Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to give my understanding of what took place in the House. I understood that a formal announcement had been made by the Prime Minister of this country as to the men who should constitute the proposed tariff board or tariff commission—call it what you may, it matters not to me. It was the board which was to be constituted for the purpose of obtaining information, of making inquiry and reporting to the government where the tariff was too high, or where it was too low, or where there should be some readjustment. It was for the purpose, as was announced by the Prime Minister and his followers last fall, of taking the tariff out of politics—a good election cry, and one that goes down with a good many people. Now here is the announcement that was made by the Prime Minister on the 7th of April. I quote from Hansard:

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table copy of an order in council in which I know—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I think this performance, for I must call it such when hon. gentlemen applaud in this manner—the statement about having laid an order in council on the table—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Allow me to make an explanation, if you please. I never said an order in council was never laid on the table.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends, I hope, would like to have a straight explanation.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is just what we would like.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) stated that I announced that a certain personnel of the board would be appointed, that I laid the order in council on the table.

Mr. RYCKMAN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Look at Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The order in council that was laid on the table contained the names of the commission as it exists at the present time; that is the only order in council that was ever laid on the table. I was asked on the spur of the moment some days previously by the right hon. leader of the opposition as to what the personnel of the commission would be before it was appointed, and I named certain gentlemen whom the government had in mind appointing, but before any order in council had been passed. Before the order in council was passed, one of those gentlemen asked that he should not be appointed, and he has not been appointed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, for the misunderstanding, but I am glad to know that I was not in the wrong, because not only was the order in council laid on the table on the 7th of April by the Prime Minister, but he made this statement regarding it:

The order in council in question sets forth the personnel and powers of the board.

And then he gave the names of the members of the board. That is what I had in mind when I said that within the last two weeks, or possibly ten days this announcement was made by the Prime Minister. It was made on the 7th of April. Now the board was constituted then; at least, on the 7th of this month the names of the board were published in the papers throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, and men who had been inclined to wonder what action the government might take in regard to the tariff on motor cars said when they saw that announcement: Well, that settles the matter; it will now be investigated by the board; that is what the board is for. That, Mr. Speaker, was the reasonable expectation of every reasonable minded man and woman in Canada. That is what the public expected. That is what the 20,000 workmen engaged in this industry in Ontario expected. That is what the owners of these factories expected. Why did they not get it? Why go through the nonsensical farce of appointing a board, and then at the very first opportunity stultify yourself and repudiate the board you have appointed? There is something deeper in this matter which these gentlemen know about. There is something under the surface. No rational body of men, if this government be a rational body of men, would treat the public or would treat the House so, or would mislead the manufacturers of these motor cars as the government has misled them by the announcement of a tariff board to whom all questions were to be referred for investigation and report in order to lift the tariff out of party politics, and then within a week, a brief week, after the announcement in regard to a most important industry, one of the most important in Canada to-day, flout that board in the face, and announce to the people of Canada radical reductions, serious reductions, that may very seriously hamper and possibly destroy that industry.

I am not altogether a worshipper of the idea of a tariff board. I remember that on a former occasion, I think it was in 1912, I moved the six months hoist in this House in regard to another tariff board. I believe that a tariff board can be constituted in this country on the lines laid down by my right hon. leader in a speech last year, which is to be found in revised Hansard of June 2, last. I believe that something may be accomplished on those lines, but I am inclined to think that the effort of the present government in regard to the tariff board is merely to evade responsibility; it is merely one of a hundred instances of "passing the buck" as they say in the language of the streets. I am afraid it would be an unfortunate day for this country if the government should ever delegate its power to deal with the customs tariff of Canada to any board, or to any body of men not elected by the people. I am inclined to think that notwithstanding the pre-election announcement, notwithstanding the flourish of trumpets in connection with the appointment of this tariff board, so well advertised on the front pages of all the Liberal dailies throughout Canada, it is the merest kind of a subterfuge, that it means nothing and will mean nothing in the commercial life of Canada; that all the government has done has been to appoint a sort of glorified body of civil servants. If that is all they are, why not let the Civil Service Commission appoint them? In my humble judgment the men named on the commission are not men qualified to deal with the matters which will be referred to them. No man has a higher regard, or a greater admiration, for the Hon. George P. Graham than I, but I would laugh at any man who came to me and said that George Graham was a tariff expert. Why, sir, as far back in his public career as we can recall he has been engaged and exclusively engaged in the operation of railways, in the management of the Railways department of this country; not a moment of his time has been devoted to commerce, or to customs, or to cognate questions. He knows as much about the customs tariff of this country as I do about the differential calculus, and I know nothing about it. But he, forsooth, is to be the head of this board to lift the tariff out of politics! Why, his chief qualifications for the position is that he is a politician, a very able politician, and that is the reason he has been selected. I have little confidence in this tariff board. Now, I am going to quote what another man says in regard to a tariff board. Last night I was reading a book recently published by Thomas R. Marshall, Vice President of the United States for eight years under the Wilson administration. He was a low tariff man, a tariff for revenue man. We know they have a tariff board in the United States, and this is the late Mr. Marshall's estimate of that board put in his own rather racy language. He says, and this is to be found at page 240 of his work, Recollections:

> The attempt to take the tariff question out of politics is not nearly so successful as the taking of alcohol out of beer. As long as the congress of the United States levies the taxes and determines the sources from which the revenues shall be derived, the tariff will remain in politics. This is not a discussion of the right or the wrong of it. This is the frank expression of an opinion that a tariff commission is just about as valuable as a letter written by an inmate of an insane hospital. To pretend to organize a commission that will tell the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, is no more possible than it is for a one-legged man to dance a hornpipe. He cannot even tell the comparative cost of production and the reason for it, in factories in our own land, our own state, our own community. It depends on the plant, the management and a thousand other things. We shall never have any valuable information from a tariff commission until they find out how to make men and plants alike, and have them all move by common impulse.

And such will be the experience of this government with its tariff board. What does the government intend to refer to that board? I do not know. Certainly it has not referred to that board the one great outstanding feature of the budget speech of to-day, and the one upon which the interest of the province of Ontario is more focussed than upon any other. The whole tendency, the whole fiscal policy, of the King administration, from the day it took office down to the present time, has been a negation of the established fiscal policy of this country since the year 1879. I am the more surprised that a man who now occupies the high position of Prime Minister of this Dominion, and who sat in the government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier between the years 1907 and 1911, should now take this retrograde, this downward step. But he has done it. I said that since the year 1879 the settled fiscal policy of this Dominion was the principle of protection, and I abide by that statement. That principle was maintained almost intact until 1896. I remember well the days prior to 1896 and the campaign of that year. I remember taking part in it with the Liberals. I remember well the speeches made at that time by Mr. Fielding, by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and by many less notable Liberals throughout Canada. I remember our craving for free trade. I remember the various definitions of our policy such as "free trade as they have it in England". I remember well the declaration that "the Liberal party will not be content until protection is destroyed root and branch". But what happened in 1896 when Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power? Did his government change the principle of protection in the fiscal policy of this country? Not they. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a protectionist. Hardly a change was made in that policy. What did they do? They revised the tariff. They made alteration in this schedule and that schedule, but the net result when the alterations were completed was an average reduction of less than one per cent. In addition to that they brought in a new feature known as the British preference, at first amounting to 25 per cent in favour of Great Britain, but subsequently increased to 33 per cent. That is when I came on the scene, in 1900. I remember well the situation as it then existed in Canada. We had a protective policy suitable to the conditions which then prevailed. We had the same old protected principle in force which had obtained since 1879. And Canada prospered. Canada did well under it. Now I come to an incident showing what happened in 1903. Under the Fielding tariff of 1900, when I came into the House, woollen goods had enjoyed 33 per cent protection, subject to the British preference cutting it down by one third and making it 22 per cent. No sooner had the preference come into force than mills began to close. Men began to lose their jobs. Mills began to run on short time. I was one of a delegation of a number of Ontario mill owners who came to Ottawa and met Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson. The delegation laid the case before them. Did they turn it down? No. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said: We shall have this matter investigated at once, and they did. With what result? They found that the Canadian woollen men were open to unfair competition in respect of wages and other conditions in Great Britain; the following session the tariff was amended, and the woollen schedule was put at 30 per cent net on all woollen goods coming into Canada from Great Britain. Why was that done? Was that done for revenue? No, it was done for protection and it worked admirably.

I remember well when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) came into the House. The woollen schedule stood then at 30 per cent net; he supported it and I supported it. I remember when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) entered the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The tariff was 30 per cent net on woollens and there it remained. I remember the revision in 1907.

Mr. ROBB: When the hon. member is speaking of 30 per cent, is he referring to the general tariff or the British preferential?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The general tariff was 35 per cent. The tariff against goods coming in from Great Britain was 30 per cent net. I remember the Minister of Finance was in the House in 1907 too. He and I both supported the Laurier-Fielding tariff of 1907.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend's memory is very defective; I was elected only in 1908.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then I will call it the 1908 tariff because it continued until 1911. I remember when the Minister of Finance came into the House in 1908. He was a supporter of the government of that day.

Mr. ROBB: I am yet.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He was a supporter of this tariff and so was the Prime Minister. Prior to 1911 the tariff remained on the statute book intact and so it remained through the Borden administration. It was the policy of protection. So it remained through the Meighen administration. Then we come to the advent of the King government and the very first year after the King government came into power they began tinkering with the tariff schedules. In the first year 2½ per cent was taken off the duty on woollen goods. The Laurier-Fielding tariff that had served the country so well, that had kept the mills so busy, was tinkered with in the first year and reduced to 27½ per cent. In the following year there was another cut of 10 per cent in the British preferential bringing the tariff on woollens down from 27½ per cent to 24.8 per cent net, and what was the result? All over Canada woollen mills began to close; men lost their jobs, the exodus started to the United States and woollen men would not invest more money. I say to the Minister of Finance: Look at your imports of woollens for those years. See them gradually rising in this country until last year, according to the government's trade returns of which I have a copy in my hand, we brought in $20.-

000,000 worth of woollen goods from Great Britain, all of which we could have made in Canadian mills if the Prime Minister had had resolution and courage enough to stand by the tariff which he helped to make in 1907. Yes, they supported it then. Why not support it now? Why change it now? They talk of the golden era which Canada enjoyed under the Laurier-Fielding tariff. If we were prosperous then, that prosperity was due to the principle of protection which they maintained in this tariff. Let the Minister of Finance listen to this. Under the Laurier-Fielding tariff, for which he voted and I voted, for which the Prime Minister, who was a member of the government, voted and for which the Minister of Justice voted, mowers and reapers enjoyed a tariff of 17½ per cent. But this government has at last cut the tariff down to 6 per cent and the result is that nearly all mowers and reapers used in Canada are coming in from the United States.

Mr. ROBB: Not at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am willing to stand by my statement. Cultivators in the days of the Laurier-Fielding tariff, when the present Prime Minister was a member of the government of that day and supported the tariff in that government, enjoyed a duty of 17½ per cent. This government has cut the duty down now to 7½ per cent. No wonder that the trade has been almost abandoned in this country and our farmers are very largely being supplied with goods from the United States. Under the Fielding-Laurier tariff the duty on ploughs was maintained at 17½ per cent until that government was put out of office in 1911. Now, under the genial smile of the present Minister of Finance, the duty on ploughs is down to 10 per cent. In those golden days under the Laurier-Fielding tariff the duty on wagons was maintained at 25 per cent. Now, through the tariff tinkering of this administration, that duty is cut down to 12 per cent; wagon factories of Ontario are very largely closed up, and wagons are coming in from the United States. The duty on cottons has received a cut of 2½ per cent and 10 per cent on the British preferential tariff from the old Laurier-Fielding tariff. I believe I am within the mark when I say that the industrial difficulties of the Dominion of Canada, the handicaps from which we have suffered in the last four years, are due if not entirely, to by far the largest extent, to the tariff manipulation and tariff tinkering of the King government. In every instance in which this government has laid its unholy hands on the Laurier-Fielding tariff it has been to the detriment and disadvantage of the Dominion of Canada.

I cannot altogether absolve in my mind the Conservative administration which took power in 1912. There was a time—and I was one of those who believed it at the time and I think my right hon. leader was for a time tainted with a bit of the same heresy—when some people thought the duty on agricultural implements was too high and the Borden administration, when they took power in this country, undertook to reduce it. Therefore, a small part of the reduction from the Laurier-Fielding tariff took place while Sir Thomas White was Minister of Finance of Canada. I remember on one occasion making a speech in this House in regard to the matter and I remember strongly supporting the idea that duties were too high on agricultural implements. But in that respect I can only say what I did before. Sometimes I am challenged and asked why ten years ago or fifteen years ago I expressed opinions entirely contrary to what I express to-day. In that regard I can only reply in the language of John Morley or better known at his death as Earl Morley when he said: "When I am confronted on the platforms of this country by men who say: 'Why Mr. Morley, ten years ago or fifteen years ago you shared other opinions and expressed them,' I reply: 'My good friend, I cheerfully admit that ten years ago or fifteen years ago I held many opinions which I do not entertain to-day and if anyone can derive any consolation from my discarded opinions, they are entirely welcome to them.'" I repeat, however, that the real damage has been done by the King government which, from the moment it took power, resolutely set its face towards the free-trade goal and allowed its supporters in this House to announce that the death knell of protection had now been sounded. With three ministers in this House from the important province of Saskatchewan, all of the same opinion, three outstanding men ready to ring the death knell of protection and establish free trade, what hope is there for the province of Ontario, with its single little Minister of Labour, no matter how able or how diligent he may be. Under these circumstances, what chance is there for us in the great industrial province of Ontario to meet a situation such as has arisen in this House to-day in regard to one of the greatest of Ontario's industries?

Sir, there is one other omission from the budget statement in regard to which we have heard rumours on the street. We thought that at last this government had awakened to the fact that there was a class in this country known as agriculturists, a class which, in the eastern provinces at least, has now become thoroughly protectionist in its tariff views and is demanding, through its associations and through its representatives in this House, some action to protect our farmers against unfair competition. There were men, I say, who believed that the government had at last become aware of the situation. In Ontario the great agricultural class is to-day thoroughly protectionist in its views. Look over this House and you will verify that assertion: agricultural riding after agricultural riding has returned to parliament a member pledged to support the principle of protection. We on this side of the House believe also that in the great sister province of Quebec the preponderance of the popular vote is protectionist. We know that at the last general election the question of protection was not made the foremost issue in that province, and we believe that in its heart of hearts the province of Quebec would pronounce to-morrow in favour of the fiscal policy of protection and as opposed to such reductions as are now announced, such tariff tinkering as has taken place, looking ultimately to the goal of free trade, a dream which hon. members in the government will seek some day to realize. We believe that the eastern provinces, represented as they are in this House by a body of members holding a common view, returned those members to the House of Commons chiefly for the reason that they subscribe to the doctrine of protection. Many and many a farmer riding is represented in this House by a straight Conservative protectionist, and we heard rumours as late as this morning that something might be done in the tariff for agriculture.

There was a time when even farmers themselves were wont to say that you could not protect agriculture. The farming community has abandoned that view and to-day it finds itself confronted by a government which, instead of making an attempt to protect the farmers' market in the Dominion, is year by year opening the door wider and wider until the little measure of protection which formerly remained in our customs tariff has now practically disappeared. It is well within the mark to say that the markets of Canada in respect of agricultural products are practically free to Australia and New Zealand and almost freely open to our great competitor the United States. All these markets are closed to our agricultural products. Time was, ten, fifteen or twenty years ago, when the customs tariff on agricultural products such as fruit, vegetables and the like, as between Canada and the United States contained a modest element of protection to Canadian farmers. But conditions have changed; the whole system of production has changed; there has been a difference in population. To-day our customs tariff as regards agriculture is absolutely negligible so far as the protective incidence is concerned. Look at the hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of agricultural products that are coming into Canada annually from the United States of which a very large percentage could be produced in this country.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is right. In 1922, for which his party must be credited with the operations of nine months, our importation of raw cotton amounted to 95,000,000 pounds and in 1925 to over 100,000,000 pounds.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was speaking of things which we could produce ourselves. For the benefit of the Minister of Finance and in order to make myself clear, let me say that I do not include tropical products such as sugar, molasses, fruits, cotton and other commodities, which by reason of our northern climate we cannot produce. But there are hundreds of millions of imports from the United States of agricultural commodities which we do produce in this country, and it is against these things that the farmers of the entire Dominion, certainly those of eastern Canada, want a reasonable tariff barrier for their own protection. Geography is largely against us, and so are climatic conditions; we are under Nature's handicap. And that handicap is aggravated by the fact that we have a population of 112,000,000 competing against us. The market to the south of us is closed to the producers of Canada by artificial means.

Why can we not adopt something of the policy of our neighbours in our fiscal arrangements? You must give credit to the people of the United States when it comes to the question of legislation on fiscal matters. They legislate exclusively for their own people, paying no regard to the tariff of Canada or of any other country in the world. If they require an article in the United States for their own purposes they make its importation free, and that is the reason why our pulpwood, our mineral ores, our asbestos and our electrical power can go in free of duty. They want those things and they allow them to come in without paying a duty. That is their tariff policy, but their tariff policy does not help Canada in the slightest. The moment a hand touches any raw material in the United States, the moment a machine is turned upon the development of that material, then automatically their tariff operates and their market is barred to us. The result is that to-day millions upon millions of dollars' worth of manufactured products are coming into this country from the United States, products the raw material of which we furnish them. We buy back the finished article for use in Canada. Do you not realize that the people of the United States understand quite well the situation over here? They are not making any mistake in their estimate of the King government. Here is an official document from Washington—the bulletin of the United States Department of Commerce prepared by government officials and placed in the hands of the president. Under date November 3, 1924, at page 265, the bulletin makes this statement:

> Economically and socially Canada may be considered as a northern extension of the United States, our trade with Canada being in many respects more like domestic trade than our foreign trade with other countries. The movement of industrial raw material from Canada into the United States and the return flow of a miscellaneous assortment of manufactured goods is not unlike a similar flow between the west and the south and the more industrialized eastern part of the United States.

That is an official document laid before the President of the United States. And how has it come about that such a statement can be possible? It has been made possible by the insane fiscal policy which the King government has pursued during the past four years. Now I am going to read from the Commerce report of the United States of the same date. Oh, I tell you they understand our situation here, they realize the tendencies of the King government and what they are getting out of it. This is what the document says:

> Against the set policy of the Conservative party of building up a thoroughly protective tariff to favour Canadian industries, has been operating the influence of the Liberal party who stand for a moderate level of import duties and a generous measure of preference to empire products.
> Since the return to power in 1921 of the the Liberal government under Mr. Mackenzie King the administrative efforts have been bent toward a discriminating downward revision of the tariff in which the government appears to have had the support of the Progressive element. The Canadian tariff is subject to revision each spring when the Minister of Finance presents to parliament the budget embodying the general financial programme of the administration for the year ahead. Each of the three budgets presented by the present government have carried changes in the Canadian import duties and almost invariably downward.
> United States manufacturers have been the principal suppliers to Canada of most of the classes of goods on which the duties into Canada have been reduced during the past three years.

Does the government not appreciate the only result of the course it is pursuing? Does it not see the end of the journey? Why, we are drifting, drifting each year, and unfortunately there is only one direction in which we can drift and that is to the south. Is it too late for us to take a stand upon this matter and re-establish ourselves in this our birthright? I for one protest against any condition pertaining in this country which enables public officials of another country to print articles such as I have just read to this House. I protest against any government which permits conditions to prevail in Canada to which articles of this kind have any application whatever. But it is a sad thing, a lamentable thing, a melancholy thing that we have to admit a large element of truth in these articles which I have read, and which were written by the officials of the United States government. Unfortunately there is too much truth in them. That is the part that hurts, that is the part that stings, and that is the part that, for the last four years, has been doing tremendous injury to the Dominion.

I rejoice, Mr. Speaker, over another matter which I had almost forgotten to mention, and that is in regard to the excellent showing which the Minister of Finance was able to announce in respect to the Canadian National Railway system. It comes as a matter of congratulation to my mind. I am sure it will come doubly so to the mind of my right hon. friend and leader, who is really the father of the Canadian National Railway system. Those of us who have been in this House, say, from 1911 down to the present time realize the sustained, the able, the persistent fight against great odds which was made by my right hon. leader to take possession of the old Canadian Northern and the old Grand Trunk and to consolidate them into one splendid national railway system as we have it to-day. Those of us who were here well remember the wonderful fight that he had to make. Part of the time, I regret to say, I voted against him, part of the time I voted with him, and at the conclusion of the long protracted and difficult fight which he put up for the people of Canada during those long and trying years, I felt honoured by the fact that I was a member of the government which consummated the transaction and brought those two railways, which at that time were such tremendous burdens upon the people of Canada, into one magnificent transcontinental system. I well remember from where the chief opposition came. I remember in this House in the sessions of 1919, 1920 and 1921 how he was criticized, how he was condemned, how on occasion after occasion he would have been outvoted had the Liberal party the numbers at that time with which to outvote him. I remember, too, after they obtained power how gingerly they were in taking over the Canadian Northern system or in announcing a policy in regard to it. Why, Sir, our old friend the late Hon. W. C. Kennedy, when he made his first presentation of railway affairs in the session of 1922 said: The government has resolved to try out this government railway ownership policy which was instituted by the preceding government. He would not commit himself to it, he would not commit the government to it. They were a lukewarm party in regard to government ownership and in regard to the Canadian National Railway system at that time. But now that the dream of my right hon. leader is about to be realized, now that the roads are becoming something in the nature of an asset to Canada, now that we can look forward to the next five years and with some confidence predict that the time is coming when instead of writing off annually the interest charges as we do to-day those charges will be paid into the treasury,—now that that day has arrived, if there is any man who should be proud of the situation, if there is any man in this country to whom we should pay tribute in regard to a satisfactory solution of our railway affairs, that man is my right hon. leader.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that I have not been able on this occasion to deliver anything like the reply to a budget address that the House would expect or that would have been delivered had the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) been in his place. He is a man specially equipped for the performance of such a duty. However, I have brought under review the matters that appeal to me, and I have given the House my views upon the subject generally. I thank the House for the patience accorded to me during my somewhat rambling remarks, which I will now conclude.

