GST.

Under the GST, people who earn more than $61,100 a year are eligible for a larger sales tax credit than those who make less than $61,100. That provision deliberately discriminates against students of this country. Why has the Minister of State for Youth remained silent on this issue? When is he going to start standing up for students of this country, the future of this nation?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, all Canadian university and college students are exempt from the payment of the GST on tuition and tutoring fees.

In addition, universities, colleges and public libraries will receive substantial subsidies on their purchases to ensure that their tax burdens do not increase.

Of course, to the extent that students make purchases as consumers, they will pay the tax on the same basis as other Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: A single question, the hon. member for York Centre.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In light of evidence being obtained on a number of fronts, including the developments at the engineering professional hearing that is referred to in the media this morning, an atmosphere of doom is developing over the RCMP which recalls the momentous resignation of Commissioner Nicholson of the RCMP who refused to obey the political direction being given by Prime Minister Diefenbaker.

In light of these developments, I ask the Minister of Justice for his assurance that any members of the RCMP who come forward with evidence against their superiors, or against officials in other departments, will be protected in their careers by the Minister of Justice. I want to ask him to take steps and what steps he will take to assure those members of the RCMP who are coming forward to tell the truth will not be harassed.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think that question is much below the dignity of the member who levied it. I think that we all have high respect for the RCMP for truth, and for justice. We are trying in this place to maintain that. That is why we have fought to make sure that nothing that is said in this place in any way endangers a fair trial for anybody.

I think it is about time that my friend concentrated on fair trials rather than muck-raking.

POINT OF ORDER

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its co-operation. In response to questions asked by the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, I received some additional information which, hopefully, will be reassuring to the native people about whom he asked.

First, a community meeting was held last night to discuss the situation at the Collins Bay mine and the affected area. If the water is found to be unsafe for drinking, arrangements will be made for alternate water supplies.

Regional officials of the Department of Indian Affairs have been trying to contact the chief and are on their way to the community. Due to bad weather they have been delayed but should arrive shortly. We will keep on monitoring the situation.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, in response to the minister's statement, I wish to point out to him that in Cameco's release yesterday it says it was established that the monitoring equipment performed as designed and that the situation could have been reported shortly after the problem occurred. That is the information I have from Cameco.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-20, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act be now read a third time and do pass; and the amendment of Mr. Manley (p. 5750).

Mr. Speaker: It being twelve o'clock, pursuant to the order made Tuesday, November 7, 1989, the House will now proceed to the deferred division on the amendment to Bill C-20, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

Call in the Members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Manley), which was negatived on the following division:

I was going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in the customary habit of this House to save time and to make it more understandable that we apply the vote just taken to the main motion on third reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the member for Ottawa—Vanier meant in reverse order.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss Grey: Of course, I would like it also to be noted, Mr. Speaker, that had I voted on this I would have voted no on the main motion. But, of course, I am concerned about saving time in this House as well.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, before the House moves back to the opposition day motion, I would like to ask the government House leader to give us a statement of the business that will be dealt with by the House when we come back.

Second, I would like to ask the government House leader if he and his colleagues would be willing to agree to have the House sit until four o'clock instead of three o'clock. We already have to sit a longer period of time to make up for the statements with respect to Remembrance Day. We have had some time taken up by the vote. In view of the co-operation we have extended in not asking for a second vote, I am wondering if we could have the indulgence of the House in that regard.

The reason I ask this is that there are a number of members who would like to express their views on the subject matter of the opposition day motion.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, if I could address the last item first. Yes, the government would be prepared to have the House sit until four o'clock today in order to allow for full debate on this matter.

I would like to advise the House that when we return on Monday, November 20, we will commence debate on Bill C-28. Further to the notice given on October 17 of this year, I give another notice, pursuant to Standing Order 57 that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the reading of Orders of the Day for resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance for second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-28, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act, and any amendment thereto in any other Acts, I shall propose a motion that the debate thereon not be further adjourned.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Lewis: On Tuesday, November 21, we will continue debate on Bill C-43, the abortion legislation. We will also continue debate on Bill C-43 on Wednesday, November 22.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8) I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 210 petitions.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE—FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. John W. Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the first report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade (Situation in Namibia).

BILL C-36—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of the Legislative Committee on Bill C-36, an Act to amend the Advanced Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, with amendment.

STRIKING COMMITTEE—TWENTY-SECOND AND TWENTY-THIRD REPORTS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the twenty-second and the twenty-third report of the Striking Committee. If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in the twenty-third report later later this day. I would ask that we dispense with the reading of that report by the Clerk at the table as that report concerns only membership changes to committees.

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS CONFLICT OF INTERESTS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Deputy Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-46, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of Members of the Senate and the House of Commons, to establish a Conflict of Interest Commission and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the hon. minister shall have to leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-277, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (destruction of the foetus).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, entitled an act to amend the Criminal Code (destruction of the foetus), would make it illegal in Canada to destroy a foetus and would provide for serious punishment for those who destroy a foetus.

There is an exception in this bill to provide for where the life of the foetus was ended as a result of medical treatment necessary to prevent the death of the mother or to remedy a condition that, if left untreated, would likely cause the death of the mother.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

STRIKING COMMITTEE

CONCURRENCE IN TWENTY-THIRD REPORT OF STRIKING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, if the House agrees, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier):

That the twenty-third report of the Striking Committee presented earlier today be adopted.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present today petitions gathered through the offices of the Seniors Today weekly newspaper in Winnipeg, Manitoba. There are over 18,000 of names of people who have gathered together to protest the April 1989 budget of this government which would undermine the principle of universality in Canada, which would discriminate against recipients of old age security and family allowance benefits by making them bear an unfair burden of tax, irrespective of geographical location or other factors, and which would tax back old age security and family allowance benefits in part or in their entirety, depending on the recipient's income.

All these people from Manitoba have joined together in calling upon Parliament and the government to change these measures suggested by the government, and to preserve the principle of universality in Canadian social policy.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to table 13 more petitions in the House containing the names of 1,891 residents of Guelph, Chatham, Wallaceburg, Blenheim, Tilbury, Ridgetown and Thamesville, Ontario, who strongly believe in the right to life of the unborn.

The petitioners ask Parliament to legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child. I strongly support the petitioners' position.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition which contains the names of many people from my riding who are concerned that there is no legislation in Canada to define and protect the life of the unborn child, and who now call upon Parliament to enact legislation which will effectively protect the life of the preborn child without distinction as to the stage of development.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, today it is again my duty to table 20 petitions signed by residents of the riding of Ottawa—Vanier in which petitioners wish to express their dissatisfaction with the government's proposal to put a 9 per cent tax on goods and services.

Your petitioners point out that the Conservative Government has saddled Canadian taxpayers with at least 31 taxes or tax increases since it came to power in 1984; that it raised the existing sales tax on manufactured goods from 9 per cent in 1984 to 13.5 per cent; that it now wants to introduce a 9 per cent sales tax on goods and services, a tax that will be hidden and will apply to practically everything; that this new universal tax on goods and services will cause financial problems for small business; that it will expose Canadians to a very real possibility of higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition on behalf of a number of petitioners from Saskatoon and area who point out that the proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because it is so regressive. The petitioners call upon the government to put in a real tax reform and reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. The first is signed by 352 residents primarily of the city of Thunder Bay and adjoining area, and also from a number of areas in British Columbia, certified by the Clerk of Petitions, with regard to the future of VIA Rail.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

I am sure, had these been signed after the transport committee tabled its report, the petitioners would agree with the recommendations in that report.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by 257 residents in the city of Thunder Bay and adjoining areas regarding the proposed goods and services tax. They point out that the government is now trying to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels. They call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from 750 residents of my riding who live along the VIA Rail right of way. They call on Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment, and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its passenger service mandate.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of Canadians resident in Toronto, Hamilton, Stratford, Kitchener, Stoney Creek, Sudbury, London, St. Thomas, Etobicoke, Ingersol, Woodstock, Windsor, Oakville, Wheatly, Leamington, Wallenburg, and points west, asking that the government cancel its plans for cancelling VIA, modernize the equipment and build a high speed passenger train between Montreal and Windsor. As in duty, your petitioners will ever pray.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

I have the honour of presenting a petition signed by residents of Clyde River, pursuant to Standing Order 36, objecting to the proposed GST which was so eloquently defined by the member for Mississauga South as the "gouging and screwing" tax.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, 2,279 signatures of people calling for a shortening of the extradition process. This brings the amount that I have presented in the House to well over 10,000 with almost 100,000 signatures of people across Canada calling for a shortening of the extradition process.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here signed by 300 citizens of the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell from such magnificent communities as Wendover, Rockland, St. Paschal and other fine places in my riding. The petitioners are objecting to the GST, the grief and suffering tax which will be imposed on my constituents with the recent proposal of the Conservative government, and they are indicating that this GST is inappropriate.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to present a petition on behalf of dairy producers in my riding who are quite alarmed by the fact that this government has been weak kneed at the GATT in presenting the views of Canadian dairy farmers.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and honour to present on behalf of several hundreds of people in British Columbia two groups of petitions. The petitioners ask the government and humbly pray and call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child, which I heartily endorse.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure today to present a petition, certified by the Clerk of Petitions to be correct, on behalf of Saskatchewan residents from Luseland, Strasbourg and Weyburn, Saskatchewan. The petition protests the removal of oats from the marketing jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. It calls upon the government not to remove oats from the jurisdiction and to place oats and barley under the Canadian Wheat Board Act so that in future farmers and their organizations must be consulted before changes are made in the marketing of these products.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to rise and present five petitions signed by over 150 constituents of Winnipeg North. They feel that the proposed goods and services tax will truly impose great suffering and grief on them and that the tax will gouge and squeeze them. Hence, they pray that Parliament will reject the proposed goods and services tax.

• (1250)

FISHERIES

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour today to table a petition signed by many of my constituents. These people realize that there is a crisis in the Atlantic fishery, that the livelihood of tens of thousands of Atlantic fishermen and plant workers is in jeopardy and that the whole fishing industry is in grave danger.

These constituents call upon Parliament to request the government to extend its jurisdiction to the very edge of Canada's continental shelf so that Canada can protect and regulate the fishing stocks so vital to the Atlantic area.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from over 250 constituents in Ottawa West and friends and colleagues whom they have also contacted. Most of these signatures were gathered at a public meeting in Ottawa West to oppose the goods and services tax. People are objecting to the impact on bowlers, students, music teachers, on reading and numerous other factors and ask the House to reject the goods and services tax.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present to this House three petitions, each of them dealing with the proposed goods and services tax. Of course, it will come as no surprise to anyone in this House that the petitioners are opposed to the proposed goods and services tax. They call upon Parliament to categorically and unequivocally reject any legislation which is brought forward for the purpose of implementing this gouge and scrape tax.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36. I have a petition certified by the Clerk from residents of Bonavista, Fortune, Catalina, Little Catalina, Elliston, Newman's Cove, Amherst Cove, and Birchy Cove, all areas very close to my home town.

The 39 signatures on this petition represent a group of people who are very concerned with the government's proposal to withdraw its $2.9 billion contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, and in particular the transfer of the $8 million into training. While they are aware of what the government is attempting to do, and that it may well have application in larger areas of the country, it is nevertheless taking money essentially out of their pockets because they will not be able to receive the benefits of this money.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject these cuts and try to come up with a better policy.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions I would like to present today from my beautiful riding of Nepean. Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present yet another petition with no less than 600 signatures on it from people of my riding. They are very concerned over the possible imposition of the goods and services tax. These are people from all over Nepean who are part of our adult population, or from our business community. In fact, they are from all walks of life in the city.

These petitioners believe the implementation of the GST will cause serious and unfair hardship, place an onerous burden on business and is inflationary. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the GST.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): The second petition, Mr. Speaker, is from 134 petitioners in my riding and it is with regard to the old age security cut-backs in the federal budget. Whereas the senior citizens earning over $50,000 will have their old age pension taxed back, as a result, in 20 years a clawback of OAS will start at $28,000 and affect two million Canadians.

Therefore, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to abolish the clawback of old age security and reaffirm its commitment to universality.

VIA RAIL

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, as the son of a former employee of the railroad who came to this country 40 years ago to help build the railroad, I take great pleasure in presenting to this House several petitions calling on the Government of Canada to come to its senses and not cancel passenger rail service in Canada.

The petitioners totally approximately 200.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition signed by several constituents in the riding of Kingston and the Islands. Your petitioners are opposed to the goods and services tax and humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject a tax that is unjust and unfair.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present four more petitions in a lengthy series of earlier petitions on the subject of VIA Rail. The petitions are signed by many citizens of the community of Revelstoke, and also a number from Nakusp, British Columbia.

My friend, the member for York South—Weston presented a petition on the same subject a few moments ago, and he referred to his father. Revelstoke was the community he came to to work on the CPR a number of years ago.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service. These petitions come from a community that is at least three hours drive from the closest commercial airport and its roads are cut off by snow and avalanches more than any other community in Canada.

ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 150 will be answered today.

[Text]

CANADIAN RESIDENTS—PAYMENT OF FEDERAL INCOME TAX

Question No. 150—Mr. Wappel:

As of October 1, 1989, what number of Canadian residents (a) pay federal income tax (b) have paid federal income tax for twenty-five years or more?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): (a) Statistics on taxfilers are maintained by taxation year, the most recent year available being 1987. For the 1987 taxation year 13,026,180 Canadian residents paid federal income tax.

(b) No statistics are maintained on the number of Canadian residents who have paid federal income tax for twenty-five years or more.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I ask that all remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S. O. 81—VIA RAIL

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Tobin:

That this House approve the recommendation contained in the Second Report of the Standing Committee on Transport, calling for a moratorium in the Government's proposed cuts to VIA Rail.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Before the Minister contributes to the debate, there have been some discussions among the parties that following the speech by the Minister of Transport and the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, there is agreement that although we will observe the normal rotation between parties, each party will use its time as it sees fit.

It is my understanding that the government will probably use the normal 20 minutes, plus a 10 minute question and answer period, and that the two opposition parties will split that time ten minutes–five minutes in their case. I would ask for unanimous consent to allow that to occur.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), on the same point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, in order to assist the Chair during the proceedings, I think Hon. Members should advise the Chair of their intentions before they start to speak. I hereby give notice that I will use ten minutes plus five minutes for questions and comments, so the Chair will not have to guess whether the 10 minutes are up or not. If it is 12, 13, or 14 minutes, it might be a problem. So I think Hon. Members should say whether they intend to take 10 or 20 minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In that case, if Opposition Members use this system, they will have two in a row, which makes 30 minutes. I thank Hon. Members for their comments. Resuming debate. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Bouchard).

[English]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the New Democratic Party for giving me the opportunity to speak immediately. Normally, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden would speak first, but he graciously agreed to let me speak first.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, for five years the Government of Canada, the present government, has been trying to build a strong economy in this country that will be able to compete with what is becoming a very strong international economy among all trading nations. To succeed, it is imperative, in our view, that the economy continues to prosper in the years to come. I say imperative, not just desirable. The measures we introduced to control the deficit and reduce the national debt were designed with that goal in mind.

The government's commitment to reduce spending and control its finances obviously applies to all sectors, and especially, as far as I am concerned, to the transportation sector.

Mr. Speaker, it is also a fact that transport has always been and always will be an essential component of Canada's economic development. It is also quite clear that we will have to ensure that this network is efficient and that Canadians are able to use it efficiently. If we are to understand the initiatives and decisions being made in the transportation sector today, they must be seen in this perspective. We must consider the financial aspects while at the same time ensuring that we have a transportation network that reflects the deverstity of the country in which we live. The government's initiative are therefore designed with this perspective in mind, while at the same time we must consider that this transportation network must develop in circumstances that provide for a network that is reliable, efficient and profitable, thus giving Canadians a better chance of competing in an increasingly competitive world.

What we must not forget, in the course of today's debate, is that railway transportation is not the only transport mode in this country and is not even the type of transportation Canadians use the most. It is a more traditional mode which has been used for a number of reasons, and those reasons have been around for some time. In 1961, the McPherson Commission recommended abandoning rail passenger services. For 30 years there were a number of studies and attempts to resolve this matter. Once again, when we look at transportation in this country, there is as much air transportation as railway transportation. But there is also marine transport and the automobile which is being used more and more today, and when we talk about freight, trucks have become an essential component, and finally, we also have buses for passenger tranportation.

Mr. Speaker, one principle has always guided the government's actions, as it does now in the transportation sector, and that is; never invest more than we can afford, in other words, invest what we can in a transportation mode, especially one that is being used less and less and is costing us more and more. And we must remember that Canadian taxpayers are footing the bill!

Mr. Speaker, in 1988, and I have often quoted this figure but I would like to remind people: $641 million was spent to prop up VIA Rail, which means a cost of $100 per passenger, and between Jasper and Prince Rupert as much as $483 per passenger. Mr. Speaker, this subsidy does not come out of the blue. It is paid for by all Canadians, although only 3 per cent of them travel by train.

Mr. Speaker, whether we admit it or not, whether we like it or not, whether we want to change it or not, we have to realize that Canadians have given more and more and will give more and more, unless the Royal Commission of inquiry proves the opposite. I am open to any recommendations, but today, Canadians have shown a preference for other modes of transportation.

The automobile is obviously the preferred type of transportation, with, to a lesser extent, air transport and buses. Eighty five per cent of Canadians travel by car. People will say: The Minister could change that. Mr. Speaker, ministers do not create the trends. Ministers manage the trends. The Minister manages what Canadians want to use as a means of transportation. Contrary to what everybody has been saying, and I am not arguing just for the sake of arguing, VIA Rail is not improving. There has been no improvement in 1988 and 1989. The situation is getting worse, Mr. Speaker. In 1988, revenues went up 13 per cent but the government spent $68 million on subsidies. Mr. Speaker, this is not a fairy tale thought up by the minister. These are figures that cannot be challenged. These are the figures we have produced time and time again, and unfortunately, the report produced yesterday by the Transport Committee says: Figures can be interpreted in many different ways, and we are not sure about the figures that were provided. Not all figures provided by Transport Canada or VIA Rail have been systematically and affectively challenged.

[English]

Prompt action had to be taken to stop this drain on the public purse. The motion before the House today would seek to impose a moratorium, a moratorium which could cost the taxpayer any amount of money because there is no limit. It means it could be $500 million, it could be $1 billion; it could be more. We do not know because the committee does not recommend any time limit for the moratorium. As the Premier of Ontario and many others, including mayors of the cities, said this morning a moratorium would cost money. The bottom line is that the committee does not say where we will get the money. I would be interested if the committee had not only proposed a moratorium but stated where we would take the money as well. Almost everybody in this country admits that the deficit is too high, and we have to make cuts. My friends on the other side are totally opposed to the GST or any increase of tax. If you do not increase the tax you have to cut, and you have to cut where people are the least affected by the cuts. In other words, where just 3 per cent of Canadians are using the service.

We would have expected the committee to say, if it is against the tax: "We are for the cuts, but we don't want to cut VIA Rail, so we will go elsewhere." Where, Mr. Speaker? That is the question. Neither the mayors nor the premiers this morning, nor anybody on the other side, said where we should cut. There is no miracle to get money for the deficit.

I can only assume that Canadians would be expected to pay the bill again. And I don't believe that this government could accept that. That is why I say I am sorry but I could not agree with any moratorium. We will not provide the millions of dollars needed to subsidize VIA Rail again.

I believe that the committee should have taken the opportunity in this report to look at the future of rail passenger transportation in the long run, not in the short term, on the verge of the premiers' conference. The committee's timing in terms of the report is interesting. It is very strange that the last witnesses appeared at noon, Mr. Speaker, Tuesday. Yesterday morning the report was ready. The timing is good. I expected the committee to give me a perspective of the future of transportation and on the way the government and the Canadian taxpayer could have a more affordable alternative to what we have today.

We hear references to Amtrak. Of course many other countries are making decisions concerning rail passenger services based on their own demographic and geographic reality. When we talk about Amtrak I am amazed that the report does not say that Amtrak has the ability to abandon any route when it wants. That is not the case in Canada, Mr. Speaker. When they use an example like Amtrak they should say also that in 1971 it cut 75 per cent of the network. We want to cut 40 per cent and we are accused of being unCanadian and not having in mind the spirit of Canada. I believe we must always be consistent. When we do something, we live with the consequences. I will give an example. We cannot have the tax system in the United States along with the services in Sweden. We would sometime have to consider using a system with all it represents.

The decision has been made in light of the fact that Canada is the second largest country in the world while, at the same time, we have a population of 25 million people. VIA service must be consistent with the reality of the country and the density of the Quebec–Windsor corridor. At the same time we have different needs. In Saskatchewan it is not like Toronto or Montreal and we have to provide service in the best way that we can afford. At the same time the mayors of cities along the corridor say "We have 60 per cent of Canadians living here and we want all the services here". I believe the government has been wise in its decision that, in the perspective of the reality of Canada, it should share the benefits everywhere. All Canadians are aware that we must reduce the burden of the debt. Canadians have been asked to tighten their belts, and VIA could not be an exception. Should we ask Canadians to do something and say that VIA is an exception? It is not viable. It is terribly expensive. Canadians do not use it. But we keep VIA Rail for $641 million, $800 million or $1 billion a year, it doesn't matter. We spend that money when we have other modes of transportation that need to be supported.

The government has distinguished itself during the past year through fiscal responsibility and judicious allocation of federal financial resources.

Mr. Milliken: After doubling the debt.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): The member opposite should know that there are so many examples to take on this side of the House on the management of the country and its finances. The member should cry over the legacy that his party left to the country. Canadians have to pay today for errors made at the time the Liberals were in power. They never knew that when money is scarce it has to be spent in the best way, where it is most needed and where it is most likely to produce results.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues opposite and all my fellow citizens to look at the record, to judge the facts and accept them. Of course we have had hard decisions to make since 1984. Mr. Speaker, I have been a Minister in this Government for five years and every year, difficult decisions have had to be made in every department. We made them because we did not want the situation we inherited in 1984. It is not what I would have wanted to inherit, but it is what we got.

Mr. Speaker, about a year ago now, Canadians recognized the hard choices the Government made and the decisions it took. Today Canadians accept responsible financial management combined with sound economic policies that lead to economic growth. This morning at the opening of the First Ministers' Conference, the Prime Minister recalled that Canada's economic growth is one of the best in the world, especially in the last five years. Of course we see the break in 1984 and we understand why.

Mr. Speaker, I tell Canadians, I tell my fellow citizens and my colleagues in this House that as responsible people, we do not have the right, even in transport, even with the difficult decisions that have to be made for VIA Rail, to leave a legacy for which Canadians would hold us responsible for not making decisions when the time came to make them.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the minister, as I always do. We do not see eye to eye on a number of things, and certainly on VIA Rail we do not see eye to eye.

I want to respond first to the minister's challenge when he says that opposition members have not said where we would cut. We have said where we would cut. We have said that if you lower interest rates you would save $1 billion a year on your deficit. A drop of 1 per cent would save a billion and a half dollars. We say drop it down. There are answers out there if you look for them.

I want to put to the minister a number of very specific questions arising out of the report of the committee. He answered in the House today that a moratorium was not acceptable to him. We regret that, but for now I accept that as his view and hopefully we will be able to convince the Prime Minister to intervene.

The other part of the recommendation was a change in the royal commission to specifically ask it to look at rail passenger service and to come up with an interim report that deals with things like a legislative mandate and future equipment requirements. My first question is whether the minister will agree to the second part of the committee's report, which are the changes to the royal commission.

The second question is this. Is the government going to bring in a bill to give VIA its legislative mandate? Now, the third question. Under the minister's predecessor, Trans-Consortium—which was Bombardier and UTDC Cancar—came up with a design for transcontinental passenger equipment, a price that was acceptable to VIA and to the companies, but was eventually turned down by cabinet. Trans-Consortium then offered to finance the construction of those cars and rent them to VIA Rail. I want to ask the minister in all seriousness whether he would now consider going back to Trans-Consortium and saying yes, that the government will look at that kind of private sector involvement.

The final question, again coming from the report and the testimony, was the whole matter of the protected routes. We can quibble on the figures, whether it is $45 million or $50 million or whatever, but in terms of a principle, would the minister agree with the thought that came through the committee that the funding for the public good should not be part of his budget but should come from general government financing so that it does not distort VIA's books? I would like some very serious answers to those four serious questions.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I think the questions are good and I will try to do my best to give what I consider my best answers.

I want to say, first, that I think it is a big temptation to believe that we can just with our hands make a decision to reduce the interest rate. I know something though.

Mr. Benjamin: Did it before?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the member from Regina—Lumsden was there at the time when Canadians were so upset about the rate of inflation, 12 and 13 per cent. Canadians would perhaps have agreed at the time to have a 12 per cent interest rate but with a 4 or 5 per cent inflation rate, as we have today. I believe the policy of the Minister of Finance is good at a time when he can control the inflation. I do not believe he could serve Canadians better, if the inflation rate would be what it was at the time.

The member asks about a change to a royal commission. I think my friend will understand that the three other questions depend upon the answer we give to the first. You will understand what I mean. The mandate of the royal commission has been determined in a way that we could answer the basic question of integration of transportation modes for the year 2000. If there is any proposal in the interim report in one and a half years at that time it will be possible to determine whether we can immediately answer a few questions.

The mandate of the commission has not been tailored with regard to VIA Rail. It has been determined with regard to all transportation modes and it does not intend to answer, specifically, the problem of VIA Rail.

On the question of VIA Rail, I have been told by the Mayor of Quebec that it was euthanasia because we were killing the system.

I am not that pessimistic. We need, though, to have major surgery. We are keeping the system alive. The Premier of Ontario said this morning that his government is working with the province of Quebec to determine new technology, high speed trains, and we are fully supportive of that initiative. But first we have to look at the commission in the broad perspective of all transportation. For that reason we could not reduce the mandate to just VIA Rail and look at a practical problem which perhaps will be answered after the commission makes its report. I am one of those who believe that VIA Rail deserves to have its own legislation to be able to manage differently than it does so far. We have asked a commission to determine the future of transportation. In a year and a half we will see exactly what direction it believes we should take with all transportation, including VIA Rail. At the time, I suppose, if the commission considers the viability of VIA Rail and it makes a proposal on the legislation we will be able to determine the legislation, which corresponds to the new reality. With the very heavy agenda that we have, the legislation will not be ready before a year an a half anyhow. In the meantime, I believe we could perhaps miss out on the competence of the commission.

The two last questions refer to the question of new cars. Even if we want to go to the Consolidated Fund or the Department of Finance and so on, management of the deficit is in the way. If you take $100 million, it will be the same money that I would need for a moratorium. I mean that we would need to pay for that.

You ask why not give the private sector the capacity to lease. Once again I refer to the commission. If it makes a recommendation of this kind, we will consider the proposal as I believe it should be done. It is the same for the protected routes. First, for those remote routes, my friend knows that I want to review them. We give the same example of Jasper–Prince Rupert which costs $483 for one ticket. I wonder if there isn't a cheaper mode of transportation. Sometimes we wonder if it wouldn't be cheaper to use a helicopter, because at $483 a ticket I believe it couldn't be more expensive. That is why we want to review. We have already started to review to see if we couldn't truncate a few of these routes. It is something that we are looking at.

In conclusion, I know there are problems that my friend honestly considers. I do not question the honesty and the fairness of members on the other side. We must keep in mind that we are very tied in terms of the operation with the deficit that we have and our resources in Transport Canada. It is a very tied operation in terms of what we can put into the system. If we put in $650 million or implant any of the proposals here with more money, it will be dramatic not only for Transport but for the deficit. I am looking forward to the day when we can give a message to Canadians in terms of deficits and cuts and for six months maintain the same message.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question from the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte this morning, the Minister of Transport indicated in the preamble that there was no time limit to the moratorium being requested. He seemed to imply that were there a definite time period he would be prepared to accept the motion.

Could there at least be a moratorium until such time as the commission has made its report and the Minister has had time to study its recommendations, in fairness to the process?

The minister spoke of major surgery. He will agree, as an analogy, that one would not first amputate the leg of a patient and then call a doctor and ask if the operation was indicated to begin with. That would be the wrong process.

I ask the minister whether he would be prepared to consider a moratorium at least until such time that the royal commission appointed by the government has had an opportunity to do its study, make its report and he has had the time to go over its recommendations?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, what I meant during Question Period is, of course, that I do not intend to accept any moratorium. It is a basic question. It is a question of resources. After January 15, the cost will be there and I cannot afford it.

If I gave the perception that I would accept a moratorium or if I said there is no time limit to it, it was essentially and exclusively to determine the range of the costs. The hon. member mentioned waiting until the commission makes its report. That means about one and a half years, a minimum of 18 months, before the interim report. What would that represent, $200, $300 or $400 million dollars? It is in the range of that possibility. We do not have the money.

Once again when we talk about moratorium, we talk about money. We could say as the report states that we could give a different interpretation to the figures and so on. We can sustain what we have said. The figures we have are good and safe, but at the end of the day when you talk about a moratorium, it is always a question of money.

Every time I ask the question from which resources will we take the money the answer has to be we will cut elsewhere, say, the interest rate. I believe that we have to put in our minds that there is no possibility today with the resources that we have to avoid the decision that was made.

I ask my colleague, as I ask all Canadians, to understand that what we have to do is not easy. It is something which basically is a sacrifice that we have to make. But at the same time, I believe we are working on the future of transportation to be sure that we will be able to develop it.

We already have a national, affordable and a sustainable network but it could be more national, more sustainable, depending upon the decision made by the commission. We need the money and if we do not have the money two years from now, perhaps we would have to cut all services, which is obviously not what I want.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I know that the minister did not take up all his time. I wonder, with the consent of the House, if I might be permitted to ask him one brief question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Blaikie: I would like to ask the minister about a matter that I know he is aware of because it was raised in a meeting between himself and the Minister of Transport of Manitoba. That has to do with service to remote cottage communities between Winnipeg and Farlane, Ontario. In the minister's announcement he included a commitment to preserve service to remote areas. Presumably, remote areas mean places which are not serviced by any other mode of transportation.

As I think the minister is aware, there are communities between Winnipeg and Farlane, Ontario, which can only be reached by rail and they are served, according to the minister's plans now, only by the Transcontinental service which will run over the Winnipeg–Capreol line. Not only does this train leave at times which are completely out of whack with times when people may want to go to their cottages, but there is also some question as to whether or not you would want a Transcontinental train to be stopping at all of those places anyway. I understand from a media article that the minister was going to give this problem his attention to see if some special arrangement could be made, at least in the summertime, to get these people to their camps and back to where they have had investments over many generations.

I would like to know from the minister where that process is at. Has he had a chance to look at it? What is the state of his thinking on that matter?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Yes, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, as I said to Mr. Driedger from Manitoba, that matter is still under review. It is a very particular case. People use that train to go to their cottages for the weekend. It is really particular because it is not in the spirit of what we call remote services. I agreed at the request of the minister to take a look at it. It was still under review at the department, either last week or the week before. I have not yet received the report.

Once again, it is very particular. It is basically a leisure service because people are going to their cottages. On that basis, it has to be seen in the perspective of all Canada. If three, four, five or six other services might have to be cut, it has to be seen in that perspective. The answer will come up later, because it has not as yet been treated by the department.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of the House for 21 years and for 21 consecutive years a member of the transport committee. The minister is the twelfth or thirteenth minister during those years. Throughout the whole time I have been surrounded by amateurs and ignorance when it comes to transportation. With my years on the railway, together with those of my father and grandfather, and the 21 years with the transport committee, I think I know a bit about it. I do not pose as an expert, by any means.

The minister referred early in his remarks to Amtrak and how it cut so many routes in 1971. Amtrak cut all the duplicate routes, two or three lines running to New York, to Chicago, from Chicago to Detroit, from Chicago to Los Angeles or Seattle, down to one line. That is exactly what was done by VIA in 1977–78. There was no use having two parallel railway lines, duplicating a service. It made transportation sense economically and it ended duplication. It also saved a lot of money. The specious comparison put forward by the minister does not stand up. It never has.

The cuts in VIA Rail according to the minister and the Minister of Finance will save money. Those who do not learn from history are condemned to repeat. The cuts in VIA Rail in 1981–82 cost the government more and cost VIA Rail more than what the savings were, and that was only a 21 per cent cut. It is not that they just do not understand; they do not care.

There is the travesty of the Department of Finance doing the studies for reference levels of subsidy for VIA Rail. I put it to you, Mr. Speaker: Where in hell was the minister of Transport? We have asked. In fact questions went on the order paper about those studies, but they were not done by transport; they were done by the Department of Finance.

When it came to environment there were two farces. Who did the study for the Department of the Environment? The Department of Transport. My question is: Where was the Minister of the Environment? Let us look at that so–called environmental study. It dignifies it to use the word "study". It is not a study; it is another farce. It does not hold any water at all for anyone, expert or non–expert on environmental impact.

The government and its adherents for all these years have advocated sound business practices. One sound practice in business is that if you go into business or you are continue in business you have to operate not only efficiently and with high productivity. You also have to operate with the latest and most modern equipment.

If a private corporation had gone to a banker anywhere in the world and asked for a loan to operate a passenger railroad with equipment from 30 to 50 years old needing repair and refurbishing, with no prospect of making a nickel or even breaking even, he would have been laughed out of the bank or even out of town.

It has been pointed out not only by myself but by independent experts that had new equipment been put on stream starting in 1977–78, equipment with a life span of 30 to 50 years, the savings in the operation and maintenance costs would have paid for the cost of the new equipment in about seven years. That is a sound business practice.

What did the previous government and this government do? They refused to order the equipment. They did finally smarten up and realized they had to get some new locomotives or the thing would have ground to a halt. If you want to reduce the subsidy to VIA Rail annually by tens of millions of dollars, then the placement of the new rolling stock is fundamental. You cannot do it without the new rolling stock.

The Trans-Orient, a consortium of builders of railway rolling stocks, has the best expertise in the world, or as good as any in the world; let's put it that way. Would you believe, Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has put up the guaranteed financing for new rolling stock built by Bombardier for Amtrak? The Minister of Transport and his department and the Minister of Finance and his department have yet to answer that question. How come we can provide the financing for new rolling stock as the Government of Canada on behalf of the taxpayers for a passenger railway in the United States, but we cannot do it for our own passenger railway in Canada? It boggles the mind.

I repeat for the umpteenth time that you must have in a rail passenger corporation people who know something about transportation economics and transportation marketing. I feel extremely sorry for most, not all, of the management at VIA Rail since 1977. They have not been allowed to function. They have not been allowed to do what they knew had to be done to make VIA Rail succeed.

VIA Rail management in the past 12 years has been required to function within the framework of government policy. Government policy has annually restricted VIA Rail. I coined the phrase in 1978 "VIA Rail, designed to fail". This government and the previous one had no intention as a matter of policy to make it possible for VIA Rail to succeed.

I find most distressing all the talk and whatnot that has gone on in this place and outside this place about parliamentary reform, the independence of committees, and the government paying attention to what the House of Commons and the members thereof have to say.

It is obvious in this instance and in other ones—and it will be in future ones—that the government makes a decision and then after the fact a parliamentary committee using its independence decides to hold hearings on the matter. The government after the fact appoints a royal commission. If you have ever played poker or any other kind of gambling games, the one thing you are bound to lose at, a lead pipe cinch, is to play against a stacked deck. This deck has been stacked since 1977.

The minister asks: "Where are you going to get the money?" My colleague said that if you lower the interest rate 1 per cent the government would save $1.5 billion. All the financial experts I have listened to and read and heard over the last year or two said that the most sensible spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates was a maximum of 3 per cent. We are now up to a 4.5 per cent or 5 per cent spread between the interest rates here and in the U.S.

I understand and appreciate the historical reasoning that having our interest rates higher than theirs will attract investment and all that. The spread has now reached the point of increasing our deficit and preventing the government of the day and Parliament from acting the way they should on things such as a national rail passenger system.

The committee was, to put it nicely, very diplomatic, very positive. We could have tried to say things that were a lot tougher and meaner. We heard from over 30 groups and individuals, and something over 100 people were part of those groups. Of all the individuals, groups and whatnot we heard from three agreed with the government proposal. One was the Minister of Transport. Well that is understandable, to put it nicely. The other was Mr. Lawless, that coyote in the chicken coop who is running both CN and VIA Rail. The third was the representative of the bus companies. I guess you could say that that figures.

I noticed with great interest that the witnesses were from right across the sociological and political spectrum of Canada. Trade unionists, free enterprisers, chambers of commerce, mayors of cities and towns of different political stripes were unanimous in opposing what the government is proposing.

Most interesting, since tourism is such a valuable industry in this country, was a witness we heard yesterday who is a tour group operator. He is only a small operator. There are dozens of others who do much more business, who book space on VIA Rail. He cannot do it any more. Just that one little firm did something like $4 million to $5 million worth of business last year and considers VIA Rail a business partner.

When the vice-president of Amtrak was in front of the committee he did not try to tell us what we should do. He just told us some facts and gave us some information. This is to give you a good illustration of what has been done to VIA Rail and the taxpayers since 1977. He told us the Amtrak trains that run from the U.S. border to Montreal, from the U.S. border to Toronto, have to pay Canadian railroads three times as much as they pay American railroads to run their passenger trains over their tracks. If that does not tell my hon. friends opposite something, I do not know what else could.

There is another item. VIA Rail had to part with $14.5 million last year in provincial and federal diesel fuel taxes. Name me another country where a transportation company that has to build, maintain and operate its own right-of-way has to pay fuel taxes which are nothing more than a subsidy to road users. There was $14.5 million in wasted taxpayers' money. It is unfair treatment of VIA Rail, CN and CP. Why in God's name are they paying diesel fuel taxes for their diesel locomotives? If they could run them down the Trans-Canada Highway they would be quite happy to pay those diesel fuel taxes. It is another example of one of the cards in the stacked deck on VIA Rail.

The committee worked very hard and very sincerely and, as my hon. friend over there will agree, we worked many hours. We heard all the witnesses and whether we agreed or disagreed with a witness, we were impressed. We worked hard at coming up with a report that hopefully all of us but certainly most of us from all sides of the House could support.

That brings me to my closing remarks. If parliamentary reform means anything at all, then the government can do no less than act upon our recommendations. We had a unanimous report. This is only the second time, by the way, this has happened in my 21 years here, a unanimous report of the transport committee.

After our trip to Europe we made a unanimous report which the government has ignored every since. Why did we bother? Why did we waste taxpayers' money and the expense to all those witnesses out of their own pockets if the government was going to ignore the committee's report?

Similarly, the royal commission is an academic exercise. It is already a fait accompli, what this government intends to do about transportation. Members of the government have jet engines for brains. Everything the government has done at airports, ports, the seaway and Via Rail has been backward, the opposite to what it should have been doing.

Is it not interesting that VIA Rail's subsidies are cut three times a week? Well, gee whiz, 12 so-called self-sustaining airports lost $60 million last year and have debts of over $800 million. Why do we not make those 10 airports operate only three days a week?

Surely what we recommended to Parliament and to this House makes sense and provides a chance for VIA Rail to succeed, instead of the deliberate activity of this government to have it fail.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I listened very closely to the remarks of my colleague from the riding of Regina—Lumsden (Mr. Benjamin), and I agree that he has a lot of experience and long years of service, particularly with the transport committee.

Still I should like to point out to him that, when he referred to the tour group operator or to the firm which booked space on VIA Rail, the figures he used may have sounded impressive because he was talking in terms of millions of dollars.

Perhaps I might remind him that the tour operator told the committee he had booked 4,000 seats on VIA Rail over the past five years. This works out to 400 seats a year, a far cry from the figures quoted by my colleague.

[English]

I would like to ask my colleague about his experience after many years spent working on the rails and sitting on committees and commissions regarding passenger rail transport in Canada, namely, VIA Rail.

Since 1977, $5 billion of taxpayers' money has been put into VIA Rail, out of which $1 billion was for capital expenditures. In spite of that support provided by the taxpayers of Canada, the number of passengers using VIA Rail has decreased between the years 1980 and 1988. Last year, VIA rail transported fewer people than it did in 1980, in spite of the fact that $5 billion of Canadian taxpayers' money has been put into VIA rail. I would like my hon. colleague to comment on that situation and to give me his views.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, to my good friend I want to say that I used the tour operator example. My friend was there to hear that witness. He said that he was about the smallest operator. He also spoke about the dozens of others who do several times more business than he does, with blocks of seats, berths, compartments, bedrooms and so forth on VIA Rail. This is just one small example, the smallest one. You add them all together and you have tens of millions of dollars of tourism business, both direct and indirect, which involves VIA Rail.

On the matter of the $5 billion that has been put into VIA Rail, I do not like people who say "I told you so". I said to the Minister of Transport in 1978, the late unlamented Otto Lang, and every one since then that they should start off with the required investment of $1 billion in capital expenditure for 50 new locomotives and the station property.

You should have seen how the CPR rooked VIA Rail. It tried to get $15 million for the station property in Regina. We finally got it down to $3 million, although it is only worth $1.5 million.

That is the sort of thing that went on. VIA Rail had no choice. Some of that $1 billion was overexpenditure on real estate and station properties. On capital expenditures, most of the $1 billion went into refurbishing old equipment, and that is throwing good money after bad. Some of those cars should have been put on the scrap heap the day VIA Rail began.

To illustrate further to my hon. friend about the victimization of VIA Rail, it had to pay over $77 million to CP and CN for that old equipment that was not fit to operate. The taxpayers got stuck. Both CP and CN had amortized that equipment off their books years before that. It was gravy. Before VIA Rail sold its first ticket, before its first train left the station, VIA Rail started with $100 million in the hole.

What a way to run a railroad. You guys do not know how to run one, never have, and at the rate you are going, you never will.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Madam Speaker, this may be the last chance for this government to demonstrate that it has any respect left for representative democracy and the people of Canada.

You will recall that when the previous government cut a number of VIA routes in 1981 many of the people who now occupy the Treasury benches had fits of apoplexy. I admit that it was not the most glorious act of the previous administration. In fact it was a disaster and a significant contribution to the defeat of that government. I include my own defeat in that as well, but at least I learned something from it. It seems that there must be some kind of elixir in the exercise of power that dulls both perception and memory.

Let us go back a little bit. I was the chairman of the transport committee at the time, and the Deputy Prime Minister was the critic. He was supremely unhappy with the committee hearings. He was particularly incensed that the government would not give the committee a reference to travel and hold public hearings throughout the country. He had his colleagues organize their own travelling road show, and I think he was right. When the Conservatives came to power he restored many of the routes. They tooted their own horn about it, and that is okay too.

However, during the last election campaign Conservative members bragged about the restoration of VIA Rail, even while they had to be secretly planning the decimation of VIA. The Prime Minister took his band of merry men and women to the quiet of the Gatineau Hills and there he ordered the decimation of rail passenger service in Canada. However, there was at least one man who recognized the government's folly in decimating VIA, and he said: "no". That was VIA's president, Mr. Denis de Belleval, and his tenure consequently was very short indeed.

Now we have the spectacle of the president of Canadian National, the company which could not make rail passenger service viable but which now makes a profit from VIA's operations, becoming the chief executive officer and the chief executioner of VIA. How cynical can a government be?

• (1400)

What about the minister, what has the minister done? Well, he and boredom, but with no conviction. He did not even make the decision. As far as I know it was made while he was ill, behind closed doors in the Prime Minister's office. The minister should have screwed up his courage and resigned rather then being used as a simple puppet by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

His actions remind me of a line from The Rime of the Ancient Mariner "About, about in reel and rout, the death fires danced at night". The death fires are dancing about this government right now.

When is the Deputy Prime Minister going to stand up and be counted? Has he totally changed his mind in a few short years? Is he not afraid to lose what is left of his credibility that once was relatively high? I can understand his embarrassment, but where is his commitment and his conviction? If he had had any conviction he would have done something, he would have at least spoken out. He is just as cynical as the Prime Minister and Canadians will remember what kind of leadership he displayed.

This government's action is the worst blow ever to befall rail passenger service in the entire history of this country. Not only is the railroad being bludgeoned, but lives and livelihoods are callously being destroyed, and for what reason? There has to be something more than profitability to make a country work.

Tory ministers went about the country during the last election campaign talking two main themes; free trade and good financial management. Almost before the writs were returned the debt was out of control and VIA had to be scrapped. Are they making way for Amtrak to come in, pick up the slack and provide rail service in Canada? Wouldn't that be dandy. Is that why we have a new president of VIA who is obviously in a conflict of interest? Talk about putting the fox in charge of the chicken coop, Madam Speaker. I cannot think of a better example.

The government systematically refused to listen to the people even though it knew there was a public outcry. The government never showed any indications that it wanted to listen to the people of Canada. The people of Canada, Madam Speaker, have spoken about their views on the cancellation of VIA Rail. All the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport were saying was that Canadians could not afford a rail passenger system. What a turnaround, what hypocrisy.

That is what this government was saying, while just about everybody in Canada was saying they needed and wanted an improved transportation system. And it is the people who pay the bills, it is not the government. The government has no money of its own, it has money only from the taxpayers of this country. That is what this government was saying while just about everybody else in western countries, even underdeveloped countries, were modernizing and improving their rail passenger service.

It should surprise no one that the government did not want to have public hearings. The government did not want public hearings because it did not want it known that it is completely out of touch with Canadian reality. But thanks to the determination of most of the members of the Standing Committee on Transport, the committee was able, against the wish to the government, to hold public hearings. Those hearings once again indicated that there is widespread opposition to the government's plan to decimate VIA Rail. And if it has any respect for the democratic process, if it has any respect for its constituency, if it has any respect for the people that it represents, the government must go along with the recommendations of this committee.

The government must declare immediately a moratorium on the announced service cuts to VIA. It must amend, by order in council, the terms of reference of the Royal Commission on a National Transportation System and charge it to examine rail passenger service and make an interim report as soon as possible. How cynical that a government scraps a service then appoints a commission to report three years hence what should have been done.

The government must direct the royal commission to undertake its interim report on rail passenger service to give particular attention to the following items; a legislative mandate, future equipment requirements, improved productivity, overall environmental impacts, high speed rail in the corridor, and alternatives for the remote services. It must also know that what it is doing is wrong. The government must know that now it is the time to do the right thing. If this government cannot do that, all I can say, Madam Speaker, is "In God's name, go!"

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech of my colleague from Miramichi. Admittedly, Madam Speaker, he worked long years and has much experience, particularly in the transport sector.

What gets me down when I hear his remarks is the fact that my colleague has been a Member of this House for a good many years, and he was here in 1981 when the Minister of Transport urged the government to reduce federal grants to VIA Rail.

Since the administration at the time governed as if they were a weather cock, changing their mind depending on which way the wind was blowing, the Minister of Transport lost his nerve and continued to hand out annual grants to cover VIA Rail's operating costs.

My question to our colleague is this: when he was sitting on the government benches, what did his government do to give VIA Rail a fighting chance to get out of the red and provide good service?

[English]

Mr. Dionne: Madam Speaker, first it gave VIA Rail its own management, which it does not have any more. It did not ask the president of CN or CP to run VIA Rail. It gave it a mandate. While it was not a legislative mandate, it did give it a mandate and it gave it funding to carry out the duties it was supposed to have carried out.

Now, I am not about to pretend that the government of that time handled the situation as I would have liked to have seen it, but it was a lot better than what we have today. It at least put a system in place that could in the future develop and prosper.

We now have a government and a minister that do not want even to talk publicly about VIA Rail any more. We heard the same thing from the minister today that we have heard over and over and over in Question Period. He has obviously been programmed. When he comes into the House he slips a little disk in and it whirls round and round and round and we hear the same gobbledegook every time the minister is asked a question. It does not make any difference what the question is, the answer is always the same and it is simply that we do not have any money. He talked today about the increase in the deficit and I remind the hon. member that it was his government that doubled the total debt in one term over all the debt accumulated since Confederation. That is the kind of mismanagement we are talking about now. While I was not entirely happy with what the previous government did vis-à-vis the setting up of VIA Rail, at least it gave it a mandate and gave it equipment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Gibeau): Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Papineau—Saint-Michel (Mr. Ouellet) has the floor.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise this afternoon and take part in this debate following my colleague the Hon. Member for Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). I am grateful to him for sharing with me the 20 minutes allocated to our Opposition Party.

I feel it is my duty to do so because this Tory Government's decision is extremely unfair, especially to the Province of Quebec. I just cannot understand how a Minister of Transport, representing a Quebec riding at that, can be so determined in eliminating completely the rail transport service, because as a matter of fact, the decisions made by this Tory Government are such that they undermine the very survival of the rail passenger service. It is matter of choice.

Since the Department of Transport is responsible for air, sea, rail and to some extent truck and bus transport, it is clear that the minister must strive to defend, through his agreement with the provinces— Well, we would have hoped that the Minister of Transport would heed the representations originating from the Province of Quebec. It is not only the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transport which is seeking a one-year moratorium. So do the Quebec Premier himself, Mayor Jean Doré of Montreal, Mayor M. Pelletier of Quebec City, and recently elected Mayor Mr—

An Hon. Member: Mr. L'Allier.

Mr. Ouellet: —thank you, Jean-Paul L'Allier who came this week to Ottawa with Mayor Pelletier to make representations calling for a moratorium. So does the Trois-Rivières Mayor. So do the municipal councils of some 300 cities and towns in the Province of Quebec. So do about 20 Chambers of Commerce in the Province of Quebec and of course the representatives of the QFL-Rail Union Common Front, as well as all the railway employees who feel threatened by this Government's decision.

Finally, the Quebec Federation of Labour who was responsible for setting up the Rail Union Common Front recently issued a statement which read in part, and I quote: "The Tory Government's recent decision will result in over 10,000 jobs being lost in the Province of Quebec. The destruction of the rail industry in the Province of Quebec will be an economic and social disaster".

Just the same, the Minister claims that only some 600 jobs in Montreal are being jeopardized. What he forgot to mention is the fact that everywhere VIA Rail operates, not only direct jobs are involved but also indirect employment provided by small businesses whose livelihood partly depends on the presence of a passenger rail service throughout the area. The Conservative Government's willingness to give up one of the safest and most economical and environmentally sound means of transportation makes us wonder what its priorities are.

At every opportunity, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the new Minister of the Environment (Mr. Bouchard) are trying to convince us that the environment has become a major priority for the Conservative Government, while the Minister of Transport is dismantling the safest and most environmentally sound means of transportation. It makes me wonder whether the right hand knows what the left hand is doing.

I am asking again the Government and especially the Minister of Transport who comes from Quebec to go back on their decision and agree to a one-year moratorium to allow the Quebec Government round table, the Royal Commission and, above all, the Standing Committee on Transport to hold hearings, carry out their work and make comprehensive recommendations on passenger transportation in Canada. It is obvious to me that rail service and air transport complement each other.

When the Minister said he would not go on subsidizing rail transportation, he should understand that in fact every single transportation mode in Canada is subsidized. Who pays for airport construction? Who pays for road construction? Who pays for seaport construction? Clearly, governments pay for those infrastructures. Therefore Governments, both federal and provincial, to a significant extent subsidize transportation modes in Canada. I say to the Minister of Transport: Railways are your responsibility, it is for you to pick-up the bill of maintaining rail passenger services, because in every country around the world passenger trains are subsidized by the state. Even in the case of the most modern and spacious ones as in France and Japan—the French Government and the Japanese Government subsidize passenger rail services in those countries. Quite naturally therefore the Canadian public expect subsidized passenger rail services. It is impossible to allow those companies to make a profit, not with a country as large and a population as scattered as we have in Canada.

Clearly, the Canadian Government must assume its responsibility and pay part of the bill for maintaining those passenger rail services. So much so that the people who will be penalized are the less privileged, often handicapped people who have no other means of travel than the train, because it is very difficult for a handicapped person to take the plane or even the bus. Also young people, who have the smallest income and want to see our country, discover it, especially and at a time when the First Ministers right now are discussing Canadian unity. Is there a better way to promote Canadian unity than to allow Canadians to travel from one point to another in Canada, and clearly the train is the least costly way of travelling, the easiest one for students. But the Government now intends to scuttle that plan that allowed during holiday periods young Canadians to travel from one area to another across Canada. And people in remote areas will be the most affected, they will be hurt most by this Government's cuts. Because in many remote areas of Canada, the most appropriate transportation service for those people is the train and nothing else.

I therefore conclude by saying this does not make sense. Finally, I hope the Canadian Government will listen to reason and accept this moratorium.

• (1420)

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Papineau—Saint-Michel (Mr. Ouellet) for his remarks. You did make passing reference to remote regions. I know the government has a Member who is facing problems in Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine. I followed the committee proceedings on the future of VIA here in the House. I would like to hear your comments on the problems facing communities in the riding of Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, for example.

Mr. Ouellet: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, a number of our Conservative colleagues on the other side feel bad and are embarrassed over the decisions made by their government.

I have here a list of Chambers of Commerce, towns and communities that have signed a petition and passed a municipal council resolution urging the Conservative government to agree to this one-year moratorium. It has become obvious—Earlier I saw the Hon. Member for Manicouagan (Mr. Langlois) seek the floor to ask questions. The Chamber of Commerce of Chibougamau passed a resolution to that effect. The Chamber of Commerce of Sept-Îles passed a resolution to that effect. I see that my colleague from Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup (Mr. Plourde) is in the House. I remind him that the town of Rivière-du-Loup passed a resolution to that effect, as did the town of La Pocatière.

In answer to your question, it has become obvious that the Hon. Member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Gray) would rather hide in the sand pit, because nearly all municipalities in his riding signed that petition and passed resolutions asking him to put pressure on the Minister of Transport about the moratorium. Unfortunately I have to admit that neither the Hon. Member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine nor the Hon. Member for Gaspé (Mr. Marin) or the Hon. Member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup seem to hold any sway over the Minister of Transport who struck a heavy blow against the province's economy when he made that decision which most Quebecers find totally unacceptable.

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, I just cannot let my colleague say all sorts of things without responding. I can tell you one thing, Mr. Speaker, I use the train which runs through Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup and I can also tell the other colleague opposite that there are no trains on the Magdalen Islands.

However, as for the moratorium that was requested, I say publicly that I am not for it. My colleague opposite who just spoke probably never worked in private enterprise. I was in private business for 28 years and I can tell you that when a private company has monetary problems, it has to make cuts. The Government of Canada, which is a very big business, must ensure that these cuts also apply to VIA Rail.

I would also like to tell this House, Mr. Speaker, that as far as eastern Quebec and the Gaspé peninsula are concerned, there are still three trains a week between Gaspé and Montreal and another three trains a week between Halifax and Montreal. That is six days out of seven. And I must tell you this: there was a train called the "Saint-Laurent" from Mont-Joli to Charny. I took that train six months a year. I would like to see Hon. Members get on that train in Rivière-du-Loup at 9.30 in the morning and arrive in Charny to transfer to the Montreal train and be told that the train from Quebec City to Montreal had already passed and could not wait for them because they were late. From there, you had to take a bus, paid by VIA Rail, for the rest of the trip from Charny to Montreal. Sometimes in my experience, the bus driver did not even know where the station was in some places. So I think it is stretching the point to say that VIA Rail has now cut its services, when we know very well that eastern Quebec and the area I represent in this House will continue to be served six days a week. I hope that people will have got the message and will take the train. Although the Saint-Laurent from Mont-Joli to Charny has been abolished, 38,000 passengers took it in 1988.

And I would like to tell my colleague opposite that of those 38,000 passengers, 18,000 had railway passes and traveled for free. This train covered 19 per cent of its costs in 1988, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, again I tell you that eastern Quebec will be very well served with the VIA Rail schedule that will take effect in January and I ask train users to continue to take the train, and I do mean to keep on taking the train if they do not want more cuts in the future.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I note the threat implied in the Hon. Member's remarks when he said that users had better continue taking the train, or else they might be faced with further cuts.

I suggest the Hon. Member has just let the cat out of the bag. Ever since this Tory Government came to power, we have witnessed its unrelenting effort to completely destroy, our rail passenger service.

What this Government has never recognized is that the Cabinet had made up its mind to completely eliminate rail passenger service in this country. The Government of Canada wants to get out of it.

Although the Hon. Member made a fine speech, he could not help but express the Tory philosophy when towards at the end of his speech, he warned that other cuts were in the offing! We know that other cuts are forthcoming. So does the Quebec Premier. So do the mayors of the most important Quebec municipalities which will be affected by them, and especially the railway workers who are urging us to act now in order to put a stop to this frightening eliminatation of rail passenger service in Canada.

In this endeavour, the government was guilty of much foot dragging. I need not remind you that as soon as the Tories came to power, the first thing they did was to impose a freeze on all the orders which VIA Rail had placed for the purchase of new engines and passenger cars. Then, they ordered a freeze on all planned repair shops which were to be build throughout Canada to make it possible for VIA Rail to carry out repairs on its own cars and engines without having to rely on the CNR and the CPR which were charging very high repair and maintenance costs.

Finally, this government appointed the Horner Commission at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars to submit a report which expressly recommended to the government to give VIA Rail a definite mandate and additional subsidies. This Tory government chose to ignore the Horner Report because it went against its own views and policies. Not only they do not want to give VIA Rail more money, but they simply want VIA Rail to suffocate and give up the ghost. If they try, they will have to fight us head on, Mr. Speaker!

[English]

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the debate this afternoon I have noted the suggestion that the standing committee held hearings against the wishes of the government. I can tell you that I have never heard anyone from the government say that the standing committee should not be holding hearings. The minister with whom I work has never once said that the standing committee should not hold hearings. It did this of its own free will because committees are masters of their own destiny.

• (1430)

It is unfortunate though that the standing committee in compiling its report and putting forth its suggestions was not a little more constructive in what it put forward. All it has said is that there should be a moratorium. Big deal, a moratorium. We are spending money like it is going out of style. We do not have the money to spend and that is what this program is all about.

Reducing subsidies to VIA Rail was a difficult decision to make and it was not done in haste. It strikes a balance between the transportation needs of our country and the fiscal realities which cannot be undermined. Fiscal responsibility is something that nobody on the opposition benches seems to want to address. They just keep saying: "Spend more money. Keep spending at the rate your are going and everything is going to be fine." It is not going to be fine.

The Canadian people have elected us to govern, and that is precisely what we are doing. I know it is going to be difficult for some people to adjust. Nevertheless, difficult decisions have to be made.

The new network will continue to link Canadians from Vancouver to Halifax. From listening to the members opposite you would think there is no more national transportation system. That is bunk. There will still be a train that you can get on in Halifax and you can get to Vancouver. It will maintain good connections between eastern and central Canada, and it will continue to serve the Quebec–Windsor corridor effectively, thereby providing Canadians from coast to coast with not only a national network but one that is affordable and sustainable. We will at last have something that we can build upon.

Much has been said about the state of rail transportation in other countries. I believe this bears some discussion. During the last few years all the western European nations have adopted plans to overhaul their existing rail passenger services. High-speed services operate in France, Britain and West Germany. In addition, France, Britain, The Netherlands, Sweden, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Italy and Switzerland are either building all new rail lines or upgrading existing lines to accommodate high-speed rail transportation service. It is anticipated that by 1995 a high-speed rail network should connect all major European cities. The investment in this high speed system will total $39 billion in 1995 and $92 billion in 2005—that is based on 1989 Canadian dollars—most of which will be funded by governments.

The Japanese inaugurated the world's first high speed train in the 1960s between Tokyo and Osaka. The route has been commercially successful and carries more than 130 million passengers a year. The Japanese have been working to extend the system the length of the country. The financial results of these extensions have been mixed as the costs of construction have been very high. Also, as population densities in the outlying areas are low and the distance between major centres quite long, the trains on these routes do not have the same high level of ridership as on earlier lines. For these two reasons, these lines require operating subsidies. While no specific information is available on the financing of high speed rail projects in Japan, the Japanese national railway is funded publicly.

In 1971 Amtrak took over 25 per cent of the rail passenger services in the U.S. All other passenger services were discontinued. By the early 1980s Amtrak had modernized its rail passenger services. The fleet is comprised of new locomotives or new modernized cars. A network of maintenance facilities has been completed and rail lines between New York and Washington have been upgraded for 200 kilometre an hour operation and between New York and Albany for 176 kilometre an hour operation. These improvements required a government investment of some $4 billion.

Opposition members seem to forget that Amtrak is a little different creature than what we have in VIA. Amtrak has the ability to abandon services, something which the opposition has been quite vocal in denying to VIA Rail. Amtrak can freely set its own price on tickets. VIA Rail had to defend its pricing in front of the NTA when challenged by the bus systems. Amtrak receives direct subsidies from individual states that require uneconomic routes to be run. Yet provinces have been asked to do this in committee. I sat there and observed what was going on. Questions were put to the mayors of the corridor:, "Would you participate in the cost of putting on a moratorium for a year?" The answer came back an emphatic no.

I read in this morning's paper that one of our premiers was gracious enough to say that he was sure that all Canadians would be willing to subsidize VIA Rail to the tune of an extra $4 per person. Isn't that great? One of the premiers is volunteering that Canadians are willing to put out another $4. The Canadian people are telling us to try to get the deficit under control. All we hear is carping from the opposition benches "spend more money".

It also was said today that the standing committee was unanimous in this decision. The standing committee I have heard was not unanimous in its decision. It was a majority of the committee that voted, but it was not a unanimous decision.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The chairman voted for it. He sits on your side.

Mr. Belsher: I was told this afternoon in a speech by the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden that it was unanimous. Now I hear otherwise. I do not know because it was an in camera meeting.

In national terms more than half of these countries that I have just cited have populations larger than Canada, and all have much higher population densities. Only the Quebec City—Windsor corridor matches the population densities of these other countries.

This government's decision is based on the economic, geographic and demographic realities of the country.

Let us look and see just what is happening between, say, Montreal and Toronto, or from Quebec City right through to Windsor. From Montreal to Quebec there is a cut-back of service. It is going from 48 round trips per week while maintaining 21. From Montreal to Ottawa it goes from 29 to 22. From Montreal to Toronto it goes from 43 down to 36. From Toronto to Ottawa it goes from 26 down to 19. From Toronto to Windsor there will be 30 trips per week. It will still have 30 trips a week.

From Toronto to Niagara Falls it goes from 21 down to 14.

Let us look at the ridership on some of these trains that we are cutting back. It is 39 per cent, 50 per cent, and 56 per cent is the highest occupancy rate of the routes that have been in service. In other words, 44 per cent of the seats are going empty on all of those routes I have just mentioned.

The combined public and private spending on transportation in Canada over the next 10 years can only be measured in hundreds of billions of dollars, and we are talking about total transportation. Therefore, an effective consideration of such an integrated system required the government to establish a forum that would permit all Canadians to be heard in a thoughtful, comprehensive and forward looking manner. That is why the Prime Minister has struck a royal commission. It was announced at the same time that the cuts were being made to VIA Rail. It is to inquire into and report on a national integrated inter-city passenger transportation system to meet the needs of Canada and Canadians well into the future.

The size and importance of our transportation system cannot be overstated. Its future development must lead to a system which will meet the challenges of the 21st century, not just the 20th century. This royal commission will be asked to inquire into and recommend solutions on the role of a national, integrated inter-city passenger transportation system and its relationship to the entire transportation system; the structure of a suitable, multi-modal transportation system demonstrating the linkages and the potential for and constraints on achieving a national transportation system and, where appropriate, financial arrangements to achieve such a system, taking into account the jurisdiction of all levels of government and the role of the private sector. The commission will look ahead into the 21st century to advise governments on the needs of Canadians and on the relationship between the modes of transport of the future.

This royal commission through its wide consultation and broad mandate is expected to provide a clear action plan that will ensure that the transportation links among Canada's regions are maintained and improved.

In making this announcement the Prime Minister stressed the importance of taking into account the wide range of interests of Canadians and the respective roles of all levels of government and the private sector in the provisions of inter-city services. He also emphasized the necessity to balance Canada's transportation needs with the government's policy of environmentally sustainable economic development.

This royal commission will examine Canada's unique social and democratic trends and look ahead to the ways the transportation system must respond to meet the competing needs and demands of users, operators, employees and other interested parties. The commission is expected to provide Canadians with a blueprint for a comprehensive, co-ordinated passenger system to take us well into the 21st century.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I have a few questions to put to the hon. member. They relate to the fact that if you take a look at Revenue Canada's own figures you see that there has been a large drop in the amount of dollars in the last five years in transfer of payments to the provinces and other governments. By the statement he just made it is evident why. It is because he feels that the deficit is out of control. Furthermore, because the deficit is out of control the tax burden should be shifted to other governments to let them worry about it.

I have one question. Is he saying to we members opposite that the federal government will no longer give a high priority to the regions of Canada or where you will live. Is he saying that in essence if the municipalities and the provinces cannot look after places such as those in northwestern Ontario, where it was decided to remove The Canadian which ran to the major centres, and if they cannot afford to do that then it is too bad, they just happen to live there and that's it, that's the way it works.

The government seems to be transferring its problems. We on this side are not saying that there are no difficulties. We realize there are many difficulties. When I became interested in running for federal politics one of the reasons was because I believed in all of Canada, as well as the federal importance and the importance of the government to keep the regions and all of Canada as one. That is the reason why I am a little disturbed to hear the Prime Minister saying: "Well, if the other governments do not want to take part in a national railway system, then too bad, we will not have one".

Second, the member gave us some interesting statistics. The main reason that he gave those statistics was to show that some lines are not being used as much as they should be used. There is one in particular I want to ask him about, that is The Canadian. It was told to me not too long ago that by 1993 VIA with its present statistics would be running The Canadian at full capacity. What I heard from the constituents of Kenora—Rainy River this summer was that The Canadian was full, you could not get a ticket on it. Again, in essence they were right. You could not get on there. In the summer months it was running at a capacity of 96 per cent. It was full, you could not get a ticket. You could not go to Sudbury. You could not go to Winnipeg on that particular train. Lo and behold The Canadian is now gone.

I ask the member if he can explain to me based on those figures the fact that VIA told us that the reason why they were not putting more cars on that train to make it more viable—and it was only running 11-car trains—was that there were no more cars available to put on that train. I wonder why the member would not be interested in making a line that is considered to be one of the best in the country more viable by putting more cars on it.

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his questions. I can assure the hon. member that this government in terms of regional disparities and looking after the regions has spent more money during this past four or five years than the previous government ever did. We believe there is a role to be played by the federal government in trying to ensure that the regions are not handicapped. He mentions the one line, The Canadian, which runs from Toronto to Winnipeg, to Calgary, and on to Vancouver, as being cut out. Yes, there have been some very difficult decisions made in what had to be cut.

The minister gave instructions to VIA management to reduce spending to $250 million per year by way of government subsidy in four years' time. That is down from the level of $641 million. There have been some very difficult decisions made. We must remember that in terms of the places that were cut out along the way there are alternate means of getting around. The occupancy rate over the whole line was considered, I think, at the 70 per cent rate. There could be times of the year—I think he made reference to 90 per cent—when it could be higher, but the fact is that VIA Rail has had to be shrunk in total size. That is what this exercise has been about.

We had to make sure that the largest number of people could be accommodated, that the largest population base would still be serviced. Also, we had to ensure that the corridor from Quebec City through to Windsor would also have the bulk of its services retained, which has happened. Faced with the financial restraints that have been given to VIA management, these are the recommendations that have come back to us. The government, with whatever alternatives were given to it, has decided to carry them out.

I would hope to see a successful conclusion to some of the ideas that have been coming out of the travel agencies which would like to invest, to put in something similar to the Orient Express that would run from Toronto through to Vancouver, through our scenic Rocky Mountains. That would still be a way of travelling for the people who want to take an excursion, or a holiday, something that is entirely different, something which allows them to see something of the grandeur of our great country.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I am pleased to be able to ask a few questions of the parliamentary secretary concerning these cuts.

Coming from Atlantic Canada, I can tell you—and I am sure some of your colleagues on your side of the House have already done this—that the people of Atlantic Canada feel very much betrayed by the government's inability to keep up with its own rhetoric about holding on to the dream of a national rail transportation system.

A few years back, we had the then Deputy Prime Minister telling us that the government—the Tory party—was committed to building a viable national network, revitalizing the train service. We had recently, I think in the spring, the National Transportation Agency going around the country, holding public hearings chaired by an individual who spent many days in this house, the former Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Nielsen, the chairman of the NTA.

One of the disturbing things for people in Atlantic Canada is that once the cuts were announced, there did not seem to be a great deal of rationalization as to why so many cuts took place in Atlantic Canada. Those who are cynical would believe that it is perhaps because Atlantic Canada sent more Liberals to this place than they sent members on your side of the House. Surely to goodness the people of Atlantic Canada deserve a little bit better than lip service from this government.

What the government has done in essence is to tell people in Atlantic Canada repeatedly that we either use the train service or we lose it. The people living in Atlantic Canada did use the train system. The train that goes from Truro to Halifax—and I hope you have the statistics there—was sold out most days. There were many senior citizens, many students, and many individuals who took the train from the industrial Cape Breton area up through the northeast of Nova Scotia to get medical services in Halifax. Many of them were seniors, and many of them are on fixed incomes. These people could not afford to take the plane or could not take the bus because it was too uncomfortable or inconvenient.

Those people rode the rails. They sat in uncomfortable, outdated rail cars. Many times it took eight hours instead of four hours if they were travelling by car to get there. At the same point in time the government came in after telling them to use it or lose it and cancelled the routes. I would like to know the rationale for that.

In Atlantic Canada we have had some of the highest ridership rates anywhere in the country. People in Atlantic Canada use the train system. It is a very necessary part of our transportation infrastructure down there in a multimodal transportation system. That is the first question.

The other question that I want to ask deals specifically with the Halifax maintenance centre. The leaks and purported leaks and reports in the media prior to the cuts being announced in this place indicated that the Halifax maintenance centre was going to be one of the places that was going to be chopped in these cuts. Indeed, at the press conference on the day that the cuts were announced, Mr. Lawless responded to the first question from a member of the press from Halifax. This was the first question he was asked, so he was not befuddled with other questions and facts at that point.

The first question was: "What is the future of the Halifax maintenance centre?" Immediately Mr. Lawless came back and indicated that the Halifax maintenance centre would be redundant, it would be closed, there would be no work. In the House later that day, the minister responsible and I believe the Prime Minister as well said that was not the case. I have sought assurances since that point in time, and have not been able to get them, that the Halifax maintenance centre will be open for the life of the business plan which is five years, and that there will not be substantial lay-offs six, eight or ten months down the road. I believe that there was a staff member of the minister's office who indicated that that would be the case.

I would like an assurance from the parliamentary secretary that the Halifax maintenance centre is not going to be a political football in the VIA cuts, that the Halifax maintenance centre will remain open, as I have been told by a member of the minister's staff, after the life span of this particular five year plan and that we are not going to face death by slow torture in that particular sector of the rail industry in Atlantic Canada, in Halifax-Dartmouth. We do not want to end up six or eight months down the road with instead of 130 workers maybe 100 workers, and then six months after that with 50 workers and eventually shut down. I hope he can give me the answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I hope he can do it in a very short time, too.

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. friend opposite for his questions. With respect to the services that he has mentioned that have been discontinued, I have the figures before me. I think they touch on some of the routes that he is talking about.

From Halifax to Sydney, there was 37 per cent occupancy; from Halifax to Port Hawkesbury, 34 per cent; Halifax to Yarmouth, 26 per cent; Halifax to Moncton—Saint John, 31 per cent. Those are the occupancy rates. In other words, well over half the seats were empty.

We must not forget that VIA Rail was created with, I think it was, $1 back in 1977. It was never given a legislative mandate to work under. It is still struggling under that situation. We have not corrected that deficiency that was created back in 1977, but we are bound and determined that we are going to have a national transportation system.

The member also asked me about the Halifax maintenance yard. I can only reiterate what the minister said in reply to either his question or one of the members opposite who asked about that. The Halifax maintenance centre will stay.

If he were to come out to Vancouver or out to British Columbia where they were used to having the two trains, the Supercontinental and The Canadian, go through he would see they are now down to three trains per week. When you look at the Halifax to Montreal route, you see it still has six trains per week. It still has them on both lines, the north and the south line.

I think the Atlantic has been well served in that respect with the connections to central Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Comments are now terminated. I have three more speakers before four o'clock. I would recognize the hon. member for Hillsborough. Then I will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan. I will wind up with the hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Dartmouth has certainly put forward the concerns of Atlantic Canada. With the exception that I would like to speak on this motion, there would not be much need of me going any further.

I rise today, Mr. Speaker, in support of the motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbes—Baie Verte. The motion calls for this House to approve the recommendations contained in the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport. Specifically the standing committee calls for a moratorium on the government's proposed cuts to VIA Rail.

It is a well-known fact that the drastic cuts to our national rail system will impact on every individual across Canada. The government states that it can no longer afford to maintain a rail service that only 3 per cent of Canadians use. What Canadians are not told is that this figure includes the regions where VIA does not operate. If we use these measures then only 6 per cent of Canadians ride buses and only 6 per cent use airplanes.

We listened to statements by the Minister of Transport like: "We have to consider that Canadians seem to stick to roads and air". What he does not say is that trains are being rediscovered in North America. Ridership increased on VIA by 10 per cent system-wide last year and in the first five months of this year showed a further increase.

According to Andrew Roman, the renowned author of a study in air deregulation, "Air fares will increase 30 per cent in the next year or two. There are going to be more people returning to passenger rail, only to find that none exists".

The minister has also stated: "Canada has to deal first of all with those modes of transportation which have to be considered as the future of transportation in Canada".

Mr. Kenneth Hare, chairman of the Climate Planning Board, cautions: "Transport policy has a profound effect on environmental issues—Getting cars and trucks off the road is a major environmental objective". He goes on to state that he personally regarded the government's plan of reducing train service as a serious mistake from an environmental point of view. I believe it is time that this government provided some far-sighted leadership by encouraging the use of an environmentally sound transportation alternative.

Thus, the standing committee's recommendation that calls upon the government to direct the royal commission to give particular attention to among other other issues over-all environmental impacts.

The VIA cuts will impact on every passenger in this country, especially the handicapped, those of lower income and those living in rural areas with poor highway systems. The Atlantic region will once again bear more than its share of the burden. Atlantic Canada will lose 68 of its 80 runs. That amounts to 85 per cent of all Atlantic train service.

My province of Prince Edward Island has been without train service for years. Our only link to the mainland passenger train service was a bus system which this government has to no one's surprise eliminated. Islanders do not have access to what the minister and the Prime Minister call a national rail system.

Last month when I asked the minister if he would restore our bus service he said: "No". He also stated that we have a ferry service that will serve as our link to the national rail system. Atlantic Canadians were told to use it or lose it. Well, we did, and what did we get? A reduction of 85 per cent. Imagine what would have happened if we had not used it to the extent which we did.

The national railway was the first institution to unite Canadians from coast to coast. It joined the east and the west and gave us an opportunity to travel across this country. Eliminating VIA all across Canada is a direct assault on the fundamental transportation network that has allowed Canadians to to live and work throughout the country for a century.

We have received mixed signals from this government over the past years as far as its policy regarding VIA is concerned. After the election in 1984 the government reinstated service reductions that had been in effect since 1981. In 1985 the Minister of Transport said: "It is now time to turn VIA into a strong system that is cost effective, national in scope, and one which Canadians will be proud to use".

By 1986, however, the Minister of Transport was telling Canadians to use or lose their trains. The government has stuck with this policy for almost three years now and has obviously abandoned any notion of rebuilding passenger rail service in Canada. It seems like a blatant waste and misuse of taxpayers' money for the government to have invested so much in the system only to pull the funding when things are just beginning to improve. In the first three months of 1989 revenue had increased by over $5.5 million in comparison with the same period in 1988.

In addition, within the first quarter of 1989 the number of passengers increased by 10 per cent and the occupancy rate of the service increased to 54 per cent, up 15 per cent from the first quarter of 1988. Over half of all Canadians use this service due to a variety of factors. Increased reliability is one. Many use it as an alternative mode of transportation because of congested airports and highways in poor shape. Others use it because it is one of the least expensive modes of transportation in Canada. I am sure that students can attest to this point.

By promoting the system and services to Canadians—and they are only becoming aware of what it has to offer—it is obvious that there have been marked improvements in the system. Now that things are just starting to roll and VIA is getting back on track, the government has pulled the funding for the company out from under its feet. More time is needed for VIA to prove its viability, as I have just said. Canadians are only becoming aware of its service. They should not lose it.

I am quite familiar with the way in which a community is affected when it loses its passenger train service. My home province has not had rail passenger service for a long time. We did have a bus. Now the bus is not going to be there after January 15 and we will have to take the car ferry to go to the train in Moncton. This certainly does not provide any incentive to take a train.

I am deeply troubled with the consequences of the government's policy for the economy of Prince Edward Island and indeed for the Atlantic region. It is not difficult to conclude from all we have seen that the present government is becoming increasingly indifferent and insensitive to the needs of Atlantic Canadians. The elimination of passenger train service was just the tip of the iceberg.

We in Atlantic Canada are aware of the growing national deficit that threatens to undermine the future of our country. We know that we must contribute our share to its reduction, but as we see it we are being asked to pay too high a price and the government's deficit reduction efforts are being carried out on the backs of Atlantic Canadians.

Of even more fundamental concern is that the government's actions threaten to undermine the economic base of our region with serious, severe and long-lasting consequences for all of us. I have very real concerns about the future of the Atlantic region and its people unless we are able to restore some of the fundamental principles of equity, equality and fairness that have guided the development of this nation.

This nation of Canada is a diverse country and that diversity needs to be recognized and responded to. My fear is that we in the Atlantic region are going to become the losers under the present agenda.

This government should be finding ways to improve and strengthen our rail system. One solution would be to invest in modern equipment. The improved service generated by this equipment would increase passenger service and the need for subsidies from the federal government would decrease in time.

In conclusion, I support the motion. VIA Rail is essential to the development of communities in all areas across this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I did err a little when I said that the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan was to have the floor. The NDP is going to split the 20 minutes into 10 minutes. The hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan will have 10 minutes, and the hon. member for Kootenay West will have 10 minutes in order to make up the 20 minutes.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I am going to talk particularly about the E and N Railway on Vancouver Island. I submit that it is a special case, although I expect special circumstances could be used in referring to many of the rail lines that are being discontinued or cut back seriously.

Everyone knows that the province of B.C. has filed a suit in the B.C. Supreme Court to the effect that the action by the federal government in announcing its closure of the E and N Railway is a direct contradiction of legal obligations made in perpetuity under the terms of the Constitution.

It is not that we want the taxpayers of Canada to pay any more to maintain passenger rail service on the E and N. We do say that the Government of Canada made a contract and the Government of Canada in this action is acting in collusion with the CPR to continue stealing from the people of British Columbia something that has been going on for almost 100 years.

There was a contract and there was consideration: two million acres on Vancouver Island, 20 miles on either side of a 150-mile long track, and the railroad was never built that long. Two million acres of timber, currently valued at $2 billion, was described by a royal commissioner as the finest stand of mature timber remaining in the province. Everything on and under the surface of the land and offshore, off the land—coal rights, mineral rights, 3.5 million acres in the Peace River—was turned over to the federal government by the Government of British Columbia and cash was given to the builders of the railroad, $750,000. Along with everything else, they got almost enough cash to build a railroad which cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $850,000. Tremendous consideration, and for that we got a railroad that was to give us service in perpetuity.

What did the Dunsmuir interests get out of it, besides the cash of $750,000? By the time they sold the railroad, all of the transportation assets in 1905, they had sold land to the value of $4.5 million. They had only $100,000 in the railroad, but in 10 years they were able to turn over the assets for $4.5 million. They sold the remaining assets to the CPR for a total of $2.33 million. They sold coal up to that period in time of approximately 5 million tonnes for a total of $1 million. They did not sell the coal rights. The total value of the coal rights sold by the Dunsmuirs for the 50 million tonnes that were produced, for which they collected 10 cents a tonne, would be $5 million. The Dunsmuirs, with a net investment of $100,000, obtained from the people of Canada or the people of British Columbia, however you want to look at it, a net amount of $12 million quite apart from the operating of the railroad.

The CPR has not done too badly either. In 1906 it paid $2.33 million, but the federal government helped out by giving it $1.5 million in cash. It invested a net amount of $830,000 in taking over all the assets of the Dunsmuir interests with the exception of the coal and clay rights. Up to 1944 it had sold additional land to the extent of $10.3 million. It more than quadrupled its total investment and its total investment, as I say, was reduced by a government subsidy. It had 13 times the original investment returned in the sale of land alone.

It made another sale in 1964 of timber land, 229,000 acres for $56 million. That is $66 million so far in sales. It had left approximately one million acres. As I said, the royal commissioner described this as the best acreage of mature timber land in British Columbia, which was appraised at that time as being worth $2,000 an acre. That means $2 billion was left in that land at that time, plus the $56 million from that one land sale, plus the other land sales of $10 million; $2.66 billion it had received up to that point on a net investment of $.5 million.

Although the CPR has taken all that money out in excess of $2 billion in sales alone, it still has tremendous assets there. It is still logging that land. It is a federal Crown grant so the Government of British Columbia can exert no restrictions with the export of round logs. It does not have to get any permission. It is indeed exporting round logs, because it gets a better price for round logs from overseas markets than locally. It is doing it regularly. We have no control, no influence over that in the Province of British Columbia.

It still owns all the mineral rights, with the exception of the coal and fire clay rights. What are they worth? Who knows. Some drilling was done for gas in the area some three or four years ago by British Petroleum which does not usually go in just for the fun of it. It does not usually invest a couple of million dollars just to practise. It has not told us what was found, if anything. Whatever it did find the wells have been capped and left. We do not know what is going on there. Certainly there must have been some substantial evidence that there is gas at least in the area, or British Petroleum would not have been in there drilling.

It owns the transportation system. It is not the taxpayers that owe something to the people of British Columbia. It is not the taxpayers that owe something to the residents of Vancouver Island or the people generally who want to maintain E and N Railway as a passenger service.

It is the responsibility of this government to make sure that the present owners of all those assets live up to the original contract they assumed when they took over the Dunsmuir interests and make sure that we keep the passenger rail service or, as an alternative, turn over to the taxpayers of British Columbia all the remaining assets that were given to them at the time.

I think we can afford to write off everything we have given them up to this point. Let us get back everything that is left. We will be more than able to afford to maintain a passenger service on Vancouver Island and do much more besides.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to rise to support the motion of the Official Opposition which reads:

> That this House approves the recommendation contained in the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport, calling for a moratorium in the government's proposed cuts to VIA Rail.

As the member of Parliament for Kootenay West—Revelstoke and also on behalf of my colleague, the member for Kootenay East, we have been spending a considerable period of time since the minister's announcement of these cuts attempting to salvage what we can of The Canadian line that runs along the Kamloops–Calgary corridor and with very good reason.

That particular corridor is one of the most heavily utilized in the transcontinental system with the best cost recoveries of almost any rail section in the country, apart from areas within the Golden Horseshoe. It has a valid claim not only on economic grounds, but the minister is making a major pitch for economic restraint and the need to reduce the deficit. We are perhaps one of the more profitable sections of the VIA Rail system in the country and one of the more heavily utilized.

It is interesting to note that The Canadian line carried some 539,000 passengers, up from 465,000 in 1987. The Canadian line has been closed. The Super Continental carried 174,000 passengers, up from 159,000 in 1987. The Super Continental has been kept operating albeit on a reduced basis.

No one, especially myself being a member who comes from an area that is in many ways rather remote and isolated with particular transportation problems, wants to suggest that we rob Peter to pay Paul. If the minister is making one of major grounds for his arguments economics, then he should look at his own figures.

On October 6, 1989, as reported in Hansard, I asked the Minister of Transport in pointing out some of those discrepancies how he could justify that discrimination and whether he would agree to postpone and review his total abandonment of the communities along the Kamloops–Calgary corridor.

The minister, in responding, left the door open a crack. We are certainly doing all we can to take him up on that. He said:

> On the southern route there are other modes of transportation available. Otherwise, it would be considered a remote area and we would provide the service.

He goes on to set out a couple of other conditions which we can easily meet to show that he would be willing to discuss in particular the arguments presented by the communities along that line.

The minister received, as did I, a fax late yesterday or this morning from the manager of the chamber of commerce in the city of Revelstoke. There is a meeting to be held in the village of Golden on the 16th of this month. They have asked the minister—and that is a little difficult to do but he has agreed; I met with him this morning—to send a representative there. There will be representatives from almost every community and every chamber of commerce along the Kamloops–Calgary corridor including Banff, Golden, Field, Invermere, Revelstoke, and other points in between.

We hope that we can establish a case, but with what is happening within the VIA Rail structure right now, as it is already beginning to come apart at the seams, we need time. I am sure there are other communities across Canada with as valid reasons as we have that also need time to marshal the facts of their own cases and time to persuade the minister or the department of the validity of their claims, even given what we may believe are the incorrect assumptions of the government as to the reasons for shutting down major parts of the whole system.

The traffic volumes and cost recovery are comparatively speaking much worse in those areas than, for instance, from Jasper to Prince Rupert, which is being given three days a week of service under the remote configurations which the minister has laid out.

We have particular problems in the communities of Field and Revelstoke. Revelstokians have to drive at least 200 kilometres to get to the nearest commercial airport. They and the people of Golden and Field also live in an area which is now to be deprived of all commercial rail passenger service. This area has its highways totally cut off more often due to heavy snow fall and avalanche closures than any other part of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, coming from the part of the country that you come from, I am sure you are aware of that. I do not think there is anyone from western Canada who cares for travel at all who has not on a number of occasions travelled that corridor between Kamloops and Calgary and perhaps to Vancouver.

The government is suggesting that it is going to keep the Rocky Mountaineer because it is good for tourism. That is good. We have hundreds of millions of dollars in offshore investment right now riding on the necessity of improved transportation between Banff and Revelstoke and Kamloops and Calgary. If this is closed before we get proper airport facilities, before we get double laning and better snow shedding along the Trans-Canada Highway, we are going to lose the potential of building up a major tourist industry in the Revelstoke area that coupled with Banff can provide a major economic boost to an area which otherwise has been very depressed by the resource depression of a few years ago and the timber supply problems we are having in British Columbia.

The minister appears to have an open ear on this particular case, but it is not enough. There are not only our communities but hundreds of communities, I am sure, all across Canada that rightly or wrongly feel that they even within the departments's own guidelines can establish a proper case.

They do need time to prepare their cases, to make their cases, to attempt to convince the government. I would hope that there is yielding to emotions such as we have had or to the spirit at least of the motion that the Official Opposition has put before us today and that a moratorium is put on. It does not specify a time period, so even the passage of this motion would not bind the government to a particular number of hundreds of millions of dollars in subsidies over a particular period to provide some time at the minister's or government's discretion so that we can make our cases and attempt to make the best of what we think is the bad deal imposed right across Canada by these arbitrary cuts to the VIA Rail system.

I am thankful for the very timely opportunity to be able make some of these arguments today. I hope the officials who will be attending for the Minister of Transport in Golden on November 16 will get an earful and will decide that they have heard the facts. In addition to having some of the best freight rail service in Canada justified by the expenditures of almost $500 million during the last few years to give us the longest tunnel in the Commonwealth to carry freight, we can also utilize those new facilities to carry passengers both ways on what is, without a doubt, one of the most beautiful areas of this country.

If we are willing to expend money either through a public rail system or through privatized local branches for tourism, is it not also proper and can we not also make a case that we ought to spend some money on behalf of serving Canadians, especially in those areas where they do not have effective choices as to their modes of transportation, at least until such time as we expend the dollars to provide them with the other modes of transportation which most other Canadians enjoy?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to support this motion for a moratorium on the government's decision with respect to VIA Rail. There are a number of reasons which I want to share with members. The first one, which I consider of critical importance, is the reality that we are facing today with respect to a constitutional crisis of major proportion. We recognize that VIA Rail is a institution which binds the nation. It gets us to know each other. It gets us to understand what each other's aspirations, dreams, hopes and desires are for this great, wonderful country of ours. It is another institution which is being destroyed gradually, which is being dismantled. It fits, unfortunately, into a number of other decisions that have been made by government.

Members will recall that Air Canada was not for sale and it has now been sold. That is another institution that permitted us to travel throughout this great land, one of the largest countries of the world.

We all know that the unemployment insurance program was not to be changed. That was promised during the election and, of course, we all know as well that that did not happen. There have been massive changes that will affect people.

We know about the Canada–U.S. trade deal and I am not here to discuss the pros and cons but surely there is no one in this House who will not accept that it has had a major impact upon Canadians throughout Canada and certainly not all of them positive.

We know that today in the House there have been comments with respect to the reduction of transfer payments, actually the cutting of significant dollars, billions of dollars to health and education. In fact, between 1986 and 1994 it will amount to $24 billion less for health and education.

We know that 31 tax increases have been undertaken by the government. We have talked extensively during the last few weeks about the goods and services tax and how it will touch and affect every single Canadian in this nation.

We know, in fact we have it in writing from a member of government that universality is in the process of being destroyed. These new programs that have been proposed by government will affect seniors and will in fact affect families.

The point I want to make is that there has been so much happening in this country that affects Canadians throughout that it has had a destabilizing effect, and this is one more decision that covers an institution that had as an objective getting us to know each other and reach out to one another. Even from this particular perspective, if we look at it in the context of the constitutional crises that we are going through today, it is worth-while considering and supporting this moratorium to somehow tone the tempers down a bit, to reflect and sit back to see what we might be able to do to bring us closer together.

The other point I want to make and another reason why we should consider this moratorium seriously is because we are talking about over 2,700 workers throughout Canada. We are talking about those workers being affected directly. We are not talking about the many, the thousands in fact of men and women who depend upon those workers for a number of service industries.

We are entering the holiday season. I want us to think about those men and women, their children, brothers, sisters and parents. What kind of holiday season do they have to look forward to? Let us just think of being faced with the same decision. How would we feel individually? How would our spouses, children, our friends and relatives feel? I cannot think of a worse time of year to implement this particular decision, to leave people with such little hope for the future.

There is another reason I would like to share with Hon. Members. You will surely know that Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Peterson today asked for a freeze on the cuts. Why? Because they want to look at what the options are. Is there something else they could do to maintain and improve services?

What I am saying is, if that request can possibly be granted—and I hope it will be—it is just as important that it also applies to Atlantic and western Canada.

It seems reasonable that, when in the process of making a decision that has such an impact on Canadians, we take the trouble to pause a while and review the figures to be absolutely sure that the decision to be made is in Canada's best interest. If we did, I am sure other alternatives could be found, other ways to meet the needs of Canadians.

There is a last point I would like to make. Like a number of other Members, I have a concern for our small, remote communities mostly in the north. It seems to me that there is a principle here that is absolutely basic to this country's very existence. As we know, a significant number of Canadians live outside urban centers. What they want, what I would like to give them as much as possible is a quality of life that compares favorably with what we have in our urban areas. I don't think there is any argument about that! It seems to me that a key ingredient is a transportation system, whether roads, airports, railroads, that can give them not only a sense of belonging, the feeling they have their fare share, but also the feeling that in a not too distant future they will enjoy the same quality of life as is enjoyed by citizens of Canada's largest centers.

I think it is essential to reconsider, if only for fundamental reasons such as ensuring that residents of small or remote communities have access to the same quality of service than city dwellers.

To sum up, there are four reasons. Firstly, we are now going through a constitutional crisis. This seems to be another decision that was used to break off long established ties. I think it would be worthwhile to preserve them and to reexamine our options. Secondly, let us think about these 2,700 people, men and women, children, parents and relatives. Soon we will be celebrating the holiday season. What a present we are giving them! If we made that decision, we could give them a great present and offer them some hope and—who knows—we could perhaps, with enlightened minds, find less drastic, threatening and difficult alternatives.

Thirdly, I told you earlier that some premiers are supporting us and asking for a moratorium. This request is not without support, mine included, except for the two big provinces. Of course, it is all very well for the Atlantic provinces and the West.

My last comment is this: Let us not forget our small, remote and sparsely populated communities that still want the same thing we, city dwellers, want: a quality of life that compares favorably with that enjoyed in the major centres.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address this motion on behalf of the constituents of Winnipeg North. The motion introduced by the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte states:

> That this House approve the recommendation contained in the Second Report of the Standing Committee on Transport, calling for a moratorium in the Government's proposed cuts to VIA Rail.

In arguing this motion, my colleague has spoken of our VIA Rail system in beautiful language, referring to it as "the ribbon of steel that binds our country".

I support this motion because I would like to see all Canadians from coast to coast served by an excellent passenger rail system.

In speaking to this motion, I would like to quote freely from the report of the Standing Committee on Transport so that Canadians across the country may hear some of the highlights of this report in order that they may judge for themselves as to whether we are right in arguing that a moratorium be established as a consequence of this study by the Standing Committee on Transport.

• (1530)

In introducing its report, the standing committee said:

> —the committee believed that it could not ignore the public concern and reaction and therefore decided to hold public hearings in Ottawa on the future of rail passenger service.

The members of this committee, the majority of whom belong to the government party, decided that they should hear the concerns of Canadians first hand. As a consequence they went further:

> As a result of the establishment of a Royal Commission (on national transportation) which will examine in depth the place of rail passenger service with a national transportation strategy, the Committee felt that its hearings should be compressed in order to report its findings to the Government before the cuts come into effect.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the essence of this motion. The committee tried to do overtime work, but careful and diligent work. It has presented a report so that the government could address the issue of a moratorium before it proceeds with its plan to cut VIA Rail's system, come the middle of next year.

Does not this government have a heart? Will it not listen to a committee of this House of Commons, the majority of its members belonging to the government party? Do we not see in here the non-partisan issue that VIA Rail passenger service has generated in the country. I ask the government to do a little soul searching, and for once listen to Parliament. As I said in the past, our Parliament is not a Parliament for government, but a Parliament for Canadians across our country.

I would like to highlight some of the report. The Standing Committee on Transport indicated, and I quote:

> Throughout the hearings the Committee was confronted with a plethora of divergent statistics put forward by various witnesses with great persuasion and conviction.

Then it continues:

> The observation the Committee would like to make is that the statistics can be used to make anyone's case or position sound persuasive. We do not intend, in this report, to become tangled in the "numbers game". In our view, this would be unproductive and somewhat redundant because obviously, the royal commission will be examining this problem in detail.

What the committee felt is that we should should find the real truth, and there is nothing wrong with that. Canadians would like to hear and know the real truth.

Obviously there are conflicting statistics being presented, but let the royal commission which has been given a mandate by this government to first make an interim report so that the government may be well advised to then consider what action to take next. Let us first diagnose the problem, not settle on the treatment before the diagnosis, otherwise it could be the wrong treatment and therefore harmful to the people of our country.

On the issue of cost-effectiveness, I quote:

> —the committee is not persuaded that the Government plan is the most cost-effective option. This leads us to conclude that is likely that VIA will have great difficulty operating the new network successfully within the reference levels set by the government.

Here, again, the committee is not convinced of the government plan. The committee has challenged the government plan. This is the committee of Parliament, the supreme court in our country, the supreme body that should be formulating policy. I would like the government, which is only a part of Parliament, to accede to the request of a standing committee of this House.

On the issue of the environment I quote:

> There was considerable comment during the hearings regarding the adverse impact of the new VIA Rail Plan on the environment. What is clear to the Committee is that the "environmental factor" has become a critical issue in the development and implementation of a national transportation policy.
> In that light, we are not satisfied that the minister's potential environmental impact assessment is adequate or persuasive.

Again, the committee feels that the government has not done a careful study about the adverse impact on the environment of cutting the VIA Rail passenger service.

On the remote services:

> The question the Committee grappled with regarding the mandatory or remote services was whether they were truly remote and whether there were more cost effective transportation alternatives.
> The committee believes that, as was pointed out in the evidence, serving these communities should be a social obligation and therefore separated from VIA's funding and treated as an imposed public duty.

I would like to repeat and underscore that when we serve the remote communities of our country, we have to consider it as a public social obligation. We truly have to subsidize those routes because when we do that, we demonstrate that we care for Canadians whether or not they are in the remote parts of our country.

On equipment:

> In the Committee's view old and unreliable equipment has adversely affected ridership and subsidy levels over the past decade.

They would like the equipment to be modernized. On the labour assistance programs, the committee states:

> —the Committee calls upon the Government and VIA to ensure that all employees are treated fairly and with compassion.

On deficit reduction:

> There was some persuasive evidence to the effect that the Government's plan will not produce the predicted reduction in the deficit.

So even this committee of which, I repeat, the majority of the members belong to the government, doubt the figures of the government.

In its conclusion, the committee can only come to one conclusion:

> —VIA never had a chance in the beginning.

It used a beautiful term, an emphatic term but the meaning conveyed is very sad for the country. It was "stillborn". It goes on:

> The current evidence has not convinced the Committee that the salvation of VIA is at hand as a result of the new Government plan.

On this basis, when Canadians hear these very specific recommendations coming from this committee, they will immediately be convinced, as we have already felt from their submissions to us through petitions, that they are truly against the government plan.

This government is challenged. We will see whether it can prove sensitive and responsive to the sentiments of the vast majority of Canadians, whether it can prove sensitive and responsive to the sentiments of the representatives of Canadians, the members of Parliament reflected in this standing committee of this House, the majority members of which come from the government side. The very first recommendation of the standing committee is:

> That the Government declare a moratorium on its announced service cuts to VIA Rail that are to become effective January 15, 1990.

The committee would like an interim report from the royal commission.

In conclusion, I think the standing committee has provided us with very compelling and persuasive arguments that we should have at the very least a moratorium on the government plan. The committee has not asked for a permanent change of the government plan. The committee has only asked that there be a temporary cessation so that the royal commission could proceed with its study. When it recommends in the future that not be too late, but this government plan could make such future recommendations impossible. The standing committee is trying to tell us to give VIA Rail a chance. If there is a vision in this country for all Canadians we should exercise the political will. If there is a political will we can discover the political way.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that you recognized me. I might add that the few observations I want to make will probably not take the ten minutes allocated to me.

I simply want to take a few minutes of the time of the House to shed some light on the economic situation of VIA Rail resulting from the budget allocated to the corporation by the government of Canada. I also want to say a few words concerning the number of Canadians who travel with VIA Rail.

Mr. Speaker, I attended most of the transport committee hearings. Sure enough, many people, many organizations and many municipal spokesmen appeared before the committee to say that the funds earmarked for VIA Rail should not be reduced, yet not one of them was able to suggest a mechanism which the federal government might use to continue paying grants to cover the operating costs of VIA Rail.

Mr. Speaker, for some time now people have been saying that the government's decision to slash VIA Rail funding comes at a time when ever more people travel by train and the corporation is beginning to see better days ahead. Reality does not lend credence to such statements, Mr. Speaker. As my colleague the Hon. Member for Roberval (Mr. Bouchard) has been saying so many times in recent months, Canadian taxpayers can no longer afford to give VIA Rail ever larger grants at a time when the corporation's productivity is declining. I would emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that the government has been subsidizing VIA Rail's operating costs.

Need I recall that last year these grants rose to $641 million, an unprecedented amount which, I repeat, was spent to cover the operating deficit of VIA Rail. Mr. Speaker, this kind of money amounts on average to $100 for each passenger boarding a train, that is $100 paid by the Canadian taxpayers every time a passenger climbs aboard a train. Another factor which cannot be ignored is that since 1977 VIA Rail has gobbled up more than $5 billion of the taxpayer's money, including over $1 billion in capital expenditures to give VIA Rail a chance to make a go of it. Mr. Speaker, we ought to realize that the billion dollars which was paid to VIA Rail to improve its equipment and facilities did not bring about the anticipated results.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize the fact that I represent a riding which is almost completely deprived of all means of transportation. In its Eastern part, it is even without roads. During the summer, for the most part, we depend on sea and air services. I can tell you that if, every year, it had only one of every 20 dollars of the amount I have just mentioned, it could work miracles by improving its means of communications as well as it health and education services. We must realize also that in spite of the huge amounts of money it was paid over the past few years, VIA Rail has failed to improve its performance. Although its subsidies skyrocketed, its ridership went down.

We must face the fact that VIA Rail saw the number of its passengers, which amounted to 5.9 million in 1987, increase to 6.4 million in 1988. But, in fact, this increase in VIA'S ridership in 1988 is compared with 1987, the year during which VIA Rail transported the smallest number of passengers since its creation. As a matter of fact, the ridership is down 20 per cent as compared to 1981, when that year it transported approximately 8 million passengers.

A general view of the passenger service offered in this country indicate that VIA Rail has not improved its performance. In spite of the fact the Government played its part, and VIA Rail tried to improve its services, we must recognize that Canadians have turned their back on the train. They have demonstrated their preference for other means of transportation. Today, rail passenger service in Canada accounts for only 3 per cent of all long distance travels, compared to 7 per cent by plane and 84 per cent by car. Six per cent of long distance travellers prefer bus transportation. Twice as many Canadians have used buses over VIA Rail trains.

All these data confirm that Canadians clearly prefer travelling by means other than trains.

As the Minister of Transport stated, and I quote:

> Canadian taxpayers can no longer afford to provide increasingly high subsidies to a means of transportation which travellers are abandonning in increasing numbers.

The government had promised Canadians to provide them with an affordable and modern national system of rail passenger services. However, Canadians must use it. The federal government wants Canadians to understand that they must use railway services or lose them, and that financing for passenger rail services will depend on the choices they make.

Since railway services attract so few travellers and the government is committed to reducing expenditures, we cannot keep giving VIA Rail the same financial support we have in the past.

Mr. Speaker, let me explain. We must realize that the situation at VIA Rail has deteriorated on all fronts. In 1988, VIA Rail had 6.4 million passengers, a 20 per cent drop since 1981. Allowing for the increase indicated in the preliminary figures for 1989, ridership is still 19.5 per cent less than it was in 1981, this at a time when subsidies to VIA Rail increased considerably. They went from $524 million in 1981 to $641 million in 1988, an increase of 22 per cent. The average per passenger subsidy received by VIA Rail from the Government of Canada has gone up 52 per cent, from $66 in 1981 to $100 in 1988.

Cost recovery has only gone from 28 per cent in 1981 to 30 per cent in 1988. I think these figures are very revealing.

VIA ridership has gone down slightly, from 53 per cent in 1981 to 52 per cent in 1988. VIA Rail operating costs were over $753 million in 1988, while revenues were $223 million. Is there any carrier in Canada, whether we are talking about air, marine or highway transportation, that can afford to spend $750 million with revenues of about $225 million? No company can afford to do that. Only VIA Rail could, because every year, VIA Rail could count on the generosity of Canadian citizens who were financing passenger rail transportation with their taxes.

I would like to mention certain routes, including the Toronto–Windsor route which had the best record for cost recovery in 1988, although it was still only 43.6 per cent.

The Toronto–Calgary–Vancouver route had the highest ridership rate in 1988, that is 70 per cent, but cost recovery was only 30 per cent.

In 1988, per passenger subsidy ranged from $21 on the Toronto–Niagara Falls route to $484 on the Edmonton–Prince Rupert line. It was $378 on the remote line from Winnipeg to Churchill, $199 on Cochrane—Kapuskasing, $116 on Montreal—Saint-John–Halifax and $74 on Montreal–Quebec City.

The figures I just quoted are indeed revealing and reflect the high cost of operating VIA Rail in Canada, considering that it is used by so few travellers.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I may say I am convinced that the schedule VIA Rail has been offered, the amounts the federal government is prepared to spend on VIA Rail in the next five years, ensures that VIA Rail will be able to provide Canadians with an acceptable and good quality service. However, Mr. Speaker, VIA Rail must be well managed, and it will have be managed like a company that operates in a competitive sector. VIA Rail will have to prove its mettle, and if it does, the Government of Canada will continue to support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to take this opportunity to thank all hon. members for finetuning their debate to 10 minutes. We noticed we were able to get a few extra speakers in today. If we do this quite regularly more members can take part in our debates and this is what Parliament is all about.

It being 3.50 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

Pursuant to the Order made Tuesday, November 7, 1989, this House stands adjourned until Monday, November 20, 1989, at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

Have a pleasant vacation.

PRIVILEGE

DISCLOSURE OF EVIDENCE OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that there are two applications for questions of privilege which I shall hear first. There is subsequent to that some other measures, and I will deal with them. However, first I will hear on a question of privilege the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief because I do not think I have to give a lengthy explanation. My question of privilege arises from matters over the last 10 days flowing from discussions involving the finance committee of the House of Commons, and the consideration of its report which examines the government's technical paper on the goods and services tax.

The nineteenth edition of Erskine May at page 146, chapter X, Breaches of Privileges and Contempts, in part states:

> —"That the evidence taken by any select committee of this House, and the documents presented to such committee, and which have not been reported to the House, ought not to be published by any member of such committee or by any other person".

It goes on to state:

> Where the public are admitted this rule is usually not enforced. The publication or disclosure of proceedings of committees conducted within closed doors or draft reports of committees before they have been reported to the House will, however, constitute a breach of privilege or a contempt.

Following deliberations of the committee between November 6 and November 9, there appeared an article in The Financial Post which stated, and I will quote just two paragraphs. The first one states, "Meanwhile, New Democrat Lorne Nystrom said his party will break off its participation in the drafting of the committee report 'They'll (the Conservative members of the committee) recommend 7 per cent on a broader base, Nystrom said yesterday'". "Liberal committee member Doug Young also said it is likely the Liberals will decide before the weekend to file a minority report. Young said the majority of Conservatives on the committee will recommend the 7 per cent rate rather than the 9 per cent proposed by the government and a broader base for the tax. The committee has to report to the House of Commons November 28."

That article prompted a number of others, Mr. Speaker. I will not quote from all of them. In essence, many of them reported a variety of matters that presumably would have been discussed at that meeting.

I received, following this date, a call from another reporter who asked me to comment on the report. I suggested that I was not prepared to do that. He then gave me a list of things and asked me whether I had seen these other articles.

Over the course of the following several days, there were a variety of articles, as well as news conferences, held by both opposition parties, as well as television interviews with members of the two opposition parties.

The problem is that it creates a particularly difficult dilemma for a person such as myself who receives these questions, sees these statements and is asked to comment about them. Without putting myself in a breach of privilege I find it very difficult. First of all, I am not in a position to either confirm or deny. I am not in a position to defend certain suggestions that are made as to whether they are true or not. In fact, if they are true, I am not in a position to discuss them, advance them and elaborate on them because often they are presented, or may have been presented, with less than a full discussion.

In fact, to go further, there are one or two instances—and in one case there is a direct quote—where my name is included directly, which is a false statement. Again, I am not even in a position to elaborate, defend or deny the false statement without going beyond what I believe would be the bounds.

Furthermore, there is no suggestion that these matters, even though they have been alleged to have flowed from the committee and its deliberations, will in fact be the case because the committee has not completed its discussions, the discussions will be continued this afternoon, tomorrow and perhaps even longer.

I think that we should examine the Chair's ruling of May 5, 1987 involving the case raised by the hon. member for Selkirk—Interlake involving the member from Kenora—Rainy River on April 28, 1987. I believe that you, Sir, put the case quite well in your ruling. I will not, therefore, repeat everything that was said there.

However, I do think that this causes a great dilemma for persons like myself who have been involved in these discussions and who have subsequently received numerous inquiries and telephone calls from reporters and the general public. Really, I am in no position at this point to respond positively or negatively, or to explain, defend or deny certain charges.

Therefore, I believe that there has been a substantive breach of privilege. I bring this to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask that you examine it. If you find that there is a prima facie case, I would be prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to enter into debate on this matter, but I can certainly sympathize with the member's very awkward position. In his alleged problem he has referred to both opposition parties, when in fact it could have been mentioned that reports allegedly were coming from members of his own party with respect to some purported recommendations of the finance committee.

I would simply indicate to you, Sir, that the review that took place by the finance committee of evidence brought before it was in fact the subject of a great deal of discussion. I might point out that the chairman of the finance committee dealing with the goods and services proposal of the government has speculated a great deal on a number of issues, including the matters raised by the hon. member in his presentation. I would agree on one point. There is no report to which one could refer, because no report was drafted at Mont Ste. Marie, nor were any recommendations made by the committee.

Although I acknowledge the perhaps awkward position the hon. member was put in as a result of these reports in the press, I would suggest that since no report has in fact been drafted nor evidently finalized, and since no recommendations have been made, any indications as to what may be emanating would be the result of some suggestions made by members of the committee from all parties. Until such time as a final report is made, there could not be any breach of privilege because there would be nothing of a substantial nature to leak.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out the same thing. To my knowledge there has been no report prepared, because it has not been finished yet. In fact, we are meeting later today to consider the said report. To my knowledge there has been no evidence leaked, no documents leaked and, therefore, no point of privilege.

The one reference made by the member opposite to myself was from an article in The Financial Post where I am quoted as saying that "They'll", meaning the Conservative majority, "recommend 7 per cent on a broader base". I have been saying that for about two months publicly. I know that my friend from the Liberal party has been saying a similar thing as well publicly for a couple of months. That is no reference in any detail to what a committee report may or may not say.

I also want to say that I do feel in an awkward position as well. At the outset I said that I could not understand why certain members were referring to what might be in the committee report because it put us all, like the member from Edmonton, in a very awkward position as to whether we should comment or not. The committee chairman himself is a person who publicly raised the possibility of a tax on resale housing. This came, as the member from Edmonton knows, from the chairman himself before we went to Mont Ste. Marie.

Then, on about November 11 or 12 three Conservative members of the committee who wished to remain anonymous had allegedly given a lot of details of the so-called report to certain journalists. I read about it when I was in Saskatchewan that weekend. I was called to comment on that. I said to journalists I could not comment on what was in the report.

Mr. Lewis: What were you doing in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Nystrom: I was in Yorkton for Remembrance Day services that weekend.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no point of privilege. There have been no documents leaked. I think you could talk to any journalist you want and you would find that they have received no documents from the finance committee, certainly not from members of my Party and probably not from most members of that particular committee.

There has also been speculation of heavy-handed phone calls going to members. One was received by the member from Cambridge, from the vice-chairman of the finance committee. I suggest there has been a lot of rumour, innuendo and insinuation. I think the member across the way just protests a bit too much. He is doing a little bit of public crying. I think there is no point of privilege whatsoever.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the problem the hon. member is talking about seems to have been created by his own colleagues in the Conservative caucus. I am talking about the chairman of the finance committee himself and a number of other members of the finance committee from the Conservative party who appear to have been quoted at some length in various articles in the press as to what the Conservative majority on the committee might end up recommending.

If that is the case, then I find it hard to see how there could be a prima facie case of privilege if other members of Parliament, using their undoubted rights of free speech, comment at the request of the press on the speculative stories in the press, the source of which appears to have been the Conservative chairman of the finance committee and several other members of that committee.

I have not had an opportunity, because I had no knowledge that this question of privilege was going to come up, to read your ruling of May 5, 1987. I would be prepared to offer further argument at some later point. I doubt very much if that ruling, and I say this without having had a chance to review it, dealt with the situation we are talking about today. I would be happy to offer, as I have said, some detailed argument on that point.

I think we have to make a distinction between the alleged premature disclosure of a report of a committee that has actually been discussed, voted upon and finalized, and comments by members of Parliament in response to questions put to them by journalists on stories that have appeared in the press, especially if these stories were inspired by members of the Conservative majority on the committee.

I say to the hon. member the issue is not really one for a prima facie case of privilege, rather it is something that fits under the old maxim "doctor, heal thyself". I suggest that maxim be applied to the Conservative members of the finance committee.

Having said that, I hope I can reserve the right to give further argument, if you so desire, based on what was the actual content of your ruling which I have not had a chance to review. Even not having done that, I respectfully submit that what has been said by the hon. member does not suggest a prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, perhaps as just a useful piece of information, not being aware that the hon. member from Edmonton was going to raise this question of privilege, I believe that in his presentation he pointed out that on November 9 the hon. member from Yorkton—Melville was making some comments about speculation regarding the Conservative members on the committee.

I would like to draw to the member's attention a Canadian Press article of October 28, some days previous, wherein the chairman of the finance committee, Mr. Don Blenkarn, is speculating that he would be recommending a tax on the sale of every house in Canada as a way of enabling the committee to lower its proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax. It is quite a lengthy article that goes on pointing out what the committee will be recommending and certainly what he will be recommending for the committee's consideration.

If my hon. friend is concerned about members of the committee commenting prematurely, he ought to raise with the chairman of the committee concerns regarding his comments. It is only fair to say that this is one of many. I think even the Prime Minister has acknowledged the fact that the chairman of the finance committee not only speculates prematurely but has views that the Conservative majority on the committee will inevitably support. Consequently, we ought to be concerned about some of the so-called leaks that he has been providing in terms of committee business.

It is a point of concern for the hon. member, and I do not want to understate its importance. On the other hand, we do not need to overstate the fact that these points might be frustrating for people having to speculate or justify why the Conservatives would want to even maintain the goods and services tax at 7 per cent or 9 per cent, something which requires the hon. member to explain why it would be appropriate to tax the sale of every single house being sold in the country. I can understand the frustration that the hon. member would have in responding to that. I think he would be well advised to speak to the chairman of the committee and admonish him for commenting prematurely.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to add two further points that have arisen from the discussion that has gone on so far. In matters like this we must make a distinction between what occurs and what someone might say himself, that is, if he is prepared to advocate or suggest something, especially when those suggestions take place in advance of any discussions that may have commenced.

For example, I have made several speeches on this subject going back to well before the public hearings were held, as well as over the course of the public hearings. I have advanced certain objectives with regard to this matter and have made certain points and said that I felt that this proposal would be improved by certain measures.

The chairman of the finance committee has done the same thing, and probably many others have done that as well. There is a difference between what a person says he believes would be an improvement and a suggestion he thinks he will put forward for consideration, versus something that flows later from deliberations once they have occurred.

I wish to go back to the original article from which most of the others flowed, the one of November 10 which I quoted earlier. When asked if the Conservatives had decided to go with the 7 per cent rate and a broader base, committee chairman Don Blenkarn said, "I am not going to confirm or deny that."

He went on to say:

> I wouldn't want to kid you but I guess we have made some decisions about rate and base and how you do it and how you put it together. It's going to be quite a report.

That was the extent of it. There were no direct suggestions of what might or might not be in the report. He said that it is going to be quite a report. There were no suggestions of what other members had said or might not have said.

There were no suggestions until November 14, after which there were many stories quoting members of the opposition and in fact certain unnamed members of the government, and three were mentioned. I may be one of them because the gentleman in question phoned me. However, I told him I was completely prepared to say anything I had to say on the record, that I felt it was inappropriate and that all matters were up for consideration. I said that all these items raised by the witnesses during the course of six weeks of public hearings were being discussed and considered, as they should appropriately be.

The point I draw here is that it is one thing to talk about something you want to advocate as an individual member and put forward to the committee, but it is another thing to talk about what other people have said or what the committee as a whole may have said.

As a final reference I would say that I was contacted by many reporters and many television stations, including Canada AM, to appear on its morning broadcast last week. I know that the chairman of the finance committee was also contacted and asked to appear. I know the member for Ontario was contacted. All declined. Two members of the opposition party chose not to decline.

I think we can draw a distinction between those two types of discussion of specific issues or issues that may have been raised in the general debate as opposed to discussions and comments that are supposedly suggesting what took place during committee.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest and other members have commented upon the hon. member's complaint that certain matters were discussed within committee under circumstances in which, apparently, members of the committee felt that they were speaking in confidence and that reports have turned up in the news media with respect to at least some of the discussions that may have taken place within the committee.

It has been very properly pointed out that the committee has not completed its deliberations. I think that the proper position for the Speaker to take is that at least for now it is a matter with the committee, and the committee will have to deal with it as it sees fit. I am going to leave the matter at that for now.

I thank hon. members for their intervention.

I do want to say this, as I have said before, if a committee is working under understandings that discussions are confidential, it goes without saying that if those discussions are repeated outside the committee it creates difficulties within the committee and invites the kind of discussions we have had. I would ask all hon. members to be careful.

However, I do find—and this is my ruling—that the matter complained about is a matter that at least for now should be taken up in the committee.

CONTENT OF BROCHURES—PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, on September 25 in this House the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition raised a question of privilege concerning certain advertisements that the government placed dealing with the goods and services tax.

On page 3809 of Hansard the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition stated:

> I submit to Your Honour that the advertisement not only misrepresents the substance of the text but the procedure to which it is subject under parliamentary rules. It prejudices the proceedings that are now before a committee of the House, the Standing Committee on Finance, as well as prejudicing future proceedings and decisions of the House itself.

Subsequently, on October 10, Your Honour gave a ruling on that question of privilege. In the course of the ruling, as recorded at page 4461 of Hansard, Your Honour said:

> I expect the Department of Finance and other departments to study this ruling carefully and remind everyone within the Public Service that we are a parliamentary democracy, not a so-called executive democracy, nor a so-called administrative democracy.

Your Honour, you can imagine my horror when I arrived back in my constituency a week ago Friday and had received in that office a letter from one of my constituents, one George Flower. He had recently been in a neighbourhood Loblaw's store and picked up a package of brochures on the goods and services tax that were being handed out to the public by way of display in that store. I thought perhaps the brochures which I will refer to in a moment had simply been withdrawn or something. In accordance with Your Honour's ruling I understand the advertisements have been.

I telephoned this same Loblaw's store in Kingston this morning—I assume it was the same one—at 10.25. I asked the gentleman who answered, who worked in the bakery of that Loblaw's store, whether in fact these goods and services brochures were still available. He said: "Just a moment and I will check". He went out, checked, then came back and reported to me that they were in fact available and could be picked up in the store.

Let me quote from the first one. It is called Goods and Services Tax: Questions and Answers. The first question that it asks is: "What is the Goods and Services Tax?". The answer given in the brochure is: "The goods and services tax, GST, is a 9 per cent consumption tax that will replace the existing federal sales tax on January 1, 1991".

I could go on. There are other questions, but let me read a couple more of the quotations to make my point: "The GST will apply to virtually all goods and services sold in Canada. However, Canadians will not be charged tax when they buy any of the following goods and services." There is a long list of the exemptions.

Then it says: "For consumers the GST will be similar to a retail sales tax. It will be charged at 9 per cent of the retail price of goods and services. The GST will replace the existing federal sales tax which is buried at the manufacturer's level."

It goes on to detail the tax credits that will be allowed. It says that income tax will be reduced from 26 to 25 per cent. Then it lists a list of benefits that I will not describe. I think that they are, perhaps, not accurate.

Point of Order

But there are other brochures. They are called Consumers and the GST, The GST Credit, Housing, Small Business, Farmers and Fishermen, Arts and Culture. In every one, the first question that is asked is what is the goods and services tax and in every one of the brochures it says that it will replace the existing federal sales tax on January 1, 1991.

The one on arts and culture, for example, goes on to say: "The current federal sales tax is badly flawed and harmful to Canada's economy. It is hurting our ability to grow and create jobs."

There is nowhere in any of these brochures any mention of the fact that this is a proposed tax, that this tax is embodied in some bill or proposition that has been put before Parliament and, in fact, as Your Honour knows, we still do not have a bill introduced in this House proposing this tax. These brochures fall in the same category as the advertisements that appeared in papers. If anything I suggest they are more offensive because they state very definitely that the tax will be in force starting on January 1, 1991. There is no suggestion that these changes are proposed and the words, as Your Honour recalls, "proposed changes" were included in the advertisements that you, Sir, found so offensive in your ruling on October 10.

I suggest that our privileges as parliamentarians are being breached. These brochures constitute a contempt of this House. These brochures should have been withdrawn when the advertisements were withdrawn. We thought they were going to be withdrawn, we were told the advertisements would be withdrawn, and yet these are published, it appears, by the Department of Finance. The term "Department of Finance" is attached on the brochures and I would have thought that the Minister of Finance, having learned a lesson in this House on several occasions in connection with his financial plans, might have taken steps to withdraw these brochures.

I believe there has been a breach of our privileges. I am prepared to move the necessary motion for reference to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedures and Private Members' Business of the matter if you, Sir, see fit to rule that a prima facie breach of privilege has occurred. I submit that these brochures are in flagrant contempt of the ruling that Your Honour delivered on October 10. While Your Honour expressed your regret that this matter might have to be raised again, I have the same regret, but I discovered these things a week ago Friday and have raised it at the earliest opportunity in this House.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands has raised a matter of some importance. I am sure that he would do the courtesy of allowing the Chair to see copies of the publications and the brochures. I will look into the matter further and report back to the House.

The Hon Member for York Centre on a point of order.

SUB JUDICE CONVENTION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, last week I wrote to you and I am rising now on a point of order to deal with the ruling that you made in Question Period about questions that I proposed asking to which it was argued that the sub judice convention applied. I want to seek guidance from you about whether it would be appropriate, as I submit it might be, for me to raise the subject matter of my letter following the intervention of my leader on a request for an emergency debate.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, my friend has raised an interesting point. I have no quarrel at all with him raising it. I think the time to raise it is now if he wants to raise it and, in effect, challenge your ruling or call it into question in order that it be aired. If he wants to air it he airs it now.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Minister of Justice would assist the Chair. As I understood it, the minister is taking the position on behalf of the government that this ought to be heard now, not later and not be conditional upon something that might or might not happen later in the proceedings. Does that sum up, in effect, the point the hon. minister was making?

Mr. Lewis: Yes, Sir. The House has opened. We have had points of privilege raised by individuals, I think quite rightly so, and if it is a privilege that should put aside the business of the House to be heard, then as Government House Leader, I am in perfect agreement with that being done but I think it should be done now. If privilege is breached, it is breached now. If my hon. friend wishes to raise it, I think he should raise it now not reserve an opportunity to be privileged twice in a day. Either one's privilege is breached now or it is not breached at all today.

Mr. Kaplan: The House Leader would be quite right perhaps if I were rising on a point of privilege. I am not. I am rising on a simple point of order and I want in that point of order, which can be raised at any time as I think the House leader will recognize, to indicate that the subject matter with which I wish to deal is covered as well by the request of my leader for an emergency debate. I think it might be more logical, and I am only submitting that, to hear the matter later, but I rose for your guidance and I am certainly prepared to accept it.

Mr. Speaker: I have the point of the Hon. Minister of Justice. In the view of the Chair it is a point of order, not a question of privilege. I think the proper thing to do would be for the hon. member to just stand down his point of order at the moment and we will see what else transpires today in the next hour or so. He may or may not want to raise the point of order again.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8) I have the honour to table, in both official languages, government responses to 216 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings]

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1). These are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition signed by 10,300 Canadians, most of whom live in Edmonton, but as well from 112 other Alberta communities. These petitioners all humbly pray and call upon Parliament to withdraw the budget proposal to claw back payments under the social programs; old age security and family allowance, a most timely petition given the business of the House today. These were collected in the main by the One Voice Committee of the Society for the Retired and Semi-retired in Edmonton. That is 10,000 Albertans, Mr. Speaker. I do hope the government pays attention.

• (1140)

IMMIGRATION ACT

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling another 1,295 signatures from across Canada; from the Yukon, Quebec, British Columbia, and metropolitan Toronto. All of these people are opposed to the existing provisions of the Immigration Act and want it revised to comply with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the enhancement of human rights and dignity of persons with disabilities.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House today more petitions from concerned citizens in communities across northern Ontario. One thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven petitioners from North Bay, Thunder Bay, Sudbury, Elliot Lake, Sault Ste Marie, Kenora, Dryden, Sturgeon Falls, Espanola, New Liskeard, Coniston, Lively, Thornloe and Crystal Falls, strongly urge Parliament to protect the rights of the unborn from conception with a law that will seek to save the life of both mother and child. I am in full support of their efforts.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of residents of Kamloops, Vancouver, Burnaby, Richmond, Ladner, Coquitlam, and Langley, who point out that one-sixth of all Canadian children live in poverty and that the number of children living in poverty has increased by 13 per cent in the last seven years, and that the number of children living in poverty in some provinces now is as high as 26 per cent.

The petitioners are asking all of us in the House of Commons to support Motion M-254 calling upon the government to negotiate with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, a number of western Canadians are very concerned with the government's decision to curtail VIA Rail service and to cut back its operation significantly and are asking Parliament to urge the government not to cut back but in fact to invest in an up-dated VIA Rail service for the country like every other western industrialized nation is doing.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, this petition is again mainly from western Canadians who are distressed at this government's commitment to proceed with the goods and services tax, after all of the opposition. These petitioners point out whole sets of reasons why they are opposed to it, and basically I guess they are asking the government to just come to its senses, back off and go back to the drawing board.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I table again today some 36 petitions humbly praying and calling upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax. It is my privilege to present these containing several thousand names of constituents in my riding.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of presenting a petition today on behalf of the residents of Carleton—Gloucester. I have well over 1,000 signatures and the petitioners are requesting the government to withdraw its proposed bill on a goods and services tax.

Like them, I feel that the goods and services tax is going to be a negative factor in the development of the Canadian economy, is going to be a negative factor in creating employment, and is going to be a negative factor for people with medium and low-incomes.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions signed by some of my constituents in Gloucester in northeastern New Brunswick who categorically oppose the goods and services tax.

I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am very proud of the effort these people have made to inform the people of the region about the harmful effects of this goods and services tax and I hope that the Government of Canada will take account of their concerns.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and duty on behalf of a number of petitioners from Winnipeg and area, to present a petition which calls upon the Parliament of Canada to maintain VIA Rail Canada's present national network, and asks that Parliament upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and change the passenger act to give a firm legislative mandate for the continuing of VIA Rail across Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I also have a number of petitions dealing with the goods and services tax. The petitioners are constituents of mine and constituents from the next riding of The Battlefords. They call upon Parliament to reject the current proposals for the goods and services tax and to ensure that the tax which it does bring in is fair to all Canadians.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by 32 of my constituents from Kingston and The Islands. These petitioners object to the proposed goods and services tax and call upon Parliament to reject any measure that will impose that tax.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that Question No. 126 will be answered today.

[Text]

REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES

Question No. 126—Miss Grey:

For the fiscal years 1989-90 and 1990-91, for each province and territory, has the government made projections of (a) its total revenues and total expenditures on a public accounts basis and, if so, what are they (b) the total revenue impacts and total expenditure impacts of the Budget presented April 27, 1989, and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): a) and b) No.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: I ask that all remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The question enumerated by the minister has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to advise the House that I have received two applications for an emergency debate, and I will hear them in the order they were received. I recognize the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Mr. Speaker: I think before the right hon. gentleman commences, and in order to help others on a similar motion today, I will hear carefully the application, of course. I do remind hon. members that an application for an emergency debate must be fairly brief and concise because under the rules there is no opportunity for reply or argument by any other member of the House. I know the right hon. gentleman will keep that in mind.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): I rise to request an emergency debate relating to the administration of justice. There will be two aspects to this very brief submission. The first is that it is a matter of urgent public importance. The second is that it goes beyond the concept of sub judice. Needing to address both these questions briefly, I crave your indulgence and the indulgence of the House.

My submission is that the issue would not prejudice the rights of the accused in the matter of charges relating to the budget leaks of last April. My submission is that we have obligations as members of Parliament to raise the very serious issue of political interference in the administration of justice. We want to raise the question of individual rights, the abuse of individual rights, in the way these charges were brought. We want to raise, if you allow us, the issue of solicitor-client privilege which may or may not exist between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Department of Justice, and the Crown prosecutor. We want to raise the issue of abuse of freedom of the press, of failure of ministers to answer truthfully on this issue in the House, the independence of our national police force, and the discretion of individual police officers to lay charges.

I submit that the sub judice convention, and it is only a convention, does not apply in this case because what we have to raise here in Parliament has little or nothing to do with the guilt or innocence of the accused before a court. The debate we seek is whether or not the government interfered with the impartial administration of justice in bringing these charges in the first place.

Those of us in Parliament cannot allow the government to use a trial to shield themselves. The convention—

Mr. Speaker: I would like to indicate to hon. members, and especially to the public watching, that this is a very, very serious issue, and I have relaxed the rules somewhat to hear the right hon. gentleman. I sense though that the right hon. gentleman is getting into the very debate that he asks for, and I must ask him to be very careful because I will be faced with a point of order I am sure.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am dealing with the submission of why you are not bound by any sub judice rule. The convention is meant to protect defendants in a trial. It is not meant to protect government ministers.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice said the Minister of Finance was the victim of a crime. We are suggesting very strongly to Your Honour that the police were therefore told that there had to be a crime and that charges had to be laid. No matter what the—

• (1150)

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the right hon. gentleman to help the Chair here. We are now getting into the very debate the right hon. gentleman is asking for, and I may very well hear exactly the same request shortly. There was a second point the right hon. gentleman wanted to raise, and I would like to hear him on that.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The convention of sub judice is not meant to hamstring this House from debating the real issues now before you, Mr. Speaker. In 1977 a special committee, to which you referred in your earlier judgment in this House on sub judice, had the following to say as regards your role in the application of the sub judice convention. I want to quote from that committee:

> In exercising this discretion, your Committee recommends that when there is a doubt in the mind of the Chair, a presumption shall exist in favour of allowing debate and against the application of the convention.

Those were the words of the committee which you, Mr. Speaker, recited with some approval in your recent judgment.

The current trial may go on for a considerable length of time. The people of Canada cannot wait. Canadians have a right to know whether or not our system of justice has been tampered with and thereby undermined. The information on the public record so far in the trial indicates political interference. Canadians therefore have a right to know. Canadians want an assurance that the administration of justice is fair and impartial. I would think that the government would want this issue cleared up quickly as well.

[Translation]

So the issue we want to raise with you, Mr. Speaker, is the possibility that some people may have interfered politically in this affair, continually and over many years.

This matter is very important and requires our consideration as soon as possible here in the House.

So I respectfully suggest, within the limits you set for me, Mr. Speaker, that you suspend the business of the House to allow us to discuss this matter in depth.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a similar motion which I brought to your attention on the same subject. I would like to say at the outset, notwithstanding the importance of the issue, that it did seem to me that the rules require us to stay within one or two sentences. If we were going to raise a question of privilege it would enable us to deal with this very serious matter at greater length.

I want to come right to the point. As I said in my letter to you, my intention is to move for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 52 for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent and pressing concern, namely, in this case, the fact that during the criminal proceedings involving Messrs. Belisle, Appleby and Small, a serious allegation has been made, namely, that political considerations played a role in the laying of charges against individuals. It is of fundamental importance that this be clarified and clarified soon.

Your Honour, on November 7 you did rule on this subject at that time and said that the sub judice convention, and I cite your words, "should apply in this case", and then significantly you added the words, "for the time being".

My reason for raising it today is that since November 7 at which time I think it is reasonable to conclude that most if not all observers thought that the situation would be resolved within a matter of days then and that there would be a judgment by the judge on the issue enabling us to deal with it in the House. Since then, as Your Honour knows, the proceedings have been delayed and they will not get back to the court level of discussion until December 18. This I stress, Your Honour, has happened since you gave us your original ruling and I submit to you that the question as to whether or not there are political considerations taking place in the laying of criminal charges is too important a matter for us to allow another delay to take place, this time for another month. Therefore, I ask Your Honour to reach the conclusion that the public interest at this time should come down on the side of having a public hearing in this Chamber on that profoundly important question.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to the observations of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and the Hon. Member for Oshawa. In view of the issue I have probably been very lenient indeed in allowing both the hon. members to make their point. I want to assure them both that I have their point and I will consider their observations and report back to the House as soon as it is appropriate.

INCOME TAX ACT

MOTION THAT DEBATE BE NOT FURTHER ADJOURNED

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That debate on the motion for second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-28, and on any amendments proposed thereto, shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

POINT OF ORDER

SUB JUDICE CONVENTION

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At the beginning of proceedings today I raised with the Speaker the question of how long his ruling on November 7 dealing with the sub judice would apply. He indicated in the ruling itself that it would apply for the time being.

I rise now to indicate my own hope that at the beginning of Question Period today the Speaker might indicate his disposition as to whether, for the reasons raised on this side of the House at the beginning of proceedings today, that we might know before the beginning of Question Period his disposition as to the continuation of that ruling on sub judice.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair has noted the hon. member's comments and they will be relayed to the Speaker. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–28, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, in 1951 it took a constitutional amendment to clear the path for the federal government to introduce the national old age pension program. The only requirement to receive a pension was that one be elderly and Canadian.

[Translation]

The OAS program was the result of an all–party committee report—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair would appreciate a little more silence so that I can hear the hon. member. Thank you.

[Translation]

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, the OAS program was the result of an all–party committee report supported unanimously across the country.

[English]

The most succinct and clear statement on what seniors could henceforth enjoy came from a member of the opposition, the Hon. Donald Fleming. Mr. Fleming said, "We are departing as far as we can from the idea of any handout, any payment as of grace, and are seeking to supplant that type of payment with a payment which will be received by the pensioner as of right". It is too bad Conservatives today do not understand, as this hon. Tory member did, what a pension is and what an entitlement is.

• (1240)

Parliamentarians then were very clear about what they intended to accomplish: basic income security for every elderly citizen based not on any needs test but on their having contributed to the building of Canada throughout their lifetime. And to make their meaning absolutely clear, that this was not welfare, not charity, not income dependent, they set it up as a contributory plan so that everybody would know that they were paying for a pension. Initially every taxpayer contributed 2 per cent extra tax to a plan that was to pay no more than it took in. That contribution doubled over the years to 4 per cent until in 1971 it was simply rolled in to the over–all tax rate and every taxpayer continued to contribute.

When that was done in 1971, the words of Mr. Stanley Knowles were prophetic and they are being realized today. Mr. Knowles expressed his concern about abandoning the special taxes that funded a separate old age security fund. He said, "This will put the government in the position of being able to play fast and loose with the whole question of old age security and even abolish its universality".

The finance minister of the day, Mr. Edgar Benson, gave Mr. Knowles what he thought was an iron–clad guarantee that this would not happen when he said that: " The right is given to the pensioner by Parliament. The only way of changing this would be for the government to amend the Old Age Security Act".

[Translation]

Well, Madam Speaker, when those words were spoken, the idea that anyone would return to a handout system for the seniors who have earned the right to a secure old age was unthinkable. With this government, it is clear that nothing is unthinkable.

[English]

The Prime Minister has excused this smashing of a sacred trust, his betrayal, his word to Canadians, by saying, "We want to do more for lower income seniors". I will tell this House what is happening to low-income seniors. At doors throughout Ottawa West during the election campaign just a year ago, I spoke to low income seniors who have never paid income tax before and who are now being gouged by this government. They and other low income Canadians are now paying 60 per cent more in income tax than when this government took office.

This government is taking from middle income Canadians and it is also taking from the poor. It is ensuring with this bill that more and more seniors every year will lose their pensions. The seniors of Canada have paid for these pensions every year since 1951, nearly 40 years. They have planned their retirement, trusting their government to return to them what they paid for.

Because these seniors lived through the depression, because they were wise enough to invest, because they were frugal enough to establish pensions for themselves, because they chose to do without many of the comforts of life to enjoy a comfortable and secure retirement, they are now being punished by this government for living by all the good conservative, frugal principles that this government espouses but refuses to govern by.

How can the Members on the other side of the House stand up and in all good conscience justify this betrayal? The government claims it is necessary to extort money from seniors to solve the deficit problem. Well, who has created this problem? Let me do a sample overview of this government's record since 1984. It has enjoyed better economic conditions, lower inflation, lower interest rates and higher employment than had been seen in the five years previous to its taking office when the economy of the entire world was in turmoil.

[English]

Despite those favourable conditions, despite increased taxes, despite more working taxpayers among whom it could spread the costs of running the country, it has doubled the national debt and doubled the amount of money that goes to pay interest on the debt. No wonder it hasn't been able to reduce the annual deficit.

The government has increased taxes most severely on low and middle-income Canadians, while continuing to talk about fairness in tax. It has increased what it extracts from individual Canadians from $29 billion to $50 billion in less than five years. It has cut programs for environmental solutions, cut programs to reduce demands on non-renewable energy and to research alternative energy sources, cut services to Canadians by cutting 12,000 jobs across Canada in the Public Service, cut help to unemployed Canadians, cut help to the most disadvantaged regions of Canada, destroyed our national rail system, sold our national airline, and reneged on its commitment to the provinces to share the cost of social programs and education.

[Translation]

What I want to know from the members opposite, Madam Speaker, is just what this government has been doing? Just what has this government been spending taxpayers' money on?

[English]

The government pretends it is moving toward a fairer tax system. What is fair about taxing only seniors at 100 per cent, only children's allowances at 100 per cent? How does the government justify 100 per cent taxes for seniors and for children, when overnight windfall profits are not taxed at anywhere near that rate, when millionaires can make a profit on their investment and pay no more than 29 per cent, when the most profitable corporations in Canada have had their tax rate reduced from 36 per cent to 28 per cent?

Seniors invested too, but they invested with their government. Beginning in 1951, they paid extra taxes specifically to provide for their old age. They continue to contribute. They have a right to keep that for which they paid.

[Translation]

Finally, I ask that we remember that this 100 per cent clawback will, in the end, add to the poverty of elderly women. Most of the households from which the old age security will be extracted are comfortable based on the income of the husband, not the family. Many of those incomes are based on pensions that die with the pensioner.

[English]

On the death of a spouse, many thousands, and perhaps hundreds of thousands of widows will be left with no pension beyond the old age security. The extra comfort they could have been left with by savings accumulated from the old age security their spouses now receive is being removed from them. In fact, the government is knowingly ensuring that it is senior couples with only one income that will sacrifice most. It is doing this by basing the clawback on the individual's income, not the family income. As a result, two seniors with $49,000 income each and a family income of nearly $100,000 do not return any old age security to the government, while a couple with one income over $50,000 does. Senior households with two incomes can earn twice as much before losing any old age security. Yet this government continues to talk about fairness in taxation. The same principle applies to the family allowance. Higher income, double-earner households will not pay the same clawback as more modest, single income households. This government seems to forget that in many families where only one partner earns an income, the family allowance is the only income a woman can call her own.

• (1250)

This move on both seniors' pensions and family allowances has nothing to do with good social policy, it has only to do with grabbing money from Canadians wherever the government can get it. The government is hitting the elderly again by its changes in the rules for RRSP contributions. Now pensions will no longer be eligible to be transferred to RRSPs, another source of tax from those who can least afford it.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, fully one-third of the adults in my riding of Ottawa West are over 65 years of age. Not all of them, in fact, a small minority will be affected by this measure, unlike when the government threatened to deindex all their pensions. But I know many of them are watching this afternoon and I urge them to understand that this is only the first step in a much larger assault on all their pensions.

[English]

The government is trying, through this initial step, to accomplish, through the back door, what it was stopped from doing through the front door, when Canadians all across Canada, old and young, objected to the deindexing of seniors' pensions. I urge seniors to understand and I urge all Canadians to understand that they have a Prime Minister who stated his intentions with respect to indexed pensions very clearly before he was even the leader of his party. He said outright that indexed pensions should be phased out and then outlawed. The Prime Minister still believes that and I urge all seniors and all Canadians to let the Prime Minister and the government know that they do not agree with it. A deindexed pension is no pension at all.

This bill, more than any other, embodies the Tory right-wing agenda. It abandons all pretence at fairness and justice. It abandons the great Canadian dream of a compassionate society that cares for the elderly, cares for those less well off and nurtures that bastion of a strong and durable economy, the small business. It lays bare the moral bankruptcy of a government that just a year ago talked about sacred trusts and knew very well its intention to smash every one of them. Once again the government is too arrogant or too afraid to face the exposure of its hypocrisy through free and open debate in this House. Once again, for the twelfth time in this new session of Parliament, it has invoked closure to stop Canadians from hearing what is wrong with this bill it proposes to pass.

This bill is a betrayal of seniors, a betrayal of families, a betrayal of many of the values that this country holds dear, and yet once again the government will use its power of numbers in this House to pass it. I urge members opposite to rethink their position and I urge the public to let the government know what it thinks of this bill.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, Bill C-28 covers many matters and in the short time available I can only concentrate on a couple of them. I would like to concentrate on the clawback of family allowances and old age pensions, matters of considerable concern to all Canadians and matters to which all Canadians have voiced concern and opposition.

I want to urge the government to show some appropriate concern for families and seniors in Canada. We should be supporting families, we should be supporting Canada's future. Families have a contribution to make to Canada's future and we should be supporting them in that role. We should also be supporting Canada's seniors who have made their contribution to Canadian society and need to be able to live with respect and dignity for the rest of their lives.

We should look not to end the universality of social programs, ensure that those who are better able to pay their taxes do in fact pay their fair share.

So we should be supporting families, we should be supporting seniors, and we should be supporting the regions of Canada. We should resist changes which make our social programs more like those in the United States.

The route that the government is following in Bill C–28 with regard to the clawback of family allowances is, of course, not the only route to follow. It is not the only way it could resolve some of the questions that it raised about the deficit and about the cost of social programs.

As has been so often pointed out by those in my party and by thousands of Canadians across the country, there is a great deal of opposition to the measures that the government is proposing, and yet the government is going ahead anyway. No consultation with groups who are to be affected prior to these measures being announced took place. Of course, this has been a touchstone of this government. Why would it want to consult, I suppose, with those who are affected if they are going to be opposed to the government's measures.

But it is critical to our approach to government in Canada that we do hear from both sides of the issue, that we do not just hear, as this government does, from the large corporations and the right wing think–tanks. Even this form of government consultation is breaking down with the Fraser Institute speaking out now against the goods and services tax. Even the government's allies, and supporters, are prepared to oppose the general thrust of this government's policy.

Let us begin with what the government committed itself to in terms of social programs. All of us will remember statements by the government about its commitment to social programs. Of course, after the election the government is prepared to go back on its word. We all remember what the Prime Minister said in Summerside, Prince Edward Island in October of 1988. "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits, especially those for the elderly will be improved, not diminished by our government which is committed to social justice and fairness for Canadians".

In response to reminders of this and in response to criticisms of the approach, the Minister of Finance has argued that the clawback on social programs, on family allowances and old age security will have only a minimal effect on Canadians, that it will not affect Canadian individuals and families very much. He claims that only 4.3 per cent of seniors will be paying back all or part of their old age security, with 54,000 paying back all of it, and 74,000 paying back some of it.

On family allowances, the Minister of Finance claims only 14 per cent of families will be affected. But these numbers will go up rapidly year by year, primarily because the government has not indexed these numbers. More and more retirees will end up repaying their pensions and more and more families will end up repaying all or part of their family allowances.

For example, a 28 year old person earning about $28,000, roughly an average industrial wage, will be hit by the clawback by the time he or she retires. That means most Canadians are going to be hit by this as time goes on.

So we are faced with cuts to social programs, contrary to commitments made by this government. Some in the government and some on the government side are more honest and, of course, it comes as no surprise that I would raise the comments of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance who has been quite explicit about the attack on the universality which these programs generate.

I think we have seen in this debate a clear recognition that these steps that the government is taking move our programs more toward the Americanization of our social programs and toward the end of universality. What the chairman of the finance committee said is that we have decided to eliminate universality—although the claw-back may be unfair and sneaky it is there.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to the interrupt the hon. member. If there is still time, I am sure the hon. member will rise later on in the day. I thank him for his courtesy in allowing me to interrupt.

Earlier today there were two applications, one by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and the other by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa, asking for an emergency debate later on today with respect to a court case which is presently adjourned to December 18.

• (1300)

There have been suggestions by a witness in the case, and I have read the transcript very carefully, to the effect that political considerations may have played a part in whether charges were or were not laid. I point out that the examination of that particular witness is not complete and will continue again in December, presumably. That is the way the court left the matter.

The application before me is for an emergency debate. It is a very important one and I think all members on both sides of the House would want to accept that. At least for today I do not think that the application meets the requirements for an emergency debate and I so order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could get a clarification from Your Honour. As you may have heard, my colleague for York Centre rose on a point of order some time ago and was trying to get an indication from the Speaker as to whether questions this afternoon would be permitted on the same topic for the same rule.

Am I to assume that refusal of the Speaker for the emergency debate also applies to the sub judice issue in relation to Question Period, or is that a separate ruling from Mr. Speaker that will come later?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I, of course, was notified that the hon. member for York Centre did raise this question.

I want hon. members to know that there are two issues here. The one I have just ruled on is that at least today we are not proceeding to set aside the business of the House for an emergency debate. The considerations that go into whether or not an emergency debate should be allowed are well known to hon. members. It should be a matter that the debate can effect one way or the other, and it should be something that cannot be dealt with in any other way. I have now ruled that at least for today there is to be no emergency debate.

There was a second question. The second question concerns my ruling of some days ago about the convention, which is just that, that reference not be made in this Chamber to proceedings in a criminal case while that case is continuing. The ruling I made was that it would not be appropriate to withdraw the convention and that the sub judice rule ought to apply. I think I indicated to the hon. member for York Centre that he may indeed want to argue that matter further at some other time. That is always a privilege of any member. But at the moment the ruling does stand.

It being one o'clock p.m. I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 1.07 the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

MINORITY LANGUAGE RIGHTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Bill 8 of the Ontario Legislature came into effect. This law is a historic step in the evolution of our society.

From now on, Francophones in Ontario will be entitled to service in their mother tongue from Ontario government departments and agencies.

Although French has not yet been declared an official language in Ontario, this timely initiative of the Peterson Government is worthy of praise in this House.

I therefore have the honour, on behalf of my colleagues in the Liberal caucus, to congratulate Ontario's Minister of Francophone Affairs, the Hon. Charles Beer, his predecessor, the Hon. Bernard Grandmaître, and the Premier, the Hon. David Peterson, for their leadership on this issue.

The wisdom and broad-mindedness of this government will certainly be an example in years to come.

UN DECLARATION OF RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, today on the thirtieth anniversary of the Declaration of the Rights of Children, the United Nations General Assembly approved a comprehensive convention on the rights of the child.

Canadians can be proud that we are recognized as one of the strongest supporters of the convention and have played an important role in its drafting.

The document contains 54 articles establishing international standards for our children's social, economic, political, religious, cultural and civic rights.

As Canadians, we are concerned that millions of children at home and abroad live in conditions of extreme poverty.

More than 40,000 children around the world die each day from preventable childhood diseases. As many as 100 million children around the world are homeless.

The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, however, is only a first step. Countries ratifying the convention must put in place measures which will guarantee children their rights. In Canada, this could be done by establishing a national bill of rights for children, as my colleague from Mission–Coquitlam has suggested in her private members' motion. The Government of Canada should take immediate action to end the immoral situation of 151,000 Canadian children each month depending on food banks for their meals.

SPORTS

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out the wonderful victory of the Victoriaville Vulkins in the Quebec college football AA finals, better known as the "Gold Bowl", Mr. Speaker, for the second year in a row.

Not only is it important to mention the talent and discipline of these students, who from the beginning of their school year had to show a sense of responsibility worthy of young people who can reach the highest goals, but also their coaches, including Yvon Paré and Jacques Dumont, who were more than trainers and became guides and friends thus helping these student athletes bring out their full potential. Reaching the top is already an achievement, but staying there is an even greater one. Bravo, Victoriaville Vulkins!

COLCHESTER REGIONAL HOSPITAL

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize a significant achievement in my riding.

The campaign chairman of the Colchester Regional Hospital Foundation fund raising committee, Mr. Tom Stanfield and his 15 directors are to be congratulated on organizing a fund raising campaign for an expansion of the Colchester Regional Hospital. The generosity of the people of both Truro and Colchester counties and the value they put on their communities is clearly shown by their terrific gesture of goodwill in the most tangible medium, that of cash donations. These funds, amounting to almost $1.4 million, will be complemented by funding for the province of Nova Scotia and the municipality toward phase two expansion of the Colchester Hospital to improve the extensive care unit, eye care unit, additional surgical facilities, a rehabilitation centre, nuclear medicine, 50 additional beds and additional space.

Congratulations are in order for the committee and also the 250 businesses which donated as well as the 6,200 individuals. The result will be that more medical and health services will now be available for Truro and surrounding area.

EL SALVADOR

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, March 17 of this year, Father Ignacio Ellacuria, the Jesuit rector of the University of Central America, told me and other members of the Mission for Peace in El Salvador that "despite appearances we in El Salvador have never been closer to peace although we have a long way to go". Father Ellacuria was internationally respected for his courageous support of the use of dialogue and negotiations to resolve the El Salvadoran conflict. We deplore the brutal and senseless murder of this man, his five colleagues and two staff by the El Salvadoran military as witnessed last week.

As a new member of the OAS, Canada must exert independent and distinctive initiatives to achieve an immediate cease-fire and a negotiated settlement to the conflict in El Salvador. "Monitoring" of the situation is insufficient and unacceptable as a Canadian response. Canada must officially take up the baton from the slain priests of El Salvador and courageously use every diplomatic facility to demonstrate its commitment to peace and the people of El Salvador. Delivery of increased humanitarian assistance through Canadian NGOs and multilateral channels must be assured.

The human rights of all, but especially of civilians, must be protected. Canadian volunteers such as Karen Ridd of Peace Brigades International must be assured safety. The U.S. must be pressured to stop its unsuccessful eight year long aid program to the El Salvador military.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest challenges facing Canada today is constitutional reform. We all know that we need a strong constitutional vision of Canada and we also know that our attempt to meet this important need has been challenged. However, we cannot retreat from what we have achieved. Instead we must advance and resolve the difficult problems. We must not deny the differences among us but rather further define what is special about ourselves and our way of life.

Our challenge as nation builders is to restructure our attitudes so that we can see ourselves in terms of what we have contributed to this great nation and what we have received in return. Having accomplished this, we must work together to identify those things that as Canadians make us the same. Let us work together to find the common ground and build a strong Constitution. Let us work together for a better Canada.

CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, if you would permit me, I would like to raise a non-partisan topic in the House. I am sure that you are as thrilled as I am that the Saskatchewan Rough Riders thrashed the Edmonton Eskimos in the western final yesterday by a score of 32 to 31. I am sure you are as thrilled as I am too that our sometimes boastful and cocky friends have been put in their place. Perhaps your deputy could have done some good for the Edmonton Eskimos but unfortunately he was not there. Maybe even the Premier should have called in a play or two to the bench.

Now it is on to the Grey Cup and the Hamilton Tiger Cats. I cannot help but notice that the member for Hamilton East has been mumbling, moaning and muttering something about her banker. I would suggest instead of wasting the money of her banker on a race of nobodies for some dubious prize of another Albertan city in about seven months, perhaps she should put that money up front and arrange a little wager with me on the outcome of the football game and contribute the earnings of that wager to some worth-while charity. That might be more worth while.

COPYRIGHT ACT

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I urge the hon. Minister of Communications to table phase two of the Copyright Act in the House of Commons without further delay. The laws that now stand provide no exemptions for Canada's educational research and library community. Indeed, they are forced to break the law every day just as members of Parliament, the parliamentary library, caucus services and millions of Canadians across Canada do.

Canadians want access to copyrighted material and do not want creators to use the rights they have been granted in the copyright legislation to control criticism, research, education and discussion in classrooms and public forums.

Canadians also want to know who will have to pay the $30 million to $40 million that CANCOPY copy estimates will be raised. Is it libraries, provincial ministries of education, universities, Parliament, businesses and other organizations throughout the country? And who is to receive the revenues: Torstar, Key Publishers and other members of CANCOPY, International creators or American creators who are not entitled to similar compensation in their own country?

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on November 13, 1989, 200 farmers from my riding held a demonstration in Amos, attended by the president of the Abitibi-Témiscamingue UPA, Mr. Denis Jutras, and Mr. Gilles Bérubé, president of the Amos UPA. The main concerns of our farmers are: A stronger GATT Article 11; quotas on yogurt and ice cream; protecting the option of maintaining import quotas on primary and processed products and ensuring that so-called "over-processed" products are included. Mr. Speaker, in Abitibi, people stand united, and I want to make it clear that I support the claims of the farmers of Abitibi-Témiscamingue.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister considers his next step with the premiers on the Constitution, he will remember that constitutional change must unify our country, not divide it. I saw these flaws, therefore I voted no to Meech Lake Accord.

Canadians are restless about their future. Can First Ministers find unity when the Prime Minister appears to refuse openness and where the need for consensus seems to have disappeared?

It is not a question of Quebec's place in Canada, that is understood. But let us remember that Quebec had agreed in principle in 1965 and in 1971 and then said no. Women had equality concerns in 1981, the charter was re-opened and amended; no fragile web was destroyed. Now if other provinces have concerns, will the Prime Minister listen and seek consensus? Can the chance for resolution be missed by excess language, personal attack, or boxing in people? It is the Prime Minister's duty to reset the tone and agenda, not for horse trading, but for consensus building for Canada.

Across the country, Canadians are saddened because this is a time for federal-provincial confrontation, not national reconciliation. It is time to move toward harmony and dialogue that allows all Canadians equal rights and the opportunity to live together and grow together in mutual respect.

FISHERIES

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, Canada is continuing its leadership role in international environmental protection by co-sponsoring a United Nations resolution on the ban of high seas drift-net fishing. This ban would take effect on June 30, 1992, and also proposes an immediate freeze on expansion of the North Pacific drift-net activity. This follows Canada's 1987 ban on drift-netting in our 200 mile zone, a step later followed by other nations.

Canada also proposed a working group on alternative technologies to drift-netting at the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission meeting, a proposal that was adopted. It is vital not only to focus attention on this issue, but also to take concrete action to solve a problem which threatens the world ecosystem and the livelihood of Canadian fishermen. Canada is both calling attention to this crisis and taking steps to solve it. I congratulate the Minister of Fisheries and the Secretary of State for External Affairs for their leadership on this matter.

Oral Questions

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the Great Lakes is being threatened by the rampant spread of zebra mussels. This biological contaminant was brought into the Great Lakes system in the ballast waters of ships coming in from outside Canada. Paul Hebert, the head of the Great Lakes Institute at the University of Windsor, said that "from a density that was probably a single animal per square metre two years ago, we are now experiencing over 10,000 animals per square metre. These mollusks pose a great challenge to the Great Lakes. Scientists and engineers expect that it will cost hundreds of millions of dollars to correct this problem.

I am glad that the Minister of the Environment is with us today because it is obviously a problem that must be addressed jointly with our friends in the United States. I implore this government, through its Minister of the Environment, to get on this problem of sea mollusks to preserve the environment of the Great Lakes.

BEEF IMPORTS

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, over the past few years the government of Nicaragua has been shipping increased amounts of beef into Canada. As a result of the U.S. embargo in 1985 on products from Nicaragua, exports of beef from that country into Canada have climbed from 3 million pounds in 1986 to 22 million pounds last year. Shipments so far this year have reached 32 million pounds and are expected to go as high as 40 million pounds by the end of the year. Nicaragua is now shipping 92 per cent of its total beef exports to Canada. It has chosen Canada as its only market for beef. The lower price but lower quality imports will cost the Canadian beef industry between $40 million and $50 million in lost income. It is apparent that Nicaraguan officials do not wish to co-operate in voluntary restraint of shipments of beef into Canada.

Other signatories to the GATT are not permitting access to this product and Canada is becoming the dumping ground for a lot of the world's excess beef. We have become a victim of our own meat import act. The Canadian industry wishes to be fair traders but imports of this magnitude are not only unfair but are harmful to a viable Canadian industry, as well as placing our trading relationships with other countries in jeopardy. I think the time is long overdue to carefully consider the measures to be taken before more harm is down to one of the most viable sectors of Canadian agriculture.

EL SALVADOR

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the barbaric murder of Rev. Ellacuria, the rector at the University of Central America, and five other Jesuits last Thursday is a horrible symbol of the Salvadoran government's approach to ending that country's decade-old civil war. I met Rev. Ellacuria last March when I was in El Salvador. He was a man of God, a man of peace, a man who was playing a key role as a mediator between the government and the FMLN. I, along with all who had hoped for an early political solution to the war, grieve his death.

We should be aware that these murders were not just murders. They were statements. The bodies were mutilated in such a way as to make clear the contempt the military, those who are really running things, have for attempts at thoughtful solutions to the war. The attack at the university is a severe blow to prospects for peace in El Salvador. The deaths of such prominent leaders of the community will make moderation and compromise difficult. There will be no peace in El Salvador while the United States is providing support for the government's atrocities, as well as over $1 million a day in military assistance.

I call on the Canadian government to condemn the actions of the death squads at the UN Security Council.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

JUSTICE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. On April 27 in this House the Prime Minister said this about the possibility of profit-taking from the leak of the budget:

> The Solicitor General has said that if any information comes to him, he will report to the House immediately.

On May 19 the Solicitor General told the House, and I use his words:

> The investigation couldn't find any evidence to the effect that some people could have profited from the budget leak.

It was revealed last week, when the House was not sitting, that Canadian National Railways signed a memorandum of understanding for a $50 million deal to lease locomotives financed in part by Mutual Life of Canada, all this on April 26, and that CN subsequently backed out of the deal when it learned that advance knowledge of the federal budget might be involved.

Why, in the seven months since the Prime Minister gave his undertaking to the House of Commons that any new information would be brought to the attention of the House, was that information about the Canadian National leasing deal never made public by the Solicitor General or by any other member of the Government?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we must remember that it is extremely important that any information that comes to the attention of any person, including opposition members, must be handed over immediately to the RCMP and investigated by that police force. I believe that in the circumstances, the important thing is that the RCMP has all the facts so that it can conduct a proper investigation, and that is what is happening now, Mr. Speaker.

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, that is no answer at all. Indeed, the RCMP had the information, at least on September 27, because according to a letter of that date from P. M. Cummins, the Director of National Security Investigations from the RCMP, reporting through his superiors to the Solicitor General: "Rumours relating to the intention of the government to increase taxes on leased equipment were emanating from Mutual's tax department in Waterloo, Ontario. This information was passed on to a consultant advising a Crown corporation which the following day, in anticipation of the tax increase, signed a letter of understanding on April 26 for a multi-million dollar lease, financed in part by Mutual Life of Canada, which would have allowed a 13 per cent to 17 per cent pre-budget saving". Those are the words from the letter.