Mr. Forke moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Carried on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried on division.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I presume my right hon. friend will be prepared to join with the government in the motion I am about to make that the debate on the budget have precedence over all other matters until disposed of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move:

That the order for consideration of the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair for the House to go again into committee of Ways and Means have precedence over all other business, except on Friday the 16th instant, and except the introduction of bills, questions and notices of motions for the production of papers, until disposed of.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to go on with the budget debate on all government days including to-day and to-morrow, but I am not prepared to give up Monday which, besides being private members' day, is the day on which a very important resolution was to be moved from this side of the House, and this motion cannot well be postponed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mentioned to my right hon. friend that there is no intention of doing away with private members' day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We cannot very well postpone the one motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend would perhaps agree to incorporate in the motion the words "excepting next Monday."

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would be satisfactory.

Motion as amended agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

The House resumed, from Friday, March 26, consideration in committee of the proposed resolution with respect to old age pensions.—Hon. Mr. King—Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I am altogether opposed to the scheme of old age pensions as placed before the House in this resolution. I can understand an old age pension scheme which depends upon the incapacity of the recipient to earn a living, but unlike every other old age pension scheme with which I have been able to come in contact during a rather extensive search, this scheme altogether eliminates the element of incapacity. It assumes that at seventy years of age every Canadian who has lived in this country for twenty years is utterly incapacitated to earn a living. I object to that assumption, because actual incapacity should be the fundamental principle embodied in any pension scheme.

If incapacity is to be the criterion as to whether parliament shall vote an old age pension list, I then suggest that the petition laid before the House a few days ago asking for pensions to the blind should receive consideration as a part of this general scheme. In Nova Scotia we have an institution with which the name of the late Sir Frederick Fraser will ever be connected, in memory of his life work devoted to the blind. In this institution those incapacitated early in life are educated in order to enable them to earn their living and support their families to almost the remunerative extent of a great number of people who possess their sight. But those who are incapacitated by blindness after the age of twenty years find it most difficult to undertake the educational work necessary to fit them for remunerative occupation from that time on. If, therefore, incapacity should be the criterion, there is no reason why parliament should not undertake to give attention to those who are incapacitated by reason of blindness at such an age as to prevent them from undertaking the educational work necessary to fit them for remunerative employment. Really I can see no reason why, if incapacity is to be the criterion, this country should not give a pension to every man and woman who is incapacitated physically or mentally. There are a number of pension schemes in connection with railway employment and employment in our industrial life, under which compensation is given to those who, in the work of railway operation or in the pursuit of that special industry, become physically incapacitated. If this country is to pension those who are incapacitated I see no reason why a farmer, for instance, who comes in contact with a mowing machine and is incapacitated to earn his living; why a fisherman, who by accident or otherwise is incapacitated to earn a living; why any person engaged in any industry that he is faithfully prosecuting for the primary purpose of earning a remunerative livelihood and for the further purpose of developing the general industrial life of the country, becoming incapacitated by disease or accident, should not be pensioned.

Further, I object to any general pension scheme being inaugurated in Canada which does not provide for compulsory contribution by the wage earner to a fund which will bear part of the cost of that scheme. I think it a fair proposition to bring before this House that the government, whether federal or provincial, should contribute to a fund to which compulsory payment would be made by employees as well as by employers in industry for the benefit of those engaged in the general industry of this country. But the proposal embodied in this resolution contemplates nothing of the sort. I have examined into a number of schemes. In Great Britain, for instance, I find that there was an amendment made in 1925 to their system of pensions providing for contributory pensions for certain classes of persons who are entitled to participate in that scheme. The cost of such a scheme, of course, is large, but I find that in a number of other countries compulsory contributions are necessary. For instance, in Austria there is a compulsory system of contribution. In Belgium, insurance is compulsory for all persons who work for an employer at an annual remuneration not exceeding a certain sum. In Bulgaria, compulsory insurance against old age is established. In Chili there is a system of compulsory insurance against old age. In Denmark the recent provisions are for the pensions being paid by the municipalities, only seven-twelfths of the expenses of operation and management being borne by the state. In France there is a compulsory contribution in respect of pensions, except that in the case of mothers who are earning their own living and that of their children there is a deduction from the contribution. In that country contributions are made by the wage-earners and the employer in equal amounts. The employer makes the contribution, but is permitted by the law to deduct one-half from the wages of the employee. In Germany the Old Age Insurance Act passed in 1889 was the first enactment providing for a national system of compulsory old age insurance. All wage-earners over sixteen years of age in industry, transportation, commerce, agriculture and domestic service, and salaried employees earning annually less than 2,000 marks, must be insured, and must pay from their weekly or monthly wage a certain proportion of the cost of maintaining the insurance system. Even in Greece, in 1922, there was adopted a system of compulsory insurance of wage-earners. In Italy they have compulsory insurance against old age and invalidity. If permanent incapacity to work is proved, pensions are granted at any age provided 120 fortnightly contributions have been paid by the worker into the scheme. The same in Jugo-Slavia, compulsory; Portugal, compulsory; Spain, compulsory, with certain subsidies granted to the scheme by the state; Sweden, compulsory, and so on.

My objection to this scheme as a scheme is that it is not well matured; it has not been carefully considered; it does not provide pensions for those who are incapacitated except by old age at seventy, and at that age they receive a pension whether incapacitated or not; it does not take into consideration the special claims of the blind, of those who are deaf and dumb, or of those who are mentally or physically incapacitated for earning a remunerative weekly, monthly or annual wage. If parliament, therefore, is willing to undertake a thorough and complete system of subsidizing from the treasury of the state those who are incapacitated mentally or physically for earning their livelihood,—and that is a large undertaking—it is unfair that we should consider simply this one case.

Furthermore, this scheme contemplates that in its operation there shall be co-operation beween the provincial governments and the federal government. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in the recent political history of this country we have proceeded altogether too far in the way of co-operation between the federal government and the provincial governments in respect, for instance, to road appropriations, which are within the proper jurisdiction and control of local legislatures. The same refers also to certain building schemes in which there was co-operation, but in respect of which the federal treasury, which provided the money, really had little or no control over the management of the funds and little or no supervision over the actual expenditures made. I do not wish to stress the matter, but I went through for several weeks, as counsel, an investigation in my native province of Nova Scotia which clearly disclosed to me that when provincial governments or provincial legislatures are expending moneys which are not raised on their own credit and responsibility, and in respect to which their sole responsibility is that of expenditure, it leads to wasteful expenditure and very wide latitude indeed in the making of those expenditures.

In the province of Quebec provision is made for those who are incapacitated either by old age or otherwise. There we have recognized under the law the family life, and by law there is imposed upon every member of the family the duty of maintaining other members of the family who are incapacitated by old age or by physical or mental disability. That law has proved, I think, a most splendid law, accepted by the whole people, preserving the family life and the responsibilities of family life, and so far as I can ascertain there is no demand from and no need in the province of Quebec for a federal subsidy to assist in maintaining what I might almost call the corporate existence of family life.

In my own native province of Nova Scotia, there is no need, I think for old age pensions or for pensions to those who are suffering special disability owing to blindness or being deaf and dumb. That province has undertaken for years past to educate its deaf and dumb and blind. That work has been so extremely well managed and so extremely beneficial that it will compare with similar work in any other civilized state in the world. I do not think there is any demand from that province for contributions of this kind in respect of work which they have undertaken as a province and in which the municipalities assist. They regard this as a provincial and municipal affair and they are prepared, I believe, unless there has been a change of sentiment in recent years, to continue it in the same vigorous and successful way in which they have carried it on in the past—in fact, ever since I was a child almost, although during the last thirty years many improvements have been effected.

If this pension scheme, therefore, is to be supported by the provincial and municipal authorities, the government should come to us with a plan which has been submitted to the provinces and which meets generally with their approval. It is utterly absurd, it seems to me, to present a scheme such as this, whereby the federal treasury will be bound, even under the limited measure proposed here, to the expenditure of $12,000,000 of annual appropriations, without having secured first the approval and the co-operation of the various provinces which will be expected to contribute the other twelve or thirteen million dollars. If any one province remains out of the scheme, an unequal and unjust burden is placed upon it, as a part of the country as a whole, for the purpose of maintaining this institution in other provinces. Furthermore, it would be grave injustice to the province of Quebec, a constituency of which I have the honour to represent in this House, and would be destructive of the entire traditions of that province, those splendid traditions which have been preserved for a century. I am sure no request has come from the people of Quebec for this scheme.

On these general grounds, therefore, without occupying the attention of the House further for the moment, I wish to express my objection to the scheme as a whole. It has been conceived without due consideration; it has never enlisted the co-operation and approval of the provinces and municipalities, although the former are bound to contribute one-half the amount involved; and finally it has never contemplated providing assistance for those who are just as much entitled to aid as others who, having attained the age of seventy, are incapacitated by physical or mental disability.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would be the better of having the minister in charge.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On old age pensions?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. I had the pleasure of introducing the resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not think the Minister of Public Works was old enough for that. What has he to say to the argument of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) which seems to me to be a very weighty presentation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George interjected certain side issues which would lead us far astray in regard to this bill. Provision for blind or disabled people would not come within the four corners of the bill. This is an old age pension bill, and it would be well to confine the operations of the bill to the matters set out in the resolution. Provision for the blind should be left more to the locality in which the unfortunate individual is situated; and I know throughout Canada provision is being made for people suffering from blindness. If it was the desire of the Canadian parliament to make provision for that class or other classes, it should be outside of this bill.

As to his argument that Quebec has already made provision for the old and aged in that province, that is true of every province and municipality in Canada, but it is well known that in the Canadian parliament for many years, in fact since 1906, this question has been mooted and discussed. In the last parliament a committee of the House of Commons in 1924 reported recommending an old age pension bill and it will be found by those who consult the report of that committee that the legislation now before the House follows very closely the report which was presented to the House of Commons at that time.

The resolution covers in extended form the matter that will come within the bill itself, and I would ask that the resolution be adopted in order that we may consider the bill when it comes before the committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course I realize the minister is only acting—and the word "acting" must be used in a somewhat ironical sense to make it properly apply—but his answer to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is conspicuously ineffective.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Sufficient, though.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He says, towards the close, that this bill, to use his own language, very closely follows the report of the committee of 1924. Why, it flies in the face of that report. I have not had time at this moment to read the report over again, but my recollection is that it recommended the calling of a provincial conference to see if the provinces could get together on some form of legislation. I have the report before me now and it reads:

Mr. Raymond, from the special committee, appointed on the 1st of May last to make an inquiry into an old age pension system for Canada, to which was referred the correspondence arising from the proposal recommended to parliament on the 1st of July, 1924, for co-operative action on the part of the federal government and the governments of the several provinces, has the honour to report as follows:

Your committee has given careful consideration to the aforesaid correspondence, and also to the correspondence more recently received from premiers and ministers of several provinces. Briefly, the view of the several provincial governments are as follows:

I really think this should be read.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It has been read.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then I will not take the time to read again the reports from the premiers and other representatives of the provinces. Suffice it to say that there is not much sunshine to be got out of these cucumbers so far as I can see. Not one of them speaks favourably of entering into an old age pension scheme with the Dominion. These are embodied in the report, and then the committee says:

Having given very careful consideration to the opinion submitted by the Department of Justice, and also to the respective views of the different provinces, your committee have come to the following conclusions:

Firstly, that if the Dominion government were to proceed now with a scheme of old age pensions, it would have to be prepared to bear the entire expense, which would approximately amount to $23,000,000 annually, according to the data obtained in your committee's investigations.

The inference being that they should not proceed now.

Secondly, that in view of the present financial conditions and heavy taxation of Canada, your committee would not feel warranted at the present moment in recommending such a large additional expenditure, annually.

Thirdly, that this measure of social reform, in the opinion of your committee, is very important.

That was a comparatively safe feature of the report.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the date of the report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: June 16, 1925. The fourth conclusions reads:

That since it is the opinion of the Department of Justice that the matter is one coming under the jurisdiction of the provinces, although open to assistance from the federal government, your committee, therefore, strongly recommend:

1. That the federal government arrange with the premiers of the different provinces for a conference to be held during the coming recess of parliament at which an old age pension system shall be given the fullest consideration with a view to securing cooperative action, and that the report of the said conference be laid on the table at the next session of parliament for future consideration and action.

2. That the chairman of your committee, and one other of its members who would be familiar with the subject matter, be invited to attend the said conference.

3. That a copy of this report be forwarded to each premier of the several provinces.

That is the report which the minister says this bill followed closely. Why, all the report recommended was a conference, and that is about all that the government have not done. They have not held any conference at all. Of course it is not difficult to divine the reason for there not having been a conference. As hon. members will recollect, we have been threatened with a provincial conference now for about two years. The suggestion came first from the ambition which suddenly sprang into the mind of the Prime Minister to clip the wings of the Senate and bring the Senate into line with democracy, and a few months afterwards the necessity for a conference became apparent to the government as a means of bringing this about. But when the government could not for the life of it think of anything to bring before the conference, the matter was deferred and we were told that there would have to be a general election in order that the government might receive the authority to call the conference. The government, however, knowing that at such a conference they would have to bring up Senate reform, were afraid to call it, so that the only recommendation the committee could have made was very skilfully avoided. No other recommendation was made. Why, then, does the minister stand up and say that this bill follows the recommendation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It follows it very closely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, as closely as east follows west; just as closely as this government follows its platform of 1919; just as closely as black is allied to white.

Mr. McPHEE: We are very near to that platform to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You are very little nearer to it now than before. I should like to discuss some features of that question; it will come up next week. I can well remember a few years ago when an announcement of this kind was made. There was great elation, and just about half of those who were intoxicated with it were left at home a few months afterwards. I make that statement by way of warning to hon. gentlemen diagonally opposite.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. McPHEE: That did not happen in Saskatchewan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There, too, to some extent. Saskatchewan, however, is a safe place to laugh in so far as free trade matters are concerned. Security is one of the attributes of hon. gentlemen, an attribute which in their case is more conspicuous than their courage. Now I come back to the point from which I was diverted. There is no family resemblance between this resolution and the report of the committee; the resolution is not the offspring of the committee. It was not born of that committee at all. It is the result of a compact, made at the opening of the House, to get the votes of Labour members, and it is not going to get any old age pensions. It was intended to secure votes and it has served that purpose already. I do not know of any much more effective step which might be taken in order not to provide for old age pensions. You put upon the statute books a framework into which the provinces have to fit themselves and you have pretty well shut the door on old age pensions. There has been no conference for the reason that the government does not want to get the premiers of the provinces together. A conference was the only recommendation, and that conference having been denied, this step is taken.

I want to dwell for a moment on the point raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. We all know that under many circumstances there is much to warrant old age pensions, but if there is anything more than another that warrants such pensions it is the fact that old age disables from earning power. Now aside from the fact that the provinces heretofore have taken care of this situation, this being their responsibility under the constitution, this legislation is not framed on the principle of disability at all. As a matter of fact there is no principle of any kind underlying it. If the Dominion is going to step in and assist the provinces in the care of old persons, the Dominion is under just as great a responsibility to step in and assist the provinces to take care of others who are disabled from earning power from any cause. Indeed, the responsibility in relation to certain other classes is even greater. The man who when he arrives at old age is unable to earn a living may be blameless if he cannot support himself, but there is a presumption in many cases that his condition is due to his own fault; and very often it is, in fact. But the man who through physical affliction, over which he has had no control, is unable to seize the ordinary opportunities of life and thus to provide for his old age has a greater call upon the public than he who has let the opportunities of life go by, finding himself at its close without the means of support. In a word, the cry of disability comes with far more force from the man who is robbed in early or in middle life of the ordinary opportunities that are available to all than from him who has failed to take advantage of such opportunities. But those from whom the call comes most insistently, those who have by far the strongest right of appeal to assistance, are ignored by the government. They are told to shift for themselves while others, less deserving, the government is ready to help because by so doing they can get votes and stay in office. And without a whisper of encouragement from the provinces, unless possibly from one, with everything indeed in the way of discouragement, the government are thrusting themselves in and saying to the provinces, "Here is the mechanism; you get in and find your place." Is that going to accelerate the arrival of old age pensions? Let the government call a conference to consider the whole question of disability, and if the provinces are not able to take care of the situation and the government desire to assist, they may join; but do not start by discriminating, especially against the most deserving of all.

Now, those are some features of the criticism I make. The government say: We cannot do it ourselves because we are forbidden by the British North America Act. That act seems to be of some use, even in the absence of the former Minister of Labour, who in his day gave us some fearful and wonderful interpretations of it. But if one reads this letter from the Justice department he will find there is nothing in it about disability. If we want to do it we can—I am not advocating it—but there is nothing in the world in the way of disability. Here is what it says:

> Referring to your letter of the 12th, instant, asking to be advised with regard to the authority of parliament to legislate on the subject of old age pensions, I may say this subject does not fall specifically within any of the enumerated subjects given to the Dominion under section 91 of the British North America Act, but does in my judgment fall within the subject of "property and civil rights in the province" committed to the provinces under section 92.

That is to say, the British North America Act does not specifically make this the duty of the Dominion. It does under, section 22, enumerate a list of the responsibilities of the provinces within which this is included. The opinion continues:

> I am of opinion therefore that the subject matter of pensions has been entrusted to the provincial legislatures rather than to parliament. I do not mean to suggest that parliament has not the power to legislate upon the subject so as to assist the provinces or to establish an independent, voluntary scheme, provided that in either case the legislation does not trench upon the subject matter of property and civil rights in the province, as for example by obligating any province or person to contribute to the scheme.

That is to say, the Dominion government could not pass an act based on the principle of contribution to the extent of saying that whether a man wanted to or not he had to contribute. We cannot do that. But undoubtedly the Dominion parliament could pass an act, saying in effect: Here is a scheme which we leave open to all the people of our country who desire to come in; anyone who comes in must pay so much—that is obligatory—if he does not, why he is simply outside the scheme. The Dominion could do that. In a word, there is no real restraint on the Dominion doing it if it wants to. We cannot compel people to come into such a scheme, but nobody would think of doing that anyway. Consequently it is only a sham, to be argued either on the basis of this opinion or on any other basis, that we cannot, if we desire to, lay down the foundation of an act wholly within our competence and our supervision, the entire moneys to be provided by the parliament of Canada. All that I want to press upon the committee is, that if we do not do it we ought manfully to say: We do not do it because we do not think it is wise. We should not say: We do not do it because there is some constitutional restraint. There is not.

Now, I rose to point out this. When the ministry advocates, in the first place, that this bill is founded upon the report of the committee, well, it argues something for which not a shadow of a fact can be produced in support of; when it argues, secondly, that this is a fair treatment of disabled people—or put it this way, that this bill is based on any principle of equality, any principle that is not discriminatory, why it has no shadow of foundation for its argument. It is discriminatory. It is selecting, I believe—not in every case undeserving instances, for in very many cases they are deserving—but it is selecting a class of cases among which the undeserving would be far more predominate than any other class of disabled people. In short, it is leaving out those whose appeal is far stronger than the appeal of those it would include. And surely when the government argues that it has to have a complicated system of inter-related provinces in its scheme because of a constitutional restraint, it is arguing what is not true. There is no such constitutional restraint at all. The resolution bears every evidence of being brought to this House for one purpose and for one only—to satisfy a compact entered into for the sake of votes on the Address; and this bill will not get us any closer to old age pensions on behalf of the workless.

Mr. NEILL: Will the right hon. gentleman before he takes his seat justify his statement that this resolution is not in any way whatever founded—I think he said—upon the recommendations of the committee? I refer now to the specific suggestions made by the committee in the report of 1924.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was referring to the report of the committee of 1925, the last I had before me. I have not read the 1924 report.

Mr. HEAPS: I have before me the report of the committee of 1924, dated July 1. I presume it must be something along the same lines as that which the right hon. leader of the opposition has just been dealing with. It is very specific in regard to its recommendations. It says:

This question has been before this House at different times since 1907, but no definite recommendation was made by any of the committees to which it was referred.

After careful consideration of the information obtained from the sources enumerated, your committee respectfully recommends:

1. That an old age pension system be established at the earliest possible date for deserving indigent persons to seventy years of age and upwards.

I think there is no doubt that the present resolution deals with the recommendation stated in this particular report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was not that report reversed the next year?

Mr. HEAPS: As I said before, it is dated July 1, 1924. It is signed by W. G. Raymond, Chairman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The later report reversed it.

Mr. HEAPS: The other recommendations are:

2. That applicants for pensions must be British subjects of at least twenty years' residence in Canada,—

And so on.

3. (a) That the maximum rate of pension be $20 per month which will be lessened by private income or partial ability to earn:

I think something in the resolution deals with that particular aspect of the question. The report continues:

(b) That one-half the amount of pension payable be borne by the federal government; the other half, by the provincial governments of such provinces as express by legislation their desire to adopt the system—the cost of administration to be borne by the provincial governments.

I believe the resolution follows exactly the lines of these recommendations. Then of course the report goes on to deal with other items which are not of very much importance at the moment, except this, to be fair to the right hon. leader of the opposition:

Your committee further recommends that the government communicate with the various provincial governments to ascertain if they are disposed to adopt the above system and enact the necessary legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the face of the replies received the committee reversed its report and brought in another one.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know that that is entirely correct. Anyhow, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal for a few moments with some of the criticisms that were made this afternoon. Since I came into the House I have learned that one of the easiest things is to criticize destructively, but it is a different thing to criticize constructively. The criticism offered this afternoon has not been of a constructive character; it has been either destructive in its nature or it has been in the form of suggestions which would extend the provisions of the scheme considerably. If I understand correctly the attitude of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) he expressed two conflicting ideas. First, he was entirely opposed to the principle of old age pensions; second, he tried to impress upon the committee the desirability of extending the provisions of the proposed bill. Now, a man cannot have it both ways, if he is opposed to old age pensions, then he must also be opposed to any extension of the principle. But it seems we have that kind of argument which would extend the scope of the measure and at the same time would oppose the principle of old age pensions altogether.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was that report of 1924 adopted by this House?