In other words, CN signed a deal the day before the Prime Minister made his undertaking to the House of Commons that any information would be brought immediately to the attention of the House. Does the government still claim that no one could have profited from the budget leak, and who were the financial consultants who arranged that deal for Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat perplexed by the line of questioning that the right hon. gentleman is following because he was alleging earlier today that there are allegations of political interference in the activities of the RCMP. Really what he is suggesting here is that we should be interfering with the process of the RCMP investigation.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Well, if hon. members opposite do not want to take it seriously, Mr. Speaker, I do and I think you do, Sir, and other members of this House want it. The hon. member talks about rumours; he talks about the potential of profit taking. If he has any evidence to suggest that there was profit taking, which would be contrary to and violating the spirit of the budget, he should come forth with that information, turn it over to the House of Commons, give it to me, give it to the RCMP. That is his responsibility. Why does he not start living up to it rather than being engaged in the kind of irresponsible rhetoric in which we have been engaged?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): That is the most turgid smoke-screen this Deputy Prime Minister has ever tried to emit. The information was in the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, therefore, should have been in the hands of the Solicitor General and, therefore, should have been given to the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Come on. That is right. There is no information that I had to bring to the attention of this government; it had possession of this kind of document.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since the Solicitor General gave us a very ambiguous answer, Canadian National, which is a Crown corporation, made a deal connected with the budget leak. Later, CN apparently withdrew. When did CN withdraw from this deal? When did the Minister of Transport find out that CN had made a deal? When did the Solicitor General find out about this deal? When did the Minister of Finance find out about this deal which was an attempt to get around his Budget? Again, my question is: Why did the Solicitor General fail to inform the House of Commons for seven months, of the deal made by the CN?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to understand what the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is driving at. When I report here in the House of Commons on information that I have been given by the Commissioner of the RCMP, the Government is accused of interfering with the RCMP's investigations. When the Goverment does not intervene and lets the police do its work and conduct its investigation, they say we are not doing our job. I think you should make up your mind and tell us exactly what you think we should be doing.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that what we have done is hand over all the facts to the RCMP which is an honourable police force. All the facts known to us are handed over to the RCMP. It has to conduct its investigation, and it is up to the RCMP to decide when to lay charges. That is how things are done in a democratic country like Canada, and I do not intend to change the way we do things.

[English]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister. I think I am in a position to challenge the statements just made by the Solicitor General about the degree to which this government believes that the RCMP should be allowed to do its own work.

Last week a hearing was held by the Quebec Order of Engineers in Montreal into one of the bribes that was paid to Michel Gravel, the former Tory MP. An engineer, Jean-Niel Plotte, who was asked for the bribe said that Bernard Roy, the Prime Minister's then principal secretary told him that the RCMP investigation would only be a little in-house investigation and that there were not supposed to be any charges laid. That is a direct quote. On what basis would the Prime Minister's office be able to give such an assurance about the RCMP whose independence is supposed to be protected by the government and not compromised by it. Does this Prime Minister's office think that they run the RCMP?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, I am sure, is aware that this matter was in fact turned over to the RCMP as soon as it was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister's Office and the Privy Council Office. Charges have been laid. What more does the hon. member want? Does he want to go back and renege on the charges?

I find the line of questioning rather bizarre. First, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition suggests that the RCMP should turn over all its information with regard to an investigation to the Solicitor General. I do not know much about law, but I know enough about the process of justice that that would be totally unfair. Maybe that is why the hon. Leader of the Opposition finds himself in so much difficulty, if that is the kind of approach he takes to running the affairs of his Party and leading a once proud national party.

Mr. Kaplan: The laying of charges and the conviction that followed is an important side, but only one side of the responsibility. Here is evidence from the Prime Minister's Office that it believes that it is running the RCMP.

After the investigation, Michel Gravelle said that the $75,000 he received was not much, and that others were getting $300,000 or $400,000.

Mr. Boudria: Who?

Mr. Kaplan: That's what he said.

Will the government act responsibly and investigate these claims? Has the government done anything about identifying these people and cleaning up its act?

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is talking about a news story that arose out of an exchange with respect to an engineer's disciplinary body. I am not going to engage in commenting on speculation and comments of that nature. The RCMP were called in and conducted an investigation. If the hon. member has any questions to raise about the method and the thoroughness of the RCMP investigation, there are ways and means in which he can follow that through with an appropriate line of questioning before the committee. Other mechanisms are available with regard to provisions that have been provided for with respect to the RCMP, including internal investigations and other appropriate mechanisms put in place by this government.

[Translation]

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for External Relations.

A young Canadian woman was arrested by the army this morning in a church in San Salvador, and with her, three American nuns.

What has the Government done to obtain the release of this young Canadian woman?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the arrest to which the Leader of the Opposition referred.

Last week, we made representations when the Lutheran minister was arrested. Today, we have people down there who will meet the authorities to ensure that the young woman is released as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I may add that a number of Canadians are over there at the present time. Last week, they were all asked by the honorary consul to stay inside, not take any risks and, if possible, return to Canada.

We are monitoring the situation very closely, and we are, of course, very concerned about what is happening in San Salvador.

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, as the minister and as all other observers will have noted, the situation in San Salvador is getting worse, not better. The death squads continue to act with impugnity. The Government of Spain, as I understand it, has now withdrawn its ambassador. The Attorney General of San Salvador in effect signed death notices for a couple of bishops last night when he went on television. He warned them to get out of the country.

Considering that the situation is getting worse, not better and that the death squads are, I repeat, acting with impugnity, will the Canadian Government now use its newly established membership in the OAS to directly urge the United States Government to cease military assistance to the government in El Salvador?

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, we are of course very concerned about what is happening at this time in El Salvador. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out last week, we are applying all possible pressure to stop this carnage so that peace talks may be resumed.

We were relieved to hear that the Secretary General of the OAS arrived in El Salvador yesterday. Canada's official representative had a meeting with the Secretary General, and we are of course looking at every possible means of getting the parties to at least accept a cease-fire, so that we can help the people who have been affected by the present fighting.

We will continue to apply pressure, and as the Hon. Member mentioned, we will use our new position within the OAS, to try and make the carnage stop and have peace talks resume as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, as the minister will know, Senator Kerry from Massachusetts in the United States has already said that American weapons are being used to kill innocent people. He, as an American, has called for the cessation of using such weapons for such horrific purposes. I repeat again and ask the minister: Since one of the criticisms made of our government in the past about membership in the OAS was that it would not use its independence but would always follow whatever was decided in Washington, and given the facts that most observers believe to be facts, that the government is sanctioning right-wing death-squad activity against innocent people, will the government now ask the American government to cease providing weapons to the government in El Salvador?

[Translation]

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, this government has its own policy and has always reacted very quickly to try to help the cause of peace in countries throughout the world. Here again, we will continue to apply pressure so that peace talks can be resumed and this carnage, which we all deplore as Canadians and as free citizens, will be stopped as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the two ministers responsible for immigration, I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the deteriorating situation in El Salvador.

The Deputy Prime Minister is fully aware that fighting has certainly reached new heights in that country and that the recent brutal killings of innocent people, including civilians and religious leaders, has gripped that country, put it into a state of panic, fear and uncertainty.

I therefore ask the Deputy Prime Minister: In light of these new circumstances in El Salvador, will the government put into force an immediate moratorium like it has for Lebanon and China on the deportation of refugee claimants back to El Salvador until and at least a state of normalcy returns to that country? Will the Deputy Prime Minister give the House that undertaking?

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the government has in place a generous and effective refugee determination system and at the present time 99 per cent of all El Salvadorans seeking refugee status in Canada are accepted as refugees.

Before the other 1 per cent would be removed from the country, their cases would be reviewed by senior immigration officials at national headquarters. If they cannot come to a clear decision, the minister herself will look at the case.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I regret that answer because the member seems to be saying: "Well, if there is only 1 per cent that are returned, so what, because we have already accepted another percentage".

Some Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): That's not what he said.

Mr. Marchi: Perhaps I could direct my question to the Minister for External Relations who just responded to a question by the leader of the New Democratic Party pertaining to that part of the world.

Could the minister explain to us therefore why she believes and why she deems, according to this government, that El Salvador is safe for claimants to be returned?

Mr. Shields: Who said that?

Mr. Marchi: I believe that they are not proper and judicious statements in terms of China and in Lebanon, and I believe that the same standards of a moratorium on deportations should be applied equally to El Salvador.

Could she give us reassurance on why she feels it is "safe" to do a case by case review rather than impose an immediate foolproof moratorium?

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman cannot hear properly, but 99 per cent is 99 per cent. They stay here; they stay here. As I said, 99 per cent is 99 per cent. They stay here.

Mr. Marchi: But one is too many.

Mr. Kempling: The other 1 per cent is reviewed, and under no circumstances will they be sent back to El Salvador—

Mr. Marchi: Eight have been returned already.

Mr. Kempling: —while existing conditions continue.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Farmers across the country are rallying against the policies of this government. Tomorrow thousands and thousands of farmers from Quebec and Ontario will be rallying to protest here on the Hill.

Last week the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, Garf Stevenson, called on the government to live up to the promises of the Prime Minister in December 1987 that as long as the trade war between the EEC and the United States continued the Government of Canada would continue to provide support to those farmers, and he called on the Government of Canada to provide some $500 million worth of support during this winter to assist western farmers.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister willing to make a commitment today that the Prime Minister's commitment back in December 1987 will be honoured and that this additional funding to hard-pressed farmers will be provided?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am encouraged by the fact that many farmers are wanting to become involved in the policy review and policy development process which I believe are overdue in terms of establishing a truly national agri-food policy to meet all the specific needs and requirements of each of the regions and each of the sectors.

In that regard we will be holding a national policy seminar in Ottawa on December 11 and December 12. As the hon. member knows, I am sure, my colleagues and I have met with all agricultural groups to talk about the basic pillars and principles that go into the foundation of that review. That dialogue has been ongoing and will continue.

I hope we will be able to make some progress at the meeting of December 11 and December 12. At that particular time we will also be addressing the very important issues of safety nets, stabilization programs and crop insurance programs, which are very vital to stability and confidence within the agricultural system.

I would hope that the hon. member would be involved in that process as well, and I welcome his input.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

In the same presentation to the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool annual meeting, the president of the Saskatchewan pool called on the government not to unilaterally cut government programs.

The budget of the Minister of Finance last spring cut $500 million worth of support to farmers at a time when the United States was not cutting any of its programs. In fact the Export Enhancement Program has been juiced up by another $90 million to directly affect sales of Canadian wheat to countries like Algeria.

Why is the Government of Canada unilaterally cutting these programs before any negotiations start on a subsidy code? Why is the government selling out Canadian farmers at a time when they need their help?

• (1440)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, in the days of the Liberal government the average support for the grains and oilseeds sector between 1981 and 1984 was something like $326 million on an annualized basis. Between the period 1985 and 1989 the annualized support for the grains and oilseeds sector rose to $2.4 billion. That certainly does not strike me as a government that is walking away from supporting the agriculture industry, particularly the grains and oilseeds sector. He should be applauding us instead of condemning us.

JUSTICE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It concerns the new and very serious allegations that were made by the former Member of Parliament, the former Conservative member of parliament for Gamelin, Mr. Gravel, who as the minister recalls pleaded guilty last February to criminal charges including the taking of bribes.

In sworn evidence before a disciplinary hearing of the Quebec Order of Engineers 10 days ago Mr. Gravel said: "I have been harassed a hell of a lot for only $40,000. A lot of other people are taking in $300,000 and $400,000".

Bearing in mind the earlier allegations by the former member for Rosemount or the current member for Duvernay who said he could put a dozen people into jail with what he knew, I ask the Solicitor General: Has the Solicitor General asked the RCMP, and in particular the National Security Investigations Directorate established to look into corruption, to examine with great care these very serious new allegations of corruption by a former Conservative colleague of his?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, there is always a danger in making such allegations from the floor of the House of Commons. I must tell the hon. member that if he has any information concerning whom ever he has a responsibility, as I and every other member in this House have to make that information available to the RCMP so that it may investigate adequately. But as long we have allegations only—

An Hon. Member: They have already been made!

Mr. Blais: These are allegations. What you should do is go directly to the RCMP, and out of respect for—

An Hon. Member: Answer the question!

Mr. Blais: May I have an opportunity to answer, Mr. Speaker?

An Hon. Member: You are not answering!

Mr. Blais: Out of respect for basic freedoms in Canada, this is the proper way to act. The information must be made available to the RCMP so that it may investigate. If you have any information, go to the RCMP.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, it is not up to me to run the RCMP. This minister is responsible to Canadian citizens for that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson: That is his job.

Mr. Andre: Instead of throwing mud, throw some facts.

[Translation]

Mr. Robinson: This is the former Conservative member who is making those charges. Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Mr. Gravel pleaded guilty after a lengthy court battle, neither did the court nor the public have an opportunity to hear the evidence that would have been adduced had there been a trial. Mr. Speaker, we heard very serious allegations of telephone conversations between the Prime Minister's office and the engineer involved. I am now asking the Deputy Prime Minister: Does he now believe that the time has come finally to launch an urgent investigation into political interference in the administration of justice in Canada? When are they going to act?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member once more asks for a public inquiry, he blames me for not stepping in and directing the RCMP to take this or that course of action. I am wondering what the Hon. Member wants, Mr. Speaker? One should indeed let the RCMP have the facts. One should make them available to the RCMP and ask it to review them. But it is not for the Solicitor General nor any government member to tell the RCMP what it should do. This government's view is that the RCMP should be independent, it should be free to investigate as it seems fit, and we will respect its independence.

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): My question is directed to the Minister of State for Agriculture (Mr. Blais), Mr. Speaker. Faced with the changes now going on in the economy of Canada and the world, farmers from Abitibi—Témiscamingue and Quebec will come to Ottawa tomorrow afternoon to make the Canadian government aware of their concerns.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Can the Minister tell me today whether he could receive the principal leaders of the UPA (Quebec farmers' union) tomorrow before the demonstration to discuss some issues of concern to them, especially on the Quebec provincial scene?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. Yes, we have already taken action. With the Prime Minister at the head, a group of us, including the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of Agriculture and myself, met the leaders of Quebec's farmers just a few weeks ago and we discussed the problems these farmers are going through. We will meet them whenever the need arises. I believe that we have always been available, unlike the previous Government, whose Prime Minister did not see fit to meet them once during his 16 years in power. In our case, the Prime Minister has met the leaders of Quebec's farmers at least eight or nine times, Mr. Speaker. This shows our Government's interest in farmers. We will continue to defend their interests, Mr. Speaker, have no fear!

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank. It concerns the other thorn on the side of the government, the Cogger affair.

Ministers of this House have contradicted each other no less than three times, finally concluding that Senator Cogger had not worked for the Federal Business Development Bank since his appointment to the Senate and that the senator himself in the other place actually insinuated such as well.

Given that Mr. Mark Rosenstein, a senior partner in the law firm of Lapointe Rosenstein, has now confirmed through a reporter for The Globe and Mail on November 13 that Senator Cogger had worked for the Federal Business Development Bank before and during his tenure as a member of the Senate, how can the minister reconcile the statement of Mr. Mark Rosenstein with the ones made by himself and by his colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP is currently undertaking an investigation into this matter.

Mr. Robichaud: How about some facts?

Mr. Andre: The other place is undertaking an investigation of this matter.

I have no ability nor any desire to look into the internal operations of the law firm of Lapointe Rosenstein. I am sure the hon. member would agree, if he thinks about it and if it is truth in getting to the bottom of this issue that he is after, that we would be well advised rather than abusing bits and pieces of evidence here and there as the occasion arises to let the RCMP investigation take its course, let the Senate investigation take its course, and in the end we will all know the true situation in a more factual, fair and open fashion.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, whether or not there is an RCMP investigation does not mean that this minister is no longer responsible for the administration of his own department. I want to ask him a supplementary question.

[Translation]

Is the Minister now prepared to tell us and repeat to us what he said on November 1 in the House of Commons:

> I am convinced, on the information it (the Bank) has provided, that its behaviour is unassailable.

Is the Minister still of the opinion that the behaviour of the Federal Business Development Bank is unassailable in the way it awards contracts or makes loans? Is he still ready to say that today?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, of course I am ready to stand by the information given to me by the FBDB.

The hon. member seems more interested in talking to his neighbour than hearing this. He scored his political points. I guess that takes care of it.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board and it concerns his department's policy of wage discrimination which has forced nearly 1,300 men and women employed as ship's crews on the east coast out on the picket line.

The government talks a good game of pay equity, but in the case of east coast ships' crews Treasury Board has steadfastly refused to conclude a contract that would pay these workers the same wage as their west coast counterparts for doing exactly the same job.

My question is this: Will the minister affirm his support for the principle of pay equity and, if so, is he now prepared to order his negotiators to close that wage gap not in the fourth year of a new contract but immediately upon signing of a new contract?

• (1450)

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, to answer my hon. colleague, I can tell him that officials of the Treasury Board have been instructed to resume negotiations as soon as we have an indication from the union that meaningful discussions can get under way.

That has been my policy all along. It is an open door policy where we are willing to sit at the table and iron out these difficulties as they come up. We would certainly welcome the union coming back to the table as soon as possible.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, paying a person less based on their gender or colour is unacceptable to Canadians. It should be unacceptable to this government because what the government has been doing is paying people according to where they live in this country. That is equally as abhorrent and just as discriminatory.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. In light of the fact that in the next few weeks thousands of fishermen will be out in the Atlantic at perhaps the worst time of the year as the new lobster fishing season opens, without the full protection of the Canadian Coast Guard and fisheries patrol vessels as a direct result of this fully avoidable strike, will the minister finally put his money where his mouth is and give wage parity to these east coast workers now? Or, is he content to wait for tragedy and loss of life before he comes to his senses, does the right thing and conclude a decent agreement with these workers?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I can only assure my colleagues opposite and all Canadians that we are very conscious of safety and security. We have made all the contingency plans necessary to ensure the safety and security of Canadians during this labour dispute.

Once again, I strongly invite the unions to come back to the table and have meaningful discussions so that this issue can be resolved once and for all.

RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Canada endorses the United Nations convention on the rights of the child which will be passed today, but we are in breach of this convention at home in Canada. Over 150,000 children each month line up at institutionalized food banks. This is a national disgrace. It is immoral.

What are the Deputy Prime Minister and his government doing to eradicate child hunger in Canada?

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Clearly, Mr. Speaker, all the members of the House of Commons are quite concerned about the problem of child poverty in Canada. In previous statements, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has described what the Government is doing, together with the provinces, to deal with the problem of child poverty in this country. The provinces have implemented programs to feed hungry children. Under the Canada Assistance Plan, we can help them too, but again we are quite concerned with this problem and I am sure that the Minister of National Health and Welfare could give a more complete answer some other time, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, our national government has a responsibility and has signed an agreement at the United Nations to this effect. We are in negligence in this respect. Obviously government measures are not working when hundreds of thousands of hungry kids have to eat from food banks. What we need is more affordable housing, higher minimum wage levels and incomes above the poverty line.

As a senior minister of this government, will the Deputy Prime Minister undertake in the upcoming year to make hungry children a priority? Will he increase the family allowance and the child tax credit, as well as undertake other measures to eradicate child poverty?

We have done it for seniors. We have almost eradicated poverty. Why can we not make children a priority next year?

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Since 1984, Mr. Speaker, the government has implemented measures which, although not perfect, have nevertheless been useful. For instance, we have doubled the child tax credit from $367 to $565 per child in 1989. The Refundable Sales Tax Credit was adopted in 1986 to help low income families, and 850,000 Canadians were struck from the tax roll through the tax reform. In addition to the day care program which will be further discussed in the House, we have increased the Refundable Child Tax Credit. Of course, I agree that this is not perfect, but in view of the budget cuts we must deal with, our record in this respect is far better than that of the previous government, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

In the past the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan have expressed their intention not to adopt in provincial legislation the national standard for truck drivers' hours of service. As this situation could make the national safety standard virtually unenforceable, could the minister provide this House with an update to this potentially difficult situation?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is true that three western provinces have not yet adopted those regulations.

On October 20 there was a meeting in Vancouver between the provinces and the officers of Transport Canada. We made a proposal. We are expecting an answer from the provinces, and we expect to be able to make an announcement soon.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The Minister is well aware that a number of Tory Members seem ready to extend the goods and services tax to the sale of existing houses. I am quite concerned about their approach.

Because Canadians deserve to know, my question to the Minister of Finance is this: Does his government intend to extend its new goods and services sales tax to every house being sold in Canada? Under its proposed policy, is the government bent on taxing not only food, but also existing as well as new houses?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the finance committee report. I am sure my hon. friend is aware of what is in it, but at this point I am not. Whatever comes out of that report is a decision on the part of the committee. Whether it is a majority report or a unanimous report, I am sure he will have something to say on it as well.

At this point in time the government's view is the proposal that is on the table, the proposal that is set out in the technical paper. That does not include the taxation of existing houses. It has the taxation of new houses but with a generous rebate in order to offset the impact on new houses to meet the commitment we made as a government a year ago last September in stating that the GST would not adversely affect the affordability of housing.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Finance. Recently we were told by the Minister of Finance that behind closed doors provinces were agreeing with his proposed goods and services tax. We are hearing today that the province of Prince Edward Island, which offered to enter into negotiations, was told that it was not important enough to be considered in any negotiations relating to the goods and services tax.

In view of the fact that he no longer wishes to even discuss the matter of the goods and services tax with the provinces, does this mean that finally he has seen the light and is prepared to withdraw his proposal for a goods and services tax?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to that question is: No, I am not prepared to withdraw. I think the hon. member knew that before he stood up and asked the question.

The statement on the part of one of the finance ministers indicated that there was some veracity to what I had said before, but clearly there are some differences of opinion on the part of the provincial governments. The premiers are not in favour of proceeding at this time.

We have said that a preference would be for a national sales tax. We are not doing things in the GST proposal that would preclude that at some later date, but at some later date future governments will have to make that decision.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Between the months of January and August of this year more than 86,000 people travelled on the VIA train called The Canadian. Information I have received shows an over-all load factor of 93.8 per cent with most of the routes carrying a load factor of 98 per cent.

How can the Minister of Transport justify eliminating The Canadian from VIA Rail's passenger network with these kind of statistics?

• (1500)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not disputing the numbers given by my colleague opposite, but they should be checked because they are based on two, to four weeks or two to three months.

Mr. Speaker, decisions concerning VIA Rail have been taken and those numbers refer to previous years. It has been proven without a shadow of a doubt that the services use had fallen overall by 20 per cent over the last eight years. The decision has also been based on considerations of national interest and funds available for transportation as a whole. Again, we can check the numbers available.

Obviously, Transport Canada and I will make no decision based on numbers gathered over two or three weeks or two or three months. That is very obvious.

[English]

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Many Canadians attempting to travel on The Canadian were turned away because the trains were booked to capacity. In my endeavour to get on with the debate and as the minister has discussed, statistics can be looked at in different ways. I asked VIA if it could give me a statistic on how many people were turned away, and lo and behold, they do not keep that statistic. But based on what I have been told, a large number of people are being turned away.

Based on that, would the minister reconsider his decision to eliminate The Canadian now that there are up-to-date statistics? Will he look at the possibility of keeping statistics on those who are turned away at certain periods during the year when the train is full and running at capacity? Those turned away are a statistic and an important one in the debate on VIA Rail and its use in this country.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to understand the rationale of my friend and I cannot. When the trains are full, normally we make a profit. We have to pay $1.5 million a day for the deficit of VIA Rail. We have to put in more and more money and this train, as any other train in the country, does not go over 50 per cent occupancy rate and not over 30 per cent or 35 per cent of cost recovery.

I will explain again what I have said for a couple of months. We cannot afford to put a billion dollars into a system which is not used by Canadians. If we were to turn people away, we would make money and we do not make money.

TRIBUTE TO JEAN-CLAUDE MALÉPART

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members already know that we have lost a colleague and a friend in the person of Jean-Claude Malépart. I will now ask some of his colleagues to pay tribute to his memory. The Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, God has taken from us one of his most faithful children, a man who valued and practised faith, charity and honesty.

Only a disease as merciless as cancer was able to fell Jean-Claude Malépart, a man of gigantic courage, generosity, will and perseverance.

[English]

Jean-Claude had the biggest heart in Parliament. He was, in his way, the conscience of the House of Commons. He had a natural eloquence, a commanding presence, always a man of the people, friend of the lonely, champion of the weak and voice of the poor. He was the greatest advocate of his generation of our country's senior citizens.

However, nothing in his youth seemed to prepare him for the important role he played in our society. His mother died a few days after his birth, and his father died when he was 12. He had to drop out of school to work in the factory in order to help support his family.

At this point, his employers noticed that Jean-Claude had a very special talent for helping his fellow citizens organize and for motivating them to carry out their projects. They decided to let him go temporarily and asked him to organize recreational projects in the neighbourhood.

Until the day he died, Jean-Claude was still a member of the union in his factory, released from his job to help the people in the neighbourhood.

Confronted with the tremendous needs of a community with very limited resources, the sports and recreation organizer quickly turned into a community worker.

After years of work and dedication to the needs of his fellow citizens in East Montreal, Jean-Claude finally embarked on a long and successful political career. First in the Quebec National Assembly, where he served for one term, and subsequently here on the federal scene since 1979.

Mr. Speaker, Jean-Claude Malépart worked in this House for more than ten years. Never on the front benches, he was always just an ordinary Member. However, his impact vastly exceeds and for a long time will continue to exceed the usual range of the average member. The fact is, Jean-Claude Malépart was not an average member. Throughout his adult life, he provided the weak, the needy, the elderly and the sick with a voice, motivation and pride. To him, politics was a vocation, a calling. As the altar boy who demanded wage parity for his fellow workers and as the thundering orator who was able to make a government retreat, Jean-Claude Malépart was always guided by the same acute and agressive sense of social justice.

His approach to justice and equity was not theoretical or philosophical. He was totally instinctive, dynamic and marvelously effective.

"When I see injustice", he said, "I don't know why, but I always feel I have to do something to correct it". For him, to see poverty and get angry about it was not enough. He had to take action and do everything humanly possible to find a remedy. His philosophy was very straightforward. It is not enough to condemn injustice. We must do something about it. Actions speak louder than words.

It was this militant, active and resolute approach that made him lead honourable battles such as the fight against deindexation of old age security pensions, his campaign "Tax food: Never!" and the last one, "Lets invest in our health!". These will remain forever, not only in the political history of our country but above all in the hearts and minds of millions of Canadians.

[English]

Jean-Claude Malépart's vision of our country was one of justice and equality. He was a proud son of Quebec. By choice, he wanted also to be thoroughly Canadian. His roots and his first loyalty was his home province, but in the 1980 referendum, he fought and fought hard to convince Quebecers that they should also choose Canada.

In his last speech to this House of Commons in April 1989, he begged English-speaking Canada to look at reality as it is and to recognize that Quebec is a distinct society. He was worried about the future of his two daughters. Jean-Claude said that Quebec wants to take its place in Canada adding, and I quote what he said to the House, "We want the assurance that in Quebec, my children will be able to continue to work in French.

[Translation]

A man who, in his youth, dreamed of wearing the uniform of the Canadiens, finally carried the torch of dedication, royalty and pride, not for a hockey club but for an entire people.

• (1510)

Just as Maurice Richard was the idol of his youth and of a generation of Canadians, Jean-Claude was an inspiration, to us and to all who want to serve their fellow citizens and help defend the less fortunate in our society. They now know that by following the example of Jean-Claude Malépart, they can make the difference. They can change things to make our society fairer and more equitable. Time and time again he showed us the value of being loyal, loyal to one's roots, language, neighbourhood, city and friends.

Personally, I had the honour of being a friend of Jean-Claude Malépart, and I had the privilege of enjoying his perfect loyalty. Of course, he often rocked the boat. He didn't always agree. And he said so loud and clear. But, when it came down to the crunch, he was always there, solid as an oak, ready to help, like a friend and brother.

If there was one spot in the world where Jean-Claude would have wished to be more often, it was with his wife Pierrette and his daughters Sylvie and Nathalie. "My family", he said, "is my inspiration and support. I have said so over and over again: Without the support, advice and understanding of my wife and daughters, I would never have been able to fight my battles and especially, I would have never been able to win them". We also wish to thank Pierrette, Sylvie and Nathalie for being so generous and letting us have Jean-Claude.

Many people will remember that for them, Jean-Claude Malépart made the difference. That is why thousands and thousands of Canadian men and women throughout the country now mourn, with his family and with us, the man who defended them so valiantly.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, I would like to offer again our most sincere condolences, on behalf of the Government of Canada and all members of the Conservative caucus, as well as personally, to the family of our colleague, the Hon. Member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie, Jean-Claude Malépart.

Mr. Speaker, we all know already that his absence will be keenly felt by his colleagues in the House of Commons. Indeed, the passing of this accomplished parliamentarian will be felt far beyond this Chamber.

Throughout the time he spent here, as well as in the Quebec National Assembly, for he represented his riding in both legislatures, the Hon. Member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie never forgot the main reason he was in politics, which was to defend the interests of those who knew him so well. A hard worker, he very soon earned everyone's respect.

On both sides of the House, we very quickly noticed an exceptional Member of Parliament, one who said out loud that he did not want to be a minister, so that he could remain concerned with those who chose him. He made a point of personally looking after all matters that came before him in his riding.

He cooperated with everyone. The constituents of Laurier—Sainte-Marie are not the only ones in mourning. With his strong commitments and enthusiastic personality, he won the hearts of many Canadians. He had a deep sense of the dignity of the most humble in society and an authority that let him keep everything in perspective.

I am told that he fought the good fight right till the end. No one here can doubt it because he fought for his people until the last minute and his work was just that—fighting.

Mr. Speaker, he fought for his constituents in his riding and he fought for his province. He fought here in this House; he fought for his country. For that, I believe that we must respect and pay tribute to Jean-Claude Malépart for all the work he did over the years.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): On behalf of my fellow members from the New Democratic Party, I would like to pay tribute to Jean-Claude Malépart. The career of that warm, exceptional member was marked by significant struggles. His steadfastness on the issue of senior citizens' pensions earned him the reputation of being the champion of social rights, just as his strenuous work on the Comité de relance de l'Est de Montréal helped address the economic situation of that underprivileged area. But in his constituency, surely the establishment of the Centre d'information communautaire et de dépannage will remain his most significant achievement. Even after he was elected in this place, he went on fighting passionately for the have-nots in our society and more specifically in his own area.

He also fought relentlessly on behalf of Quebecers, as well as for the recognition of their place in Canada.

[English]

Jean-Claude Malépart was an exceptional Quebecer and an exceptional Canadian. He worked day in and day out, for the poor, principally who needed a spokesperson at all times in his area, in his province, but indeed, for the poor all over Canada. He was an effective voice in this Chamber.

At the same time it was in his last speech in the House that he drew the attention of English Canada to the importance, at this point in our history, of recognizing the distinctiveness of the province of Quebec. He was a passionate Quebecer and a passionate Canadian and he wanted, to the end, to be able to see himself in these two categories.

We as members from all Parties of the House of Commons send our deepest sympathy to his wife and to his two daughters. We take no pleasure but a great deal of sadness in recognizing the passing of a man who contributed to this place and to what it should be all about—passion, intelligence, commitment to the well-being of the people he represented. No one at his time in this House has done it better.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie, Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart, is no more. He died with dignity and courage, as we always knew him. To his wife Pierrette, his daughters Nathalie and Sylvie, all members of his family, especially his sisters, and indeed his close friend Georges Boudreau, we extend our deepest sympathies.

The Leader of the Opposition, on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, paid him a very eloquent tribute. I would like simply, and in all humility, as a Member of Parliament from Quebec, to testify to the great place Jean-Claude Malépart always had on the Quebec political scene, although Jean-Claude viewed himself as an ordinary citizen. But in many respects he was an extraordinary citizen whose involvement in social matters was of tremendous service to thousands of his fellow citizens, and whose fiery speeches in the House of Commons influenced governments, both Liberal and Conservative, to better care for the needy in our society.

I knew him in the early 70's when I was mminister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and he applied to my department for a grant for his Centre d'information communautaire et de dépannage. This was of course before he got into politics. I was immediately conquered by the man and his work. Needless to say he got his grant, and of course he deserved it because his claims never were of a personal nature. They were always for the defenseless and the needy

Respect for others and their dignity was important to him. All his life he found ways to help people in need without humiliating them, without embarrassing them. He therefore leaves, not only in Quebec but across Canada, admirers who will miss him and remain very grateful to him.

In Parliament, his departure certainly will leave a very great void. We very much will miss that friend, that colleague we all loved and admired, irrespective of political allegiance, because Jean-Claude was much more than a party member, he was above all a true defender of great and beautiful causes. On his hospital bed he had this to say about himself: "I never lived for Jean-Claude Malépart because I needed reasons to live."

Till the end he gave us examples of his relentlessness, courage, abnegation and dedication. We will miss him deeply for a very long time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, as a private member of the party opposite, I would like to say a few words on the occasion of the death of Jean-Claude Malépart, a noble-hearted man who had the courage of his convictions.

I was very saddened by the death of my colleague, the Hon. Member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie, Jean-Claude Malépart, with whom I had the honour to travel for a week just two years ago.

His illness took us by surprise. A kind and brave man, Jean-Claude Malépart had the respect of french-speaking Members of Parliament in Ottawa for his ideas and his courage. He said out loud what many thought privately. And, despite our political differences, he was one of the members I felt closest to. It almost seems as if I have lost an ally in the House of Commons. He fought his battles and I fought mine.

I had supported him in his battle against deindexation of old age security pensions, he had endorsed my anti-scab bill and my battle to champion the cause of the french fact in Quebec. We also shared the same faith in Quebec society, its values and its people.

The GST and the Meech Lake Accord were his last great battles. He may have lost his fight against cancer but he won the respect of each and everyone.

In Jean-Claude Malépart, Quebecers have lost one of their most ardent champions. I wish to offer my sincere condolences to his wife and his two daughters.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, today we mourn the death of a colleague, of a friend, of a fellow parlementarian who had and will always have a special place in our hearts.

Over the years the House has been the public forum of gifted speakers, discriminate intellectuals and elected members possessed of unmistakable leadership qualities.

Yet I do not believe that this House has ever known, at least certainly not in my time, such a unique and exceptional member as Jean-Claude Malépart.

The day after Jean-Claude died an editorialist described our colleague as having been the voice of the voiceless, the messenger of the destitute, the spokesman for the ordinary man.

Mr. Speaker, our friend Jean-Claude was all that indeed, but he was also a militant and an activist, totally and fully given to helping the needy.

The list of cases handled and fights led by Jean-Claude is endless, as are his sucesses. We all remember the major issues which attracted national attention and which were the subject of often outstanding debates in this House.

First, Montreal East. Within a single month in the fall of 1985, no fewer than seven companies announced their intention to close their doors, thus depriving more than 5,000 workers of their jobs in a region which, in normal times, was already so unfavourably treated.

Jean-Claude took it upon himself to rally all interested parties. He set up the Comité de survie de l'est de Montréal with the workers of Vickers, Bombardier, Canadian Steel Wheels, Canadian Steel Foundries and Gulf Refinery, along with all politicians at every level, representing not only his riding, but the Greater Montreal region as well.

After weeks and months of tireless work Jean-Claude and his survival committee did succeed in slowing down and, finally, stopping the extensive economic decline which had been the hallmark of our region.

This tangible victory was won by solidarity, dedication and perseverance, three words that admirably describe the colleague we mourn today.

However, Jean-Claude fought for more than his riding and his region. He also defended the paper mills at Desbiens and Matane.

His vast campaign against cuts in unemployment insurance benefits for early retirees started in the area around the old capital, spread to cover the entire province of Quebec and finally took on national dimensions.

Across this country, he also fought his battle against deindexation and old age security pensions, a battle he won, and the one against deindexation of family allowance, which he unfortunately lost. He also waged a national campaign against a tax on bread and butter and a tax on medicine.

Finally, during the darkest days of his illness, he discovered how cuts on transfer payments to the provinces resulted in a decline in services for the ill, including those stricken with terrible diseases like cancer. Once again he went on the war path, demanding that the government take the budgets earmarked for two nuclear subs and spend those billions of dollars on medical research.

In most cases, he started his battles alone, sometimes giving the impression of being a voice crying in the wilderness.

I remember vividly his campaign for early retirees, whose unemployment insurance benefits had been cut by the government. It was just a few months after his historic and victorious battle against the deindexation of old age security pensions.

For months, the early retiree benefit cuts had been practically his only topic of conversation. Morning, noon and night, he tried to persuade colleagues, friends and reporters to join him in this struggle. Most refused to get involved since they felt it was a lost cause. Many explained that we were in the opposition and that he would not succeed in making the government retreat every time. However, he was not discouraged. He went on as though this fight were his first, or his last.

In time, he managed to get together a large number of these early retirees and instil in them the hope that they would be able to persuade the government to correct this injustice. Then he used his famous "hammer and nails" technique. Like the carpenter who hammers the head of his nail until it is properly sunk, Jean-Claude went into the fray, time and time again, with patience, energy and determination. He felt that what we had to do, both in and out of the House, was to keep on banging on the same nail over and over again.

He won one more time. Finally, the government re-imbursed 34 000 early retirees to whom it had unfairly denied benefits. This was great Jean-Claude Malépart in action.

Last year, he told me that he loved his work so very much that he could not understand how he could ever get sick. There is no doubt that if love of work, dedication and compassion had been the criteria for a long life, our friend Jean-Claude Malépart would have been eternal.

Yet, our friend has left us. He will remain for quite a long time a source of daily inspiration and motivation.

The first time I was elected to the House of Commons in 1984, Mr. Speaker, Jean-Claude taught me right away the ABC's of good parliamentary life.

He explained to me that if I wanted to promote an idea, I had to work, work, work. I had to do my own work and convey my ideas in clear, colourful and universal understandable sentences. After that, all I would need would be patience, a lot of it, and determination.

This may seem easy, but one needs a lot of willpower to promote a cause the way our colleage did. From now on, every time a cause may seem lost, we should seek and find inspiration in Jean-Claude Malépart's example.

• (1530)

Mr.Speaker: We will now rise and observe a minute of silence.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties in order to allow members to attend the funeral of Jean Claude Malépart and I think you will find there is consent to put the following motion without debate to the House for approval.

I move:

That the House sit the following hours, and conduct the following business, on Tuesday November 21, Wednesday November 22 and Thursday November 23:

On Tuesday November 21, meeting at 10 o'clock for Statements by Members, Oral Questions at 10.15 a.m., Routine Proceedings at 11 a.m., following which (but, in any case, no later than 11.30 a.m.), the sitting will be suspended until 6 p.m. when Government Orders will be called for resumed debate on Bill C-43, with adjournment of the debate and of the House to be at 10 p.m.

On Wednesday November 22 and Thursday November 23, in addition to its normal sitting hours, that the House sit until 9.30 p.m., on resumed debate on Bill C-43; provided that the Adjournment Debate be held at 9.30 p.m.

During the tribute to Mr. Jean Claude Malépart it occurred to me that there might be a possibility that the debate would collapse prior to 9.30 p.m. on Thursday. It was the intention of the Prime Minister, who is in Russia, to enter into the debate on Tuesday, November 28 in the morning right after Routine Proceedings.

Therefore, if at any time prior to 9.30 p.m. on Thursday there are no further speakers, we would simply adjourn the debate on Bill C-43 until Tuesday, November 28 at 11 a.m. This would not preclude any further speakers after the Prime Minister but there would be an effort to use the time of the House wisely and accommodate as many speakers as possible.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the draft order that the Minister of Justice has just read out is in conformity with discussions that we had beginning on Friday. Also he has brought to my attention the interest of the Prime Minister in speaking in the debate on the abortion legislation and we would certainly agree with his suggestion in that regard.

However, just as he thought of an additional point in the last few minutes, another one has occurred to me as well. I hope he will give it his consideration as we have given consideration to his request about the Prime Minister, namely, that the Order be amended to make clear that committees of this House are not to sit during the period from 11.30 a.m. to 6 p.m. when the House sitting is to stand suspended so that those who wish to do so can attend the funeral of Jean Claude Malépart.

It has come to my attention that some of the committees intend to sit during the period when the sitting of the House is to be suspended pursuant to the Order. I really do not think that is consistent with the spirit behind the proposed Order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I think the remarks of my hon. friend have been helpful and I would agree with the spirit of those remarks. It would be the suggestion of the government that no committees should sit during that time in order to fully respect the arrangements and ability of any member on any committee to attend those funeral arrangements.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I too certainly agree with the intent of the motion but I seek clarification on two points.

The government House Leader has indicated that it would be the suggestion of the government. Are we to conclude that it is more than a suggestion and that committees will not be sitting tomorrow afternoon to allow members to attend the funeral? Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, if the debate were to collapse prior to 9.30 p.m. on Thursday the understanding would be that the Prime Minister would have an opportunity to participate in the debate on November 28, and presumably other members as well. The government House Leader is not precluding other members from participating at that point as well?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the second question, yes, that would definitely be the case. With respect to the first question, I am not sure that the government House Leader has the ability to order committees not to sit but I think the committees would understand the spirit with which all members in this House are agreeing to this motion. I would think that that should take care of that particular question.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, if there is any doubt that the committee chairmen will respect the wishes expressed here, it would be very simple that the House order have words added to it that not only will sittings of this House stand suspended between 11.30 a.m. and 6 p.m., but the same shall apply to all committees. The committees are subsidiary bodies of this House and subject to its direction.

Mr. Lewis: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the proposal of the Minister of Justice and has heard the comments of the hon. member for Windsor West and the hon. member for Kamloops. The motion is:

> That the House sit the following hours, and conduct the following business, on Tuesday, November 21, Wednesday, November 22 and Thursday, November 23, 1989:
> On Tuesday, November 21, meeting at 10 o'clock a.m. for Statements by Members, Oral Questions at 10.15 o'clock a.m., and Routine Proceedings at 11.00 o'clock a.m.; following which (but, in any case, no later than 11.30 o'clock a.m.), the sitting shall be suspended until 6.00 o'clock p.m., when Government Orders will be called for resumed debate on Bill C–43, an Act respecting abortion, with adjournment of the debate and of the House to be at 10.00 o'clock p.m.; and no committees shall sit between 11.30 o'clock a.m. and 6.00 o'clock p.m.; and
> On Wednesday, November 22 and Thursday, November 23, in addition to its normal sitting hours, the House shall sit until 9.30 o'clock p.m., on resumed debate on Bill C–43 and the adjournment debate shall be held at 9.30 o'clock p.m.; provided that if no more Members rise to speak before 9.30 o'clock p.m., the debate shall be adjourned to another sitting day.

Is there agreement?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House earlier when a question of privilege was raised with regard to brochures on the goods and services tax that were being distributed through the supermarkets. I felt it might be useful to you if I made a comment on that particular matter.

Since your ruling, Mr. Speaker, there have been no further information materials on the proposed goods and services tax made available for distribution through supermarkets. These brochures were printed originally in early August around the time of the release of the technical paper. They were intended to be complementary to the technical paper to provide more information to Canadians. As you can see, they are in a much more accessible form and therefore easier for Canadians to read.

As was planned at that time, the contract for the distribution of the brochures has ended and has not been renewed. At the expiry of the contract it was the responsibility of the contractor in his dealings with the supermarkets to collect the unused brochures and return them to the Department of Finance.

I am advised that the contractor responsible for the distribution has assured my officials that by end of October there were no brochures remaining in supermarkets. If any member of Parliament has any information to the contrary I would appreciate it if they would let me know and we can gather them up accordingly.

The proposed GST is a key part of the government's plan to build a strong economy. We believe Canadians have a right to know and understand how the proposed tax will operate.

Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in accordance with your ruling we will respect the principles that you have established in our information efforts and certainly any future information efforts that would involve the release of brochures by my department.

As a government we have a responsibility to explain why the GST is being introduced. The importance of public understanding is a key lesson from other countries where similar tax systems have been introduced and, indeed, the Finance Committee of the House has commented specifically on this. Where business people and consumers have been well informed implementation has gone smoothly.

So, Mr. Speaker, we will continue to pursue a broad campaign of public information about the GST but to do so consistent with the ruling that you set out about one month ago and certainly in the production of any new materials will be very mindful of the parameters that you set out in that ruling.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, first, I wonder if the Minister of Finance could inform the House as to exactly when the contract to which he referred ended. What was the date of completion of the contract?

Second, I would like to point out to the Minister of Finance that our concern is not about the government giving information about a proposal it wants to make to the House and the country regarding a new tax, but rather that it has been conveying information to the public in a way which conveys to the public the idea that this House has spoken, has made a decision on this tax that it will go into effect on January 1, 1991. This is not the case, and no matter how much the government believes in this proposal it has no right to convey to the public any information suggesting this House has acted, has taken a decision such that this tax will go into effect. I think this is the point, and I am sorry the Minister of Finance still has not got it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had made it clear that I had got that point, that I had made it very clear that we would be mindful of the parameters that you have set out in your ruling.

In answer to the specific question, I do not have that date in mind but I think the key point is that information is not being sent out. The brochures, I have been advised, have all been withdrawn from the supermarkets which has been part of the contract, so the information will not be provided at this point.

Mr. Speaker: This matter was raised earlier today by the Hon. Member for Kingston and The Islands and I appreciate very much the fact that the Minister of Finance has come into the House and given the statement that he has. The Hon. Member for Windsor West intervened and the Hon. Minister has responded. I think the Hon. Member for Kingston and The Islands would understand why I would now think that the matter has ended.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it would be of interest, I respectfully submit to the House and to yourself, as to whether the distribution of these leaflets, pursuant to the contract, continued after you gave your ruling of some weeks ago.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I spoke too hastily. I do not know whether the Minister can give us that information.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have not got that information. What I do know is that the contract is completed. The materials have been withdrawn. I am not going to say to you today that there were not materials that were in the supermarkets following your ruling that did get out into the hands of the Canadian public. The point is that by the end of October we were advised that they had all been withdrawn and that there are no further brochures being distributed through the supermarkets.

Mr. Speaker: Following the comment of the Hon. Member for Windsor West and the comment of the Minister of Finance, I will come back to the House with some comments about this matter after I have had a little more time to look at it.

Again, I thank the hon. minister for coming into the House and I thank the Hon. Member for Kingston and The Islands for raising this important matter.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When the House rose at 1 p.m. the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing had the floor. The hon. member.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, as I was saying, we have seen in the changes and the clawback to family allowances and old age security massive protests across the country from young and old, from all Canadians, to the end to universality of social programs. The government on the whole has insisted that there is not attack on universality in these programs and yet there are, as we know, members on the government side who have recognized, indeed, that universality is under attack and is being threatened by this legislation.

In addition, the government's own advisory body, the National Council on Welfare, made it quite clear that it sees these clawbacks as putting an end to universality. The Council says there is no question that the clawback puts an end to universality. A social program that delivers benefits to everyone and then collects them back from some recipients is not universal. That is clearly the case, and that from a government-appointed advisory board. Surely the government should take some notice of those it appoints to advise it on important matters of social policy as in this case.

In addition, apart from ignoring the advice of Canadians from all across the country, the government had, prior to the election, made commitments to Canadians, as we know, and in particular the Prime Minister made commitments as to the sacred trust with regard to social programs. In addition, as late as 1985 the government in fact had committed itself not to introduce a clawback or a surtax on old age pensions on the grounds that it would seriously disrupt the retirement income system.

So in spite of commitments over a long period of time from all parts of the government, in spite of ignoring the advice of Canadians everywhere, the government has gone ahead to implement a program which is divisive and which attacks the social programs and the values that Canadians have held so dear.

If the government had wanted to know how Canadians felt, if the government had wanted to know what Canadians thought about its proposal with regard to clawbacks on old age security and on family allowances, it could have asked those groups across the country who work for senior citizens and for families.

For example, with regard to senior citizens, there are many to whom the government could have spoken with regard to obtaining advice. It could have, for example, spoken with people like Frances Pettit in my own city, the president of Senior Citizens Action Now in Saskatoon, a strong and effective advocate for senior citizens in Saskatoon and Saskatchewan. She has spoken out strongly and consistently against these measures and of course will continue to do so because they are wrong. The government could have spoken to people like her. They could have spoken to many, many representatives of senior citizens across the country and got their information. Surely then the government would have seen the light and not introduced a measure which begins to put an end to universality.

In spite of what the government has said, clearly the clawbacks in this bill are the beginning of the end of universality. The impact of these measures, these clawbacks, these attacks on senior citizens and families, will be major. Average families all across the country will lose some or all of their family benefits.

As I said, we should be supporting families, not attacking them. We should be supporting seniors, not attacking them. Yet clawbacks on old age pensions, as set out in this bill, will catch 120,000 pensioners by 1990 and within 20 years time will attack over 1 million pensioners. This is not a measure which just attacks a few, but one which goes on to attack a very large number of pensioners in this country. The same goes for the attacks on families. In 1990 roughly 14 per cent of families will have their family allowances subject to clawback, but in 10 years this will rise to nearly 30 per cent.

This is not a small attack on universality but a major attack on universality, one which will affect so many Canadians. What is clear here is that average Canadians are losing the benefits of social programs, losing the benefit of programs that made us distinct from the United States. More and more of our social programs will become poorer, they will become more targeted, and they will be available only to those in need. The only effective way to ensure that our social programs and taxation are fair is to ensure the continued universality of social programs coupled with a progressive taxation system.

As we know, the Conservative government has chosen to do the opposite, has chosen to make our taxation system less fair and has chosen to make our social programs less and less adequate to meet the greater needs that Canadians are facing. Canadians do not believe this government when it says that these measures are fair. They do not believe this government when it says these measures do not attack universality. They do not trust this government when it speaks on social programs.

It poses a number of important questions with regard to the system of the government's priorities, a number of important questions about fairness in Canada. For example, why should an individual be entitled to receive $100,00 in capital gains tax free but another individual lose $4,000 he or she gets in old age security simply because it is paid as a universal social benefit?

Family allowances and old age security are already taxed in Canada. Why should a special tax be levied on children and the elderly? If the intention is to raise money from the rich, why not do it through a more progressive tax system instead of a super tax on children and on the elderly?

And to ask a more general question with regard to the whole process, when was it that Canadians voted for a means test being applied to the family allowance and old age security? When was it that the Government of Canada asked for Canadians' advice on that matter? It was not an issue in the 1988 election. It has never been an issue which has been presented to Canadians and yet the government is going ahead anyway.

What the government is doing is constantly increasing the tax burden on ordinary families and reducing the tax burden on the richest of Canadians and larger corporations and at the same time programs that make us distinct from the United States, those programs to which the government committed itself prior to the last federal election.

The choices this government has taken would not be taken by any government which is committed to fairness and to supporting Canadian families, Canadian children and Canadian senior citizens.

It is not the only course the government could have taken. Many opportunities have been presented for the government to change its mind. Many alternative approaches have been suggested but, so far, to no avail.

It is worth remembering that senior citizens did turn the government back in its first term when it made its first attack on senior citizens' old age security. Those senior citizens are making their presence felt once again as we have indicated.

In closing, the government needs to reassess its priorities. There is no doubt about that. Anybody who spends any time going across this country will hear that from almost everyone. It needs to listen to what people are saying and it needs to respond to what people are saying. It needs to stop doing the opposite of what people are asking it to do and do what is good for Canada. Madam Speaker, it needs to put people first.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, I take pleasure in being able to speak in this House today on Bill C-28. As you know, the title of Bill C-28 is quite lengthy. I will simply refer to it as an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Given my time restraints and not to diminish the importance of the other acts and their amendments included in Bill C-28, I will confine my remarks to clause 48 of this bill.

As we know, this clause concerns a clawback proposal on old age security and family allowance benefits. I believe this is of great importance to a number of Canadians and to the nature of Canada's universal social programs.

Bill C–28 will have a serious impact on two special groups in Canadian society; our senior citizens and families with children. These groups are important in any society. However, the amendments to the Income Tax Act contained in Bill C–28 will have a severe negative impact on two elements of our society which the government should be doing its utmost to protect and support.

With the implications of Bill C–28 one can truly see just how much this government really cares about the elderly and the Canadian family. Clause 48 uses the taxation system to institute the clawback of family allowances and old age security pensions. Clause 48 amounts to an attack by this government on two major components of Canada's social system; old age security pensions and family allowance benefits.

Bill C–28 is yet another example of this government's plan to eradicate piece by piece our universal social programs and, I suspect, to limit or eventually eliminate our social systems entirely.

The Canadian Council on Social Development has condemned the government's proposal to clawback old age security and family allowance benefits. The council did not criticize the government on this issue for any partisan reasons. It is, in fact, an independent, national, non–profit organization concerned about the future of Canada's social policies.

In the opinion of the council, "The clawback is the latest step in a serious erosion of the principle of universality and the clawback imposes a surtax on pensioners and families with children".

I believe this is a correct assessment of Bill C–28. This legislation will unfairly penalize old age security and family allowance recipients. The government would like us to believe that because the clawbacks only apply to recipients with an individual net income of $50,000 or more, they are not unfair. However, there is a serious flaw in this line of reasoning. Right now the clawbacks would indeed only affect a small portion of those who receive these benefits. However, the government is not so quick to point out that over time the clawback will apply to a much greater number of recipients as the $50,000 threshold is not fully indexed to the rate of inflation. By not indexing the threshold for the first 3 per cent of inflation, within seven years the threshold will actually be $40,000 and will be at $35,000 four years later.

The National Council on Welfare, which is a citizen's advisory body to the Minister of National Health and Welfare with its members appointed by the cabinet to advise the minister on matters of social policy, has added its voice to the opposition against the clawback. This past September the council released a report entitled The 1989 Budget and Social Policy. The report called upon the government to abandon the clawback proposal. Obviously the council would not have made such a recommendation unwisely. However, the government has decided to ignore the excellent advice it has been offered.

According to the National Council on Welfare, and I quote from the report: "There is no question that the clawback puts an end to universality. A social program that delivers benefits to everyone and then collects them all back from some recipients is not universal".

Under the clawback every parent or senior citizen in this country will lose all or a portion of his or her family allowance and old age pension if he or she has an individual annual net income of $50,000 or more. Recipients will lose 15 cents in benefits for every dollar in net income above $50,000. The National Council on Welfare states quite clearly that this act by the government is, in its words: "The most significant change in social policy in a generation. Yet it was announced by the Minister of Finance in the budget speech without prior consultation."

Is truly amazing that this government is determined to end the universal characteristic of Canada's social programs. By using income levels, old age pensioners and family allowance recipients will be placed in a series of classes with some having their benefits taxed back. At the same time the government is ensuring that more and more recipients will fall into the clawback scheme over time. All this is being done without the slightest consideration of what this will mean for the people who receive these benefits and for our society as a whole.

The fact that the clawback was proposed by the government without consulting with experts in the social policy field should not come as too much of a surprise. The insensitivity of this government is quite appalling. It is not content with cutting VIA Rail to pieces. It is not satisfied by withdrawing from unemployment and it is not very concerned about the negative impact the proposed goods and services tax will have on many middle and low-income Canadians. Instead, the Conservative agenda includes an outright attack on the universality of our social programs and the government is actually going after senior citizens and families.

The National Council on Welfare estimates that as the clawback proposal is not fully indexed to inflation, in less than 10 years more than one million Canadian families could be subject to a full or partial clawback of their family allowance benefits. The clawback proposal discriminates against one-income families and seniors. A single income family with two children with a net income of $58,000 will lose all its family allowance benefits while a two-income family with one spouse earning $45,000 and the other earning $30,000 would escape the clawback. This despite the fact that their combined income totals $75,000. This is by no means an example of fairness.

The clawback proposal is also unequal for senior citizens receiving the old age security pension. We should remember that seniors have already earned their pension as a result of the income tax they have paid over their working years. Now the government steps in and says, "Forget it, we are taxing back your pension regardless of what you have paid in taxes." There is something incredibly wrong with this kind of action from the government. Our seniors, regardless of their incomes today or in the future, are deserving of their old age security pensions. None of them should have to see a lifetime of work, savings, and taxes ignored by a single piece of legislation from this government. They deserve better treatment, far better treatment.

The idea being expressed by the government with Bill C-28 is one which is very clear. The clawback proposal means that seniors and families in Canada do not count any more. Of course the government will argue that it is prepared to assist those who receive these two benefits by adjusting the threshold figure in the future, that there will be some element of fairness to protect the majority of recipients from the clawback.

We are left wondering when will the government actually come through on this promise? How badly will the $50,000 threshold have to dip in real money terms before the government will raise it? How many recipients will have to be caught in the clawback net before the government announces an adjustment?

I certainly find no comfort in this empty promise. One need only remember the Prime Minister's own words on social programs being a "sacred trust". By looking at Bill C-28 we see how much that trust has been maintained by this government.

The Conservative government views the clawback of old age security and family allowance benefits as one means to address the federal deficit. Given that the government has played a considerable role in raising the deficit since being elected in 1984, I guess it would do just about anything to reduce it. However, there is a rather large problem in the logic of having seniors and families address the deficit through their social benefits. We all know that the reduction of the deficit is important to every Canadian, but is it fair or fiscally prudent to fight the deficit with our social programs? One voice, the Canadian Seniors Network, has stated, and I quote:

> Why should a family pay more towards the deficit than a childless couple, and why should a pensioner pay more than a wage earner with the same income?

This group suggests it is incongruous for the government to introduce the clawback proposal which, in its opinion, will only recover a relatively insignificant amount when compared to the massive public debt. This organization has suggested that the same amount or even more revenue which the clawback would provide the government can in fact be generated by raising the top income tax bracket by a single percentage point. This would tax all high-income individuals and not single out old age pensioners and family allowance recipients with an individual net income of $50,000 or more. The government, however, seems convinced that the clawback proposal, without full indexation, is the better route to take. The clawback is obviously punitive, unfair and a discriminatory measure.

There is no moral or fiscal justification for the government to proceed with this blatant attack on benefit recipients and our universal social programs. Why then is the government willing to implement the clawback? Why is it eager to dismantle universality?

A strong case can be made that the clawback proposal is not an attempt at reducing the deficit, it is really the universal nature of Canada's social programs that is the real target of this government. We know that the free trade agreement with the United States plays a large role in the actions of the government. Some may well argue that the agreement has led the government to its attack on universality.

The Canadian Council on Social Development has stated, and I quote:

> The Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement generates inevitable pressure from within Canada and from the United States for the social programs of the two countries to be harmonized so that neither partner has the competitive advantage. Since the United States does not have the extended universal programs we in Canada enjoy, it is more likely that our own plans and programs will be stunted or rolled back.

This is a very perceptive view from the Council on Social Development. I believe the clawback proposal fits nicely into this government's agenda. The plan calls for the reduction, if not the elimination, of universality and, indeed, most of Canada's social programs which are considered to be out of step with the small amount that is available in the United States social system. Surely, this really cannot be the case. It cannot be the real reason behind the clawback or the assault this government is launching on our social programs and the principle of universality. After all, the Conservative government has assured Canadians that our social programs—our entire social system—has not been nor ever will be up for negotiation with the United States because of the free trade agreement. We have this promise from the government.

I urge the government to rescind the clawback proposal contained in Bill C–28. By doing so it would remove any doubt about the government's sincerity in protecting the universality of Canada's social programs. It would tell us that our social programs are not under attack and will be preserved. By removing the clawback proposal the government would also be informing the United States that it will maintain the universality of our social programs and policies.

In conclusion, if the government is truly serious about maintaining universality and in providing a fair, equitable and non–discriminatory social system for our seniors, families, and all Canadians, whether they receive these benefits or any other ones now or in the future, it will heed the advice it has been given by various national organizations and social experts and abandon the clawback proposal.

The government must realize that the clawback will effectively punish current recipients and the many others it will draw in over a relatively short period of time. To proceed with the clawback would be an injustice. It would indicate that this government is not really interested in true deficit reduction efforts but with the destruction of universality and the eventual disintegration of Canada's long–cherished social system.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take advantage of this opportunity to speak against Bill C–28, and in particular against clause 48 which has to do with the clawback of two particular types of income.

This bill is a special bill, special in that it applies only to two kinds of income. We are talking about the old age pension and about family allowance. These are the only two types of income to which this special tax will apply.

It is special in that it applies to individual income as opposed to family income. There are other examples of taxes, of course, where that principle applies as well, but not all. This tax falls in the category of applying to an individual's income as opposed to family income, which is going to increase the possibility of members of a family, certainly between the income earner and the spouse, and perhaps even beyond that, changing their income pattern among themselves so that they will pay a minimum of income tax to the government. It is going to encourage that kind of tax planning. So it is special in that respect as well.

It is special in that it is only partly indexed. Certainly, if members of the government intended it to be fully indexed they would have provided for that in the legislation. But they do not intend that. They intend to leave it flexible so that at any time at all the minister, if he chooses, for whatever reason—perhaps for a political one if an election is on the horizon, or perhaps for an economic one if it is after an election and he wants to have more money to do with whatever he wants—has the flexibility to change it so that it will be fully indexed over one period, or leave it as it is, which is partially indexed, or change the basis or the formula. It is totally flexible in that respect which makes it special in that way as well.

It is special in another way. It is a major step toward the Americanization of our social programs. The Americans do not have anything like the kind of social network that we have here in Canada. For example, they have pensions, but they are contributory pensions. The people intending to benefit from these pension programs contribute regularly to them. They have plans set up in the manner of our contributory Canada Pension Plan, for example, or the Quebec Pension Plan, and as means tested programs such as our guaranteed income supplement.

These are some of their programs. But they have no universal pension program equivalent to our old age security system. No pension exists in the United States where residents have a right, simply by virtue of the fact that they have reached the age of 65 and have been residents long enough, to qualify. This is a step to bring us in line with the American plan of not having a universal program. It is a major step toward Americanization. Perhaps it is even more than that because, in some instances, some of our senior citizens did contribute to the old age security plan.

Madam Speaker, you are not old enough to remember, but some of us in this House are, when there was a special 2 per cent income tax that was levied for the express purpose of providing funds for the old age security system. So seniors are having that taken away from them with this clawback provision in this legislation. It is special in that way as well. It is the first time that the government has ever said, "Contribute to a plan and later on we will confiscate the funds". So it is special in that respect as well.

It is special in another way. It is a special tax in that it is a major step toward the end of universality. In spite of the Prime Minister's reassurances, and other members have spoken about this—but I think they are important enough to read into the record—he said on March 7, 1984, when he was not the Prime Minister, "Our position is simple and straightforward. We are in favour of universality of social programs and they shall not be touched."

Speaking on October 15, 1988, at Summerside, P.E.I., the Prime Minister told seniors—and you will recall, Madam Speaker, that we were in the middle of an election campaign then, which might make a difference—"Let me say a special word to the senior citizens. In the future Canada will be doing more, not less, for all of you". He said, "all of you", he didn't say for some, at the expense of others.

He went on to say, "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished, by our government, which is committed to social justice and fairness for Canadians". He made it very clear in the middle of an election campaign that he was totally committed to the idea of universality, that he would do more rather than less.

There are other ways in which the budget takes away from senior citizens, not specifically, but it certainly affects them. It means that they will have lower net incomes. In this instance the government is going after them again with this clawback provision of the old age pension. It is a major step towards the end of universality because it applies particularly to the kinds of income that the Prime Minister dealt with very specifically when he said that the government would not do exactly what it is doing right now.

The Prime Minister made the same promises with respect to other social programs. He said the same thing with respect to medicare. Dare I ask, Madam Speaker, will that be next? He said the same thing with respect to hospital insurance. Dare I ask, Madam Speaker, will that be next? Where will he stop?

We can quote others. We can quote the Conservative chairman of the finance committee when he admitted, quite candidly, what the government is doing in this legislation. He said, "We have decided to eliminate universality". That is precisely what the government is doing with this legislation in this particular section. He also said, "While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky, it is there." I agree with the person who said that. I do not think there is any question about it.

I think many members of the Conservative party, if you could get them separately and quietly and ask them to speak candidly, would also agree. They would also agree that during the election campaign they went around reassuring people that there would never be any danger of any Tory proposal that would in any way at all affect universality. Yet they are supporting this legislation now.

If that is the way they feel about it, if they really believe that Canada cannot afford universality, that it is not proper for us to make universal programs available, such as the old age pension, the family allowance, why do they not have the intestinal fortitude to come out and say so and simply bring in legislation doing away with these programs? Why not admit it? Why not be honest about it? I do not think the question will be answered. There is not much point in my belabouring it.

It is a special provision in another way. To benefit the affluent, members of this party in office have made some special provisions. This clawback is not the only special thing they have done to the people as a whole who are getting old age pension and family allowance. They also have special treatment for other people in our community. I am speaking now of the affluent.

The progressive income tax rate, that is, the marginal rate for those in the highest income tax bracket, was reduced by the previous government in 1981. The highest marginal rate in 1981 was reduced from 43 per cent to 34 per cent. The Conservatives opposed it at the time no doubt.

In 1987, the Conservatives brought in legislation that reduced the rate from 34 per cent down to 29 per cent. The old age pension is being taken back from everybody, not just from the poor or middle-income people but also from the most affluent. We might say that they are being fair. They are taking it away from everybody. In fact, the clawback is phased in to help those in the lowest brackets for a while.

But the combination of the clawback and of the gifts to the most affluent by reducing the marginal rate on the highest incomes, leaves the top 1 per cent of taxpayers with an average of $3,770 more in their pockets at the end of the year. They do not mind the clawback because they are still almost $4,000 ahead. That is the kind of special treatment that is provided in the budget, not solely in this legislation. The net effect of other budget provisions and this clawback proposal is to leave the people at the very top of the heap better off than they were when the Conservatives were first elected. At the same time, the working poor and the middle-income people will be worse off.

It is not fair to load 80 per cent of the population with the cost of lowering the marginal rates for those with $100,000 or more net income. It just is not fair. It is typically Tory, but it is not fair.

Why should there be special and preferential treatment for the income of the affluent in the realm of capital gains, something which was mentioned by my colleague earlier? On capital gains up to $100,000 accumulative there is no tax at all. That is not for the poor. That is not for the working poor. That is not for the middle-income people.

Let me talk about the tax exemptions for residences. It is one thing to say that a $100,000 residence is tax free, but it also applies to a $1 million residence. So even that is not applied fairly, not progressively.

Why is there special treatment for investment income? Again, there is special treatment, not the special kind of treatment that helps the lowest income people, but special preferential treatment on those affluent who are receiving investment income. They get special rates of tax that are lower on the average than on income that workers earn by the sweat of their brow.

There are special rates for corporations. Why is there a large corporation tax also included in this budget which taxes some 3,200 corporations which were not previously paying corporation tax on their income, but which still lets some 60,000 large profitable corporations escape from paying any income tax at all? If they are catching 3,200 and letting 60,000 go when they could have brought in legislation that would have caught all 64,000 of them, then the answer must be that they are looking after their friends. There does not seem to be any other choice.

I can appreciate the government's need for money. There have been cutbacks in expenditures that we have complained about and are still complaining about and no doubt will continue to complain about. There is the tremendous deficit that, this year, went up by some $5 billion. While there are projections that it will come down in the future, the deficit for this year was supposed to have come down too, if we were to believe the estimates of the Minister of Finance. No one really believes that he knows what is going to happen two, three, four and five years down the road when he could not say what was going to happen tomorrow.

We know that the government needs money to reduce the deficit, to wipe it out and even to work on the accumulated debt. There are fair ways of getting that money. We have talked about such methods. I do not intend to go into them in any great detail now other than to mention one which I have mentioned before and which others have mentioned.

In 1962 the government of the day was concerned about revenue, but it also had some silly ideas. It must have been a Liberal government at that time, but I do not know for certain. It was really a novel idea. It was that the new tax system should be fair. So that government appointed the Carter Commission in September of 1962. It took until December of 1966, four years and ten months later, to produce a nine volume report which described in detail a fair tax system for Canadians. It was not universally applauded. As a matter of fact almost everybody in the country found something to say against it, anyone that would talk about it. But it was, on balance, a fairer system. It was so fair that the government of the day filed it away and it now gathers dust in libraries and archives around the country.

If members of the government really want to be fair, and I doubt very much that they do, then I want to recommend something to them. Certainly their record to date has given no indication that they are the least bit interested in being fair to the population as a whole. They certainly want to be more than fair to their friends, the most affluent ones at the top, and more than fair to the large profitable corporations that are not paying any tax. They do not want to be so fair to the middle-income people, and they are unfair to the ones at the bottom. Everything they have done points in those directions. But if they want to be fair, if they want even to consider it, and perhaps there is one person over there who would, and that is the chairman of the finance committee, I would recommend that they dig up the Carter report, blow the dust off it and start reading the details. I said at the time, and I think I was one of a relatively small group who did so, that it was a good report. It is a report that could be the basis of a fair taxation system in Canada.

People do not like paying taxes. I am sure, Madam Speaker, you have maybe said yourself on platforms during election campaigns, and you have certainly heard it many times, that the only fair tax is the one that you pay and I do not. Nevertheless, I think there is a feeling among Canadians that if taxation were convincingly fair, then they would support it.

The Carter Commission was fair, "a buck is a buck". It does not matter whether your income comes from the old age pension, from family allowance, from a lottery win or from dividends of a corporation, it is one more dollar that you have, one more dollar of spending power, and you should pay the same rate on this dollar as you do on every dollar that you get regardless of the source. It should be progressive beyond that, yes, but it should be taxed all in the same way.

I am not giving you the details of a nine volume report, Madam Speaker. You could certainly get those if you were interested, as could the government. But it was a good report. There were many criticisms of it, but on the whole it was a good report, one that could form the basis of a fair taxation system in Canada. It is one that I would strongly recommend to the government to take up, at least take it out of the library and blow the dust off it. Start reading it. Bring it in instead of all these changes that you are making, each one of which makes the system more unfair.

I can recall, and I have repeated this on other occasions, when the finance critic for the New Democrats, Lorne Nystrom, said in debate, "When in the history of Canada was a major tax change ever made which shifted the load of government from the very poor to the affluent?" When did it improve the lot of those at the bottom of the heap at the expense of those at the top? To this day no one has given any answer to that. Every major tax change has left the most affluent better off and the ones at the bottom worse off. The various changes that are being made by this government follow that pattern right down the line.

There is a better way. There is a better answer. I would recommend to the government it take a look at the Carter report.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I stand today to speak to Bill C-28, a bill that makes 59 different amendments to the Income Tax Act. There are a whole series of areas that are impacted which, among others, includes the family allowance and old age security pensions. That particular clawback is what I wish to address today. I do not want anyone listening to think that that is the only thing being impacted by the amendments to this package that has been deposited by the Minister of Finance and which is going to cause great distress and financial hardship to many people in our society.

Part 1.2 of Clause 48 in Bill C-28 implements the clawback of family allowance and old age security pensions. The amount of the repayment is equal to 15 per cent of the taxpayer's income over $50,000. That is what I wish to address.

In general, I think those of us who are concerned would recognize that with respect to family allowance this particular measure is going to take $1.686 billion out of family budgets in the next five years, or $500 million a year by 1991. It is true that certain family allowance benefits are taxable. Thirty per cent of family allowance benefits are already paid back to the government through the progressive income tax system.

Within ten years, close to one million Canadian families who currently receive family allowances or old age pensions will begin to lose these benefits due to the partial indexing that is inflation less 3 per cent of the $50,000 threshold. So it is with great concern that I participate in this debate because it is an attack on children and families, as well as an attack on those who helped to build this country, the seniors of this land.

I want to speak in particular, and make my remarks on behalf of the people of the Mount Royal riding, as well as those in the rest of Canada. I have had the opportunity to speak to hundreds and hundreds in my riding. There is very serious concern. They feel that they are going to suffer directly as a result of this very negative, regressive legislation.

I would suggest to you that in fulfilling our responsibility as legislators we have to keep a careful eye on the government and its agenda, particularly in opposition. But I think that conscientious members of this government and of the legislature here should be speaking and expressing the concerns that are brought to their attention by their constituents, irrespective of party policy when it comes to matters as serious as this.

It is, therefore, ironic that after a weekend when the news was filled with the reviews of the Conservative agenda one year after the last election, today we are in the middle of a debate that symbolizes that agenda, one of the most serious attacks on social change and social policy in the history of the last 25 years.

I refer to the clawback of seniors' pensions, an erosion of the universality principle that has always guided our social programs in this country. The Conservative agenda appears aimed at cutting and reducing the caring aspects of government saying it is in the national interest. Where we differ on this side of the House is by believing in a more balanced approach to financial responsibility, always respecting the compassionate traditions upon which our country was founded.

Most people would agree that a government exists to make changes possible and to make things happen. However, Liberals do not believe in change for change sake but rather making things better. That is why a balance must be struck between the economic and social impact of change. We believe in this balanced approach. We believe that while it is the economy that grows, it is society that cares.

Throughout Canada's history, with all the changes brought in its short 120 years, there has always remained a deeply held conviction, a cornerstone of our national life that would never change, our tradition of universal access to social programs, Canada's way of demonstrating tolerance and fairness as members of a society. Yet, in 1984, that tradition began to unravel, to erode. It is this unravelling that I would like to address now.

Since coming to office the Conservatives have time after time, year after year, continued a slow, often deceptive, but always real plan, a plan to dismantle the safety net of social programs that most of us believed was part of the fabric of this country. Once it was everyone's right as a Canadian to have access to social programs, but that is no longer true. The social contract established decades ago gave every Canadian equal access to the benefits of our social programs. That is the contract that has been broken. There is not fairness and equal access.

Universality is quite a simple idea. It is the expression of a belief that over a lifetime every single Canadian contributes to the building and flourishing of this society in their own way and that no one should be shut out from the benefits of the country that they have helped to build. That is universality. It is simple, true, and Canadian. We must remember that this principle has survived governments of two political stripes and has survived recessions. Indeed, it grew out of the Depression. Yet this spirit and tradition of a government looking out for the health and welfare of every Canadian, no matter their means, came to a sudden end in 1984.

Under this government in Ottawa, universality has become little more than words on paper, words offered to Canadians on the one hand then quickly erased with the other. How familiar we are with the Prime Minister standing before a crowd and declaring to all the country that our social programs were a sacred trust. Yes there were days when this government's smooth rhetoric tricked Canadians into believing they shared this caring approach to social programs. But it seems to have been a mask behind which lay the real truth.

Time after time this government has used fast talk and colourful packaging to hide from Canadians the true facts, the slow dismantling of universal access to well established and important social programs. As a result, for five long years the opposition has devoted endless energy trying to stop the government's slow erosion piece by piece of these social benefits.

We are lucky that sometimes challenges to the government do succeed because Canadians are not fooled; they see past the rhetoric. They speak out, sometimes they do this successfully and they force this government to back-track. It was very early in the Conservative mandate that the unravelling of universality began. I go back to December 21, 1984, just weeks after the Conservatives took office, when the Leader of the Opposition rose in this House, trying to fend off the finance minister's deindexing of old age pensions.

Today we paid tribute to my colleague, Jean Claude Malépart, who unfortunately passed away this past weekend. He was one of the strongest critics of the government's insensitivity in the deindexing of old age pensions.

The leader of our party stood by the principle of universality and began a battle with this government that continues to this very day. He put it this way: "Why are we so committed to universality? It is because Canadians believe in equality. Canadians believe that all individuals, no matter their social status, deserve equitable treatment. If you segregate services only to the very need, then those services meant only for the poor become poor services". Preserving the social contract is what my party has always believed in, and that is what we have fought this government over since 1984. Fortunately, on the deindexation of pensions, the people won.

The reality is that the 1989 budget did cut old age security benefits through what is now called the clawback clause. They have cut family allowances as well and they have cut health care funding allocations. They have also privatized unemployment insurance, which is another important aspect of our social contracts.

Today the practical implications of the clawback are that anyone receiving $50,000 a year in retirement income net will have their pension benefits taken back into the government treasury. The same applies to family allowances. There is an additional piece of trickery for 70 per cent of seniors whose net income is based not only on pensions and interest funds but also on dividends. If dividends are collected, the amount of those dividends are grossed up by 25 per cent.

Just a word of explanation here where I think we must focus some of the fight as well. The tax system treats dividends for Canadians in a very special way. They are grossed up by 25 per cent in calculating net income and then this is offset by the dividend tax credit in the final tax calculation. The clawback, however, is based on the inflated net income figure. I would say that that is grossly unfair, that grossed up figure, on top of everything else. I will come back to that a little later.

What about tomorrow? Within 10 years nearly 1 million more Canadian families will lose all or part of their family allowance and old age pensions because of this action. The threshold will change. It will only rise in future years by the amount that annual inflation exceeds 3 per cent. That means that eight years from now the tax-back threshold will have fallen to the equivalent of $40,000 today.

In a careful reading of a Globe and Mail article of Monday, May 15, Hugh Windsor outlines this. I wish to quote much of what he has to say because it is very important. I have checked this out and it would seem that these are very well-founded figures. He states that while it is true:

> —that the $50,000 income threshold for the beginning of the clawback affects relatively few seniors—about 13 per cent of old age security recipients who file income tax forms, with only 3.5 per cent of those paying back all of the pensions. At first glance, the $50,000 seems a reasonable level to begin the cut; indeed, it must seem like Easy Street to the approximately half a million seniors who live below the poverty line. The $76,000 where the clawback tops out is beyond the expectations of most Canadians, whatever their age group—

But sneakiness and potential unfairness enter into the way Mr. Wilson chose to treat the $50,000 over time. The threshold will not rise in step with inflation—

Which must be done when assessing such a major public policy change.

So, if we look down the road at maintaining current buying power while evaluating seniors' income in constant dollars, and if we project current inflation rates forward, by the year 2000 the clawback will start at $35,765. Fifteen years from now, the threshold will be down to $30,000; five years later when the first of the baby boomers start retiring, and that is in the year 2010, it will stand at $28,000 and will affect at least two million Canadians.

It is a crafty thin edge of the wedge, eroding universality and not taking into account the goods and services tax or the potential for lowering the threshold to $40,000 or $45,000 and raising the rate up of taxing at 15 per cent. Tampering with indexation was wrong in 1985. It is wrong in 1989. This is not taxation. It is ideologically driven confiscation.

Mr. Thacker: What about the six and five program?

Mrs. Finestone: That was not good either. Not that that should make it any different. It did not take effect at that point either, so do not try to deny the erosion of rights that you have put into place right now.

As some members try to look for arguments and blame it on the other guy, blame it on someone else, not me the Conservative, let me quote the Minister of State (Seniors) who stood in this House and cited senior citizens groups which were were supportive of budget clawback provisions and were reacting very favourably. It is amazing that the reaction of these senior groups' to her remarks was one of disbelief and indignation over what they saw as a blatant misinterpretation of their position. It goes right along with the blatant misinterpretation of our Prime Minister who swore that he would never touch his mother's pension. He would never touch anybody's pension and only enrich the well-being of the elderly in our society. It goes along with the Minister of Finance saying that he has not touched universality. That too is an exaggeration.

The problem is that a buck is a buck is a buck. There is a fairness argument to be made that $1 of income should be taxed the same way no matter where that income comes from. Second, most of the people receiving this old age security have paid many times over in the past. Those presently receiving old age security payments of approximately $4,000 a year have been paying since 1952. They paid at a rate higher than that of a pension plan even at the self-employed rate of contributions of employee and employer share. In the beginning in the 1950s the amount of the contribution was 2 per cent of taxable income subject to a maximum payment of $60, that is those who have an earned or unearned income of $3,000 in taxable income.

By 1965 they were paying 4 per cent with a top of $120 a year. That was the year before we even introduced the Canada Pension Plan. In 1967, it stayed at 4 per cent, but the maximum payment on $6,000 of taxable income went up to $240. In 1971 we remember that the then Finance Minister Edgar Benson removed the ceiling of total payments on taxable income, and I refer to page 11 of the summary of the 1971 tax reform legislation where he kept the 4 per cent but rolled it into the tax revisions that he made. He set no limits so that those at $50,000 of taxable income paid $2,000 into their old age security. It was not an attack on universality or a cut in the old age pension, it was a different way of paying for it. Since 1971 to 1987 this has been the case. We are all paying into it and we pay all our life for our old age security whether we are in need or not in need. That is the point.

Mrs. Dobbie: And we believe in paying for our brothers, if we are rich enough to.

Mrs. Finestone: Aren't you lucky we all fought for you before so that you could earn income. Lots of people did not earn income.

I would suggest that there are many serious problems that we are facing in this whole cut-back. It is an inhuman approach. It is an unfair approach. The changes that the Minister of Finance brought in with his tax reform obscured the reality of what he was doing in terms of changing the whole system of paying for the old age security.

One of the things that I think bothers us over here is the whole global view. First of all, there will be people who will lose all or part of their old age security, not based on real income but based on a financial decision taken with a false premise because there is a grossed up amount in there which is totally unfair. The minister took away the first $1,000 worth of taxable income from investments. That is another attack. Now the minister takes away old age security cheques and wants to claw them back. I think that there is gall on the part of the Minister of Finance, and the people should rise up and complain steadily about what is going on.

The danger is that once you start tinkering with and undermining the principle of universality, you put everything into question. Who decides who gets what benefits? Where do you draw the line? Who decides which Canadians deserve more help than others? It is time for all Canadians to write to their Members of Parliament, particularly those on the government side, deposit those petitions, make them stand up, and make them talk to the issue that is of great concern to many Canadians. This debate, more than any other debate, has crystalized the difference of opinion over the future direction of Canada and people are not pleased.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I was holding back a little bit, hoping that some of my Conservative colleagues across the way who prefer to debate from their seats might stand up and provide some kind of defence for this program, but it seems that some Tory members feel that their only job in this House is to occupy a seat and when it comes time for a vote, to vote for whatever the government puts forward, rather than to express any kind of commitment, concern, or support for a particular program. Even if they are opposed to the program, they sit on their duffs, keep their mouths shut, and provide the 150 votes that are necessary for the government to ram it down the throats of the rest of Canadians. That is unfortunate.

When we are debating an issue like this, those who take some pleasure in sitting over there and shooting from their seats really have a right to do that, unless they show a little commitment to what the government is doing by standing up and providing some defence for a program. In this case the program is absolutely indefensible, especially given the promise that was quoted over and over again by my colleagues, the promise made by the Prime Minister. "Our position is simple and straightforward. We are in favour of universality of social programs and they shall not be touched". Somebody has not been telling the truth to somebody and these Conservatives on the other side should be standing up and making the confession.

This program is a direct attack on universality. It is not the only attack that has come from this government, unfortunately. Universal programs in this country have traditionally been supported by two pillars of federal policy. The one pillar is the progressive income tax system that makes sure that those who are favoured by this country, those who are favoured in terms of wealth and those who are favoured in terms of income, pay at least their share and then some, and are recognized for the amount of contributions they make and rewarded for these contributions. The progressive income tax system is an important pillar of the universality concept that we have used in this country for a long, long time.

The other pillar of the universal social programs are the programs themselves, the family allowance system and the Old Age Security system. This government has now begun to attack those two pillars of universality from both sides. First, they attacked from the side of the tax system. By reducing the effective tax rate on those who are earning the highest incomes in this country, they have made that tax system much less progressive.

Certain types of incomes which are only earned by the wealthy in this country, incomes such as dividends and capital gains that are skewed predominantly toward the wealthy and the high-income earner end of the tax scale are less heavily taxed than other types of income, for example, hourly salaries and the types of income that are earned by the poor and the middle-class. The rich and the high-income people in this country are being favoured by changes brought about in the tax system that have reduced its progressivity.

At the same time, this government has gone heavily into other areas of taxation that are the most regressive. For example, the one we are debating these days is the goods and services tax, which bears more harshly on the poor and lower-income people than it does on the wealthy who can afford to pay a high price for the things that they purchase and can afford to pay the tax, but unfortunately, poor people cannot. By extending the services and the goods that are taxed under consumer taxes, the poor pay heavily on everything they purchase, especially on the necessities that they use, whereas the wealthy tend to pay on luxuries which probably should be taxed at a higher rate. We have seen the Conservatives attack the fundamental pillars of social programs from both pillars, from the progressivity of the tax system and from the social programs themselves.

This is after the Prime Minister promised that the principle of universality would not be touched in this country, that it was a sacred trust. Like other sacred trusts, it has now gone by the board. It appears to me that the Prime Minister, even when he was saying this, knew that he had a policy to undermine those social programs, to undermine the progressivity of the tax system, and in fact to undermine the universality principle itself. He simply was not saying it to the public. He was saying the opposite, knowing it to be untrue and he was misleading the people of Canada at the point that he said that.

When I look at this bill what concerns me is not that the family allowances and old age pensions are going to be taxed back from the wealthy. In fact, I think that that is a good idea. That was the basis of universal social programs in the first place, in order to avoid those demeaning means-tested programs that we had in the past. For example, a whole system of means testing had to be gone through to get family allowances, or old age pensions. One of the ways of eliminating those means tests was to make the programs universal and then to tax them back through the progressive income tax program. By destroying the progressive income tax program, the Conservative government has now made that system virtually unworkable.

What the government is doing in this legislation is isolating old age pensions and family allowances as income which should be taxed specifically and separately from all other types of income. They are isolating that particular form of income to be taxed back on a different basis than other types of income. In the universal system, it is combined with all of the other types of income and taxed on the same basis.

I believe that at some point in the future, when those who are at the high end of the tax scale recognize that pension income and family allowance income is being taxed specifically and directly, they are going to be petitioning the government and saying that they do not want that kind of income at all. "Why not just provide those programs for the poor, because for us they are a nuisance because we have to deal with them on our tax forms". They will be speaking to the government and suggesting that we no longer pay old age pension and family allowance to those above a certain income level in this country. What will happen is that we will return to the means-tested program, that demeaning system where poor people are put through a whole series of questionnaires and analyses to find out if they are cheating on their declarations of income so that these programs will apply specifically to the poor.

That cannot be done. In a country like Canada these programs are extremely valuable even to high income families. I want to point out an example to you, Madam Speaker, of how the family allowance system is extremely important to women because the family allowance cheques are paid to women, even in relatively high-income families. I will use the example of a community that I used to serve when I was a provincial member of the legislature in British Columbia.

That community was a single-industry community, a forest industry town with a pull mill. In that community most of the men worked and most of the women stayed home and looked after their kids, or if the kids were in school, they simply stayed home, but not in all cases. Although the men made relatively high incomes in the pulp and paper industry and in the logging industry, did they bring that income home? In some cases, they would gamble it away on pay day or drink it up and the family would never see any of that income. In other cases, since the man decided that it was his income from his employment, he would parcel it out to his family and an inadequate amount of income was shared with the family. As a result, even though the male income earner was relatively well off, the rest of his family was relatively poorly off. In fact, it could be argued that they were below the poverty line.

I recall that some of the women in the community, the wives in the community came to me as a provincial member of the legislature seeking money to set up a day care centre so that their children could be looked after and so that they could go out and seek employment. I told them that because they had such a high family income they did not qualify for the day care supplements that were provided by the provincial government or for the capital grants that the provincial government at that time provided.

They told me in no uncertain terms that while their family income was high, they as spouses, as women, were poor and that the only income on which they could rely was the family allowance cheque that they got once a month, a cheque that was addressed to the women themselves, but was inadequate really to provide a decent standard of living for the family apart from what the men were earning in the pulp and paper or in the forest industry.

My argument is that we should be raising family incomes in this country, raising family allowance income in this country, raising old age pensions and then increasing the tax on the wealthiest people so that the amount of increase can be paid for directly from income tax. There should be a balancing not only between rich and poor but also within families so that the women in that family have the same amount of income as the breadwinner. There should be a distribution of income in the family as well as between the rich and the poor people in our society.

What this legislation does is precisely the opposite. It focuses on a type of income. It makes that income liable to a different kind of tax than the way the rest of the income is taxed. It is going to create pressure in this country, especially from higher income earners, to do away with this universal system of pensions and family allowances altogether.

It is bad legislation. It violates the promise that the Prime Minister made when he said that he would not touch universal programs, that universal programs were a sacred trust. It is a subtle—and as the chairman of the finance committee said—a sneaky way of getting around that promise and actually destroying universal social programs by this system that we see in this legislation. It is dirty, it is underhanded, and if the members on the other side had an ounce of conviction, if the members on the other side supported and believed and campaigned on the basis of the promise that the Prime Minister made back in 1984, they would be on their feet in this House, in caucus, and in cabinet demanding that the Prime Miniter live up to his promise and that he withdraw this legislation and respect his promise to maintain the universality of social programs rather than bringing in sneaky, underhanded legislation such as this which is designed to destroy the universality of those social programs, but in a very underhanded way.

We have seen countless studies and countless statistics showing that since the Tories took office in 1984 the rich have actually been excused from paying taxes in this country. They have paid less since the Tories came into office, and the poor have been frozen, ghettoized in poor income levels. The middle-income people and the people who pay income taxes based on salaries and hourly rates of earnings have seen a tremendous growth in the amount of tax they have to pay. The rich are getting away with murder as a result of Tory policy, the poor are frozen in a ghetto of poverty as a result of inadequate Tory policies, and the people who are at the lower end of the income scale and the middle income scale end up paying a heck of a lot more as a result of the Tory policy which supports the rich and ghettoizes the poor and leaves the rest of us paying far more than we should.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being five o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Access to Information Act to ensure that all Canadians have right of access to all environmental information gathered or held by the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on an issue that I know is of pressing interest and concern to Canadians from coast to coast. This government, much like its Liberal predecessor, was proven to be among the most if not the most indifferent in the western world when it comes to allowing the public access to information regarding environmental matters.

I believe Motion M-104 is very straightforward. It simply requests the following of the House:

> That, in the opinion of the House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Access to Information Act to ensure that all Canadians have right of access to all environmental information gathered or held by the government.

Over the last 10 years or so I have had the opportunity, in fact the duty, to attempt to get all kinds of information from the Government of Canada and from time to time from the provincial and territorial governments.

I am saddened to say that the Government of Canada is the least likely to release information that is of public interest. Quite often there are excuses. The government says that it can't release certain information because it is commercially confidential or because a particular group of individuals in Toronto, Montreal, Yellowknife, or Queen Charlotte City might not understand what the information really means and would not be able to do anything useful with it.

As I have learned in the years that I have had a particular personal and political interest in environmental matters, the public out there is much more knowledgeable than most members who sit on the floor of the House of Commons. It is much more capable of and much more likely to read the information made available and, if necessary, to go to the experts, whether it is in forestry, in water quality, in atmospheric matters, or in terms of toxic or hazardous wastes. It is much more likely to dig into it and try to find practical and pragmatic solutions, something the government does not give the Canadian public much of an opportunity to do.

More and more we find not only here in Canada but around the world people who talk about thinking globally and acting locally. The fact of the matter is that one cannot act locally. A local farm family cannot in fact approach a lot of the difficult issues it might face in terms of soil erosion, flooding, or various problems with insects, disease or whatever unless it has information to work with.

One thing this chamber must do is respond democratically in terms of allowing the public to access the information that we as the Canadian public have collectively paid for.

Let me give examples of why it is so important that this information be made available. Let us take a look at what many scientists are now describing as the last green gold rush in relation to the massive proposed investments particularly by international firms that come to Canada to turn our forests into pulp to be sent off for various paper related purposes around the world.

In B.C., for example, one of the pet projects of the minister of forests, Mr. Parker, who has just recently been dumped, was trying to give away one-seventh of British Columbia to a firm from New Zealand known as Fletcher Challenge so that it could come in and pulp one-seventh of British Columbia. There were no attachments to a forest licence requiring recycling. There were no qualifications attached to it in replanting, no priority requirements in relation to wildlife or the replanting of certain areas within a certain time frame for certain of the natural ecosystems that were disrupted; nothing like that.

A third of the province of Alberta, with almost not a peep from the federal government, is in the process of being turned over to a consortia primarily from Japan that wants to cut down almost a third of the province of Alberta over the next 20 years and turn it into pulp to be shipped to various areas of the world.

One fifth of Manitoba has been turned into the hands of one company, simply to have it pulped away. Half the province of New Brunswick, a few years ago, was handed over to four large firms. That is just a smattering of examples from across Canada.

What is being done? I know Environment Canada has all kinds of information on the cumulative impact of these kinds of harvesting proposals in terms of the negative impact of these pulp projects on the Athabasca and the Peace rivers in Alberta and, as we already know, on the water systems of British Columbia.

We know that 40 per cent of marine pollution in Canada comes from pulp mills. Environment Canada has a library filled with information on the direct, cumulative and bio-cumulative impact, and in terms of bio-magnification, on water systems from furans, from dioxins, and from organo-chlorines.

We have heard long tales from the Minister of the Environment, all well meaning I am sure but not backed up by any kind of real political action. We hear the minister saying that he is concerned and that new regulations and so on will be brought in.

We know that there is a proposal to clear cut one-seventh of British Columbia for one pulp mill, one-third of Alberta for six pulp mills, one-fifth of Manitoba for one pulp mill, and one-half of the province of New Brunswick for four other pulp mills. No cumulative impact has been done in any of those provinces, either in terms of the impact on the atmosphere, the impact on the forest ecosystems, or the impact on the water systems.

What is going on? This is the latter part of the 20th century and we have a government that either does not give a damn or is acting as a front for certain corporate interests so that the public is not really told the impact of some of these projects.

This brings me to what I think is really the key point in terms of this debate. It is that the Government of Canada is intentionally withholding vital information that the public should be given.

Let us take a look at another area. I will come back to the forest sector in a moment. We know that today 50,000 tonnes of hazardous waste were produced in Canada. We know from debates that have taken place in the House that about 80 per cent of the toxic and hazardous waste produced on a daily basis in Canada is not properly disposed of.

For example, it is dumped. As we hear from the Ontario Minister of the Environment, "The industrial polluters along the St. Clair River suffer from industrial incontinence". In the last couple of months there have been 35 major potentially life endangering and certainly life threatening spills in the St. Clair.

Some papers shuffle hands. The people say they deplore this. The fact of the matter is that the federal and provincial regulations and their likelihood of enforcement are so weak and so slow that industry in Ontario and industry in most of Canada have decided that it is in their interest to pollute. It is the cheapest way of doing business. Rather than having proper disposal methods with closed circuit technologies so that waste does not escape into the air, on to the land or into the water, they have decided it is just a cost of doing business.

Let us look at my home province. A study done by Dr. Rankin who teaches law at the University of Victoria took a look at the environmental permits structure in the province of British Columbia. He found, last year, that 63 per cent of the Class 1 permits were in significant non-compliance for more than a year.

Let me tell you what that means because it is quite a mouthful. It means that two-thirds of the permits given to municipalities or to industry which are dumping waste into rivers or into lakes or into the ocean were not in compliance. They were not living up to the absolute minimum terms of their permit. Some 76 per cent of the Class 3 permits were in significant non-compliance for more than a year. That is for land fills, dumping on to land, dumping into the atmosphere.

A considerable number of permits that Dr. Rankin examined had never been in compliance, never. It was only because Dr. Rankin knew how to access this information and to get it out that it ever became public. It was not released by the government. It is only where you have people who are persuasive, dedicated and persistent that they can dig a little information out and find out what is really going on.

Public trust in my view is breached and violated constantly in this country due to the political control of most governments right now by powerful private sector interests, whether it is in the nuclear sector, the mining sector, the forest sector, or in terms of hazardous and toxic wastes.

What of PCBs? What of the St. Basile le Grand fire and all the concern not only in the province of Quebec but right across the country about what happens to PCBs when they are burned and about the long-term problems that are known.

• (1710)

I was shocked during that period of time when there was debate in this House and a member on the government side got up and said that all this stuff about PCBs is all blown out of proportion. The fact of the matter is that if one takes the time to speak to professionals in the field of medicine, people who are interested in the impact of long-term low-level exposures of all forms of life to PCBs, one finds that there are in fact intractable, dangerous problems that come from associations with PCBs.

For Mr. Klein, the Minister of the Environment in Alberta, to say it is okay to drink PCBs and for members on the government side to suggest you could go and wash your hands in PCBs is in my view a repugnantly, intellectually and medically dishonest approach to a serious chronic problem that we have not only in Canada but around the world right now.

We have to start thinking globally and acting locally. That is the way to start seriously addressing problems that may well bring about the end of life with a whimper. It will not be with a big bang; it will be a whimper.

Many of these global problems are starting to have what is called bio-feedback. They are starting to respond to other symptoms of the degeneration of our ecological systems. A lot of Canadians who know it is starting to happen. It is a visceral feeling. They look at a government that seems to be more interested in things that while important do not deserve the degree of intellectual, emotional and political time spent on them in this chamber.

Why can we not have access to information? Why should I have to spend what I do on some of the files I have been working on more than two years to try and get a little teeny bit of environmental information out of the minister, the department and other departments? I am persistent. I have staff that can help me. There are very few Canadians who can possibly even consider that.

My colleague from Vancouver Island was speaking a moment ago about the nature, the structure of what is happening in Canada. I think there we can find part of the symptoms and perhaps part of the reason the access to information in this country is so difficult to get. It is because those who control it are so powerful.

Over 50 per cent of the wealth in Canada is now controlled by less than 10 per cent of the population. Some 70 per cent of the wealth is controlled by the top 20 per cent, and the bottom 20 per cent of income earners in Canada control no wealth at all. They owe. They are in debt. They are the ones who often, if not always, face the significant, negative environmental impacts of many of the things going on around us that can be controlled and in fact can be of great economic and direct environmental benefit.

Here is a study that this government of Canada refuses to release. Of course, as you would expect, I am going to release some of the contents of it right now. It was done for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. It was done in relation to the greenhouse effect and the actual cost benefits of reducing the amount of CO2 and greenhouse gases released into the atmosphere in Canada.

On page 1 it points out:

> The World Resources Institute estimates the man-made contributions to the greenhouse effect to be as follows: carbon dioxide, 49 per cent; methane, 18 per cent; chlorofluorocarbons, 14 per cent; nitrous oxide, 6 per cent; and other gases, 13 per cent.

This group, working for the Government of Canada, paid by the Government of Canada, but never of course a report to be released to Canadians who might be interested, goes on to say about the costs of carbon dioxide emission reductions:

> Most of the measures that reduce emissions of carbon dioxide also save energy. In many of these cases, the value of the energy saved over the life of the measure exceeds the initial investment required. As a result, the net cost of most of the measures is negative; that is they produce a net benefit. Most of the measures selected reduce carbon dioxide emissions, save energy and save money.

That sounds like a winner to me. Let me repeat so government members can hear of a document that their minister of energy is sitting on. Most of the measures selected reduce carbon dioxide emissions, save energy and save money. That sounds like a pretty good idea.

The total cost associated with the carbon dioxide emission reduction measures in each penetration scenario is as follows: market penetration, minus 42 billion; measures economically attractive to society, negative 150 billion; technical potential, negative 99 billion. I am not talking millions. I am talking billions that this government over here could save. It got the report but it does not want to do it. I will come to why it does not want this information out and why it also does not want to do it. I am quoting:

> Implementing the measures economically attractive to society yields a net benefit of $150 billion on the basis of energy savings alone. The technical potential scenario achieves larger carbon dioxide emission reductions by including some measures that are not economically attractive to society. As a result the total net benefits, at $99 billion, are somewhat smaller than under MEAS. However, it is important to recognize that the technical potential scenario still yields a significant net benefit to society.

> These economic benefits cannot be achieved without significant investment. The incremental capital investments required are estimated as follows: $23 billion for market penetration; $74 billion for measures that are economically attractive to society; and for technical potential, $128 billion.

You might ask, Madam Speaker, what are the benefits of making this investment. Saving Canadians $150 billion probably is not a bad idea on its own. What about the other great benefit? We heard the Minister of the Environment, and we have heard the Prime Minister saying they are going to do all these great things about global warming. Even from the most recent conferences the government has not even been able to adopt the suggestion that Canada reduce the amount of CO2 we are producing by 20 per cent by the year 2005. Yet it can do more than that and save Canadians $150 billion.

If I were a government member I might say: "Why is the minister of energy withholding this report from me as a government member if it is going to save Canadians $150 billion? We are slashing unemployment insurance. We are clawing back pension and family allowance. We are gouging middle and low-income taxpayers. We are kicking the crap out of this province and that province. What is going on?" Well, try and get a government member to talk seriously about hydrogen technology. They say: "Hydrogen, you cannot drive a car on hydrogen". Of course you can. If you have a beaker of water, you have got energy to drive a car. And government members say: "Good grief, this is not possible".

We have allowed a very select group, not just in Canada but around the world, to get a stranglehold on a lot of people. Whether it is for industrial or residential fuel consumption or for motor vehicles or for aircraft, there are alternate fuels, hydrogen being the prime one.

Why are we not moving on hydrogen? It does not create carbon dioxide. It is not going to add to the greenhouse effect. It is not polluting. The only thing that comes out of the tail pipe of your car is water and oxygen. I have people in my constituency who have already converted their vehicles and now they have all kinds of heat and pressure from the provincial government saying: "You are not taxes". There are intelligent approaches to be made.

The plea that I make to this chamber is that we start to use even a small fraction of the native intelligence that each of us was endowed with and the capacity to read. Why is a report that would save Canada $150 billion being hidden in the safe in the minister of energy's office? Why will he not tell the Prime Minister? Why does he not come in here and say: "Look, I can save $150 billion. I can reduce the carbon dioxide being released into the atmosphere." We can do something serious. There are entire countries that are going to disappear between the oceans within the lifetime of many of the people sitting in this chamber if we do not do something about the greenhouse effect.

In conclusion, I could go on, as you could imagine, Madam Speaker, at some length about the benefits and the reasons why, not only members of Parliament but Canadians generally have a right to access environmental information that is vital to them in their community, to them and their family, to us as a global species and to the other species on the planet. We have paid for it as Canadians. We deserve access to that information, and I would hope that all members would support such a proposal.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that the government and, I am sure, all members of Parliament understand the importance of providing the public with the type of information which it needs in order to become informed and to build upon the concern which is already there with respect to manners in which we can collectively work together to improve the health of our environment.

Even a passing interest in public affairs and environmental issues would cause any observer in these last few months to understand and to appreciate the fact that there is a growing awareness of the importance of the environment. In a very real sense there is a thirst for knowledge and how we as individuals can lead toward that healthy environment.

I use as an example a letter I received from a constituent that really struck home. This constituent living in one of the smaller communities within Brandon—Souris wrote to say that she was heating her house with fuel oil. She wondered if in so doing she was contributing in any significant way to the degradation of the environment. I was pleased to use that particular example to go to the department to ask for the type of information she obviously wished to have in order for her to determine whether or not she was doing her part to assist in the development of a healthy environment.

This is but one example of the importance of providing information to Canadians wherever they may live in such a way that it is comprehensible to them and that it meets their everyday need for knowledge.

I think it is also important that the information be as comprehensible and readily available as possible, because I sense there is a tremendous danger as well that sometimes a little information or information improperly understood can contribute to misinformation and sometimes unnecessary fears.

The whole area of the threat to the environment is so scientific in nature that many Canadians are having difficulty grappling with the information before them. I would hope and believe that the government is beginning to provide its information in such a way that it is, cohesive in nature and leads to the kind of better understanding which will permit Canadians as individuals to lead a healthier and more environmentally pleasing lifestyle, as well as enable them as individuals to play a role in policy making. There is no question that virtually everyone who is a part of public life in Canada today would concede the fact that the public in many instances is leading and government is at best responding. As a member of government, I would readily concede that. I must say to my hon. friend who has just spoken that I very much respect his knowledge of the environment. I readily recognize that his commitment to the issues has made him a leader in this House and throughout the nation. I would say, however, in defence of this government that I do believe it has done more than he has given it credit for in terms of trying to provide the kind of information the public is seeking. I refer specifically to the hearings which are taking place in Alberta with respect to proposed pulp mills there because the hon. member made reference to it.

I think most people who have followed those hearings would concede that the information provided by those who have spoken on behalf of the federal government has been information in depth. It has been information that has made a valuable contribution, although one cannot judge that process until it is completed.

I would say in passing that I think many people were surprised by the breadth of evidence made available to that hearing by the spokesmen on behalf of the Government of Canada. I would not like members of this House or the listening public in any way to fail to appreciate the extent of the knowledge being provided in the hearings and as part of the environmental assessment review process.

We have been doing one thing which I think is worth noting, that is, the development of a state of the environment reporting system. This system, as you know, is given legal recognition in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act under section 2 which states: "The government of Canada shall provide information to the people of Canada on the state of the Canadian environment."

As part of that process there has been created a public advisory committee to determine the type of information needed as part of state of the environment reporting and to ensure that the information provided is accurate, up to date, and meets the needs of Canadians wherever they may be. This committee consists of individuals from environmental groups, consumer organizations, industry and the academic community, all of which have a direct interest in the state of the environment and all of which recognize the importance of the dissemination of accurate and up to date information.

The government has made a very deliberate and, I think most members would agree, positive step to involve the community at large in the issues which are ours. The environmental issue is not something which is in any way unique to this House. In fact, one would be less than honest if one were to try and pretend for a moment that the House has led in the development of environmental issues throughout Canada because I do not think it has. I think it is following. I think it is providing equal leadership on occasion, but it has not in the strictest sense of the word led.

This government is trying to involve the public in ensuring that our knowledge is as complete as it can be and the information which we are providing is as comprehensive as it can be. One of the ways we are doing that is by involving as many people from all sectors of the community as we can.

In 1986 the first national state of the environment report was published. Following the example of other governments and other countries, a 260-page publication was issued examining conditions, trends and our renewable resource systems. It looked at the effects of our human activity on our ecosystems and discussed the responses of institutions and organizations to environmental change. We are now working on that second national report which is scheduled to be published in 1991.

In addition, the state of environment fact sheet series is made available. It is designed to stimulate interest in environmental concerns among the media, non-governmental groups, high school students, libraries and the interested public.

If I may say so in passing, I think one of the most encouraging things I have noticed these last few months is a very evident interest among young people in environmental issues and also their willingness to do the type of research they must do in order to be well informed. I think the state of the environment fact sheet series contributes to that. Also young people in the province of Ontario, by way of their own leadership, have contributed to changing practices in requiring fast food restaurants to provide the product to them in a more environmentally satisfying manner than had been the case before.

Young people, as a result of the kind of information which they have been accumulating, some of which has been provided by this government, some by other governments, and some by their own research, are now playing a positive role in the sense that they are going into the industry, exercising their power as consumers and demanding that product be provided to them in a way which is environmentally sound. At first their efforts to ensure that hamburger packages did not contain CFCs were scoffed at and management paid little attention to them. More recently I have noticed, however, that they have succeeded and now the products they wish to buy are being packaged in such a way that it is much more satisfying to them and much more environmentally safe than would otherwise be the case.

In addition to the fact sheet series which I mentioned before, there is the state of the environment report series which will feature insights into a wide variety of environmental issues of national and regional significance. These reports will be aimed at universities, resource managers and interest groups as well as at individuals who want information in depth. Some of these reports currently under way deal with endangered species, peoples and parks, air quality, ground water, prairie water resources and impacts of global change.

In addition there is also the state of the environment reporting newsletter which we have made available three times a year. We are trying to build up a data base within Statistics Canada that will provide Canadians with quick access to a wide range of environmental information. Preliminary efforts have been made to develop key indicators of the state of the environment comparable to traditional economic indicators such as the Consumer Price Index. The availability of all this data will ensure that the public will have a greater access to information in the future than it had two, three or four years ago.

I think that all of us will benefit from that because a well informed public is certainly the most important step in ensuring the legislation and practices in this country and in other countries throughout the world are what they might be.

For too long, economic development has occurred at the expense of the natural and cultural environment. That, of course, was recognized and dramatized by the report associated with former Prime Minister Brundtland and those who worked with her. One of the results of that, of course, is a growing interest in the words "sustainable development". It may well be that many Canadians as yet could not define the term "sustainable development", and if they were to attempt to, they probably would not agree on what that definition should be.

I think what has developed is a realization that Canadians, by acting together in as well informed a manner as possible and by ensuring that their governments act on their behalf as well that we can indeed ensure that economic development in the future will occur in such a way that it will not be at the expense of future generations as has occurred in the past. Unfortunately, in the past, we made decisions based almost entirely on economic considerations alone and later we asked what the environmental consequences of those decisions would be.

I think as a result of the information which is now being made available by government and others to the public, we will ensure that in the future, consideration of the economic implications of a decision will be a forethought rather than an afterthought.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that if the parliamentary secretary had read the commitments to open government made by his leader in the 1984 election and had been consistent with that pledge, he would also have had something positive to say in support of the motion of the member for Skeena and would have indicated his government's intention to let this motion pass. The Parliamentary Secretary refrained from saying that, however, ignoring the commitment of his own party to a more open government which was one of the basic pledges made in the summer of 1984.

Worse than that, the parliamentary secretary decided to develop a reply on the subject of transfer of general information and interpreted the motion of the member from Skeena as meaning that all he wants is to provide fact sheets, state of the environment reports and that kind of general information which we all know has been made available to the public but really contain very little hard data.

The member for Skeena talks with his motion about ensuring that all Canadians have right of access to all environmental information. He means the hard facts and the hard studies and the interesting stuff which does not see the light of day, if I understand his motion correctly. Of course there is merit in what he is proposing. The public ought to know about the hard econometric studies as to what are the options and policies when you make a decision affecting the economy, energy and other aspects that have an impact on the environment.

It would be a question, therefore, of making available to the public studies made on the cost of inaction on environmental matters or studies that I am sure are being made by the Department of the Environment on the evaluation of water quality in the Great Lakes about which we would like to know. What is the pattern and what do scientists in the employ of government say these days on this subject matter which is, however, not disclosed to the public on a matter that is basically one of public health.

The member would like, I am sure, to see studies made on energy options and the real cost of these energy options and he made a reference in his intervention to that particular report which we would all dearly love to read. I am sure the public would like to know more.

Since I see the Minister of Labour in the House tonight, I will say that the public would like to know what studies are being conducted on the subject of ergonomics, on the subject of health at work, on the use of video screens and how that impacts on the health of workers. In other words, this is what is meant by greater access to information on the part of Canadians as to what are the workings of the various facets of government.

In that respect the parliamentary secretary has disappointed us. He has made a speech on the subject of public relations, of governments communicating to the public news, data or propaganda which are not necessarily the hard and difficult substance of studies that are probably being conducted by the government on a regular basis.

We come down to this basic issue of sharing of information which is a question of the sharing of power. When you have an imbalance in the knowledge of what is stored and accumulated by a unit called a department or by a larger corporation called a state and the public does not have access to that information, you have a considerable imbalance of power in that respect and therefore an inability to assess the gravity of a situation or an inability to decide which route to take when options are available.

I wish the parliamentary secretary had in his intervention given us some of his thoughts, for instance, on the Rafferty–Alameda Dam and how that was handled in terms of public information. Why were the basic facts not put out despite the pressures that developed? Why, for instance, was there not a public consultation process launched when it came to the so–called environmental study with relation to VIA Rail? All of a sudden, we saw a study that came out of the blue, without any public involvement, without any sharing of information beforehand with the public. It was a conclusion made by a department in isolation from the public affected. It was described as "an environmental study".

Why is there no sharing of information on the proposed and several times announced Winnipeg Centre on Sustainable Development? The parliamentary secretary filled the time out toward the end, because evidently he was running out of steam. Why is there not access to information as to what has been going on since June, 1988 when the Prime Minister at the United Nations General Assembly announced the opening of the Winnipeg Centre on Sustainable Development? We know nothing about it. We do not know the substance of intergovernmental negotiations. We do not know anything about where the matter stands at the present time.

We know that the Minister of the Environment went to the United Nations in September and once again made an announcement. Actually, that announcement has been made several times and probably will be made many more times. Each time it will sound as if it is a great revelation, a great step forward by the so-called Progressive Conservative government. Here you have an example of how you could practise the open government promised in 1984. The report to which the member from Skeena referred is a very good example.

I will conclude, because my time is running out, by bringing out another example of not practicing what is being preached. Why did the government preclude the publication of Storm Warning in 1985? It was a brochure produced by Environment Canada dealing with the impact of transboundary movement of air pollutants as they affect the food chain which was suspended from publication for one year by the Minister of the Environment of the day. There was such an uproar on the part of the public that the government subsequently had to publish it. What kind of a record is that, Madam Speaker? These are probably the basic issues that the parliamentary secretary would have wanted to explain to us when it comes to access to public information.

Because of lack of time, I cannot go into the sham of the Rafferty-Alameda approval process, where the minister himself did not follow the requirements of his own regulations and he knew it. He denied it many times in the House, but he knew that he was not following the requirements.

Time does not permit me to go into the so-called environmental impact assessment on the VIA Rail decision which falls under the very same rules and regulations which this government proclaims that it is respecting. So, because of the time element, it is impossible now to go in depth into the subject, except to say that if this government intended in 1984 to practise open government—

Mr. McDermid: Time!

Mr. Caccia: And I know the minister is crying "time" because it disturbs his hearing system and his political conscience. He does not like to be reminded of these elements, but for a government that promised on the hustings to be the defender of open government and to inform the public of what goes on really has very little to be proud of and very little to write home about. The minister of so-called public works over there has to learn a lot on the subject of making information available to the public as well. I hope that on another occasion, the parliamentary secretary will be more forthcoming on these outstanding issues.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to a very important subject, namely, the public's right of access to all information on environmental matters. Madam Speaker, we cannot expect opposition members to consider the fact that things have been changing for a number of years and that this kind of information is becoming increasingly available. There were many references in the course of this debate to the situation in western Canada. I am more familiar with what is happening in eastern Canada and especially in Quebec, where the Government of Quebec is to be commended for environmental legislation that is among the strictest and most effective in this country. For instance, Madam Speaker, as a private citizen, I asked the Government of Quebec a few weeks ago to give me some vital information about mine tailings which are a major source of pollution in my region, and I did so following announcements made by the Minister of the Environment in Charlottetown, together with his colleagues, the provincial environment ministers, when it was decided to earmark $200 million for decontamination of abandoned sites in this country. I asked for a list of these sites, which happen to be mine tailings, and a week later, I was given all the information on these sites which are a health and environmental hazard for my region. This is one example to show that when we ask for information about subjects that concern us, that information is available.

Madam Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to show that the situation has improved in the past few years, and that as far as the environment is concerned, the federal government is making more and more information available to Canadians.

The government is so aware of these issues that it now has a vast range of programs, provinding the public with access to up-to-date information on climatic change, water quality, land, forests and other natural resources in this country. The most recent and most exhaustive program is the system of reports on the status of the environment included in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act we passed in 1987, and I quote: "The federal government shall provide information to the people of Canada on the state of the Canadian environment".

Reports on the state of the environment are an excellent way of identifying problems and setting priorities, because after all, actions speak louder than words when the delicate balance of our planet is threatened.

Following the example of countries like the United States, Australia, France, Sweden and Japan, Canada in 1986 published its first national report on the state of the environment, a document of some 270 pages that looked at our use of renewable resources and our policies in this area, the impact of human activity on our ecosystems and the way our institutions and organizations respond to environmental changes. The second edition, which is to appear in 1991, will include information provided by federal agencies, the provinces and territories, and industrial, academic and non-governmental groups. I am convinced that from such a diverse report will come a complete and accurate description of the state of the environment in Canada, in a form that is easily accessible to the public.

In order to add to knowledge on the state of the environment, the federal environment minister has begun to publish a series of information leaflets dealing with important environmental issues and trends and their impact on the natural world, economic opportunities, health and quality of life. These leaflets are intended to make the media, non-governmental organizations, high schools, libraries and the public more aware of environmental concerns.

This series of leaflets was launched last year with the publication of The Urbanization of Rural Canada, 1981-86, which dealt with the loss of agricultural and other resource-rich land as it was converted to urban use. This publication of the Canadian Wildlife Service reports on the urbanization of rural land in 70 regions of Canada. Coming leaflets will deal with the contamination of sea birds and the pollution of the marine environment in British Columbia, among other subjects.

The department also intends to better inform the public by publishing complementary reports on the state of the environment which will shed light on a host of national or regional environmental issues. These reports will be for universities, resource managers and interest groups, as well as anyone who wants detailed information on specific subjects. Reports are now being prepared, in particular, on endangered species, the public, parks, air quality, ground water, water resources in the Prairies and the impact of change on a global scale.

Madam Speaker, we also want to encourage exchanges of information between governments, individuals and non-governmental organizations interested in approaches, methods and publications in connection with reports on the state of the environment; to this end, we will publish a state of the environment bulletin three times a year. At Statistics Canada we are also setting up a data bank which will give everyone instant access to a wide range of environmental information. Preliminary efforts have been made to define key environmental indicators similar to economic indicators such as the consumer price index. This source of information will prove invaluable useful to Canadians who want to know how to improve the environment.

Now more than ever, Madam Speaker, Canadians are deeply concerned about environmental problems. They have also expressed their willingness to share responsibilities for their future on this planet. That is why, if we hope to preserve and improve global environment, Environment Canada must let people know about environmental changes and their consequences. For too long now economic development has been pursued at the expense of the natural and cultural environment. The World Commission on Environment and Development, chaired by Mrs. Gro Brundtland, called for a reversal of this tendency in favor of sustainable development. Every Canadian will have a key role to play in the achievement of this objective.

By giving people the means of information they need to shape their destiny, we believe they will be in a better position to exert an influence on the health of the environment. Environmental reports give us a better perspective on ourselves and our habitat. They are the foundation of sound resource planning and management. We hope that the people will put this information to good use. The success of environmental reports depends on everyone taking part in the protection of our environment.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's concern for the well-being of our environment is shared by millions of Canadians. I am sure that he would agree that the protection of our natural resources is a serious responsibility and one that requires the legislative power to prosecute polluters as well as to protect the rights of individuals who have provided Environment Canada with confidential information for the good of the country.

Without legislation governing the disclosure of information to the public, our ability to protect every Canadian's right to a healthy environment would be seriously impeded. Under existing legislation, exemptions from disclosure relating to environmental issues, as well as other information within the federal government, are specified in the Access to Information Act.

If I may quote from Section 20(1) of the Act:

> The head of a government institution shall refuse to disclose any record requested under this Act that contains:
> (a) trade secrets of a third party; (b) financial, commercial, scientific or technical information that is confidential information supplied to a government institution by a third party and is treated consistently in a confidential manner by the third party; (c) information the disclosure of which could reasonably be expected to result in material financial loss or gain to, or could reasonably be expected to result in material financial loss or gain to, or could reasonably be expected to prejudice the competitive position of a third party; or (d) information the disclosure of which could reasonably be expected to interfere with contractual or other negotiations of a third party.

To summarize, these exemptions are generally designed to protect information that has been submitted to the government on a confidential basis. Environment Canada receives much information through confidential consultations and negotiations with provinces as well as with other countries. The total release of this information would seriously damage the department's ability to carry on these relationships and would hamper our negotiating position.

It should also be noted that the department and the Conservation and Protection Service, in particular, gathers information in the course of investigations that may lead to prosecutions against polluters. If this information were to be released without agreement by the third party involved, as specified in the Access to Information Act, it could well compromise the success of any subsequent investigation.

As well, the consequences of releasing trade secrets and other confidential business information under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act should be self-evident. Sources could be reluctant to divulge important information for fear that public disclosure could prejudice their competitive position in the market or result in material financial loss.

There is already an extremely thorough public interest provision for disclosure in Section 20(6) of the Access to Information Act. It states:

> The head of a government institution may disclose any record requested under this Act, or any part thereof, that contains information described in paragraph (1) (b), (c) or (d) if that disclosure would be in the public interest as it relates to public health, public safety or protection of the environment and, if the public interest in disclosure clearly outweighs in importance any financial loss or gain to, prejudice to the competitive position of or interference with contractual or other negotiations of a third party.

In addition, other legislation, particularly the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, CEPA, has provisions dealing with access to environmental information, including the possibility of public interest disclosure. CEPA limits the type of information that can be considered confidential and allows for a number of circumstances in which information may be disclosed.

Section 20(2) of CEPA specifies the wide range of types of information that may be disclosed. These include information on a substance's use, its safe handling, its disposal and elimination, safety measures to be taken in case of accidents involving a substance, certain physical and chemical data on a substance, a substance's effect on health, safety and the ecology and the methods and results of product or environmental tests done on a substance by or for a government institution.

Section 20(4) of CEPA indicates various circumstances in which information may be disclosed, namely:

> (a) with the written consent of the person who provided it or on whose behalf it was provided; (b) as may be necessary for the purposes of this Act; (c) under an agreement between the Government of Canada and the government of a province or of a foreign country, or between the Minister and any other Minister of the Crown in right of Canada where (i) the purpose of the agreement is the administration or enforcement of any law, and (ii) the government of the province or foreign country or the other Minister undertakes to keep the information confidential; (d) to a physician or prescribed medical professional who requests the information for the purpose of making a medical diagnosis of, or rendering medical treatment to, a person in an emergency; or (e) in accordance with the Access to Information Act.

Further, Section 20(6) of CEPA specifies circumstances under which the Minister may disclose information on 24–hour notice. I will quote from this section:

> Notwithstanding subsection (3), the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, the Minister may disclose information—where (a) the disclosure is in the interest of public health, public safety or the protection of the environment; and (b) the public interest in the disclosure clearly outweighs the importance of any material financial loss or prejudice to the competitive position of the person who provided the information or on whose behalf it was provided.

Clearly, the implications of removing all restrictions on the access to information regarding the environment would not serve the interests of Canadians in situations where it could seriously hamper the government's abilities to protect the right to a healthy environment.

I ask the hon. member to consider seriously the negative implications that such a change would have on the government's ability to collect information that is vital to the protection of the environment.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, I am privileged to rise on this motion to give the perspective of the committee that looked into this whole question of access to information. I think my friend opposite will find my comments germane.

In the last Parliament, a special committee of this House looked into the whole question of access to information and reviewed witnesses, ministers and officials from across the country and had a unanimous report.

Mr. Fulton: It had a unanimous report, none of the recommendations of which were followed.

Mr. Thacker: I am not sure whether my friend wants to hear my comments or not.

In general, we found that with cabinet confidentiality, the memos that go between cabinet minister, the memo that goes from a senior deputy minister to a cabinet minister, of course have to be confidential. But in general, we formed the view that the more information that the ministers could get out to the public, the better it would be indeed for the minister, because often these problems are not simple. Simple problems are solved and are not before the ministers or the cabinet. The more options that people can see the minister considering, given the complications of the issues they are dealing with, in actual fact would see that the decisions that are often taken are in fact the best decisions and the wisest given the circumstances.

So I agree with my friend when he says that more information should be revealed because I think it would perform a very valuable role for our fellow citizens. They would then see that most often the decisions that cabinets make are, in fact, wise ones. I want to encourage my friend to keep this motion on the order paper and to keep bringing it up, because I think more members need to express themselves. We should express ourselves sensibly. Indeed, more information is being revealed today by the ministers of this cabinet than in previous Parliaments. I can say that from personal experience. So we are going in the right direction. As more ministers come in—

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I rise today on behalf of senior citizens in my riding to debate the legislation before the House.

Bill C-28 will, in effect, put an end to Canada's most respected and envied social programs. In fact, the Canadian Seniors Network described the measures in the April budget more precisely. In its summer newsletter One Voice this organization said, "History will remember the clawback as the end of universality, not for its drop in the deficit bucket."

Senior citizens in Kenora—Rainy River have never been more disillusioned than with this Conservative government. This is not the government's first attempt to destroy universal social programs. In 1985, the Conservative government tried to deindex old age pensions even after the Prime Minister had solemnly pledged during the 1984 election campaign that, "social programs were a sacred trust never to be tampered with."

Senior citizens in this country believed the Prime Minister in 1984 but they soon realized how wrong they had been. The government will say it listened to the voice of senior citizens in 1985 and withdrew the deindexing proposal. In reality, the government backed down in the face of a public outcry by seniors right across Canada.

The Prime Minister continued to assure senior citizens since the 1985 coup attempt on old age pensions that his government would preserve and protect social programs. During the 1988 general election the Prime Minister, standing on the stage with his own mother, repeated his pledge.

Senior citizens in Kenora—Rainy River no longer believe anything this government says. They know that as soon as one promise is made, another is broken. My constituents know that this Conservative government has a hidden agenda when it comes to universal programs. One of the government's own members admitted as much in an article which appeared in The Ottawa Citizen on September 23. The chairman of the House of Commons finance committee said that his government's real agenda was to do away with universal social programs.

The clawback provisions for old age security benefits and family allowances are a definite and real threat to Canada's social programs. There is widespread opposition to the clawback measure. The government says that everyone must help to reduce the deficit. Many respected Canadians and senior organizations say otherwise.

Allow me to quote from a few sources. Don MacGillivray said in The Ottawa Citizen September 14, "The policy pretends to continue universality but in fact cancels it."

Hugh Winsor of The Globe and Mail said on May 5, "If, as Mr. Mulroney subsequently admitted, tampering with the indexation was wrong in 1985, attempting the same thing with the threshold levels is wrong in 1989.

Leonard Shifrin said in an article published in The Ottawa Citizen on May 4 that the finance minister proceeded to undermine the universality of family allowances and old age pensions.

A report from the National Council of Welfare states, "A social program that delivers benefits to everyone and then collects them all back from some recipients is not universal."

The President of the Canadian Council of Retirees, Bill Corns, said in a Toronto Star interview on May 7, "This is the start of the end of universality and an introduction of a means test."

So there you have it. Everyone who looks at the clawback provisions believes that this government is putting an end to universal social programs. If the clawback provision goes through, what is there to stop this government from attacking other universal programs? We have already seen changes to the unemployment insurance system which threatens universality. What's next? Medicare? Canada Pension? Who knows?

Within 10 years close to one million Canadian families who currently receive family allowances or old age security pensions will begin to lose their benefits due to the partial indexing of the 50 per cent threshold. It is estimated that by the year 2000 the threshold will fall to the equivalent of $35,000 in today's dollars. By the time the baby boom generation reaches retirement most will have to repay their benefits under the clawback provision.

Furthermore, once Canadians accept the principle of the clawback provision as part of our system, there is nothing to stop the government from setting the threshold as it sees fit.

Canadians do not support the clawback provision and they will never accept it. Canadians are prepared to share the burden of deficit reduction. However, they are not prepared to carry the burden alone.

My constituents want to see responsible government spending. They do not tolerate the millions of dollars spent to promote the goods and services tax. My constituents believe, as I do, that universal social programs are a right of citizenship. As the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition stated to this House on October 11, it is part of the social contract in return for a lifetime of contribution to our community.

Reducing the deficit on the backs of senior citizens is unfair and it is downright criminal. I myself have a large seniors population in my riding, senior citizens make up 18 per cent of the population of Kenora—Rainy River. I have been inundated with calls and letters opposing this measure. Senior citizens are telling me that they are living in fear for their future. They see their incomes reduced as a result of higher taxes. Not only is the government taking away what they have spent their lives working for, it is imposing a 9 per cent tax on goods and services. Senior citizens are having to live on a tighter budget because of reduced buying power.

Senior citizens in Kenora—Rainy River are worried that further erosion of their benefits and increased taxes will mean that the rest of their lives will be spent in poverty. Many of them remember the depression years and wonder if they will have to relive that time in 1989.

The clawback provision is also extremely discriminatory. It attacks one income families like no other measure. A family with two incomes, each earning less than $50,000 will not have to repay any family allowance benefits. However, a single income family with two children earning $56,000 a year will see its family allowance benefits clawed back. Where is the fairness in this? I think the clawback provision will have the most devastating effect on single parent families earning over $50,000 per year. That sounds like a lot of money but when you have children and are on your own, I do not think that is a whole lot of money in today's world. There are more expenses in a single parent family than in a two parent families.

I was speaking with a constituent of mine over the weekend who is a single parent with two children. One child is in grade two and the other child is a preschooler. My constituent has a net income of $54,000 per year. That sounds like a lot of money. Her job requires that she attend meetings in the evening and on occasion she must travel on weekends. My constituent pays for child care services during the day for her preschooler and babysitting fees in addition for her grade two child after school. On top of that she must pay additional babysitting fees in the evenings when she has meetings and on weekends when she must travel. She is faced with higher transportation costs as a result of driving her children around.

Given that she is a single parent, she must also take time off work when there are functions at the school or when her children are sick. The family allowance benefits she receives every month have helped her to defray some of these costs. They at least cover some of the gas expenses for her car. Why should she have her benefits clawed back? She is already paying taxes on the family allowance benefits she receives through the income tax system. My constituents looks at the clawback provision and she worries about her family's future.

She has worked extremely hard to provide her young children with a good family life. She is dedicated to providing her family with a secure future. Why should my constituent be discriminated against because she is a single parent? Why should she be penalized for working hard at providing her children with a financially secure environment?

The goods and services tax will further erode her income. She told me that the clawback of her family allowance benefits, combined with the goods and services tax and higher personal income taxes, will mean a net reduction of some 6 per cent in her income. She does not see these measures as a fair distribution of the burden, nor do we on this side of the House. These measures discriminate against seniors and against families.

The government must withdraw the clawback provisions of old age security benefits and family allowances. Our Canadian senior citizens and families must be treated equally and fairly. The universality of our social programs must be preserved as a sacred trust. I ask the members opposite to consider that before they put this very discriminatory legislation into law.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to participate in tonight's marathon session. I was assuming I was going to start nine minutes from now but my neighbour to the west surprised me.

I want to start by reflecting on events that led up to all of us being here. As I look at the clock I think back to what I was doing this time 365 days ago. I was in the final poll on election night working to pull out the voters to make sure their votes counted, getting them to the ballot box. I say that in terms of reflecting on why we are here tonight under the imposition of closure, why we are debating a piece of legislation that we believe fundamentally changes this country and the manner in which it is operated.

I want to take you back in time to March 7, 1984 when the then-to-be Prime Minister said, and this was recorded in a CP wire story, "Our position is simple and straightforward. We are in favour of universality of social programs and it shall not be touched."

Then after four years of majority government, on the election trail once again the Prime Minister, in Summerside, an interesting location in which to make pronouncement about the future, told senior citizens this:

> Let me say a special word to the senior citizens. In the future Canada will be doing more, not less, for all of you. As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished, by our government which is committed to social justice and fairness to Canadians.

Here we are a year to the date of the eve of the election. A year ago at eight o'clock the polls closed, returned the Conservatives with less of a majority, but a majority albeit. And what has happened to the promises? Tonight is a prime example. We are debating a bill that eliminates universality for our old age pensions and for our family allowances. How does it do that? It does it by clawing back those universal benefits at a certain threshold; in terms of the old age security at $50,000.

You may ask what is wrong with that. Two things. First of all, the whole point of universality is the minimization of the bureaucracy required to administer such a scheme. It means that every Canadian who reaches that magic age qualifies. It is much easier, much more efficient, and much more cost effective, dare I use that phrase, to have everybody on the list rather than establishing some sort of means test, whether it is tied into the income tax system or through specific applications or what have you. It is much more efficient in terms of the cost of delivering that service.

I do not have the figures with me, but I can give you the ranges of an answer to an order paper question provided to me by the Conservative government in, I believe, 1985 or 1986. I asked what was the cost of delivering those income support programs. I was amazed to find that the most efficient income support program, the cheapest per hundred dollars to get a hundred dollar cheque into the hands of a Canadian citizen, was old age security, including the income supplement. It was down around 32 cents per $100. Family allowance was not too far away from that. But then we get into the real heavy ones, the ones that this government likes to attack, such as unemployment insurance, with all of its checks and balances. It was up around $8 or $9 per $100 to deliver.

When I checked with the local welfare officials of the city of Thunder Bay, it was $13 per $100 to deliver that service. Workers Compensation in Ontario was around $18.

Just from the aspect of efficiency, let alone the humanity involved, it makes much more sense to have a universal program than one that is selective.

There is another reason, and that is why we pride ourselves as a nation on treating all of our people, as much as possible, in the same way. By providing every senior with the full benefit of his or her pension, or every family with the full benefit of the family allowance, we are making a statement to the world. We are saying that we care about our citizens. We as a society are prepared to assist those who have less than we do. That is extremely important. It is also important that we recognize the value of those programs. Yes, there are people, both seniors and families who "don't need the extra money".

Old age security and family allowance are already part of the income tax system. If you make more money, you pay more money back into the system, and that is only fair. So what is happening to seniors in this case, in terms of the clawback, is double taxation. The same thing for families. It is not as if they are getting a free ride. It is not as if they are getting the full benefit of the income support. They are paying their fair share based on their ability to pay. That is the way it should be.

Let us go back to the promises made by this government time and time again. Before the election, government members used words like "sacred trust" and "supportive universality", all those very nice phrases that brought warmth to the heart. They were all lies. There was clearly no intention whatsoever of fulfilling them. The Minister of Finance, a few days before the election a year ago, said that all our promises are spending commitments. We have money to pay for it. Lo and behold, all of a sudden we do not have any money to pay for then. We do not have money for VIA Rail. Where is the child care program that was promised for the day after they got re-elected? We will bring in a child care program, they said.

Well, it is a year and no child care program. That is the kind of government we have in power in Canada these days, a government that has no qualms whatsoever of saying one thing to people before the election and not only just not doing it after the election, but doing the opposite. The attack on universality, the attack on VIA Rail, the lack of child care policies, the attack on unemployment insurance, the attack on post-secondary education, where again the Prime Minister promised that we would do better than ever before. What do we find? We find cuts, reductions of transfer payments to the provinces that can least afford to lose the money.

Perhaps it is okay for me to be from Ontario and say, "We're okay. We can afford it." But in some of the prairie provinces, and specifically the Atlantic provinces, the only hope is the human resource and access to higher education so that they can go on to build a better life for all of us. But no, this government is cutting funding in that area as well.

That is not why the Conservatives were elected to govern this country. People believed them when they said they had enough money to live up to their commitments, that the deficit was no longer a problem, that they had it managed, it was under control. I have to wonder how it can be under control on the eve of November 20, 1988, and then two days later, after the dust settles, it is chaos, it is a major crisis, that we need to reconsider everything that we have committed ourselves to. They never did use the word "promise", maybe because people have a great suspicion about promises. Maybe they do not think that promises will be kept. But when the finance minister, supported by the Prime Minister, says that these are commitments, we have the money in the bank to pay for these, people say, "Maybe this time they are going to live up to it, maybe they really mean what they say".

We have seen over the last year that there was never any intention to live up to those commitments, that this government had a very specific agenda. As the current Minister for International Trade once said, "If we told you what we were going to do, you would never elect us, you would never vote for us". For all of his failings, the hon. minister is a very honest man. He tells it like it is. When we said, "Look what he is saying, you had better listen to him", people said, "Oh, no, no, no, he doesn't know what he is talking about." The government said, "No, he doesn't know what he is talking about. We are going to live up to our commitments".

The commitments have not been lived up to. The people of Canada have been sold out. They gave their vote to a particular party but were really robbed of it because they expected something in exchange. They certainly did not get what they expected. That is very unfortunate because that taints all of us.

In this House we are partisans. Whether it is between the Conservatives and the New Democrats or the New Democrats and the Liberals, we pick at each other because that is the nature of our parliamentary system. But those kind of lies fundamentally undermine the political parties and the system in this country because people will look at us and say, "Well, if we can't trust them how are we going to trust you folks? What makes you say that you will be any different?" My answer of course is, "Try us, and if you don't like us then you can boot us out too", which I hope the people of Canada will do to the hon. members opposite. It seems that the government cannot be straightforward with the people of Canada and this really bothers me.

Let me return for about five minutes, if my clock reads correctly—as you know, Madam Speaker, I have had some disputes with the clock in this House over time, but never in terms of five-minute spans and not with you but with one of the gentlemen who sits in that chair, has knees like mine, but was able to play football a lot better than I was.

In terms of the clawback itself, the Minister of Finance says it will have a minimal effect on Canadian individuals and families. He may believe that. For example, he claims that only 4.3 per cent of seniors will be paying back part or all of their pensions, with 54,000 individuals paying back all of their OAS and 74,000 paying back a part of it. On family allowances, he claims that only 14 per cent of families will be affected; 368,000 of them mind you, paying back all of their family allowance and 167,000 paying back a part of it.

The important thing to note, though, is that that is for this year. That figure is going to go up rapidly year by year so that more and more retirees will end up repayng their pensions and more and more famlies will repay all of their family allowances.

Here is how it works. The income level at which the clawback starts will move upwards according to the same deindexing formula that exists in the tax system, i.e., inflation minus 3 per cent. This means that if you assume an inflation rate of 4.5 per cent, which I think is about where we are at right now, the income limit will move up by only 1.5 per cent a year. A worker earning $40,000 a year and watching his or her income rise with inflation will be earning enough to put his income over the clawback level for family allowances of $56,309 by 1997.

When we think about that, that still seems like a lot of money. But I can tell you that when I was earning $20,000 at Parks and Rec a number of years ago, having started at $6,000 a few years before, $20,000 was quite a significant sum of money. So we have to recognize what inflation does and what wage increases do over time. Ultimately, hundreds of thousands of people will be affected by the clawback. People who are working now expecting to retire in 25 years will be included and they will have a healthy level of income according to 1989 dollars but it will be eaten away so that more and more Canadians will be caught by this big claw.

It will come to a point where more people will not get it than people who will get it. That is one of the other reasons why we fundamentally oppose the concept of the clawback, because of its impact on the social services program, the income support programs of this country.

Mr. Thacker: How many budgets will there be by then?

Mr. Angus: My hon. friend asks how many budgets. Well, perhaps he would like to make another promise. Am I hearing him suggest that the government will reinstate this at the next budget, or promise at the next election to reinstate it and become the defenders by saying, we have money now, we found some extra cash and we can afford this again?

You do not tamper with the income support programs. There are other things you can do. You can lower interest rates, save a billion and a half dollars for every point. You could increase employment. Every 1 per cent employment increase leads to a $2 billion influx into the federal treasury.

Mr. Thacker: How do you do that?

Mr. Angus: You work at it. You do not leave it to the private sector, you do not leave it to the Americans. They are just going to buy up our companies and move them into the states like they are doing now.

The first thing we do is to defeat the Conservative government and put in a government that cares about people.

• (1830)

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me the opportunity to join the debate on Bill C-28.

Still, Madam Speaker, I can hardly say I am pleased to take part in a debate on a legislative measure which strikes at the basic principle of the universality of Canada's social programs.

Besides, the government is going after elderly people and families when it launches such an attack against old age pensions and family allowances. Only a callous government would so mistreat seniors and Canadian families.

Madam Speaker, you will certainly ask me how the government goes about attacking all these people. Well, let me explain. This bill includes 59 amendments to the Income Tax Act, 59 amendments which signal the demise of social programs of which Canadians are so proud.

The principle of universality was adopted so that all Canadians would be treated the same way and to create such a feeling of belonging to the community as would make it possible for all Canadians to share the riches of their country and be entitled to certain benefits.

This Bill marks the end of all that. No more universality, no more social justice, no more equity in Canada. This is the beginning of the end for this government.

Yes, Madam Speaker, the beginning of the end for this government which in 1986 began to levy a special income surtax which it described as being temporary. Well, surtaxes are still with us. They went up, from 3 to 5 per cent. Talk about nerve, Madam Speaker.

As to the family allowances and old age pensions clawback provisions contained in this bill, they only confirm the fact that the government has gone too far and driven one more nail into its own coffin. The Prime Minister told us in 1984 that social programs were a sacred trust which was untouchable. He repeated the same thing in 1988. Now this legislative measure tells us that the Prime Minister did not keep his word and that he is heartless. The Prime Minister and his heartless government have given us umpteen examples of their insensitivity towards Canadians. They once assured us that VIA Rail passenger transport services were extremely important and that they would be maintained at any cost. Yet not so long ago we learned that VIA services would be cut by one half.

Madam Speaker, the government's unemployment insurance reform is a sure sign of its insensitivity: henceforth Canadian workers will simply have to accept shorter benefit periods and pay for training programs.

Canadians in a number of communities will also have to accept the fact that they no longer have access to their own post offices.

Madam Speaker, the new tax on goods and services, the deplorable condition of infrastructures throughout the country, the reduction of funds earmarked for regional development—I will not mention them all—are as many concrete examples of the heartlessness of this government.

Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister told us on many occasions that social programs were a sacred trust, but what he says and what he does are two different things.

The obvious danger when one begins to tamper with the principle of universality of social programs is that the whole thing hangs in the balance. When they reduce the rates to the minimum, they give themselves the power to reduce them even further. Then it becomes difficult to know who is entitled to benefits, where to draw the line, and who will be in a position to decide which of our fellow citizens most need assistance.

[English]

Bill C-28 shows us that the government does not care about seniors. It does not care about Canada's social net. It does not care about the needs of the regions and it does not care about students. This bill puts an end to universality.

The National Council of Welfare in the annual report which it tabled last month claimed that this clawback puts an end to universality. It strongly urged the government to abandon its clawback proposals.

The National Council of Welfare is a citizens' advisory group appointed by cabinet to advise the government on matters of social policy. The council's annual report strongly decries the government for its harsh policies.

This National Council of Welfare has claimed that the move away from universal benefits is the most significant change in social policy in a generation and that the Minister of Finance announced this change in the last budget speech with no prior consultation.

The Council further reported that the federal government had publicly rejected the idea of a clawback or surtax on old age pensions as late as January 1985 on the grounds that it would seriously disrupt the retirement income system. The government is now changing the rules of the game without obtaining the consent of Canadian seniors. Does the government not understand that these people have already paid for their old age pensions through a lifetime of hard work and paying taxes?

In the case of family allowances, the National Council of Welfare made it very clear when it said that the clawback discriminates against one-earner families because it is based on individual net income. For instance, a one-earner family with two children and a net income of $56,000 would lose all its family allowance benefits. On the other hand, a family with two incomes where one spouse earns $45,000 and the other $35,000 would escape the clawback despite the fact that they are making a total of $80,000.

Is that what you would call fair? Is that what Canadians have come to expect from their government? Will the rich keep getting richer and the poor sink further and further below the poverty line? As long as this government is in power, the answer is clear. This is a government that does not care for this country and its traditions. It is deliberately undermining the social fabric of the Canadian federation. How much longer will families and seniors have to put up with this type of government?

The National Council of Welfare does not stand alone in its criticism of this legislation. The Senior Citizens' Federation has also claimed that the clawback is biased, grossly inequitable and that it seriously undermines the principle of universality.

In a letter to the Prime Minister, the President of the Seniors' Federation, Mr. Les Batterson said with respect to this policy: "We view this proposal as a serious breach of faith by our government, an insidious effort to undercut the social security programs that you have on numerous occasions stated are a sacred trust".

Mr. Batterson also added later in his letter: "We are also aware that we had previous deficits as serious as the present one and the government of the day did not tax back pensions to which Canadians had every reason to believe they had the genuine right."

The present government has often claimed that the deficit imposes an unfair burden on future generations; that the deficit indeed is larger than what some economists believe. Indeed, it has cut many programs which were vital to the future of this country in its efforts to reduce this deficit. With this mean-spirited legislation, it is now taxing back the pension benefits of those who worked hard to build this country, and it is reducing family allowances, all in the name of reducing the deficit.

However, despite the Prime Minister's constant rhetoric about the need for budgetary restraint and the downsizing of government, Treasury Board estimates show that his own Privy Council Office budget will jump almost $5 million. It will go up to $59.1 million in the next fiscal year and its staff will increase from 579 to 591.

What is sauce for the goose should also be sauce for the gander. How can the Prime Minister preach budgetary restraint to everyone while increasing his own budget? Moreover, how can the Prime Minister justify attacking the families and seniors of this country in order to achieve his aims?

To all intents and purposes Bill C-28 spells the end for universality of social programs. The Canadian Council on Social Development has said that the government is eroding the fundamental principle of universality which requires the collective responsibility of caring for children and seniors. It is doing so by withdrawing family allowance benefits from approximately 368,000 families and by eliminating old age benefits from 54,000 seniors. Furthermore, it will be reducing the amount of these benefits for many other families and seniors.

What the Conservative government is doing to this country is unimaginable. Over the next five years the clawback of family allowances will withdraw $1.68 billion from family budgets. This means that $500 million a year will be withheld from these families. That is outrageous.

These families cannot afford this kind of loss or reduction in their incomes.

In conclusion, I would like to say that every organization representing families and seniors in this country has said that the government is eliminating universality. If the government had been really honest, it would during the last election campaign have told everyone that it would end universality, that it would gut VIA Rail and that it would cut unemployment insurance benefits. If this government had had the courage to clearly spell out its intentions before the Canadian people it would not be standing where it is today. The Canadian people would not have elected a government which knew that it would be bringing down these Draconian policies.

Finally, a government which claims that the deficit imposes an unfair burden on future generations should ask itself whether the imposition of substandard education and health services, dilapidated transportation and communication infrastructure which will inevitably result in this fixation with the deficit does not impose an unfair burden on future generations.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I rise with more than mixed feelings. The definition of "mixed feelings" is watching your banker go over a cliff in your new car.

I want to say that the basic principle of universality is that it is universal—there are no ifs, ands, or buts, no qualifications, no hestitations. There used to be measures in the Criminal Code, I do not know if they are still there or not, concerning perverts and perversion. If there ever was a perversion of the principle of universality, this is it. You cannot have it both ways. It is either universal and people get it as a matter of right or you snoop into all their private affairs, their incomes and so forth and withhold some or all of it because in the view of the government of the day, no matter what political stripe, that is more than they need or more than they should get.

There is a basic flat in all of this, and I will repeat myself, it is either universal or it is not. If the government wanted to be completely honest, it would say that universality should be scrapped or severely amended so that anyone getting more than so much does not get it or not all of it. No, it does not have the courage of its convictions to do that.

All my working life I think I have tried hard to make my contribution to my country in the various occupations I have been in, on the railroad, working for my party, as a member of Parliament, working for some farmers, that sort of thing. I have paid my taxes. During the late 1940s, the 1950s and the 1960s, I believe even into the early 1970s, when you made out your income tax there was an item stating "Old Age Security Fund". I believe, certainly back in the 1950s and 1960s it was 3 per cent. It varied from around 2 per cent, 3 per cent or 4 per cent. I paid for the darn thing.

Madam Speaker, this is a confession. I am going to put in my application this month for my old age pension. I do not look like I should be doing it. I do not act like it. I did not know whether to laugh or cry when I was making out the application.

I spent all these years earning my old age security pension. It is not all that much. It might come to $4,000 a year. I am not sure. But I spent all my working life earning it, and my fellow Canadians who could not earn it were also entitled to it. My fellow Canadians who did not need it were entitled to it and got it because it was universal, pure and simple.

I will never forget a fellow that I fought against—and I fought against his party for a lot of years—Louis St. Laurent. At that time we had not reduced the retirement age to 65, it was at 70. Mr. St. Laurent was Prime Minister of Canada. He had a sort of semi-public ceremony at which the press were present to receive his first old age pension cheque to emphasize the universal principle of old age assistance pensions. Whether or not you needed it, it was universal.

I also will never forget when my honoured colleague, Stanley Knowles, reached the age of 65. That is a long time ago, but then I have been here a fair while. Arthur Laing from British Columbia was the Minister of Public Works. We had a party for Stanley downstairs in Room 112 North. Arthur presented him with his first old age security pension cheque. He guaranteed him that the Government of Canada, no matter of what political stripe, would ever consider that a conflict of interest—after all the years of fighting Stanley did for pensioners.

Before I got the opportunity to speak in this debate, I made it a point to read the letter that Mackenzie King sent to J. S. Woodsworth in, I think it was, 1924 or 1926, somewhere in there. It was a minority Parliament. In the letter he guaranteed that the government would bring in the first old age pension and unemployment insurance. Reading Canadian history and listening to old timers in my party, there were only two of them left, Woodsworth and A. A. Heaps, Woodsworth got up and said: "Mr. Speaker, I welcome this. On behalf of my group we will support this measure." It was $20 a month at age 70 with a means test. A. A. Heaps got up and said: "Mr. Speaker, I support my leader. He's the leader and I'm the group."

The long history of the efforts of people in this country enabled us to arrive at just where we are now, people of all political persuasions, of every kind of group you could think of in this nation. We finally got to it.

Let me give you an example, Madam Speaker. I refer to someone who gets a company pension after 25, 35, 45 or whatever number of years of work of, say, $45,000 or $50,000 a year to which they contributed tens of thousands of dollars, but had been allowed to deduct the contributions from their income tax. When they drew the pension, they would have to pay income tax on it. It was the same with the Canada Pension, which I think is a good deal. It could still use some improving, but it is a good deal, especially for the younger people.

If you add the two together you are looking at $52,000, $54,000 or $55,000 a year gross pension from employment pension and Canada Pension. I have done some calculating. A person in that category will pay somewhere between $15,000 and $17,000 income tax on those two pensions, plus a clawback of some or all of their old age pension.

I suppose people like us from the NDP are not noted for supporting the wealthy. I suspect we have some reputation, depending on your point of view whether it is good or bad. You pay on a basic, fundamental principle based on ability to pay. Nobody is complaining about what you will pay on your company pension or your Canada Pension. That is perfectly proper. But on something that is supposed to be universal, to tax back some or all of it from people who, for all of their working lives, or even if they weren't working got it as a matter of fundamental right as a Canadian citizen, a basic right which has been established since the 1920s, brings me back to the whole question of perversion.

If someone is making $75,000, 100,000 or $1 million a year, I do not care what the amount, you get them to pay their share through some other way, but old age security and the family allowance are inviolable. I repeat, they are either universal or they are not. The government had better make up its mind and say: "We are no longer going to have universal pensions". I know there are some who say, both in this House and outside: "No use giving them the universal pensions, they do not need it". That immediately denies the principle of universality.

The other thing is something that is going to affect me and many hon. members of this House when we are no longer here, either because we get defeated or retire, but we will leave that aside. We cannot say that we are suffering. But for tens of thousands of people earning the amounts I mentioned earlier, they will be lucky if they net $30,000 a year. One is not going to live very high off the hog on that, not in this day and age. That is only about $6,000 or $7,000 above the poverty level. The government wants to start a clawback on old age pensions or family allowances when these people's net pay is around the $30,000 mark. This flies in the face of any kind of reason and decency. For my hon. friend who is sitting there and not paying attention, I want to say it even flies in the face of Christian decency.

The other thing that is scary and worrisome is this. What is to prevent this government or a succeeding government of the same or a different political stripe from saying: "Well, we think the $50,000 is too high, let us make it $40,000, and apply that to both the Old Age Security pension and family allowances"? What is to prevent any government, now or later, once the principle of universality is betrayed and perverted from saying: "Well, if your income is over a certain amount, then you have to pay half of your own hospital bills and doctor bills"? What is to prevent the government if your income is over $50,000, or whatever amount is set by the government of the day, from saying: "Your kid is going to university and your income is over that amount, you're going to pay half, three-quarters or all of the cost of that university education"? This flies in the face of any kind of decent reasoning.

There are other ways for the government to recover more than what it loses in income taxes or clawbacks out of the old age pension. There are many ways to do it. I can make a few suggestions. We keep getting asked by the Minister of Finance: "What is your alternative?". How about a 10 per cent tax on deferred corporation taxes? That will bring in nearly $4 billion a year, and it is nearly four points below the current interest rate.

• (1900)

How about closing some loopholes in income tax, both for individuals and for corporations, which are totally out of date compared to when they were brought out? How about restoring the corporate tax rate to what it was in 1984? That is worth $4 billion to $5 billion a year. I have not noticed corporations passing their production and their goods on to us consumers at lower prices. All that has happened is that they kept the money. That is all that has happened.

I recall a famous occasion in the 1950s when the government of that day decided to take the 10 per cent sales tax off drugs. There was great fanfare as that was going to mean lower drug prices. It did not mean lower prices; it meant higher prices. The drug companies kept the money. They did not reduce their prices a nickel.

I return to my main argument. The government has to decide and tell the people of Canada that it is no longer a universal program. Don't give me this nonsense about we are going to send everybody a cheque and then tax some or all of it back. That is the perverted part of it. It then becomes not universal.

I do not understand. I guess all political parties are guilty of this: The longer they are in, the harder they work at losing. Far be it from me to advise Conservatives how to stay in power. This is another one of those idiotic, unreasoning, nonsensical attempts by the government to pay the country's bills. I am not objecting to that. There is no one in the NDP caucus objecting to us making extraordinary efforts to pay our bills, debts, and our current deficit. No problem. That is not the argument. The argument is: how do you go about collecting the money and how do you go about paying off and reducing the debt and the deficit?

I want to remind my hon. friends that at the end of the Second World War the national debt or the annual deficit translated into 1989 dollars was almost double what it is now, and we paid it off. We had relatively full employment. We did not have nearly so many tax loopholes, and we paid it off. We did nothing more than learn some lessons from our own experience in our own nation, that what we did before we could do again even better. There were other ways of doing it. By the way, not a nickel of the national debt at the end of the Second World War came from outside of Canada. We did the whole thing ourselves, and we paid off that deficit and that debt. By 1955 it was paid.

We do not have to claw back on the backs of old age pensioners and families with children, no matter what is their income. We must keep it universal and collect it some other way from those with higher incomes. Do not mess around. Do not try to destroy something that people of all political faiths since the 1920s have supported and agreed to. It is the only decent, civilized thing to do. It is for the government to say: "All right, we will withdraw this one. We will bring in some other measures to get the same amount of money". In that event we would likely support it.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I must say I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak tonight on this bill. I have heard many speeches in the House today on the subject of Bill C-28. There certainly seems to be a general theme, and the theme seems to concern all the speakers with about the same amount of amplitude.

We all know that Bill C-28 makes 59 different amendments to the Income Tax Act, implementing many of the budget provisions. Now it is not possible, of course, to speak on all these. There are some that concern me more than others.

I want to set a scenario which is perhaps a slightly different approach than some of the previous speakers have taken this evening. I do this with cognizance of the fact that aspects of the clawback are of concern to seniors as are the deindexation factor and the misrepresentation, if I can call it that. However, it is important to set the the stage by mentioning some of the things that are going on in my riding right now against which people judge these 59 changes.

I have a situation now in which the telephone virtually has not stopped ringing in my riding. I just took some calls a few moments ago when I was talking with my constituency office. Literally the phone is just ringing off the hook. People who are listening to the speeches in the House of Commons tonight and watching them on television are concerned about these changes in the Income Tax Act. They are concerned about many of the things that we have talked about here. It is so important to understand what their basic concerns are at this point in time, and to understand that I have to tell the House about my riding.

If not the largest fishing riding in Canada, my riding is certainly one of the largest where 85 per cent of the employment comes from the fishing industry. A month before Christmas, and we are now concerned, literally, that people have bread on their table and a cup of tea to drink.

I am referring to the emergency response job development program recently announced by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I cannot tell you the number of people who will not qualify under that program although they have been employed in the fishing industry all their working lives, 15 to 20 years. Because of the criteria that has been set up it is not possible for them to qualify to get unemployment insurance under the job development programs. Because of the stringencies in the requirements and the inability right now of the bureaucracy to review those people they cannot fall directly under the criteria.

It is all very well to talk about the income tax changes and about all the difficulties we are going to have with clawbacks, deindexation and family allowances, but it is against the backdrop of people who will not have any money in their pockets to buy Christmas presents for their children, to make a Christmas cake, or to feed themselves when Christmas day comes. That is not a very nice thought as we talk about those issues in the House today.

While I feel it is incumbent upon me as a member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception to talk about Bill C–28, my major concern today and for this week is to get some kind of redress against the stringent criteria that has been set up and the lack of review process that has not been going on, although the Minister of Employment and Immigration in fact stated in her press release that it would go on.

Let me talk just a little bit about the clawback. The clawback does a number of things, but what it does more than anything else is remove the rug from under the faith that Canadians have in what their politicians say and what their politicians from all sides of the House promise them during election time.

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition and several members here in the House tonight reminded us of a lady by the name of Solange Denis who was so concerned about deindexation and a promise that was made which was not being kept that she became, if not a heroine, somebody who represented the concerns of the seniors in Canada.

In my riding there are around 10,000 senior citizens, all of whom either watched that or heard about it. They believe that what she did was so responsible and so representative of their feelings that even as I was campaigning last fall and I mentioned her name people remembered who she was. They remembered that television clip of that lady standing in front of the House of Commons and making a statement to her Prime Minister that she was being let down.

Common sense prevailed and deindexation was, we thought, forgotten about. The Prime Minister of the day said that universality was something that they would not have to worry about. They were going to make sure that these programs were universal, but our finance minister announced the clawback mechanism in his April 1989 budget which effectively ends universality.

The family allowance program and the old age security is paid to everyone now. Everyone receives the benefit regardless of income. Clawback, however, will recover the full amount of the benefit from those earning a certain income through a higher income tax rate. I refer now to clause 48 of Bill C–28 which implements the clawback on family allowance and old age security pensions. The amount of the repayment is equal to 15 per cent of the taxpayers' net income over $50,000.

The Minister of Finance introduced the measure as a deficit reduction device, but the amount to be recovered by the clawback is relatively insignificant when compared to the massive national debt. In fact somebody worked out that the same amount of money that is going to be realized by the clawback could be generated by raising the rate of the top income tax bracket by only 1 per cent, thereby transferring what benefit this would have to the deficit to high-income earners.

Many view the mechanism as discriminatory since it taxes pensioners and families at a higher rate than others earning the same income. Mr. Speaker, a buck is a buck is a buck. Why should people with families and people drawing old age security pensions be penalized more so than somebody else in a different age bracket or somebody without a family?

They do not understand why and, quite frankly, I cannot explain it to them, particularly since there was a promise made of universality and that these programs would be a sacred trust. I did not want to use that word because I think it is overused, but I have to use it to emphasize the promise that was made to Canadians.

Of greater significance and concern is that over the years more and more pensioners and families will start repaying these benefits. People have put together their savings, they have worked out their RRSPs, and they have worked out their investment programs. While $50,000 may seem like a lot of income for a senior citizen, many of the people in my riding—and I can assure you that there are those who do have that amount from a combination of their pension and their investments—have proceeded on the basis that they would be receiving this income and have projected their whole life after retirement on this assumption. Now they are told that they are going to have to rework the whole system. They are going to have to redo the whole thing. Their whole plan of financing will have to be reworked. The whole business will have to be redone. In other words, they are not getting the income that they had expected or that they had hoped to get.

Partial indexation is responsible. The threshold is now $50,000, but it has been calculated that by the year 2000 it will have fallen to the equivalent of $35,000 in today's dollars. That is 10 years from now. By the time the baby boom generation enters retirement, most of them will have to repay their old age security benefits through the clawback.

Is that fair? I do not think it is fair. I know that many of my colleagues do not think that is fair. I know that other members who are not my political colleagues but whom I have come to know very closely in the last year or so do not believe it is fair. I would suggest that there are many people on the other side of the House who do not believe it is fair either, although I have not heard too many of those this evening. I believe they will have to explain to their senior citizen population and to those who are drawing the family allowance as to why they think it is fair. It is going to be a difficult thing to explain.

In the meantime, once we have accepted the principle of clawback as part of our system, governments of the day are free to set the threshold at any they wish. The principle has how been established. It is $50,000 this year, and we know what will happen by the year 2000 if nothing is changed. But next year, if the government decides that more money is needed to address the budget or for another reason, the threshold could be changed to $45,000, to $40,000, or to $30,000. Who knows? I have not even heard any promises that this threshold will not be breached.

There are also widespread fears that the clawback is the thin edge of the wedge, a wedge that will destroy our much envied universal social programs. This country has been very proud of the way it has treated its senior citizens, certainly over my lifetime.

I know that seniors have been very proud of that. They have spoken to me about it. I know it has been a source of security and pride to senior citizens who have travelled outside the country and compared their lot with seniors in other countries. They have been able to say: "My government is proud of me and I am proud of it because it has been able to provide this universal service to me and it has been able to provide it in an unfettered manner with no strings attached". That is all gone.

History will remember the clawback as the end of universality, and not for what it has done for the deficit. My colleagues and I have been concerned that the government has not held any real public hearings on this issue. We have heard about the goods and services tax. We have heard about legislative committees on Bill C-21 and other legislative committees, but there has not been very much discussion about this issue. There has been a decision. It has been capped at $50,000 with a 3 per cent limit on deindexing or indexing or whatever you want to call it. It does not look very good for the future as far as seniors are concerned.

Again, I do not know how to say this any more eloquently or with any more colour than I believe that senior citizens have and should have a very special place in all our hearts. Let us face it, if it were not for them a lot of us would not be here today. I would suggest most of us would not be here today. However there is a general feeling that when you reach a certain magic age something magic happens.

That may be the case, but in my riding there are many senior citizens who continue to make a contribution and to do things that they did before they reached the magic age. They do not look at themselves as much different from you and I or anybody in this House. They think they are average people who need to have average chances, who need to have the average opportunity to take advantage of all the programs that are in existence. They do not understand why they have to be made special by having money taken away from them more so than any other segment of society. I cannot go home and explain that to them, and I do not think anybody in this House can.

There is another area that concerns me and that is the income surtax on individual incomes. It has been raised from 3 per cent to 5 per cent and to 8 per cent for high income earners. Clause 47 of this bill raises the surtax on personal incomes from 3 per cent to 5 per cent. It also raises the surtax to 8 per cent for Canadians whose tax payable is more than $15,000. The minister made the proposal that personal income surtaxes would be a permanent feature of the income tax system. Essentially, what the minister said he was going to do is not what is being done. Therefore we have universality which is not being done and then we have the surtax increments which are not being done. What else is not being done?

Since 1984 this government has increased taxes 31 times. There are 59 clauses in this particular bill now. Canadians have not received the lower income taxes promised. In 1984 and 1985 the federal government collected $29 billion in income taxes from Canadians. This year the government expects to collect over $50 billion in income tax. That is more than 72 per cent in five years. That is a big percentage increase.

The clawback of family allowance will take $1.686 billion out of the family budget in the next five years. That is around $500 million a year by 1991. There must be a better way to look after our deficit financing than hitting the pocketbooks of those individuals who can least afford it, those individuals who having achieved the status of senior citizen should not have it happen to them.

Perhaps I can take you back to the scenario I set earlier this evening, Mr. Speaker, to those people who could not spend all their time in the fishery because of a bad year in 1988. They are being penalized this year because they cannot get the right number of stamps, the right number of weeks to qualify for the emergency response job development program.

Next year, because of the quirk in circumstances unless the Minister of Employment and Immigration does something about it, they will have to work for 20 weeks to qualify. If they cannot find three or six weeks of work in one year, they are not likely to find twenty weeks in the next year.

This is the circumstance in which I find myself as the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. It is the unfortunate position that one has to get up and speak on this, one has to be perforce negative while I tend to be positive. I think you know, Mr. Speaker, that I like to be positive. It is very hard to be positive on Bill C-28 in any or all of its features.

If I could somehow wave a magic wand and cause Bill C-28 to go away, if I could wave a magic wand and have the Minister of Employment and Immigration allow the review to be conducted for those people who cannot get the job development strategy and get the right number of weeks this year, or if I could get all the bureaucrats in her department to carry out a review for these unfortunate people who are on the phone to my office and to me tonight as I speak, I would do so. However I do not know where the magic wands are. I was not issued with one when I became a member of Parliament. I am still looking for it. I am still looking for it. If I had one, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that tonight I would take my magic wand and I would wave Bill C-28 away. I would wave on the review of those people who cannot get their proper review done. In the same wave of that wand I would restore the universality that has been promised to our senior citizens, the people whom we should be spending a lot of time thinking about and working for.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight on the eve of the anniversary of last year's election on November 21. Today is November 20, and I rise to speak on a bill which is very indicative of the kind of bill that this government has brought in since that election victory. This bill is an omnibus bill dealing with a lot of matters related to the changes in acts affected by the spring budget.

It speaks to the kind of deception this government perpetrated on the Canadian public in last year's election campaign. That is why I bring it to your attention on this date, the eve of the anniversary of the election.

This bill deals with the amending of the Income Tax Act, including the clawback of family allowances and old age security pensions. It deals with the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. It deals with the Old Age Security Act. It deals with the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. It deals with the amendments to many of those acts.

Basically it allows for the opportunity to highlight the record of this government in all of these areas. We can speak to the contrast of what government members said during the election campaign and what they have actually done since they were elected. This is the government of deception.

The clawback of family allowances and old age security pensions on incomes of over $50,000 which the government introduced in its May budget and presented in this bill is a major step toward the Americanization of our social programs and the end of universality. This is exactly what Conservatives said they were not going to do. They said that we should not be worried about the trade deal, that it was only a trade deal and we could tear it up if we did not think it was a good deal.

We in the opposition spoke out strongly against the trade deal seeing it in its insidious nature as affecting our social programs. Here it is a year later. The government has invoked closure on this bill to do that, to really erode the universality of our social programs.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have tried to deny this, but the hon. member for Mississauga South was more honest. In a letter written to an Edmonton man he said: "We have decided to eliminate universality. While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky, it is there." That is the nature of this government, unfair and sneaky in plain words but very descriptive.

For the first portion of my speech tonight I am going to focus on the effects of post–secondary education. I come from the province of British Columbia where we now have our premier in the light of recent events in eastern Europe trotting off to Europe and saying that he wants to get East German skilled labour and bring them back to British Columbia.

Are there not enough British Columbians already quite capable of taking the trades training that will be able to give them the kind of jobs that Mr. Vander Zalm is seeking for them? Federal transfer payments to post–secondary education are being eroded and the Social Credit government in British Columbia with the short–sighted vision of Mr. Vander Zalm thinks it has to bring in immigrant labour from overseas to fill the jobs we have in British Columbia.

Post–secondary education across Canada is being eroded by these cuts to this program under this Bill C–28. Now we spend something like $13,000 on average per student, while in the United States the average expenditure per student is $20,000. This is quite a difference. The Prime Minister promised to make education a high priority with reforms that will generate excellence in education from coast to coast. That was from the Progressive Conservative general meeting in August of this year. At the same time his government's latest budget reflected his real commitment to education as one of the priorities for its second mandate. These transfer payment cuts are going to have a devastating effect across Canada, but particularly in British Columbia where the Social Credit government has the short–sightedness not to put in the kind of funds that are necessary.

I now want to talk about some of the fundamental questions that should be asked when considering this type of legislation. Why should an individual be entitled to receive $100,000 in capital gains tax free but lose the $4,000 he or she will get in Old Age Security simply because it was paid as the universal social benefit? I am pointing out that if you get $100,000 through capital gains you are not taxed on it. But if you get it as part of a pension you will have to pay $4,000. It is an erosion of the universality of our social programs.

The government members chided New Democrats for looking after the wealthy by voicing our concerns on this bill. What we are talking about is the fundamental injustice of this bill. Mr. Blenkarn said it was unfair and sneaky. Those are the words that we will have to keep in mind in the final hours of this debate.

The family allowance and the old age security are already taxed in Canada. Why should a special tax be levied on children and the elderly? If the intention is to raise money from the rich why not do it through a more progressive tax system? I know that is the kind of thinking that is somewhat offensive to this government in its current bid to get the GST pushed through. Why not raise marginal rates at the top of the income tax bracket to 32 per cent instead of taxing back family allowances and Old Age Security? Either method would raise about $600 million in 1991. Why not restore the 1987 top rate to 34 per cent and raise $2 billion? The highest income group in Canada has its marginal tax rate cut from 43 per cent to 34 per cent in 1981 and to 29 per cent in 1987.

For middle-income earners the marginal tax rate has remained almost constant in spite of so-called tax reform. We on this side realize that the government must gain revenue especially in light of the trade deal when $13 billion in tariffs was lost through this government's signing of the trade deal. We realize that there have to be taxes. We are just questioning whether or not they should be coming from the same people, the low and middle-income earners, families and old-age pensioners. What will the unique identity of Canada mean in a few years when our social programs exist to serve only those in need. Won't our social programs be just like those in the US, leaner and meaner?

I had the privilege of travelling with the external affairs committee last week in New York and Washington. I saw on the streets of New York and in the city of Washington evidence of a leaner, meaner social program. There were beggars in the streets with tin cups. These are not just cartoon characters, this is reality.

Up here it is reality as well. This situation will only get worse under this government. How long will the population continue the maintenance of social progress from which they have been effectively excluded as beneficiaries? What we are concerned about here is the kind of erosion of public consent to participate in these programs. If it is only to be the low income earners who are the beneficiaries, why should the middle income earners contribute to them? We have a voluntary compliance system of taxation in our country. So far this government's policy, in this budget, through Bill C-28, and with its goods and services tax proposed legislation, is eroding that. What we are going to see are taxpayers very seriously trying avoidance schemes. This will have a real impact on the attitude of those who are recipients of social programs.

Social programs have been paid for. Old age pensioners have paid for this. They have been taxed on their income. Now they are having it clawed back under this bill. Will need be redefined downwards as it has been in Britain, or in the U.S., as it already has been in our unemployment insurance and welfare programs?

If the essence of universality is destroyed through the back door, what is to protect medicare from the same attack? We see the insidious nature of this government, the kind of deception in what it promised last November 20, and what it is doing this November 20. It is like night and day. I think this also speaks to a real lack of trust if this government is allowed to get away with the lies it has told Canadians on this and other issues. What effect will it have on the cynicism Canadians already feel toward politicians of all stripes?

I think that will have implications on our whole political system. I do not want to dramatize this overly, but it is a concern. It is the kind of cynicism that is everywhere throughout this country and it does not necessarily relate to whether it is a member of Parliament or the alderperson or the member of the legislature who is doing a good job. That, of course, has an impact, but the people do not trust politicians. One wonders why. But contrast what was said last November 20 and see where we are today. We are putting forth all the things that the government said it was not going to do.

There is no question that this clawback puts an end to universality. The National Council on Welfare which is a federal government advisory group is saying there is no question but that the clawback puts an end to universality. This report was made to government entitled "The 1989 Budget and Social Policy" and states: "A social program that delivers benefits to everyone and then collects them all back from some recipients is not universal". I know that sometimes it is a difficult concept for some of the members opposite to understand when they say that it does not have an effect on universality. But when you give to some and take it away from some, that is an effect on universality.

The clawbacks are designed to save the federal government about $500 million a year. The savings would then be used to reduce the deficit rather than increase the benefits for low-income parents and seniors.

The National Council on Welfare has taken a page out of the New Democratic books and would prefer to see the government raise taxes for upper income people generally rather than having the heaviest burden on upper income parents and upper income seniors. Alternatives to clawbacks that are outlined in the report would save the government $2 billion a year, rather than $500 million.

I think we should also point out that this is a government that gives a lot of lip service in support of the family. While it gets a lot of Brownie points for those nice words, this bill erodes the whole concept of the family.

In the case of parents, the clawback discriminates against one-earner families because it is based on individual net income. A one-earner family with two children and a net income of $56,000 would lose all of its family allowance benefits. A two-earner couple where one spouse earns $45,000 and the other $35,000 would escape the clawback despite their combined income of $80,000.

Now, as I said, this government does give a lot of lip service to the support of families and about the way children should be raised, that women should stay home and look after their children rather than going out into the workforce. Well, here is a real slap in the face, because it is penalizing families which do that very thing. That kind of inconsistency is a bit galling to say the least.

I would like also to talk about the complexity of this bill regarding the child benefit system. After the clawback there will be four types of families receiving family allowance: Those keeping all of the family allowance because they are too poor to owe income tax; those families who keep part of their family allowance because they pay regular income tax on their benefits; those who keep part of their family allowance because they pay regular income tax and the clawback on their benefits and those who pay all of their family allowance back because of the clawback. This is a real distinction and we are talking about universality. It is a joke.

The clawback will erode the principle of horizontal equity. Removing family allowance from families that are better off will put them at greater disadvantage, vis-a-vis, childless couples and singles who have the same income but no child rearing expenses. Once again, this government gives a lot of lip service to the support of the family, but that is all it is, lip service. Its real motivations were very apparent in Bill C-28.

As members of an opposition party we have not only a right, but a duty and an obligation to oppose legislation that we believe is wrong-headed. We also have a duty and an obligation to propose alternatives.

As I said earlier, there is a recognition, even by New Democrats, that the deficit is a problem. We think it is an over stated problem, but if there are ways in which we can help advise these government members on how to address this problem, we are happy to try to contribute to that.

I believe the deficit has been over-sold to Canadians due to the Conservative ideology and the free trade agreement.

Mr. McDermid: The NDP doesn't give a damn about deficits, or debts or anything else.

Ms. Hunter: Lowering the deficit should be a goal of a much broader economic strategy not the only goal. That sort of linear thinking of the government members is apparent by this type of legislation. We have to think of a broader economic strategy. The government member opposite is eager to hear of our alternatives, so I am sure he will be attentive. By proposing alternatives I do so in the spirit of this House. I hope that the government will take some of these suggestions and incorporate them. I have not fallen to the cynicism of some of my constituents, that we are all here just to pick fights with one another. I think that we are here to contribute.

Canadians deserve a federal budget that responds to our real economic needs such as spreading the near full employment of southern Ontario to our regions. Ultimately, a focus on jobs and fairness will bring down the deficit. I think that should be the real focus of this government, a full employment program and a fair and simpler tax system. Then we would not have the erosion of the universality of our social programs as in this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate tonight, and I may add that tomorrow is the anniversary of the Tory Government's re-election. It was a sad day last year, when the Tory Government came to power for the second time. I am sure you remember that at the time, the Tory Government laughed at the Opposition parties with their various programs and said that Canada could not afford the kind of government being proposed by opposition members and the opposition parties. However, the Tories claimed they had all the funds that were necessary to continue to administer this government. That is what they said. They also said their commitments were not mere campaign promises but were backed with the necessary funds to implement them.

A year ago, it was the day before the election, November 20, 1988, and today it is November 20, 1989. One year later, suddenly the government no longer seems to have the funds it had last year. And to rely on the party's—I beg your pardon, the government's—coffers— I get the words "party" and "government" mixed up, because the Tories have a tendency to confuse the meaning of the two words. So in the light of those facts, Madam Speaker, I am sure you will excuse me for making this mistake, but it is typical of the government opposite, and I am sure that you, as an impartial person, will understand. I am sure you understand what I have to say in this respect.

In any case, one year later, the Tories across the way no longer have any money. No money at all. They have to cut here, they have to cut there, they have to raise taxes for Canadians. None of this was mentioned.

The Tories say they need the money so badly and they are so broke that they have to invoke closure and make members sit during part of the night to get those funds right away. Not bad, for a government that less than a year ago had all the funds it needed to administer this country!

Even if we agreed with the Tories a year ago, we can now conclude that what they offered Canadians was poor government, because all of a sudden they no longer have the funds they claimed to have.

[English]

But the sad reality is that the government across the way was not telling Canadians the truth a year ago, and it continues not to tell the truth to the people of Canada. Now, a year ago it was claiming, as I said previously, that it had all the money necessary to administer its own campaign commitments. You see, Madam Speaker, campaign commitments are slightly different from campaign promises. Campaign commitments were the ones made by Tories and campaign promises were the ones made by the opposition during the campaign. The Conservatives identified those differences at that time. They further added that all the funds necessary to administer the programs which they were proposing were completely inside the government's budgetary envelopes and that they were already provided for by the Estimates and so on.

Mrs. Dobbie: I am spellbound.

Mr. Boudria: And I say that to the hon. member across the way. I invite her to pay attention to this because we might ask her questions later. The hon. member will not remember the people last year who were forced to listen to this.

Mr. McDermid: That is the same line I heard you say in the provincial House.

Mr. Boudria: And I hear the minister from Brampton across the way. He reminds me of the fact that I used to sit in the Ontario Legislature at the time that he was Claude Bennett's side kick.

• (1950)

I remember when he used to do that for a living, and now Claude Bennett is no longer in public office—he resigned before he was defeated, which is exactly what would have happened to him. I say to the minister that he had better listen closely. He and his colleagues should continue to try to administer the Federal Business Development Bank, and listen attentively to what we are saying.

As I was saying before I was provoked, the family allowance is taxable. Thirty per cent of family allowance benefits are already paid back to the government through the progressive income tax system. The government is claiming that we need in addition to this a clawback provision, to snatch back the funds which the taxpayers of Canada have been receiving. It says not to worry, it only applies to rich people right now, only those earning $50,000 a year and so on. It says all those people are rich and can afford to give their money back to the Conservatives. Personally, if I were rich, which I am not, the last people I would want to give my money to are the people across the way. That is another issue and we can discuss it at another time.

The point is that this $50,000 threshold is only partially indexed—hardly at all, as a matter of fact—and will erode to such an extent over the next decade that many people who are considered not to be wealthy at all will then fall into that group of people who will see their pension clawed back by the Conservatives in the unlikely event that the Conservative party will still be in power at the time. I say extremely unlikely, because as we all know the Conservatives will be turfed out of office by then.

The other unfairness is that the proposal would put a special tax on families with children and on seniors, a tax that does not apply to anyone else. One has to wonder why the government wants to attack seniors and families. Is it not bad enough that it has tried to attack everyone with the GST proposal? It had 80 per cent of Canadians displeased with the GST. Some Conservative members looked at this and said to themselves that this was not good enough. They said: "What we should do is try to get unanimity". Do you know how they went about that? They decided to make the other 20 per cent angry, the 20 per cent of the people who are still supporting the GST. Do you know what they did? They put out a trial balloon about taxing existing homes. They sure have unanimity. Now everyone is angry at the Tories, even the few people who previously supported the GST proposal.

Returning to Bill C-28, in which the government has successfully found another way to get a lot of Canadians angry with it, it has invoked a procedure which is most unfair. Let me describe the scenario. For a senior citizen with $70,000 in income, the principle of fairness would suggest that it should not matter whether you get your income from a government pension, the stock market or elsewhere. A $70,000 income should be taxed the same way regardless of from where it comes. After all, a buck is a buck. Why should it be taxed differently if people get money from a pension, stocks, bonds, or anywhere else?

The minister sits in cabinet responsible for many government programs. Why would he, being the reasonable person he no doubt is, want to agree with such a program? I understand the minister from Brampton is agreeing with that, but not our friend from Montreal who is listening to this.

The government clawback provision would single out people who receive family allowances and old age pension cheques for a special tax. Why do the Conservatives across the way want to tax people who receive pensions any more than anyone else? Is it not bad enough that they are taxing everyone, that they would want a special tax grab directly aimed at people getting a pension? Why would they want to do that, other than finding another way to get unanimity, getting 100 per cent of Canadians mad at them again? They are bound to succeed one more time.

They have managed to do it with the GST. It took some creative thinking in those last two weeks to get the 20 per cent of Canadians who still liked the GST upset, but now they have succeeded in doing that. One hundred per cent of Canadians are mad. The Conservatives are going to do the same thing with this clawback provision. They had many Canadians mad at them for their income tax proposals. Now the few people that were not too upset are going to be upset with the implementation of this bill.

That is why we in the Official Opposition have stood for Canadians. We have contested these measures. We have indicated to the people of Canada that we do not like this bill and that we are not going to vote for it. I say to the members across, just in case the Tory members across think for instance that this is merely a partisan remark that I am making, as unlikely as that could be, to read from One Voice Seniors Network Canada Incorporated, which is a national organization representing senior citizens across this country.

This is not the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell or someone who may perhaps be thought of being partisan by those people across the way, but what One Voice said: "If we want to maintain true universality we shouldn't tax benefits through the back door. That penalizes people who receive benefits, specifically pensioners and families, and destroys the universal nature of benefit. Meanwhile other taxpayers at the same income level are left unscathed even though they may be more able to pay."

Mrs. Dobbie: They are not getting welfare. That is the difference.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I am glad that the member across has said that. I do hope that Hansard has properly registered what we just heard. The member across has just stated that senior citizens' pensions are welfare. That is what we have now heard. She has said those people are not receiving welfare, insinuating that the ones who are receiving old age security pensions are receiving welfare. Well, for me as a Liberal, that kind of thinking is wrong. There is no way that senior citizens should apologize to the member across the way and beg to get money from this government. Senior citizens should not have to do that, and they will not do that, so long as we in the Liberal party can stand here and defend their interests.

I say to the member across the way that she should apologize to the senior citizens of Canada for insinuating that old age security benefits are a form of welfare. For me they are not. They are a richly deserved universal pension which we have consistently stood for in the Liberal party and implemented a number of years ago. We will continue to do that.

Let me get back to what some Canadians had to say about this issue of clawback which is a form of deindexation. We have here in hand from The Ottawa Citizen a story of September 14 by Mark Kennedy in which he interviewed the Prime Minister. I know it is unfair to quote the Prime Minister using his own words, but I will do it any way. I know it is very, very difficult for the members across the way. The National Council on Welfare issued a report in which it criticized the Tories for the clawback provisions of Bill C–28. The National Council on Welfare is a government body, of course. I am sure the member across the way knows this or she should. It stated:

> There is no question that the clawback puts an end to universality.
> A social program that delivers benefits to everyone and then collects them all back from some recipients is not universal.

That goes really to the heart of what the member was saying a while ago, assessing or qualifying or describing old age security benefits as being a form of welfare. We do not think that old age security pensions are welfare, but the member across gave us a different view of that and now the Prime Minister says through this interview here, and I quote: "'We don't accept that view at all,". That is what he told reporters. "It is an opinion like many others but no more than that.'"

The National Council of Welfare, a government organization, there to advise the government on social issues, is considered by the Prime Minister as having an opinion that is an opinion like many others but no more. In other words the Conservatives give little if any credence to what is said by this national body, describing its opinion as no more or no less than the opinion of anyone else. They do not listen to the opinion of anyone else, so that means that they give absolutely no regard to what the government's own National Council on Welfare says.

I have some difficulty in understanding what the government is trying to do here. Conservative members say they want to lower the deficit. They say they are trying to make ends meet, yet they go on wasting and squandering money the way they have been since 1984 with all kinds of schemes that have been questioned in this House, and I am not going to repeat today's Question Period or Question Periods of other days here. We all know what they consisted of. At the same time they claw back pensions of senior citizens, questioning again the universality of such pensions, describing pensions as being welfare programs when all of us including the Prime Minister called them universal programs that were sacred trusts. Now, today, they are being described by some as being welfare programs.

Mr. Les Batterson, the president of Senior Citizens Federation said to the Prime Minister on June 23, 1989:

> —our position is that the tax-back is age biased, grossly inequitable and has serious implications with regards to universality.

Mr. McDermid: Who said that?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Les Batterson, president of Senior Citizens Federation said that to the Prime Minister on June 23, 1989. He said this in a letter, and of course the Prime Minister has the original. Maybe the minister can get someone to read it to him. Then we will understand.

The Coalition of Quebec Seniors, in a letter to the Minister of Finance of May 24, said:

> —as the clawback begins to affect increasing numbers of individuals there can be no doubt that the net effect will be a gradual reduction in the principle of universality.
> We consider further, that a special tax which is only directed at seniors, is discrimination on the basis of age, unfair, and contrary to the Charter of Rights.

That would make an interesting Charter case. Anyway, it says further:

> Your proposal creates a steeper tax rate for seniors than for others at similar income levels. Seniors who with great difficulty, have succeeded over the years, in saving for their retirement, are being penalized.

Those are the words of the Coalition of Quebec Seniors in a letter to the Minister of Finance of May 24, 1989.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I think or I hope I have persuaded Tory Members opposite to change their minds and withdraw this bill. They still have a chance, and it is still a few minutes or should I say hours until a vote is taken, and the ministers opposite could call an emergency meeting behind the curtains and withdraw Bill C-28. We would give them our unqualified support for withdrawing the bill. However, if the Tory Government, if the Tory ministers refuse, all I can say is that Canadians will remember when the next election comes around.

[English]

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this debate on Bill C-28, legislation which flows from the Conservative budget tabled earlier this year.

This bill deals with a number of issues of concern to all Canadians. It amends the Income Tax Act and includes provisions, which I will be coming back to in a minute, respecting the clawback of family allowances and old age security pensions and a capital tax on large corporations. It cuts the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements and federal post-secondary education and health contributions. It deals with the Old Age Security Act. It touches the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act and as well it amends a number of other acts flowing from the budget.

Because the time is limited, I want to focus on two or three aspects of this proposed legislation. I want to first deal briefly with the cut-backs in federal-provincial transfers for health and post-secondary education because this amounts to a very serious erosion in EPF funding. We saw just three years ago in 1986 another round of cuts in EPF funding. What this will mean for Canada's poorest provinces is devastating indeed. In fact, the four Atlantic provinces alone will lose $189 million over the next four years while the four western provinces, including my province of British Columbia, will lose some $633 million.

What we are heading for is in many ways a two-tier-system of the delivery of services in this country, a two tier health care system with one quality of health care in the rich provinces and second or third rate services in the poorer provinces. Those are the words of the Canadian Medical Association.

These cuts come on top of other cuts as well, including unemployment insurance and regional development cuts. Post-secondary education is being particularly hard hit at a time when we should be putting more funding into post-secondary education. Right now we spend something in the order of $13,000 on average per student while the United States spends an average of some $20,000 per student. We are falling further and further behind in this fundamental area of support for post-secondary education.

The Prime Minister on the one hand has said he would make education a high priority. He promised in a speech in August 1989 "reforms that will generate excellence in education from coast to coast". Instead of bringing forward meaningful reform in post-secondary education, the Prime Minister is cutting back on funding to the provinces for post-secondary education.

We have seen the effects of this across Canada, including in my constituency. I just recently was at Douglas College, a college which serves the lower mainland of British Columbia and has a very important role to play in the delivery of post-secondary education in the province of British Columbia. It is suffering under the impact of devastating financial cut-backs and at this same time, the federal government is proposing to cut back further.

I mentioned the promise the Prime Minister made to improve the level of support for post-secondary education. The same Prime Minister has made other promises which are broken in a very fundamental way in this Bill C-28. On March 7, 1984, the Prime Minister said this: "Our position is simple and straightforward. We are in favour of universality in social programs and it shall not be touched". What happened to that fundamental promise made to the people of Canada in March 1984? What happened to the promise made in October 1988 during the last federal election campaign?

My colleague from Saanich—Gulf Islands noted that this evening we are on the eve of the first anniversary of this government. This is an appropriate time for us to be looking back on the promises made during that election campaign which culminated in the election of this government one year ago tomorrow.

One of the promises made was a promise made to Canadian seniors and it was made by the Prime Minister in Summerside, Prince Edward Island. Of course, the people of Summerside have other concerns these days about the promises and commitments made by this government, but this was a solemn promise made to Canadian seniors. The Prime Minister said this:

> Let me say a special word to the senior citizens. In the future, Canada will be doing more, not less, for all of you. As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished, by our government which is committed to social justice and fairness for Canadians.

Well, what happened to that promise? That promise has been broken by the Prime Minister and by the government he leads.

One of the things that I have found as I travelled across this land and in speaking with people in my constituency is a degree of disillusionment and cynicism about the whole political process. A part of that is because of the extent to which political leaders, the Prime Minister in this case, are prepared to cast into the wastepaper basket promises that they have made during the election campaign.

I mentioned some of the concerns that are raised in this area of pensions and the clawback of pensions, but this is not the first time we have seen an attack on the senior citizens of this country. We all remember back in 1985 when this Conservative government attempted to deindex old age pensions.

[Translation]

We remember very well the role the opposition played in forcing the government to withdraw its bill. I remember very clearly the outstanding role played by the former Member Jean-Claude Malépart, and it was quite fitting that his magnificent contribution to the fight against deindexing was mentioned today.

[English]

Indeed, it is appropriate that we acknowledge today the contribution made in particular by the late member for Laurier—Ste. Marie, Jean-Claude Malépart, in this struggle. We all know where he would be in the House today and where he has been with respect to this attack on old age pensions.

That was the first hint that we had in 1985 when the government tried to cut back on old age pensions, tried to deindex old age pensions and was forced to step back in the face of overwhelming opposition from Canadians.

We got another hint of the true attitude of Conservatives to senior citizens in the words of the member for Mississauga South who chairs the Finance Committee. This is a senior Conservative. He has been a member of this Parliament since 1979. What did he have to say about seniors?

This is the attitude of a senior member of that Conservative caucus, the chair of the finance committee. When Conservatives expressed their anger and their outrage about the GST, he said: "Well, don't worry about that, older people don't wear out their clothing, they don't wear out their furniture and they don't run around and all of that costs dough". That from the Conservative chair of the finance committee.

Where were all of his Conservative colleagues? They were probably shrinking back in horror at the words of their Conservative colleague, but where were the members from British Columbia, from Alberta and from across this country? Where were they standing up for seniors and telling their colleague, the member for Mississauga South, that this was an insult?

Mr. Blaikie: They were silent.

Mr. Robinson: As my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona has said, they were silent, not a word. That is the attitude of this government. Fortunately, the member for Mississauga South had the honesty to voice that attitude. It is rare that that happens. But that in fact is the attitude of this government.

There are other concerns as well and the member for Brampton—Georgetown has expressed some views on this bill. He supported this bill which would erode the quality of life for senior citizens in this country and if he wants to stand up and defend that, he is certainly entitled to do so.

What we have seen is a clawback provision which over time is going to hit more and more seniors. In fact, the fundamental element of the clawback proposal is that it is only partially indexed to the amount of inflation which is over 3 per cent.

We all know that one of the impacts of the Conservative goods and services tax will be a significant rise in the level of inflation. What we will see over the course of time is more and more families will become subject to this clawback because their incomes will rise faster than the amount of the clawback income threshold.

This clawback, of course, has other weaknesses as well. The fact is that it is a breach of trust with senior citizens of this land because for many years they paid in, in good faith, assuming that one day, having paid into the program, they would in fact receive the pensions to which they are entitled. It was from 1952 to 1971 that seniors in this country paid a special surtax on income that was earmarked for old age pensions.

I remember a senior citizen, an elderly gentleman from Stratford Gardens in North Burnaby, who came to my constituency office and said: "Svend, I'm sure I remember back in the 1950s and the 1960s, when each year when it came time to pay my income tax, having to pay a special surtax for my old age pension. Now, they want to take it away". Well, so much for the Prime Minister's sacred trust. So much for the Prime Minister's promise to the senior citizens of this land.

We are aware as well of the fact that this government has said that it wants to reduce the deficit. Reducing the deficit on the backs of Canada's seniors is not only wrong, but it is fundamentally immoral.

Mrs. Dobbie: You're immoral. You're misrepresenting.

Mr. Robinson: In fact, the Canadian Seniors Network—one of the hon. members for Winnipeg suggested it misrepresented the facts. She can rise in her place and take issue. What they have said is that this partial indexation will mean that by the year 2000, the threshold which is now $50,000 will have fallen to the equivalent of $35,000 in today's dollars. Thirty-five thousand dollars is a significant drop and certainly that will affect hundreds of thousands of Canadian families and Canadian seniors.

The Canadian Seniors Network has pointed out as well that if this government were looking seriously at tax reform, it could raise the rate of the top income tax bracket by 1 per cent and generate exactly the same amount as it is by clawing back old age pensions. That would be a much more just and equitable way of raising these funds.

A government which purports to be concerned about a fairer tax system is doing nothing whatsoever to deal with the appalling problem of child poverty in this country. We learned in a report just this week that a survey was done by the Canadian Association of Food Banks showing that some 400,000 Canadians, almost half of them children, are lining up for food hand-outs at soup kitchens, churches and drop-in centres.

What is this government doing to deal with the problem of poverty, particularly among children in this country? What does Bill C-28 which is now before the House and which represents this government's attempt at tax reform do for the poor and the children in this country who are living in poverty? In fact, 151,000 children every month depend on food banks for their food in this affluent country of ours. There is something profoundly wrong which is not in any way being addressed by this legislation now being debated under the hammer of closure this evening.

This legislation will do nothing whatsoever to reduce the disparities between the wealthy and the poor. In fact, in 1984 the top 10 per cent of the population in Canada held more than half of the country's wealth. The top 20 per cent held close to 70 per cent of all the wealth and the bottom 20 per cent had less than nothing. In fact, they owed more than they owned.

Surely any government that believes in social justice would recognize that we have a fundamental task here to redistribute wealth, to ensure that no one in this land is dependent on food banks for survival.

Mrs. Dobbie: Communism doesn't work. They're tearing down the Berlin Wall.

Mr. Robinson: Instead of moving in that direction of redistribution of wealth and income, what this government is doing is breaking the promise that it made to senior citizens, to the children of this country and to families and clawing back those pensions and those family allowances. We in this party say that that is wrong and that that is a betrayal of the promises that this government has made.

Madam Speaker, there are other ways to find the money needed for social programs in Canada. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Yorkton-Melville, pointed out that more than 90,000 companies made $27 billion in profit in 1987 without paying a cent of income tax.

Madam Speaker, instead of asking for money from Canada's seniors, who have already contributed for a long time to their retirement pension, why not collect taxes from these companies that paid nothing?

Madam Speaker, our present tax system is unfair and when businesses do not pay, ordinary citizens pay, and pay dearly.

[English]

In fact, that is what this legislation is all about. It is about transferring the burden of taxation to seniors, transferring the burden of taxation on to those who are least able to bear it.

There are other aspects of this legislation as well, but in closing, I want to emphasize what the National Council of Welfare, an advisory committee to the government, has said about the clawback provisions of this legislation. It said that the move away from universal benefits is the most significant change in social policy in a generation, yet it was announced by the Minister of Finance in the budget speech with no prior consultation. A budget is no place to alter the very foundation of Canada's social programs.

That is really what this is all about. It is a fundamental change in the nature of our society. The free trade agreement was part of that. The goods and services tax is very much a part of that. It is a change toward a meaner, harsher Canada, an Americanization of this land. That is what we are seeing in the erosion of our social programs. That is what we are seeing in the erosion of our health care plan in this country. That is what we are seeing in the cut-backs in unemployment insurance and that is what we are seeing today in Bill C-28.

It is for that reason that we as New Democrats reject this clawback proposal to cut back on cost-shared programs and health care and post-secondary education and it is for that reason that in the next federal election the people of Canada will resoundingly reject a government which has betrayed the promises that were made to them and which has broken its faith with the people of this land.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I was interested when my colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway was speaking that the hon. member for Winnipeg South had much to say from her seat. For those who may not have been able to hear what she was saying, when the Hon. Member for Burnaby—Kingsway was denouncing the clawback provision and talking about the whole idea of redistributing wealth, the Member for Winnipeg South was saying:, "Communism doesn't work, don't you know that?"

Apart from noticing that she is a worthy successor to the political tradition established on that side of Winnipeg which regards everything slightly to the left of Genghis Khan as communism, I wonder if the seniors of this country would be interested in knowing that the hon. member for Winnipeg South thinks that they are advocating communism because they believe in the redistribution of wealth or because they believe in universality with respect to social programs and in this case with respect to pensions. It seems to me that is something that the pensioners of Manitoba and other places would like to know more about, how the member for Winnipeg South equates these ideas which have been part and parcel of a political consensus for some time, a consensus which the Conservative Party wants to break now with this budget, is communism.

All those Canadians who supported universality and redistribution of wealth have been communists in the eyes of the member for Winnipeg South and they did not even know it, but they will be interested to know that. I am told that the Prime Minister himself said that. We are talking more about a parrot than someone with an independent thought.

What we are talking about tonight is a departure from the principle of social policy. If the Conservative government wants to establish a reason why it ought to be abandoned, it ought to do so with a little more intellectual and philosohical weight than simply branding it as a form of communism. One of the things that has distinguished Canadian social policy over the years has been the element of universality.

We have said as a country and as a society that there are certain things we want to do because we are a certain kind of community. The people receive because they are citizens. Families will receive a certain amount of support per child because they are families, not because they are poor families or rich families or middle-income families but because they are families. People who are over 65 years of age will receive a certain amount of support because they fall into that category, not as an act of charity but because this is something which Canadians as a community have decided to do for all Canadians who fall into a certain category. The same is true of health care and education. All these things are a way of looking at society.

The Member for Winnipeg South is still yapping from her seat. She had an opportunity to get up when the member for Burnaby—Kingsway sat down and no Liberal rose. She did not rise, perhaps because she has been instructed by her caucus or her whip not to speak for fear of embarrassing the government and bringing more shame down upon its head. If she wants to speak, she is welcome to get up after I have finished.

The principle of universality is a principle that we in the New Democratic Party hold very dear. We do that along with a great many other Canadians. What this government is doing through the clawback is establishing, and they know this, though government members are being clandestine about it, a conceptual watershed in social policy. Once this bill goes through they will have effectively, without really having a debate about it, established that it is okay to deuniversalize programs.

They are hoping to take advantage of the natural reaction of a great many people of what could it hurt to take back some money from people who have a net income of over $50,000. They are hoping that most Canadians will not see that this is the thin edge of the wedge.

In fact, most Canadians have seen that. They realize what is going on and they know that if this principle of universality can be breached for people who have a net income of over $50,000, it is only a matter of time before others can be next. I think that is why there is widespread opposition to this particular measure.

Mrs. Dobbie: Do you think people earning $100,000 should get this?

Mr. Blaikie: I think that people earning $100,000 should be taxed fairly and progressively and heavily. I do not see why pensioners who are earning over $50,000 net should be singled out in the way that this budget does and be asked to give back part of their old age security. If the government opposite wants to raise money from people who are making $100,000 then let it tax people who are making $100,000, but let it not tax the old age security which these people receive from the government. There are plenty of ways to get that money back.

We have always said tax it back, but tax it back as part of the progressive income tax system, don't tax it back in a way that violates the very way we think about Canadian society and social programs. That is the agenda here, it is not the money. It is a paltry sum in the big picture that the Conservatives are raising through this clawback. What they want to do is to score a victory with respect to how we think about social programs so that other social programs can follow, particularly medicare. Because, in this same bill—

Mrs. Dobbie: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blaikie: She is still yapping.

Mr. Rodriguez: She hasn't got anything to yap about.

Mr. Blaikie: As a former Conservative leader once said, you can always tell when you throw a stone into a pack of dogs if you have hit something because you can hear them yelping. I can understand why the members opposite are a little sensitive about this because they remember how angry the general public were, and pensioners in particular, when they tried to deindex the old age pension in the early part of their government in 1985. The fact of the matter is—

Mrs. Dobbie: You're going to give this to people earning over $100,000 just because of 1985?

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, are we going to have some order in the House or is she just going to be able to go on and on like this without ever having the courage to seek the floor?

What I wanted to say is that if the government wants to raise money, as all governments do, there are plenty of ways in which it could raise this money without, at the same time, changing the way in which we think about social policy in this country. The government could tax that money back from old age pensioners who are making more than $50,000 through the progressive income tax system, as I have said. And the same with families who are making $50,000 net. The government could have a minimum corporate tax; it could shut more of the loopholes in the tax system; it could respond to some of the suggestions that have been made recently about devising taxes which would have the parallel effect of encouraging people to do things which are environmentally friendly, the eco-tax or whatever it has been called from time to time. There are many ways in which the government could have been a little creative. The government has been creative, it has been creative according to the Conservative mind. Because, what is the government trying to create?

Since 1984 the government has been trying to create a context in which all the things which it fought against for decades can be dismantled in the course of its two terms of government. All the time it is sort of bouncing from scandal to scandal and scam to scam, step by step it has been dismantling the Canada that was created up to and including 1984. That is what the government got into power to do. Unfortunately, I believe Canadians thought that no one would really contemplate doing these sorts of things. And now Canadians are seeing that this is exactly what the government is about.

Bill C-28 also deals with a reduction in Established Programs Financing. This brings us to the whole question of health care and post-secondary education, but tonight I would particularly like to talk about health care. I remember in the early 1980s there were a lot of debates about EPF and about federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. What has happened since then? Despite all the protests of the Conservatives when they were in opposition about cutbacks in EPF funding, this is the second unilateral cutback in Established Programs Financing that we have seen from the Progressive Conservative Government.

You will remember these are the same people who always talked about the evils of unilateral federal action when it came to federal-provincial relations in the early 1980s. These are the people who made a political career out of denouncing unilateral federal actions when it came to federal-provincial relations and federal-provincial programs. Yet this is the second unilateral cutback in Established Programs Financing that we have seen. Between the federal government and the provinces when medicare was created is being slowly destroyed and more and more of the burden is being put on to the provinces with respect to health care. It is already an onerous burden for even the richer provinces, but particularly the ones that are not rich. It cannot go on like this. Sooner or later something is going to give. We will have a two-tier health care system in the regional sense, that is health care systems in the richer provinces which are far superior to the ones in the poorer provinces. Somewhere down the road, unless the pressure is taken off the health care system, unless more funding is provided in the spirit of the original 50-50 cost sharing arrangement, there will be pressure for a two tier health care system in some of the have-not provinces. of that line, to get to the head of that queue, to get to the head of that waiting list. And do you know what? That is not something the Conservatives will regret because they never liked medicare in the first place.

Then they will say, "You see, there is a need for a private system. There is a need for people who can afford to pay will take the heat off the public system". That will be the beginning of the end of universality in medicare. But it will be easier to do because they will have already established that it is okay to do away with universality in family allowances and old age pensions. So when somebody says, "But this is doing away with universality and that's a sacred principle, is it not, at least the Prime Minister said so", they will say, "Well, it may have been at one point but don't you remember the budget of 1989 when we did away with universality in family allowances and old age pensions? That principle of universality was done away with a long time ago." If we can establish that it is okay to make a difference between rich Canadians and other Canadians with respect to support for families and old age pensions, then we can establish that principle in other areas.

We hear the protestations coming from the other side in the same way that we heard them during the debate just a year ago in the federal election of 1988. We said that UI would be changed in order to make it more like the American system. They said, "You are being silly", just as the hon. member from Brampton is now saying I am being silly. But what did they do after they said we were silly? They came forward with legislation to make our unemployment insurance system more like the American system. Many other things that we said at that time for which we were accused of being silly have come to pass. Now they accuse us of being silly one more time.

Well, I hope they are right. I hope that we will be able to look back some day and say we were wrong in our anticipation that that was going to be the case. But we have not been wrong. Those things which we have pointed to as part of the general trend, as part of a general over-all agenda on the part of this government are all falling into place and they do not have the courage to admit it. Why? Because if they went to the Canadian people and said what they actually wanted to do to this country, if they said how they actually wanted to change it, they would not have won the election. They would not get the support. The Minister of International Trade said that a couple of years ago.

The only member who recently, as far as I can remember, has been honest about the true meaning of the free trade agreement has been the hon. member from Mississauga South who, as usual, is one of the few Conservatives that you do not have to worry about stabbing you in the back. The hon. member from Mississauga South is always running straight at you with a spear so you know exactly where he is coming from. He has in the past, and during the election, been very forthright.

I cannot quote him without being unparliamentary on what the free trade agreement means for the opponents of the Conservative party. It means, for that those of us who have imagined a Canada in which universal programs would not only be maintained but enhanced, for those of us who have imagined a Canada in which we would have more control over our own economic destiny and the ability to determine the future of our own country, that we are finished. That is the polite way of putting what the hon. member for Mississauga South said to me at one point. The free trade agreement will become the context in which all the things that the Conservatives do not have the courage to do directly they will be able to do indirectly. They know that.

I do not blame them for sitting over there smiling like a bunch of Cheshire cats because they know that, unless the Canadian people wake up and in 1992 throw this group out of office, that will be the last chance for the country. Last chance, 1992, because in the second term they will proceed to complete, as far as they can, the agenda which they had in mind all along. It is only at the end of their second term that Canadians will have one last chance to say that this is not what we intended in 1984 when we were so sick of the Liberals and we wanted to vote the Conservatives in. This is not what they intended.

Mr. Mifflin: You don't really mean that, do you?

Mr. Blaikie: I am asked whether I really mean that. People were sick of the Liberals in 1984, and part of the problem was that they had not got over it by 1988, it was that bad.

The fact of the matter is that it is, if you like, a sort of parliamentary and political crime to have to debate universality in the context of an omnibus budget bill, because this is a major philosophical divide that we are crossing, that Parliament is being asked to cross with the instrument of closure at our heads.

I regret very much that debates on these sorts of things do not get the kind of attention, if you like, that they may have at one point because what we are talking about here is the very nature of the country. I think it is one of the things that has made our country a better place to live. I think there are a lot of people on the other side of the House who do not know what they are doing. I do not mean that in the sense that they are stupid, although that would apply in some cases, I mean it in the sense that they do not really know what the long-term consequences are of playing and tampering with these values that are held so widely in Canada.

We are the kind of country that we all value—at least I assume they value—because we have had a different notion of community and a different notion of social policy than our neighbours to the south. They are moving us off in this new direction which takes us closer and closer to the way things are organized in the United States of America. It is a regrettable piece of legislation indeed.

Mr. McDermid: What a lot of crap.

Mr. Blaikie: It is not a lot of crap, as the hon. member for Brampton has so profoundly responded to my criticisms. It happens to be a view that is held by the Canadian Council on Social Development, the National Council on Welfare, the Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian labour movement, you name it.

Mr. McDermid: You name a socialist group and they say it.

Mr. Blaikie: Oh, these are all socialists groups. Some of them are funded by the government, oddly enough.

He is a little more progressive than the hon. member for Winnipeg South. She thinks that everyone who disagrees with her is a communist. The hon. member for Brampton thinks that everyone who disagrees with him is part of the socialist conspiracy. There is a conspiracy of people in this country who care about the way things are done in terms of social programs and who care about the principle of universality and they are the people that this government should be listening to instead of their own paranoid fantasies about their critics.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I found it very difficult to join this debate because I think the debate has degenerated into a name calling and silly type of argument that we are hearing from the other side.

I would like to remind the House that we are not debating universality today. We are debating a bill, and we are debating efforts by this government to create an economic situation in Canada that will allow us to keep all those social programs that we on this side of the House value as much as do members on the other side of the House. I want to remind the House that when we took office in 1984 the government of that day was borrowing $16 billion to run programs. It was actually borrowing $16 billion to run programs that the government had in place.

The government had to borrow because the revenues it was receiving under the taxing system, revenues to the federal government, were $16 billion short of what it needed to run the programs. Revenues today exceed $9 billion over expenditures. Madam Speaker, add the $16 billion to the $9 billion and you will see that we have turned that around. We have had a $25 billion turnaround, something that the members on the opposite side of the House do not want to recognize and do not want to understand.

They talk about unilateral cutbacks. I heard my hon. friend talk about the unilateral way that this government is moving with cutbacks. I want to remind that member that this government has cut program spending to where the increase is below the level of inflation at 3.6 per cent. That compares with the provincial government program spending increases going up, for some of them as high as 16 per cent, but on an average of 6.5 per cent.

What we are doing—

Mr. Blaikie: You are transferring the burden to them.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, the hon. member does not like to hear these kind of figures so he is going to interject, and I understand that. He spoke about health care. Again I would like to remind everyone in this House and the people of Canada that health care is not universally free to every individual in Canada. Anyone who is drawing a salary is paying their health care premiums. Those who can afford it are paying more, those who cannot afford it do not pay a premium. We all understand that. We still consider that a universal program. We all subscribe to that and we all work very hard. We pride ourselves on having one of the best health care systems in the world. Those that can afford it pay a higher premium for the health care benefits that they receive and those who cannot afford it do not pay a health care premium. We all understand that.

We all know that we have today an accumulated debt of $350 billion. That is made up of $200 billion of a debt that we inherited, an accumulated debt, and $150 billion in interest. We are attempting, through very difficult times, to create an economic climate in Canada that will allow us to preserve the health care system, the old age pensions, and all of the rest. Let us look at the old age pension for a moment. I have talked to constituents of mine who are receiving the old age pension and when they recognize the difficulty we are in they, above all, the ones who I have talked to who are earning $50,000, $60,000, and $70,000 income in their retirement, are more than happy to return, under the tax system, that portion of their old age security or old age pension that they are receiving now. If we do not take action on the deficit and the debt, if we do not get that under control like we are supposed to be doing, their children and their grandchildren are going to have to carry the burden.

If you really analyse it and if members will honestly look at the situation, they will recognize who the real supporters and the real friends of the social programs that we have in this country are. There are people on this side of the House who are willing to take the very hard decisions that have to be taken, whether it is a goods and services tax or attempted are to bring the economic situation of Canada into line because of the misadministration and the mismanagement of government by the previous administration, by the Liberals, and supported fully, supported 100 per cent, by the NDP sitting on their left. Every time a program was brought into place it was either at the instigation of the NDP or the Liberal government supported by the other party. These were programs that we in Canada could not afford. They are the ones who put us into this debt and we, as financially responsible members of Parliament and government, are attempting to put right what has been so wrong for so many years.

Let me go back to the comment that my friend made. He said that this government fought against unilateralism by the federal government. Yes we did, we certainly did. We fought against the unilateral decision made by this government to impose a national energy program on western Canada. You are darn right we fought against that. We fought against it because we said it was wrong to steal revenue from other provinces, and we righted that. One of the first things we did when we took office was get rid of the National Energy Program and the Petroleum Gas Revenue Tax.

What did we hear from the NDP? What did we hear from the Liberals? Well, I'll tell you, they didn't support it. They supported bringing in a National Energy Program and the NDP even went so far as having their energy critic getting up in this House and saying it did not go far enough. They said what you should be doing is nationalizing the largest one, nationalizing Imperial Oil. That was the statement that was made by the NDP, and they talk about unilateralism. It just boggles my mind to hear the garbage that has been coming from that side of the House.

I am not going to say any more. The only thing I would say in closing is that these initiatives have to be taken because this Government of Canada, the very foundation of this government, is going to crumble if we do not get our deficit under control. We have to do it and our only hope is that my hon. friends from the other side will recognize some of the very difficult times that this country is going through in the financial area and get behind us and help us determine the best way to go about putting this government in a position of financial security so that these social programs can remain in Canada and be the pride of Canadians and so all of us can walk out of here with our heads held high.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Madam Speaker, in rising to speak in this debate it is interesting that we are continuing with an approach we have seen now for the last year or so in this House in the way the Government approaches problems in this country. We are discussing a bill that is described as an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements, and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related act.

In listening to my colleague opposite opening his address to the House I heard him say that we are not debating universality. My point is that government members remain consistent, say one thing and do the other, because in fact we are debating universality. The unfortunate thing is that we are debating it under the guise of income tax and other tax reform. It seems to me that the people of Canada understood the problem of the deficit and certainly now more than ever before in our history understand the importance of the debt which this government has been able to double in five years from $170 billion to $350 billion. Those are things that Canadians understand, but I would think what they would appreciate from this government is for people to do what they say they are going to do. If we are talking about reforms to the Income Tax Act that are going to result in clawbacks, what we should be saying is that we are talking about changing the social fabric of this country, the social support systems, and be very candid about that.

I was amazed to hear my colleague opposite suggest that the Conservative government has gone through hard times in the last five years and has had to make difficult decisions. Canadians have heard from this government that the last five years have seen unparalleled growth in this country, have seen the economy improve on the basis of good management. So, how can the government say that everything is moving ahead in a very progressive way under Conservative management, and then say at the same time that we are in a position where we have to look very harshly at social programs because we cannot afford to pay for them.

That is the key, and I think that is a very good point. If you want to change social programs you can always trap people by putting them into an embarrassing position. In my view, if there is a group of people in this country who should never be embarrassed it is our senior citizens. The senior citizens that I speak to in this country are embarrassed because, by dint of hard work and through very careful management of their funds, some of them have accumulated some money, some of them have been able to develop a capacity to generate $50,000, $60,000 or $75,000 a year revenue. Some of us in this House may do that over the years.

Mrs. Dobbie: And you are saying that we should still give them old age security?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the comments of people who are suggesting that there is something apparently wrong with having people making $75,000 or $100,000 a year and not paying their fair share of taxes. If that is the case what we should do is address the legislation that is particularly relevant. Let us talk to the senior citizens of this country and ask if they are prepared to make all of these contributions and not be concerned about this chipping away of their security, because what is a threshold today that looks very high and perhaps only affects people with relatively high income could, in a very short of time, change significantly. If we want to do this to them I think we should be telling them directly. There is no one better organized in this country than senior citizens through their senior citizens clubs, through the New Horizons Program that this government supports which previous governments instituted.

Let us go and ask them. Let us not embarrass them by forcing people making over $50,000 a year to have to fight this battle. They have fought their battles in this country and they have paid their taxes over the years in this country, they do not deserve to be put in the very awkward position of trying to fight this legislation on the basis that somehow they appear to be trying to hang on to what people would describe as too much money.

I am not going to debate whether or not the government should change its approach to how it takes care of people of 60, 70, 80 and 90 years of age. But if you want to do something, all Canadians expect is to be told what you want to achieve. Do you want senior citizens to pay down the debt? Do you want senior citizens to reduce the deficit? Ask them. Tell them. Do not say it is because you have too much and we want to take some away from you.

• (2100)

Mrs. Dobbie: No, that is not what we are saying.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): What are you saying, then?

Mrs. Dobbie: What is being said is that what has been given to you is only deserved if you have an income that is less than what it takes to live on.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The point that I am trying to make is that I believe that senior citizens should have the same rights as anyone else in this country. I do not want to in any way appear condescending to senior citizens, but I think that many of them for all kinds of reasons that every member of this House should understand, do not feel that they can fight these big battles any more. They have spent their time in the trenches. If I am wrong, then senior citizens will tell me and will tell you, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Dobbie: And they do.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I have been to Alberta and Manitoba and I have not had senior citizens saying: "My goodness I am glad that you have begun the process of eroding our security". I have not even heard people 50 and 55 years of age saying that.

Mr. McDermid: They have said: "We do not need it so tax it back".

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I am sure that what—

Mrs. Dobbie: I know what senior citizens in my riding are saying. I have talked to them.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Listening to members opposite I am sure that what they are saying is accurate to one extent. Senior citizens are generous. They do understand their commitment to Canada. Some of them would say that they would pay down, that they would pay their share if they had a few extra dollars. However, I opened my comments by saying that you say one thing and you do another. Is there someone, Mr. Speaker, to your right saying that the debt will be reduced next year?

Mr. Shields: The deficit will be, yes.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, is there someone to your right saying that the deficit will be reduced next year?

Mr. Shields: Yes.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): By how much?

Mr. Shields: You will find out. Wait and see.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, one thing is for sure. We have been told by members to your right that the goods and services tax will be a deficit reduction tool, but in the very same document it states that it is revenue neutral.

Mrs. Sparrow: The 23.9 is revenue neutral.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the 23.9 is revenue neutral. The difficulty for Canadians—

Mrs. Dobbie: You are talking about old age security and whether people who earn over $50,000—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): I wonder if the member for Gloucester might wish to make a speech rather have a question and answer period.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to be rude to members opposite. It appears as though they have a number of things to say about this particular piece of legislation.

The difficulty that I have in listening to these comments—and I am listening to an hon. colleague from Alberta—is that they say that they are listening to people. Again, many of us are listening to what people are saying in Alberta. We do not even have to go out to Alberta to hear them because they are allowed to speak out in the presence of two members from your right, Mr. Speaker, in debate in the west on the goods and services tax, for example. Who are you listening to?

We are told, by members here apparently, that the population of Alberta must support the goods and services tax because members to your right support it, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Dobbie: What does that have to do with old age security?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): It has to do with telling the truth. Who are you listening to? If you do not listen to people who do not like the goods and services tax, why would you be listening to senior citizens who do not like this approach to a clawback of what they have legitimately earned? Who are you going to listen to?

Mr. McDermid: We listen to everybody.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The point is that they say they listen when in fact they do not. They say it will reduce the debt when in fact it will not. They say it will reduce the deficit when in fact it will not. They say the debt that this country is faced with was created by mismanagement of previous governments.

Mr. Shields: It sure was.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): When this government came to power the people of Canada owed $170 billion.

Mr. McDermid: It was $200 billion.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Today the people of Canada owe $350 billion.

Mr. Shields: Interest on the debt.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): What we do not accept is that people who will not understand simple arithmetic are talking to people and saying: "We are listening to them". You have not listened to people who say you have to reduce the deficit. The deficit is still over $30 billion a year. You talk about it but you do not do anything about it.

What I do agree with is if you are going to do something, then tell the people exactly what you intend to do. If you are going to tell senior citizens in this country that they have too much money and you want to tax them back, then tell them that, but do not tell them that you are going to reduce the deficit with their money because you have not been able to do that in the last five years.

Mrs. Sparrow: Nonsense.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I listened to my hon. friend tell us that the income was now $16 billion more than what it was.

Mr. Shields: You were not listening.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): In 1984 they were borrowing $16 billion to pay for programs.

Mrs. Sparrow: That is you.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): That is right, our predecessors.

In 1989 there has been a $25 billion turnaround. That is what was said. The debt in 1984, when this $16 billion was being borrowed, was $170 billion.

Mr. McDermid: It was $200 billion.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): What we will do is give members opposite the benefit of the doubt and we will say $200 billion.

Now, in 1989, after five years of good management, the debt is $350 billion. This is the kind of turnaround this government likes. The Conservatives are managing things so well that they have nearly doubled the national debt even according to their own admission.

To continue on the same line, what has been stated is that we could not afford some of these programs. This was stated by my friend just moments ago in his speech to this House. I quote: "Some of the programs we could not afford".

What we should do when we discuss this bill, Mr. Speaker, is have hon. members to your right get up and tell us which programs they cannot afford. That is what we need to know. It is not a question of whether senior citizens have so much money that you want to claw it back from them. If there are programs we cannot afford, there is one thing the people of Canada would like to be able to have and that is a straight answer on what it is that this government cannot afford.

It was very nice to listen to people opposite and perhaps we will get some answers to some of the things we are discussing tonight.

The element of attitude involved in all this debate on the kinds of directions that Canada is taking is illustrated when we, for example, listen to people in this House say that senior citizens are telling members of the government that they want this kind of a tax measure passed.

Are they speaking for associations of senior citizens? Are they talking about senior citizens' clubs across this country in the provinces of Quebec, British Columbia and Atlantic Canada? Are they getting petitions from senior citizens saying: "Please start this process of eroding the security that we always felt was ours and that was a guarantee in Canadian society"? Who are they listening to?

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that members to your right who have been here for more than six years have security.

Mrs. Dobbie: I have security.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I listen to my friend say: "I have security". Is the hon. member comparing herself to a senior citizen now? There are different kinds of security. For many years in this country Canadians believed that they had security.

The Prime Minister of this country guaranteed Canadians security by saying that universality was a sacred trust.

Mrs. Dobbie: At $50,000 you are still secure.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Is it a sacred trust at $50,000, $35,000 or $25,000? Or, did we miss part of that phrase: "It is a sacred trust but there is a threshold to my sacred trust".

• (2110)

Mr. Shields: They are still getting it.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): They are still getting it, but he who giveth also taketh back.

We are going to have all kinds of opportunities to talk about the undertakings we have made to Canadians as legislators. We are going to have to decide when people are going to talk to Canadians—

Mrs. Dobbie: At $50,000 a year you still get $325 or so a month old age security, so let's get the facts straight.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): There is no question that the intervention being made by my colleague is part of the ploy whereby you can say to Canadians: "Come on, can you be serious about questioning people paying back their fair share when they receive over $50,000 or $60,000 or $70,000 a year?" That is the crack in the sacred trust. It is the beginning. Nobody thought that they would simply get rid of old age pensions, or get rid of family allowance, or cut back on post-secondary education. It is: How do you start the process? How do you begin to convince Canadians that you are not going to be able to live in this country under a set of social standards—

Mrs. Sparrow: What we are doing is convincing them that they will be able to live in this country.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I am looking forward to hearing those convincing arguments. I know the one argument that works in this House: a majority government defeats the opposition. That argument comes up whenever there is a vote.

Some Hon. Members: Right.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): There is no question that my colleagues across the way are right. When you have a vote, you lose. There is no question about that when there is an elected democratic majority.

Perhaps there is another consideration, though. It is how the majority got to be the majority. What was said to get them there? Sacred trust gets you there. Breach of sacred trust can move you out of there.

Mr. Shields: Just like wage and price controls.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): You know something, today—

Mr. Shields: Do you remember that one?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Yes, I do indeed.

Today, this very day, I heard the words again: "wage and price controls". Several months ago in this House I heard the words: "wage and price moderation".

Mr. Lewis: So it's moderation now.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The hon. House leader also heard the words: "wage and price moderation". This very day I had someone ask me "what do you think the chances are of the government introducing wage and price controls", all I could say was that I asked the question a couple of months ago—

Mr. Corbeil: You should know. What did you do with them?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Trudeau introduced wage and price controls—

Some Hon. Members: After saying that he wouldn't.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): That is right. There is no question that governments have often said one thing and done another.

I want to tell you one thing, Madam Speaker. It is a very easy thing to say that we are going to point a finger at what was done 10 or 15 years ago and to say that because they did it you would do it also. My question tonight to my friends opposite is very simple. Are you going to do it? We know what the Liberals did 10 or 15 years ago. What are you cooking up? Wage and price moderation sounds a lot better.

Mr. McDermid: We are cooking up a country that will be able to operate soundly for decades to come. That is what we are doing.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Madam Speaker, apparently we have the answer.

I want to say in closing that no matter what government says it or what political party says it, you keep saying one thing and doing another. One thing is going to happen to you is what has happened to governments before you that did the same thing.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I have a little problem here tonight. The member for Winnipeg South has departed the chamber. For the last hour or so she has been carrying on a heckling session with members on this side when they were speaking. One would think that if she had anything useful to say she would go on the record publicly and all the folks watching TV could hear what she is saying because it is forward into the past when she speaks. That is one comment I have. The other one is: I do not know for the life of me what it is that infects politicians once they become the government.

An Hon. Member: And you never will!

Mr. Rodriguez: I suppose that the late I. F. Stone was probably right when he said that government is run by liars and nothing they say should be believed. He was right then, and as I watch it today it is true. I. F. Stone was right.

We saw examples of that. Liberals were running an election in 1974. They ran against Stanfield with wage and price controls. Once they became the government we got wage and price controls.

The Conservatives made a whole list of promises and commitments and as soon as they formed a government they broke every one of them. I do not know what it is. Maybe there are some microbes over there in the desks that crawl up their legs, up their ankles, up their knees, up the main part of their body right into their ears. It invades the brain.

Mr. McDermid: What is your excuse?

Mr. Rodriguez: I have never been in the government so I cannot claim to have any microbes.

I hear the member for Brampton. It is fairly obvious that a cuckoo is resident in his head.

Mr. McDermid: I'd rather have a cuckoo than a woodpecker.

Mr. Rodriguez: A woodpecker would have a heyday with a cuckoo.

On this question of the old age pensions, it is not surprising that they would have in clause 48 this clawback. They were never committed to pensions in the first place. Pensions were first introduced into the House of Commons in 1926.

I want to remind members of this House and the people who are watching that it was first of all $20 a month payable at age 70 and it was means tested. The Conservatives opposed it, Madam Speaker. They opposed a $20 a month old age pension payable at age 70, and it was means tested. What was the argument that the Tories used at the time? Can you guess the argument?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): That it was not enough?

Mr. Rodriguez: No, of course not. They said that paying 70 year olds $20 a month, not means tested, would make them lazy and would take away the initiative to work. Those are not my words. It is in Hansard. It is true. In fact, they should go back and look at the record. It got passed in the House and went to the Senate. The Conservatives in the other place defeated it and an election ensued in the course of things. Then the bill was brought back and eventually passed.

• (2120)

Mr. Blaikie: You mean a Conservative Senate defeated it?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. And you know how they are all for work over there. They have a commitment to that ethic of work over in the Senate.

I only use that example to sort of remind us as we are discussing this whole question of universality and the clawback that these are people who really have no role to play. Conservatives were opposed to any social program. They are. The record is clear.

On the other hand, in this particular bill—and I want to raise this question very, very seriously—it seems to me that there is a fundamental change in the direction of this country. The record is clear that this party, the New Democratic Party, and its predecessors, the CCF, really believed that in fact the vision of this country was one of collective responsibility; that in fact the reason we are social democrats was because we asked ourselves the question: "Are we our brothers and sisters keeper?"

The answer came back, yes, so it developed that we supported every move and oftentimes initiated moves to establish social justice. With social justice came in its practical application old age pensions, family allowances, unemployment insurance, health care and a whole host of other social programs.

Now what am I hearing today? I am hearing from the other side that that is no longer the case, that it is the triumphant individual. That is the philosophy that I hear from across the way. No longer is the question of collective responsibility what motivates our actions in this House, but rather it is the triumphant individual; it is me. We see that in this worship of the market-place. We see it in this whole question of their worshipping at the altar of the market-place. They have liberated greed. It is in fact: "You have no limitations. You can do anything you want. As long as I am all right, Mac, I do not give a damn about anybody else." That is what it is.

I am not only suggesting but I am declaring; I am saying very clearly.

Mr. Blaikie: She is back.

Mr. Rodriguez: I see the member from Winnipeg South is back. I will say to her face what I said while she was away. I wish she would take the opportunity to get up and put her thoughts on the record so that all Canadians can not only hear her but can see her in the flesh to really realize that there is a body, an entity who is actually saying these things.

What I want to say is that this government is fundamentally changing the pattern of Canada, the face of Canada, the vision of Canada. That was never placed before the people of this country. As a matter of fact, a year ago, on October 17, 1988, the Prime Minister said: "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished by the government which is committed to social justice and fairness for all Canadians."

I remember in the campaign the Prime Minister had his poor mother up on the platform. He had his mother, his sister, everybody. There was his mother, and he said: "Would I do this to my mother?" Well, he just did. I want to say: "Hey, Mama, he just did it to you in clause 48 in Bill C-28. He did it."

Mr. Shields: She does not earn $50,000.

Mr. Rodriguez: I do not know what the Prime Minister's mother earns. I have no idea, but he did it. In fact, not only did he do it in setting these ceilings of $50,000. That is only for starters, because we are down the road. As a matter of fact, the seniors citizens' network of this country puts out a paper called One Voice, and I want to quote what it said:

> In the meantime, once we have accepted the principle of the clawback as part of our system, governments of the day are free to set the threshold as they wish—$30,000, $20,000, etc.
> There are widespread fears that the clawback is the "thin edge of the wedge", a wedge which will destroy Canada's much envied universal social benefits program.

Those are the words of the senior citizens of this country, the united senior citizens of this country; not an isolated group in any one province. This is a national organization.

The Vanier Institute said that this destroys families, that it does nothing for family life. I wish all those people on the Tory benches who claim to be for life would only stop to ask themselves: "How do I practise my pro-life positions on the government side?" How do they practise it? Is it by cutting back all the social benefits that help the family, that support the family, that strengthen the family? Is it by chipping away at benefits for children? Is that how we show we love life? Is that how we show we are for children?

Michael Wilson said it, and we should never forget it. I am saying that social justice is not going to be meted out by the community. Michael Wilson said it is going to be meted out by the bloodless verdict of the market. That is what Michael Wilson said.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know my hon. friend does not mean to do this in the heat of the argument, but he should not, as we all know, refer to an hon. member in this House by his name. He should either refer to him by his constituency or his portfolio if he is in cabinet. I think that hon. member knows that.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure the hon. member for Nickel Belt is quite aware of that. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Rodriguez: I was just going to say, Santa Clawback said that these decisions are not going to be meted out by the community, but they are going to be meted out by the bloodless verdict of the market, except it is the victims of these cutbacks that are going to shed a lot of blood. There is no bloodlessness about what they have in mind.

I wish that the Tories would just simply be honest to their Tory roots with respect to these social programs. I always said when I was in a campaign against a Liberal and a Tory that I have no respect for Liberals because they have no principles, but I have some respect for Conservatives because at least they have principles. I might not agree with them, but at least they have them. Since they have applauded me, now comes the question: Will they at least be honest? Can you be true to the principle of truthfulness and really say what you are about, which is to destroy universality? Isn't that what you are really after? The Prime Minister denies it, the member for Brampton denies it, the member for Athabasca denies it. Why don't they simply stand up and say:

"Yes, we don't believe in universality and we want to start this process of de-universalitizing the programs".

• (2130)

I say to the Conservatives, be honest! Be true to your principles. You believe in the triumphant individual. Why don't you simply say every person is responsible for his or her own pension program. Why don't you just say it? Why don't you say that there is no responsibility for a system that creates votes to redistribute that vote? Why don't you just say it?

Because, Madam Speaker, it is the truth. It is the truth and the one person who tells it like it is, is the one person I have any kind of respect for now on the Tory benches and that is—I can't say his name—Blenkie. Everybody knows Blenkie. Now I think he is euphemistically known as the member for Mississauga South.

He wrote to a gentleman who had written to him regarding the tax back for the old age pensions, and this is what he said:

"With respect to your clawback matter I understand your concern," Blenkarn wrote in response to a letter of complaint filed by 61-year old William Daly.

"We have decided to eliminate universality and we do that in a sense by the clawback in both family allowance and the old age pension."

"As you know, it has been a Conservative philosophy for some time that distributions from the state ought to go essentially to those in need. While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky, it is there."

That is the one Conservative who tells the truth. God knows he tells it in a very colourful way.

An Hon. Member: Where is he now?

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, we all know he is cooking up another theft from the taxpayers called the grief and suffering tax. Madam Speaker, notice what has now crept into the lexicon: "that it will essentially go to those in need." As democratic socialists the system we fought for was a system that allowed people to maintain respect, that allowed people in their retiring years to live with some dignity. It wasn't the system that says, well, you have to apply and there will be a needs test and if you are really poor, we are going to give you charity. This is the philosophy of the triumphant individual. We are in an era of triumphalism. Let us not kid ourselves, Madam Speaker. This is what we are in and these are the acolytes of triumphalism. They are the acolytes and here the Prime Minister denies that this is anti-universality.

With Pinocchio it was the nose. With this Prime Minister it is the chin. Somebody said you can always tell when the Prime Minister is not exactly telling the truth—he moves his lips. I wouldn't be so cruel, but the fact of the matter is why would he persist in saying that this is not a taking away of the universality principle when it is admitted at least by one honest Conservative that it is? At least let the Conservatives be honest. We can deal with something when it is out in the open. But to have this sparring over what they really mean is counterproductive.

So I say to members on the other side, let's go back to what we decided when we built this country with respect to social programs. Do not sit there like a bunch of sheep. Come forward, defy your Prime Minister, defy the Neanderthals in the front benches.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, after listening to the various speakers, I really have the impression we are hearing a dialogue of the deaf. At the same time, it reminds me of a phrase used by the French to define politics. They say that politics is war in peace time, and if we listen to the debate in the House, it is clear this is a war of words.

If we consider what has happened in government during the last ten years, I think Canadians have reason to be disturbed. I repeat, the last ten years, because I am not blaming either party which was responsible for governing this country.

Nevertheless, when we consider the figures, and especially those covering the past five years, we see that in less than 20 years, a deficit that was quite minimal managed to go up to over $340 billion, and there were also the many tax increases we have had since then. Especially in recent years, we have had many new taxes that have put a real burden on taxpayers, especially those with an annual income between $25,000 and $50,000.

Madam Speaker, about two weeks ago, I met a number of businessmen, mostly in the tourism industry, in Vancouver, Calgary and Toronto, and our discussions were remarkably similar. Everywhere, businessmen are saying that the tax burden has become a real problem, and they know there is a problem. Everybody says it is unfair and inequitable, but they cannot say exactly where the problem lies. But they do realize that the tax system is unfair and inequitable, and they are right.

The last time there was an attempt at tax reform in this country was 25 or 30 years ago. That was when the famous Carter Commission report was tabled here in the House but, unfortunately, it was never published. One of my Montreal colleagues mentioned the Carter Commission's famous turn of phrase: "A buck is a buck is a buck". Whether you get it from your pension fund or from investment, or by any other means, it should all be fairly taxed. If it isn't, obviously the money will have to come from another source.

We have seen the many taxes introduced during the past five years put the main tax burden on the middle class, while our financial elite has enjoyed unprecedented tax benefits. It doesn't take a university degree to realize there is something fundamentally wrong with our tax system.

We now have a government making a decision that is unprecedented in our history since we first had social programs. They tell us that when our annual income reaches $50,000, we no longer deserve to get any benefits from the State. And the fact that people made sacrifices to earn this money and invest it over the years doesn't count. It doesn't make sense! And that is why Canadians are sending petitions from all over the country. There is not a single member in this House who has not received petitions or letters from people who have been seriously affected by the way the Government has decided to tax them. The subject is on everybody lips. What does it take to convince the Government that we need sweeping tax reforms?

It doesn't take a university degree, as I said before. It takes some common sense to realize that things have reached the point that we are asking for a revolt.

The middle class is so busy trying to survive and raise a family that it cannot afford tax experts or tax lawyers to find all those tax loopholes. The only class that can afford these frills is the financial elite. If we look at the legislation passed by the House during the past 20 years, we have to say that the governments in power during that time were legislating for the benefit of the financial elite. And if anyone can prove the contrary, I will resign my seat. It's true, and we all are aware of this. We don't have the political guts to put an end to this situation.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Watch your blood pressure.

Mr. Assad: Blood pressure or not, you are the first people who should realize the financial elite of this country have had the run of the country and you are just making it easier for them.

Mr. McDermid: Oh yeah!

Mr. Assad: Yes. You cannot prove the opposite, you know very well.

An Hon. Member: The way you left the country it's a disgrace.

Mr. Assad: Disgrace. There is no disgrace, the facts are the facts. It is a disgrace the way you have been prolonging your lies and the double-talk you have given in this House.

Madam Speaker, I have just been interrupted by a member who doesn't know what he is talking about. He would have us believe that everything is beautiful, when we are looking at unprecedented deficits and very real problems. Do you think I am the only one who shows an interest in this matter and who is mad as hell? All we have to do is travel around the country as I did to realize that people have reached the end of their tether and that the only reason they do not revolt is probably because Canadians have never had a tendency to do so.

However, people do feel the burden, deep inside, and they are concerned. They are concerned when they see their elected representatives, like the Hon. Member who just left the House, who sits in the House as a Minister, turn away as though the problem did not exist. But the problem does exist and we will have to face up to that problem in the House pretty soon. The time will come when Canadians— It is quite true that they are getting petitions from all over the country and from all kinds of organizations that have had enough!

Like most Members here in the House, I represent the middle class, the backbone of our society. I am certainly not exaggerating when I tell you that they have reached the end of their tether and want some justice in our tax system. They know and we know there are problems. It isn't easy, but we have to accept certain decisions, and the political will must be there. Let them have the courage to say they will introduce tax reform, genuine tax reform. And in fact, we could usefully embrace some of the principles defined by a man who was a hero in our history at the time of the Carter Commission.

It was recognized as a revolutionary document in several fields, one which demonstrated some basic principles, that regardless of income, whether from investments, capital gains, pensions, whatever, everything should be taxed. Even succession duties were removed. But many experts and economists say that such a tax is quite appropriate in a democratic country—it is another way of redistributing wealth. That is one of the principles. This document could be used as the basis for a real reform. But unfortunately neither your government nor the previous one implemented the main recommendations of the Carter Commission report, and that is what we must look at. I believe that my fellow citizens, like those whom I have met, who send letters on all sides of every issue, are telling us that we do indeed need a reform. They are quite interested in seeing a government live within its means.

But when they see the deficits and the taxes piling up, they realize there is a fundamental problem. They do not have to be great economists. How many of my colleagues here saw their parents during the depression years forced to make more sacrifices to avoid debt? They adjusted. And we have a long history which proves this ability to adjust. Now, can we believe for a moment that a national or other government can survive on the brink of bankruptcy, especially when the time comes to take such drastic action as cutting vital public programs? That would almost be admitting failure; it would almost mean bankruptcy. But what we must remember is that in this Chamber, we represent all classes of society and to a large extent the middle class which makes up most of the population. These people are saying that they can no longer bear the tax burden. So, our role is very simple. As all Members of the House know, and I am not the only one to say so, time will come when your own constituents will litterally knock at your door and tell you that changes are necessary, that a reform is imperative. Otherwise, we will all suffer, and that is the fate awaiting us.

To conclude, Madam Speaker, I am sure that if every one of my colleagues here in the House took the time to ask their constituents—they do not have to do so since they receive letters—if every one of them was getting to the heart of the problem, they would see that most of the people are concerned and are counting on us to find at least a partial solution.

[English]

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I only want to say a few words tonight on Bill C-28, which is an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act at this second reading debate.

I listened to some of the comments made by the last several speakers who had the floor. Quite frankly, many of the arguments, as the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt pointed out, go back to the time when old age pensions were first introduced in Canada, namely, that people should be self-sufficient. One of the arguments that I heard tonight was why should someone making $50,000 a year receive an old age pension?

I remember in 1985 when this government was proposing to deindex old age pensions, one of the arguments given then was why should bank managers and bank presidents receive old age pensions. That question has been answered both in the House in previous debates and by Canadian society generally. The reason why people should receive those universal social benefits is that they paid for them. That is the only basic argument: They paid for them.

If the government believes that because that individual received that social benefit, his or her income is too high, then there is another way to address that, namely, to bring in a fairer taxation system, not to attack a social benefit that is universally supported in this country and, indeed, can only exist if it is received on a universal basis. Unless society broadly supports that kind of program, it will fail. I think everybody is in general agreement with that.

Senior citizens have paid for those pensions. It is not something that governments give to senior citizens through the goodness of their heart that can be taken away at will. Senior citizens paid for the benefits they received. They paid for them through the income tax system in recent years. It is the same with family allowances. Both programs are already taxed when people receive them. Old age pensions are taxed as a part of income. Family allowances are taxed as a part of income. Why does the government feel it is necessary once again to go after senior citizens?

I remember in the last campaign I received a phone call from a very active senior in my community. I know she will not object to my using her name, Gerry Schwalm. Gerry called me the day after the Prime Minister was seen on national television with his mother assuring seniors in Canada that the opposition parties, the Liberals and the New Democrats were lying to them when we said that the first thing that would be attacked under free trade would be social programs. The Prime Minister pointed to his dear old mother and said: "Would I touch her pension?". Gerry Schwalm said to me: "That guy just scared me half to death. Every time I hear that guy saying that he won't do something to social programs, he is going to do it".

In 1984, this Prime Minister said: "Universal social programs are a sacred trust". It took him five months before he tried to rip them apart. On October 18, 1988, in Summerside, Prince Edward Island, another community that is going to appreciate this, the Prime Minister said: "Let me say a special word to the senior citizens. In the future in Canada we will be doing more not less for all of you. As long as I am the Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved not diminished by our government which is committed to social justice and fairness for our Canadians". Some social justice and some commitment!

Seniors in this country trusted this government when they elected it in 1984. By the time 1988 rolled around there were not too many senior citizens in this country who believed the government any more. I would think there would be even less today after seeing what this government is proposing to do to seniors once again in this piece of legislation.

Senior citizens are not stupid. They know that when the government is talking about clawing back pension benefits for those who earn in excess of $50,000 a year today, next year is going to be a different figure, and the year after that is going to be a different figure.

This government has never believed in the pension system. Since I came here in 1980, I could count on two hands the number of times that that government has tried to go after the pension systems in this country. In fact, just prior to the last election, the Minister of Finance tabled a White Paper on pension reform in the private sector prior to the election. There was such an outcry in this country from organized groups that the government withdrew the White Paper, but it is still sitting there. The government withdrew it because it knew it was going to hurt in the election campaign. However, the White Paper is still sitting there and I will put money on the fact that before we get to the next election we are going to see it again. The Tories are not happy, and they are not going to be satisfied with just going after the public sector, they are going to go after the private sector.

I would recommend to every member in this House, especially the ones who were not here between 1984 and 1988, to get a copy of that White Paper and read it because that is the next fight on pensions.

Now, I said that I was not going to speak too long and I do not intend to. However, I do want to read something and I am going to do it very slowly because I want the government to take heed of it. It is a letter written to The Globe and Mail in Toronto by a senior who was recalling some of the recent history on pension plans and, in particular, how the Old Age Security Act was funded. This letter states:

> Between 1952 and 1971, all taxpayers paid surtaxes to provide for OAS.

Between 1952 and 1971, Canadians paid a surtax to provide the old age pension. It did not run out.

> Beginning in 1972, the Trudeau government made the surtax invisible and raised the tax rate by some 3 percentage points, with the funds raised going to general accounts—and this remains unchanged. Therefore, all old age security recipients have contributed towards this pension plan; they continue to contribute even during retirement; and, lest it be overlooked, such pension payments are included as taxable income.

And that is what this writer calls "double taxation".

Senior citizens have paid and bought and are still paying for their old age pensions. It is not something that somebody is handing to them out of the goodness of their heart. They paid for them. It is much the same argument we are facing from some members on the other side, not all members, but from some members who seem to truly believe that somehow or other seniors are getting charity when they receive OAS and that that charity can be given or taken away at will. They paid for it.

It is much the same argument as was used by that government during the last Parliament when it went after civil servants' pensions, civil servants who, numbers of years ago, agreed to have 1 per cent of their income go to pay for indexation of pensions and this government tried to take it away from them. They had paid for it.

It is much the same argument that we faced from this government when we had amendments to the Pension Benefits Standards Act around 1987 when we dealt with surpluses and private plans. Who do surpluses belong to? Do they belong to the employer or do they belong to the employee? My argument is that they belong to the employee. They are deferred wages. They were negotiated in collective agreements. Those pensions were given up as a part of the wage package in order to provide that individual with a decent pension on retirement. Those moneies belong to the individual. It is no less the case with old age pensioners. They paid for the pensions. They bought them. They belong to seniors.

This government has no right to come along with this kind of legislation and try to grab that money from them. Describing what is happening in this bill as a clawback is absolutely right. It is an apt description of what this government is trying to do, if it gets away with it. It is a clawback. It is like sticking a hand in a senior citizen's pocket and taking money right out of it. That is what this government is doing.

I think it is insidious. I feel it is offensive. It is something I will not support. I would hope that by the time we get into a vote on this that members of the government side who recognize that what is happening here is wrong and should not be allowed to happen will join with the opposition to defeat this.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise and have the opportunity to add my voice to the voice of the opposition against Bill C–28 and to add my voice on behalf of the residents in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap.

This is a fairly substantial piece of legislation. There are about 59 amendments contained in this omnibus bill and certainly I will not be touching on all amendments. I would like to concentrate on a few of them. To begin with clause 47, which is the increased surtax, I think a lot of Canadians do not even realize that virtually every Canadian who pays taxes in this country also is paying a surtax.

People across this country, particularly those who live a long way from Ottawa, out on the west coast for example, feel that the role of the federal government is almost indistinguishable from the role of the provincial government. They are a little confused with what the responsibilities of each of them are. I tell you, Madam Speaker, that breaks down when it comes to tax matters, particularly income taxes. When it comes to tax matters, everyone knows that it is Ottawa's hand that is in their back pocket.

A surtax is defined as an additional or an excessive load or burden in addition to ordinary income tax. In 1986 a surtax was introduced by this federal government on federal income taxes and the rate at that time was established at 3 per cent. It does not apply only to upper–income Canadians. It is payable by virtually any Canadian who is paying federal income tax. They are also paying a surtax.

The government makes the argument for the fairness of imposing this tax by saying that it will ensure that the burden of deficit reduction falls most heavily on those who are best able to carry it. That statement was made in this House recently by the member for Wild Rose and is recorded in Hansard. Obviously since the surtax is payable by virtually anyone who has a taxable income and not just by the top few who can most afford to pay it, the burden does not fall upon only the shoulders of those who can most afford to pay it. The argument of using higher–income Canadians for deficit reduction is a fallacy. It is a sham. It is like this government is a sham in what it is trying to do with this legislation.

The finance minister said that when this surtax was introduced it would be a temporary measure. We have heard of temporary measures before. The income tax I believe was introduced after the First World War as a temporary measure and we still are dealing with it. Just like the surtax was introduced as a temporary measure in 1986, we are still facing it.

A goods and services tax was introduced in the April budget. The finance minister said that when such a tax would be introduced the surtax would be removed. Instead, the surtax is being increased to 4 per cent for 1989 and to 5 per cent for 1990. There is no removal of this surtax. We are getting hammered once again. More is being applied. The GST has been proposed. Where is the provision to get rid of this surtax? Where is the promise that the Minister of Finance made at that time? I think the government is following the axiom of why spoil a good election promise by actually doing something about it.

Moving on to clause 56, this clause implements changes to our federal transfer payments to the provinces for health costs and post-secondary education costs.

The budget that we saw introduced earlier this year outlined a decrease in these payments over the next four years. In that time period the four western provinces will lose $633 million. What is this going to do to health care and education in those provinces? To British Columbians it is going to mean that all too familiar theme that we experienced after the recession in the early 1980s, during the restraint era of the Bennett government, the years that we are still trying to recover from. The news of decreased federal transfer payments is not good news for British Columbians, is not good news for the residents of Okanagan-Shuswap.

A good education for our children, which is insured by these federal transfer payments when it comes to post-secondary education, is not just an expense, it is an investment. It is an investment in the future of this country. It is certainly an investment in the future of our young people.

Being wealthy is not relative to intelligence. Our best and our brightest will not necessarily be among the ones who can afford the best schools. Adequate funding for post-secondary education today, as we all know, is crucial to the future of all Canadians. Reducing these transfer payments jeopardizes that future, it jeopardizes the future of our young people.

In the past Canada has had an exemplary health system. Today I think we would all agree that that system is deteriorating because of inadequate funding and also a tendency of governments to blame the users. Yet health care in Canada is a right. We do not want the American system in which hospital admittance is determined by one's ability to pay, and certainly not by the degree of illness or injury.

Let us turn to clause 48, which is one that most members have been focusing on over the last little while, and that is on the family allowance and old age security clawback, what the government calls a benefit reduction tax.

In the debate on bill C-28, it has been pointed out a number of times in the House that from the 1950s to 1971 people paid about 4 per cent of their income into the Old Age Security pension. My colleague who spoke just prior to me this evening said they have paid for this benefit. They were investing in their future, in their twilight years when people put money into the Old Age Security program. It was a contributory program and people did not mind paying into it because they trusted the government, and they believed that when they reached retirement age that money would be there for them.

Today, this government proposes to tax back that pension. What was paid for by those contributors then and through the years is now being taken away from them. It is being snatched back. It is being literally ripped from their back pockets. That is why seniors right across this country have lost faith and trust in this government. They have seen once again that it never lives up to the commitments it makes.

The Okanagan-Shuswap in the interior of British Columbia is in large measure a retirement area because of the climate and the geography. We have a large percentage of people who are over the age of 65. The demographics in the riding indicate that more than 15 per cent of the population in my area are seniors. The changes that this government is about to make with these clawback provisions will seriously affect the financial future of seniors in those communities. A lot of these retired folk do not receive over $50,000 a year in income, so they are not going to be affected initially. At the same time they have expressed to me in no uncertain terms their fears of what this process has initiated.

They recognize that today when this government sets the clawback threshold at $50,000, tomorrow that threshold may be lowered. I submit that it will be lowered to $30,000, perhaps even lower. Although many of the seniors will not be impacted by these changes, what about tomorrow? They know from what they have seen that they cannot trust this government and they are worried about their financial security as this government tries to rip away the benefits that these people have paid for, trusting that they will be there when they finally retire.

The Old Age Security clawback is based on the formula of inflation minus 3 per cent. As we saw in 1985, seniors fully understand the consequences of deindexing pensions. They knew what the government was up to when it wanted to deindex the pensions from keeping up with the inflation rate. They caught members across the House in the act of trying to quietly claw back those provisions. They stopped them then and what the government has done in an insidious way is come back at the problem again through the back door. It is trying to claw back these pensions by capping them at a higher level. It is a mean spirited provision and it is no wonder that seniors across this country have lost trust and lost faith in this Prime Minister and this government.

The Minister of Finance says that only 4.3 per cent of senior Canadians currently receiving the Old Age Security benefits will be affected by the clawback. That is in 1990. In 10 years it will be up to 8 per cent. In 20 years it will be up to 25 per cent if nothing else is done and we all know that we cannot trust that nothing else will be done.

A 30 year old in the workforce today earning an annual salary of $30,000 will see part of his or her Old Age Security benefits clawed back by the time they retire. We are part of an aging population in this country and that which is of concern to seniors today will be of concern to all of us tomorrow.

I want to move on to the section on family allowances and the clawback provision affecting this benefit. Whereas seniors would need to have a net income of about $79,000 before they would fully lose their old age security benefits, when you look at the threshold for the family allowances that threshold is much, much lower. We have to remind members on the other side of this House why mothers are paid a family allowance. It is in recognition of the very real costs associated with raising children. Our children are our future. The future of those children, I think, is the collective responsibility of all of us in Canada. Anyone who has children knows the significant costs a family bears in raising those little ones from toddlers to adulthood.

Today the family allowance is only a token payment. It does not begin to cover the real costs. The payments fall far short of what it costs to bring up a child. To tax back this token payment amounts to robbery. It constitutes a total disregard for the families and the children and the future of those children in Canada.

In the initial year of the imposition of this clawback, the first year in which it comes into effect, 14 per cent of Canadian families who now receive family allowances will be affected. In 10 years that figure is expected to double simply because of the inflationary aspect of it. In previous speeches in this debate it has been said many times that the clawback funds from Old Age Security provisions and family allowances will be used.

We have heard the government members talk about it time and time again. The argument they give is that those benefits will be used to help those Canadians who really need it, a noble gesture by all means. When you think about it and analyse it, it is totally illogical.

It has been stated also that the imposition of the clawback is for the purposes of bringing down the debt. How are you going to use it to bring down the deficit while at the same time you are using it to funnel it to those people who really need it? It is a logical consistency. The government is guilty of doublespeak on this.

The money that is refunded by the clawback tax is not going to be used to increase the benefits to those seniors and to those families that really need it. On the other hand the government is saying it is going into deficit reduction. In fact, when you look at it, more money for more people will be collected with this tax over the next few years because these benefits are only partially indexed. More and more people will begin to qualify for that clawback provision.

Seniors in this country want to pay their fair share. They want to try to help in the difficult challenge we have of deficit reduction. Families in this country want to do the same thing, but the emphasis here is on the word "fair". How is it fair when one group is singled out and must pay extra taxes when somebody else who is receiving the same income does not pay those taxes at all? A senior with an income of over $50,000 is now going to be subject to a clawback of those very benefits that he paid for years down the road. Somebody under the age of 65 making exactly the same salary does not have to pay that tax at all. Is that fair? I suggest to you it is not fair. It is not fair in the least.

Not only is it not fair but I also submit that it smacks of age discrimination. A seniors group has pointed out that the amount that the government is trying to save by not paying these Old Age Security benefits, by clawing them back, could in fact be collected by raising the taxes of high income earners in our country—the well-to-do—by one percentage point. We could collect the same amount without having to touch the Old Age Security provisions.

Much has been said on the violation of the principle of universality with the erosion of these social programs. The Prime Minister and his broken promises and I repeat, his broken promises, have been quoted by almost every member who has attacked this legislation. The quotes are memorable because they are so incredible. Whether it is only 4.3 per cent of seniors as the Minister of Finance contends or whether it is only 14 per cent of families that are going to be subjected to this clawback, any one person treated differently simply means that the concept of universality which the Prime Minister called a sacred trust is gone.

The government argues that the programs are still universal, that everyone still receives a cheque, but a number of the recipients have to return those cheques. The numbers who will fall under this category as I stated before will steadily increase over the years.

There is no question that this is the beginning of the end of the enshrined concept of universality the Prime Minister holds apparently so dear to heart. These programs are no longer universal, but they are by the intent of this legislation now selective.

I want to turn to one final point and I think this is probably one of the most salient issues in my arguments tonight because I think that one of the most telling points that comes out of the debates and the comments that we have heard throughout this evening is that there is something very elementary lacking, and that is the lack of trust in this government as a result of what it has done over its two terms. It is an oft-repeated comment, whether it is on this bill or the goods and services tax, that this is only the beginning. This is only the beginning of the end.

• (2220)

People trusted what was said by the Conservatives and this government. When they promised not to touch the social programs they believed them. People trusted the Prime Minister when he said that social benefits especially to the elderly would be improved. It would not be diminished. Those are not my words, those are the words of the Prime Minister. The Canadian people trusted him when he said that and I submit that that trust has been abused. Its sole purpose was to win votes. That trust is gone. Canadians no longer trust this government. Universality is gone, trust is gone and I hope that soon enough this government will also be gone.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Although it is getting late, Madam Speaker, I should like to deal briefly with this Bill, because we have just had a week off. Most of us, I think, spent it in our respective ridings. Madam Speaker, I am sure you too have constituents who are quite worried about the fact that the government is planning to raise new taxes. Canadians are complaining that they cannot make ends meet. This is the very first day we spend in the House. What are we dealing with? Taxes again. Taxes, whether sale taxes, income taxes, sale taxes on goods and services, all kinds of taxes.

As recently as this afternoon, because I had been unable to return all my calls, I tried to reach some of my callers from Ottawa. For instance, there was a lady who wanted to know if she could collect her child tax credit before filing her income tax return because she could no longer make ends meet.

Madam Speaker, it is easy for the Government, whatever its political stripes, to say that it must raise new taxes. It needs only introduce a new legislation. Can the old pensioner who does not have enough money seek more from the government? Can the worker who cannot balance his budget obtain a raise from his employer? I think the time has come for us to put a stop to this madness and behave responsibly. It is not the way to solve the problem. Madam Speaker, I realize that for the past five years, the government has insisted on the need to raise taxes to cut the deficit. But the deficit has not increased. As of March 31, 1984, according to the official statistics for the last complete fiscal year before this government came to power, the deficit amounted to $32 billion. But if we look at the Minister of Finances' forecast for next year, we are still at $32 billion. After five years of an extraordinary economic performance, including 32 tax increases, the deficit still amounts to $32 billion, while the national debt will have tripled by the time this Government completes its second term. Tax increases, therefore, are definitely not the solution, and by the time the new tax is implemented in January 1991—

[English]

The GST will be imposed, a 9 per cent tax across the board, on everything. The government may try to tell Canadians that yes, you will pay 9 per cent on everything but the federal manufacturers' sales tax of 13.5 per cent will be removed. First of all, how is this going to happen. There is no way the government, if it is looking for control, is going to remove that 13.5 per cent.

Speaking of the 13.5 per cent, in 1984 when this government took office, the tax was only 9 per cent. In five years it increased it to 4.5 per cent. What guarantee do Canadians have that the new GST of 9 per cent will remain 9 per cent. Maybe in a few years it will be 20 per cent. Imagine 20 per cent or 9 per cent plus the provincial sales tax.

The government tells Canadians to look at the over 40 countries around the world that have GST or value-added tax.

But it forgets to tell Canadians that is the only tax, one sales tax. We have 11 sales taxes in this country. When you add all that together, Canadians cannot take it any more. It is very easy.

You do not have to be an economist or a genius to understand that Canadians cannot afford to pay tax any more. And what do we do? We take a week off. The major concern of our electors is stop increasing taxes. The first day that we come back, we have a bill and we have to stay late into the night because the government is in a rush and has to pass the bill because it needs the money. Where will this money come from? It will come from the taxpayers.

The members on the other side might laugh, but I can assure them that in my riding and in many of my colleague's ridings, it is not a laughing matter. It is a very serious matter. Canadians are fed up. I would not be surprised if by the end of 1990 we will not have a tax revolt in this country because Canadians are fed up.

I do not want to take too much time of this House. I think if the Conservative members want to vote, I am sure that when the time comes Canadians will judge them. I want to make sure it is in the record that Canadians are fed up with tax increases and new taxes. I think it is time if the government wants to look seriously at the deficit problem and the debt problem, it should look elsewhere because in the past five years we have seen over 30 tax increases. After five good years of economic performance the annual deficit is at the same level as it was five years ago and the national debt is going to be tripled by the end of this term of the government.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in the second reading debate on Bill C-28, an act which has the effect of implementing the April budget of the government and in particular the provisions which will claw back, as the expression has come to be used, old age pensions and family allowances and which will cut back a number of important federal funding programs including the Federal Provincial Fiscal Arrangements, Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

We have heard a lot of anger in the House tonight. I share that anger and I know many of my constituents in Victoria share the anger at the government's approach on this particular bill and, more generally, the approach it is now clear it has been taking over the last year on a range of public policies for this country. This bill fits in the over-all program and agenda which the Conservative party is now foisting upon the people of Canada. That agenda started in December with the free trade legislation.

Mrs. Campbell: (Vancouver Centre): Hurray.

Mr. Brewin: We hear "hurray" from the member for Vancouver Centre. I am pleased to see the member for Vancouver Centre here tonight. I am looking forward to her rising in her place and challenging this legislation which is punitive to seniors, punitive to the poor, punitive to families in Canada, punitive to those who are trying to get an education in this country. So far we have heard silence from the Conservative members from British Columbia. I look forward to her intervention in this debate.

The clawback provisions of this bill are the Conservative's rebound from the political failure they met in 1984–85 when they tried more directly to end universality in old age pensions and in family allowances. They retained a small portion, even then, of their attack on universality because they allowed a certain amount of deindexing through the work of inflation. Now they have come upon a formula which has permitted them to destroy the principle of universality with relatively small outcry from the country as a whole. I believe the lack of response in the public is in part due to a defeatism brought on by the sense of loss that comes with the free trade agreement, a loss of the direction of this country, but also the sense that the Conservatives, with their majority, are driving through a reactionary and regressive agenda which is going to change the nature of this country over the next few years.

It took years, a fight led by parliamentarians such as J.S. Woodsworth and Stanley Knowles, to finally push the Government of Canada into introducing old age pensions in this country. Back in 1926, Mr. Woodsworth and his colleagues used the minority government situation to force a Liberal government to introduce old age pensions, but the old age pensions were then introduced with a means test. It then took over 20 years to finally persuade the Government of Canada to change that, and then it was not an act of generosity on the part of the Government and Parliament of Canada but because of the political threat from the CCF, as it then was, which had been pounding away at the issue on behalf of seniors that the means test was unfair and ungenerous.

Finally, the principle was established that as a right, Canadians were entitled to an old age pension. Rich, poor or middle income, irrespective of income, Canadians as Canadians were entitled to family allowances. These universal programs meant that we had a distinctive social network. They formed the base of our distinctive social network in this country which distinguished us from the country to the south.

Conservatives never did like universality. In fact, the member for Mississauga South who is the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance and has this fall been regaling Canadians with a series of quotes, said in a letter to a Mr. Daley from Edmonton: "With respect to your clawback matter, I understand your concern. We have decided to eliminate universality". He went on: "As you know, it has been a Conservative philosophy for some time that distributions from the state ought to go essentially to those in need. While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky, it is there".

The Conservatives tried in an awkward and messy way in 1984 and 1985 to put their agenda into effect. Now they are doing it again with three full years before the election, greeting an electorate that is tired and worn down by the hypocrisy and reactionism of this government.

We are not going to allow this bill to pass without speaking out. The people of Victoria, and particularly the seniors of Victoria, have had it up to here with the broken promises of the government. This was the government, during the election last year in its attempt to defend free trade, which was forced to say, "This will not erode our social programs. Universality is a sacred trust". It did not take the government four months before it had broken that commitment to the seniors of this country and to the people of this country.

The Conservatives are, by this provision, changing the income tax law so that at a certain point, 100 per cent of income earned from old age pensions or family allowances will be taxed back. If you earn your money through dividends, salaries, capital gains or gifts, those are taxed, if at all, at a different rate. At a certain level, old age pensions are taxed 100 per cent.

This breaks faith with election commitments. The cynicism of the Canadian people continues to grow at the speed with which this government breaks its election commitments, but it breaks a long-standing commitment from this Parliament to the people of Canada who have tried to plan their futures as seniors on certain commitments coming from the Parliament of Canada. This government, instead of what we would say in the labour context of grandfathering the clause are in effect making a retroactive change. They are changing today the basic pensions which frugal, prudent Canadians over the years have used as a base for planning their retirement income. I say that this change must not occur.

Let me deal with a couple of other aspects of this bill. The government has said that in this new free trade era, education is one of its major priorities. Yet this bill will have the effect of cutting back even further on federal support for basic education and for post-secondary education. This bill will permit the government to cut back on health care and on social assistance across Canada. It does so in the name of deficit cutting.

The seniors of Victoria, the people of Victoria, the people across this country, know that we cannot permit the deficit to continue, a deficit which has grown to mammoth proportions under this government. What we say should be the priorities in deficit cutting are not to be placed on the backs of the seniors or families or students or those involved in health care, the poor in this country, but instead we must attack the deficit in this way.

We must cut government waste. We must take a hard look at the $1 billion we are spending on maintaining troops in an outdated commitment in Europe. We must look at reducing interest rates. We must look at an eco-tax, at a wealth tax. We have to change the corporate tax rates in this country and we have to change the tax rates at the upper level.

This government has cut the tax rates at the upper levels. A simple increase to 34 per cent would add nearly $2 billion to the coffers of the government. That is what should be done instead of the kind of changes which are contemplated in this bill.

With the GST, with these clawback provisions, this government continues its agenda of eroding social programs, of creating two nations, a rich and a poor, of bringing us further into the same programs as our colleagues to the south of us have. We are now beginning to look more and more like the United States because of the agenda which this government is foisting on the Canadian people. I ask this House of Commons to defeat this bill when it comes to a vote later this evening.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on Bill C-28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act. Specifically, I would like to speak to the clawback clauses in the bill.

If I may, Madam Speaker, I would like to go back a little to what is going on. As a member of Parliament from an opposition party, I have had a chance to watch the implementation of the Tory agenda. At times I have been at a loss to explain what the government is trying to accomplish.

During the past four months, the government has introduced the UI bill which will place the entire burden on working Canadians and small businesses. We have also seen cuts to regional development funding to econmically depressed areas of Canada. We have seen the government support the Bank of Canada's high interest rate policies which again hurts small business and working people, while at the same time making Canadian exports more expensive. Now we have the goods and services tax which takes income out of the hands of Canadians and increases the cost of goods and services to consumers and the operating cost to small business.

When the election was in full swing, there were some comments made by the Minister of Finance, who at that time called the Leader of the Liberal Party and the Leader of the New Democratic Party liars, and I would like to refer back to that if I may.

Mr. McDermid: The Prime Minister never said that.

Mr. Parker: I said the Minister of Finance. In The Globe and Mail of October 31, he was quoted as saying, "Programs which are generally available such as medicare, pensions, old age security, aren't trade-distorting subsidies, and are not subject to trade laws".

The Leader of the Liberal Party in the debate Tuesday night said that he, the Prime Minister, has agreed to let the Americans have a say in the future of our social programs such as unemployment insurance and medicare. The Minister of Finance said, "I say to Mr. Turner, that is a lie". That is a quote from The Globe and Mail.

The comment was made by the Leader of the Liberal Party that our unemployment insurance programs were in jeopardy. The government has backed out of that program and has now put it solely in the hands of the workers and the employers. The government does not contribute five cents so there is no subsidy and the Tories can say to their American friends that they are fulfilling our free trade agreement.

The New Democratic Party Leader said in the House of Commons that senior citizens want health and social programs maintained and enhanced for future generations. The trade agreement jeopardizes these programs, threatens to cut them as those in the United States, and the Minister of Finance said that is a lie too.

Here we have a piece of legislation that is going to for them over the years and are entitled to them. I want to say it is a sad day for me as the member of Parliament for Kootenay East to have to stand up here in this House and say to pensioners that this is what the government is doing to you.

I want to ask this question on behalf of the seniors in my riding who have come to me and asked what has this government got against the senior citizens. In the last Parliament the Tories brought in a drug patent law that changed the patent laws for drug distribution in Canada, and it has increased the cost of prescription drugs drastically. They tried to deindex old age pensions and through a strong fight by seniors' associations, we were able to stop them. Now they want to claw back our pension rights.

Another thing that they have done with regard to pensioners, and this has never been addressed, and it is another outright steal, is the changes to VIA Rail policy. Many of those seniors worked for the railways throughout the years, some 40 to 50 years service and have a pass on the railway. This government is going to take that away and those people who have paid for those passes through their working agreements are not even going to be able to travel on those trains.

What have you got against our seniors? That is what they are asking. I am proud to be a New Democrat and to look back at the history of Tommy Douglas and Stanley Knowles and many other people who have stood in this House, yes in opposition, and yes fighting for social democracy to bring about the kind of universal programs such as medicare, adequate pensions and universal education programs. I think it is a sad day when we have to stand in this House and see our universal programs being torn away and deteriorated to this extent.

I say to the Conservative government, think about what you are doing. Listen to what the public is saying. Seniors are fed up, business people are fed up with your goods and services tax, the Chambers of Commerce are fed up. Every group across Canada is saying to you, "Listen to what we are saying because we are fed up. We are fed up with the tax grabs. We are fed up with what is going on and we want some people to start to listen to what we are saying and watch what we are doing".

I want to say that in any riding in British Columbia and in the neighbouring ridings in Alberta, the goods and services tax is one of the biggest items that the people are complaining about. It is a tax grab of the worst kind. When you start taking back from seniors and from young children through their family allowances—

Mrs. Dobbie: Seniors making $50,000 a year.

Mr. Parker: The member who is from a riding in Winnipeg speaks of seniors with an income of $50,000. When you pay for something, you expect a return. When those people paid into those pension programs over the years, they expected a pension and if we want to look at a fair and equitable way, let us look at a fair taxation policy, a progressive taxation policy that will bring about some fairness.

The government has let us down. Whether it be pensions, drug prices, prescriptions, post-secondary education, whatever the programs are, the Conservative government has let us down. It cannot be trusted by the Canadian people and we as opposition members have to fight to let the public know exactly what is going on to ensure that we can keep these universal programs, and let us keep some social democracy in this country so that when the people are saying no to something, the government will start to listen.

Mrs. Dobbie: You don't represent the people. If you did, you would be in government and not in opposition.

Mr. Parker: We have a debate going on. I must have hit a nerve over there. Or maybe some of the members are beginning to realize that they have a responsibility to the seniors and to the family allowance recipients in their ridings who are saying that they want to retain these universal programs.

When the Minister of Finance calls the leaders of the opposition parties liars during an election campaign when they tried to bring out our concerns, I object to that. I object very strongly to it. I do not think there is room in our society for that kind of comment or that kind of remark.

I do not want to speak too much longer, but I do want to say on behalf of our seniors, for goodness sake, roll it back, turn it back, vote against this legislation, give our seniors what is rightfully theirs and do not claw back their pensions.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre), which was agreed to on the following division:

DRUG AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, November 19 to 25 is Drug Awareness Week. To this end the Government of Prince Edward Island is working with schools, churches and other community organizations to promote the theme "Keep your dreams alive".

Through the media, classroom presentations, church bulletins and even through a one-act play people in my province are discussing a problem that affects many of its citizens.

We are all aware of the effects that alcohol and drug abuse have on the user, the user's family and the community as a whole. I hope and expect that the sincere and determined efforts being made in my province this week will increase the awareness of the dangers of drug abuse and contribute to an improved quality of life for all Islanders.

COLLEGE WEEK

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, since this is Colleges Week, 1989, I invite all my colleagues in the House to join me in paying tribute to those who work in college education, throughout Canada.

Courses given at the college level prepare our youth for university education and help them better choose the field of studies and the career that interest them.

CEGEPs and other college-level institutions also train our skilled labour, an essential element of our country's human resources.

Across Canada, more and more adults are registered for college courses. Colleges therefore play a key role in continuing education, especially in labour force retraining and the ongoing adjustment of workers to new technologies.

In short, colleges and vocational training institutes are an essential link in our education systems and a vital asset for a strong and dynamic economy.

SPORTS

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, it is not that frequent that we in Canada can proudly announce world champions. It is even less frequent that I can do it for the Cariboo—Chilcotin.

Today, it gives me great pleasure to announce that the Canadian arm wrestling team consisting of both men and women have returned victorious with the over-all title from the world arm wrestling championships in Athens, Greece.

• (1010)

Mr. Worthy: It gives me even greater pleasure to announce that for the second year in a row Mike Kadar, a resident of Nimpo Lake in my constituency, has been crowned world champion in the heavyweight class. Last year, Mr. Kadar proved he had the world's strongest right arm when he went undefeated in the world championships in Sweden. This year, in competition with the world's most powerful men, he reconfirmed his supremacy.

Arm wrestling is not a fancy or expensive sport. It has, however, ancient roots and world-wide popularity. I think the residents of Nimpo Lake as well as all of Canada should be proud of Mr. Mike Kadar.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The only thing I can add to that is that I know Nimpo Lake very well.

EL SALVADOR

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak for all members of the House when I express relief that Karen Ridd from Winnipeg, someone who is working in El Salvador with Peace Brigades International, was released yesterday by the Treasury Police who had taken her into custody.

True to the spirit of the work of Peace Brigades International, e noticed that Karen refused to be released unless the Colombian woman who had been arrested with her was also released.

The work of people like Karen and Peace Brigades International, people who go to Central America to provide an escort service which is designed to protect Salvadorans who may be under threat of death or kidnapping, is truly in the spirit of Canada's peacekeeping role. These are people who are real peacekeepers, who put themselves, their bodies, between the victimized and the oppressors, in this case the Cristianni government.

I think it is about time the Canadian Government showed the courage of some of its citizens like Karen Ridd in El Salvador and put itself, diplomatically, politically and economically between the United States, its puppet regime in El Salvador, and the people of El Salvador.

TRIBUTE TO JEAN-CLAUDE MALÉPART

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today I wish to pay a final tribute to our colleague and friend, Jean-Claude Malépart, whose death is a grievous loss for us all.

An outstanding Member of Parliament, Jean-Claude Malépart not only made his mark on Canadian politics but also left us with memories of a sensitive, fiery and determined man. With his sense of duty and justice and his courage to fight to the end for the causes he cared about for the good of his fellow citizens, he leaves an example of a model parliamentarian for all those who seek to excel.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to respectfully salute Jean-Claude, who lives on in my heart, with admiration and affection. Thank you, Jean-Claude!

EL SALVADOR

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, while the death squads continue to roam the streets of El Salvador with the blessing of the right wing military government, Canada continues to deport people to that country. In effect, this government is upholding the U.S. policy of aggression in El Salvador. Thirteen El Salvadorans have been removed from Canada since January 1.

I call on the government to stop immediately this removal of Salvadoran citizens from Canada, to increase our embassy staff in that region, to speed up the processing of family class and other visas for those who wish to leave, and to use minister's permits to bring people out who are in danger of their lives, perhaps because their husbands or spouses are here in Canada as refugee claimants.

I call on the Minister of Employment and Immigration to use every effort she can to bring the endangered people out of El Salvador and not to send people back to El Salvador.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, a strike by 2,200 crew members on federal government ships started in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia on November 11.

These union members work for the Coast Guard, Fisheries and Oceans, Public Works and National Defence. They have been without a contract for two years.

Treasury Board has been dragging its feet in negotiations, and now talks are not even taking place. There are a number of issues involved in this strike, but the most appalling is the wage disparity between east coast crews and west coast crews.

The federal government is supposed to have a policy of equal pay for equal work. RCMP and the Armed Forces are paid equally across the country according to rank. However, in this case, east coast workers receive an average of $2,500 less per year than their west coast counterparts. This is blatant discrimination against Atlantic Canadian workers. These people are being penalized financially for working on the east coast.

In addition, foreign fishing is rampant, the lobster season is opening in South West Nova without any patrols for enforcement, navigational aids are not being set, and if a freeze-up occurs many harbours will not be able to operate.

When will this government assume its responsibilities, give these eastern workers a fair settlement, and stop its policy of discriminating against Atlantic Canada?

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, today, thousands of farm producers from Quebec and the rest of Canada travelled many miles and bravely withstood the cold to express their concerns about the future of agriculture in this country.

I will be out there with them, demonstrating in the presence of a number of Quebec Members.

They want a clear commitment from their federal representatives that we will stand firm during multilateral talks, especially at the next GATT round.

I have made an unqualified commitment, Mr. Speaker, in this respect.

Quebec producers demand adequate representation of Quebec on all Canadian teams at the multilateral talks. I could not agree more.

Today, on the anniversary of the day this Government was elected a second time, we must ensure that everything we do always reflects what we said in our election speeches and with our public commitments, and that is why, Mr. Speaker, I have made a solemn commitment, and I know the Quebec Caucus is solidly behind me.

[English]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, for a number of weeks now I have received calls and correspondence from a number of health care professionals who are really concerned about the goods and services tax and the impact it will have upon health care services in Canada.

For example, with respect to psychologists and their psychological services, they provide not only needed therapeutic services but useful and essential preventive health care. They are also a very cost-effective alternative to over-burdened psychiatric services. I am really concerned, as are they, that the imposition of the goods and services tax will affect our health services negatively.

There are also others, such as occupational therapists, who are in the same boat.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in addition to this tax there are also the billions of dollars cut as a result of reduced transfer payments to the provinces, which will have a negative impact on health services in this country.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank. It concerns loans made by the bank to the Lido strip joint in Hull.

Yesterday, the minister repeated in the House in response to a question that I asked that the Federal Business Development Bank conducted itself, since the Tories came to power, in a manner that was "irreproachable".

Given that less than four hours later Radio-Canada confirmed that the Federal Business Development Bank had made two loans to the Lido strip joint in Hull owned and operated by a friend of a former cabinet minister and totalling $1.3 million, does the minister still think that this conduct is irreproachable? Or does he not agree with me that government dollars should not be used to fund strip joints?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, of course it would not be appropriate for FBDB to have a policy of funding strip joints, and it does not. In fact, it has a policy that forbids the funding of such establishments.

A loan of $400,000 was made in 1986 to a company owning the land and buildings in which were operated, FBDB was told, a bar–disco. That loan was paid down to $250,000. In 1989, a request from one of the partners for an additional $650,000 was agreed to so that he could buy out his partners in this land and building.

There was an error made by the local officer in Hull not to investigate to determine that the land and building was home for a strip joint. There was an error made in the headquarters in approving the loan. Procedures are being looked at to remedy this situation to ensure that does not happen again.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, five years ago a minister was turfed out of cabinet for even going into a strip joint. Now the Government of Canada is building them.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: Have we not had enough of this nonsense?

I want to ask the minister across the way the following question.

[Translation]

Yesterday, a representative of the Federal Business Development Bank said, in referring to the strip joint loan: "It is not FBDB policy to finance this kind of establishment". If isn't bank policy, why did the bank make loans of this kind on two occasions? Especially in the case of the second loan, the bank should have know it was a strip joint. That should be pretty obvious, I would think!

[English]

Mr. Andre: I guess the hon. member had his feigned indignation written out in advance, as well as his supplementary. He did not listen to my answer to his first question.

As I explained, a loan was made to a company which owned land and buildings in which FDBD believed operated a pub–disco. That loan was paid down to $250,000. Then there was another loan of $650,000, which brought it to $900,000, on a building in which headquarters believed was operating a pub–disco. It was a loan which had performed well, had been repaid, and it was renewed.

As I indicated in my answer to the first question, the officers in Hull ought to have informed headquarters as to the type of business it was. Had they done that, the loan would not have been approved. Procedures are being amended to ensure that does not happen again.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, that answer is not good enough for Canadians. Canadians want to know—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question to the acting minister responsible for the status of women. If such a minister is not available, then I direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Ten days ago we found out that the best friend of the Prime Minister was sending legal bills to the Federal Business Development Bank. Now we discover that—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: It is not the place of the Speaker to in any way direct the selection of questions, but I am having some difficulty knowing how that question is supplementary to the questions that have been asked. Perhaps the hon. member could at least put his question.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is to the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the minister responsible for the status of women.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister approve of this kind of loan? Does the government's representative for the status of women approve of this kind of loan to strip joints? Does this meet the criteria of improving the status of women in the country? Why does the government not clean up its act once and for all?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, for the third time, this type of loan is contrary to the policy of FBDB. It is clearly contrary to the policy of this government.

For the third time, an error was made.

That is three questions with the same answer.

Mr. Speaker, I will write it out and send it over. He can read it as well as hear it.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, this morning, the Minister responsible for the Federal Business Developent Bank would have us believe that a mistake was made. Either he doesn't not know how the FBDB functions or he doesn't know what he is talking about. Mr. Speaker, the FBDB annually turns down thousands of loans because project proposals do not meet modern technological standards. Does this government see strip joints as the technology of the future? How can you say there was a mistake when the bank turns down any number of loans every year? Is there more to this?

[English]

Mr. Andre: I guess for the fifth time—

Some Hon. Members: Fourth!

Mr. Andre: For the fourth time, Mr. Speaker, the loan should not have been recommended by the Hull office of FBDB. It should not have been approved by headquarters. An error was made.

It is contrary to the policy of FBDB for these types of loans.

Procedures are being investigated to see if changes can be made to help prevent this type of thing in the future.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, the minister for the fourth time is saying that he is giving us the same answer.

Some Hon. Members: It is the same question.

Mr. Gagliano: Is the minister willing to say that he will start a full investigation to find out exactly what happened? This was not the first loan. What about the second loan? Every year the FBDB demands financial statements on any loans it gives. That means one officer could make a mistake. The second one made another mistake. Every year since 1985 mistakes have been made. We are almost in 1990. That makes five mistakes because every year they have to submit a financial statement.

Would you tell us exactly what happened and report to the House?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, for the fifth time, a loan was applied for by a company owning land and buildings in which FBDB believed a pub-disco was operating.

That loan was paid down and in 1989 an additional amount of $650,000 was added to it. Again, headquarters believed a pub-disco was operating in a building owned by the company to which the loan was made.

An error was made by the office in Hull in recommending the loan. An error was made in headquarters in approving the loan.

Procedures are being looked into to see what amendments would be appropriate to be sure that this does not happen in the future.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

I have just come from the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General at which the Commissioner of the RCMP was a witness. The Commissioner advised the committee that contrary to what he had said in May or June when he had appeared before the committee in respect of the Grisé affair that the RCMP in fact made a decision last year during the election campaign to hold off the search warrants against Mr. Grisé until two days after the election.

My question for the Solicitor General is this. When was he advised by the RCMP that in fact the decision had been to withhold the search warrants? If and when he received that information, why did he not come to this House immediately to advise this House of that information?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I was informed of the statement made by the RCMP Commissioner. First of all, I want to say that this morning, the RCMP Commissioner emphasized that he had never been subject to political interference by anyone.

Mr. Robichaud: Answer the question!

Mr. Blais: If it had happened, he would have condemned such interference in public, something he did not have to do because he was never subject to political interference.

As for the point raised by the hon. member, the Commissioner said he had been informed yesterday that the Chief Superintendent in Montreal had decided to delay the issuing of warrants in the case to which the hon. member is referring, and the Commissioner has promised to obtain all information in connection with this case. That is the only information I have for the time being, and I will let the RCMP, as is customary, clear up this case, and I think it is quite clear this was an administrative decision on the part of the RCMP and not a decision influenced in any way by politicians.

• (1030)

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it is in fact a matter of national importance as to the role of the RCMP in these political investigations. This issue has been before the country for a year now.

Again, to keep his record perfect, the Solicitor General failed to answer the question. The question was: when did he hear this information from the RCMP, and when he heard why did he not come to this House? If he is saying he simply heard this morning, then I suggest that the Minister has completely failed in his duty. This was an issue.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister say to this House whether or not there were any calls from the Prime Minister's office to the criminal investigation division in Montreal? I may say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put his question. The minister may want to respond.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think I made myself sufficiently clear in my first answer. I said that the RCMP Commissioner mentioned this morning, in the hon. member's presence, that he had been given the information last night and that he immediately informed the House committee this morning. So how could I have informed the House six months ago? The question makes no sense at all, Mr. Speaker. If I had any prior information, I would have informed the House accordingly, but the Commissioner himself was given the information last night, and he informed the people who were there that he would if the Hon. Member would care to listen, this may be of interest, and if you want your answer, here it is he informed the committee that he would explain. and that his information was that of the RCMP's employees in Montreal had made this decision, without any interference whatsoever. So I fail to see why this question should be raised. The Commissioner gave a very clear answer, and I think he repeatedly said, Mr. Speaker, and I think this is very important, that he had never been subject to any political interference whatsoever. He repeated this several times this morning.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, this morning we heard that a political decision was made to delay issuing search warrants in the Grisé case. Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Last April, the RCMP Commissioner confirmed that it was a coincidence that very serious allegations by Phil Edmundston had been set aside until November 22, the day after the election. This morning, we heard that the superintendent of the Montreal section made the decision to delay issuing search warrants because of the election. My question is as follows: Could the Solicitor General confirm to the House today that there were no calls, from his office or from the Prime Minister's office in this case, because the Commissioner told us that he did not know whether Bernard Roy was involved or not, and he was going to ask.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should get back to the facts. What was brought to my attention only a few minutes ago is that the Commissioner mentioned that he had been informed of these facts last night and that he would go one step further and personally meet the RCMP officer who made this decision in Montreal last November or October, I am not sure when, but in any event, he would make enquiries. He mentioned there was a possibility that the election may have played a part, but he did not say so categorically. That is what was said, and the text can be checked as well as the recording of this morning's testimony. In any event, those are the facts that were reported to me. And I think that, especially in the House of Commons, we should avoid making accusations of any kind against anyone. And to get back to the very emphatic statement made by the Commissioner, he said that he never, ever had been subject to political interference, and if that had been the case, he would immediately have taken steps to publicly condemn such interference something he had never had to do because there had never been any political interference whatsoever. That is what the Commissioner said this morning, and I think we can trust him.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Today, thousands and thousands of farmers from the UPA in Quebec and the OFA in Ontario are marching on Parliament Hill to protest the government's agricultural policy. They feel that they have been sold out in the free trade deal because their marketing boards have not been protected from imports. They feel that they were sold out because their incomes were capped at the GATT decision last spring. They feel that the government promised them open access to the U.S. market and they got a countervail on hogs.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture when is the government going to start keeping the promises it made a year ago today in the last election and stop selling out Canadian farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, other members of the House and I are always concerned about the welfare of agriculture. No one is more concerned than the members on this side of the House in the government and we have certainly demonstrated that.

The plain fact of the matter is that the hon. member is wrong on all three counts. He says the marketing boards have been undermined and dismantled and he is wrong in that regard. They have been protected under the Free Trade Agreement and they are being protected under the Free Trade Agreement. He says that we capped the incomes. That is wrong again, because as he knows the industrial price of milk rose by 39 cents per hectoliter. The hon. member says that we do not have market access to the United States. He is wrong again, because many, many agri-food industries are penetrating that market, are doing very well, are creating jobs in Canada and providing security to the agriculture community here in Canada.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, if the minister is all right and the farmers are all wrong, why are 12,000 of them marching on Parliament Hill today?

These thousands of farmers are concerned that the government is going to sell them out at the GATT council meeting on December 4 in Geneva, just as they were sold out in the free trade deal and with the capping of industrial milk. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture what assurance he can give these 12,000 farmers marching on Parliament Hill today that they will not be sold out in the GATT council meeting, and that the government will not accept the ruling of the GATT panel to allow a flow of cheap surplus dairy commodities into Canada from the U.S. What assurance can the minister give, in view of the fact that our chief partners, the Cairns Group and the United States, are both opposing our position with regard to marketing boards and with regard to import controls on dairy products?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons that there is concern within the agricultural community is that of the fear and the anxiety that is being perpetrated by people like the hon. member and other critics.

Mr. Foster: They are all wrong and you are all right?

• (1040)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the position of the federal government taken by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister for International Trade at the MTN negotiations is to strengthen and to clarify Article 11 so that we will not have the kind of decision that was brought down by GATT with respect to ice cream and yogurt.

That has been the position of the government for a long time, notwithstanding the fact that members opposite were suggesting that we should not tamper with Article 11. We are tampering with it to strengthen and clarify it so that it will preserve the supply managed underpinnings upon which the supply managed systems and the import controls obtain their power.

This government has provided unprecedented support to the agricultural industry. In the grain and oilseed sector alone, between the years 1984–85 and 1988–89, a total of $11.777 billion has been allocated in support of that sector.

Furthermore, in 1984–85, the support for the Canadian agri–food industry was something in the order of $4.6 billion. In 1987–88, that exceeded $8 billion, 75 per cent of which was provided for by the federal government. That is the kind of support this government is giving and that is the kind of support it will continue to give.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Foster: Twelve thousand farmers are wrong and you're right?

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Agriculture is right, why did the President of the Union des producteurs agricoles say:

> The way Canada is trading away the future of our agriculture in the GATT negotiations in Geneva is unacceptable—

Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister how come only he is right and thousands of farmers are wrong.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister why the government is breaking the social contract with farmers.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, barely a month ago, the Prime Minister, the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of Agriculture and I met with the leaders of the Union des producteurs agricoles.

Mr. Robichaud: Why are they coming back today?

Mr. Blais: The president himself said that he was very pleased with that meeting and that we could build on it.

Mr. Robichaud: You are making fun of them!

Mr. Blais: These people have concerns and have come to voice them here. We met with them and we are prepared, Mr. Speaker, as we said, to continue to support them. To do that, we have to go to GATT, because that is where it is being discussed—there are 95 countries there—and where we must strongly and vigorously defend Section 11. In the past, we realized that this section was not clear enough.

So the decision made by this government is to defend the Canadian position, which is quite original, involving marketing boards, and to strengthen and clarify Section 11 so that Canadian agriculture will be protected internationally, Mr. Speaker. Never has a government done so much for its farmers and we will continue to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the minister says that never has a government done so much for farmers, but never have we seen such a large demonstration by farmers here on Parliament Hill. That is the farmers' response to the minister after that meeting.

I ask the Minister once more: Will the Government answer Canada's farmers today that it will respect the social contract, take an unequivocal position in favour of agriculture and offer farmers formal guarantees for the future?

On behalf of Canadian farmers, I ask for a clear answer and not for the patter which the minister has given farmers in the past and again today.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, my colleague has a short memory. He does not remember what happened in 1976,when he was in government. I will remind my colleague that when we arrived in 1984, Canada's dairy farmers had been waiting for over four years for a long–term dairy policy, which his government did not want to renew. Our government put in place a five–year dairy policy worth hundreds of millions of dollars and we made a commitment to renew this dairy policy with the farmers when they sat down with us and to eimplement it in 1991. On the other hand, for years, you did not want to respond to Canadian dairy farmers, you never wanted to defend them. We were the first government to do so, Mr. Speaker. We have nothing to learn from those people about defending Canadian farmers.

JUSTICE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Solicitor General.

The minister now knows that the Commissioner of the RCMP before a committee this morning said that the superintendent of the Montreal region for the RCMP delayed issuing search warrants in the Grisé case "because of the election". He said that in the committee this morning.

The member for Burnaby, earlier on November 7, asked the minister questions about the delay at that time. The minister, instead of saying he would look into it, came back with, to put it bluntly, his usual bluster and went on to attack the member who asked the question and said: "The commissioner is not just anyone. He is in charge of RCMP operations", et cetera, instead of pursuing the matter at hand.

Considering that this issue was raised November 7—indeed we raised this issue last May—and that the Commissioner of the RCMP admitted today there was a delay because of the election, why did the minister not do his job a week ago, a month ago, last spring, instead of just finding out this morning what was being said about this issue?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am taken aback by the import of my colleague's query. Should I question the integrity of the Commissioner of the RCMP every time he makes a statement?

I had no reason to doubt the word of the commissioner. As I recall, last June the commissioner answered questions before the committee, and this morning he told the same committee that he had been mistaken and that he would make inquiries to find out why the decision was delayed.

I would suggest we can rely on the integrity of the Commissioner of the RCMP. He was very frank and honest, I did not have any reason to doubt his word, and I have no intention of asking for an inquiry every time an RCMP officer makes a statement.

I think we should let the RCMP shed light on this matter, as it has done and as it knows how to do. Mr. Speaker, it is very important to this House and to all Canadians that no questions be raised concerning the integrity of the RCMP and the commissioner.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that it is his responsibility as Solicitor General of Canada to ensure that the RCMP is doing its job. He cannot pass the buck. The buck stops with the minister and he knows that. Considering that it was Mr. Inkster, not someone on this side of the House, who said in committee this morning that the course of action that ultimately led to a conviction was not taken "because of the election", will the minister now do his job and immediately find out why there was a delay and why there was hesitancy to prosecute, to look at evidence to see if court proceedings should be taken? Was it for political reasons or not? Is the minister now prepared to exercise his responsibility, or does he just want this thing to be buried? That is no way to conduct his responsibilities, and the minister knows it.

• (1050)

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the question, but since I was quoted, I suggest we go back to what I said on November 7 this year, and I will quote exactly what I said:

[English]

"The RCMP is an honourable police force that acts without political interference. I would like to refer to what the RCMP Commissioner said himself in June before a committee of this House. He was very emphatic about this, and I believe that in order to protect the integrity of this police force we must let them do their job and conduct their investigation as they see fit with the utmost integrity".

Mr. Broadbent: He changed that testimony this morning.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should realize that this morning, the Commissioner was most emphatic about the fact that he had never been subject to any political interference, and that if such had been the case, he would have been the first to say so publicly. This proves the integrity of this police force, which we must respect, and as solicitor general I do not intend to interfere in any way with the work of a police officer. I must let them do their job, and that is what we should all do as members of this Parliament, Mr. Speaker.

TAXATION

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. For many months, Canadians have worried about the 9 per cent GST that will be implemented on January 1, 1991, while they have practically no reservations about the hidden 13.5 per cent tax now in effect, which applies, for instance, to milk taken from the farm. My question is this: There are only 13 and a half months between now and January 1991. Could the government and the Minister of Finance explain the 13.5 per cent tax to Canadians, which would help minimize the damage done by the GST as a result of lack of information? Sir, I want action on the 13.5 per cent tax. Let's stop playing games!

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member points out is quite right. There are a lot of people who do not understand that there is a 13.5 per cent tax. There is a federal sales tax on everything that we buy today, directly or indirectly.

My colleagues across the way say that that is wrong. There is a tax. The federal sales tax is in the price of everything we buy, directly or indirectly.

An Hon. Member: Not 13.5 per cent.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says not 13.5 per cent. The 13.5 per cent is applied at the manufacturing level. It is on everything we buy, but it is impossible for anybody to tell the precise rate that the tax applies at the retail level. The tax is applied deep in the manufacturing process so that by its nature it is very invisible.

What we are trying to do with the new tax, under the goods and services tax proposal,is make the federal sales tax much more visible and also make it level across the board; not the very distorted, indirect and hidden tax that it is today.

JUSTICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the opposition has been charging for some time that the RCMP is being politically interfered with by this government and our charges have been supported—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question in the usual way. The preamble is in order to launch the question. It is not to initiate a debate which may or may not be a good thing or a bad thing, but it is not for me to control. I would ask the hon. member to put his question succinctly with a preamble that leads to the question.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, the charges include not just allegations by Glen Kealey but sworn evidence by RCMP officers—

Mr. Speaker: I have to ask the hon. member, who is a very experienced member in this House, not to put a charge by way of preamble. It puts the Speaker in an almost impossible position.

The hon. member has the floor. The hon. member will be given every right to ask the question. However, I would ask the hon. member to put the preamble, that is the facts upon which the question is based, not charges. If there are charges they have to be taken in another place.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, given the indication by the commissioner this morning at the justice committee meeting that he had been misinformed and would proceed to correct the record about the possibility of political interference, I want to ask the Solicitor General to assure—

Mr. Mazankowski: He didn't say that and you know it.

Mr. Kaplan: He did say that. I was there, and he did say that.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Kaplan: Will the Solicitor General assure that the Commissioner of the RCMP pursues not only the possibility of political interference into the matter which was discussed this morning in the justice committee, but into all the matters of political interference which have been put forward in relation to the work of the RCMP?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we have repeated many times that it was not our intention to interfere in any way with the RCMP's job, and if you were there this morning, you probably heard the Commissioner say several times that he had never, ever been subject to political interference, and that if he had been, he would have said so publicly.

Mrs. Bourgault: This is repetitious. You don't have any new questions.

Mr. Blais: I am really surprised to see, with the hon. member's experience—but Mr. Speaker, in this connection, I would like—

Mrs. Bourgault: This is repetitious. This is the seventh time he repeated the same question.

Mr. Blais: —to quote what my colleague said a few weeks ago.

[English]

"It is the nature of the Canadian Opposition's tradition to be irresponsible or non-responsible and I mean that in the highest sense of the word".

[Translation]

I think the intent of the hon. member's questions in this House is fairly obvious, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Kaplan: It is certainly the duty of the Solicitor General to protect the political independence of the RCMP.

My supplementary question is to ask the Solicitor General whether he will undertake to report to this House on the work which is being done in the way of an investigation by the Commissioner of the RCMP, given that the commissioner himself will be away for almost three weeks?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I can only refer to what the Commissioner said this morning. Yesterday, he was informed that the information he gave the committee a few months ago was incomplete, that a member of the RCMP in Montreal had made a decision and that he promised to look at the entire case and check the facts. However, he had not been advised of any interference and he himself had never been subject to interference and had never witnessed any instances of interference, and if he had, he would have condemned these actions publicly. I think we must trust the integrity of the RCMP Commissioner, which seems entirely normal to me. This morning, however, I am being asked to interfere in the RCMP's process, and that I refuse to do, Mr. Speaker. I will let the RCMP do its job.

EL SALVADOR

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. He will know, I hope, that a Canadian from Winnipeg, Karen Ridd, was released yesterday after having been taken into custody by the Treasury Police in El Salvador. He will also know, I hope, that Karen is one of many who have gone down to El Salvador to help protect potential victims of death squads by accompanying them in their life and their various tasks in that country.

I wonder whether the government is now prepared to show the same courage that many individual Canadians have shown by putting itself between the people of El Salvador and the death squad known as American policy in Central America by urging the Pentagon, Washington, and Mr. Bush who seems not to have caught on to what is going on down there, to stop military aid to El Salvador immediately. When will the Canadian government call on the American government to do that and cut off the aid?

• (1100)

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): As my colleague just said, Mr. Speaker, we were glad to learn last night that Canadian Karen Ridd had been set free by the Salvadorian authorities. I should point out to my colleague that the personal intervention of senior officials there proved to be a key element of the release of Karen Kidd. We are proud to note that Canada does have a certain influence.

I would suggest that Canada's position concerning conflicts has always been the same. We are now urging the parties involved to put an immediate end to armed aggressions, sit down for talks and negotiate a permanent cease fire. As we see it, the conflict will not be resolved unless the parties begin to negotiate. Such has been our position all along and we will continue to defend it until peace has been restored in El Salvador.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people on the ground in El Salvador—and there are not enough of them—were instrumental in obtaining Karen's release and we are all grateful for that.

The minister says that the Canadian government position has always been the same. I agree. The Canadian position with respect to Central America has always been to refuse to speak the truth about what is going on in Central America. What we are asking the government to do is to finally speak the truth about American military aid to El Salvador. If it will not do that, the very least it can do is not be complicit itself and cut off government-to-government aid to El Salvador.

[Translation]

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, of course my colleague has a different position, but still I want to say that the Central American countries are very thankful for the role played by Canada to restore lasting peace in that region of the world, and we will continue our efforts to that end.

Mr. Speaker, we have always urged foreign powers not to intervene in a conflict but to put pressure on the parties with a view to negotiating lasting peace. We believe that is the only way to find a solution.

As to assistance, I must say that in view of the precarious situation in El Salvador and to ensure the security of Canadians, the implementation of the assistance project has been deferred. I might point out to my colleague that assistance has been provided through Canadian and Salvadoran NGOs to help displaced people who are now victims of the armed conflicts.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and concerns the Emergency Response Job Development Program recently announced by the government that is designed to help bona fide fishing industry workers in Atlantic Canada adversely affected by circumstances beyond their control.

The criteria for qualification states that repeat claimants must have acquired a minimum of six weeks of work this year or three weeks this year and have qualified solely in the fishing industry last year. For those who had a bad year and worked under a similar program last year, by the strict application of the criteria, they would be ineligible this year because in fact they did not work solely in the fishing industry last year.

This is a Catch-22 situation. In the press release the department indicated that the criteria were intended really as a rough guideline and it stated that individuals unable to receive these special benefits but with proven long-term attachment to the fishing industry would be able to request review of their cases.

Can the minister assure the House that those bona fide fishermen and plant workers who have had two bad years in a row, but have been employed in the fishing industry essentially their working lives will be shown some flexibility and compassion in the application of these criteria, and that the bureaucrats would be advised and instructed to do so?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I know this is a very important question to the hon. member and many of the plant workers and communities of Newfoundland in particular that have been impacted by adverse conditions in the fishery this year.

My colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration did announce a program of special measures two weeks ago and I do not think I am in any position today to interpret the rules for delivery of that program. But I can assure the hon. member that his question will be brought to the attention of the minister, and appropriate latitude will be sought in the application of the rules to the benefit of the affected communities.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to table several petitions.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could clarify the record.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to table responses to several petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PETITIONS

BILL OF RIGHTS FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present three petitions on different issues.

The first petition is from western Canadians and points out that one-sixth of Canadian children live in poverty and the percentage of children finding themselves living in poverty is increasing each year. The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to support private members' motion 254 which calls upon the Government of Canada to negotiate with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from a number of people in western Canada concerning the government's cut-backs to VIA Rail passenger service. They are calling upon the government to not only maintain its existing VIA Rail network but to invest in its upgrading with new equipment. This will give VIA Rail the opportunity to develop a national passenger rail service like other western industrialized nations.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of people in western Canada who point out a whole set of concerns they have regarding the government's goods and services tax, stating how unfair it is to people living in rural areas and how unfair it is to certain sectors of the economy. They are simply asking the government to go back to the drawing board, in other words stop proceeding with this goods and services tax.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present two petitions. One is from a number of people in my riding which deals with the abortion bill that is going to be before this House this evening and tomorrow. The people who have signed this petition are asking that the government protect the rights of the unborn. I think that in the bill presented now the rights of the unborn are not protected.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorald): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition which was collected by one of my constituents. It is part of the 12,000 names she collected against the goods and services tax. My constituent, Mrs. Idris O'Neil, made this presentation to me last Monday. I think it encompasses the great dislike which some 12,000 people in my riding have for the goods and services tax. Once again we are asking that this government reconsider this heinous proposal which makes money on the backs of the poor and the lower middle class.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition from my home community of Rankin Inlet. This petition objects to the proposed goods and services tax.

• (1110)

RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition from a number of petitioners from British Columbia. The petitioners are concerned about children's rights. They state that one-sixth of all Canadian children live in poverty. The drastic lowering of incomes between 1980 and 1986 has increased this number of children by 13.4 per cent. They call on Parliament to support Private Members' Motion M-254 calling on the government to negotiate with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens of Canada, all the way from Inuvik to Montreal, asking the government to not do what it is going to do to VIA Rail, and to ensure that VIA Rail has enough equipment and funding to remain a viable operation.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to present a petition, signed by residents of my constituency of Saskatoon-Humboldt, who call upon the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to provide other means of taxation which is fair to Canadians.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 350 residents of my constituency in support of the CBC in Victoria. Victoria is the only provincial capital in Canada which lacks both CBC Radio and television facilities. The lower island is the third largest metropolitan area in Canada without a CBC facility. The petitioners pray that the government will reverse its cuts to CBC and include Victoria in its mandate to provide CBC service.

RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition to present signed by residents of Whitehorse, Moncton, New Westminster, New Brunswick, Saskatoon, Brantford, Nelson and Powell River, B.C., all across Canada. The petitioners are appalled with the statistics regarding child poverty. The over-all child population has fallen by almost 4 per cent between 1980 and 1986, the number of children living in poverty has increased by 13.4 per cent in the same period.

The petitioners call upon parliament to negotiate with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present on behalf of a number of residents from Davenport and neighbouring ridings, expressing their deep felt disagreement and opposition to the proposed general sales tax.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians concerned with the increased taxes, 31 new taxes and tax increases since 1984; including the federal sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. Last evening we debated a tax bill with some 59 clauses.

The petitioners are concerned about the heavy burden of taxation and they humbly pray and call upon parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians who are opposed to cuts to VIA Rail services. This petition was signed in July last year, and I can only imagine how appalled these Canadians are at the cuts to VIA Rail recently announced by the government.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to deposit a petition with 150 names from the National Arts Centre who continue to be concerned about the state of the National Arts Centre orchestra. The present concern is over the management which has proved, according to these petitioners, to be incompetent and inadequate in artistic matters. They call upon this House to maintain the National Arts Centre, and ensure its sound cultural credentials to be the main criteria for any new appointments to their board.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would deposit for your information petitions from the people of Ikaluit, where I had the privilege of visiting earlier this year, who find that they are particularly hard hit and are carrying an already heavy burden of taxation and find that the goods and services tax will be an ongoing and further hard burden for them to bear.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions I would like to table today. All have been certified correct as to form and content by the Clerk of Petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first is signed by 33 residents of Kincardine, Ontario and it is regarding VIA Rail. The petitioners point out that railway passenger service, as carried on by VIA Rail, is an essential means of transportation for many Canadians and has been part of basic Canadian infrastructure for over 100 years. They go on to call upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I also have a number of petitions that deal with the whole question of the goods and services tax. I have first to present petitions signed by 575 residents of Thunder Bay who stopped by the NDP booth at the Westport Days Fair in my riding.

They call upon the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

I also have a number of other petitions that have been circulated in my riding by local business concerns. I have, first, a petition signed by 35 customers of the Thunder Bay Harley Davidson outlet on Roslyn Road. As well, there are thirty-seven customers of Riverdale Store on highway 61, 43 employees and students at Lakehead University and 60 customers of Creative Croissants in West Fort and finally 35 customers of the Royal Barbershop on North Brodie Street.

All of these petitions reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax. They want an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and if there is to be a reform, that it not be a massive tax grab such as the goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, over the past six months hundreds of thousands of Canadians including municipal leaders and premiers across this country have pleaded to this government to restore VIA to its rightful place in our history as a viable transportation mode.

I stand today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to submit another 1,200 names from people in southwestern Ontario again pleading with this government to restore VIA to all of its full service so that they are not pushed to use the airlines and the roadways that are already congested and unsafe.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to present to the House today more petitions from people all across the province of Ontario on behalf of all unborn children.

These petitioners, all 1,804 of them from such diverse communities as St. Catharines, Hamilton, North Bay, Espanola, London, Woodstock, Kirkland Lake, Thunder Bay, Sturgeon Falls, Stoney Creek, Massey, New Liskeard and Toronto call upon Parliament to pass legislation that will protect life from conception with a law that will seek to save the life of both mother and child. I am in full support of these petitions.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions.

This petition, along with another petition already on file with the Clerk of the House, has been signed by over 195,000 Canadians from across the country calling on Parliament to enact legislation that would effectively protect the life of the pre-born child from conception without distinction as to stages of development.

These petitions were brought to Ottawa by Evelyn Wyrzykowski and Doreen Ferraton of the Catholic Women's League of Canada who are here today as part of their nation-wide "women—sign-for-life campaign".

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I too have the duty and honour to table a petition of behalf of the residents of Parkdale—High Park who object very strongly to the imposition of this government's new general 9 per cent tax on goods and services. The petitioners strongly oppose this new goods and services tax which according to them is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

The petitioners call upon this Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax and I know that you are taking note, Mr. Speaker, that even today we have had such petitions coast to coast and north to the Arctic.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present two more in a long series of petitions on the subject of VIA Rail. These petitions are signed by a significant number of citizens of Revelstoke, British Columbia and other communities throughout the west Kootenay protesting the closure in particular of the Canadian line of the VIA system.

Many of these petitioners are now increasingly outraged and incensed that despite repeated assurances from the Department of Transport that there would be a representative at a meeting of some 30 people representing five federal ridings in B.C. and Alberta last Thursday, there was no representative of the Department of Transport there and their anger as expressed in this petition is even more compounded by that fact.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 62 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 62 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

DEVELOPMENT OF ENERGY RESOURCES

Question No. 62—Mr. Plamondon:

1. Since 1945, has the government taken any measures to develop energy resources and, if so, by province and, for each province, by energy sector (a) what were they (b) what was their cost?

2. Since 1945, has the government made any investments in order to develop energy resources and, if so, by province and, for each province, by energy sector (a) what were they (b) in what amounts?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–43, an Act respecting abortion, be read for the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Debate. The Hon. Minister of State for Employment and Immigration and Minister of State for Seniors (Mrs. Vézina).

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, fellow members of the House of Commons, I intend to treat the debate on Bill C–43 with all the seriousness it deserves, all the attention, the good will, even unselfishness that various individuals and groups in my riding have for this great social issue.

For example, last Friday, my riding office received a petition with 10,000 names. It contained the names of 10,000 people in Rimouski and Témiscouata who said: "We are against abortion in any form for a normal pregnancy, that is one with no risk, and we are against it from the moment of conception."

Others representing a completely different school of thought told me quite clearly that only the woman concerned should decide whether or not to interrupt her pregnancy. One of them told me clearly that she never regretted having interrupted an unwanted pregnancy when she was 20.

I received the testimony of a father who said that he supports our bill, but who told his 13-year-old daughter who asked him what he would do if she came home pregnant: "If you wanted to terminate this pregnancy, we would take the necessary action. If you wanted to keep the child, we would want you to have a normal happy life and we would help you bring up this child as if it were our own."

Mr. Speaker, with these examples, I just want to show the interest all of society has in this most serious issue and the many points of view that we must consider as legislators, our main duty as elected representatives.

As far as I am concerned, I wish to state at the outset that I would certainly prefer to be somewhere else and not to have to participate in such a poignant, troubling discussion.

No one will say that abortion is an easy issue. No one will say that we can debate it light-heartedly, for the simple reason that no bill can ever faithfully reflect all shades of individual opinion on this agonizing question. In this regard, this House reflects Canadian society and the right to freedom of conscience which is one of its values.

No age or social group can escape the dilemma now facing society.

The decision to give birth is one of the most important, personal and private choices that can be made by a human being. But personal rights, health and life protection are also fundamental values that concern society as a whole. The balance we, as legislators, must maintain between a woman's right to choose whether or not to interrupt her pregnancy and the state's responsibility to protect the foetus is extremely hard to find. Whether from a religious, moral, social, legal, medical or political standpoint, our conscience must inevitably grapple with this issue.

Mr. Speaker, over the last few months, like every other member of this House, I have been concerned with the abortion debate mobilizing Canadian men and women. I felt all the more concerned since I knew that a moment like today would come when, after thinking about it as parliamentarians, we would have to give this country a bill addressing the issue. Today I would like to share with you the various thoughts that come to my mind.

First, I would like to deal with our responsibility as legislators. I think it is important to properly define the realities we are talking about. At the risk of shocking some of my colleagues, I would suggest that the worst threat to the proceedings of this House would be to become idealistic. Finally, I would like to speak to the bill introduced by the government.

Mr. Speaker, I will deal first with our work as legislators. I want to stress how the debate that has just started is personally demanding. Seldom will our work be so challenging and require so much self-denial on the part of honorable members.

There is something extremely personal about the abortion issue. It challenges our most basic values and most private experiences. Yet, today I wish to emphasize the need for all of us, each and every one to somewhat distance ourselves from our own personal experience and opinions.

On this issue, the Right Hon. Prime Minister insisted on a free vote. He deserves to be praised for respecting our freedom of conscience. I appreciate the respect he is showing to Parliamentarians. But I see also in the Prime Minister's decision an invitation to reach out to others.

This new debate has nothing to do with what we personally think about the abortion issue. What is involved here is not what we would do in our heart of heart if we had to decide whether or not to terminate a pregnancy. No matter how free we are as members of the House, our debate must deal with the legislation which, as legislators, we must develop in Canada in the area of abortion.

Although I would not wish to show disrespect to any member of this House, I know that most Canadians men and women are not interested in our moods. They want us, as their elected representatives, to do our job.

Having sat in this House for nearly five years now, I trust that most of my colleagues will share my views. Mr. Speaker, I do not take part in this debate so much as Monique Vézina, the mother of four children, as the Hon. Member for the Rimouski—Témiscouata riding, duly elected by her constituents to provide our country with the legislation it needs.

Now to come to my second point. As a rule, I have always felt that, both as Parliamentarians and legislators, we had to show idealism, look toward a better world and strive to achieve it.

Today, however, in view of the very nature of the problem we are dealing with, I wish to state emphatically, without renouncing these ideals, that the principle of reality must prevail completely and totally in this forthcoming debate.

• (1810)

In 1988, there were between 73,000 and 74,000 therapeutic abortions in Canada. When reviewing the available data for previous years, it will be found the number has remained relatively unchanged. From 70,000 in 1982, it fell to some 65,000 in 1983–86. I conclude from those figures that abortion is a fact of life in Canada, a reality in our society. I also conclude that the women involved in those 74,000 therapeutic abortions wanted people to respect their personal decision. None of them claimed to have taken that course of action without some reluctance. They submit however that in all conscience that was the solution they chose.

Mr. Speaker, each and everyone in this House is hoping for that ideal world in which all those women could have all the financial means and the psychological and emotional strenght that would have let them bring their pregnancies to completion.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I am refering to the real world. Without sacrificing our dreams and our hopes, we must face up to the realities of human life where there will always be tragedies, where society will always be perfectible. I am asking that we as legislators recognize social reality in this country and the experience of Canadian women.

Let me turn to a third aspect, Bill C–43 as such. This government's challenge was to develop legislation that would fit with the Canadian reality. Yes, we looked for the area of widest possible social consensus. In any other area, we might be accused of being political opportunists. But in this matter this is the only tenable position.

What about the proposal? The Government states in the first place that abortion is a crime, and in the second place that it is not where it is induced in consultation with a who is of the opinion that if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened. There again, I suggest that we get away from any philosophical debate.

Personally, and along with large number of a very Canadian women, I also would have preferred that the legislation do not re–criminalize abortion. As legislator, I have found this to be impractical. This enactment is the only possible way to allow Parliament to regulate abortion nationally.

The legislation's first goal is not in my view to re–criminalize abortion nor, as claimed in some quarters, to return to situations where the lives of human beings, individuals, women are jeopardized in conditions that are worse than before.

Our first objective, therefore, under the circumstances, in the present Canadian context, is to take another step forward, another step to the future, taking account of our evolution as a society over the centuries, another step towards the equality of men and women: an equality which can only enrich both sexes with their complementarity, another step towards the fundamental freedom that we all seek. More and more men understand—and I know several among my colleagues who do—that subordination is not liberating for a couple, it is not liberating for a family, it is simply not liberating for the whole of a democratic country like ours. The same goes for our abortion bill.

Nevertheless, our government must be cautious and moderate, it must avoid venturing into uncharted waters, when many Canadians are telling us that we do not know how deep they are. The Government is instead choosing to bridge the two sides, the two extremes, so as to serve the most Canadians who want to use it. This bridge is our new legislation.

You will agree that we are taking a step forward, after the legal vacuum left by the Supreme Court judgment, when our government is eliminating the anomalies of the old law such as life imprisonment for women, among others. Also, as the Leader of the Opposition explained it so well in this House, we will no longer say that abortion is allowed if the mother's health is in danger, but if the mother's health is threatened.

Mr. Speaker, as a woman elected to this House, as a woman who has fought for recognition of women's rights, I urge all women who are still hesitant to cross this legislative bridge. I urge them to look back to the past, to look at history and remember how women have contributed to the development of this society. But they did so only when they could express themselves freely, as equals.

It is my profound belief that women must never give up their equality and their freedom. They should take advantage of this opportunity to perfect this very fundamental legislation and jump at the chance to increase their independence by having more control over their own bodies. That is what the new legislation will give them.

Men will also benefit because they will have friends, advisers, wives and doctors who are increasingly free, responsible and worthy of their trust.

There are critics in some groups who object that despite this national standard, there will be differences in treatment from one region to another, from one province to another. That is true, Mr. Speaker. However, I belong to a political party that has never been ashamed to recognize regional realities. As far as abortion is concerned, it is only natural that every region in Canada should be able to proceed at its own pace. On what basis do they want to reduce Canada to a one-dimensional society? Here again, the government has made a genuine sociological reading of the abortion phenomenon and has drawn the appropriate conclusions.

Mr. Speaker, I do not claim that Bill C-43 is perfect. Far from it. I do say, however, that the greatness of our Canadian society and its ability to be a pluralistic society will be reflected in the ability of this House to vote.

These legal concerns will never reflect all the nuances that our hearts and minds want to express.

Mr. Speaker, we must therefore rise above that which might divide us irreparably and seek a common ground that is acceptable to the majority. Our most dependable guide posts in this respect are tolerance, understanding and maturity.

Mr. Speaker, we all realize that men and women benefit by change, even if change comes very gradually. That is why, speaking in this public and democratic forum, I urge women to support this bill, and I urge men to realize that when women change, so do they.

Together, let us cross the bridge the government has built for us. As a woman and a Member of Parliament, I say that we are going in the right direction.

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I rise with respect to the Hon. Secretary of State's speech. The tone of her speech had a great deal of dignity and I appreciate that. I appreciate also the difficulty with which she has explored her soul in this whole discussion about this very difficult question. I think she has set a tone tonight that is worthy of respect and I credit her for that.

I too have spoken with many people of different views in my own riding and I respect their views. However, when it comes to the responsibility of legislators, she and I have to part company. She said that we must give a bill to this House. I see no reason to give a bill to this House. I think it is only increasing the kind of pain that exists in our country now. This very debate is increasing that pain and encouraging the kind of lobby that is going on outside the House of Commons which is also increasing that pain.

We all dream of our ideal world, as the minister has said. My question to the hon. member really relates to the reasoning behind this bill. The minister said it was the only vehicle which would set down regulations on a national scale. The Criminal Code is not going to ensure access to abortion in the regions of our country where poor women are the ones who are having to turn to back street abortionists or having to terminate their pregnancies themselves.

How is Bill C-43 going to solve those problems?

Mrs. Vézina: Once again, Madam Speaker, I will refer to the principle of reality. When I look at the statistics as a woman and as a legislator I can readily see that last year 65,000 women had to undergo an abortion for whatever reason. There is a legal void. It is up to the provinces to guarantee access to health care, and as a woman and as a legislator I want to make sure that any woman seeking abortion services can do so with dignity, if I may put it that way, because it will be recognized as a medical act performed by a qualified medical practitioner in a recognized institution.

I used to be involved in development motivation. I met women and teenage girls. I saw how abortions were carried out in many cases. I deplore the fact that the legislative measure we are proposing involves the Criminal Code, but as we said on so many occasions, this is the only way to proceed at the national level if we want to enable Canadian women in any province to use this emergency service, this emergency measure, but with a medical approach, through a medical act which will take into account the quality of life.

That being so—the principle of reality—we must build a bridge which will reach both pro-life and pro-choice advocates, but within the context of Canadian reality. As legislators we must also implement measures to achieve this ideal project which will make it possible for women to protect the unborn child, practice family planning, and provide information.

And I maintain that with respect to this legislative measure, as a legislator I will support the government position because it enables us as a group of men and women to take a small step ahead, yet I would urge all women to continue to enjoy their freedom.

[English]

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. minister a question, again with appreciation of the great thought that she has obviously given to this issue.

Given the minister's statement about the importance of women having access to good and proper medical care, can she explain to me why the bill in its present form provides an equal penalty for the totally unqualified person who preys on vulnerable women and provides abortions without any training to do so and for a doctor exercising his best medical judgment who, for one reason or another, does not perhaps completely meet the intentions or the wording of the law?

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina: The answer that comes readily to mind is that I have faith in the medical profession. Our government considers abortion as a medical act that must be performed by a qualified physician. Doctors are men and women who also live by a professional code of ethics. Health will be defined by the medical body, which reassures me, as a woman, that women's health will be kept safe and private, since the woman will see a doctor with whom she will share responsibility for the decision. Having said that, I call on women, with whom I have worked for many years, to demand their right to quality services.

But the bill under consideration gives me the assurance that Canadian women throughout the country will be respected whatever the habits and customs of their province, because indeed habits vary from one province to the next, but that the decision to perform the medical act will be made with a clear conscience with the physician in appropriate quality surroundings. We are taking a step towards the acknowledgement of the freedom of the woman, of her sense of responsibility, of the right of the foetus. As a society we must acknowledge that women should have freedom as well as responsibilities—for responsibilities come with freedom—but we must also acknowledge the evolution of life. I would suggest that the bill enables us to reach both objectives.

[English]

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, I also appreciate the tone with which the minister speaks. I too am a social worker. I have practised in the field and have seen women die from illegal abortions.

I think women make the decision to terminate a pregnancy after a great deal of deliberation. They do so based on sound judgment, a knowledge of their own circumstances, and in consultation with their doctors.

For nearly two years now in Canada, we have had no criminal law on abortion. I think the women of Canada have demonstrated that they have acted responsibly during this time. They have shown Canadians that there is no need for any legislation, particularly criminal legislation, concerning abortion.