Mr. HEAPS: I cannot say that it was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that it was not. The report of 1925 was adopted.

Mr. HEAPS: I desire to point out that this question has been discussed by various committees of parliament for the past eighteen years, and if hon. members tell me to-night that the House has not given consideration to the question of old age pensions, I cannot understand their logic. Away back in 1919 a commission was appointed by the then government to inquire into the question of industrial unrest, and I do not think hon. members on the other side would care to repudiate the findings of that commission.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Their own commission.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know what the hon. member means by that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It was under the jurisdiction of the government.

Mr. HEAPS: I will not say it was under their jurisdiction, but the commission was appointed by them. Very often these commissions report in accordance with the desires of the government in power.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: And what do we find? On page 19 of their report, which was signed by T. G. Mathers, Chairman, Carl Riordon, Chas. R. Harrison, Tom Moore and John W. Bruce, we find this:

> We recommend immediate inquiry by expert boards into the following subjects, with a view to early legislation:
> (a) State insurance against unemployment, sickness, invalidity and old age.

Nothing was done with the report of that commission in 1919, and nothing has been done to make effective their recommendations. It might be argued from their report that they recommended some form of contributory system under which the beneficiary himself or herself, as well as the government, should contribute. I think such a scheme would be impracticable in Canada. In Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand, where old age pensions have been in effect for the past fifteen years or more, they have a non-contributory system.

Mr. MANION: Is it not true that in England they adopted a system of non-contributory and also contributory pensions?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. I was coming to that in a moment. In Australia—and it is the same in New Zealand—the pension is on a non-contributory basis.

Mr. BENNETT: The royal commission reported against that.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. I think the hon. member for West Calgary referred to that the other day, but up to the present time the recommendation has not been adopted. What is the scheme in Australia? We are now attempting to put into effect a scheme whereby the old age pension is payable at seventy; in Australia it is payable at sixty-five. Now taking the purchasing power of money in Australia as compared with Canada, I would say that $20 in Canada would be considerably lower than the pension paid in Australia. I believe in Australia it amounts to £39 a year. The age is sixty-five for men and I think sixty for women; consequently we are considerably lower in our rate of pension than they are in Australia. In Great Britain the scheme started in 1908; the age for pensions was seventy, and it remained there until the beginning of the present year, when the scheme was changed and enlarged considerably. The age limit was reduced from seventy to sixty-five, but the pension was put on a contributory basis. In Canada we are starting with a scheme of old age pensions in the same way as they started in Great Britain and elsewhere, and when we have had the scheme in operation for a number of years something might be said in favour of a contributory system.

I cannot see that it is possible at this time to adopt a Dominion-wide scheme, because the British North America Act is a hindrance when we try to put into effect a plan of this kind and compel the provinces to adopt it. If the Dominion wanted to make it applicable to all the provinces, one of the provinces might refuse to accept it, and there is no compelling clause to make them accept it. It is said that the provinces which do not come under the provisions of the act will be paying for the benefit of those provinces, which do come under it. Of course that kind of thing is going on all the time in Canada. We in the west might say we are paying for the wharves and docks built in the province of Quebec. But we do not complain of that expenditure. Quebec seems to be a rather favoured province in regard to government expenditure. I do not think there should be any complaint if the eastern provinces do not take advantage of the provisions of this bill in regard to old age pensions. But when we are dealing with old age pensions the government should bring in a bill equal in its application to all the provinces and should give the provinces the right to refuse to come in if they so desire.

If it is left to every individual province to enact legislation along the lines of old age pensions, what are we likely to see? What is happening now in regard to other social legislation in Canada? You find one province with a Workmen's Compensation Act, and another province with a very poor imitation of it. You find one province that has a Minimum Wage Act, and other provinces without such legislation. You find some provinces with eight-hour day legislation and others which have not such legislation. That is one of the bad features about social legislation in Canada. When I was in Manitoba recently I was in touch with certain manufacturers there who objected to the low wages being paid in some of the eastern provinces. They claimed that while the Minimum Wage Act had been recently placed on the statute books it had not been enforced, and that the manufacturers of Manitoba, who are paying a minimum wage of $11 and $12 a week, had to compete with eastern manufacturers who were paying $5 and $6 a week. That is the effect of having nine governments deal with a problem that should be dealt with by one central authority. That is why I want to see Dominion legislation in this matter. Its application would be uniform in all the provinces, and one province could not get the advantage of the others by keeping outside the provisions of the act—

Mr. McGIBBON: What industries in the east are paying $5 and $6 per week and where are they?

Mr. HEAPS: There are some eastern firms who are paying wages of about $6 per week.

Mr. McGIBBON: Name them.

Mr. HEAPS: In Quebec.

Mr. McGIBBON: Name the industry.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think it is necessary to name the firm. I have made the statement and it can be proved if necessary. In fact I was in Montreal on Sunday last and a manufacturer there told me that girls applying for positions in his establishment stated that they could not work for less than $5 a week. That wage is paid in some of the eastern parts of Canada. I am not referring to Ontario at all. I know they have a Minimum Wage Act here, and I think it is being generally oberved. I want to see legislation of a similar character in all the provinces; I do not want to see any one province in a worse position than another.

This old age pension legislation has been asked for by the labour forces in all parts of Canada; I do not think there is a labour organization in Canada on record as being opposed to it. I would like to see the federal government assume a much larger share of the cost of this legislation. In fact if I were to go through the bill and say what I would like to see, I would be opposed to many of its provisions; at the same time I want to see legislation of this kind put on the statute book. We are to-day about fifteen or sixteen years behind other parts of the empire in legislation such as this, and if we have to wait until all the nine provinces are ready for an act of this character I am afraid that we may have to wait for a good many years yet.

I notice that a committee that recently investigated the question of migration from Great Britain has suggested that there be put down on the agenda of the forthcoming Imperial conference to be held this fall the question of the standardization of insurance schemes throughout the empire, and that contributory pensioners should be credited with a year's pension when proceeding overseas. Although that question is down on the agenda of the Imperial conference for discussion this fall, our Prime Minister, or whoever represents Canada at that conference, will have to confess to the conference, to the delegates from New Zealand and Australia and the representatives of the British government, that in Canada we have no old age pensions at all. What does that mean? It means that we in this country are more backward in our social legislation than they are in other parts of the empire.

It may be true that this legislation is not going as far as I should like to see it go. I should like to see it go as far as it does in Australia. I should like to see blind people included, and invalidity insurance established in this country, but invalidity insurance is something apart altogether from the question of old age pensions. I would like to see it made possible for men to earn sufficient when they are working to tide them over the period when they may be unfortunate enough to be invalided, but I claim that this piece of legislation is a step in the right direction. It is something that has been asked for by labour for many years past; organizations of various characters throughout the Dominion have asked for it, and if we put this on the statute books of the Dominion, we shall only be putting into effect legislation which has already gone into effect in other parts of the empire some fifteen or twenty years ago.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is there any class of people in this country that the hon. member would not put on the payroll of the state?

Mr. HEAPS: If I could get a sensible question from the hon. gentleman, I would answer it.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I want to say at the outset that for many, many years I have realized, and publicly recognized, the desirability of some legislation that would make provision for the care in old age of deserving citizens. As a principle, or as a measure of social legislation, I think it is one that ought to have the careful attention of the people of Canada.

I am also aware that this subject has been discussed for many years in Canada, as the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Heaps) has said. It is also correct that in the last two sessions a special committee of the House has studied the problem and made reports. But I want to say to the government very, very frankly, and to hon. gentlemen who are supporting this particular resolution, that in my opinion, and I speak as one who has advocated for years a measure of legislation to bring about the care of those in old age, this resolution if passed into law in the form of a bill based upon the resolution will not have that effect. It is just as certain as that we are present here to-night that a year from now, or two or three years from now, if this measure passes the Senate, there will be no old age pension for the old people of Canada. I am convinced of that in my mind, and I will give my reasons. I hope I shall be given credit for giving my opinion honestly, although it may not be in the form the government might wish.

In the first place, I would like to refer to the two previous reports that have been made on this subject. First there was the report of 1924. That report, which was never adopted, and the House should bear that in mind, recommends an old age pension system for deserving indigent persons of seventy years of age and upwards. I call attention to that, because it is really the main principle of that report.

In another clause that 1924 report suggests that the federal parliament should pay one-half and the provinces one-half of the pension, but the committee went on to point out in this report, which was presented on July 1, 1924:

> Your committee further recommends that the government communicate with the various provincial governments to ascertain if they are disposed to adopt the above system and enact the necessary legislation.

That was an honest and a serious suggestion. Why was that recommended? The committee which had studied this question knew that it was perfectly useless to pass the legislation unless the governments of the several provinces were willing to co-operate, so they suggested in the report itself: Here is a scheme which we think will work, but before it is passed into legislation the provinces should be consulted. Now that part of the report was never considered by the government. There was no consultation with the provinces; I am not speaking of last year, but of two years ago. No effort was made by this government to bring the provinces into harmony so that when the legislation was finally introduced it might be useful and effective if all were agreed upon it.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member says that the government made no attempt to carry the 1924 report into effect. The government did communicate with the various provinces, as the report of 1925 will show.

Mr. STEVENS: No. There may have been informal communication, but the Prime Minister knows that in this sort of thing you must get the provinces together in conference, and have some definite scheme in which the provinces will agree to join.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is before them now in this bill.

Mr. STEVENS: I will deal with that in a moment, I submit that there was no conference of the provinces held, and no effort made to hold one.

Mr. NEILL: We did not ask for a conference in the 1924 report, but we asked that the provinces be communicated with, and that was carried out.

Mr. STEVENS: There were a number of answers from the provinces, but I do not wish to go into that. My point is that there was no scheme arrived at in conference between the provinces and the Dominion.

Now I come to the legislation proposed in this resolution, and again I want to inject this, that I am not opposing the principle of old age pensions. I am endeavouring to show that this resolution will not give effect to the desire of those who wish to see old age pensions come into effect. Take the first clause of the resolution, which reads:

> That the Governor in Council may make an agreement with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of any province for the payment to such province quarterly of an amount equal to one-half of the net sum paid out during the preceding quarter by such province for pensions pursuant to a provincial statute authorizing and providing for the payment of such pensions to the persons and under the conditions hereinafter specified and regulations made under the proposed legislation.

Then in clause 3, which must be read in conjunction with clause 1, otherwise it is meaningless, we have this:

> Before any agreement so made comes into operation, the Governor in Council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province.

I ask any member of this House, particularly members of the government who have had experience in provincial governments—my hon. friend who is in charge of this bill was for a number of years a minister in the provincial government of British Columbia; the Minister of Agriculture and other members of the government have also had experience in provincial governments—what provincial government or what provincial legislature is there in Canada to-day that will submit its legislation to the approval of the government in Ottawa?

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not desirable to have uniformity in legislation on old age pensions?

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely; that is what I am trying to show. But this legislation will never accomplish that.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes it will.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend, I think, is quite sincere in his support of the measure. His idea is to have uniform legislation all over Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. I agree with him there, but I am trying to point out that the very provisions of this bill will vitiate that and make it ineffective. I ask again what legislature or government of any province will submit its legislation to this government—not to this parliament but to this government—before they enact it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Lots of them have done so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They did it in the case of the legislation for the building of roads, the advancement of technical education, for agricultural instruction, and several other measures.

Mr. STEVENS: The highways bill was an entirely different matter, and by the way, it has been called into question by my hon. friend's supporters for years, and I would hesitate to support it again myself. The highways bill was a gift from the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So is this a gift.

Mr. STEVENS: No, not exactly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: You are asking the provinces to pass legislation which must be submitted to the Governor in Council at Ottawa before it becomes effective.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In order that the legislation may be uniform.

Mr. STEVENS: Why do you not go to the provinces beforehand and get an agreement with them before you do anything? Why do you not bring in a bill which will reflect the opinion of the provinces?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We want to get on.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend does not want to get on. To be perfectly frank I say this: the hope, the expectation, the desire of this government is that the bill to be founded on this resolution will go to the Senate and that the upper house will view it as an abortive piece of legislation and reject it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I dissent altogether from that statement. This government and the party it represents proclaimed to the people of Canada in convention that they proposed to bring in legislation to provide for old age pensions. This resolution represents the effort of the government representing the Liberal party in this country.

Mr. STEVENS: I am trying to show the minister that the proposed legislation will be wholly abortive. If the only guarantee of the soundness of the legislation is that it was passed in a Liberal convention, then it is an absolute guarantee of the government's desire to evade the issue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend not recognize the fact, in speaking of the Senate, that the bill can only be thrown out in the upper house if a majority of his own party reject it?

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. That is the precise proof of the correctness of my statement.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. gentleman recommend his own party in the Senate to pass the bill?

Mr. STEVENS: As far as I am concerned I will recommend the Senate to pass an old age pension bill that is going to be useful and effective. Now I am going to finish what I was about to say, and I am receiving support from the interjection of the right hon. Prime Minister. He says that if the bill is thrown out in the Senate it will be rejected by a majority composed of friends of this party. That is the hope of this government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not a bit of it.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the hope of this government. It is the government's hope and expectation that the Senate will throw this legislation out—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Senate throw it out they may expect to hear a great deal from this party about it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: If my right hon. friend would only let me finish my sentences when I am on my feet; unfortunately he finishes the sentence for me. This is the reason the government hope the Senate will throw the bill out: so that they can go before the country and say, "Here we have the Tory Senate throwing out the Old Age Pensions bill." They will make an appeal of that kind in regard to a useless piece of legislation.

Mr. HEAPS: Will my hon. friend permit me one more question?

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to be allowed to finish my sentence.

Mr. HEAPS: Will my hon. friend make some suggestion of a constructive nature that will make the bill more useful?

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to finish one or two of these sentences that I have tried several times to complete. The Prime Minister is so anxious to help me out that he rather gets in before me. I say this again: The government expect and hope that the Senate will throw this bill out because it is more or less a controversial piece of legislation. I venture to say there will be—what? Fifty members sitting behind the Prime Minister, fifty members of his own party, who would rather this legislation was not before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Name them.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, I can name them. They are over there by the dozen.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. gentleman answer the question I asked him a few moments ago?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but I should like to finish this part of my remarks first. I say there are behind the Prime Minister fifty—to-night there are not very many of them there—who would rather this legislation was not before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Name them.

Mr. STEVENS: They realize there is some political advantage in it. I realize that a large section of the people of Canada favour this legislation. I supported the principle, and have done so for years. I did so long before this government had the courage to bring it in, because I think legislation is good, but not of this particular type. The government's hope is that the Senate will throw it out and relieve them of the embarrassment which it causes. And why will the Senate throw it out? If the Senate throws out this legislation it will do so because it knows it is not effective. That is the reason.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to a point of order. I think my hon. friend is going beyond the mark when he undertakes to tell this House what the Senate will do. My understanding of the rules is that no reference should be made here to the actions of the upper house. My hon. friend is telling us in advance how the Senate proposes to deal with legislation on old age pensions when it comes before that venerable body. I submit he is out of order in so doing.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. Prime Minister is wholly wrong in his description of what I said. I said what I felt in my heart, that this government desired and expected the Senate to do something. I did not say what the Senate would do. I will go further and say this: So far as I am concerned if I had any influence with the Senate I would advise them to pass the legislation, even though it is of an abortive character, so that the uselessness of it may recoil upon the government's head.

Now I come back to the resolution. It says:

> That before any agreement so made comes into operation, the Governor in Council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province.

Thus not only the main principles of any legislation but the scheme of administrating it must be submitted to this government for approval. When I say "this government" I mean the federal government; it does not matter which government it is. We know perfectly well that the federal government may be Conservative or may be Liberal. The provincial government may be of one or the other complexion. There may be a conflict of opinion politically between the provincial and the federal government. A provincial government of Liberal persuasion may pass certain legislation and submit it to the approval of the Governor in Council of a Conservative government at Ottawa, and all the possibilities of political animosity are there so as to render the working together of the two governments impossible. In any case, this type of legislation should not be made subject to a provision of this kind. Further the resolution says: "no change" whatsoever—the word "whatsoever" is not in the resolution, but I am putting it in to emphasize the point—"in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the Governor in Council." That is, a provincial legislature having passed a bill for old age pensions and having got it into operation, cannot modify, change or in any way touch that bill without first coming to the federal government and receiving approval by order in council.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If action is to be a joint matter between two governments—and that is the intention of the bill—the federal government being the parent government introducing the legislation, surely as a matter of common sense, if a provincial government wishes to vary the operations of legislation that this parliament will pass, it must have the concurrence of the parent parliament that originated the bill. My hon. friend will not for a moment argue that that is not a proper course to follow if the bill is to be effective.

Mr. STEVENS: I am trying to argue that the bill will not be effective.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Unfortunately.

Mr. STEVENS: What I am trying to point out is this. We will assume that they get such a bill into operation. If any one legislature out of nine desires to have some clause different from what another legislature has, it cannot have it without the consent of this government. Furthermore, a provincial legislature, for instance British Columbia—and I understand the Hon. John Oliver has intimated that he is prepared to pass an old age pension law—may propose certain legislation satisfactory to the people of British Columbia and acceptable to that legislature. But that legislation might not suit the provincial legislature of Ontario or of Nova Scotia, and unless this government consented to such legislation passed by any one of the three or all of them, it could not become applicable and they could not take advantage of this bill. By attempting to pass a measure of this kind before a conference of the provinces is held and an agreement on the part of those provinces secured, the government are passing a piece of legislation that will be a joke on the statute books of Canada.

[Mr. Stevens.]

I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said that the provinces had been consulted. I have not under my hand the replies of the provinces, but so far as I can recollect—and I will speak subject to correction—I think the majority of those replies are of a character indicating that the provinces do not wish to join in a scheme with the federal authorities.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a fair statement as regards all except one, I understand. I will not argue it down to any fine point, but I know that the replies from the provinces do not indicate any real unanimity of opinion.

Mr. NEILL: While there may have been no unanimity in favour of it, opinions were divided throughout the country. But those replies were made before the decision was given by the Department of Justice that the matter was one for the provinces to deal with, and therefore it is much more now to their advantage to agree than it was at that time.

Mr. STEVENS: That answer would be all right except for one thing—the Department of Justice did not make such a statement. The whole atmosphere surrounding these replies indicates what I am getting at, namely, that this government in 1924 and again in 1925 ought to have called a conference of the provinces. How could you expect to get any unanimity of opinion by writing nine letters to nine provincial governments asking their opinion on a given subject? You are going to get as many opinions as letters you write. But if you get nine people around a table to confer on a given question with the federal authorities declaring that they have taken the lead in the matter, then you would have some hope of getting unanimity.

I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that a genuine effort has not been made by the government in this matter. I do not like to indulge in prophecy, but I predict that one year, two years or three years from now this legislation will be a dead letter on the statute books of Canada if it passes both Houses of parliament this year. It is pretty late in the session and perhaps hopeless to get a conference of the provinces, but I would say to the minister: Get a conference of the provinces as soon as possible; even if this legislation passes, get a conference of the provinces and bring them together with the idea of having some unanimity of opinion so that the parliament of Canada may pass legislation that may be effective.

In connection with this resolution there are other points that might be studied with profit, but I do not wish to detain the House at great length. Clause 2 reads:

That every agreement so made shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation—

That of course sounds all right, but a province might pass the legislation; it might draw from this treasury a certain number of quarterly payments for two years, three years, five years, and then drop the scheme. It could fail to vote the necessary supply, or repeal the legislation, or drop it, and so it passes off the books and off the scene. As I pointed out before, the very nature of this legislation leaves a province in the position to step in or step out. Let it be a definite agreement by all the provinces to enact such legislation supplemented and assisted by federal legislation and you may have something effective. But I have a suggestion—and I am replying now to the hon. member, not at present in his seat, who asked me a moment ago what suggestion I would make. I would suggest that the federal government determine themselves if they sincerely want to give old age pensions. If they now say they do—and they are sincere in this although I must say I do not read in the pages before me any evidence of sincerity—let them bring in a definitely and exclusively federal old age pension scheme, and I will support it. In fact if I have nothing else, I will support this just as an evidence of my good faith, but I declare to the House again that in supporting this I feel that I am supporting something that is really trifling with the good faith of the old people of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reply to the suggestion just made, my hon. friend's colleague, the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) told us the other night that if we did what he suggests the chances are it would be declared we had no authority to deal with the matter at all; that it was a provincial matter. He agreed with us that the only way in which we could proceed with a sense of security in the matter of an old age pension bill was by co-operation with the provinces.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. I say to the Prime Minister, as I have already stated: Show your good faith by bringing the provinces together and bring before them a measure that is composite in its form as representing the views of the provinces as well as of this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just as a step towards reaching, as quickly as possible, the point my hon. friend suggests. What is there to prevent the government from having the provinces come together, and assisting them in discussion by placing before them a measure that has already received the approval of this parliament and asking them if it requires amending in order to be wholly acceptable to them? If it does not, we are that much further ahead. If it does, we can have it amended.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a very plausible argument. Why did the minister not take the 1924 resolution a year ago to the provinces? Then he might have come here to-night with something that would be effective. I have about as much hope—I say this with kindness, but quite frankly to the Prime Minister—of evidence on the part of the government of taking this bill to a provincial conference in order to get the co-operation and support of the provinces as I have knowledge of their taking that resolution of 1924. It is for that reason that I have criticized this measure to-night. I believe it will be abortive, but even at that I wish to support it, not because I approve of its terms, but because I regard the following words in the resolution as the only declaration contained in all this legislation that has any degree of clarity or of sincerity, namely, "A measure respecting old age pensions."

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The government professes its sincerity in the desire to pass this legislation. Perhaps the Acting Minister of Labour can tell me whether the legislation foreshadowed by the resolution now before us will include the Yukon and the Northwest Territory. If it does, does not the word "province" in subsection (d) of section four limit the application of the resolution solely to the provinces?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Yukon and the northwest will be provided for in the bill.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): They are not included in this resolution.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They will be, in the bill.