Is the minister aware of some particular circumstances in the last two years that would prompt her to feel that this House is more capable or more able to make a judgment than the woman herself in consultation with her doctor?

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina: I repeat that the central government has to make sure that health care is of first quality and readily accessible to all Canadian men and women. This is why we must have this legal measure in place. Personally, as a legislator, I would rather not go through the kind of situation we were in last July. It is imperative that every Canadian woman—wherever she resides, I repeat—be entitled to that service. There exists a legal void which needs to be filled. This is a medical act which has to be recognized as such and performed by a physician. As a legislator I am convinced that the bridge we are proposing under this measure will enable the proponents of both positions to reach a common ground. As legislators we have to rise above personal opinions. What our constituents and Canadians expect of us as law makers in this House is that we take measures to improve the quality of life in this country, and such is the aim of our efforts: a medical approach, and proper balance between the right of the woman and the concern of society with respect to the evolution of the foetus and of human life.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, the issue of abortion is a highly charged one for the House and for each of us as individual Members of Parliament, and also for the nation. It is even more so for the woman who finds herself pregnant unexpectedly and faces a situation in which carrying, bearing and raising a child seems an overwhelming impossibility. For her, the choice she faces is agonizing and painful.

For us as legislators, I believe the task is not to determine how, through law, we can impose our own individual consciences on all Canadian women. Rather, it is how we can draft a law that respects the right of a woman to exercise her conscience, that respects the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and its guarantees of the right to life and security of her person, but that also reflects the value society gives to the worth and dignity of human life.

• (1830)

Madam Speaker, whatever our opinion on abortion, the law must apply equally to all Canadians, rich or poor. It is not enough to say, as the Minister of Justice did two weeks ago, that it is a provincial decision as to what medical services are to be provided in their jurisdiction.

[English]

If I could return to the question of balance, we do not find this balance of rights and of interest in human life in most of the representations we have been receiving by the thousands. Instead we find two opposing views so strongly held as a matter of conscience that any meeting of the minds seems impossible. On the one hand are those who firmly believe in the existence of human life from the moment of conception and believe that any abortion should be illegal and the perpetrator subject to punishment under the laws of the land. On the other hand are those who believe, as a matter of conscience, that any abortion at any time agreed to by a woman and her doctor should be no concern of society and that society has no interest in the unborn child at any time until the moment after birth.

The people we are not hearing from are the vast majority who hold a view somewhere between those two, who believe that a woman with sound medical advice and support should be able to decide at a certain point, according to her own conscience, whether she is able, physically, mentally and emotionally, to not only give birth to but to provide for the life of a child. They also believe that there comes a time in a pregnancy where another life is involved and must be considered. I am not convinced this bill is even a good starting point from which to develop such a law.

The Canada Health Act guarantees Canadians that health services will be universal, accessible and comprehensive. If the government is bringing forward a bill, and it has, that makes abortion legal under certain conditions and under fairly broad conditions, then it must ensure that women have equal access to safe, quality medical care when they choose to exercise their rights under the law. It is not good enough to say, as the justice minister did, that it is a provincial decision as to what medical services are to be provided in their jurisdiction. When one says that Prince Edward Island, for example, has the right to fund or not fund abortion services, what one is really saying is that if somebody can afford to go somewhere else is what it comes down to, then they have a right to exercise their legitimate entitlement under the law, and others who cannot afford it cannot exercise that entitlement.

This bill fails to guarantee access to a service that the bill says is perfectly legal under the right conditions. It provides the same punishment for a totally unqualified, perhaps unscrupulous practitioner who will take advantage of vulnerable women as it provides for a fully qualified medical doctor providing the same service and perhaps not quite meeting the requirements of the law. I find that inadequate protection for women from unscrupulous practitioners.

[Translation]

While we are trying to decide whether we must limit or prohibit abortion, provincial governments continue to restrict access to contraception to those who can afford it. Indeed, the health insurance plans of these governments do not include contraceptives. How can we, in all good conscience, allow this abuse to continue?

[English]

How can we say on the one hand we are criminalizing abortion and yet at the same time allow people across this country not to have access to the contraceptive devices, advice and counselling that would prevent the need for an abortion?

A third point I want to make on the bill specifically is that whatever are a person's rights under the law, they have a right to know what those rights are and to exercise them. They have a right to be absolutely clear about when they are performing an act which is not legal and when they are performing one which is. I think this bill fails to a large measure to provide that clarity. The lack of clarity is evident in the fact that it is presented on some occasions as a bill that gives fairly liberal choice to women in the matter of abortion and on the other hand of clarity can only leave people unsure of their their rights, unsure of their responsibilities and unsure of whether in fact they are obeying the law.

I want to address the balance of my remarks to a serious issue that is not covered in this bill and that I do not expect to be covered in any companion legislation that there is even the remotest hope of this government introducing. I want to address some of the fundamental factors that lead women to the point of feeling desperate when they find themselves pregnant and convinced that abortion is their only remedy. Abortion is the failure of social policy, of health policy and of economic policy. It is the failure of a society to adequately reflect, in its allocation of resources, in its laws and in its programs, a full and abundant respect and love for human life at all stages.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I see every day in my own riding that the society we live in does not recognize the worth and dignity of every human being.

[English]

I see every day in my own community the reasons women seek to abort rather than bear a child. I see a world of work that still punishes women for wanting or needing to be both workers and mothers, that deprives them of earning potential, promotion opportunities and even a decent pension in their old age because they choose to rear and nurture children. A society that truly valued children, that truly valued the women who bear them and the raising of those children, would put its mind to finding solutions so that women can both be mothers and fulfil every other aspect of their life.

[Translation]

Some families living in poverty and earning only minimum wages are forced to turn to food banks because they are unable to adequately feed and clothe their children.

[English]

I see women brutalized by an abusive partner and a society that provides to them no support and no shelter. I see women left alone with their children on the breakup of a marriage, forced to give up their homes, forced perhaps to give up a job to care for their children, to try to rebuild a secure family environment for them to grow up in. I see a society that does not value their roles as mothers but through its welfare system provides poverty level support and hems them in with rules and regulations that keep them and their children trapped in poverty. I see them deprived of the encouragement and support they need to become self-sufficient, left on long lists, waiting for child care and waiting for training programs.

• (1840)

Just this past week I received a letter that clearly outlines this from a young woman who is finally breaking out of that trap. She is back in school and has parent who is attending school, who has a goal to obtain an education in order to get a worthwhile job. If there are not sufficient subsidized day care spaces, what happens to the others like me who have this same goal?" Yet the budget clearly says that because of the fiscal situation, the government has decided not to proceed with the expenditure of $4 billion over the next seven years to increase significantly the number of good and quality child care spaces across Canada.

That is a plea from a woman, who is making her way in the world, that we provide what is necessary for others like her to do the same.

[Translation]

Women are trapped in a social system which deprives them of life's essentials and does not help them become self-sufficient.

[English]

The statistics speak for themselves. Families headed by women are four times as likely to be poor than families headed by men. At the same time as these women struggle I see them and their families, their children, shunned and condemned by a society that brands them and their children as leeches on the generosity of society, responsible for all the ills of their communities, responsible through the social programs even for the national debt.

I see women out in the workforce struggling to support themselves and their children but unable to earn a decent living because they are trapped in pink collar ghettos where pay Women still earn only 66 cents for every dollar a man earns.

Most heartbreakingly I see the children of poverty entering our school system with three strikes against them, judged as incapable before they are even five years old because they are not as well nourished, not as well dressed, their hair is not as bright and shiny and they do not speak the same way as children from better off famlies do. Is it any wonder, branded as failures, they drop out of school at a rate double that of the general population? It is vicious cycle as poor incomes lead to dropping out of school which results in poor incomes which leads to the next generation dropping out of school.

In this, one of the wealthiest countries in the world, we have over one million children, one of every six children, living in a family where the income is below the poverty level. And two-thirds of children raised by female single parents are poor.

I see a justice system that punishes theft more severely than it punishes the sexual abuse of a child. I see our children bombarded by a society that uses the sexuality of women to sell products in the marketplace. Yet I see people who do not want to see sexuality and birth control even discussed in our schools. I see young girls who become sexually active while they are still children, seeking some small token of self-worth in a society that tells them that being sexy and glamorous is the way to have value and importance and in many areas they still are told that only men achieve success and value.

I see neighbourhoods where showers are held for 13-year old pregnant girls because when the predominant climate of the community is poverty and hopelessness, the birth of a child is a reason to have some new hope.

The public debate on abortion has been so polarized around the question of birth that it has to a large extent obliterated the question of life. I would love at some point in my stay in this Parliament to have as many phone calls and as many letters addressing the issues of poverty for women and children as I have had on this issue.

The polarization on one end has been focused on giving women the legal and theoretical right to choose not to bear a child. I have chosen to address those factors that rob women of choices, that make it impossible for them to choose pregnancy with joy and with hope.

On the other end the debate has focused on the right of a child to be born but not on the right of every child to be nurtured, supported and valued to fully develop its humanity at every stage of life.

There are many things that have been said and will be said about this bill, and I do not need to repeat them all. Whether by placing the onus on doctors for meeting some nebulous criteria we ensure that more and more doctors in fact choose not to risk their careers and their practice by making a decision that is somewhat ill-defined; whether doctors are subject to private actions that call into question their judgment as medical practitioners; whether pregnant women can still be dragged publicly through the courts, every detail of their private lives flashed on the television, radio and the newspapers; whether the bill fails to adequately respect the developing human life; whether it forces women to lie and deceive to achieve a right which the law at least on the surface gives them; whether it gives a choice to women of economic means and not to women who do not have the same economic advantages; whether the issue could not be dealt with more thoroughly in the Health Act where it could be combined with measures on contraception, on counselling, on options and on various other related matters; whether this bill describes with sufficient clarity the rights and responsibilities of women and their doctors; whether in fact the bill is any more than a duplicitous attempt to please both sides, without really addressing the issues, society at large feels the need to be addressed.

It is difficult but necessary, I think, not to be guided by our private moral values, by the conscience that we would apply in our own lives to choices that we might personally have to make but to act as legislators with respect for the belief of others who perhaps have different standards and different moral values. We must act with compassion for those who find themselves in a situation in which certainly most of us in this House would never find ourselves, and with a commitment to do that which respects the pluralism of our society and the democratic principle that the laws will not force the moral beliefs of one segment of society on all of society except where society itself is directly threatened. It is clear that we do not know what the predominant moral value in society is on this.

I started out by saying it is a difficult question. It is a difficult question. I urge us all to act with that respect, that compassion and that commitment to a law which respects the diversity of views that Canadians have on this subject.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to the member and I am still not sure what her position is on this bill. I guess that probably goes for her party as well. I wanted to ask this question of the minister who has left the House. The minister said a little earlier that each Canadian woman will be entitled to a medical abortion and will be able to have it with dignity as a result of this legislation. I wonder if she agrees with that, if that is her interpretation of the limits? Well, really this bill has no limits as far as access is concerned which is what the minister, I think, was saying.

The member mentioned some examples in the form of questions. I wondered about the example of women, for various reasons, seeking abortions which doctors do not judge to be for health reasons. She was indicating that doctors may be feeling that they have to have a very strict interpretation of "health" under this act. The member mentioned young people whose health is not in danger but who simply cannot care for a child and who have many reasons for not wanting to continue with the pregnancy. She mentioned single women who are healthy but become pregnant and do not want to bear a child for various reasons. She mentioned as well low-income women who may have several children and simply cannot cope financially with an abortion. All these examples would probably be women who are not seeking abortions strictly for health reasons and therefore, I assume, would be not eligible for a legal abortion under this bill and doctors indeed might be fearful of giving too liberal an interpretation of the question of health. I would like the member's views on this.

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, the member has raised a myriad of questions which may require another 20-minute speech in which to reply. It is true that the Liberal party does not have a position on abortion. It has done what I think is the right thing and allowed each member to vote according to his or her own conscience. I think that is an appropriate approach on a bill such as this.

If the member detected no firm commitment one way or another on this bill, she is absolutely right. I have a number of reservations with the bill. I have not yet concluded whether, in fact, it is worth allowing a bill like this to proceed through second reading to committee stage where it might be improved and some of the issues she raised addressed. That is why I am paying very close attention to all the debates in the House and to a number of other people whose advice I am seeking.

Obviously I do not believe that this bill gives women equal access everywhere in the country, regardless of their financial circumstances, to what the bill purports to deliver as a legal right and entitlement for them. I do not want to comment on how the law will be interpreted. I suspect that the Minister of Justice knows quite well that under this law there is virtually no possibility of a doctor or a woman being prosecuted and convicted for the carrying out of an abortion.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, I have a number of questions I would like to ask the member. I am particularly struck by her last comment because I think people are playing ostrich. They are putting their heads in the sand and passing criminal legislation and then saying, "Let's not worry about it because a doctor is never going to be prosecuted under this act".

The reality is that doctors are going to be prosecuted. People who are anti-choice are going to be trying desperately to have a doctor charged and doctors are going to become fearful. This bill does not allow an abortion for a 14-year-old-girl. It does not allow abortions for deformity of a foetus. It does not allow abortions for incest. It does not allow abortions for family planning or socioeconomic reasons. People said that if a young girl went to a doctor and the doctor said that he would not perform an abortion, she need only go to another doctor. The first doctor has made a decision that the abortion could be subject to criminal sanction because there is not a threat to the woman's health. Now is the second doctor going to perform that abortion? I doubt it. If no doctor is ever going to be charged, why do you think they are putting it in the Criminal Code? Is it not the intent to put it in the Criminal Code so that if people step over the bounds they will be charged?

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I think the member misunderstands. I am not the person proposing this legislation and I think those comments and questions should more appropriately be addressed to the minister who did propose it and I trust that he either has done or will be doing that.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, when the Supreme Court struck down the existing criminal legislation on abortion almost two years ago Justice Wilson said at the time, and I quote: "The right to reproduce or not to produce—is properly perceived as an integral part of modern woman's struggle to assert her dignity and worth as a human being."

I completely agree with this and I and my Party take this principle as the starting point in any serious discussion about the right to abortion.

The problem today in our country is not that we no longer have criminal legislation respecting abortion, the real problem today is that Canadian women do not have assured access to abortion services. They are denied the dignity that Justice Wilson specifically wrote about.

The bill we have before us does nothing to change that. What it does is confront women with the threat of criminal prosecution. What it does is reduce women's right and ability to make decisions that affect their lives. The New Democratic Party of Canada cannot accept such legislation.

Women have varying philosophical and religious beliefs about abortion. That is obvious. Some are totally opposed for reasons that I respect, if I do not agree with them. Others believe it ought to be their right to decide. We believe as a matter of policy, I believe as a matter of principle, it is not for the state to legislate one answer for everyone. The state must provide a legal framework for all women to choose freely according to their own philosophy or their own religious convictions. This bill does not do this.

Quite the contrary. It makes abortion illegal except for women who fit certain health criteria. It reduces access to abortion by threatening doctors with criminal action. It makes women possible accessories to a crime. It invites third party interventions. It in no way addresses prevention or unwanted pregnancies. For those who believe morality is based on freedom, as do I, this bill must be defeated.

[Translation]

Let us be frank! Women faced with an unwanted pregnancy under this legislation might feel compelled to claim they are weak or under trauma in order to qualify for abortion. They would need their physician's judgment. If the physician refused, they would have to seek another one. And where a first physician had refused to induce the abortion, would a second one take the opposing view thereby taking the risk of being charged under the criminal code? Certainly or probably not. The legislation is unfair to medical practitioners. It forces them to make decisions they would rather not make. But, it is deeply unfair to women.

[English]

The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court at the time of the same ruling that I quoted earlier had this to say:

> Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person.

Women must have the right to be free in reaching a decision themselves in this domain, obviously, after consultation with loved ones in a particular case, after consultation for medical purposes with their doctors, after consultation with any range of a number of people that they may want to discuss the situation with, if they so desire in terms of moral considerations involved. But the fundamental human right—and I stress human right—ought to reside with a woman to decide. The bill denies Canadian women that right. Therefore it is unacceptable for this reason.

The bill should also be rejected because it does not guarantee access. Those women who have been denied abortions because of the control of hospital therapeutic abortion boards by those opposed to choice may be no better off as a result of this legislation. They can still be denied access to what I regard as a fundamental human right, as does the Supreme Court.

Poor women will suffer. Wealthy and powerful women have always had access to abortion, and always will. Throughout the whole history of civilized existence, when abortion was at one time condoned by the church, after it had ceased to be condoned by the church, when abortion was deemed to be unacceptable for a variety of secular reasons in certain societies, those with wealth and power, women with wealth, have always had access to an effective right to an abortion if they wanted it. The reality is that money has bought freedom. Money has bought choice. I believe that freedom, whether in this domain or any other, should not be dependent on wealth. That ought to be a fundamental concern.

The truth is, there is no need for criminal law to regulate the morality of Canadian women on that issue.

Our mothers, sisters, wives and daughters are not criminals. In Canada, there is no need to introduce abortion into the Criminal Code. Since January 1988, abortion no longer comes under the Criminal Code. The number of abortions has not changed. But in Prince Edward Island, women still do not have access to abortion services. In Newfoundland, only one medical practitioner induces abortions in a hospital. Women in northern British Columbia, northern Alberta and northern Ontario must travel great distances to obtain an abortion. In Nova Scotia, where the number of late abortions is higher than the average, with a higher risk of health hazards, the provincial Government recently took measures to restrict still further access to abortion services.

Canadian women have no need for threats of criminal penalties. What they need is that the Canadian Government ensures they have access to abortion services.

[English]

The Canada Health Act stipulates that universality, comprehensiveness and accessibility must apply for all medically required services. Through the financial clout of the federal government, it should insist that these principles apply to the issue of abortion. The federal government, as we have made clear for a number of years now, has the legislative mandate to achieve these principles in application to the question of abortion. It is time this government showed leadership by using the Canada Health Act the way it could be used effectively to guarantee access to this important right from one coast to the other.

Despite the best intentions, some 64 per cent of pregnancies occur while partners are using some form of birth control. All methods of birth control have flaws, and any choice involves some kind of compromise, a compromise to a woman's health. Danger by and large tends to increase with the reliability of the birth control device that is used. Women who use IUDs risk pelvic inflammatory disease and sterility. Those on the pill can face two to four times the risk of heart attack and stroke.

When birth control fails—to state the obvious under such circumstances—women are faced with unwanted pregnancies. If the foetus is carried to term, women in today's society overwhelmingly continue to be the primary care givers in the family structure, and frequently for single women, the only source of financial and emotional support for the child. That is what is involved if a woman is forced to have an unwanted child.

I ask members of the House to keep in mind, if we are thinking of single women here, that 56 per cent of single-parent families in this country live at or below the poverty level. Knowing this reality, I repeat, a woman ought to have the right to freely decide for herself in such a situation.

Family planning organizations all over the country have long recognized women's lack of control over their own fertility as a major health risk for themselves and for their families.

Pregnancy in women 15 to 19 years of age is considered to be the number one health problem by many health specialists. Teenage mothers experience a higher rate of mortality and morbidity. Pregnancy in adolescent women can seriously interrupt educational goals and often results, as we all know too well, in lifelong poverty. Young women who become pregnant after discussing all options, again I repeat, must be free to choose.

We have come a long way since 1969 when we threw out laws that made it illegal to disseminate information on birth control. But this bill shows we have not come far enough.

One woman in four is sexually active in our society on this continent and in northern Europe by 15 years of age. It is time we all understood that. Fewer than 10 per cent of North American teenagers use an effective method of birth control when they first become sexually active. In contrast, 90 per cent of adolescents in Scandinavian countries use birth control methods from the start.

Quebec, a province with one of the best birth control services in North America, also happens to have one of the lowest rates of unwanted pregnancy in the country. A child born in the province of Quebec tends to be a wanted child. We believe all children born in Canada ought to be wanted children.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Family Planning Division of Health and Welfare Canada is composed of one full-time staff person. Surely this must change. Surely the federal government must make a substantial increase in the funding of birth control education and all other aspects of family planning in this country.

I want to conclude this brief but serious speech on this very serious subject by saying that families, as all of us know, can be the source of infinite joy, of boundless love, of security and of kinship. The decision to bring children into this world is quite possibly the most serious decision a man and a woman together—a woman in the ultimate sense here—will ever make. Such a decision, with all its responsibility implied, should be a free decision.

Let us not enact a bill that would make criminals of women who do not look lightly upon the responsibilities in such a choice. Let us do all we can instead to ensure that all children in Canada are wanted children.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I listened with care to the very serious speech that the member for Oshawa just made. I would ask him if he is telling the House by implication, taking his premise that abortion should be exclusively a matter between a woman and her doctor, that society or the government, if you like, has at no point the right to interfere with that, to regulate that matter. Or, in other words, is he telling the House that at 16, 20, or 22 weeks it is still his view and that of his party that society has not the right to say, at some stage: "You cannot make the decision exclusively between the two of you"?

Mr. Broadbent: I am saying that of course we need regulations in this domain, but they are health regulations. The evidence is overwhelming that we do not need criminal law.

We have criminal law in our society and in others, if there is a mode of behaviour, a kind of behaviour that is deemed to be repulsive or morally unacceptable, and we need the sanction of criminal law to curtail. The evidence is overwhelming in this particular area that we are now debating that criminal law is not required, that Canadian women, as I said in my comments, whether they are our friends, wives, sisters, mothers, or lovers, are responsible, moral human beings. They have so demonstrated it in the case of the country as a whole since the Supreme Court decision almost two years ago.

Also, in the case of the Province of Quebec, where there has been freedom of choice for many years before that, there has not been irresponsibility—if one chooses a word—to deal with the issue in moral choices made by women.

Overwhelmingly, the decisions made about pregnancies are in the earliest stages. Overwhelmingly, when they occur late in a pregnancy, it is to save the woman's life, or for some other very serious medical reason involving deformities that may occur.

The evidence for us, not only in this party, but for the large majority of Canadian women, I repeat, is that we do not need Criminal Code sanctions, with all the attendant risks that come with such a measure in this domain.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Oshawa. It is a follow-up to the question my friend from Edmonton just asked. I know this is a very serious issue and he and I, as he obviously knows, will disagree strongly, our positions being naturally very different.

I want to get it clear in my mind if the member is telling us that at no point in the pregnancy does he think that society has an interest of such a magnitude that criminal law should apply, that at no point in the pregnancy is there an offence against society if the life of the unborn were terminated. In fact, that is criminal law—it is an offence against society. My colleague is a lawyer, and I am sure he knows that far better than I.

An Hon. Member: He is not a lawyer. He is a professor.

Mr. Boudria: I am sorry, he is not a lawyer. Neither am I.

I want to ask him very seriously if the position that he is taking is that at no point in the pregnancy is that the case. If it is, even for people who do not agree with me on my pro-life position—I happen to think that life begins at conception and that human life should be protected from that point—surely, then, there must be some point at which he would think that society has an interest and that it is society's moral duty to intervene, to protect and to punish behaviour which is contrary to what society thinks is right.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, let me begin my clearing the record. I have many faults, but being a member of the legal profession is not among them.

On the substantive matter, as I said earlier, my understanding of the principle of why criminal law is needed is that certain modes of behaviour become not only repulsive but the instrument of the state is needed to ensure that they do not take place. The evidence as we have seen it in our own country is that the kind of outrageous act envisioned by the hon. member—and perhaps he might think of a woman having an abortion at the latest steps, beyond a certain point in the development of the foetus—does not take place. Therefore, if there is no evidence that this practice is taking place, from our point of view you do not need the sanction of a moral code. You do not need to leave the implication, as it would for me, that women are not exercising their moral responsibility seriously when I believe they are.

If there were a situation that is hypothetically possible along the lines that the hon. member alludes to, and he has acknowledged a philosophical conception, a view that fundamentally differs from mine—and I repeat that I respect that difference quite seriously even though I do not share it—if we are evolved in our behaviour as a society, and if we consider the kinds of practices that he alludes to as being hypothetically possible, then perhaps hypothetically at some point you might need that.

Why make that assumption now when there is no evidence to warrant it? The evidence goes very clearly all in the opposite direction that women, like men, are morally responsible human beings and therefore ought to have the right, in my view, to continue to exercise their freedom unfettered by the potential threat of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Oshawa. In my preamble I would like to point out that this debate does offer the opportunity to MPs to differ with their very own colleagues from their very own party.

I would like to say to my hon. friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that in our vocabulary of abortion we should never, ever find the words "punish" or "punishment". We should never be thinking of punishing women. We should be thinking of supporting women. I say to all members of the House that if you want to protect the unborn, you protect their mothers. That is how you do it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harvard: I have a question for the hon. member for Oshawa because I want him to expand on one particular area of his remarks. He said that the woman should have the right to freely decide this matter of having an abortion.

I would like to ask him this question because there are some people who already feel that under this proposed legislation women would have that unfettered right, they would be able to freely decide in consultation with their doctors whether they are going to have an abortion. They say that because, as some people say, the criteria are so wide that you could drive a Sherman tank through them. I ask the hon. member for Oshawa why he would be concerned about women not having this unfettered right to make this decision once this legislation were passed, if it were to be passed.

Mr. Broadbent: I would be very happy to answer that question. As the member knows, the criteria is essentially medical. It seems to me that it is something that ought to concern us from a point of view of moral responsibility. We are doing precisely what I believe the Supreme Court and this legislation has ultimately tested. There is better than a fifty-fifty chance that it will be declared ultra vires because it does deny the basic rights of a woman in terms of free choice, independent of medical criteria, to make a decision.

I will just repeat in my answer the argumentation that I found both moving and logically cogent in the ruling of the Chief Justice. He said: "Forcing a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations—" There is no reference to health, physical or psychological. He says: "—unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person".

That is a very cogent expression of the view that a woman ought to have the unfettered right to decide. If I were involved, if my wife were pregnant, we would have this discussion. I believe this myself.

Our party's position is a question of a choice here. I am saying as an extension of that principle, if I advised my wife that I did not favour her having an abortion, even as a partner in the act of creating a potential human being, then she should be free ultimately to reject it. I believe that. She ought to have that right. Certainly, she should not, nor should any other person, married or unmarried, have to go to a doctor for other than medical reasons. If a doctor says there are good medical reasons for a woman not to have an abortion, then that opinion should be respected.

The woman should not have to be dependent upon anyone's opinion, medically, psychologically or whatever, if she is to have the respect, as the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada said, to her security as a person, her ultimate freedom. We have to give her that freedom. We ought not to deal with the question again, having legislation that refers to medical criteria basically as the only criteria to be used in reaching such a decision.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as I rise to take part in this debate it goes without saying that members of all sides of the House face a dilemma. Can we support with our vote a bill that we may find difficult to support in our hearts and in our minds?

At the outset, it is important that the country observing this debate recognize and accept that as legislators we have the duty not only to vote but to speak, to explain our votes. The two go together. So, in my comments today, I ask members and my constituents not only to note that I support this bill, but also to remember why I do.

We must remember where we were in this House on this issue in the summer of 1988. The House faced an obligation imposed on it by the Supreme Court following its decision in Morgentaler to come to a consensus on a new law on abortion, a law that would balance the rights of women desiring an abortion and the rights of the unborn child.

The House faced an opportunity, an opportunity to choose from a variety of approaches to a new law. We failed to achieve a consensus. That process proved what we knew then and we know now. There is no agreement in this country. There is no agreement in this House.

Possibly there is no agreement in any party on what an ideal abortion régime in Canada should be.

Agonizing as it has been, futile as it appeared, the process in my mind was useful. It was useful if only to demonstrate through our imperfect means in this place that no one's ideal law can be achieved in this place.

The government has done what it had to do in the context I have just described. It has introduced for debate, for study, for possible amendment and finally a vote, a bill that attempts to balance the rights to security of the person of the woman seeking an abortion and the right to life of the unborn.

Simply, as I see it, the bill does this by beginning with the premise that an abortion cannot be performed unless it is necessary to preserve the health of the woman. It removes the previous procedural obstacles that the Supreme Court indicated infringed on the security of the person of the woman and which has been part of this debate in earlier speeches.

The bill, in acknowledging that abortion is a medical procedure, places on the medical practitioner the responsibility of determining whether the procedure is medically warranted. I do not shy away from placing that responsibility on those who are trained, those who are professional and those who must make life and death decisions in the course of their work every day.

But in my view the bill does not adequately circumscribe the grounds on which the act of terminating unborn life should be allowed. From my perspective and that of many Canadians of every region, both men and women—and I believe from every walk of life—this is the bill's greatest deficiency. It will be said that the bill allows abortions for too wide a variety of motives and under too many circumstances. I freely admit that such a prospect troubles me deeply.

In response, however, I can only point out the inherent weakness of the law, of any law, not just this law. How does law deal with the motives of the human being? For the law to command respect and to have any effect it must do two things.

First, it must bear some relation to things as they are, and not exclusively as they should be. Second, it must be capable of enforcement.

I have come to the conclusion, though reluctantly, that no abortion law would be capable of preventing abortion on the scale on which it occurs in our society today, and that no law would reverse what has been done in our society for the previous 20 years.

I believe that women seeking an abortion are not going to change their intentions if a law imposes a threat to their health or their freedom. Is a remedy a sanction against the woman? Remember, we are dealing, my colleagues, with criminal law. A sanction can only take place after an act has been committed. For those of us who are pro life it does not address the saving of life.

Physicians are not going to deny abortions to women whose health is affected by the pregnancy as they determine it in their professional code. Regrettably, juries are not going to convict today any more than they have in the past.

I acknowledge that our society does not respect unborn life sufficiently. I acknowledge further that in general our society inadequately supports women who bear children. As a former Minister of National Health and Welfare I struggled with the issue of what type of programs could we come forward with which would strengthen the support for women and with it the support for the family. I agree that in general men have a long way to go in respecting and placing sufficient value on the roles of parenting and caring for children.

This debate is not simply a woman's debate or an issue relating to or affecting women only. It affects women, obviously. It affects men. It affects children. These failings of our society are not going to be solved in this law or any other because the law cannot reform the human heart, and too often we try here to do just that. The law cannot achieve what society is unwilling or incapable of achieving.

We freely admit that the state cannot solve the great issues of human life. Many of us know that genuine reform in society will not come through political reform. Yet I believe that the state has a moral obligation to restrain the actions taken by men.

Chuck Colson in his book Kingdoms and Conflict writes the following: "Attitudes are forged by spiritual forces, not by legislation. Values change when spiritual movements stir the hearts of people and when fresh winds of reason stir their minds."

I am also convinced that we need a law because virtually every action, individual or corporate, in society is circumscribed in some manner by law, no matter how minimal the protection or the sanctions within that law. Surely members on both sides of this issue would have to agree that this issue is of sufficient import that if other actions are circumscribed by law, this action of abortion is sufficiently serious to be considered to be circumscribed by law as well.

What I do believe, therefore, is that what this proposed law will do is reinforce the principle that human life has unique value; that unborn life cannot be terminated simply on the basis of one person's choice without recognized grounds. Therefore I support this bill, albeit after much struggle and soul searching for two more fundamental reasons.

The first alternative was to have a law that rests on the principle that unborn life somehow attains greater value with the passage of time. The cabinet, and I say this even though we are all restricted by cabinet confidences, struggled with that issue. This House struggles with that issue. I am absolutely convinced that if we ever accept the principle that life somehow gains value as it matures, we are then subject to that great danger of asking ourselves the question: Does life lose value as it ages?

The second reason for supporting this law is that the alternative is no law. That, to me, is unacceptable because underlying such a course of action is the principle that unborn life has no value at all. It needs to be said in this place that the kind of solution for a middle ground proposed by the Law Refrom Commission, namely a gestational principle, is arbitrary in moral and scientific terms. Arbitrariness is precisely what the law is supposed to prevent. That was one option open to the government. I am pleased and frankly relieved that that course of action has not been taken.

This bill maintains that there are no stages in the value of life. If there were, then any other stage of life would be subject to arbitrary evaluation. If we introduce the idea of relativism in this matter, it will be difficult to exclude it in other matters. The whole concept of human rights rests on the principle of excluding arbitrariness and relativism.

A bill based on the gestational principle could have been one alternative, but the House would have faced the same dilemma it faces now, a membership comprised of those who believe that the law is not even necessary, of those who believe a law must prevent abortions under any circumstances except for a threat to the mother's life, and of those who favour a law that allows abortions in some cases. No bill, I am convinced, would be capable of covering that spectrum. The point, therefore, is that we have this bill and we have to decide what to do with it.

The alternative to this bill, the result of a negative vote, would be a complete absence of any signal by society or to society that abortion is a serious matter involving human life.

The proposal has been called a compromise bill and I suppose it is. I think of it rather as an incomplete bill. It is incomplete because it rests on what is outside the law for its force and its effectiveness, namely, the values that thousands of Canadians bring each year to the decision of abortion. It is incomplete because it does not contain all the protection for human life, for unborn life, that I would like personally to see contained in abortion law. It is incomplete because perhaps society will ever yet move to a greater respect for human life in every dimension.

Possibly in the not distant future, in a more perfect and caring world, public attitudes and the public institutions by which we govern ourselves will respect the most innocent and vulnerable of human life. It will be a society which celebrates the fact that we have been given the joy not only the obligation of experiencing divine creation and giving support to that divine life in all its stages. Regrettably that day is not today.

Therefore I have not been persuaded by the arguments of my colleagues on the other side of this issue and I, in turn, have failed to persuade them with my arguments. However here we are with the best that the government could do, the best that the House could do, and I think the best that society could do on this issue in law at this time.

All of us have been influenced by certain forces. We all are influenced by what we have experienced and what we have been taught. On this issue I have been influenced by the British parliamentarian Wilberforce who, as my colleagues will know, was instrumental in having the slave trade abolished in the United Kingdom in the early 1800s. Wilberforce struggled with the need to compromise in public life as well as the obligation to be faithful to his faith. In that struggle his clergyman, a minister by the name of Newton, a member of the Church of England, gave Wilberforce some advice. Wilberforce was saying: "I have to compromise too much in public life and I might as well leave public life and do something else."

Wilberforce, after he had spoken to Newton, took the counsel of Newton, who said very simply: "You follow your own faith, your own convictions, but you do not abandon public office." Wilberforce followed that advice, Madam Speaker, and I intend to do the same.

And so it takes me to my last point. What can we do tonight? I am convinced that the law will not change the hearts of men and women. I am convinced as well that the law will not change the fact that 65,000 young Canadians die each year. I have to recognize that. I also have to recognize that sanctions are not the answer.

Therefore, I challenge the churches, I challenge the men and women in society to put faith to action: Adopt an unborn child. Let us take away the stigma that just because a child is unwanted that that child should therefore have no future. I have seen churches adopt children. I have seen them take under their care unwed mothers, give them care, give them support, give them a future. I have come to the conclusion that it is men and women in that setting who will have to become the answer to helping those who are most vulnerable and, in so doing, be that leaven, that catalyst in society that society can pride itself in preserving life.

It is with those conditions that I support this bill.

Mr. Blaikie: I have a comment and a question for the hon. member for Provencher who I know has struggled authentically with the various responsibilities that come in public life—tension between one's own individual conscience, the view of one's particular religious community, the view of one's political party, the view of one's constituents, and all those things that go together to make being in this place sometimes a very difficult place to be, particularly when it comes to an issue like this one.

Without entering into debate about the member's reasons for indicating his support for this bill, I was only moved to rise at the end when, if I remember him correctly, he threw out a challenge to the church and presumably to all those in the Christian community who out of their Christian belief have taken a pro-life position and who have advocated either a position similar to the one that this legislation which we have before us represents, or a position which is even more restrictive with respect to abortion, and I expect something like the member for Provencher might have advocated in another context.

When I heard the word "challenge", what I was hoping for—and I do not say this in any polemical way—was not that the challenge would only be to individual families or churches to adopt, but that the challenge would be to society to create the social and economic conditions in which women could choose life, choose pregnancy, without as it is the case in so many cases choosing poverty. If we want to send signals about the value that we place on children, we do that every time we make law with respect to family allowances, we do that every time we make law or we don't with respect to child care, and we do that every time we make law with respect to unemployment insurance and make a distinction between the benefits that adoptive parents get and natural parents.

There are a host of ways in which the concern that the member for Provencher raised could be more comprehensively articulated. I think that is the challenge which ought to be issued to those churches that find themselves at odds with this law or that advocate a stricter law.

In that respect I have to say to the member that many times when certain churches have been involved in advocating certain social and economic policies they have been told by successive governments that it is not any of their business, that these are matters for economists.

I hope we could at least agree that it is not just a question of individual action with respect to adoption. It is also a question of social and economic policies, both sending signals to potential parents as to how supportive society is going to be of their choice to be parents in whatever context that choice is exercised and to society in general. It seems to me that that is where the challenge should go out to the churches and to the Christian community or, for that matter, to any other religious community. They ought to teach not by the force of law in this case but by the power of example, by the power of love exercised not just individually but through the civil community, and by the other laws that might be passed.

• (1950)

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, to answer that question would take a lot of time, and in the issues of human life there is never one answer.

I know the member asked the question in the spirit that I have seen him address this question at other times. There is no doubt in my mind that social or economic circumstances have an effect on the decisions we take, but I would caution him, if I might, in the same spirit that it is not necessarily those in the lower economic groups who seek abortions today in Canada. I think we should be careful with that.

Perhaps I could use a personal example. I do it with a great amount of hesitation, but I do it perhaps to make the point. As I said earlier we come from our own experiences. I am a member of a family of four and I am the only one who is not adopted. My father and his first wife adopted two children who are brother and sister naturally and who escaped the Soviet Union. One was four and the other five. That family was very poor. The children were advertised in a church newspaper. It had very little to do with economics. It had everything to do with attitude.

My mother and her first husband adopted a girl. My mother's first husband for their entire married life was ill. They adopted a girl. All I am saying is that we should be careful when we give to this question that easy economic answer.

When I take a look at our native people, if I may speak about them for a moment, their attitudes to life and the reality of their poverty, I find very different attitudes in that society than I find in the general mainstream of Canadian society.

I do not want to deflect from the member's comments and his question, so I come back to the question. I say to him that I believe that not only the Christian churches but society in general should not ascribe to society the powers that it does not have. I believe that society only sets frameworks through law. People then work within that framework to do good or to do evil. I have tried to challenge them to do one of the greatest goods, and that is take from their own resources both financial, physical, emotional, spiritual and help someone rather than simply condemn because either the law is not good enough or that society does not understand or want to understand.

I appreciate what the gentleman says when he talks about economic factors. I am sure they play into that from time to time with certain circumstances, but I would suggest they do not affect every case or every decision relating to abortion.

Mr. Blaikie: I did not mean to suggest—and I think the record will show it—that every case is affected only by economic factors. I tried to go beyond that. For instance, with respect to child care, in many cases the need or the prospective lack of child care is something which affects decisions about parenthood, decisions made not only by the poor but by middle income and upper income Canadian women who have to make decisions about whether or not they would have to leave their job in order to provide the kind of care that they may think is unavailable because of the current child care system or may be unavailable to them depending on where they live or for a variety of circumstances.

I certainly was not meaning to suggest that it is only poor women who seek abortions, although in many cases economics are a very strong element in why people make the decisions that they make, and we know that to be a fact.

All I am saying is that when it is a question of pure economics and choosing poverty by choosing pregnancy, or when it is a question of other things that may come into the factors in the decision-making process by women who we would not consider poor, all these things are related to social policy decisions that we make on other days in this House of Commons.

The challenge that the member issued at the end of his speech to the church should be a challenge not only to do the individual moral thing of being available to adopt children who may be unwanted, but the social, moral thing of being involved in the political process in building up the kind of support networks that would enable all women, regardless of their circumstances, to make the kind of choices that the hon. member wants them to make.

Mr. Epp: There is a lot of truth in what the hon. member says. The only points that I would repeat in this complex issue of abortion are these factors which play on decisions that are taken by individuals. That is why I come back to the main thesis of my point tonight, and that is, yes, let us strive to get a society that is more equitable, but let us never ascribe to society the ability to change the moral factors which I believe are personal and spiritual and come from a basis other than from laws passed in this House.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, it is with some pleasure and very serious intent that I rise this evening to join in this debate on Bill C–43.

Perhaps I might just comment on the speech of my colleague, the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, because nothing shows more clearly the difficulties faced by members in this House. The hon. member is a colleague whom I love and admire very much and whom I am proud to stand beside and on most days sit behind as a colleague of this House. Yet, he and I take very different views on the issue which is the subject of the bill being debated this evening.

I think we can understand that when trusted and loyal colleagues take very different views on an issue such as this one—and it is truly a divisive issue indeed—not only does it not lend itself to the kinds of usual partisan organization that we find in this House, but it is a profound challenge to our understanding of our role as parliamentarians to find some common ground to meet the expectations of Canadians that we will make some kind of sense out of one of the most divisive issues in society today.

Like my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, my position on the issue of abortion itself is well known in my community where I am well known as an advocate of those who are pro–choice. Like the hon. minister, I face the challenge of going into my community and trying to reconcile views that are basically irreconcilable on this fundamental issue.

My particular perspective on this issue of abortion arises from my own experience and my own intellectual and spiritual development. As a philosophical Conservative, I have a great distaste for dealing with human problems in the abstract. I am often reminded of the statement of Edmund Burke, perhaps one of the great founders of philosophical conservatism, in his commentary on the French Revolution written in 1790 that the French revolutionaries saw men as abstractions and in seeing them as abstractions they forget that they were human. It has been one of the guiding principles of my life to try never to lose sight of the human dimension of an issue.

In the issue of abortion there are a number of human dimensions but, in particular, it is an issue that lends itself very poorly to attempts to generalize or to understand in the abstract. I am reminded also of the opening lines of Tolstoy's great novel Anna Karenina, where he says words to the effect that all happy families are alike; unhappy families are each unhappy in their own way. I think similarly one could say that all welcome pregnancies are in a sense alike; but each unwanted pregnancy is unwanted in its own way. The existence of an unwanted pregnancy is a circumstance that is unique to the woman involved.

I am among those Canadians who are very comfortable without a law because from my perspective I feared a law which would attempt to generalize about what is basically an experience that cannot be generalized. I feared that we would not be able to come up with a law that would respect the uniqueness of the decision to terminate or continue a pregnancy.

Bill C–43 has been described as a compromise law. Certainly for those who are on the pro–choice side of the issue the fundamental compromise is whether to have a law or not. As I say, I dreaded the prospect of a law in this area because I feared very deeply the notion of trying to create a legal framework that would lose sight of the unique circumstances that are involved in each decision with respect to pregnancy. But I can say quite sincerely and with quite a clear heart that I believe that this bill is actually better than no law. I realize that this is a position which will come as a surprise to many people who share my position on the fundamental issue of abortion. I want to address myself this evening to the reasons why I, as a very committed and passionate pro–choicer, can support Bill C–43.

I believe that in order to have a law there has to be some quid pro quo and the law itself has to respect the privacy, and, as I say, the uniqueness of the decision that has to be made about a pregnancy. I believe this bill does both. It certainly describes abortion as fundamentally a decision made by a woman with her doctor.

Unlike many people on the pro-choice side of the issue, I am not at all uncomfortable with the role of the doctor in that decision because I believe that what the bill describes as the legal framework within which abortion is performed is fundamentally good medical practice. The definition of "health" is very broad and I believe takes into account all of the circumstances in which a woman would seek an abortion.

But I would be very disturbed by a regime which did not require of medical practitioners that an opinion be formed before the procedure be carried out because just as I am deeply opposed to the notion of a woman not being able to obtain an abortion when she wants it, I think it is equally tragic for a woman to have an abortion which she later regrets. Now, that is part of human life and we all do things which we may later regret, but I think it is extremely important that when a woman goes to a doctor with a request for something as serious as a termination of a pregnancy that there at least be an inquiry as to whether that decision is an informed decision, whether it is based on a realistic evaluation of her circumstance.

I give as an example an older woman who is pregnant who may go to a doctor and may otherwise not be averse to having a child but may be convinced that at her age she will undoubtedly produce a deformed child. Some reassurance from a doctor about the diagnostic techniques of amniocentesis, for example, may be very helpful there. A woman who is in an emotional state because she fears she will be left by her partner because she is pregnant may want to reconsider that decision in light of broader options that are available to her.

So I think what is described in the bill, the requirement that a doctor form an opinion based on standard medical practice is simply good medical practice and it is something that all women are entitled to. I do not find that a problem at all.

What I think is extremely useful about the bill and what for me tips the balance in terms of this bill as opposed to no law is that I believe that in so far as it is possible for the federal government to take steps to ensure access to abortion, this bill does so by clarifying abortion as a medical procedure performed for health reasons.

It has been stated by many people in the House during this debate, including my colleagues the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Justice, that the federal government has no jurisdiction to regulate health practice in Canada.

Contrary to the understanding of many Canadians, the Canada Health Act is not a statute regulating health, it is a funding statute by which the federal government basically intrudes into the area of provincial jurisdiction with its spending power. So the notion that somehow one could put a provision into the Canada Health Act that would assure access to abortion is a mistaken notion, relying on a failure to understand the realities of Canadian constitutional law.

I believe that this law accomplishes perhaps the one good thing that was accomplished by the law that was struck down in the Morgentaler decision. Under the previous provisions of the Criminal Code, by definition, every abortion performed in Canada was a medical procedure performed for a health rationale. For that reason funding was assured under the Canada Health Act.

I can remember that in my own province there were those who wished to pressure the provincial government not to fund abortion. They found that they could not because it was, by definition, a medical procedure under the Canada Health Act.

I believe that Bill C-43 accomplishes the same thing by its very clear definition of abortion being performed for a health rationale. Although that may disturb some people who are very much against abortion, I think they would agree that whatever the status of abortion in Canadian society, it ought to be a status that is uniform across the country. If it is to be a legal procedure, it ought to be equally accessible across the country, and I believe that Bill C-43, to the extent that the federal government has the jurisdiction to do so, accomplishes this.

Bill C-43 ensures that abortions will be carried out by or under the supervision of a qualified medical practitioner. Bill C-43 creates no barriers to access in the way of procedural requirements or the requirements that abortions must be performed in any specific facility, for example. Whether abortions performed in clinics will be funded under provincial medical plans is something that is beyond the federal government to ensure, but abortions may be performed in a doctor's office or in a clinic without any legal penalty. The question of whether they will be funded under provincial plans is something that will have to be worked out with provincial governments. But, in so far as the federal government has jurisdiction, it has removed barriers to access that I think were very troublesome in the last bill.

I believe that Bill C–43 goes as far as federal jurisdiction can to ensure a national standard of access to safe, legal, funded abortions.

I would like to address some of the criticisms of Bill C–43 that have come from those who share my own position on the basic issue, criticisms from the pro–choice side of the issue. Perhaps the most important criticism is with respect to this bill as an amendment to the Criminal Code and a distaste for what is described as the "recriminalization" of abortion.

I think there are two aspects of this. One is the concern that somehow women or doctors will be subject to arbitrary penalties for providing a medical service which many feel is a right that women should have in Canadian society. I think it is important to examine what is meant by recriminalization because what has been criminalized in this bill is, first, abortions performed by non–medical practitioners or not under the supervision of a medical practitioner; abortions performed without forming an opinion as to the health rationale which, as I said before, I believe is quite simply bad medical practice; and the sale of abortifacients, toxic devices or equipment to induce abortions or for women to induce abortions in themselves. Abortion is criminalized only in a very narrow sense.

What also offends many pro choice people with the notion of abortion being in the Criminal Code is that somehow they feel that having abortion mentioned in the Criminal Code implies a moral judgment even upon those who avail themselves of legal abortions. I think that is very much a misunderstanding of the way criminal law functions in our society. If you look through the Criminal Code at the subjects of things that are regulated under the Criminal Code you would find that many perfectly acceptable kinds of activities in our society have been criminalized in certain contexts.

Those would include sexual intercourse, sexual touching, lighting a fire, gambling, being near a dwelling house at night, driving a car, possessing a narcotic, taking possession of property. Under certain circumstances those activities are all criminal and incur criminal penalties under the Criminal Code. But under other circumstances they are perfectly natural and acceptable activities in human society.

What this law does is draw a line around the legal practice of abortion and, beyond that line, certain practices relating to abortion will incur criminal penalties. But within that line activity is perfectly legal and there is no implied judgment upon those who avail themselves of the service, according to the law.

It is important to emphasize, as have my colleagues, that there is no other constitutional jurisdiction under which the federal government can act in this area. We do not have the constitutional jurisdiction to regulate health care. The residual jurisdiction of peace, order and good government is a very weak ground and unless we were to regard things happening about abortion as a national emergency, it is simply not a usable constitutional head of authority. So the only way the federal government can act at all to create some kind of national standard is to use its criminal law power. I think it is very important for people to understand that. The only way we can establish the legality of abortion in a positive legal statement is to define the boundaries beyond which it is illegal.

The question of access is the other aspect that is raised with respect to this bill. As I have said, there are limits to federal jurisdiction. I believe that the defined status of abortion as a medical procedure in this bill accomplishes a great deal toward ensuring equality of access across Canada. None of the barriers that existed under the old law, the committees, the need to perform abortions in accredited hospitals, exist in this legislation. I believe that this should ensure access for women in all parts of Canada.

The issue of abortion is, of course, something very fundamental to value systems in current Canadian society. It is impossible for us to have a legal framework which will satisfy all. The Minister of Justice has said: "We are not asking Canadians to change their views as to what they think is right, we are asking Canadians to respect the views of others and to respect this new law."

That is a harder challenge than it first seems because I know how passionately I feel about my side of the issue, and I know that many of my colleagues feel equally passionate about their side of the issue. To give ground on that kind of a fundamental commitment is the most difficult thing you can ask of anyone. Tolerance is the hardest virtue to practice in a democratic society. For those of us who make laws, moving from highly principled positions is very difficult indeed.

What is interesting about this law is that it represents agreement on some aspects of the issue among people from both sides of the issue, although, interestingly enough, for different reasons. For example, my colleagues who are strongly anti- abortion are adamant, as my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has said, that abortion only be available for a health rationale. I can accept that because first, only a very broad definition of health will pass the House and will pass, I believe, court review. But also, from my perspective, a health rationale clarifies the status of abortion with respect to the Canada Health Act.

So, for very different reasons, we can agree on putting a health rationale into the bill. My colleagues who are strongly anti-abortion do not wish to see gestation limits in legislation. I agree with them on that but for different reasons. For them gestation limits suggest a varying value of human life at different times of pregnancy which is anathema to them. For me, gestation limits simply feed the myth in society that women seek abortions late in pregnancy when over 99 per cent of abortions are, in fact, sought in the first trimester of pregnancy.

You will remember that Chantal Daigle could not get an abortion in Quebec after 20 weeks. There was no law. There was no criminal law against abortion and there was no law in Quebec setting out gestational limits, but the ethics of the medical profession apply here. We sometimes forget that that is a very important force. That is a force recognized in this bill where decisions about abortions are made according to standard medical practice. There are substantive limitations within the Canadian Medical Association about the performance of abortion. I and my colleagues who are on the other side of the issue can agree that it is not necessary or appropriate to have gestational limits in this bill. We have never had them in Canada. There are de facto gestational limits and they are gestational limits determined according to medical ethics in Canadian society.

The use of the criminal law is not only our only jurisdictional choice constitutionally, but I believe it also is a reflection on the seriousness of the issue. I had a letter recently from a very good friend of mine, a leader in the civil liberties field in Vancouver. He wrote to me congratulating the government on the bill. He is a person I admire very much because although he is deeply committed to civil liberties he is also a pragmatist who understands the difficulty of translating values into public policy. He says: " By retaining the criminality of the procedure the government has offered a potent symbol of conciliation to those very many Canadians who feel that this can never be seen or treated as just another moral issue. Its deep significance must, they insist, raise it to the level of the criminal law".

I think that recognition is appropriate. Strongly pro-choice though I am, I recognize that abortion is not just another issue. It is a deeply important issue, it is a deeply important issue to me as a woman and all my understanding of what fertility means to a woman.

I would say in conclusion that I am among those Canadians who are comfortable with no law regulating abortion. I have confidence in the judgment of women and the ethics of the medical profession, and both of these views, I believe, are reflected in Bill C-43.

If this were all it would be a helpful declaration but not perhaps necessary. I do believe that Bill C-43 goes farther and, in clarifying the status of abortion as a medical procedure, it improves access. It also considerably narrows the range of possible legal challenges. I believe this law reflects the views of people on all sides of the issue although it does not reflect all the views of people on all sides of the issue.

The nature of the compromise that is required in this bill has been shown by the supporters of this bill. In reading some of the debate that has taken place so far and listening this evening, I am struck by the kind of maturity that is being shown in dealing with this very sensitive issue.

I believe that Canadians are looking to us to be pragmatic and to understand where the broad range of Canadians are. They are not asking us to give up our personal views or to cease our struggles in other arenas to convince others of our views. I believe that this bill is the best we can do and that it is an opportunity for us to show that we recognize the true role of parliamentarians in this House. For that reason, Madam Speaker, I am pleased to support the bill.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I was very interested to hear the rationale presented by the Minister who shares a pro-choice point of view. I want to raise two or three points that to me did not seem quite logical in her presentation. For one thing the Minister spoke about the medical aspect of the bill and felt this was a positive aspect of the bill. I wonder why she feels that it needs to be under the Criminal Code again when in fact abortion currently is a medical procedure and is regulated as a health matter.

She mentioned also in the Chantal Daigle case that the ethics of the medical profession applied in Quebec as far as the 20-week limit on abortions was concerned. Yet she was using the rationale that we need the Criminal Code in order to apply this at this time.

I would ask her why we need it when there was no need during that period when this was occurring in Quebec? I agree with her that there are health regulations in that the medical profession certainly has a code of ethics which is pretty general across Canada.

I am worried about the member's statement and the statement of a number of other government members on the question of equality of access. I cannot see how this bill provides for equality of access, including geographic access. I cannot see how it will help women in P.E.I. and Newfoundland who have no access to abortion now.

I certainly cannot see how it will encourage access in the future. I do not see how it will help those women who want an abortion, have made a decision, and do not have a valid health rationale. I think we have to agree with the difficulty this presents for many doctors who undoubtedly will feel that they have to interpret health with a fairly narrow rationale. These are women who do not, in honesty, have a health reason to seek an abortion, but who find it very difficult to be honest because they are desperate and this is their decision. I would ask her to respond to those points. I find it very difficult to find them in her remarks.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Center): Let me respond first of all to the member's comment about gestational limits in the Criminal Code. I do not think the member understood what I said, or perhaps I did not express myself very well.

There are no gestational limits in this bill. We have never had legislated gestational limits for abortion in Canada. The point I was making is that I do not believe they are necessary. I believe that their existence in legislation reinforces a myth that I think is injurious to women and, therefore, I do not believe they should be in the legislation. In fact, they are not in the legislation. My colleagues on the other side of the issue from me also do not wish to have gestational limits.

In this bill there are some principles that we can agree on, although for different reasons. That is the point I was trying to make. My reason for not favouring gestational limits is different from the reasons that my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, would give. But the fact that we can agree on the substance of what should go in the bill is a step in the right direction. Therefore we have some consensus. The reasons are very different.

With respect to the member's question of access, her first and third questions, let me just draw on my own experience in British Columbia when the Morgantaler decision came out striking down provisions of the Criminal Code when there was no law. The government of British Columbia moved to restrict money for abortion, except in cases of rape and incest. That regulation was struck down, but it was struck down for a largely technical reason, that there was no statutory basis for it. But that could have been corrected by the legislature.

Where attempts to limit funding for abortion can be impugned as being veiled attempts to prevent abortion, I believe will not survive legal challenge. They will be seen as an attempt to invade the division of powers and invade the criminal field which is the sole jurisdiction of the federal government. I believe that without any law, it does leave the door open for the provinces, quite legitimately, to draw a distinction between abortions which are medically necessary and those which are not, and to fund only those which are medically necessary, drawing their own criteria. I believe this bill solves that problem by making it clear that every legal abortion in Canada is a medical procedure performed for reasons of health.

When we get to the question of the valid health rationale and the breadth of it, we already have a fair amount of dicta in the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of Canada, which indicates how health should be interpreted, which is why psychological health is included in this bill. A narrower definition, we believe, would not survive a constitutional challenge. I believe that health is a very broad concept. Chief Justice Dickson used the terminology, I believe, "the aspirations of a woman." There is other commentary. One thinks of the World Health Organization definition of health.

Under the previous legislation, the legislation that was struck down, there was strong pressure from pro-choice groups in Canada, that somewhere, somehow a definition of health, for the purposes of that provision of the Criminal Code, be defined as the World Health Organization definition. It was recognized that a broad definition of health would open up access to abortion.

I am the first to agree that putting that definition in the bill is the compromise, that having a health rationale is a compromise for somebody coming from my perspective. It is the provision that concerns strong pro-choice women. I believe that the definition is broad enough, and the trade-off in terms of securing the status of abortion, which I believe puts it firmly under the Canada Health Act, is a reasonable trade-off to make. I do not believe that that health rationale will be an impediment for any woman. I believe that it is important to see health in terms of the whole human being. The definition of this bill includes health as physical, mental or psychological which, it seems to me, those of us on the pro-choice side of the issue have been fighting for for years and fought for when we had to deal with the old law. We said there has to be a broad definition of health because otherwise the old law was not fair. The old law was struck down, but we are now faced with defining health in a helpful way.

So to answer the member's question about equality of access geographically, once again, I believe that in firmly putting abortion within the purview of the Canada Health Act, by removing the previous barriers, for example, the need to perform abortions in an accredited hospital which existed under the old legislation, the hurdle of therapeutic abortion committees without the requirement to form them, that the federal government has done as far as is possible for it to do under its jurisdiction all it can to ensure access.

There is no legal penalty under this bill for a doctor to perform an abortion in Prince Edward Island. I believe that if provinces are not prepared to make those services available, that as with many other services that are not available in all jurisdictions in Canada, they will be obliged to provide funding for those services in other parts where they are available. There are many services for which this applies in Canadian health care.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, in the minister's speech she spoke about the role of the medical practitioner. It seemed to me she suggested that the medical practitioner's only role certainly was not the physical act of performing the abortion, but rather that it had to do with revolving around consent and that that consent should be based on information. The minister used the word "informed" consent.

Would the minister be willing to give a full and fair consideration to a potential amendment relating to informed consent? Second, might she consider an amendment that related to perhaps a period of time for reasoned judgment? In fact, after the first consultation with the medical practitioner there might be a 48-hour period whereupon further reflection and reasoned judgment could be brought to bear for that person to consider the information that the doctor, in fact, might give that woman. Third, would the minister define an abortion itself as the termination of life? Does the minister accept that definition, the termination of life is what an abortion is in fact?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the question of informed consent, no, I would not support that kind of amendment. First, there are already civil remedies against physicians for performing procedures where informed consent is absent. It is part of the law in Canada now with respect to medical procedure.

What I was speaking about was simply good medical practice—time for reasoned judgment. Once again, we are talking about this question of dealing with things in abstractions and trying to generalize about what are unique circumstances. One woman may come to a doctor and say, "I have been thinking about this now for two weeks, and I have talked to my clergyman, and I have talked to my partner, and I have talked to my parents, and I have been all around this issue and I have made this decision and I just feel that I cannot go ahead with this pregnancy" for all these various reasons.

Another woman may come to her doctor in tears or simply may advise the doctor of her pregnancy and at that time begin the process of coming to a decision. I do not think it is the business of Parliament to dictate to practitioners how they deal with that. That is precisely the thing I fear, this desire to create a general regime for what is basically a unique situation for each person. I think we have to have some confidence in the medical profession. As I say, what I like about the way the health rationale is put in this bill is that it demands good medical practice for women in Canada.

Finally, the member asked me the question about whether abortion is the termination of life. That is a philosophical question. I do not accept the notion that a foetus has the same rights as a born human being. Maybe I am too much of a product of the common law, but I think that is an opinion and a discussion which is philosophical. We are trying to legislate in the real world and I do not think it is helpful to get into that discussion at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): The time for questions and comments has expired. On debate, the hon. member for Ottawa South.

• (2030)

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I must say the Chair becomes you very well. I welcome this opportunity to participate in the debate on this bill and to put my views on the record with respect to the complex and difficult issue of abortion.

I wish to say that I have very carefully considered the views of the hundreds of my constituents who have taken the trouble to contact me either in person or by mail. I have also considered the many written materials sent to me by groups and organizations concerning this issue. I have told those who have contacted me that I take my responsibility in this matter very seriously.

I endeavour to approach this issue from what I would call a non-doctrinaire point of view. I seek to apply my judgment as a legislator trying to find a framework in law for the benefit of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Each and every one of us, as members of this House, must use his or her own judgment on this issue. As a group we bring a unique combiration mix of life experiences and of political and sometimes personal philosophies.

[English]

My own experience has been profoundly touched by the reality of life and death. I have witnessed the birth of each of my three children and these are three of the most precious moments of my life. At each of them and at the memory of them, I was and am moved by the miracle of human life.

My wife and I have also experienced the grief of a miscarriage and we have shared in difficult decisions relating to the use of artificial life support for both of my parents.

The need to reflect on matters of birth, life and death can escape none of us for these are the common denominators of the human experience. Consideration of matters of life and death is not limited to abortion. Modern technology presents us with a host of questions about life and death that never before needed to be answered by humankind. Some of these questions, in vitro fertilization, surrogate parenthood, voluntary euthanasia, create difficulties that are as profound as those presented by abortion.

I believe the principle that life is special is self-evident and even that it is not in dispute, including in this debate. Some refer to this principle as the sanctity of life. Human life should represent in a civilized society a very special value, a higher value. Human life itself should be preserved and protected as the highest possible priority of human endeavour and ingenuity.

Life, however, is much broader than the issue before us. Human life itself cannot exist independent of other life forms on this planet. What we must be learning from the environmental crises that surround us is surely this:

While human life may be sanctified, it will only be preserved on this planet if we show concern and respect for our world, its plant and animal life forms as well.

[Translation]

Have we not finally understood that all life forms are interdependent? Respect for life involves a lot more than just preventing abortions.

[English]

That being said, it also seems to me to be self-evident that human life begins before birth. Nature in its own course provides for the human child to be carried by its mother well beyond the point at which modern technology has rendered it viable outside the mother.

I also believe in the principle that in our society, the maximum possible scope for individual freedom or choice should be permitted. I do believe, however, that freedom to choose brings with it the obligation to accept the consequences of one's choices. We take pride, and rightly so, in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms but sometimes I believe that we should have a charter of rights and obligations because obligations flow necessarily from rights.

I am not unaware of, nor do I disregard, the views of those who believe that a woman should have the right to control her own body. I am not one who favours a pervasive government interference in the private lives of individuals and I believe that matters of private morality should not be within the purview of the state.

I have heard the plea from some women that the life within a pregnant woman, especially in the early stages of pregnancy, is not independent life but really part and parcel of her own body. To enact a criminal law to interfere with a woman's control over this aspect of her person is viewed as a profound interference in a woman's private, personal matters.

I understand this viewpoint and I am responsive to it, especially to the extent that I believe that the state should have less rather than more control over the personal lives of individuals. But I find enormous difficulty with the view that the unborn child, especially after the point of viability, has no right to protection by the state.

Having outlined my view of the meaning of respect for life and the need to accept responsibility for one's choices, I would like to comment on the proper role of the criminal law in this matter.

First of all, as a lawyer, I agree that the sole head of federal jurisdiction in this matter is the criminal law power, whether exercised through the Criminal Code or otherwise. This requires us to define an offence and to prescribe a penalty.

I also believe that the rule of law is fundamental to our system of government. Without the rule of law, that is, the acceptance that the law is paramount and of equal application to all, the integrity of our system of government will be undermined. The acceptance of the rule of law depends upon respect for the laws we enact in this place, fortunately, far more than it depends upon respect for us as legislators. The importance of this principle should give legislators great pause in deciding to enact a criminal law.

What is required for us to enact a criminal law to prohibit behaviour in our society? I believe that a very broad consensus within our society is required, a consensus which encompasses the following elements: First of all, the behaviour which is prohibited is such that it should be punished. The behaviour must offend against society's view of acceptable behaviour. Second, the person to be punished for committing the offence must be deserving of punishment. Third, the punishment must be fair and reasonable in the circumstances.

I have been told by some of those who support a law prohibiting abortion that it does not matter if the law cannot be enforced or if it is commonly disobeyed. It is enough for them that the law be in place to demonstrate society's values even if enforcement is impossible, impracticable or even undesirable. On the latter point, some have told me that they favour an abortion law but would not like to see women punished for disobeying it. These statements undermine for me the argument for legal intervention.

[Translation]

I suggest that if the law is not enforced or is full of loopholes or if juries refuse to convict those who disobey it, there will be us respect for the law and this will thus undermine the Canadian legal system.

[English]

There are doubtless many times that citizens consider the law to be an ass, as Mr. Bumble said in Oliver Twist, but when this is said of the criminal law in respect of a matter which touches people broadly in the country, the danger to respect for law is intensified.

• (2040)

The values implicitly or explicitly contained in the submissions I have received, both in favour of and opposed to a law, are not reconcilable, premised as they are on a fundamentally different view of the time at which human life begins and is worthy of protection.

I must say that some of the extreme presentations of these points of view have been rather offensive to me. This debate, more than most, has resulted in the characterization of opposing views in provocative and extreme epithets reflecting to the disgrace of those who make them.

I too am a product of my upbringing, my experience of life, my legal training and, perhaps most important, my faith and the understanding it gives me of life and the meaning of the universe. The views that I hold of matters of life and death are the ones that I will teach my children and that I will seek to apply in my personal life. But as a legislator, I am responsible for shaping laws that will affect the rights of other people in matters of life and death. In our pluralistic society, I cannot expect that everyone will agree with my views or accept my values. But a society must have values which it owns and which unite it. It is to these values that I now appeal.

The first, as I have explained, is the principle that the laws we enact must be worthy of and receive the respect of the population. But further, I believe that we share values in Canada that will provide us with the affirmation of human life that is sought by caring people. It is upon these values that we have built a system of social programs that is envied by other nations.

As Governor Mario Cuomo of New York has said:

> We should understand that whether abortion is outlawed or not, our work has barely begun: the work of creating a society where the right to life doesn't end at the moment of birth; where an infant isn't helped into a world that doesn't care if it's fed properly, housed decently, educated adequately; where the blind or retarded child isn't condemned to exist rather than empowered to live.

The unfortunate truth is that in Canada, abortion is often motivated by economic considerations. If we condemn some of our people to live in poverty, whether through lack of jobs, lack of adequate child care or an unfair tax system, can we rightly criticize these same people when they seek to mitigate their responsibilities? If we keep our young people in ignorance, if we deny them the moral guidance and the physical means to avoid unwanted pregnancy, is it fair to condemn them when they seek the means to continue their adolescence without the interruption and responsibility that childbirth provides?

If I have never experienced rape or incest, how can I judge whether a woman impregnated in these circumstances is wrong to want to remove from within her the consequences of these violations of her person and her dignity? Again, quoting Governor Cuomo:

> If we want to prove our regard for life in the womb, for the helpless infant—if we care about women having real choices in their lives and not being driven to abortions by a sense of helplessness and despair about the future of their child—then there is work enough for all of us. Lifetimes of it.

We must see that justice is done, not only for the unborn, but also for their parents. Any abortion law should be accompanied by a very positive pro-active agenda that will endeavour to prevent unwanted pregnancy, to support mothers during pregnancy, to enable families to live without hardship and to ensure that women have readily available to them counselling services and advice concerning the adoption alternative and to ensure that no woman obtains an abortion who might have been willing and able to bear a living child.

As Canadians, let us find common ground for policies and programs based on these values, values which affirm the dignity of human life, values that promote caring and compassion.

Before I conclude, I wish to comment specifically on Bill C-43. During the election campaign and since, I have maintained that I would support a law that would protect the unborn and that would be consistent with the Charter of Rights. I believe that Bill C-43 meets or appears to meet the minimum requirements of this test.

I have carefully reviewed once more the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Morgentaler and I believe as a lawyer that the proposed bill is constitutional. However, I do not disagree with the suggestion that the bill be tested by reference to the court after enactment but before proclamation.

However, I believe this bill to be fundamentally dishonest. It appears to protect the unborn from the time of conception, and yet it is hard to see how even one abortion would be prevented under this law. It appears to leave the matter to a woman and her doctor to decide and yet it criminalizes the act of abortion and I believe exposes doctors to real peril of prosecution.

In short, I fail to see how this bill can do other than to lead to disrespect for law. Would Canada have an abortion law? Yes. But that law would be worse than a bad law or no law. That law would be a joke.

Because of the critical importance of respect for law to the rule of law and of the rule of law for the preservation of freedom, I cannot support this bill. I will not vote for a law that will fuel cynicism and contribute to a sense that the laws we enact here, much like the talk we often engage in, are irrelevant to contemporary society.

I will vote for the bill on second reading, however, not because I support it in principle, but because I think the matter should be studied by a committee of this House and amendments considered. I will vote against this bill in its present form at third reading.

For the record, I will say that I absolutely support the use of criminal law to prohibit abortion after the foetus is viable as an independent human life. It is to me totally unacceptable for an abortion to take place after the point of viability which I understand may be as early as 21 weeks. How can we countenance an abortion in one hospital room of a foetus at the same stage of development as that of a premature baby whose life we are seeking to save in a room just down the corridor? Only if it is a matter of saving the mother's life should the life of a viable foetus be sacrificed. I believe most Canadians agree with this, and would support such a law.

In the earlier stages of pregnancy, I am not any more content that abortions occur, but I draw back from the prohibition of elective abortion at an early stage, not because I think the unborn has any less value at 12 weeks than at 20 or 30 weeks, but because I perceive that such a prohibition would not be enforceable.

I am offended by the reality that abortion is being used in Canada as a means of birth control in 1989. There can be no other explanation for the number of abortions that occur in Canada each year. It is evident that in many of these cases, choice is exercised irresponsibly before conception and abortion is the means of avoiding the consequences of one's choice.

However, I believe society does not accept that the state should intervene in the life of an individual woman at this stage of pregnancy. I also believe that if the state attempts to do so, the result will be legal chaos, with confrontations between police and groups, refusals by juries to convict accused, and also, unfortunately, many illegal abortions and the gruesome possibility of back alley and self–inflicted abortions.

Whatever my own opinion about whether abortion is right or wrong, I cannot as a legislator support the enactment of such a law, one which will not be effective and could cause hardship and suffering for those whose act is viewed by society as essentially private and unworthy of attention by the state.

I feel the burden of this legislative responsibility to be very heavy. I know that many will criticize me for the conclusion I have reached since, like Bill C–43 itself, it satisfies neither extreme in this debate.

In response, I say two things: First, I do not believe that we are here to debate whether abortion is good or bad, right or wrong. Rather, we must debate and decide what is the best legislative response within the constitutional powers of the Parliament of Canada to the issue resulting from the demand from women to obtain abortions. Second, my response is to remember the advice given by Polonius to his son in Hamlet:

> This above all, to thine own self be true.
> And it must follow as the night the day
> thou canst not then be false to any man.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by briefly outlining my position in support of the protection of the life of the foetus or the unborn child. First, it is well known that all of the components necessary for the development of a unique individual human being are contained in the genetic code that is present from the moment of conception, the hue of our eyes, the colour of our hair, the size of our feet, as well as the capacity of our brains, have all been established in that instant. Nothing needs to be added, other than food, shelter and care.

Second, the indicators of life and its development are manifested early and dramatically. The unborn child produces its own blood at 17 to 20 days after conception. Its heart begins beating from 20 to 24 days after conception. Between the sixth and seventh weeks, the electrical activity of the brain is discernible and at the eighth week, all essential organs are present.

Canada has accepted in medical practice that the cessation of brain wave activity is the irreversible indicator of death. Well then, should it not be reasoned that the first readable signs of brain wave activity confirm the presence of life? Nevertheless, our behaviour as a society deliberately and in a premeditated manner destroys that life. From Statistics Canada's figures for 1986 and 1987, it can be readily seen that approximately 75 per cent of all abortions occur after the beginning of brain wave activity.

I think it is highly instructive to read how, in 1975, after an exhaustive examination of the available biological and physiological evidence by 133 world-renowned scientists, geneticists and gynaecologists, the West German Federal Constitutional Court responded to the question as to when life begins. It is also important to note that the court was acutely conscious of the historical events which took place between 1933 and 1945, and was therefore especially anxious to ground its judgment in scientific objectivity. Its conclusion was:

> Life, in the sense of historical existence of a human individual, exists according to definite biological-physiological knowledge, in any case, from the 14th day after conception—

Or the period of nidation or individuation.

> The process of development which has begun at that point is a continuing process which exhibits no sharp demarcation and does not allow a precise division of the various steps of development of the human life.

In view of this concrete evidence, it is a sad commentary on our society that one's position on abortion can then be construed, and thereby dismissed by some, as being simply a matter of personal opinion or belief. No, it is not a matter of personal opinion; the medical evidence of life is concrete, it is objective, it is compelling. To anyone with an open, enquiring and honest mind, life then must be accepted as an uninterrupted continuum which begins at conception and ends at death. Without doubt, abortion brings about the death of a living human individual during the process of its development along that continuum.

I fail to see why anyone including our Supreme Court Justices, do not see this logic, for surely a human foetus will never result in a cat, dog or a horse but only in a human being which it became at conception and will remain so until death. Only shelter, food and normal development and protection is required throughout pregnancy or up to age two, or five, or fifteen, or twenty, or fifty, or seventy years of age.

Dr. Jerome Lejeune, one of the world's foremost human geneticists, stated the following to the United States Senate Committee in 1983:

> —if a fertilized egg is not by itself a full human being, it could never become a man, because something would have to be added to it, and we know that that does not happen.

After I read the tortured reasoning of the Supreme Court Justices which they revealed in their judgment of November 16, 1989, in the Chantal Daigle case, I wished and I prayed that someone could get our judges to contemplate the simple yet profound common sense of what Dr. Lejeune said.

Indeed, according to Sir William Lilley of New Zealand, knighted because of his pioneering work in amniocentesis, the unborn child is not a part of the mother's body, as some incorrectly suggest, but rather is a separate person who dictates his or her own growth and when he or she is to be born. Therefore, it is absolutely essential that our laws protect life from conception. That is why it is so important that the government reject any legislative proposal that followed the gestational or highly arbitrary approach of foetal viability.

The bill before us implicitly recognizes that life begins at conception by placing a criminal sanction against the taking of foetal life. Further, the criminal prohibition on abortion is throughout the pregnancy and is not only mandatory to protect the sanctity of life but also this criminal sanction is highly symbolic. Mr. Joseph Maingot, a member of the Law Reform Commission which issued a paper this past summer entitled "Crimes Against the Foetus", put this very well when he stated:

> The criminal law is our nation's fundamental statement of public policy. It is the instrument by which the community draws a line between the tolerable and the intolerable. Criminal law defines those whose interests are worthy of respect and protection, and in my view this should include all members of the human family. Ultimately the criminal law is a mirror of what we are; it reflects our commitment, or lack of commitment, to human dignity and equality.
> The law does not exist for the sole or primary purpose of punishing illicit acts. It exists as an expression, in a broad sense, of the kind of people we are. It does not merely regulate our behaviour, it articulates and symbolizes our values and beliefs.

I am pleased that the government heeded this advice and demonstrated its respect for human life and made the taking of a life by abortion a crime within the Criminal Code except under certain circumstances. This action by the government is in keeping with the invitation of our Supreme Court in its decision on the Morgentaler case of January 28, 1988, in which Chief Justice Dickson wrote:

> The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes 'compelling' should be left to the informed judgment of the legislature.

In this bill, the government has defined that precise point as conception when the state interest should become compelling since the criminal sanction against taking foetal life applies from conception. The Supreme Court decision of January 28, 1988, also stated in the judgment of Chief Justice Dickson:

> Like Beetz and Wilson, I agree that the protection of foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid governmental objective. It follows that balancing these interests with the lives and health of women a major factor, is clearly an important governmental objective.

This balancing of interests between that of the mother and her unborn child is also a part of the bill before us in that it allows an abortion only when the life or health of the female person is likely to be threatened. If we in this House believe in the sanctity of life, we must ensure that there is an equal concern for the well-being of both mother and child.

Unfortunately, the abortion debate has been interpreted by some as being one of competing interests; the right of the mother to be free to choose versus the right of her unborn child to live. However, it surely defies all that we hold dear about humanity to speak of a mother and her unborn child as being in competition against one another. Only a pathetically distorted sense of what is right, or what is freedom of choice, or what is demanded as control over my own body, or what is a deliberate act of ignoring all medical and scientific evidence could render a mother and her child as antagonists.

In view of the limitations placed upon us by the Charter of Rights, I would like to state the following: I believe an abortion should be performed only on the grounds of self defence in those very limited number of circumstances where the mother's life and narrowly defined health is, in the opinion of a medical doctor, in demonstrable danger, and where there is no other accepted medical procedure to treat that danger according to the opinion formed using, as this bill says: "the generally accepted standards of the medical profession."

I would submit that this bill is sound in principle. Life from conception must be protected within our Criminal Code. It is also on the right track in that it permits an abortion only when there is a threat to the mother. But the bill goes far beyond that by permitting an abortion, not only for the rare legitimate reasons of the life of the mother but for health broadly defined as physical, mental, and psychological.

That definition of health is so broad, so open to abuse, that abortion could be and has been justified by unscrupulous and unprincipled doctors for almost any reason. Anyone who has studied the reasons for abortions from 1969 to January 1988 knows full well that very few abortions were performed, one, to save the mother's life or, two, to save the mother's physical well-being where in the professional opinion of the doctors involved there was no other medical procedure or option to treat that risk. In fact, Madam Speaker, the vast majority of abortions were performed for reasons of convenience and the desire simply not to have the child.

Therefore, this bill is in obvious need of, in fact it cries out for, amendments to circumscribe more definitive boundaries and standards around the word "health" so that we truly are balancing the interests involved.

We need to carefully consider adding words such as "seriously endangering" the pregnant woman's health. Further, we need to clearly state that an abortion should be only undertaken by a doctor if in his professional opinion there is no other medical procedure or option open to him to treat this serious health risk endangering the pregnant woman.

I also think we must strike out the word "psychological" in the definition of health and retain the words "physical and mental", but only within the constraints I have just mentioned. I think the bill should demand, and I also take it as a given, that every doctor would retain a written documentation of his professional medical judgment justifying the performance of the abortion.

We must carefully consider other amendments such as Mr. Justice Beetz indicated when he wrote:

> Parliament is justified in requiring a reliable, independent and medically sound opinion in order to protect the state interest in the foetus.

Further he stated:

> Parliament requires this independent opinion because it is not only the woman's interest that is at stake in a decision to authorize an abortion".

The penalty against unlawful abortion proposed in this bill is that it is an indictable offence with a possible prison term not exceeding two years. If the principle of the bill is to protect life and to balance both the interests of mother and child, then surely two years is woefully inadequate and an amendment providing a term of up to 15 years or life is far more appropriate. Only then would we be truly protecting life as we do in manslaughter or murder cases.

The purpose of second reading debate is to debate the principle of the bill. I believe that one of the principles of the bill is to protect the life of the foetus or the unborn child from conception. This bill does this by placing a criminal sanction against the taking of that life from conception.

The bill also seeks to balance the vital interests of both the mother's and child's life by permitting an abortion only when the life or health of the mother is likely to be threatened. In this case, the bill is far too weak to achieve any proper balance by not carefully limiting the word "health", by providing only up to a possible two-year prison sentence and not requiring an independent medical opinion.

The way the bill now stands, all of its provisions are on the side of the mother and next to nothing protects the child within her womb. To succinctly summarize the nature of this bill, I would submit that one could characterize this bill as one that is pro-life in form and pro-choice in substance. It is pro-life in that it assumes that life begins at conception and should be protected throughout the pregnancy. But it is pro-choice in that it literally permits a woman to go to any doctor prepared to do abortions simply for cases of anxiety or alleged psychological harm.

Nevertheless, because at least the basic principle of protecting the unborn from conception is the implicit foundation of the bill, I will support it at second reading in spite of its serious inadequacies which I will seek to amend at committee and report stages when amendments are permissible. I do not support this bill with any joy within my heart. I do so only after much soul searching and only in order to make full use of all of the opportunities the process affords us as members of this House to make amendments to improve this bill so that the vast majority of abortions done for none other than the frivolous and shameful reasons of convenience might decrease in number. Then and only then will we begin to do what we in this chamber should always strive toward, to defend the innocent, the weak and the powerless and to stand for the truth and for the protection of the sanctity of life that that truth demands of each of us.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam, Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in this important debate, a sometimes very moving debate. We have had experiences with that here tonight. A very sincere group of speakers has been addressing the problem with which we are all wrestling with.

I am sure we all bring different perspectives to the debate. The perspectives are as varied as are the people addressing the bill. I personally bring all of my life experiences to what I am about to say. My sense of worth and my sense of values are going to be brought into the discussion as I am sure will those of many who will address the bill. In spite though of all these variances that we find among ourselves, we would all agree on some fundamentals I think, one of these basic fundamentals being that life is worth while, life is a valuable entity, life is worth protecting.

I am sure that to argue otherwise would contradict what we see going on in any hospital in the city of Ottawa tonight. Doctors and nurses are there working to try and preserve a life. Lifelong sacrifices are being made by some families to preserve a life, a life which some would have thought was not worth preserving. There is something very, very fundamental that touches us all when we talk about preserving life. It does not matter whether it is a big person or a small person, a young person or an old person, a sick person or one who is well. All people are very different. All are lives and in spite of different surroundings, in spite of totally different circumstances, they are worth our protection.

That is what this debate is all about. Sometimes we get off on ramifications of economics and so on and I have heard it mentioned here tonight. It seems to suggest that economics should be the dividing line. We are talking about life, fundamental life.

Our obligation as human beings is to protect the lives of others who are in no position to do so. They have no voice. A tremendous moral responsibility rests upon us to particularly protect those who cannot protect themselves. The inconvenience that one life may cause to another life is not justification for the dominant one to discontinue the life of the innocent one. In no way is that justification to turn somebody else's life around, to discontinue the life of that person because somebody happens to be in a stronger position.

A child on the verge of being born is developmentally indistinguishable from a newborn infant. In a free and democratic society infants have the status of persons. They possess fundamental rights, including the right to life and the right to legal protection.

The mere fact that a baby is inside someone else's body does not imply to me that it is not a person. If it is not a person at this stage, presumably the reason for that is that it is still physically dependent on its mother. But if its personhood is diminished in this way by dependence then the personhood of seriously ill people who are on life support systems would come into question as would the personhood of other seriously dependent or handicapped persons with whom we are surrounded daily.

If intrinsic value of the life were diminished by dependence, some persons would have less intrinsic value than others, and I think that would bring our Charter of Rights with regard to life into play. The problem I have with viability as a determinant is that the level of development at which the foetus becomes viable depends on the stage of medical science and technology. We have made tremendous strides in society in that area of science in recent years. Let us not turn our back on it. I think it would be a disgrace, a reflection on the personhood of people to turn our back on newly developed medical techniques and newly developed awareness such as we have heard spoken of here tonight, things which we did not know 25, 50, 75 years ago. I do not think we should turn our back on new medical evidence that life begins at conception.

Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms says: "Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right of the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination".

Failure to protect the life of the foetus by law would, in my opinion, be permitting the taking of a life. If a law prohibiting infant abuse becomes unenforceable, or very difficult to enforce because of widespread deterioration in values in our society, that would not be sufficient reason to promote the absence of such a law. It is difficult to enforce but surely we do that in society all the time.

If no one's life is valuable enough to protect by law then none of us really have any basic rights. If a foetus has the right to have its life protected by law, such a law is justifiable in a free and democratic society and it is in accordance with our Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

On January 28, 1988, the Supreme Court of Canada declared Canada's abortion law unconstitutional. We need a new law which will be found to be constitutional. Certain women's groups, and I have heard this alluded to here today, oppose any form of protection for the foetus. I want to caution women. The justice women which have achieved, and rightly so, will be seriously undermined in society if it is bought at the price of injustice to persons conceived but not yet born. Women will lose. If they think that gives them the right to impose upon and extinguish the rights of others, what have they gained? There is tremendous risk if women feel that they now have the right to impose their new found rights, justifiably distinguished and determined, for which I give them all sorts of credit, but not pushing it so far that they think they can now impose rights on others who are in no position to express themselves.

Pregnancy concerns the whole person. It concerns the family, it concerns the community, and I think it concerns all of society. It requires, above all, communities and a society that cares. It is like poverty, which is a concern of all society. Racial inequality is a concern of all society. Institutionalized abortion means to me that the community is opting out, opting out of caring; caring socially, caring economically, caring judicially and caring personally.

To say that a man, the male species, should not comment on abortion because it is something that he will never experience is a simple way of copping out too. I have never witnessed war. I have never been on the front lines of war. I have read much about it and have heard many stories about it, but surely I can have some appreciation for that. I have some appreciation of what war must be like. I feel confident and certain that I can speak out on that issue and try to see that we will never have that to contend with again, although I have not experienced it myself.

If we have legislation to protect the unborn, I think the state then has a responsibility to introduce social programs which will assist people for whom abortion seems to present the only temporary solution to their problems. There is some responsibility for the state here which includes such programs as access to counselling; the full range of adoption options explained to people; housing needs, on which the determination to have an abortion is very often made; the provision of time for parenting and child care; programs in child care; affirmative action for fathering, something which probably was not thought of a few years back but should be addressed in today's changing times. Above all, we need education to prevent unwanted pregnancies.

Calling anything a woman's issue strikes me, personally, as being rather offensive. Spouse beating, day care and abortion are society's issues, they are not strictly and rigidly women's issues. It would be like calling apartheid a South African issue. Apartheid is not a South African issue, it is a universal society issue and society is no one gender, race, colour or religion. Injustices of the past toward women or any other group in society cannot be corrected by perpetuating further injustices and denying life to unborn children.

I am asking my hon. friends who have not thought this through or have not taken a position to consider voting for the life of the unborn. Come down on the side of human dignity, be a promoter of life. What legitimate right requires for the exercise of that right the infliction of pain and death on another innocent human life? I ask that question.

There are two lives here to consider and, therefore, the moral question of abortion is absolutely not a women's rights issue exclusively. It involves the question of whether it is moral to dispose of or to destroy the weaker of the two individuals. When two people enter one of Morgentaler's clinics, only one comes out.

History tells us that in more barbaric times if a woman condemned to die was found to be pregnant, the execution was postponed to allow the innocent party to be born. In pregnancy there are two different heartbeats, two different brain wave patterns, often two different blood types and, in about half the cases, two different sexes. There are two people involved.

The question is not so much should they break the law but rather should they kill babies? That is the question. In a civilized society one does not kill one human being to alleviate the problems of another human being. We would not tolerate that. This bill would allow that to happen.

The foetus is not just a potential human being but rather, in my opinion, a human being with full potential that needs time to develop and to mature. Life is a continuum. It is not measured in weeks, in inches, in pounds or in kilograms, life is a continuum.

I do not think it is good enough to say that the legislation will be okay because most people's rights are respected. We are talking about individual rights. An apology to those whose most basic right, that of life, has been denied does no good whatsoever. As long as just one person's rights are encorached upon with the result that life is denied them, then I think society is in deep trouble.

I heard tonight that every child is a wanted child. That suggests great love, a reaching out for children. It is a common slogan, but let me remind you, Madam Speaker, that this slogan is not quite as loving as it sounds. It reduces children to objects with the right to exist only if somebody wants them more than some other material thing. I think life is worth more than that.

Abortion is an attempt to solve one's personal problems by eliminating the life of another. Nothing threatens the most basic foundation of human civilization more directly than the widespread assault on the sanctity of life, whether it is by terrorists, plain murderers, or by the advocates of unrestricted abortion and euthanasia. Such cheapening of human life, apart from destroying the highest moral values, cannot but encourage the rise of crime and violence in our society. It is part of the throw-away society. Already crime is inflicting humanity at an alarming scale.

Any solution that I would have to this topic we are discussing would not be without any problems either. I admit that. I concede that. But we solve a problem because it is there and it challenges us. We have a problem confronting the Parliament of Canada now.

How terrible it would be if someone levelled all the mountains in life and, if it were possible, removed all the problems that we will be confronted with over our lifespan. There would not be any opportunity left for human beings to become really human, with the real qualities of a human being, if there were no challenges left.

What better time in the history of this country to show some leadership and be viewed by the rest of the world as the most generous, the most compassionate people in the world and the nation which showed the most human dignity in the world. All of us are here because of the generosity and the sacrifice of someone else. I think we have an obligation to others to return that sacrifice that others made on our behalf.

The gestational approach which has been mentioned tonight is unacceptable in principle because I think it arbitrarily determines that human life is more worthy of respect at some stages than at others and this, it seems to me, lends itself to selective living and selective dying. To offer easy access to abortion shows a callous failure of responsibility to protect life. To outlaw it, on the other hand, without proposing some positive measures to remedy the situations that we have heard mentioned here tonight encountered by pregnant women would also amount to a failure of responsibility.

I am suggesting a coherent and effective family life policy. It would require a co-ordinated effort from all levels of government.

• (2130)

Instead of this proposed legislation, which is just a fancy way of having abortion on demand, I think the government should be proposing a family life plan which could then be supported by all members because it is something positive. It is a positive attitude toward life. Measures would have to be taken in education, labour, revenue, and housing, as has been mentioned.

In closing, what I am asking is a new approach to something that is very old. If you take away life as a basic right, all other rights that you would extend to the foetus are meaningless. Do without that one, you will do without them all.

Why not reject this proposed law in favour of a family life policy that is positive toward life in its outlook, one that would see the family elevated above every other social unit or organization—the ultimate unit, the family, the one that is of prime importance if we are to advance as a society on the world scene.

I think Canada has an opportunity to show leadership. Forget about party differences. What I am proposing is developing an attitude that respects the family and transcends all the petty differences we find when we bring party lines into play.

I think we must commit ourselves to elevating our purposes once and for all. Do something because it is right although it may not be popular. Do it because it is right.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, the member who just spoke did so thoughtfully and obviously very sincerely about an issue of importance to all of us.

I take it from his final comment that he is inclined to vote against this bill. Nobody would agree with him more that there are major defects in the bill, in my view as well. I would ask him if he would consider—and he obviously does not have to answer now—what would happen if this measure were voted down on second reading. I am told by a journalist friend that it is very close now as to whether or not it will pass, that nobody will be happier than the people sitting to his left who believe in abortion on demand. Of course they are not all sitting to his left.

I would ask him if he and others in his party, as well as those on this side of the House, might consider what would happen if that does happen. Maybe we would be better to try to get this bill into a committee and to try to make amendments either there or at report or third reading stage which would make this bill more acceptable from the point of view he has been advancing.

I ask him if he and others might consider that before voting this bill down when it comes up for second reading.

Mr. Jordan: Madam Speaker, I will not be supporting this bill. I am torn terribly on it. At the present time I do not think you will ever reach ideals unless you are prepared to pursue those ideals. To break it off and say "I can support it, although I do not quite support it on something as basic as human life" puts me in a bit of a jam.

I am really puzzled at the people who normally would be here at my left, and I do not want to get into great debate with them. These are supposed to be the people who have great compassion for people. They are not showing too much compassion when it comes to this little person who cannot defend himself. That is the thing that bothers me. They may have their own rationale for their opinion on it, as I have my own rationale for what I have said here this evening, but that one puzzles me terribly. I just cannot understand their vein of thought at all.

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the hon. member. I think that much of this debate tonight has been very thoughtful, and many of his comments fall into that category. I am struggling to give him the kind of respect that I think is accorded to those who participate in this debate.

However, when he makes comments that women choose to have an abortion because it is part of a throw-away society, for some material thing, as a woman I take great umbrage.

This is the kind of attitude that causes women to want to make it very clear that this is a woman's issue. I would like him to comment on that.

Mr. Jordan: It is a woman's issue, but because women are part of society, it is a societal issue. I do not think it is strictly and solely a woman's issue.

My basic premise is that there are two people involved. If you do not agree with that, then of course you disagree with what I have said. If you do not agree with that, that there are two people involved, then I can see where you take the position that you have already taken.

It is a woman's issue. Because women as men and children and everyone else are part of society, it is a societal issue. It is something as fundamental as life. It is a societal issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Hogue: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member opposite, the Member for Leeds—Grenville. Certainly I would not try to influence him, and it is basic in my view that he asks to some extent that the House not play politics on such a basic and important matter. For quite some time I have been working on the pro-life side of the question, and I am proud of it. What I do not understand is the position taken by the hon. member opposite. As it seems to me after examining and pondering the legislation, it protects the fetus to a much larger extent more than I have heard him state. So much so Madam Speaker, that it recognizes it not as an extension but rather as a part of the human being, because it introduces the concept of criminal act into the thought process and the legislation. Again, I would not try to influence the hon. member, but it seems to me he could reflect a moment on that double dimension and his personal position, which I share indeed.

[English]

Mr. Jordan: I have difficulty agreeing with you if, as I understood you to say, this bill protects the foetus. This bill allows open season on the foetus. All you have to do is convince a doctor that you have some physical ailment—it could be a scratchy throat or a headache that you did not used to have that—and attribute it then to your pregnancy.

I am thinking of certain doctors, and I will not mention names, who do not have much guiding them, it seems to me, morally. They would have no trouble accepting your word for that and perhaps getting a signature or whatever is required of them to give to you so that you could have your pregnancy terminated. I do not see much in the bill that would prevent that from happening. Indeed, I think it will become commonplace.

The next thing that follows of course in a country that gets too liberal on abortion policy is to permit euthanasia. I think China is a good example of that. I was reading in the newspaper the other day that China has a very liberal abortion policy. Right now in China euthanasia can be performed in hospitals. The state does not interfere. Somebody in the hospital decides that somebody's life should be snuffed out. It is permitted in China today without question.

I think you will be finding yourselves with this kind of legislation which is so weak in terms of protection of the foetus.

• (2140)

To me, it permits abortion on demand. If it is not on demand immediately the legislation passes, then the tendency with any legislation like this, though, is to become more and more liberal as society becomes more and more accepting of it. If it is not abortion on demand immediately, it soon will be. I am going back to what has happened in China where they went with a very liberal abortion policy and now they have euthanasia wholesale.

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Madam Speaker, never in the Canadian parliamentary history have elected representatives been confronted with such an agonizing issue as that of legislating abortion.

During this last year especially, so much has been said and repeated on the subject, so many arguments have been put forward in support of legalizing or prohibiting it; so many extreme, intolerant, not to say disquieting reactions have come from legal, health and other professionals, people in responsible positions; there has been such an escalation in the media sometimes bordering on indecency, that I wonder if there is any point today to preach one way or the other.

Maximum exploitation of the victims of situations that arose last year has helped radicalize the already irreconcilable positions of both sides of the question. What with publicity, the temperature kept rising, and verbal violence even erupted at times. Is it any surprise that our fellow citizens differ in their views when the interpretation of government actions varies from one newspaper to the other? Indeed, after our legislation was tabled, we could read on November 4 in the Edmonton Journal: "This Bill makes sense"; in the Ottawa Citizen, "Abortion compromise pleases no one"; in the Gazette: "MPs on both sides unhappy with"; in Le Devoir: "Ottawa recriminalise l'avortement"; finally, in La Presse*: "La femme et son médecin décideront de l'avortement".*

Madam Speaker, first of all, I want to make quite clear that I am neither a lawyer, a doctor nor a social worker. I am a citizen of this country, a mother and a grandmother, and my hair is white. However, I am very much aware of the debate that is going on today, in and outside Parliament and before our highest courts. I am also very aware of the many comments I have read and heard, of often hasty judgments that would benefit from a more critical view, and the many personal statements that at times I found chilling. And here I am again, in the same situation we had during the debate in 1988, torn between my personal convictions as a woman, as a Christian and a Catholic. I also have my responsibilities as a legislator, and I am a member of a government that is seeking legislation that is in line with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, while it is also seeking the best solution, and does so in the best interests of the society it has been asked to lead. The government and Parliament cannot and must not claim to dictate to women what they can think and do.

The government's role is to help these women opt for life, for having a child and a family. It is not the State's role to act as their conscience and to make for them a choice that is so difficult and problematic.

Last summer, journalist Jean-Luc Mongrain wrote the following in the heat of the debate, and I quote:

> We don't need full-page ads of guilt messages. When we have to make decisions as important, as intimate, as disturbing and as profoundly existential as these, we certainly do not want to be hustled by people defending the ideololgies of pro-life or pro-choice!
> We need people who listen and understand, who reach out and are tolerant, and we need love and understanding. No court and no Parliament will ever be able to satisfy us and provide the right answer.

Experience has taught me the following: Coercive laws will not change people's attitudes. To try to understand the human drama going on today, we need tolerance and an open mind. In most cases, the problem we are discussing today is a disturbing reality for those who are directly involved.

Following a judgment by the Supreme Court on abortion, some people shouted and screamed that the so-called legal vacuum had to be filled as soon as possible.

The opposition in Parliament, many editorial writers, those whose only defence and opinion is to pass the buck—all these people have been clamoring for federal legislation. But no one has had solutions or concrete proposals to suggest and when our bill was tabled, it was often the same people who criticized it most strongly.

Faced with the innumerable comments on this bill, I feel somewhat like a referee between two fighters whom nothing can dissuade from doing everything to beat the other.

These two gladiators—a term I reluctantly use for extremists who tolerate no compromise—each have a share of public opinion behind them. Each has the support of 15 to 20 per cent of the population, but between them lies the majority, often called the "silent" majority, which certainly does not make the headlines.

One thing is for sure: No law will please everybody. If we want to protect the rights of the fetus, will we have to continue to take women to court? That is the terrible dilemma we are asked to resolve.

However, we cannot escape our responsibility, because what Canadians want now is an end to the confusion. They want the government to take a position and legislate in a way that strikes a fair balance between abortion on demand and criminalization. Such a law might not deal with the moral issues raised in this debate, but there will always be such problems which are hard to solve by legislation.

As my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, said, we were elected by the Canadian people to choose the course that will respect the rights of all concerned in as fair a way as possible.

That is why, Madam Speaker, I support this bill. However, I would like it to be just the starting point for another step. For all of us who care about respect for life, respect for the embryo, the fetus, the unborn child, for all of us who deplore the alarming number of pregnancies that are terminated every year, it seems urgent and imperative to me to lay the foundations for a real family policy.

The government's responsibility goes far beyond legislating or banning abortion. Since our role is to promote the welfare of the people, would it not be logical that, along with other government levels, with the private sector and with organizations dedicated to the future of our nation, we direct our combined efforts towards the prevention of abortion, prevention which in concrete terms means helping women who reject their pregnancy, and enhancing the desirability of the child and of the role of the mother?

AFÉAS, a group well known for its enlightened and reasonable positions, advocates the establishment of family planning clinics for men and women alike where they would have access to services related to contraception, fertility, sterilization, and therapeutic abortion. A pregnant woman would be offered a full range of services such as reception, information, local resources reference and psycho-social support. A woman who does not want to have children should be aware of the many contraceptive methods which she and her mate can use.

On the other hand, it is just as important that a woman who wants to bear a child be in a position to look forward to maternity with enthusiasm and optimism. If this commendable aspiration is to be fulfilled, it is essential that a family policy have two objectives, one material, the other psychological.

In the first instance, the policy must eliminate or reduce as much as possible the destabilizing impact of pregnancy on the financial status of an individual, of a couple, or of a family. This could be done through tax measures which clearly favour women who want children. The baby bonus is a modest step in the right direction, but we have to think about the longer term. It is absolutely imperative that the career of family mother—or family father, in some cases—no longer be beyond the reach of most Canadians. The time has come for the tax burden to be distributed more equitably among those who are concerned about the survival of this nation and those who care only for their pleasure here and now.

As to the psychological objective of this policy, it seems to me to consist only in the enhancement of the contribution made by the father and mother. Even if we succeeded in making this contribution financially affordable, we would have achieve only half our goal if we did not make it socially worthwhile in the eyes of everyone. The mother who stays at home must be perceived as a precious asset and not simply as an "Yvette", as she was unfairly caricatured in Quebec during the referendum campaign.

In our new society, the couple who decides freely to enrich their home with one or several children deserve the congragulations, encouragement, moral and financial support of the state. In short, they should get incentives to realize their objectives and to achieve their educative goal.

Personally, I think it is high time for the government to help society become more open to all life, as suggested last year by our Catholic Bishops. It should take society by the hand, walk side by side with it, educate it, convince it to help the family seek more children.

Thanks to such family human development assistance policies, abortion would practically disappear. Then and only then might we feel that we have done what we had to do to prevent abortion. That could be our most worthwhile contribution to the welfare of Canadian men and women.

Mr. Nicholson: Madam Speaker, I wonder if there would be unanimous consent in the House to call it ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. parliamentary secretary. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before adjourning the House, I think it would be in order for the chair occupant to wish each and every one of us in the House a happy first anniversary.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the farmers from Ontario and Quebec who were here on Parliament Hill yesterday to try to make this government understand that its policy direction is unacceptable for Canadian agriculture and will end in the destruction of this once vibrant industry.

Those thousands of farmers who conducted this demonstration with purpose and dignity and their forceful presentation should make this government realize that the free trade agreement has already proven to be a disaster to Canadian farmers and Canadian food processors.

We have had a countervail placed against our pork entering the United States from Canada. We have a threat of countervail against our Durum wheat entering the United States. We have a GATT decision against our dairy farmers allowing ice cream and yoghurt into Canada, while the United States restricts imports of our ice cream into their country. Just last week the St. Lawrence Starch Company announced that it was closing its plant in Ontario and moving to Buffalo, New York.

This government has been systematically dismantling the most sophisticated marketing system of any country in the world and Canadian farmers are being thrown to the vultures of the market-place.

I call on this government today to stop this madness, to restore agriculture to the position that it deserves in society, to restore the Advance Payments for Crops programs, to provide its share of crop insurance premiums to make it truly tripartite, to restore At and East transportation policy, and to restore the Farm Credit Corporation as a credible lending agency rather than a collection agency.

I call on this government to make agriculture a national security issue and give the Canadian farmers who demonstrated here yesterday a secure living that is commensurate with that of the rest of society.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, in my riding office, I regularly receive people in search of employment, as do my colleagues in this House I suppose.

In recent years, I have noticed a lack of coordination between employers and potential employees.

Mr. Speaker, more and more employers lack skilled workers and must make do with fewer employees than they need. At the same time, prospective employees only have such general training with no specific skills that they conclude few jobs are available.

Some say that there are no jobs, but I wonder! Take a look in the Canada Employment Centres where jobs are posted. There are jobs, and I am convinced that a very small effort in terms of training would create openings for them that they do not even suspect exist.

Once job seekers understand that employers' needs go beyond the status quo, we will train a society that can meet our expectations.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Agriculture told the 5,000 farmers who were in front of the Parliament Buildings that his government was not undermining farm support and that the supply management program is preserved in the free trade agreement with the United States. In fact, the free trade agreement states that both the United States and Canadian governments should work for the elimination and the reduction of import barriers.

The United States views supply management as a restriction of imports and Canada is showing complicity with the American point of view. The British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association has stated that the agricultural industry in that province will cease to exist if these marketing boards are removed. The $30 million Okanagan Valley commercial soft fruit industry will virtually disappear as tariffs are removed over the next 10 years. The elimination of supply management will serve to deliver the death blow. Supply management and tariffs ensure a secure market for domestic products. The combination of free trade and this government is proving lethal to farmers, especially the fruit growers in British Columbia.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday our farmers came to Ottawa, to make the government realize that agriculture in Québec and in the Beauce region faces an uncertain future.

Our spokespersons for international trade should realize that we will not tolerate any indifference on their part to Québec demands as they relate to the GATT talks.

Mr. Speaker, agriculture in Québec has become very organized. I want 100 per cent protection for our joint ventures, our marketing boards and our quotas. Many sacrifices have been made to set up our family farm operations, with the co-operation of governments and the UPA.

As the Member for Beauce, Mr. Speaker, I demand that francophone negotiators from Québec, who are familiar with our needs and requirements, be included on the Canadian negotiating team in Geneva.

Mr. St-Julien: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bernier: We must strengthen GATT Article 11. We will keep our eyes open, believe me!

EL SALVADOR

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we hear today that the armed conflict between the military in El Salvador and the opposition forces continues to escalate. The Liberal party believes that Canada can no longer take a passive stand in light of these dramatic developments. We would like to ensure that the Canadian government immediately addresses the following recommendations.

First, that the Canadian government through its new role in the OAS urge the United States to reconsider its policy on El Salvador and in that context suspend its aid to the Salvadoran military and condition its economic aid to political negotiations, human rights and compliance with the Esquipulas II peace accord.

Second, encourage the OAS, specifically its human rights arm, to investigate the human rights abuses in El Salvador and report as soon as possible, as well as call on El Salvador's government to cease and desist immediately from human rights violations.

Third, that Canada adopt an open-door policy for refugees escaping the conflict in El Salvador during this time of crisis and hardship and put a moratorium on the deportation of any El Salvadoran refugees now living in Canada.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, the recently released discussion paper entitled "Growing Together: A Vision for Canada's Agri-food Industry" has provided an unprecedented opportunity for us to review our many past achievements as well as to forecast our future direction in the agri-food industry.

The organization Dairy Farmers of Canada is to be congratulated for the initiative it has taken to study and make recommendations on the future of the dairy industry in Canada. In the past, we as Canadians have been able to look inward to decide what is best for Canada. Now as we enter the 1990s there can be no mistake about the fact that we are intertwined in a rapidly emerging global economy. Our involvement in this global economy will have tremendous long-term benefits for Canada.

The four fundamental components directing the review process will ensure that our competitiveness in international markets will be continually strengthened throughout the 1990s. However, the most important feature of the review process is that it is participatory. Producer representatives and producers themselves are encouraged to get involved in this initiative which gets under way with a national agri-food policy conference on December 11 and 12 in Ottawa.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, an unacceptable case of toxic contamination exists in the community of Rankin Inlet in my constituency in the Northwest Territories. The contamination has been found in the tailings pond of an abandoned nickel mine. The results of a consultant's report show that the level of contamination for arsenic, copper, nickel and sulphur exceeds the severe contamination level.

The report suggests that for the past 20 to 30 years the tailings area has probably been generating an acidified leachate which has drained into the marine waters of Rankin Inlet. It points to possible problems arising from heavy metal accumulation in sediments and the food chain.

The consultants say that more detailed investigations to assess the nature and extent of the contamination and the associated health risks to the community are needed as soon as possible.

I call upon the Government of Canada to exercise its environmental responsibilities and act upon its expressed concern for the Canadian Arctic environment. Get involved, clean up the contamination now.

TRIBUTE TO VICTOR DAVIS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, on November 13, this year, Canadians heard the sad news of the tragic death of one of our most famous athletes.

A gold and silver medal winner at the 1984 Olympic Games and three times winner of the world record for the 200 metre breast stroke, Victor Davis was throughout his career and his all too short life a shining example of courage and determination and a proud symbol for Canadian youth.

Even after his death, Mr. Speaker, Victor Davis continued to set an example by donating his vital organs, his heart, eyes, lungs, liver and kidneys, so that other persons may live.

His fighting spirit and his love and respect for his fellow men were qualities that endeared him to all Canadians and won him their respect, admiration and love.

I wish to extend our condolences and express our feelings of sympathy and profound sadness to all members of his family.

Victor Davis' example will be with us forever.

EL SALVADOR

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, President George Bush has defended U.S. military aid to the government in El Salvador by stating that "Cristiani is doing a job for democracy". "Doing a job for democracy" means the brutal murder of Jesuit priests, the detention of foreign nationals and terrorizing of the civilian population. Increased militarization will not lead to democratization as the United States maintains.

Bush argues that the elections in El Salvador this spring were "certifiably free and fair". Is the U.S. now issuing certificates to justify military intervention? I was in El Salvador at the time of the elections with the Mission for Peace. Our report made clear that elections are only one instrument of a democratic system. If other instruments are absent or weak, elections have questionable validity.

To declare the process in El Salvador fair and free is to severely distort reality. By not formally denouncing the position of the United States, this government is allowing the myth of democracy in El Salvador to be continued. Until the Bush administration accepts that democracy means the participation of all members of society without fear, there will be no peace and no democracy in El Salvador.

DRUG AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Jean–Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Government realizes it is necessary to make youth aware of the dangers of drug abuse and has therefore announced that the week from November 19 to November 25 will be national drug addiction awareness week.

Canada's decision to set up a national anti–drug strategy, initiated in 1987 with a budget of $210 million, is praiseworthy, but drug awareness and prevention programs will not stop the supply of drugs and the dependency it generates.

Today more than ever before, we must be concerned about the insidious effects of drugs.

Increased drug use is a new threat to national security. Life loses its value, the crime rate soars and young people's lives are ruined for good.

Every year, hundreds of millions of dollars worth of drug trafficking profits cross the border between Canada and the United States.

The fight against drugs cannot be won by governments alone. Mr. Speaker, we should take advantage of this week to maximize our efforts to fight drug abuse.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, yesterday thousands of farmers from Ontario, Quebec and other parts of Canada gathered on the lawn in front of the Centre Block to protest this government's lack of direction in farm policy. They voiced their concerns in many ways. Their anxiety was apparent.

The fate of their farms and the agri–food industry is in serious jeopardy as they see their industry being systematically dismantled, a system they have struggled for decades to put in place to ensure the production of quality food products in Canada. They feel that the government has done nothing but trade away their industry. They feel strongly that organized marketing as they have known it is coming to an end in Canada.

I join with the thousands who made the trip to Ottawa, representing farmers across the country, in voicing my continuous concern for the future of the farming industry in this country.

Mr. Guy St–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the farmers of Abitibi demonstrated on Parliament Hill yesterday. The signals they have been getting from Ottawa recently gave them reasons to be seriously concerned about their future. Nevertheless, the president of the UPA, Jacques Proulx, reached out to the Minister of State for Agriculture and said, "Let's work together."

Mr. Robichaud: He will be disappointed again!

Mr. St–Julien: The demands of our Quebec farmers relate to three areas, namely freer trade in agricultural goods because of GATT and the Free Trade Agreement, advance payments for crops and the reform of agricultural policies.

Mr. Speaker, the government must act on this because farming is essential to Canada and to Quebec.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT OF LEBANON

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I rise to mourn the death of Lebanese President René Mouawad today in Beirut. Mr. Mouawad was elected only a few weeks ago, but already, thanks to his reputation as a man of dialogue, his country was able to move significantly towards peace and national reconciliation, in a land torn by more than 14 years of pitting brother against brother. Canadians welcomed his arrival among the world's heads of state because it marked an important step on the road to the unity, sovereignty and reconstruction of Lebanon.

The attack which took President Mouawad's life is totally unjustifiable and those responsible have dealt Lebanon a heavy blow. The Canadian Government condemns this act and hopes that all parties with influence in Lebanon will show restraint and continue to work towards a political settlement of the Lebanese conflict. Mr. Speaker, violence cannot solve this conflict.

President Mouawad sacrificed himself to make the Lebanese nation what it was before, a beacon of civilization and community understanding. I wish to express our condolences to President Mouawad's family and to all the people of Lebanon.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the Lebanese community around the world was horrified and shocked at the assassination of President Mouawad early today, an assassination which was undoubtedly a vicious attempt to thwart the Arab League Peace Plan that recently became the only hope of reconciliation to the people of Lebanon and to others around the world.

President Mouawad was elected on November 5 of this year by Lebanese legislators at a special session called for in the peace plan as an attempt to bring to an end 14 years of violence and bloodshed.

I want to call on the Arab League to not be discouraged by this brutal act, to not let this act deter them in their efforts toward a final resolution of this long and tragic conflict, and to elect another president quickly to avoid any further deterioration that would almost undoubtedly result in absolute anarchy.

I want to call on General Aoun to endorse the peace plan by offering full support to the process and decisions agreed upon by the Lebanese legislators and the Arab League.

I want to call on the Government of Canada, this time to use our seat on the Security Council, bring the matter up for action and show the people of Lebanon that we will not stand by any more while innocent people are being murdered, and that we will be willing to work with them, to work with the Arab League, to put an end, once and for all, to this senseless killing that is tearing the heart out of the Middle East.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I would like to join with everyone here in the House of Commons in condemning this act of violence, the assassination of the President of Lebanon.

We extend our sympathies not only to the family of the president but to the entire people of Lebanon who have suffered these last 14 years an endless cycle of violence which can only be perpetuated by the kind of violence which we saw enacted there today in the bombing that killed the president.

I am reminded that today is the anniversary of another assassination, the assassination of President Kennedy on November 22, 1963. We see that whatever hopes that we had at that time that assassination might disappear from the face of the earth have been shattered time and time again and are shattered here today, shattered in a country where assassination and violence have become a way of life.

• (1420)

I join in the appeal that the Arab League and others who are sincere about peace in Lebanon not be discouraged by this event, that the life and the courage of the President of Lebanon, who no doubt knew that this was a dangerous job when he took it on, not be offered up in vain, and that some day soon everyone who has influence and power in that region of the world will come to their senses and make it possible for peace to come to the people of Lebanon.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

JUSTICE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

On June 6 this year, the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police wrote to the House of Commons justice committee confirming that on November 8, 1988, that is to say in the middle of the last general election, indeed two or three weeks before the election date, the RCMP had received a document from the Prime Minister's principal secretary, then Peter White, using the commissioner's words, a document "relating to the investigation which led to criminal charges, including those against Mr. Richard Grisé."

The commissioner wrote the justice committee that he had received legal advice, I assume from the Department of Justice, not to release the document from the Prime Minister's principal secretary. In light of the extraordinary revelations with respect to the Grisé affair, will the Deputy Prime Minister ensure that the part of the document given to the RCMP by the Prime Minister's principal secretary, Peter White, which relates to the convicted Conservative member of Parliament, Richard Grisé, will be made public immediately?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, this matter, which was discussed yesterday and is still being discussed today, was already dealt with by the Commissioner. The Commissioner is now outside the country at an Interpol meeting. When this question was put to the RCMP Commissioner, the answer was, if I recall correctly, that at the time there were legal grounds for not disclosing the letter. I think it would be entirely appropriate to ask the Commissioner again, when he is back in the country, whether this document can be made public. I believe that the government acted entirely appropriately, in the circumstances. As soon as it was informed of the facts, the information was handed over—

An Hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Blais: If the hon. member will let me proceed I listened to the question and if I could have a chance to answer the question—

The government immediately handed over the information it had to the RCMP, so that the RCMP could conduct its investigation. The results of the investigation are now public knowledge. I think that if people have further questions for the RCMP Commissioner, they can put those questions when he comes back. However, it is my feeling that everything was done in an entirely appropriate manner and that there are no grounds for further questions on this matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we are very anxious to have the commissioner appear again before the committee, but this is a matter I feel concerns the Prime Minister's Office and the principal secretary at the time.

[English]

The Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police did not deal with this issue yesterday, but he did tell the justice committee that the officer in Montreal who delayed the search warrants had acted on his own. That particular officer later told reporters that one week before last year's general election he had advised the Acting Deputy Commissioner of criminal investigation here in Ottawa of the decision to delay search warrants and that the Acting Deputy Commissioner told the officer "He had no problem."

This officer who delayed the search warrants told a Montreal newspaper yesterday: "proceeding with those searches less than one week before a general election—perhaps could have influenced the election on a local and national level."

I want to put this question to the Deputy Prime Minister because he understands, I am sure, the profound questions involved in this affair which go to the root of our system of justice. The public interest demands prompt and impartial investigations and the administration of justice whether or not there is an election on. Nobody is to be convenienced by when a search warrant will be laid or when a charge will be laid.

Six days before the decision to delay the search warrants was made, the RCMP received a document from the Prime Minister's principal secretary. I put the question to the Deputy Prime Minister, what was in that document?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman keeps trying to incriminate the RCMP and undermine the integrity of the RCMP. I consider this to be a very serious matter. The members opposite do not.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I would remind hon. members that a question has been put to the Deputy Prime Minister who has the floor and is trying to answer.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is the RCMP Commissioner, Mr. Inkster, was very frank and forthright with the committee yesterday and undertook to look into this matter in its fullest detail. The Solicitor General has responded in a similar manner. What is happening here is that we are providing the answers that are being made available to us. The RCMP are providing the answers that are being made available. Because the opposition does not like the truth and it does not fit their political motives, I cannot help that. We want to ensure—

Some Hon. Members: What was in the letter?

Mr. Mazankowski: Well, Mr. Speaker, that will be something for the RCMP to decide because as he said yesterday, he would take grave exception to any individual who would make an effort to tell him what to investigate, who to investigate, or how that investigation should be undertaken, and I agree with that statement.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this issue at this stage does not relate to the integrity of the force. We support that. It relates to the integrity of the Prime Minister's Office and the heart of this government, and that is why we want to know what was in that document and whether the Deputy Prime Minister will produce it.

We do not need the return of the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for this answer. We will await his return before the committee. We want to know why an intervention was made eight days before the election by the Prime Minister's principal secretary relating to the Grisé affair and why the Deputy Prime Minister will not produce that document.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman can ask the RCMP if they will produce the document. If he wants to interfere with the investigation then he can be my guest.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP have said that they will not produce that letter. They have told us, and I want the Deputy Prime Minister to get this, that they will not give us the letter. We are asking the government for that letter because of the circumstances in which that letter was sent. Will the Deputy Prime Minister make that letter public?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not satisfied with the truth.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You are not giving us the truth.

Mr. Mazankowski: Yesterday there was a firm undertaking by the Commissioner of the RCMP to get to the bottom of this and report back as quickly as he possibly can.

I also noted that the hon. member has great confidence in the Commissioner of the RCMP. If he has so much confidence, why does he not let him complete the review and the investigation and report in an appropriate fashion?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, we all know that the Commissioner of the RCMP will not make public a letter that he got from the Prime Minister's Office. That is for the Prime Minister to decide to do and we are asking the Deputy Prime Minister to make that letter public. The investigation is over. A conviction was obtained. What is the public interest in withholding from us and from the Canadian people the contents of that very important letter?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the public interest is in defending the independence of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That is the issue.

The investigation that was undertaken was undertaken by the RCMP. It was conducted in the manner in which the RCMP saw fit, its conclusions were made in an appropriate fashion, and what we are doing here again is imputing motives.

The hon. member is making suggestions of political interference and political wrong–doing. The RCMP Commissioner has been very clear and categorical on that account. He may not believe us but surely he should believe the RCMP Commissioner.

• (1430)

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. May I just say that it is very clear from the facts in this case that the Commissioner of the RCMP has been kept in the dark in this whole matter.

My office learned yesterday from Chief Superintendent McConnell that he normally reports to none other than Deputy Commissioner of Operations, Henry Jensen, and that Mr. Couteau who received the call from McConnell yesterday was simply sitting in for Jensen who was away.

Now Mr. Jensen sat in the justice committee beside Mr. Inkster in June when he misled the committee. In the case of Inkster this may well have been unintentional, but it is not unintentional on the part of this government.

An Hon. Member: Get on with the question.

Mr. Brewin: In view of the fact that the Solicitor General has had 10 months in office to get to the bottom of this affair, how can he say that he has not either been negligent in his duties to the people of Canada or, because he is afraid of what he might find out if he looked into this affair, he is simply intentionally acting contrary to the interest of the people of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Now that was a charge, and I have said before that we are not using preambles by way of charges. The minister may wish to respond.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. We know that eight days before a decision was made to delay the issuance of search warrants in the Grisé matter Peter White wrote a letter to the RCMP. We know that Bernard Roy apparently told an engineer who had given bribes to Michel Gravel that this would be a little in-house investigation and that Gravel would quietly resign. There was not supposed to be any charges or any big scandal. We all know that is not what happened.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister explain to the House precisely what role was played by Bernard Roy in the Michel Gravel investigation? What role was played by Peter White from the Prime Minister's Office in the investigation of Richard Grisé? Will the Deputy Prime Minister stop trying to cover up political interference in the administration of justice in this country and—

Mr. Speaker: The question was doing quite well until the last moment or two. The minister may want to respond.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with respect to Mr. Bernard Roy, I noted in The Toronto Star today, November 22, that allegations which were made in regard to any information he had with respect to the probe into the dealings of Michel Gravel were "odious and false". It is my understanding that he has written to the letter publisher or the editor of the Montreal Gazette to that effect.

In so far as the other matter is concerned, the only information I can give to the hon. member at this particular time is that as soon as information was made available to the Prime Minister's Office with respect to this, it was turned over to the RCMP.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Solicitor General. Yesterday RCMP Superintendent McConnell stated, after admitting to delaying search warrants in the Grisé affair for political reasons, that he would do exactly the same thing again. I want to ask the Solicitor General who is responsible for the RCMP: Does he accept this very dangerous decision by the RCMP, or will he now finally show leadership and assure the House that this kind of political manipulation of the criminal justice process is totally unacceptable—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Why is he allowed to continually do this?

An Hon. Member: You are questioning the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I think that under the circumstances I will have to proceed to the hon. member for Saint-Léonard.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank. Yesterday, in answer to my question, he said and I quote:

> Headquarters believed a pub-disco was operating in a building owned by the company to which the loan was made.

The Federal Business Development Bank's loan policy excludes this kind of business. Therefore it is not a mistake but it is contrary to the policy. Will the minister clarify this matter? Will he tell this House who received the loan application at the branch office, and who reviewed and authorized this loan exceeding $1 million at headquarters? Are we going to find out the truth once and for all?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, five times, the application was sent to headquarters for approval because of the nature of the business, being a night club–pub–disco. The vice-president at headquarters approved it, not knowing it was a strip club. He ought not to have done that. It is contrary to public policy. That is the sixth time I have given that answer to this House.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, today we learned from The Toronto Star that Ken Cavanaugh, the spokesman for the federal bank, said that the loan in question was supported by a chartered bank.

Now if it was supported by the chartered bank, why did the bank not make the loan? Why did the FBDB make the loan, which is a last resort lending institution? Is that another mistake?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, his leader is a former director of a chartered bank. He should ask him why the chartered bank would recommend that kind of a loan.

How am I supposed to know?

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank and is on the same subject.

The minister told us yesterday and again today that the branch office and the headquarters of the Federal Business Development Bank both made an error in approving a loan to the Lido strip joint. Today, Mr. Ken Kavanagh, spokesman for the bank, said in an interview with CBC that the bank had no intention of "divesting" itself of this client. If the loan is contrary to the policy, as the minister told us yesterday and again today, if it is unacceptable to finance this kind of business, is is not also unacceptable to keep this client? Why is the government continuing to finance a business which it considers unacceptable?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, a contract was entered into between the FBDB and the numbered company that owns the land and property and the business contained therein. That contract obligates the FBDB, as well as the holder of the loan. There are no provisions in that contract.

There will be in terms of the policy from now on, as I indicated yesterday in the House, but there is no provision in that contract to call the loan in the manner the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. Boudria: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the minister told us there was a mortgage and today he tells us it is a loan. That is a fascinating way he has of getting himself confused.

I want to ask the minister a very serious question. Can he give this House his assurance here and now that the Federal Business Development Bank has not financed any other such establishments, that the Federal Business Development Bank has not financed strip joints directly or indirectly in the past other than the Lido strip club in Hull?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, to spare the hon. member hours of work sniffing down a blind alley here, let me tell him that it is a loan secured by a mortgage on the land and property as well as certain assets within the business.

Mr. Jelinek: He would not understand that.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, five times and today at least once, a mistake was made. The policy has been changed.

• (1440)

The policy now reads: "The bank does not provide financing to businesses which would result in FBDB being identified as encouraging activities which, while legal, generally could be considered offensive".

Mr. Boudria: Are there any more?

Mr. Andre: The hon. member again shouts from his seat showing he is more interested in feigned indignation for the benefit of television rather than information from this side of the House.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Yesterday thousands of farmers demonstrated in Ottawa searching for answers from the Minister of Agriculture—

Some Hon. Members: How many?

Mr. Althouse: Thousands—regarding the future of national farm marketing boards. They got no answers.

Specifically what role does the minister and this government see for national marketing boards? What role will they play in the export of farm products in the 1990s? Will he be expanding the existing legislation to permit the establishment of new national boards by removing the current restrictions on fruit and vegetable producers, grains and oilseeds producers, and livestock producers which now prevent them from establishing such boards?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the position of the government and the position that we have taken as a party for many, many years is that we will honour the type of marketing system that producers want. If the majority of producers want a marketing board system, that is something we will facilitate for them. The fact of the matter is that—

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Did you check the free trade agreement?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, a Liberal is saying from her seat that that is not what the free trade agreement says. The free trade agreement very clearly establishes the right for marketing boards to exist under the provisions of GATT.

What this government is doing during the GATT negotiations is an attempt to clarify and strengthen Article 11, the foundation under which supply management systems can exist and under which import controls can be implemented.

As a result of the ice cream and yoghurt decision, which was not a free trade decision but rather a GATT decision, it is necessary to clarify that provision because the wording goes back to 1947 and there have been a lot of changes since that time.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister might focus on answering the question. All sides of the House applauded when east bloc countries, specifically East Germany, began tearing down the wall that kept people in. Now East Germans have a choice.

Will the minister and his government tear down the blockage that exists in the natural products marketing law which restricts the producers of grains and oilseeds, livestock, fruits and vegetables from even considering establishing such marketing boards? They have to get the legislation changed first. They have to get permission to go through the wall. Will he tear it down?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been living in Ottawa too long and not getting back to his constituency often enough.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: If he was paying any attention to what was going on in rural Canada, he would know that beef producers in Ontario rejected a marketing board and supply management concept.

We believe in democracy. If they had voted in favour of one, we probably would have taken action to facilitate that course, but democratic forces prevailed. They did not want that kind of a system, and we will uphold the decision of the farmers.

MONEY LAUNDERING

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

After a convention of North American chiefs of police held recently in Kentucky in the United States it would seem that billions of dollars of drug trafficking profits cross the American border every year and are laundered in Canadian financial institutions.

Considering that the laws of our two countries are not compatible and that our banks can break up a large deposit into several smaller deposits to various bank accounts and then transfer them to U.S. accounts, with a view to correcting this situation, does the minister intend to take appropriate and concrete steps to authorize our police forces to obtain information from our banking institutions so as to uncover these fraudulent operations and enable our society to make progress in the fight against drugs?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the government looks upon money laundering as a serious issue. I should like to reassure the Hon. member for Drummond by telling him that we have been and will be using the latest and most effective measures to fight against this plague.

For example, some people have suggested registering any transaction in excess of $10,000. My response is that drug traffickers may be criminals, but they are not necessarily stupid. It is very easy to find other ways to complete the transaction. We looked at that suggestion on three occasions and, for the time being, our conclusion is that the methods we use with the banks, the RCMP and the Superintendent of Financial Institutions are up to date and effective. We will continue to use the latest technology.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Agriculture).

Yesterday, while some 15,000 angry farmers were protesting—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: The minister had the gall to brag in the House about his dairy policy. Is the minister not aware that his policy became worthless when his government signed a free-trade agreement with the United States, and especially decided to progressively remove the tariff on yogurt and ice cream, before securing from the United States the assurance that they would allow Canada to add these two items to its import control list? Does the minister not realize that the people who were outside booing him and insisting they no longer trusted him are seeking a better treatment from him? What is he going to do?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I realized that I was fortunate to hold two portfolios when RCMP officers advised me that there were 4,500 farm producers demonstrating yesterday in front of Parliament.

In this connection, my Hon. friend ought to know that the decision dealing with yogurt and ice cream—

I am aware that NDP members could not care less about Quebec farm producers, but I suggest that there are people both in and out of the House who care about them.

In reply to his question, may I suggest to my Hon. friend that he should know this is a GATT decision which has nothing to do with our free trade agreement with the United States. It was at the request of farm producers that we had added yogurt and ice cream to that list. The tribunal ruled against us; yet, we have done something which Liberal Governments had not done in over 20 years, to wit, sit down with Quebec farm producers in an effort to put together a new dairy policy and strategy with respect to GATT talks. You did not even have a long-term dairy policy. For five years, farm producers waited for some action on your part.

Since my colleague is absent from the House, may I suggest, as I did yesterday, that we have no lesson to receive from hon. members opposite. We have always looked after dairy producers and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of State (Agriculture), who is fully aware that he simply extended for a five-year period a dairy policy that has been of benefit to Québec farmers for years and years as it was renewed by the Liberal administration. The industrial milk policy has done so well in Quebec because it was well designed years ago.

When in 1976 there were demonstrations on Parliament Hill, the government of the day listened and made corrections.

Here is my question to the minister: Faced with that demonstration, by whatever the number of farmers, because all farmers in UPA and the whole UPA membership in the province of Quebec, support those who came to Parliament Hill and are demanding that the Minister take concrete steps to protect, not only yogurt and ice cream, but also butter, cheese, powdered milk.

What will the minister do to ensure that Canada's industrial milk producers are not put out of business by the Americans, as they are now preparing to do?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, it is amazing that after five years the hon. member for Papineau would ask a question dealing with agriculture. For five years, Mr. Speaker, this government has been looking after farmers. In 1986 we brought in the first long-term dairy policy ever a policy they could not get from you.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, which is of significant importance for dairy farmers, they sit with us on a strategy committee. We are reviewing the current dairy policy with a view to strengthening it and ensuring—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Blais: If you will listen—and ensuring that we are able not only to address what we have gone through over the last three years, but also to meet the challenges of the future.

We believe that under a strengthened and clarified Article 11 marketing boards will be in a position to compete during the 1990s and into the next century, Mr. Speaker. This is what farmers need.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who has thrown in the towel in determining fishery policy in Atlantic Canada, leaving two big fish companies to call the shots on which fish plants to close and leaving thousands of plant workers and fishermen economically stranded.

Does the minister not agree that catch quotas rightfully belong to the individual ports and fish plants, and not to the companies?

If the companies try to close particular plants in Atlantic Canada, will he ensure that the appropriate quota shares remain with the individual fish plants? Does he not agree that sharing the work is better than shutting down individual plants altogether, permanently?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that I certainly have not agreed to throw in the towel, although if he needs one, feeling rather wet, I could provide him with one.

Mr. McKnight: Actually it is a crying towel.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, there are certain matters with respect to the distribution of fish quotas that come ultimately under the authority of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

As we plan for the quota management of the 1990 fishery we will be setting those quotas in a fair and equitable fashion, following a process of consultation involving all industry sector groups, affected provincial governments and ministers of fisheries.

There are other matters as to which plants should receive which portion of supply under quotas accorded to private companies which have been properly the domain of those private companies. In the course of the work of the special cabinet committee on the northern cod issue in particular and the Atlantic fishery more generally, that matter is being considered very carefully.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows as much about towels as he does about the fishery.

Does he not agree that the fish belong to the communities and the people, not to those multinational fish companies?

Yesterday there were some meetings in Halifax on this subject. I am sure the minister has heard reports are circulating from that meeting yesterday that both inshore and offshore quotas are going to be drastically reduced. That should come as no surprise to him.

Will the minister now bite the bullet and set some direction on how the quotas are to be distributed between the offshore and the inshore? Will he undertake to see that the two sectors of the industry are not being played off one against the other, leaving the industry in even deeper chaos?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, first the member was concerned that I would throw in the towel. Now he wants me to bite the bullet. I think he really needs a shot in the arm.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Siddon: The hon. member knows full well that for several years there has been a process of consultation in which we discuss these questions with the affected sectors of the Atlantic fishing industry and provincial governments.

Upon completion of that process of consultation we will publish the 1990 Atlantic Groundfish Management Plan on or around December 30 or 31 of this year, and all the answers to his questions will be revealed at that time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. The minister will know that the Prime Minister said yesterday in Moscow that the 1987 White Paper on Defence was outdated. Of course the Prime Minister was the last person in Canada to realize this, but we are glad he has come to this conclusion.

I am wondering if the Minister of National Defence could tell us what process the government now has in mind for reconstructing Canadian defence policy along the lines of the new realities that the Prime Minister has observed, and whether in the context of that process he is prepared to say now that the government will suspend its commitment to low-level flight testing over Innu territory in Labrador until such time as the government can arrive at a new defence policy?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the member asks a very important question. The White Paper was drafted in 1985 to 1987. It was released in 1987 and it was the reality of the time. I think the hon. member admits that, as do others.

Several things have happened since that White Paper was drafted. There was a budget and, to provide the economy of Canada with the strength that we think it needs, there was a reduction in the allocation for the Department of National Defence. A review was undertaken at that time and it is still ongoing.

There are realities today and there are opportunities today that were not available four weeks ago and were not available some six months ago. Therefore, naturally we look at the changes as we progress and the White Paper will continue to be reviewed.

I suggest to the hon. member that it would be prudent to take the time and to allow this government to take the time to come to the right answers as there is a changing reality in the world today.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I think the minister should acknowledge that even in 1987 there was disagreement about the White Paper. It is true, of course, that other things have happened in the meantime.

I asked the minister about a process for reviewing the White Paper, and I asked him in that context to suspend the government's commitment to low-level flight testing, to put a moratorium on it until such time as it can be re-evaluated. The minister has not answered that question.

In the same context, would he also consider suspending Canada's commitment to cruise missile testing which also belongs to a very outdated view of the world?

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, the member represents a party which believes we should not seek collective security in the NATO alliance. This government believes we should and that we should continue to seek security in the NATO alliance.

The member has to understand, and I am sure he does. The changes that have been taking place in Europe today, yesterday and the day before were changes that were encouraged by NATO over the whole period of its existence. NATO has never been an aggressive force. NATO has been a defensive force. It will continue to be. So are the activities and the training that Canada takes part in today.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to advise that in view of the intervention of the hon. minister and the replies by the opposition parties, we will end Question Period at 3.05.

INVESTMENT CANADA

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. In February the minister and Investment Canada approved the takeover of Texaco by Imperial Oil even though the Investment Canada Act says that the question of competition must be resolved first, and that was not done until June. Even though the question of competition was resolved in June, the competition tribunal said that the decision on competition was flawed on November 10.

If the competition question was not resolved until November 10, how could Investment Canada give its approval and say that the competition question was resolved in February, thereby violating its own enabling legislation?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the mandate of Investment Canada was to examine mergers and acquisitions to see if they are in the national interest. In matters relating to the oil and gas industry, it is the oil and gas policy that imposes certain restraints and applies particularly to upstream assets, namely the oil and gas in-ground reserves.

Those policy requirements were met in terms of this agreement. There were certain dispersals imposed on Imperial Oil. It had to dispose of certain assets and so on in order to meet the requirements of the energy policy.

The Competition Act has its own authority and there is no sequential arrangement. They both must be approved before any acquisition is finally approved. As you know, the competition questions are currently being examined very closely and certain amendments being caused, and that will carry itself to its conclusion. Either it will be permitted or not permitted, but that has nothing to do with Investment Canada's responsibility and mandate.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, yes it does, because the Investment Canada Act says that the question of competition must be resolved before Investment Canada can give its approval to the takeover, and it did not do that. In fact, the competition question was not resolved until four months after Investment Canada gave its approval.

From here on, will Investment Canada wait until the competition question is resolved before giving its approval on investments such as this, particularly takeovers and mergers, or is this going to be a regular procedure, that of the enabling legislation of Investment Canada being breached for the convenience of the government?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, it is not for the convenience of the government, it is for the convenience of commerce in the country. I do not see any advantage to anybody to follow the procedure the hon. member is suggesting. There are two conditions that must be met; the net benefit to Canada test of Investment Canada and the Competition Act test. Each must be met separately or a deal does not go through. The procedure the hon. member seems to be suggesting offers no benefits to anybody.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. He will know that the United Nations General Assembly has approved a comprehensive convention with regard to the rights of the child. Canadian governments, both present and past, have been strong advocates of this. Today 10 per cent of Canadian children are in need of some form of child care, however, they are not being accommodated. In Ontario 11 per cent of the province's children in need are being served by the child care program in this country.

Why is the government of Canada not finding this subject matter to be sufficiently important to introduce a comprehensive program, thereby creating the many new spaces which are needed for child care in this country? Is it or is it not a priority?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that this was the first government in Canada that did try to introduce a comprehensive child care plan for children in Canada and that it was stopped by the other place with his party being instrumental in that stoppage.

Let me say as well that this government has committed itself to bringing in another comprehensive child care plan before the next election, within the next two or three years, and that in the meantime the Canada Assistance Plan is available for the provinces to use. It is an open-ended plan to which this government is committed.

Mr. Dingwall: The minister knows that they have had almost six years to come forward with a national program for child care and they have failed with that particular priority.

There are fewer than 70 child care centres serving more than 1,000 native communities across Canada, some of which are now facing closure because of lack of funds. At the present time the Government of Canada spends less than $5 million for First Nation child care.

Would the minister explain why the government has gutted $60 million from native child care? Why is the Government of Canada denying native people, whose needs must be obvious to everyone in this House, of high quality and culturally sensitive child care?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, this government is well aware of the particular needs of native children and of native women. We have done more to show that than has any previous government. Let me go back to some other things too.

In terms of child care, this government introduced tax measures that will provide financial assistance to parents. We launched the Child Care Initiative Fund which includes the very kinds of things the hon. member is talking about. The Child Care Initiative Fund was set up specifically to deal with doubly disadvantaged children and women who need particular help, such as native inamen. That is in action now and it is moving forward. This government also recognizes that we need to have a national child care program and we will do that as soon as possible.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

RACIST ADVERTISING

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today on a question of privilege. My background is Italian, and my office received an anonymous telephone call asking whether that made me a mafioso. Enquiries were made, and it seems that Télé-Direct, the company responsible for printing the yellow pages across Canada, has committed a grave injustice vis-à-vis the Italian-Canadian community. Collège Platon, established in 1957, is a language school and teaches 25 different languages. The college is located in Montreal and is known not only to Canadians but also to foreign students. For the year 1990-91, the college placed an ad in the yellow pages on page 453, listing 23 courses offered to students. It says: "English, French, Portuguese, Dutch", and so forth, but instead of Italian, it says: "mafia".

Point of Order

Needless to say, the entire Italian-Canadian community, of which I am a member, was shocked by this racial slur. When Italians first immigrated to Canada, Mr. Speaker, they were called a number of unpleasant names like "mafioso". We worked as labourers for abysmally low wages, to gain recognition and be accepted as solid citizens. For 20 years we have been part of the Canadian and Québec community.

Just look at the newspapers! Italians are no more likely than the English, French or dyed-in-the-wool Québécers to commit crimes, rape, or be involved in shady dealings or drugs. We are Canadians, not mafiosi. On behalf of the Italian-Canadian community I represent, I ask Télé-Direct to take action against the person or persons with this warped attitude and withdraw this racist page from the directories or make the appropriate corrections.

Mr. Speaker, the Italian community doesn't deserve to be treated like this in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I listened with some interest to the hon. member's statement. This is a very serious matter. It may be appropriate for the Chair to consider the matter and make a statement later on in the House. I want to thank the hon. member.

• (1510)

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, although I have not seen the document, I agree with the hon. member that in 1989, such insults are unacceptable, and speaking on behalf of the Italian community and with the hon. member, I hope that with the support of this House, steps will be taken to prevent any recurrences.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief point of order arising from the proceedings during Question Period yesterday, November 21. This is the first opportunity I have had to raise the point.

It has to do with a question put by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who said, as reported at pages 5931 and 5932 of Hansard:

Point of Order

> Given that less than four hours later Radio–Canada confirmed that the Federal Business Development Bank had made two loans to the Lido strip joint in Hull owned and operated by a friend of a former cabinet minister and totalling $1.3 million—

Mr. Speaker, I have heard you many times in this House, indeed I heard you today and yesterday, admonish members about using preambles and comments that amount to charges or impugned motives and so on. No doubt you are reflecting the admonitions in Beauchesne's sixth edition, section 409(7) which says:

> A question must adhere to the proprieties of the House, in terms of inferences, imputing motives or casting aspersions upon persons within the House or out of it.

In this particular case the reference is to a former cabinet minister, with the inference that somehow perhaps he influenced this loan which I admitted was an error.

Outside the House the hon. member mentioned that it was Roch LaSalle he was talking about. That, of course, had the press going and they were pursuing me to see if I was going to follow this up with a full investigation into what was to them imputed wrong–doing. Other reporters checked that out and Mr. LaSalle denied categorically knowing the owners of the Lido strip joint or ever having been in the establishment. My office confirmed that. He absolutely denies that.

Mr. Speaker, in keeping with your admonitions my request is very simple. I am not accusing the hon. member of deliberately inferring wrong–doing on the part of Mr. LaSalle. He may have received information which was in error.

In any event, I think it would be in keeping with the kind of atmosphere we would like to promote in this House if the hon. member would withdraw that comment and recognize that Mr. LaSalle is not a friend of the owner of this strip joint and has not been a frequenter of this strip joint. He should recognize that any reflection such as that is unfair to this person who is no longer a member of this House, and particularly unfair to that person's family.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I invite you to read carefully what Hansard says and what the minister himself has stated:

> —four hours later Radio–Canada confirmed that the Federal Business Development Bank had made two loans to the Lido strip joint in Hull owned and operated by a friend of a former cabinet minister—

I was stating what Radio–Canada had said. If the minister across has some difficulty with what reporters of Radio–Canada say, he can phone Mr. Normand Lester at Radio–Canada and ask him publicly to recant.

As you will know, Mr. Speaker, neither members of the opposition nor anyone else in this House are in a position to dictate to Radio–Canada what to say. I would imagine that Mr. Normand Lester has a mind of his own, he can say what he likes, and if that is not satisfactory to either Mr. LaSalle or to someone else they can take it up with Mr. Lester or with Stevie Cameron or all the others who have made such statements. But for me to read what has been said on television last night can hardly be considered a slander or anything of the like, and I say to the minister across the way that just because he does not like something does not make it slanderous.

Mr. Speaker: I will consider the interventions that have been made and report back to the House.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. If I am not mistaken, the hon. minister who raised the point of order was in the House yesterday at the time that the words he complains of were spoken by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. He heard the words and he therefore was in the position to raise the point of order, if one existed, promptly after yesterday's Question Period.

I just point out he did not do so at the first opportunity. I simply add that point to what I think are the extremely valid words of the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, and I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that words like those used by the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell citing basically a press report have been used many times in this House by members on the government side when they were in opposition and in replying to questions and no complaint has been made. I think there is no validity, as a result, to what was said by the hon. minister in his point of order.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, at the time the accusation was made by way of statement, I had no way of knowing if it was true or not true. Of course, no names were given at that time. It was outside the House that the name Roch LaSalle was mentioned so I did not have the opportunity to verify. I then sought out independent verification. My office talked to Roch LaSalle and he is again deploring the fact that even though he has left this place, his family continues to be abused in this fashion. It is for that reason and that reason alone that I just say, would it not be nice if for once we could say, "We are sorry we dragged your name through this muddy situation, it should not have been dragged through".

I did not suggest the hon. member invented this fact. He says he got it from Radio-Canada, that is fine. However, is it not about time that perhaps just out of decency, out of respect for the man's family, we acknowledge a mistake was made and withdraw the remark. That is all I was asking for, Herb, that is all I wanted.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to comment that my hon. friend, the House Leader for the Official Opposition, just made the point that the minister was in the House yesterday and could have complained at that time but did not rise at the appropriate time. I appreciate the point my hon. friend has made. We are taking due note of that and will follow that precedent in the future.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is in a position to hope. The hon. member for York Centre.

JUSTICE—QUESTION PERIOD COMMENTS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising from Question Period. My leader and I asked questions about a certain letter sent by Peter White of the Prime Minister's Office to the Commissioner of the RCMP containing information on which charges were eventually laid. The Solicitor General did not answer the question and said, in his reasons for not answering it, that yesterday at the justice committee the commissioner had been asked and had answered all the questions about the letter.

I was at the justice committee meeting yesterday and I have a transcript of the meeting. My recollection is confirmed that there was no discussion at all about that letter at the justice committee meeting yesterday. I submit that the Solicitor General has misled the House and he should retract that answer that he gave.

Mr. Speaker: I will consider what the Solicitor General said and I will also look at the proceedings in committee and report back to the House.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments made by the government. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

BILL C-23

TABLING OF LEGISLATION COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-23, an Act to amend the National Energy Board Act and to repeal certain enactments in consequence thereof, with amendments.

VICTIMS OF CRIME COMPENSATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-278, an act respecting compensation for Canadian victims of crime travelling or posted abroad.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, this bill is designed to fill a gap in compensation for criminal injuries. All provinces and territories in Canada have legislation under which victims of criminal acts have an opportunity to apply for compensation from the province. Unfortunately, if a Canadian is travelling or working abroad and is injured there is no possibility of claiming compensation. The event must occur within the provincial or territorial jurisdiction.

This bill is designed to provide, at the federal level, that Canadians who are travelling or working abroad and are injured may apply to their provincial or territorial compensation tribunals and would assume that the federal government would pick up the compensation thus applied for.

I urge the House, at the appropriate time, to adopt the legislation.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

CHILD CARE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 wherein petitioners from western Canada point out that one-sixth of all Canadian children live in poverty and that the percentage of children living in poverty is growing in Canada. The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to support Private Member's Motion M-254 which calls upon the government to negotiate with the provinces of Canada to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have another petition. The petitioners, again from western Canada, point out their concerns regarding the government's decision to curtail passenger rail service and are asking the Parliament of Canada to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail services in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economic, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, a last petition, again on behalf of a number of petitioners, largely from Kamloops, British Columbia, who point out a whole variety of concerns they have regarding the government's initiative concerning the goods and services tax. The petitioners are opposed to the goods and services tax and request the government go back to the drawing board and draft a comprehensive tax reform package that is fair to Canadians.

POST OFFICE

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and the duty to table a petition submitted by a number of petitioners who wish to exercise their ancient right to express a common opinion and who seek to submit a grievance with respect to the rural post office.

LAW OF THE SEA

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 170 of the people in my riding who are calling upon Parliament to enjoin the Government of Canada, to request—indeed I think they should demand—that the Government of Canada extend its jurisdiction to the very edge of Canada's continental shelf as is consistent with international law and as every other coastal state in the world has done, so that Canada can protect and regulate the fish stocks vital to Atlantic fishermen. This is the subject, as you know, Madam Speaker, of a crisis in our most important industry at the present time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition signed by 510 people calling upon the House to request that the Government of Canada establish an unemployment insurance pay centre at Happy Valley, Goose Bay, to service all of Labrador. This would mean that those people who qualify for unemployment insurance, which is about 50 per cent of the people at the present time, can avail themselves of their legitimate rights.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 420 people in the riding requesting Parliament to demand that the Government of Canada reject the proposed goods and services tax which is going to have a negative effect all across the country but which will have enormous consequences for the north. If you consider that the goods and services tax will add 100 per cent disability to southern Canada, it will be 150 per cent to northern Canada.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition from residents in my riding calling upon the House to request that the Government of Canada revise the laws of Canada and the Canada Evidence Act to better serve victims with disabilities, allowing them to communicate their account of their victimization in court.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, I have been asked by several thousand people in the province of New Brunswick from the Grand Falls area, Plaster Rock, Quispamis, Moncton, Fredericton and Saint John, totalling 11,720 petitioners who have asked me to present a petition on their behalf indicating that they sincerely and strongly believe that faith in our future can only be guaranteed by our witness to respect for life from the unborn to the aged.

They believe that human life is a gift given by God and that life is unique and special, and they believe in the sanctity of that life from the moment of conception. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child.

It is quite evident from the size of this petition that there are a significant number of people in this country who are concerned. We must consider that the over 11,000 people who signed this petition represent a province that has a population of about 700,000 people. Indeed, at this critical moment in the history of this Parliament, they ask for deep consideration.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House eight petitions signed by residents of York West all opposed to the new tax, this GST being proposed by the Conservative government, not only because of its impact on small businesses, but also on average citizens. This proposal, the thirteeth new tax presented by the government since 1984, would cause a lot of hardship. We, the Liberals, ask the government to reject completely and totally this new GST.

[English]

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am very pleased to present 1,000 petitions that have been certified. I have more thousands of petitions that are not certified. I appreciate I can only recognize those petitioners but they are bowlers, psychologists, consumers and business people. Everybody in Sault Ste. Marie is against this tax. I present these petitions with the hope that the government have an eleventh hour change of heart and scrap the goods and services tax.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition from a number of residents of Rosthern, Saskatchewan. These petitioners are concerned that we should support Canada's original peoples in traditional use of their lands. Therefore, they ask this House to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Inuit of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada, to demand the end of all NATO–NORAD low level flight training and to refuse the establishment of NATO operations in Canada. They demand that we redirect Canada's NATO–NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and to promote sustainable development for all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have another petition from a number of residents of Ontario, from London, St. Mary's, Lambeth, Ottawa, Oakville and Hornepayne. These petitioners point out that VIA Rail provides Canadians with an affordable and environmentally friendly means of intercity transportation on which many Canadians depend. They, therefore, humbly pray and call upon Canada's Parliament to reject any proposed reduction or elimination of VIA Rail, to modernize existing equipment and to build a high-speed passenger train between Montreal and Windsor.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition to the House for the following reasons. It is clearly evident by the widespread interest shown that Canadians are growing increasingly impatient by the lethargic approach we are taking to the extradition of those accused of heinous crimes against humanity.

The current extradition laws in this country allow alleged or convicted criminals to escape justice for sometimes brutal crimes committed outside of Canada. An example is Charles Ng who is wanted in the United States for 13 savage murders in the State of California.

I have the honour to present today petitions supporting the extradition of these individuals seeking haven in Canada. The petitions I am tabling today have 1,381 signatures, although I have received over 2,000 signatures to date. Unfortunately, many did not meet the rigid format required by the House.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): I continue to be amazed, Madam Speaker, and somewhat overwhelmed by the ongoing number of petitions that we are getting, all in opposition to the 9 per cent GST. They come from all parts of Canada from people in all walks of life and from all segments of our society.

These particular ones come from my community in Brockville. Like some of the previous petitions presented they do not all meet the criteria, but the spirit is there with them.

Having said that, the names of petitioners on this sheet do meet the criteria in accordance with Standing Order 36.

It is a pleasure to present this petition, which has been attested to as to its propriety in form and content.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present petitions from Burnaby, B.C. and from Sarnia, Ontario. They contain a total of almost 900 names. These petitioners are asking this government to reconsider its position on the goods and services tax. These petitions have been certified by the table officers of the House of Commons.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Anawak: I have the honour, Madam Speaker, to present pursuant to Standing Order 36 a petition signed by people from my birth town of Repulse Bay. They object to the proposed goods and services tax. As well, I have a petition which is signed by residents of the community of Pelly Bay in my riding of Nunatsiaq where exists the highest cost-of-living in all of Canada because they can only get their produce and other goods by airplane, and certainly not by trucks or other forms of transportation.

These petitioners from Pelly Bay object to the proposed goods and services tax because if it goes through the cost of living that they are enduring now is going to get even higher and they will not be able to afford it.

QUEBEC BILL 178

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria—Haliburton): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege and duty on behalf of a number of petitioners from Cavan, Mill Brook and Frazerville to present a petition which calls upon Parliament to exercise its constitutional powers of disallowance with respect to Bill 178 of the province of Quebec.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX AND VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, when the hon. member from Victoria—Haliburton rose I was waiting for him with open ears to hear that his petition did not deal with that particular subject but instead with an approval perhaps of the goods and services tax, or an approval of the cuts to VIA Rail. No, his constituents would not do that sort of thing.

I have in my hand petitions from the Northumberland and Belleville areas containing hundreds of names, dealing first of all with the need to protect our rail transportation system in Canada and condemning this government's action in cutting VIA Rail.

I have hundreds of signatures on these other petitions dealing with the goods and services tax.

I look forward to the day when members from the opposite side of this House will rise and present the same type of petitions dealing with their constituents who want VIA Rail cut, and who want that 9 per cent goods and services tax imposed.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and pleasure to present to this House 13 petitions signed by 3,211 people from Saint-Léonard and the greater Montreal area. These Canadian citizens ask Parliament to reject any new tax on goods and services. This new tax would lead to inflation, higher interest rates and lost jobs. It is a nightmare for small businesses to have to deal with this tax.

So I have 3,211 signatures and many more still to come, Madam Speaker. I hope that the government will go back on its decision.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to present a petition on behalf of the Canadian Vietnamese community who are calling upon Parliament to request the Government of Canada to consider the following actions. First, putting pressure on the Hanoi government to end its abuse of human rights in Vietnam. Second, negotiating with the countries of first asylum to maintain the existing refugee camps in southeast Asia and not to send the refugees back to Vietnam against their will. Third, requesting the governments of Thailand and Hong Kong to open up their closed refugee camps to give the refugees kept there access to settlement services.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of Ontario citizens concerned about the rights of the unborn. These petitions contain the names of 1,352 individuals who join with the many other petitioners whose petitions I have presented during the past week, calling for Parliament to pass legislation that will protect the life of the unborn from conception instead of the proposed law that would legalize the killing of innocent human beings.

I have no hesitation, Madam Speaker, in highly endorsing these petitions whose origins are from many communities in Ontario, namely, Chatham, Dryden, Wallaceburg, North Bay, New Liskeard, Sault Ste. Marie, Woodstock, St. Catharines and Nipigon.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I too have the honour pursuant to Standing Order 36 to table a petition on behalf of the constituents of Parkdale—High Park who are objecting to this government's 9 per cent tax on goods and services. The reasons they give for their opposition is that this government has already increased taxes 31 times. It has increased the manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. They also argue that this tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians. As a result of those arguments, the petitioners are calling upon this House to force this government to cancel the goods and services tax.

• (1540)

RCMP DRESS CODE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Madam Speaker, I am honoured today to present several petitions to the House pursuant to Standing Order 36. There are 9,631 signatures here, over 5,000 from Saskatchewan, over 4,000 from Alberta, and most of the rest from British Columbia. These Canadians believe that the RCMP dress uniform is a symbol of Canadian tradition and culture and are asking Parliament that it remain unchanged.

OLD AGE SECURITY AND FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): The second petition I am presenting pursuant to Standing Order 36 is from about 50 senior citizens in my riding. These seniors are adamantly opposed to the budget proposals to tax back Old Age Security and family allowance payments.

Of course, I am always pleased to present petitions to the House on behalf of the residents of Beaver River.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to present to the House of Commons today a petition signed by a number of people from Scarborough, Agincourt and Toronto. They are calling upon the Government of Canada to work with the province of Ontario on a very important issue.

This issue is to save the Rouge Valley. It is 5,000 acres in the northeast part of Metro Toronto. The wildlife and wilderness aspects of this valley are of national significance. The interim report of the royal commission on the future of the Toronto waterfront recommended that the Rouge Valley be protected as a natural heritage area.

I would just like to mention in relation to this petition that the Legislature at Queen's Park this week approved unanimously the Progressive Conservative motion to have the Rouge Valley as a park. We now need action, as the petitioners are asking, to have the Government of Ontario establish the Rouge River Valley as Canadian heritage land or a provincial park.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition signed by people from my province. They strongly oppose the proposed goods and services tax. They feel it will cause serious and undue hardship to low and middle-income Canadians. Also, they say not only will it mean higher taxes but higher interest rates, higher inflation and higher unemployment. Therefore they call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present to the House today pursuant to Standing Order 36. They have been certified as correct as to form and content. The first one contains many hundreds of signatures and is in regard to the goods and services tax. The petitioners point out that the government is now trying to tax reading, hair-cuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels.

They are asking the government to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and where there is a broad public consensus on the sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax and that this reform not be an opportunity to impose a massive tax grab.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, the second petition is also from my constituents and contains roughly about 75 signatures. It is concerning the VIA Rail transportation system.

The petitioners point out that this government, like its Liberal predecessor, has refused to provide VIA with the necessary support to fully realize its potential to develop the kind of national passenger rail network that Canadians want and deserve. Coming from a region where there is going to be an elimination of a whole line, they ask that this government please abandon the plans to cut VIA Rail service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, like Canadians in Malpeque and across the country, the residents of Kingston and The islands object to the continual string of tax increases imposed by this government. After 31 such increases they decided to take matters into their hands and sign a petition.

A bunch of them have done so, and as their Member of Parliament I am honoured to present this petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 in which these residents of my riding call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax as number 32 in a string of unpopular, unnecessary, unfair and unwanted tax increases.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52 I ask leave to propose a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration of the House, namely, the unsatisfactory response by the government to the pressing and specific needs of Canadian farmers in financial, trade, marketing and other areas which is creating a dangerous level of frustration as seen in yesterday's mass demonstration in which thousands and thousands of farmers from throughout Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick massed on the lawns of Parliament.

We believe that an urgent debate is required in order to expose and to ventilate these frustrations which all Canadian farmers feel today.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair is quite aware of the problems raised yesterday by Canadian farmers. However, I do not believe that the situation calls for an emergency debate at this time.

[English]

If we are to look at the requirements stated in Standing Order 52, I do not think for the time being that this would require a debate at this time.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to speak on this bill, although it is a very difficult matter. It is the act respecting abortion, Bill C–43.

I believe the bill is unfortunately mistaken. It is no doubt well meant, but I believe if it were enacted it would do more harm than good. Therefore, I must oppose it.

In brief, the bill tries to outlaw abortion by using the Criminal Code and the threat of prison, but then it goes on to try to excuse abortion in most of those cases.

What is the effect? The effect will be confusion. It will be to make a number of women and doctors fearful, perhaps with cause, that is, that they might be imprisoned, perhaps without cause. The results in the courts will be uncertain. It will worsen conditions for normal childbirth; and it will not reduce the number of abortions.

It is the wrong way to go. It is impractical. There is no need to recriminalize abortion.

The problem of which abortions are very often the expression is a problem of family life. We should rather be looking at the causes of family trouble.

In fact, it is my understanding that abortion from a moral standpoint may be murder of a person, as some people are pointing out in this debate, but that from a legal standpoint the comparison with murder is mistaken. The reason is that the foetus is inside another person. Even if the foetus be regarded as a person still the fact is unchanged that it is inside another person. We cannot separate them to protect one or both separately.

• (1550)

I want to remind the House of part of the opinion given by Chief Justice Brian Dickson of the Supreme Court of Canada who said:

> Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person.

In the same court Madam Justice Bertha Wilson said:

> Liberty in a free and democratic society does not require the state to approve the personal decisions made by its citizens; it does, however, require the state to respect them.

I believe along with her that this is a personal decision in which there is indeed a moral obligation. There may be several moral obligations. They may even seem to be in conflict with each other. The state does not have a duty to agree with this decision or that decision in that case but it does have a duty to respect the decision.

She goes on to state:

> It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision; it is a profound social and ethical one as well. Her response to it will be the response of the whole person.

In other words, it is not a private, individual or isolated act. It is the act of a person who is a member of society and who normally recognizes that membership. It seems to me that there is a tendency among some of the remarks I have heard in this debate to regard women in a traditional way as somehow weaker. Not only weaker in body, but weaker in moral fibre. I do not know any good reason for holding that view. We do not assume that about men in that case, although there could be an argument for saying that generally women exercise more responsibility about childbirth than men do. In a country where most of the police are men, most of the lawyers are men, most of the judges are men, most of the legislators are men, it is a little disturbing to hear again and again the suggestion that a woman is not fit to make this moral decision.

The fact is that there are countries that have taken the line that some people here would like them to take, countries such as Brazil, Ireland, Italy and Romania. They all have very severe laws against abortion. They all have a much higher rate of abortion than Canada does.

It seems foolish to repeat their experience by insisting on an extreme law, an extreme threat of punishment in the matter of abortion. In Brazil, there are 4 million abortions annually where there are 3 million live births. That is a dreadful situation, but it is not stopped by criminal threats. In Romania, I read in The Toronto Star, the birthrate there has dropped from 24 births per thousand women in the late 1940s to 14 per thousand in our time. This is in spite of a very severe prohibition and threat of punishment for abortion. In fact abortion deaths there have soared from about 25 per million women in the year before the present government to about 100 per million—four times the amount in the 1980s.

There seems no good reason among those who have spoken for recriminalizing abortion. In fact, it is not even clear that there is any reason to change the status since the Morgentaler decision.

Planned Parenthood has pointed out that abortions have not increased since the Supreme Court of Canada ruling in January, 1988. That is in its report from which I have just quoted.

The Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists of Canada does not feel that the situation is out of hand because we lack specific criminal prohibition of abortion. The society points this out in its official statement entitled, the "SOGC Abortion Position",

> To circumvent the need for abortion should always be the ultimate goal. To this end, there is great value and urgency for provincial Ministers of Health, Education and Social and Community Services to integrate programs devoted to sex education with family planning clinics and abortion services. Only in this way can the adolescent population that contributes so heavily to the abortion statistics be reached effectively.

They also point out that the decision to perform an abortion should be considered a medical one and as such the issue of therapeutic abortions should be removed from Canadian criminal law.

This is the opinion of the specialists in this subject. They go on to state:

> Nevertheless, abortion services should be uniformly available to women across Canada.

Of course this law does absolutely nothing to bring that about.

The Canadian Medical Association has also issued its statement in the matter in which, in part, it states:

> The decision to perform an induced abortion is a medical one made confidentially—

That is an important point, Madam Speaker.

> —between the patient and her physician within the confines of existing Canadian law. The decision is made after conscientious examination of all other options.

The proposed bill is rather insulting to all these medical doctors by suggesting that they are not now exercising their professional responsibility in the matter.

> Induced abortion requires medical and surgical expertise and is a medical act. It should be performed only in a facility that meets approved medical standards, not necessarily a hospital.

The argument some people have used is that there are a growing number of abortions. Certainly I, for one, am not happy with the number of abortions, or even with any abortions. My wife and I, as we have had opportunity, have occasionally been able to encourage and help a person to choose a course of action other than abortion, but it was her choice.

The statistics are interesting. In 1970 there were 11,200 abortions in Canada. In 1982, there were 66,319, a large increase. But in 1987, there were 63,662, almost 3,000 less abortions five years later. There has not been an explosion of abortions.

If you look at how many abortions are performed per thousand women, again the number rose 2.5 per thousand women in 1970. In 1982 it was 11.1 per thousand women; and then it dropped in 1987 to 10.2 per thousand women.

It is interesting if you look at the ratio of abortions per hundred to live births to see how many abortions there were. It went from three in 1970 to 17.8 in 1982, again a large increase. It then dropped a small amount to 17.2 in 1987. Abortions peaked in 1982 and have been declining since then. That is true of the number of abortions per woman and the number of abortions per live births, although they declined less.

I think the explanation is in the live birth rate, not in the abortion rate. In 1970 there were 371,988 live births. In 1982, 12 years later with a larger population, there were 372,882, only 900 more, a very tiny increase of live births. In 1987, there were 372,080; in other words, a drop of 800 live births between 1982 and 1987, a time when there was a drop of 3,000 in the number of abortions.

The problem is not with abortions. When the population has gone up by 20 per cent, obviously the number of women has increased. The proportion of abortions to women has gone down slightly. The proportion of abortions to live births has gone down slightly more. The problem is not with abortions but with the country's fertility rate; that is to say from the point of view of those who worry about the number of live births. I do not worry about it personally. Alice and I have seven children and 13 grandchildren and we are hoping for more grandchildren.

Those who talk about the rate of abortions imply that somehow or other it is a cause in itself of all these troubles. That is simply not true. It is much more a result of the breakdown of family life: the rate of divorce, the rate of separation and the large number of single parents, mostly women. These are very much concerns of the last 20 and 30 years. To pin them all down to abortion would be to stand the matter on its head. Other speakers have pointed out, including the last speaker last night, Mrs. Bertrand, that we should be looking at the sources of family trouble. I find those sources largely in a market-driven economy. Children are treated as unproductive or at least unprofitable. In other words, we seem to be sliding back to the days when governments in England in the last century had to legislate that it was not allowable to cause children under 10 years of age to work in the mines. The issue of child labour, or the proposal of child labour, has only been advocated by a few groups like the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. It is not a serious threat yet.

What is a serious threat is the refusal of those who build our cities and housing to provide room physically for children. In Toronto, between 1951 and 1971 there was a net loss of about 20,000 units that had two bedrooms. There are other characteristics of family units but that is a basic one. Just recently, between 1976 and 1985, in the new building with demolition subtracted—in other words, the net increase of residential units—the units that were suitable for families in 1976 were 32.4 per cent of the whole. They declined from there so that the average now is that family units are only 17.5 per cent of the total units of housing being built in the city of Toronto.

Of course, the builders argued that it was the market which wants that. In fact, I have many people coming to me now, as they came when I was an alderman in the centre of the city, complaining about not being able to find a place for children. In the 1970s it was landlords who explicitly and openly forbade children in their apartments which is now, fortunately, illegal.

In the city of Toronto in 1971, there were 28.6 children for every 100 adults and in 1986 there were only 20.5. In other words, there has been a drop from 28.6 to 20.5 in 15 years in the percentage of children to adults.

In Toronto, children are hungry. According to the Daily Bread Food Bank survey, an estimated 72,000 children 17 years of age and under in metro have found it necessary to use a food program on an average of three times in the past year. Of families using food assistance, I quote: "Sixty-five per cent are single-parent families; 15 per cent of all metro families are single-parent families, but 65 per cent use the food banks". Again I quote: "Children nine years of age or younger are 11.3 per cent of the population of metro but 28.3 per cent of the food bank population". In other words, children of nine years of age have an almost three times greater chance of being forced to go to the food banks.

Those figures from the Daily Bread Food Bank relate to the people who have come to my office because they cannot find a place to live where they can pay rent and still have money for food for themselves and their children. This is a very serious problem in family life in our cities. No wonder there are strains, wife beatings, child beatings, break-up of families when it is impossible to find a place to live without moving right out of the city, when it is impossible to find a place to work since Toronto has a high level of unemployment, even if you do not count the 10,000 or 20,000 people who are homeless because nobody can survey them to find out whether they were looking for work last week.

It goes further than that. There are many ways in which the economy of this country, which finds children unprofitable and therefore considers them really unproductive, simply prices children not only out of the city but out of a decent chance to live. It is very often the mothers of those children who decide that they will make a dreadful decision to avoid having more children that they cannot feed.

My points are that the bill is mistaken. It will not work. My point is that it is ethically wrong to confuse a moral decision and a moral responsibility with a legal responsibility. My point is there is no occasion for recriminalizing abortion because the medical profession has it properly in hand. There is no crisis of increased abortion. There is a crisis of family life. Therefore, this bill should be scrapped and the government should get to work with some of its promises to provide for day care and the other things that a family needs.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I enjoyed the debate of the hon. member from Spadina. I would like at the outset to indicate that contrary to his suggestion that because abortion is a moral issue, therefore there ought to be no law on it, I would like to remind the hon. member that in the history of legal construction, the foundation of a good law in fact is morality.

My questions for the hon. member are: first, would he agree that where there are no genuine reasons to do an abortion he would respect the decision of the physician, rather than just asking whether there be no medical reasons not to have an abortion, as his leader said yesterday? There is a great deal of difference between the two positions.

It is the tradition of medical practice, as a medical doctor by background, that before a physician does a medical procedure or prescribes therapy, there ought to exist a rationale for treatment. It is not enough only to say that there does not exist a contraindication for such a treatment. That is only one of the factors when a physician prescribes a therapy.

My second question for the hon. member is: would he agree that when a medical doctor says that there exists no indication for abortion he would respect not only the decision of that medical doctor but also to require that the decision ought to be based only on the basis that there is a threat to the life of the pregnant mother.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's first point, I would say that while law should be based on moral considerations, not by any means every moral consideration ought to be made the subject of a law. There are many moral considerations which must be left to individuals singly or in groups to work out among themselves. This is one of them.

Second, the position that I have taken, and for that matter my leader has taken, and that the Medical Association and the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists has taken is not the position that the hon. member has suggested. They are not saying they will do an abortion only when they find medical grounds. What they have said is abortion should not be regulated in the Criminal Code. They would want to make sure that the abortion was done under appropriate conditions. They have not defined the conditions in the statements that I have referred to because we have recognized in our law, including the criminal law, that the doctor has the responsibility for judging those conditions. That is not to say that they will judge them only on medical grounds.

Poverty may not be a medical matter but it has medical consequences. For example, it has been found in Montreal that children born of mothers who have been malnourished are almost certainly doomed to an unhealthy life. That is the kind of thing that a doctor may recognize even though it is not necessarily the subject of a medical decision.

The point I am making is the reasons for abortion. The reasons why in fact women have chosen abortion and will continue to choose abortion regardless of what the hon. member may wish, regardless of what I may wish, are social and economic. They have to do with the fact that a great many mothers now must work; with the fact that a great many fathers now do not want to support their children or do it badly. Those are the sorts of facts that move many women to seek an abortion. They are not a matter for a medical judgment but they are a matter for medical care by a qualified practitioner. That is the point that the Medical Association has made.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, just briefly, I would like to make some comments on the whole subject of criminalization in relation to abortion because I have heard the pleas of the member for Trinity—Spadina and his complaint that he does not want to see abortion criminalized. That notion is unwarranted, given the state of law in Canada.

The Parliament of Canada has only one basis for legislating with respect to abortion and that is the criminal law power. There is no other way the Parliament of Canada can legislate with respect to abortion unless it exercises its power to enact criminal law. It is only in that academic sense that Parliament is criminalizing abortion.

The whole fact of the matter is that if there is to be a prohibition, there must be a sanction, there must be a penalty and that can be called criminal law. Whether the province enacts legislation dealing with abortion, as has happened in my province of Nova Scotia restricting the place at which abortions can be performed, or whether the Parliament of Canada enacts a prohibition, it must be enforced by a penalty and that is what we call criminal law.

The question is not really criminalizing abortion, the question is: are we going to legislate with respect to abortion? I hope the member will understand that because his or her choice, as a member of Parliament, is to vote against the law, whether they characterize it as criminal or some other kind of a law.

The real question is, and I do not want to see the member avoid it: should Parliament legislate with respect to abortion? That is the issue. Do not be confused by terms like criminalize and so on. Make your decision on that question: should Parliament legislate with respect to abortion? I think that Parliament should legislate with respect to abortion. If the member does not agree with that, he simply votes against it. Do not bring in questions like criminalize or non-criminalize to confuse the issue.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I think Parliament should indeed legislate with respect to abortion. I do not share the hon. member's one-eyed vision where he thinks the only thing Parliament can do is to prohibit. Of course, if the member wants to prohibit abortion or if the member wants to prohibit wearing eye glasses or having white hair or anything like that, the only way he can do it is by getting Parliament to put it into the Criminal Code.

I do not want to prohibit abortion. I would like to bring abortions to an end or to a much smaller number. I have spoken before and today on how that should be done. Prohibition is what I said did not work in Ireland, Italy, Brazil, Romania and probably failed to work in many other countries. It is a stupid thing to try here.

There is legislation that Parliament ought to consider for abortion. It ought to amend the National Health Act to ensure that the basic principle of the National Health Act is upheld across this country and that abortion services are equally available to women in all parts of Canada. That would be parliamentary legislation which would improve the health of all concerned. It would be a step to accompany, for example, legislation, to provide day care services for the children of working mothers which would do more than anything else I can think of to reduce the number of abortions.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C–43, legislation that we have introduced to deal with abortion.

Some of my colleagues will know that I have spoken in this House on three previous occasions on the issue of abortion: twice with respect to private members' bills and once last year when we had the debate to determine if there might be a sense of the House about how we might proceed with the issue.

I think my personal views which I have expressed on this issue are well known to members of the House.I believe that women should have the broadest possible range of freedom to make decisions about themselves, their bodies and their futures. Like many of my colleagues, particularly some of my female colleagues who have spoken on this legislation in the past week, I have come to this debate with some concerns, a lot of thought and some heartache but finally in my own mind with a recognition that what we have brought forward is fair and does meet basic criteria which I believe are important for women and is also workable.

I also understand how so many other of my colleagues, who have come to view this issue from a different kind of perspective, have worked hard and how caucus members have worked together to see if there is a way that we can jointly come forward with what the role of the state and the government should be in providing a regime with respect to abortion. Upon reflection, I will be supporting the bill because I think it is fair; I think it is workable.

I would like the opportunity today to go back and look at how I feel and where I have come from on this debate, talk a bit about the legislation and talk a bit in more general terms about the issue of abortion itself. Certainly, in terms of my own thinking this goes back many, many years recognizing that as a woman in modern–day society we have had to fight pretty long and hard to gain legal equality, to gain economic and social equality in many areas.

I suppose that many of us come from the strong feeling that we do not want to see anything or any law which would in any way restrict that freedom that we fought so hard for. If we look at this issue purely from a feminist point of view, we have difficulty accepting any kinds of restrictions in law that might restrict our ability to make a choice as to whether or not we would want to have an abortion or proceed with a pregnancy.

I also think we have to recognize that no rights are absolute in society and that there always has to be a balance. No one of us can do anything that we want at any time, particularly if it is going to interfere with somebody else. The role of the state is to regulate between often conflicting rights, sometimes the rights of the individual versus the rights of a group or between individuals. That is one of our responsibilities as legislators, to try to achieve that balance while minimizing the interference of the state in the lives of Canadian men and women.

When we think of what we are dealing with here, are there reasons why the state should play a role? Why should I, as a woman, accept that someone else can interfere with my decision? I think there are reasons. When we are dealing with the issue of abortion, we are dealing with something that is different, that does reflect on some very important values that we hold as a society. I guess it does come back to the issue of life or the potential of life. I am not the expert. I am not the one who can say when life begins, and I am not even pretending to be able to do that. However, there is within this issue a recognition of that concern and that value.

As a Canadian society we treasure life. It is fundamental to everything we do in this Parliament, everything we try to do as governments to protect life and to prevent people from interfering with other persons' lives. We pass laws that deal with murder, with assault and with interfering with property rights. We also try in every way possible to enhance the quality of people's lives through the economic and social policies that we put forward because we believe that that is fundamentally our responsibility.

Sometimes when we compare our society with other societies around the world we can see some differences. Whether those differences are rooted in philosophical or religious beliefs, I do not think it matters. But, I think it does matter that in Canadian society we do treasure life. If someone is killed in an automobile accident, that is considered a tragedy and we use the force of the law to sanction those who might have caused that. In some other parts of the world that is not necessarily the case. I think that is a value we have to hold very dear.

When we come back to looking at the question of abortion, I think we do have to consider that balance. This is perhaps an area in which the state does have a legitimate role, a role which the Supreme Court of Canada in dealing with the Morgentaler case recognized that there needed to be a balance between the security of the woman and the potential interest of the state in the foetus. I can accept that balance and therefore I can accept at this time in an imperfect society that we have a right and indeed a responsibility to provide a regime, a set of rules, which tell Canadians on what grounds there is a legal entitlement to abortion and provides a national standard.

I have also had the feeling from many women and men that I have talked to across the country who support the right of women to choose and believe that abortion should be a matter of discussion between a woman and a physician that they want to feel that there are some bounds, that there is some sense as a society that we have a regime in which abortion is regulated. I have come after some considerable thought to accept at this point that we can have a law and if we have a law, what criteria in my mind would be most appropriate?

In coming back to my fundamental belief in the rights of women, I would say first of all it should be a law which minimizes the interference with the right of women to make choices about themselves, about their bodies and about their future. It should be the least intrusive, it should be workable and not create impediments in terms of delays as we had under the former law which created impediments that were inappropriate. It should also in my mind not restrict where, when or how abortions can be performed.

Abortion, I think everyone would agree, requires medical intervention. We do not want women going back to the past when they tried to induce their own abortions. That is not the right thing. It is not condoned in our society. It is not right for women or for their health. We recognize that it requires the intervention of a qualified medical practitioner and in this legislation we have provided for that, which is determined on the basis of provincial legislation which licenses persons as qualified medical practitioners. Therefore, if it does require a medical procedure, does require the intervention of a medical practitioner, I think it would be irresponsible not to recognize, as my colleague across the floor has indicated, a medical practitioner has to play some role. They have to make a professional judgment about the implications of this medical procedure for the woman and that there has been some considered thought in this decision.

In the legislation we have provided for the criteria to be that if the pregnancy would likely hinder the woman's health, with health being defined in a broad context including physical, mental and psychological, it then provides a joint responsibility. A woman herself has to consider, as I believe she should, why she might wish to proceed with an abortion. Also she would have the professional advice of a medical practitioner who might be able to advise her, first of all, given her particular circumstances what the medical implications might be for her health if she proceeded or not. Obviously there are implications both ways when you are dealing with an issue of this nature.

When we look in terms of society at who can share in making this kind of decision, I think it is appropriate that it is a medical practitioner. That does not, in my mind, take away in an unacceptable manner the right of women to make choices but it is a choice in consultation with a medical practitioner.

• (1630)

The legislation does not restrict where abortions may take place. That would be up to provincial governments. On the other hand, as my colleague from Vancouver Centre pointed out last night—and I agree with her because it does confirm abortion as a medical procedure—it gives greater weight to the understanding that as a medical procedure it should be covered by provincial health care plans. If there were not that kind of consideration it might be easier for provinces to say: "It is not a medical procedure. It does not relate to health. Therefore we do not have a responsibility under our health care plan to provide for it". I think it does help in that respect as well.

There were other approaches that we had discussed. In fact, when we had the debate last year, I put forward an amendment to the motion that was being considered which would have introduced a gestational approach and different degrees of intervention and/or sanctions depending upon the stage of pregnancy.

After having thought about this and talked it over with people of a wide variety of opinions and opposing opinions, I am comfortable with the concept that we should not proceed on that basis. I know some of my colleagues would say that that in itself would imply differential values at different stages of pregnancy. I can find that that is distasteful. It is not necessarily sound philosophically or from any particular point of view.

Also the gestational approach implied incorrectly that women would wait until later stages of pregnancy. We all know that that is not correct. Over 99 per cent of abortions are carried out during the earlier stages and, if a woman is going to make the choice, except under the most unusual circumstances that choice will be made as early as possible. With the legislative base we are proposing, I believe that we will ensure and enhance that abortions can be carried out as quickly as possible because the procedures involved are not complicated. It requires the woman to seek the opinion of her doctor and then be able to proceed.

The other issue which many colleagues have talked about in this House and which friends of mine have discussed is why the Criminal Code, I guess because the Criminal Code connotes in our minds something that is wrong. I do not think that is a fair reflection.

The member for Halifax West who just spoke a few moments ago had a more appropriate perception of why it is necessary to use the Criminal Code. If we are to provide a regulatory regime, a national standard with respect to legal entitlement for abortion, there has to be a mechanism. There has to be a power of government to proceed, and that really is the only one that we have at the federal level.

It does not imply in any way that abortions are wrong. All it is saying is that these are the conditions under which women are legally entitled to have an abortion and that under some situations, either if it is not carried out by a medical practitioner or the criteria are not met, it would be considered inappropriate and the sanction of the law would come forward.

It is wrong to say that this legislation criminalizes abortion or criminalizes women who seek abortions. That is not the intent; that is not the purpose of the law. The purpose of the law is to provide an appropriate, fair regime under which abortions in Canada can proceed.

I would like to take a few minutes to talk about the issue of abortion. No one likes it. No one wishes it upon women. In fact, our deepest desire from all parts of the House would be to try to find ways to minimize the reasons for abortion, the reasons why women seek it as an option. We can never hope to minimize that to zero. I certainly have friends who, despite their best efforts with respect to birth control which has failed, find themselves in a situation where either for health reasons or because they do not want to they are unable to proceed with the pregnancy.

There is a lot we can do. As you look at the figures you recognize it is still young women who are seeking abortions. I read in the paper the other day that in Ontario in 1987, 47 per cent of young women between the ages of 15 and 19 sought abortions. In the Ottawa region itself it was higher. It was 62 per cent of young women between the ages of 15 and 19. That is a very sad reflection. There is something wrong there.

About 15 years ago I was living in Sudbury. I wrote and produced a documentary for the local television station on abortion. I called it To Have or Have Not. Those were early days and I believe in Sudbury it was not possible to obtain a legal abortion because of restrictions in the hospital. It was considered quite something to actually have a television show that talked about these issues.

During the course of researching and producing that documentary I met with people from all different sectors—women who had sought abortions and members of the local women's centre which was the only referral agency to assist women in obtaining abortions. They had to go either to other parts of Ontario or to the United States at that point in time.

I talked to women who had decided not to proceed with abortions but to put the baby up for adoption, and I also talked to representatives of agencies involved in that area. I talked to young women who had proceeded with the pregnancy, kept the child and as young unmarried mothers were still trying to cope with completing their schooling or finding a way to survive the problems and how they felt about it. It was a very moving experience to go through that process.

What saddened and angered me was that it seemed that all those women were in losing situations. None of those were really the answer. The answer lay in more effective education and action with respect to the prevention of unwanted pregnancies among that age group, and in a willingness to be more open, to talk about women's reproductive capabilities and what is involved in sexual relations between young people, and to try to encourage both young men and women to accept a greater degree of personal responsibility for their behaviour and to truly seek more viable options for women. Certainly at that time—and I do not think it has improved significantly since—the option of the young woman trying to keep a child creates barriers for her which are almost insurmountable in our society.

I was pleased when the Minister of National Health and Welfare spoke on this issue several days ago and announced a number of new initiatives dealing with all those areas—assisting young people in their own reproduction and in education and improving access to adoption. All those are important. It is not something that we at the federal level can do ourselves. It is something that has to be done in concert with other levels of government, in the community, and with families. There must be a willingness to be more open.

I know the experience that I have had. I am sure other members have had it. I also consider it to be a sad commentary. A co-worker of mine some years ago, a good friend, was totally opposed to abortion. We had many discussions about this. He was absolutely adamant in his views.

I remember some time later that he found out that his 18-year old daughter had gone to the United States one weekend and had an abortion. She felt that she could not go to her father, knowing his views, that it would not be accepted and that she had to go off on her own to do this. He was stricken. I was saddened.

Despite one's personal views about these kinds of issues, surely we have to encourage a more open dialogue among men and women and between parents and children so that we can deal with these issues more effectively and help our young people in ways in which I think they want to be helped. They want that kind of understanding. They need that knowledge, and they need that acceptance.

• (1640)

My plea to my colleagues in the House of Commons today is: yes, support the bill. We need to get on with this and get it behind us. Also, let us work together to ensure that Canadian women truly have options and that we indeed have a greater esteem and respect for Canadian children.

Mr. Flis: I enjoyed listening to the hon. member. She has given the topic a great deal of thought, time and research, as has almost every speaker who has risen in this House. It takes a topic like this to bring out the true parliamentarian in all of us. I congratulate the speaker for her words.

I was pleased she highlighted that as a Canadian society we treasure life, we protect life. She is right on there. I think that is what makes the Canadian society a little unique, maybe more unique than many other countries. It gives us that identity because we do have this respect for life, this respect for others.

This is why I am having difficulty in trying to analyse why she would support the bill. The hon. member from Trinity—Spadina gave us statistics that for 1987, 63,662 abortions were performed. He was impressed that this was 3,000 less than the year before, but it is still snuffing out the lives of over 63,000 children. This bill will not reduce that. If this bill goes through we will continue to have more than 60,000 to 70,000 lives snuffed out, which goes against Canadian society that treasures life. The minister also said that when someone gets killed in an auto accident we have laws so that one person cannot take the life of another person.

I am one of those who believes that life does begin at conception. I am wondering if the hon. member could clarify how she came to that conclusion, knowing that this bill will snuff out over 60,000 lives a year, and how she can still support the bill.

Just for interest, she also mentioned the right of women to make choices. I called one of the pages and asked for the Oxford Dictionary. I looked up the definition of choices and it said: "variety to choose from". I think that is the beauty of our society too that men and women who are of an age where they want to have sexual encounters have this variety to choose from. If they make the right choice, there will not be life and there will not be a need for abortion.

With her experience in the television program where she was doing the interviewing, I am wondering if she could share with this House how we can teach our young people—and she specifically mentioned the ages 15 to 19—to make the right choices but to make the choices before the pregnancy, before conception, again not requiring so many abortions.

Mrs. Collins: The member has put a number of questions. I am not sure I will have an opportunity to address them all in the question and comment period today.

It comes back to the balance that I see. Yes, we treasure life, but we also treasure the rights of women to make decisions about that. In my mind the woman should be able to make that choice. I hope she makes an informed choice if she is in the situation of having to make it and understands the implication of that choice. She should have the opportunity, as broad an opportunity as possible within the regime that we are putting forward, to make those choices. That just comes from my own view of the world and the way it should be. I would not place the responsibility or the onus on this law or this bill for causing or not causing abortions in itself. There are a variety of reasons that women seek abortions. In my mind at least it is not fair to say that this bill will result in increased abortions. I hope indeed that if we progress as a society we will see fewer abortions.

What do I say to young people? I have three teenagers myself. My daughter and I talk about this quite a lot, actually. She has some very strong views and is quite abhorred by some of the laws she is familiar with in the States where in some cases a young woman would have no access to abortion or a court, a judge has to make that decision. She thinks that is totally wrong and that it should be a decision between a woman and her doctor.

I have tried to instil a sense of responsibility and that there are consequences to actions. You cannot tell young people not to engage in sexual activity. They are going to have to make up their own minds about that. It has changed from my day and young people perhaps act quite differently now, but I think they have to be prepared for the consequences and therefore take measures, preventive measures. The onus should not only be on the woman. That is one of the things that has always annoyed me in the past, that society has said it is the woman who should take the preventive measures. I think men, young men particularly in this case, have to accept that responsibility as well.

As I said before in my comments this takes education. It takes openness and willingness to talk about it. It is not the approach where you pretend it does not happen. It does happen. It is there. The facts tell us that young people engage in sexual activity. We may have our own views about that, but all we can do is help them through that process and try to assist them in understanding what their responsibilities to themselves and to their own future are as well.

A young girl of 14 or 15 just does not usually have the capacity to look after a young child. Therefore, it is not fair that she should engage in activity that could result in a child being born, without taking appropriate measures. There should be a lot more willingness to be open on these issues.

Ms. Hunter: It should be clear to the minister how disappointed I personally am, and I imagine many of her constituents are, with this Byzantine rationalization to support this bill.

There are a number of points I want to make. I listened with care to her remarks, and I think those remarks were based on the assumption that the great Canadian compromise will bring some resolution to this very painful debate that we are now engaged in. I would like to ask her to respond to that because I think she and I both know that this is not going to be resolved. This is going to be an ongoing, continuing debate as our society develops.

The other comment I would like to make is that she said: "some bounds are necessary". I would like her to answer whether or not she does not believe that women really are capable of imposing their own bounds on that kind of decision. I think that does speak to the kind of respect the minister has for women and their capacity for making painful decisions.

I also would like her to try to get me to understand why she characterizes this bill as fair and workable and why there should be a national standard, because it does not improve any ability for access in this bill.

Finally, I would like her to clarify also her allusion to the Supreme Court decision regarding the foetus in light of the Daigle decision last week which I think made quite clear that the foetus really has no rights unless the child is born alive.

• (1650)

Mrs. Collins: Madam Speaker, my understanding of the decision last week by the Supreme Court is that it referred specifically to the Quebec charter, that they have not yet dealt with the other cases before them, so I do not know what their ruling will be.

With respect to access, this bill does not in itself provide or ensure access. We know the difficulties in certain parts of the country. I also recognize that that is a provincial responsibility. Our responsibility at the federal level is providing the legal framework, and a legal framework which I believe will be more conducive because it will be a national standard. Ultimately, if a province is not providing the service and it is taken to court, it would provide greater justification to be able to be successful in such a case.

I believe compromise is essential in a democracy. I know we all have very strong views about different issues and that this is the place we express and debate those views. We will never really be able to get on with things unless we are prepared to compromise.

I have talked to people from newly developing democracies, to Mrs. Aquino who was here recently, about the difficulties they are having in the new Philippine Parliament, as well as to others in other Parliaments.

One of the difficulties is that people have not been used to this aspect, that you have to be prepared to compromise. If you just hold stringently to two opposing grounds you will never get anywhere. We do that within our caucus and I am sure within the caucus of the hon. member. This is the only way you can move forward. You have to come to a compromise so that you can move ahead with a position which you believe is probably in the best interests of the whole, although it might not be what you prefer personally.

In this case, yes, it is a compromise. We have all admitted that. We have all had to put some water in our wine, as the Prime Minister said, but I believe in the interests of not resolving the issue forever. I know it will not be. I know it will continue to be debated. However, for the majority of Canadians—and this is certainly the feedback that I have had in my riding—this is an appropriate compromise in balancing the different points of view and different interests involved in this issue. Perhaps it is a typical but an appropriate Canadian compromise.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan)—The Budget—Request for budget withdrawal/Request for Minister's resignation; the Hon. Member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Anawak)—Canada Post; the Hon. Member for Victoria (Mr. Brewin)—Transportation of dangerous goods/Emergency preparedness.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I should also advise the House that we have now completed the first eight hours of debate. From now on the members' interventions will be of a 10–minute duration.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At the beginning of the debate this afternoon we allowed members of the New Democratic Party and on the government side a 20–minute speech, each subject to a 10-minute question and comment period. Since you, Madam Speaker, decided not to see the clock beyond the 61 minutes, I wonder if we could request that the next speaker proceed with a 20-minute presentation as well in light of the complexity of the issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair did allow the last exchange to go about two minutes more than the 10-minute period should have gone. The debate has gone for eight hours now and, unless the House gives unanimous consent otherwise, we should proceed with 10-minute speeches. Those are the rules.

Mr. Pagtakhan: I regret the determination, indeed. Could there be unanimous consent for my suggestion?

Mr. Nicholson: I am sympathetic to what my hon. friend has to say. My only concern is that I know many members of Parliament have expressed an interest and that many of them are planning to speak tonight. If they do not speak tonight, they will not be able to speak at all for one reason or another. I would suggest, as much as I would like to accommodate my friend from across the aisle, that we now move to 10-minute speeches.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I want to thank the parliamentary secretary for his intervention.

I think he should realize that the reason there were two speakers who had a period of 20 minutes to express themselves, followed by a 10-minute question and answer period, was simply that we were following our rules. There was not any question of making preferences between the different parties. I was in the chair yesterday and we followed the same rotation all day.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, it is my honour today and in fact my duty, as it is the duty of every member of this House, to address these very important issues. We have now come to a point where decisions should be made. The decisions that are before us are: When do we terminate a pregnancy, what rights do individuals have in our society, and what are the rights of the unborn child from the moment of conception?

This government has brought in legislation, Bill C-43, which it hopes will address these problems. I suggest that the legislation does not address the problems. The legislation in no way goes anywhere near correcting the problems before the House. Therefore, the legislation is fundamentally flawed. It should be turned down and sent back to this government for reconsideration and redrafting. Then a new piece of legislation could come before this House. It is the duty of the House to bring forth acceptable legislation, and this legislation is certainly not acceptable in its present form.

Let me deal first with some of the arguments that we have heard and have been hearing since the introduction of Bill C-43 from both sides. We hear that at least we now have some legislation, inadequate as it is, but it is better to have this legislation than no legislation at all, inasmuch as no legislation at all allows abortion on demand.

The other thing we hear is: let's get this bill into committee, then at committee stage we can make some amendments and bring it back before this House with the amendments we want.

We also hear that we should draft the amendments, approve them, incorporate them into the legislation, bring the bill before this House, pass it, but before it receives Royal Assent, send it to the Supreme Court of Canada on a reference to test its authenticity, to see if it would pass Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I say that these arguments do not hold water. They are not acceptable. It is the duty of the governing party to bring forth legislation, and it is the duty of the opposition to challenge, correct and refine legislation before the House. In this instance it is the duty, then, of each of us in our own conscience to reject or accept the proposed law. It is still the fundamental duty of this government to legislate, but what it has done in this instance is bring forth a very neutral proposal. The legislation before us lacks in total substance. In fact it has very little substance at all.

When the Minister of Justice proposed this legislation, he said in this House on November 7 that the new abortion law had as its overriding objective the balancing of interests—the rights and interests of women, society's interest, and the protection of the foetus. This legislation does not realize these objectives. It does not satisfy those who oppose the termination of pregnancy, and it certainly does not satisfy those who prefer choice as to whether that pregnancy should be terminated.

• (1700)

The law that was struck down on January 28, 1988, in the Morgentaler case, and then the law that was stated by the Supreme Court on November 16, 1989, said that no one has the right to seek an injunction depriving a woman of her right to terminate the pregnancy.

The proposed legislation that we have before us is contrary to this decision. It invites any third party to press criminal charges against a woman or a doctor if there is evidence of an unlawful early termination of pregnancy.

Bill C–43 may be in violation of the Charter of Rights since it in effect removes all choice from the woman, leaving the decision entirely in the hands of a physician. We as legislators, I suggest, cannot abrogate our rights to the courts or to the medical profession. It is the duty of the courts to interpret legislation; it is a duty of the medical profession to heal; and it is the duty of this House to form legislation.

The government has said in this legislation that the decision for the early termination of pregnancies should be left entirely in the hands of the physician. We hear of the Morgentaler decision; we hear of the Morgentaler clinics. We hear the name of Morgentaler but we never hear of the preface. It is not Mr. Morgentaler or Master Morgentaler, it is Dr. Morgentaler. I ask, is this the type of person who will be making decisions on whether or not pregnancies should be terminated?

The bill is pro choice for doctors but has no choice for women. I think it removes all discretionary rights from the woman in her visits to the doctor. The Chief Justice said on January 28, when he struck down the present law, that to carry a foetus to term, unless she meets certain criteria related to her own priorities and aspirations, is profound interference with the woman's body, and this is a violation of the person. I suggest that the proposed legislation before this House is open to challenge on the same grounds as the former law.

Let me discuss one of the fundamental issues that this legislation lacks and that is the rights of the unborn child. This legislation certainly does not address this issue. Joseph Borowski failed to assert fetal rights because there was no longer an abortion law upon which to base a challenge. The proposed legislation does not address the rights of the unborn.

As we discuss the rights of the unborn, just for a few moments let us remove any thoughts of religion from the equation, because this is the area where we run into some difficulty from a religious aspect or from our own beliefs. The greatest thing left to us, with the removal of God or religion from the argument, is life itself.

Even the most radical secular person, the most hedonistic of individuals, must struggle at some time with the fundamental question of when life begins, when life ends, under what circumstances life can be ended, when life must be protected, and what authority in our society protects life? Is it our legal authorities, medical authorities or our church authorities who protect life in our society, or is it a combination of these elements?

In our society, what protection do we extend to the lives of the helpless, the dying, the aged, and the unborn? We must look at all of these phases of life.

Even if some scientists or theologians state that in the early stages of pregnancy we cannot discern human life, the fact remains that the potential of human life is indisputably there. I believe there should be some respect and some caution if the potential is there. At the very least, the potential for life exists and that should unequivocally be respected.

As I was putting together some thoughts about this submission I received in the mail this morning a letter from a Mr. and Mrs. Kowalski. They said something that I want to include in my remarks:

> Visit your aged mother or grandmother and kiss them tenderly; give your spouse, or your friend a warm hug; take a child's hand, or let an infant grasp your finger and look in their eyes, all the time remembering that the only difference between the very oldest and the very youngest is only "time". Their humanity has not changed!

I suggest that the legislation before us today is about life but it fails and fails badly in dealing with life. Let me close by saying that I am glad that I had the opportunity to address this issue. It is so important that I am able to close on the aspect of when life begins and I thank you for the opportunity of being able to address this issue.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this debate on Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion.

As we have seen, the issue of abortion has touched an emotional chord in practically every Canadian across our country. This is one of the most important debates facing our country. Those of us who are pro-life will be fighting for the rights of all unborn children so they will have the opportunity to grow and to reach maturation as God intended. Those who are not pro-life would like to have unrestricted abortion so as to add to the carnage of some 65,000 unborn children who are being killed every year in Canada by abortion, something which a so-called enlightened Canada should never condone or tolerate.

On January 28, 1988, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down Canada's abortion law. Unlike the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in 1973, the Supreme Court of Canada did not rule in the Morgantaler case that women have constitutional rights to abortion.

Nothing in the court's decision prevents Parliament from passing a law banning abortion altogether, a decision that would be consistent with the Charter of Rights. The court ruled that the objective of protecting unborn children is pressing and substantial and that Parliament has the right to pass laws protecting the unborn. Parliament has not only the right but the urgent duty that the state's compelling interest in the promotion of human life beginning at the moment of the child's conception.

It is entirely possible to have a law which would protect all human life from the moment of conception which would be constitutionally valid. To allow the charter to be interpreted in a way that excludes a segment of humanity is to open the door to its total degradation. To accept any law that would recognize wholesale abortion is to accept abortion in principle. If we concede that, we would have no real defence against pressures to accept unlimited abortion.

A law which would permit the killing of innocent human beings would inherently be an evil and unacceptable law. Those who aim to support and pass so-called middle of the road legislation would be simply legalizing abortion. They portray themselves as moderates wanting to please both sides. But since their proposal is not acceptable to those of us who abhor abortions they end up pleasing only those who support abortions. If Parliament ever accepted those proposals, it would simply legalize abortion.

The people who argue that a compromise-type law would only be a necessary and practical step toward better days are not facing the facts. In Great Britain, for example, after 21 years of legalized abortion an attempt was made in 1987 and 1988 to reduce the legislative period of 28 weeks for abortion to 18 to 24 weeks. After strenuous efforts the attempts failed. This ought to teach us not to recklessly support a compromise-type law and lose the opportunity to ban abortion in Canada, except in the few instances of recognized exceptions, such as where the life of the mother is at stake and in cases of rape and incest.

It has been a proven world-wide experience that whenever abortion is available for so-called health reasons, abortion becomes easily available. If there are some restrictions on the meaning of "health", the restrictions are likely to be vague enough to invite wide-scale abuse. Abortionists, who have been defying the law openly for years, will not be restricted from committing abortions by such terms as "seriously", "substantially" and "social". Those, and similar terms, have no legal or medical definition, and are therefore subject to the most liberal interpretation.

The abortion mentality attacks the absolute value of human life and seeks to replace it with a relative value which allows human life to be destroyed if it is unwanted, inconvenient, an economic burden or handicapped. Either by our own action or our own apathy, we are determining the kind of society we will leave to our children. We must ask ourselves: Will it be a caring society, nurturing the helpless and protecting the vulnerable, or will it be a cruel society discarding the socially and economically inconvenient and disguising its cruelty as concern for the quality of life?

We often hear from the pro-choice forces about a woman's freedom to choose. We all value our right to free choice regarding our vocation, our religion, and our goals in life. However, genuine freedom does not give us the right to trample on the human rights of others. The pro-choice slogan focuses on the freedom, while ignoring the choice it demands; the choice to end the life of a living, unborn child. In reality, freedom to choose has become a licence to kill. Women's rights, yes, Madam Speaker, but not at the expense of the human rights of others.

Another slogan of the pro-abortion group is: Should not every child be a wanted child? This slogan makes the faulty assumption that unless the child is wanted, he or she is of no value and can be eliminated by abortion. Simply to be unwanted becomes a capital offence, deserving of a death sentence. Being unwanted is not an attribute of a child. It is truer to say that there are no unwanted children, only parents who are unwilling to raise a child. Nonetheless, that child must always retain his or her right to continue living.

A child cannot be considered merely as property to be disposed of at will. Today, in Canada, there are so many couples waiting to adopt that it has come to the point that many agencies refuse to take new applicants. Yet some 65,000 children are aborted each year because they are unwanted.

We hear also from the pro-abortion groups that unwanted pregnancies result in abused children. How a woman feels during the first months of her pregnancy when her body is undergoing tremendous hormonal changes is not indicative of how she will feel when her baby is placed in her arms. The majority of unwanted pregnancies become very much loved and wanted children. Since we have had virtually abortion on demand in Canada since 1969 and have done away with an estimated 1,200,000 children, the problem of child abuse has not been eliminated but rather has increased to epidemic proportions.

Abortion, the ultimate in child abuse, has not solved the problem of battered children. In fact, since abortion has become commonplace, child abuse has increased by at least 500 per cent. The question has been raised that should we not care about the woman's problem? Undoubtedly we must, but our concern should not mean contempt for the life of the unborn child. Instead, we must have compassion for both and help them in positive and constructive ways. Since 1969, over 2,000 crisis pregnancy centres have been established across North America by pro-life volunteers and others, to give practical assistance to both mother and child during pregnancy and post-partum adjustment.

Abortions performed because of serious maternal health problems, rape, incest or foetal abnormality, account for no more than 2 per cent of all abortions performed in Canada. A full 98 per cent of abortions occur for social or economic convenience.

In a civilized society one does not kill one human being to alleviate the problems of another. Respect for life must remain the cornerstone of our civilization. Once life has begun that life has the God-given right to reach its natural end, and by destroying life the human race is in fact losing honour and dignity. If the suffering of the defenceless does not arouse our compassion, and move us to act on their behalf, nothing ever will.

By destroying other life to ensure one's economic and social success, I believe the human race is losing whatever dignity and honour it has worked to build up for itself over the centuries. To place a utilitarian value on human life, to see each person only in terms of his economic worth can and will lead to the destruction of human life. It will lead to the murder of those already born who through mental and physical incapacity are not able to contribute to society what may be demanded of them by extremists. In some disagreements and arguments that have taken place between pro-lifers and pro-abortionists, the focal point has been the issue of contraception. I said before and I must stress again that proper birth control methods must be readily available to all. Sex education must be taught in a way to make all people understand. Once that is done, people will be able to make the choice concerning the birth of children.

I would like to read into the record a letter that I received from a lady in this area:

> I am ashamed to be a woman. I am disheartened by how irresponsible, cold-hearted and extremely selfish we have become. Led by the "women's movement", we have convinced ourselves we are not the loving, caring, nurturing beings we are by nature. We have convinced ourselves that the child in our womb is not a person worthy of respect. Were we all not a foetus in our mother's womb? Are we not the same person we were then?
> No matter how bad a woman's situation may be she can survive and help is there for the asking.
>
> Most abortions, however, are done because the pregnancy is an embarrassment or inconvenience. Is nine months really too much to give for the life of another? Is killing your baby better than giving it to a couple who will love her as their own? Give the baby a choice and I am sure she will choose life.

She concludes by saying:

> I beg women to find courage to take responsibility for their action and not take the easy way out.

The bill before us, Bill C-43, amounts to nothing more than abortion on demand. There is nothing in that bill that offers any kind of protection to unborn children. It is important that Bill C-43 be given short shrift in the House of Commons by unequivocally and overwhelmingly defeating it.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, today I rise to address an issue that has a long and sordid past in the history of our nation. The abortion issue evokes the greatest emotion in people at the very mention of the word. I have seen for some time now that all people, young and old, have an opinion on this issue, whether it stems from the religious, socio–economic or educational backgrounds or from personal experience.

My opinion stems from a fundamental respect for the sanctity of human life, human life which I believe begins at conception. This is not only what I believe. It is a belief that is held by the majority of the constituents in my riding of Hillsborough, constituents who have written to me over the past year and with whom I have spoken many times. These people have expressed a great concern with the developments that have occurred in the abortion arena over the past year and a half.

Since January, 1988, we have seen a virtual saga of events unfold as a consequence of the Supreme Court's ruling in the Morgentaler case. The Supreme Court ruled that the old abortion law did not comply with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. A year later we saw Mr. Borowski's attempt to have foetal rights defined denied by the Supreme Court of Canada since the Morgentaler decision left the nation without an abortion law upon which they could base a decision.

This was, as many people said, an open invitation to Parliament to deal with this issue. The government, however, did not respond despite calls for a new law from around the country. The Daigle and Dodd cases which we witnessed this past summer demonstrated just how serious an issue this has become. Cases such as this also help to shape our opinion as a nation on this fundamental, social and ethical question.

It is through the unravelling of such events that the federal government has been given an opportunity to introduce abortion legislation so that we can break free from the chaotic state of lawlessness which extends from coast to coast. This situation disturbs millions of Canadians who have written to their members of Parliament asking that Parliament enact legislation to protect the rights of the foetus from the moment of conception. The government has ignored the feeling that seems to prevail across the country.

The legislation at hand fails to define the rights of the foetus, thus the unacceptable nature of this legislation.

In July, 1988, members of this House were given the opportunity to participate in a multiple choice vote so that government could sense the mood of the House. It was thought that the results of such votes would be taken into consideration when abortion legislation was drafted. Of the five motions voted on at that time, the one that received the most votes was the most pro life and did not call for abortion on demand. The government chose not to introduce legislation to this effect and, instead, allowed the state of lawlessness resulting from the Morgentaler decision to prevail.

The next stumbling block proved to be Mr. Borowski's case. The government did not want to introduce legislation until the Supreme Court made its ruling on this issue of foetal rights. The climax of the ensuing state of lawlessness came with the Daigle and Dodd court cases of the past summer. The anticlimactic end of this saga came on November 3 when the government finally tabled its long–awaited legislation, legislation that I feel does not adequately address the problem at hand.

We have been presented with legislation which is, in effect, a compromise between two opposing forces, legislation which virtually changes nothing and pleases no one. The difference between this bill and the old law is simple. The federal government is now advocating abortion on demand; subject, of course, to the arbitrary decision of a medical doctor regarding its effect on a woman's mental, physical or psychological health. Gone are the days when a therapeutic abortion committee could objectively interpret a need for an abortion.

Abortion is a crime, an act that injures another human being at its most vulnerable stage in development. It is the intentional destruction of a human life, life that begins at the moment of conception with the fusion of the ovum and the sperm. At this time, the first cell of a distinct human being is formed and the colour of the child's eyes and the child's hair is determined. Cell division takes place within hours after conception. A heart beat is present at 25 days and the cerebral cortex at 33 days. Forty–five days after conception, the child's body is complete. At this point, the pregnant woman is carrying a distinct human being, with arms, legs, fingers and toes which are visible by ultrasound.

Two months after conception, organs and body systems are in place. At this point, many women may not even be aware of the miracle which is taking place. At 12 weeks the movement of muscles and nerves are synchronized so that the arms and legs can move and the child is also sensitive to touch, heat, sound and pain.

It is difficult to believe that it takes only 12 weeks for a human foetus to reach such a level of development. At this time all of the body functions and parts that children will develop as they grow are present. When we learn that human development has such distinct stages, it is alarming to hear that 87.8 per cent of all abortions performed in 1986 were completed before the thirteenth week of pregnancy. The common belief is that a foetus is not viable until it reaches 20 weeks, but when its development is broken down in such a manner, one sees that this is not the case.

Such information is used in order to appease the sentiments of those who justify the act of performing an abortion before the foetus is viable. The survival of the foetus is threatened if full development is not reached. Abortion is an act that affects not only the life of the mother, but the life that the mother has created in union with the child's father.

What, may I ask, could be more tragic than to allow a human being with the capability of feeling pain and hearing the human voice and that has all of the body parts intrinsic to life outside of the womb to be terminated at will by abortion.

All abortions must be criminalized. Our criminal law is a reflection of who we are as a society. It defines the interests of our society that are worthy of protection and respect against those that are not. Laws which dictate such policy mirror our societal beliefs and values. I believe as Canadians we must demonstrate a fundamental respect for human life. As a result, I believe all abortions should be banned in Canada.

I realize that a statement of this magnitude will draw objections from various groups of people. There are those who will immediately respond with objections regarding health risks imposed upon a woman if she is forced to carry a foetus to full term. Is this a feasible objection given the medical and technological breakthroughs that we have witnessed in recent years? If health risks do present a problem, is it not part of a doctor's responsibility as a medical practitioner to make every conceivable attempt to save both of the lives that may be at stake?

We must also examine this from the perspective of those who advocate freedom of choice by making use of the argument that unwanted pregnancies pose a threat to a women's freedom. Indeed, an unwanted pregnancy does restrict the activities of a woman who is a member of the workforce. I am a strong supporter of equality, but I do not agree with those who feel that pregnancy discriminates against women and the equality for which they have striven to achieve over the years. I ask them, does equality mean taking another human life so that they may maintain their present status in society? I do not think so.

Abortion is certainly the problem at hand but as someone who opposes this criminal act, I believe it is the role of parliamentarians to examine the root of this problem and propose viable alternatives. The legislation that we have before us is not part of such viable solutions.

It is not a demonstration of our nation's fundamental respect for human life, but one that confirms the individualistic values which our society has adopted in recent decades. Most people today are merely concerned with the pursuit of their own self-interest without considering the effect their decisions will have on others. Freedom of choice does not necessarily mean a freedom to choose because of religious or legal reasons, but a freedom to make choices without considering the life that they have created and is growing inside them each day. This life is destroyed in many cases merely for reasons of convenience.

The underlying problem in this debate is that of unwanted pregnancies. Unwanted pregnancy is a fundamental problem in our society and abortion is not the cure for it. Canadians must act together to change society's attitudes toward unwanted pregnancies. As parliamentarians we can get the ball rolling by examining the cause of such problems, one of which is the erosion of the family unit coupled with an increase in abortions and a decreasing birth rate. We must put an end to the dehumanization of the relationship between a mother and her unborn child by attempting to recondition society's attitudes in this respect. We should be enacting legislation that will raise public consciousness and attempts to put an end to the dangerous attitudes and habits we have developed in western society.

Many feel that wider access to abortion is the solution to the myriad of problems that a woman must face upon learning of her pregnancy. Indeed, the pregnant woman faces the challenge of dealing with psychological problems of both an economic and social nature. Society must be given the opportunity to provide economic and emotional support through the extension of existing counselling services and through the provision of more homes for unwed mothers. It is in the absence of adequate facilities such as these that women come to view abortion as the only viable alternative to their unwanted pregnancy.

We must enact social programs in order to combat the anti-family, anti-life attitudes that are prevalent in today's society. This legislation does not even mention provisions for the examination of such possibilities. It does not implement procedures that will encourage life. Instead, it makes it easier to put an end to life, a procedure that is becoming easier through the development of such drugs as RU 486 which makes abortion as simple as swallowing a pill during the first trimester of pregnancy.

All levels of society must work together in order to promote life and motherhood through education, support programs, housing for unwed mothers and improved day care and maternity benefits for those women in the workforce. It is with such considerations in mind that I cannot support legislation that will effectively grant abortion on demand. I do, however, want to see this bill proceed to a legislative committee where amendments may be proposed and hopefully accepted. As Parliamentarians we must take the opportunity that we have been afforded and examine this pressing issue that poses a threat to the very fabric of our society. We must explore alternatives and options for the pregnant woman.

• (1730)

Most important, we must also implement educational programs for our children so that they may develop respect for the greatest gift of all, that of human life.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, in rising to address the subject of reproductive choice I would like to put the issue into the context of tolerance.

Canadian society has long recognized the importance of us understanding each other's points of view, recognizing that there is room for differing points of view, that there is room for debate and discussion on important issues and, in particular, that it is important to be tolerant of our differences.

In this there is the recognition that we, as Canadians, support and respect others in their differences. This is the approach the vast majority of Canadians take with regard to most issues, including reproductive choice. Regardless of their personal view on the abortion question, the majority of Canadians feel it more appropriate to support women and the decisions they make rather than to force them, through criminal law sanctions, to follow a particular route. This tolerance is something we, as Canadians, should be proud of and should encourage. The intolerance of others who would have women subjected to their values is reprehensible. There should be room for dialogue and discussion, but not for coercion.

The Supreme Court of Canada agrees. Chief Justice Dickson words said: "Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus an infringement on security of the person".

I want to take a moment to state my position clearly. Women must have the right to make decisions affecting their bodies after consulting with whomever they wish. The state should not dictate decisions over this issue. As this bill contravenes that basic notion that women should have the right to control their own bodies, it must be rejected. The Supreme Court has also clearly stated that Canadian law does not confer the right to life on the part of the foetus, and neither does it provide putative fathers with any rights over that foetus.

Consequently, the tragic circumstances of the past summer involving Ms. Daigle and Ms. Dodd have been addressed and no legislation is required to deal with that matter. Since the Criminal Code provisions were rendered unconstitutional there has not been any increase in abortions in Canada. The proposed legislation is unfair to doctors, unfair to women, and we do not need it.

I want to say a few words about the federal government's responsibility to show national leadership through the Canada Health Act. We have heard from ministers on the other side that they feel the criminal law power is the only way to approach this issue. The Minister of Justice, for example, stated:"Only by using the criminal law power can the federal government ensure a national approach to the issues of entitlement to abortion". He also said, "The bill does as much as it can to ensure that lawful abortions are possible in all areas of the country, including remote and rural areas".

This is clearly false and clearly misleading. What the government is really saying here is that it does not want to bring forward a comprehensive, all–encompassing national policy on reproductive health. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has said as much. The legislation does not deal with access at all. There is nothing here or in anything the government is proposing or plans to propose to ensure that a woman who seeks an abortion has equal access to the procedure no matter where she may live in Canada.

Without the quite legitimate use of the federal spending power and federal leadership, spurred on, I might say, by the great ideals of Tommy Douglas, Woodrow Lloyd and Allan Blakeney in my own province, and by New Democrats across the country, we would not have a national health care program.

For this government to say that the Canada Health Act cannot be used to address the question of accessibility is pure hypocrisy. In 1984 direction was given to the provinces regarding the nature of health care delivery. As a result, extra billing and user fees were ended, and a good thing too.

The Conservatives, then in opposition, voted for this proposal but now they want to take a hands–off approach. For once they should come clean with Canadians. They were prepared to talk about using the federal spending power to introduce a child care program, albeit an undesirable one, prior to the 1988 election. They broke their promise to Canadians then and they are reneging on their obligations now. The federal government has a clear role of national leadership in Canada's health care system and it is failing Canadians once again.

I do not have the time here to deal with the specifics of this argument, but the 1984 Canada Health Act provisions dealing with extra billing and user fees refutes the government's arguments about its inability to act through the Canada Health Act. Public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability and accessibility are the stated pillars of medicare. It is the federal government's responsibility to enforce these criteria.

So the Conservative government has reneged on this leadership role in dealing with Canada's health care system. This is unacceptable for Canadians generally with regard to health care and unacceptable for women with regard to abortion.

If you add to this the attacks in the Wilson budgets of 1986 and 1989, and now further threats on the part of the Minister of Health to attack transfer payments to the provinces for health care even more, it makes it clear that this government is reducing the federal government's commitment to health care in a very serious and major way.

Canadians will not forget this. What Canada needs is federal policy which sustains and supports women and families. It also needs a full–fledged strategy dealing with all aspects of reproductive health. We need to have federal leadership in the area of family planning, in the area of research into safe, effective contraception, and in the area of workplace flexibility so women have the opportunity to fulfil their major role in looking after children.

We need federal leadership in dealing with environmental and workplace reproductive health hazards. We need federal leadership in dealing with reproductive health promotion, and particularly we need federal leadership in dealing with the elimination of poverty which makes abortion an option for women in the most unfortunate circumstances. We also need federal leadership in dealing with sexual assault prevention and we need federal leadership in access to abortion services.

Prevention is the cure for unwanted pregnancies but this requires both more effective contraception and education in sexual matters. Since the government is doing neither of these things effectively, indeed over the years it is reducing its commitment in these areas, its commitment to reducing the number of unwanted pregnancies in Canada and its commitment to the health of Canadian women must be questioned.

In relating my comments specifically to the bill at hand, Bill C–43 would recriminalize abortion and that is reason enough to be opposed to it. The bill threatens doctors with jail for performing abortions except in cases where vaguely defined health criteria are met. In certain aspects it threatens women with jail. The government takes no clear position on abortion in this bill. It first bans abortion and at the same time provides that if a woman can persuade a doctor that her health will be affected in terms of physical, mental or psychological health, the doctor may then perform the abortion requested.

Criminalizing abortion is not the answer. If the purpose of the government is to reduce the number of abortions, it clearly will fail with this legislation. If the government intended to increase the suffering of women and risk their health, then it succeeded. The bill also may very well be unconstitutional. For all these reasons, and in particular for not permitting women to make their own decisions over their own bodies, this bill must be defeated.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address a very sensitive and difficult issue which has moral, ethical, religious, and often very personal meanings for every Canadian. I am referring, of course, to the issue of abortion.

The new legislation recognizes that abortion is a medical decision to be arrived at by a woman and her medical practitioner based on health grounds. Three principles guide the new legislation: one, balancing the woman's constitutional rights with society's interest in the foetus; two, ensuring that fair and reasonable access to abortion is not denied; three, ensuring that all abortions are performed by qualified medical practitioners based on health grounds.

• (1740)

The bill before the House is reasonable. It provides for the legal entitlement to abortion by the following means: the bill proposes to eliminate administrative impediments found in the old law and struck down in Morgentaler and a woman seeking an abortion is required to secure the opinion of a single medical practitioner stating that the continuation of pregnancy would likely be a threat to life or to health. General health grounds for permitting an abortion have been identified by the medical profession and by the courts as including mental, physical and psychological health.

The bill also requires that a medical practitioner's assessment as to the threats to life or health be rooted in generally accepted standards of the medical profession, and the new bill provides definitions as to the meaning of "health", "medical practitioner", "medical opinion" and "inducing abortion".

The proposed legislation comes under the Criminal Code because it is only through the power of the criminal law that Parliament can legislate entitlement to abortion on a national basis. I truly deplore the fact that the legislative measures that we are proposing involve the Criminal Code. But, as we have said on many occasions in this House, this is the only way to proceed at the national level if we want to enable Canadian women, in any province all across the country, to have the right to the services of this medical procedure.

I firmly believe Parliament should legislate with respect to abortion and that is why I am speaking today. I do firmly believe that the decision to have an abortion is a medical decision that rests with the woman, her physician, and her God; her beliefs, her morals, her standards. And yes, all abortions should be and must be performed by a licensed physician for it is a recognized medical procedure.

I support the Canadian Medical Association which is opposed to abortion being legislated under the Criminal Code or other federal laws. The physician will have the responsibility of making the medical decision on whether a continuation of the pregnancy would, or is likely to, threaten the life or the physical, mental or psychological health of the patient. The physician will have to make a decision on an individual basis according to accepted standards of medical practice. Could the physician be charged? Practically never, except, of course, under extreme circumstances. And the Supreme Court judgment made public last week to all intents and purposes rules out third-party intervention. The unanimous ruling removed the legal basis for obtaining court injunctions to block abortions anywhere in Canada.

For most women the decision to have an abortion is one of the most difficult decisions they will ever have to make. It has implications for the woman, for the family and for all people, because most of us really hold deeply religious views. The decision requires careful thought and analysis.

Counselling is extremely important and I believe all women deserve to be informed, to be informed about the effects of an abortion and, more important, to be informed of all the means available to carry the pregnancy to term. However, once a woman decides to have the medical procedure, the abortion, it is her decision. Family life education is really truly necessary in the school curriculum right across the country. Young people must be taught about the values of life, of love, of sexual relations, responsibility, and understanding. I recognize that family life education is under provincial jurisdiction but surely today we can pledge time to teach our children and all people the responsibility of the human body, the responsibility of pregnancy, the responsibility of life.

Legislation is absolutely necessary and Canadians are demanding it. We can all do without the shocking display, the horror we all witnessed last summer and, of course, I am referring to the Daigle-Tremblay and the Dodd cases.

In a perfect world abortion would not be necessary. We all know, however, that the world is not perfect and that abortions are sometimes necessary. For this reason we must face the issue of abortion as best we can as individuals, as Members of Parliament and as a government. We must try to come up with a reasonable solution to this very sensitive and difficult issue.

I do not claim that Bill C-43 is perfect. I do want to say that we must rise above that which might divide us and seek common ground that is acceptable to the majority. Our most dependable guideposts are tolerance, understanding and maturity. I believe women, in consultation with their physicians, have the right to an abortion. It is imperative that every Canadian woman, wherever she resides, be entitled to these medical services.

I will support this bill in order to get it into the legislative committee where we can have serious consideration, deep thought and where perhaps there will be some amendments for improvement. This is the reason that I support the bill.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to add my comments on second reading of Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion.

Approximately two years have passed since the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the previous law on abortion as unconstitutional. The recent tabling of the legislation by the Minister of Justice shows serious neglect in waiting so long to bring forth this bill. During this period, 100,000 abortions have been performed in Canada.

There is no doubt that this issue is creating controversy since the proposed law straddles both sides of the issue. While it criminalizes abortion, it also permits a woman to terminate her pregnancy on the advice of a doctor. We are faced with a very sensitive moral dilemma. Indeed, I would like to quote from the speech of the right hon. member from Vancouver Quadra wherein he stated the following: "Speaking frankly, we will never reach a consensus on this issue in the House of Commons or in the country. We can reach only an accommodation at best."

I fully agree and I am sure my colleagues on both sides of the House share the same view. The right hon. member from Vancouver Quadra went on to say: "What happens if this legislation is defeated? First, of all, we are back to no law, so we are back to abortion on demand as we have now. If those who hold a strong pro-life position and want to defeat this law, and are successful, we are back to abortion on demand." We would be the only country in the world which does not have any regulation pertaining to abortion.

I am prepared to see this bill go through second reading and to a legislative committee. This would permit pro-life and pro-choice representatives and the medical profession to present their arguments and share with us their concerns.

I would like to take this time to point out some of the flaws in the legislation. This new bill places the responsibility squarely on the shoulders of the doctor whose final decision will be based on the generally accepted standards of the medical profession. However, there is no guarantee that all physicians in Canada would apply the same standards and criteria in assessing the health of a pregnant woman.

What if a doctor runs his practice like a business? Also there is no guarantee that a physician's moral and religious values will not influence his assessment of the need for an abortion. In my view, this places a very heavy burden on the medical profession. First, the doctor has the ultimate responsibility of the decision. Second, there is nothing to prevent the father of the child from challenging the doctor's decision and ultimately pressing charges of malpractice.

The bill does not address the issue of foetal rights. The government has chosen to exclude a time restriction which would ban abortion after a certain period in the pregnancy. I am deeply concerned with Madam Justice Wilson's comment concerning the permissible timing of abortion. She said: "The precise point in the development of the foetus, at which the state's interest in its protection becomes compelling, I leave to the informed judgment of the legislature, which is in a position to receive guidance on the subject from all the relevant disciplines. It seems to me, however, that it might fall somewhere in the second trimester".

In my view this statement is irresponsible and inhuman. At six months, premature babies are able to survive due to modern medical technology. I would never agree to an amendment which allows an abortion at such a late stage. It would be a most brutal attack on the weakest of human beings, the foetus, which is at the mercy of circumstances.

It is also unfortunate that the bill was not accompanied by counselling, programs addressing these issues would have provided alternatives to those who seek abortion as the solution for an unplanned pregnancy. To quote the Minister of Health: "There are 150,000 young, single, low-income parents in need of assistance. If we take away the economic reasons for abortion, we would ensure that children are brought into the world and properly cared for".

This statement is further supported by the Council of Bishops of Canada and I quote its president: "Moreover, we reaffirm that a new abortion law must be developed in the context of other policies and programs which address the social and economic conditions which contribute to abortion". What is being said is, let us not put a patch on the problem, let us try and minimize this last resort. I must reiterate again, let us have programs that will provide the people of this country with some alternatives.

I can only hope that a Conservative government will see its way clear on this matter and will institute programs which will give the woman an option and therefore give the right to life to the unborn child and the opportunity to reach his or her full potential. There is absolutely no reason in a country as rich as ours that some children are denied.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is with mixed feelings that I rise in the House today to speak on the abortion legislation. I hope that everyone would agree with me when I state that there should never be a need for an abortion, that an abortion should never take place, because ideally, an abortion should never be required. Unfortunately, that is not the reality of the situation. We must accept the fact that we do not live in a perfect world. Regardless of our position on this most personal issue, we must resolve this situation to the best of our abilities within the framework society has laid down.

I believe there are two fundamental realities that must be addressed before we review the legislation itself at this stage of debate.

First, a bill must pass the test of Parliament. It must be designed and worded in such a way as to reflect and gain the support of the majority of parliamentarians. Without such consensus any law cannot be enacted or implemented. Second, a bill must be able to stand the test of the Charter of Rights. It must reflect the views of society without infringing on the rights and freedoms of individuals as outlined in the Charter. It must be deemed constitutional and therefore stand up under a challenge to the Supreme Court of Canada.

This government has shown strong leadership in drafting a bill that encompasses these democratic requirements. Although for many of us on both sides of this issue the legislation does not reflect our personal convictions, it is still a valid piece of legislation that warrants our discussion and our thoughts. As legislators and also residents of this democratic society our personal views must often be tempered by the restraints inherent in this institution.

Yes, we can all take individual stands based on our sentiment and emotion and personal beliefs, but without consensus we will not accomplish anything except going back to square one without any valid legislation. Or we can reach a majority agreement, through compromise, that reflects both our individual beliefs and yet supports the legislation that best demonstrates the consensus in this country.

Concessions, no matter how unpalatable, may be necessary from all parties if effective leadership and direction is to be shown by the members of this House to the country. Any law dealing with abortion must protect the sanctity of life. It must recognize not only the rights of the living, but also of the unborn. In other words, in dealing with and recognizing the rights of the woman we must also acknowledge society's responsibility to protect those who cannot protect themselves.

The Supreme Court of Canada, in its decision on December 28, 1988, indicated that any federal policy or law on abortion should not deny Canadian women fair and reasonable access to abortion, should protect the constitutional rights of women to security of the person, should reflect, as a valid federal objective, the state's interest in the foetus and should protect the health of the woman at all stages.

As a result, this new legislation attempts to balance women's constitutional rights and society's interest in protecting the foetus, it ensures that fair and reasonable access to abortion is not denied and it ensures that any abortions are performed by qualified medical practitioners based on the physical, mental or psychological health of the woman.

A woman seeking an abortion under this legislation is now required to seek the opinion of her medical practitioner. The physician's decision to proceed with an abortion based on generally accepted standards of the medical profession must show that the continuation of the pregnancy would likely threaten her health or her life.

This recognizes that life begins at conception. I believe this legislation reflects society's interest in protecting the foetus, and yet at the same time it also recognizes the rights of women to maintain positive health. The term "positive health", as defined by the World Health Organization and adopted by our Ministry of National Health and Welfare, means: "a state of complete, physical, mental and social well-being, not merely the absence of disease or infirmity". This also clearly reinforces the woman's constitutional rights to security of the person.

The woman, like the medical practitioner, must follow the legal requirements as stipulated in Bill C-43 which balances her rights with those of the foetus. Therefore, any woman performing a self-induced abortion or who obtains one outside of the medical profession will be committing an illegal act punishable by prosecution under the Criminal Code.

• (1800)

The potential threats facing doctors under the proposed law in my opinion have been greatly exaggerated. The police will not lay charges without valid evidence, and Crown officials will withdraw charges if they are frivolous. It is entirely possible however that, yes, some will try to abuse the law. But we must have faith that the vast majority of doctors in this country will respect the intention of this law. The inclusion of the abortion provisions into the criminal Code is welcome because as was said by law reform commissioner Joseph Maingot:

> The criminal law is our nation's fundamental statement of public policy—Ultimately, the criminal law is a mirror of what we are; it reflects our commitment, or lack of commitment, to human dignity and equality.

There are a number of critics who believe an abortion law is not necessary. I, however, disagree. The situation we found ourselves in last summer and the associated publicity as a result of the Supreme Court decision refutes that argument. A situation was created where the Supreme Court was forced to work in a vacuum, attempting to make a decision based strictly on its legal perspective and not that of society. It is our job as legislators to draft and implement legislation that is based on society's perspective.

There are those who have suggested that education and information regarding proper methods of birth control and research at the scientific level should be improved. This is something that I feel should and could be endorsed by the federal government through the Canada Health Act and would go a long way to assist society as a whole. This is an area that should be explored at the committee or report stage and could form part of the regulations and then be administered through the Health Services and Promotion Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Once the legislation becomes law, if the Supreme Court of Canada cannot resolve cases before it to the satisfaction of the government, then perhaps at that time further amendments, if required, could be introduced to rectify the problems that it encounters.

However, I sincerely feel that the legislation is clear and concise enough for the courts to make clear judgments without any hesitation and without prejudice.

I personally do not believe the present legislation is strong enough to satisfy my pro-life views. However, the present legal void that we find ourselves in is totally unacceptable. We must reach a consensus before more lives are lost.

I am also terrified of the prospect of returning to the bad old days. We must not turn back the clock to a time when women's lives were threatened because they could not obtain a legal abortion. This once prevalent occurrence should be avoided at all costs.

I would support an amendment to this bill to protect the life of the unborn except where the continuation of a pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life of the female person. The rationale of such an amendment is that the unborn constitutes human life and that the only possible ground for ending this life is self defence.

Therefore it is my opinion that the present act will require amending in order to afford full legal protection to this life. I personally would have liked the legislation to be more restrictive. The term "health" could have been more narrowly defined.

I anticipate the opportunity to speak in support of this type of restrictive amendment to Bill C-43 at third reading. Therefore, given the democratic rules of this House, and by that I mean that amendments cannot be made until after second reading, I do at this time support the legislation even though it does not reflect my personal convictions because I know in due course I will be given the opportunity to persuasively present amendments.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): I would like to take this opportunity to express my views on this very important matter.

[Translation]

I would first of all like to thank the hundreds of people in my riding of Ottawa Centre and throughout the country who gave me their opinion on this issue. Their letters and calls show deep convictions about the right to life and their feeling that the government must protect it. I am pleased that we can finally debate this complex and difficult issue and grant the wish of Canadians who have asked us to find a solution and bring forward legislation to fill the legal vacuum in which we now find ourselves.

I know, Madam Speaker, that the bill before this House was only tabled after long hours of hard work and painfully personal decisions. Although I am aware of the effort required to draft it, I am afraid that it ignores some basic problems raised in the abortion debate.

[English]

I had hoped the new abortion legislation would take a broader look at the social and economic factors that play such a large role in the abortion dilemma. Last year, for example, 65,000 women in Canada made the difficult decision to proceed with abortions. Why does a woman decide to have an abortion? The answers to that question are varied and complex, but I think it is fair to say that many abortions that take place in Canada every year might not have happened if the proper education and support systems had been in place.

Canada is a country renowned for its compassion. Our peace keeping efforts and our diplomatic initiatives have saved countless lives around the world. Our social programs have come to the aid of the disadvantaged and underprivileged within our borders. We must ensure this compassion reaches out equally to the unborn and his mother. We must take this compassion and the intense energy that has been focused on the abortion debate and develop a productive, preventive plan of action.

As a government we must take the challenge to prevent the attitude and situations that are now resulting in abortions. There is no doubt that unplanned and unwanted pregnancies have been found to be an exceedingly difficult dilemma for a pregnant woman.

It may be the most devastating event in her life. What is happening is that many women take this step because they feel that they have no alternative—they are desperate and they have nowhere to go. It is our job as a society and as a government to provide that alternative. We must work to change the attitudes and situations which lead to abortion. It is the government's responsibility to ensure that our citizens have the income, the child care and the emotional support to effectively care for a child.

Educational institutions and health care agencies must share the family doctor's responsibility for providing advice and information on family planning. We need to look at the extent of funding and support being given to family planning services.

Are Canadian women being given all the facts? Are adequate services and support networks in place? If they are, are they accessible?

Counselling and family support services must be readily available and accessible to all Canadians in all walks of life. Each one of us in this House, as well as Canadians across the country, have different views on issues such as abortion and capital punishment. It is my belief that there is not a consensus on this issue, and that there will be no consensus.

Canadians, if they are given the opportunity to vote on this issue, would vote on the basis of their convictions, their beliefs, their upbringing, their education, and the values they hold. I know that in my riding, as well as across Canada, there are those who support the legislation and those who are opposed to it.

For me, while I understand there is no consensus on this issue, it is my responsibility to vote on this matter according to my conscience. During the last election and ever since I have stated publicly that I would be in support of legislation that protects the right of the unborn. Since this legislation does not seem to fulfil this commitment, I find myself compelled to vote against it.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to address the House today on this most important issue. It is an issue which is of concern to all Canadians, but most specifically it concerns Canadian women.

• (1810)

Abortion is being perceived as an issue which divides Canadians. It should not be. We must as a nation show respect for individual decision-making in matters of fundamental personal importance. We must also seek to balance the vital interests of both the mother and the child by permitting an abortion only when the life or the physical, mental or psychological health of the mother is threatened.

As women struggle to develop their place in this modern and constantly evolving society, they are struggling to eliminate discrimination and to develop a set of legislative reforms which ensures this. Women's needs are being translated into protected rights. The right to reproduce or not to reproduce is a right which women recognize as fundamental to their dignity. Therefore, when formulating our legislation, we must listen to what women are saying and we must formulate legislation which will best serve the universal requirements of Canadian women.

The decision to proceed with an abortion is probably one of the most difficult any woman will be called upon to make. It is a decision which will have lasting ramifications on her life. The factors determining the decision are the result of previous life experiences, personal conscience and personal moral values. No two women will experience life in the same way. That is why a woman must enjoy the democratic rights afforded her in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which allow her to arrive at her own decision.

Legislation in this issue of abortion is necessary to prevent further highly publicized and, for the participants, emotionally draining judicial confrontations. In a recent decision members of the Supreme Court unanimously stated:

> There is no foetal right to life contained in the vague wording of Quebec's Charter of Rights nor under the province's Civil code or the common law that prevails throughout the rest of Canada.

This statement re-emphasizes the fact that matters related to this issue should not be resolved in the courtroom. The courts will uphold the laws that we the legislators put in place. So when proposed legislation is being drafted it is essential to ensure that it reflects the greater public good and that it will withstand legal scrutiny. We must provide for Canadians a law which establishes a uniform national standard.

Abortions, when deemed to be necessary, should be accessible in every region and to all female citizens. Location and financial resources should not be factors in such an emotional and a personal decision. I am convinced that Bill C-43 will meet those requirements.

Each year in Canada, about 360,000 children are born and about 65,000 abortions take place. Over half of these abortions are performed on women under the age of 25.

This debate on abortion, by emphasizing the fact that so many abortions are performed on young women, may produce a positive effect. We know there is an urgent need to better educate our young people on the prevention of unwanted pregnancies. Our goal must be to reduce the number of abortions by concentrating on education and information accessibility. Counselling services, family planning services and information on contraception must be readily available to all Canadians.

The provision of advice and information on family planning and human sexuality falls to the family physician, but that responsibility must also be shared by the educational institutions and health care agencies.

Frank and open discussion on this issue will help to illuminate the dilemma and hopefully will result in positive advancements which will make abortions unnecessary.

The Canadian Medical Association is pleased that the proposed legislation recognizes that abortion is a medical act. It supports the concept of abortion being decided upon within the doctor-patient relationship. It does have concerns related to the issue of abortion which are also shared by many Canadians. The association is concerned that all patients should be provided with the option of full and immediate counselling services in the event of unwanted pregnancies.

Since the risk of complications of induced abortion are lowest in early pregnancy, early diagnosis of pregnancy and determination of appropriate management should be encouraged. There should be no delay in the provision of abortion services.

However, no patient should be compelled to have a pregnancy terminated. No physician should be compelled to participate in the termination of a pregnancy. A physician whose moral or religious beliefs prevent him or her from recommending or performing an abortion should inform the patient of such so that she may consult another physician. No discrimination should be directed against doctors who do not perform or assist at induced abortions.

Abortion services should meet specific standards in the areas of counselling, informed choice, medical and surgical procedures, nursing and follow-up care.

We should look to the areas of research and development in the health care field for advanced methods of contraception. Our goal should be to reduce that number of 65,000 abortions, not by restricting choice but by encouraging greater choice in contraception.

Organizations such as the Planned Parenthood Federation encourage choices by educating, promoting and supporting family planning. This organization recognizes that each community is different and implements programs sensitive to the varying needs of each one.

All children born into this world have a right to be anticipated with love. That is the hope, I am sure, of all of us in this Chamber. That is their fundamental right. How can we best ensure that this will be? We must utilize all the avenues that have been offered to us, through the knowledge we have gained over time, through our education and life experience, to bring in the fairest legislation possible for all Canadians.

If and when a woman is called upon to make this crucial decision, we must afford her the benefit of her knowledge, education and experience to make the right decision for herself and her child.

I would like to end my speech this evening by referring to remarks made by Justice Bertha Wilson on this issue upon rendering a decision in the Morgentaler case in 1988.

> Liberty in a free and democratic society does not require the state to approve the personal decisions made by its citizens; it does, however, require the state to respect them.

In summation, it seems to me that what Canadian women are asking for is the fundamental right to make a choice which is right for them on an issue which is a deeply personal and private matter. Should guidance be sought, it should be readily available to every woman through our health care services.

• (1820)

In a free and democratic society, all members of that society have their rights and their responsibilities. I have no doubt that the women of this country are fully capable of accepting their responsibilities as full and equal partners.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the previous speaker for her remarks, which I think women will appreciate.

I rise today to summarize my opposition to Bill C–43 and to suggest steps that this government can take to lessen the need for abortions.

Recently I received a long and thoughtful letter from an Ontario woman who sent her views on abortion to all MPs. In it she said:

> There is nothing that you will ever do in life that will affect your life as much as becoming a parent, and it is irreversible. You can become unfat; you can become unemployed; you can become unmarried; you can even become unordinary; but you can never become unparented. It is not to be taken lightly or forced on anyone.

I strongly believe that women of Canada must have the personal freedom to choose to be a parent. In this way children will be loved and wanted. Hopefully, a woman and her partner will be able to provide the loving care and opportunities that children need to grow to maturity.

However, many women are not in a position to do this and for a variety of reasons may decide to terminate an unwanted pregnancy. This is a very personal and often a very difficult emotional decision.

If a woman decides on an abortion, access to safe medical procedures must be available to terminate a pregnancy as early as possible.

The Supreme Court decision last week on the Daigle case sends a strong message. Judges agreed that a woman has the right to choose whether or not to terminate a pregnancy. There is no basis in law to recognize the foetus as a person.

I will be voting against Bill C–43 because I am strongly opposed to recriminalizing abortion. I do not want the state interfering in a matter that is a very personal and intimate female decision, a reproductive right that should only require consultation between a woman and her doctor.

The medical profession already has health regulations and standards that apply to medical procedure. We do not need criminal sanctions.

Many speakers from my party have explained why we oppose Bill C–43, which is an amendment to the Criminal Code that prohibits abortion at all stages of pregnancy, unless a doctor decides that the continuation of the pregnancy would threaten the woman's physical, psychological or mental health. This bill reduces access to abortion by threatening doctors with criminal penalties of up to two years in prison unless vaguely defined health criteria are met. It ignores the real issue of unwanted pregnancy. We will see more court actions and third party interventions as a result of the bill.

Access is limited. Many healthy woman, and particularly young girls who my colleagues said are 50 per cent of those seeking abortions for a variety of reasons, may not qualify. They will be forced to lie to a doctor or go to a back–street abortionist.

I am sickened at heart by extremists who are so autocratic that they want state interference to curtail a woman from having an abortion. I feel that those who support criminal sanctions are victimizing pregnant women. Like Chantal Daigle's ex–boyfriend, some want to force women to continue unwanted pregnancies unless there is a health problem.

Doctors also are victimized and scapegoated. They are placed in the role of judge and face a jail term, and as a result may interpret health very narrowly.

Undoubtedly, many poor women will not have access to abortions, and healthy adolescents may not qualify.

This law is degrading, judgmental and intrudes on the rights and privacy of women. Why are women not trusted and respected to make their own decisions, if and when they want to have children? Why do women need to be controlled by a patriarchal society? Why is the focus all on women as if men had no responsibility for pregnancies?

It takes two to achieve an unwanted pregnancy and to cause the need for an abortion. If this law were to be applied equally under the Criminal Code, perhaps we should have an amendment that would require the prevention of unwanted pregnancies.

What are the responsibilities of men to their sexual partners? Should vasectomies be required in law unless a pregnancy is planned by both partners and fathers agree to support their progeny? This would be one way to eliminate abortions.

Of course, we do not want this kind of state interference to require sexually active men to be more responsible to sexual partners. However, too many men ignore the fact that birth control and responsible family planning are a man's responsibility, not just the woman's.

Mutual decisions to have a family result in wanted children. This should be society's goal.

This bill discriminates against women because it deals only with women's role in reproduction. In many ways it does not comply with international agreements to which Canada is a signator. For example, the UN Convention on Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women in Article 2(g) requires a "repeal of all the national penal provisions which constitute discrimination against women". We are creating a new provision under Bill C-43.

This convention and the UN Forward Looking Strategies, as well as the UN Population Plan Of Action, all make it clear that family planning must be available to all women. Yet this government continues to contravene these agreements by drastically cutting funds to Planned Parenthood.

If the government wanted to do something about abortion, it could ensure access. It could reinstate the funding for Planned Parenthood that it cut. It could perform research into safe, effective means of contraception. It could put the support services and programs in place that pregnant women and parents need to raise a child.

The only law we need is one to ensure access, not restrict access. This is not a matter for criminal law but for amendments to the Canada Health Act.

Abortion should only be a last resort. Society can do a lot to prevent unwanted pregnancies. Research by Planned Parenthood indicates that the provision of reproductive health services and sex education reduces the rate of teenage pregnancies. Clearly, not enough is being done in this area as research also shows that one in six teenage girls will become pregnant before turning 20. Although the government self-righteously insists it has raised funding to Planned Parenthood, this is misleading.

Planned Parenthood received $447,000 in 1979, and this was reduced to $139,000 in 1988, a paltry sum for such an essential service. I urge the government to further increase funding for Planned Parenthood and for community groups that provide family education and accessible contraception services.

Sex education in schools should be encouraged. The government should also re-establish a family planning division at Health and Welfare where there is only one full-time staff person.

The federal government must increase funding for research into reliable forms of contraception for men as well as women.

Health problems associated with IUDs and the pill are of great concern to women. Why has the government neglected this research which could prevent abortions in the future?

Although attitudes are changing, and I am very pleased many younger men in our society are sharing the joys and responsibilities of parenting, women still do bear the brunt of child rearing. Whether or not she has a spouse a woman is usually expected to fulfil the demanding task of caring for and raising children as well as working outside the home.

Child maintenance payments continue to be inadequate or nonexistent, and women are left to raise children alone and in poverty. Governments must enforce maintenance payments more effectively and ensure family incomes above the poverty line.

• (1830)

It is a national disgrace that one in five children are poor and that 150,000 kids use food banks each month. After years of studying government promises we still do not have a national child care program. We urgently need a child care system that is universally accessible, affordable, non-profit, and of high quality. We must also extend parental leave with UI benefits to cover at least 26 weeks. Family policy should be encouraged in the workplace so parents can spend more time with children, with flexible hours and family leave.

In conclusion, I implore all members to spend as much time next year as we have spent this year on this abortion debate in order to promote policies that will reduce the need for abortion and programs that will support children and provide for their care.

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House today and make my contribution to the debate on Bill C–43.

Madam Speaker, all Canadians were appalled last summer when they heard about the Chantal Daigle case on radio, television and through the other media.

I do not think anyone would want to go through an experience that must have been quite terrible, to see one's private life dragged through the newspapers and flaunted on television, especially a life as full of controversy and incidents as that particular one. I think we all agree we would not want to repeat that experience.

However, where we do not agree, and I think here our differences are almost irreconcilable, is on how to solve this problem.

I truly believe that the Bill before the House today does not deal with the problem. It would need a number of amendments before it could do so even partially. I would even go so far as to say that whatever we put into the bill, the problem will never be solved.

In fact, the problem is a social one. I feel that any bill that does not recognize this fact will never provide a solution, and quite frankly, it would be no more than an exercise in camouflage that ignores the real problem.

One paragraph of this Bill shows a tendency to criminalize, where it says that a physician who induces an abortion where there is no threat to the mother's health is liable to a maximum of two years' imprisonment.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think putting people in prison is the ideal solution, because it does not deal with the problem. Women will continue to have abortions, despite the restrictions we put into this bill.

So what do we need to tackle the roots of the problem? We need a family policy, supported by a tax policy. It is a fact that, be it unintentionally, our federal and provincial laws do not support the family and even tend to destroy it. Let me explain. As a married man with five children, financially I would be better off abandoning my family, because in that case, I could deduct alimony payments from my income tax. Personally, of course, I would never do this just to save a few dollars, but there are people out there who might do just that. So as I indicated in my example, and it applies to many other Canadians as well, our laws definitely encourage marital separation and the destruction of the family unit. And that is a sad comment on our society.

I have raised the subject on many occasions, and I intend to go on doing so until something is done about it. What is taking us so long to provide help for needy mothers? I have already talked about wages for women working in the home. Or it could be for a father working in the home, because some fathers stay home to take care of the children, because the mother has died or for whatever reason.

It seems to me that if we tackle the roots of the problem, it would be a lot easier to find a solution that is more humane for all involved. We would not have to take people before the courts, much less put them in prison, because that will never solve the problem. The fact that today, on the threshold of the 21st century, in a civilized country like Canada, we have no solutions at hand to restrict abortion and the destruction of the foetus and of our people and we have found no other solution but to put the doctor in prison, I think shows we are truly lacking in imagination. We will never be able to solve a social problem of this magnitude.

The fact is that no matter what we put into this Bill, a young girl or young woman in dire financial straits, and God knows there are many cases like that, will get an abortion regardless.

I have already suggested that in some cases abortion would be acceptable but only when absolutely necessary, as in cases of rape or incest or when the mother's health is at risk, and when I say her health I mean physical health, not mental or psychological health which, as you know, is very difficult to determine. Today, a woman could go to a doctor, feeling rather desperate. Her doctor would say: "Okay, in that case, since you feel depressed, whether" this is temporary or whatever, I will do an abortion.

Of course any woman who comes to such a decision will not go out and celebrate. If she comes to such a decision, it is because she is really hurt inside and does not know where to turn. We already know that; the doctor does not have to justify it.

So we might as well then have abortion on demand, because it comes to the same thing. But in the case that I just described, I see no need for the woman and her doctor to provide any health reason whatever. If the woman's health is threatened, if her physical health is threatened, if she is pregnant following rape or incest, in that case, I see no need for the woman or doctor to produce a medical document showing that her health is threatened. I was prepared to be more liberal than that in such a case and accept abortion on demand, perhaps with a certain time limit, because the bill before us sets no limit. In that case, it is up to the physician. Even if the foetus is eight months old, he can still perform an abortion. Nothing forbids it.

If we were to consider the problem first and attack it at its roots, we would have to change first of all our policies, our tax legislation, to make it less discriminatory or not discriminatory at all, because God knows it is discriminatory. Let us support families, single mothers, even married women, because they can sometimes be in equally difficult situations.

• (1840)

If we did that, Mr. Speaker, I assure you that the abortion problem would be reduced, if not completely, at least to a very large extent. That would be much more effective, instead of providing punitive measures such as sending the doctor or mother or anyone else to prison—that will not solve the problem. In a way, we are acting unconsciously, and for this reason, I ask my colleagues to think a little. I have already pointed out several times here some injustices that affect young people, especially in Québec, where those who are under 30 get only one third as much welfare as those who are 30 or over. This situation creates juvenile delinquents and repeat offenders whom I would consider victims rather than criminals. We must ask ourselves the question, Mr. Speaker. Since my time is up, I thank you for listening to me.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, there is no need for me to remind the House of the deep anguish and soul searching the issue of abortion has created in the Canadian community. As we explore new ways to generate human life, the sincere fears and questions of community groups and individuals grow in intensity. At the same time, we are a nation proud of its steady movement toward a more equal partnership of men and women and a fuller commitment to the individual rights of all citizens.

For myself, I would like to go on record at this time as a citizen against abortion and seriously concerned for the protection of the human foetus. However, in spite of that deep personal belief, I am committed to serving all of my constituents as their elected representative. I must find, therefore, a more balanced position for my community as a whole.

Few of us could cast a vote for or against abortion and claim that our vote represents a clear majority of our citizens. In this case, it seems to me that to stand in Parliament absolutely for individual rights or absolutely for foetal protection is an heroic act that is all too easy. It fails to provide leadership to our troubled and divided communities.

If ours were an ideal community in which every child born was guaranteed the love, nurture and social support essential to happiness, if I were confident that every child born would be valued and protected by our social system, then I could stand here today confidently and say no to any abortion. But, it seems to me, the steady erosion of universal social support by the current government casts a deep shadow on the hopes for such a social climate. So I have no alternative but to search for balance.

The internationally renowned Canadian scholar, Northrop Frye, has written a great deal on the nature of our culture and our unique qualities as a nation. One very distinct image and attitude he describes is our obsession with the two-sided legend. He says we are always conscious of the double ledger and the need to find balance between conflicting values. While we have sometimes been ridiculed for this as being too low key, too middle of the road, we have built our credibility throughout the world on this willing sense of balance. Our successful history is one of compromise. We seek laws, institutions and expectations in which contrary yet mutually essential human needs and values are sustained in some acceptable and even pragmatic manner.

When history and generations of the future call us to account for our actions in this momentous social issue, we will not be judged by our heroic extremes but by our sensible balance of voices and value systems. If there was ever a need for this Canadian consciousness, this awareness of the double ledger, it is in regard to the difficult and crucial issue of abortion. At moments it may seem to we politicians more a double-edged sword than an opportunity for balance. Yet, I do believe that this learned and sincere parliamentary body can find a way that will enable our society to move forward unafraid of more sophisticated knowledge, technology and challenges to the wonder of human procreation.

Recent landmark cases make clear the two sides of the ledger. On one side is the right to liberty, identified with human dignity and autonomy and the right to make fundamental personal decisions without state interference. On the other side, with as much validity is the public interest in the protection of the unborn. The Supreme Court has noted that there is a point at which the state interest in the protection of the foetus becomes compelling and responsibility for this protection falls to the legislature.

Let me remind this place once more of this additional burden. The most recent Supreme Court decision makes it very clear. It is this House and this House alone that holds "concern for the life of the foetus" in the cradle of its power to legislate.

I hold the current legislation up to the light of Northrop Frye's ledger and I examine its bottom line, as our current government likes to say so often. What angers me today is the lack of leadership and balance in this legislation. Bill C–43 clearly does not balance the beliefs, the fears and the genuine desires of Canadians. It is a mask of compromise rather than a genuine effort to integrate the two legitimate yet conflicting arguments on abortion. It declares abortion illegal in its text and then its qualifiers make abortion available virtually without restriction.

In the letter of the law it claims concern for the foetus and in its spirit it provides no protection for the foetus whatsoever. It unfairly places the full burden of responsibility on medical practitioners. From the mother's point of view, it makes a woman dependent on the idiosyncrasies of local community and provincial power structures.

Whatever balance the government claims it has established, it is an illusion. There is no evidence in this legislation that the public's concern for the welfare of the foetus has been addressed. This public concern which has clearly not been abandoned even by the Supreme Court of Canada, this other side of the ledger which must be balanced with the woman's right to individual choice, has not been given any sort of strength in this sly piece of legislation. Although the government will claim it is sufficient that abortion remains in the Criminal Code and that this context is enough evidence of concern for the unborn, this too is mere posturing rather than substantial recognition of public concern for the foetus.

The Minister of Justice has stood in this place and said that Bill C–43 creates a criminal offence. Then, soon after, he informed news reporters that the government was not going to prosecute. This is hypocritical legislation. The presence of this new legislation in the Criminal Code in no way provides a reasonable balance of public desire on the issue of abortion. It gives the impression of concern for the foetus without the substance of enforceable law.

I call upon this government to provide legislation that is truly a compromise and that addresses both sides of the ledger clearly and effectively. Even as I call for changes in this legislation, it strikes me how narrow and limited this approach to child birth and the renewal of generations will be.

How can we ask women to carry new life to fruition unless we are prepared to provide the social environment and social vision that value new life clearly and pragmatically? As long as this government continues to cut back on social support systems, to dare tear down the universal social welfare programs, and is more concerned for dollars than for people, women will be uncertain of wearing the mantle of child birth.

• (1850)

Who are we as legislators to speak on the issue of abortion unless we are prepared to take better responsibility for the basics of new life—food, clothing, shelter and child care? Yet this government has put the infamous deficit ahead of these essentials at every turn in its legislative agenda.

Can women really believe that this government cares deeply for the birth of another child? Can we really believe that this government has a commitment to families, to those who most need assistance in raising children? Let us not be foolish enough to believe that this legislation does anything to enhance the quality of life in our community. Let us instead demand that the government stop its obsession with the market–place and its financial ledgers and turn its attention to the far more important ledger of social needs and responsibility.

In closing, I am prepared to take this government at its word only when I see it is practising this concern in its legislation for social support systems. When the government begins to take seriously the cries for child care, the desperate need for more shelter, more clothing, more food, the responsibility to assist the provinces in providing a better quality of life for the poor and the unemployed, then and only then will Canadians believe that this legislation grows out of true concern for the lines of women and children.

As it stands this legislation is an abdication of responsibility. It has failed to balance the public's concern for the unborn child with the need to assure the dignity and rights of women. It is, above all, promulgated by a government whose whole legislative agenda devalues those very universal social programs which guarantee quality of life for all children.

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, as introduced by my hon. colleague, the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada.

Our government was faced with finding a solution to a problem that touches the very core of the basic values of Canadian men and women. As with any legislation where personal attitudes and moral convictions are involved, we could expect a lack of consensus within our own society. We can make this a legal debate. We can make this a matter of conscience. We can make this a scientific debate. The fact remains that although it may be difficult to accept, abortion is a reality. We must therefore give it a legislative framework that gives women the right to use their own judgment, that offers women a measure of protection and finally, that is aimed at preventing abuse. It is in this perspective that the legislator tabled this Bill.

Mr. Speaker, I speak first of all as a member of this House and as such, I support the decision of a responsible government to deal with a difficult and emotionally charged situation.

A legal vacuum was created, when the Supreme Court concluded that Section 251 of the Criminal Code was contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It was therefore up to the government to remove this contradiction by introducing legislation adapted to our times. The bill tabled in the House on November 3 is the result of solid thinking and reflects the wisdom of a government that is firm, fair and realistic.

If we look at the theoretical aspect, the legislation may seem inadequate. It is true that the subject is so emotionally charged that it creates controversy and makes discussion very difficult. However, the legislator was able to maintain the clarity and perspective required to consider the practical aspects and make abortion a medical act, subject to the rules of the profession: an act that arises from a decision made by a woman and her physician.

In tabling this bill, the government decided to avoid taking a stand for or against abortion, restricting its involvement to creating an objective framework for the act, which so far remains the best solution.

Second, I speak to you as a woman who, like many others, has acquired a measure of experience both in her personal and professional life.

Like any human being, I debate issues with myself and this helps me shape my opinions. I too have my own values and personal convictions and sometimes I call them into question when faced with realities that must ultimately be accepted.

Over the years, the status of women has evolved steadily in our society. Today we can say that women occupy a respectable place although they still have some obstacles to overcome.

Respect for personal choice is the very foundation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and all legislation must comply with it.

Abortion is not a choice between good and evil. A woman wants an abortion because she is torn inside; she sees it as a solution to a tragic situation.

Abortions, in many cases, result from a lack of external support and a feeling of rejection due to social prejudice. That is why I am convinced that the bill will enable a woman and her doctor to have a healthy dialogue. Together, they will have to decide how to deal with a problem which only they know in detail.

I am reassured by this legislation, Mr. Speaker, not only because it respects women's judgment but also because it protects them and is free of prejudice on an issue so closely related to social values.

I myself raised a family of four children. I was able to understand and intensely experience what motherhood and deciding to have a family mean for women. Based on this experience in my own family, I favour a situation and setting where women can develop and grow.

Society has evolved and so have women. Respecting women also means respecting their decisions, including what they do with their own bodies, in consultation with their doctor.

When I look at the past or compare us with the many countries to which my work takes me, countries which Canada helps, I say that Canadian society is doing more all the time for the equality of women in their individual and collective rights.

The bill before us today meets a basic need to respect individuals, to respect women and their decisions.

This respect, Mr. Speaker, must go together with our society's evolution, as women move towards greater autonomy. Will this bill settle everything? I sincerely do not think so. But that is no reason not to do something that will contribute to women's betterment and protect their basic right to decide with their doctors what is best for their physical and mental health.

If women have full rights in our society, legislators must be consistent with this great principle and enact it in legislation. This is just what we are doing today.

Mr. Speaker, as a woman and as a member of this House, I fully support the solution proposed in this bill. I recognize in it the leadership and tolerance which have guided our government throughout its term of office.

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that everyone in this House has faced the same problem as I have in dealing with the abortion issue and now, more particularly, with Bill C–43.

As a new member of Parliament, I can safely say that this particular issue has dominated my mail. I must say that I am pleased the matter is at least before the House so that we can finally deal with it and address the issue.

On a positive note, I think the bill has caused a great deal of hue and cry among the extreme positions on the issue. That, in itself, might be an endorsement for the bill. I believe that people in Canada are looking for an acceptable compromise, a compromise which deals with all sides of the issue and if you have both extremes upset, then maybe that is what this bill achieves, a compromise.

• (1900)

The Dodds and the Daigle cases this past summer have brought the issue home to millions of Canadians. It is an issue which affects everyone. I would hazard a guess that every member in this House knows of someone who has agonized over whether a person wanted or needed to have an abortion. It is an issue which affects all Canadians. Our role as legislators is to find a way to deal with this issue so that the constitutional rights of women are balanced with the rights of the foetus.

The question then becomes: "Does Bill C–43 achieve this objective?"

The bill is a negative bill, which neither protects the rights of the woman nor the rights of the foetus. The bill does not deal with many of the other surrounding issues involving this complex process, for I believe that we cannot just view this issue on the basis of abortion, but we must take a holistic point of view and abortion is really the final end of a very long and involved process.

As the Citizens for Public Justice said: "To introduce a pro–life amendment to the Criminal Code without social policy changes will not adequately protect human life. To give women legal right to abortion without social policy changes means that many women have few effective choices other than abortion. This is not a choice anyone would recommend."

In light of the recent decision in the Supreme Court of Canada, Daigle vs. Tremblay et al the court has found that under existing law the foetus has no rights until born. I must say, as a lawyer reviewing the case, I can follow the logic of the decision and the conclusion, but I cannot agree with the conclusion in the sense that I feel that we, as legislators, must make the necessary changes and correct the results of the decision that has been reached by the Supreme Court of Canada. For this reason, I would have preferred a degree of foetal protection in this bill. This bill does not provide that protection.

This bill basically is an amendment to the Criminal Code which makes all abortions criminal except in a case where a physician is of the opinion that the woman's physical, mental and psychological health is endangered by the continuance of the pregnancy. In any other circumstance, it is a criminal offence punishable by up to two years, imprisonment for anyone to induce an abortion, including self-inducement.

I must also say that I don't believe that women embark on the decision to have an abortion lightly. As a man I cannot say for sure because I won't have to face that decision, but it must be a hard, gut-wrenching decision, which in most circumstances appears to the woman involved as the only alternative available.

Looking at the bill, one quickly sees that it deals with the issues on a very negative basis and shifts responsibility for the decision. I do have some very grave hesitations with the criminalization of the mother, and I do not feel that the bill should shift that criminalization to the physician. The physician is now faced with a situation where he can make a decision or come to an opinion that an abortion is acceptable treatment and then be subject to prosecution at a later stage.

The provincial Attorney General or a Crown prosecutor may hold certain views which may start that process and leave that physician subject to criminal prosecution. As a lawyer, I would have to say that in most cases I would advise a physician never to do an abortion on the basis of the bill because of the vulnerability that the physician faces. While it would appear in the Supreme Court of Canada decision that third parties do not have any rights to bring actions, there is nothing to stop the criminal process from coming to the fore and for a Crown prosecutor or anyone to lay an information or start that process which is obviously bad for the physician.

The other problem which the physician faces is medical opinion across the country on what will be mental, physical or psychological health difficulties will differ in the different areas of Canada. I believe that the psychological definition is going to be the hardest one to come up with from a medical point of view and that definition is not provided in the legislation. Therefore, a doctor is left to his own devices to define "psychological", and if he reaches the wrong conclusion could become a criminal.

Also, the bill does not provide equal access to women across the country. In effect, the legislation ducked that issue and put it in the hands of the provinces. Therefore, we will see unequal access to abortion across this country. We have seen that already under the existing law. In New Brunswick, for instance, there are regions within the province that perform abortions in certain hospitals and some that do not. We are going to exacerbate the situation by expanding that across the whole country with this type of legislation.

The Supreme Court of Canada in its decision said that foetal rights only arise once the foetus has been born. This requires us as legislators to step in and resolve that problem to a degree in favour of the foetus. The Law Reform Commission had recommendations. I know that a lot of groups were opposed to those recomendations but at least it provided a degree of recognition of the rights of women and the rights of the foetus. In my view, in this legislation neither rights have been protected.

The legislation by its negative effect also causes the woman, in effect, to lie. She must go to the physician if she wants an abortion and concoct a story. That is exactly what has happened in the past and that is again a most unreasonable way for us to force women to act.

As I indicated earlier, I believe that we have to look at this issue from a holistic point of view. To bring forward legislation which just deals with abortion and does not deal with the other sides of the issue is a very negative way to proceed.

A classic case that we see in society today is children having children. How do we deal with that situation? An abortion is the last part of that whole process. We have an obligation to look at day care, to look at the opportunities that are presented, to look at family planning and those associated issues, and to deal with things like sex education and contraception when dealing with younger women. The issue is not just one of abortion. All issues such as family, day care, and reproductive technology are involved and should be associated with this particular bill. For us to come forward with legislation which only deals with one aspect is shirking our responsibility as legislators.

My view is that at this particular stage we really do not have any choice but to send this bill to committee, hope for some amendments that will put some of the things that each one of us believe are necessary into the legislation, and hopefully fashion a piece of legislation which does the job rather than leaving it the way it is now. At this particular stage, we must send it to committee. Hopefully we can come up with amendments, but I must say that if the bill comes back in its present form, I would have no choice but to vote against it.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-43, and I hope that my comments will be useful to the legislator and to this country. My presentation will reflect my experience in the practice of psychology. I will deal with three points in the few minutes at my disposal.

First, I will explain my position on the issues and the bill before the House today. Second, I intend to discuss the duality and apparent contradiction between the individual and society. Finally, I will discuss an approach that in my view would make it possible to enforce the legislation with a heightened understanding for the new realities in our society.

Let me say, first of all, that I believe in life. I will not try to determine whether the foetus is a human being, and I will not agonize about the exact moment when the foetus is considered to be a human being.

My colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mrs. McDougall) raised the subject on Wednesday, November 8, at page 5725 in Hansard.

• (1910)

As was said before in the House, the purpose of this bill is to make abortion a medical act. This position is fundamental, and I welcome it. It is based on a definition of health, either mental, physical or psychological, and this definition is set within a social context. Mr. Speaker, the bill recognizes that the living foetus is not just an excrescence or a fibroma but quite definitely something different. I call this foetus a human being.

The Bill acknowledges this as well, since it is based on three guiding principles, the first of which is to balance the constitutional rights of the woman and society's interest in the protection of the foetus.

This principle indicates, in no uncertain terms, that abortion is not solely a private matter. It is also a matter that affects society and the public interest and hence it is a matter of ethics, whether social or religious or both.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) raised this question in the House and gave us an excellent answer. It seems almost impossible to dissociate social ethics from religious ethics. It is not any easier to dissociate the human spirit from its physiological counterpart.

Both Hippocrates and the philosophers acknowledged this fact. The modern scientist is no exception. The laws of nature, when they apply, always do so in a tangible, material world. Our laws are implicit in the matter that surrounds us. This is an accepted fact in both psychology and management.

The Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada said, and I quote:

> In a perfect world, abortion would not be necessary for any reason. We all know, however, that the world is not perfect.

We are human beings. We are finite beings, limited by our physiological and neurological equipment, and obviously will be for a number of centuries to come. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said there were few, if any, moral issues on which people agreed. He added that abortion was a disturbing issue for each and everyone of us because it seemed to force us to chose between two essential human values.

Mr. Speaker, no man is an island. He lives in an environment and belongs to a group. Therefore, he cannot make laws to please himself. That is why it is up to the legislator, with all his perfections and imperfections, to identify and implement standards. Finally, Mr. Speaker, I don't think this legislation is intended to let everyone do as they please or that it is a lawyer's paradise or that it puts the onus on the physician. In my view, people who say this are avoiding the issue.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to my second point. This bill merely recognizes two realities which exist whether we like it or not.

First, we have a woman. Second, this woman is carrying a foetus, a new being; she is no longer alone with her body. For this reason, she must deal with another reality called society.

In fact, two human beings form the basis of society. At the very least, they often provide all the elements needed to form a society, whether it is a cell, a group, a family.

We all know that living in a group or society raises many problems. Where does the freedon of one person begin and end and conversely where does the freedon of another person begin and end? Social psychology and the question it raises shed some light on this for us. Many say that this bill is aiming for a compromise. I do not think so. As I see it, the bill sets a standard for an inherent human problem: individual versus collective rights. In other words, the bill sets parameters so that two separate but interconnected entities can function and develop as harmoniously as possible. The individual depends on the richness of the group in order to stand out and find a way to excel.

Just as man influences his environment, it shapes his behaviour as much as it does his opinions, beliefs, attitudes and especially values. But if a society is to continue to envolve, individuals must be able to continue to assimilate its basic values.

Therefore the human being is always guided by an individual and collective vector, and his behavioural patterns are inspired by social prescriptions which themselves are tinted by factors of levelling and individualization.

It is in that sense that the feeling of belonging takes a connotation of development. Apparent dissonances such as group/individual, security/accomplishment, and levelling/individualization convey a message to the extent that one accepts that an individual alone cannot develop fully enough, or at least to the degree that his potential can be actualized.

What may seem to be theoretical, philosophical and useless in this debate, Mr. Speaker, is not really so because this problem underlies human, social and even moral values.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I am satisfied with this bill, even though we may always encounter vile men, weaker women and physicians without strong conscience.

Even so, it is up to the institutions to step in and steer them back towards justice and equity, while keeping in mind both the individual and the group to which he belongs and from which he seeks guidance to sustain his own legitimacy and sense of belonging.

Mr. Speaker, I said that one cannot be independent without first having been dependent, and that the more independent one is the more one has to acknowledge one's dependence on others. I am no exception.

In the riding of Outremont which I am honoured to represent in this House, I have the privilege of listening to a wide range of opinions, and I can say that we find there the normal array of different positions. I must keep that in mind. If the citizens of the riding of Outremont have that right, it logically follows that their right becomes my duty.

One last point before I conclude. A little over a year ago I said to a journalist who asked me where I stood with respect to the abortion issue that I was pro-life. I went on to say, and I quote the newspaper article: "If we want a society to develop, that takes individuals. We must plant our own maple trees and see that they reproduce".

• (1920)

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that since the bill deals with a medical act and opinion and since neither the doctor nor the woman has all the relevant scientific information, it would be worthwhile for them to get the support and advice of professionals who could show them how to make the best decision.

And moral and religious convictions will finalize this process. Mr. Speaker, I am pro-life but I also recognize life in society requires flexibility.

[English]

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of sadness that I rise to participate in the debate on Bill C-43, a bill to recriminalize abortion in Canada.

January 29, 1988, was an historic day not just for Canadian women but indeed for all Canadians. It was on that date that the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the criminal provisions dealing with abortion in a decision which stated that they were in breach of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Madam Justice Bertha Wilson, in her very eloquent reasons for judgment, stated that the right to reproduce or not to reproduce, which is an issue in this case is one such right under section 7 and is properly perceived as an integral part of modern women's struggle to assert her dignity and worth as a human being. Judge Wilson went on to state that section 251 treated women as a means, a means to an end which she does not desire but over which she has no control. She is the passive recipient of a decision made by others as to whether her body is to be used to nurture a new life.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Chief Justice Brian Dickson, in his judgment on the Morgentaler case, said that forcing a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term unless she met some criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations is a profound interference with her body and thus violates security of the person.

[English]

In striking down the provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with abortion, the court recognized a number of very serious flaws in that legislation, flaws which frequently led to delays that put women at risk and increased the risk of complication. Indeed, Canada had the second highest rate of mid-trimester abortions of all industrialized nations. The requirements for therapeutic abortion committees clearly led to the kind of delays that, in turn, resulted in complications which could lead to health problems for Canadian women.

In addition, too often in this country we have seen destructive battles for the control of hospital boards based solely on the question of abortion because of deeply held feelings on the part of both those who oppose abortion and those who are in support of freedom of choice. Instead of hospital boards which are elected to deal with a whole range of health care concerns, under the old legislation we had hospital boards which too often were driven in a harsh and unrealistic way to respond only on this issue.

I want to take this opportunity to acknowledge the dedication and the commitment of many women and men across this land in the struggle that culminated in the great victory for women on January 29, 1988 when the criminal law with respect to abortion was struck down.

I remember the role played by Grace McInnis. Grace McInnis, a former New Democratic Party Member of Parliament, served this country with distinction in a whole range of areas, was the only woman in the House of Commons who, when the provisions on the Criminal Code were adopted, stood up with dignity and courage and called for this decision to be left to a woman and her doctor, outside the purview of criminal law.

I think of my very distinguished predecessor as the spokesperson on justice for the New Democratic Party, Stuart Leggatt, now a judge in British Columbia, who fought long and hard to establish this principle. Many of my colleagues in the House today, and I single them out in particular, one being the spokesperson on the status of women, my colleague for Vancouver East has struggled so long, not just for freedom of choice, but for real alternatives for Canadian women to help reduce the number of abortions in Canada.

I think of the women from across this land who have struggled to establish free standing clinics to provide women with access to safe therapeutic abortions, Every Woman's Health Clinic in Vancouver, a clinic in Winnipeg, in Toronto, and those women who are seeking to establish a clinic in Halifax.

I think of Dr. Henry Morgentaler. Dr. Morgentaler has waged a battle of courage, integrity and in some cases doing time in jail to stand up for the right of Canadian women to make this basic decision for themselves.

I think of Chantal Daigle, a young woman from Quebec whose personal life was dragged across the front pages of the newspapers and television, and who was the victim of an act of judicial violence in my view by the Quebec Court of Appeal. I was in the Supreme Court of Canada for the hearings and I rejoiced when the Supreme Court reversed that decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal, that decision which allowed her boyfriend to tell her that she could not make this very difficult and agonizing decision for herself and who had admitted that, yes, he had beaten her but he had not left any marks.

Many of us had hoped that this government would recognize that instead of bringing forward new criminal legislation, what was needed were changes to Canada's health legislation to ensure equitable access across this country and concrete measures to reduce unwanted pregnancies, and to assist women who want to keep their children but who, in many cases, are faced with a crushing burden of poverty.

That was not to be so. What did this bill do? While the Supreme Court of Canada in its judgment on Chantal Daigle has closed the door on civil injunctions, this Conservative government has opened the door to criminal prosecution of both women and their doctors. We in the New Democratic Party find that deeply offensive and we reject categorically recriminalization of abortion in this land.

Let us be very clear on this. This has been a long standing policy of the New Democratic Party. It is with considerable sadness that I have listened this evening to representatives from the Liberal party, including the associate critic on justice who indicated that they will be supporting this bill at second reading and agreeing to the recriminalization of abortion. Indeed, it is not surprising, given the fact that the Liberal leader himself in August of this year urged the government to bring forward new criminal legislation.

In introducing this legislation, the Minister of Justice has said that he has confidence in Canadian doctors and Canadian women. If he has confidence in Canadian doctors and Canadian women, and indeed he should, he should recognize that there is no need for new criminal legislation. Instead, we should be moving to ensure under the Canada Health Act access for women across this land. This bill does nothing whatsoever to assist those women in Prince Edward Island who were denied access; to assist the women in Newfoundland who have but a single doctor in St. John's, and when that doctor is sick or on holidays, they must travel to Montreal or elsewhere.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this bill does nothing at all for women who, in many regions of Québec, have no abortion service and often Québec women must travel hundreds of miles to large centres; some hospitals refuse abortions for married women or those who do not use the pill or contraceptive devices.

• (1930)

[English]

So we should be looking at access and we should be looking, fundamentally, at alternatives. Instead of cutting back on funding for the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada, we should be increasing funding, looking into the whole question of child poverty, into research into safe and effective contraception, to the removal of workplace and environmental reproductive hazards, to care for pregnant women and new mothers, to access to reproductive health services, including abortion services.

In closing, I want to say that these are the issues which we in the New Democratic Party believe should be addressed by this government. Every child must be a wanted child. Yes, I am pro-life. I support the life of those children in our society who are too often victims of poverty, the 150,000 children that line up at food banks every day. I deeply reject the suggestions that somehow we in the New Democratic Party are not in support of life. Indeed, too often those who attack us are concerned about life which starts at conception, but their concern ends at the birth of the child. I want to say that we reject the recriminalization of abortion in Canada and we appeal to this government to take steps to ensure that Canadian children live a life in which they are wanted and in which they do not live in poverty and that Canadian women are allowed to make this very basic and fundamental decision for themselves in consultation with their doctors.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, since Bill C-43 has been made public most of us, I believe, have received considerable numbers of letters from constituents and from interested Canadians in all parts of the country.

It is interesting to note for the record that for completely different reasons we have received and continue to receive correspondence that expresses on the part of the writers a view against the bill. The view is expressed by those who belong to the pro-life movement, as well as by those who are on the pro-choice side of the issue. That fact creates a dilemma for the legislators. When you have two very articulate groups of citizens expressing their views on a very important social issue, it is then left, I suppose, to each one of us to draw our own conclusions as to what course of action to take in an attempt to reflect as well as we can the views of our constituents. Believe me, this breakdown into two streams of correspondence in the mail makes the task arduous.

Nobody likes and nobody wants abortion. And at the same time, nobody wants to treat the mother as if she has no rights from the moment she becomes pregnant. There are rights that have to be taken into account for both the unborn and the mother. And one, I submit to you, does not exclude the other.

Therefore, if you approach the issue from this point then inevitably the legislators have to address the question of demand for abortion. It must be addressed in a manner so as to reduce the demand for abortion by approaching what I would describe the large middle ground of this issue between pro-life and pro-choice ideologies. There is a significant and very important middle ground.

I submit to you that it is not an either/or question. The question is how to deal with the situation so as to reduce as much as possible the demand for abortion and possibly eliminate it. The question is how to reduce the demand.

That subject has been developed in a four-pronged approach. It begins with education of the population at large by way of family planning and by way of education on contraception.

Second, it means dealing with young people providing them with a better teacher than just the experience of life. It means an understanding of how reproduction works, how the human body works and how to prevent the pregnancy.

Third, we come to the important aspect of the involvement of man. As we all know, no woman has made herself pregnant alone. Therefore, man should and must be helped to recognize his equal responsibility in all aspects of sexuality. In terms of decision making, he must be helped to recognize his responsibility also in obtaining and using contraception and also his equal responsibility in the handling of crisis when it occurs.

We must be perfectly clear that there is a desperate need in our society for support services. This issue cannot be treated in isolation from the vacuum that exists today in terms of support services. Therefore, the debate on the question of abortion must focus principally on this question. You need to have social and economic measures in place in the form of programs. And they must be available to people whether they are rich or poor. In specific terms they have to touch on housing, day care, counselling and on post-natal employment. The fact which has been brought to the attention of all parliamentarians over the years on a number of occasions is that poverty has been found to be one of the strongest reasons for abortion. That fact must be addressed.

I have outlined for you in the limited time available this four-pronged approach which, to my way of understanding the issue, is an essential policy that is needed if we are to discuss in an intelligent manner the question respecting abortions.

I am indebted to the British Columbia Teachers' Status of Women Journal of June of 1988 for having produced these elements. We must also ask ourselves what would be achieved by outlawing abortions. Would it prevent abortions, or would that drive those wanting abortions underground and make the practice one that is still with us but not necessarily in a visible form? The polarization of this issue is a matter of serious concern, and as parliamentarians it seems to me that we should resist stressing what divides us on this issue and stress instead what brings us together on a social issue of such importance.

We must, therefore, identify the viable solutions of this matter. Why create a conflict, I ask you? Why sharpen it? Why not instead diffuse it where possible and to the largest possible degree?

A lot has been said on Bill C-43. I wanted to put on record some views. I must tell you that in the knowledge I have of this bill tonight, if a vote were to take place, I would find it necessary to vote against it because I find it inadequate.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, while it may be difficult, if not impossible for me to offer any new perspective or original thought on the subject of abortion after the many thousands of words which have been spoken previously on this subject in this House, nevertheless, I do value this opportunity to express my own views about the issue, both in terms of my personal convictions as an individual and of my legislative responsibilities as a Member of Parliament.

In fact, I think it is extremely important to note these two very distinct aspects to the role of all hon. members in considering this matter of abortion. Perhaps it is only such a rare issue which is so unique to itself. Those considerations are not only how we feel about abortion within our own minds and consciences but also how we view our responsibilities as elected representatives to consider abortion on behalf of society, to reflect the common interest, to lead public opinion, to bring order out of confusion and, in short, to provide good government with respect to this most difficult subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I found that abortion is more than a difficult issue. For me, it shows the very need for a government decision. I personally have not only the problem of reconciling my own ideas with those of my constituents but also my great priority of helping create a law for good government. But in fact, in Canada, our constituents are extremely divided. According to the best estimates, approximately 20 per cent are truly opposed to abortion, another 20 per cent are for free choice and about 60 per cent are in between these two extremes.

[English]

To add further complexity to the decision which I and each one of us must make is the fact that the Supreme Court has struck down existing laws concerning abortion and since that has happened in the vacuum of any effective federal law, there have been lower court judgments in various parts of Canada which have brought sharply conflicting rulings and which have, over the past several months, created a sad spectacle of social confusion, intrusion of privacy, and embarrassment of individuals, all into full public view on our television screens.

There is little wonder then that in this House of Commons we are facing a continuing dilemma of a clear need to create law governing abortion and to provide legal and ethical guidelines for Canadian society. Yet being frustrated by the experience of the last Parliament, when I understand this House was unable to gain a majority on any one of a combination of resolutions and amendments put before it about abortion, it is in this context about an issue bearing all of the agonizing characteristics to be the most extreme of political considerations, that the government recently invited a number of caucus members to grapple with the subject to seek a resolution that would meet the test of three imperatives. First, a resolution that would be in the form of a law adequate to provide a clear legal and ethical reference for all Canadians. Second, a resolution that would receive the approval of this House of Commons by way of at least majority voting support by its members. Third, a resolution that would, in all likelihood, prove stable against any appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

As one of those caucus members invited to participate in these discussions, I feel it is worthwhile to share with all of my colleagues and my constituents the process of considerations which we pursued in arriving at, for the most part reluctantly I should say, the consensus which is generally reflected in the content of Bill C–43 now before us. Represented in the composition of our group was the complete range of views that undoubtedly exist among hon. members and, in fact, among Canada's population about the abortion issue, from strong anti–abortion convictions on the one hand to equally strong freedom–of–choice positions on the other, and with a spectrum of moderate views between those two extremes.

Convictions and positions were not easily sacrificed in the search for consensus. But as our discussions intensified to meet these three essential criteria, a gradual movement emerged toward the higher level of our responsibilities as legislators and to the compelling objective of creating a law to govern abortion that would meet all the tests. What we have arrived at, as expressed in Bill C–43, is a consensus that represents, as I have said previously, the true essence of politics, "The art of the possible", with respect to abortion.

There was full accord that a law governing abortion was an essential requirement for Canadian society. But it was not possible to reach accord in total opposition to abortion and it was not possible to reach accord in support for complete freedom of choice. This Bill C–43 was not the original position nor even the first consensus choice of the participants. Eventually, it did emerge as the one statement which we have come to believe will best provide a legal framework for a national position on abortion, while at the same time winning a majority support in the House of Commons to become law, and having the most likelihood to successfully withstand appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada.

This position was reached only after long and intense debate and only with politically responsible reflection on the part of virtually all members involved. I would readily call it a consensus but I would hesitate to describe it as a compromise in the traditional sense of that word, because it does express some important principles which make it, in my view, a distinctive and contemporary Canadian legal statement.

What does Bill C–43 really say? Well, for me, it clearly seems to say several important things. First, it says that abortion is fundamentally illegal in Canada and that protection of the foetus from conception until birth is a basic priority. It says that the health of the mother is also a priority, be it physical, mental or psychological and may take precedence over the foetus if judged to be necessary in the opinion of the woman's doctor.

It does not purport to render a decision about the legality of any specific abortion, but rather places the onus for that judgment in every case upon the doctor as he or she may be licensed to practise medicine under the laws of each respective province. It says, by implication, that the selection and approval of facilities where an abortion may be performed will similarly be at the judgment of the doctor within generally accepted standards of the medical profession in the province or provinces in which the doctor is licensed to practise. It also seems to say by implication that the payment of medicare benefits for abortion procedures will be in accordance with federal–provincial medicare agreements within the province or provinces in which the doctor is licensed to practise medicine and in which the abortion is carried out.

In terms of the broad public debate with which the abortion issue has been seized over the past many months, Bill C–43 does implicitly address the value and dignity of life, both of the foetus and of the mother. As proposed, Bill C–43 clearly states the principle of protection of the foetus from the moment of conception until birth. It does so by making it illegal to induce an abortion unless the mother's health is threatened. It also does so by excluding any reference to a gestational period of time. Therefore, I believe that Bill C–43 does clearly state fundamental respect for life from conception which is a deeply held conviction for a large number of Canadians, perhaps for most of us.

At the same time, Bill C–43 recognizes the priority of the woman's own health and her right to obtain an abortion if her health is threatened either physically, mentally or psychologically. I realize that this is a broad definition of health, subject to the professional opinion of the woman's doctor, and in practical terms will ensure that abortion is accessible on a reasonable and equitable basis for all women where it is required.

Essentially, the proposed law recognizes that abortion is a medical decision and places the onus for that decision on the qualified medical opinion of the doctor in consultation with the woman. The criminal responsibility for abortion decisions has been transferred from the woman to the doctor.

I think it is worth stating that even in so–called circumstances of free choice, the woman ultimately would have to gain the approval of a doctor to have the abortion. So freedom of choice is never really absolute. Also I have become convinced that most of those who support freedom of choice as a right do not necessarily or even generally support abortion as a principle.

Considering all of these factors, I remain convinced that Bill C–43 is the best possible resolution and perhaps the only right one for this very difficult issue. Not only do I feel that way because it is my first duty as a parliamentarian to help create an effective law on this subject but, coincidentally, Bill C–43 as it is now proposed does reasonably reflect my own moderate position on the matter as I have previously and consistently expressed in public.

Perhaps my previous views bear repeating at this time. I would like to say that one year ago during the election campaign of 1988 I expressed the view that abortion was a difficult decision to be made by a woman in consultation with her doctor. If the question arose in my own daughter's case, I would encourage her to bear the child. Ultimately, however, I would be prepared to accept her decision with love and respect, whatever that decision might be, subject to the professional opinion of her doctor.

In closing, we as parliamentarians and legislators must address ourselves to a consensus which will provide for most Canadians some basis for social order and tolerance among conflicting views, if not for reconciliation of those views. I believe that over time Bill C–43 will prove to fulfil such purposes and I encourage all hon. members to give it their support.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased this evening to be able to address the House on the subject of Bill C–43. I think it is fair at the outset to indicate to the House that I do not feel I can support this bill.

The main reason is that I do not believe the bill accomplishes the goal that I think it should have set out to achieve. It uses the same framework as the previous abortion legislation contained in the Criminal Code before the Morgentaler decision. That old framework, going back many years, in which our society attempted to prohibit or curtail abortions, was based on what I think history shows was a profound ignorance of what happened inside the womb.

The generations which preceded us had very little knowledge of the intricacies of child development in the womb and afterward for that matter. As a result they tried to resolve the messy problem of abortion by targeting the mother and the abortionist. At this stage in our history I do not believe that we have any more excuses. We have no excuses not to recognize precisely what happens in the womb and the various stages of development of life.

It is my view that we should not be prohibiting abortions based on who the mother is, or who the father is, or who the doctor is, or what they think at the time. We should be dealing with the issue of abortion because of who the foetus is. I want to suggest that the foetus, this will not surprise anyone here, is in fact the genesis of all human life. It is the genesis of all of mankind here on the planet today. I believe in our society what this government should be recognizing is that genesis of life and the protection to which it should be entitled.

We continue to learn more every day about how life is formed and how the human body takes shape. The study of genetics is a major field of study and experimentation today. I believe that that particular field of study is related to the way in which we deal with the issue of abortion. I am not suggesting that a statute or a bill proposal now would be able to deal with all of the issues. I recognize that a royal commission has been created for the purpose of studying several of those issues.

I do fear how our society will deal with issues such as the human mutant, created unintentionally or intentionally, and I believe that that issue should be dealt with in the same framework as the human foetus should be treated in our law. I believe that all of our laws should reflect this and I believe that our Charter should reflect this. The use of the Criminal Code to deal with protection of the foetus is anachronistic and it is based on ignorant concepts of just how human life begins.

I believe our law should be protecting the foetus. However, the current proposal does only two things. First, it sets out to criminalize the conduct of a mother, or a doctor, or an abortionist, and then it creates an exception to that criminalization, which really provides in the end result no protection to the foetus. Last, the bill fails to articulate for society the role of society in ensuring that birthing and parenting are properly regarded as essential elements in the health and well–being of our country. I do not believe that removing the foetus from the womb at any stage and disposing of the foetus as we customarily dispose of our normal refuse accomplishes any of these goals for our society and I think it is crucially important that we recognize this at this stage of our history.

I feel that with this bill, I and that portion of humanity which may still be in the womb are still awaiting a bill which will accomplish these goals.

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to address Bill C–43 on abortion. This is a matter that is extremely difficult for me because I feel it is very personal for each individual and that I should not be advancing my own views on this issue. At the same time it is important to relay my constituents' views on issues of their concern and this is the first occasion to convey those concerns on abortion.

Allow me to present three aspects: First, an overview of Bill C–43 as we understand it; second, some concerns that arise therefrom and third, my own position regarding Bill C–43.

This is indeed a controversial issue but we need legislation without further delay. This proposed legislation pays heed to the Supreme Court's opinion on abortion. In the January 1988 decision the Supreme Court of Canada reminded us as federal law makers that any policy or law on abortion, first, could not deny a woman fair and reasonable access to abortion, second, must protect the woman's constitutional right to security of the person and, third, would reflect the state's interest in the foetus. Finally, it would have to protect the woman's life.

Bill C–43 achieves all of these objectives to some extent in its attempt to accommodate both sides of the debate. Unfortunately it will not be possible to satisfy both sides. The Supreme Court also recommended that Parliament secure a medically sound opinion as to the meaning of life or health. The proposed legislation now provides a definition as to the meaning of health. Section 287(2) states that health includes, for greater certainty, physical, mental and psychological health. Perhaps consideration ought to be given to a more narrow definition, to help define mental and psychological or, in the alternative, certain guidelines could be included for the doctor to use in his assessment process.

This bill reflects the fundamental belief that abortion is a medical act, one that requires consultation between a woman and her doctor so that valid health grounds can be established, thereby respecting society's interest in a foetus. However, this may give a doctor an absolute discretion in making a decision. It is his opinion that is decisive to the issue of termination of pregnancy.

Opinion has been defined in Section 287(2) as an opinion formed using generally accepted standards of the medical profession. It is unclear, however, what generally accepted standards of the medical profession are and who will overlook the medical doctors' practices to ensure these standards are being adhered to.

There is no enforcement mechanism or review of this opinion. If a review of doctors' practices were put in place perhaps the interests of the unborn would be better protected. Some have argued that the unborn is protected by the criminal sanction imposed but this is after the fact. There does appear a need for clearer guidelines to be given to the doctor so he can carry out the intention of Parliament, which is to achieve a balance.

If I may digress for a moment to a personal perspective, as a native Indian my upbringing has had a significant bearing on my own views of life. We view life in all forms to be very important. Human life is to be honoured and respected as a gift of the great spirit. It is a gift for which we are to be very thankful.

In conclusion, although it does not fully protect the unborn, the passage of this bill at second reading is imperative. It is imperative so that we are all afforded the opportunity to move to committee where I hope to see more clarification or improvement in substance.

Therefore my position, one of pro–life, is to support passage of Bill C–43 at second reading. We need legislation with which to work and I look forward to amendments that may improve the proposed legislation. The full process of Parliament must be executed for this very vital issue.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak against this bill. It is a bill that is wrong in principle and it is a bill that will be hurtful in practice. I believe very strongly that in the final analysis the decision to terminate a pregnancy or, to put it the other way around, the decision to carry a baby to term, must be that of the woman alone. For the state to interfere with that decision is profoundly wrong in principle. For that to be adopted by this House, an overwhelming case in principle and in practice must be made, and no such case has been made.

I address the House as a New Democrat. Our party's position is clear. Our leader last night put our position on record very eloquently. I speak as a Canadian and as a father. I believe that life is sacred and that we must treat life with great respect, but I believe that this bill does not do so, that this bill will not protect unborn babies or the foetus. This is a bill, to put it very bluntly, which is designed to protect politicians.

I speak as a Christian. I believe that life is the gift of God. But I believe in the final analysis that the complex decision that must take place in balancing the act of creation with the reality of creation must be made by the woman. That decision cannot be made by a doctor, that decision cannot be made by parliamentarians, that decision cannot be made by lawyers or judges. It must be made in the final analysis by the woman involved and it will be made by the woman involved whatever law this House adopts.

Canadians have varying degrees of views on what is moral in this area of abortion. Some would say, as we have heard in the House so far, that virtually no abortion could be described as moral. Others would accept it perhaps in the case of rape or incest; others would say if the life of the woman is endangered; others would say if the health of the woman is endangered. That decision about health can be defined in different ways; physical, mental or psychological health. Others would say that it is moral to have an abortion if in the final decision that pregnancy would be unwanted. There are these different views and no law can capture that range of different moral views on this very difficult question.

This bill encapsulated one view which is that it is moral to have an abortion if the health of the mother, as defined by physical, mental or psychological health, is at risk. But that is not a view which is universally shared in this country. Therefore, apart from anything else, this bill will not work. It is wrong in principle and it will be wrong and hurtful in practice.

The church to which I belong, the Anglican Church of Canada, has spoken out on this issue. Many faithful Anglicans have taken different positions. The church itself is, as it describes it, cautiously in favour of the bill. In my view that position is wrong, and the reservations which the Anglican Church has are more powerful than the reasons it advances for the bill.

Let me deal with a series of specific flaws in this bill. First, it reverses the onus. It says than an abortion is unlawful unless certain circumstances are met. That puts the onus on the defendant to show that the defendant is not guilty of an offence.

Second, by having the law turn on the opinion of a doctor the bill then becomes open to challenge from every kook and every nut who wants to challenge the individual decision of that doctor. Every doctor is going to have a somewhat different view of what is involved in the medical health of the mother in a particular case. Not only do we have a law which is open to challenge from whoever chooses to challenge it, but we also have a law which will be widely inconsistent in application. A law which is inconsistent in application is a bad law.

There is no requirement in this law that where an abortion is lawful a hospital must perform it. There is no guarantee of access to a lawful abortion and that is why the Supreme Court struck down the other law. This law will not stand the test which is why I say again it is a law not to protect the foetus, it is a law to protect politicians who must band together to try to fend off attack.

This is an occasion not for compromise on principle, this is an occasion for a principal decision by each individual legislator in this House. This bill offends the decision of the Supreme Court in Canada by making abortions in the early terms of pregnancy illegal in certain circumstances. It alters the doctor–patient relationship. In every other case the doctor offers an opinion to the patient and the patient decides in the final analysis whether to accept the treatment and the recommendation of the doctor. This turns that relationship on its head. It puts the doctor in the controlling position. Doctors in this country should be standing up in force against this legislation and this House should not put doctors in this position.

This bill invites doctor shopping. There will become known in the community doctors who take a broad view of the language of this bill. There will be doctors who take a narrow view. In communities where there is only one doctor, who may take a very narrow view, women will be deprived of a right which they have in other communities of Canada.

Finally, this bill fails to meet one of the underlying fundamental requirements of any criminal law which is that it reflects the broad consensus in the society. There is no consensus around the moral provisions of this bill and that, among other reasons, is why the bill will fail.

I want to refer the House to the words of Madam Justice Wilson. She said:

> This decision (of having an abortion) is one that will have profound psychological, economic and social consequences for the pregnant woman. The circumstances giving rise to it can be complex and varied and there may be, and usually are, powerful considerations militating in opposite directions. It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision; it is a profound social and ethical one as well. Her response to it will be the response of the whole person.

Those are wise words, Madam Speaker, words which this House must take into account. She said further on the question of religion and conscience:

> Accordingly, for the state to take sides on the issue of abortion, as it does in the impugned legislation by making it a criminal offence for the pregnant woman to exercise one of her options, is not only to endorse but also to enforce, on pain of a further loss of liberty through actual imprisonment, one conscientiously-held view at the expense of another. It is to deny freedom of conscience to some, to treat them as means to an end, to deprive them—of their "essential humanity". Can this comport with fundamental justice?

The way with which this issue of abortion must be dealt is not to put it back in the criminal law. The Supreme Court of Canada has now laid down the grounds that under existing law the foetus has no legal rights. The foetus may have moral rights. That is for each individual to determine. But the foetus has no legal rights and in that regime we can then move to begin truly to protect children in our society, to protect women in our society, to protect life in our society.

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Madam Speaker, like most of the previous speakers, I rise in the House with some trepidation to speak to a subject of this complexity. In the riding of Montmorency—Orléans, in the rest of Canada, in the rest of the world, in our caucus and I would even say within the Supreme Court itself, if we bother to read the comments of individual judges, we can sense a number of different reactions to the abortion issue. It is a very controversial issue. I even did a survey in my own riding which showed that, like in many other communities, 70 per cent were against abortion and pro-life while 30 per cent favoured a far more flexible approach and some went so far as to prefer no legislation at all. But people do want Parliamemt to show leadership.

Last August, La Presse published a CROP poll indicating that three out of four Quebecers wanted the Parliament of Canada to pass legislation. And tonight, I think we are showing leadership by debating Bill C-43.

Madam Speaker, I feel some trepidation because I have a degree in theology and for 25 years, as a pastor in the Catholic Church, I worked hard to promote respect for life. I am sure you realize that this evening, my role is a different one, and that as a legislator, my task is no longer the same. And since the people in my riding, as in so many ridings in Canada, have been permeated by Catholic and Christian culture, I think it would be interesting to read the advice given by the Canadian bishops in 1966 to Christian legislators. The bishops said the following, and I quote: "The norm—a Christian legislator must make his own decisions. The norm for his activities as a legislator is not primarily the well-being of a religious group but the well-being of society. Religious and moral values are indeed very important to good government. However, these values influence political decisions only to the extent that they affect the common good. Members of Parliament have temporal duties. They can vote, and in practice they often do so in accordance with the Church's teachings because what the Church defends or approves is often closely related to the common good. However, bear in mind that the common good should always be their sole reference."

That is the principle that will guide my comments tonight, and in this connection, I may add that the Leader of the Official Opposition in the National Assembly made a very apt comment which reflects my own position, when during the election campaign he told someone who was going on about respect for life that one person's religion should not be made everybody's legislation.

The day after the referendum, Mr. Trudeau, the former Prime Minister of Canada, said: "Democracy is based not only on the views of the majority but also on the expression and inclusion of minority views".

• (2020)

So what guides me personally in my work as legislator and as Member for Montmorency—Orléans is the quest for a legislative measure which will restore some sense of respect for life, which is a great value, a legacy of civilization which must be protected from birth to death. Even in the case of older people respect for life is also very important. It is a sacred principle.

But at the same time it is the development of our civilization, I would say a development of the knowledge of the rights of women. In that respect the charters of human rights throughout the world have made us more aware of its importance, and I would suggest that on that point the Catholic Church has a long way to go to give women the place that righfully belongs to them in the management , I would say, of their structure and their organization.

To end on this note, a theologian whom I greatly admire, Mr. Durand, said, and I quote: «Coercion is contrary to moral standards.» Far from me to seek to impose my moral standards, either through coercion, or by legislative force, or by obstruction, or by depriving fellow citizens of social and medical services. I simply want to express my deep and personal conviction. I lived in Quebec during the 40s and 50s when the word was "believe or die", and in my pastoral activities, while promoting and suggesting the great values of the gospel to my congregation, I always tried to show tolerance and I was one of those who enjoyed meeting with divorced people, it did not matter to me. If you believe the lesson of the gospel, the Church welcomes you.

I think that as legislators in this House we ought to be tolerant. I am fully aware tonight that we must legislate within narrow limits for the Supreme Court would never accept a bill which would condemn abortion outright. This is something we must realize and tell our people. Otherwise, the Supreme Court would rule that such a bill goes against the right of women to the security of their person as was emphasized by Chief Justice Dickson. But there is the other side of the coin, the respect for life which is a real value, something which Justices Beetz and Wilson emphasized, adding that the interest of the state is to safeguard a minimum of control.

I feel, therefore, that Bill C–43 introduces an interesting element, the fact that the medical profession will have to decide. It is an interesting notion. Judging from a number of speeches here, I had the feeling that physicians are nothing but robots and automatons; yet, we are all well aware of the tact the Canadian Medical Association maintain very high standards and that most physicians I know are respectable people who do not decide lightly to carry out an operation, either to terminate a pregnancy or in any other area. I suggest that we should rely on the professional competence and quality of Quebec and Canadian practitioners. Whatever the position Parliament may adopt and it is a very pragmatic view, in my pastoral work I had personally to interview women who had decided to seek an abortion and I tried to reason with them, but when a woman has made up her mind, she will go ahead no matter what Parliament may decide. In this connection, a legislation which would be too stringent would favour affluent women and make it possible for those who can afford it, to have their pregnancies terminated wherever such services are available.

Therefore, we need a legislation which provides a balance between— A legislation is not an ideal in life. We are aware that the law forbids us to kill, but I wonder if life would be worth living if our purpose was simply not to kill at any cost. We are here to set up a framework within which the respect for life is proclaimed as a principle, abortion is forbidden unless a qualified physician agrees it is justified.

This being said, Madam Speaker, I would like in conclusion to make a very important point. It seems to me that the abortion legislation now before us must be examined in the light of the need for a much more comprehensive family policy. In that respect, I very much appreciated the speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who listed a number of projects that hopefully will be announced in the shortest possible timeframe to help enlighten Canadians. I am referring especially to young people. Of the 70,000 abortions performed each year in Canada, half involved women under 25. In that respect, whether in the area of family planning or tax measures for families on child care, I for one hope that we revive as soon as possible what we had on the Table before Parliament was dissolved before the election, so that families once more are given support and that we go to the root of the problem. I cannot believe that there is a single Canadian woman were she to enjoy physical and psychological health, and financial means, who would even accept to have her pregnancy terminated. It is my hope that this government will compliement this abortion legislation with a series of measures to ensure that families, pregnant women and girls can have all the financial, moral and psychological support they should expect from the state.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak again on this subject, having spoken on it just about 18 months ago. I would like to make several points that are important to me and I think maybe are important to a broad spectrum of our society.

First, I would like to say that there are two reasons for this debate. The first is that any civilized society must make a statement about what it values the most, what is normal, what is orderly. If we are to be a civilized society, that is the nature of civilization. We speak to order, we speak to value, we speak to norms.

The legislation we are debating today prohibiting abortions except in certain circumstances is making a statement about life, it is making a statement about what is normal and wholesome and orderly, and it is doing it by implication because it does not address those factors. It is making a statement about sanctions. But in speaking to sanctions this bill is saying that in the ordinary course of things it is normal to give birth; it is extraordinary to ask for an abortion. It is normal to want to give life, it is normal to be exuberant at the thought of birth and exuberant at the thought of reproducing ourselves. That is normality. It is extraordinary to have an abortion. In fact, the Supreme Court itself in its language of January 1988 called abortion an extraordinary medical procedure.

We are dealing with sanctions. As in all of life, while we are permitted to do almost anything, the law speaks to those sanctions which we find repulsive and we will not tolerate in a civilized society. Because we are speaking to sanctions in this legislation it underscores the normal, the accepted, the value of life.

The second reason we are debating this bill now is because the Supreme Court has asked us to. It said in its Morgentaler decision that there are two important factors about abortion. One is the protection of women and the second is the protection of life. It threw out the old abortion legislation because it did not properly protect women. It needed to throw out that legislation because if women are to have protection it cannot be seen as being uneven across Canada. It cannot be arbitrary, nor can it be illusory. Therefore, the Supreme Court was absolutely correct in rejecting the former legislation.

In pronouncing its judgment it also asked Parliament, almost begged Parliament, to make a definition of the value of the foetus. I quote Justice Wilson on page 26 of her judgement as follows:

• (2030)

"I believe that the main objective advanced to justify a restriction on the pregnant woman's Section 7 right is the protection of the foetus. I think this is a perfectly valid legislative objective."

Justice Dickson in the majority decision states at page 38:

> Like Beetz and Wilson, I agree that the protection of the foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid governmental objective. It follows that balancing these interests, with the lives and health of women a major factor, is clearly an important governmental objective.

Beetz goes on to state at page 43 of his judgment: "Accordingly I believe that the state's interest in protecting potential human life exists throughout pregnancy."

On page 4 he makes this statement: "The primary objective of Section 251 of the Criminal Code is the protection of the foetus. The protection of the life and health of a pregnant woman is an ancillary objective. The primary objective does relate to concerns which are pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society in which, pursuant to Section 1 of the charter, justify reasonable limits to be put on a woman's right."

The Supreme Court has asked us to make a statement about worth. This legislation, by stating that the foetus deserves protection from conception to birth, makes a statement about worth of that foetus, of that unborn child.

It speaks to intrinsic worth. It does not depend on external factors like viability, or potential, or becoming a productive member of society. Those are externals. The worth of the unborn is intrinsic. It does not depend on those externals. Any gestational approach implies or suggests some level of expendability, a graduated level of worth.

Sooner or later, unfortunately, when we introduce those kinds of graduated values, it becomes reduced to an economic unit rather than the intrinsic value of becoming a productive member of society—will that person fit, will that person be able to earn a living, will that person be dependent? It comes down to economic values.

The irony is that for centuries women who have been angered at their subjugation at the hands of a male dominated society have rebelled against values that put extrinsic worth on them rather than intrinsic worth. For years they have tried to make the point, and have done it successfully, that they have value in themselves, not because they are housewives, lawyers, or doctors, but because they are people the way anyone else is.

If that is true for women, is that not true for the unborn? Should we perpetuate the notion that life has extrinsic value rather than intrinsic value?

This legislation is important because it states clearly that life is important from conception on, and everybody has worth regardless of the age at time of conception or time of senility. It is not the value we put on them that makes them valued.

It is time for us to be building an ethical climate that will provide security and sanctity for the unborn from the moment of conception.

I want to read, in closing, from an article in a publication entitled Christianity Today. It is an article written by Tim Stafford on October 6 in which he states, referring to Roe v. Wade, and I ask my colleagues to bear with me:

> The discussion had been about where to draw the line among tragic choices; the justices erased the line completely and said there was no room for further discussion.
> Anti-abortionists may someday have reason to remember this lesson, if they gain the power to stop abortion by fiat. As we have seen, restricting abortion works best when it is based on a wider consensus about the value of life. The first centuries of the church gained this consensus through centuries of witness. They spoke passionately against abortion as a part of their faith. They also suffered for their faith. Ultimately their faith triumphed and legal changes followed.
> By contrast, the 19th century though it passed anti-abortion laws seems not to have built a strong, public consciousness of the humanity of a foetus.
> Ethicist Stanley Hauerwas touches on this issue when he notes the frustration of anti-abortionists who fail to convince their opponents that a foetus is a human being. He says that more than logic is needed and continues:
>
> Christian arguments about abortion—have not merely failed to convince: they have failed to suggest the kind of "reorientation" necessary if we are to be the kind of people and society that make abortion unthinkable—Even if [we succeed politically[, our success may still be a form of failure if we "win" without changing the presuppositions of the debate.
> That is what Christians in the first three centuries managed to do. They changed the world, not just the law.

I would say, Madam Speaker, to the many people out there who are concerned about this issue that we are facing an ethical morass more than a legal morass. I was watching television the other day and I heard Carmen McRae sing a song and the recurring line was: "Your gentle touch has made me strong".

I would say to those anti-abortionists out there who are carrying placards and chaining themselves to fences: put away the chains, put away the placards, and get a little closer to people. The confrontation separates us. If we could get close enough to embrace and to comfort, rather than to confront, then maybe we could begin building the kind of an ethical consensus that would make a stronger abortion law possible and give the kind of protection to the unborn that all of us hunger for.

This legislation speaks to life. We want all of society to cherish the life that we propose here.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak to this bill, a bill that addresses an issue of the hearts, of the minds and souls of people. It is an issue in which we find very strongly held points of view on both sides.

There are those who would believe that this bill answers neither side of the question. It does not fully satisfy those who believe in a pro-choice point of view nor obviously, if one has just listened to our colleague, those who believe in a pro-life point of view. This is not the time in our society when one can afford to hold to one's personal conviction, which I would respect and hope that others would respect. I think it is a time to find a kind of compromise.

The question is: Does this bill answer the compromise that is required? I am still not very sure. I am still not 100 per cent comfortable with this bill.

This bill does respond to the jurisdiction question; it is a federal jurisdiction. It does define the act as a medical procedure. For that I am very pleased, for in the definition of a medical procedure it defines itself properly in the potential for access across this land. The question as to whether or not full access will be made available is one which I think will have to be looked at very carefully in legislative committee.

• (2040)

That women should have to consult their doctor, a medical practitioner, I believe to be sound. I believe that you do need to consult. The decision as to whether or not you wish to terminate a pregnancy is not an easy decision.

In fact I would suggest that the only time I would ever really enter into a very serious argument with colleagues who have a different point of view from mine is when they tell me that this act is one that a woman would undertake as an act of contraception. I find that to be very offensive. It is not an act of contraception. It is a very difficult emotional decision, one that is not easily taken. I would suggest that anyone who thinks otherwise has either never been pregnant or has not got very much heart or is very hard minded in his or her own point of view.

I would suggest that being able to take an informed choice is very important. I would think being able to talk to a medical practitioner is helpful. I also believe it is very important that one have the best of health and the best of medical practice when a decision is taken, if the decision is taken to terminate her pregnancy. I believe the ultimate decision is that of the woman, but I do believe that she needs help and guidance. I trust the woman and the medical ethics of our medical profession.

The reservations I have about this bill and the reason I will vote to send it to legislative committee is that there are some issues that must be carefully examined. I do not know the answers, but I do know that there are concerns in this bill.

I believe that it needs careful scrutiny. I believe we must hear from the medical profession. I believe it must be checked to see if it will withstand a court challenge. I believe there are women who have to be heard.

While I support the full right of women to choose, I am well aware of the fact that others do not agree with this point of view. Because there are deeply held divisions in this society, there are no easy answers.

I would have preferred no law. When one lived through this past summer and saw the degradation and the stress that two cases before the courts underwent, the cases of Barbara Dodd and Chantal Daigle, one realized that there must be some form of legal format. Therefore, we cannot afford a country that is going to have 11 different laws and no sensible approach to this very difficult situation. The uncertainty is more than I think this society can withstand again. We certainly do not want that humiliation once again.

I am not happy that it has gone into the Criminal Code. I want to make very sure with legal counsel in legislative committee that there were sound reasons that it could not go under the Canada Health Act had it been amended. I understand and I accept the minister's perspective, but I would like to hear it once again.

I would hope if it absolutely must be recriminalized that we can find the mechanism through the Canada Health Act to ensure that access will be afforded all women who take a decision, and not lightly, to terminate their pregnancies and to ensure that it can be met in every province and every town where this request is made.

I would suggest to you that there are a series of rights that come. With those rights come personal responsibility on behalf of the individual woman to make an enlightened decision early in her pregnancy. Equally there is the responsibility of the state to provide the means for a woman to take that decision, knowing that her society truly cares for her child, truly cares that these children will be brought up to be productive, well informed, well nourished, intelligent young people.

Our society has far from demonstrated that caring to date. We do not have the kind of support system or the cadre politique familial that we need.

We are in desperate need of a look at how we handle children in our society. There is violence against children, rape, incest, lack of decent food, lack of proper housing and child care. There is a lack of the kind of incentives that would help a woman make that enlightened choice.

I say to you that while rights and responsibilities go together, it is not only for the individual woman making that decision. It is not only for the individual doctor who is helping and counselling her. It is also for those of us who are legislators to determine what are the highest priorities in society and then direct those funds. It is not the death that is important. It is the life of these children.

I would suggest to you that we see this new law in the light of the concerns and constraints that many of us are expressing around this particular issue and that we try as best as possible to find the medium, the middle line. That road will not answer all our concerns. I am definitely one who would prefer a woman to be able to make that decision in an enlightened way and be solely responsible herself.

Those of you who feel that there should be no option, that life begins at conception and there are no other choices, will understand that we as legislators have to find something that will answer that need. We all live in a very pluralistic society today. We all come from very different backgrounds, upbringings and personal perspectives. For a woman who is about to make a choice, we must respect that choice but find the cadre in the legislative perspective that will best meet her need and that of our society.

I have certain disappointments with the bill. There are certain aspects of the bill that I find acceptable. For goodness sakes, let us start to think about sex education in the schools. Sexuality is part of our humanity. We have to find a way to share the responsibilities of that sexuality, if it has to be through teaching in the schools because the parents cannot do it properly or teaching in whatever way or with whatever medium. It is important that they understand.

I would like to suggest that while I am pro-choice I find the best answer to meet the differences in our society will be the best response possible.

As one would say, as Canadians it is the best that is possible in a world of all possibilities. I will certainly vote to send this bill to a legislative committee.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I must compliment you on your ability to listen attentively to the entreaties of all hon. members on the issue before this House, Bill C-43, what Canadians have come to regard as the abortion legislation.

I daresay that that ability must surely be taxed. I wonder whether in fact you are at all not unlike so many of our citizens, or even some of our colleagues, as argument, as philosophy, as emotion and, yes, even rhetoric buffet one's faculties from intervention to intervention. It calls up respect for the various positions explained by so many members who go through the tortuous ordeal in an effort to find a path so right, so true, so appropriate for a Canadian society that is, and for a Canadian society that is becoming.

Many colleagues have attempted the juridical approach to the question noting along the way that jurisprudence reflects social convention often following in the footsteps of accepted practice and rarely venturing into the realm of groundbreaking, in effect reflecting, and I quote a previous member, "things as they are and not as they should be".

It has been difficult to take umbrage with arguments of colleagues. They have been thoughtful and deliberate. They have been respectful of the need to be tolerant, I daresay, to the point of being obsequiously courteous to those whose arguments have been in diametric opposition to their own. Perhaps this is so because we all have a basic premise from which we launch ourselves in this debate. That premise, no matter what it is, is today faced with a dilemma as hon. colleagues espouse one position or another on the bill.

• (2050)

Examine if you will for a moment the consequences of voting no to this bill and carrying the vote. In so doing I might remind colleagues that of a most moving speech that I heard from an hon. member yesterday, a minister of the Crown, who reflected some, I beleive, widely held views, pointed to the "failings", the "deficiencies" and the "incompleteness" in this legislation, and still felt that a yes vote was required because the alternative to this bill was no law at all. No law means that those who advocate abortion on demand carry the day. Those who oppose this bill on the grounds that it is virtual abortion on demand are faced with a dilemma. I am such a one.

If we vote yes we accept in principle that abortion is undesirable. We acknowledge that anyone who wants one can have one, a medical practitioner accepting. Yet, there are no procedures imposed on the medical practitioner, no definitions of conduct, no guidelines of practice, no mechanism for adjudicating that practice.

In a word, the government has accepted that the question of abortion is merely a medical matter between a woman and her doctor. That is not what the government was encouraged to do when the Supreme Court struck down the old abortion legislation nearly two years ago. That ruling confirmed, perhaps positively I daresay—I hope positively—that women have universality of access to medical care.

It called on the government and Parliament to determine by way of legislation the rights of a foetus or unborn child, the extent to which those rights are equal to those already born, when those rights may take effect, whether and when the rights of the pregnant mother take precedence, and, if and when society or the state has an interest in the development of life in its foetal stage.

That ruling called on the government for leadership. It has shown none in this bill, nor has it heeded the call to be pro-active and to define life in a context different from that which is current, that is to say, one that sees no alternative to unrestricted abortion on demand. And even, almost perversely I daresay, its caucus members, or some thereof, ask for support for this piece of legislation on the grounds—and in my view it is a little bit too clever by half—that, and I quote them, "the alternative will be the absence of any signal that there is any regard for the value of human life".

Government logic has abdicated the obligation to deal with life to the convenience of debating the issue of abortion and, I might add, in isolation of factors and social issues and policies that make abortion the attractive alternative to birth for many women.

Many hon. colleagues before me have detailed the lack of education on sex and on birth, the societal conditions that breed irresponsible sexual practices, carnal violence and disrespect for the dignity of women. They have spoken of the lack of affordable, accessible day care facilities and of the cost of raising a child by a single parent under the burden of increasing taxation or cutbacks in programs of a social support nature.

Other eloquent members have regretted the government's inaction in the face of the disintegration of the bulwark of social harmony and productivity: family cohesion and the values that emanate from it, that is, a sense of responsibility, a degree of compassion, a modicum of respect for others, mutual support in moments of crises and a long-term approach to actions and consequences.

Rather than show leadership on the question of life and on the quality thereof, the government has contented itself with casting the issue in the context of abortion, a context which invariably favours the rights of those who are present against those who are silent, a context which too often is seen as purely a woman's issue with the unfortunate consequence of pitting one gender against the other, a debate which attacks the contribution of someone like me as improper on gender, religious, cultural or legal grounds.

If we are what we have become as parliamentarians, then can the contribution to such a debate like that of this humble elected member, who is a married father of four, Christian Catholic, an educator and administrator in a constitutionally recognized separate school system which used to teach the family values of which I spoke a moment ago, an elected representative of the people with the vested authority to promote the best interest of society, be so summarily dismissed? I say no.

We have all come here as parliamentarians to identify and define those values and conventions which distinguish Canadians and to legislate for conditions where these values and conventions are given nourishment to make our society a paragon of harmonious productive social interaction.

Yet with Bill C-43, on so fundamental a social issue the government abdicates to the medical profession its moral and legal responsibility to make decisions regarding life and/or abortion. It requires the provinces to pay for the services consequent to that decision of retaining the right to apply legal sanction under the Criminal Code in the event, unforeseeable today, that a doctor might be unable to satisfy the most generous of guidelines, that is, his or her own personal judgment.

No, our government has an obligation to present legislation that shows purpose and suggests direction. As parliamentarians we, too, then can discharge our obligation to debate the merits of that direction and a means to its realization. Regrettably this Bill C-43 gives us neither.

It asks us to debate legislation that inadequately deals with consequences. Bereft of vision it deprives us of the opportunity to address causes and goals. As such, it represents no compromise. It represents no solution. It is unworthy of support.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have listened with great respect to the words of the previous speaker, the member for Eglinton—Lawrence. I thank him for them.

I also listened with great respect and admiration to the two speakers who preceded him. I would like to compliment the member for Mount Royal and my colleague, the member for Surrey—White Rock who spoke before her. From separate sides of the issue, they both gave sound, reasoned arguments. They are both to be commended on the strength and obvious sincerity of their presentations. It is a privilege for me to add my thoughts and words on this sensitive and emotional issue.

Each time one of us rises in this chamber to speak on any legislative change we accept a serious responsibility. While speaking we should always remain true to our own personal principles, but at the same time we should be representing the views of those who elected us. We have to balance a requirement to provide leadership with the responsibility to represent the electorate.

Each of us puts a degree of thought, discussion and research into each and every topic that comes before us. I can think of no other issue that has come before this House in the time I have been here which has required the degree of thought and serious soul searching than the moral question of abortion.

To achieve political solutions to the complex and controversial problems that come before us it is often necessary to accept compromise. On this issue, however, views are held so strongly and opinions are so galvanized that many of the people we represent are, because of personal convictions, unwilling or unable to compromise their position or their belief. The same is true for many of the members who sit in this House.

Bill C–43 is by necessity a political answer to a moral question, and as a political answer represents a compromise and moral values are not subject to compromise.