Mr. STORK: Little remains to be said in reference to the resolution. We have had a lengthy discussion this afternoon and evening following an equally exhaustive debate when the resolution was last before the committee, and I fancy the matter has been fairly well covered from every angle. I have no lengthy remarks to offer but I certainly do think that this is a very notable step in the direction of social legislation, and I want to associate myself with the movement. As has been pointed out to-night, the question has been considered at various times from 1907 to the present day. We realize that a great deal of vacillation has marked the movement. The matter has been discussed by this House on different occasions, and it has been debated in our provincial legislatures. But where a scheme of this kind is passed on from one authority to another and back again we can readily see that no definite action will ensue. Somebody must take a definite step or nothing will be done.

The government in my opinion is to be commended upon having taken the initiative in the matter of old age pensions. I agree with some of the things that have been said touching the resolution, which perhaps is not all that might be desired. Some people will argue, for one thing, that the age limit is too high. However, it is a matter for gratification that at least we are taking a step in the right direction, and it is only a question of time until the various improvements which are being advocated will be incorporated in beneficial legislation. I am glad to see that the legislation is meeting with support, for it will assist a class of people who are most in need of the relief which is promised. This is a young country that offers opportunities to those who are anxious to work, but we must not overlook the fact that even in a young country there is a good deal of tragedy in life. This scheme, if I understand it, is designed to alleviate the hardships of those who are suffering from physical disability and who consequently cannot support themselves.

Not long ago a warm friend of mine found himself in sad straits as a result of a misfortune which he could not possibly have foreseen. Year after year he had faithfully contributed to an insurance scheme, and when the fraternal society of which he was a member collapsed, at least when its financial stability was discovered to be insecure, it was decided, in order to save what was left of the wreck, that men above a certain age should be completely debarred from sharing in the benefits of its insurance. Many men were left destitute in consequence of this appalling tragedy. Not long ago, in the province of British Columbia, a man who had been rated as very wealthy retired after having placed every dollar he possessed in a financial institution which failed. This was one of the great crashes that occurred in western Canada. This man was well known throughout the province, and when it was learned that as a result of this failure he had lost every cent he had in the world the sympathy of the people went out to him from all parts of the province. But what about the thousands of people in Canada who are left in exactly the same position through financial failures and who, because of their humble station in life, do not receive the same wide sympathy? These people suffer just as severely, but the average citizen in the country learns very little of their tragic fate. The purpose of the present legislation is to come to the assistance of such people, who are certainly entitled to every consideration that can be shown them by this country in their old age. For that reason I support the resolution.

Mr. MANION: Some of the remarks that have been made on the resolution before the committee have reminded me of other questions upon which perhaps I may be allowed to offer a few comments. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) observed to my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) that if the Senate should attempt to reject this legislation the Senate would certainly hear about it. It occurred to me that we have been hearing similar threats in reference to the Senate for the last two or three years, but we have never seen those threats put into effect. Throughout the last election campaign the Senate was the subject of considerable discussion, so much so that it came to be an important issue for decision in the country. We were told that the government were out to reform the Senate; that was their promise. But like most of the other promises of this government the undertaking to reform the Senate has gone by the board. A conference was to have been held last year to consider the question of Senate reform, but that conference has never been held. Nor was there held any conference such as was recommended by the committee which dealt with the matter of old age pensions.

I want to refer very briefly to another matter. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) has said that the Conservative party has always taken an attitude of opposition to such proposals as the one now before us. May I remind that hon. gentleman that it was the Conservative party in the province of Ontario who instituted the Workmen's Compensation Board which has proved such a great blessing to the working classes of that province.

Mr. HEENAN: What I said was that the Conservative party having advocated these things on the platform, I wanted to see its members vote for such measures in the House.

Mr. MANION: So far as I have been able to see, the Conservative party has done more to fulfil its pledges in matters of this kind than any other party. If I mistake not, it was the Conservative party that brought about mothers' pensions in Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MANION: Well then, I am subject to correction. My hon. friend here mentions that it was framed by the Conservative party, and their successors enacted it. However, the Workmen's Compensation Board Act probably has been the most important legislation for the working men of Ontario that has ever been placed upon the statute books of the province, and it was introduced by the Conservative party.

Now, in regard to the principle of this bill, I, like all the other members who have spoken, believe in looking after the old people of this country. I do not think there is a more pitiable tragedy in the world than a man who in his old age is reduced to poverty. I might point out that in China and Japan no such legislation as this is required, because although they are what we call heathen countries, their people hold their ancestors in such reverence that none of their old folk are allowed to go hungry and unsheltered. Under their traditions of ancestor worship their old people must be looked after by any relation, whether he be son or daughter or some more distant connection.

Mr. CAHAN: We have a statutory provision to that effect in the province of Quebec.

Mr. MANION: I am very pleased to hear my hon. friend bring that out. I had intended to refer to the situation in his province. But I was speaking of the attitude of the so-called heathen countries as opposed to that of many of our nominally Christian countries in this regard. After all, old people are very often in a poverty-stricken condition due to several causes, some entirely beyond their control. Sometimes they are indigent owing to unfortunate investments, as happened to many of the depositors of the Home Bank already referred to in this discussion, or to the operations of some swindler; others, again, have always had to struggle along with very low wages. I have some figures before me given by a Mr. Squire, who points out that in the state of Massachusetts, which is one of the richest in the union, the average per capita income is only $788. He points out also that one in four citizens in that state over sixty-five years of age requires financial assistance. It is rather a striking fact that such a strongly industrial state as Massachusetts should have so large a portion of its people in penury when they reach sixty-five or seventy years of age. Then another cause is improvidence, and naturally we are reluctant to look after those who have been utterly careless with their money. After all, it is difficult to ask those who have provided for their old age to contribute to the support of those who have made no such provision. At the same time, our Christian spirit should prompt us not to neglect even the improvident in their old age.

I find that in different countries there are different types of pensions. There is what is called the service pension—such as this—which is given to all old people who apply for it and can prove their need, and is granted without any contribution on their part either early or late; then there is the contributory pension; and finally the annuity type, such as we have in this Dominion, which the people themselves buy. I shall come back to this point in a moment. But one of the reasons why I think this legislation is premature is that it is not brought forward really with the intention of providing old age pensions, because it does not comply with the report made last year by the Old Age Pensions committee. That committee sat under Mr. Raymond, and my good friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence) was another member. After going into the question very throughly it brought in a report, the first and most important recommendation of which was that a conference should be held with the premiers of the different provinces to deal with this question. I repeat, that conference was never held. It should have been held before this legislation was brought in because unless you can get the different provinces to co-operate with the Dominion in this scheme, you are going to bring about the injustice which was pointed out by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and by the Premier of Quebec —this injustice, that the province which is not taking part in providing old age pensions for its people is to a certain extent paying the bills of the other provinces that do take advantage of the scheme. It is true that the provincial governments were written to by the Dominion authorities some time, I think, before the committee made its report, but I have read very carefully the replies from the premiers and not one of them openly and wholeheartedly said that his government was ready to co-operate with the Dominion government. True, one of the premiers was a little doubtful in his reply and more or less encouraged the scheme, but I think of the other eight some said absolutely they would have nothing to do with the scheme at all, and the others threw cold water upon it or took the attitude that it was a matter of federal aid entirely and they should not be called upon to bear any portion of the burden.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the hon. gentleman say just how many of the provincial governments actually opposed the principle?

Mr. MANION: Let me quote the various replies as set out in the report:

New Brunswick.—Under date of May 23rd, 1925, the Premier (Hon. Mr. Veniot) writes: "This province is now considering the establishment of what is known as Widows' Pension, and we are not prepared to take any decision in the matter of an old age pension.

That is strong enough I should think. He goes on to say:

While I do not disapprove of the old age pension, and feel that it would be a good thing, yet it would be impossible for me to commit the province to any action in this matter at the present moment."

Certainly that is opposing the principle.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He simply says "at the present moment."

Mr. MANION: "We are not prepared to take any decision in the matter of an old age pension."

Mr. HEAPS: "At the present moment."

Mr. MANION: The second reply is from Quebec:

Under date of February 17th, 1925, the Minister of Public Works and Labour (Hon. Mr. Galipeault) writes: "On the occasion of the recent visit of the delegates of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, this question was taken up and, although it was not submitted in the regular way to the cabinet, I understood from the remarks of my colleagues, that it could be no question for the province of Quebec, considering the obligations actually imposed upon it, of adopting a law which would take care of the old age pensions in this province."

Is not that a refusal? Only the other day Premier Taschereau made a speech in which he distinctly said his government was not in favour of old age pensions, and members from that province who have so far spoken in this debate, including the hon. member for Labelle, have also taken that attitude.

Under date of June 2nd, 1925, the Premier of Nova Scotia (Hon. Mr. Armstrong) writes: "In view of the importance of the subject matter, and the lack of an opportunity to fully consider the same, I was instructed to advise you that without a further and better understanding of the subject-matter and without an opportunity to fully discuss it with your committee, no action would be taken upon the matter at present."

That is three, and we have not discovered any agreement yet.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No one opposes the principle.

Mr. MANION: Every one.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. MANION: Well, my hon. friend and I do not interpret the English language in the same way.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We do not.

Mr. MANION: The next reply is from Prince Edward Island:

Under date of May 22nd, 1925, the Premier (Hon. Mr. Stewart) writes: "In this province, as you probably are aware, except in the towns, we have no municipal government, consequently all assistance to indigent and aged persons is furnished directly by the provincial government, either in the Provincial Infirmary or by monthly contributions to private persons who become responsible for their support. I have read over your letter and the accompanying report with interest. I shall place the matter before my government at its next meeting and will then advise you of its decision."

I understand they have not heard from him from that day to this, so he has not very enthusiastically supported the scheme.

Mr. HEAPS: Do you call that a refusal?

Mr. MANION: It is a very polite way of refusing. Regarding Ontario—

Under date of 24th November, 1924, the Premier (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) writes: "I shall be glad to consider the matter."

That is the fixed formula that the Prime Minister of this government and every other government employ when they want to get rid of importunate people. That is all he says.

Then the reply from Manitoba, under date 25th February, 1925, from the Attorney General, Hon. Mr. Craig, is as follows:

We are in the midst of our session just now with the multiplicity of matters requiring immediate disposition. I shall, however, take up the matter with the Premier and the Minister of Public Welfare at the earliest opportunity.

That is another gentleman who has forgotten to take it up. Then I come to Saskatchewan. Under date of 19th November, 1924, the Minister of Labour and Industry, Hon. Mr. Gardiner, who is now I believe Premier, writes:

The government of Saskatchewan is of opinion that an old age pension scheme for Canada can best be adopted by the federal government alone.

I may tell my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that this is not a refusal.

There would seem to be so much difficulty in the way of providing any scheme that would be suitable to all the nine provinces of Canada as to make it almost impossible, and it will be readily understood that if any number of the provinces were to remain out, it would be almost impossible to adopt any scheme that would not subject those provinces within the arrangement to considerable expense that should rightfully be borne by those outside the scheme. While we are disposed to think that an old age pension scheme should be undertaken, the difficulties in the way of the suggested scheme appear almost, if not entirely, insurmountable.

Not much encouragement there. Then we come to Alberta, and under date of June 2, 1925, the acting premier, Hon. George Hoadley, writes:

This government has reviewed the recommendations of the committee and approve of the general principle of old age pensions.

I have not heard anybody who did not approve of the principle.

We are not prepared, however, to accept the recommendations of the committee. The three main objections are: (1) We believe that the federal government should assume a larger share in the financing of an old age pension scheme as it is more a federal obligation than a provincial one; (2) We are not satisfied that a non-contributing scheme is the best one; and (3) There is no guarantee that the federal government would continue for a definite time to carry out the mutual arrangements with respect to financing the scheme.

They have not much faith in this government. Then we come to British Columbia, and my recollection is that British Columbia was the only one which gave any encouragement to the scheme. Under date of February 5, 1925, the Minister of Labour, Mr. Manson, writes:

This matter has been carefully considered by the government and also by the provincial legislature at its last session, and the consensus of opinion is that the matter of old age pensions is one entirely in the sphere of the federal parliament—

I was wrong when I said that they were in favour of the scheme.

—and this government does not concur in the suggestion made by the committee that a portion of the cost of such pensions be borne by the provincial crown.

Mr. NEILL: I will make the same objection to what my hon. friend says as I made to the statement of his deskmate, namely, that it must be borne in mind that all the replies were given before the report of the Department of Justice was submitted to the effect that the matter was entirely a provincial matter. Since then British Columbia has entirely changed its point of view, and not only has endorsed the principle, but has pledged itself to endeavour to persuade the other provinces to do likewise.

Mr. MANION: All the more reason for holding a conference of the premiers before bringing in this half-baked piece of legislation. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) calls my attention to a letter from the Minister of Labour of British Columbia, dated March 5, 1925:

I beg to say that the matter has had very serious consideration on the part of this department and the opinion is confirmed that the matter of old age pensions is a subject for the consideration of the federal and not the provincial parliament.

That confirms the statement that all of them were against the scheme. I thought that the reply of one province was favourable to it, but I was wrong; apparently none of them agreed to it. This government presents a scheme by which the Dominion parliament and the provincial parliament are to co-operate, yet not one of the provinces agrees to co-operate. How are they going to put it in force?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reference to the answers from the nine provinces, which the hon. gentleman has just read, I might say that those very replies convinced the government of the futility of ever having an old age pension scheme enacted by correspondence with the provinces. We concluded that the best way would be to enact concrete legislation. We thought that was the only way we could get anywhere.

Mr. MANION: That seems to me an extraordinary way of doing business with any person—to make your agreement first and then ask the other parties to accept it. Why not make your arrangements with the provinces first? The Minister of the Interior came in with a piece of legislation based exactly on the same principle.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Assistance to settlers.

Mr. MANION: I criticized this legislation on exactly the same grounds as I am criticizing the legislation to-day. The land settlers bill was one designed to help to get the settlers on the land, and the Minister of the Interior said he intended, after the act was passed, to discuss the matter with the different provinces. The time to discuss the matter with the provinces is not after you pass your act, but before, so that you can bring in an act which is the consensus of opinion of the different provinces, in co-operation with the Dominion.

I am making suggestions as to a pension scheme, and I am not opposed to the principle. I am not making factious objections. I object to this bill because I consider it is merely a gesture, thrown out for the purpose of proving that my good friend the Prime Minister wrote what he meant in that book he published some eight or ten years ago, which he read the other evening when he was discussing the matter, and showed by that—and I do not criticize his sincerity—that he believed in old age pensions when he wrote the book. But what struck me then was the fact that he waited until he was in such a position that he could not carry out the scheme without the support of the independent group in this House before he brought in the legislation. It seemed a little inconsistent, if he believed as strongly in the principle as he said he did, that he should wait until this time to bring forward the legislation. I have an idea that this legislation is only a gesture, the same as the wheat board was a gesture, and the Trusts and Combines Act was a gesture, the Petersen contract and freight rates legislation. All these matters were important so far as the Dominion is concerned; they were all brought before the House and put through, but nothing was ever done with them. They were pigeonholed and were of no service to anybody, except perhaps they were the means of giving a little more salary to the civil servants and occasioned more expense by keeping the House sitting a little longer. This is not a scheme for old age pensions. It is a scheme for old age government. It is a scheme to convince this House that this government is out to help get old age pensions, whereas the government knows it cannot be carried into effect unless nine provinces agree; and it cannot be carried out unless it is a practical piece of legislation. If they had the consensus of opinion of the provinces in favour of it, no doubt it would pass the Senate and pass this House. But they have not the agreement of the provinces, in fact they have the opposition of the provinces, including Quebec.

I repeat that I favour the principle involved, and I believe that, as so-called Christians, we should look after our old people. We should not allow our aged to be down and out and to be dependent upon charity.

Mr. HEAPS: What would the hon. member suggest, to make the bill practicable, or to make old age pensions practicable?

Mr. MANION: A conference of the provinces. Let that conference be held, as suggested by the committee, to discuss the matter.

Mr. HEAPS: Would you wait until all the provinces agreed upon an act before you put it through?

Mr. MANION: I would wait for one or two of them. When we do not get one out of the nine agreeing, it is a poor outlook. I have read the report. We do not get any of them to agree. Why should the government endeavour to put this legislation through when none of the provinces agree?

Mr. HEAPS: Was there not a case some years ago where the Dominion government passed an act without the consent of the provinces, and subsequently the provinces consented to come under the provisions of the act?

Mr. MANION: That is a different principle. There are conditions under which this government has a right to legislate. My good friend from Comox-Alberni quoted a decision of the Department of Justice, and I think correctly, that this is a matter for the provinces and not for the Dominion.

Mr. HEAPS: I think my hon. friends opposite are at variance with each other on this question.

Mr. MANION: Who is?

Mr. HEAPS: My hon. friend is not in agreement with his right hon. leader.

Mr. MANION: I do not mind that. We have a good independent party, and have the courage to voice our own opinions. We are not under anybody's whip, so far as agreeing with anybody is concerned. We vote according to our convictions over here, but my hon. friends on the other side simply vote to keep themselves in power. That is the difference between that party and this. My hon. friend is not long in the House yet, but he will learn that shortly.

In addition to the points which I have brought out, there is this, which I think is most important of all. This scheme when it comes into effect should be made a contributory scheme. It should be a scheme in which the men themselves, as they go on working in their healthy time of life, will contribute something to look after themselves in their old age. That encourages the principle of personal thrift, and that is something we should encourage so far as we are able. I know what my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni is going to ask me: What about the old people of to-day?

Mr. NEILL: I was not going to ask anything.

Mr. MANION: I thought my hon. friend was getting up to ask a question.

Mr. NEILL: If the hon. gentleman would sit down, I would get up.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is up a good deal in the House. I think I will stay up and keep him down a little while. The principle of personal thrift is important to people all over the world, not only to our own people. I have noticed that Great Britain after having had an old age pension scheme in force since about 1908, last year brought in an amendment to their act making the scheme contributory.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. CAHAN: A compulsory contributory scheme.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George says it is even stronger than I put it. I will get the authority and show my hon. friend that I am correct. Germany has had an old age pension scheme since 1889, and their scheme has always been contributory. Sweden, Italy, Belgium, and many other countries have contributory schemes. Australia, New Zealand, and England up to last year, have non-contributory schemes, where the pension is provided without the pensioner contributing anything. But I submit that the proper system is the contributory system, whereby men are encouraged in their youth to save for their old age by contributing. Contributions might also be made by employers, and as well there should be assistance by the state.

I have offered these constructive suggestions, but the most important to my mind are these two: First, the system should be contributory, and secondly, we should get the provinces to agree before we insist on taking them into this scheme.

Mr. GERSHAW: I rise to express my approval of this resolution. I see no reason whatever to doubt the sincerity of the government. I have every reason to believe that if this resolution is put into effect a great many people in our country will benefit thereby. I quite realize that it does not cover the whole field. It does not provide for all those who are incapacitated, but I believe it will provide the necessities of life and some meagre comforts for a class of people who are deserving of more than kind words and good wishes. Some people after reaching the age of seventy find themselves with no provision for their old age. Some have their savings to fall back upon, others are kept by their children; some have insurance, and some are provided for by their employers. The large railway companies, for instance, not only provide compensation for a man who is injured, but pensions for men who have been a certain number of years in the service. The brotherhoods also provide pensions, on a contributory basis, for men who have reached a certain age, and pensions as well for those who are totally or partially incapacitated before reaching that age. Again, some are fortunate enough to have invested in annuities. I would like to point out that a man can secure an annuity of $100 per annum at the age of 65 by investing at 42 the sum of $357.81. I have recently been in the west, and I find that a great many people are interested in this legislation. I believe that it will meet with the approval both of those who hope to benefit by it and of others as well.

As to the two kinds of schemes, contributory and non-contributory, I find that Australia, New Zealand, Uruguay, Spain, Denmark and Norway all have non-contributory schemes. Some of the states across the line also have non-contributory schemes. The recent amendment to the British act provides for both contributory and non-contributory schemes. I think that a good number of people will be disappointed because in order to participate in these pensions they must have lived in Canada twenty years. Yet Australia has the same number of years in its scheme, New Zealand has twenty-five years, and Uruguay about fifteen.

Some hon. members referred to the question of cost. I believe it will be much less than $11,000,000. In view of the financial report which we had this afternoon, it seems to me that Canada at the present time is in a good position to initiate legislation of this kind, so that the federal government will have something definite and concrete to present to the provinces when they meet in conference.

Primitive people, Mr. Chairman, are not always kind or grateful to their old people. We in the west know of a case of an Indian woman who cut her own flesh to provide bait to catch fish for herself and her starving children, and yet that same woman died in want neglected by those very children she had helped in that way. It seems to me that as the family advances this filial duty is observed more generally. The state, which is a larger family, should also recognize its duty to look after the old people, and such recognition as this will not only mark a distinct advance in our civilization, but will also reflect credit on those who assist in passing this legislation.

Mr. MANION: May I be permitted, Mr. Chairman, to read just one sentence to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni? I have here the memorandum issued by the Labour department in which I find that:

In Great Britain the Old Age Pensions Act of 1908 established a non-contributory system of pensions. This act was amended in 1911, 1919, 1924, and again in 1925, the last amendment providing for contributory pensions for certain classes of persons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if he has read the English act of 1925? He will find, if he does, that as respects the very class we hope to serve in this legislation, namely, those who are already in advanced years, the English act provides for the state looking after them without any contribution.

Mr. MANION: I was just answering the point of my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni.