My own personal and deeply held values are that life is sacred from the moment of conception right through until natural death. We do not have the right to murder. We do not want to take upon ourselves the right to take life from the elderly, the infirm or the mentally disabled. Rather we generously provide for their well–being through our envied system of social programs. We seek to enhance the quality of their lives and I question whether this bill does enough to protect the life of the unborn.

The bill does set a moral guideline, but I do not feel the definition of health is strict enough to dramatically reduce the number of abortions actually performed in this country.

Outside this House, and I appreciate that I have not heard it included in the debate, there are some who say that abortion is a women's issue and that men should refrain from commenting. I cannot agree with that. To deny men a voice is to perpetuate the myth that men have no responsibility for pregnancy. I do not accept that.

There is an unfortunate trend in this society of ours. On this and many other issues we ignore the requirement that we should all accept responsibility for our actions. As Canadians we have legislated and protected our rights, but if this society is going to continue to reflect the values upon which it was built, we have to understand and accept the fact that responsibility must precede and overshadow rights.

We are all too willing to demand our rights. Yet, at the same time, we are far too reluctant to assume the responsibilities that go with those rights. On this particular issue, it is essential to recognize that every sexually–active person should accept responsibility for his or her actions. Bill C–43 is an attempt to balance the rights of the mother to life and health with the rights of the unborn child.

In considering those rights, I cannot help but think of the uproar that would come if a newborn baby were discarded by its parents. I would suggest that there would be countless offers of support for such an infant. Canadians from coast to coast, regardless of their income level, religion or walk of life would open their hearts and homes to help and provide for that infant. I cannot comprehend how all those same people would not show that same degree of compassion and sympathy for the unborn.

At the same time, there is another side of the issue that we cannot overlook. When we talk of compassion, we must also be compassionate toward the mother, the woman with an unwanted pregnancy. We who advocate life for the unborn have a responsibility to provide not only compassion but also economic, social and cultural support for that mother. We must provide her with choices, choices other than abortion. We have to enhance an adoption alternative. We should be willing to provide her with economic and moral support so that we encourage and enable her to continue with an unplanned and unwanted pregnancy.

It has been said by almost everybody in this debate that abortion should not be accepted as a form of birth control. In excess of 65,000 therapeutic abortions were performed in Canada last year. This is far too many. Abortion has become a far too commonly accepted procedure.

We also have to accept the sad fact that no law is going to stop abortion completely. A law cannot change the human heart. It is not going to achieve what society is unwilling to accept. Attitudes and values have to change. Those attitudes and values are formed not in legislation but in our families, our churches and our communities.

Bill C–43 does make a very important statement. It recognizes that life is sacred from the moment of conception and that it does not gain value with age. It sets a moral tone which says that Canada does not condone abortions and because it recognizes that life is sacred from the moment of conception, it should be protected, the only exception being when the health of the mother is threatened.

In a perfect world there would be no need for a law, but our world is far from perfect and Canadians are demanding a law. They will not tolerate another series of court challenges similar to those we have seen in the past year. On the 293 of us in this Chamber falls the responsibility to set a standard for Canadians. Yet within this Chamber and within Canada there is no unanimity. There is no clear consensus as to the perfect law, so we have to compromise. We have to decide whether Canadians will accept a compromise and whether those who hold to either side of the question in this House will accept a compromise.

My decision has come down to two questions. First, is no law better than one that is less than perfect? Second, what is the purpose of the law? With regard to the first question, we have seen what no law can do. I do not want to see a repeat of last summer's series of court challenges, nor do I feel will Canadians accept a decision from us that allows a repeat of those challenges.

More important is the second question. What is the purpose of the law? I have said, and I would hope everyone would accept, that we cannot legislate morality. We cannot change individual values through legislation. What we can do with the law is to set a standard. Beyond that, we must encourage our communities, our churches, our families and individual Canadians to take responsibility for influencing moral values. Although this legislation will not change what is within a person's heart, it can enforce the need for reflection and emphasize the seriousness of action.

It has been stated by some that the bill will restrict a woman's access to abortion. Those on the same side of the issue as myself fear that in reality the definition of health is too broad and there would be too few restrictions.

We need to set a standard and this is not the law that I would prefer to see. I support a more restrictive definition of health. I have decided after much soul–searching that I will vote for this bill on second reading. Further to that, I will also be urging those who truly love life to encourage others who share that love to help provide support with compassion for those with unwanted pregnancies, to help provide choices for them other than abortion.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I begin by regretting that those of us who participate in the debate at this time in the process have only 10 minutes. I truly feel that it would take me about three hours and 10 minutes to explain everything that there is in my own mind about this issue. Regardless of what I have to say tonight, it is bound to be somewhat truncated, incomplete and therefore inarticulate.

It is also the case that I wish all of the debates that we have in this House were of the quality which we are having on this particular issue. I do not want to use up too much time on this, but this is the kind of debate that those of us who participated in the McGrath committee process had in mind for a wider range of issues in the House. Although, frankly, I do not know if I could stand it if we had a lot of debate like this, because this issue is so very, very difficult. It is certainly an issue which has caused me personally no end of personal and intellectual hell since my first election campaign in 1979.

There was a time when I would have wanted to support this bill. It contains elements of what, at one time, I thought would be close to a solution. I used to say to some of my friends when we were talking about this, that what was needed was a form of decent hypocrisy when it came to this issue; that what we needed was something which was pro–life in substance and pro–choice in practice; that most Canadians were concerned not so much about the number of abortions that were taking place but about the preservation of certain values and about the preservation of the notion of their being value in unborn life. To a certain extent, this bill does that. In fact, it was described by the hon. member for Kitchener the other day, as being pro–life in substance and pro–choice in practice. It is in that respect that I wonder why so many pro-life members have decided to vote for it but I think I understand what they are doing.

I have arrived after much travail at a view that regards the use of the criminal law as unacceptable with respect to the regulation of abortion. I said this last summer, it is not something that I am saying for the first time, whether we like it or not, the criminal law is an instrument of power and an instrument of coercion. After much struggle I have come to see that much of what this debate is about is power. It is about the power relationships, if you like, between women and men; between women and society. The use of the criminal power in this case, regardless of whether it is ever used, represents a continuing offence against what so many women regard as their rightful self-consciousness as an individual person when it comes to this kind of intensely private decision.

I think the use of the criminal law is inappropriate in this case. I would have hoped that some other way could have been found. I continue to believe that many of the abortions which will be chosen, either in the context of this law if it is passed or in the context of there being no law, will be the wrong choices. I do not think that choices just by virtue of the fact that they are free choices are therefore the right decisions. But I have come to the conclusion that these right or wrong decisions have to be taken by the women involved and not by doctors and not by the state.

I could sum up my position by saying that I think the pro-choice people are right, in many cases for the wrong reasons. I have found much of the rhetoric and many of the assumptions underlying the arguments of the pro-choice position to be faulty and to contain assumptions which I reject, but as a policy, not as an inalienable exalted right, I believe that this is the way that we have to go at this point in history.

Having said that the pro-choice people were right in many cases for the wrong reasons, I also think the pro-life people are wrong for all the right reasons. Many of the things they say are values which all of us here want to uphold. Where we disagree is about whether or not those values can in fact be upheld in the way in which they want them to be upheld, through the power of the criminal law.

The law is not just a force, it is also a teacher. So I accept the argument that when we are talking about law we are talking about values. But we can give a signal about the value we put on unborn life, on children and on families in so many other ways. We can do it by not trying to de-index family allowances. We can do it by a massive attack on child poverty. We can do it in a myriad of different social and economic ways. We can send signals to perspective parents that life, in this case unborn and then young life, is something which we value. Presently, we do not send out those signals very well at all.

I might have been persuaded because I have long advocated a compromise. But, as you can see, I have changed my mind. I might have been more tempted if the compromise had provided an anxiety free period. That is to say, some period in which there might have been a complete pro-choice policy moving to a more restrictive approach in the latter part of the pregnancy. However, I am convinced, because I have had a good look at the CMA guidelines and other medical regulations, that abortions in the third trimester after viability are very rare indeed. And they should be. If it ever came to my attention that this was not the case then I would be the first one to argue that there ought to be some sanction against that practice. Yet, there just does not seem to be any evidence that there is a need for that kind of interference at this point.

One member said, and I agree, that we should never be in the situation where, in one wing of the hospital we are striving to save a premature baby and in the other wing of the hospital we are, by virtue of whatever policy we adopt, condoning the termination of the life of foetuses which are at the same stage as those who have been born prematurely.

This is where I am after 10 years of very, very difficult thinking about this. I retain my willingness to be critical of the arguments put forward by both sides in this debate. I think that in many cases, unfortunately, both the pro life and the pro choice positions have been presented in a way which is so symptomatic of our times, as a kind of instant quick-fix solution to problems which run much deeper.

The pro life forces, particularly those who operate from a religious perspective, want to have a world without sin. It cannot be done. Many of the pro choice forces want to have a world without guilt. That cannot be done either. We can have a world in which the privacy, the dignity and the intimacy which women deserve in these kinds of decisions is respected.

In the absence of the government coming forward with a bill that really tries to address some of these very difficult issues, particularly issues which I think will have to be addressed down the road with respect to early-stage abortions, when technology permits us to make more choices, not just about whether or not to have a child but what kind of child to have, questions which are not being addressed in this debate and will have to be addressed by people on both sides, sooner or later—

In the meantime, the government having failed to do that, but having succeeded in doing what I think the hon. member from Victoria said so well in coming forward with a bill to protect politicians, something under which a majority of us could huddle for protection from the various groups that have such strong opinions on this, my only alternative is to vote against the bill.

• (2120)

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate with mixed emotions. I feel relieved that we are finally seeing legislation introduced on abortion, but I must say that it saddens me deeply that at this juncture in what we believe to be our highly evolved society, we need to be debating whether we should have legislation that provides guidelines for abortion. In my view, and in the view of the majority of my constituents, there is no question guidelines are needed.

In my home province of British Columbia there are 26 abortions for every 100 live births. Yes, guidelines are needed. All members of this House, and in fact most members of the Canadian public are aware of the controversy that surrounds this issue. In fact there have been a great number of court cases involving abortion.

The most recent case that has been decided comes from the Supreme Court of Canada. As members will know, it is the Chantal Daigle case. Although decided on August 8, the court has only recently provided us with the reasons for its decision. Once again, the main message of the court comes through loud and clear. That message states that the responsibility lies on our shoulders. We, the legislators, must take action. The court does not exist to make law. There is no government by judiciary in Canada. The Supreme Court has not ventured into the realm of making law, but to its credit leaves that to the members who are gathered here. Now we are doing just that.

I am aware that there appears to be a great movement to block any action on this important issue. Once again, common sense is not so common. Nonetheless, that movement is, to my understanding, a vocal minority. The silent majority, whom I believe share my concern, are tired of waiting. They elected us to the House of Commons to take action. That is what we are doing. Some say that Bill C-43 returns us to what we had before the 1988 Supreme Court decision on Morgentaler. Some say that we will have abortion on demand. I disagree. There are three points that must be made clear.

First, by introducing a law that provides guidelines for abortion, the government is indicating that the state has an interest in the foetus.

Second, by avoiding a gestational approach, the government is recognizing that life begins at conception. If this were not the case, then the state would have no reason to regulate abortion.

Third, and most important, I believe that this legislation will stand up to a challenge in the Supreme Court of Canada. The ability to stand up to a court challenge is essential. We presently have no legal guidelines for abortion because the Supreme Court found the previous law to be unconstitutional.

The present situation of no regulation has been recognized as unacceptable. It is tantamount to anarchy. To enact a law that would subsequently fall, if challenged, would be irresponsible as it would simply result in the present anarchic situation. I find the present situation of no legislation to be unacceptable. We need a law to protect the unborn. This bill is that law. It is a step in the right direction. This is true for several reasons. It recognizes that life begins at conception. There has been no attempt at negotiating this point. By avoiding the gestational approach, the government is saying that a foetus, the unborn, is protected by the state and by the law from conception onward.

Because life begins at conception and the state has an interest in that life, the method which exists to unnatu-rally terminate that life, namely, abortion, is being controlled. This control has not been introduced in a vacuum. On the contrary, the government has learned that the Supreme Court will strike down any unconstitutional laws. Therefore, the government has provided for the rights of the woman by allowing abortion in the cases of physical, mental and psychological threats to the woman's health. This is consistent with the Charter. It does not coerce a woman to bear children under penalty of law. At the same time, it does not allow the woman to have access to abortion on demand. The balance that is apparent in Bill C–43 is consistent with our Constitution. It is not contrary, and if challenged, I believe it will not fall.

I am here in this House today at the behest of the electors of Fraser Valley East. It is only fitting to make reference to the prevailing feeling that exists in my constituency. The people of Fraser Valley East are overwhelmingly on the side of the unborn.

When I stood for election in 1984 and re–election in 1988 I did so on a highly visible platform that included among other things a pro–life component. My beliefs were not secret. The electors of Fraser Valley East knew my record on the issue of abortion. They were well aware of the position I would take and they knew the reasons why. I was not then, nor am I now, a one–issue politician. I made a commitment to influence policy. They accepted that commitment. They knew that I would not change the world. The commitment was made and it has been kept. My constituents know me and they know my position. They voted accordingly and here I am. What is it that they think on this very important issue? Like myself and many other members in this House, they think that life begins at conception. They believe that life is sacred and although concessions are part and parcel of politics there can be no compromise on these principles.

Church and state are separate. The state must be all things to all people. This is what we must hold true if we are to have the understanding and tolerant society we say we desire. This involves being true to certain underlying principles that make the existence of the state possible. Among those principles of tolerance and understanding are the principles of the preservation and sanctity of life. This is true regardless of religion or the absence thereof. That is why it was so important that this bill did not take the gestational approach. The gestational approach is simply indefensible. It draws an arbitrary dividing line between life, which is worthy of protection and life, which is not. It ignores a primary function of law, the protection of human life. There can be no compromise on the principle of when life begins. The foetus is protected from conception and that is evident in this bill.

In politics and in a plural society we realize that concessions must be made. Reality tells us that compromise is necessary.

The oft–quoted example of the British parliamentarian, William Wilberforce, and his 17–year struggle to abolish slavery stands as testimony to the need and indeed the efficacy of compromise. I might point out that it is compromise on the means not the end. The principle must remain intact.

A gestational approach is unacceptable because it would betray the principles of recognizing that life begins at conception and that life is sacred. This principle has not been compromised and that is why this legislation is a positive step in the right direction. That is why I can support this bill and believe that my constituents, although they might not be completely satisfied with this bill, would accept it. Like William Wilberforce I am willing to fight the good fight for my principles.

Although I can support this bill I do have reservations. I believe the bill would be more effective with more demanding definitions of the kinds of health risks that merit access to abortion. But it is at committee, or report stage, when we must try to strengthen the provisions of this bill and propose suitable amendments.

We need a law to protect the unborn. Having no law is unacceptable because I believe that life does begin at conception. Bill C–43 recognizes this fact. This recognition is the only reason that I can support this legislation. It is for this and the aforementioned reasons that I support this bill and I encourage other members to do likewise. The legislative committee must study this piece of legistative and report back to this House.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (2130)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE BUDGET—REQUEST FOR BUDGET WITHDRAWAL—REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, on April 28, I raised questions in the House with the Minister of Finance about the budget leaks. That was a long time ago. Since then charges were laid and the sub judice convention has been applied by the Speaker for the time being. I want to respect that. However, I want to use the opportunity here to make a very important point about the way in which this government sees its responsibility.

What I want to point out through the answers we have received to questions on a number of subjects over the last few months is that the government no longer assumes any responsibility for its moral conduct, for the proper administration of the public affairs, or for the proper discharge of the duties of ministers. The government is not prepared to give any indication of how its own responsibilities are discharged, except in one way, and that is to say if members on this side of the House have any evidence of wrong-doing we should go to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In other words, the conscience of this government has disintegrated and declined to the lowest level of behavior in the country. If it is criminal behaviour, it has nothing to say about it. Its colleagues are to be presumed innocent until proven guilty. In the meanwhile, if we have any evidence that any of them is breaking the law, we should take that to the police.

Mr. Boyer: It sounds reasonable to me.

Mr. Kaplan: Well, it may sound reasonable to the members opposite, but I understood when this present government was elected that it would operate at a level, not only which would be beyond reproach, but which would also appear to be beyond reproach. Ministers would not only behave according to the highest moral standards, which are much higher, by the way, than the standards of the criminal law, and they would appear to operate by them.

I took that to mean that when a minister or a member of the House came under a legitimate cloud of suspicion that the minister or the member would do the honourable thing while matters were being investigated, and not necessarily only those on a criminal basis. It could well simply be a breach of an undertaking, or conduct legal but unbecoming a member of the government. In that connection, I think that the public administration of Canada has deteriorated enormously under this government.

I asked about the budget leak and whether there was a state of sloppiness existing around security in the preparation of the budget. I was not necessarily talking about criminal behaviour. I did not know whether a crime had been committed in the way in which the budget was prepared and the level of security that was applied to it. I was simply asking whether the standard of security in the operations of the Queen's Printer, under the responsibility of standards which cover a number of ministries, were adequate. That is a simple question. It is not asking for a criminal investigation. The answer that I got on April 28 was: "Investigations are being conducted, Mr. Speaker, and it is entirely inappropriate to comment on them in this House". That was the answer on April 28.

Today I read a Canadian Press release, reported in nearly every newspaper in Canada, including The Globe and Mail which states:

> Budget leak investigation ended.
> The RCMP has concluded all its investigations into the leak of Finance Minister Michael Wilson's budget and does not plan to lay any more charges.
>
> Federal Solicitor-General Pierre Blais told reporters—

—(that he did not know whether the investigations were still under way).

> But Sergeant Pierre Belanger, an RCMP spokesman, said—" We have no evidence of any wrongdoing. No charges will be laid".

The excuse for not answering my question, and I quote again from Hansard: "Investigations are being conducted, Mr. Speaker, and it is entirely inappropriate to comment on them in this House."

Well, I never accepted that answer. Even if I had accepted it, the validity of that answer expires today, November 22, 1989, because according to the RCMP, investigations are now concluded. So I want to ask the representative of the minister the question that I asked which could not be answered as it was answered back in April when the excuse was given that criminal investigations were under way, as if that had everything to do with the question I was asking.

Will the minister confirm that a state of sloppiness existed around the security in the preparation of his budget? On the basis of that sloppy security, will he tell us whether he will recognize his responsibility for it?

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, first let me point out that the member began his remarks by saying that the Speaker has ruled that this subject matter is sub judice. In fact, the Speaker has made two rulings on that. I would have hoped that a former Solicitor General would respect that. It is still sub judice. Nothing has changed and it remains that way.

I do recall, however, that when the member was Solicitor General, he passed an order in council which empowered the government in peace time to release prisoners from penitentiaries who had been convicted of a criminal offence in order to make room for political prisoners who had not been convicted of any offence. A man who passes that kind of an order in council has no authority to talk about morality.

Mr. Kaplan: You are insane. I passed no such order in council.

Mr. Friesen: Emergency planning orders. You know that. You admitted it in the House.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity tonight to return to the issue of the northern air stage parcel subsidy which I raised in the House on October 27.

For the past several years going back at least to the 1970s, Canada Post has been delivering food stuff and other goods to remote communities in certain provinces and the Northwest Territories. It has been delivering these goods at a rate which is much lower than air freight rates. This service is known as the northern air stage parcel subsidy.

This service means that northern residents can purchase basic groceries and other essential goods at prices that, while still much higher than what the goods would cost in a southern Canadian city, are still much cheaper than goods delivered under commercial air cargo rates.

Previous governments subsidized Canada Post for providing this service with an annual funding allotment. They did so in order to fulfil an important public policy goal and social objective. Previous governments wanted residents in the northern and most remote parts of Canada to have access to fresh produce, fruits and vegetables and other basic groceries and goods throughout the year at reasonable and affordable prices.

The current Conservative government has abandoned this social policy objective. In 1986, without consultation with northerners, it decided to phase out the subsidy. Since 1986, the subsidy has declined by $1 million a year. The government's intention is to eliminate the subsidy totally within 15 years.

Because the subsidy has been reduced, Canada Post has decided that it must raise the northern air stage parcel rates by an average of 32 per cent. Eighty–five communities in the Northwest Territories and the northern parts of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan will be hurt by this increase. Twenty–three of those affected communities are in my constituency in the eastern Arctic.

A letter from Arctic Co–Operatives Limited to the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs, and the minister responsible for Canada Post, says the rate changes will have a devastating effect on the people of the north.

• (2140)

According to the Arctic Co–operatives, this increase means that a case of bread, now $21.49, will increase to $41.30. A case of baby's powder formula, now $13.41, will increase to $41.30. A case of Pampers, now $25.65, will increase to $56.10.

In the community of Broughton Island a loaf of bread now costs $3.45. After the increase, that same loaf of bread is going to cost $4.49. A head of lettuce now costs

$4.27. After the increase that lettuce is going to cost $5.55.

Would the members of the government and the officials of Canada Post like to pay almost $6 for a bunch of celery? What about $5 for two pounds of carrots? Even with their high salaries they would find it difficult. For the people in these remote northern communities where unemployment rates are 50 per cent and higher and most people are on fixed incomes, these prices are absolutely beyond reach. People will not be able to feed their families properly. People, including children, are going to go without. There will be health consequences and severe emotional and financial hardship and stress placed on families. These will be the results of this callous and heartless government position.

On November 2 I attended a meeting with officials from Canada Post, Indian and Northern Affairs, Health and Welfare and the hon. member from Abitibi. Also at that meeting were representatives from northern Indian and Inuit communities and groups. The meeting ended with a request from aboriginal representatives for a moratorium of one year on the proposed rate increase.

Late that evening, Canada Post issued a press release postponing the implementation of the increase from November 13 to January 31, 1990. Between November 2 and January 31 consultation is to take place with affected parties to minimize the impact of the increase.

The following day, November 3, I questioned government ministers about the postponement and was told that a working group would be set up to deal with the issues. Since that day, November 3, I have been trying to get more information on this working group. As of this afternoon, no one could tell me who is chairing the group. For almost three weeks Canada Post and Indian and Northern Affairs have been fighting over who will take the lead role. Canada Post does not want the lead role. It says Indian and Northern Affairs should have it. Indian and Northern Affairs does not want this responsibility. It says the program is Canada Post's.

Since the departments cannot agree on who will lead it, the study group is not yet officially established. Since it is not officially established, it has no terms of reference. The terms of reference will be worked out when the group meets. When will it meet? No one knows because it has not been officially established. Will there be representatives from the affected northern communities? No one can say because it will have to be discussed when the group meets and no one knows when that will be.

Due to this infighting we have already lost about three weeks of the three months that were supposed to be used for consultation. Who suffers from this delay? Not Canada Post, not Indian and Northern Affairs. But the people of the north.

Three months is too short a time to begin with. Christmas is coming and not much work will get done during the Christmas season. The postponement it seems is just an executioner's delay. Canada Post appears determined to proceed with this increase. It says it cannot continue to provide the service at current rates because of the cut-back to the subsidy.

An acceptable solution will not be found by January 31 without clear and precise political direction from the ministers who are involved. The proposed increase must be stopped, not merely postponed. The government must reverse a decision it took in 1986 to eliminate the subsidy. This increase is not justified. We have had no roads built in the eastern Arctic which would enable us to bring in our groceries more cheaply than by air; our frozen waters will not permit year round shipping. We will not accept a situation where we can have fresh fruit and vegetables during the summer months only when the ships can come in.

The government has no major economic development plans for the eastern Arctic which would increase employment and incomes. With all the tax increases over the past few years and the new proposed goods and services tax scheduled for 1991, northern incomes and standards of living are being further set back, and to put an increase of 32 per cent on basic groceries and foodstuff is absolutely intolerable.

I urge the Ministers of Indian and Northern Affairs, Canada Post and Health and Welfare to go back to their cabinet colleagues. Tell them that you did not realize how devastating this increase would be upon the northern people. Tell them the subsidy must not be eliminated, that it must be maintained at a level that will not result in Canada Post increasing its rates.

Tell them that children, single mothers, elderly pensioners, and unemployed youth will suffer the most. Ask them if they are truly willing to reduce the deficit on the backs of these people whose only offence is that they live in the north. Ask them to please put people ahead of profits.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member for Nunatsiaq has outlined the problem very clearly and he has also discussed tonight what appears to be a problem in getting on with the solution to the problem.

Several points have to be made. First, the role of Canada Post must be to provide delivery services across this country. Beyond that, when we get heavily into social policy, that rightly falls to other areas. I noted in the conclusion of the member's remarks, when he was talking about the impact of this decision with respect to the northern air stage rate increases, that this was going to be on the backs of the elderly, single mothers and so on.

I understand the concerns. The member speaks very eloquently about them, but I do not believe those are matters that fall within the ambit of Canada Post and they are much more correctly dealt with under other government programs. That is the reason that a joint or interdepartmental committee has been proposed. Two months remain before the rate increases go into effect. I would hope that is time enough for all the interested parties to get together. The hon. member says that time has already gone by before this committee has found which table it is sitting at and who is going to be bringing down the gavel as chairman. I submit to him and to those he represents that already since this announcement was made by the government on November 2 there is a delay in the increase until the end of January. This is to provide time for consultation with northerners so that those in the north and others have an opportunity to get their suggestions and proposals together. I am sure that his intervention in the House tonight is going to accelerate the process of getting that committee struck and I do think it will also be an opportunity for some of the uncertainty about this to be clarified.

I know the hon. member speaks on all his examples in graphic terms specifically about the increase of items at the retail level. In fact, the proposed rate increase will be applied of the basis of the per kilogram weight and whether that translates into the price increases that have been described in the House tonight is something that is going to have to be reviewed by this committee.

The issue is an important one. The reality of northern distribution of goods and services, and this is not through a service that is like the distribution of parcels normally through Canada Post but the special operation of northern air stage, is a unique service for a unique part of Canada. That is why the government has held back on the effort to try to have the post office in all parts of Canada from coast to coast pay its way and be responsible in delivery of services to people but with all Canadians, wherever they live, paying their fair share. It is never easy, but I hope with the co–operation of the hon. member and certainly the impetus that he has given tonight to get this interdepartmental committee moving that we can get a good result in a balanced way.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS/EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise following a question which I put on October 25 to the Minister of State for Transport. It deals with the transportation on B.C. ferries of hazardous materials and, in particular, PCBs. This issue was first raised in August by the President of the B.C. Ferry and Marine Workers Union, Lee Cochrane. It had come to the attention of the union that PCBs and other dangerous goods were being carried on B.C. passenger ferries, and that this was happening without any inspection to see whether the regulations were being complied with.

It emerged that, in fact, the Department of Transport had imposed restrictions and conditions on the transportation of dangerous cargoes on passenger ferries 18 months ago. But it also was quickly conceded by the regional people that, in fact, they did not have the staff to see whether the conditions were even being complied with. There was apparently no requirement being placed on terminal agents and others to ensure that when a truck carrying a dangerous cargo or PCBs came on a B.C. ferry that the regulations were being complied with. No notice was being given and nothing was happening to see that these very detailed lists of conditions were being met.

When I asked the minister about this back toward the end of October, the minister's reply was that we have great conditions, we have checked them all out and the conditions and restrictions are adequate, which of course, missed the point. The point was not the adequacy of the conditions. The point was the adequacy of the enforcement of the conditions.

The matter then got raised in the Auditor General's report, because as it happens the Auditor General was digging into this very situation. In his report this year he came through with a devastating attack on Transport Canada for precisely this point and others, namely, that there was not sufficient staff to inspect dangerous cargoes on ferries.

What we are looking at here is trying to prevent a disaster before it happens. This is not a partisan issue. This is one which I am sure the department is as concerned about as we are on this side of the House. What we have here is a failure on the part of Treasury Board and others in government to ensure that personnel resources are available to inspect and ensure that these regulations are being maintained.

One would have thought after all that the department would have got the message. Just the other day I received a letter from the Minister of Transport, and the minister replies finally to my September 15 letter. I received this in my office on November 1, 1989. In this reply all we got was the same old stuff: "I must emphasize that the conditions imposed were more stringent than those required by the IMDG Code or the Dangerous Goods Shipping Regulations. The Canadian Coast Guard is enforcing all such regulatory requirements." That is just not true. It is not enforcing the requirements.

What I would ask the parliamentary secretary to do is to at least acknowledge an understanding of the problem and assure the people of Vancouver Island and those who travel on B.C. Ferries—and this issue probably applies to other ferries across Canada, but we know it applies on the coast—that the government understands the problem, that the problem is grasped by the department, that there is some plan in motion to try to get the necessary inspection resources in place, that the government is going to inform B.C. Ferries staff, or require that they be informed before these shipments take place, and that there is going to be some system of inspection. The Auditor General said that the only inspections that take place are kind of annual inspections. The ferries and others are warned they are coming and that is all that happens. But there are no unpredictable spot visits.

You have had notice of this. What we ask is that the department at least acknowledge this and say that something is going to be done. In the meantime, lift the permission. No hardship is going to occur if for a two or three-month period permission to transport on passenger ferries is lifted because there are other ways of getting dangerous goods back and forth from Vancouver Island. They can be carried on non-passenger vessels.

So please, we ask, that you at least acknowledge the problem and give the people of Vancouver Island some assurance that this matter is going to be dealt with.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to address this House on the important issue raised by the hon. member for Victoria on the adequacy of the Coast Guard program to ensure that dangerous goods are safely carried on passenger ferries.

First, let me state that the health and safety of the travelling public remains a top priority of this government. With this in mind, Coast Guard inspection procedures are constantly being reviewed to ensure that marine transportation of dangerous goods in Canadian waters are effectively and efficiently controlled and monitored.

In his report, the Auditor General made specific references to the dangerous goods inspections, procedures currently being employed by the Coast Guard on vessels of either Canadian or foreign registry. The transportation of dangerous goods by any mode is subject to very strict regulations. Under the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act anyone transporting dangerous goods in defiance of the act is breaking the law.

The transportation of packaged dangerous goods by ferry is regulated by both the dangerous goods shipping regulations made under the Canada Shipping Act and the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act and regulations.

The Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act and the regulations address the classifications, marking and documentation requirements, while the dangerous goods shipping regulations address the stowage and segregation of dangerous goods aboard the ferry.

The Auditor General has noted in his report that we do investigate and conduct inspections on ferries when some specific concern exists and random inspections are also conducted.

The Coast Guard also conducts training courses for senior officers and shore management officials to ensure a full and complete knowledge of regulatory requirements, including particularly reference to the types of dangerous goods prohibited on passenger ferries and those other dangerous goods that may be subject to stowage restrictions. In addition, Coast Guard inspectors are available to provide advice and guidance to ferry safety supervisors.

The department will continue to work closely with other jurisdictions to continue to improve upon the safe transportation of dangerous goods. It should be pointed out that the Auditor General stated that the Coast Guard's mandatory inspection of safety features, regulations and examinations of mariners is well organized and well carried out.

VACANCY

LAURIER–SAINTE–MARIE, BY DEATH

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that I have been notified of a vacancy in the representation in the House of Commons for the electoral district of Laurier—Sainte–Marie, in the Province of Québec, following the death of Jean–Claude Malépart. Accordingly, I have addressed an official order to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Justice I am pleased to table in both official languages a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

STRIKING COMMITTEE

PRESENTATION OF TWENTY–FOURTH REPORT

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the twenty–fourth report of the striking committee.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure, indeed an honour, to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36 and certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions from a number of people from Kamloops, British Columbia, who point out their reasons why they are opposed to the government's goods and services tax and feel that it will bring very serious economic hardship to so many families in the area. They are asking the government to stop proceeding with this goods and services tax and go back to the drawing board in an effort to come up with a real tax reform package that is fair and just to all Canadians.

• (1110)

RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition on behalf of a number of people from all parts of Canada, including western Canada, Ontario, Quebec, Newfoundland, Alberta and Saskatchewan, who point out that one–sixth of all Canadian children live in poverty today. The percentage of children living in poverty is increasing year by year. In some provinces the figure is as high as 26 per cent of children living in a condition of poverty. They are urging the Parliament of Canada to support Private Members' Motion No. M–254 which calls upon the Government of Canada to negotiate with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition, again from western Canadians who have filled out a petition questioning the judgment of the government in its decision to curtail or reduce VIA Rail passenger service. They are asking the government to reverse that decision and actually reinvest adequate money into VIA Rail so that we can provide a first-class rail service in Canada as virtually every other western industrialized nation is doing.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present petitions on behalf of the constituents of Lambton—Middlesex, in particular the Alvinston-Watford-Bothwell area, who are objecting most strenuously to the goods and service tax because of what it is going to do to their communities and the services provided.

VIA RAIL

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from the same area objecting strenuously to the discontinuation of VIA Rail services to some areas of Canada and the stringent cutbacks that are being imposed on Canadians who depend upon the railways as a viable alternative to highway congestion and airport delays.

I am honoured to present these petitions on behalf of these constituents of Lambton—Middlesex.

ROUGE VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to file with the House of Commons today a petition that is entitled "Help Save the Rouge". Many members of Parliament have heard about the Rouge Valley in the northeast section of Metro Toronto, 5,000 acres. It really has been quite a miracle in that this 5,000 acres is still in a wildlife wilderness state.

The petitioners are asking that it remain so. This land is 80 per cent owned by the province of Ontario. The petitioners are asking that this endangered wildlife and wilderness be saved in the national interest. They join with the royal commissioner, the Hon. David Crombie, who has stated that the Rouge Valley should be protected as a natural heritage park. The mayor of Scarborough, the federal Minister of the Environment and the Save the Rouge Valley system organization have all expressed that support. They are calling on the Government of Canada to work with the Government of Ontario to establish the Rouge River Valley as a Canadian heritage land or provincial park.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have the honour to table a petition which has been deemed correct as to form and content by the clerk of petitions. This petition was signed following an information meeting on the Finance Minister's proposed goods and services tax and 27 petitioners from all municipalities in my riding point out in particular that the Conservative Government has prided itself in cleaning up the public finances and firmly attacking the serious problem of Canada's debt and deficit. They also say that the Conservative Government does not intend to mortgage Canada's future and leave future generations with a country that could not even afford to meet its people's basic needs anymore.

For these reasons, the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to quickly pass the federal sales tax reform proposal that will be submitted to it by the Hon. Minister of Finance.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting, pursuant to Standing Order 36, two petitions, one from the community of Hall Beach in my riding and one from Lake Harbour, also in my riding.

One must understand that when I present these petitions, my riding consists of three time zones. Therefore, when I present these petitions from different parts of my riding it does not mean that they are within blocks of each other. It means that they are miles apart. At the same time they are all objecting to the proposed goods and services tax.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege this morning to present three petitions that have all been certified correct as to form and content pursuant to Standing Order 36.

These petitions are signed by residents mainly from the city of Red Deer and the town of Innisfail. They ask that their names be added to the approximately 90,000 other Canadians who have called upon Parliament to revise the laws of Canada relating to extradition to allow the Minister of Justice to order the extradition of alleged or convicted criminals at any time after their apprehension in Canada, even during their period of incarceration for crimes committed in Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I too have some petitions which I am honoured to present. It relates to the GST, the gouge and swindle tax that this government is trying to shuffle through here.

The people of Spanish Room are outraged with this tax, as are the people of St. Jets and La Poile, all in my riding, and Harbour Breton. The people of Grand Bruit do not like this tax. In Ron Connor East they cannot stand for it. In St. Veronica's they are signing petitions and mailing them out to me.

In Burgeo they see what this tax is going to do to them. In Boxey, Petty Fort, Garden Cove, in Burin, in the head of Bay d'Espoir they are against this 9 per cent goods and services tax, as they are in Grey River and St. Lawrence and St. Alban's, Velorme, all over the riding of Burin—St. George's. The petitions come in, dozens and dozens of them. St. Bernard's, English Harbour West, Bortier, Burin Bay Arm, Garnish, Rose Blanche, Red Harbour, Grand Banks. Even people in Whitburn—not quite in my riding—but people over in other ridings are getting into the act. Lewin's Cove, that is in my riding. St. George's, Francois, Milltown.

Mr. Merrithew: Time.

Mr. Simmons: I am only using a word or two on each petition. I can present them individually if the minister would rather.

Mr. Merrithew: Don't waste your time.

Mr. Simmons: These people, I say to the minister, are not wasting their time. They are hoping that somebody over there is still listening. Port aux Basques, they are against this goods and services tax. In Black Tuck Cove, Port aux Bras, Isle Lamorts Marguerite—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Could I ask the member to please conclude.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to save the time of the House. Instead of presenting these petitions individually, I was reading a name from each petition. If the Speaker would prefer, I can present them separately.

Francois, they are against it. That is one group that I would like to table.

I have another group here who are also against this goods and services tax. In the Codroy Valley, Channel Port aux Basques.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been here for a long time, longer than I have and I think he knows that what he should do is summarize briefly the petitions.

• (1120)

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank you Sir. I am summarizing in the briefest possible terms. I am using no more than than the name of a community for each petition and I shall do it as quickly as I can, Sir.

Isle-aux-Morts. Mr. Speaker, these petitions I would like to table. I would like to table some petitions against the goods and services tax from the good people of Baie d'Espoir, Stephenville, and so many other communities. Kippens. I think you get the idea, Mr. Speaker, that all over the riding of Burin—St. George's in every single one of the 158 communities there are people by the thousands who are outraged absolutely by what the government is trying to ram down their throats.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for presenting petitions today.

Mr. Simmons: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, a total this time of around 4,400 people have put their names on those petitions and I hope somebody over there is listening.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of 3,412 constituents of Okanagan Centre who ask Parliament to revise the laws of Canada relating to extradition to allow the justice minister of Canada to order the extradition of alleged and convicted criminals at any time after the apprehension in Canada, even during this period of incarceration for crimes committed in Canada. The total of these petitions now stands close to 100,000.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present to this House on behalf of a number of constituents of mine, St. Louis, Domremy and Hoey, my neighbours, and a number of people from the city of Saskatoon, who humbly sheweth that the tax that is being suggested by the government is going to be difficult for them and is going to impose on them considerably during the next few years.

They call upon the government to reject the current proposal of a goods and services tax and put in place a broad tax which would be fair to all the ordinary citizens of Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, this morning I have the honour and the privilege of tabling 12 petitions, the first of a series, from people who humbly pray and call upon the government to cancel the proposed legislation on goods and services tax.

This tax will cause serious hardship and is unfair to low- and middle-income Canadians.

[English]

The rest of them are objecting strongly to the tax that will be hidden from Canadians and will be applied to virtually every single purchase they make.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, perhaps because they did not have a chance to send them to their own members, I have petitions here from residents from Saint-Hubert, Candiac, Senneville, and from all over the South Shore, the Laurentians, the Eastern Townships, and several ridings on Montreal Island, including my own, Saint-Laurent—Cartierville.

These petitions are tabled pursuant to Standing Order 36.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, the privilege and the duty of submitting to you today 15 petitions from the people of the riding of Sudbury. This is not the first time I have presented such petitions and I can assure you that they keep coming in. I have at least 30 names per petition for a total of approximately 400 names just today.

These people are extremely concerned with the proposed goods and services tax and they ask that the government reconsider imposing this tax on Canadians. They are extremely worried about the impact of this tax on their day-to-day activities and whether they will be able to continue these activities.

They are extremely concerned with the fact that the tax will apply to their heating bills. As you know, we are somewhat north of here and it is cruel to impose a tax on something as vital as heating.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, today I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by hundreds of residents of Hamilton Mountain who add their names to the approximately 25,000 that I have already brought to Ottawa. These petitioners have spoken out overwhelmingly against the government's proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax. They believe the tax is unfair and that it places an unnecessary additional burden on low and middle-income Canadians.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon this House to reject the 9 per cent goods and services tax proposal.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two sets of petitions today pursuant to Standing Order 36. The first is signed by 1,200 students of St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, Nova Scotia. This group petition includes signatures of residents of the Town of Antigonish and the county.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to ensure that VIA Rail service, serving the students of St. F.X. is not eliminated. Hundreds of these students use the train as an economical and efficient means of transportation to their respective homes in the area and there is no substitute for that existing service. The Halifax-Sydney passenger service is necessary for these students to pursue their higher education; bus service cannot accommodate their large numbers. The town and country residents have the same strong concerns over the impending loss of this service to citizens of the town and surrounding areas.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Second, I have the honour and privilege to present petitions on behalf of over 1,200 petitioners from Canso, Nova Scotia, which is also in my riding. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to intervene, as and where necessary, to protect the livelihood of the fish plant workers of Canso who are faced with the possible closure of their main industry, the National Sea Products fish processing plant.

This plant employs over 700 workers from Canso and surrounding areas, including 140 trawler workers. The effect of closure will be devastating not only to the residents of the town of Canso but to all of Guysborough county.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, last but not least, I have a petition containing several hundred names of residents of communities along the right-of-way of the Esquimalt-Nanaimo railway system who are petitioning Parliament to call upon the government to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service and, in particular, these constituents are referring to the service on Vancouver Island.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of a number of farmers from Saskatchewan. These farmers are concerned with the direction in which this government is moving in respect of agriculture in this country. They are particularly concerned over the future of orderly marketing and supply management. They are calling on the government to reinstate oats under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and for the Wheat Board to provide not only oats but barley with the same protection that wheat now has under the Wheat Board Act.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 145 will be answered today.

[Text]

AMENDMENT TO THE CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Question No. 145—Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East):

Is it the intention of the government to introduce an amendment to the Canada Elections Act to grant urban voters the same right to "swear in" at the polls on election day as is now enjoyed by rural voters and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): The government is committed to making voting easier and more accessible to Canadians. In June of 1982, the Government introduced legislation (Bill C-79) which included provisions to improve enumeration procedures. No consensus could be reached to allow this and other important amendments to the Canada Elections Act to be made prior to the last election.

On November 15, 1989 the government announced the establishment of a commission of inquiry to make recommendations on changes to be made to Canada's electoral laws.

The enumeration process will be one of the aspects of election procedures which will be examined by the commission.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate. This is a critically important issue, an issue which we as legislators I am sure have all had to struggle with. How can I discuss abortion when this is really not an abortion bill? This government has brought in legislation, Bill C–43, which it hopes will address these problems. Bill C–43 does not address the problems, Bill C–43 certainly does not correct the problems, and Bill C–43 fails the fundamental test. Therefore it must not be passed.

• (1130)

Let me deal with some of the arguments I have been hearing from both sides. The first argument is that at least now we have some legislation, inadequate as it is. It is better than having no legislation which of course is the equivalent of abortion on demand.

Let us pass this bill and get it into committee where we can make some changes. We should draft the amendments. We should approve them and incorporate them into the legislation. However, before it receives Royal Assent, we should send it to the Supreme Court on a reference to test it against the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

It is the duty of the governing party to bring forth legislation. It is also the duty of the Opposition to challenge, correct and refine this legislation. It is also the duty of this House, then, to pass or reject the proposed law. It is also the duty of Parliament to legislate. What this government has done is bring forth a neutral proposal without substance.

The proposed new abortion law has as its overriding objective the balance of interests, the rights and interests of women and society's interest, in the protection of the foetus. This legislation does not realize this objective. This legislation really satisfies no one, not those who oppose the termination of pregnancy or those who prefer choice as to whether or not to terminate a pregnancy.

The proposed legislation is contrary to this decision. It invites any third party to press criminal charges against a doctor or a woman if there is evidence that an unlawful early termination was performed; that is, an abortion that was performed without first ensuring it was in the best interest of the woman's psychological, mental or physical health.

The question of the rights of the unborn child also must be addressed. This legislation does not address this issue. If you will remember Joseph Borowski failed to assert foetal rights because there was no longer an abortion law upon which to base a challenge. The proposed legislation does not address the rights of the unborn child. As we discuss the rights of the unborn, let us attempt to remove God or religion from the argument for a moment. If we remove this from the equation, the greatest thing still left to us is life.

Even the most radical secular person, the most hedonistic person in the world, must struggle with the fundamental questions of when life begins, when life ends, under what circumstances life can be ended and when life must be protected. What authority protects this life? Is it legal? Is it medical? Is it the church, or is it a combination of all these elements?

As a society, what protection do we extend to the lives of the helpless? What protection do we extend to the lives of the dying? What protection do we extend to the aged? Better still, what protection do we extend to the life of the unborn? We must look at life in all of its phases.

At the very least, even if some scientist or theologian states that in the early stages we cannot discern human life, the full potential of human life is indisputably there. That to my mind on its own should demand some respect and caution. At the very least, the potential for life exists and should unequivocally be respected.

I think all you have to do is visit your aged mother or grandmother and kiss her tenderly or give your spouse or your friend a warm hug, take a child's hand or let an infant grasp your finger and look into his eyes, all the time remembering that the only difference between the very oldest and the very youngest is only time. Their humanity has not changed.

This legislation is about life but fails to deal with life. This legislation is deficient. Providing the doctor will accept the reasons concerning the health of the female person, physical, mental or psychological, the doctor can terminate the pregnancy.

A doctor can terminate the pregnancy from the moment of conception to the moment prior to birth. That is what this bill implies. There are no guidelines; there are no rules. This government has evaded its responsibility and shifted the onus to the medical community.

As a layman I have great difficulty understanding the medical community. On the one hand we see premature births using every available means to sustain life, the doctors using every new advancement without questions of cost to save the life of a premature child. In the same instance, perhaps in the very same hospital, they are terminating the life of an unborn child. Moreover, to augment the deficiencies in this bill, there is no precise definition of the health reasons that would allow the termination of a pregnancy.

This legislation attempts to marry two incompatible positions: that abortion should be illegal and punishable by imprisonment while at the same time available to all Canadian women based on the value judgment of the physician. There is no development of the concept of the unborn child, no requirement that the unborn child has rights which must be respected. This bill fails in this respect.

I listened with interest a couple of days ago to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development who both have diametrically opposed views, yet they both said they can support this legislation; another inconsistency from the very people who proposed Bill C–43.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Charlesbourg.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this morning to speak to Bill C–43. I will divide my speech into two sections. First, I will consider this legislation in my capacity as elected representative of the residents of the vast riding of Charlesbourg and as a legislator here in the House of Commons, and second, as a woman and mother who believes that family and children are part of the fundamental values of our society.

When I look at the positions that have developed among the people of my riding, I realize they are not much different from those taken by Canadians as a whole. There are people who are stubbornly pro life and pro choice, but most of the representations I received contained a request that the federal government act responsibly and fill the legal vacuum created by the Supreme Court's judgment in January 1988.

In the spring of that year, those of us who were sitting in the House will remember the splits that developed among members when a motion proposing three legislative options was tabled in the House for debate. Although it was to be a free vote, and despite the fact that the debate was long and intense, it was impossible to reach a consensus on one of the three options or on any of the many amendments that were presented.

At the end of this debate, many members believed that new abortion legislation would no longer be necessary. They were soon forced to reconsider that position, however. This summer, day after day, Canadians were headed to what I would call a macabre exposé of very personal problems on the front pages of our information media. This public airing causes people in my riding to reconsider their position and that the government should intervene to give this country legislation that would not be too permissive but that would nevertheless reflect Canadian realities in this respect.

Bill C–43 before the House today was not the result of a mere whim. It represents many hours of study, consultation and analysis to ensure that the proposed legislation reflects the benchmark established by the Supreme Court and based on the dictates of the canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Mr. Speaker, what strikes me in this Bill is that it recognises the health aspect. It also acknowledges that the decision is up to the woman and her doctor. Furthermore, the bill's objective is to balance the constitutional rights of women and society's interest in the protection of the foetus.

All these measures lead me to believe that the new legislation will pass the test of the Supreme Court, that a consensus will be reached in this House and that the bill will become Canada's new legislation in this area.

In a debate that is often emotionally charged, I must say that as a woman and a mother of four children, it is much harder to put one's personal convictions into perspective. Of course, I do not think abortion is necessarily the only solution. I believe that abortion should always be considered as a last resort and that women should have access to all the support they need to make such a difficult decision. It is easy to talk about abortion, whether we are pro-choice or pro-life, and it is easy to make decisions for others in hypothetical situations. One has to experience these situations, however, to realize that making this kind of decision is extremely difficult and that at this point, we need people who can give advice.

If I were to comment on the suggestions made by my colleague at National Health and Welfare, for instance, I think I would have to say that it is extremely important to ensure that all cases come before a doctor. I also think that we must have in the community people who have certain values and are able to provide advice, help and support.

Sometimes when I see demonstrations by people who are solidly pro-life, I wonder whether it would not be more useful to channel all that energy in to giving support to the people who need it.

I think that our society needs more compassion and more love, and that these fundamental values are essential if we are to make any kind of progress. People in these circumstances are often in financial difficulty, they need help and they should be given that help.

When I look at the bill, I think we have achieved a certain balance, and I must say that as a Member of the House of Commons and as a woman, I agree with the proposed measures and I intend to vote for Bill C-43 on second reading.

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak on this debate for a few minutes this morning because the debate taking place in the House over the last few days is perhaps one of the most important in terms of human values that we will have in this Parliament for some time to come.

The preamble of the Constitution of this nation states that Canada was founded on principles recognizing the supremacy of God and the rule of the law. I accept those principles, but I further believe in the sanctity of human life, and I will work and fight to protect the rights of unborn children.

The law, however, that was intended to provide protection to the unborn was struck down on January 28, 1988, but interestingly enough not by a unanimous decision of the court. Since Parliament is the only body that can enact legislation to protect the lives of unborn children, we as elected members of this institution have a responsibility to bring forward a law that is workable and practical but at the same time protects unborn children.

The recent voter survey conducted by one of our colleagues in the other place reveals that 59 per cent of Canadians were not aware that there were one million abortions approved in Canada since 1969. Most of those were paid for by medicare. Yet 66 per cent of those surveyed believed that life begins at conception, while 73 per cent of those considered an unborn child at any stage a human being.

If we then consider the results of the survey, first that life begins at conception, that an unborn child at any stage is a human being, then of course the current status of this issue is nothing more than a wanton disregard for human life.

The medical legal protection of foetal life dates back to the Oath Of Hippocrates, 460 to 377 BC, which predates the birth of Christ. This oath states: "I will give neither a deadly drug to anyone who has asked for it, nor will I make a suggestion to this effect. Similarly, I will not give to a woman an abortion remedy". I have to suggest to this House today that if this proposed legislation, Bill C-43, goes through, it flies directly in conflict with that Oath of Hippocrates.

The letters I have received on this issue are running 50 to 1 against abortion, but there are three in particular that stand out above all others. These are from doctors in my constituency. I want to read excerpts from them into the record today. I quote the first doctor:

> I would encourage the defeat of this legislation in order to obtain more effective legislation which will protect the rights of the unborn child and ultimately the health of the mother. There is conclusive evidence that the action of abortion has serious health consequences on the mother as well, and we need to give consideration to their well-being also.

Another letter states:

The government which fails to protect the lives of the people within its care, no matter how young or old, is a moral failure. The institution has been established to assume some degree of moral authority. The Canadian government demonstrates this in regard to many human rights by making laws against murder, assault, racism, et cetera, and by promoting equality for all Canadians. Is a request for the protection of life too much to ask of one's own government?

The third letter states:

I am writing to express my concern over the lack of protection in Canadian law for the life of unborn children. Abortion at any stage of pregnancy is the deliberate killing of an innocent human being. To say that this is a woman's right to have control over her own body totally ignores the reality of fact that there are two or more lives involved in a pregnancy. A woman has legal rights over her own body but she (and all society) has a moral obligation to protect the helpless being in her womb.

At this time we are seeing the tragic spectacle of women—fighting through the courts to have her unborn child destroyed although she is now at the stage of pregnancy when the child, if born, could probably be saved.

Other abortions differ only in that the baby generally would have no chance of survival.

I urge you to fight in the House of Commons for a law giving total protection to the unborn.

These three doctors—two of them are family doctors from my constituency—who took the time to write on this issue before us today have said it all and probably much more eloquently than I did. Their depth of knowledge, their respect for human life and their moral principles must reflect the feelings of thousands of Canadians across this nation.

• (1150)

When we examine this bill before the House today, we find that it really creates no legally imposed delays or obstruction to obtaining a legal abortion other than the necessity to consult with other doctors. Of course, if the first doctor does not agree, you would go on to others, hoping that you would find one who would. In fact, this bill as it sits before this Parliament today is not far from being abortion on demand.

I fully realize that this bill is at second reading debate and that debate is on the principle of this bill. Therefore, in the parliamentary process it will go on to committee, to report stage and then on to third reading. I want to call on the government at this point either to bring forward amendments or to be receptive to amendments of members of this House that will provide protection to unborn children.

As I indicated earlier, there are two or more lives involved in a pregnancy. While I clearly accept the exceptions to save the life of the mother, this bill does very little to save the lives of unborn children. At this point in the debate I believe that I would be remiss if I did not remind members of the House that it is stated in the preamble to our Constitution that we believe as Canadians in the supremacy of God.

The Bible itself mentions repeatedly—and it is on this Bible that we as members took our oaths—in Genesis 4:1, Jeremiah 1:5 and Job 33:4, children in the womb. A child conceived in the womb develops in the womb and is born from the womb.

Therefore, if we accept the supremacy of God as stated in the preamble to the Constitution, then we in turn have an obligation to accept the teachings of the Bible. Consequently, we must also accept the fact that a foetus is a child or a human being and as such this nation has a duty to protect unborn children, to preserve their right to be born and to enjoy the rights and obligations of human beings.

As those of us in this House realize, those of us who are older, life itself takes on a new meaning. I as a farmer never cease going out in the spring of the year to the fields and the pastures. Life is all about us. We see the birds, the animals, the new growth, the trees, the grass and the flowers. There is a sense of nearness to one's Creator, our Creator who said: "Suffer the little children to be brought unto me."

This debate is about human life. We are debating human life, the lives of unborn children, and I ask members of this House to consider the lives of these unborn children above all else.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to reaffirm and to expand on remarks I made in this House on this topic last year.

After that court decision in the Morgentaler case I canvassed my constituents to seek their opinion as to three possible courses of action. The first would be to permit abortion only when the mother's life or physical health was in danger. The second would permit abortion without restriction. The third choice would permit abortion without restriction during the first 16 weeks and thereafter, only where the mother's life or physical health was in danger.

Some 64 per cent chose option one; 9 per cent, option 2; and 24 per cent, option 3. The clear majority of the people in my riding believes that abortion should be allowed only if the mother's life or physical health is endangered. Indeed more women respondents than men supported that position.

It happens that I agree with the majority of my constituents, but even if I did not I believe that where there is a clear expression of opinion within a constituency and, in the absence of party discipline, a member ought to respect the wishes of his constituents.

As a Christian and one whose personal philosophy is respect for the basic worth of the individual, the sanctity of human life and the primacy of the family in our society, I believe that, in so far as is possible, every human life from conception should be given a chance.

This latest chapter in the abortion debate began in January of last year when the Supreme Court in the Morgantaler case struck down Section 251 of the Criminal Code on the grounds that the procedures deprived the pregnant woman of the right to security of her person under Section 7 of the Charter. Since that time Canada has been without a law.

The government attempted to fill the void in July 1988 with a compromise resolution based on the gestational approach. This proposal along with five others ranging all the way from classic pro-life to pro-choice was debated and voted on, all six questions were defeated in this House, and Canada was left without a law.

In March 1989 the Supreme Court rejected the Borowski appeal because Section 251 had already been struck down. When the judges refused to rule on the rights of the unborn in the abstract, they indicated again that it was up to the legislature to make law.

Then came the Dodds and Daigle cases in the summer of 1989. The media spectacle accompanying these cases made it obvious that we could not continue to live in a state of lawlessness. It is up to the federal government to exercise leadership in filling this void.

The division of legislative powers under our Constitution is such that the only area under which the federal government has the appropriate authority is the criminal law. If this issue is not dealt with under the criminal law, then it must devolve to the provinces with the prospect of more chaos. Consequently, the government has brought forward this compromise, Bill C-43.

Last week the Supreme Court in the Daigle v. Tremblay case noted that the courts have consistently concluded that to enjoy rights the foetus must be born alive. The court went on to address the matter of a potential father's rights and concluded "that no court in Quebec or elsewhere had ever accepted the argument that a father's interest in the foetus which he helped to create could support a right to veto a woman's decision in respect to the foetus she was carrying."

In short, the courts are saying that for a foetus to enjoy certain rights before birth or for a potential father to exercise any possible rights, there must be substantive legal reasons. There must be legislation—a decision taken by legislators based on social, political, economic, and moral choices.

Here we are again in November 1989 revisiting this issue, an issue which Parliament failed to resolve in six free votes in the summer of 1988, an issue which the courts have clearly indicated belongs to the people of Canada as expressed through their elected representatives, an issue on which Canadians in all walks of life are divided, an issue on which individual Canadians are sincerely and honestly at odds with each other.

It is important that all Canadians understand the procedure involved in dealing with Bill C-43 which the government has proposed as a compromise to end the current state of lawlessness. Bill C-43 makes it an offence to induce an abortion unless the procedure is done by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that if the abortion were not induced the health or life of the female person would likely be threatened.

We are currently debating this bill at second reading. Under the rules of this House no substantive amendments as to the content of the bill are allowed at this stage. Members will vote yes or no. If they vote no, the bill fails and we revert to a legislative void. If the answer is yes, then the bill goes to a legislative committee composed of 15 members from all sides.

The legislative committee can hear witnesses, receive submissions, propose and vote on amendments, and then report the bill back to the House where it will be voted on. This is called report stage. At report stage members other than those on the legislative committee can also propose amendments. Obviously there will be amendments and there will be opportunities for members to vote on these amendments at report stage.

At the final stage, third reading, there will be further debate and an opportunity to vote for or against the finished product. Bill C–43 does recriminalize abortion. Bill C–43 does reject the gestational approach. Bill C–43 presents a health standard in determining grounds for ending unborn life. That is important because if the day ever comes when we as a society arbitrarily measure the value of life by its stages, we are on a very slippery slope.

• (1200)

Bill C–43 is opposed by pro–choice people who want no law at all. It is equally opposed by pro–life advocates who would restrict abortion further. Indeed one such pro–life advocate said to me that this bill is worthless, it would be better to have no law at all. With respect, I disagree. It is the pro–choice advocates who want no law. It is the New Democratic Party that wants unrestricted access to abortion. I cannot and will not support that position.

Therefore I intend to support this bill on second reading in order to get it to the legislative committee. This will allow for witnesses and for amendments and for the possibility of changes which might improve the bill. I believe it would be wrong to defeat the bill at this stage. To do so would not only deny the opportunity to work on the bill and to improve it but would also return the nation to a state of lawlessness.

Clearly we must have a law. We have laws to regulate the speed of vehicles and where they can park. Surely it is not too much to ask for a statement as to the validity of life itself, a law that reflects our beliefs, that a living being is involved and that life has value regardless of its stage of development. If it is easy and straightforward and acceptable to terminate life near its beginning, then is it any great leap forward towards ending life at other stages in circumstances where there may be inconvenience or cost? What comfort will there be for the elderly, the handicapped, the sick and, ultimately, for those who see things differently from those in power?

What is it that separates our society from past totalitarian regimes? Surely one characteristic is that of reverence and respect for life, whether at the beginning or near the end or indeed at any stage.

In closing I want to touch on a couple of peripheral issues. One relates to demographics. Declining birth rates and population trends indicate that Canada will not be able to sustain its present population, let alone increase it, without immigration. By the year 2015, if present trends continue, there will be almost as many Canadians 55 years of age and over as there will be in the 25 to 54 age group. This projection raises serious questions about our ability to pay for pensions or medicare or care for an aging population. Ironically, every statistic points to the need for a policy to promote and encourage a higher birth rate in this country.

I do applaud the establishment of a royal commission to examine the implications of the new technology available to human reproduction as well as the economic ramifications thereof. I would have preferred that the mandate be widened to encompass not just the host of questions surrounding reproductive technology but also those of euthanasia, suicide and all issues of intentional intervention in the human life cycle. The sanctity of human life runs through all of these issues.

Finally, I want to commend members on all sides for their participation in this debate. I have listened intently to their positions, some quite opposed to mine, but all sincere and all reflecting the profound challenge before us; to address an issue in which the views of virtually every individual Canadian differ in some degree, some irreconcilably.

Members of Parliament can do only that which is possible. Sometimes, indeed most of the time, we arrive at compromises. The result may not be what we would have preferred as individuals but it is the best that we can do collectively. Whatever happens, there must be every effort made to assist and improve adoptive processes. Whatever happens, we must encourage efforts toward greater understanding, heightened awareness and, most important of all, individual responsibility.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak against this bill. The reason I am speaking against it is that while it appears to support the pro-choice position that insists that the question of abortion is a matter between a woman and her doctor, in fact it is exactly the same position that was taken in the previous abortion legislation which was overturned by the Supreme Court. This legislation leaves the decision not up to the woman but up to the doctor. A woman may attempt to choose a doctor that supports her viewpoint on abortion but, in fact, the doctor has the final decision on whether that woman should carry a foetus to term or should have an abortion. That is precisely the question that the Supreme Court dealt with in Morgentaler and struck down.

Essentially it is a repeat of the legislation that we had a few years ago where the government set up in the Criminal Code a therapeutic abortion committee that was appointed by hospitals which performed abortions. What this legislation does is reduce the number of people on that committee from three to one. It still leaves the decision as to whether an abortion can be performed up to the doctor rather than the woman herself. That is the problem with this legislation and that is the reason why I intend to vote against it.

This legislation, in my view, is anachronistic and atavistic. It is based on the idea that the reproduction functions of a woman have a third party interest in them. In the past the husband or the father saw the woman as a chattel, as a piece of personal property. Our laws considered a woman to be a chattel of her husband or father. In a modern pluralistic society which recognizes the rights of all individuals, this type of primitive, atavistic belief simply cannot prevail and I am surprised that it is being restated in this legislation.

The decision with respect to abortion should be a decision solely of the woman in consultation with any doctor, medical person or other authority that she chooses to consult. I must reiterate that the decision itself should remain with the woman involved and not with the doctor.

As I said, there was a time not long ago when we considered in our legislation and in our society that women where the chattels of their fathers until such time as they became the chattels of their husbands. It has only been within the last seven decades that women have had a right to vote in this country, to exercise the same right in politics that males in our society have exercised for hundreds of years. Women have only had the right to vote for the past seven decades.

It has only been within the past four or five decades that women have been considered persons with respect to their rights before the law. Our society has not advanced very far from a very primitive view of women, and the legislation that we are debating today is actually a return to that primitive view of women as chattels of their husbands or their fathers. But there is a bit of a difference in this legislation in that the government appears to be nationalizing the interest that the husband or the father had in his chattel and making it an interest of the state in the reproductive functions of women. I do not believe that is a right, proper and democratic thing to do in a society such as ours.

The decision to proceed with an abortion, as other speakers have indicated, is not an easy decision for anyone to make. I can recall when in my family we were looking forward with hope and expectation to the birth of our children. As our children go into high school and university and begin to select a career we continue to look with hope and expectation upon their prospects for the future. It is very enjoyable for parents to be able to do that. But that is not a privilege that all parents in our society enjoy.

To some parents, and especially single parents who are living in poverty or living in difficult circumstances, the possibility of having another child is looked upon with horror. In fact, it is an expectation which causes the family to lose hope for the future and in some cases it is just considered another mouth to feed in a poor family that has difficulty feeding the children they already have. It is an extremely difficult prospect for some of those families to face. Those families feel that in our society they have absolutely no alternative.

The American Medical Association polled all of its members a few years ago and asked what the major medical problems faced by different groups of their patients. The major medical problem facing teenage girls was pregnancy and the second was acne.

So it is a serious problem facing children in both Canada and the United States. When we consider that the major concern of teenage girls who go to physicians is pregnancy and the second one is acne, we are dealing with a serious difficulty in this country. When a teenage girl becomes pregnant she does not look on that with the same hope, expectation and excitement with which the rest of us look upon that prospect, she looks at it as something that is going to interfere with her schooling, destroy her career and, in fact, destroy her life as she chooses to live it. It is an extremely difficult prospect for that teenage girl to face.

Doctors are not necessarily all that sympathetic. They may adopt a very narrow view of what constitutes psychological, mental and physical health. That teenage girl will be dependent on the doctor to make a decision as to whether her career is going to be destroyed, whether her school is going to be interrupted, or if she is going to be facing a career which involves poverty, low wage levels and a dead end. So it is a serious problem.

But, in spite of that, no one faces the prospect of having an abortion with anything but extreme concern. As I said, most of us in this room look forward to having children with hope, expectation and excitement, but many people in Canada see it as a terrible prospect which will destroy their future. They look upon abortion in the same way because, having the understanding that the process to create a human life has already been put into effect, no one likes to terminate it, even with all of the terror with which it is anticipated.

This legislation does nothing to help people address that prospect. It does nothing other than give the potential to recriminalize abortion and make the abortion extremely difficult for the women who have to face that prospect.

I find that strange because there are many things that this government could do in order to make abortion the less desirable choice. This is the government that has cut back on assistance to family planning organizations in Canada. This government refuses to fund the availability of birth control information and birth control apparatus to people across Canada.

I think there are three ways that we could reduce abortions in Canada without recriminalizing it. One is to make birth control information and apparatus widely and freely available so that abortion is not an option to be considered. The second is to make access to abortion available to everyone in Canada in the event that that birth control apparatus fails. The third and most important is for this government to reverse its policies and to start supporting families financially and socially so that the prospect of raising children in Canada is not a horrible one of poverty and abuse but one in which you can raise children free of poverty in happy surroundings and with a prospect of a great future. That should be the object of the government's policy to reduce abortions in this country.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak on Bill C–43. Abortion is a very difficult issue. Over the last year I have received numerous communications from my constituents. Abortion was raised by many people during the last election campaign as I travelled throughout the riding knocking on doors to encourage people to consider electing me as their member of Parliament. During that process I heard from those who represented a very solid pro–life position. I heard from those who represented a very solid pro–choice position. I also heard from those who fell somewhere in between. Consistently I was asked my views on abortion and I was very clear in my position to my constituents on several points. I said that I felt that abortion should not be available on demand and that abortion should not be available simply at the call of an individual, but that I would accept that abortion should be available for specialized circumstances and I had some examples of that.

That answer satisfied neither the pro–life people nor the pro–choice people, but that was my personal feeling. I did say to my constituents that this bill would be a free vote in the House of Commons, as was promised by the Conservative Party, and that I would give my constituents ample opportunity to reflect and to advise me of their wishes as to how I should vote on this issue. I did say to them that I would not necessarily be bound by every specific representation because you can appreciate that if you get 160,000 representations you cannot satisfy them all.

I made the point of meeting with as many people in my constituency as possible and they included the Knights of Columbus in Whitby, various pro–choice people, organizations from Whitby and Ajax, various right–to–life groups from Whitby, Ajax and Pickering and individual citizens. I have an open-door policy in my constituency and if a resident wants to meet with their MP I am available and I will discuss the issues. I do not necessarily need to know in advance what they want to talk about. I had people through my offices who told me in advance that they wanted to discuss abortion and others who simply made appointments and we discussed it while they were there.

I have received many submissions from my constituents on this issue. I did promise my constituents that I would canvass them and learn what they had to say as a group on this particular issue. This I did and I would like to share with you some of the things I learned from them.

In a householder that I sent out early September I asked my constituents many questions on the issue of abortion. They responded with almost 3,300 responses. In fact it was 3,299 at the point when this particular summary was prepared and I think it is probably representative. I have received some additional responses since I prepared these numbers but clearly my constituents have an opinion on the issue of abortion and I would like to share that with members here today and maybe in this way you can appreciate my position on this.

I asked about 17 questions on abortion. The first question I asked was whether the government should pass a law dealing with the issue of abortion. Without asking them to say whether they were for or against or anything else, I asked whey they wanted the government to act on this issue. Eighty-seven per cent of the respondents said yes, and I am happy to say that the government is in fact doing that.

The second question was whether the government should ban abortion outright. The question was very clear, very specific. It said that under no circumstances would an abortion be allowed. My constituents again responded; 19.7 per cent said yes. Of course there is a corollary to that question and that is whether we should legalize abortion on demand for any reason at any time. Thirty-two per cent said yes.

So there you have the view of my constituents. Half of them have said that it is either yes or no completely. The other half came in with the answers to the balance of the questions.

Because I felt that my constituents should have the opportunity, as I did, to feel that maybe there are some circumstances where an abortion should be available to the individual, I asked a number of questions on that side.

• (1220)

For example, I asked whether my constituents believed that abortion should be available to a victim of rape. Four times as many said yes as said no. Did my constituents believe that abortion should be available to a victim of incest? Four times as many said yes as said no. Should abortion be available when the health of the mother is involved? Sixteen times as many said yes as said no. Should abortion be available if there was proven circumstances that there was a deformity with the foetus? Three times as many said yes as said no.

I also asked various questions relating to the gestational approach because in September, without knowing what the legislation was going to say, it was thought that maybe the legislation would allow abortion based on a gestational approach. I asked my constituents whether abortion should be available in the first eight weeks without question. Eighteen per cent said no, 14 per cent said yes. As to whether it should be available in the first 12 weeks it was 20 per cent no versus 13 per cent yes. At 16 weeks it was 22 per cent no, 9 per cent yes. At 20 weeks it was 24 per cent no. It went all the way up to 28 weeks and it got to 25 per cent no.

Very clearly, as my constituents have indicated by this response, they were not interested in a gestational approach and I note that the bill does not have that. Of course I was not aware that it was not going to be in the bill, but my constituents have clearly indicated to me they did not want me to support a bill that included a gestational approach.

I also asked my constituents whether both parents have the right to input on the decision on an abortion. I do have responses from both males and by females to my survey. I can tell you that they consistently agreed all the way through until I came to this question. More men thought they should have input in the decision of abortion, that both parents should be involved, than did the women. The women very clearly said that it was not the decision of both parents. Although the men felt clearly that it was not both parents' decision, they did feel a little more strongly on this issue.

Family finances was discussed. I asked whether abortion should be available for family finances if there was a problem in that area. Again my constituents said no. I asked whether abortion should be available if the mother was mentally handicapped. The answer was clearly yes.

There was a question about the age of the mother, whether abortion should be available because of the age of the mother. I left the interpretation of that question to the view of the respondent. Clearly they said no, that should not influence the availability of abortion.

Very clearly my constituents have put some rules in place. They have suggested to me that I ought to support some legislation. I can only conclude that this bill in fact does what my constituents have asked me to do. I will be supporting this legislation because I think it goes a long way towards what my constituents have indicated to me very clearly. Personally I might prefer a little more tightness in the bill but I will be supporting this bill because that is what my constituents have indicated they want.

I thank you for the opportunity to present to you the views of my constituents and my personal view on why I will be supporting this legislation.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, ten minutes is a very short time to deal with a very complex and difficult question, so I will try to be brief.

I intend to vote in favour of the motion that Bill C–43 be read a second time. I shall do so not because I like this bill in its present form, but because I believe that Canadians abhor the current legislative vacuum. They want legislation that will protect the unborn adequately. They want a law based on the principle that abortion is socially and morally unacceptable as a birth control device.

The bill now before the House is deeply flawed. It is vague and ambiguous in many crucial respects, however the bill gives us a starting point. It can be amended in committee. If we refused even to give this bill second reading and to send it to a committee, as parliamentarians we may have lost an important opportunity to fill this legislative vacuum. If we throw out this law now, we may be for a long time without a law. So I will vote to allow this bill to go forward to the committee stage. There it can be clarified, strengthened and improved.

I urge the Minister of Justice to give the legislative committee that will consider Bill C–43 ample time to hear expert testimony, to obtain clarification of various provisions and to formulate amendments to improve the bill. I would urge too that the government permit ample time for members on all sides of the House and all sides of this debate to express themselves in this debate and, most importantly, that contrary to common legislative strategy we be given notice well in advance of the timetable for this legislation. Let us not deal with this as a partisan matter.

There will be much for the legislative committee to do. The bill is short but there is much in it that requires clarification. Perhaps the provision subject to the widest scope for interpretation is the portion of subsection (1) of revised Section 287 that makes it not a crime for a medical practitioner to induce an abortion if, in his or her opinion, the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened.

Subsection (2) proposes for greater certainty that health means physical, mental and psychological health. Also, it defines opinion to be an opinion formed using the generally accepted standards of the medical profession.

In the background information accompanying this bill we are informed by the government that based on majority reasons for judgment in the Morgentaler case, permitting an abortion if the psychological health of the woman is threatened is constitutionally required.

We are also informed in the background information that while the bill does not specifically refer to eugenics, rape, incest, socio-economic welfare, or other reasons for seeking an abortion, these factors could be included in the determination of health if their effect was to threaten a woman's health.

These explanatory notes do not provide much guidance to medical practitioners, to women seeking an abortion, or to Canadians generally as to what circumstances will allow a doctor to induce an abortion. They raise as many questions as they answer.

There are inherent risks and stresses in every pregnancy. However, modern medicine combined with the facilities available in most Canadian hospitals means that these risks and stresses can be controlled to such a degree that few Canadian women need fear lasting damage to their physical or even psychological well-being as a result of carrying a baby to term.

Indeed, as far as psychological health is concerned, there is evidence that an abortion may cause long-term negative effects. Should we expect qualified medical practitioners to deny virtually all requests for abortions under this bill if it becomes law? Is that the purpose of the bill? If a woman in robust health receives an abortion by a qualified medical practitioner under this law, should the casual observer conclude that section 287 of the Criminal Code has been violated? Is that what the government intends? Would it be the responsibility of such a casual observer to bring such a practitioner to justice for violating the Criminal Code? Just how would this be done?

Alternatively, is the provision relating to health to be interpreted as meaning that if a woman merely claims that her health will be threatened in some way by carrying the baby to term, a medical practitioner may agree to the abortion provided that performing the abortion would not, in his or her opinion, endanger her health or life?

Setting aside the difficult case of eugenics, rape and incest the claim might be that due to her "socio-economic circumstances" her health, physical, mental or psychological may be threatened, in which case the medical practitioner will be required to determine whether that was merely an excuse or a legitimate claim.

The explanatory notes provided by the government suggest that socio-economic circumstances would qualify as grounds for abortion if they threatened a woman's health. There are those who argue that socio-economic circumstances on their own would be sufficient justification for an abortion. If the government agrees with that view and intends that socio-economic circumstances be grounds for an abortion, this should be clearly specified in the bill as an additional reason for permitting an abortion. Obviously, if that is to be the effect of the bill, I shall vote that this bill not pass this House.

I am not insensitive to the socio-economic difficulties which many women, in particular single mothers, face. These difficulties call for positive action on the part of governments. They call for progressive day care legislation to enable women to participate in the workforce without compromising the care they give to their children. They require more determined enforcement of legislation regarding child support so that fathers will contribute their share to the financial needs of children. They require education on family planning. Abortion is not a remedy. It is not a solution. This bill does not address these difficulties.

What is required is far more than simply a law to put abortion back into the Criminal Code. What is required is a comprehensive policy designed to bring down the number of abortions, whether legal or illegal, in Canada. This goal would be sought by education, by reducing the number of unwanted pregnancies, by support for adoption, by progressive workplaces with pay equity and day care programs that recognize the contribution of child-bearing women, and abortion legislation is a necessary part of that program.

If we were at third reading stage, I would vote against this bill, but this is only second reading stage. I abhor the legal vacuum which has persisted in this country for almost two years. We must make an honest effort to get a good law on the statute books. It may be possible to amend this defective bill at the committee stage between second and third reading. For example, it may be possible to strike out the vague, imprecise reference to the health of the pregnant woman. I hope so, because if the defects of the bill are not corrected by the committee to which it is sent, I shall vote against the bill at third reading.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-43, an Act respecting abortion, since I am sure you will agree this is a very important and very delicate subject for Canadians and for the people in the riding of Terrebonne, which has not escaped the heat of this debate.

As you know, there has been a great deal of debate and a lot of controversy about this very important matter, which on some occasions, proved to be very divisive. All this makes for an extremely delicate and, above all, controversial issue, depending on whether one is pro–life or pro–choice.

Mr. Speaker, despite ideological differences, recent events and especially what happened last summer have shown that as legislators we must act responsibly, show leadership and play our role as elected representatives in this House.

How do we define that role, Mr. Speaker? I think it was our duty was to introduce a bill that, while considering two main realities, would provide a legal framework that respects the individual rights and freedoms recognized in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and also considers Canadian society's interest in protecting the foetus.

Mr. Speaker, this balance is not easy to achieve. However, as the Supreme Court said in the Morgentaler decision, the rights of one party should not necessarily be exercised to the detriment of the other party. You will agree this leaves us with very little room to manoeuvre. If we really want legislation that is constitutionally acceptable, in other words, that passes the test of a legal challenge before the Supreme Court, I believe it is imperative to respect this balance and, above all, to resist the temptation to give it a pro–life or pro–choice image, which would have the effect of destroying this delicate balance.

Bill C–43 makes abortion a medical decision that a woman and a doctor make, based on health reasons, health being defined as physical, mental and psychological health.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, this bill recognizes that only the woman will make the decision to terminate her pregnancy, a decision which clearly is not easy for a woman to make. It is a very difficult decision and as for any medical procedure, this decision will be subject to a physician's diagnosis, as is now the case anyway, Mr. Speaker. Someone asking for a surgical operation or medical treatment must submit to a doctor's diagnosis.

The bill also states that abortion is a medical procedure which must be performed by a qualified medical practitioner. Personally, I am satisfied with that because it will criminalize illegal abortions, those which are performed outside the legal framework, and this can be considered protection for women.

Mr. Speaker, the foetus is also protected because the decision must be based on health reasons, not frivolous reasons or any reason at all, but on health reasons.

This new legislation will be part of the Criminal Code. This raises the whole issue of "recriminalizing" abortion. Certainly it would have been preferable not to do that, but what credibility would a law have without penalties for those who break it, in a country where Parliament can regulate abortion at the national level only through the Criminal Code! Let us make it clear that abortion is not being made a crime to the detriment or on the backs of women; rather, physicians will have to comply with the law.

In my opinion, it would have been preferable not to legislate in this area, but Canadian society does not see it this way and we are here to represent all the Canadian people.

This bill is not intended to, and will not, change the personal opinions of one and all, nor will it change deep convictions, people's moral convictions, whether for or against abortion.

The day after this law takes effect, Mr. Speaker, those who are deeply pro–life will remain pro–life and those who are deeply pro–choice will remain pro–choice. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I would be completely opposed to a law that would impose one set of moral values instead of another or to the detriment of another. Who am I, Mr. Speaker, to say that a woman who wants her rights respected is wrong? Or that someone who attaches very great value to the life of the foetus is not right?

When I was elected to Parliament, Mr. Speaker, it was not to become unduly involved in the personal moral values of my constituents and people in general. It was certainly not to impose anything on anybody in that regard, especially not my own point of view.

This issue touches on the deepest moral convictions of each and every one of us and I am not here to play the role of a religious leader, which I would refuse to do in any case. My role as a member of a legislative body is to put in place a balanced legislative framework which will avoid unnecessary suffering and I intend to play this role fully, Mr. Speaker.

I must tell those who would be tempted to use legislation to reduce the number of abortions in Canada and to use it restrictively to limit access to abortion that they are wrong. Never will we achieve that result with a law on abortion. All we need do is implement a coherent family policy, enhance the role of mother and father, urge Canadians to acknowledge that the birth of a child has tremendous social value, and then I am sure that fewer women will opt for the ultimate resort—abortion.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, restrictive legislation would amount to nothing more than a temporary way out. Just as the old act was thrown out by the court, a more restrictive piece of legislation would probably suffer the same fate for the same reasons. So it is imperative that we understand that any abortion which might upset the balance of the Bill would be utterly unacceptable. People must be told that any amendment designed to prevent a woman from securing an abortion would fly in the face of her rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We would have the impression that the law is in the statute books, but the minute it would be challenged before the Supreme Court, it too would be invalidated, just as the preceding legislation was.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must confess that the abortion issue was a thorn in my side during the last election campaign, and I have found it very difficult to deal with this matter ever since I was first elected to this House. Why? In all likelihood because when I considered the question I was biased by my personal convictions. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have grown to appreciate the fact that my role here, as I said before, is not to impose any concept or moral value on anybody. Our role is to see things just as they are within the context of the Canadian people and to set up a legal structure which can be accepted and which will do away with the kind of difficult and dramatic situation women have to live through, as we saw last summer.

I received a lot of comments, advice and mail from my constituents on the subject of abortion. However complex the whole issue may be, I feel that the Bill under consideration strikes a proper balance and as Member for the riding of Terrebonne, Mr. Speaker, I intend to give this measure my full support.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): As a Member of this House who is both a woman and the mother of four children, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is important for me to deal with this new abortion bill which, by failing to take a positive stand in an effort to please everybody, settles nothing and creates a new problem.

Abortion was liberalized in January 1988, when the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that under the Criminal Code, anybody who compels a woman to carry a foetus to term is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to legal proceedings. In spite of this decision, women are still faced with the same difficulties when they try to obtain adequate care for the purpose of terminating their pregnancies. The whole approach varies from one province to the next. In some regions, the woman who manages to secure the assistance of a physician for this purpose is considered something of a phenomenon.

In my view, it is clear that in an ideal society with its long term assistance and support services and its really efficient educative and preventive programs an abortion policy would no longer be required. Unfortunately, this is not the case. Far from it! We are still very much afraid of what the neighbours will think, we live under constant social pressure, and we are concerned with the individual freedom to make a difficult choice and to live with it. If we really want to encourage women to carry their pregnancy to term, we can do it in a practical way. We can make sure that they have easy access to adequate, abundant and affordable day care services, that they are entitled to maternity leave and decent subsidized housing, that they get legal assistance in cases of incest and family violence and that they are assured of automatic alimony payments. In short, Mr. Speaker, we should provide women with the support they need to care for their children, especially in a way which is equitable for all.

[English]

Unfortunately, the bill presented by the government does not even attempt to address the issue of alternative services. Instead of threatening women and their doctors with the heavy hand of the law, the government should have instituted programs that would provide women with real alternatives. Support systems must be in place to assist women who chose not to have abortions. The government must improve the state of child care in this country. It must address the issues of teenage pregnancy, and it must realize the gamut of complex social, religious and economic influences which play an important role in a woman's decision. It must address the inherent discrimination in this legislation that biases the availability of abortion services to those women who have both the time and the money to find them.

[Translation]

If we really want to improve the current situation, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is vital that men should be made fully conscious of their sexual activities and the consequences of their actions. Parents should teach their boys to take the necessary precautions not to make girls pregnant if they do not want to be responsible for their abortions. They should teach their children generally that they must live with the consequences of their actions and choices. They will be able to achieve this goal through communication and dialogue before any harm is done. Support services simply do not exist.

In our society, Mr. Speaker, it is important that all children receive adequate sex education, and have access to and use of good birth control methods. The media also have a role to play to eliminate taboos and the obsessive fear that, by talking about prevention and encouraging people to use condoms, birth-control pills or other means of contraception, we are inciting young people to have sex prematurely. I think we must stop burying our heads in the sand or turning the other way if we want to prevent unwanted pregnancies.

Any woman who has gone through an abortion can tell you that it is a difficult choice to make, a major reassessment and a permanent scar in your life. Whatever the motive behind the decision, since it is the woman who is ultimately responsible for having her pregnancy terminated and who must live with the consequences, it is important that she receive adequate care.

[English]

When a woman discovers that she is carrying an unplanned child she must face the decision herself as to what course of action she will take. If she is young, poor and has few employment opportunities, she must decide whether she wants to bring a new born child into that situation. She must decide whether to bring a child into a cycle of poverty and deprivation, or to delay parenthood until she will be able to provide a proper environment for herself and her children. Because of the lack of support structures within this legislation there is less motivation for a woman to keep or to take her pregnancy to term.

• (1250)

The fact that this government has backed down on its commitment to the establishment of a national child care program does nothing to discourage the option of abortion. If day care services were accessible to all Canadian mothers, then the ability to continue working and to provide for a family would weigh the question of abortion in favour of carrying the pregnancy to term. Without such services, can our society expect a woman to automatically give up her right to choose?

The rolling back of transfer payments to the provinces for education and health care services will further limit the accessibility of abortion services if needed. Once again, poor women will be forced to use inadequate and, at times, dangerous methods because they are unable to pay for proper medical services because of the lack of provincial funding or lack of access.

It is evident that the bill before us puts a burden on doctors in Canada. If doctors become liable for a criminal act, many may simply not want to take the risk of prosecution. Already, the president of the Alberta Medical Association has warned that doctors in that province would stop performing abortions, perhaps even where necessary, in order to avoid criminal prosecution under the proposed law. This is further evidence that this bill could eliminate those services in certain areas of our country.

If we accept the proposed legislation as is then the decision as to whether a woman should have an abortion should be made between her and her doctor and not by lawyers, judges or the Government of Canada. Physicians might not want to endure the possibility of harassing techniques from various groups and could eventually not offer the services rather than risk the chance of criminal sanctions. In the end, the women of Canada are the ones who will suffer.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a bill such as this one makes the physician responsible for the decision. Many will desist to avoid social pressure and the risk of being sued. Let us not open the door to illegal abortions which will carry consequences such as infertility, shame, rejection and a return to the past in a society trying to look forward to the 21st century.

[English]

I will probably vote for this bill at second reading, but unless there are amendments there is no way that I could support it on third reading.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval): Mr. Speaker, when I first came here in 1984, I never thought I would have to legislate on the life or death of an unborn being. I am the father of three children, and neither my wife nor I would ever have thought that we would have to make a decision on abortion, and had we been faced with that choice, it would have really been traumatic to think that one of our children would not have an opportunity to be born.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, an abortion is a criminal act, because I view abortion as a band-aid solution. Abortion will not solve the problem in our society. Before legislating on such an important matter, we should first ask ourselves: what causes women to seek an abortion? Why do they have to do such a thing to free themselves of an unwanted pregnancy or birth.

I think we should look at family problems, and in that respect my view is that governments have not done enough to help divorced mothers, single mothers, widows who some day are faced with a pregnancy that is unwanted for lack not necessarily of love but rather money.

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, nobody up till now has thought of introducing support projects or programs helping them bring their pregnancy to term and then raise their children until such time as they can look after themselves.

This is a societal not a legislative problem, it is not a government problem. It is my view that, through the legislation now before us—after the Daigle-Tremblay saga which, as you know, Mr. Speaker, dealt with a lovers' problem by making society, or Canadians pay—this government said there was a legislative vacuum and that vacuum had to be filled. It tabled Bill C-43, which was a way of sitting on the fence.

Mr. Speaker, this Bill is pro-life with pro-choice contents. If you look at it closely you will realize immediately that it criminalizes the act and yet does not provide sufficient protection for the child to be born, the foetus. I am convinced that we will never build a healthy and strong society if we destroy embryos. We simply cannot build something unless we begin somewhere.

Mr. Speaker, some people may suggest that the embryo or the foetus is not a living being, but keep in mind that if it is not a living being, if it is not a human being who will live, it is at least the beginning of a human being who will go on to live. It will become a human being after the gestation period. By denying that it can become a human being we deny as well that there is a beginning. If we do not acknowledge the beginning, we will destroy it. As a society, as individuals, Mr. Speaker, can we allow ourselves to destroy the beginning?

The second part of the Bill under consideration does not acknowledge or protect that, and this is why we in the House find it so difficult to state unequivocally whether we are for or against the Bill. Because on either side of the issue it answers a question we are asking. Well, I ask myself that question. Criminalizing the act because killing an unborn child has to be as close as you can get to a criminal deed, I agree and I can live with that, but the one thing I cannot live with, Mr. Speaker, is our failure to give full protection to the unborn child.

Still I must say that the bill is a step in the right direction. Perhaps it will pave the way for other laws, and perhaps we may be able to redress the situation by moving amendments once the bill reaches the committee stage.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have not used up all my allotted time before the lunch hour. May I have a few minutes after lunch to conclude my remarks?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Mitges): The hon. member will have three minutes left to complete his speech when we return.

It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

ABORTION

Mr. John MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the serious subject of abortion and a piece of legislation that is before us in the House. I want it recorded that I do not stand for Bill C–43, but I will not stand against it at second reading. As I have told my constituents, I am most uncomfortable with this bill because I cannot condone the act of abortion. I cannot accept the taking of an innocent unborn.

Although C–43 does not sit well with me, I believe strongly that we in this place are obligated not to reject this bill at the outset but consider and debate its contents. We owe it to our public who sent us here and to the future generations to work diligently over the next few months on this bill, to work together as Canadians and to arrive at a position that allows every one of us to sleep at night.

Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Parish of New Liskeard have asked me: "Please stand for and vote for the strictest law regarding abortion. Please make sure there are no undefined terms in it which would provide loopholes." To them, and to my constituents, I understand and I intend to do just that.

NAMIBIA

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, with the completion of its first free elections, Namibia is proceeding along the path to independence.

Unfortunately, independence carries with it a financial cost. Namibia must find international support to make up for the withdrawal of budgetary support from south Africa.

Canada's long–time commitment to the well–being of Namibia cannot be abandoned now. With this government's slashing of foreign aid budgets, CIDA has been forced to cut proposed aid to Namibia by 50 per cent.

I call on the government to put its money where its mouth is, restore full funding assistance and a major package of bilateral aid to Namibia, and ensure through its position on the Security Council that Walvis Bay, Namibia's only deep water port, is removed from South African to Namibian control. Last, we must establish a high commission in Namibia or, minimally, an aid commission to Namibia.

Namibia's emergence is a forerunner of future developments in South Africa. The progress of this new nation will be watched intensely by all forces involved in southern Africa. It must not be allowed to fail.

EL SALVADOR

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the FMLN in El Salvador have today called for a cease–fire in the war. Their recent dramatic escalation of that war was in response to increased government repression and violence.

The UN Commission on Human Rights in its report on El Salvador noted a dramatic increase in the number of human rights violations since the coming to power of the Arena government of President Cristiani.

The FMLN has appealed for a UN monitored cease–fire. A lasting peace is possible through sincere negotiations between the Salvadoran government and the FMLN and a reversal of current U.S. policy. Only when the United States abandons its cold war posture in the region will the people of Central America be able to exercise their sovereign right to determine their own destiny.

I once again appeal to our government to impress upon the United States that the world is changing and that the U.S. military interference in Central America is unacceptable.

TRIBUTE TO JEAN–CLAUDE MALÉPART

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, my colleagues on both sides of the House paid a final tribute to my friend Jean–Claude Malépart. Since I was in Montreal with his family, I could not pay tribute to him in this House.

[English]

Pierre Trudeau once said when MPs are 50 yards from Parliament Hill, they are no longer honourable members, they are just nobodies. Well, Trudeau would have been wrong again if he had said that about Jean Claude Malépart.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, more than 4,000 people went to pay their respects one last time over the weekend in Montreal and more than 2,000 people gathered in St. Anselm's Church to honour him in a simple and moving ceremony.

His last speech on Meech Lake in this House attracted much attention. It is no doubt what Jean-Claude Malépart leaves to all Canadians. He saw his death coming, knew that he would die and gave us his parting words. Jean-Claude Malépart, a worker for ordinary people, the Maurice Richard of politics, is now in his final resting place but lives in the hearts of many.

Mr. Speaker, cancer knocked him out, but like a great heavyweight, he continued to fight while going down. We have lost a giant defender of the people, a man with a great heart, and we will miss him for a long time.

Jean-Claude, your friend who pumps gas salutes you.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, each week when I return home to my riding, I am faced with yet another example of how detrimental the GST will be to the constituents of Malpeque.

Most recently, the reality of the proposed 9 per cent tax has hit our figure skating clubs and minor hockey clubs. These organizations represent a major part of community life in my district and indeed across Canada.

The importance of sport in young people's lives cannot be denied. Through the minor hockey clubs and the skating clubs, they experience the rewards of dedication, the importance of good sportsmanship and the benefits of physical activity.

The GST proposes to tax areas of sports programs which were previously untaxed: coaching fees, facilities, test fees, membership fees and travel costs. The effect of the GST on these items will create a financial burden that many young people and their families simply cannot afford.

On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada and more particularly my Liberal colleagues in the House of Commons, I urge this government to keep the community spirit alive in Canada by promoting sport for youth instead of prohibiting participation with the GST.

ENDANGERED SPECIES

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, every day more species of plants and animals come in danger of extinction, largely the impact of humans on nature.

One species, the African elephant, is now receiving the protection it needs. Commercial trade in ivory has been banned by Canada and most other nations under the Convention on the International Trade in Endangered Species. Last Friday hundreds of Canadians who care about this attended a meeting at the University of Toronto organized by Zoocheck Canada. They heard Doctor Richard Leakey, Ian and Oria Douglas-Hamilton and others speak about the plight of Africa's elephants. Over $120,000 was raised for the Kenya Wild Elephant Fund.

Concern for endangered species here in Canada and around the world measures how attentive we humans are to others with whom we share this planet and upon whom we depend for our own life and well-being.

LEBANON

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Lebanese President was killed in a bombing incident. His death came not only as a shock but as a severe disappointment to the many who saw him as Lebanon's hope for peace. Around the world religious ceremonies were held to mourn this great loss.

[Translation]

I hope that President Mouawad's death will not lead to further bloodshed, but instead that it will bring together the citizens of that country as they mourn the death of a leader eager to restore peace to Lebanon.

[English]

It is ironic that a man so driven toward restoring peace was killed by such a brutal act of terrorism. After only 17 days in office, President Muawad was already carving out a path that could have led to peace in Lebanon. I am confident that the people of Lebanon will overcome this tragedy and hope they will follow in the late president's footsteps by continuing his efforts toward achieving a sovereign, independent, just and fair Lebanon.

HOUSING

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, an article by journalist Jean-Denis Girouard that appeared in today's Journal de Montréal is entitled: "Housing: Quebec does not have its fair share".

Quebec is the only province that has put in place a joint cost-sharing renovation program with the federal government.

The city of Montreal's contribution was practically equal to that of Quebec and of the federal government, and over half the 6,490 renovated units were in rooming houses for the poor.

Mr. Speaker, in this situation, the cut in the rental RRAP is completely inappropriate given not only the costs but also the urgent needs of people in Quebec and Montreal, and I would ask the Minister of State (Housing) to reintroduce this program as soon as possible for the sake of Quebec's poor.

ABORTION

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, there are those in this House and outside it who would paint the abortion issue as simply a woman's issue. Nothing could be further from the truth. It most definitely is a woman's issue in so far as it is women who are most profoundly, indeed exclusively affected. It is a woman's issue in so far as it is women's fundamental constitutional right to security of the person that those who would deny women access to abortion propose to violate.

For this very reason, abortion is an issue of human rights that far outstrips mere gender. And it is for this very reason that there appears in today's The Globe and Mail an advertisement from a group called Men for Women's Choice. Endorsed by over 600 men named in the advertisement, it makes the simple and utterly fundamental statement that "no government should be able to force a woman to bear a child against her will".

• (1410)

These men, and the millions of other men across Canada who support and share their views, are a welcome contingent in the struggle for freedom of choice on abortion in Canada.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the New Brunswick economy has benefited greatly since this government came to power in 1984. Since 1984, over 38,000 new jobs have been created in New Brunswick alone while the number of people living below the poverty line has fallen by 26,000 over the same period.

The unemployment rate in New Brunswick has fallen from 16.3 per cent to 12.3 per cent since September 1984. Housing starts for the first five months of 1989 are up by 104 per cent from the same period in 1984. Exports increased by over one-third in 1988 as compared to 1984.

I know those opposite find it very difficult to listen to these very impressive figures, but I am sure the opposition members realize that we are doing a good job and will continue to do a good job in Atlantic Canada and in my home province of New Brunswick.

NATIVE PEOPLES

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of this House a disturbing incident which casts in a very poor light this government's dedication to the cause of native rights and dignity in Canada.

S. O. 31

A slide presentation on the Fathers of Confederation prepared by Parks Canada and shown to visitors to Province House in Prince Edward Island contains a reference to Canada's native peoples as heathens and infidels.

It is true that this remark is part of a contemporary quote, however the context is not made clear to viewers, who receive the impression that this is how our society regards native people. As well, the rich contribution made to our nation by Canada's original inhabitants is neglected in the presentation.

Prince Edward Islanders are shocked at the callousness and arrogance of the presentation and disturbed by the government's apparent disregard for the dignity of native people. I call upon the government to take appropriate action regarding this matter and promise all Canadians that such an incident will not be repeated.

OPPOSITION PARTIES

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, what is the difference between the Liberal party and the NDP? In a September 1989 speech to the Canadian Association for Securities and Studies Conference, the hon. Liberal from York Centre stated, and I quote:

> It is in the nature of the Canadian opposition tradition to be irresponsible or non-responsible and I mean that in the highest sense of the word.

This is now the York Centre tradition for the opposition. Recent admissions by the NDP Member for Essex—Windsor follows this tradition. In his drive to lead his party of the irresponsible, he is reported in The Toronto Star to have said that the current leader of the NDP wanted to "remain neutral on free trade because it could turn out to be a positive deal for Canada."

Led by the Member for Essex—Windsor, the NDP caucus stayed true to the York Centre tradition and ultimately opposed the deal. What is the difference? Here it is. The Liberals readily admit their irresponsibility and the NDP operate irresponsible—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

NAMIBIA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it is often the case in this House that we spend our time talking about international situations which are not working out, regional conflicts, the prospect of war and various other things.

I think it is incumbent upon the House to take notice of a success story in the international situation that happened recently. I am talking about the election in Namibia. I am talking about the fact that in Namibia we saw the United Nations working as the United Nations was designed to be. That is the agency which provided the context in which a significant act of decolonization could take place, in this case Namibia bringing itself from the colonization of South Africa where free and fair elections were held as a result of the efforts put in by many Canadians, and people from all over the world converging on Namibia to make that free and fair election possible. It is incumbent upon us to notice that and also to call on the Canadian government to do everything in its power to make sure that the very difficult days which are ahead for Namibia are days in which it will have the full support of the Canadian government in every way.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE YEAR IN QUEBEC

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, on November 10, at a ceremony held at the Méridien hotel in Montreal to mark the eighteith anniversary of the Province of Quebec Chamber of Commerce, the Des Moulins Chamber of Commerce, from my own riding, was chosen as "The Quebec's Chamber of Commerce of the year" among 240 participating organizations.

The Chamber received this award for its exceptionnal performance, its dynamism, its integrity all contributing factors to the economic development of our area throughout the year.

Many of its initiatives were successful, namely the Provincial Data Processing and Office Automation Show, the Primas Gala held to highlight the achievements of our business community, and so on.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention in particular the tremendous work of Mr. Normand Harvey and Mr. Claude Hamer, and their team. They have done a remarkable job.

We should be proud, Mr. Speaker, of what those people have achieved, as evidence of the enthousiasm of the Des Moulins area and the riding of Terrebonne.

I want to congratulate the Des Moulins Chamber of Commerce. I know this honour will fall upon all the people of Terrebonne.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Canadians now know that his government has untold millions of dollars to finance an apparently limitless number of dubious enterprises.

Given that the government has all this money to throw around, why is there no money for child care programs, why is there no money for single mothers, why is there no money for food banks, why has the old age pension been clawed back and why has the family allowance been clawed back? What kind of priorities does this government have?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday in answer to a question about a loan to a strip joint implying that some sort of political pressure had been applied, I said that a mistake was made and corrective action had been taken. Subsequently I found out that that should have been in the plural. Mistakes have been made. Mistakes have been made going back to 1972—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Who was the minister?

Mr. Andre: Various businesses which were identified as nightclubs, licensed dining facilities and so on at the time and subsequently in other cases brought in exotic entertainment of the type which I think the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and myself would agree was probably inappropriate for federal government financing.

As a consequence the policies of the FBDB have been tightened up to ensure that this does not happen in the future. I hope the right hon. gentleman will join with me in applauding that move by the executive of this Crown corporation and in ensuring that we can say unanimously in this House that we do not think Canadian government agencies should be financing that kind of activity.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): It takes this minister a few days but he finally catches on, Mr. Speaker. I want to say to him that whatever may have gone on in the past, we never sacrificed programs to the needy in order to finance the type of program he has just described. My supplementary question is—

I can wait until the minister gets briefed by the Deputy Prime Minister here. Do you want time out, Don?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is again for the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister responsible for the status of women.

Since the government spent millions of dollars financing countless establishments that exploit women, why did it cut 15 per cent this year from the funds intended for programs to help women?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, although the question did not really deal with my responsibility, the preamble certainly did.

To make it clear, the Federal Business Development Bank, which has been around for over 40 years, is in the business as a lender of last resort to small business. Part of its business has to do with establishments like motels, nightclubs and so on in the tourist business. For a lot of years, going back to at least 1972, we have had instances where they have been funding organizations that bring in entertainers. They are of a type that are probably not appropriate, at least for federal government help.

• (1420)

I have to add that unfortunately, because of the horrendous deficit left by the previous government, we have had to cut back on the funds that the FBDB has available for small business. It has gone through a 50 per cent reduction.

Is the hon. member suggesting that we should eliminate entirely this bank which is a bank of last resort to help small business in this country? If that is the position of the Liberal party, let it make that position public.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, let us talk about the Federal Business Development Bank. Under its charter it is indeed a bank of last resort. Under its charter it is supposed to help legitimate small business and is supposed to help the economic growth of the country. I have read the charter too.

I ask the minister the reason why this year only 16 per cent of the money available from the Federal Business Development Bank went to the poorest regions of our country and only 16 per cent went to the Atlantic provinces, the prairie provinces and the Northwest Territories. I ask the minister if that is also an accident. Is that the fault of some bureaucrat? How can he explain as a policy matter that only 16 per cent of the funds available from that bank went to the poorest regions of Canada?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the regional development programs of this government through ACOA, WD and through my department in terms of Quebec and northern Ontario are there to provide government assistance to industries, generally speaking, which help in that area. The Federal Business Development Bank is in the business of helping small business across the country. It does not have a mandate that says it must allocate its loan portfolio according to other criteria.

One of the reasons we have had to maintain these regional development programs has been the failure of past government policies to get the kind of economic development in those regions which would create the demand for loans to which the bank could respond.

JUSTICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General about the undertaking of Commissioner Inkster. While Commissioner Inkster is pursuing his independent investigation into possible political manipulation of the RCMP, and we in the opposition support him in this inquiry, I want to ask the Solicitor General about matters which are not police matters but come within his direct responsibility, namely his office.

I know, as a former Solicitor General, that there is an information flow of sensitive police information to the Solicitor General about police investigations which are under way. I want to ask the Solicitor General whether any of that sensitive police information has been made available by him or through his office directly or indirectly to any persons who are involved in the investigations or the subject of the investigations.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): No.

Mr. Kaplan: I want to ask the Solicitor General whether he has or will undertake to call his staff together and ascertain from them if that is indeed the case.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I answered clearly. I defended—and I believe I expressed very clearly in the last few days—the total independence which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other police forces must have. So far, no one in the RCMP has said that they were subject to any political interference. I am very satisfied with that, especially when it comes from the Commissioner.

And I do not see why—I always wanted, my team and those around me never wanted to interfere in any way with the work of police officers and I will continue to maintain that position, which seems to me to be the right one. I am glad to learn from my colleague, the Hon. Member for York Centre, that as a former solicitor general, he knows how important it is to preserve this independence. And my colleague himself said and repeated that the Commissioner is a man of great integrity. That is what he said this week and if anyone were able to clear up this whole business, he is the one and we should trust him. I take your word, my dear colleague!

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank. He will be aware that during the eighties and indeed back into the seventies it had always been the bank's practice that it would forbid loans or financing to strip joints, topless bars and exotic dance halls and the like. Yet we have found out now that not only once, but twice, three times, four times, five times, six times, in just one day, all sorts of abuses of this particular regulation have been uncovered.

Has the minister conducted or launched an investigation to find out the extent of these abuses? Knowing that the regulations have been breached time and time again, what was the cause of the breach of this regulation and was there any political interference involved?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, I have asked how it happened, and yes, I do expect the president to take remedial action. If it was inadvertent, then the policy change should prevent it happening in the future. If it was deliberate, then the penalties, if you will, should reflect that fact.

It is unacceptable to have deliberately given loans of a nature that are contrary to the policies of the bank and indeed of the government.

I have no evidence whatsoever at this point in time of any political interference. It is a Crown corporation, it does operate at arm's length. From time to time, many members of the House phone on behalf of businesses in their constituencies. One of the things we are discovering is if funding has been provided for a motel with a licensed dining room attached, frequently when the business is not up to snuff or what have you, the owners have brought in exotic entertainment. That occurs after the fact. There will be in the future but there has not been in the past a provision to call the loan when that kind of change is made.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about a particular enterprise owner who changes the operation during the process of a loan repayment. We are talking about the Lido club which has been in operation, presumably, for a number of years.

I assume that the representatives of the Federal Business Development Bank visit the premises to see how the business is being conducted and they receive financial statements, surely, on an annual basis.

Yesterday the minister said this was an isolated case, that a mistake had been made by someone, a senior public servant. We now know that there were at least six strip joints, and who knows how many more, so the minister cannot fob this off on a senior bureaucrat. Surely to goodness he is responsible. I want him to explain why he was not aware of this incredible range of abuse that was taking place across the country regarding the bank for which he is responsible.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I said on Tuesday, in response to an accusation that political interference had been brought to bear in terms of the Lido club, that that was not true and that as far as I knew this was an isolated incident. That is what I knew at that point in time.

The loan in question, by the way, was a mortgage loan, a loan secured by a mortgage on the land and buildings, which was adequate security for the loan. The cash flow to service the loan was provided by a business which was registered as a dining establishment with a liquor licence. The nature of the entertainment was not on the application. It will be in future. If the entertainment is unacceptable, the Federal Business Development Bank will not be making loans to that kind of business. I repeat, the loan was to a numbered company which owned the land and the buildings and supplied the security for the loan.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that we recognize that financing strip clubs, topless bars and the like has been an inappropriate lending practice since the beginning of the Federal Business Development Bank and has been abused, as the minister has indicated, since as early as 1972.

There is something very obscene happening here. I know it is very funny when a government cuts $2 million from women's programs at Secretary of State, when it deindexes family allowance, and when it refuses to meet its child care commitment!

• (1430)

Yesterday in Kamloops alone, my own community, a request for funding for a women's shelter was denied, yet the government presumably puts millions of dollars into the Federal Business Development Bank and approves the Lido, El Greco strip club, the Hideout strip club, Club 61 strip club, Voyageur strip club and Minsky's strip club.

Is the minister simply going to say: "I know that the regulations have been broken for years and years"? What is he going to do to ensure that this kind of lending practice stops and is never, ever done again?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member was here for the last two days. He is late to the issue, and he needs to get his clip for television too.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: That has been answered six or seven times. The answer was: when I became aware of it, I ordered a change in policy to ensure it does not happen again. An investigation is under way to find out whether any officers of the Federal Business Development Bank flagrantly violated the policy that is in place.

I do not know what else the hon. member is getting at. That was the answer two days ago, yesterday, and it is the answer today. He seems to be demanding of me the answer that I gave two days ago.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank.

The minister will recall that yesterday I asked him if he would be prepared to provide his assurances to the House that FBDB had not financed other strip joints than the Lido club in Hull. We now know why the minister refused to answer the question, preferring to say, and I quote: "a mistake was made." Will the minister now do the correct thing, the right thing, and tell us how many more such mistakes have been made by the Federal Business Development Bank? Will he table a list in the House of Commons of how many strip joints are financed by his department?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly tell the hon. member about one called the Hideout in Cornwall, Ontario, the constituency of Ed Lumley, which in March 1983, when Ed Lumley was the minister responsible for FBDB, became a strip joint.

Mr. Boudria: They already had their loan.

Mr. Andre: The fact is that we are discovering, going back as far as 1972 under a whole string of Liberal ministers including the House leader of that party, that the FBDB had made loans to institutions which in most of the cases brought in exotic entertainment after they had received the mortgage loans. We have changed that policy.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to ask the minister why there isn't money for anything else but there is always money around for strip joint owners.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the Minister responsible for women's issues the following question. My leader asked it a few moments ago but there was no answer, as usual.

Two days ago, I asked the Minister responsible for women's issues whether she was in favour of lending money to a strip club, the Lido, in Hull. I now want to ask the following question: Is the Minister responsible for women's issues in favour of financing clubs which have naked young women dancing on tables for men's entertainment? Yes or no? That is what I want to know.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the policy, as I have indicated seven or eight times, is that we do not favour, we do not support, we do not believe it is okay and we have put in place policies to ensure that in future the FBDB or any other government institution, for that matter, does not provide loans to institutions which are putting on that kind of behaviour.

The hon. member talks about the club Lido which I understand had male strippers when it first got into this business. On the question of trying to make it into something having to do with status of women, I think he ought to reflect on the record of his own government, the record of the man sitting in front of him who was minister responsible for this institution during that period, and at least recognize that in fact corrective action has been undertaken now that this issue has become public. We do not, I repeat we do not believe it is appropriate for the FBDB to be providing loans to these types of institutions.

Mr. Boudria: What about the list, Harvie?

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank.

It has now come to our attention that the Federal Business Development Bank has a list of notaries who act as legal agents for the bank's various transactions. We know that for loans between $200,000 and $400,000 the list of notaries is put together at the regional office, but for loans over $400,000 that list is provided by head office.

Could the minister table in this House, either today or tomorrow, the complete list of those individuals who are on the list of notaries and legal agents at FBDB, as well as their dates of appointment?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take that request or representation as notice. I do not know what is involved. I know that thousands and thousands of loans have been made.

Does the hon. member want me to go back to 1946? Is this a leading question that has something else attached to it? If he would tell me what he is after, perhaps I can answer more fully.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I will make it very clear. The list I am looking for is the current list which has been provided by this government to the Federal Business Development Bank and which it is currently using.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. Will the minister inform this House at the same time what criteria was used by the government in selecting these individuals for the Federal Business Development Bank notary list? Will he provide the information now, or will we have to wait as long as we did to find out that Senator Michel Cogger had his bill in the till at FBDB as well?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, if the member is asking for long lists of people who do the legal work, the notary work and so on for this Crown corporation, I think he should do that through the Order Paper. That is the most appropriate way.

If he has somebody specific in mind, if there is some specific wrongdoing, make an accusation and I will provide the information if he is on a fishing expedition. the Order Paper is the place to go.

FISHERIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

I am sure he is aware that the level of industrial toxic contamination of some B.C. seafoods is so high that major new closures are being ordered today on the B.C. coast at Kitimat, Gold River, Elk Falls, Cowichan Bay, Nanaimo, Crofton and Powell River.

Would the minister of fisheries advise the House how long he has know about the growing levels of contamination and why he has not taken any steps to stop the growing levels of contamination before the fisheries had to be closed?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, indeed members of the government and I are well aware of these very unfortunate findings of elevated levels of dioxin and furan compounds in the vicinity of several B.C. coast pulp mills.

That is why, when the presence of dioxins in the vicinity of pulp mills became internationally known in the winter of 1987–88, we initiated a national pulp mill monitoring program. As a result of early findings of that scientific analysis we closed two areas in Howe Sound and Prince Rupert to commercial shell fishing last December.

We have been intensifying the monitoring. At my request we have taken large numbers of samples in the vicinity of these mills and subjected them to assessment by the Health Protection Branch of my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On his advice, yesterday afternoon we decided that these closures were immediately necessary in the public interest.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, in February of this year Dr. Murray Rankin of the University of Victoria Law School discovered that two–thirds of pollution permits reviewed in British Columbia had been in violation for more than one year. That was in February of this year; two–thirds of the industries dumping into the waters of British Columbia had been in violation for more than a year. They had been breaking the law, to be precise Section 33 of the Fisheries Act.

Today's closure of prawn, oyster and crab fisheries is no accident. It is the direct result of the minister allowing companies to break the law. On behalf of British Columbians and all Canadians, I would like to ask the minister of fisheries: When does he intend to uphold the law?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the quantities of these chemicals which are being measured are very, very minute indeed and difficult to detect.

• (1440)

The hon. member also knows that with the exception of the consumption standards with regard to the edible portions of fish products we do not have an accurate base line, nor did industry have until recently a means of determining what its levels of discharge were. Indeed, the levels of discharge in effluent streams could be below the detectable limit.

Notwithstanding, as a result of our monitoring of the meats and the consumable portions of shellfish through the National Pulp Mill Monitoring Program, we have now determined that levels in excess of those acceptable from a health risk standpoint are occurring. That is what is leading to these announcements.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. The NDP financial critic took advantage of last week's parliamentary recess to accuse our government once again of unduly favouring business at the expense of the average citizen who cannot evade the tax system. It seems NDP members do not have the courage to put their questions directly to the Minister, so I will do so instead. Is it true, sir, that over 90,000 Canadian companies made a profit of $27 billion in 1987 and did not pay income tax for that year, and if so, what has the Minister done to remedy the situation?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as usual the New Democratic Party uses statistics which are out of date. The information obtained by the finance critic of the NDP was prior to tax reform, which brought in such things as a broader corporate tax base, changes in capital gains, general anti-avoidance rules, and so on.

The results of the first phase of tax reform are very clear. Not only is it fairer for all Canadians, but over 40,000 more corporations are now taxable, resulting in additional revenue of some $5 billion over five years. In fact the most recent figures indicate that corporate tax revenue was $11.7 billion, up by 7.8 per cent over last year.

Phase two of tax reform is going to be even better. I just wish the Opposition would keep track of all the positive things this government is doing.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

JUSTICE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Yesterday the minister, in response to the Leader of the Opposition, in dealing with the Peter White letter, said:

> I think it would be entirely appropriate to ask the commissioner again, when he is back in the country, whether this document can be made public.

We do not agree that this is an RCMP matter. We believe that it is a government matter. Peter White who wrote the commissioner was the principal secretary to the Prime Minister in the PMO's office.

Why do we have to wait three weeks to hear from the commissioner? There are telephones. Why do you not call the minister and release the letter immediately?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into this matter to some extent arising out of questions yesterday. This issue was raised before the standing committee.

On June 6, the Commissioner of the RCMP wrote to the chairman of the standing committee and indicated the reasons it would be inappropriate to release such a letter, and I quote as follows:

> After consultation with my legal advisors, I believe it would be inappropriate for me to produce this document which was provided to the police in the course of a criminal investigation or for me to disclose, through testimony, to the committee any information contained in this document.
> My decision is based on the long-standing practice that the contents of an investigation file should not be produced or otherwise made available, save and except during the course of judicial proceedings in which the rules of procedure and laws of evidence protect the interests of any individual involved in the matter.

He goes on to say:

> Public disclosure of information pertinent to or bearing on the investigation could have an adverse effect upon these judicial proceedings and could seriously jeopardize the rights of these individuals to a fair trial.

This has been pointed out—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The trial is over, Don.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member knows that there are other individuals—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): We just asked for the part respecting Grisé.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the Liberals change their standards and rules of operation when they are in government as compared to when they are in opposition.

Some Hon. Members: What about you, Don?

Mr. Mazankowski: I quote the former Solicitor General, the member for York Centre, when he said—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: The NDP chickadees are singing again, Mr. Speaker.

I quote the former Solicitor General who said the following, as reported at page 1272 of Hansard for February 10, 1984. It is very revealing and has to be put on the record. I am quoting the hon. member:

> Everyone surely knows that the Minister, the Solicitor General, does not tell the RCMP when to open and close criminal files. The Solicitor General does not tell the RCMP who to investigate or who not to investigate and where or when to seek a judicial warrant to engage in more intrusive investigation. The Canadian people want police investigations to be entirely free of government interference and direction. In other words, people want the RCMP security service to be accountable, but in police work they want the RCMP to be independent.

That is precisely what we are doing, preserving the independence and the integrity of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely why we are asking questions. We are concerned about integrity with the RCMP.

When we look at this particular situation we see that this case is over. If the case is over and a decision is made, is the Prime Minister or his office prepared to release the letter now?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member got his facts straight he would realize that the case is not over. It was referred to in The Gazette of Montreal this morning:

> The head of the RCMP criminal investigation in Quebec said Tuesday he decided not to issue search warrants against Grisé and political organizer Joseph Hamelin because he did not want to influence the outcome of the election.

There are two members involved, and the hon. member should know that. He may not want to listen to the government or trust the government, but surely to goodness he should trust the words of the Commissioner of the RCMP.

What could be more appropriate than that, given the words, the evidence and the testimony of his own colleague, the former Solicitor General, the member for York Centre?

Research your questions a little better next time; don't just rely on the research department.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. The 2,100 federal ship crew workers put their lives on the line every time they put out to sea to protect the safety and security of Canadians, all for a miserly average salary of $21,000 a year.

The strike of these workers leaves Canada's fishing stocks wide open to foreign fishermen, grinds search and rescue to a halt, and jeopardizes response to environmental disasters such as the near spill off the coast of Alaska just this morning.

Will the minister finally admit that these negotiations have been bungled, that it is time to put a fair offer on the table to get these people back to work and get things moving in Canadian waters?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned quite a few times in the House on this particular matter, the government is prepared to go back to the table at any time.

We would welcome a positive sign from the union to indicate that it is willing to sit down and talk seriously about reaching a mutually agreeable negotiated settlement.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, it is the minister who has said these people are necessary to the safety and security of the Canadian public. It is up to him not to sit back and wait for the union but to put a decent offer on the table to get these people back to the bargaining table.

Has the minister in fact told his negotiators that $21,000 is not decent compensation for the risks these people take, that their lives are worth the same whether they work on the east coast, the west coast, the north coast or the Great Lakes? Has he instructed his negotiators to put a decent and equitable offer on the table?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, we have already put a decent and acceptable offer on the table in keeping with the offer we made to the rest of the public service.

We recognize the question of pay equity between the east and the west, and we put that on the table. I wish the hon. member opposite would research her questions before asking them. That is on the table.

Mrs. Catterall: But 1991 is not soon enough.

Mr. de Cotret: That is on the table. It is on the table for the end of the contract. That was flatly rejected and no counter offer was forthcoming from the union.

If the union would like to come back with a counter offer, we are more than prepared to look at it.

• (1450)

I am saying that we, as a responsible government concerned with the welfare of our employees and the safety and security of Canadians, are willing to go back to the table on a moment's notice as soon as the union tells us it has something to counter the offer that is already there.

Mrs. Catterall: You should take the initiative. It is your responsibility.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Under Section 5 of the RCMP Act it is not the commissioner who is in charge of the RCMP; it is the Solicitor General who directs the commissioner.

Will the Solicitor General exercise his responsibilities in respect of the Peter White letter and say that in the interests of the public and the administration of justice he will not wait for the commissioner to come back, that he will today produce the Peter White letter in this House?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, that question was answered earlier by the Deputy Prime Minister. I am really astonished, and I find it hard to understand the NDP's position on this matter. We have made it abundantly clear that we believe, and I think we are supported in this by the former Solicitor General, the hon. member for York Centre, that the integrity and independence of the RCMP must be preserved. Is the hon. member suggesting that I should intervene and give instructions to RCMP officers in a case that is now before the courts, Mr. Speaker? If that is what is being suggested, all I can say is that I would never do such a thing, because I respect the integrity of the RCMP and because we must let the RCMP do its job, Mr. Speaker, especially when an investigation is being challenged before the courts.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, let me ask about another exercise of the minister's responsibility in the Grisé matter itself. Chief Superintendent McConnell, who says he made the decision last year to delay because of the election, has said that if he had to do the same thing he would do it again.

Under the minister's responsibility for the direction of the RCMP, as a general policy matter does he agree with Chief Superintendent McConnell? Does he believe that it is appropriate for the RCMP to delay the administration of justice for election and political purposes?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, there are two elements here. First, what Chief Superintendant McConnell said, as reported by the newspapers, and as far as I can see, first of all, he clearly explained that he had never been subject to any political interference whatsoever, that he made the decision himself and that he informed his superiors at the RCMP accordingly. The RCMP Commissioner said this week that he had been informed the day before—I think it was Monday or Tuesday, I'm not sure which—and that he would check all the details of this decision and find out exactly what had happened.

As the hon. member for York Centre said earlier, I believe we should trust the integrity of the RCMP Commissioner, and in this respect, I think we should wait until the Commissioner reports to us on all the circumstances of a case that would seem to be sensitive, and we must consider the fact that some elements are still before the courts. I think we have a duty, and with me the hon. member for Victoria and the other Members of this House, to ensure that we do not interfere with a police investigation, especially when such investigations are before the courts, Mr. Speaker.

NAVIGATIONAL SAFETY

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

The 1989 Great Lakes Water Quality Board's report to the International Joint Commission states that proposed changes of regulations to no longer require licensed pilots on the Great Lakes may undermine navigational safety, especially in areas where compulsory pilotage is now required, including the Welland Canal.

This has caused concern because navigational safety of commercial vessels is fundamental to avoiding spills of hazardous materials through collision or grounding.

Will the Minister of State for Transport follow the recommendations of the board and review the potential consequences if compulsory pilotage is eliminated?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question because I know of his concern for safety and shipping within the Great Lakes.

Actually the proposed amendments do not affect the areas set aside for compulsory pilotage. Those areas remain the same.

The proposed amendments are for exemptions for captains who have the experience to travel the Great Lakes with their ships. Nevertheless concerns have been expressed, and just last Tuesday the minister appointed a very eminent lawyer experienced in maritime law who will investigate as far as the recommendations are concerned and come forward with a report to the minister.

No decision will be made until that report is received.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I want to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister if I can just get his attention for a minute. The question is on a serious matter in Labrador and Newfoundland, those fishermen and plant workers who do not qualify for unemployment insurance because of the failure of the fishery.

Three weeks ago the minister said in the House, as reported on page 5000 of Hansard, that she was going to build in flexibility to the criteria to meet the needs of those who really needed help. Yet, a directive from her office in Newfoundland went out this past week saying: "These are the only funds we have for this initiative and the program has been designed to assist bona fide people who meet the criteria". Only 50 per cent of the fishermen and plant workers meet the criteria.

My question is very simple. Will the minister see that the directive given and the commitment given by the minister three weeks ago is carried out by the department? If he does not, there will be women and children on the coast of Labrador, on the coast of Newfoundland, who will be facing a pretty bleak Christmas this year.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to make that representation to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I understand the department put forward measures as rapidly as it could. The department is dealing with those who are eligible now as rapidly as it can.

As I have said before, I will be very happy to make those representations to the minister.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, what we need is a definite commitment to act now. We have been on this case for a month. There are people who have had no income at all this summer or this fall. Christmas is coming.

Don't give us a commitment to study the problem; give us a commitment that you are going to help the people who need it in Newfoundland and Labrador, right now.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, this is not a commitment to study a problem. The government is very sensitive and very much aware of the particular difficulties of those people to whom the member is referring.

Some measures have been put forward, and the member knows that. We have dealt with those who are eligible under the rules as rapidly as we can.

The government intends to act as rapidly as it can to deal with all people who are concerned by this problem and do whatever it can to help them.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications.

I know the minister is putting out the story that he did not snub the ministers of telephones from the prairies when they were here on Tuesday. After having personally witnessed the minister's uncomprehending, ill-informed and indeed sometimes arrogant attitude toward this issue at his press conference and in two Question Periods, I have to believe the prairie ministers.

When the minister had personally promised that he would not act unilaterally before seriously considering a compromise proposal from the prairie alliance—and he received that compromise proposal several days before he made his surprise announcement, why has he not to this day made a substantive reply to that proposal?

When is he going to quit snubbing not only the prairie ministers but indeed all prairie Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the process of defining a telecommunication policy for Canada started seven years ago and is ongoing. It involves both reflection and communication, and I am sure that thanks to our approach based on a sense of belonging and on compromise, we will put together for Canadians a thoroughly modern communication policy.

[English]

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions. When can they expect a substantive reply to that proposal?

When can they get a copy of the act which the minister has not given them?

[Translation]

Mr. Masse: Mr. Speaker, all things are falling into place. When the time comes, I am sure the green grapes will be ready to harvest.

HOUSING

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Finance).

I am sure the Minister realizes that the most recent federal budget discriminated against the Province of Quebec generally and the city of Montreal in particular.

The fact is that, effective January 1, 1990, no funds will be made available under the rental component of the RRAP.

Could the minister who, as a Quebecer, knows just how much the residential rehabilitation assistance program is a success in the province of Quebec, make representation to his colleague the Minister of Finance for the purpose of re-establishing this program as soon as possible?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell my hon. colleague that we have indeed observed the impact the reduction of this program has had not only on the Quebec region, but also on some others. As we are now in the process of preparing the forthcoming budget, this is one of the items we will look into very carefully.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I suggest the minister's reply was not adequate. The various provincial ministers responsible for housing are going to meet next week and this program is expected to expire at the end of December. Therefore, a reply is required very shortly.

Because the city of Montreal, which had set up its own housing rehabilitation program to supplement the Federal program, will be most adversely affected by this Ottawa decision, the number of tenants there being the greatest in Canada, it will likely be forced to give up its own program. Could the minister accept at least that the rental component continue to apply to all Canadian cities which have their own program to supplement the federal program?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I could tell the Hon. Member that even before he contacted me about this problem, my colleague from the Conservative caucus had already done so with tremendous energy. They have already made representations concerning this to my colleague responsible for housing. We are in fact very actively looking into this.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period today I am afraid that the Minister of National Revenue inadvertently misled the House. I know he did not do it intentionally.

I think it is important that we clarify for the record what the member from Yorkton—Melville said the other day regarding the profitable corporations that do not pay any income tax. He said that in 1987 there were over 93,000 profitable corporations that failed to pay income tax because of the various tax exemptions in the tax act. I think that is the appropriate comment. That was in 1987, on profits of $27 billion. Then the minister confirmed that a year later, 1988, the year that we do not really have adequate statistics for yet, there were still 50,000 profitable corporations not paying any income tax.

We appreciate the minister's clarification of that. We were not certain what the number was for 1988 but now we know it is 50,000.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the course of my quoting an article from the Montreal Gazette in response to a question from the member for Moncton, I am advised that I used the word "members" and it should have been individuals, rather than members. I would not want to leave the inference that it was Members of Parliament. They were individuals.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the usual Thursday business question. I know that the Government House Leader will be unable to give a complete response because certain discussions are under way with respect to the business on Monday and Tuesday, which I feel will likely be resolved in a way that will be satisfactory to all sides of the House. But I think, in conformity with our custom, I should ask the question in the first instance now.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will have more precise details to share with the House very shortly, as we are reworking the wording of a House order upon which we have agreed.

I want to take this opportunity to thank my colleagues, the House Leader of the Official Opposition and the House Leader for the New Democratic Party for their assistance in bringing this about.

I can say that tomorrow will be an allotted day and next Wednesday will likely be an allotted day. We are in the process of working out a House order which will lay out the details for Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, there is an additional point I would like to raise with my colleague, the Government House Leader. In the past it has been customary, although not always the case, that when a Prime Minister returns to Canada from an overseas trip he would give a statement to the House about the developments that took place during that trip. In that connection would it be expected that the Prime Minister would report to the House about his trip to the Soviet Union.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly raise that representation with the Prime Minister as soon as possible.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C-43, an Act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval): Mr. Speaker, when the bell rang I still had a few minutes left in my remarks to the House concerning the very important issue of abortion.

I was saying that the measure under consideration is not perfect but that it is a step in the right direction. I made the statement because I feel that pursuant to the second part of the bill a woman could consult her physician and have an abortion on demand. I think that the opinion of only one physician is not enough.

I believe that a committee of three or five doctors could interview the woman, meet with her family and all people involved and explain to them exactly what it is all about and what are the psychological and physical consequences of an abortion. Mr. Speaker, I think this would have more influence on the behaviour than if there were only one physician.

I am not saying the Bill must be rejected because if we do that it would be like voting pro-choice since the Bill would stay on the shelf, never to be heard of again. We would have no opportunity to delve into the question, debate every aspect of the consequences of abortion, and talk about family planning.

Mr. Speaker, this is why I support the motion for second reading so we may study the matter in committee and bring in the necessary amendments and corrections.

Among such amendments and corrections I would favour considering the advisability of a properly structured family policy, nothing very hard to implement and which only civil servants can easily understand, but something simple which would make it possible for men and women, families and children to develop in society, to make use of our common wealth and plan in the long term. I would like to see structures designed to accommodate all needy people. We could help them earn a living and seek fulfillment in a more or less liberal career.

I think that all we have done so far is paper over the cracks in our society. We have been trying to plug holes. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, we have put band-aids on wooden legs. All parties in the House of Commons have been asking for the establishment of government structures and policies aimed at the family. What are we waiting for?

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker, I should think that Members who will have the opportunity to sit on the legislative committee to study the measure on abortion will be in a position to shed their political party bias, make constructive amendments to the Bill—amendments geared to the 21st century—and set up the kind of structures which will enable us to prosper in this beautiful and great country of ours.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, once again Parliament is confronted with the complex and difficult issue of abortion. I say complex and difficult because we must deal with such questions as when does human life begin in the unborn child, when is it permissible to terminate that life and for what reasons, and also, to what extent should the criminal law apply to behaviour surrounding the abortion question.

It is also a difficult question for members of Parliament because this is a bill which is submitted as a free vote issue. Members of Parliament must make up their own minds on the bill and must provide their own reasons for voting for or against it. They cannot fall back on a party position.

I am personally opposed to abortion on moral grounds because I believe that life starts at an early stage and must be protected no matter how undeveloped or incomplete the unborn child is. On a moral basis, I would only accept abortion when the life of the mother is seriously in danger. That is my personal, moral position.

On the other hand, I recognize that there are many persons all around me, both here in this House and in my community, who do not share these views. These are individuals who are just as sincere, just as intelligent and just as altruistic as I am and yet they have a completely different view with respect to this subject.

The Christian churches have different views on this subject. They are all opposed to abortion but they differ with respect to the grounds on which abortion should be permitted in the criminal law, and they differ with respect to the period when the foetus has human life, and they differ on other grounds as well.

My point is that personally we have strong views with respect to abortion and those views are based on moral principles, but there are others who are just as sincere and intelligent and altruistic who have different views.

We must recognize that in Canada we live in a pluralistic society which has many views on an issue such as this. In these circumstances, how should we deal with this subject under the law? How should this subject be treated, in particular, by the criminal law?

While many moral codes, both religious and personal, say that abortion is wrong, I do not know of any moral code which says that every moral law should be incorporated in the criminal law. As a matter of fact, in this country, we have many types of behaviour which are considered immoral and which, at one time, were forbidden by the criminal law but which today are not forbidden by the criminal law. I give as examples, adultery, homosexual acts, birth control, blasphemy, suicide, gambling, drunkenness, addiction and so on. As a matter of fact, in some jurisdictions in the world, these things are still considered criminal, and in some countries there is a consensus that they should be considered criminal. But in this country, although we believe very strongly that some of these types of behaviour are immoral, we do not believe that they are proper subject matter for the criminal law.

The question that we must determine in a debate like this is that despite our different, strongly held moral positions, what should be the criteria for certain behaviour to be covered by the criminal law? In answering that question the first principle is that the criminal law should be used with discretion and restraint because it involves penal consequences. It involves prison, and the curtailment of freedom. Consequently, the criminal law should only be used as a last resort in controlling behaviour in a democratic and pluralistic society.

If that is not done, and there is not a strong consensus in respect of a matter being covered by the criminal law, then it will be almost impossible to enforce that particular law. We saw that in the past. I was in this Parliament when lotteries were illegal under the Criminal Code, but nobody paid much attention to that article of the law. While that matter was covered by the criminal law, people turned their heads and pretended that they did not see what was happening, because in fact there was no consensus in the country that it should still be considered a part of the criminal law. The reason was that there were many different views with respect to the morality of gambling.

The same applied with respect to homosexual acts by consent, in private. It was the same in respect of suicide and other matters which were finally taken out of the criminal law. So if certain individuals insist on putting certain behaviour in the criminal law when there is a wide variety of views in respect of that behaviour, then it will not be enforceable. And when it is not enforced, the whole criminal law is brought into disrespect and disrepute.

I believe that totally controlling abortion in the criminal law, when there is no consensus to do so, does not really do very much to reduce the number of abortions or does not deal with the problem of unwanted pregnancy.

It is my strongly held view that there is no consensus in this country with respect to the criminalization of abortion in the early stages of pregnancy. It is very difficult to detect such a crime in the early stages of the pregnancy and such a law would be almost impossible to enforce. I do not believe that abortion should be criminalized in the early stages of pregnancy and I believe that it should be left to the woman and her doctor to decide what must be done. In doing that, the woman in question must wrestle with her own moral position and the doctor must apply his own professional standards and ethics.

I want to make absolutely clear that because one opposes the criminalization of abortion does not mean that one is saying that abortion is all right, that abortion is okay, that abortion is a good thing. By opposing the criminalization of abortion, we simply mean that in a pluralistic society, the criminal law is not the proper response to the problem of unwanted pregnancy and abortion. I think that we have too many abortions in this country, both legal and illegal, and I think we must do all in our power to reduce that number.

The question is how we deal with the problem and how we reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies and abortions. Once again, I do not believe that the response is a strict criminal law dealing with abortions. If we are serious in wanting to reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies and abortions, then we must have preventive programs. We must have better programs to help mothers keep their children and raise them properly. We especially need better programs for child support, housing, nutrition, education, pregnancy leave, day care and so on. If we did more of these things we would find that more mothers would be able to keep their children, and would want to keep their children. We would have fewer unwanted pregnancies.

We also need better programs in family planning, in reproductive education and in moral instruction. By doing these sorts of things I think we will see the number of abortions and unwanted pregnancies decline.

There are some in this House and some outside the House who say that abortion is murder and should be treated like murder since the moment of conception. The state has never treated abortion history of our Criminal Code you will note that several crimes have been treated differently than murder. The crime of murder at one time had the penalty of capital punishment, which then became life imprisonment. We had the crime of infanticide, the crime of manslaughter, and the crime of abortion which was always treated differently than murder.

Even within our Christian churches the death of a foetus in its early stages was never treated like the death of a child after birth. No church that I know of believes in the baptism of an infant immediately upon conception. As a matter of fact, it treats that unbaptized child in a different way from a theological point of view.

I will conclude by saying that I intend to vote against this bill because I believe, first of all, that it is an inappropriate use of the criminal law. I could accept some criminalization in the later stages of the pregnancy, but even then I doubt whether the substance of the law should be in the Criminal Code but perhaps in some other federal or provincial statute. I am also opposed to the bill because I do not believe that it deals with the real causes of unwanted pregnancies and with the means that will bring about their reduction.

It is my intention to continue to listen to the arguments in this debate. The bill will probably go to committee and then we will have another debate at third reading. For the moment that is my position. I will vote against the bill.

I repeat that this is a difficult subject. I have no problem with my own personal moral position. I am opposed to abortion on moral grounds, but what we are discussing in this House is not what is moral or immoral about abortion. We are discussing to what extent abortion should be criminalized. That is the issue that we must address.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Edmonton East there is a point of order by the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there have been, as I indicated earlier, discussions among the parties and I think you will find that there will be unanimous consent for me to move the following order and to vote immediately without debate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That, further to the order of the House made Tuesday, November 7, 1989, respecting the adjournment of the House on November 30 and December 1, 1989:

On Monday, November 27, 1989, the House, on Government Orders, shall dispose of Ways and Means Proceeding No. 8, and then consider and complete report stage and third reading of Bill C–36, with the Speaker interrupting at 4.45 p.m. that day, if necessary, any debate then under way and putting every question necessary to dispose of the said stages of the said bill, successively and without further amendment or debate. Following the completion of proceedings on Bill C–36, Private Members' Business shall be called and taken up for one hour, after which the House shall resume debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, and on any amendment thereto, until 10 o'clock p.m., when the debate and the House shall be adjourned until 10.00 o'clock a.m., Tuesday, November 28, 1989;

That, on Tuesday, November 28, 1989, the House will sit at 10.00 o'clock a.m. on Government Orders and shall resume debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C–43, with the Speaker recognizing the Prime Minister at 11.00 o'clock a.m.; following the speech of the Prime Minister the question on the said motion, and on any amendment thereto, shall be deemed to have been put and a recorded division on the same shall be deemed to have been requested and deemed to be deferred until 1.00 o'clock p.m. that day;

That the sitting stand suspended until 1.00 o'clock p.m., when the Speaker shall cause the bells to ring for 15 minutes to call in the Members, following which the said recorded division or divisions shall be called, following which the House shall stand suspended until 3.00 o'clock p.m., at which time Statements by Members and Oral Questions will be called, followed by Routine Proceedings, following which the Speaker shall adjourn the House until 2.00 o'clock p.m., Wednesday, November 29, 1989; and

That, on Wednesday, November 29, 1989, the Orders of the Day shall be a non–votable Opposition motion as a Supply Proceeding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. Government House Leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate this afternoon on the second reading debate of Bill C–43, it is my intention to be brief because the points I have to make can be made simply and quickly.

I wish first of all to say that although I do not share their views I do respect the deeply held personal, religious, ethical and moral convictions of those who cannot bring themselves to support what I consider to be a woman's right to abortion.

During the federal general election last year it was my privilege to be invited into many homes in the riding of Edmonton East and in many of those homes I encountered constituents who devoutly believed that abortion was wrong. I do not in any way question the sincerity of those beliefs. Again, while not agreeing with them, I recognize them as legitimate beliefs held by those people.

However, in my opinion—and this opinion was arrived at over the course of years—the fundamental right of each Canadian woman to the security of person guaranteed her in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms overrides all other considerations in this matter.

If I may, I would like to quote Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty, and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

I can conceive of no greater principle of fundamental justice than the right to control one's own body. The right to control one's body is inherent in each and every individual and so long as that individual can exercise that control then that right is indivisible.

Further, I think it must be recognized that no law adopted in this House which would have as its object the abridgement of that right, for that is what we are speaking of, could succeed. There is no law which we could fashion in this Chamber which would end abortion. It is a social impossibility. We know that from our experience during those years when there were such laws.

They did not serve to end abortion, Mr. Speaker. They did serve to end the lives of some women who sought abortions illegally because they had no choice, and again that would inevitably be the circumstance were we to pursue any kind of law that had as its object the curtailment of the fundamental right to security of the person.

Once again we would find ourselves in a situation where the lives of poor women—for it is they who would have no option—would be placed at risk. The return of the back alley butchers would once again mar our society. In those instances where such a law was effective, where women were forced to carry through to term babies they did not want, we would in most instances merely add to the 1,120,000 poor kids in Canada today, causing that cycle to repeat itself in ever greater degradation.

There is no need for such a law because it is a fundamental fact of our society that individual Canadian women are able to act as competent moral agents. We need not collect into this Chamber that decision-making capacity. Canadian women are perfectly capable of exercising it themselves. They can make those achingly complicated moral decisions.

The proof of this is in current practice where the overwhelming majority of abortions performed in Canada are performed early in the first trimester as soon as the pregnancy becomes known. In almost no instances, I assume, and certainly in none of which I am aware, has anyone undertaken a second or, God help us, a third trimester abortion for any other than the most horrible reasons in the face of the most horrible circumstances.

The one instance, in fact, which comes immediately to the minds of everyone in this Chamber is that of Chantal Daigle, who was forced into the second trimester because of interference in the Canadian judicial system. Other than such instances, and those where discoveries of deformed foetuses are made, it is indeed rare to the point of negligibility to find third trimester abortions. So, we can trust Canadian women to make proper moral decisions based on their circumstances, for they are the only ones who can know those circumstances as intimately as is necessary in this instance.

Further, the law that is before this House presents us with what can only be seen as a potential nightmare of litigation. Relying as it does on the opinion of a doctor, it invites the intervention of a contrary opinion of another doctor. Indeed, it conjures up images of anti-choice vigilante squads moving from doctor to doctor and from hospital to hospital attempting to intimidate doctors and thereby further restrict and reduce Canadian women's access to abortion, using a poorly crafted law as an instrument of terror against women.

Disgruntled ex-boyfriends, as was the case in the Daigle case, could challenge any doctor's opinion and could launch a third party court action. In fact, this bill will once again open up that very door to all kinds of civil litigation which the Supreme Court in its wisdom closed just last week. It would be a terrible error.

I think it must as well be made clear that nobody in this House, and of this I am certain, favours abortion. Nobody in this Chamber can honestly be said to want women to have abortions. The question that can legitimately be before this House is what steps ought properly be taken by a government concerned about this matter? How can a government concerned about reducing the incidence of abortion in Canada conduct public affairs such that that perfectly commendable goal is achieved?

You do not do it by attempting to ban abortions, as I have already argued. You do do it to the extent possible by making birth control devices and counselling widely, publicly and freely available. That is the only way you can do it.

But you have to acknowledge that even when such enlightened public policy is in full flower, there will still be errors, accidents and, God help us, violence against women. In those instances, the option of abortion must remain available at the sole discretion of the woman involved.

What we can do in that regard is to amend the Canada Health Act to guarantee access to every Canadian woman who may find herself seeking an abortion in Canada.

I note that there have been no abortions performed in Prince Edward Island since 1982. This is not because there were no women in Prince Edward Island seeking abortions. Far from it. It is because the women of Prince Edward Island were denied access in their province. That is a condition which must be rectified. It is a condition utterly unaddressed in this bill but it is a condition which must be rectified in the interests of Canadian women.

In summary, I would call on the House, in the name of Canadian women, to defeat this bill. Take positive measures to curtail the need for abortion and then the day may yet come when we can achieve that beautiful vision which animates the pro-choice movement in this country: Every mother a willing mother, every child a wanted child.

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to take part in today's second reading debate on Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion.

I have been a member of this House since 1984 and I have addressed my colleagues on several occasions on the subject of abortion. I personally consider the fact that 65,000 abortions performed each year in Canada is a national tragedy. I have expressed that opinion here and at home in my Manitoba constituency of Dauphin—Swan River.

I consider myself, and I am sure my constituents know that I am as well, a pro-life member of Parliament, or, rather, an anti-abortion member of Parliament. I use the term anti-abortion rather than pro-life because I believe that labels have become a major contributor to the rancour in this most emotional of national debates. Pro-lifers are not anti-choice and as well, pro-choicers are not anti-life. So I am personally an anti-abortionist and my record in this House confirms that fact.

For example, on June 2 of 1987, I voted in favour of Private Members' Motion M-37 in the name of the member for Grey—Simcoe. The motion asked the government to consider amending the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in Section 7 to include unborn persons. That motion was lost by a vote of 89 to 62.

Once again in July of 1988, I had the opportunity to vote on several motions ranging from outright abortion on demand to calling for legal protection of unborn children from the moment of conception. I voted for the latter which reflected my belief that life begins at conception and that society must begin to recognize that fact.

It has often been said that every society is judged by the way it treats its weakest members. That particular amendment, once again in the name of the member for Grey—Simcoe, was defeated 118 to 105. That is an indication of strength of the anti-abortion feelings at that time in this House.

In a perfect world, there would be no need for abortions. Every pregnancy would be a wanted pregnancy and a happy pregnancy. Every child would be a wanted child and a happy child. But sadly, as we all know, we live in a very imperfect world. Society wants and needs laws to protect its citizens and as well, society requires laws that are a reflection of that society. I believe that Canada needs a law on abortion.

Since January of 1988 when the Supreme Court of Canada struck down Section 251 of the Criminal Code, we have had no law to govern abortion. The reality of contemporary society is that certain women will seek abortion services.

Another important reality in Canada is the existence of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. So in its 1988 ruling, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Section 251 of the Criminal Code, which dealt with abortion through therapeutic abortion committees at accredited hospitals, was in violation of Section 7 of the charter. That is, it violated the woman's right to security of the person.

As well, and this is very important, the Supreme Court also clearly indicated that Parliament should take into consideration society's interest in the foetus, the unborn child. So we now have before us Bill C-43. It comes under the Criminal Code because it is only through the Criminal Code that the Parliament of Canada can legislate on abortion.

Having no law, I believe, would potentially cause serious problems in Canada. The provision of health services is primarily a provincial responsibility; that is, the delivery and the operation of those services.

• (1540)

The Canada Health Act does not list specific medical services, so the individual provinces specify services to be available and specify access to those services. The absence of federal law could lead to critical variations across Canada in the provision of abortion services.

For example, one province's policy could be the exact opposite of that of a neighbouring province when dealing with abortion. It is my opinion that doing nothing was not an option.

Bill C–43 makes abortion a criminal offence unless the pregnancy would likely be a threat to the life or health of the woman, health considerations to include mental, physical and psychological health. The law undoubtedly places a large responsibility on Canada's medical community because such a determination would be based upon the opinion of a single practitioner.

However, I have great faith in the physicians of Canada. The Canadian Medical Association has developed policies on abortion. It has spent much time in debate developing those policies and I believe that association can be depended upon to act in the best interests of their patients.

As well, the decision to have an abortion must be an agonizing one for a woman. I say "must" because I cannot as a man purport to know what a woman goes through in making such a decision. However, as a legislator, I do know that we as a society cannot and must not send women who have or seek abortions to jail. Society must instead work toward a time when abortions are not required or are not even desired.

Abortion must not be dealt with as an isolated issue. Abortion solves no problems. In fact, it could create many new ones. Related and supportive social policy must be developed concurrently with any abortion legislation.

I am, therefore, pleased that a royal commission on new reproductive technology will study the causes, treatment and prevention of infertility, sterilization reversals and other reproductive health issues. As well, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has announced $500,000 per year over the next three years for research into family planning issues, including contraception and fertility problems.

At the same time, federal and provincial governments must continue to develop new policies and programs dealing with family violence, child sexual abuse and child care and must meet the challenge to address the problem of unwanted pregnancies. Of course, ultimately, the search for a better society rests with our young people. They must be provided with information and education so that they can hopefully avoid the mistakes that we have made.

The citizens of Canada expect leadership from their government. I believe that has been provided with the introduction of Bill C–43. Of course, it is impossible, considering the emotional feelings on both sides of this important issue, to develop a law that will satisfy everyone. As well, it would be fruitless to have a law that would not survive a court challenge under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I could never have supported a bill that based access to abortion on the gestational model. Such an idea I find abhorrent. The logical extension of society's recognition of the increasing value of a developing foetus is to place less value on a life as it ages.

Therefore, I intend to support Bill C–43 at second reading. It does not totally reflect my own personal anti-abortion feelings. However, as a legislator, I feel duty bound to work toward developing laws that are constitutionally acceptable and will meet with the approval of tolerant and thoughtful Canadians. I feel that Bill C–43 accomplishes that purpose.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, over the decade during which I have had the privilege of sitting in this House, there have been many moments in which the House of Commons has risen to an occasion where it provided a sense of direction for the country and responded in a sometimes quite magnificent way to expectations, hopes and aspirations. Unfortunately, this is not one of those times.

It is a great sadness and disappointment to many Canadians that on an issue that affects so many of them in so many ways, that reaches into family life in such a profound way, the Parliament of Canada is not giving this country the kind of leadership that it requires. In this, I agree with the member from Dauphin—Swan River who just spoke.

I have been struck over the last three or four months, particularly after the events of last summer, by how many people in my own riding and across the country have spoken to me about this issue and have approached it in a way with some reason and dispassion, commitment, some with agony, some with clear questioning but in a certain spirit of trying to find a resolution to the problem. I think they were hoping that the Parliament of Canada through its members would find that avenue, that particular opening that would give them some sense that we are reaching a new plateau in public policy as it relates to this very crucial issue.

I would also say, after listening to the speeches made in this House over the last several days, that the feelings expressed by members also had within them the germs and ingredients of a kind of resolution. It has been quite fascinating to listen to the kind of personal commitments, real feelings of awareness and engagement that so many members have had in trying to again find a way of resolving what has been such an important and widespread debate in this country for such a long time.

The legislation before us falls far short of that mark. It is a serious and profound lack of leadership and direction. It is, as the minister who introduced it clearly called it, a compromise at a time when a compromise was not called for but something much broader, more comprehensive, more rational in dealing with an issue of such great significance.

This was not the time for the politically expedient answer. It was not the time to try to find the ways of patching together a temporary agreement among members of the cabinet to get legislation through to meet a statement that was made perhaps in haste by the Prime Minister last summer. In fact, the country was looking for a great deal more than that.

The legislation before us, the bill itself, as we know, is deeply flawed. Perhaps what bothers me most about it, is that it will create a whole new set of problems. I think the test of good legislation is whether it resolves a problem without creating a new generation of new problems. This legislation clearly does not meet that test.

This legislation opens up once again the possibility, the real potential of a number of new actions, of confusions, of court initiatives being taken by third parties against doctors. It is not going to resolve any of the clear questions dealing with access that have been very much part of this debate, of a fair degree of equality and access for women across the country.

We are now going to be putting an onus, an intimidation on different medical practitioners in different parts of the country and basically putting them in the position that they may want to withdraw their services or not become engaged at all. The legislation is flawed.

We have seen since the Supreme Court decision the reaction of the legal fraternity which is to say that it creates once again a new legal problem for many Canadians. That is not good legislation which creates a whole new set of problems. It is not good legislation because once again we are using the Criminal Code as a way of providing punishment to those engaged in the very difficult choice, and it is a difficult choice. We are saying that the criminal system will punish those who disobey this legislation. That is a terrible, awful indictment of a society that uses the threat of prison or of a criminal judgment against such a personal deeply-felt act that involves so many questions of morality and nervousness.

I listened with interest to the speech made by the member from Edmonton East. He said that women have the right to make their choice, and I agree with him. But to say that they can make that choice in a calm atmosphere is not right. I have talked to people from the Pregnancy Crisis Centre in the city of Winnipeg. Often young women, unwed women in particular, are making choices full of anxiety, of a sense isolation, of being lonely. They are making a decision at a time in their lives when it is perhaps the most difficult time to make a decision because they are faced with a great world out there. All of a sudden, a pregnancy takes place and perhaps the boyfriend leaves, or there is no love in the relationship and they are left bereft of any support whatever. That is a very tough time to ask anyone to make a choice.

While I defend the right to make a choice, I also believe strongly that it cannot be a choice made in isolation. Choice does not mean licence. It does not mean to say a complete freedom to do as one wants. That is where again I think the approach taken by the government falls deeply short. There was such an opportunity to address some of the crucial problems faced by women making a choice, an incredible sort of fear of "just how do I support a child?"

• (1550)

We live in a country that has a million children living in poverty, where 50 per cent of the people going to the food banks are young families with children. We have such a total breakdown and failure of family policy and we say nothing about it.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare says, "Well, I understand the problem," and offers $1.5 million and a couple of studies to deal with that basic breakdown of the family structure in this country and the support for families. What a terrible vacuum.

I listened to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Again, he gave a very heartfelt speech the other evening. He said that it is up to the churches to make this choice and totally absolved himself of any governmental responsibility whatsoever.

We in this Parliament cannot abdicate responsibility. Goodness knows, how can we be talking about the crucial fact of abortion when we know that many women face the choice of living in poverty, living with the prospect of their children being underfed and under-educated, of not having a chance in society. Do you think that does not affect their choice? Do you not think that that biases and distorts the choice that they are going to make? Of course it does. And yet we say nothing in this Parliament about it. It has nothing to do with the debate.

One good reason for voting against this bill and defeating it is to keep the pressure on the government to produce a decent family policy in Canada so that when women have to make a choice, they make a choice with a fair chance, with a proper system of support in this country. If we pass this legislation, then the thing gets forgotten and the pressure is off. For another 20 or 30 years, we can go on doing business as usual and not address what is becoming a national tragedy, embarrassment and serious handicap to the future of a million children or more in this country and that is a fact that they have not been given a proper chance in society. Surely Members of Parliament have to take that into account when they decide how to vote on this bill. They cannot, in any way, eliminate that broader question from the context in which a choice is going to be made by Members of Parliament.

The real question is how do you reduce abortions, how do you reduce the necessity of making those choices? As members have talked, and I have listened to most of the speeches, they have clearly signalled the fact that we need much better services. We need counselling for women. We need to make adoption a real legitimate choice.

My wife and I adopted a young boy four and a half years ago. He brought us enormous warmth and love and it is an incredible experience. I want to see this society do a lot more, not just to have children who are wanted but to have children who are needed in this society.

I do not see anything in this bill that says anything about that. I do not see anything that the government is doing to make that possible. In fact, what I saw three weeks ago, in the unemployment insurance bill, was the government bringing in a measure that clearly discriminated against adoptive parents. Yet, at the same time, its members have the nerve and gall to stand up and say, "We want to reduce the incidence of abortion," but they bring in an Unemployment Insurance Act which clearly contradicts that commitment.

I said in the House at that time to stay true to your beliefs. At least be consistent. The government ignored it. One minister stood up and said: "Well it does not matter. It does not count that we are discriminating against adoptive parents". Yet on the other hand we hear government members say: "But we want to reduce the incidence of abortion". That is hypocrisy. That is not fair.

That is one reason why I cannot vote for this legislation. I do not want to take the heat off this government. I want to keep the pressure on. I want to keep reminding government members every day that they owe an awful lot more to society to deal with this problem. We need much better legislation than this can produce.

If they would listen to the members of this House as they have spoken over the last two or three days, we could come up with a much better bill. I am not saying it would make everybody happy, because there are clear divisions on points of view between those two important values, one of which is right of women to make that choice in a society that has been dominated by males for so long. I do not think that we can compromise on that, but surely there is an awful lot more room to move in legislative terms, statutory terms, regulatory terms and fiscal terms to create a social and economic system which would substantially reduce the need to have an abortion.

There was room for this Parliament to provide real leadership in the country and to meet the concerns of all those who have spoken, for the entire spectrum of opinion. But this legislation and this Parliament is failing terribly to provide that kind of leadership and that kind of direction for Canada when it is so desperately needed. For that reason, I will be voting against the bill.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, today on this debate addressing the issue of abortion, I am speaking for the fourth time in my parliamentary career on the right to life for the unborn.

In 1982, the Constitution of Canada was delivered to this country. Despite the fact that it did not have an amendment to it—which I and others of my ilk determined would be in the best interests of the unborn, namely, having a provision included to protect the rights and the life of the unborn—the constitution was repatriated.

With that repatriation, the Parliament of Canada lost its supremacy to the Supreme Court of Canada, and in 1984 this government inherited an abortion law which was struck down early in 1988 by the Supreme Court of Canada. In the intervening two years, the country has been without legislation.

I recognize that the government has the responsibility of governing this country. It has the responsibility of enacting legislation. It has the responsibility to lead. I also recognize that the government has the responsibility to enact legislation that will meet the test of the Supreme Court. Indeed the government of the day is, in fact, in a no-win situation because in my opinion there is no way that legislation can be introduced under the present conditions that will be acceptable to the majority of Canadians.

With this legislation, the government has come under fire from the pro-choice side which believes that any abortion law at all is an impediment to the rights of women. We have seen the pro-life side of the equation just as concerned about the legislation because that side maintains that it forsakes the right of life to the unborn and provides for abortion on demand.

There are for us who are pro-life three positive aspects to this legislation which I have had to take under very serious consideration. First, by placing the legislation in the Criminal Code, it identifies the act of committing abortion as a criminal act and indeed this is important. Second, the exception to this provision is that an abortion can only be accepted with respect to a decision taken by a medical practitioner with the advice and consent of that medical practitioner as it relates to the health of the mother. Third, as it does not identify a gestation period, and although I am not a lawyer, it would occur to me that there could be a basis now to determine through the procedure of the courts that life indeed does begin at conception which would go a long way to identifying with the crisis in which the pro-life people find themselves.

In my opinion if this legislation were on the books, it might be a good thing from the point of view of the pro-lifers to start the process through the courts and deal with the process through changes to the constitution. If, indeed, the legislation is not passed, the field of abortion may be opened as it is now to those people who have made a career out of taking the lives of the unborn.

However, the legislation has unfortunately fatal flaws. These same provisions that I refer to which give support to those who support life and recognize that the unborn needs legislative protection are indeed the very same concerns that are a deep and grave concern to me. The legislation provides that an abortion may be provided if the mental, physical or psychological health of the mother is threatened. In the legislation nobody has determined what psychological health is, nobody has identified what mental health is. This legislation clearly moves beyond the provision that the life of the mother is the only acceptable condition whereby an abortion may be permitted in the event of distress.

• (1600)

Because the gestational period is not identified the problem becomes, when is it acceptable not to perform an abortion? My grave concern is that with the knowledge that life can be sustained at 23 weeks—at 23 weeks a child may be born prematurely—that life is now threatened under this proposed law because it simply provides open-ended abortion which could be interpreted by some as being permitted right up to the moment of birth. Nobody, I am sure, in this House would condone or support that type of situation but, nonetheless, that is what we are faced with.

And what constitutes a medical practitioner in this country and what constitutes the direction of that medical practitioner? Does it mean that somebody in an office in Toronto can supervise, under his direction, a team of abortionists in Halifax? Does it mean that we will indeed be in a position in the future to see abortionists, people who are in that business, establish abortion clinics much the same as we have McDonald's franchised across this country, or Burger King? That, too, is a very real possibility.

I appreciate the govenrment's difficulties in trying to come to some solution to this anguishing question. And it is likely that this law, if it was passed, could meet the constitutional challenge. In principle it could be argued that the rights of the unborn are protected but, in fact, in the practicalities of practice this legislation clearly does nothing for the life of the unborn.

My position remains as it has been for the number of years that I have represented my constituents in this Chamber. I have always maintained that abortion is not acceptable as a means of birth control and that we must act to protect those who cannot protect themselves. I say that innocent lives are being destroyed, lives that have value and worth. I just want to read, in the last few moments of my time, a letter from a constituent of mine which I think sums it up very nicely.

He says: "My wife and I are the foster parents of three adopted children. Our three children should have been destroyed in their mothers' wombs, so the abortionists would have us believe. Two were born to unmarried girls and the other was born to a woman separated from her husband. How grateful we are that their mothers decided not to destroy them. They have brought great joy to our lives and enhanced the lives of many other people. My wife and I implore you to enact laws that will protect the unborn at all stages of development."