Mr. CHURCH: Coming from a large municipality where we have a number of old people who are in need of assistance of this kind, I support without any hesitation the principle of an old age pension. This is not a new subject at all. It has been before the municipalities of the province for a great number of years. Many countries have adopted an old age pension scheme—England, Belgium, France, Italy, New Zealand, Australia, and many other countries. Stanley Baldwin, the head of a Conservative government in Great Britain, is a believer in social legislation. In the province of Ontario, the late Sir James Whitney was in favour of the principle of an old age pension. It is pretty nearly time that this parliament, which is ready to spend millions and millions of dollars on transcontinental railways that are not needed, and on breakwaters and other material things of that kind, should do something for humanity, but when a question of this kind comes up, the British North America Act is trotted out and made a political football of, just because the country is asked to do something for humanity. We have millions to squander on material things, but not one dollar to relieve the aged, the blind, the poor and the suffering. The time has come when the federal parliament should take up and deal with many of these questions. It should relieve the municipalities of Canada of much of the burden of taxation which they incur in attempting to cope with social problems. The trouble in the past—we saw it in the case of technical education and other questions—has been that politics has been allowed to creep in and issues which should have been treated without partisanship have become political footballs. Timely action will produce the most beneficial results; an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. In the larger centres they have learned to value and now appreciate highly steps taken to promote the welfare of the citizens and the masses of people generally. I allude especially to the creation of health departments, effective disposal of sewage, the installation of a good water supply, the establishment of hospitals, and measures of this character. The municipalities of this country are already heavily burdened in attempting to care for the aged, the infirm, the poor and the blind. The provinces receive large subsidies from the federal authorities, but often they are too prone to shift the burden they should carry on to the shoulders of the municipality.

Some effective means should be adopted through a system of old age pensions to provide for the aged poor. It should not be regarded at all in the light of a dole. In our large cities probably fifty or sixty per cent of the aged poor people are physically unfitted to work or to earn their own livelihood. The House of Providence, the House of Industry, and other charities are doing a splendid work. I want to pay a tribute to the House of Providence in Toronto, a Catholic institution. It is doing a fine work caring for all classes of people regardless of the denomination to which they belong. When I think of necessitous cases I have in mind the case of an old man named Michael Brophy, a Crimean veteran, who had served the empire for years. In spite of his long and faithful services he received no pension and, at the age of eighty-six, died in front of Eaton's store while engaged in selling bootlaces and lead pencils. It is lamentable that cases of this kind should occur. The officials of the health departments of our large cities know something of the struggles of our poor and aged people to maintain a precarious existence. The cost of food, the high rents, the lack of work, render it almost impossible for these people to live. Even if they were physically fit to work, the employers of labour demand younger people.

This is not a question in connection with which there should be any politics. You cannot keep the life in people on politics. With all the resources at its disposal it surely is not impossible for the federal government to obtain the necessary money to deal with this question adequately and efficiently. And when we are providing for the necessities of the poor we should not omit to care for the blind. They must be looked after especially in view of the danger which exists by reason of the congestion of traffic in our streets. Even a person in possession of all his faculties finds our streets dangerous at times, and the peril is even greater in the case of a blind person. Let the federal authority come to the aid of the provinces and the municipalities not only in the matter of old age pensions but in other humanitarian movements the expenditures upon which are in many cases a serious burden to municipalities. Conditions are changing and it is becoming harder all the time to make a living. The more this country grows, the more we shall find it necessary, whether under the British North America Act or not, to take this up as a question of federal legislation. The fathers of confederation when they drafted the British North America Act could not foresee these things. At the present time these poor people are being taken care of in provincial and municipal institutions to which public spirited people subscribe out of their own pockets, but this work should not have to be done by people with kind hearts putting their hands into their pockets. This is government work, government responsibility and some government should be saddled with the expense of it. It is a movement that should be three-sided. It should be taken up by the Dominion government, the provinces, and in my opinion the larger municipalities should also contribute something to it.

We have heard the same arguments used against this legislation as were used against workmen's compensation, good roads, technical education and mothers' pensions. Dear knows that the scheme of mothers' pensions in Ontario was a God-send to the poorer people of that province—for instance, a widow with five or six small children in a large centre of population struggling to make a living by doing scrubbing and that kind of thing. Apparently millions in cash and land subsidies by the Dominion and by the provinces can be given to railway corporations, and a country that can spend two billions of dollars on a national railway and other projects of that kind can surely do something to help these poor people in these dark days of civilization when it is hard to make a living. The government should come to the help of the larger municipalities especially which are saddled with this burden to the great cost of the municipal taxpayer. I do not care whether there is politics in this bill or not. Politics does not make any difference to me in a proposition like this because it is a question which should be above the realm of politics. I have seen over a period of seventeen years something of the work of a municipal health officer in a council which has been most generous in regard to this matter. Ninety per cent of these people are not fit to work; they have been driven to the wall, and if this parliament is not going to help them the public-spirited people of the country will have to continue helping them as they have been doing.

Mr. NEILL: I am glad to hear the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Church) and I congratulate him on the attitude he has taken along with a few other hon. members on that side of the House. I wish to explain the statement made by the hon. member for Fort William and I think earlier in the evening stated by someone else, that the British old age pension system is contributory, and compulsory at that. That is a sort of play upon words; it is both true and false at the same time. The system is this: Britain has had an old age pension plan for some sixteen years. During all that time the age was seventy and the plan was entirely without contribution. Five or six years ago they also introduced a system of contributory insurance against unemployment, or at least against sickness and accident. This was entirely a contributory matter and very limited in its action. You got a pension for only a few weeks' illness and so on. That had nothing whatever to do with the old age pension which began and still begins at seventy and which is entirely free.

As an hon. member mentioned, last year they passed another act dealing with the period between sixty-five and seventy and they made that in some part contributory. It was also mixed up, I think, with some other phase of sickness insurance. But when the person who contributed between the years of sixty-five and seventy reaches seventy, he automatically passes under this free pension system beginning at seventy. Consequently, if we compare that system with the system proposed in this resolution, it is perfectly correct, logical, accurate and truthful to say that the British system is not contributory inasmuch as when they reach the age at which our scheme proposes to commence, there is no contribution.

I should like to dwell for a moment on the emphasis that was given to those questions that were sent out to the different provinces and to explain that those questions were sent out in the summer and fall of 1924, asking the opinion of the provinces, and the answers that have been read in the House were more or less not in favour of the bill. One or two were; some were doubtful and one or two were flatly against it. I think the reply from British Columbia was more decidedly against it than any of them. It said:

> This government does not concur in the suggestion made by the committee that a portion of the cost of such pensions be borne by the provincial crown.

Further on it says:

The consensus of opinion is that the matter of old age pensions is one entirely in the sphere of the federal parliament.

That was the decision of British Columbia in February, 1925, but since then something happened which changed the attitude of British Columbia and, I think, of the other provinces. The Department of Justice gave an authentic ruling, challenged by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) but supported by other members of his party, in which they stated definitely, at least to the layman, that this was a matter for the provinces, and although it did not forbid us to contribute, we could not handle it as a compulsory scheme. That ruling was not available when these more or less ambiguous replies were written. It is available now and this is the change of thought and mind of the British Columbia representatives. The hon. member for Fort William quoted the reply of British Columbia last year.

This is their attitude adopted in the session of November last when they passed this resolution unanimously. I will read only the last part, the effective part of it:

That the necessary steps be taken to formulate some plan, in conjunction with the Dominion government, to provide old age pensions; and that the other provinces of the Dominion be requested to take similar action.

That is an entire change of front due to changed conditions. Previously they thought: Here is the Dominion government asking us to pay 50 per cent of what is their business. Now they find the Dominion is offering the provinces to pay fifty per cent of provincial obligation and they hasten to take advantage of the offer. The resolution goes on:

And be it further resolved, that an humble address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, praying that he will cause to be conveyed to the Secretary of State for Canada and the provincial secretaries of the various provinces this preamble and resolution.

Observe that. They are not only willing to lend their assistance and to co-operate with the Dominion, but they are anxious that the other provinces should take the same attitude as British Columbia, and I anticipate the other provinces will act as British Columbia has acted once the matter is brought home to them in that light.

It is somewhat remarkable, the attitude with which this bill has been received on the opposite side of the House, the entirely contradictory character of the criticism that has been offered. Some hon. members are entirely for it. Some admit, for reasons they have some difficulty in explaining, they are equally strong against it. Some say they are strongly in favour of it, but it goes too far. Others say they are strongly in favour of it, but it does not go far enough. One man says it is too expensive while another says that the age at which it should be given should be lower. Some say that it is only a gesture. If it is only a gesture, why combat it so seriously? If there is so much contradiction in the criticism, it suggests there is much good in the bill. I regard this legislation as a genuine attempt to deal with the situation. I hope the government will press this measure through the House at an early date so that when it goes to another body it cannot be met there with the excuse that it is too late in the session to consider it. Give them an opportunity to consider it, and if they throw it out, then I hope the time will have come when this government will take the proper action in the premises.

Mr. KAISER: I have taken a great interest in the question of old age pensions during the past few years, having advocated an allowance of this nature in the province of Ontario, and as my constituents expect me to say something on the present proposal I desire to discuss it briefly. Since coming to parliament I have submitted a personal referendum to my constituents, especially in the rural districts, in an effort to find out what their opinion is on the question. I requested an answer to the following memorandum:

The matter of establishing an old age pension in Canada is now before parliament. As your representative, I am anxious to secure the opinion of my electorate upon this important question. Will you kindly express your sentiments by marking the ballot, hereto attached, and return it to me signed by you, or otherwise as you may wish.

During my election I expressed myself on one or two occasions on this subject. I said that I hoped some time or other to have the privilege of sitting in a parliament which would be asked to discuss an old age pension scheme. To my surprise I found the sentiment of my constituency overwhelmingly in favour of the proposal. The replies were greater in number than I had anticipated and they were two to one in favour of doing something in the matter.

As regards the resolution before the House, while I am in accord with its general principle I must say that the provisions in detail are objectionable. I believe that the Dominion should have a universal and uniform old age pension law. I cannot possibly understand how the Department of Justice could give the opinion that while it would be permissible for the Dominion to pay fifty per cent of the cost it would be illegal and in contravention of the British North America Act for this government to pay the whole amount. This is a legal point, but I must say that it is beyond my comprehension. I see practical objections to contributory legislation on the part of the provinces. If one or two provinces should refrain from participating we should then have this anomaly that such of the aged in those provinces who might still be earning would be taxed to pay their contribution to the allowance given to old age pensioners in other provinces that were under the scheme. That, of course, would be a manifest injustice and in time it would create such a situation as now exists in the Maritime provinces. Provinces would be contributing to a Dominion obligation in respect of which they were enjoying no benefits and the result would be that compensation would be demanded. This feature of the bill is therefore open to objection.

I rise, however, not to enter into a discussion of the details of the legislation so much as to indicate something of what is being done elsewhere in the matter of old age pensions. In November I wrote a letter to Dr. Riddell, the Canadian representative at Geneva, asking whether he would be good enough to give me such information as had been obtained in that quarter on the subject of old age pensions. The following is his reply:

I beg to acknowledge your letter of the twelfth ult., asking for information regarding old age pensions. I enclose a brief memorandum on invalidity and old age pensions, prepared by the International Labour Office at my request. I am also sending you, under separate cover, a number of texts from the Legislative Series published by the International Labour Office. I trust that this material will be of use to you, and that you will let me know if I can be of further help.

Yours truly,

W. A. RIDDELL,
Canadian Advisory Officer.

I would ask that the memorandum to which reference is made in that letter be placed on Hansard so that it may convey to others the information which it has supplied me, giving as it does a synopsis of what is being done throughout the world. The memorandum is rather lengthy but the information it contains is valuable. It shows us the sort of pension scheme that appeals to any particular country, together with information in regard to the percentages of those receiving pensions as well as the varieties of pensions paid, and so forth. There is one sentence with reference to Great Britain which I should like to read. In the Old Country pension legislation was first introduced in 1908 when there were 829,000 people in receipt of pensions, this number being seven per cent of the population. The following is the note which I want to emphasize:

So far as the great majority of the septuagenarian population are concerned the non-contributory pensions provided under the Old Age Pensions Acts 1908-1924 (L.S. 1924, Great Britain 4) will in the course of the next thirty years be replaced by pensions for which the beneficiary has contributed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought I heard my hon. friend say that he would like to place a certain memorandum on Hansard.

Mr. KAISER: This is the memorandum.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to deprive my hon. friend of any privilege, but I ought to point out to him that the permission to place memoranda on the record is one which is granted occasionally by the unanimous consent of the House usually to members of the government to enable them to have certain official statements incorporated in the report. The privilege is one which, however, should not be taken advantage of generally, and certainly not in committee on a resolution. If the House were once to adopt the practice of placing documents and memoranda on Hansard, Hansard would soon become over-encumbered, as indeed it is already. There is this further consideration: the purpose of discussions in committee is to enable hon. members to follow the proceedings and to weigh the pros and cons of the different points submitted for consideration and discussion. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he send his memorandum to the Department of Labour and if it contains valuable data it will be of service to the department. I trust my hon. friend will not press his request.

Mr. KAISER: I am not acquainted with the rules but I thought that, as the memorandum is undoubtedly of value, there would be no objection to its being embodied in the report. I am willing, however, to hand it to the Prime Minister to use it as he may see fit.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. Prime Minister has raised a point in which, I may say, I concur, but I should like to draw your attention, Sir, and also his to the fact that the practice of handing in memoranda to Hansard has grown in recent years, and many hon. members have erred or violated the rules. So I should not like my hon. friend (Mr. Kaiser) to be singled out as a sort of victim in this case. Let us stop the practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I appreciate very much the spirit in which my hon. friend has met my request. I think he understood my purpose in raising the point. I do so because Mr. Speaker himself has recently been discussing with me the practice which unconsciously perhaps has been growing up of hon. members reading their speeches, which is something contrary to the rules of parliament itself.

Mr. STEVENS: There was a very good one read a few minutes ago right behind the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There have been very many good ones read; at the same time, to read speeches is not according to the rules of the House.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Unless we follow as nearly as we can, with a reasonable degree of latitude, what has seemed in the wisdom of previous parliaments to be the right course, we will soon get our Hansard out of all proportions. Again I wish to thank my hon. friend for the way in which he has kindly acceded to the request.

Mr. KAISER: The document is so concise that I do not wish to take up the time of the House reading it. As I said before, I am quite willing that the Prime Minister should look over it, and, if he thinks its insertion in Hansard will be of service to the House, that it should be inserted. I do think that if we have old age pensions they should be Dominion wide in their application, and I hope we shall make some progress in that direction.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Mr. Chairman, I realize that we already had a very extended debate on the question of old age pensions. I do not rise to protract unnecessarily that discussion, but were I to remain silent while such an important measure is under discussion I would be remiss in my duty to my constituents, and especially to the industrial population of eastern Nova Scotia, with whom for a number of years I have maintained the most friendly and sympathetic relations.

Let me say, Sir, that I heartily approve and will ever cheerfully support the principle of old age pensions. Nor do I consider this measure in the light of a charitable contribution by the state towards its aged citizens. Justification for such a measure rests not upon grounds of charity, but rather upon the broader and firmer basis of distributive justice.

There exist between every state and its citizens certain mutual obligations, certain grave responsibilities, which neither party to the social contract may wantonly ignore. It is admitted that the state has the right to demand from its citizens allegiance and service; it also has the right to force them to contribute to the upkeep and maintenance of the body politic in the form of taxation, and when some great national peril threatens its very existence the state has the right to conscript its citizens for national defence.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a well established maxim of Christian ethics, recognized in every Christian country, that there can be no rights enjoyed either by a state or individual which do not carry with them corresponding responsibilities; and when you admit that the state has the right to exact allegiance and service from its citizens, to tax them and to conscript them in time of war, you must ipso facto admit that the state has a duty to provide for its citizens if the evening of life finds them helpless and in need. I consider therefore that the state is merely discharging an ethical obligation which it owes to its citizens in providing a measure of old age pensions, and I heartily support that measure.

In regard to the constitutional difficulties in the way, there seems to be an idea that this measure should be taken up and passed by the different provinces. It may be presumptuous for me to disagree with the right hon. leader of the government in his views, but I think a conference with the premiers of the provinces should be held first before you enact any specific form of old age pension legislation, we owe it to the provinces as a matter of courtesy, if not on grounds of justice, since they are paying a part of the cost, to consult them as to what specific measure this government is going to enact. However, I do not argue that point, because I am glad to see the principle enacted in some form or other.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to suggest in all candour to the government—and this probably is my principal reason for rising—that in regard to certain classes of labour the age limit of seventy years should be reduced. We must realize that some people who are engaged in the lighter occupations are still sprightly young blades at seventy; but those engaged in certain other industries—I had in mind men working in steel plants and collieries, and women engaged in the garment making industry—find their physical vigour is greatly impaired when they reach the age of sixty. Therefore I would ask the government to take under serious consideration the advisability of lowering the age limit from seventy to sixty years with respect to those engaged in coal mining and certain other industries.

However, whether the government does or does not act upon my suggestion in that regard, I shall certainly support this measure, because I realize that it is by such measures we will succeed in lifting up the manhood of the poor in this land. Let me say in conclusion that whenever a measure is introduced calculated to do that, I will cheerfully give it my support, no matter by whom it is introduced or by whom it is opposed.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Chairman, the reading of an opinion by the Minister of Justice would lead one to suppose that the Dominion parliament has no place in providing in its entirety for a plan of old age pensions. I do not think that that can be the correct interpretation of the minister's opinion, because I suppose what he would say is that the Dominion parliament has no right to impose any obligation on the provincial authorities. Perhaps he would be good enough to say if I am correct in my view.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is it exactly.

Mr. GEARY: I would have thought that would be the result of his consideration of the question. Now, Mr. Chairman, it does occur to me that there is a good deal to be said in favour of the view taken by some members who have already taken part in this debate that you are only going, if not to defeat, at least to disappoint the expectations of prospective pensioners in trying to carry out a pension scheme under such a bill as this. The reading of the communications from the various provincial governments carries to my mind no hope that we will be able to establish a relationship between the Dominion and each of the nine provinces with respect to this measure.

If there is nothing to prohibit this parliament from supplying all the funds necessary to a proper old age scheme, then I think we should take up the matter in that way. Those who are in favour of old age pensions should meet the issue fairly and squarely and say that this parliament shall provide all the funds; then, I think we would be on our way to having something done, and done soon. But if we are, as the Prime Minister suggests, merely to pass the bill with the idea of sending it on to each legislature in the hope that by conference and discussion with each legislature we will be able to have it put into effect in each province represented, we are embarking on a path that leads a long way into the future. To me this sort of legislation has a very strong appeal. It has a personal appeal that, in spite of the economic situation, one cannot resist. One has only to see some aged and destitute person, to carry his mind to his own people and consider, what would I think if that person were one of my own family? Personally I cannot face a position like that. If the government thinks this is all it can do at the moment, I cannot oppose the legislation, but I do think very sincerely that if our minds are set upon a proper system of old age pensions we should not stop with this bill, which promises difficulty and discrimination between provinces; we should rather, as I repeat, take hold of the whole thing ourselves, and see that this House inaugurates a scheme that cannot fail. It follows the trend of modern legislation. It is a departure from the old state where security had little place in life; it removes too the dread of the future which must always overhang those who are without certainty as to what will be their fate when strength fails and their working time is past. It is unfortunate but true that only too often people who have suffered and sacrificed themselves in the upbringing of families find, when their turn comes to be taken care of, that they are not getting the comforts they hoped for or the reward they should have from those for whom they struggled and sacrificed so much. There is no legal objection to it. If the government feels it can go the whole way and provide the money for the scheme throughout the Dominion of Canada I shall be very glad Failing that, and in the hope of getting something, in the hope that the Prime Minister may prove to be right when he says that he is sanguine that it may lead to results, I shall support the measure.

Mr. ROGERS: It is quite evident that hon. members on both sides of the House are desirous of doing everything they reasonably can to promote and carry into effect a measure which will be of assistance to the aged as provided in this bill. What I want to say to the minister in charge and to the Prime Minister is that in view of the good feeling on both sides in respect of this measure, and in view of the fact that nothing can be accomplished and brought to a definite conclusion save and except when a certain consideration has been given to the views of the various provinces, some conference should be held. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that we pass the resolution as it is, and that the Prime Minister endeavour to gather together at least a few of the premiers of the provinces. The Premiers of British Columbia and Alberta are on their way to Ottawa, I believe. It would be an easy matter for the Prime Minister to get a representative from Quebec and one from Ontario, and possibly he could get representatives from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and the lower provinces, if they are prepared to come. At all events if he had four or five premiers here and they would care to join in the proposal, I am sure there would be no difficulty in having the bill pass this House unanimously, and no doubt a bill could be framed by arrangement between the provinces and the Dominion, that would be workable. The representatives could be called together; there is no hurry to put the bill through for a couple of weeks. The Prime Minister would be well advised to consider that suggestion in order that a definite measure, having some force and effect, might be considered and carried through this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The members of the government would be only too pleased to confer with any members of the provincial governments interested in this legislation when they are visiting the city, but I would not like my hon. friend to feel that the government would pledge itself to call this conference, or what would be equivalent to a conference of premiers, between now and the time this measure will come up for further consideration. I do not think it could be done. You would have some provinces not represented who might feel that they should have been present at the gathering. Further, I imagine that the premiers of the provinces would wish to confer with their colleagues, and certainly their colleagues in the various governments who have to do with labour legislation would have the right to be consulted. I am a little afraid that if a commitment were made on the part of the government to delay the measure, as my hon. friend has suggested, we might be postponing it beyond the period when I hope this session will close. But I do say to my hon. friend that if the premiers from the various provinces come along it will be a pleasure to discuss the measure with them.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not see the difficulty my right hon. friend suggests. It is not a matter of great concern whether the bill goes through to-night or in a month or six weeks hence. We are going to be here for some time, and we would have every opportunity for the calling of a conference of representatives of the various provinces to deal with the matter in such a way that there would be some finality. If he presses the suggestion he has just made of merely discussing the matter with individuals as they come here, he will reach no conclusion. It will leave the idea, at all events, that there is bad faith somewhere. Nearly all the provinces have closed the sessions of their legislatures and their representatives will practically all be coming to Ottawa within the next thirty days. It would be easy to have a day fixed when they could all be here at the same time, and the matter could be settled in a short afternoon. I hope as I trust and as I believe that the provinces would be favourable to the scheme, and if they are we can dispose of the matter in a way that will be satisfactory to those who are promoting the bill as well as to the aged people themselves. I hope my right hon. friend will give serious consideration to the suggestion.

Mr. McGIBBON: In view of the answers that have been read from the different provinces practically refusing this scheme, would the government be good enough to assure the House that they will take the full responsibility themselves?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of what?