What I see before us today is legislation that meets the requirements of constitutional challenge and court challenge and the requirement as well of those who want virtually unimpaired access to abortion. Unfortunately, I see nothing that meets the requirements of those who would be denied birth and life.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, it is not possible in ten minutes to consider all the details of Bill C–43, its implications, its medical and legal advice, but let me at the outset say that as someone who believes that the lives of the unborn should be protected I believe the bill is very weak and I believe too that it is badly flawed in its protection for the unborn.

Let me first deal with what I believe are the positives. I am pleased that the justice minister has included it in the Criminal Code. This reaffirms that the performance of abortion is a criminal act. Second, I am no less pleased that the minister did not use the gestational approach. Third, it implies the recognition of human life from conception and that the unborn child does have intrinsic value.

The negative aspects are many. For conviction, the sentence is two years. The taking of an innocent life should demand a much stiffer sentence, say 10 or 15 years. An abortion could be performed for health reasons defined as including physical, mental and psychological health. This is almost abortion on demand. Health is defined basically in a manner which cannot be verified. Therefore, would recurring headaches during pregnancy be sufficient reason for an abortion?

Consultation with only one medical practitioner is another weakness. Surely the woman should be expected to consult at least two medical doctors. It should be a requirement that the doctor or the doctors give written advice and a written report as to why, in his or her opinion, an abortion was deemed necessary.

I find it repugnant that Parliament, representing society, is even debating the issue of abortion. Abortion should not be illegal; it should be unthinkable. Abortion is society's declaration that we have no desirable future as a people, as humanity, as a society.

More and more we find ourselves on the slippery slope of decadence from violence and drugs and sex in relativism and situational ethics. The so–called pro–choice argument postulates the right of a woman to control her own body. What is the legitimate right that allows the pain and thus the ultimate death of an innocent human being?

Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states that:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

I suppose it is a foregone conclusion that if we all accepted the premise that "everyone" included the unborn then this debate would not be taking place here today. Consider the following statement made by Jules Carles, director of research at France's National Centre for Scientific Research:

> The first cell formed by sperm–egg union is already the embryo of an autonomous living being with individual hereditary patrimony. Such that, if we knew the nature of the spermatozoid and the chromosomes involved we could already, at that point, predict the characteristics of the child, the future colour of his hair and the illness to which he would be subject. In his mother's womb he will form, he will not accept everything she brings to him, but only that which is necessary to his existence. Therefore he will realize his hereditary patrimony. In that first cell the dynamism and the precise direction of life appears. In spite of its fragility and its immense needs, an autonomous and genuinely living being has come into existence—
> The law must therefore aim at protecting the rights of the unborn from the moment of its conception, not merely from some subsequent point of human development. The law must set its face against functional definitions of personhood. People function as humans because they are human; they do not become human by performing human functions—

Mr. Troy Weber, who wrote to me on the subject of fundamental issues inherent to abortion, stated:

> The scientific, genetic criteria speak plainly. The foetus is a human being from the moment of conception.
> Since we cannot refute the argument that the foetus is a human being from the moment it is conceived, and since the medical community and the genetic information we have received from it both concur with the argument that the foetus is a human being from the moment of conception, our most logical recourse is to accept that the foetus is a human being at conception.

Mr. Speaker, I agree. From the time of my first nomination meeting in March of 1978 and through four federal elections I have made public my views on abortion. It is on the record back home and it is on the record in this chamber that I am pro–life and anti–abortion. The easiest course of action then for me to take would be to vote against the bill. It will be difficult for me to vote "yes" at second reading and I will do so reluctantly. But let me tell you why I expect to do so.

• (1610)

I will work diligently with other pro–life members to bring in amendments, both in committee and at report stage, to strengthen this bill. Some of my constituents have told me to do everything in my power to defeat Bill C–43 because a bad law is worse than none. I do not think I am going to buy that logic. This law is better than none at all. Not for a moment do I believe that the majority of my constituents want a lawless society. No law on the books is truly abortion on demand.

I recognize the fact that this is the position of many members in this House. It occurs to me that if I and other like–minded MPs cannot pass a pro–life bill then I must do everything in my power to restrict the number of abortions that occur and the wanton destruction of life.

In conclusion, I want to throw out a challenge to the churches because it is mostly they who demand pro–life legislation. The challenge to them is that they provide counselling and, more than that, that they provide facilities and financial assistance with the love that goes with it for women who are facing this dilemma.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the issue of abortion is not for the timid. In general, legislators have displayed a great deal of frailty and evasiveness by refusing to confront what must surely be called the ethical, social and political quagmire of our time. The verdict of this House will determine the value which our society places on human life itself and the very foundation upon which all our laws are based.

In the past it had been possible for those who wished to avoid taking responsibility for their decisions to hide behind the neutrality of the courts. Recent legal decisions have shown that there can be little neutrality on an issue which deals with the primary concept of life. Since the previous legislation was struck down, individual judges were forced into making complicated legal decisions based on their personal and independent interpretation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We have recently witnessed how the community and the courts were left twisting in the wind because of this government's legislative paralysis.

The decision as to which life merits protection cannot be left to judges, doctors, or even women themselves. The issue must be dealt with on a national level by Parliament so that we as elected representatives may once and for all establish the supremacy of life and the protection of the unborn as would befit a civilized society. We must not be condemned by a future Parliament for legitimizing the termination of hundreds of thousands of unborn Canadians.

This fall the nation was embroiled in controversy. As a result, this government has been forced to hastily draft an abortion law in an attempt to fill the legislative void. The presentation of this bill must be classified as the worst kind of chicanery because Bill C–43, as written, is obviously not intended to be enforced. This bill will not prevent a single abortion, nor was this its objective. Yet it is still being fraudulently marketed as a compromise. On the one hand, this government tells us that abortion is illegal and, on the other, it outlines succinctly how the law can be circumvented in every case.

Bill C–43 is abortion on demand with red tape. The definition of health has been given the widest possible interpretation. One of the authors of this bill admitted in this House that Bill C–43 entitles women to abortion under a wide variety of circumstances. In effect, the legislation makes it possible for women to seek and obtain abortions for reasons that may have more to do with lifestyle considerations than with actual physical endangerment.

In fact, the health clause will operate as nothing more than a rubber stamp condonement of abortion on demand. It will allow women to abort their unborn child based on the fleeting notion of immediate convenience. But life itself is not convenient. Many of the mundane decisions we make on a daily basis are not expedient but we are forced to make them. The value of life is not a function of convenience. Our society grants those who are legally regarded as persons the right to life, liberty and security of person.

We must remember that even during this century the rights of women were severely abridged. We had to fight for what are now considered basic human rights. It was only when social attitudes changed that we were granted full personhood before the law. Thus it would seem incumbent upon those of us who until fairly recently were denied full legal status and protection to extend those same rights to the unborn.

By the simplest definitions available to us, a foetus should qualify for personhood. But as history has proven, the attributes necessary for the granting of legal status can be arbitrary, capricious and discretionary. The argument that this debate is a conflict between the rights of women and the rights of the foetus is political in nature. The mother has size, voice, legal recognition and voting power. The foetus has none of these endowments. It must rely on others for protection. Accordingly, it is granted not even the most minimal of protections under C–43.

As legislators we now have the duty to examine the basis upon which our laws are founded. We must re–examine why we as a society have outlawed crimes such as homicide. We condemn them not because they are socially or economically destabilizing, but because we recognize the intrinsic value of human life. Our laws are not simply non–aggression pacts between participants, but make some attempt to develop universal social standards. The tragedy of this bill is that it fails to address and grant the logical extension of the recognition of the intrinsic value of life to the foetus. It does not make any attempt to defend the weak, but merely caters to the agenda of the strong.

We must channel the energy and passion which surrounds this debate into dealing with our collective social responsibility for the well–being and security of our fledgling generation. Those of us who wish to protect the unborn must also understand, however, that the role of government cannot stop with merely enacting protective legislation. We must also deal with the true challenge of confronting and changing the social attitudes which so often lead to abortion.

Society must learn to accept the responsibility for caring for unwanted births by providing the social support systems which are so desperately needed by pregnant women. These women are often alone, abandoned and trapped by their predicament.

• (1620)

Our governments have failed on many accounts to provide the necessary structural environment to assist women to deal with the existing social inequities. They have failed to provide child care spaces, adequate funding for shelters for abused women, and the counselling and education programs necessary to alleviate women of the traditional male–female economic disparities.

It must therefore be our responsibility as a caring and just society to protect and nurture mother and child through the full development of human life, both before and after birth. To merely impose an ethical judgment on the backs of the vulnerable members of society without compensating social support would be both cruel and irresponsible. Those of us who are compelled to champion the unborn cannot be indifferent to the needs of those who have survived birth. We cannot make our ethical and social decisions in a vacuum.

Sadly, the proposed legislation is seriously flawed because it makes no attempt to balance the rights of the unborn with those of the mother. The bill before us sets such a small bounty on the life of the unborn that even the lamest excuses of the mother will be accepted. We, as legislators, must learn to embrace the foetus as an equal member of society. To imperiously determine which life should be afforded protection of the law and which should not would leave our society extremely susceptible to the social decision-making characteristic of the genocidal policies of certain Third World nations.

We must not allow ourselves the arrogance of so easily denying life. We do not have that right. No one carries the truth in his pocket. If we are to err in our judgment let us err on the side of life.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the Hon. Member for Medicine Hat, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The Hon. Member for Saskatoon–Clark's Crossing (Mr. Axworthy)—Proposed Goods and Services Tax; the Hon. Member for Drummond (Mr. Guilbault)—Dairy Industry; the Hon. Member for Dartmouth—Auditor General's Report.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate on Bill C–43 there is probably little else that can be added to the substance of either side of this sensitive issue that has not already been raised.

During the last two elections there was probably no question put to candidates running for office more frequently than "What is your position on abortion?" I stated my pro–life views clearly in 1984 and again in 1988 so that my constituents knew my position before they voted for me. I was among the members in this House who supported the pro–life amendment on motion M–37 during the last Parliament.

Those of us who sit as members in this House come from every area of Canada. We come from different ethnic and cultural backgrounds. We come from different walks of life and different religions. It is because of these differences that this place is interesting, challenging, frustrating and, at times, most difficult.

In dealing with the abortion issue it is these differences, personal views and family values that each of us has developed which shapes and determines our individual position on this issue. Despite the eloquent debate on either side of the abortion issue—and I have been listening to the many eloquent speeches on either side—few, if any, members I am sure will be persuaded to change their position.

The difficult decision for many of us is whether or not we can support a bill that is not our preferred choice in legislation. This bill does not contain everything most of us would like to see encompassed in legislation. It contains clauses that I am personally uncomfortable with.

We failed as members to reach a consensus in June 1988. If that exercise proved anything, it showed us that there is no more consensus in Parliament than there is throughout the country. Few if any of us will ever see the legislation we personally want survive this House and meet the test of the Charter. The Supreme Court can strike down any unconstitutional law. It has become apparent to me that my personal choice is unconstitutional.

I admit that Bill C–43, in my view at least, allows abortions in too wide a variety of circumstances. The latitude under the definition of "health", both mental and psychological, creates great difficulty for me. The determination of psychological health I am afraid will not be made, in many cases, by medical practitioners who are specialists in that field.

I have heard it said by some that no law is better than the bill that we have before us today. I cannot agree with that. No matter how minimal the protection, if pause for further consideration of the consequences by a woman and her doctor results, that alone is worth making an effort to achieve. Flawed, in my view, as this bill is, it will reinforce the principle that human life has a unique value. To have no law suggests that unborn life has no value at all.

Colleagues on the other side of this issue will not be persuaded to change their views because of my arguments, nor will I by theirs. I would hope, however, that they would fully consider supporting this bill at second reading. To defeat the bill at this stage would not give Canadians all of the opportunities available under the parliamentary process to attempt those changes and improvements that many of us feel could be implemented in this legislation. Regardless of their position, I think that there is little to be lost and perhaps much to be gained by giving a legislative committee the chance to consider amendments and conduct hearings. With this in mind I will support this bill at second reading.

Statistics are cold hard facts that are often filed away and forgotten. In 1988 between 73,000 and 74,000 therapeutic abortions took place in Canada. If the procedure that has become so commonplace today had been so readily available in the past, how much different might our country and our world have been. What if the mother of a Picasso, a Mozart or a Churchill had the opportunity for easy access to terminate unwanted pregnancy?

If economic factors played a role, how many of us in this House who were born during the depths of the Depression might not be here today? How many members born during the 1940s were raised alone by their mother while their father was serving for his country? No doubt they were an inconvenience and created a hardship and economic difficulties for a single parent. How many of us sitting in this chamber today were at one point in our past an unwanted pregnancy? Can any of us smugly say that is not an option our mothers would have considered? Think about it.

I ask each member sitting in this House to reflect upon the circumstances their own mothers faced a few months before they were born. Ask yourself if, given the choice, might she have made the same decision 73,000 Canadian women made last year. Today you are a member of Parliament. You could have been a statistic.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this very important debate. If I may be forgiven the expression, I think this is one debate and one issue on which we as Members of Parliament are certainly earning our keep, given the volume and the emotion of interventions by constituents and many others, and indeed the need to probe very deeply within our own convictions on where we actually stand on this particular piece of legislation.

I would also like to thank all other members for their very thoughtful speeches from which I have learned a lot. It is a debate that many of us will remember for a long time.

What we see here is a clash between two very profound, and in many ways, equally compelling values. The one set of values grows from the women's movement which, in my mind, has been the most progressive and powerful social movement of this century in Canada. Many of the people who have taken up the cause of women's rights are genuine inheritors of the legacy of people like Agnes MacPhail and Nellie McClung in seeking not only equality, but the liberation that goes beyond simple equality for women. It is not only the ideology of a movement that propels them, but a real sense of the reality of many women's lives, especially in the era of backroom butchers.

On the other hand, there is a strong feeling of respect for life that many of us share, and my own case, it grows from the traditions of the Mennonite Church, the Anabaptists movement going back to the 16th century.

We have tried to be consistent about respect for life. As a people we have always opposed capital punishment, although there have been individual people who held opposing views. We have taken a pacifist role, a non-resistant role in times of conflict. The need to respect life goes back many centuries in our family and, indeed, my own being.

I talked to many women in trying to come to terms with this particular piece of legislation. I talked to them as a Member of Parliament and somebody who had to make a decision here, knowing how irritating it is for many women to hear so many male voices talking about this issue. They opened up on this issue because they feel very strongly about it, whether they considered themselves pro-choice or pro-life. What surprised me in those conversations is how many women that I knew and knew well, many of whom came from what might be considered or called good homes with a religious upbringing and so on, had actually had abortions, many of them illegal and many of them outside of the country.

I listened to these women. From what I heard, the presence or absence of a particular abortion law was the least of factors in their decision. What precipitated their choice was in fact the circumstances of their lives and what they saw as the potential future for themselves and their child.

Therefore, it seemed increasingly clear to me that if we in this place are serious about reducing the numbers of abortions in this country and reducing unwanted pregnancies, we must address all the factors involved. We must give serious priority, for example, to the issue of child poverty, on which we are having a debate tomorrow. Our leader's last speech will be on child poverty, and it will be worth listening to and acting on by all of us.

The abuse of women and children in this country must come to an end. I, as a Member of Parliament, had a case this summer where I had no option that I could pursue to prevent a 14-year-old girl from going home to a community and a home where her 16-year-old brother was going to sexually abuse her. I could find no recourse to keep that girl from going back. If that girl became pregnant, I would not want to make the moral choice on what should be done in that situation.

Then there is the whole question of adoption, which is certainly a positive alternative, but is really mired in a morass of bureaucracy and a totally inhumane approach to family structures, especially in cultures that are not mainstream cultures.

We do not have training and support for young mothers. We do not have a national child care policy. We do not have safe and effective birth control, at least to any kind of standards that today's science can make possible. We do not have adequate sex education in many schools. We do not have adequate family planning. The role of men in this is all too often ignored.

As well, any legislation that I could personally support would have to include, first of all, the right of conscientious objection for all health care professionals who disagree with a particular law. Second, it would have to have equal effect for all women in this country, be they rich or poor, and in whatever community they happen to live.

Therefore, I have decided that I would not support any legislative initiative on abortion that did not come to terms with these priorities and would leave them unaddressed.

In fact it seems to me that it is morally inconsistent for people who say that they want to see fewer abortions to put more energy and commitment into lobbying for a strict abortion law than they put into the struggle for better lives for women and children. Indeed, I have observed with some sadness that some of the members of this House who are most adamant in insisting that the full weight of criminal law should be brought to bear on women in these circumstances are also the most ardent supporters of Margaret Thatcher's vision of a dog-eat-dog world and the social Darwinism that goes with it.

Therefore, I cannot in good conscience even try to sort out the deep moral and ethical questions which surround this issue until such a time as a genuinely humane and caring attitude towards women and children permeates everything we do in this House. I will therefore join my caucus colleagues in opposing this bill.

In closing, I would like to thank all the women who shared their feelings and experiences with me, as difficult as it often was for all of us. I would especially like to thank three women. One, a sister in Prince Albert, in this case a nun who offered to pray for my faith, an offer I gratefully accepted. Second, another sister in the city of Prince Albert, this time a working woman, who asked me point blank if she could count on me not to sell out women on this issue. I would like to place on the record that I promised that woman that no woman would ever go to jail for having an abortion because of anything I did as a legislator.

Last, I would like to gratefully acknowledge the role of the member for New Westminster—Burnaby for her understanding, her sincerity and calm in the face of immense pressures. As the critic on this issue in our caucus she has to take much of the credit, along with our leader and others who participated in genuine debate. But this was really spearheaded by the member for New Westminster—Burnaby. In spite of the profound differences of philosophy which certainly are there in our caucus, her depth of character and the scope of her concern for humanity was enident.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, this is an issue that many of us have struggled with for a considerable period of time not only as politicians but as individuals. In my own case, as a former municipal politician in metropolitan Toronto, representing a constituency of 560,000 people for five elections and 11 years, I have had to take a position on it since 1972.

In every election I have run in I have had a number of people calling and asking my position and telling me that they would not vote for me if I was in favour of permitting abortion. We all have had that experience.

As a member of the Metro Toronto Community Services and Housing Committee in the North York Board of Health, I again had to make decisions which were the subject of heavy lobbying regarding abortion and contraception counselling programs.

Perhaps the most difficult forum in which I had to deal with this issue was at the board of directors and executive committee of the Catholic Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto. That society takes the position that it can never support abortion under any circumstance because it is firmly of the opinion that another child is involved. The society views this as a fundamental tenet of Catholicism and one of the major reasons for having a separate society.

However, in every instance that I am aware of, when a ward of the society went before a judge requesting an abortion, the judge granted the child an abortion. In one seminar that the board held the matter was debated by theologians and one of the situations that we had struggled with as a board was discussed. This case involved a 13-year old child who was the victim of incest who was threatening to commit suicide if she was forced to have the baby.

One theologian felt that in that particular instance he would interpret the teachings of the church that permit abortions in instances where the mother's life is in danger to the greatest degree possible and permit the abortion.

Several members of the board immediately and angrily protested such an interpretation of the church's position. In their view, that 13-year old victim's mental anguish was not a sufficient reason to permit her to have an abortion.

• (1640)

There are a great many other people whom I know and greatly respect who have equally adamant views on this issue. Many are caring and compassionate people, as indeed are all the members of the CCAS board. Some of them lead truly exemplary lives and have adopted and/or fostered many children because of their deep desire to help less fortunate children.

I strongly believe they are entitled to their Children's Aid Societies, their schools and hospitals and their way of life and beliefs. That is why as a board member I supported the board's position. However, I do not feel that that viewpoint can survive at all in the real world. Just as that 13-year old victim who was freed from her horrible situation by a judge who said that it is wrong in Canada to force a child to bear a child, so too in the real world the subjugation and enslavement of women, the deprivation of freedom of choice that is implied by such an act could not possibly survive in a free society. The anti-abortionists' views are best left as moral convictions to be practised by those who share them.

As an elected official my consistent position has been that I am personally opposed to abortion, but I feel that it is fundamentally important that women not be deprived of the right to choose. I have always said that I am not for abortion on demand and have refused to be labelled as pro-choice because I simply do not agree with the position so well enunciated by those members who feel that no legislation is necessary except for legislation which makes access to abortion mandatory in every town and rural district in Canada.

The proposed law provides the opportunity for women to choose whether or not to have a child based on a reasonably thoughtful process, and in conjunction with the medical profession. While it does not legislate access, it does improve access. The law makes abortions illegal except when they are performed by a medical doctor who has reached the medical opinion that the woman's health or life is likely to be in danger. Health is interpreted as physical, mental or psychological.

In the first place, I do not think that there are any reasons that women have abortions that cannot be considered as health reasons that would qualify under these provisions. Women do not undertake the decision to have an abortion lightly. Women do not have abortions for socio-economic reasons. Some women have abortions because their particular socioeconomic positions are so stressful that an additional child would make their personal situation so intolerable that they could not cope.

The law requires doctors to develop the medical opinion. This must be in accordance with the standards of their profession. We have received a preliminary report from the Canadian medical profession describing what they are. I was pleased to read these and will listen to the presentation of the CMA with great interest at the legislative committee. I think they are very reassuring to many people.

First of all, the CMA interprets abortion as the act of termination of the pregnancy before foetal viability. The CMA has stressed that beyond the stage where the foetus is capable of an independent existence the termination of pregnancy is indicated only under exceptional circumstances. They also say that it should not used as an alternative to contraception. They say the patient should be provided with the option of full and immediate counselling services in the event of an unwanted pregnancy. They say a physician should not be compelled to participate in the termination of a pregnancy, and that a physician whose moral or religious beliefs prevent him or her from recommending or performing an abortion should inform the patient of such so that she may consult another physician. Many people have concerns about the fact that under this legislation abortions could conceivably be in the latter stages of pregnancy. Doctors in Canada will not do abortions too late in the pregnancy without very severe reasons.

The legislation does not currently set a mandatory deadline for an abortion but medical standards do. Similarly, the concerns about counselling, as I have already mentioned, have been addressed. There is a flexibility in the approach that can adjust to future medical developments. At present, amniocentesis can only be done at the twentieth week and a confirmatory amniocentesis and subsequent abortion can take up to the twenty-second week. Medical science could shorten that timespan considerably in the future.

With respect to the question of access, the law will certainly improve the situation. It makes abortion illegal except where a medical practitioner believes that the continuation of the pregnancy would, or is likely to, threaten the life or the physical, mental or psychological health of the patient. I suspect that particularly given the previous Morgentaler decision, it will be very difficult for any provincial government to prohibit doctors performing a legal medical procedure, or to limit funding to only abortions approved in hospitals. That is an issue I want to explore in the legislative committee.

I very much object to the idea of doctors or nurses being forced to participate in abortions against their will, or a hospital board being forced to provide abortion services in a hospital against its will. Abortion does not represent an ordinary medical service. There are many people in Canada who have deeply held moral convictions on this issue that must be respected. This law, however, makes it much more possible for individual medical doctors to provide this service in clinics. The law is necessary to establish a national standard and to clearly state that the decision to authorize an abortion is based on medical reasons after a consultation with the patient.

One final point I would like to make is that permitting abortions in this fashion also ensures that women are free to choose to have the child. If abortions were made illegal and in some strange authoritarian society women were not able to choose to have a child, but were forced to continue their pregnancies, the tremendous joy of having a wanted child who is welcomed into the world as a blessing would be lost.

I think of the great joy I have had in my daughter. I think of other friends and relatives who have grappled with the issue and have chosen life. It is a good law and I look forward to considering it further.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the opportunity to speak in this historic debate this afternoon. We as legislators have a very important role to play in crafting a new abortion law for Canada.

I am of the firm belief that life begins at conception, and that the state has the responsibility to protect that life. Indeed, Mr. Justice Beetz wrote in the decision of January 28, 1988: "Parliament is justified in requiring a reliable, independent and medically sound opinion in order to protect the state interest in the foetus". Further, he stated, "Parliament requires this independent opinion because it is not only the woman's interest that is at stake in a decision to authorize an abortion".

I am here in this Chamber today by the good graces of the people of Canada. I believe the majority of my constituents are pro-life and they have elected me knowing that I too was pro-life. Like many other members, I have received over 3,000 letters in the last month urging me to follow my conscience and protect the unborn. I believe that I can do no less.

I have listened to many sincere speeches by members from both sides of this House. On Tuesday night, the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources outlined his reasons for supporting this particular bill. I listened and I was moved.

But I am very troubled by the dilemma we face. It is this law or no law. It is an unfortunate and negative situation. It is also one that I cannot accept. If we support the bill for second reading, it means that we support the bill in principle. I believe this means that we support abortion on demand. If we compromise on life itself, what is next?

• (1650)

Each of us represents a special interest group, a group whose issue we speak out on. It could be farmers, seniors citizens, women, or small business people. Who speaks out for the unborn, those who have no voice? What interest group could be more special than a child as yet unborn? It is a crime to destroy the eggs of certain birds, yet it is acceptable to destroy a human being.

I share the views of my hon. friends for Leeds—Grenville and Bruce—Grey who spoke eloquently this week. The member for Leeds—Grenville mentioned that back in history if a woman was to be executed and was found to be pregnant the execution was delayed so that the baby could be born. Two people were involved, Mr. Speaker, not one.

I am not a lawyer or a university professor or someone who pretends to have all the answers. I am just a human being who listens to my constituents and follows my conscience. We hear about the limits on what may or may not be legal when it comes to abortion. We hear what may or may not be acceptable. We hear about what may or may not be worthy of a choice. Is morality not supposed to be a consideration? I believe that it should be.

I acknowledge that it is extremely difficult to impose morality in a law. Laws are supposed to be clear, objective, sterile and without emotion. For me, the issue of abortion is different. Anyone can hire a lawyer to try his or her case, but who speaks for the unborn? Perhaps that is the issue: Who speaks for the unborn? Our obligation as human beings is to protect the lives of others who are in no position to do so.

In the 122 years since Confederation, Parliament has never debated or voted on a question of such moral gravity. To paraphrase Sir Winston Churchill's famous saying, we could say for Canada, with no fear of exaggeration, that never did so many human lives depend so much on so few.

This week we are debating a compromise bill. Some positive points can be seen in the new government bill.

However, the legislation has three negative aspects: any doctor can approve and perform an abortion at any time during the course of the mother's pregnancy. Second, the doctor is not required to verify the reasons for approving the abortion; and the abortion may be performed if, in the opinion of the doctor, the health or life of the mother likely would be threatened. Health reasons are very loosely defined as physical, mental or psychological. I believe that the undeniable and elementary right of the human person, the right to life from conception to death, would be gravely wounded if this proposed legislation is enacted.

Those who hold the reins of government should not forget that it is the duty of the public authority by appropriate laws and sanctions to defend the lives of the innocent. This is all the more so since those lives which are endangered and assailed cannot defend themselves.

We hear often in this House concerning protection of minority rights, of French or English-speaking people, for example. We have multicultural bills to protect ethnic minorities. But what of the unborn? Who speaks for them?

Legislation to protect the unborn is just the first step. If we enact legislation, any legislation, we as a people then have a responsibility to offer support to the women with unplanned or unwanted pregnancies. Social programs must be enhanced and more and better counselling services offered. The full range of alternatives, including adoption, must be explained. Housing and child care access must be improved upon. Above all, we need education to prevent unwanted pregnancies in the first place.

As I stated before, we who consider ourselves pro-life are torn terribly by the notion that if it isn't this law, it is no law. The arguments put forward by the ministers of energy and transport are very persuasive. However, it seems to me that Bill C-43 shows no purpose or direction. If I vote for it on second reading to send it to committee, then I accept it in principle. I say very profoundly that I am unable to do that.

I have rhetorically asked throughout my remarks: "Who speaks for the unborn?" I believe that we must speak for the unborn. This is the most personal, moral issue we could ever face. Life and death issues are incredibly difficult to translate into barren words, to be placed within a specific piece of legislation.

Birth is a miracle. I can only think of my own five grandchildren and the day each of them were born, gently holding their delicate hands, looking into their newborn eyes as they look back at you with a sense of wonder and trust, and finally holding their fragile bodies in your arms. It is an experience born of a miracle. Life is so precious we must protect it. We must speak for the unborn. This is not a perfect world nor a completely moral or ethical world, but surely we must strive for it to be so.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this very important subject of abortion.

I approach the subject today from the aspect of 30 years in family practice in medicine. In that time, I have seen the advent and development of the birth control pill, the acceptance of surgical sterilization as a legal right, I have witnessed the sexual revolution and its diverse consequences, and I have witnessed the changes in the legal status and frequency of abortions. I have seen this in the context of the family unit and seen its effect on the functioning of that unit which is a basic building block of our society.

This is a very good bill in many ways. It has been arrived at in a way that I hope will set a precedent in establishing other new legislation. It is essentially a middle of the road bill in the fact that it has received criticism from both extremes. It is a good political document as it provides the answers that many Canadian people have been looking for in this serious national question of abortion.

The big problem, however, is that abortion is not only a political question, but it is also a bio-ethical question. In other words, it should be based, not only on good political but also good biological and ethical principles as well. I believe this is what the legislation lacks. I think it is worth while to look at those principles that are relevant to the question of abortion.

When the sperm and the egg unite they produce a single cell containing the blueprint for a complete new life. That single cell is a new life and it soon doubles, quadruples, and multiplies many times over. It is not long before the cells start to differentiate and show the characteristics different from that of the original cell. It is not many weeks before it can be identified as a human embryo and not some other member of the animal kingdom. Some people have compared the foetus with an acorn, claiming it only has the potential to form in the one case an adult human and in the other a mighty oak tree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must interrupt the hon. member because it is five o'clock. He will have eight minutes left in debate when we get back to the orders of the day.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private member's business as listed on today's order paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION ACT

MARINE TRANSPORTATION COSTS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of extending the Western Grain Transportation Act to include marine transportation costs incurred between Thunder Bay and salt water, along with an elimination of the 100 per cent cost-recovery requirements of the seaway.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present for debate my private member's motion which you have just read into the record.

Since I came to this House, in fact even before then, I have been concerned about the impact of the Western Grain Transportation Act on the economy of the port of Thunder Bay and the ports along the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway.

Prior to 1984, I appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport which was charged with the responsibility of reviewing the changes to the Crow benefit and replacing it with the WGTA. At that time in Winnipeg, my colleague for Regina—Lumsden was there, I made a presentation to argue for protection for the Port of Thunder Bay and the Port of Vancouver, a protection that was subsequently placed into the WGTA requiring that rail transportation subsidies be paid only on those commodities that were being processed through the ports of Vancouver or Thunder Bay and obviously, in turn, Churchill and Prince Rupert as well.

My involvement with the whole concept of grain movement goes back for a number of years now, because it is very important to the community that I represent, the Port of Thunder Bay. The Standing Committee on Transport has been seized with the issue of the viability of the Great Lakes—St. Lawrence Seaway system for a number of years now. We had hoped to complete our work this fall but we were sidetracked, if I can use that term, to deal with the question of VIA Rail. We did not get back to the seaway but we will continue our work on that.

It is important to note that the seaway is in trouble. There are a multitude of solutions that have been suggested. What I am proposing today are two of them that I believe are worth considering. They are probably the two easiest to deal with, both in terms of the economics involved and the politics of 1989.

The first is the inclusion of domestic marine transportation costs under the WGTA. As some members will know, the way the WGTA was designed in terms of the subsidy component was ,in effect, to equalize the distance-related costs for moving grain from the farm gate to the port of Thunder Bay or to the port of Vancouver. What has happened, and it has equalized it even though the run to Thunder Bay is downhill, is that the turnaround time is 14 days; that is, from the grain car from the Prairie elevator to Thunder Bay unloaded, deposited in the elevator and back to the Prairie elevator, while for Vancouver and Prince Rupert, the time ranges from 18 to 21 days.

Second, the trip to Vancouver is uphill through the mountains and through a very congested port system that creates inefficiencies in terms of the movement of that particular commodity. The WGTA did equalize that. If the producer in middle Saskatchewan was sending his or her grain east or west, the cost was the same, whether it was 500 miles from Thunder Bay or 500 miles from Vancouver.

What was not taken into consideration was the additional cost for the eastern movement, the cost of the marine transport from Thunder Bay to Baie Comeau, Port Cartier, Halifax, Quebec City, Sorel or Trois Rivières. That is purported to be in the range of $23 to $25 per tonne. When you add into that the principle that my party supports, which is that the Canadian Wheat Board has a responsibility to get the best price at the lowest cost for the Canadian producer, you can see how the emphasis on marketing in the Pacific Rim will attract the attention of the Canadian Wheat Board.

For example, in the last few years the Wheat Board has closed its marketing office in Europe and opened up one in the Pacific Rim. We know that right now in the third of three disastrous crop years the Wheat Board is maximizing the west coast ports. It is pushing every tonne of grain, every bushel it can through Vancouver and Prince Rupert because the Wheat Board gets a better deal over all for the producers by doing so.

What does that mean in the long term? It means, and we have seen this over the last three years, that a number of vessels have been scrapped on the Great Lakes. Lake freighters have been cut up with torches and sold to scrap yards. We have seen a number flagged out to foreign countries, formerly Canadian vessels crewed by Canadians with employment and revenue coming to Canada. Now these vessels are flagged in the Bahamas or any other country that provides that kind of tax-free haven. We do not have the capacity to move the kind of grain that we should be able to move in good times.

I was told two days ago at the retirement reception for Mr. William O'Neil, president of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, that one of Canada's shipping companies is moving only American grain out of the port of Duluth to Port Cartier or Baie Comeau.

We have been told that we cannot move the grain sitting in Thunder Bay downstream right now because we do not have the ships available—this is still in a bad year. What happens if we get a 30 million tonne crop for export purposes? Sure the west coast can handle 16 million, 17 million or 18 million tonnes, but where is the rest going to go? What happens if we get a 40 million tonne crop? The port of Thunder Bay can handle 26 million tonnes during a short season with a winter rail program. As a nation, if we do not protect the investment that we have in Thunder Bay, in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway system, we will not be able to move our products when we have to.

What I am proposing is a means of equalizing the movement of grain east and west, to leave it to the market-place to decide in which direction the grain should go. Right now it is going through the west coast because the Wheat Board is more aggressive in its marketing in that direction than it is in Europe, North Africa and even the Soviet Union.

Let me refer to the years 1978-1984 when on average Thunder Bay had 55 per cent of the export grain moving through that port and then the river ports. At one time, 37 per cent of the grain that the port of Thunder Bay handled was rehandled at Baie Comeau. We are now at the point where we will be lucky if we get 40 per cent of the grain movement coming through the eastern system. So there has been a fundamental shift and we will have good times again. It is important that we, as a nation, be in a position to export that grain. Quite frankly, if we cannot move it, then why are we producing it on the prairies?

The only other option would be to rail the grain past Thunder Bay, down to the bay ports, even to Montreal or to Quebec City, at a much higher cost. It is about $20 a tonne more using three freely-supplied Canadian Wheat Board cars to move it east of Thunder Bay by rail. The irony is that we are probably going to have to do that this winter. There will probably be a winter rail program out of Thunder Bay this winter because we do not have the ships to move the grain in the last three weeks when the Seaway will be open in order to meet the unconfirmed purchase from the Soviet Union. So as a society we will pay more than we have to.

We also have to recognize that, although rail transportation is a very efficient mode of travel and a very environmentally friendly method of transporting bulk commodities, marine is even better. So we will lose in a couple of ways. What I am proposing is that in order to level the playing field, we treat the eastern movement the same way we are treating the western movement by rearranging the WGTA.

I am told that in the WGTA there is a provision for 20 per cent overhead for CN and CP, a guaranteed allotment of funds from the federal treasury for the processing of the handling of grain. I am suggesting that money could be better used by providing the same kind of subsidy that we currently offer CN and CP to the ship operators on the Great Lakes, so that it is farmgate to salt water whether it is the west coast or the east coast. The logical extension of that is that the Canadian Wheat Board will not have to overemphasize one direction over the other. It can be as aggressive in its marketing for the eastern system as it is for the western system.

Tied into this is the whole question of the seaway tolls and the current requirement of 100 per cent cost recovery. We do not have that requirement in air and we do not have that requirement in trucking. We are subsidizing rail, so we obviously do not require it there. When we look at the Seaway tolls I will admit right up front that the amount of money per tonne which goes toward Seaway tolls is minimal. But as Robert Patterson, president of Patterson Steamship Lines, one of the oldest grain shipping companies in this country, has said in the past, "On the seaway we are talking about pennies per tonne. In terms of our flexibility, one or two more pennies will mean the difference between whether or not we move that cargo."

To say to the users of the Seaway: "Thou must pay 100 per cent of the cost of operating" does not reflect the realities of the market-place, nor does it reflect the reality that every time bulk cargo is moved through Thunder Bay, whether it is potash to the United States, coal to Hamilton, grain to Sorel, Quebec City, Baie Comeau or Port Cartier, it is not just Thunder Bay that is benefiting from it, it is Sault Ste. Marie, Welland, Thorold, Toronto, the Quebec ports and Halifax that are benefiting. Jobs are created in those provinces.

In western Canada it is coal from British Columbia and Alberta, it is grain from Saskatchewan and Manitoba and it is potash from Saskatchewan that is moving through the system. The hub, the handling and trans-shipment point is Thunder Bay. It is important for our community. Hundreds and hundreds of jobs in Thunder Bay depend upon the movement of grain and bulk commodities through that port.

The tolls exist because during the lead up in the negotiations between Canada and the United States to construct the Seaway, the American rail lobby, which had blocked such a development for years, only agreed to let it proceed if there would be 100 per cent cost recovery. Do you know why? Because they knew they would be out-competed. It was the Americans who forced Canada to charge 100 per cent of the cost.

Today the United States has eliminated its Seaway tolls. The Americans have put in place a port tax on commodities in all ports throughout the U.S. with the money going into a development fund to operate and build. They rebate those who go through Canadian locks with American products. Even though they are the ones who said Canada must charge 100 per cent, they are not doing that themselves now.

Tolls are a barrier to the introduction of new services. Tolls are another form of tax and act as a detriment to the ongoing viability of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway. The largest population mass in North America lives along the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway system and has a very important impact on the economies of both countries. It is up to us as legislators to try to provide solutions to the very real and legitimate concerns about the manner in which the movement of bulk commodities is treated—grain on the one hand in terms of the WGTA and all bulk commodities in terms of the Seaway toll.

We have had a discussion paper called "Growing Together, A Vision for Canada's Agri-food Industry" which has been circulated by the Minister of Agriculture. It is asking for responses. It is asking for ideas. It raises issues. My intention is for this motion to be a catalyst, to provide a focus for discussion that will impact on "Growing Together" because it will have a major impact on our ability to sell the grain that we know we can grow. Some of the best grain in the world, if not the best grain in the world, comes from our prairies.

There is a major crisis in the Seaway. We are losing ships, both to the scrap heap and to the foreign flags. We are losing highly skilled trained workers. Even with the upturn in terms of grain movement this fall, no one has been called back to work in Thunder Bay. What we are seeing, as well as the rail program that I expect will occur, is some employment stability for those few men who have been called back this fall. There will be a whole other group that will not have any work this year and will not be able to qualify for unemployment insurance. They are going elsewhere to find other work and we will lose their talents.

It is not just a question of not having the bottoms to move the grain, we must have the skilled people on the marine side, elevators on the land side and rails to move these products. As a country we will lose because of that.

In closing, I want to say that I would encourage the government to take this motion very seriously. This is not a dilatory motion. One has to plant a seed and say: "let us look at it". I would encourage the members opposite to support this motion, to allow it to come to a vote so that we can send a message to the Government of Canada. It is up to them to decide if that is the direction they want to go, but there is no benefit in saying no at this stage.

• (1720)

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as you know very well one cannot talk about the grain industry without talking about grain transportation. Furthermore, you cannot talk about grain transportation without talking about the WGTA.

WGTA is not a simple issue. In fact, it is very much an historic issue in the sense that it is built upon the Crow rate which I would like to talk about in a few moments.

Unfortunately, the motion before this House to extend the WGTA to include marine transportation costs between Thunder Bay and Salt Water fails to recognize this history.

Furthermore, I would suggest that now is not the time for piecemeal solutions to complicated problems. As the hon. member has just indicated, we are on the threshold of a major agricultural policy review which will deal in a comprehensive way with transportation as well as with other issues which are vital to agriculture.

Perhaps for our listening audience it is important to talk for a moment about the WGTA, and to note that the act is related only to rail transportation and only to movements no further east than Thunder Bay. This act came into effect in 1984 but it was a successor to the legendary Crow which is very much a vital part of our history. In fact, the Crow and the history of western Canada are almost synonymous, at least since the latter part of the 1890s.

Under the famous, or some might even say the infamous Crow, the Canadian Pacific Railway built a railway line from Lethbridge to Nelson through the Crowsnest Pass in return for a fairly generous subsidy from the federal government.

As part of that package there was an agreement that freight rates would be reduced on inbound settlers' goods and outbound grain traffic. This agreement encouraged settlement of the west and expansion of Canada's grain industry. Although this agreement was subsequently altered in legislation in the 1920s, it basically remained in effect until the 1980s. By the 1960s, however, the statutory grain rates were not providing the railways with enough revenue to maintain the grain-related rail network on the prairies.

As a result, ad hoc government financial assistance programs were instituted in the 1970s to assist the railways, to help with the cost of hopper cars, boxcar repairs and the rehabilitation of grain-dependent branch lines.

The WGTA was supposed to provide the railways with enough revenue from the transportation of grain to ensure the long term viability of the grain gathering network. The required revenue was generated by increasing the government's subsidies to the railways through the so-called Crow benefit and by increasing the freight rates charged to shippers.

This act did result in increased freight rates. But like the previous legislation, it was directed to rail transportation of western grain from the prairies to Canadian ports. That is why, in my opinion, this motion is inconsistent with the act's historical basis as an assistance mechanism for the movement of western grain.

In addition, any extension of the WGTA to include marine transportation costs, together with the elimination of the 100 per cent cost recovery on the Seaway, would undoubtedly increase the current level of subsidy. That subsidy is approximately $720 million at the present time. It is my opinion, speaking as the member of Parliament for Brandon—Souris, and on behalf of an area which has been badly hit by drought for the second year in a row—in some instances a third and a fourth year in a row—that if we are now able to increase financial assistance to agriculture, as indeed I hope we are, then the 1989 drought program should be our first priority.

While the WGTA has largely achieved its goals, it has been discussed and debated widely for many years. There are many questions remaining with respect to its future. There remains a wide range of views about what its significance has been in the past and what its role should be in the years to come.

Obviously now is an important time to review the role of the WGTA just as it is a very important time to review the role of agricultural policies in general. That is why the Western Grain Transportation Act is considered to be a very key transportation issue in the current review of federal agricultural policy.

A discussion paper has been unveiled called "Growing Together". It will be discussed at some length when farm leaders come to Ottawa in early December. It will also be discussed at farm meetings throughout all of Canada.

This policy review is concerned with getting Canada's agri-food industry up to date and able to cope with the next decade.

There are many pressures facing the agricultural sector today, both domestic and international, which point to the need for this comprehensive policy review.

In the past few years, we have learned—sometimes the hard way—that approaches used in the past are no longer appropriate now and they do not always permit us to address future challenges in a way in which we would wish.

In some cases, these policies are preventing the agricultural sector from exploiting opportunities. In others, the uncertainty and unpredictability of ad hoc programs is interfering with its management decisions. I think it is exceedingly important that we rid ourselves to the nth degree possible of our dependency of ad hoc agricultural programs—

Mr. Benjamin: This isn't ad hoc.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): No, not agriculture, but ad hoc agricultural programs have not always worked in the best interests of the agricultural communities and that is why this review is important.

Recent events have shown more clearly the need to take stock and adapt to the environment the agri-food sector will face in the future.

There are a number of compelling reasons for government and industry to define a new vision for agriculture. The sector needs to adapt to a rapidly changing domestic market for agri-food products. We must also be ready to respond to an increasingly competitive world trading environment. We must also review and revitalize our financial farm support programs. We must do what is necessary to keep pace with rapid technological change. The challenge of increasing environmental awareness and pressure must be met. Our record for safe nutritious food must be maintained.

In the area of transportation, this government knows transportation policies must be sensitive to both regional diversity and national interests. A program that operates in one region may have implications across the country. These implications must be considered in any proposals for change. For example, four western provinces at the moment either have or have had livestock feed assistance programs to offset the effects of other programs. Sometimes this patchwork of programs leads to conflicting results and makes it exceedingly difficult to have a national approach to agriculture.

Since the WGTA took effect, Canada as a major exporter of grains and oilseeds has experienced the negative impact of huge, direct subsidies by our major competitors, namely, the American and the European communities. Programs which support the Canadian industry must be viewed in the context of these high subsidy levels maintained by our competition.

Transportation policies, like all government policies, should be consistent with international trade rules to minimize the risk of trade action by other countries. Canada wants to reduce over-all levels of trade distorting subsidies, but we do not plan to do it alone. We will be looking at the actions of our trading partners to ensure that they are dealing with their subsidies as well. What we need to do is to examine our grain transportation policies including the subsidies to make sure that they are the most effective form of assistance possible to promote and develop our industry into the future.

Many agricultural policies and programs, including the Western Grain Transportation Act, have been in place for a number years and in some cases have been built upon a legacy of a number of decades. A review which is now about to take place is designed to ensure that transportation policies like other agricultural policies are developed and planned so that they are in harmony with each other to ensure that government dollars are used in the most effective manner possible, to ensure that there is co-operation between provincial and federal governments, as there must be, and to ensure that these policies work together in co-operation with the farm communities to provide as much viability and security for the farm community in the future as indeed it must have.

• (1730)

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to debate the motion before the House. I agree with my colleague from Thunder Bay—Atikokan on many of the statements he has made with respect to the efficiency of the workforce in the city of Thunder Bay, and in fact in northern Ontario, which has a great effect on the movement of grain through Kenora, Dryden, Ignace, and Thunder Bay and out of Winnipeg and Brandon.

We serve fundamentally the same area and the same constituents. We serve the 1,500 grain workers in Thunder Bay who work in the elevators, led by their very capable business agent, Richard McFarlane. Many railway workers working in that area for the CNR and the CPR move very efficiently the full grain cars coming in from the west, unloading them at the elevators, moving them out from the elevators and returning them back to the farmers for refilling.

There are hundreds of government employees involved in the movement of grain through the port of Thunder Bay. The municipality of Thunder Bay and other municipalities along the north shore benefit greatly because of the municipal tax base created by the elevators on the waterfront.

Indeed, we serve also the business community and the businessmen in Thunder Bay in the north because of the tremendous wealth brought into that area by the movement of grain into the port of Thunder Bay. We serve the same area. I agree that when we compare the movement of grain from the farms in the west to the Prince Rupert ports, the Vancouver ports and the port of Thunder Bay, they are indeed moving grain downhill rather than uphill.

More important, the port of Thunder Bay has been moving grain for well over 75 years. We have developed an efficient workforce. It is a treat to go down to the ports to see how they move the grain in from the rail cars, unload them and move the empty grain cars back with, as my friend says a turnaround of more than seven days in moving the grain through the western ports. These are considerations that have to be taken into account when we are talking about the Western Grain Transportation Act.

I agree with what has been said here today in the main. Unfortunately, I cannot agree with the solution my friend offers. I would like to explain why.

When we talk about subsidizing the movement of grain from the port of Thunder Bay to down river ports in Baie Comeau, Montreal or Halifax, we are talking about moving approximately 17 or 18 million bushels of grain a year. The average cost of a tonne of wheat being moved is about $20. This means that we are adding an additional $340 million in subsidy to the transportation of grain in this country. When you add this to the Crow's Nest Pass or recently the Western Grain Transportation Act which is approximately $1 billion a year, we are contemplating subsidizing it in excess of well over $1 billion a year. With the economy we face today, when we have to come to grips with the deficit that we are trying to control on an annual basis, with the huge debt that we have, I am wondering if it makes any sense at this point in time to further subsidize something else in our economy that will add not only to the deficit but to the debt, when there are alternative ways in which to correct this problem.

The alternatives have been suggested not only by our experts in this field but by the Alberta and British Columbia governments; the Canadian Grain Council's factoring influence in the direction of exports of grain, which was in March 1989; the solutions of the president of the Canadian Ship Owners Association; and the solutions of the Shipping Federation of Canada. All of them say that we should change the Western Grain Transportation Act. That is the fundamental issue we are here to discuss today—changing the manner and the method in which they are paying the subsidy of the movement of grain today to a more efficient method.

If I may say there is no incentive today to reduce the cost of shipping grain. The farmer brings the grain to the gate and he pays a certain fee regardless of where the grain is shipped. The railways, CN and CP, have no incentive to move the grain at a more economical rate or find better ways to ship the grain. According to the act they get paid by the distance they move the grain. There is no efficient, cost effective way or any incentive for either of those two primary parties to reduce the cost of shipping of grain in western Canada.

What I am saying, as has been said by the people who have reviewed the Western Grain Transportation Act in some depth, is that we have to create an incentive to move grain in Canada at a more efficient rate than what we are doing today. We must make our railways more competitive. We must promote efficiency and reward that efficiency with the railways and with the farmer.

We have to change the method of payment from paying the railways to paying the grower or the producer. Let the farmer, the person who produces the grain or the product, make the final decision as to where and how he is going to ship that product because it means more of a return to him. This is a basic flaw in the Western Grain Transportation Act, as it is now stated. Until we come to grips with that fundamental flaw in that act, we can do nothing to enhance the movement of grain and the cost efficiency of movement of grain in this country.

I see that my time is up. I thank Your Honour for the opportunity to make this intervention.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, again I find myself surrounded by amateurs; two in particular, the hon. member for Brandon—Souris and the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon. I never thought I would live to see the day when they would oppose a motion that protects the hundreds of millions of dollars of both public and private investments in Canada, in the St. Lawrence Seaway, in our ports, in our shipping industry, in our grain terminals, and in our railways.

The whole purpose and intent of the Crow's Nest Pass Freight Agreement and subsequent to that the Western Grain Transportation Act was trying to provide—and I hate to use the phrase—a level playing field for our grain exports. Our competitors produce their grain within 200, 300 or 400 miles of salt water. Our average haul is 1,000 miles. What we have at the moment is a level playing field and the other guy has the ball on our 10-yard line all the time. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will understand that.

• (1740)

I want to say to the hon. members for Brandon—Souris and Thunder Bay that I would appreciate if they would organize a debate on this issue in their respective ridings any time they wish and invite me. I ask them to give me a couple of weeks' notice. They can invite all the Liberals and Tories they like and fill the hall with them. I would love a chance to take them on.

All that this country has been trying to do since 1897 is make the playing field level in competition with our main competitors.

Second, as my colleague from Thunder Bay—Atikokan pointed out, the Americans refund the tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway to their flagships. That is why even Canadian ships are moving grain from Duluth and not from Thunder Bay. That is why the grain handlings have dropped substantially in the downstream ports in the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence and Atlantic Canada.

In fact, American companies are using some of our terminals downstream St. Lawrence to move their grain and the tolls do not cost them anything, because they get it fully rebated by the U.S. government. Surely, any member of Parliament from Thunder Bay, in fact from Halifax West would understand that is unfair and unreasonable. We can do no less than try to defend ourselves from that kind of unfair, irresponsible activity of not only the United States but other countries, particularly the European Economic Community.

My friend from Thunder Bay—Nipigon had the figures all wrong on the cost of moving grain. He used figures for moving it by rail, not by water. He gave dollars per bushel instead of dollars per tonne. He must have dropped his file in Thunder Bay, because he was all wet on the figures he tried to cite.

We cannot continue to just leave things as they are. It was the party of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon that killed the Crow's Nest Pass rate. The Conservatives along with I and others fought the Liberal government on that for a year and a half until we lost the vote in 1983. I did not expect any more from a Liberal, because they are the ones that did it to us. But when I hear a Conservative member from a Manitoba constituency, almost all of whose grain goes east, getting up and opposing this motion, I tell you that passes all understanding. It is not only wrong headed; it is stupid.

I have been involved with this issue for more than 21 years as well as when I was on the railroad. If you charge the full commercial rate for the movement of grain and other bulk commodities without any subsidies of any kind, one of two things will happen in our country.

It either loses the markets or producers of those bulk commodities will have to take drastically lower prices and they will get out of that production. I do not care whether it is coal, potash, sulphur, pulp, or grain; you name it. All these programs, as does the WGTA to a certain extent, take into account our climate, our geography and who it is we are competing with, compared to climate, geography and where they produce their commodities.

As I pointed out earlier, the Australians and Argentinians produce their grain within 200 miles of salt water. The Argentine Government hauls its grain to export positions at no cost to the producers. Yet these two hon. members, one Liberal and one Tory, expect our grain producers and our shipping companies on the Great Lakes and seaway, to compete with that. That is unmitigated nonsense.

My colleague's motion makes imminent sense. It is another step we have to take. According to free trade agreement proponents, if they mean what they say about a level playing field and they are honest about it, we are to see to it that this sort of thing happens.

The St. Lawrence Seaway for Canadian products and shipping should be toll-free. It is a public investment. It is a public utility. It is there for all to use like our highways. I do not understand the so-called free market system and free enterprise system. It has been nothing more than socialism for the rich and capitalism for the poor.

I do not understand why there is the resistance to make a national effort to take into account our geography and climate and set up facilities and transportation costs that allow us to deliver our product to export positions anywhere between Thunder Bay and Halifax at an equal transportation cost to those of our competitors, even if that means another $200 million or $300 million a year in subsidy. I do not call it a subsidy. I call it protecting our investment in our farms, shipping companies and what we have put into the seaway and ports, all of which lose money. You cannot even give them away to a municipality.

This motion is worthy of consideration and action by a government of any political stripe, if it treats all the producers and transporters anywhere in this country equally and decently.

• (1750)

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, may I allude to some comments first of all by the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden. He refers to the amateurs who have spoken. I am proud to be an amateur. I am proud to have the opportunity of addressing this particular bill as the member for Scarborough East, because I think it is incumbent upon all members of this House to try to comprehend in some way the problems of their colleagues from other parts of Canada.

I think it is necessary for us to consider and examine various provisions of the Western Grain Transportation Act, which is a very important piece of legislation for all western farmers. The act came into effect on January 1, 1984. Rail freight rates for shippers increased and the federal government was committed to making payments to the railways to reflect new cost based rail rates.

The act consists of eight parts plus two schedules. The main provisions of the act include new regulatory and advisory machinery aimed at implementing the act and improving the over-all grain transportation system, and also a timetable for review of the acts, operation.

Although the act contains no formal statement of its over-all objectives there are references throughout to a number of interrelated objectives, such as to improve the capacity and efficiency of the grain transportation and handling system in order to maximize returns to producers and to ensure an adequate, reliable and efficient railway transportation system, as well as to ensure that the over-all revenues of the railway system are adequate to meet long-term needs.

The WGTA is comprised of five major parts which deal with administrative measures, rates, government payments, limits on shipper rates and reviews. The part dealing with administrative measures has two principle objectives. The first is to establish the Senior Grain Transportation Committee, to define its membership and responsibilities, to establish in law the grain transportation administrator and to define his responsibilities. It also deals with specific provisions related to efficiencies, system performance, service quantities, car allocation and railway commitment plan.

The Senior Grain Transportation Committee advises the minister and the administrator on any issue affecting the transportation, shipping and handling of grain, including performance objectives, capacity, efficiency measures and railway car allocations.

The SGTC originally consisted of 21 members representing a wide range of interests, including producers, the railways, grain companies, Great Lakes carriers, the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian Grain Commission. Amendments to the act approved in 1985 expanded producer representation on the committee from four to nine. The establishment of the Senior Grain Transportation Committee has facilitated the involvement of all segments of the grain industry and the evolution of the grain transportation and handling systems.

The grain transportation agency administrator and his staff have specific operational responsibilities related to system capacity and efficiency, performance objectives, car allocation and administration and control of the government fleet of hopper cars. The administrator is a member of the Senior Grain Transportation Committee.

A nominal system of awards and sanctions related to performance objectives was established pending a review in 1985 and 1986 to determine the practicality of a permanent scheme. Implementation of such a scheme would be to subject to parliamentary review.

Under this system the grain transportation agency administrator establishes objectives such as tonnage targets for system participants. The administrator reports twice each year to the minister and SGTC on the achievement of these performance objectives. This provides an opportunity for the industry to assess problems and identify solutions for the transportation and the handling of grain.

Monitoring railway investment is an important aspect of the WGTA. The railways submit to the minister, the Senior Grain Transportation Committee, The National Transportation Agency and the GTA Administrator, an annual statement of their plant and equipment investments related to the movement of grain for the preceeding year, their general investment plans for the current and next calendar year, and expenditures on the maintenance of grain dependent branch lines for the preceding year.

The National Transportation Agency monitors the railways expenditure programs and submits reports to the minister. The minister has the authority to withhold payments to the railways in the event that he is not satisfied with the level of branch line maintenance on grain dependent lines undertaken by the railways or with railways general investment program.

The second part of the act deals with rates. The principal objectives of this section are to provide a statutory basis for the distance related base rate scale for the movement of grain by rail, the principal of port parity for Vancouver and Prince Rupert, a phase–in contribution to the railways constant costs, the determination of the railways eligible costs in the annual rate scale and finally, regular railway crossing reviews.

Unlike the old statute which fixed the rate levels of grain movements, the new act sets formula which determine the new rate every year. The annual rate scale is determined on the basis of the distance related base rate scale adjusted for railway price indices established by the National Transportation Agency, tonnage forecasts provided by the administrator of the grain transportation agency, and productivity improvements.

The WGTA contains a base rate scale which is simply the Crow rate scale adjusted to correct certain anomalies. The annual rate scale under the WGTA is determined by adjusting the base rate by a multiplier calculated in accordance with the WGTA formula.

In the interest of achieving future system economies, provision was made for the railways to charge incentive rates, that is, rates below those permitted under the rate scale. These incentive rates are subject to National Transportation Agency approval. The initiative to seek a lower rate rests with the shipper in consultation with the railways. Until crop year 1985–86 no lower rate application to the agency was permitted except for weekend and seasonal loadings. All the major grain companies currently benefit from incentive rates.

Provision was made to ensure that a lower or higher rate paid by the shippers as a result of an error in a tonnage forecast was corrected over the course of the two following crop years. This provision has since been amended to provide for an adjustment only where an overpayment or underpayment exceeds $150 million.

The principal objectives of the part of the act concerning the government payments are the following: to provide a statutory basis for the Crow benefit; to define the cost sharing formula; to limit the government payments to a tonnage ceiling linked to a blended freight rate; and finally to provide for a timetable to make government payments.

The government is committed to pay the full Crow benefit of $658.6 million plus the government share of cost changes. The Crow benefit is the shortfall in railway revenue calculated for 1981–82 when legislative change was set in motion. The shipper currently pays for annual changes in railway costs up to 6 per cent. The government pays for cost changes in excess of 6 per cent.

An adjustment payment is made to CN owing to factors affecting costs outside its control such as port parity to Prince Rupert and the high cost of the Churchill line. There is a single rate scale common to both railways.

The "shipper share limitation" provision in the act requires the government to ensure that average rates paid by shippers do not exceed a defined percentage of the selling price of a basket of six grains. The limit is currently 10 per cent. This acts as a safety net for producers.

The section on review enshrined in legislation is a commitment to undertake reviews of key features of the bill.

I see that my time is up. I have enjoyed having the opportunity to address the Western Grain Transportation Act.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the debate ended at five o'clock, the hon. member for Delta had the floor. He has eight minutes remaining in his debate.

• (1800)

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, when we were interrupted by Private Members' Hour, we were just comparing the human foetus not with the acorn but with the young sapling of an oak tree. It resembles a young sapling much more. Although small in size, it has the fully developed characteristics of that mature tree.

However, the single fertilised egg can indeed become a whole body of extremely complex structures producing many different tissues and functions. It will produce many thousands of complex chemicals and enzymes, nerve cells, skin, hair, bone, muscles and blood and various sensory organs.

When we are talking about the embryo or the foetus, we are not dealing with an indeterminate mass or a lump of tissue, we are dealing with something that will eventually become what you and I are today. That little foetus is a contractor for the adult human. It has the plans and the blueprints and the ability to receive supplies from the mother and develop something far more fantastic than the building of brick and mortar. We need to remember that you and I and Dr. Morgentaler were all at one time an embryo, a foetus, a baby and a child.

The greater and harder question we have to ask today is, is that foetus a person? Is it a human being? Does it have a soul? That question must be asked because it is crucial to the whole question of abortion. When does one become a human being? Do we suddenly become one? Is it a gradual process or a developmental thing?

We do not have all the answers at this time in history. Part of the question is semantics. A person is a legal definition for a biological entity of the most complex order.

The answers to this question are as varied as the numbers of people providing answers. Aristotle, for example, thought that males became persons at 40 days after conception and females at 90 days after conception. There are many criteria which have been used over the years to try to determine when the foetus does indeed become a human being or a person. There are physical criteria such as time or age. For example, does it become a human at conception? Is it when the organs are forming or when the heart starts to beat or perhaps when the mother first feels that quickening. Perhaps it is at the age of viability when it is first able to survive on its own outside the womb. Others would suggest to us that it is when that first breath is taken at birth.

The second physical criteria that is sometimes used is health. In other words, if a foetus is not healthy, it is not a person or a newborn. For example, Nobel prize-winning biologist Francis Crick believes that a child should be two days old before it is considered to be a person. This would allow for elimination of those who are unhealthy or perhaps have serious defects that would interfere with their functioning in society. Others would use social criteria. In other words, an infant must show interaction with other human beings in order to be considered human. This would put the development of a person at a much later stage than birth.

A third possibility that has been used is mental criteria. Man is distinct from animals because of his intelligence. Joseph Fletcher, the author of Situation Ethics, supports this view and maintains that abortion, infanticide and euthanasia are not the taking of human life, merely biological life.

It is this reasoning that allowed slavery to flourish as blacks were considered a sub-human species. Nazi Germany allowed the extermination of six million Jews in World War II because they were not as human as the master race.

The Vancouver Sun, in an editorial of November 20, 1989, said in its referral to the Supreme Court decision in the Daigle case that the court did not attempt to assume the role of a moral or philosophical adviser on the controversial question of when life begins. It did not consider the theological or scientific aspects of the question, only the legal ones.

I would suggest tonight that this Parliament must define these rights of the foetus. As Madam Justice Wilson said in a written judgment in the Morgentaler case: "The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes compelling I will leave to the informed judgment of the legislature which is in a position to receive guidance on the subject from all relevant disciplines".

I personally have sat and wept with young pregnant teenagers. I understand the anguish of the pregnant wife with the alcoholic husband. I have wept with the 45-year-old woman with three teenagers who finds herself pregnant even though her husband has been out of town for six months. I have also seen the 18-year-old coming in with her third and fourth pregnancy and desiring an abortion. These are the realities that we live with.

I believe the answer to these problems is not the quick and easy abortion route but rather the development of a caring society that provides for good birth control information when and where needed. We should encourage research into new and safer forms of birth control. Society has to provide the caring support for the unwed and the poor mothers and their families. There are more than enough good homes in this country crying out for babies to adopt.

Ninety-five per cent of abortions in this country are performed because of the anxiety and depression resulting from the pregnancy. Abortion is said to be a woman's issue and in many ways it is. However, in my practice I found that a very high percentage of the abortions were as a result of pressure brought about by boyfriends and husbands who threatened to leave or threatened other things for their own selfish reasons. I believe that we must ensure a thorough counselling and support program, including financial support for pregnant women where required.

I would suggest today that there is absolutely no evidence that the long-term health effects of abortion are in any way better and indeed many studies have been shown them to be far worse than when an unwanted pregnancy is carried to term.

Dr. Philip Ney, a Victoria psychiatrist and professor at the University of Calgary, writing in the current issue of the Psychiatric Journal of the University of Ottawa found in a survey of the literature "Mental Health and Abortion: Review and Analysis", and I am quoting here his summary:

> This survey of studies which relate to the emotional sequelae of induced abortion draws attention to the need for more long-term in-depth prospective studies. The literature to this point finds no psychiatric indications for abortion, and no satisfactory evidence that abortion improves the psychological state of those not mentally ill; abortion is contra-indicated when psychiatric disease is present, as mental ill-health has been shown to be worsened by abortion. Recent studies are turning up in an alarming rate of post-abortion complications such as PID and subsequent infertility. The emotional impact of these complications needs to be studied. Other considerations looked at are the long-term demographic implications of abortion on demand and the effect on the medical professions.

In this day of modern medicine and therapy, indeed there are very few medical indications for abortion.

In summary, I would like to agree with the author of the minority report of the Law Reform Commission which stated abortion should be permitted only where the continuance of the pregnancy would constitute a genuine and serious threat to the health of the mother.

I would be prepared to vote at second reading for this legislation in the hopes that the legislative committee and later the House would bring in amendments to the bill so that we may restore to this problem a basis of sound biological, medical and ethical principles for guidance and judgment.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I must say I found it very difficult to espouse the legislator's point of view and accept the fact that the Abortion Bill had to be part of the Criminal Code. In this respect, I must admit that the position taken by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops as well as that taken by the Law Reform Commission reflect the principles I adhere to as a Catholic, and I quote: "The inclusion of provisions relating to abortion in the Criminal Code reflects the fundamental policy of our nation. In the last analysis, the Criminal Code is a reflection of what we are. It is an extension of our will or absence of will to promote human dignity and equality".

Mr. Speaker, in every discussion we had in caucus and with the public, there were many times I felt this as an intrusion in my personal affairs, and I was very frustrated to see a lack of understanding for the economic, physical and physiological circumstances of women's lives.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I was very much involved in preparing the legislation before the House today, and I admit that I am a pro-choicer who was willing to compromise, because we must have legislation in order to avoid incidents of the kind we saw in the sad and sensational case involving Chantal Daigle and Jean-Guy Tremblay.

• (1810)

During our first debate, I was in favour of an 18-week limit, a position I had to revise as a result of the numerous debates that ensued and the legal opinions I received. I am also very concerned about what is happening in the Maritimes, for instance, because if the government had provided for an open gestation period, from 0 to 18 weeks, during which women could obtain an abortion without indicating any particular grounds or reasons, we might have penalized certain women and created an unfair situation, because the provinces could have refused to pay the fees of medical practitioners since certain regions do not offer this kind of service.

Mr. Speaker, we must not forget we have two extreme positions on abortion: pro-choice and pro-life. In fact, anti-choice is more like it, Mr. Speaker. Both parties object to any legislation that does not espouse their respective principles.

It is easy for those on either side of the fence to say that the government has failed to address the issue, because these people did not have to sit down as legislators to deal first of all with Canadian realities, then Parliament, caucus, the Supreme Court and finally, our Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Bill C-43, in my opinion, merely lays down in a legislative text what is happening today. A woman who wants an abortion must first see her doctor. We all agree that abortion is a medical act. So, with or without legislation, a woman must talk to her doctor, and the doctor will either agree or refuse to do the operation.

As for those who complain about lack of access, this is a frivolous objection since, according to the Canada Health Act, health is a matter under provincial jurisdiction and provincial health care systems have been developed to cover the specific needs of each province, hence the obligation to deal with Canadian realities.

The criteria in the act provide a general orientation, while the provinces are deliberately given a certain latitude for implementing the legislation, so that they can make decisions on the basis of local priorities and resources.

When we read the text of the Canada Health Act, we find there is no list of specific medical services, such as oncology, cardiac surgery or abortion services. The provinces, together with the medical profession, determine what medical services are necessary. The provinces regulate the medical profession and health care institutions such as hospitals and CLSCs. The provinces also decide how to ensure that their residents have access to these medical services.

We must remember that the federal government cannot dictate policy in areas under provincial jurisdiction. It seems to me that is not difficult to understand, Mr. Speaker. If it tried, it would impinge on the role of the provinces in Confederation, which would obviously meet with objections from the courts.

We must remember that the constitutionality of the Canada Health Act is now being challenged before the courts. However, we believe that this abortion legislation will come through with flying colours, since its present wording does not impinge on provincial jurisdictions.

Briefly, Parliament can only pass regulations on abortion at the national level through the Criminal Code. The proposed legislation provides the provinces with the guidelines they requested regarding the legal framework for dealing with abortion. To do so, the proposed legislation gives the provinces the guidelines they sought concerning a legal framework for abortion.

I think that with this new legal framework, the provincial governments will be able to respect the letter and spirit of the law and provide access to all the required medical services.

I now call on women's groups to put pressure on the legislatures in provinces which do not provide abortion services. I ask my colleague from Halifax, the Liberal critic on women's issues, to spend more time in New Brunswick than in Ottawa, because that is where the big debate is going on.

Another thing to point out, Mr. Speaker, is that we broadened the definition of health to include psychological health. That was very important. It shows that we trust doctors because we know very well, Mr. Speaker, that women who want an abortion do not do so with a glad heart; it is always an agonizing, difficult decision.

It is really sad to see all sorts of propaganda campaigns with beautiful little babies, as if women were killers. It is wrong to believe that we who are pro-choice are pro-abortion. We are for women's choice, which is quite different.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell all Members of this House that the moderate approach of Bill C-43 should become law so that this public debate, which I think has gone on long enough, can end. It is time to get back to more basic things, like how to reduce the sexual abuse of children and how to help the victims of it, just as it is time to fight the violence suffered by many women.

The economic reality of women is staring us in the face, Mr. Speaker. We just have to look around us to notice it. The same goes for the insidious poverty of young people, which should make us think some more instead of acting in a paternalistic way and engaging in sterile debates on an issue which is first and foremost a woman's own business.

Mr. Speaker, I shall support the bill because I sincerely believe that it is the best compromise under the circumstances and in future I want to deal with the economic situation of tomorrow's children, those who are alive and just want to grow in the best world possible.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the subject is a very difficult one. This two-page bill on abortion says, and I will quote the English version:

[English]

Every person who induces an abortion on a female person is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practitioner.

[Translation]

I agree with that part. We have finally gotten rid of the sordid image of backroom transactions. Finally, when an abortion is necessary, it is done by a physician, and any other person who does so is a criminal.

[English]

If the abortion were to be induced, it could be in a case of the health or the life of the mother. In the case of the life of the mother, I do agree with it, but I have some difficulty when I hear the definition of health when it talks about physical, mental and psychological health. I wonder who is going to make this decision.

If a person goes to see a doctor and doctor number one is not in agreement, then would the pregnant woman go and see doctor number two? If this is the case, are we not opening the risk of having a lawsuit by a third party who would ask why is it that doctor number two was in favour of the decision and doctor number one was not. Was doctor number two a psychiatrist or was he an expert in abortions? What kind of an expert was he? This will open the way for a tremendous amount of lawsuits by third parties, I suspect.

The last part of the bill states that everyone who unlawfully supplies or procures a drug or other noxious thing, or an instrument or thing knowing that it is intended to be used or employed to induce an abortion on a female person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years. That I also agree with. However, with the bill as it stands I would have a great amount of difficulty.

I have heard speaker after speaker, member after member, especially now, referring to this being a woman's issue. I beg to differ with that point of view. We are all human beings. It appears to always be the same people who insist that when we refer to the feminine gender we should only refer to persons in the neutral gender. In this particular case, they become very possessive and they say that we have no right to even discuss the issue, let alone make a decision.

I find that difficult because life depends on the couple, that is male and female. I have had four children. I was very lucky to experience the births of my three last children. I found those births to be miraculous things, good things. We are part of this universe to procreate.

I have also experienced the death of a grandchild at the age of eight months and that is excessively difficult to experience. I have raised four children with my wife and found that a wonderful experience because I am rather proud of my children.

In a contemporary society such as ours, we must not be afraid to adapt ourselves to the evolving needs of society. To adapt ourselves may signify sometimes that we must make a few drastic changes. Such changes should be expressed by establishing once and for all the basic rights of the foetus.

[Translation]

The Supreme Court says it has no obligation to intervene in philosophical and theological discussions on whether the foetus is a person. In that case, we wouldn't have to consider this matter here in Parliament and pass legislation in this House to protect the foetus.

[English]

Despite what the Supreme Court has said, the question of when life begins is not an issue of theology or philosophy; it can easily be answered by elementary biology. For more than a century, medical science has known conclusively that every individual's life begins at conception.

[Translation]

In any case, I would like to say a few words about my position on the abortion issue, with special emphasis on the rights of the foetus.

[English]

Presently, abortions are performed in Canada to solve the socio-economic problems of distressed pregnant women. These problems are real, but should be treated with socio-economic solutions and not by the wilful destruction of human life.

Let me quote a doctor who was on a therapeutic committee before they were declared unconstitutional on January 28, 1989:

> In the time I was on the committee, there was no instance in which a serious physical threat to the health of the mother was ever demonstrated, and I don't recall any patient with a diagnosis of psychological or emotional illness being sick enough to ever have been referred to a psychiatrist – My recollection of all the cases presented in the month that I was on the committee, is that they were all socio-economic or economic reasons.

Hence, we do not solve any problem by implementing this law nor would we if we allowed abortion on demand. One of the issues that this government will have to face is what drives so many women desperately begging for an abortion when the majority of them are perfectly healthy. I pay a great deal of attention when I am told that pregnancy is a perfectly normal biological event, never a disease.

There is no case where an abortion is therapeutic. Abortions have nothing to do with physical or mental health. Abortions are done for reasons of social, economic or medical convenience.

[Translation]

The life of the foetus versus the life of the mother. Fortunately, this cruel dilemma is very rare nowadays. Doctors will practically always try to save both. However, the situation is interesting in that it gives us a chance to take a general perspective on the problems that arise when the interests of the foetus and those of the mother do not coincide, when it is a matter of survival for one or the other, and whose interests should come first, when we assume they are not compatible. In fact, it is both difficult and distasteful to put these two lives in the balance. Life is our most precious possession. Take that away, and we take away a person's whole world. Furthermore, what grounds are there to justify setting a higher price on one person's life as opposed to others? All lives are equal. After all, no one in our society considers destroying a foetus as intrinsically good, despite all the diverging views on abortion. In fact, even the most solid supporters of free choice, who see abortion simply as a way to terminate unwanted pregnancies, will admit that the decision is often heartbreaking. To most people, the best answer is better family planning.

We could avoid this lengthy debate on abortion if we could improve family planning and education for Canadians. Family planning and education should be a priority for every government that wants to make abortion unnecessary. When abortion seems inevitable, we should encourage the use of social programs that provide single mothers with daycare and financial assistance. We must maintain and develop new and effective social programs in order to help the neediest among us who are seeking some kind of support.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I intend to vote for the bill on second reading. However, it is not because I support the principle of the bill but because I feel the bill should be considered by a committee of the House and that amendments should be made. However, I intend to vote against the bill in its present form on third reading, especially if we fail to offer at least minimal protection for the foetus.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the decision to allow the termination of a pregnancy is indeed one of the most difficult and divisive issues that our country has ever faced. I know that all of us as legislators have given it a great deal of personal thought and have wrestled with its moral and social implications.

We have all been lobbied intensively by those who oppose the concept of choice and those who support a woman's right to self-determination. We must always, as legislators, try to seek public consensus in a process and through our decision-making. Unfortunately, there are always those issues in our imperfect world where consensus is all but impossible, where public opinion remains intransigent and unalterably divided. There are occasions when the processes of conciliation and compromise only serve to compound our difficulties and to frustrate the solution that we seek. Such is the case with abortion.

I believe that the legislation on abortion now before this House does just that. In attempting to seek compromise where none appears possible, this legislation in fact denigrates a woman's legitimate right to choose by throwing it back into the Criminal Code. It compounds and frustrates the difficult decision to terminate a pregnancy by casting over it the ominous cloud of criminal sanction.

I have thought about this issue a great deal and I firmly believe that making abortion illegal is unjust in principle and is unworkable in practice and that is why I cannot support this legislation.

The choice to terminate a pregnancy is a moral and intensely personal decision and in a free and a democratic society the conscience of the individual must remain paramount to the state. As was so eloquently stated by Supreme Court Justice Dickson, forcing a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her priorities and aspirations is a profound interference with a woman's body and an infringement of security of the person.

In this country we have a strong tradition of freedom and of individual liberty. We value our freedoms and our right to make those choices necessary to reach our life's goals and aspirations. Through this proposed legislation the government wants to take away that right to choose and give it to the politicians, and I think that that is a dangerous wrong.

Yesterday I listened to the former minister of health give his reasons for supporting this legislation, and in his arguments he made a very cogent point. The minister stated that we should not ascribe to society the powers it does not have. I would like to respond by saying that we should not ascribe to society the powers it does not deserve. Society does not deserve to interfere with what is a woman's personal moral decision, the outcome of which will influence the rest of her life. It is not for the state to legislate morality. Morality, the distinction between right and wrong, is not based on one answer for everyone. Morality is based upon freedom and the very essence of freedom involves the principle of choice.

The ability to choose one's destiny and to select one's path toward self-determination is a fundamental democratic right, a right that is being jeopardized by this legislation now before the House, a right that this government is trying to take away from the women of Canada.

Just what does the concept of choice really mean? Most anti-choice advocates equate the concept of choice with abortion on demand. But as a gross misconception, it completely ignores the traumatic reality that a woman must face when she is confronted with an unwanted pregnancy.

I make that statement with some direct experience. My wife faced an unplanned and totally unexpected pregnancy as a young woman. For her the prospects of bearing a child meant interrupting her education, it meant finding employment and it meant bearing the social and psychological trauma of being a young and unwed mother. She probably could not have faced it alone, but she was exceedingly fortunate. She was surrounded with the love and fellowship of an understanding and compassionate family who were there to help and support her in the difficult path that she would choose.

She chose to bear the child and to endure the difficult and often painful, yet greatly rewarding job of parenthood. I came to know her at this point in her life and I witnessed first-hand the difficulties, the barriers, the deep psychological trauma that a young woman, as a single parent, must face. After we married I adopted her daughter who is now a young adult completing her degree in psychology and it goes without saying that we are both very proud of her.

Later in life, as a parent with three children I decided to interrupt my professional career to return to university and complete my doctorate degree in the health sciences. My wife informed me that she was again pregnant. Although we had taken precautions mother nature had once again performed her timeless ritual demanding the re-enactment of the biological imperative with great finesse. We could not possibly face the burden of another child if I was to return to academia and yet to terminate the pregnancy was not in the cards. There was, we felt, a reason for this child. So, we had the child, our youngest daughter, Karalyn, who is now eight years of age. I remained in my career. I eventually entered political life and that is why I am here today. There are times, I must admit, when I wonder whether I am a victim or a beneficiary of circumstance.

For my wife the choice to terminate her first pregnancy was not the option she could choose despite an uncertain future and hardship as a single parent. The same was true for us as husband and wife with our last child despite the difficulties involved. Having said that, we would not want to dictate to anyone else the path that they must choose. Faced with that decision, I think we both have a more realistic appreciation of the difficulties and the personal trauma that other women must endure, women who do not necessarily have the financial and the emotional supports to adequately care for a child.

And that is precisely the point. Choice means the freedom to select the path that is right for you. Choice means the right of a woman to decide for herself whether to bear the child or whether to interrupt the process until such time as she is better able to bring into this world a child that is wanted, a child that is loved, a child that can be adequately cared for. I firmly believe that the right to make that choice must be left up to the individual. Governments should not be allowed to interfere.

The legislation before us today does nothing to resolve the bitter polarity surrounding the issue of abortion. It is intellectually dishonest and it is politically fraudulent. It gives the appearance that the government is doing something about the issue and in reality it is doing nothing to tackle the very essence of the problem. It does nothing to reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies and to support the unwanted children who continue to suffer in society today.

Our efforts in resolving the controversy of abortion have been futile, largely because we have been tackling the problem from the wrong dimension. To circumvent the need for abortion should always be the ultimate goal. Consensus can only be reached by focusing on the preventive side of the issue. The aim of education, research and social action must always be to reduce the incidence of abortion and to promote effective contraception. We must also involve the development of national programs, of counselling and support for those women who have decided to see their pregnancy to term.

The reality is that 56 per cent of single parent families in Canada live at or below the poverty line, and while one woman in four is sexually active by the age of 15, fewer than 10 per cent of North American teenagers use birth control when they first become sexually active. Despite these harsh realities, the national division of health and welfare has only one full-time worker in its family planning division.

We have failed miserably as a nation to provide a framework of support so necessary to allow women to make responsible decisions. Establishing effective preventive programs through our health, educational and social service agencies will do much to decrease future demands for abortions. This has to be combined with adequately funded support and counselling services for women facing an unwanted pregnancy. It is our collective responsibility to do all we can to help.

May I conclude by saying that in the final analysis the decision of whether or not to terminate a pregnancy must be left to the woman. It must remain hers to choose the path which she alone must walk.

• (1840)

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, usually when I have the privilege of speaking in this House I mention how pleased I am to speak on the bill before Parliament. Tonight I am not so much pleased as I am aware of the difficulties of this subject for all members of Parliament, including myself.

This is the second reading stage of Bill C-43. We are being asked to approve in principle a new law on abortion. The bill does not reflect my personal point of view. I have opposed abortion since I was a teenager and since that time I have worked and spoken out on behalf of protecting unborn children. I have spoken twice before on this subject in the House of Commons and it is not my intention at this point to repeat the arguments that I have made as to why I want protection for the unborn. I think it will suffice for me to say that for me this is a deeply held conviction.

I said this subject is difficult for parliamentarians. It is difficult because I know there is no consensus in Canada. I and many who share my point of view have tried to build that consensus but, for many reasons, it does not exist.

This Parliament now has the unenviable task of trying to reconcile two very divergent points of view, both, in many cases, passionately held. I do not know the words that could be put down on paper that could completely satisfy both sides of the issue.

Therefore, those of us who are deeply committed to the pro-life position have a decision to make. On the face of it, it would seem that the decision is straightfoward because this piece of legislation does not reflect my point of view and, therefore, it would seem simple to say that I must vote against it. But, and this is why it is difficult, there are other considerations to take into account.

One of them is my belief that this bill is better than no bill at all. It affirms that all human life has value. As well, there is the possibility that if this law passes perhaps a future Parliament might be able to build a consensus that would strengthen the protection of unborn children.

I am also faced with the reality. If this law does not pass I do not believe that Parliament ever again will pass legislation in the area of abortion. I cannot see federal parliamentarians re-opening the subject of abortion if this Parliament fails to enact legislation.

So the decision for those of us who support the pro-life position is this: Do we vote against this because, on principle, it does not protect unborn children in a manner that would be acceptable, or do we vote for this knowing those political realities that I have just set out?

One of my colleagues yesterday quite correctly pointed out that compromise is necessary in all legislation. I agree that we are called upon to do that in the parliamentary process. Every piece of legislation I know of that is presented to this House is an attempt to balance two or more competing interests and we, as legislators, try to strike a reasonable balance.

However, I believe that when all is said and done there are some beliefs that cannot be compromised. There is a set of core beliefs in all of us which defines who we are as human beings and what it is that we stand for in this world. I am at that point.

I have had to face a decision like this on a previous occasion. Sixteen years ago I was a member of a university student council. We were asked to approve a student council departmental budget that dealt with many aspects of health. Part of the money in that package would end up financing an abortion referral service. The vote that we were called upon to make was a take it or leave it proposition on the whole package. I spoke with a number of my colleagues about my concern and said that my opposition to abortion precluded my support for the package. They gave me the strong argument that if the vote was lost we would lose all the other good services included in the package. I felt then, and I believe today, that I cannot rationalize my position to that extent.

There are others in the same position as am I who have come to a different conclusion and will support this bill at second reading stage. I do not believe that they are any less right in coming to a different conclusion than me based on the same set of facts. But for me, in this debate, this is the crucial point. This is the point at which Parliament is being asked to give approval in principle to something that I have always opposed. Accordingly I will vote against this bill.

If it is the will of Parliament that this bill be approved in principle, I will be among those who will say that it is preferable to none at all. But I will be among those who will say that once having been approved in principle there is nothing that can be done to turn it into a pro-life bill. The attempt would be procedurally out of order, I think, and would probably destroy any consensus that has developed up to this point, but that argument is for another day.

For me the way is clear; I will vote against this at second reading. But being sure in my own mind as to what I should do does not make the decision much easier. It is a free vote for members of Parliament in the Progressive Conservative Party. If in coming to my conclusion I had been pressured by my colleagues to do something against my conscience, my decision would have been easier, but that was not the case. I was and am free to speak my mind and vote according to my conscience and I think that is crucial.

As have all members of Parliament, I have received a great deal of mail on this subject. One man recently wrote to me and said that I had an obligation to do what a majority of the people want and not vote according to my conscience. I have to disagree. In the long run it would be very bad for Canada if members do not act and vote according to their conscience.

I thank the House and particularly those in the leadership of my party who have understood and been supportive of those for whom this decision has been so difficult.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in this very important debate on Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion.

I do not think I would be exaggerating at all if I stated that this issue is one of the most difficult and contentious issues that has gripped Canadians and members of Parliament, my colleagues, in many years.

It is very difficult to deal with because the legislation as proposed deals with two very fundamental issues; the rights of women and the rights of the foetus which encompasses the sanctity of life. It is a debate on a piece of legislation, the outcome of which, regardless of defeat or approval, holds little hope of lessening the passionate and, at times, gut-wrenching and divisive debate now or in the foreseeable future. But as a legislator I bring with me my own opinions, my own biases, and also my own concerns.

During this debate on this particular issue I have tried my very best to put my own point of view and my own positions aside and to listen to those who hold contrary opinions and to try to understand why they hold those contrary opinions. I have listened a lot. I have tried to understand how these individuals, whom I consider to be rational, caring, intelligent individuals, can be so far apart on such a fundamental issue as abortion.

I also want to say that I have attempted always not just to listen but to respect contrary opinions on the subject. I have defended and I will continue to defend the rights of individuals on all sides of this issue to have an opinion, to present that opinion and, most important, to be respected for having that opinion. Consequently, in return I ask nothing more than that same courtesy.

I must also state that I consider myself not just to be against abortion but to be in favour of protecting the lives of the unborn wherever and however possible. I do, however, understand the position of individuals who hold a contrary view, many of whom are my dear and longstanding friends. But as hard as I try, I simply cannot accept their conviction on the other side of this argument.

I am sure that most of us in this Chamber, no matter what point of view we hold on this particular debate, have been asked by individuals who hold different points of view what our point of view is.

• (1850)

There is one thing that has bothered me, although it has not happened in this House. After being asked what my position is and saying that I am probably pro-life—although I do not like the labels that this debate has forced on many of us—many times I am immediately told that I do not have a right to have an opinion because I am not a female. I fully understand some of those sentiments. But I also know, as a father of two children, that I should have some say in the rights and the future of the unborn. Many times when I am asked my opinion it is met with hostility but many times it is meet with a great deal of support.

But all of that aside, we are now in the place where a decision on this very critical piece of legislation must be made. I have listened to arguments and I suppose I am prepared to accept any bill that limits abortions to those instances where a mother's life is at risk. I suppose I am also prepared to listen to arguments concerning abortions being permitted in cases of violent crime, such as rape and incest.

I intend to support this bill at second reading solely so that it can proceed to the legislative committee for further review and to hear from Canadians on this critical issue. It is also my hope that when we do get it into committee a true debate will take place, not the type of sterile debate that many times takes place in the House, but a true exchange of ideas across a committee table as amendments are put forward, to try to make this piece of legislation which is currently, in its present form, to me unpalatable, more palatable to myself, many of my colleagues and many Canadians.

In my view this government has a responsibility to propose legislation. It was my hope as well as the hope of millions of Canadians that this House would bring in legislation that would not just address the rights of the foetus, but a bill that sought to make a statement which indicates society's interest in the rights of the foetus.

In its ruling of last January 28, the Supreme Court clearly indicated that the state has an interest in the foetus. As Chief Justice Dickson wrote:

> The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes "compelling" should be left to the informed judgment of the legislature.

He went on to say:

> Like Beetz and Wilson, I agree that the protection of foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid governmental objective. It follows that balancing these interests, with the lives and health of women a major factor, is clearly an important governmental objective.

In other words, what he was saying is that the state has a responsibility to act on behalf of society's interest in the foetus. Many individuals such as myself waited to see such legislation that would enshrine the rights of the foetus. In late October and early November in the days preceding the introduction of Bill C-43 on November 3, the government systematically leaked bits of information which suggested that somehow the legislation that would be forthcoming would be pro-life in its form, that the great compromise had been reached and it had been reached in favour of foetal rights. In my opinion, nothing could be further from the truth.

This legislation outlaws abortion, except—and it is a very important exception—when in the opinion of a doctor the health or life of the mother is likely to be threatened. Health is then defined as being the physical, mental and psychological health; by any stretch of the imagination, a wide and sweeping definition.

What the government has really done is to introduce a bill that at first glance seems to be pro-life but in practice is actually, or could be, abortion on demand. Nowhere does this legislation mention foetal rights. The foetus is without any protection whatsoever in this bill.

The government did not have the guts to define health. Instead, it has left the entire responsibility in the hands of Canada's doctors. I know that many people think that might be appropriate. For instance, I am sure that doctors such as Henry Morgentaler must be quite satisfied. Others do not share the same definition of health.

If this bill passes unamended, I am sure that in a short period of time some medical practitioners, a very small minority, will become abortion specialists because of their very loose definition of what constitutes a risk to the health of a mother. Although the legislation says there will be some protection against this type of thing happening, I think anyone who has examined the bill and has looked at some of the recent court rulings, including the Chantal Daigle case, would question whether or not any third party intervener would have any success in laying charges or getting a prosecution against a doctor's medical opinion in this instance.

Most important, the bill does not recognize society's interest in protecting the rights of the foetus. I happen to believe that the foetus represents life and with Bill C-43 there will not be any recognition anywhere in Canada for those rights.

As I mentioned earlier, I intend to vote this legislation through on second reading to committee stage, but let me say very clearly and unequivocally that if this bill is not changed to protect the rights of the foetus, if it is not changed to more clearly define the definition of the risk to the health of the mother, I will not be able to support it on third and final reading.

Bill C-43 is another disguise for abortion on demand. I personally find it a bit abhorrent when I look across at the government and see how weak-kneed it was when it did not seek to put a proper piece of legislation before this House. Bill C-43 does not protect the sanctity of human life and I cannot support any legislation that completely ignores those rights.

One other thing has to be said before I conclude. There is another important piece of the puzzle that has not been addressed by this government in its legislation. This government has failed in that it has not introduced companion legislation to remove the economic and other factors that force many women to choose abortion. There should never be a case in a society as wealthy as ours, with the resources that we have, as advanced as we are, where an individual chooses to have an abortion because she simply cannot afford to have and raise her child.

Yet the government comes in with a piece of legislation which is supposed to address the problem of abortion in our society and completely fails, through legislation, through government policy, to remove those economic indications that have caused thousands too many abortions to be performed on Canadian women.

Child care is not there. Income support programs are insufficient. Family planning programs which should be taught to children at a very early age in the school system and public education and awareness are nowhere in this bill or in any piece of companion legislation put forward by this government.

Therefore, it is my opinion that this government has introduced legislation that provides for far too easy access to abortion without addressing the real causes for abortion.

I started off by indicating that this was a very difficult debate for most of us to be involved in, but it is one that none of us can afford to skirt because it is a fundamental issue.

I do not intend, I have never in the past, nor do I intend in the future to lecture those who do not subscribe to my point of view or to criticize those who, for whatever reason, find themselves in a position that they have to choose legal or illegal abortions.

I would hope that once this bill comes back it will have the necessary amendments to protect the rights of the foetus, that it will have a clear definition of what "at risk" means when dealing with the health of a mother and, more important, that the government will recognize its responsibility to remove the economic justification for abortion that has far too long been imposed on the women of Canada.

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, this debate is not one that is easy to address and in fact it raises some fundamental issues of life and respect for life to which all of us are committed, particularly in terms of our public representation.

I want to deal this evening, in the brief time available, with what I think are the three essential aspects of the debate on this bill. They are the issues of right to life, respect for life and responsibility for life.

Over the past number of years I have been increasingly troubled by the increasing amount of hate and animosity and the decreasing amount of understanding and insight that has occurred in trying to deal with this issue. I guess I could even say that in several elections, particularly the election of 1980, I experienced the extent and the depth of the animosity around this particular issue.

This is not my first occasion, neither in this place nor in other places, to discuss this issue. In fact, as I was preparing for the debate, I looked up one of the House of Commons reports on Health and Welfare from 1967 and 1968 when I participated in the standing committee which, on December 18, 1967, issued its report recommending some of the changes that subsequently became the law which stood until early 1988.

• (1900)

Having said that, I would in no way want to suggest that I feel that I have any more expertise or right to speak on this matter than any other individual in this House. I do think, however, it is important that we understand what this debate is about. Those who have taken a strong anti-abortion position have chosen to describe their position as one of right to life. I have always felt that they had chosen the right language even if, from time to time, they demonstrated a very real lack of understanding and sensitivity and very often, and perhaps with increasing frequency, have transmitted a message which is almost the opposite of that to which they espouse.

This is not something new. As far back as our own committee of 1967–68, in quite a lively exchange that took place on February 8, 1968, I was forced to say to one witness: "I would say though, Mr. Dehler, that your whole interpretation is founded upon a one dimensional view of life, that life can only be looked at and human life as being much more than its isolated physical aspect in its biological sense". I said that because it seemed to me that so often the discussions that took place around the issue of right to life were, at best, narrow and superficial and, at worst, even contradictory.

I guess another example of that is to suggest that I often found that people who were the most passionate on the issue of right to life were equally at home with the feeling that we should retain and, in many instances, expand the use of the death penalty. I was never quite able to reconcile that dichotomy. I believe that in the matter of life one cannot disengage for other reasons.

We must look at what the issue is with respect to this right to life. We are dealing, as almost all members have said, with a very unique form of life in terms of the foetus, but in dealing with that unique form of life we must remember that there are some very real limits and those limits are rarely, if ever, recognized or dealt with.

The Canadian Medical Association, in its own communication in response to this legislation, has said:

> Abortion, as interpreted by the Canadian Medical Association, is the act of termination of a pregnancy before foetal viability.

The words "foetal viability" hardly ever enter into the discussion. But when the Supreme Court was faced with its own decision it said, and I quote here Chief Justice Dickson in interpreting that decision:

> Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term, unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus an infringement of security of the person.

I have to believe that the Chief Justice, in speaking not only for himself but for others in the court, was presenting something that was profoundly important. We really have to ask the question: whose life are we concerned with? I think it comes out, both directly and indirectly, in the things that people have been saying about the legislation.

Tom Harper who is an Anglican priest and writes for The Toronto Star, in writing a column in justification of this legislation, uses this paragraph:

> What having an abortion in the Criminal Code says to me and to all Canadians is that all human life is sacred and so nobody can terminate it merely on a whim or to remedy one's own basic stupidity.

Now notions of "whim" or "stupidity" related to those who make the awesome decision to have an abortion reflect an attitude which, unfortunately, is all too pervasive and current.

Even more troubling is the recent press statement of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops on the introduction of this bill where on three separate occasions they refer to the dignity, value and protection of the unborn child and of children. That is very important and is to be applauded. But this same press release makes absolutely no reference whatever to women!

I find it passing strange that a body that would speak for close to half the population of this country, over half of whom would be women, would not recognize the fundamental respect for rights and life that exist with the mother and the potential mother in each and every instance. I have to say as a church person myself that we have a lot to answer for. A lot of it goes back deep into our own scriptural heritage. I could refer to the symbolism of 'Adam's rib' and of the notions from Genesis of "man having dominion over every living thing" as creating an expectation that is altogether paternalistic and degrading ultimately for half the population of this planet.

We are in fundamental terms looking at responsibility for life itself. Where does that responsibility rest? Well, in the first instance with the very life that gives new life opportunity, and that is woman. I ask you, how can we be expected to believe that we are going to make some advance over the present agony that exists, not only for those who are at different ends of this debate, but for the tens of thousands of women who face this decision, if we focus so narrowly and exclusively on only one aspect of that dilemma?

I think the issue quite fundamentally is one of responsibility for life and responsible decision, and I have said for some time now that I think we have to face the issue of responsibility squarely. What disturbs me so much about this legislative initiative is that it moves that responsibility away from the women themselves and back into the courts and the Criminal Code. The language would imply, if not invoke criminality. It appears to do one thing while, in effect, apparently intends the opposite. This does no service to the law and does no service or respect to women.

It has already been mentioned and I would mention it again that there are major issues of counselling and support and understanding with respect to the issue of abortion itself that have not been addressed. There is the scandalous situation of the inequality of treatment that exists for women across this country which has become more pronounced in recent years with the actions of my native province, Prince Edward Island, and now Nova Scotia.

This legislation—and I am no lawyer—troubles me because it might create the kind of incentive for further inequality that none of us should be willing to accept. This legislation in no way meets the basic concerns that all Canadians have, namely, to ensure that all members of society are treated with dignity and respect and invested with the responsibility that we all seek to bear.

This legislation is troubling and not acceptable in its present form.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion.

There is no doubt that Bill C–43 concerns a very serious and difficult issue which is of great importance to all Canadians. However, what is in question with this bill is its ability to adequately address the issue of abortion.

Matters which relate to life and death are not easy to deal with. During the last Parliament the debate on the death penalty certainly proved that. Yet the members who were involved in that specific debate eventually chose the preservation of life rather than have the state take it away. Unfortunately, in this case Bill C–43 does not provide complete protection for foetal life.

• (1910)

Bill C–43 is a feeble attempt by the federal government to escape a very difficult issue. It has failed in drafting legislation to protect the unborn. Bill C–43 is merely an example of the government trying to appease the opposing sides in this issue. Such an exercise is futile. It pleases no one. It will do very little to settle the abortion issue. Far more importantly, this bill does not insure an unquestionable and most basic right in any society, that being the right of life.

I respect the views that have been presented thus far by all members on Bill C–43. I know that the decisions reached by my colleagues to support or oppose this bill were not arrived at quickly or without serious consideration.

In the past year, every member has had contact with representatives of the pro–life and pro–choice organizations. As members, we are also aware of the views held by a large number of our constituents. I would certainly like to thank my constituents and Canadians from all parts of the country who have written and talked to me on this issue. Their personal opinions were valuable to me and I certainly know that they were very sincere.

During the 1988 election campaign I clearly identified myself as a pro–life supporter. I believe that life begins at conception. I also believe that there must be legislative protection for the unborn to guarantee their right to life. Since being elected as the member of Parliament for Stormont—Dundas my position has not changed nor has it diminished. I have always shared my views on abortion with my constituents. The people of Stormont—Dundas know where I stand.

Bill C–43 is an attempt by the government to apply a political answer to an issue that is way beyond politics. Whatever position we as legislators take on abortion, it is understood that lives are in the balance. This fact is indisputable. We are debating legislation which, if passed, would permit the ending of human life. This House, and our entire society for that matter, cannot view this in any other light. Abortion ends the natural progression of human reproduction. In the final analysis, if this bill is passed without protecting the right to life of the unborn, our society as a whole will be the real loser.

We can argue numerous points in this debate. We will, however, actually end up weighing the value of human life. Whatever we argue and however passionately we present our arguments, the hard fact remains that if Bill C–43 is accepted then there will be no protection for the unborn. We would be sanctioning the right for life to end.

Every member of this House knows the multitude of issues tied in with the subject of abortion. There is a myriad of questions involving issues of a legal, ethical, moral, societal, medical, religious and constitutional nature. With such an array of items to consider, it is easy for this government to present Bill C–43, and hope that the Canadian people accept it.

I cannot accept this bill and I am certain that a good number of Canadians will not either. It was incumbent on the government to introduce abortion legislation when the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the previous abortion law. The government, however, took a considerable amount of time to present such legislation.

While this issue is certainly complex, it is by no means a new one. I believe the government would have been content to sit back and do nothing except that two sensational cases arose this past summer which forced the government into action.

These court cases made it clear that the government could not hide from its responsibilities. The pressure for the government to act reached a point where it had to. We see the results of the government's response here in the contents of Bill C–43. One could say that Bill C–43 is a compromise. Unfortunately, it is impossible to compromise on matters which involve life and death. As is to be expected, both sides of the abortion issue have condemned this bill.

As I have said, I support the pro–life position with regard to abortion. I formulated my position as a result of a number of influences. Certainly the environment in which I was raised played a part in my own views on a very personal matter. The information that was available to me and the many discussions I had were also significant factors.

I do, however, believe that my views reflect a reverence for human life and I know I am not alone in this thinking. Society has a fundamental duty to protect and foster human life and its development. To lessen that duty in any manner would be inconsistent with our social and moral values.

No one segment of our society should have the right to decide whether another life can continue or not. The rights of one must not take precedence over the rights of another. It is not a question of gender here, it is a question of life.

We as a society must adopt an attitude which clearly states that all life is precious. We have to accept the responsibility to share in the nurturing and care of both mother and child, born and unborn, so that human life is supported and enriched. It is all too simplistic to end the life of a human foetus. Every effort must be made to preserve life.

We have to pursue all avenues in making it easier to continue with a pregnancy, rather than to end one. If we really believe that the abortion of a human foetus solves the problem then we as a society have failed.

In conclusion, Bill C–43 must be defeated, but the matter will not end there. We will have to present an acceptable alternative, one which will take a firm stand and enshrine the principle of the right to life of the unborn.

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate with sorrow in my heart. I have heard my colleagues on both sides of the House express their opinion. I agree with some of them and agree less with others.

Let me take a few minutes in this House to share my deepest convictions with you.

Mr. Speaker, as member for La Prairie since 1984, in the service of my fellow citizens, I was elected according to the ethical principles found in our modern democracy. I would like to tell hon. members to ponder this principle: "Do not seek greatness and strive for honour, but excel in the practice of virtue."

This maxim of our philosophy is the very essence of what guides me in this debate and all the debates in which I have taken part in this House since I was elected to the Commons.

I have always professed good humour, sincerity and discussion. My trademark is open–mindedness and moderation in all my dealings with fellow human beings. Mr. Speaker, in my humble opinion, patience, kindness, trust, self–knowledge, but especially warmth and love for humankind, justice and honesty, should guide this debate, in spite of everything.

For years, Mr. Speaker, although I lacked a university degree, I pursued my education methodically, I questioned and consulted and today I speak in this debate, as in all others, as my conscience dictates.

• (1920)

Mr. Speaker, I listen to my constituents and I heed their advice. Such are the very premises which guide my choice when it is not tied to a party policy and when that policy does not disturb my conscience.

Mr. Speaker, human laws do not supersede God's commandment: Thou shall not kill. The Supreme Court of Canada does not consider the foetus as a human being, but geneticists tell us that the first cell division occurs 30 minutes after fecundation. Six days later the foetus measure 2 centimetres and the embryo is taking shape. The heart muscle begins to beat on the 25th day. After 30 days most of the organs essential to survival are already growing.

Mr. Speaker, foetus is the name given to the child in the womb of his mother from the moment he can be recognized as a human being, after about two months. To destroy a foetus is to get rid of a child to be born.

What is life, Mr. Speaker? When does life begin? At conception? When the cell first separates? Even scientists cannot agree. Have they proof to state unequivocally and absolutely when life begins?

What is happening to the conscience of man for whom killing is no longer a question of ethics but more often than not a question of comfort, luxury, materialism? What is happening to men, they who no longer feel love in their heart for a child to be born?

Mr. Speaker, nowadays we are witness to too much youth abuse. Abortion is the killing of the smallest of the small. Who will come to their defence? Who will give them a chance to claim their place under the sun? How many more potential human beings are we going to destroy this way? At the rate we are proceeding we will do away with the next generation before they are even born.

If we give the permission to destroy, how many Canadians will see the light of day? Mr. Speaker, will the next generation have to be ever grateful to their parents for not killing them? What are the moral, mental, psychological and spiritual consequences for future generations? What is the future of a civilized country like Canada from which a number of developing countries draw inspiration? Are we going to have another genocide? Will countries that look up to us follow our example? Will they not be left with the impression that we Canadians can afford to do without human beings, important as they are for the survival of our country. We have it made, they are not so well off, so should they not do as we do?

If we look at what is going on world-wide in all so-called underdeveloped cultures we realize that respect for life and procreation as well as the assurance of having many offsprings is a major priority in many countries.

Instead, Mr. Speaker, why not set up preventive and educative programs, make available birth control methods, facilitate adoption programs, and assist needy women with alternatives which are less radical then abortion.

Let us listen to our own heart, let compassion and love guide our decision, this love which we feel for other human beings. Let us treat life with the respect it deserves and we will be shown respect.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-43 is to amend the Criminal Code. I understand that the area of Federal jurisdiction is rather limited, health care regulation being a Provincial responsability.

I am aware that Bill C-43 does not legalise abortion. Yet, under Clause 1, an abortion induced by a physician will be deemed legal when the health or life of a female person is threatened. I understand that health means physical, mental and psychological health.

Mr. Speaker, we are not sanctioning abortion on demand, but we are making it a legal medical procedure when performed for health reasons.

Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, will physicians be called upon to exterminate the poor, the old and the needy on behalf of the state which is shirking its responsibilities by renouncing all ethical and moral rules?

That is not a solution, Mr. Speaker. The legislators' duty is to be the guardians of public morality. To criminalize abortion is not an ideal solution. Entrusting physicians with the responsibility of the state to make social judgments is not an acceptable solution.

With an heavy heart, Mr. Speaker, I must inform my constituents and my colleagues in the House that I just cannot support Bill C-43.

[English]

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, there is an ad in today's Globe and Mail which states:

> "Men for Women's Choice.
> This Personal Decision is No Crime.

I rise in the House to concur with that sentiment. Underneath the ad is a list of several names, I suppose hundreds, I have not counted them. I am sorry that my name does not appear among them.

I would like to read the ad, because I think it says in all the essence what I stand for personally and which I believe my party's stand tries to say:

> No government should be able to force a woman to bear a child against her will. The proposed law would make women criminals for taking a personal decision to seek an abortion. Abortion has no place in the Criminal Code.
>
> Like a growing number of men, we do not think that men should control women. Men ought to have equal say and responsibility in a decision to parent. But ultimately, if there is a dispute, the decision to end a pregnancy must be a woman's choice because it is her body.
> No husband, no boyfriend, no judge, no doctor, no politician, should control a woman's body. Ever.
> Governments should act to ensure access to abortion in every province and every territory. More and better sex education and birth control information should also be provided.

It goes on to say that: "Now is the time for men to speak out. Show your support for women's choice by letting—" and I will not bother to name the politicians who ask us to let them know—although, of course, it includes the Prime Minister and all the other Members of Parliament—how we feel.

I rise today on this issue in as sincere a plea as I have ever made in my life that this place should not recriminalize abortion. Abortion is a health matter, not a political matter, not a criminal matter. It certainly is an emotional matter. It certainly is a physical matter in every sense of our humanity. The government has said that it is a psychological matter, and it certainly is; that it is a health matter, and it certainly is. I guess there have been some suggestions made that it is a religious matter. I presume that some of the decisions on both sides are made on the basis of a religious conviction.

The question is certainly a human rights matter without question. Fundamentally it is a power question. I will deal with some of the other questions in more detail a little later. It is an economic, sociological, educational and political matter. This piece of legislation cannot be. We cannot get ourselves involved in a criminal matter in so far as this issue is concerned.

• (1930)

It is a health matter in more ways than one. I would suggest that one of the most important aspects of it being a health matter is again that it is women. Why is it that in this human history of ours throughout the ages it is always women who become the victims as a result of decisions which are for the most part made by men?

Also, in so far as women are concerned and as far as the matter before us is concerned, it is a matter of rich and poor, and that is not an unusual question to be coming before this House. There are many, many things which seem to be predicated on privilege. The obvious fact is that if a woman has access to any degree of wealth, she will be able to have an abortion regardless of what is decided in this House. She will be able to have a safe abortion, perhaps not even in this country. But if she has the financial wherewithal she will be able to avail herself of a safe abortion.

That is not the case with those women who do not have much money, who do not have the financial ability to perhaps go to another province or to go to another country. Sometimes, certainly in the past, it has meant going far beyond the borders of Canada to procure something which, undoubtedly, for their psychological, mental and physical health was a necessity, but again we have injected into this discussion the whole matter of the rich and the poor.

I do not think too much has to be said about the religious connotations. Wherever religious connotations arise, I would suggest that in Canada, being a nation where church and state are essentially separate, that a religious discussion should not inject itself into the discussion in the Parliaments of this country.

As I mentioned, human rights are involved because I do not think the issue is abortion; the issue is the freedom to choose. The issue is the freedom of a woman to choose and the freedom not to have to be beholden to a man when she makes that choice.

I mentioned that power was an element in the discussion and this relates back to the matter of being able to choose. As the advertisement in the paper said, there is no way that a man should be able to exercise that kind of power over a woman, be he a husband or a boyfriend.

We have seen in one case this summer where that was precisely an element in what was probably the most severe distress a woman has suffered publicly in Canada for a long while. I would suggest that such a spectacle is something which surely most Canadians would have found abhorrent and would in all senses wish not to see repeated. There is an element of power in this which has to be recognized, and it is one of the main reasons why this legislation should simply not be put through.

The proposed legislation states that a woman may have an abortion if she can demonstrate physical, psychological or mental reasons for having it done. I would suggest that most Canadian women who are going to have an abortion in reality are psychologically very sound mentally and physically. In order to have the abortion they are going to have to lie and perhaps drag the physician into the matter as well, which introduces the element of criminality as far as the legislation is concerned.

I do not think that this legislation ought to be enacted, something which will stigmatize half the population of Canada permanently in law. I would strongly suggest that this legislation should be defeated.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Tétreault (Laval–des–Rapides): Mr. Speaker, on the issue of abortion, I am of two minds and, while appreciating one another, the two minds cannot really agree. One of those minds belongs to the member of Parliament who, being at the same time a lawyer recognizes the government has an obligation to fill a legal vacuum with something acceptable. The other is that of the man, the father, for whom life transcends every law. In other terms, Mr. Speaker, while recognizing that a bill is needed, I deplore the need for one.

The need for abortions is almost entirely caused by the current lack of a social conscience. Nobody could object to a therapeutic abortion, that is in the case where the life or health of the mother is really threatened.

But the other abortions, those for instance that result from a whim, vengeance, socio-economic considerations, lack of generosity, irresponsibility, immaturity—how could they be justified? Or could they only be justifiable under an enactment?

At every turn my thoughts bring me back to that starting point—the fundamentally of happy christian ethics, and the social conscience that leads a notion to ensure its own survival. A society that eliminates its children soon after their conception is bound to disappear. There is no future for a society that refuses to be perpetuated.

It is a sad reflection, Mr. Speaker, that in Canada there were last year 65,000 therapeutic abortions as against 360,000 births. One child out of six was sacrificed.

Since the Bill was announced, there has been general dissatisfaction. Some view it as too permissive, others charge that the freedoms of women are being violated. My intention is not to deal once more with the basic issue of whether the foetus is or is not a human being.

But since a law is needed, let us take the time to look at what the physical and psychological implications are for women who will get an abortion in order to terminate a pregnancy.

Abortion is touted as the almost only and perfect solution for women faced with an unwanted pregnancy whose physical, mental and psychological health might be threatened.

But would the physical, mental and psychological health of those same women not be also threatened by an abortion?

Abortion is the radical solution to an often temporary problem. If we really want to protect the mother against the consequences of an unwanted pregnancy, we should at the same time caution her against the physical and psychological dangers.

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, let me join Father Jacques Croteau who had this to say: "I would be the last one to accuse a mother who had gotten an abortion of deliberately wanting to kill her child. Things almost never happen that way, either in the mind or the heart of a woman faced with an unwanted pregnancy, in view of the fears, panic, anxiety, even distress that can grip her."

• (1940)

But in practice, once the abortion is performed and the baby is no more, many deep and at times indelible psychological and physical scars remain.

Last January, right after his election as President of the United States, George Bush said at the Roe vs. Wade rally, and I quote:

[English]

> Before you begin your march today, on this first Monday of my presidency, I wanted to take just a few brief moments to restate my firm support of our cause, and to share with you my deep personal concern about our American tragedy of abortion on demand.
> We are concerned about abortion because it deals with the lives of two human beings, mother and child. I know there are people of good will who disagree, but after years of sober and serious reflection on the issue, this is what I think. I think the Supreme Court's decision in Roe versus Wade was wrong and should be overturned. I think America needs a human life amendment. And I think when it comes to abortion there is a better way, the way of adoption, the way of life.
>
> I know that you and hundreds of thousands with you across the country have raised a voice of moral gravity about abortion, a voice of principle, a full voice that properly asserts and affirms the basic dignity of human life—
>
> I promise you that the President hears you now and stands with you in a cause that must be won.

[Translation]

What strikes us at the outset is that President Bush talks about two separate entities: the child and the mother, which raises a question: Why is it only by destroying the former that we can solve the problem of the latter's unwanted pregnancy? Why not a life-enhancing solution rather than a death sentence?

I think it is unfair to the mother faced with an unwanted pregnancy to present abortion as the only option. If it is indeed the case, where is her freedom of choice? And does the woman asking for an abortion know all the potential and likely consequences of her decision? Does she know, for example, that abortion has been linked with subsequent problems such as more difficult pregnancies and deliveries, congenital deformations, ectopic pregnancies, psychological problems, suicidal tendencies, et cetera?

Even though such problems are not common, we cannot say that "it only happens to others" and no woman can say beforehand that she will be spared.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, abortion is not an exclusively male or female issue; it concerns an entire people that is in danger of disappearing sooner or later if its children, the hope of the future, keep getting killed.

In Quebec, for example, there are only 1.4 children per family, whereas it would take at least 2.1 to maintain the population. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that a society which has no more hope, no more desire to perpetuate itself is bound to disappear shortly.

The bill now before us must be compatible with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case. However, this decision does not prevent Parliament from prescribing penalties that would forbid abortion at any stage of pregnancy, unless continuing the pregnancy would endanger the mother's life or health. In this case, most judges said unequivocally that choosing a criterion based on the protection of life and health is not incompatible with the right to security of the person guaranteed by the Charter. Physical, mental or psychological health: a woman who really wants an abortion or believes that it is the only way out for her can easily find herself in one of these three categories, with this bill. That is just what I have trouble with.

While I realize the need to legislate abortion to make it accessible in certain cases, I cannot accept all the terms of the bill. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I fear that with the present terminology, refusing abortion will become the exception, whereas abortion itself should be an exception.

And now we are back at the starting point, the basis of a responsible society which, far beyond its rights and freedoms, would assert its obligations and responsibilities.

But society needs tools, and it is the role of the state to ensure that all citizens can live and grow in a climate of freedom, balanced by rights and responsibilities that must be respected. The role of a responsible government is also to provide everyone with social measures to meet all needs.

The State should open up other avenues, to provide hope and suggest positive and viable solutions.

Mr. Speaker, we see the despair of women faced with an unwanted pregnancy and we also see the despair of thousands of Canadian couples whom nature has not endowed with the gift of fertility. These couples would have no hesitation in spending nine months helping a pregnant woman who cannot keep her child. Mr. Speaker, from a strictly objective point of view, adoption is certainly the most positive and most equitable answer. It releases the natural mother from a responsibility she is not able to assume, and more than meets the expectations of couples who until then had no hope of becoming parents. And I think adoption is a unique opportunity to overcome despair by giving the gift of unselfish generosity.

I realize that many women worry that they will not be able to give up their child if they carry it to term, and they think it will be less painful to have an abortion. This is where we have a responsibility to counsel and help these women.

Besides caring for his patients, a doctor has an obligation to protect and save lives. What would happen if the doctor became the cornerstone of a system for protecting life, for encouraging the woman who is pregnant and for providing hope for couples who cannot have children? If all those who are pro-life were to make a common effort, many solutions would emerge and many lives would be saved. It would mean an ongoing presence at the doctor's office in the form of appropriate literature, resource persons to support and counsel the pregnant mother, a database with names of prospective parents, and so forth. All these couples who despair of ever having children would be delighted to help contribute to the life-creating process.

As a member of a Christian society and of this government, I feel responsible for protecting life. I think it is time we dropped intransigence and systematic opposition in favour of understanding and compromise. It is time society realized where its responsibilities lie, otherwise the state will have to take charge of our collective conscience.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the definition of health will be amended to make it more restrictive. I believe that every doctor who is asked to do an abortion should immediately suggest another alternative. Then and only then will women truly have a choice.

Mr. Speaker, I have just explained my philosophy, which reflects the tenets of the Christian conscience and my social conscience, which dictate my behaviour.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the issue of abortion and also to speak to Bill C-43.

Let me just say at the outset that I consider abortion one of the most important and difficult issues that we have ever had to face as a legislature. It is also one of the most difficult issues that any individual has to face. We are debating an issue which strikes at the core of our belief system. Every individual who enters the abortion debate brings with him or her a different conception of the meaning of the purpose of life, of our collective existence, and of our society. I for one believe that life begins at conception. All of my religious and rural upbringing has given me a strong respect for the preciousness of life.

Abortion demands and produces more than opinion. It demands and produces belief, and beliefs are what people live for and what some people quite frankly are willing to die for.

I know that all of us in this House understand the depth of the sentiment involved in this debate and of the disagreement within this House and in communities throughout Canada. We see it when we go to our constituencies and talk to Canadians. I have received letters from hundreds of residents throughout Haldimand—Norfolk, each one of them with strong views and each one vastly different from the next.

All those views are represented in this House tonight. The predominant viewpoint and opinion expressed by the people of Haldimand—Norfolk to me is one that leans toward a pro-life meaning.

• (1950)

I have met people from Dunnville. In fact, in my constituency office last Friday I was to meet a small group of people concerned about this issue. Well over 100 people packed into my office. We had a good discussion about the bill because they are concerned about it.

They are concerned about what some people in this House like to call a compromise solution, and they did not believe there was a compromise. It was their point of view that this bill should be defeated. I explained to them my belief that if the bill were defeated after third reading, we would not have another opportunity in this House to debate the issue. I still believe that. I believe that this government is not committed to bringing forth another piece of legislation if this bill is defeated.

I am left with the question as to whether or not this bill goes far enough toward a compromise or whether or not this bill could be amended at report stage in such a way that a compromise solution could be found that would be acceptable to all in this House.

I believe that if I project my views and the amendments proposed by certain members of this House, we are going to get extremes again. I have been talking to different members throughout this House and have looked at the amendments they want to bring in. Quite frankly they are still at the extremes. I believe that if a bill is going to come out of this, we are going to have to compromise. That would mean that I would have to compromise my beliefs and that many members of this House will have to compromise theirs too.

But I feel that it is important to have a piece of legislation on the books because some law is better than no law. I believe that if we defeat this motion at second reading we will have no law and that the rights of the foetus will not be protected.

What we are talking about tonight is what is right and what is wrong, and who decides this issue? I believe that we as a legislature must decide. Our decision must be based on the full exercise of our collective mental and spiritual capabilities.

I do not believe that it is preferable for Parliament to stay out of the abortion debate. In fact, I do not believe it is possible to stay out of the abortion debate. We are dealing with the fundamental rights of human beings. If we do not decide, we are saying that we believe that somebody else should. With the depth of belief on abortion and the depth of opposition on abortion, I do not believe that anyone else can decide but the highest court in the land—Parliament.

To abdicate our responsibility to legislate on abortion would have just as much impact on the lives of Canadians as accepting and fulfilling our capacity to legislate. We need to find a solution that is workable, and by that I mean one that the majority of us here in this House with our strongly held beliefs can support. Unfortunately, I believe that the bill we have before us in its present form fails in its attempt to provide a workable solution.

I have heard many of my colleagues in this House observe that in a perfect world we would not have to legislate on abortion. In a perfect world every pregnancy would be a wanted pregnancy. A world of only wanted pregnancies could come about in two ways as I see it. Birth control, if accessible and safe enough for all women and men, would allow for absolute control over our reproductive capacities. Every pregnancy would, therefore, be out of choice.

To say that every pregnancy would be a wanted pregnancy would also mean that our society, if more supportive of women, if more developed in its ability to provide for the financial and emotional well-being of every pregnant woman, every mother and child, would demonstrate a collective responsibility for our children.

This is not a perfect world and in terms of recognizing our collective responsibility for children, it is unjustifiably far from being a perfect world.

When we talk of abortion, of the rights of the mother and the rights of the foetus, we must recognize that giving birth, creating life, is a unique occurrence in our lives and it creates equally unique emotional ties.

The relationship between a mother and child is one of dependancy. The child is dependant on the mother for life but the mother in turn is dependent on her child, on her immediate surroundings and on society at large for support. In turn, we in society are dependent on children. They are our future.

I believe that we as a society have failed to recognize our interdependency. Too often, women who have children bear the responsibility on their own. Single mothers still face emotional and financial hardship.

I do not believe that abortion is the answer. While I believe that we have a responsibility to protect the rights of the pregnant woman, I do not believe that open access to abortion is in the best interests of anyone in the long run.

I do not believe that this bill contributes in any positive way to addressing the problems that exist vis-à-vis the rights of women and society's interests in the protection of the foetus.

This bill is nothing close to what I feel would represent a compromise. The bill gives only the most empty recognition of society's interests in protecting the rights of the foetus. While recognizing that abortion is not condoned by society, it proceeds to negate this principle by allowing abortion at any stage of pregnancy.

This bill represents an amendment to the criminal code and yet the maximum sentence is two years. If the bill purports to see unjustified abortion as a crime, then I think higher possible sentences are necessary.

The bill also fails to make a distinction between illegal abortions performed by medical practitioners and non-licensed practitioners. I do not feel that the bill's provision for abortion to be performed on the determination of one medical doctor is sufficient for an objective determination. I believe that this bill's failure to define what is meant by health when determining a legal basis for abortion would have serious repercussions were it to become law.

I will not be supporting this bill. It gives no substantive recognition to the rights of the foetus and is therefore not an acceptable compromise.

The justice minister has said that while some amendments would be possible, amendments which would substantively alter the bill would not be welcome. If providing for the protection of the foetus can be seen to so alter this so-called compromise bill, then the government must admit that it has failed and it must find a workable bill.

I call upon this government to present a bill to the House which would truly strike a balance for the rights of women and the rights of the foetus. Hopefully, with amendments after second reading which address the main issue of the rights of the foetus to survive, the right to life of the foetus, I believe that possibly we could get a compromise in this House.

This bill goes nowhere toward giving that compromise and I cannot at this time, in any way, support it, though I will continue to look at the issue. I will continue to discuss with my colleagues on all sides of the House what they feel to be compromise solutions and what they feel can be done to this bill to make it more workable. Quite frankly, I do not see this bill as a compromise. I do not see it protecting the rights of the foetus. If it stays this way, if there are no changes after second reading, if this government is not willing to accept amendments then I will not support this bill on third reading.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this topic tonight with less enthusiasm than I have brought to any other duty that I have had as a minister or as a member of this House.

Like so many of my colleagues, I wish that this decision had been someone else's responsibility but it is not. This is an issue that has afforded me more personal anguish than any other debate in which I have participated in my five years in this House.

• (2000)

When the Supreme Court struck down the previous law on abortion almost two years ago, we tried here in this House to build a framework upon which society could arbitrate this clash of fundamental rights. We failed. Now we find ourselves facing this question again, and perhaps this is appropriate.

Thousands of Canadians each year face the dilemma of an unplanned pregnancy and for them it is not an issue that they can avoid, it is an immediate and a pressing problem.

In the last two years we have watched as private citizens found themselves before the courts of law and before a far more brutal court of public opinion and media exposure. It is hardly appropriate that we should stand by while young people confront an intrusive review of their personal lives and motivations when they seek to define their rights under the law.

Abortion has been an issue of debate in my riding through two national elections. Indeed, even in the election of 1988, when free trade filled the newspapers and the nightly news broadcasts in Hamilton, Stoney Creek, Grimsby and Lincoln, the issue I heard about most often at the front door of thousands of homes was abortion.

In those two national campaigns, while there was no clear consensus in my region, there were a number of points upon which my constituents clearly agreed. First among these was the clear message that abortion should not be considered as an alternative method of birth control.

Second, the role of a doctor was seen by most people as essential to ensure about the safe medical procedure and also a degree of professional counsel for the individual making this difficult decision.

Finally, the people of my region clearly believed that Parliament has a role, a duty to provide leadership and to attempt to fashion as best it could a compromise which respects the rights and the views of everyone concerned.

I believe that this bill meets these conditions and that the vast majority of people in the communities throughout my riding will agree that this bill is as good a compromise as could be created with the deeply divided environment which surrounds this discussion.

Clearly not everyone supports the concept of compromise. In the last few weeks we have heard many voices raised against this bill. Some pro-choice supporters, such as the New Democratic Party sitting opposite, will vote en bloc against this bill because it does not provide abortion on demand. The leader of the NDP has even suggested that the government should deny provinces funding for essential medical services unless they agree to guarantee the availability of abortion services.

On the other hand, there are voices arguing with great sincerity that the right to life is pre-eminent and that Parliament's paramount duty is to protect that right even when it collides with other rights. Is this an option open to us? Could Parliament move today to ban abortion altogether?

The judgment of the Supreme Court indicates clearly that to do so would be simply to invite another successful challenge under the Charter of Rights.

We should remember that in the landmark Morgentaler decision, Chief Justice Dickson wrote:

> Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term— is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus an infringement of the security of the person.

This government does not support or encourage abortion. Indeed, in this bill we will make it a criminal offence to perform an abortion except in the consideration of a threat to the health of a woman. We believe that a qualified medical practitioner is the appropriate person to judge this question and, in stating that, we put our trust in the ethics and judgment of the women and men of Canada's medical community.

My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in speaking to this bill made it clear that the government will redouble its effort to help Canadians avoid unplanned pregnancies and the agonizing choices that follow.

As a woman and as a mother, I know that women who choose to have an abortion do not make the decision lightly. In many cases, the individuals may feel that no alternative exists because of their economic or social situation. We owe it to these people to do whatever we can to help them avoid the problem in the first place and to provide all the possible alternatives to abortion in cases where unplanned pregnancies have occurred.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare mentioned some of these measures that are planned. They include increased research into family planning, including contraception, continued funding of Planned Parenthood of Canada and measures to encourage more pregnant women to consider adoption.

We must remember that young people in Canada today are exposed to a far more chaotic social environment than the one which most of the members in this House experienced. If we do not take steps as a society to provide greater stability and to support the individual, we can scarcely be surprised when that individual faces problems which might not occur if the educational, religious and family systems were all as effective as we would like them to be.

In two elections I told the people of my region that I did not believe in abortion as a method of birth control, but that I could not support legislation that took away the right of a woman or, where necessary, parents of an under-aged child to make a decision, no matter how painful, to end a pregnancy. This is a matter for a woman in consultation with her doctor and with the guidance of her God. This bill is consistent with that belief and I would urge the House to support it.

[Translation]

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, like all my colleagues in this House I have been flooded with letters and phone calls from my constituents. Admittedly, opinions are diametrically opposed on the issue of abortion. Some firmly believe that life begins at conception and have urged me to support a legislative measure which would be aimed at protecting the foetus right from the moment of conception. Others do not share that view. I respect the opinion of each individual.

I listened with interest to the remarks made on this subject by all Members of the House who have also heard from their constituents.

I recall the comments of the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration, the Member for Rimouski-Témiscouata, who told us about a family father who said he was in favour of this Bill but who, to his 13-year-old daughter who asked him what he would do if she came home pregnant, replied: If you chose to interrupt pregnancy we would take all available means. On the other hand, if you wished to keep the child we would want you to lead a normal and happy life and we would help you raise the child as if he or she were our own.

I should like to direct a question to Members of the House. If a young girl in such circumstances decided to interrupt pregnancy, would we be right to say that she is committing a crime? Are we justified to make a young girl of 13 or 14 a possible accomplice of a crime for having obtained an abortion if she does not meet the requirements of this legislation?

• (2010)

Because, if I am not mistaken, that is what could happen with the bill we are considering today.

Mr. Speaker, one of the principles of democratic societies is that the state should not tell everyone what to do. Therefore the state must allow every woman to choose freely according to her own philosophy or her own religious beliefs.

[English]

It has long been accepted in western society that individual rights are the basis of our concept of human dignity and liberal democracy. I voted for the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1981 because I believed that the courts had a role to play in defining the rights of Canadians and in setting limits to governmental action.

In the Morgentaler decision, Madam Justice Wilson puts it this way: "The rights guaranteed in the Charter erect around each individual, metaphorically speaking, an invisible fence over which the state will not be allowed to trespass. The role of the courts is to map out, piece by piece, the parameters of the fence".

Respect for individual decision-making in matters of fundamental personal importance is how Madam Justice Wilson summarizes the philosophy underlining the Charter and indeed our democratic traditions. She decides that these rights apply to women and, in particular, to a woman's decision to terminate a pregnancy.

She explains why only a woman can make this decision in language which I feel bears repeating in this House:

> This decision is one that will have profound psychological, economic and social consequences for the pregnant woman. The circumstances giving rise to it can be complex and varied and there may be, and usually are powerful considerations militating in opposite directions. It is a decision that deeply affects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision; it is a profound social and ethical one as well. Her response to it will be the response of the whole person.

I agree with Madam Justice Wilson that a woman's decision to terminate her pregnancy is a fundamental human right protected by the charter and by her democratic traditions. This bill denies this right and therefore I cannot support it.

Indeed, the bill makes abortion illegal. Rather than assuring access to safe abortion services throughout Canada, the government reduces access by threatening doctors with criminal action. It makes women possible accessories to a crime. It invites third party interventions. It fails to address prevention or unwanted pregnancies. It is a given that we all want to reduce the numbers of abortions but this bill will not reduce the numbers of abortion. Every year there are about 360,000 births and about 65,000 abortions in Canada. I do not think that any member of this House can seriously maintain that we can significantly reduce the number of abortions by prohibition or by criminalizing abortion. I would remind hon. members abortions are illegal in Ireland but that that country has one of the highest abortion rates in the world. To reduce the number of abortions we have to on the one hand reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies and on the other hand ensure that women who decide to carry their pregnancy to term know that they are doing so in a supportive environment.

The only effective tool for the prevention of unwanted pregnancies is education, particularly for our most vulnerable group, the young. As a society we must address prevention in an active fashion. We must increase education about responsible sexuality. We must increase the involvement of men in family planning and support continued research into acceptable and safe birth control measures for both men and women.

I certainly agree that the state has a legitimate interest in protecting potential children and members of society but this rings hollow when women cannot find adequate day care, when single parent women are among the poorest people in Canada and when one in six Canadian children is being raised in poverty.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words in connection with Bill C-43, an act with respect to abortion. It is a matter which is very controversial and very sensitive.

My own views on this subject are very well known indeed. As you may be aware, I was nominated to stand for Parliament back in 1982. I spent some two years going door to door in my constituency and at many of those doors I was asked the question where I stood on this issue. On each and every occasion I indicated that I stood on the pro-life side of the issue.

That was not the last time that my views were made known because during the last term of Parliament I frequently rose in this House and made statements on the subject, all of which reflected my own views and personal beliefs, that of a pro-life position. I might say that about a year ago, last Christmas, I was nominated by a well-known radio broadcaster in the city of Toronto as the creep of the year as a result of my pro-life position. I base my own position very clearly on what I think and believe are undisputed medical facts with respect to this matter.

First of all, as I understand it, and I do not believe it is disputed in any way medically or scientifically, immediately upon the union of a man's sperm with a woman's egg, that is fertilization, cellular development begins. Second, the sex is determined at the single cell stage by the X and Y chromosomes carried in the father's sperm cell. At the single cell stage the egg is alive and is human and has a sex, either male or female. It immediately begins the growth process which continues from then on until adulthood.

Third, in the first week the division of the cells continue. Next, after 18 days the heartbeat can be detected. At 30 days, the foundations of the brain, spinal cord, nerves and sense organs are complete. There are eyes, ears, a mouth, kidneys, a liver and blood circulation. At 43 days brain waves can be detected. At six weeks nerves and muscles begin working together, the skeleton is fully formed but made of cartilage. Lips become sensitive to the touch. At seven weeks all internal organs are present. The stomach produces digestive juices, the liver manufactures red blood cells, the kidneys eliminate uric acid from the blood; the legs, ankles and toes are formed.

• (2020)

At eight weeks, lines of the hands develop that will remain as a distinctive feature throughout the entire life of an individual. At eight and a half weeks, the child squints, the fingers close into a fist if the palm is touched.

At 10 weeks the thyroid and adrenalin glands function. At 12 weeks, the child kicks, turns his feet and curls and fans his toes, swallows, inhales, exhales, sucks its thumb. From 16 to 20 weeks hair grows on the head, eyebrows and eyelashes appear, the child sleeps and wakes and it can be roused from sleep by external noises. And from there on, as you are well aware, it continues to grow and to mature.

In addition to that, the medical profession is now able to operate on the brain and urinary tract of an unborn child and a foetus can be kept alive in a hospital outside the mother's womb just 26 weeks from conception. I do not believe that any of those facts are in dispute by anyone, whether a scientist or a member of this House. No matter what side he be on, I have never heard anyone dispute those facts. It is on that basis that I have come to my own position, a pro-life position.

What we have before us tonight, Bill C-43, is a bill that has been arrived at after an awful lot of discussion and an awful lot of debate. Mr. Speaker, you are aware as I am of a good deal of that debate.

For me, it began in the last term of Parliament. It was one that caused an awful lot of emotion and concern within the government caucus, it was one that was the subject of very lengthy debates. It was one that was subject not only to very lengthy debates but very emotional debates; debates in which each and every person on each and every conceivable side of this issue put their views very strongly, very firmly, very forcibly and very passionately.

It was not just within the government caucus. Certainly the same process took place within cabinet, within committees of caucus and within the caucus itself. Out of that has come this bill, Bill C-43.

There are certain aspects of this bill which I find appealing. This bill, for instance, makes the inducing of an abortion an offence under the Criminal Code. It also rejects the gestational approach to abortion and it recognizes implicitly, although not explicitly, the right to life from conception.

The problems that I have with this bill, as many other people have, is that unfortunately the bill's exemptions are far wider than I want. You know and I know and members of this House and the public know that the Prime Minister has said that in spite of their personal views all cabinet ministers must vote for this bill. I have wrestled with that issue very long and very hard. I spent a good many sleepless nights on this issue and I want to tell you I have not finished wrestling with it. I continue to wrestle with this issue.

I am one who believes that this bill needs quite a few amendments. Many have been suggested and I know that if and when it goes to committee there will be a number of amendments put forward.

There has been one in particular that I put forward the last time this matter was debated in this House in 1988. It has to do with the health care workers and a conscience clause for health care workers.

You may or may not remember that in the debate of 1988 on this subject, I indicated that I felt very strongly that any legislation with respect to abortion should include a conscience clause. That is a clause that would deal with the question of a health care worker's conscience. Many doctors, nurses and other health care workers firmly believe that in caring for pregnant women they actually have two patients, a mother and her unborn child. They do not want to participate in a procedure to terminate a pregnancy because it would conflict with their own moral beliefs and moral values.

There are many hospitals that recognize and respect those views of health care workers. The ones that do permit health care workers to arrange their assignments to exclude participation in abortion procedures. However, there is no legal obligation at the moment and, to the best of my knowledge, there never has been a legal obligation for a hospital not to discriminate against a health care worker who refuses to assist in an abortion.

That is not the case in other countries. In at least 44 states of the United States and in the United Kingdom there is such a conscience clause. It is written into the legislation to protect health care workers in this sort of a situation. Section 4 of the British Abortion Act of 1967 states:

> Subject to subsection (2) of this section, no person shall be under any duty, whether by contract or by any statutory or other legal requirement, to participate in any treatment authorized by this Act to which he has a conscientious objection:
> Provided that in any legal proceeding the burden of proof of conscientious objection shall rest on the person claiming to rely on it.

I fervently hope that if this bill is passed in principle on second reading that there will be opportunity for that sort of amendment to be put, passed and carried because there is real concern out there on the part of health care workers about this issue.

I notice that you are already indicating that my time is drawing nigh. I have two or three other points I would like to make, very briefly. I hope with your indulgence and the indulgence of the House I can do that.

In the first case, I want to say that in the short five years I have been in this House I have seen some spectacular things done in changing bills in committee. I have not been a member of too many legislative committees, but in the ones I have been a member of I have seen some really spectacular things done in the way of changes. One of them, the Shipping Conferences Act, I can remember was changed entirely. The whole concept changed entirely from the day it was introduced into this House until the day it came out of that committee and finally was passed, in an entirely different form than it went in.

I remember being a member of another legislative committee on amendments to the Criminal Code. At that time it was suggested we should add another amendment which would allow for the introduction of a new offence, war crimes. That was rejected by the Parliamentary committee. Shortly after, almost instantaneously, and before the Parliamentary committee reported, the Deschênsne Royal Commission was appointed and out of that came an amendment to the Criminal Code dealing with war crimes. So I do not believe that there are very many things that are not possible to be done in this House and to be done by a committee if there is goodwill on all sides.

I believe that at this stage, notwithstanding my views, it is premature for us to decide whether this bill is good, bad or indifferent. I believe that we should see what happens when it does go to committee. It may very well be that an entirely different bill will come out of committee.

The government has indicated that this may not be the case. But, who knows. I am one who believes there should be changes made. I fervently believe that there should be changes made in this Bill C–43. I fervently hope that we will see those changes made and amendments put at committee.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate, I think as all members do, taking this issue and this debate very seriously. It has meant a lot to many of us in our election campaigns, and much of the discussions that we have had with our constituents concerning Bill C–43, an act regarding abortion that the government has introduced. It deals with a very important issue that we take seriously, and I think I could speak for many members.

In our election campaigns, when we are asked for our stand and our position on abortion, probably most of us in this House take the time to let our constituents know exactly where we do stand. It is because we owe our constituents, on this very important issue, an opinion and advice so that they know, when they are voting for us or against us, where we stand on this issue.

I can safely say that I support my party's position on this legislation. It is the same as my own personal view when it comes to abortion. The debate has been led by our critic in this area, the member for New Westminster—Burnaby. As well, I had the opportunity to read the excellent speech made by our leader, the hon. member for Oshawa the other day.

Our party has been clear on its position. That does not always mean it has been an easy position to take, because for many people, this issue goes perhaps to the root of some of the many concerns that they have.

Let us take a look at the legislation that the government has introduced. What is Bill C–43? The bill is an amendment to the Criminal Code that prohibits abortion at all stages of pregnancy unless a doctor decides that the continuation of the pregnancy would threaten the woman's physical, psychological or mental health. Doctors can be charged with an indictable offence subject to the penalty of imprisonment for up to two years.

We have been told in this House that the cabinet must support the bill. We have had some ministers say they will hold on and see just exactly what is going to happen with the legislation.

Our party stands proudly on our position, a well thought out one I might add as well, because of the work done by our caucus, the people who work behind the scenes and our critic as well.

What does the bill do that we find offensive in not dealing with the issue? I think that is part of the context of the comments that I would like to make. What does this legislation not do?

First of all, the bill reduces access to abortion by threatening doctors with criminal penalties unless some vaguely defined health criteria are met. It really ignores the whole issue of unwanted pregnancies.

We on this side of the House have suggested that the Canada Health Act was supported by members on the other side, the government side. When that legislation was introduced in the House, you will remember, there was some discussion at that time whether the Conservative members would actually support that legislation.

I spent some time looking at what the Canada Health Act is not doing with this legislation. It is punitive legislation and it does not get at the root of the problem. What is there in the family planning unit within Health and Welfare Canada? One position. Funding to planned parenthood is being cut.

The way to deal with problems like abortion and not have the extremes of debate is to deal with it in a preventive way. How can we do that?

What we do not have in this legislation or other legislation that might be brought before the House are changes that through the Canada Health Act can become the vehicle by which the government can deal with the question of access to abortion. This is a very important question, not just for those members who represent large metropolitan areas like Toronto where if a woman has a need for an abortion, it might be available. But what about the communities across this country that do not have that access? It is easy for someone from Toronto to have that access, but much more difficult for a woman in Prince Edward Island.

Equal access is guaranteed or should be guaranteed to us under the Charter of Rights in our Canadian Constitution. What can the Canada Health Act do? What I would suggest is, as our leader has very clearly pointed out, use the measures in that legislation to ensure that women across the country have equal access to abortion, when necessary.

I come from a province where the premier is wont to shove his ideas down our throats. Yet you must balance that against some very informative and thoughtful speeches, not just in this House, but elsewhere. I am reminded of the speech made by the Governor of New York, Mario Cuomo, who had to debate the merits as a practising Catholic with what that meant to him as a legislator. I recommend that article. It is an important one because it debates the issue that we in this House must deal with now as we debate this legislation.

On health care planning right now, there is a need to have a major federal–provincial review to look at the kind of work that we can do in this country both between the federal government and the provinces to ensure that we can have proper family life programs.

Because I do not think he understands, I think we should get the premier of our province before a committee here so he can learn and try to understand some of the problems and difficulties that many women have across this country. I think there is an obligation on the part of the federal government to ensure that he does understand, and in that case the provincial government of B.C. would bring in the necessary legislation and rules to ensure that we do have equal access across not only our province but across the country.

This legislation, Bill C–43, is a set–back for the women of Canada. The government is suggesting to us that the bill is a compromise, that somehow government members have found a way to weave their way through the courts. I would suggest quite the opposite is going to happen. Perhaps there is some sinister scenario from the Prime Minister's office to introduce this legislation, in the hope that it will fail so then he can say that he attempted to deal with it but, of course, he will attempt to blame Parliament for not being able to pass this legislation.

When we do vote on this legislation at second reading we will see what support there is, if any, from the government members to ensure that this legislation is not passed because the bill is not going to help solve any of the problems we have with health care and with the unwanted pregnancies in Canada.

I want to just wrap up on what I think is a related issue. Our leader has recently been speaking about the incidence of child poverty in this country. I believe it is on the agenda to be debated tomorrow in this House. I think that is part of the package that we must look at and decide what we want to do. We must take a holistic approach to health care. This legislation is not that. We are not getting that from this government and we have many steps to go yet before we can see the kind of open and fair access to health services, including abortion, across this country that we need.

• (2040)

I know that this is not going to be the end of this debate in the House or throughout this country. We will be debating this for some time to come. That is our duty. That is why we have been elected.

I think all of us are taking this discussion and debate very seriously and we will certainly when we are back home in our ridings be explaining our position. That is our obligation. It is my obligation, I believe, given my own position and our party's position, to oppose this legislation.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, through you, I take this opportunity to address Canadians and my northern constituents of the Western Arctic. I speak to this issue after much deliberation, soul–searching and examination of the implications of Bill C–43.

I have been listening to the tortured reasoning and qualifications of many on why to support or vote against this bill. I am not a doctor or a lawyer. Those are not my orientations and I suppose in a sense that would be reason enough in many minds to disqualify much of what I would render as my position, but I say not.

This is not just a legal issue. It is indeed the most profound moral dilemma with which I have ever had to come to terms. This is not just a legal or a medical issue or strictly a woman's issue. This is a human issue with which we are all struggling.

How do I, as a woman of the eighties and nineties, young, and I guess by some standards, progressive, upwardly mobile and career oriented, approach this issue? I know that my first commitment to society as a person is truth and decency. I cannot be hypocritical to save face or to advance my personal political goals and aspirations. That in my mind would be deceitful. I have indeed struggled to find common ground and I have retreated to a place of truth for myself, who I am and what are the values and principles that guide me that I brought to this complex political process.

I am a woman, a mother of three wonderful people, a Dene from the Dene nation in the Northwest Territories, a member for the Western Arctic and, of course, a Canadian federal parliamentarian. All these roles bear each a certain responsibility, sometimes conflicting.

I would be dishonest to say that I could expound a profound legal sense of this issue but my greatest expertise in all these roles is not just being a woman or just being a Member of Parliament, but for 38 years of my life I have been, I was born a Dene and I will always be a Dene. I know in my mind and heart and for the sake of common decency what that means. I do not have to read or research that subject. I know what the issue of life means to those people, the Dene, my people. This is not to say that I do not want to represent or try not to represent the best that I can all the other people in my riding.

On this issue, this is a subject that I know well within the context of my own culture and my own people. It has been a profound guide in all of my struggles, joys, failures, successes and hardships. Rather than to speak of things I know not well, I will speak of how my views are certainly a reflection of the utmost importance given to life by my people. I know that that essentially overrides everything else.

My people are not dinosaurs ignoring life's problems. We understand change. We know not only change through a natural process but through imposition many times. We know that there are problems faced by many of our people. We understand disparity. We have understood that for hundreds of years, even thousands. We do not compartmentalize life just as it relates to people. Life is viewed in terms of who you are, what you believe and even how you relate to such issues as the land.

During the Berger inquiry of the early 1970s, Mr. Richard Nerysoo, now the Speaker of the Government of the Northwest Territories, said:

> It is very clear to me that it is an important and special thing to be an Indian.

He meant to be a Dene.

> Being an Indian means being able to understand and live with this world in a very special way. It means living with the land, with the animals, with the birds and the fish, as though they were your sisters and brothers. It means saying the land is an old friend, an old friend your father knew, your grandfather knew, indeed your people have always known—we see our land as much, much more than the white man sees it. To the Indian people our land really is our life. If our land is destroyed, we too are destroyed. If your people take our land you will be taking our life.

This is one statement of how much value life has even as it is expressed in the way life encompasses the land and what it means to our people and how valuable it is.

Where does the love of life, the joy of life, the sanctity of life, the reverence for life come from? How is it nurtured? There are enough theories, I suppose, but I venture to say as a student of my Dene elders that life is the most valuable gift we the Dene feel we are given.

I as a woman and we as women in my culture are viewed as the nurturers, the protectors, the bearers of a special gift called life and men, our companions, are bestowed the privilege of sharing in this experience. This may sound idyllic. However, it is our world view, it is our code of life.

This is not a newly found Christian ethic we have adopted. It is a world view that we have held to because our struggle for survival has been so severe and so harsh in many circumstances. We have faced rejection, alienation, colonialization, oppression and possible extermination beyond our control but we survived. Our people have been our greatest resource, our determination to hang on to life our greatest strength.

Listen to some of the views of my elders. They are far more eloquent on their views than I am. A lady by the name of Margaret Sabourin from Fort Providence says:

> When I married, my husband and I travelled far together by dogteam. We had two children and it was my greatest sadness when they died and no more children were born to us.

These people were constantly faced with tragic circumstances. Baptiste Gardan, another elder from the same community, said:

> My mother died when I was a baby and still nursing. How I used to cry for my mother's milk but my father couldn't do a thing about that. You couldn't buy milk then so I was given flour boiled in moose milk and marrow to suck on. I was so hungry I would cry all the time.

So much hardship to continue living. Elise Bonnetrouge, another woman, said:

> I never knew my father. He died when I was very young, leaving my mother to bring up my younger brother and me by herself. Then my brother died and my mother couldn't work any longer. There was only me to take care of her. As I held her, to change her bed of moss, she died in my arms. Now I was quite alone, without food and unable to fend for myself.

Maybe, just maybe because death was always such a close companion of my people, life was such a welcome friend.

The struggle of women in 1989 is not a new one. You have to listen to the words of women from my culture who are older women, the elderly women. Elise Gargan of Fort Providence said:

> Life was especially hard for the women. When the man is away the woman has to feed the children. No matter how cold it was I had to check the snares. Before I left the children, I had to tie a leather thong around the waist of one and tie the end to something stable, put another in the swing cradle, and leave the eldest to watch them all. That's how we used to live. The low points in my life were hunger and sickness. We didn't know how to help each other when there was sickness and there was no doctor. Sometimes we boiled herbs, sometimes just thinking of getting better helps you overcome. When you're out in the bush you sometimes experience real physical pain. It was especially difficult giving birth. Sometimes you don't know what you have to do. You are very thankful if your child is alive.

So few resources, so few options, so much hunger and sickness. How did the temptation to give up escape these people? How did they manage for generations to pass on this value placed on life?

• (2050)

It may be that when your constant companion is despair and uncertainty, the will to live and cherish life is much greater. Another aspect may be the enormous individual and collective losses my people experienced during epidemics and even the experience of harsh circumstances during childbirth. Adeline Constant of Fort Providence says:

> After I was married I had fifteen children. I have only five boys and two girls left to me now. The worst time in my life was when I came close to death. I was with child and went out to check my snares. I became ill and my baby was born dead on the trail. All my children were born on the land except one who was born in the mission.

Now having heard all that, I am sure people are saying, "Come on, wake up, it is 1989 and we all have to move on". Well, my people have moved on. These people have moved on but they have not left their minds, their hearts, their souls and their value for life behind. Their value for life is intact.

I know skeptics and critics will say, "What about the number of abortions being procured by young native women in the north?" I say, "What about all the other social maladies that also exist?" Those statistics are a huge indication of how much work we have to do.

We are not going to be excused from dealing with these problems just by passing legislation. This will not deal with the problems that face men, women and children in dire straits who need our help. We need action from the powers that be to make changes, to put forth the resources and the political will behind programs and policies to aid those that are in need.

Mr. Speaker, I say, through you, to my fellow Canadians: Dear Canada, we have a huge problem, a complex, divisive problem, one that great minds, hearts and souls have struggled over, legal minds have tangled over, and more experienced and talented politicians have debated. Such wisdom and eloquence, and yet no resolution, no consensus.

This human issue of life is more than just that, it is indeed a social dilemma that has virtually stumped the political process and all that engage in it. It is the debate of our very essence, I believe, maybe even our very existence. We have come closer to accepting our differences but no closer to altering or breaching the values and principles that guide us in our work and our lives.

It is extremely naive to think that we do not bring any bias to the process and that we have come unfettered by our experiences, our education, our close human associations and relationships, our distinct cultural ties. We are all different and the agony of each person is to find a balance that we can live with as being fair.

We are essentially forced into a corner, not just by the current legislation but the issue itself and the demands of the public. I can only say that we have to demonstrate courage to express our position.

My position is one for life. I choose life. I do not belong to the pro–life movement, but I belong to a people who believe that life is sacred and always have under the harshest of circumstances.

I also believe in people who are willing to take the unwanted; I believe in the people who adopt. I am an adopted child. I celebrate my mother and I am the oldest of 15 children. I celebrate my mother because she brought 15 of us into this world, under the harshest of circumstances, with great poverty and difficulty. I celebrate my aunt, my stepbrothers, and my stepsisters because they adopted me. I am a wanted person and I think I have given back to those people what they have invested in me.

I celebrate my people because they are willing to share and they are willing to value a human life and to give it a chance to grow and to nurture it. I celebrate the people who put me here, who have entrusted their votes to me, and I hope that I can, and more than on just this issue, represent them as fairly as I can. But this is indeed a huge dilemma for me and I have struggled with this as many of you have.

We, as parliamentarians and Canadians, have been faced in the past with the consequences of faulty legislation that excludes the rights, ignores the rights and even erodes the rights of groups and individuals, victimizing people who need representation. I cannot support this legislation, such as it is. I cannot take the chance of having this legislation pass. I will vote against it. But I can tell you once more, that for my people, children are important, people are important, and life is the most valuable gift you are given.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my personal concern about abortion, as a member of Parliament, dates back to May 29, 1980, when I raised in this House my concern about Dr. Morgentaler opening up an abortion clinic in Champlain, Montreal, and my disappointment as a politician that the federal government could not do anything to close the clinics. The Minister of Justice at the time said this was a provincial matter and it would be up to the police of Quebec to lay the charges. Well, we know what has happened since 1980.

My question is, will Bill C-43 respecting abortion stop the Morgentalers of this country. If it will not, then I say no to this bill.

Why was I so concerned about the Morgentaler abortions and others? Abortion kills a defenceless human being. The unborn child is a human being and as such is entitled to the full protection of the law of the land for all human beings.

The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops made an excellent statement on the sanctity of life in their response to the Law Reform Commission Working Paper on Crimes against the Foetus. They said that all human life must be valued, respected and protected, from conception until natural death. All human life, without exception, is sacred, irreplaceable and inherently worthy of protection and respect.

I would like to quote our own Prime Minister and his position on the sanctity of life. He said in this House:

> It is wrong to take life. I can think of no circumstances except self-defence to justify it—we hold for the sanctity of life— But for all else who uphold one simple principle: the inherent dignity of a human being, the inherent worth of human life. I will resist with all my strength, all of my life, any action that would diminish that reality and would lessen value.

If you believe in a principle, that principle should hold whether we are participating in a debate on capital punishment or on abortion. I campaigned as a pro-life candidate in the last election, but I promised my constituents that regardless of my personal beliefs, I would try to reflect their views, their wishes in this Parliament.

I did an extensive poll on the issue of abortion, whether we need a bill at all, and other related issues. I would like to place on the record in this House some of the findings that I received from my constituents of Parkdale—High Park.

To the basic question, do you feel there is a need for an abortion law in Canada, I did not get any clear direction even to that basic question, as 50.6 per cent said yes, 44.2 per cent said no, and 5.2 per cent had no opinion.

To the question, would you feel comfortable with an abortion law that would allow for abortions only under certain circumstances, here also there was no consensus; 50 per cent said yes; 47.4 per cent said no.

To the question, should any of the following circumstances be included in a law: rape or incest; women's health threatened by pregnancy; women's safety threatened by father; within 12 weeks of conception; child raised in dangerous environment; within 22 weeks of conception, the responses here ranged anywhere from 10 to 24 per cent. Again, there was no clear direction.

• (2100)

In response to the question "Do you feel an abortion law should treat abortion as a criminal offence", I did get direction because 60.3 per cent said no to this question. In other words, 60.3 per cent feel that having an abortion should not be a criminal offence. So if I want to reflect the wishes of my constituents on this bill I would have to vote no. Some 36.4 per cent said yes.

To the question "Should the decision for an abortion be made by the woman and a doctor", which is what this bill says, 30.2 per cent responded in favour. Again, if I were to reflect their wishes in this Parliament, I would have to vote no to the bill. Some 47.6 per cent indicated that the decision for an abortion should be made by the woman acting alone. Only 12.5 per cent said that it should be made by the woman and father.

The comments that people gave me also covered the whole of the spectrum on this issue. A constituent wrote:

> While I personally believe in rights for the foetus, I don't believe I have the right to inflict my views and beliefs on someone else. If a woman is going to get an abortion she is probably going to get it somehow or other, so why make it difficult or unsafe or illegal? Let each decide what is right for their conscience.

On the other end of the spectrum a constituent writes:

> A civilized society does not kill one individual to alleviate another's problems. Canada must have a new law against abortion which will protect unborn children from conception to birth.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare said in his remarks in this debate:

> We have been elected by Canadians to choose the course which best balances the rights of everyone concerned.

Well, Mr. Minister, the rights of everyone concerned must also include those who cannot speak for themselves. The weakness of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms entrenched in the Canadian Constitution is that it does not include protection for the unborn.

I would like to pay tribute tonight to the late Dr. Stanley Hudecki who voted against the Constitution of Canada because it did not have that protection of the unborn built into it.

Many members in this debate used the excuse that because we do not live in an ideal world this bill is the best compromise and they will support it. We are the leaders of this great country. We are the guardians of this planet. If it is not an ideal world, then for heaven's sake is it not our role as legislators to bring in legislation to make this world as close as possible to the ideal world instead of destroying it even more? Again, if we are talking about an ideal world or something close to it, let us build in protection for all minorities including the unborn.

Canada should receive an additional 425,000 children each year. It receives only 360,000 because over 65,000 are aborted each year. What a stigma for a country, one that I am not proud of.

Recently the Prime Minister announced the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies. What he should have established was a royal commission on why so many young mothers see abortion as the only solution to unwanted pregnancies.

Is it because of the lack of child care services and that women are afraid there will be no one to raise the child while they are out working? Or, is it because they are afraid to be caught in a poverty trap? Maybe it is time in our society for our politicians to think more creatively. For example, why can we not guarantee mothers of first and second born children a two-year paid maternity leave?

The Prime Minister should strike a royal commission that would provide recommendations to make adoption more appealing as an alternative to abortion. At present it takes five years to adopt a young child through government sponsored agencies. It takes only three months to adopt through questionable private agencies, and I say questionable because a young couple has to pay an average of $20,000 to adopt a young child. By aborting over 65,000 foetuses each year our society has created a supply management problem on the lives of adoptive children. Bill C-43 will keep the supply of adoptive children down so that the questionable adoption agencies can increase the price per head. That is not my idea of a just society.

To answer the debaters who argue that it is better to abort than have an unwanted child, I say nonsense. Thousands of couples are waiting to become parents through adoption. They will provide the shelter, the love, the security and the education that all children need. I speak as an adoptive parent. I am always reminded that if our daughter's mother would have believed in abortion we would not have Elaine today, a daughter who brings so much love and happiness to the whole family.

I would like to end by asking all hon. members a simple question: How many of us would be here today debating this bill if our mothers believed in abortion?

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address my comments to the legislation before us, Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion. It is not my usual habit to speak from notes, but since this is a very contentious bill and one in which there are subtleties of expression, I have written notes and I wish to refer to them so as not to have my meaning mistaken.

I must say that after only one year in this House I have not found any debate more stimulating than this one on the long awaited subject of abortion. I have found it stimulating because I recognize that more than usual, as each member speaks for him or herself, the truth about who they are as individuals in this place is revealed. It is a very emotional debate reflecting the seriousness of the matter for individual members and their constituents. Elections can be and were won and lost on this issue alone. However, it is also a fact that lives of future

Canadians and lives of mothers are nurtured or lost according to the decisions of this House.

From the outset I want to state clearly that I will be voting against this bill. I will express my reasons why, but first I would like to say that in my conscience I feel confident and totally at ease with my decision concerning this bill.

In fact, I will have to say that it was not a decision that I anguished over for I have addressed this issue and debated it for many years. That long period of discussion and reflection, which was entered into with close friends who fell on both sides of the issue, helped me to clarify and consolidate my views on abortion. I am grateful to my friends, whatever their point of view, for they cared enough about me to discuss this highly sensitive and personal issue with me. I count them all among my friends as I appreciate that each of them holds his or her own position sincerely and thoughtfully from a unique life experience as do I.

Among this group of friends, none like abortion, none are anti-life, none regard this to be a trivial issue whether they fall on one side of the issue or the other.