Mr. McGIBBON: The responsibility of this legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is the purpose of introducing the legislation. The government in this measure is taking money out of the federal treasury to contribute to the provinces. We do not intend to give money from the federal treasury to any province without having some say as to the satisfactoriness of the measures under which they purpose to use that money. My hon. friend knows that usually certain conditions have to be complied with before aid of this character is given, and we are in that position here with respect to money from the federal treasury. We do not propose to give aid for old age pensions or any other purpose unless we can have some agreement as to certain requirements being fulfilled.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Prime Minister is confusing the question. What I asked him was this: Would his government take the responsibility of putting through a federal pension scheme wholly independent of the provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If what the hon. member for West Calgary, a colleague of my hon. friend, said the other evening is correct, that he was inclined to think the federal government had not the right to do that, I would say to my hon. friend that we will not take the responsibility of putting through a federal scheme that may be open to question whether or not we have the federal authority to do it. We know that we have authority to contribute towards a pension scheme in co-operation with the provinces. We are not sure that we have the authority to put through a federal scheme apart from the consent and co-operation of the provinces.

Mr. McGIBBON: But provided you have the authority?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That we will consider at the right time.

Mr. BURY: In my view the resolution and the scheme of an old age pension implies that there is something wrong in the wage-earning conditions of this young country.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The world over.

Mr. BURY: The very fact that a country like Canada, supposed to be a country of opportunity, supposed to be a country calling to the effete lands of the east to come over and find their chance in the land of opportunity of the west, has to establish an old age pension scheme shows that there is something radically wrong with our system. But apart altogether from that, I wish to say that I am in absolute sympathy with the principle of the scheme, because we have to face facts as they are.

On the general question I would like to add this for the consideration of the committee. The question has been debated as to whether this is a matter of provincial or federal responsibility. In my view it is a matter of federal responsibility, and I will tell you why. The federal government has complete control over the question who is to come into the provinces; the provinces have no control. The provinces are not able to say who shall and who shall not come within their borders, who shall or who shall not settle within their territory. Inasmuch as the federal government has the absolute and sole control of saying who is to come into the province, then it rests upon the federal government, which alone has the power of keeping out undesirable citizens or citizens who are not able to support themselves to provide, as a kind of correlative obligation to this power which they alone have, an old age pension scheme to meet the necessities of the population, the nature of which lies entirely in the hands of the federal government. We in the province of Alberta and we in the city of Edmonton, on the council of which I sat for four years, had year after year to face this question of the relief of those who were not able to work or were not able to get work, and we came to the conclusion which I have just expressed here a minute ago, that inasmuch as we could not put up barriers around the city of Edmonton to say who was to come in or who was not to come in; inasmuch as the provincial government could not put barriers around the boundaries of the province to say who was to come in and who was not to come in, we were not to be held responsible for supporting the people who did come in.

In other words, the authority that has complete control over immigration into this country and the settlement of our provinces and our cities is the authority that ought to deal with this old age problem. That seems to me to be perfectly clear.

On the other matters that have been debated in the course of this discussion, it seems to me that the proper course to be followed should be, as already suggested, to postpone any drafting of a bill until there had been a prior conference with the provinces, and for these reasons: First, because it seems to stand to reason that if we are going to establish a conjoint scheme in which the provinces and the federal government are to unite, we should consider and consult the wishes of the partners in the scheme. What is suggested here is that we in this House should settle our scheme and then go to the partners and ask them whether they are willing to come in, and if they are not willing, we should then come back and tinker with the act we have already solemnly passed. Would it not be infinitely better to consult your partners first, to ascertain how far the provinces were prepared to go, and then draft your bill and pass it through this House based on the results of that conference?

There are other grounds that suggest themselves. The provinces have themselves asked that this course be taken. In the replies which were read to the House, and which I am not going to read again, you will find in some of them, in the reply from the province of Nova Scotia, for instance, this:

> In view of the importance of the subject matter and the lack of an opportunity fully to consider the same—

That is tantamount to a request by the province of Nova Scotia for time to consider the scheme. Again:

> I was instructed to advise you that without a further and better understanding of the subject matter, and without an opportunity to fully discuss it with your committee, no action would be taken on the matter at present.

If that is a sample of the attitude of the provinces, what it amounts to is this: "We do not say that we are opposed to any scheme of old age pensions, but we do say that we want an opportunity of considering the question and of consulting with some representative of the federal government so that we may try to work out a common scheme which will satisfy our province and the other provinces in this Dominion." Is not that reasonable? That is what the provinces ask. But instead of doing what the provinces ask, this parliament is requested by the government to go absolutely in the teeth of the request of the provinces and do something that the provinces never asked us to do. The provinces asked that the matter might be taken up at a conference between the federal government and themselves. The provinces, some of them at least, professed themselves willing to discuss the matter, and the federal government makes answer to that request: We will not discuss it with you; we will draft and pass our act and submit it to you, and if you do not like it, we will alter it to suit the convenience of one or another or of all of you. Now is that reasonable?

I pass to the suggestions and recommendations of the committee. It was recommended:

> That the federal government arrange with the premiers of the different provinces for a conference to held during the coming recess of parliament—

That was in 1925.

> —at which an old age pension system shall be given the fullest consideration with a view to securing co-operative action, and that the report of the said conference be laid on the table at the next session of parliament for future consideration and action,
> That a copy of this report be forwarded to each premier of the several provinces.

The provinces asked for a conference, your own committee advised a conference; and in the teeth of the request of the provinces, in the teeth of the request of your own committee solemnly passed, and in the teeth of your own promise of a conference, you ask the House to pass a bill without a conference—in direct opposition to your own resolution, to the request of the provinces, and your own promise to pass a bill settling what the terms of this old age pension relief shall be. Now the only answer the Prime Minister makes to that is this: 'Oh, we are in a hurry. We do not want to waste any more time." Why was the time wasted in 1924? Why was the time wasted in 1925? It seems to be rather another illustration of the old adage:

> The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
> The devil was well, the devil a monk was he.

You had two years in which to act upon the reports of your own committee, and you do nothing till a quarter way through 1926.

Now, let me address myself to the main question. The only justification alleged by the government for the present course, the only justification suggested for going in the teeth of the request of the provinces, in the teeth of the government's own promise, in the teeth of the recommendation of their own special committee unanimously passed and adopted by the House, is this: "We are in a hurry, we want this legislation passed quickly." How much force is there in that argument? Absolutely none, because the provincial legislatures are all either up or getting up, and you cannot do anything under this legislation before the end of 1927 or the beginning of 1928. Anyway, you cannot do anything this year. You cannot do anything until the provincial legislatures meet in 1927. The matter will be considered by the provincial legislatures in 1927, and even if you pass this legislation to-day you cannot do a single thing until the end of next year or the beginning of 1928. The whole argument, therefore, that the government is in a hurry, that we should not postpone action until the government has had a chance to consult with the premiers of the different provinces and find out how far the provinces are prepared to go—that argument, that pretext, that excuse, is hardly worth the breath it has taken to voice it.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand from what the hon. gentleman says that he is speaking on behalf of his province of Alberta. Would he be good enough to tell the committee what that province is thinking about the matter?

Mr. BURY: Yes, I will tell my hon. friend. I will quote to the hon. member the answer of the province of Alberta. It is to be found in the report of the special committee of this House in 1925. Under the date of June 2, 1925, the acting premier, Hon. Geo. Hoadley wrote:

> This government has reviewed the recommendations of the committee and approve of the general principle of old age pensions.

That is going a certain distance; that is a pledge by Alberta that it approves of the principle. All right. I quote further:

> We are not prepared, however, to accept the recommendations of the committee. The three main objections are: (1) We believe that the federal government should assume a larger share in the financing of an old age pension scheme as it is more a federal obligation than a provincial one.

There is one objection which might be cleared up at a round table conference between this government and the premiers of the different provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the hon. gentleman in favour of the recommendations as outlined in the report of the committee of this House?

Mr. BURY: What report does my hon. friend mean?

Mr. HEAPS: Either the report of 1924 or that of 1925.

Mr. BURY: I cannot see any recommendation in the report of 1925 except one, that the federal government arrange with the premiers of the different provinces for a conference.

Mr. HEAPS: Take the 1924 report of the same committee.

Mr. BURY: The 1924 report was brought before this House and was solemnly buried by it in the sessional papers. I understand, however, that the 1924 report also recommends a conference with the provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes; but did not that report contain other recommendations?

Mr. BURY: I am not familiar with the 1924 report.

Mr. HEAPS: The 1924 report recommends that the cost of the scheme be borne on a fifty-fifty basis by the provinces and the Dominion.

Mr. BURY: That is all based on a conference. The question of who is to pay the money required in connection with the scheme is one of adjustment between the provinces and the federal government. I will come to that question in a few minutes.

Mr. TOBIN: Do you believe Alberta is in favour of or is opposed to old age pensions?

Mr. BURY: I am reading now, if the hon. member will listen, the reply of the Hon. Geo. Hoadley, acting premier of the province, in which he says:

> The government has reviewed the recommendations of the committee and approve of the general principle of old age pensions.

That must refer to the recommendations of the committee of 1924. Then Mr. Hoadley raises three objections. He says:

> We believe that the federal government should assume a larger share in the financing of an old age pension scheme, as it is more a federal obligation than a provincial one.

I have pointed out that the question as to the proportion in which the cost shall be borne as between the federal and the provincial government is a matter of discussion and conference, and of adjustment between the provinces and the federal government when the provinces understand the nature and extent of their obligation. Someone suggested here that the provinces did not understand at the time that the obligation to support the aged was a provincial and not a federal one, and that when the provinces understood the matter they would be the more willing to fall in line with the federal scheme. Now if that be true, or whether it be true or not, it surely stands to reason, taking the Alberta answer as an example—

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Was the matter debated in the legislature of Alberta?

Mr. BURY: The hon. gentleman ought to know that better than I, because he was a member of that legislature.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): I want to see how much you know about it.

Mr. BURY: If the hon. member will concern himself with what he knows about it, I will concern myself with what I know about it.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): The hon. member has just been quoting from a letter of Mr. Hoadley, and I want to know if the legislature debated the question.

Mr. BURY: I would suggest that if a matter lies within the knowledge of an hon. member he ought not to ask such a question. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin was a member of the Alberta legislature and whether the matter was discussed there or not he ought to know, unless he was not doing his duty and was out of his place in the house.

Take the other objection:

> We are not satisfied that a non-contributory system is the best one.

Surely that is also a matter to be debated around a table in conference. That is one of the fundamental questions of any old age pension scheme. Are you going to make it a contributory system or are you not? If you are going to make it a contributory system, may I say in answer to the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary), then the federal government cannot frame the scheme because the federal government cannot enforce contributions from the people of Alberta? They have no power or authority over provincial rights in that province. If it is going to be a contributory scheme it will have to be a contributory scheme enforced by the province of Alberta. One of the provinces asks: "Is your scheme to be contributory or not contributory? We are satisfied that the contributory system is the better scheme." Then get together in a conference with representatives of the provincial governments, discuss the question and settle it. Until you have that question settled you do not know whether it should be a federal or a provincial scheme. If you are going to have it as a non-contributory scheme, then it can lie absolutely within the purview of the authority of the federal parliament. It is only in the event of its being a contributory scheme that it is obligatory to bring in the provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the Dominion government force legislation on any province in the Dominion?

Mr. BURY: Surely it stands to reason that the Dominion government cannot force legislation on the provinces. I am not talking of forcing legislation on a province. It is impossible for the Dominion government to enforce a contributory scheme of old age pensions because it has no authority over property rights of individuals in Alberta. You must bring in as supplementary to your scheme some agreement with the province that the province will put the machinery at work for the purpose of carrying out the scheme within its domain.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Could the hon. member tell us how people of seventy years of age who are indigent could contribute to a pension fund at the present time?

Mr. BURY: The hon. member has utterly mistaken my position. One of the questions at issue raised by Alberta is whether this is or is not to be a contributory scheme. That is a vital question as between the federal government and the provinces. I am not saying which is the better scheme; I am merely pointing out that one province out of nine has an idea that a contributory scheme is better than a non-contributory scheme. So long as that is a moot question, not agreed upon as between any province and the federal government, you cannot settle your legislation. You have, therefore, to have a discussion between the different provinces and the federal government and first of all to settle the question whether this is or is not to be a contributory scheme. Then the question will come up that my hon. friend has raised, and the arguments in favour of a non-contributory scheme. But my hon. friend is premature in arguing it now. I am merely pointing out the fact that the provinces have not themselves decided which of the two kinds of schemes they want, and until they do, this act is impossible. You must have your conference first and settle that question.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): How could indigent people of the age of seventy now contribute to an old age pension fund?

Mr. BURY: I am sorry the hon. member has still not got the point. I am not arguing in favour of a contributory scheme. I have not said a word in favour of it.

[Mr. Bury.]

Mr. BROWN: Does my hon. friend think it would be possible to establish a contributory scheme to meet present needs.

Mr. BURY: It seems impossible to get it into the heads of hon. members opposite that I am not debating the wisdom or folly of a contributory scheme. I am only saying that some of the provinces have not yet made up their minds which is the proper scheme to adopt and until they have done so you cannot force an act on them; you cannot submit an act which you are sure they will accept. The better way will be to have a conference and thresh out this very question. I have no doubt that if my hon. friends at that conference give their reasons why a contributory scheme is absolutely absurd, their opinions would be welcomed. I am assuming that by "contributions" they mean contributions by the beneficiaries of the scheme and not contributions by the provinces. I am not debating that at all.

The third objection is this:

> There is no guarantee that the federal government will carry out the mutual arrangements respecting the financing.

That is already provided for in the resolution. In support of the position which I submitted to the House that the provinces had asked for a conference, may I quote one of the last statements made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill)? I have not his exact words, but this is the substance of the resolution he cited: He said that in November of last year British Columbia had passed a resolution asking for a conference. In the teeth of that request the House is asked to pass this legislation on the chance that the different provinces will accept it, and if they do not accept it we shall come back here to thresh the whole thing out again and recast the bill. Is the government going to save time in that way? Is it not more likely to get the adhesion of the different portions of this Dominion by consulting them in the first instance before it sets up to them a hard and fast, cast-iron act and asks them to come into it? I know what the attitude of one of the provinces is. They would rather be consulted before the act is drafted than have it put to them after it has been passed by this parliament with the declaration that if it is not suitable it will be recast. The answer would be given at once: Why did you not consult us before you drafted and passed it? It may be said that there was no time to consult them, but the argument of time is gone, because they will say: You have now to go back and amend the act you have put up to us, and you are no further ahead than if you had come to us in the first instance. They would have to put through acts themselves, and even if we pass this resolution and the bill that is to be founded on it to-night, we would not get a single result or any action from it until 1928. There is ample time, therefore, in the summer of 1926 to have a conference in order to settle the terms of this bill, and there will be ample time afterwards to pass it.

As I said at the beginning, I am in hearty sympathy with the principle of old age pensions, and like those who have spoken before me, if there is only the one way to get it, namely, by passing the resolution and the bill which the government propose to found on it, I am quite sure the government will have no fault to find with and no criticism to level at the spirit in which members of the party on this side of the House meet their suggestions.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I thoroughly agree with what the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) has said in favour of old age pensions, but I am surprised that we should be discussing the inability of this parliament to amend its own constitution. The time has come when we should act rather than talk in this respect. Canada will next year be celebrating the sixtieth anniversary of confederation, and if we do not do something to remedy the present situation we shall continue to suffer under the disability which at present hampers us. The government declares that it is in favour of a revision of our constitution, but so far it has been dilinquent in the matter. Within the last two or three days I have heard the suggestion made in a club in this city that what Canada needs is a Mussolini to take charge of her affairs. Well, if our Mussolini does not come from British Columbia he will come from the province of Quebec.

It has been said that Quebec does not want any change in the constitution, but I do not believe that. In my opinion that province is in favour of such a change, just as the Dominion as a whole is anxious to have it. Session after session this House is held up on various legislative measures because of this very inability of the parliament of Canada to amend its own constitution. I do not want to abolish any rights or privileges that exist under the terms of confederation, but it certainly is anomalous that after sixty years of confederation we are utterly unable to change our own constitution. The United States, the Mother Country, the Dominion of South Africa, Australia, the Irish Free State—all these countries have the power inherent in themselves to change their own laws at will, but Canada does not enjoy the same right. I have been in this House thirty years now; I have heard this constitutional question discussed time and time again, and it seems to me that the time is ripe for definite action. There is one man in England who is qualifying for the role of Mussolini: I refer to Lloyd George, who some day in the British parliament will do on our behalf what we have not the courage to do for ourselves. If we continue in this state of national impotence this country will fall into disrepute. We profess to be a nation equal with other states, and although other countries and even our sister dominions can amend their own constitutions, Canada remains helpless in this regard. Let us quit talking and get down to action. Let us settle the matter properly once for all. When we do so we shall have taken one long step forward in the interests of the nation.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. ROGERS: I want an answer from the Prime Minister. This is a serious matter, and I am sure, if we are to judge by the tenor of the speeches that have been delivered on both sides of the House to-night, there is a general wish to promote the legislation as rapidly as possible. Nothing can be done, however, under present conditions until there is a conference of the various provinces, and never was there a better opportunity than now offers to hold such a conference. Some of the premiers are on their way now and others could be summoned to consider this matter, which is of such great importance. If my right hon. friend has presented this legislation in good faith, and if the government is behind it, he cannot refuse to meet the request we have made in order that the legislation may be brought to a successful result.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will recall his experience in the ministry he will realize, I am sure, that the government has quite enough to do while the session is in progress without attempting to hold a conference with the premiers of the provinces. If we had such a conference it would be our wish to show to the premiers or to the provincial ministers such attention and courtesy as the occasion would demand, and it is impossible for the government to think of such an undertaking in view of the matters that must be attended to during the session. The bill has been prepared with a view to avoiding delays and in order to enable any provincial government that may care to enact at once, with respect to old age pensions, legislation in conformity with the requirements of this measure to take advantage of the proposed scheme. If some provinces do not desire to pass such legislation, that determination will in no way affect the situation except in so far as they are concerned. But as a federal government we want to show our readiness at the earliest moment to assist any province as soon as it is prepared to enact legislation along the lines here laid down. The government has carefully considered the question and feels that it should not run the risk of further delays by waiting for additional communications with the provinces. The desire is to carry this legislation through at this session and I am afraid I shall have to tell my hon. friend that that is our intention.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sorry, because I feel that my right hon. friend is adopting the only course that will possibly kill the measure.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is it the intention of the government to proceed with this matter to-night?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, if possible.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is not a man in the House who will not say at once that he is prepared to do anything that can possibly be done to improve the condition of all classes of Canadians, and if I for one thought there was anything in the resolution that suggested the slightest likelihood of achieving the results which it professes to have in view, I should be prepared to support it. But because everything surrounding the preparation and presentation of this resolution indicates clearly that there is no desire on the part of the government to bring in an old age pension scheme that will be effective, I urge that we should not pass this resolution. My hon. friend from South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) has suggested to the Prime Minister a means by which he might possibly get to the point where he could introduce effective legislation of this character. The Prime Minister says he is not prepared to accept the suggestion that during the session he should enter into a discussion with the premiers of the several provinces with regard to the plan outlined in this resolution. This government and this parliament, he asserts, is going to enact the proposed legislation as it now stands, and say to the provinces, "If you accept this we will assist you; if you do not, you will not get anything."

Now, Mr. Chairman, as a layman I should like the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice—if in his seat—to state whether he feels that the federal parliament can pass a bill founded on this resolution and then if one or two of the provinces, say Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, accept its provisions, and the remaining seven provinces refuse, the federal parliament can tax those seven provinces. Perhaps we have that power. But while the constitutional question is being discussed, as one who is anxious to see a genuine measure of old age pensions made effective in all parts of Canada, I have very grave doubts whether we have any such power.

Everything associated with this resolution and the attitude of the government in regard to it indicates one thing, and one thing only—that this resolution has been adopted merely as a feint to make the two hon. members who presented their claim to the Prime Minister, and who secured from him a pledge that he would introduce this measure, believe, and to make the country believe, that the government is endeavouring to do something which it knows perfectly well is doomed to utter and complete failure because of the unsound basis on which it was founded.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Some hon. member says "Order." I have not had very much to say in regard to this, but I purpose to express my views notwithstanding any interruptions of that character. Coming to the resolution itself and what it is presumed to provide, let me say that while I am in favour of a plan whereby every aged person in this country who is not able to take care of himself will be provided for, I am not in favour of any scheme that in principle intends to pauperize any section of the people. As this resolution is framed, the measure to be introduced in pursuance of it involves the pauperization of all our people who will come under its terms. Of all the countries that have tried out old age pension schemes of one character and another, we find that sooner or later fifteen of them have reached the point where they have adopted contributory systems, six have so far gone forward with non-contributory schemes, and one is carrying out a system of forced insurance. Of the six that have non-contributory schemes, two are now considering amendments to their pension law under which they propose the contributory feature, solely because of the well recognized fact that anything which takes away from people the incentive to thrift destroys their manhood and womanhood.

If the government had given the mature consideration to a measure of this character that its importance demands, they would have found that we already have in our annuity scheme, properly applied, a genuine form of old age pensions under which by the contribution of twenty-five cents per week between the ages of twenty-five and sixty-five any citizen can ensure to himself after seventy years of age an income equal to the pension which is now proposed. What does the government intend to do with this annuity plan? Is it to be scrapped entirely?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then what are you going to do with the thousands of people who have purchased annuities?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They will have their annuities.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then you are going to tax those people to pay old age pensions to others who had an equal opportunity to provide for their old age.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are they not taxed at present for the very same purpose?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Under what provisions?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Under the provisions of every province and every municipality for the care of old people.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is another evidence of the absolute lack of consideration which has been given to this resolution.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think it was stated this afternoon that the province of Quebec already takes care of its aged people.

Mr. NEILL: At no cost?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not going to say that the social legislation of that province is not what it should be; it is for them to determine. What are you going to do with their system? In Ontario some of the very class of people contemplated in this bill are already provided for—in fact they are all provided for in provincial and municipal plans. What are you going to do with those schemes? Are you going to throw them on the scrap heap?

According to information which I very hurriedly secured from the Department of Labour, there are in Canada 220 industrial firms, exclusive of the transportation companies, now providing pension schemes for their employees. Are you going to say to those concerns, "You must scrap your insurance schemes"? No? Then under the provisions of this bill you say to those people, "You continue to provide pensions for all your employees—including the 150,000 railway employees—and notwithstanding that you are already making that provision, we are going to tax you to provide old age pensions for a similar class of people without requiring them to make any contribution at all."

Mr. HEAPS: May I interject that the employees of the railroads, particularly the brotherhoods that have old age pension schemes of their own and will not be entitled to any benefit under this measure, have gone on record approving of this scheme?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend perhaps speaks for the brotherhoods a little out of his turn. The brotherhoods have considered the question of old age pensions, and they have endorsed the general principle of means being found by which old age pensions will be provided where necessary. But has this scheme been submitted to the brotherhood?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You are not asking that anyone capable of looking after himself be provided for?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do you argue that all the provisions made by the various organizations will be scrapped because provision is being made for old age pensions for people unable to take care of themselves?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before you undertake to pass legislation which you will automatically force on the country, you must take these things into consideration. Manifestly this government has not done so. Now, as these various industrial concerns are already paying the costs in connection with insurance schemes and providing funds for vast numbers of employees, I contend that it is wholly unfair to expect them to contribute to old age pensions, for others. Moreover, I question whether you have the jurisdiction.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the hon. member deny that these concerns are now contributing to the upkeep of the indigent?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes; that is, they are not contributing generally. And are you going to make them contribute to such pensions in addition to the provision they already make? There is no doubt that they will as a result of this legislation; for who will pay the $23,000,000?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the hon. member argue that they are not paying now?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Most assuredly, because they are not being taxed for the purpose.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then you say there are no people in Canada who are not able to support themselves?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I speak, of course, of the province in which I live. When one of the municipalities taxes itself to take care of the indigent, does this not suggest that there are people in that community who are unable to support themselves? In any equitable scheme of old age pensions you work out you must take all these things into consideration, and if it is going to be equitable and successful it must have a contributory basis. The question has been asked, how are you going to take care of people who are now seventy years of age? Does anyone argue that it is impossible to frame an act that will take care of people seventy years of age, and at the same time provide that those under seventy years of age who are in a position to do so shall make contributions to the fund? How is it they have had such a system in Great Britain since 1908?

Mr. HEAPS: Would the hon. member favour the adoption in Canada of the scheme in operation in Great Britain?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am in favour of a scheme of old age pensions properly worked out, made contributory on the part of those below a certain age, by which those over that age will be taken care of. I would like to see such a measure introduced in this House with some reasonable assurance that it is going to become law. The hon. member for South Toronto put the case in a nutshell when he suggested that the bill should be withdrawn and the government should introduce a federal measure of old age pensions and take the responsibility of passing it. It is the only way in which it can be done, because you cannot force legislation on the provinces without giving them some say as to the manner in which it shall be framed. This legislation has been introduced for the purpose of side-tracking the whole question. If we live a hundred years we will never see anything practical as the result of it. You cannot force it on the provinces. This federal parliament can introduce legislation providing for old age pensions and put it into effect if they are prepared to pay the whole bill, and that is all they have to do. In 1919 hon. gentlemen opposite pledged themselves to a system of old age pensions and a lot of other things which they have long since forgotten. They would have forgotten about this matter also had it not been for the two hon. members from Winnipeg, to whom the Prime Minister was forced to yield. But the government forgot all about it in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. NEILL: Does the hon. gentleman know, or has he forgotten, that this is not a party question; and that this House in 1923 passed a resolution in favour of old age pensions?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not endeavouring to make a party question of it, but if the government will withdraw this wholly innocuous resolution and introduce a workable scheme for old age pensions, I will support it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And let the hon. member for East Algoma draft the bill.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You need not get so jocular over it. Ever since the beginning of the session legislation has been thrown at us without being considered. When members of the government meet around the council table they say to themselves, "What kind of legislation can we draft that will hoodwink the people and hoodwink members of the House of Commons into supporting it?" So far as we can see, this legislation is of that class. The hon. minister who interrupted me a few minutes ago had to withdraw his bill the other day because proper consideration had not been given to it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will tell my hon. friend that legislation in regard to soldiers has always been a subject on which we have tried to get unanimous agreement in the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON: So far this session government bills have been brought into the House in a half-baked condition, making it impossible for the government—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will not support any government bill unless it suits him personally. It may come to the point where we will have to divide on questions of this kind.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I hope the minister does not think he has me scared on that account. If he thinks I am afraid to go on record as voting against any government measure, he is badly mistaken.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will say to my hon. friend that he need not imagine that he can scare the government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have no intention of scaring the government; I wish simply to express my opinion. When the government brings in legislation which is wholly innocuous and meaningless, designed entirely to sidetrack the whole question, I am going to oppose it.

Mr. BROWN: Is it not a strange position to take to say the bill was brought in at the instigation of the labour men and yet brought in to fool them?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, it is not strange at all. The whole record of the government since they came into office has been to bring in legislation to fool those members supporting the government.

Mr. BROWN: Does the hon. member think the labour men are so easily fooled?

Mr. NICHOLSON: In the first place, I do not know that there are any labour men sitting over there, and when the opportunity comes we may have occasion to discuss that question. But whether they are fooled or not fooled, this bill is designed to fool them and designed to fool every other working man who is depending on it.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. King (Kootenay) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, respecting old age pensions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

Friday, April 16, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure) moved:

That the first report of the joint committee of both houses on the Printing of Parliament be concurred in with the exception of the recommendation as to the printing of sessional papers Nos. 36, 84, 88, 102 and 110.

Motion agreed to.

HUDSON'S BAY EXPLORATORY SYNDICATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I beg to call the government's attention to an article which appears in this week's Financial Post and to ask a question with reference thereto. The article to which I refer appears under the following headlines:

Offer Land on Hudson's Bay at Dollar an Acre to Cleveland Citizens.

Exploration Syndicate "Sponsored by Canadian Government" Seeks Memberships on Promise of Land Grant from Dominion—Radio Base and Aeroplane Station.

Will Raise no U.S. Flag on Discoveries.

I do not intend to inflict the whole article on the House but I should like to read some extracts from it. I quote:

"An organization of red-blooded Americans, co-operating with the Imperial Canadian government to encourage exploratory operations into Hudson's Bay and the Arctic Circle." This is the way "the Hudson's Bay Exploration Syndicate, Limited" of Cleveland, Ohio, describes itself.

The syndicate literature indicates that it is soliciting memberships at $2 apiece, and every member is promised an acre of land in the islands or territories contiguous to Hudson's Bay, "when, as if the intended land grants are made by the Canadian government to the syndicate."

The Hudson's Bay Exploratory Syndicate describes itself as an organization sponsored by the Canadian government and further sponsors for its operations, as listed, include organizations of much power and influence. They are:

"The Royal Geographic Society.

"The Ancient and Honourable Hudson's Bay Company.

"The Canadian Campfire Club of Cleveland.

"The Arctic Club of Cleveland.

"The MacMillan Polar Club.

"The National Geographic Society.

"The National Aeronautic Association.

"The Canadian-American Exploration Society, and many others."

Objects of the Syndicate

The objects of the syndicate are, by their literature, stated to be:

"To promote closer relations between two great Anglo-Saxon neighbours;

"To encourage the discovery of new territory in the Arctic Basin;

"To further co-operation between the United States and Canada in opening up to sportsmen the vast unexplored territory contiguous to Hudson's Bay;

"To establish headquarters on the Belcher Islands in Hudson's Bay for aerial operations into the unknown wilderness of the north;

"To secure accurate information relative to the Eskimos and Indian tribes;

"To found a permanent radio base in Hudson's Bay;

"To open a summer seaplane route from Cleveland direct to Hudson's Bay;

"To develop the spirit of exploration among its members and awaken a new interest in the possibilities of discovery and adventure throughout the largest remaining unexplored territory in the world, comprising upward of two million square miles."

"By special arrangement between the Canadian government and the Hudson's Bay Exploration Syndicate, Limited, a completely equipped radio station will be established by the syndicate on one of the Belcher Islands in Hudson's Bay," it is stated. "Already plans are under way to acquire title to the largest fresh water lake, christen the same 'Lake Cleveland' and erect a radio station and seaplane base thereon. The lake is 64 miles long, from one to five miles in width and shaped like a hairpin. It is known to abound in fresh seal, fish, fowl and game of many kinds.

"With permanent radio and sea-plane headquarters in Hudson's Bay, constant communication with civilization is certain. It will be the most popular hot weather station in America.

"Plans are now under way to secure for the syndicate valuable concessions in the Belcher Island group. It is a sportsman's paradise, comprising about five thousand square miles of wilderness almost wholly unexplored."

Further with regard to the airplane rate, the promise is made that "By the summer of 1927 the new sea-plane route from Cleveland to Hudson's Bay will be open. Any member of the Hudson's Bay Exploration Syndicate, Limited, can hop aboard at the Cleveland station in the morning, fly across Lake Erie, stop at North Bay on Lake Nipissing for luncheon and arrive at the Syndicate Camp on the Belcher Islands in Hudson's Bay in time for supper."

"The flying distance is a trifle over a thousand miles and the average speed should be 120 miles an hour, making it a delightful and fascinating daylight journey.

"From the syndicate sea-plane base on Hudson's Bay numerous air trips can be made into forests, lake and river regions never seen by white man. The possibilities for the adventurer, the explorer and the sportsman are beyond comprehension."

Will Raise no Flag

It is assured that:

"By arrangement between the syndicate and the Imperial Canadian government no jurisdictional claims will be made to territory discovered through the efforts of the syndicate or its members, and no attempt will be made to raise the American flag and lay claim to the land for the United States. The syndicate realizes that diplomatic relations with the official Canadian government are at all times essential to its success and therefore yields to Canada the right of possession and ownership to all new territories resulting from its exploratory operations."

Canada is going to make extensive grants to the syndicate, they state, and it is mentioned that for the concession of agreeing not to plant any American flags on any territory "discovered" that:

"In return for this concession the Imperial Canadian government will undertake to grant to the syndicate several large tracts of lands, and groups of islands in the Hudson's Bay region with permission to allot portions of the same to the syndicate members, under and by virtue of a special act of parliament."

Are any such negotiations or proposed arrangements as intimated in this article under way? If not, have any steps been taken to restrain the improper use of the Canadian government's name for advertising purposes?

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): I was not able to follow the article as the hon. member read it, but I gathered that it referred to some suggested proposal in connection with air-craft exploration. So far as I know no information has reached the government regarding any such project, but I shall read my hon. friend's question carefully and advise him later.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): I attended a sitting of the Board of Railway Commissioners this morning when the question was discussed relating to rates on the moving of coal by the railways east and west. On March 15 last a resolution was passed by this House, appointing a committee to investigate the question respecting lake and rail transportation, as well as the mining and delivery of coal. A number of questions must necessarily be disposed of before this matter can finally be dealt with, and I would ask the government when we may expect the committee to which I refer to be appointed. It is essential that the committee be constituted before the Board of Railway Commissioners' hearings are concluded, in view of the fact that a number of prominent men are likely to appear before the committee. These men should be given an opportunity to discuss various phases of the question before that committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall have to look at my hon. friend's question as it appears in Hansard, and reply on Monday. I understand that the hon. member refers to some resolution passed for the appointment of a committee. If I am right in that assumption I may say at once that if such a resolution was passed and the committee has not yet been appointed the government will see to its appointment forthwith, provided the whips of the respective parties will confer on the question of membership.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): When will the standing committees of the House get down to work? The session is getting on and so far we have had no meetings at all?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The committees regulate their own affairs and the government has no say in their arrangements. It is for the individual members of those committees to arrange for the sittings.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Autonomy.

PARKING ON PARLIAMENT HILL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I would call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the number of automobiles that are parked in front of this building. Can some other parking space be provided for these cars?

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): I am glad to say that the department has provided parking space on both the east and the west sides of the parliament buildings, and it would be very much appreciated if those who use motor cars would take advantage of that provision. I think it would give a much better appearance to the front of the building, and the spaces provided are convenient. If hon. members concur in that, I will undertake to see that the general public do not park their cars in those spaces.

PELEE ISLAND CABLE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. Gott (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) if repairs have been started on the Pelee island cable; if so, how far advanced are they; and if not, when may some action be expected?

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries as to whether repairs have been started. I had the matter before me some weeks ago as the result of a question asked by my hon. friend. In November last the cable was disturbed by ships anchoring in the vicinity, and ice having formed on the lake, it was impossible to repair the cable at that time. I know the department intend to make the necessary repairs as soon as it is possible to do so, but I will bring the matter to their attention.

MAIL MATTER—MARKING WITH RUBBER STAMP

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) asked a question as to whether a rubber stamped paragraph on an envelope which he sent over to me had the approval or consent of the government. I promised to confer with the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Murphy) in regard to it. I find that this stamped statement, or whatever it is, was undoubtedly put on by the person who sent the envelope. It was certainly not impressed on the envelope by the Post Office Department in Montreal, where the letter originated, nor, so far as is known, was it placed there by anyone connected with the government service.

I would point out to my hon. friend that the Post Office Department has no control over an envelope passing through the mails beyond requiring that the space which is used for the address shall not be interfered with. The owner of the envelope is free to print or stamp any matter on it that he wishes; there is no regulation of the Post Office Department to preclude this. I presume that is how the stamped matter referred to appears on this envelope.

My hon. friend asked me to be sure to return the envelope to him. I should like the House to bear witness that I am doing so now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand from the Prime Minister that any person is at liberty to rubber-stamp anything he pleases on the outside of an envelope going through the mails?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, there are certain classes of matter prohibited by law, obscene matter and the like.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not mean anything of that kind, but propaganda that any person or class of persons might desire might be put on the outside of the envelope?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think anything like "Buy-made-in-Canada articles" might be stamped on envelopes and be perfectly within the law. Anything of that kind is permissible.

Mr. HOCKEN: Then I presume the Prime Minister means that if some person prepared a stamp—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOCKEN: I will ask the Prime Minister if he intends to convey the idea that any person could prepare a stamp the reverse of this one and be at liberty to put it on envelopes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite so.

An hon. MEMBER: And make propaganda for the Orange lodge?

Mr. HOCKEN: What did my hon. friend say?

CARILLON POWER DEVELOPMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) asked me yesterday if "any permits or licenses or leases had been applied for or granted involving construction in the Ottawa river at Carillon or involving the right to export power." I have made inquiries of four of the departments that might be concerned—the Department of Marine and Fisheries, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Public Works and the Department of Railways and Canals. I am informed that no permits or licenses or leases have been granted for the purposes mentioned, though in one of the departments there is application with respect to approving the construction of some work on the Ottawa river at Carillon.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask from whom the application comes and if any protest has been lodged by the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec with respect thereto?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend will put his question in the form of a motion on the order paper and I will answer it. I have not the exact knowledge in my mind at the moment.

TWENTY-FOUR HOUR ELEVATOR SERVICE

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, representations have been made to me by a number of members as to the convenience of having one of the elevators running for twenty-four hours in the day. I should like to inform them that the centre elevator to the left of the entrance will henceforth be running twenty-four hours every day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Were any of them members of the Progressive party?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I think not.

MR. J. A. DONALDSON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) as to newspaper reports that Mr. J. A. Donaldson, a prosperous business man in the town of Kingsville, who acted as returning officer in South Essex at the last election, has been appointed harbourmaster of Kingsville. If these reports are correct, on whose recommendation was he appointed?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The inquiry should appear as a regular question on the order paper.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT AMENDMENT

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 13 consideration in committee of Bill No. 17 to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.—Hon. Mr. Stewart—Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, while I have not been fortunate enough to reconcile all the suggestions offered in committee, I have done my best to get as near to them as I possibly could. I would much appreciate, Sir, if you would take the bill subclause by subclause. I may say that in clause 1 of section 68 I have made a slight change to make it clear that where the soldier has sold out his interest we are not dealing with that particular land.

Mr. CLARK: How will it read now?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is the third reprint we are dealing with to-day. For the information of the committee, I may say that we replaced the word "abandoned" with the words "who has not assigned or transferred." It was said the meaning was obscure, and we have changed the wording to make it absolutely clear.

On Section 1, 68 (1)—Revaluation of land sold to settlers.

Mr. CLARK: What particular settlers will be embraced by this section who were not embraced in the bill as it was formerly constituted??

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): None. Exception was taken to the word "abandoned," and to make it perfectly clear what we were endeavouring to do, we changed the wording. It embraces all those whose contracts are in existence; that is the point.

Mr. CLARK: Then those soldiers who were forced off the land, by reason of the fact that they could not carry the load, have no chance of getting back and having a revaluation of their land made?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, provided the land has not been allocated. I do not want to lead the discussion away from this particular section, but under subsection (k), which has been added to the bill, that provision is made. For the information of the committee I might say that we argue that we have that authority under the bill, but there was a good deal of discussion about it and to put it beyond any question of doubt we drafted section (k).

Mr. CLARK: Then if the particular land which the soldier occupied has been disposed of in some way, as has happened in a great many cases, he has no chance of getting either a revaluation or another piece of land?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Practically no. I have gone into that question rather thoroughly with the board, and there are innumerable difficulties in the way. He could not even come back as a new settler, and you could not transfer his payments. Where the land is still under the control of the board we can re-establish the settler and make an allowance for any payment on principal, or at least put him in the position he occupied before his contract was rescinded. That is the situation.

Mr. CLARK: A couple of months ago I brought to the attention of the minister a report appearing in the press to the effect that about fifty empire settlers had been brought into the Fraser valley and settled on soldier lands. Has the minister investigated that report, to ascertain just what degree of truth was in it and how many empire settlers have been placed upon soldier lands in the Fraser valley?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am informed that approximately fifty are settled in that particular locality, under the scheme of empire settlement.

Mr. CLARK: The minister then proposes to do nothing whatever for the soldiers who were forced to abandon these lands, despite the fact that the empire settlers have been brought in and given the lands at a valuation much lower than that originally given the soldier settlers.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am very much afraid that that is the situation. I would be very glad to be able to remedy it if I could, but unfortunately I cannot see any way by which that could be done, in view of the difficulties which present themselves. The board, of course, take the ground that they did not in any case force anyone off these lands, and I can only speak from the report which I received in connection with this matter. I will say very frankly to my hon. friend that there is absolutely nothing to be done in a case of that kind, where the land has been allocated to someone else.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does not the minister think the government is under a moral obligation to return to those people at least the ten per cent which the government took from them and placed in the public treasury?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would very much prefer to deal with that matter apart from the question of the revaluation of the lands. We have the problem now of the men who have stuck through thick and thin and who are still on the land; there is no question in my mind that our first duty is to them. There are innumerable difficulties in connection with this matter, and I stated very frankly in the beginning that I did not see how we were going to meet every individual difficulty that might arise.

Mr. McGIBBON: I must submit, Mr. Chairman, that I think we should deal with that question now; the government took the money from those soldiers and put it into the public treasury; now they have taken their lands away and if the matter is not dealt with now it will never be dealt with.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask my hon. friend if he would suggest that the government pay that amount back to the man who dissipated everything, and who got the government property as well? I just mention that to show how difficult it is to deal with this problem. My hon. friend will at once answer no. Then you have to meet the difficulty of the man who, perhaps through no fault of his own, lost all his money, as against the man who will have a thousand and one claims to the effect that it was not his fault that he lost his investment. I merely mention these to show my hon. friend how difficult it is to deal with a complex question of this character.

Mr. McGIBBON: I admit that it is difficult, but it is the duty of the government to deal with difficult questions. When the government undertakes to deal with these questions they should deal with the entire question at once. A great injustice has been done to this class of soldier.

Mr. HANNESSON: We have canvassed the whole situation; some hon. members have said the whole scope should be widened, others that it should be restricted. This bill apparently goes as far as the government is prepared to go. We want to see relief given to the returned men on the land, so let us report the bill. The government have the responsibility; let us go as far as the government can go, because the soldiers should and must soon receive whatever measure of relief the government is prepared to give them. I am in favour of some extensions; I would like to see some things provided for which are not included at present, but we have covered the whole ground. The minister is not prepared to accept some suggestions; he has accepted some, so let us report the bill.

Mr. COOTE: This question has been before parliament for three or four years, and has always been put off. If we accede to the wishes of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) I am afraid we will go on with this bill for another two weeks, with the result that we will not get any revaluation for the soldiers. Let us proceed with this bill, and if these other cases should be taken up, the House can deal with them afterwards in a separate bill.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think the hon. minister is more interested in the political side of the question than in doing justice to the soldiers.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have not a word to say in reply to a statement of that character. It is unfair and quite uncalled for.

Mr. McGIBBON: I was not referring to the minister, but to the hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. BURY: Take the case of a soldier who has been put off the land through default in living up to his agreement, and whose land is sold to a new settler, and the purchase money of the new settler plus the money already paid by the soldier who has abandoned his land amounts to more than the original price of the land; does the soldier settler get any benefit from the resale of his land? What I am getting at is this: Are there any cases in which by virtue of the double sale of the land the government is getting more for it than it was originally valued at by the government? Let me put a concrete case: Suppose a soldier purchases a farm for $5,000, and pays off $2,000 of that amount, and then makes default; I am talking of the principal. He is put off his land and his farm is put up for sale and sold to a new man who pays, we will say, $4,000. Does the government get the benefit of that extra $1,000? Does the soldier settler get any benefit from the resale of the land?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am informed that that is done.

Mr. BURY: I understand that the government has about $600,000 profit from these land sales. If that is so, it is a scandal. They have no right to make money on the soldiers.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is a new question to me, but the chairman of the board informs me that in cases such as my hon. friend has mentioned where more is received for the land than the soldier's indebtedness, he receives the difference.