I mention the ease with which I come to my decision on this bill and some of my background because I have noticed considerable anguish and distress among anti-abortion colleagues on the government side who hold positions similar to mine but who feel compelled to vote in favour of this most unsatisfactory abortion legislation.

I am pleased that in this House, where each member is supposed to vote according to his or her own best judgment on this bill, I indeed can do so and am not coerced into doing otherwise. I must also say that no amount of party coercion on this issue or lobbying from the extremes of the Campaign Life Coalition or CARAL would convince me to subvert my principles in this matter.

I wish to speak to the substance of this bill, or rather the lack thereof, which causes me to express my opposition.

I believe that currently we are living in this country without any legislation in an environment of non-legal abortion on demand. This bill, if passed, would alter the situation only slightly creating an environment of legal abortion on demand with the proviso that a medical doctor would be available to perform the abortion procedure and would agree that a woman's physical, mental or psychological health was threatened.

The legislation has advantages for those supporting a pro-choice point of view. The definition of health in this legislation is so vague that I believe prosecution against a specific case would be next to impossible unless there was a gross negligence on the part of the presiding doctor. However, it also encourages women to lie to their doctor in order to easily fit the health definition and thus procure an abortion.

The legislation does not require abortion to be performed in a hospital which would ease the responsibility of provinces of having to provide pro-life taxpayers' dollars to support abortion facilities and procedures. It is not inconceivable that under this legislation abortion clinics would spring up in communities across the country where same day service from health assessment to completed abortion could be performed.

To the disadvantage of the pro-choice advocates it does not entirely leave choice in the hands of a pregnant woman but is dependent upon a medical practitioner's discretion which would be subject to the same variety of moral principles which we hear expressed in this House.

I would like to address more particularly why I will not support this legislation, which has more to do with what is left out than what is in the legislation. First, I believe that human life begins before a foetus is born alive and that every foetus has rights, especially the basic right to life.

Given the recent Supreme Court decision in the Chantal Daigle case, I believe it is incumbent upon this House now to express foetal rights in our Constitution and Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is beyond my intellectual capacity to discern at what point in time foetal life becomes more important, more sacred. Is it conception, four weeks after conception, four months after, or five minutes before live birth?

I am a fortunate, happy mother of three of my own healthy children. As a nurse I have personally witnessed the miracle of life and the loss of that life at most stages of pregnancy. I have watched the anguish of parents when spontaneous abortion has occurred at many stages. You will not convince an anguished parent who has lost a foetal infant life through spontaneous abortion that that was not a human being.

Because I believe in and try to live in the spiritual, sacred, mystery side of life, in my intellectual weakness I submit to the view that it is probable that the sacredness of life begins at conception. Therefore, I cannot accept abortion at any stage of life from conception onward.

On the other hand, through my personal medical experiences as a nurse on hospital wards or in public health among the poor, through my years of work among the poorest of the poor in the Third World, through my conversations and dialogue with friends on this issue of abortion, and then my own associations and experiences in my community, I recognize that there are many relevant, serious, socio-economic reasons why women seek abortions. I realize that many women, including young girls and middle aged women, feel that they have no choice for socio-economic reasons but to have an abortion. They have a sense of desperation, isolation and hopelessness in the face of an unplanned pregnancy. This legislation does nothing to change these circumstances.

I believe that any legislation which proposes to criminalize abortion and impose a penalty for illegal abortion must be supported by companion legislation which would address the major socio-economic reasons now have for seeking abortion. However, I also believe that that companion socio-economic legislation on its own would not meet all the needs. Society, communities, those who care about foetal life, must voluntarily reach out to support and sustain women through their pregnancies and be prepared to assist women and their children after birth to achieve the fullness of life.

Communities must work together to help pregnant women and young girls with life supportive counselling, group homes, family planning education, and other support services. These initiatives are beginning to spring up in my riding of Northumberland but to date are far too few to meet the need if this legislation or amended legislation were to be enacted.

To reiterate, abortion legislation is unacceptable without companion legislation which would assure women and children the minimum resources to assure each a full and meaningful life. To date in this country we lack adequate housing and adequate child care. Our social programs legislate against the independence of single women with children against the working poor. One million children live below the poverty line in this country to the sorrow and despair of thousands of Canadian parents. This abortion legislation does not address any of these problems. Many women seeking abortion are blinded in their decision making by the reality of these circumstances.

Until we have legislation in this country and community services which meet basic needs, you cannot convince me that this abortion legislation is in any way adequate to reduce abortion and protect foetal life. It legislates a penalty against many living in socio-economic distress.

Even if amended to severely restrict the health definition permitting abortion, I would not be satisfied for I believe that once this government has dealt with abortion through this bill, if passed it will have "done abortion", so to speak, and will be deaf to any further legislation which would reduce the incidence of abortion, especially if it were to involve any budgetary expense or priority readjustment. This government is free market driven with debt reductions, not human lives as a priority.

In conclusion, I reiterate that I do not want any abortion in this country. Bill C-43 as it now stands does nothing in my opinion to protect foetal life. Even if amended to restrict the health definition, it will not address the underlying causes of abortion in this country. Any abortion legislation must have companion legislation to support pregnant women and their children. I dedicate myself in this House to do all I can to encourage the enactment of that companion legislation.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to stand here tonight and take part in this debate. Many of the people in this House are lawyers and many are doctors. When speaking to the member for St. Catharines who is a lawyer and the member for Delta who happens to be a medical doctor, I mentioned my sense of inadequacy in addressing this issue. They were quick to point out that some of the best and most emotional speeches in this House, with feelings of real concern, came from those individuals who do not have technical skill in this area.

I believe that we are all here for a purpose, and that is to create a better Canada, a better nation. As candidates many of us took positions on abortion to get us to this House, in a sense, so that people knew what we were all about before we were elected. I think that we must honour our own positions on an issue like abortion.

I am often reminded of my own words in this regard. I normally do not quote myself but in this particular case I will. My statement on abortion is as simple as this:

> I am opposed to abortion except in cases where the life of the mother is clearly endangered—further I will support all legislation that protects the life of the unborn child.

I will not deviate from that position. I am comfortable with that position.

• (2120)

I think we have to remind Canadians of what exactly is in Bill C–43 which we are debating here this evening. I am going to read part of that bill to remind Canadians of the exact wording of it. It reads in part:

> Every person who induces an abortion on a female person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that, if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened.

I am not entirely comfortable with the words "likely to be threatened", because I think the lack of a clear definition leaves the door open in this particular case. I refer back to my own words in 1988 "except in cases where the life of the mother is clearly endangered". I believe that we are living in a compassionate society which has to look after those who are not fortunate enough to look after themselves.

I would like to quote a very famous American politician who is no longer with us. Hubert Humphrey is an individual who many Canadians came to know, and he had this to say about society and civilization:

> The true test of civilization is how society treats those in the dawn of life, the margins of life, the twilight of life.

That is very true. A civilized society can be judged on how it treats it most defenceless members. I believe that the foetus is exactly that, a defenceless member of our society.

I am going to go through a crash course in foetology, the study of the unborn child or foetus. This has become one of the fastest growing and most promising fields in medicine.

New techniques and sophisticated instruments have given us a new view into the previously hidden world of the unborn child. We can watch the child developing, moving, touching and responding. When ill, in some cases the the unborn child has been diagnosed, treated and cured within the womb.

I will point out some of the highlights of progression toward human life from conception. When the sperm and ovum unite in fertilization genetic make–up is complete and a unique individual comes into existence.

At 18 days the heartbeat can be detected. At 30 days foundations of brain, spinal cord, nerves and sense organs are complete. The new human being has eyes, ears, a mouth, kidneys, a liver and blood circulation although the mother may not yet know that she is pregnant. At 43 days brain waves can be detected.

At six weeks nerves and muscles begin working together, the skeleton is fully formed but made of cartilage, lips become sensitive to touch. At seven weeks all internal organs are present, the stomach producers digestive juices, the liver manufactures red blood cells, the kidneys eliminate uric acid from the blood, and legs, ankles and toes are formed. At the end of eight weeks lines of the hands develop and will remain a distinctive feature of the individual throughout life. At eight and a half weeks the child squints and the fingers close into a fist if the palm is touched. At ten weeks the thyroid and adrenalin glands function. At twelve weeks the child kicks, turns his feet and curls and fans his toes, swallows and drinks fluid, inhales and exhales and sucks his thumb. At 16 to 20 weeks hair grows on the head, eyebrows and eyelashes appear, the child sleeps and wakes and he can be aroused from sleep by external noises. As the basic structure of the human being has been in place for some time, all the unborn child now needs is time to grow.

I think we have to allow that foetus to grow and we as parliamentarians have to take the high road. It may, in the minds of some, be a difficult road, but I believe that we as parliamentarians have to recognize that life begins at conception and we have to enshrine that into our Charter of Rights.

In 1987 when the member for Grey–Simcoe brought forward a motion setting out the idea that life did begin at conception it came very close to being supported. The motion was lost by a vote of 62 in favour to 89 against, a difference of only 27 votes.

That motion brought forward on June 7, 1987, is I believe the approach that we have to take if we are in fact concerned about the foetus and the life of a foetus. It has to go right back to the Constitution Act of 1982.

That motion stated:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of amending the Constitution Act, 1982, to include unborn human persons, and that the Governor General issue a Proclamation under the Great Seal of Canada to amend section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights so that it reads as follows;
>
> "7. Everyone including a human foetus or unborn being has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice."

I believe that is the direction in which we have to go.

I believe that only when speaking to a child can one really grasp the abortion issue. It brings it down to a very fundamental and very human level when you are speaking to an eight–year old child. My son, Christian, who is eight years old, one night asked me: "Dad, what is abortion?". Never in my life have I had more difficulty explaining anything to anyone than I did that particular evening in attempting to explain to an eight–year–old child what abortion is. You are constantly grasping for the right words, words that are soft enough to explain to an eight–year–old child exactly what abortion is and exactly what the outcome of abortion is.

Abortion is death. It is as simple and fundamental as that. It is a word that we hate to use but that is exactly what it is. I do not believe that as parliamentarians we can compromise human life and I believe that that is exactly what this bill does, it compromises human life.

In conclusion, I would like to go back to my opening statement, the statement on which I stand, that is:

> I am opposed to abortion except in cases where the life of the mother is clearly endangered—
> —further I will support all legislation that protects the life of the unborn child.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order made on Monday, November 20, 1989, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time. Therefore the question is that this House do now adjourn.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, recently I asked the Minister of Finance about the effect of the proposed goods and services tax on the cost of health care in this country, specifically dealing with physicians' costs. The minister replied that there would be no negative effects on medicare because health care is within the so–called tax exempt category of the goods and services tax.

• (2130)

I rise today to clarify in the House and for the Canadian people what this government promises to do to health care in the name of good management. My remarks are generally applicable to all members of what is commonly called the "MUSH" sector, meaning, municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals, all of which will be in the tax exempt category under the goods and services tax proposal.

MUSH turns out to be a very appropriate acronym for this part of the GST because no one is quite sure what the government is proposing. We know one thing for certain. The Minister of Finance promised to the Canadian Hospital Association last January that under the national sales tax, hospitals would not bear a greater tax burden than they would under the existing tax system.

Unfortunately, given the other broken promises of the minister, revenue neutrality, simplicity, fairness, co–operation with the provinces, all promises he made with regard to the goods and services tax and all broken promises, no one is holding their breath for the fulfillment of this promise either.

Tax exempt is supposed to mean that no one in this class pays more tax after the goods and services tax is instituted than before. But this is very misleading in the health care sector, although some system will be put into place to reimburse health sector organizations for their additional taxes paid on supplies and services purchased by the organization. There will be no mechanism in place to reimburse higher costs faced by these institutions which are a direct result of the goods and services tax.

Some of these higher costs facing hospitals, for example, will be administrative costs of determining what amount of tax should be reimbursed. Because some hospital purchases will be tax free, such as groceries, prescription drugs and some medical devices, not all non-labour expenses of hospitals can be used in calculating the tax paid. There must be a separate accounting of each item in order to determine whether it qualifies for the federal refund. Consequently, the administrative costs to each hospital will be increased.

Cash flow problems and lost interest will also be an added cost. A study prepared by the Canadian Hospital Association calculates that even at a rate of 8 per cent GST, that is 1 per cent lower than the proposed tax, hospitals will face increased costs of up to $2,000 per bed per annum or $356 million for health care facilities considered as a whole. This means that there will be enormous sums of money remitted to the government with probable delays of anything up to six months or perhaps even longer before refunds come back. Hospitals will be required to pay the carrying costs of such a loan to the government and absorb the interest costs.

In addition, inflationary effects on wage bills will have an impact on hospitals also. The largest expenditure in health care is for wages. The Minister of Finance has projected inflation of close to 3 per cent as a result of the goods and services tax, although many other economists expect it to be at least twice as high as that.

Unionized workers have quite reasonably given notice that they do not intend to allow their incomes to be eroded by this inflationary impact and will bargain for wage packages to make up the difference. This will result in enormous cost increases to hospitals and to other health employers.

We can see that the financial base of tax exempt institutions will be eroded by the goods and services tax. Other sectors of the health care system will also be adversely affected. Doctors will be facing higher input costs as well in terms of staff wages, rent and insurance costs, for example. In order to maintain their incomes, the Canadian Medical Association has given notice that it will be bargaining for higher fee scales from the provinces in order to compensate for this lost income as a result of the goods and services tax.

Other health care providers who are not insured by provincial plans will also be negatively affected. Such practitioners as psychologists, dietitians, audiologists, family counsellors, speech therapists and physiotherapists who are not insured under their provincial plans will see the cost of their services rise by the full 9 per cent. This sector is completely ignored by the so-called tax exempt provisions.

Every major study of health care in the past 10 years has emphasized the need to use alternative health care providers in the system, such as those I have just mentioned. There has also been an emphasis on the need to provide better out-patient facilities and nursing homes in these studies. However, all private providers of these services will also face 9 per cent increases in their costs, and consequently those who are purchasing those services will be faced with a 9 per cent increase in price.

All of these increases must be absorbed by the consumer. Higher health care costs for hospitals will mean that taxpayers must pay higher provincial taxes to make up the differences or the province's deficits will increase. This is doubly likely, given the huge cuts to Established Programs Financing made by this government and the further cuts to this program covering health and education under Bill C-33, which is presently before the House.

I would like to quote from the Canadian Medical Association statement regarding the goods and services tax and the problems it will create for health care. The treasurer, Dr. Railton, when testifying before the House of Commons Finance Committee stated:

> While it is impossible to calculate precisely how much, there is little doubt that the goods and services tax will increase the cost of operating hospitals and nursing homes—especially those operating privately. The GST will also increase the costs of community support programs, like homemaker services, that allow patients to be cared for at home rather than in the more costly health institution.

They also pointed out the impact of the cuts under Bill C-33 and by combining those two together felt that the government was creating severe problems for the health care system.

This government is putting Canada's health and education system into a vice. On the one side are the higher costs imposed by the goods and services tax as I have outlined. On the other side is the slashing of revenue from cuts to Established Programs Financing.

The total cuts to EPF over the next nine years for health and education will be $24 billion. That is $24 billion that will be taken out of the system which but for the government's Bill C-33 would have been available to the provinces for health and education.

This is a truly staggering figure, and if we add this to the impact of the goods and services tax we have a serious situation for our hospitals as well as our education institutions and our urban and rural municipalities.

We do not yet know the full impact the goods and services tax will have on costs in hospitals, but given the wide disparity between government projections and reality we can be sure that they are going to be enormous.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe contrary to the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing that implementation of the GST will work to ensure the future of Canada's health care system rather than adversely affect it. First, by providing the government with a stable source of revenue, the GST will help to ensure that we can continue to pay for valued programs including many of the services under our health care system.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member might refer to the GST technical paper and read pages 85, 86, 87 and 138, among others, where he would find answers to his questions.

Mr. Speaker, a wide array of health care services have been exempted so that Canadians may find effective alternatives to hospital care which will enable patients to remain at home. Just to name a few, they include mobile canteens, home nursing care, and non-profit homemaking services.

Allow me to say a few words about services offered by health care professionals. Among other things, in its June 1987 White Paper on Tax Reform the government recommended that health care services be exempted, provided they are covered under provincial health care programs.

Mr. Speaker, in consultations with health care professionals after the release of the white paper, the government was warned against the problems which might come up if indeed health care services covered under health insurance plans were to be exempted. The result might be unequal tax treatment of health care services available in various provinces.

So, Mr. Speaker, in the GST technical paper released last summer—I am showing it to you so you might have a look at it—the government set forth a number of criteria aimed at enlarging the scope of exemptions in the health care field. In accordance with the revised version, services provided by health care professionals will be GST-exempt if such services are covered under the health insurance plans of at least two provinces.

Mr. Speaker, what this means is that such health care professionals as chiropractors, optometrists and dental surgeons— once again, we can see on page 88— the Hon. Member refered to physiotherapists, they too are exempted. I just want to name a few, they will not have to add the GST when they bill their patients.

Mr. Speaker, in summary, I can say without hesitation that our commitment to health care plans is clear. We have established a system of exemptions for health care plans that is as wide as possible and we have also taken measures to offer health institutions like hospitals and extended care homes significant rebates on the GST they will have to pay on their purchases.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude by reminding the hon. member that I attended the latest health ministers' conference as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I can tell you that the federal and provincial governments find themselves far short of the resources they require to meet the tremendous needs in the country for health care. It would take what the government pays for the debt plus the present equalization payments to the provinces for health care to deal adequately with all health problems.

In this past decade, we have seen dehospitalization. This was meant to make health care services more humane, except that, with the way life is today, there are fewer families that can provide care and those that do have difficulty because the needs are great and their resources are slim. So I understand very well what the Hon. Member wants to tell us, Mr. Speaker. We also share these concerns, but I can assure you that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has seen to it that the GST legislation will not only guarantee health care but provide more money to invest in this whole area which needs more financial resources all the time.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, when I rose in the House on November 1 this year, my question for the Minister of State (Agriculture) concerned dairy producers who were worried about the GATT talks, following the yogurt and ice cream decision which goes against their interests and might jeopardize the existence of our marketing boards.

Tuesday, farmers came to demonstrate on Parliament Hill, to tell the government that Québec agriculture faces an uncertain future, and I showed my support for the farmers by taking part in their demonstration. Unfortunately, the situation remains confused, and Canadian producers feel more threatened than ever. As we know, the GATT Council examined the report of the special GATT panel on ice cream and yogurt on November 7 and decided to postpone any decisions until December 5.

This is a faint but encouraging signal that shows how complex the decision is and also that the problem is taken very seriously by all concerned. By postponing its decision, GATT has shown it acknowledges the merits of the Canadian Government's position and wants to take enough time to reach the best possible decision. As you know, Canada has now had a supply management program for its dairy sector for over 20 years, and the dairy industry has become a key sector of our economy. It generates farm income totalling over $4 billion, and it is estimated that the total value of dairy products represents $7 billion annually. Supply management in the dairy sector has helped develop a downstream processing industry that complements and supports a primary production sector that relies on a complex system of quotas based on supply and demand, on a pricing formula based on production cost, enhanced productivity and import restrictions, all of which has promoted income stability on dairy farms and helped many farmers and their families meet the challenges of modern agriculture. Maintaining supply management is no longer the economic option it was when it was introduced. It has now become a political and social option.

As stated by the three federal ministers responsible for this area in a circular addressed to Canada's milk producers, and I quote: "Canada's supply management system is not for sale and is not negotiable. We will not abandon a system that is acknowledged and respected by all our foreign trading partners, because it is an essential component of our long-term agricultural policy". That says it all, but unfortunately for all parties involved in the dairy sector: governments, producers and processors, the situation that has developed as a result of the Free Trade Agreement, the recent GATT negotiations, and the subsidy war between the European Economic Community and the United States has emphasized the need for a thorough reform of our agricultural programs. However, what first appeared to be a welcome improvement for the world's agricultural economy has now apparently created a controversy among the various trading partners.

If our dairy supply management system is to operate properly, we must closely monitor imports of dairy products, otherwise we are no longer talking about supply management. GATT Article 11, and this is entirely legitimate, authorizes countries that manage the supply of certain agricultural products to restrict entry of similar products that would otherwise prevent the proper functioning of the supply management system.

During the FTA negotiations, Canada added ice cream and yogurt to the list of controlled imports. This decision was intended to provide more protection for the dairy sector, as authorized by GATT. We should add that the government was also responding to the expectations of Canadian dairy producers who had exerted enormous pressure to have these two products protected as well. However, the U.S. reaction was soon in coming. In December 1988, they filed a

It should be noted that the Americans are not singling Canada out. They previously used the same remedy against other countries, including Japan. But the basic question is rather simple—why? Why, in this era of free trade, are there so many jolts, so much uncertainty? How is it possible that simple farm products like yogurt and ice cream lead to a situation that becomes a Gordian knot?

The GATT panel that examined Canadian restrictions to ice cream and yogurt imports favoured the Americans, but it also recognized that the requirements of Article 11 of the GATT, as interpreted by the panel, are difficult to adhere to. Article 11 leaves too much to the interpretation as to what a like product is, as to the need to restrict quantities, and as to the form a like product may take.

The Canadian Government is sticking to its position of maintaining a recognized goal, which is the establishment of a set of rules that are clear, fair, workable and acceptable by all parties, namely producers and Canada's trading partners.

For the time being, nothing comes out of this except this government's renewed faith in marketing boards. And also that, for the first time in Canadian history, a Prime Minister and his two ministers responsible for Agriculture, as well as his Minister of International Trade met with the president of Union des producteurs agricoles and its executive and some producers. This is a signal indeed that this government is going in the right direction and wants indeed to protect the industry.

International Trade spokesmen will have to become aware of Québec realities during the GATT negotiations, and I demand that we have French-speaking negotiators from Québec at the table.

Our joint schemes, our marketing boards and our quotas must be 100 per cent protected. Québec farm producers will not tolerate that a blind eye be turned on Québec demands.

This is why I am asking the Minister whether he can reassure Québec producers in terms of the current GATT negotiations. Can he tell us whether all parties in the various farm industries in Québec will be adequately represented by knowledgeable people at those negotiations?

[English]

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member for Drummond that this government will continue to vigorously defend the interests of the Canadian dairy producers in the GATT negotiations.

We firmly maintain our right to develop programs that best respond to Canadian conditions, and this includes our right to set up supply management systems. Our position has been, and continues to be, that Article 11 of the GATT must be clarified and strengthened. The GATT panel ruling on Canadian import controls for ice cream and yogurt clearly confirms that. We want to see fair and equitable trading rules that apply to everybody in the international marketplace.

We are not taking this ruling lightly and we are seriously concerned. What this ruling means is that under current rules, U.S. ice cream and yogurt exporters will have greater access to our marketplace. At the same time, the American market will continue to be closed to Canadian producers of the same product. That is because the U.S. has a waiver from GATT that effectively prohibits U.S. imports from Canadian ice cream.

That is not at all this government's idea of fairness. As I have said, this ruling confirms our MTN position that Article 11 has to be strengthened and clarified. I want to assure the hon. member that we have raised this concern in Geneva. This is the route that the Canadian Dairy Industry itself has endorsed.

At the October GATT Council meeting, this government clearly stated its concerns regarding the implications of the panel ruling for the dairy industry. We pointed out the very narrow interpretation of GATT Article 11 used by the panel. Specifically, we have trouble with the terminology of "direct competitive products". We reiterated our concerns about the impact of this decision on the Canadian dairy sector at the November GATT Council meeting.

The Canadian dairy industry has been well represented in this process. In fact, this government is working hand in hand with the dairy industry to explore our options.

Just recently, a number of our dairy farmers travelled to Europe to discuss with their European counterparts the implications of this ruling on the Canadian industry. It is our view that the panel report is calling into question the original intentions of the GATT drafters. We certainly do not believe it intends to exclude the entire dairy sector from Article 11 coverage.

We firmly believe that our supply management programs conform with international regulations as we understood them. We have played by the rules and we expect our trading partners to do the same.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to further elaborate on a question that I asked of the President of the Treasury Board on October 26, 1989.

The subject of my two questions that day dealt with the government's refusal of a request for access to information by the Auditor General. Specifically, in this particular case, with releasing logs for the use of VIP aircraft by ministers of the Crown.

Now, as everybody knows, on October 24 of this year, the Auditor General released his report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1989. In chapter 6 of that report, the Auditor General indicated that he had been denied access to certain files regarding ministerial expense claims and also regarding the government's use of VIP aircraft.

Now, on first blush, the documents that were requested by the Auditor General concerning the use of VIP aircraft seemed to be something that a government should have given as a matter of course. What he wanted to know was what was the stated intention of the trips that the ministers had taken on government VIP aircraft. He wanted to know that for the simple reason that he was trying to do his job. He was trying to find out whether or not the charges that had been sent to the minister or the department from National Defence were the proper charges. That is because there are three different classifications of flights.

The previous day, I believe it was, in response to a question from another member, the minister indicated that he had put the issue over to the comptroller general who would conduct an investigation and, yes, the information that was requested would be made available to Parliament, to members and to the public.

As reported at page 5051 of Hansard on October 24, the President of the Treasury Board said:

> —we will provide on a regular basis the total travel expenses of each minister, the number of times he takes an aircraft, where he is going, who he is going with, his itinerary, the reason for the use of the aircraft and the cost of the government aircraft.

The day before, the minister seemed to respond that the information which the Auditor General requested would be made available. That simply is not the case. I have been in touch with the Auditor General and I have carefully read the responses from the President of the Treasury Board to previous questions. The minister responsible for the Treasury Board basically said that all information from that date forward would be made available. The Auditor General had requested specific information from the period of April 1, 1989 onward, not October 24, 1989 onward. The question that I had asked was would the minister responsible for the Treasury Board—yes or no—specifically give the information that had been requested by the Auditor General. The minister's answers did nothing to allay the concerns or the questions that were posed by myself and some of my other colleagues. Consequently, on November 9, Mr. Paul Tellier, Clerk of the Privy Council, commented at a committee meeting in response to a question from one of the members of the Public Accounts Committee. I wish to quote from an article that appeared in the Globe and Mail for November 10, 1989:

> When Mr. Tellier was asked yesterday whether Mr. Dye would be allowed to audit ministerial travel, he told the committee: "That audit is not going to take place."

You can see why I am a little confused, you can see why I am concerned, you can see why I am looking for additional information, Mr. Speaker.

We have also been told by the President of the Treasury Board that that information could not be made available dealing with receipts and other matters requested by the Auditor General to do his audit because he said, and I quote from page 5086 of Hansard for October 25:

> I think that Opposition Members can well understand that in such cases, it is important to maintain confidentiality. It is government business.

I think that is an absolutely incredible statement for a minister of the Crown to make. The Auditor General is an officer of this place. In the conduct of his duties when he audits various government departments and agencies the information that he is given is confidential. Surely to goodness this government is not questioning the trustworthiness of the Auditor General, a man whose job and that of his department is to ensure that the public interest is being upheld by members of Parliament, by government departments and government agencies. It was an incredible statement to make.

Every time an audit is done by the Auditor General, I would suspect that he would have access to confidential information. So the answers that have been given in this place are simply unacceptable and do not in any way address the request of the Auditor General, a request that I repeated, hopefully on behalf of the Auditor General and other parliamentarians in the House on November 26.

Is the government prepared to release to the Auditor General the documents that he has requested so that he can do an audit, not to find out whether or not the trip was worthwhile, but he wanted to find out whether or not the charges that were coming from the Department of National Defence for cost recovery purposes were correct?

The government has stated that it is quite prepared to give that information from October 25 onward. From a discussion I have had with one of the members of the Auditor General's staff, I found out that six months prior the government gave almost identical information when an information audit was done to find out what material was available so they could structure their audit.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary who is here tonight if he can shed some light on the questions that I have raised, subsequent to the questions that were asked in this place. He may wish to comment for a moment or two and because of the nature of the questions that I have asked, he may wish to provide me and the House with a formal reply.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I first want to apologize to the hon. member for Dartmouth. We have had an earlier discussion. He has had a number of questions on the Order Paper for the late show and we have had a slight mix-up in our responses. What he has asked for is some very detailed information of a question that he had asked earlier this year and that other people have asked. I think in all fairness and to give him the proper answer we will provide him with a written reply to the questions he has raised tonight. I believe that that would be the most fair way to look after his concerns. I give him my word that we will reply with a written response very shortly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10 a.m.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—ELIMINATING POVERTY AMONG CANADIAN CHILDREN

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa) moved:

That this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues.

[English]

One morning in the middle of June, lying in my bed, the alarm clock went off on my clock radio and I listened, as I usually do each morning, to the morning CBC news. On this particular day the news I heard was deeply distressing. The report on that particular morning was that we have in this country of ours 1,121,000 children living in poverty.

Normally I had been reasonably well aware, given my responsibility as the Leader of the New Democratic Party, of the general social policy oriented data, if I can put it in those very abstract terms, but I frankly say that on that particular morning I was totally surprised by how serious the problem of child poverty in Canada had become.

I went to my office that very morning, checked with members of our research staff and asked them to get me a copy of the report on child poverty which had just been produced and which formed the basis of the CBC news report.

It turned out that the figures used were true. There were well over a million poor kids in this Canada of ours in 1989, not 1939; in Canada, a developed industrial society, not a poor emerging nation in the Third World.

The situation is bad for our children. For the rest of us, no matter how we have been burdened by tax increases, no matter how hard done by we feel when we cannot buy an extra suit that we might have planned on, take our families out to another restaurant for a dinner on a given week, or have a more extended holiday, that is the reality for a majority of Canadians.

It is certainly our task as a party, our task as parliamentarians, to be constantly trying to improve the well-being of the majority, but the well-being of the majority in recent years has been improving. While this has been going on in our country, the well-being of a significant number of our kids has been getting worse.

• (1010)

From 1980 to 1986, when the child population of Canada actually fell by some 4 per cent, the number living in poverty in Canada at precisely the time the rest of us were doing better increased by 13.4 per cent.

A few years after I was elected to the House of Commons a survey was taken in 1973. In 1973 it was found in this land of ours that 21 per cent of our kids were poor. The most recent figure, according to the Canadian Council on Social Development, is that this percentage has increased from 21 per cent to 25 per cent, one child out of four from Newfoundland in the east to British Columbia in the west. Some provinces are obviously much worse than others, not necessarily because of the different political regimes but certainly because of the different capacities of the different regions to generate growth.

I repeat, while the over-all sense of well-being for most Canadians has been getting better, that of our children has been getting worse. While the rest of us have been better clothed, there are more kids going without shoes. While the rest of us have improved housing, we have literally thousands of children who are homeless in Canada. While the majority now take their families out to a restaurant from time to time for a meal, we have thousands of kids, indeed 151,000 children, using food banks each month.

While we in Canada have witnessed in the statistics that Mercedes Benzes and Porsches and Cadillacs are selling in record numbers, one quarter of our children are wasting away. This is a national horror. This is a national shame. It is a horror and a shame that we should put an end to.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, one of the major obligations of our democratic responsibilities—and I say this to all members on both sides of the House—is to improve the well-being of the majority. That is a fundamental requirement of a democratic society.

It is also a requirement to go back to an old-fashioned and for me fundamental notion of democracy which predates the view that you have a democracy simply if you have a competitive political system, legal institutions and the rule of law. The early 19th century and pre-19th century notion of democracy was that you had a society, not just governmental institutions as important as they are, so organized that all of its members had fully equal opportunities to develop their capacities and talents as human beings. It is to that notion of democracy that we in Canada should be committing ourselves.

When we apply this test we have to understand particularly here, now, in our generation, that we have the obligation of persuading a majority of Canadians to take on the task in the interests of a minority, in the interests of our poor, in the interests in particular of poor children.

In my maiden speech 21 years ago I noted in the euphoria of that time at the end of the 1960s that our task as a people was not simply to praise our past and celebrate our present. I said that our task was to create a future, a different future, to defend what we have, and that to refuse to go beyond was to refuse to lead. We have an obligation always in this chamber to lead.

For too long we have refused to go beyond into the future when it comes to our children. For too long we have ignored the appalling poverty in the midst of affluence. For years the United States and Canada had been regarded not only here in North America but around the world as the world's two most affluent nations and in many criteria well beyond average personal income, this remains true today. However, today also among industrial states, Canada has the second highest rate of children living in a condition of severe poverty. We are second only in this terrible indicator to the United States.

I want now to get beyond the abstractions of some of these statistics.

[Translation]

What is the face of poverty? It is dangerously underweight babies. It is infant deaths. The infant mortality rate of the poor is twice as high as that of the rich. Physicians in Quebec have stated that babies born in certain poor areas of the province run the risk of being as underweight as babies in developing countries.

Poverty means chronic illness, infection and viral diseases. The rate of poor children in poor health is 150 per cent higher than the national average. This is appalling!

A recent study on poverty in Regina mentioned babies who were brought to the emergency ward with convulsions because mothers had diluted their milk to make it go further. We cannot allow this to happen!

[English]

An Ontario study found that being on welfare was one of the best and surest indicators of discovering a child with chronic health problems. Welfare payments are totally inadequate to deal with that problem.

Third, the face of poverty is malnutrition. It means going to school without breakfast and going to bed at night hungry. Again in the same recent study in Saskatchewan that I picked up and read when I was recently out there, it showed that a youngster from school during the summer vacation of two months lost 25 pounds. The weight was checked before school recessed and checked when the kids came back to school. Some 25 pounds in weight was lost by that child because the school lunches that that child was getting during the school year were not being provided at home during the summer in that it was a very poor family.

I repeat, this is happening in Canada 1989, not 1939.

Children dependent on welfare in British Columbia can meet daily nutritional requirements according to medical reports that have been done for only two and a half weeks per month. What are they going to do for the other one and a half weeks? Well, they suffer; that is what they do.

While the rest of us are well off, while the rest of us go to restaurants, while the rest of us have lots of pleasure, these kids are suffering. We should be suffering when we think about it so that we will move and put an end to it.

• (1020)

Being a poor kid means box lunches from food banks and soup from soup kitchens. Children make up 26 per cent of the population, but they make up 40 per cent of the users of food banks in Canada.

Around Thanksgiving I was speaking somewhere here in my home province. I picked up a copy of The Toronto Star and in that paper on Thanksgiving weekend, when most of us are with our families and enjoying our families and when most of us have lots to be thankful for, I saw a report that in Toronto, our richest city, there were 34,000 Canadians who could not feed themselves adequately. Over half that 34,000 were under five years of age. They have inadequate diets.

There are more food banks in Toronto than McDonald's hamburg outlets. Perhaps if we had neon signs in front of every food bank in the city of Toronto and in every city across Canada, when we drove around in this country of ours we would become as aware of poverty, and particularly poverty for young kids, as we are of McDonald's hamburgs.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, to be a poor kid means trying to read or write or think on an empty stomach.

A Harvard medical study has shown a direct link between poor nutrition and the ability to concentrate, so important in the learning process. A survey of 132 public schools in Calgary reported that in 46 schools, the number of children coming to school without breakfast was a serious problem.

It is not surprising that poor children are twice as likely to drop out of school as other children.

[English]

In Canada we know—and in every country where studies have been done they know it—that rich kids are not inherently better than poor kids, that they do not have a greater capacity to become musicians, poets, good hockey players or great skiers. The poor in our nation genetically have the same capacities over all, statistically, as the rich kids. But as every study shows if you are suffering from malnutrition and you are underhoused and you have all of the concomitant negative effects on your life that goes with that, you are not likely to do as well in the learning process, by a considerable proportion, as the rich or the average.

It is time we took our obligations seriously to ensure that every kid in this country has the right and the same right to develop his or her capacities and talents, that the child in Cape Breton Island ought to have the same opportunities to be what he or she can as the child in Rosedale in Toronto.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, to be poor means to be homeless and without hope. Three years ago, 30,000 children were looking for a place to sleep in shelters for the homeless. Others lived on the street or with poor families who skimped on food to pay the rent.

[English]

There is now in Canada and in the United States a vicious cycle involving the poor. Poor kids are undernourished, underhoused, more sickly, more poorly educated, get the second or third rate jobs, and when the lay-offs come, they get laid off first.

The same young people marry each other and then they produce children, statistically out of proportion, who go through the same cycle. We have a cycle of poor food, poor housing, poor clothing, poor education, poor jobs, poor spouses, more poor kids. This is a vicious cycle. It is a vicious cycle that can be broken and it is a vicious cycle that must be broken in this Canada of ours.

Our children, 25 per cent of them, are imprisoned in poverty and we must get them out of that prison. There is a problem in this relatively well off democracy of ours in dealing with this. It is to get the problem recognized for what it is. It is to get people reasonably well off to care about the problem so that they will come to grips with it.

First and foremost, there has to be a change in attitude. Let me just cite some examples. I will not give names, but I will give positions here.

The Social Services Minister in the Province of Saskatchewan, when asked about poverty in that province, said—and I do not exaggerate—that poverty among children in Saskatchewan does not exist. Saskatchewan has the second highest level, in excess of 25 per cent, of child poverty in Canada.

A premier in one of the western provinces said if poor kids go to school hungry, it is because their parents do not love them. That is outrageous. It shows a terrible insensitivity. Every member in this House has poor families in his or her constituency. Every member in this House knows them. Every member knows that poor parents care for their kids just as much as any other parents. It is terribly offensive to suggest that we have poor kids because their parents do not care for them.

In another province a cabinet minister said kids go to school hungry in her province because their parents spend their money on booze and cigarettes.

There is a psychological explanation for this. We have learned during the course of the 20th century about the psychological mechanism of denial. We all do it in varying degrees in our personal lives. People in political life people do it too. That is to say, when there is a reality out there that you do not want to recognize, you do not recognize it. You pretend it does not exist, and at a certain profound level you believe it does not exist. This reaction, the psychological mechanism of denial, is going on at too many levels in our country.

If I may be personal again on this subject, when I discovered this in the middle of June and woke up to the reality myself from that newscast, I began to speak, and for five months, I spoke in every province of Canada on this subject. Every speech I have made since the middle of June, with the exception of two speeches which were exclusively devoted to the Constitution, I talked about child poverty. There is, to my knowledge, one and only one news report about that issue that has been made on a speech that I gave in five months of making speeches from coast to coast in Canada.

It would be interesting to understand why the news media in our country has ignored the question. Is there a kind of denial mechanism that is going on there as well? Is it because it is not conflict laden, not entangled in personality battles of some kind, or regional battles? Whatever the reason—I repeat, five months of speeches with the exception of two in every part of Canada—I have said almost word for word what I have said today, and the nation has little knowledge of it. There is a problem. The reality is there. The reality is abominable, and the reality is correctible. But many Canadians—I believe most Canadians—do not know about it.

A friend of mine many years ago, Michael Harrington, who is now dead, wrote a remarkable book on poverty in the Unites, a book called The Other America. That was almost three decades ago.

As a result of that book and because it came to the attention of a president, a young man named John Kennedy, it did get attention. It was taken up in the centres of power, which is normally what happens in a society. I say to the minister, those who have power are in a position to do something. Something was done. There was going to be something done in that particular instance. President Kennedy was planning a 1964 campaign based on the issue of poverty in America. As the whole world knows, he was shot and it was not done.

It was written about the United States, and it happened to take off for reasons I know not exactly, but I know it became a political issue because a president took it up. I am convinced that this will become an issue in this country of ours when premiers from coast to coast and when the Prime Minister of Canada say, "We have to put an end to child poverty".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I quoted some of the statements by ministers and governments who blame poverty of children on their parents. Many Canadians will believe that, and average Canadians will believe it as well. But I want to say that that is not the case. The study done recently for the city of Regina looking into hunger produced, as I understand it, a virtually unanimous report on the following points when it came to the causes of the poverty.

It was not due to waste. It was not due to laziness, mismanagement, bingo, booze or wilful neglect. It was due to the fact that the families were without money.

Poor kids are poor kids because they are poor kids. If we want to overcome poverty in this country, we have to do something about getting more money into the hands of poor people. That is where we have to start.

On Monday of this week the United Nations adopted the first-ever Convention on the Rights of Child. Canada co-sponsored that landmark agreement. Let us as a Parliament use that as a nation for a starting point. Article 14 of the Convention imposes on us to recognize, and I quote:

> —the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development.

According to this Article we are now obligated to take:

> —appropriate measures to assist parents and others responsible for the child to implement this right and shall in case of need provide material assistance and support programs, particularly with regard to nutrition, health, clothing and housing.

We can, we must take up our obligations now.

The point that I want to make is that it can be done. In Sweden, Norway and West Germany there is a level of child poverty one-fifth as high as ours. Where over 25 per cent of our children live in poverty, theirs are around 5 per cent. Other societies that have cared, that have targeted the problem, have understood it is a problem, have done something about it.

In Canada, all parties—and I am not going to talk about the political genesis of it beyond that—in the late 1950s and early 1960s recognized that we had a serious problem with our elderly. We saw then that statistically speaking a much greater percentage of senior citizens were living in poverty than the percentage of children living in poverty today. The people of Canada did not sit back, and at one point people in all parties did not sit back. We all have parents. We know senior citizens. We know it is a human right that a man or woman, who spends his or her life working for the nation and with his contribution whatever it is in labour, ought to be able to retire with dignity, not just survive but retire with some dignity.

We began to move as a country. In the early 1960s we began the important struggle for elderly Canadians. In 1963, 41 per cent of elderly Canadians were poor. The Canada Pension Plan came in. Old age security was significantly improved. Indexation of pensions and pension benefits took place. By 1966, the percentage of elderly couples living in poverty had dropped from 41 per cent to 9.5 per cent. We still have poor citizens. More has to be done, of course. But we made real progress for the elderly.

There is one person who is sitting here—I see him now—who sat here day in and day out, often in the front-benches of the New Democratic Party rows, now before the Speaker, who in particular did a remarkable job for senior citizens, and that is Stanley Knowles.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say to you if we want to succeed with our children we have to deal as specifically with their poverty as we did with senior citizens. We helped to bring dignity to the lives of the elderly. We must now do that for our children. We must show that for us human dignity is to be cherished as much in life's first pages as it is in the concluding chapters.

I say to the minister that the federal government must show leadership. The Prime Minister said this fall that our goal for social programs must be those that "bring us both peace of mind and pride in citizenship". I agree. All Canadians would agree. I simply say it is time to match the rhetoric with action.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Broadbent: Basically, at the federal level the government must start by increasing the minimum federal wage which is now the lowest in the country and has not been increased in three years. It should be indexed to the cost of living, just as pensions were indexed several years ago. Second, the federal government must increase family allowances and the child tax credit and index them to the rate of inflation. This money goes directly to low—and middle-income families to pay for food, housing and clothing. Third, the federal government must increase federal financing for low-cost housing.

Ten years ago, the government financed construction of 30,000 new low-cost housing units per year. Today, this number has dropped to 20,000.

[English]

We must also move to bring in child care legislation which has as its purpose and fundamental goal an increase in the number of spaces that will be available for children throughout Canada.

• (1040)

This in itself will help thousands of Canadian women who love their children, who want to care for them but who are now locked into welfare. They cannot afford adequate child care and so are forced to stay home when they would prefer to be spending part of their time working in the economy out of the house and part of their time looking after children but they know that they cannot leave them if there are not adequate child care spaces available.

One recent survey showed that there were over 21,000 Canadian women who specifically said they would prefer to be off welfare, would prefer to be working out of the house if only this nation of ours had taken the proper steps some time ago to ensure adequate child care service is available. We must begin to make that child care spacing available for these women.

I would like to propose that the Prime Minister or the federal government before long convene a national conference on the elimination of child poverty, inviting first and foremost the provincial governments because much of the responsibility as we know in this federal constitution of ours to deal with this problem resides with the provinces. Also invited should be municipalities to send delegates, volunteer agencies, the trade union movement, chambers of commerce, service clubs and poor peoples' representatives themselves.

There should be a national effort to talk about and understand the gravity of the problem and to understand that things can be done. This conference should be called. In my view such a grand coalition that could be brought together should not be a one-shot deal, but it should obligate itself to meet on an annual basis to establish targets. I am aware we cannot do this overnight, as I am aware if we begin to spend money now and target spending to overcome the disgrace of national poverty for children certain other priorities would have to be set aside. No serious man or woman in political life can escape from that. I am aware that it cannot be done overnight and without some sacrifice in some other domain, but by God I am saying we should now organize our political community like we have never done before. This can be done by bringing in groups that have not been involved before, setting out a national target, and monitoring it on an annual basis until we eliminate child poverty in this country.

I want to conclude with these observations. Whatever their philosophical basis, whether Canadians are Conservatives, Liberals or New Democrats, I know there is not the slightest bit of difference in terms of their commitment to the well-being of children. However else we may differ on other political matters, and the differences are real and serious, on this issue there is no difference on the commitment to overcome child poverty. I believe there would be no difference about that goal.

I think that if we speak to all of Canada and if all Parties took this on, we could get a response. I am convinced that a great attempt to mobilize the energy and effective imagination of Canadians would meet with a great response from the people of Canada. We have the resources. We have the ability. We have done it before on pensions. We have done it before on medicare. What we need now is to demonstrate the same will concerning the needs of our children.

For the sake of our children, let us find that same spirit of reform, of hope, of courage, of tenacious intelligence that has led this nation of ours to great accomplishments in the past. Let us affirm today in this Parliament that as a nation by the beginning of the 21st Century—only 11 years away—child poverty in this great Canada will be a relic of the past.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate today in this debate about child welfare and child poverty. However, before addressing the motion perhaps the House could bear with me for a minute while I make some remarks with regard to the hon. gentleman for Oshawa.

The hon. member, when he moved his motion and gave a very eloquent address today, did not make mention of the fact that this is probably the last opportunity that he will have as Leader of the New Democratic Party to put a motion before the House of Commons.

He made mention of the fact that throughout his long and distinguished career in federal politics he has been very concerned about issues related to poverty. Indeed, over the years we have seen that this hon. member has been in the forefront of the fight against poverty at all levels.

He mentioned the struggle that was led by the Hon. Stanley Knowles on pension reform, on the rights of seniors. The hon. gentleman from Oshawa was there at all times as well strongly supporting any initiative which could reduce poverty. Indeed, he talked with considerable eloquence and force about the commitment he made earlier this year in all of the speeches which he gave, with the exception of two which dealt exclusively with the Constitution, that in every instance he raised the issue of child poverty because of a sense of deep personal commitment.

I think it is probably appropriate, knowing the hon. gentleman and the depth of his commitment, his sincerity, his compassion for people who have fewer benefits than the rest of us, that he would put as his last motion a motion which is forward looking, which tries to provide for the children of the future, which is compassionate, and which recognizes that there are far too many Canadians who do not share the benefits that the rest of us do. It is a motion, as well, which in its very tone and its phrasing is non-partisan, which seeks the support of members on all sides of the House.

I think it was striking, and I know that members of the press gallery will have noted as well as other Canadians that the tone of the hon. gentleman's remarks today was one which was non-partisan and an appeal for Canadians transcending all differences of philosophy, all differences of region, culture, class, faith and of language to work together to try to deal with the common goal to ensure that all of Canada's children have an opportunity and to ensure that the scourge of poverty is ended. I think the extent to which we can work together in trying to achieve that goal will be a fit legacy for the hon. gentleman for the contribution that he has made to Canadian public life.

There was some speculation in the news media today as to where the hon. gentleman is going after he leaves the federal Parliament. It is not for me to speculate on that and, indeed, I do not know. But I do know that on the strength of having sat in Parliament with him for some 17 years that there is a depth of commitment there to public service which will lead him in whatever capacity, whether in Parliament or outside of Parliament, to continue to have a concern about the welfare of Canadians and to continue to work conscientiously for the betterment of all Canadians. Parliament has been better and the country has been better for his service in Parliament and our best wishes go with him for the future.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I would be more effusive in my praise if I had not had the experience last time there was a major party leader's resignation back in 1979 when Mr. Trudeau announced that he was stepping down. The news struck me and I was moved to write a column for my weekly newspapers, praising Mr. Trudeau and his contribution to Canada, saying things which never could have escaped through my lips while he was still party leader, talking about what a tremendous contribution he had made to Canada because I was absolutely confident that he was going.

• (1050)

Two weeks later the government was defeated. We were back into an election campaign and the first thing that greeted me in my weekly newspapers was a column by me praising Mr. Trudeau and saying what a great guy he was. Until the NDP convention is actually over, and until I see the results, this is the last of the praise that I will be offering in the direction of the hon. member for Oshawa.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: The motion which the hon. member put before the House today asks that the House express its concern for the more than 1 million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000. Members of the opposition would like to see us agree with this motion, and indeed we do.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: All Canadians, regardless of political affiliation, care deeply about the future of our children and about the future of our country. All Canadians can work together to try to deal with this issue.

There is no question that poverty affects many Canadians. Poverty oppresses more than 3.5 million people in Canada. Despite a generous system of elderly benefits, approximately 450,000 seniors, most of them single, continue in poverty. The problem which is most troubling to us all is that almost one child in six—close to 1 million children—will find it difficult to break out of this vicious cycle.

These numbers are bad enough on a national basis but when we look at the pattern region by region we see even more disturbing trends. In Newfoundland, for instance, we see that more than 25 per cent of the children are poor. In Manitoba, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick the rates are 20 per cent or higher. This is far too high.

[Translation]

Canada is not the only country to have reached this conclusion. Every night, two-thirds of the world's children go to bed hungry, and every day more than 38,000 children die of hunger, or because they have no shelter or are not getting proper health care.

One of the objectives of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child is to reduce that number. There is only one way to ensure that children enjoy those rights and have a chance to develop: We must deal with the underlying problem, which is poverty.

Now that the convention has been adopted, we intend to support the agreement, in close co-operation with the provinces, so that Canada's name can be added to the list of signatory countries.

[English]

But in Canada the problems facing children are much simpler to define than in many of the other countries of the world. For instance, the Convention calls for basic rights for children, including the right to a name. Most of the rights that are listed are fundamental in our society and are already being met in Canada.

We know that the lot of children in Canada has been improving step by step. In 1984, more than 1.1 million children lived in poverty. By 1987, that number had dropped to under 1 million. This is a significant improvement but the number is still too high.

As we look at the goal of eradicating poverty by the year 2000 we have to ask ourselves this. How was this progress achieved and what can we do as the federal Parliament to continue this trend?

There are two ways to put more money into the hands of our children. The first, which was largely the emphasis of the speech by the hon. gentleman from Oshawa, was by redistributing the wealth that we have. The second is by increasing the total amount of wealth available.

Let us talk first about the programs we have to target support to the most needy. The foundation of Canada's support to the needy is the Canada Assistance Plan. This year we expect to transfer $5.1 billion to the provinces for a range of social assistance expenditures. In addition to basic income support payments to families, the Canada Assistance Plan supports social services such as counselling and emergency shelters.

When we began our first mandate in 1984 we were determined that families with children should receive more support. The segment of the population most in need was obviously lower income families. The first thing that we did was to increase the child tax credit by more than 50 per cent. The child tax credit was increased to $565 per child and a new $200 supplement was brought in for children six years old and younger. We wanted to help families break out of poverty. Because 70 per cent of Canadian families have children at home, we knew that we needed a program for small children.

The growing numbers of two-income families and single-parent families showed us that an effective child care program is needed. We have already brought in a $100 million child care initiatives fund and developed child care programs which really work for different communities. This year we expect to spend another $240 million under CAP for subsidized child care spaces. That is a 20 per cent increase in CAP in just one year. All of our spending on child care this year at the federal level will amount to a figure just under $1 billion. We will implement a new national child care program by the end of the current Parliament, as both the Prime Minister and the Speech from the Throne have announced.

As I have already stated, there are two ways to increase the amount of money available for low-income Canadians. The first clearly is the redistribution of wealth. The second involves increasing the total amount of wealth within a country.

The hon. member for Oshawa made reference to the commitment of President Kennedy to the eradication of poverty. It was President Kennedy who said that all ships float higher on the flood tide. As we can increase national prosperity in Canada, all Canadians should benefit from the increases, both in our ability to finance increased transfers to individuals who are in need in Canadian families and in terms of new opportunities for Canadians.

In 1984 this country had just come through one of the worst recessions seen since 1929. Runaway inflation robbed pensioners of their life savings and of their dignity. The level of unemployment was so high that when young people looked for jobs they were told that their skills simply were not needed.

We embarked on a program to revitalize our economy, enlarging our foreign markets for Canadian goods and services, turning Crown corporations that had outlived their public policy purposes back to the private sector, and deregulating industries which were stifling under government intervention. We needed income tax reform because the system that we had inherited choked initiative. We removed 850,000 lower-income Canadians from the tax rolls. We wanted to free up disposable income and improve incentives for people to work, thereby generating economic activity and jobs for others.

In just five years these and other initiatives have helped to create 1.5 million jobs for Canadians, the majority of them full-time jobs. Retail sales are up by 48 per cent. Manufacturing shipments are up by 28 per cent. It goes a long way to explaining how we are able to remove some 549,000 Canadians from below the poverty line. We are continuing to look for ways to further develop the strategy. Mr. Speaker, we are going to continue to make progress in this area to ensure that economic growth can continue.

An important part of this package showing the government's continuing concern for those with lower incomes is that those with incomes lower than $30,000 will be better off after sales tax reform than they are now. This would be possible because we will have a progressive GST credit. We are doing this because we want Canadian families to have opportunities. This is a prosperous country and each Canadian should have the right to better his or her own situation.

I am a married man and I have two small children. I know how parents agonize over how to raise their children well. The fundamental responsibility for raising their children will always remain with the parents themselves. Within the Department of National Health and Welfare we have taken some important steps to help families with problems.

Perhaps we could call it eleven o'clock at this point, Mr. Speaker, and I could resume discussion of some of these initiatives following Question Period.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will now proceed to statements by members with the hon. member for Miramichi.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

MIRAMICHI

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, for the past six months the people of Miramichi have gone through hell. Four people, Mrs. Annie Flamm, Linda and Donna Daughney, and the Rev. James Smith were brutally and senselessly murdered. Nina Flamm was brutally beaten but fortunately survived. Father Smith was the brother of my predecessor, G.A. Percy Smith, who many members will remember. All the victims were gentle and good people who had never hurt anyone.

During the night and early morning the prime suspect was apprehended as a result of the work of brave, careful and dedicated police men and women of the RCMP and the towns of Chatham and Newcastle. I am told that the officer who was instrumental in the apprehension is a female member of the RCMP.

I want to take this opportunity to applaud and thank most sincerely all the brave and courageous men and women who put their lives on the line to bring this awful nightmare to a successful conclusion. We are fortunate indeed to have such people in our police forces.

I also want to congratulate the people of Miramichi for their stoicism in the face of this awful nightmare.

THE ELDERLY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the B.C. government and the pharmacists have instituted a program of voluntary drug review for our senior citizens. In one case, a senior had 48 bottles of pills on hand. This may occur when old prescriptions are not discarded, when the medications are changed or discontinued, or as a result of different doctors prescribing medications for the same patient.

The elderly are much more likely to develop adverse reactions and be much more sensitive to medications, particularly sedatives and tranquillizers. They are also more likely to be confused as to the directions and may have difficulty remembering if they have taken the medication.

This program is designed to eliminate inadvertent, excessive and duplicate drug use. I would encourage all governments, pharmacists and doctors across Canada to work together to protect the elderly in this way.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the fight to save VIA Rail continues across this country. Following on the heels of the Standing Committee on Transport's report that recommended a moratorium on the VIA Rail cuts, rallies are springing up across this country. In Windsor, in Toronto, and yesterday in Vancouver, union members and Canadians rallied in support of rail passenger services.

A group is travelling to North Bay this weekend; troubadours, labour leaders and other Canadians, to point out to the government that VIA Rail is important, it must be maintained.

I want the Minister of Transport to reconsider. In order to assist him in reconsidering, I have booked passage from Ottawa to Toronto, Monday morning, train No. 41, a ticket in my name and a ticket in the name of the Minister of Transport. I would like him to join me, ride to Toronto, talk to the people who use VIA Rail and find out what they think about his decision to cut their services and then he can catch a plane back with me to Ottawa so we can be here for Question Period.

The minister has a ticket to ride, but does he care?

NATIONAL AWARENESS—DRUG ADDICTION

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, this is National Drug Awareness Week and it is important for each and every one of us, whatever our field of activity, to combine our efforts to fight the scourge of the various forms of drug addiction.

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, I would point out an important event that I chaired at the beginning of this week, namely the first regional conference on addiction, organized by Unité Domrémy Lamater, which brought together more than a hundred participants from all backgrounds—educational, cultural, social, industrial—to be better informed, but especially to establish a joint regional strategy and thus better reach the target population.

It was a success and I wish to mention the outstanding work done by the president of Unité Domrémy Lamater, Pierre Sigouin, and by Noël Beaupré and their whole team.

Mr. Speaker, addiction knows no boundaries and everyone must get involved.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that the present manufacturers' sales tax works in favour of imports from other countries, creating jobs there at the expense of the Canadian labour force. That is why this tax must be replaced with a new proposed GST tax. In this regard, I have received petitions and correspondence from many people and businesses in my riding pointing out some of the inequities in the proposed tax.

In particular, many ask that all pre-cooked and ready-to-eat food to be consumed at home be treated the same whether purchased in fast food outlets, groceries or supermarkets as far as the application of the sales tax is concerned.

Others have expressed concern that the proposed tax rate is too high and should be lowered. Still others propose that the tax be abandoned altogether.

I am confident that the government has been listening and will continue to listen carefully to these representations and others and will make the right decision so that the proposed goods and services tax will be as equitable as possible.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, although women have entered the workforce in record numbers over the past few years, their income levels are still only 60 per cent of their male counterparts. Economic security is still a dream for many women and this is especially true for those who are retired or are entering retirement age.

[Translation]

In many cases, women who have chosen the more traditional role of homemaker do not have access to the private pension plans which are essential to a decent retirement. Because most of them count on their husband's income and the financial plans he made, they can quickly find themselves in poverty if they are suddenly widowed or some other misfortune strikes. Four out of ten households headed by women in Canada are poor.

[English]

A recent report by the National Council of Welfare stated that the disparity of benefits paid to men and women under the Canada Pension Plan is increasing. Instead of introducing regressive pension clawback schemes, this government should be concentrating on programs to improve the quality of pension plans for women.

JUSTICE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, as Canadians, we are most fortunate. For the most part, we can send our children to school, go shopping, go to work, and go about our normal daily lives in relative security. We are free of the terror and horror that disrupts daily life in so many countries around the world. Only when terror and horror strikes close to home do we realize how fortunate we are as Canadians. This has been the case in my home province of New Brunswick.

Over the past number of months, as convicted murderer and prison escapee Alan Legere terrified, brutalized and horrified residents of the Miramichi, we were not at ease. I am pleased to report that Alan Legere has been captured and hopefully life in the communities along the Miramichi will gradually return to the quality and standard that we take for granted in this great nation of ours.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, November 25 is the eighth annual International Day to End Violence Against Women. This day was initiated by women in Latin America in 1981 and is now celebrated with marches and demonstrations throughout the world. The threat of violence against women is a growing phenomena in the developing world.

In Mexico, a woman is raped every nine minutes. More than 80 million African women and girls are victims of various forms of genital mutilation. In El Salvador women have banded together within the National Co-ordinating Council of Salvadoran Women known as CONAMUS. Under the shadow of civil war, CONAMUS organized the women of El Salvador and established clinics for battered women and women who have suffered sexual assault. On November 15, in response to the good work of CONAMUS, the Salvadoran military raided and looted their office and destroyed their clinic.

One in ten Canadian women will be abused by her partner. As we mark this special day it is important to remember that violence against women is an ever-increasing problem in Canada and throughout the world.

NATIVE PEOPLES

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Pope John Paul II granted an audience to the delegation from the Attikamek-Montagnais Council of Quebec and assured them of his full support in their campaign against low-level military flights over their ancestral land.

In his communiqué, the Pope stated clearly that the Church recognizes Amerindians as the ones mainly responsible for their own development, which must be based on their own spiritual and moral values, that it is with them in this task and supports them in their search for just and equitable solutions to situations that threaten their welfare and the future of their communities.

Mr. Speaker, Amerindians have succeeded in making people in Canada and abroad aware of this cause, on which I have already spoken, declaring myself to be against these low-level military flights.

LEBANON

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the tragic news of the assassination of the newly elected president of Lebanon is another cruel and senseless blow aimed at all of the Lebanese people. Such an act of violence can only destroy and further complicate the process of national reconciliation so desperately needed after 15 years of civil war.

I think it is only normal that the Lebanese people in this country should call upon this government which sits in the United Nations on the Security Council. The only solution to the problem is to have an international conference concerning the problem in Lebanon. Obviously, the solution will be achieved if the two invading armies on Lebanese soil go back to their own homelands.

The Middle East is a holy land. Lebanon is as holy for the Lebanese people as for any other people in that area. Therefore, it is the role of the Canadian government to call upon the two invading armies of Israel and Syria to withdraw and regulate the Palestinian question once and for all.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the latest tempest in a teapot over FBDB making loans to companies which operate strip clubs is useful because it raises once again the larger question as to why government would be in the lending business at all. Each government lending agency means a duplication of personnel and facilities and additional expense for Canadians.

We have in Canada an excellent system of private-sector lending institutions, including banks, credit unions and trust companies, all of which are perfectly capable of providing the financial intermediation services that Canadians need. Why on earth do we need another layer of government bureaucracy in the lending business?

Given the national debt and deficit situation and the clear message from Canadians that government should cut spending, I suggest it is time examine the whole question of government involvement in the financial intermediation field.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, residents across northern British Columbia and other provinces are expressing outrage over the report of the task force on the northern and isolated tax allowance.

New Democrats have been leading the fight against the regressive recommendations and we are pleased that the member for Prince George—Peace River and a member of cabinet have now joined our call to scrap the report. In a November 17 Prince George Citizen report the minister is quoted as saying that he is disappointed with the task force recommendations and that he will ask the finance minister to take another look at the report.

The minister should listen to northerners, New Democrats, and his cabinet colleagues and scrap the task force report.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, since accessibility to the American market as promised during the free trade debate is now seen as a myth, as witnessed by the countervail being imposed on Canadian pork entering the American market, when can the Canadian farmer expect to see some counter steps taken or hear some positive announcements by the government? This would put stability back into our domestic markets, since that expanding market in the U.S. is gradually being closed through harassment, as the Minister of Agriculture so aptly described, according to a news item in the The Ottawa Citizen on October 28. The minister said: "Rather than harmonizing, we're being subjected to harassment and it is timely and necessary to remind our American friends of the spirit within which the free trade agreement was negotiated."

When can farmers expect to hear the plans that the government has to counter this harassment?

OPPOSITION TO BRUNELLE REPORT

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to protest against the Brunelle report on isolated posts in the north and other areas. You will understand that my constituents, and I agree with them 100 per cent, are very upset about the possibility of further cuts in certain programs. We are really isolated, because we lack a number of essential services. There are a number of examples of this in remote areas. Take our transportation network, which is quite primitive compared to the rest of the country. Compensation through this isolation allowance makes it possible to level some of the disparities in the system, in a country the size of Canada. Our economy has benefited from this allowance, Mr. Speaker. The young, the not so young and the elderly are starting to enjoy living in this part of the country. Before making this decision, I think we should sit down and consider ways of giving people a fair deal. Today I want to ask the Minister of Finance to reject the conclusions of the Brunelle report so that we can discuss the matter again.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the harbourfront of the city of Dartmouth is one of the last underdeveloped waterfronts of any major city in Canada. Over the last number of years, the city administration has examined various redevelopment options which would encompass a mix of recreational, commercial and residential development.

One of the major impediments to this project going ahead is Canadian National's marshalling yards located directly on the waterfront. In the past, CN has either refused to cost share any studies of harbourfront development or to fund any studies dealing with the relocation of the marshalling yards to other parts of the city of Dartmouth.

Early this week I met with CN president Ron Lawless to discuss this urgent and pressing matter. I have asked no more than the city of Dartmouth be treated in the same manner as that of Toronto, Edmonton, Montreal or other Canadian cities where CN has participated in harbourfront or downtown redevelopment in partnership with municipalities and the private sector.

I therefore ask this government, and in particular the Minister of Transport, to support this important initiative to the fullest, and to encourage Canadian National's active and early participation in this very necessary, timely and exciting proposal.

EDUCATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, this current week has been selected to mark the great contribution which our community colleges and technical schools make to the life of our country.

Canada's community colleges and technical schools offer a wide diversity of job-oriented, educational programs designed to create the skills which will be required as Canadians face the impressive challenges of our national future. Graduates from these programs step into every area of our nation's life, using their new skills and knowledge to make a significant difference both for their own lives and for Canada.

Whether it be in the fields of health or social services, in our primary manufacturing industries or in the business services sector, the impact of community college training on our social and economic fabric is enormously beneficial.

As the theme from New Brunswick's community colleges states, they are reflective of our province and responsive to our people. Whether you need the skills to enter the new job market or the upgrading to improve your present position, they have the training that works. I feel certain that those words speak for all community colleges and technical schools right across Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EL SALVADOR

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. This morning I spoke to Miss Karen Ridd, the young Canadian aid worker who has just returned from El Salvador and who also happens to be a constituent of mine. She spoke of the very deep and urgent need for this country to press for a negotiated settlement in that strife-ridden country, and particularly for the protection of human rights. The Catholic bishops who appeared before the external affairs committee yesterday said exactly the same thing, that it is time for Canada to take advantage of its new position in the OAS and to take action in this area.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us if the Government of Canada has expressed its deep desire for the government of El Salvador to begin negotiating a settlement in that country? Have we expressed our concern to the United States government, suggesting that it stop providing military aid to the government of El Salvador during this strife? In other words, what action is the Government of Canada taking to try to bring an end to that horrible situation in El Salvador?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that, with all the members of this House, we deplore what is happening today in El Salvador. Of course we are trying every possible means to make this terrible situation come to an end and provide some relief for the population. At the OAS meeting in Washington yesterday, we discussed the situation with the entire team, and I can inform the hon. member that talks have now ended but will resume Monday, and of course we hope that as a result of all these negotiations, the situation will come to an end and peace will return to El Salvador.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the minister who has just spoken. Yesterday when the Catholic bishops appeared before the committee, they expressed a very important concern that there be a form of independent inquiry and independent protection for human rights in El Salvador. They had just returned from the funeral of the six slain Jesuit priests and said that the threat, the danger and the menace that exists in that country is repressive.

Has Canada taken advantage of its new position in the OAS to ask that organization to undertake an independent inquiry into the deaths of those priests? Have we or will we use our position on the Security Council to ask for an international presence in that country to protect all those people whose human rights are presently being threatened or being menaced? In other words, is Canada taking specific initiatives to try to provide for the protection of the lives of the people of El Salvador?

[Translation]

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, I am of course aware of the fact that three priests appeared yesterday before the Standing Committee on External Affairs, where they too expressed their concern about the situation.

The hon. member knows very well that the government wishes to see a negotiated peace in El Salvador, and we have indicated our position through the OAS. We shall continue to urge all parties, all governments to cease their intervention in El Salvador, and we continue to hope that the parties will be able to sit down and negotiate a lasting peace, which is the only way to bring back peace to this country and eventually ensure the development and well-being of the people of El Salvador.

• (1120)

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister knows, Canada can act alone right now with regard to El Salvador. For example, we can have an open-door policy for refugees. We can make our aid conditional on respect for human rights. We can also increase our diplomatic presence.

My question is this: Will the Government take immediate action to help Salvadoran refugees? Will it change our aid program to reflect our concerns? Will our diplomatic presence in El Salvador be increased? Indeed, will the Government take action to help that country?

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, again, I think I understand my hon. colleague's concerns.

We now have in El Salvador two representatives from our embassy in San José who are there to help with the situation.

Refugees are quite able now to apply as provided for in our system and we believe that the present staff there is sufficient.

Of course, if the need should increase, we would agree to add staff to meet the demand.

As for our aid, I would repeat to my hon. colleague that given the present situation, we saw fit to suspend the distribution of aid projects, if I may say. But I would repeat that in spite, perhaps, of my hon. colleague's objections, the aid which has been delivered is really reaching the displaced and impoverished people. Many have confirmed that our aid projects do really reach the people. Last year, these projects helped 200,000 people suffering from the situation in El Salvador.

I can assure my hon. colleague that we shall continue to monitor the situation very closely and act so as to restore lasting peace to El Salvador.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In early October, the Prime Minister tried to reassure thousands of Atlantic lobster fishermen that they would not be affected by American legislation to limit the import of live lobsters of a certain size into the United States. An industry of over $100 million is at stake!

The Prime Minister told us that he had spoken with the President of the United States and that External Affairs had undertaken a series of very special representations.

In spite of all that, we know that the U.S. bill has now passed all stages and only requires the President's signature.

Obviously, the Prime Minister and External Affairs failed completely in their task.

So here is my question: Where is the Minister of Fisheries on this issue? What other representations does the Government intend to make to ensure that Atlantic fishermen will not be affected by this U.S. measure which threatens to cause them serious losses? And finally, how come, with the free trade treaty, we are still harassed in this way by the Americans?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you would permit me to answer on behalf of the Minister of Fisheries who is unavoidably absent today.

As my hon. friend knows, the minister is very much seized with this issue. It has been dealt with at the highest level. As the member himself said, the Prime Minister discussed this issue with the President himself and the President's signature is not on any document. I can tell the hon. member that the minister is very much concerned as is the hon. member and others, and we are on top of the situation.

Mr. Robichaud: The minister is now seized with this question, the fishermen will be seized this coming Monday when they set their traps in Nova Scotia for a new lobster season.

What assurances can the government give the fishermen that they will not be affected by their ineffective action? What assurances can he give them that the price of lobster will not be affected and that the revenue of all those families will not be affected. Can he give them those assurances?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, with respect, the hon. member has acknowledged that action has been taken. The Prime Minister discussed this issue with the President. So why do we not wait to see what the outcome of those deliberations are and not raise any fears that may not be justified.

Oral Question

CHILD CARE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister knows, as we were talking about it in debate earlier this morning, that there is not only a serious but a growing problem of poverty among Canada's children.

There are in fact more than 1,000 bodies active from coast to coast in Canada, providing food for the poor, including 151,000 children every month. Food banks are growing so rapidly that they are now outpacing the number of McDonald's outlets in the country. In the city of Toronto there are more food banks than McDonald's outlets.

Given the expression of concern that we heard from him this measure announced on the part of the government to deal with the serious problem—will the minister on behalf of the government now tell us what measures the government is taking to alleviate this alarming situation.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons why the hon. gentleman has not heard yet of the government's proposals is that the very eloquent speech that he gave went on for some 40 minutes. I have not had a chance to complete my remarks. I hope over the course of my remarks following Question Period to talk about some of the initiatives that we have taken and some of our goals in terms of eliminating child poverty.

Our approach is essentially twofold. The first is to ensure that in transfers to individuals and to families, adequate assistance is given to ensure that we can deal with problems of poverty. The second, which he did not deal with in his remarks, was the question of ensuring prosperity and growth in Canada which creates opportunity for all Canadians.

As a result of the government's policies, we have significantly decreased the number of Canadians in poverty over the course of the last five years, including the number of Canadian children in poverty.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that I look forward to hearing the concluding part of his speech after Question Period, but I also want to say that the government's reliance on continual growth in the economy will not be adequate in the future just as it has not been in the past.

The economy has been growing in the last few years, but while it has been growing the situation for children has been getting worse. There has been over a 13 per cent increase in poverty among children in recent years.

In those things that he may be announcing this afternoon, will the government now deal with the level of the federal minimum wage? The federal minimum wage now is the lowest in all of Canada, lower than all the provinces. An increase in the federal minimum wage would not cost the federal treasury scarcely a cent. It would be obligatory for all those companies working within federal jurisdictional authority. Will the federal government now show some leadership to the provinces by announcing an immediate increase in the level of the federal minimum wage?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows it is not for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to announce changes to the federal minimum wage. Obviously that is a question which should be put elsewhere.

The hon. member should be careful when he uses statistics. He has been here long enough to recognize the fact that the base that is used is very important in determining what the statistics mean.

The hon. gentleman says there has been a 13 per cent increase in child poverty. As he will recall, in my remarks I took as the base line 1984 when this government came into office. In 1984, more than 1.1 million children lived in poverty. By 1987, that number had dropped to under a million. That is a 20 per cent decrease.

The hon. gentleman may say that there are fewer children, the birth rate has fallen. It has not fallen by 20 per cent. The fact is that the number of Canadians living in poverty and the number of children living in poverty has decreased during the term of this government in office. It has not increased. I think the hon. gentleman should recognize that fact.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that we are operating with different statistics, but as has been the case in the past if the government has statistics which show that the degree of the problem is not what I said it was compared to recent years, I am quite prepared to accept that.

• (1130)

Also as the minister knows, whatever the nuance or difference between those statistics may be, the alarming reality is that we still have over one million children living in poverty. That presumably to him, as well as to me, is unacceptable.

[Translation]

The last question concerns what the Government does concretely to finance home building.

Ten years ago, the government financed the construction of 30,000 new homes. Now it is only 20,000, a major reduction.

Would the Government, and the minister speaks for the government today, would the minister announce today or soon that this figure of 20,000 will be increased to provide more adequate housing for the poor in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, again the hon. gentleman is asking me as Minister of National Health and Welfare to make announcements on behalf of my colleague. He could more properly put the question to him.

What I can do, though, is give the House some information about the progress that has been made in dealing with poverty during the tenure of this government. Some 550,000 Canadians have escaped poverty since the government took office according to Statistics Canada low income measures. The poverty rate declined to 14.1 per cent in 1987 from 16.8 per cent in 1984. The child tax credit was increased by more than 50 per cent between 1984 and 1989.

In addition a new CTC supplement for children aged six years and under was introduced. There was a refundable sales tax credit introduced in 1986 to help support low income families. It will double by 1990 to $140 per adult and $70 per child.

The 1988 income tax reform removed 850,000 Canadians from the tax rolls. I accept the point the hon. gentleman makes that as long as there is one Canadian who lives in poverty, as long as there is one Canadian who cannot share the benefits of the prosperity that we have in society, more needs to be done.

I think we are on the right track. The fact that we have reduced poverty in Canada and that we continue to do so indicates both the commitment on the part of the government and the knowledge on the part of the government on how to achieve this.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank.

Yesterday the minister refused to table in the House a list of all strip joints funded directly or indirectly by the Federal Business Development Bank, preferring to tell members and Canadians that such information was available from the House of Commons Order Paper.

Now we discover through the media that the minister has ordered a probe of the FBDB to determine how many such loans have been made.

Given that such is the case, is the minister now prepared to commit himself to tabling the list, either now if he has it or as soon as it is provided to him by the officials of the Federal Business Development Bank? If not, why not?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the hon. member is accurate in stating what was asked of me yesterday, nor my response. I was asked yesterday for a list of notaries and legal agents who work for the FBDB, and my response to that was that that is more properly directed to the Order Paper.

I do not recall in answer to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell mentioning the Order Paper at all, so I think he has mixed up a couple of questions there. I think he should reread Hansard from yesterday.

On the question of the propriety of funding nightclubs that feature this kind of entertainment I think I have answered quite clearly. It is improper. We have beefed up the policy of the bank to make sure it does not happen again.

I have asked the bank to examine and to make sure if, in looking back over the records, it is able to establish a flagrant disregard for that policy on the part of some officers, they should be dealt with appropriately, and if in fact they were errors of omissions, if you will, loopholes in the policy and so on, then to be sure that the new policy will prevent that happening in the future.

I have not asked them to assemble a detailed list but if it is part of their examination, and if the hon. member has some curiosity in this regard and it will not violate business confidence or trample on the rights of people who need not have their rights trampled on, I will certainly give consideration to his request.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, first I want to tell the minister that on page 6094 of Hansard of yesterday I specifically asked him to table the list in question.

[Translation]

I would now like to put my supplementary question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Is the government prepared to initiate, as of today, a complete investigation by a parliamentary committee of the administrative practices of the Federal Business Development Bank? Is the government prepared to respond to this issue today?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question, I told the hon. member that his reference to the fact that I had suggested he put it on the Order Paper was improper. That response on the Order Paper was in regard to another question. He knows that. He should not try to misrepresent what I said in the House.

In terms of an investigation, as I have indicated I have instructed the President of the Federal Business Development Bank to determine how in fact we have this situation where strip clubs receive mortgage financing from the bank in contradiction of the bank's policy.

In terms of a committee of the House of Commons, under parliamentary reform a committee is free to take whatever action the committee decides to take.

LAY-OFFS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday in Montreal, Fonderie CSF announced 250 lay-offs at its plant in East Montreal. Since the beginning of this year, we have now had over 80 lay-off announcements involving nearly 7,000 workers in Montreal. When does the Government intend to take these lay-offs seriously? And what is the Government prepared to do to reverse this deplorable situation?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons)): Mr. Speaker, I don't know why but every Friday, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce rises in the House and asks his usual question, claiming that jobs have been lost in Montreal and that the government has done nothing about it. And every Friday I give him more or less the same answer. I may inform the hon. member that he has a very selective memory, and that from time to time, plants close down in Montreal as they do anywhere else. However, there are also plants that open their doors in Montreal, thus creating new jobs. In fact, one of the reasons why Montreal and the Quebec economy are more dynamic is that in Quebec and Montreal, the entire economic community, the economic elite was in favour of the Free Trade Agreement and Bill C-22. We have created far more jobs in Montreal during the past five years than were created under the previous Liberal government, and that will continue, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it so happens that every week there are more and more lay-offs at Montreal. The answer of the minister is a very harsh and cold response to the situation of these workers.

Since the beginning of this year nearly 7,000 lay-offs have been announced in Montreal: 900 hundred plus at VIA Rail, 500 at Domtar, 200 at Eastern Airlines, 590 at Gillette, 1,100 at Simpson's, 360 at Weston's, 380 at Vickers, and the list goes on and on. These are real lay-offs affecting real persons, not simply estimates based on surveys.

I want to ask the minister again: What is the government going to do about this deplorable situation at Montreal?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, the member from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce goes through the same routine every Friday. He gets up and puts forward a list of jobs that would have been lost when in fact there are thousands of jobs that have been created on the Island of Montreal and in the Montreal area since this government has been in power.

The unemployment rate has been down not only across the country but also in the Montreal area and the province of Quebec. One of the reasons why unemployment is down in Montreal is that this government, for example, put forward Bill C-22, a bill his party obstructed. This created thousands of jobs on the Island of Montreal. Why did the Liberals do that?

Another good example is the space agency that went into Montreal. There are numerous measures that this government put forward, and the best answer I can give to this House is that if they want to compare their record of 1980 to 1984 to our record from 1984 to today, I think the answer will be very clear for all the people of Montreal and of Canada.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank. He will know that yesterday loans out to strip joints and topless bars and so on had reached $3 million. By this morning another $600,000 has been uncovered. It is going up like a fund-raising chart by the day.

He will be aware of the rage that is growing across the country from the small business community and people like the hon. member from Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia who has joined with the chairman of the finance committee to condemn the government for failing to act and failing to monitor adequately to ensure that loans in the millions of dollars were not being made to strip joints and the like.

Recognizing just how outraged Canadians are as they learn more about this situation, will the minister indicate that indeed an investigation is being conducted and that he will report to the House the extent of the loans that have been made to these kinds of business operations?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would hope the hon. member would agree with me it is appropriate that immediately upon becoming aware of this situation, even the one case, it brought about that policy change. The fact that there was more than one case is in a sense immaterial. There should not even be one. We have introduced the policy. I hope he would have the grace to admit that was the appropriate action to take.

I hope he would also have the grace to admit that I have asked the president to ascertain whether in fact any of the loans in question occurred as a result of flagrant disregard for what had been the policy all along, since 1944 I am informed, of not funding these kinds of organizations and how that occurred. If it occurred through administrative error, he is to ensure me through whatever legal advice is necessary that in fact the existing policy will prevent that from happening in the future.

As I indicated earlier to questions from other members, we are looking into the files. We know they go back as far as 1972. It did not start in 1984.

This minister has not looked into a single loan of the FBDB. I have not authorized a single loan. It is a Crown corporation, one of those government run organizations the NDP likes to see in operation. It operated at arm's length. It made decisions contrary to government policy. Remedial action is being taken.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, today we found out more about loans from the Federal Business Development Bank to clubs which exploit and degrade women. These loans bring the total so far to $3.5 million of taxpayers' money used for these clubs.

At the same time this government has cut $2 million for the funding of women's organizations, despite intensive lobbying by both the government's own status of women department and women's groups across the country. The FBDB has refused to set up a special fund for women entrepreneurs.

When will the government redress the balance between the millions of dollars given to businesses that degrade and exploit women and the millions cut from programs designed to help women participate fully in Canadian society?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have to repeat, because the questions keep coming back with the accusation that somehow there is concurrence or agreement on the part of the government for those loans, that there is not. There never has been. We do not support it. It would be helpful if members would try to avoid the temptation of putting that accusation into their preambles.

It is perhaps technical, but the fact is that there has been no taxpayers' subsidies involved here. In fact the FBDB makes a small profit. It should not be making a profit off of these kinds of loans, but it does make a profit.

Third, let me say that over the past three years the bank has authorized some 16,000 loans for $2.7 billion.

Most of the loans are less than $100,000. Small business is its clientele.

I do not have the exact numbers available, but I will look into them because the small business secretariat of my department tells me that, in fact overwhelmingly, women are a much higher proportion of small business entrepreneurs than men. They have a higher success ratio, I might add.

I would not be at all surprised that after going through these statistics we will find that the FBDB funds more women owned small businesses than men owned small businesses. I hope that is the case.

FINANCE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and concerns the suggestion that there are thousands of Canadians, individual and corporate, who are "profitable but pay no tax". A couple of obvious reasons are that they carry forward farm and business losses from previous years and the use of business investment tax credits on the purchase of production equipment, and there are regional incentives.

I want to ask the Minister: Are these the real reasons? Who are these individual Canadians and Canadian corporations? Are they really profitable and what are the reasons for these allegations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has pointed out two reasons why there are profitable corporations that do not pay taxes. The interesting observation that I would make is that the NDP referred to 93,000 large corporations in 1987, the sense being that 93,000 large corporations are not paying tax.

If we go back to the large corporations tax that we introduced in the last budget, only 3,500 corporations qualified to pay for that. There are a large number of very small corporations that are in that 93,000 number as has been identified by the NDP.

The second point I would make is that that information was for the calendar year 1987. That was the year before tax reform came into play. It also is before the impact of tax reform on financial institutions.

I believe one-third of the corporations in the listing of the NDP were in the financial services area. The large amount of money in that is with banks and large trust companies.

The tax reform that came into effect in 1988 is directly pointed at ensuring that banks and large financial organizations do pay their fair share of tax. They are paying tax now; they were not paying tax in 1987. That is clearly a demonstration of the resolve this government has of making sure that we have a fair corporate tax system and that those who should be paying tax do pay tax.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I notice he also walked out. However, it is for whoever wants to get up and answer it.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Beatty: That was before you even got up.

Mr. Karygiannis: In August, while visiting England to celebrate—

An Hon. Member: Where did you find this guy?

Mr. Karygiannis: If members across the hall listen, there might be something they want to hear about human rights.

In August, while visiting England to celebrate the Ahmadian centenary, a request was submitted regarding a number of Ahmadian refugees in England whose visas were expiring and faced deportation back to Pakistan. They expressed their wish to come to Canada.

The Ahmadian Muslims are facing many forms of persecution in Pakistan. An official at the Canadian Embassy, Mr. Gerard, gave me assurances that he would give this matter his immediate attention. To this date nothing has been done.

Would the minister responsible instruct her officials to make haste in processing the necessary documentation for these people so that they may finally get on with rebuilding their lives?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, it might be of some use for the hon. member to know that the Deputy Prime Minister left at approximately 11.40 because he had a scheduled flight to take and a previous engagement. I think it might be useful for him to know that when such things happen it is not always within our own control, and that he was here as is usually the case doing his duty.

I can't say I was very surprised by the remark. Is this not the member who suggested that we should throw Quebeckers into the ocean, I think? It is the same type of remark.

I will be very happy to take up the representations that the hon. member has just made and to transmit them this day to the Department of Employment and Immigration so that it may offer its usual rapid response.

• (1150)

Mr. Karygiannis: Mr. Speaker, I did approach the Minister of Employment and Immigration a week and a half ago and I was expecting an answer. However to this date I have received nothing.

My supplementary question, if somebody would have the decency to answer it, is: Would the government instruct the minister responsible to make haste and instruct her officials in England who are fully aware of what is going on to proceed with these particular cases because their families back in Pakistan are being persecuted?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, I will take up this matter with the minister as rapidly as possible and get back to the hon. member as rapidly as possible.

TAXATION

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. According to the Association provinciale des constructeurs d'habitations du Québec, the GST, and I quote: "—will increase the price of homes by at least 2 per cent and in the long run restrict access to home ownership in Quebec". Since there is already a lack of affordable housing, how can the Minister justify this new sales tax on housing, and furthermore, how is he going to deal with the problems that will ensue?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the numbers that the hon. member has put before the House.

We have demonstrated in the technical paper that as a result of the very generous housing rebate the impact of the GST on the price of housing will be quite limited when you take into account that there is an existing hidden sales tax, a sales tax that I am sure the hon. member does not agree we should keep. We need to move to this new sales tax system, but there is that existing sales tax in the price of a new house which is about equivalent to the net of the GST less the housing rebate. So in the large majority of communities across the country there will be no increase in the price of houses.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, the minister has the wonderful capacity to dismiss everybody else's figures on this and all of the criticisms of the GST.

It is an amazing thing, not just the construction people in Quebec but elsewhere in Canada have shot the department's figures full of holes on the housing side. The minister knows that the tax on housing is unfair. He knows that its burden is going to fall most heavily on the major cities like Toronto and Vancouver, and he knows that his attempt to claw back the housing rebate has a major loophole in it.

In the most recent Gallup survey, which I am sure has been brought to the minister's attention, done for the Canadian Federation of Independent Business only 7 per cent of Canadians still support the GST.

Why does the minister not admit that his tax first of all should not apply to housing? Second, why does he not do what Canadians are demanding and withdraw the GST and bring about some real tax reform based on fairness and ability to pay?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to my not accepting figures of other people. Let me refer him to a quote from The Edmonton Journal to tell you why I do not accept the figures of other people.

This is a statement made by an unnamed senior treasury official in the Government of Alberta who said that "the Treasurer of Alberta made a simple math error" in the figures he had been quoting quite aggressively about the impact of the GST.

I also point out to the hon. member that the provinces have a report. It was leaked over two weeks ago. We have not seen this report, but we have seen that the chief economist of the Conference Board who did the analytical work for that report has distanced himself from the conclusions that have been draw by the provincial treasurers and finance ministers, saying that he regrets the conclusions that have been drawn by the treasurers and that finance ministers have been used; they are too pessimistic. He said he would take the more optimistic side of the analysis he presented to them. He believes that the result has been an unfortunate and misleading one.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday, the minister joined the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in announcing a fishing ban and consumption advisory for commercial, recreational and native fishing for crabs, clams, oysters, prawns and shrimp. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is further quoted as saying that the poisonous dioxins have been found in shellfish, crabs and bottomfish.

A lot of this food is in the food distribution system. Some of it is in our homes, some on retail store shelves, and in grocery warehouses.

The consumption advisory is what bothers me. Would the minister recommend to the people who have these products on their shelves that they consume them or throw them out? Indeed, would the minister feed these products to his own children or his own grandchildren?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, certainly not to my own grandchildren. When we issued the advisory what we did was to indicate by type of fish whether they should be consumed or not. I would be pleased to make available for the hon. gentleman copies of that advisory so he could look by type of fish, by location in terms of where it was caught, whether it poses a threat to human health, whether there should be limitations in terms of consumption, or whether it should not be consumed at all.

Mr. Stupich: I am not sure whether the minister was talking about the food that is already on shelves or whether he is talking about what might have been fished had they not banned fishing. He did not make that clear.

That is not the end of the story.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, perhaps my question should be to the Minister of the Environment. Environment Canada and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans are requesting the companies in the areas affected by these closures to stop pouring these poisons into the water. They are requesting them.

This is not a new problem. These problems have been operating for two, three and four decades. All we are doing at this stage is asking them not to continue doing it or asking them to change their habits. This problem arose because the government did not accept its responsibility to deal with this problem even when it knew about it years ago.

What plans does it have to tighten up on those procedures? What plans does it have to insist that the pulp mills clean up their act and to start levying fines if they do not?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the results of those studies stem from an operation which was launched last year by our department to know more about the level of dioxin and furans in effluent waters around those mills. We now have the conclusions. I will send letters to all companies across Canada next week notifying them that a new regulation will be enacted next year.

This regulation will call for the virtual elimination of all furans and dioxins throughout Canada. It will be a very tough regulation. It will oblige the companies to change the technology and process. This work will be done.

We have warned the companies last March that we were drafting those new regulations. Many companies now have begun to change the process, and we think that by next year we will have eliminated those very dangerous toxins all over Canada.

JUSTICE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General, the minister responsible for prisons and prison security.

Over the past number of months convicted murderer and escapee Allan Legere has terrified and horrified the people of northeast New Brunswick, the Miramichi region. What assurances can the minister give this House and all Canadians that the series of events, mistakes and misjudgments that led to the escape of this individual will not happen again.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Solicitor General I would like to advise the House that when that occurrence took place there was a full internal inquiry into the reasons for the escape. It is my understanding from the documents available to me that all or most of the suggestions in the report have been implemented in order that this will not occur again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: To conclude question period there will be one question from the member for Kenora—Rainy River and one question for the member for Saskatoon—Dundurn.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. It relates to the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. I do not think that the government understands the ramifications of the decision to withdraw funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. Canadians believe environmental issues are a number one priority today. The centre had plans to provide crucial information to Canadians on the environment. When the government decided to withdraw its funding, the centre was forced to put a stop to those plans.

My question is this: How can this government claim on the one hand to be concerned about the environment but, on the other hand, cut the funding to this centre? Would the minister explain this to the House and will he guarantee the future of the centre to Canadians who are very interested in environmental issues in this country?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of this issue is that the government is not necessarily the only source of funding for this centre. Other alternatives can reasonably be looked at as to whether those who have a stake in the centre should also be called upon to help fund the centre. Beyond that, I will be happy to make some representations to the Minister of Labour.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, there are 2,200 public servants off the job from federal vessels. My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The issue of wage parity is one which any thinking person can certainly support. People who face daily risk to save lives should be decently paid regardless of which coast of the country they live on, whether they live near the Great Lakes or work on the Great Lakes or on the St. Lawrence. These public servants are anxious to get back to work but they want to see fairness prevail. Will the minister use his office to bargain constructively and do the right thing by immediately establishing wage parity across the country and help to bargain for a fair and liveable wage for these esteemed public servants?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board is not in the House today. As the hon. member knows, my colleague is very much aware and very much involved in the discussions on this particular matter. I believe he commented on it in the House three or four days ago. Certainly I will draw the attention of the President of Treasury Board to the question of the hon member and I expect he will get back to him next week.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8) I have the honour to table in both official languages the government responses to several petitions.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF DELEGATE TO INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE POLLUTION OF THE SEAS

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House the report of the Nordic Council's International Conference on the Pollution of the Seas in Copenhagen, Denmark from October 16 to October 18, 1989, in both official languages.

I would just say, Your Honour, since this invitation came through you, I was asked to lead this delegation along with the official critic on the environment, the Member for Hamilton East, the Member for Skeena, the official spokesman for his party, and Senator Robertson of the other place.

This important conference attempted to urge a number of major advances with respect to the marine environment, in particular the ratification of the Law of the Sea in which Canada played such a crucial role, a series of measures to restore the marine environment of the North Atlantic, North Sea and the Arctic Ocean, urge a 50 per cent reduction of toxic and bio–accumulating waste in the marine environment, a ratification of the 1989 Basle Convention and a ban on ocean dumping and incineration. I believe the initiative of the Nordic countries to call this conference, which included both eastern and western Europe and Canada, was an important advance and I look forward to a further follow–up of the important decisions and discussion that took place at that time.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jean J. Charest (for the President of the Privy Council) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–47, an Act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the hon. minister have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of the province of Manitoba concerning the proposed goods and services tax that the government is presenting. These petitioners present the ways in which the tax will unfairly affect them and they ask humbly that the government withdraw this goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition today on behalf of a number of western Canadians who point out a whole set of reasons why they are disenchanted and very disappointed with the government's decision to reduce and curtail VIA Rail service, and they are asking the government to reverse that decision and actually invest in an effort to improve and modernize our passenger rail service, as virtually every other western industrialized nation has done.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a second issue, there are hundreds of petitioners who point out their concern with the government's goods and services tax and are asking the government to reconsider what it is doing and essentially forget the tax.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty today to present petitions from my constituency of Saskatoon—Humboldt and the constituency of the Minister of National Defence. These constituents ask the government to reject the goods and services tax and to put in place a tax that is more fair to all Canadians and not one that is regressive.

It is interesting that small-town Saskatchewan is supplying these petitions as in many cases every member of the community signs the petition.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting a petition from roughly 800 residents of the riding of Comox—Alberni on the west coast of Canada who call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax which they characterize as shifting the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform, and they call for reform of the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of private music teachers in my constituency, and I know that this reflects the concerns of music teachers in Manitoba and across Canada, I want to present this petition which asks for the abolition of the goods and services tax on music, which is an enrichment for all of us. It is another tax on education, another tax on culture and another tax on children and others who, quite rightly, profit from music education.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to present a petition from another 100 residents of Ottawa West and other ridings in the national capital region objecting to the fact that the government has increased the manufacturers' sales tax by 50 per cent, from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent, and now proposes to replace that increased tax by the goods and services tax. These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and honour today to rise to present a petition on behalf of a number of producers from western Canada who are concerned about the future that this government is providing with respect to agriculture.

They are particularly concerned with the fact that the government has removed oats from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and are concerned over the future of supply management and orderly marketing in this country.

They call upon this government to replace under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board and to give oats and barley the same protection that wheat now has under the Canadian Wheat Board.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions from residents in my part of British Columbia who wish to bring attention to this tax-crazed government.

The first petition is with regard to the additional tax on long distance calls which they feel is an unfair burden on northern and rural Canadians who must use these services.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is on the grief and suffering tax as it is known across the country. The residents of the riding of Caribou—Chilcotin and other areas are expressing their concern to this government in introducing this very unfair tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 with two petitions signed by a number of residents from Calgary, Alberta and the cities of Revelstoke, Kimberley and the communities of Winfield, Nakusp, Westbank and Burton, all in the southeast corner of British Columbia.

The petitioners condemn the cancelling of the Canadian line of the VIA system and call upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail's present national network to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail the sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

VICTIMS OF CRIME

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present to the government a petition signed by Vernon residents, members of the Communities Against Sexual Abuse, that call on the government to revise the laws of Canada and allow the Canada Evidence Act to better serve victims with disabilities, allowing them to communicate their account of their victimization in court.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to also present to the House today again under the provisions of Standing Order 36, my first instalment consisting of 88 petitions, a total of 7,500 signatures, residents of the Okanagan—Shuswap area, who re simply outraged with the government's proposed goods and services tax.

The 7,500 petitioners call upon the government to reject the proposed goods and services tax and to consult with business, labour and consumer groups to reach a broad consensus on reform of the tax system before implementing further changes and to ensure that there is a process of fair tax reform that will ensure a healthy climate for future economic growth in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 133 and 164.

[Text]

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Question No. 133—Mr. Heap:

1. What number of person-years are allocated to the Immigration and Refugee Board?

2. What number of these person-years will be applied to the Appeals Division of the IRB?

3. Will any adjudicators now being hired be solely responsible for refugee claims or will they work in other areas?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. For the fiscal year 1989-90, a total of 525 person years have been allocated to the Immigration and Refugee Board. A further 217 members of the Immigration and Refugee Board, who are appointed by the Governor-in-Council, are not included in the Board's person-year allocation.

2. Staff person-years are not allocated by Division. Of 217 members of the Immigration and Refugee Board, 22 are allocated to the Immigration Appeal Division.

3. A claim to refugee status may be initiated at two distinct stages; when a person still has valid status in Canada or within the context of an immigration inquiry with respect to Immigration allegations brought against the person concerned.

All abjudicators preside over all aspects of the inquiry/hearing process. This applies whether the refugee claim is submitted by a person who has valid status in Canada, or whether the hearing into the eligibility and credible basis of the claim is conducted within the context of an immigration inquiry. In the latter case, abjudicators are also responsible for considering evidence and rendering decisions with respect to the Immigration allegations brought against the person concerned.

NATIONAIR CANADA

Question No. 164—Mr. Keyes:

Has the government provided (a) capital grants (b) loan guarantees, or (c) any other type of financial assistance to Nationair Canada, and, if so (i) in what amounts and (ii) in what years?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, the Federal Business Development Bank and the Department of Transport as follows:

a), b) & c) No.

i) and ii) Not applicable.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the government House leader have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

EL SALVADOR

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has received an application pursuant to Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Supply

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 52, I rise to request of the chair an emergency debate on the question of El Salvador.

We have seen this morning the fact that the situation is deterioration greatly. Canadians from all walks of life and the Catholic bishops appeared yesterday to talk about the importance of the Canadian presence in that region. We listened to the minister and understood that the Government of Canada is not doing anything to represent its new position, yet we were promised by the Prime Minister in his acceptance of membership at the OAS that this would now become an area where Canada would have an active and important involvement.

I think it would be important for this House to represent the concerns and feelings of many Canadians about this desperate situation in El Salvador and to give members of this House an opportunity to express their concerns on behalf of constituents and to try to develop the kinds of initiatives we think the Government of Canada should take to respond to the very tragic situation in El Salvador.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has carefully reviewed the application made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. The Chair recognizes that the matter is most serious in El Salvador at the present time.

However, the Chair does not feel that the application made by the hon. member meets the strict requirements of the standing orders at this time.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—CHILD POVERTY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Broadbent:

That this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, when we broke an hour and a quarter ago I was pointing out to the House that the fundamental responsibility for raising their children will always remain with Canadian parents themselves.

Within the Department of National Health and Welfare we have taken some important steps to help families with problems. Our family violence initiative is in its second year. This $65 million program which works in co-operation with the provinces will create many more shelter spaces for battered women and their children.

In the past family violence and child sexual abuse were seen as strictly private matters. We are only now beginning to understand the depths of these problems and the number of child abuse and wife battering cases being reported to authorities is growing dramatically.

[Translation]

The Badgley Report shows that 42 per cent of our population has at some point been a victim of unwanted sexual acts and many of these victims are children. This is a most disturbing statistic. Canada can no longer tolerate exploitation of the most vulnerable by brutal individuals.

We must pool all our resources to fight family violence. Special attention must be paid to the needs of native Canadians who, because of their isolation and poverty, suffer the tragedy of family violence.

Early in the new year, my special adviser on the sexual exploitation of children, Rix Rogers, will present me with his report, the result of two years of consultations across the country.

[English]

In the meantime, I announced recently that the federal government would support an important new national service for children in distress with $1.3 million in funding. The Kids Help Phone received more than 45,000 calls in its first six months. Three thousand of them reported that they had been abused. With an outlet like this we can start to identify those children who really need our help and concentrate more of our future efforts on them.

We will be working over the next few months to further develop programs which will be helpful. I think there is much more that we can do.

Let us focus for a minute on the future. The motion before us today sets an important goal. It calls for the elimination of poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000. What can we expect in the year 2000? What will Canada be like? We have just completed the most comprehensive demographic survey in Canadian history and it gives us a pretty good idea what is happening to families and where the population is going.

By the year 2000, roughly 12 per cent of our population will be 65 or older. Today Sweden and West Germany have more than 15 per cent. Both of these are dynamic and vibrant economies which have no difficulty supporting their social network, nor if we act prudently should Canada have difficulty, but what will change significantly over the next 10 years is the nature of the family itself. The more that I learn about families the more I realize that even today there is no such thing as an average Canadian family.

We see examples of the nuclear family, single parent families, extended families and families who choose not to have children. In our attempts to be supportive of families, we have tended to concentrate on the disfunctioning family. It is critical that we assist those who are in difficulty.

I want us to look as well at what we can do to help families which are functioning well but which may need help in some of the routine affairs of life. This means reaching children in school and teaching them that drugs or smoking will damage their mental and physical health. It means reaching parents in the workplace and teaching them how to cope with stress. It means developing a child care program which will be supportive of families. When all that fails and families break down, it means intervening and giving them the tools that they need to help themselves.

We need to develop a seamless approach to what we are doing, stitching together the disparate programs available today to build a comprehensive policy for the future.

We know that by the year 2000 there will be more women in the workforce, a trend we must expect to continue for some time. As a result we must make sure that women have full access to the labour market. This means that we have to ease the transition back and forth from child raising to the workplace.

A major challenge to the lives of children in the developing world today and possibly in the year 2000 is disease. Children in the Third World die from diseases which are easily preventable. Until recently that has not been a serious problem in Canada. We have a universal health care system which has eradicated many of these killers.

In 1982 that started to change. That was the first year we identified a case of AIDS in Canada. Since then 3,000 more have surfaced. As the disease spreads through the heterosexual community, we see more mothers giving birth to children infected with HIV.

• (1220)

In New Jersey one in seven children has the virus at birth but with many of the diseases plaguing the Third World, the situation is completely preventable. AIDS is still a new disease and we must make sure that it does not have an opportunity to become an old one.

Looking toward the year 2000 the burden of the national debt may not lighten appreciably without several more years of continued economic growth. The cruel truth is that this year we will be spending more on the debt interest payments than on old age security, family allowance, child care, health care and all of the other programs and services delivered by my department put together.

If we keep going at this rate, which is adding another $30 or $35 billion to the debt each year, by the year 2000 our accumulated debt would approach three quarters of a trillion dollars. That would be the worst thing that we could do for the future of our children.

Why should they be saddled for the excesses of their parents? We came to that realization about the environment. Why can we not come to that realization about the debt?

Over the years Canadian governments have developed a national network of social support programs that are admired by people in much of the world, including many, I believe, in this country. Despite tensions in the system today, our health care system is remarkably successful, so much so that I was recently invited to Washington to explain its workings to a group of American health care experts looking north of the border for solutions.

Each and every child in Canada must have access to adequate health care. Our goal must be to make sure that each and every child is also freed from the trap of poverty. The hon. member for Oshawa has asked us to try to eliminate poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

During Question Period he asked whether or not I was making new announcements today. I am sure that the hon. member would not expect that having just received notice of his motion late yesterday afternoon the government would redesign whole new programs simply in response. What I have tried to do is indicate today that important progress has been made, that we commit ourselves to the principle of making more progress, that we believe that we are on track in terms of moving ahead in the right direction and that by working together there is substantial progress that can be made.

Simply redistributing wealth will not help us to achieve that goal. It is essential that we increase the total amount of wealth by encouraging our economy, removing impediments to growth and reducing the burden of debt facing our children.

The point that I must repeat, almost whenever I speak as Minister of National Health and Welfare dealing with this issue related to the debt and dealing with our children's future is this. We are spending more money just for the interest charges this year on the national debt than on all of the programs administered by my department put together, all of our national health care, all of our welfare programs, all of our old age security, family allowances and so on. It is the very survival of these programs which help us to have a humane and compassionate and caring society that is in question if we do not get our economic house in order.

Our generation, the generation of the Leader of the NDP and myself, must take that initiative now. We must stop borrowing from our children's future to finance expenses today. We are concerned about poverty. We are concerned about our ability to maintain progressive social programs which will help us to alleviate the suffering of those people who are in poverty in Canada and to give opportunity to Canadian children.

It is essential that we ensure the very survival of those programs. It is essential that we get our economic house in order.

Let me conclude this way. We do not have to be afraid of the future. We have a prosperous and a dynamic economy which if managed well promises to improve even further. We have the tools to reduce the number of children living in poverty as we have for each and every year since 1984.

In a few short weeks we will be entering a new decade. This is a good time for us to reflect on the very real progress that we have made in the past and to think about what accomplishments we want in the 1990s. Any society that cares about its future must care about the plight of its children today. This government has demonstrated that commitment and I can assure you it will continue to demonstrate that commitment.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the minister's remarks. I appreciate that he did not have some overnight programs to introduce today. On the other hand, I would like to ask him if he would be prepared to make a commitment to the proposal put by my leader earlier, and that is to give leadership to calling together a national conference on the topic of elimination of child poverty.

If I recall correctly, my leader described this as a vehicle that certainly needs government leadership and would involve provinces. More than that, it would involve poverty groups, chambers of commerce, voluntary groups and all other groups that are able to become involved in solutions to poverty.

He also proposed that this action group meet annually, establish timetables and targets and have a monitoring function.

I would like to add to that. During Question Period the minister felt he was unable to answer anything about housing or tax measures, things that were in other departments, or whether such a conference would involve a number of federal ministries so that there would be a comprehensive consideration of solutions and then an action plan.

Would he commit himself to at least calling this kind of a conference during the next year?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, in his remarks the leader of the New Democratic party made about six or seven separate proposals for steps that he felt would be important steps in dealing with poverty, ranging from increasing subsidized housing to increasing the minimum wage to having a continuing national conference with regard to child poverty.

Certainly we will look at all of the recommendation he made. We are pleased to do that. We appreciate any suggestions that are made by him and by his colleagues. Additionally, the issue of poverty is obviously one that is on the agenda on a continuing basis when we meet with the provinces and when we meet with colleagues from other departments.

The focus I have had during the time which I have been Minister of National Health and Welfare is broader than simply the focus on child poverty. I think that is one essential element of the concern we should have. My concern has been a broader one in trying to look at problems of families. It means economic problems, socials problems such as familial violence. It means problems such as child sexual abuse. It means a whole range of other issues that we should be pulling together and not looking at in a disjointed, separate isolated way. Rather the tests that we want to apply, the government initiatives at all levels, should be: Are these initiatives supportive of families? Do they help families to function well and do they help with interventions in cases where families become disfunctioning?

Today the leader of the NDP asked me to give a commitment with regard to increased subsidized housing. One of the areas where the government has acted and which I can tell him about today where significant progress has been made is in Project Haven, a program that was under the leadership of my colleague who is responsible for housing.

What we have done is significantly increase moneys going to the provinces to provide shelters for women and for children who are in homes which are abusive. We are pleased to say that the take–up on that program has been very considerable by the provinces. It allows us to intervene in instances where children and wives are in situations where they are physically in danger and to provide alternatives.

The leader of the NDP would no doubt propose other initiatives that we could take as well. We are glad to take a look at any of those. I think it is important when we deal with family measures to not look at them simply in an isolated way, independent of everything else that is being done, but begin to stitch them together, take a much more holistic approach and begin to apply a test to government programs as to whether they are supportive of families or not, instead of looking at them in a scattered and fragmented way.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the minister a very specific question.

During the course of his remarks, he talked about the government wanting to fulfil its commitment of two years ago to bring in the child care program. I want to ask the minister specifically when exactly can we expect that child care program to be brought into the House? Do we have a timetable? Is it going to be at the end of this term or is it going to be within the next month or two?

• (1230)

The fact is that we have waited a year since the election and there has been absolutely no indication of when there would be a bill, so I want to know, does he have a timetable that he can share with the House today?

Second, in bringing forward that legislation, has the government looked at the very serious criticisms raised by the number of associations representing child care workers and previous bill brought in by his predecessor which showed serious inadequacies? It was really not going to add any new spaces. It was going to sort of eliminate a number of the opportunities that child care should have. Can we expect a new, better, reformed, revised child care bill taking into account those commentaries and critiques that were raised by the child care community in Canada?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, I wish that we had national child care legislation in place today. He knows as well as I do why we do not. The legislation died on the Order Paper before Parliament because of delays in the House of Commons and the Senate in getting it passed before Parliament was dissolved.

I think that members who opposed the bill made an error. I do not think the government ever held it out as something that was perfect or that was beyond improvement. But it would have given us a basis on which to establish a national child care system and on which to build and evolve a new system.

The commitment that has been made by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of Finance, by the Speech from the Throne, by myself and by the minister responsible for the status of women has been that during the life of this Parliament, we will have a new program in place, not promised, not progressing through Parliament but in place.

In the meantime, we continue to fund programs for child care. As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, this year if you consider the tax measures, if you consider spending under CAP, if you consider the child care initiatives fund and a range of other initiatives we have taken, the federal government will be putting slightly less than $1 billion into child care in Canada. It is a significant amount of money.

In the case of the Canada Assistance Plan, it is entirely open-ended. We are anticipating an increase of some $40 million this year in transfers to the provinces under CAP. But if the provinces decide to increase spending on child care beyond that, the program is open-ended and the federal government will pay some 50 cents out of every dollar that is eligible that is spent by the provinces. As a consequence then we are seeing a significant commitment to child care and one which is going to increase.

The other element of the hon. member's question was whether the government is taking on board criticisms or comments or suggestions made by people in response to the previous legislation. Yes, we are.

I have had the opportunity to meet with my provincial colleagues and a number of national organizations and to visit a number of child care centres. As we come back to Parliament with proposals with regard to child care, what we will be doing is trying to ensure that the package we present to Parliament is one which is as contemporary and responsive to present circumstances as possible and one that meets the national need.

What is the need? The need is to dramatically increase the number of spaces in Canada. The need is to ensure that they are high quality spaces. The need is also to ensure that Canadian families have freedom of choice and that parents themselves have the ability to take a decision as to what the most appropriate form of child care is for them.

I think that within those principles, I am certainly open to have representations from any member of the House or from others with regard to what the nature of the program should be. But in the meantime, we are continuing to spend a significant amount of money to provide child care spaces.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the motion placed before the House by my colleague, the hon. member for Oshawa, is of profound concern and of great importance to Liberal Members of Parliament as well as to the rank and file of the Liberal Party of Canada.

The substance of the motion, that is dealing with the plight of poor Canadian children, ought to be one of the highest priorities for all members of this great institution. Today, many Canadians enjoy a quality of life, a standard of living, which leaves many throughout the world envious of our socio-economic status. There are, however, certain hard realities whose consequences are inescapable. To deny that childhood poverty is not common in Canada would be totally irresponsible and factually incorrect.

I believe it important that we place on the record certain facts which are indisputable. More than 1 million Canadian children live in poverty, up 120,000 since 1980, and over 60 per cent of these children come from single female-led families who are poor.

Canada's children are poor because their parents are poor. The gap between the rich and the poor is sadly growing and growing under this administration. The poorest 40 per cent of Canadians received less of Canada's total income in 1986 than they did in 1980. At the same time, the wealthiest 40 per cent increased their share of the total income.

Poor children suffer ill health, hardship and educational failure. Twice as many poor children fall behind in school as do children from rich families. According to the National Council on Welfare, children now make up the single largest group of poor people in the country. In 1986, more than 1 million children were growing up in poverty. That is about one child in six.

The poverty rate for families headed by persons not in the labour force is approximately 23 per cent compared to 9 per cent for families in which the head of the family is doing paid work. The risk of poverty is greater for young children. Twenty-one per cent of children below the age of six and 19 per cent of those between the ages of six and 14 are growing up in poverty.

There are almost 7.5 million Canadian children under the age of 20 in Canada. In 1985, 6,000 of those children died. Of the 365,000 babies born in Canada in 1985, nearly 3,000 died before reaching their first birthday.

A recent Canadian survey indicated that the child mortality rate is twice as high among families at the lowest income level than among those at the highest income level.

Other facts are clear, unequivocal and very disheartening. The major cause of hospitalization of children under 14 is respiratory illness. A recent Canadian study indicated that the mortality rate from respiratory illness was twice as high among boys and six times higher among girls from low-income families than among children of high-income families.

A recent study in Ontario found that being on welfare was one of the strongest predictors of psychiatric disorders and chronic health problems among children. When you review the statistics as evidenced by agencies of the Government of Canada, one is not only disconcerted with these facts but, indeed, I find them to be alarming.

Child poverty statistics on a province by province basis in 1986 show that in the province of Newfoundland, a province dear to my heart, families in excess of 44,000 were believed to be in poverty. Female single parents in that province number roughly 7,800, that being a percentage of 72.9 per cent. In Nova Scotia, my own province, 39,000 families were found to be in poverty. The female single parents in that province number roughly 15,000 for a percentage of 70.9 per cent found to be below the poverty level for children under 16 years of age.

Such families in the province of Alberta number 93,000. Female single parents number 34,000 for a percentage of 51.3. So goes the statistics which for all of us must be alarming and it deserves our careful attention and speedy action.

• (1240)

Let me discuss native people. In 1977, the number of hospital admissions of native Indians because of infections and parasitic diseases was about seven times higher than the national average. In 1983, the mortality rate among native infants was two times higher for Indians, four times higher for Inuit than the national rate. In 1982, the mortality rate was almost three times higher for native children ages one to four years than for non-native children. And the facts go on.

Native Canadians are also at risk. In 1981, 50 per cent of native people were in the labour force and the average income was two-thirds less for natives than for non-natives.

I put these facts on the record, not to be disputatious with my colleagues who will speak after me, but it is an attempt to have members of Parliament focus on the true meaning of those particular facts and the consequences of them for young Canadians.

I do not speak today of bridges. I do not speak of airplanes, bricks and mortar. I speak of young Canadians who have dreams and aspirations as diverse as those of the men and women who occupy these seats in perhaps the greatest institution in the world.

The human face of poverty in our country must be described, it must be articulated, but more important, it must be felt and it requires action by those of us who now occupy positions of responsibility.

A report in my own province entitled Women and Children Last of February, 1989 talks about single mothers on welfare in the province of Nova Scotia. For the benefit of those members who are here today, I would like to read two excerpts for their edification and, indeed, for their reflection.

This is a social worker in the province of Nova Scotia commenting on a situation. I quote from page 56 of that document:

> A social worker at the Izaak Walton Killam Children's Hospital has seen single mothers bringing their babies into the emergency room with diarrhea and vomiting. They tell the doctors who examine their babies that they have been feeding them diluted whole milk, or Similac diluted at twice the normal amount. Their welfare checks were insufficient to permit them to buy Similac, which is much more costly than milk, or to buy enough of it. A month's supply of Similac costs around $60. These mothers are not aware that their efforts to stretch an inadequate income have led to their babies' illnesses. "They just blanch at the thought of having to give the proper amount of Similac because of the cost."

A basic necessity of life for young children is milk. We have not only in my province but across this country individuals confronted with similar serious situations. I believe that to be horrifying for Canadians anywhere in this great country.

Page 57 of the same document talks about a child with asthma:

> The medications and Medi-Mist he needs cost between $80 and $100 a month. But $80 or $100 is far beyond the means of his mother, who receives Family Benefits. The tragic consequence for this child and others like him is that he is not getting the treatment he needs. When asthma is poorly controlled, a child is much more likely to suffer from attacks of life-threatening breathlessness. Hospitalization may follow such crises. The child may have to spend approximately ten days in hospital before his asthma can be brought under control. Then the vicious cycle is likely to repeat itself a few weeks or a few months later, when once again, the child's parent is unable to afford the treatments he needs.

This again is another real life example, not some bare-faced statistic found within Statistics Canada or the National Council on Welfare. It is real people experiencing the difficulties and the necessities of trying to have a healthy and happy life.

For what it is worth, it must be frustrating for those who are out there confronted with these serious issues and the problems that they manufacture not only for poor children, but for poor families, to see that our government has reacted not in a great positive way but indeed in a negative way. There has been the partial deindexing of family allowance, the reduced turnover point for the refundable child tax credit threshold which the RCTC has decreased based on family earnings from $26,300 to $23,500, partial deindexing of this threshold level, the net effect which will be an increasing number of near-poor families losing some of that child tax credit. There has been a reduction in the child tax exemption from $710 to $390 by 1989, and a partial deindexing of this exemption. Tax reform has since reduced this exemption to a rather insignificant credit of $65.

I could go on with regard to the lack of programs in terms of child care or in terms of the proliferation of personal income taxes that have caused grief to many Canadians and particularly poor families.

The motion put forward by my colleague from Oshawa was done, I think, in an attempt to marshall and harness the spirit which is within Parliament to address this problem not only conceptually but, indeed, from an action perspective.

The causes of child poverty are great and many. Child poverty is directly related to family poverty, and families without meaningful employment and economic opportunities in this country continue to find that their plight and the plight of their children will be directly related to those economic opportunities.

An inadequate educational and training system both at the federal and at the provincial levels is also facilitating the difficulties in terms of causing poverty and child poverty in this country. The lack of affordable, accessible and quality child care in this country again is another cause, a cause in which I believe all of us should join and try to find new child care spaces in this country.

There has also been a failure of institutions, the failure of Parliament to deal with the necessities that young poverty-stricken children will have to face, but also the failure of other institutions such as the courts which have been less than adequate, have not persevered, have not been vigorous in forcing maintenance orders upon those spouses who duly must and ought to pay those maintenance payments to families who are in need of that financial assistance.

It is an absolute disgrace that an institution such as the courts across this country, administered by the provinces, are allowing individuals to act irresponsibly and not pay the maintenance orders that a court deemed to be appropriate.

About the welfare system itself, I could tell you story upon story. I come from a riding where the poverty is real and the welfare system acts to prohibit and restrict the incentive of the individual.

• (1250)

In Nova Scotia, we have a system which I would deem archaic. The cross-examination and the evaluations that these people must go through in order to receive some assistance to care for their children and their families is, in many instances, unbelievable.

When you lose your dignity, you lose everything, and I would hope that as we reflect upon the substance of this motion, as we reflect upon what we can do as parliamentarians, we will look squarely and clearly at the national systems that we have in place which are very inadequate indeed in addressing the concerns of our welfare system.

Many of those individuals who work in that system are caring, compassionate, loving persons. But equally so, I am afraid to say, there are numerous individuals who have lost the compassion, the sensitivity and the understanding to deal with those problems with which they are being confronted with on a daily basis.

I recognize that my time is limited. However, I would like to close, if I may, with a quote from a book entitled Two Worlds of Childhood. It says the following which I believe to be descriptive of the substance and the spirit of the motion today and hopefully can be descriptive of the action that we as a Parliament may take:

> This is the place to start, for that is where the children are. For only a hard look at the world in which they live—a world we adults have created for them in large part by default—can convince us of the urgency of their plight and the consequences of our inaction. Then perhaps it will come to pass that, in the words of Isaiah, "A little child shall lead them."

I urge all members to support the motion to demonstrate to Canadians that Parliament, the rock of democracy, has the capacity, and, more important, the political will to confront and to resolve child poverty throughout this great nation.

[Translation]

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's speech in the lobby and here in the House, and the Minister has said, and we will say it again today in the course of this debate, that we fully support the motion presented by the Leader of the New Democratic Party However, poverty among children is not something that came out of the blue. I may remind the hon. member that a political party and a government must have vision and look to the future.

When the Liberal government was in power, at the beginning of the quiet revolution, it was a time when families started to have problems and women were taking their place in society. At the same time, divorce, separation, and so forth, were becoming more common. And at a time when this country needed a long-term policy that would prepare for the impact of the quiet revolution on today's society, the government went off on an incredible spending spree with taxpayers' money. In my own riding, we had the expropriation of 97,000 acres for Mirabel. Millions of dollars of taxpayers' money was spent for nothing, because the government was later obliged to sell the land back to the owners.

I would like to ask the hon. member who was a member of the Liberal government for almost a quarter of a century, for 25 years, how he can—we all agree that child poverty is insidious, it is unacceptable, it does not make sense and that everyone must do what he can to help alleviate the problem. However, I wish the hon. member would explain how we can deal with child poverty if we take only a fraction of the money we need to pay the interest on the cost of servicing the debt, because that is what we are doing now. We have a national debt that has assumed incredible proportions, while at the same time, as we approach the year 2000, we must deal with the problems of sexual abuse. I am very much concerned, and the subject was brought up by the hon. member and the minister as well, and the Rix Rogers report will be submitted very shortly, and I am sure that all members will be appalled when they read that in Canada, more and more children are suffering sexual abuse, children that today need treatment because after sexual abuse something must be done. But all this takes enormous amounts of money! The last ministers' conference made it abundantly clear that the needs that exist are an administrative nightmare. So could the hon. member explain what he did when he was in the government to try and deal with this problem or to take preventive action?

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the time allowed me is sufficient to explain all of the positive things that my government was able to do in the years in which I was fortunate enough to be a representative of the people of my constituency from 1980 to 1984. I do wish to say to the hon. member that I know she would not want us to enter into a long, winding debate of political partisanship and of pointing the blame at different individuals. However, since she has done that, it may be necessary for me to accommodate the hon. member in response to the question she raises.

There is no question that for governments at every level, Conservative, Liberal and NDP, provincially and federally, there is sufficient blame to go around. If members of Parliament want to point the finger at someone else other than themselves, that is fine, but that does nothing to eradicate the serious situation which affects young children and families in this country.

Yes, there were family allowances. Yes, we did something with regard to the Canada Assistance Act. Yes, we did many things with regard to the child tax credit. A whole host of things took place with regard to trying to address some of those issues.

But I say to the hon. member that that ought not to be the question. The question that she poses is: Where is the money? Where is the money going to come from in addressing this most serious situation? I suggest to the hon. member that one must have a vision of one's nationhood. You must have a vision as to where you wish your children to be, and then you assess your priorities accordingly.

We learn every day that governments give moneys to questionable enterprises. We learn every day that national governments refuse, for whatever reasons, to collect appropriate taxes from corporations that ought to be paying them. We learn that governments give moneys to their friends and to their political cronies. But on the other hand—and this is a serious point—we give very little in terms of money, time and concerted effort with regard to child poverty and poverty as a whole.

So I would say to the hon. member that perhaps she ought to change her vision as to where she wishes this nation to go. Yes, members on this side are concerned with regard to the deficit as are members on that side and I am sure are members to the left. But if you want to eradicate child poverty in this country, your view must change. You must have the political will. You must have the courage to say no to the corporate elite in this country who get off without paying appropriate taxes. You must say no to your political cronies wherever they may be and provide the appropriate money for child care. You must say no to those provincial governments who wish to extract money from the Government of Canada and then spend it elsewhere. That is what you must do.

• (1300)

I urge the hon. member to change the vision that she may have, that her party certainly has, in order to rectify and to put a priority with regard to child poverty and poverty as well.

Mrs. Bourgault: Are we still on questions and comments, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dionne): No, we are not.

[Translation]

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, for your information and that of hon. members, the government agreed that we would get ten minutes speaking time and—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dionne): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties. I think you will find that there is agreement that while we will continue with our usual rotation of speakers, if one of the parties wishes to break up the 20-minute speech and 10-minute question and comment period they could do that by having a 10-minute speech and a five-minute question and comment period and take two of those. I would seek the unanimous consent of the House to allow that to occur for the rest of the day to enable the maximum number of speakers to have a chance to raise their voice on this most important issue.

Mr. Dingwall: This matter has not come to my attention since the hon. member has just raised it. Perhaps we could continue on with the speaking order that we have in place I could report to him very shortly in terms of whether or not that consensus can be given on behalf of our party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dionne): In that case I recognize the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I will try to limit my remarks so that others will have an opportunity to speak on this very important topic.

I am sure all members of the House were very moved, as I certainly was, at the last address from my leader, the hon. member or Oshawa, when he spoke so emotionally about the importance of us taking action together to eliminate child poverty in Canada. His approach was non-partisan and appealed to all parties and to all leaders across Canada because, of course, provinces have a very important role in this mission.

He appealed to the media. I could not agree with him more. The media must take a much greater responsibility to make the public aware that this is one of the most tragic aspects of life in Canada today. We do not want it just to be done at Christmas time. I think a lot of us talk about the funds for children at Christmas and then we forget them the rest of the year.

Our leader spoke about the tragedy in the fact that one in four children in Canada are poor. This figure is not diminishing very quickly at all. He said that 151,000 children line up at food banks each month. From 1974 to 1986 we know that 86 per cent of the working poor families increased and this was an increase of about 19 per cent. Poverty for families is still in a very devastating situation and there is no question that we need concerted action from all of us.

Last year I had the honour to chair an interparliamentary committee which met as part of the Interparliamentary Union Conference in Hungary. We studied the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and made resolutions to the larger body.

I want to say that I was very moved by the representations from delegates from many different countries of the world who spoke of the situation of children. They spoke of children in many Third World countries who are dying of starvation and preventable disease, children who were being brain damaged and permanently disabled by malnutrition, children who were abandoned because of war and poverty and the movements of people in many countries, and the serious neglect that comes with poverty in every country of the world. The people we talked to from Third World countries could not understand how, in a country as affluent and well endowed as Canada with our rich resources and our low birth rate, we could have over a million children who are poor.

We know that in Third World countries one of the reasons they cannot make any headway, in fact they are going backward in trying to provide a floor of health and welfare services that would protect children, is because of the immense pressures of international debt, a debt which we should be doing something about. We do not have those kinds of restrictions. Yet we have children who are lining up at food banks every month.

Canada is a signatory to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. This week we actually signed the formal declaration that passed the UN. We have an obligation to act here in Canada. We must bring our standards up to recognize the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development. That is what we said we would do when we signed that agreement.

The motion that is before us today in the House asks us to seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000. I wish we could agree to take major steps in this direction during 1990. I, for one, am not satisfied to wait until the year 2000. If we were to delay action until the year 2000 we would have a whole generation of children who would continue to be victimized and damaged and who as adults would be unable to function adequately in society. The unending cycle of poverty from family to family would continue.

As my leader pointed out, the solution to poverty is to get more money into the households of poor families. He proposed several specific measures to reduce poverty which I would just like to summarize again.

He proposed that we should have action on the part of the federal government, something which could be done immediately, to raise the federal minimum wage which is the lowest in Canada, and that this minimum wage should be indexed so that it provides jobs at adequate incomes for poor families.

He proposed that family allowance and the child tax credit, the two federal programs that are targeted directly to families and to children, and particularly to low-income families, should be raised. I would propose that we consider raising this to 20 per cent in 1990.

He proposed reintroduction of effective and affordable quality child care programs.

He also proposed a national conference on the elimination of child poverty involving the provinces, municipalities, voluntary agencies, labour, chambers of commerce, and all people, including all federal departments that can make some impact on poverty in Canada. He proposed that this group meet annually, establish targets and timetables and in fact to act as an advocacy group and an ombudsman group to make sure we take practical and specific steps as quickly as possible to alleviate poverty for children in Canada.

The minister talked in vague terms about redistributing wealth and rationalized some of the credit programs which we do not believe have been very effective for low-income families. He talked about increasing the amount of wealth in Canada. I want to say that children are being victimized now. They will not be victimized further because of the national debt in Canada. Children should not be sacrificed to the national debt.

If we were to put money now into satisfactory incomes for low-income families with children, we could have one million poor children over the next 10 years who would be adequately nourished, have adequate housing and child care and the opportunities to grow into mature adulthood. This would, in effect, result in one million adults and their families who would break the poverty cycle and who would become contributors to the tax system of Canada. Even in economic terms, we have to take action.

We need the political will to address this problem, and we need it on all sides of this House. Unfortunately, I must say that the policies carried out by this government have not addressed this issue, and I do not want to dwell on this today, but we must remember that the trade deal and the shifting of production south of the border is very hard for families. Changes to UI will restrict benefits for many low-income families. The national child care program has been indefinitely postponed. The clawback of family allowance and old age security benefits are a direct impact on low-income families.

The lack of monitoring of the Canada assistance cost-shared programs and the threats to cut shared programs with the provinces are also of great concern, not to mention the increasing impact of both the goods and services tax and the inflation that will hit low-income families as a result.

What can we all do together to really make some impact on poverty? First of all, we need to have major increases in family incomes. I would suggest that although there are many people who are poor, including single people and still many single older women, who we must not forget, that probably there is some justification to targeting a major income increase to families with young children.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dionne): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but her speaking time has expired. There are five minutes for questions and answers.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I was wondering if perhaps the hon. member who has just spoken might have further comments in this regard she would wish to make.

Ms. Mitchell: I would be very pleased to finish my remarks very quickly, Mr. Speaker.

Not only do we need to increase incomes, we need to have affordable housing for low-income families. So much of their incomes goes to rent. We must have an affordable, good child care program across this country. Of course, we have to change policies in order to redistribute income.

I just want to say in closing that I hope we will all work, perhaps through the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, as an all-party action group to sponsor a national conference on the elimination of child poverty, and to get on with the specific measures in the federal jurisdiction which we can take immediately to make some impact on this problem.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my appreciation for the opportunity to join in this debate. I wish also to congratulate my leader on his last speech in this body for bringing up a subject that I think this body tends to avoid or to steer around because we are all a bit ashamed of the figures concerning child poverty and the figures relating to poverty in this country.

I was pleased to see at the beginning of the debate how members seemed to adopt this issue as one that was rather non-partisan, we would all like to deal. I hope as a result of this debate the few examples of partisanship that did introduce themselves will be forgotten. I hope that ultimately the wording of the motion will be the thing that will be remembered by people in this House. Essentially, what this motion is asking us to do is to set as a priority the elimination in this country of child poverty by the year 2000. If there is anything we choose to remember about the Leader of the New Democratic Party and about this debate, it should be the challenge that he has thrown out to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada. This is a personal challenge that I think he has taken on, to eliminate this terrible child poverty that we experience in this country by a certain time period.

I do not think we could expect the Minister of National Health and Welfare to come back within the scope of this debate and list a series of priorities which he would adopt under this motion. I certainly would have hoped for a commitment from the minister and perhaps from his parliamentary secretary that he would go out and take part in the structure suggested, such as a national conference on poverty, or perhaps by referring the issue to the health and welfare committee of this House. I hope that he will work to develop a series of programs that would ultimately result in achieving the challenge that the Leader of the New Democratic Party has set for us.

I do not want to go through the statistics that have already been enumerated by a number of the speakers in this debate. They are terrifying statistics especially, for those who experience the reality of poverty in their day-to-day life. What struck me was one of those statistics which points out that in the industrialized countries of the world, Canada is the second worst in terms of child poverty. We are second only to the United States in how poorly we deal with this problem.

The member for Oshawa pointed out to us that there are other countries to which we can look as models and countries which seem to have established as a priority the elimination of child poverty. These are countries which are doing much better than we are. If there are these models around the globe, then at least we should be committing ourselves to look at these models to see how they do it, at least to examine their priorities and possibly try to match our priorities to theirs in terms of eliminating poverty.

The fact is hundreds of thousands of Canadian children go to bed hungry every single night of the year. Hundreds of thousands of children go to school every morning without an adequate breakfast and without a school lunch. They do not perform well in school as a result of the fact that they have a problem of poor nutrition. They suffer academically as a result and often cannot complete their schooling because of nutritional and other problems.

There are tens of thousands of children in this country who as a result of inadequate clothing, inadequate insulation in their homes and sometimes a lack of fuel altogether, suffer more than other children in this country from common diseases such as respiratory diseases and others which can be easily dealt with if they had proper clothing, shelter and fuel or the wherewithal to acquire those things. Unfortunately in Canada there are tens of thousands of children and tens of thousands of families who do not have the wherewithal.

In large part the blame for that problem lies with we in this House, because of the things we do or neglect to do. It is because of the priorities that we establish or neglect that those children and their families are suffering in poverty.

There is a group in British Columbia called End Legislative Poverty. Poverty in this country is not an accident. It is not an accident of any individual. People who are poor are not necessarily lazy or incompetent. They are not necessarily people who cannot obtain the wherewithal to live normal lives. Poverty in this country is legislated. It is legislated through what we do in this House or what we omit to do in this House. We on all sides of this House are the people who are responsible for the problem of poverty in Canada.

I reject the suggestions made by one member opposite who would wish to blame a previous government for creating the debt problem here.

• (1320)

I recall the minister saying that one of the problems we have is that when the economy expands we are going to be able to look after the issue of poverty. On the other hand he is saying that when the economy goes down again those people are going to become poor again. We are going to leave those people subject to the variations in the economy. That does not make sense. We have to establish an absolute priority in this House that no Canadian is going to be pushed into poverty as a result of the variations in the economy. If any government has that policy, it does not belong in government. If any member has that policy, they do not belong in this House.

I look back on a statement made by Abraham Lincoln. He said, "This nation cannot exist half slave and half free". If he qualified that statement by saying, "except in bad economic times", we would never remember that President as a great liberator. In fact, his name would have been tarnished from that day to this.

Our object in this Parliament should be to follow the challenge that the Leader of the New Democratic Party has laid out for us, that is, to set as a goal for the year 2000 that no child in this country should be a poor child, that no family in this country should be a poor family. This country is rich enough and we as a collective are wealthy enough to make sure that is the case. I think what simply remains for us to do is to set that goal for ourselves and to work hard to reach that goal. That can be done through the conference that our leader has suggested, as well as through establishing priorities through a committee of the House—whatever it takes. Let us, out of this debate, establish that as our goal.

I think we should put a banner up in the House outlining the goal to eliminate child poverty in this country by 2000. I think we should put other banners up showing how we perform as those figures go down. By my stars, if those figures do not go down, then we do not deserve to be re-elected as members of this House. Let us establish that goal. Let us set it up where we can see it. Let us challenge ourselves every single day to make sure that we accomplish it.

A part of the problem in this issue is the attitudes that we hold as a group. People in Canada think that those who are poor are all on welfare. As the gentleman who spoke previously pointed out, in fact the vast majority of people who are poor in this country work for a living, and they work hard. In some cases because they work at minimum wages, very low wages, they work at two jobs. In some cases, both heads of families work. So it is very difficult when you tell people that they should work in order to get out of poverty and they find themselves going deeper and deeper into poverty. While costs go up, while taxes go up, and while interest rates go up the fact is the minimum wage has stayed very low. The minimum wage in this country is not sufficient for hard working people to work themselves out of poverty. I applaud my leader for his suggestion to raise that minimum wage so that we can bring those people who work for a living out of poverty.

There is also the suggestion that poor people are all on welfare and that they do not pay their own way. Studies which have been carried out across this country, in particular at Dalhousie University in Nova Scotia, have analyzed the taxes paid by poor people. The results show that not only do they pay for their own programs, they pay more. They pay for other people as well, people who are not poor.

There is a serious problem with the way taxes are structured in this country. There are taxes that favour rich people and which are generous to them but which create a burden and an oppression on the poor. There are many things that have to be done in order to eliminate the problem of poverty in this country.

I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I will tell the rest of the people in this House, the one thing that first needs to be done is the one thing that is called for in this motion. Members of Parliament unanimously have to establish as a goal the elimination of child poverty by the year 2000. We should establish that out of this motion making it a goal of this Parliament.

[Translation]

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member whether he could give us some suggestions, since he says the government should introduce legislation. Does he have any suggestions about the kind of legislation the government should table in the House to deal with the problem of child poverty, and doesn't he think that one way to deal with poverty is to ensure that families have access to jobs? Is he prepared to acknowledge that the government—although of course it was not 100 per cent, since nobody is perfect—has made considerable progress, since the unemployment rate has declined from 11.6 per cent in September 1984 to 7.4 per cent in October this year, and the youth unemployment rate has declined from 18.2 to 11.3 per cent? Will the hon. member acknowledge that the government deserves some credit for introducing policies that promote job creation in this country?

[English]

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for her question. I would like to point out that many of the jobs that have been created since the recession of 1981–1982 are part-time jobs at very low rates of pay, in fact at minimum wages both in the provinces and nationally. As I pointed out in my speech, those people who are working at those minimum wages, in some cases at two jobs, simply cannot make the money to make ends meet, to feed their families, to get decent shelter, to put decent clothing on their children and to provide for decent education and medical care.

As a response to the question I just want to give the example of a woman in my riding who, as a result of a marriage breakdown, went on welfare. She felt humiliated by being on welfare. Her daughter had a chronic illness. Although welfare provided her with a less than adequate income, fortunately, it provided her with free medical care, free dental care and with prescription drugs that her daughter desperately required.

When she tried to take training to go back to work to become a legal assistant she was disqualified from welfare because the course was one year long. She went anyway and was able to beat the system and take that course.

Then she went to work in a lawyer's office and she was paid at the minimum wage. She lost the right to those free medical, dental and prescription drug benefits. She ended up making less on the minimum wage than she made when she was on welfare. Her daughter's health was put into jeopardy as a result of that.

What we need is a system that addresses those kinds of obstructions to work and that raises the minimum wage so that people who are working can look after their children and are not forced to sacrifice the health and safety of their children simply by getting off welfare and going to work.

There are a lot of things that need to be done. We are the people who have the power to do it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to the motion on child poverty.

On behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare I would also like to take this opportunity to thank the leader of the New Democratic Party on behalf of the poor childen in this country, for addressing their concerns in his last speech on an opposition day. It is an eloquent example of the hon. member's great sensitivity to the problems of the neediest in our society.

I sincerely hope that after he leaves Parliament, the hon. member will continue his active involvement in addressing the terrible problem of child poverty and especially, Mr.Speaker, the appalling increase in child sexual abuse.

I think that as a private citizen, the hon. member for Oshawa would be in an excellent position to increase Canadians' awareness of this very serious problem.

The family is our starting point in this world. It is the environment in which we grow up and it teaches us sharing and compassion.

Although we are aware of the problems facing families today, we must not forget that most families, whatever their structure or status, are responsible and take care of their family members and are proud to see them grow up and make their way in this world.

• (1330)

When I was growing up, Mr. Speaker, most of our families consisted of a father who worked outside the house and a mother who worked at home. We had strict discipline and felt secure in our family unit. However, as we approach the year 2000, the family is undergoing major changes and faces economic pressures and significant challenges.

In over 60 per cent of Canadian households, both spouses are in the labour force. Thus, most children live in an environment where their parents do double duty: Work outside and family responsibilities. Many of these children, who do not receive the same family support as I did when I was growing up, do not feel loved and wanted; they often feel as though they are in the way because when their mother comes home from work, she is pre-occupied and perhaps unfortunately does not have the time to give them all the attention they deserve.

Furthermore, one marriage in three ends in divorce or separation. Therefore, the probability that Canadian children will spend part of their childhood in a single-parent family increases every day.

These facts shape the daily reality of today's younger generation, and as decision-makers, we cannot escape them. Child poverty is also another reality for some Canadian families. One child in six is poor, as poverty is defined in Canada. This situation could jeopardize the development of some of tomorrow's adults and their chance to reach their full potential; we cannot be indifferent to it.

That is why the government has taken action to support the family. Without resting on our laurels, of course, we must be glad that child poverty has declined since the Conservative Government took power. This improvement is due to the economic recovery of recent years, the lower unemployment rate which has benefited all families and social programs for the economic betterment of families. Economic priorities are the guarantee of our future prosperity.

In that respect I should mention the value of the refundable child tax credit which is designed to help low—and middle-income families and which has gone up by 50 per cent since 1984, from $367 to $565. Close to five million children stand to benefit from this measure this year. For that credit alone the federal government will issue cheques totalling about $2 million.

Aware of the tight financial situation of families with children, in November the government sends an advance part payment of the child tax credit to eligible households. Mr. Speaker, God knows the month is well chosen—just in time for Christmas! We also help support families through the monthly family allowances paid for each child under age 18.

This year, roughly 6.6 million children will be entitled to the allowance and the federal government's outlay will amount to about S2.6 billion. In the Province of Quebec alone, 1.6 million children receive the monthly allowance.

Mr. Speaker, I might point out that pursuant to specific Family Allowances Act criteria the provinces may choose the way to distribute the allowances. This enables them to give greater consideration to their own priorities. The Province of Quebec avails itself of this provision. For instance, Quebec youths aged 12 to 17 inclusive get a higher allowance than younger children. The amount of the allowance also increases according to the child's rank in the family.

We know for a fact that poverty is more prevalent among children of single-parent families. It is more difficult for a single parent to assume his or her economic and family responsibilities in a world where two parents generally look after the child. What is more, the economic situation of a single-parent family takes a turn for the worse when the marriage breaks up.

Anxious to help the provinces enforce support orders and family agreements, the federal government has created two services. The first uses federal data banks such as the unemployment insurance benefits central file to keep track of parents who have defaulted in their financial obligations. The second service recuperates from the defaulter parent the amounts administered and paid out by the federal government such as tax refunds and public pension plan or unemploymewnt insurance benefits.

Although these services have been operative for only a few years, they report that the number of retraced parents and seized funds is on the increase. Single parent families are the first to benefit from these improvements. Thanks to the new GST, the tax system will be made more equitable through a number of integrated changes which will make it possible for low income families to receive tax credits. So, following the implementation of the new GST, families earning under $30,000 a year will be much better off.

The government has publicly commited itself to supporting families through social measures aimed at developing a day care network and at ending family violence. Let us not overlook the significance of the Canada Assistance Plan whose costs are equally shared by the Federal and Provincial Governments and whose purpose is to provide financial assistance to needy families. Let us not forget either the convention on the Rights of the Child which was proposed and adopted this week by the United Nations, more specifically on November 20. The purpose of this Convention is to set up modern international standards aimed at protecting the social, economic, political, religious, cultural and civil rights of children.

Mr. Speaker, in order to live up to these new international standards, we will have to amend our relevant legislation. In my humble opinion, I feel that in view of these rights, we will have to take steps to make sure that physically and sexually abused children are getting the help they need to overcome the trauma they have suffered. I am thoroughly convinced that as we near year 2000, the growth of this country will largely depend on our investments in our human resources, and this from childhood.

I have examined here only some of the steps the federal government has taken in its effort to eliminate poverty among young Canadian children. At the provincial level, non-government and community organizations play an essential role. I will mention for instance the province of Quebec which has adopted a family policy dealing with several aspects of family life.

In conclusion, I should like to say that the family represents our main institution and our children the future of our society. I am 39 years old and childless which I consider a personal tragedy. For that reason, I love other people's children, and I just could not tolerate anybody hurting any of my nephews, nieces or any other children I know.

Within the next few months, Rix Rogers, a special advisor on sexually abused children, will submit a long awaited report. I wish to emphasize once more that I am determined to ensure that the federal government, together with the provinces, implements its recommendations, in order to deal once and for all in a fair fashion with the serious problem of child abuse.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for her comments, and I agree that a number of programs have been continued, that some improvements have been made in some cases, and that a few new but rather limited initiatives have been taken.

[English]

Here is the record as I understand it. There have been 31 tax increases during the last five years. There has been a goods and services tax proposed affecting disproportionately the poor. In spite of the comments that have been made to the contrary, we get no agreement from the poor on that.

• (1340)

There will be a goods and services tax that taxes sports such as ringette, hockey, bowling, private music lessons, books and other reading materials, many of those very important to children and poor children in particular, non credit college and university courses, and even the simple niceties of life such as candies and other treats, as well as certain health services such as psychological services and the services of psysiotherapists. There is also the content of the last budget which a lot of people called an anti-family budget; it claws back from seniors and it claws back from families. How have these helped? If one looks at the total context, how have these helped to reduce the three and one-half to five million poor in Canada, and the little over one million children, the almost one million families, many of them single parent familiesled primarily by women, and the over one million unattached adults, most of whom are women? How has it reduced the food banks that we are told are of the order of 150 to 160 and the soup kitchens? How has it helped the unemployed who do not appear on the unemployment list because they have run out of benefits and lost hope, or the almost 25 per cent youth unemployment in Newfoundland?

If we look at these new initiatives that my hon. colleague speaks about in the total context, can she tell me honestly that the poor in this country are not as numerous and that they are better off than they used to be?

[Translation]

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, at the present time, incredible demands are being made on the federal government, both in the area of health and welfare and the environment. The amounts of money required in these two areas alone are astronomical.

I hope hon. members don't think that the government is particularly happy to have to raise taxes in order to achieve a more equitable distribution of the tax base. But although much remains to be done, some progress has been made. I may mention that the number of Canadians living below the poverty line has declined by more than 549,000, which means 179,000 children, 61,000 senior citizens and 198,000 women are no longer living below the poverty line. It may not be spectacular, but it is a positive development.

Personal disposable income after taxes, Mr. Speaker, has risen by $1,400 per capita, in real terms, since September 1984. Of course these are statistics, and when in our ridings we see children and families who are poor, we wonder why they can't be part of the statistics. It is clear the government has some very serious problems with the deficit, and at the same time we have a very serious social problem that we must deal with.

Of course, the only way the government can do anything is through the tax base. And although we don't particularly like raising taxes, we have to if we are to make any attempt at dealing with the problems facing so many poor families in Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate with the hon. member for Cambridge.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased for the opportunity to speak to this important motion before the House today. The emphasis we in Canada place on our social programs and the intensity of our national belief in sharing and equity help make Canada the great country that it is. We take pride in the deep rooted tradition of caring for the less fortunate among us.

For these reasons, the issue of poverty is a distressing one for all Canadians; poverty in a country so richly endowed as Canada should not be happening. It is a matter of serious national concern. We are among the most concerned about those in our society least able to overcome poverty by their own efforts and we are speaking, of course, of those children who live in poverty.

It must be pointed out that there are clearly problems associated with the definition and measurement of poverty in Canada and with child poverty in particular. Thus, for example, the number of children cited in the motion as living in poverty cannot be accepted as an accurate picture of the real situation. That fact in no way diminishes the seriousness of child poverty nor the importance of seeking to reduce or eliminate it. The intent and spirit of the motion deserves the support of all members of this House.

It is an unfortunate fact that the welfare of children and the opportunities they have to life to a great extent depend upon the economic circumstances of their parents. Those children who are raised in poor families may very likely experience significant material deprivation. The lack of an adequate family income will very likely impose relative hardship on children in those families. Clearly, improving family income, raising the standard of living of low-income families is fundamental to reducing child poverty and eliminating the roadblocks to opportunities that it creates.

The best way the government can help raise many families out of their low-income situations is to ensure Canada has an economy that is operating at its potential. Canada needs to have a strong productive economy to generate the jobs and economic activity that translate into higher incomes and to finance our social network. In short, a key to reducing poverty among children is a strong economy.

The Conservative government has been working to build a dynamic and competitive economy that will raise standards of living and provide the means to sustain the valued programs that are part of the social fabric of this country. It has done so through an economic strategy introduced n 1984, which this government has been following ever since. There are two basic aspects to this economic plan: To ensure sound stewardship of national finances and to make fundamental changes to the economy so as to unshackle the private sector and promote competitiveness and innovation.

Over the past five years we have made substantial progress on these two fronts. The government's annual deficit has been reduced considerably below the levels of the 1984–85 period. We have also made and are continuing to make significant changes that improve the way the economy operates. By removing frictions and distortions, we are making the economy more productive. By improving productivity we are raising the living standards of Canadians and thus making headway in fighting poverty.

The actions we are taking are many and far–reaching: The Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, forward–looking trade initiatives with Europe and Pacific Rim countries, the deregulation of energy and transportations sectors, tax reform, privatization, new skills training for the labour force and a new competition policy are just a few.

These changes have contributed to a healthier, more confident private sector. They are part of the new foundation we are building for a stronger, more dynamic and prosperous economy in the next decade and beyond.

This plan is working. Over 1.5 million new jobs have been created in Canada over the past five years, unemployment rates have dropped in every region of the country and, more important, Canadians have benefited from these improvements. By helping to put in place and maintain a healthier economic environment, the government has laid the groundwork for social programs, lower levels of poverty and unemployment, and a more progressive distribution of after–tax income.

Over the past five years, we have taken a number of specific steps to help alleviate child poverty by increasing child benefits through the tax system to low–income families. For example, in the February 1986 budget we introduced a three stage increase in child tax credits and a new supplement to the child tax credit. There is a prepayment now of two–thirds of the child tax credits to about 700,000 low income families that was also started in 1986.

In stage one of tax reform, we converted the child tax exemption to a credit in order to benefit low income Canadians. The federal sales tax was increased in the April 1989 budget. These increases represent a first step to the new refundable sales tax credit that will accompany sales tax reform. Increased assistance provided through the refundable GST credit will protect low and middle–income Canadians. Families earning less than $30,000 will be better off once the goods and services tax has been implemented than they are under the existing system.

• (1350)

Our economic policies are designed to ensure that Canada is able to protect and strengthen the fundamental values of a caring society that define us as a nation. Our goal continues to be to ensure that Canada is economically strong and competitive, able to meet the needs of Canadians, and to provide for a better future.

All of the steps we as a government have taken to restructure the economy, to improve social programs and ensure that as a nation we can continue to afford strong social programs will count for little if we do not also ensure that our children are prepared to take advantage of the opportunities we are working to provide for them. Therefore, one of the avenues out of the vicious circle of poverty is education.

We must ensure that all Canadian children, whatever their family income background, receive the best possible education, a world class education to meet a world class challenge. Our children's future lies in our system of education. If it is to do the job we want, we must also seek ways to ensure that the school drop–out rate among poor children is no greater than it is among children who are not poor.

At the recent First Ministers conference in Ottawa, the Prime Minister outlined his concerns about education in Canada. He expressed a desire to work with the provinces, the private sector and with all interested Canadians to improve our national education systems from coast to coast and to ensure that they match, if not exceed, those of our toughest competitors world-wide.

Education is a national issue, not a federal or provincial issue, not just necessarily a government issue. Indeed, it is an issue that affects all Canadians and demands the co-operation of all Canadians. To this end, the Prime Minister called on the provinces to join him in establishing a national task force on human resource development for the year 2000. Its objective is to assess Canada's human resource development needs and to ensure that our education system is capable of meeting the challenge in the year 2000 and beyond. If we are to meet that challenge, we will need to draw on the potential represented by the children of all families in this country, whatever their income situation.

Throwing money at the education problem is not the answer. Canada already spends huge amounts on education. Indeed, on a per capita basis we are second only to Sweden among the industrialized countries. Money spent on education is clearly a wise investment, but we want to increase the return on this investment. We want to get better results. We want to ensure that young Canadians across the country and across all income levels can take advantage of the opportunities that will be accessible to them through a better education.

We must and we will work together with all Canadians to achieve our educational goals. This is indispensable if we are to achieve our long-term goal of eliminating poverty among children everywhere. As Canadians we want a Canada in which poverty is minimized, a Canada that continues to be caring and compassionate with a capacity to maintain social programs and services Canadians need. A Canada that is economically strong and fully competitive with the nations of the world is a Canada that can best reduce poverty and provide social services and social support where it is needed.

I trust that all Canadians will join in helping to build a stronger, better Canada where poverty among children is not a present reality but just a bad memory of the past.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to add my witness on behalf of my constituents and my caucus to the parliamentary last will and testament that was issued this morning by the member for Oshawa in what I thought was providing an important service to this House in not only drawing attention to an issue that troubles all of us, but also in the challenge he raised about the need to change our vocabulary, perception, the way we think, the way we act and the way we begin to absorb the harsh reality of poverty among children.

Unfortunately, after listening to the last two speeches of the spokespersons for the Conservative government, I feel that challenge is not being taken up. This is not a time for an apologia such as we heard from the member from Cambridge about how the wonderful economic record of the government is eliminating poverty.

I thought there might be the opportunity for some honesty in this House today, honesty which says that regardless of all of what he, the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of Health and Welfare described, the situation over the last four or five years for children has become worse. That is the hard reality.

To have members of this House get up and tell us about the kind of neo-Conservative economic growth and all the rest of it as being the answer when it flies in the face of reality is in fact a rejection of the honest and sincere challenge raised by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

I invite the member from Cambridge and the parliamentary secretary to look at the reality of Canada. I have had an opportunity to see it during the last three or four months. The Leader of the New Democratic Party said his conversion came in listening to a broadcast of the CBC last June. Mine started a bit earlier. It started in this House of Commons.

In 1985 I was sitting in this chair listening to the debate on the government's proposal to deindex family allowances. That is part of their economic record. I was listening to members talk about the conditions of that family and I realized all of a sudden that really no one in this House knew what they were talking about when it came to the condition of the modern family, including myself.

I went back to my riding. I spoke to the churches and social agencies in my riding and asked them to tell me what was going on, to describe to me what the family was like in my riding, and what was happening there. They did not know exactly either.

We put together a consortium to study the problem. About 20 organizations were involved, churches, social agencies and others. We knocked on doors like one does during a campaign, only this time we were asking serious questions about the condition and state of the family in what was my riding at the time, Winnipeg—Fort Garry. We talked to 12,000 families. Some tell me it is the largest study ever done at a local level in terms of family life in this country.

That was a revelation because all of a sudden I began to see that part of the problem of discussing children in poverty is that it is a different kind of circumstance. It is a more invisible kind of circumstance. Let me tell you what I found. I found young single mothers living in the downtown part of my riding in around Broadway, Roslyn Road, River Avenue who had to move every six or seven months in order to find some proper child care. They could not get sufficient, adequate, or proper child care accessibility because the day care centres were full, so they had to move around to try to find a proper place to look after their kids.

When you are moving around that way, there goes all your energy. There go all the resources you have simply to find somebody to look after your children. I discovered that, in my riding alone, there was at least a couple of thousand teenage kids out on the streets, not necessarily children from poor families per se but children from all kinds of families who were out on the street trying to find a place to live. Sometimes they were living with a friend, sometimes they were living on the streets, and sometimes they were just bouncing around from agency to agency.

It might be interesting to the member from Cambridge who was extolling the virtues of a government that I went to a place called Rossbrook House which is an agency that deals with poor children in downtown Winnipeg to ask what the problems were and how were they coping. They deal with 200 or 300 street kids coming in off the streets.

They pointed out that one of the really serious problems they were now facing was because of the cut-back in the budget of employment and immigration and because of the change in rules, they could no longer get job creation funds going to social agencies. That particular agency had to cut back its program by 30 or 40 per cent. They could no longer hire young street kids to work on other street kids. They could not hire teenagers to work with the young ones because your government said that that was no longer an acceptable way to spend public money which was to give money to agencies working with poor children. That is the great economic record of this government, taking money from an agency that was dealing with street kids in downtown Winnipeg.

When the member from Cambridge and the ministers and the parliamentary secretary get up and say that they are dealing with the problem, they don't know what they are talking about. They are dealing with a society that is becoming further divided, further split, and they only represent one half of it. They only represent one part of it. They do not understand the reality of the other part of Canada. They do not understand it and they do not care about it, that is the problem. They get up and read a set speech without trying to use their intellect or their energy to understand what is going on. That is the reality of Canada as it is today.

You can go into the Rousseau Indian reserve which is not too far from the city of Winnipeg and still see children having to drink water that is shipped in 30 or 40 miles and getting gastroenteritis every week as a result of that. That is a product of a policy of this government. Is that something that members on the other side want to get up and defend and say this is part of the proud achievement and accomplishment of this regime?

• (1400)

I ask members to shed the speeches prepared by their departments. Open your eyes and your hearts a little, start looking at the reality of what is going on, and begin to talk about what is the real vocabulary in this country.

A day does not go by in this House of Commons that we do not hear ministers or members of the Conservative regime talk about the deficit. That has become the icon of our times: The deficit.

I never hear the Minister of Finance talk about the real deficit in this country, which is those one million kids in poverty. That is the real lack of investment. That is the real tragedy. In 10 years from now those are the children who should be tomorrow's teachers, business people, politicians, or journalists. They will never get there because they are never going to get to the starting line. When you have a million children living in poverty that is the greatest lack of investment. That is the greatest deficit we face. That is the problem, and there is nothing being done to address that kind of issue.

If this country is to be competitive, if it is to be productive, if it is to meet the international challenge, it will need every one of those children who are living in poverty today. We will need their skills, talents, brains and abilities. We cannot afford to have them on the scrap heap today, which is where we are putting them. We will need those kids to be the adults of tomorrow, to be the productive, contributing citizens of this country. This is not in the far distant future. We are only talking about something that is six or seven years away, and that is not much time.

We hear about educational forums and new task forces being set up. I do not buy that. It is simply a stall tactic. It is another way of studying the problem to death. We are going to need those children as contributing adults in a very short period of time to make this country prosperous, to make this country productive, to make this country competitive. We cannot afford in a country of 26 million people to have 1 million of its future citizens pushed to the sidelines, put on the scrap heap and told that they are forgotten. That is why it will take immediate action and a substantial change in the way we are doing things.

While we are on the question of deficit, members opposite say: "Well, maybe we would like to do more" and they use cliches: "Don't throw money at problems" and everything else. The fact of the matter is that you have to make a choice about where you are going to invest your money. Do you want to invest it in those kids? Do you want to give them a chance through decent income to become productive citizens, or are we to continue investing in megaprojects which are presently on the books for $7 billion under this government.

That $7 billion would do an awful lot to turn this country around and give those one million children a chance in this world, but this government easily will go off and sign $2.5 billion here—$800 million for Oerlikon and all the rest of those types of expenditures.

A government member said today, and I applaud him for it, that we should look at the whole gamut of business subsidies, grants, loans, guarantees, support and say that if you really believe in the private sector it is about time that it starts doing those things for itself. The role and the responsibility of this federal government is to put the money where it counts, and that is with the children of Canada. That is where the real investment should be made.

I challenge members opposite: "Stand up for your principles. Do you want to be free enterprisers? Do you want to believe in the market–place? Then start believing in it and start saying that its time to stop the giveaways. We are going to put our money where it is really going to do some good. We are going to make sure that five, six or seven years from now we are going to have well trained citizens, because we are going to take those children and give them a chance".

That means not simply withdrawing from the programs; it means building something new. It is about time that we started looking at the inadequacy of our family programs. I am prepared to say today, without any equivocation, that the existing arrangements we have do not work. The family allowance was developed 40 or 50 years ago and was a very important program at the time. It does not meet the need today.

I will give you an example that is very clear. As I went through that family study I talked about in my riding what I discovered was that many families no longer have any flexibility whatsoever to meet a crisis. They no longer have a support system. The same kind of range of institutions and families are not there. They do not have the margin of income to meet a problem if there is a family breakdown, illness in the family, or if they discover their child has a learning disability.

Let me give one example of a couple who came to see me in my riding about two or three months ago. I think he is a bus driver and she works as a retail clerk in a department store. They found out that their child is a hyperactive kid and was then put on Ritalin. The school board said: "You can't have this kid in the school any more". They have to send him to a private school for $5,000 or $6,000 a year, and they are making a combined income of $38,000. Where does the $5,000 come from, other than going on welfare? It means giving up their payments on the mortgage on their house. It means going to the Canada Assistance Program, but they are not going to do that.