Mr. BURY: I am not criticizing the minister in the least, because I know there must be many things done under the machinery of the act that he is not personally familiar with, but what I am getting at is this: I understand that there is about $600,000 of a profit as a result of these land deals in connection with the soldier settlers, and I would like this House to have the assurance that there is no soldier who is being exploited, either intentionally or unintentionally, by the government of Canada or by the Soldier Settlement Board.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Under the provisions of subsection 4 of section 22 of the old act the board have been repaying the difference that I have just mentioned to the settler when his land is resold.

Mr. BURY: One more question. I would like to know just what that $600,00 does represent. Where does it come from? It is a profit, and it must be capable of explanation. It must come out of the soldier somewhere.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): While that statement is made, I am informed by the chairman of the board that that amount is only a book-keeping surplus, because the losses incurred in the salvaging of the implements and stock more than offset that amount.

Mr. BURY: It is a profit on the land which is set over against the soldier's indebtedness on implements and stock?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BURY: Is a profit in the case of any individual soldier set off against the loss in the case of another soldier, or does every soldier get the benefit of the profit that is made on the resale of his land?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Where the settler is being salvaged and more is received than the amount of his indebtedness, the board do not appropriate that surplus, but pay it back to him, I can see the difficulty my hon. friend has, and I frankly confess it is one that I would have had, but the chairman of the board informs me that while the land shows a profit of $600,000, probably owing to the 10 per cent that was contributed by the soldier, nevertheless the losses on salvaging the implements and live stock more than offset that $600,000, but that does not debar the individual soldier from receiving the difference I mentioned and the board have paid to the individual soldier the difference that arises in that respect.

Mr. BURY: All I want to know is that each individual soldier is treated on his own merits, as a separate book-keeping entity.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: I would like to support the stand taken by the hon. member for Selkirk. I have in my constituency about as many soldier settlers I think as there are in any other constituency, and some of them were settled on as poor land probably as there is in the Dominion. I do not want the committee to think that we have a lot of poor land in my constituency, but unfortunately some of these settlers were settled on poor land. The minister in this bill is, I think, endeavouring to meet the situation, and to do justice to the soldier settlers in so far as this House can go. There will be, no doubt, cases of injustice due to the individual circumstances in which these men find themselves to-day. But I believe on the whole the minister has tried to make a workable act which will be in the interest of the returned soldiers, and I would support the stand taken by the hon. member for Selkirk that we should report the bill.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The bill provides that all applications for revaluation must be submitted to the board prior to October 1, 1926, and that they must be made by the settlers themselves. Would the minister consider adding a few words to clause (b) so that it will not be necessary for the settler to personally make application, but that application may be made on his behalf by someone else. If the application has to be sent in personally by the settler, there may be cases where owing to incapacity or temporary absence of the settler hardship will result. In my opinion either the date should be extended to the 1st of October, 1927, or such an amendment as I suggest to permit of applications being made on behalf of the settler should be made.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are several objections to that. In the first place, we cannot act without the personal affidavit of the applicant. Forms will be sent to them all. The only reason we make it October 1 is because, as my hon. friend will readily understand, the board will have considerable difficulty in making collections until this revaluation is adjusted, and that is one thing we had in mind. I would have no objection to extending it perhaps one month, but I think October 1 is ample time for everybody to make application, and even if somebody was missed I cannot conceive that because they were a day late in making application that their case would not be considered. But let us get the application in before the board and the adjustments made, so that payments may continue to come in. My hon. friend knows that interest has been suspended for the past few years. We would like to get the soldiers who are on the land dealt with and their cases settled in a permanent way in order that they make their payments to the board and carry on. Naturally it will not be done until this adjustment is made. That is the reason I made it the 1st of October. I would not like my hon. friend to press for any change in the provision as to the application. We want it to come direct from the soldier and to be supported by his affidavit.

Mr. McQUARRIE: There does not seem to be any discretionary power vested in the board to accept applications after that date.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Someone may make an application a day or two late, but it is necessary to get the applications in as rapidly as possible.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How could the board accept the application if it was a day or two late? If some discretionary power was vested in the board to meet those cases I would be satisfied.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The bill states specifically that the applications must be in by the 1st October, and I would like very much to have that date remain because I want to get the matter settled. The thing will be unending if we do not get these cases dealt with. Therefore there should be a settlement in order to put the soldier settlers out of suspense and let them know exactly where they stand. There are a large number of soldier settlers who are waiting to see what kind of adjustment they are going to get in order to make up their minds whether they are going to remain on the land or abandon it. Therefore, the quicker a settlement is reached the better it will be for all parties concerned. Consequently, I should not like to change the date fixed.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I only wished to see that suggestion met as to applications being made on behalf of the soldier settler. There could not be any trouble there.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The application and the affidavit must come from the man himself. I have gone into that point pretty thoroughly. A considerable length of time is allowed in which to do it, and naturally there is a great deal of publicity. Every man who is on the land will know the requirements and will govern himself accordingly.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the widows and children of deceased soldier settlers come under the scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. MULLINS: I think this bill has been before the House long enough.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MULLINS: The bill as it has been amended and altered by the minister suits me as the representative of the constituency of Marquette and, I think, will suit the soldier settlers in that constituency also. I believe that I have as many soldier settlers in my riding as any other hon. member here, and I take the responsibility of supporting the bill in its present form. Now, let us report the measure and pass it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I hope the two hon. members who have just spoken will forgive us for trying to get some further information. I do not think I have asked any questions so far in regard to the bill, and have not said one word about it. Therefore, I do not think it would be fair for these hon. members to prevent me from gratifying my eagerness for information. Did I understand the minister to say that surplus receipts had been paid to soldier settlers?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): In what provinces do the ex-soldiers live who received surplus receipts?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am informed that the chairman has not that information with him, but I can say that soldier settlers in several of the provinces received them.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): In what provinces may I ask?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The chairman informs me that of a certainty the answer applies to Ontario and British Columbia.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Can he tell us in what parts of Ontario and British Columbia the soldier settlers are located?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No; we do not happen to have that information here.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Can he tell us what the amounts were?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No; we cannot give the amount. I stated the amount was the difference between the sales price and what the soldier had paid.

Mr. CLARK: Can the minister tell us the total amounts that were repaid to the soldier settlers?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No. We can get that information for the hon. gentleman and will be very glad to do so. My hon friend (Mr. Ross, Kingston) wanted the names of the provinces in which repayments had been made to soldier settlers and also the amount of such payment. We did not come prepared to give that definite information, but I will be very glad to obtain it and furnish it to my hon. friend.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am not going to discuss the question, I simply wish to get information. It will be understood that many of these ex-service men have suffered. They had to pay 10 per cent of the whole amount that was paid them as a gratuity. A great many of them put up all their savings and then, on account of reasons applicable to themselves or to the department, they absolutely lost every cent they had. If the government has made $600,000 out of this arrangement there should be some money coming to those who have suffered in the way indicated.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I pointed out a few moments ago that that $600,000 really did not exist because the loss on equipment much more than covered the amount paid on the land. What I want to impress upon hon. gentlemen is the fact that where an individual soldier had a balance coming to him he received it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I want to press for such a measure of relief for these returned men as the government is willing to give. I think all of us concede the principle that there should be a revaluation. That is acknowledged in the bill itself. Then the question arises: To whom shall the benefit of a revaluation of soldier settler lands accrue? The bill as originally drafted provides that the benefit of revaluation shall extend in the first place to those who are still on the land. That was a very practical measure of relief. As redrafted the bill now extends the privilege of revaluation to those who, having bought lands, left them because of the inflated value and whose farms have not yet been disposed of. The benefit of the bill has been extended in that regard by the insertion of sub-section (k). That is a further measure of relief. I am entirely in accord with that relief so far as it goes. I think that to a great extent it gives relief in a practical way to most of those who are desirous of carrying on on the land immediately.

It does not, however, grant relief in two other classes of cases and to these I wish to refer. First, the case of the soldier settler who has paid up in full. No relief under the revaluation by way of a refund is provided for him. I think that is unjust. Let me give two cases by way of illustration: X has a farm on one side of the road which he purchased under the soldier settlement scheme for $7,000. Y, on the opposite side of the road has also purchased a farm for $7,000. We will assume that both farms are of the same value. X has paid up in full. Y still owes $3,000. Both farms were originally bought for settlement. Under this revaluation plan, if Y's farm is revalued at $5,000 he will get a reduction of $2,000. But X, although he paid $7,000 in full, whether by borrowing or otherwise, will not get any benefit. That is unjust. I urge that men in this class should be given the benefit of revaluation. But the minister has told the House that it is not the intention of the government to go that far. The question has been fully discussed, he says, and they will not go as far as that. Well, I am for accepting from this government what we can get and the responsibility for that injustice must rest upon them.

There is one other class of cases. Take the men who abandoned their farms by reason of the fact that they were carrying too heavy a load. Subsequently their farms, having been salvaged, have been resold to empire settlers, civilians, or somebody else. Such a settler's farm having been sold he cannot come in under this scheme or secure another farm. Personally, I think he should be permitted that privilege. But the bill does not go as far as to take in that class of cases, and the minister has intimated that the government cannot extend that right to them. I take it that the government is prepared to accept that responsibility also. However, I am in accord with the bill in so far as it goes. The matter has been very fully discussed, and if the government, after having these other classes of cases pointed out to them, will go no further than the bill provides for, let us go ahead, make some progress and get such measure of relief as it is possible to obtain at the present time.

Mr. BURY: I understand we have discussed the principle of the bill; we are now considering the re-drafted clauses and I must strongly object to the railroading of the bill through while we are considering these clauses.

The CHAIRMAN: We are now considering the bill section by section and sub-section by sub-section, and I must ask hon. gentlemen to deal with the measure in that way.

Mr. STEVENS: Which sub-section is now before us?

The CHAIRMAN: Sub-section 1, 68. (1).

Mr. STEVENS: I draw attention to the fact that sub-section 1 constitutes the whole of the bill. If the chairman would be good enough to call the sub-sections following, (a), (b), (c), (d) and so on, we could then keep to a specific matter. These sub-sections are all included in sub-section 1.

The CHAIRMAN: I intend to read them, but I thought it would be necessary to read 68 first.

Mr. STEVENS: It is all included in 68.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes. Of course we are not passing the whole bill now, but we are taking it section by section.

Mr. STEVENS: I would suggest that the Chairman read the paragraphs starting with (a).

Mr. BURY: It would appear from the reading of sub-section (b) that three distinct documents have to be filed. Would it not be just as well to have one affidavit setting out the three different matters? A form of affidavit could be supplied by the board setting out the original purchase price of the land, the value of improvements and the soldier's belief as to the present value, his reasons, and so on. It looks as if he would have to supply three distinct documents.

Mr. CANNON: No, the whole thing will depend on how the form is prepared. It is a matter of detail.

Mr. BURY: I am not dealing with that point. I am dealing with the drafting of the bill. The bill provides that the application shall be supported by affidavit supplied by the board, and secondly by a written statement by the settler, which is not necessarily an affidavit at all. I suggest there should be one affidavit, setting forth the whole of the subject matter that the settler is submitting as the ground for his revaluation.

Mr. CLARK: I endorse what the hon. member has just stated; and furthermore I point out that the requirement that the affidavit shall be on forms supplied by the board puts the soldier to unnecessary inconvenience. The minister said that the board would send the forms to the soldiers. Many soldiers will not get them and many who get them will mislay them. Why could the section not read like this:

The application shall be supported by affidavit setting forth the settler's belief as to the present value of the land, his reasons therefor and the names of the persons whom he proposes to call as witnesses.

I presume that is all that is necessary. Why should there be a statutory requirement that the affidavit shall be on a form supplied by the board? It would not be so bad if the settlers lived in a city where they could go to the office and get the forms; but some of them are living perhaps a hundred miles away from the place where they could get the forms. It is not necessary to have the forms supplied by the board——

Mr. CANNON: Unless the forms are supplied by the board the document referred to by my hon. friend would have to be prepared by a legal gentleman and there would be additional cost. Most hon. members who have spoken on this question have expressed a desire to reduce as much as possible the cost incurred to the soldier. Unless special forms are prepared by the board stating exactly what is required, these soldiers would have to go to legal men to get the forms prepared, and would have to pay costs. That is not desirable.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend has not got the point. I am not talking about the practice or what is going to take place. I am simply speaking in regard to the drafting of the bill. I am in accord with the suggestion of sending out forms to the soldiers, in accord with the principle of preparing a form containing everything that should be in it, and in accord with the principle of having the affidavit set forth everything the soldier has to do and dispensing with any additional written statement. I am suggesting there should not be a statutory requirement that the affidavit should be on a printed form. If the affidavit contained everything set out in the statutory form, it should be sufficient. It should not be invalidated by reason of the fact that it is not on the statutory form.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am afraid my hon. friends are raising bogeys that will not exist. If we were going to administer the matter strictly from a legal standpoint and a man were shut out for a technical failure to comply with any of the requirements, it would be a direct endeavour on the part of the government to deny the soldier what is undoubtedly his right, but I think hon. gentlemen will admit that a form duly prepared, with these matters set out in rotation, is the proper thing for the soldiers

Mr. CLARK: Did I not say that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And due precaution will be taken to see that he gets them, because there are supervisors in every part of Canada, in every province, and if he does not get them by mail, anyone who makes application by letter or otherwise for such forms will be supplied with them. It will be taken that the letter is an indication of his desire to be dealt with. I do wish my hon. friends would rid their minds of the idea that any soldier will be shut out from consideration because of some legal technicality in the draughtsmanship of the bill.

Mr. CLARK: But the fact is, notwithstanding what the minister says, that the soldier who does not send in his affidavit on a printed form supplied by the department will be debarred. He must comply with this statutory requirement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CLARK: That shows how little hon. gentlemen know about the effect of statutory requirements. The minister suggests that we are putting up a legal bogey. No more ridiculous suggestion could be made. The principle of the bill having been decided upon, we must necessarily consider the draughtsmanship from the legal standpoint. We do not want the bill draughted by a farmer, and the sooner the minister recognizes as a sound constitutional principle the legal draughtsmanship of this legislation the better it will be for him and his department. I am not raising any bogey at all; I am suggesting something which I trust will facilitate the passage of the bill and at the same time assist not only the department but, as well, the soldier who wants to take advantage of this legislation. The suggestion I make is a simple one. What possible objection could there be to having the soldier supply a declaration in some form other than an affidavit if he should happen to lose the printed form supplied him?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the hon member arguing against the submission of the printed form proposed?

Mr. CLARK: The minister has missed the point I have raised three times already. I am in perfect accord with the suggestion that the department should prepare a form for submission by the soldier, but I suggest that if by accident the soldier should lose that form a declaration to the same effect be considered valid. That would preclude any possibility of his being shut out from consideration.

Mr. FORKE: I do not see why the minister should not accept the hon. member's suggestion. Possibly, however, the man in sending in his own form might forget to dot his i's and cross his t's.

Mr. CLARK: Does my hon. friend want to deprive any soldier of any right to which he may be entitled, simply because he happens to send in some other form than that supplied by the department?

Mr. FORKE: No; I do not want to shut out any soldier.

Mr. BROWN: The difficulty might be met by the use of some such words as these, "that the application shall not be considered invalid by reason of the use of some other form." I do not think any difficulty such as my hon. friend apprehends will actually occur, but the minister might accept this suggestion to set all doubts at rest.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think that in this particular case an affidavit would be permissible; what is here required is a statutory declaration. My suggestion is that paragraph (b) be amended to read:

The application shall be supported by a statutory declaration setting out the original purchase price of the land.

As regards the other requirements as to a written statement and the names and addresses of witnesses, which particulars under the section as it stands are to be supplied on the printed form containing the affidavit, these are matters that could be made the subject of regulation as provided for in paragraph (j). I am sure the minister has misapprehended what my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) has said. There is no tendency whatever on the part of lawyers to be unnecessarily technical, but there is undoubtedly a tendency on the part of members of the committee to assume that when a lawyer makes a suggestion looking to the improvement of a bill he is doing so for the purpose of creating difficulties. That is altogether wrong. I would point out to the minister the danger to which the soldier is exposed under the bill as it stands. For example, paragraph (d) provides that all applications for revaluation shall be submitted to the board prior to the first day of October, 1926. Suppose some soldier should fail to send in his application before October 5: that application would be rejected under this provision. We ought to fix a date late enough to avoid any difficulty of this kind, say November 1. I suggest that the minister amend the section as I propose; a statutory declaration and not an affidavit is what is here required. Perhaps the Solicitor General will give his opinion on that point.

Mr. CANNON: A statutory declaration or an affidavit.

Mr. BENNETT: The cases in which affidavits are permissible are limited. In the present instance a statutory declaration would be necessary.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did my hon friend refer to some other part of the section besides paragraph (b)?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the written statement as to the value of the land and the names and addresses of witnesses would be a matter of regulation under paragraph (j).

Mr. CANNON: Perhaps the following draft will meet the views of the committee:

The application shall be supported by a statutory declaration setting forth,

(1) The original purchase price of the land and the value of improvements effected since the establishment of the settler thereon.

2. His belief as to the present value of the land and his reasons therefor.

3. The names and addresses of any persons whom the settler proposes as witnesses to the present value.

Mr. BURY: Certainly; it is the suggestion I made in the beginning.

Mr. CANNON: Would that be satisfactory?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I think the third is a most unusual provision. Even on discovery in a civil case, as the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) is no doubt aware, the other side is not entitled to get the names of witnesses. Why is it necessary in this case? I submit that it is fundamentally wrong and unjust. I think the settler should put in his application and afterwards appear with his witnesses at the hearing.

Mr. CANNON: But this is exceptional procedure and the provision is intended to make the soldier settler show that his claim is serious. As to the regulations which are referred to further on, something might be inserted there to the effect that if any witnesses have been omitted from the original declaration, later they may easily be brought before the board.

Mr. GEARY: That is provided for under the Public Inquiries Act. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, the reason for this is that the man need not come himself; his whole case is given to the board, and the board may call the witnesses he has designated.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is really to facilitate his getting his witnesses before the board. However, I have no objection to striking out the paragraph.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. GEARY: If you are preparing a form the notification should be put at the top.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: This third subsection apparently leaves it optional with the soldier to supply any names. To my mind this is a very important subsection. I recall when the resolution was before the House a few weeks ago I proposed an additional procedure on the part of the soldier to support his application. I did not get any reply from the minister at that time, and I have been wondering if he heard me. I am of the opinion that a great many soldier settlers are in need of having their land revalued, and every last one who is entitled to it should have this privilege; but I am also of opinion that there are quite a considerable number—and I am thinking of my own constituency when I say this—who are not entitled to a revaluation. There is nothing in this subsection to prevent such men making application for a revaluation. They have simply to give a written statement setting forth their belief as to the value of their land. If a man believes his land will be revalued for $500 or $1,000 less, he is likely to stretch his belief a long way. I have suggested, and I again suggest, that the application of the soldier settler should be supported by a resolution, duly moved and passed by the local municipal council. I should like to hear if the minister has any objection to the addition of a fourth subsection reading somewhat as follows:

4. By a written statement of the local municipal council setting forth their belief as to the present value and their reasons therefor.

I make this proposal because the municipal councillors know the land and know the settler and are in a better position to give a fair and impartial view than he is himself.

Mr. FRASER: Before the minister considers that suggestion, let me point out that it would not work at all in British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER: That part of the province which is municipalized is very small, and a very large proportion of the soldiers are in the absolutely unorganized districts.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I agree with my hon. friend from Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) that one undoubtedly would get reliable information from a municipal council. Perhaps no body of men know their locality better than they do. But the adoption of his suggestion would entail the expense of notifying them, and I think he will agree with me that if the local council reported against any revaluation they would be in a rather awkward position, and the soldier would have an everlasting grievance. That is one of the reasons why I felt it necessary to extend the privilege of revaluation to every soldier whether entitled to consideration or not. Our hope is that we will settle this once for all, giving every man a full opportunity to make his statement, and then the board will either agree or disagree with it. Naturally, in dealing with it they would seek their information from the very body that my hon. friend has mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN: I will read the subsection as amended.

Moved by Mr. CANNON that:

Subsection (b) be amended to read as follows:

The application shall be supported by a statutory declaration setting out:

1. The original purchase price of the land and the value of the improvements effected since the establishment of the settler thereon.
2. His belief as to the present value of the land and his reasons therefor.
3. The names and addresses of any persons whom the settler proposes as witnesses to the present value.

Shall the subsection carry?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It was not intended by the minister originally that the whole statement of the settler setting forth his belief as to the present value of his land and the reasons therefor should be under oath. Why is it necessary to go further now and have all the material under oath?

Mr. CANNON: The amendment was suggested by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). It was stated that the clause as it read in the bill would mean practically the preparation of three different documents by the soldiers, and that they might have trouble in preparing them. In order to simplify matters this amendment is proposed. Under it there would be only one document, which would contain the particulars enumerated in the clause as it read originally. I do not think there is any serious suggestion that the settler should in a statutory declaration state his reason for a revaluation. If he is serious he will have no objection to putting that in a declaration.

Mr. BURY: It should all be under oath.

Mr. CANNON: That is my opinion.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would the Solicitor General agree to the addition of a provision at the end of the amendment to the effect that the settler may call witnesses who are not included in that list?

Mr. CANNON: In order not to complicate the clause I think my hon. friend should refer to clause (j) on page 3. The regulations, which are to be made by the Governor in Council, could cover these cases.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Very well, if that is understood.

Mr. CLARK: What regulations are those?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All the regulations for the hearings.

Mr. CLARK: I think my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) has raised a rather important point. The settler may think he has given the names of all the witnesses he desires to call, but there should be some provision in the bill itself permitting the presiding officer to call additional witnesses if it is thought necessary.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps we could clear that up by striking out the reference to witnesses.

Mr. CANNON: If we did that we might work a hardship on the soldier.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am quite prepared to strike that out, because I anticipate that we will have trouble when the regulations come up.

Mr. BOYS: I would like to support that. I do not want to make a speech again, but I feel it my duty to support what has been said about the names and addresses of the witnesses There is no earthly reason for that. It is a very unusual thing; no man is supposed to disclose the names and addresses of his witnesses. Another and more serious objection is this: Is it really proposed that when this list is given and the matter is heard, the settler cannot call anyone else? If we are to have an amendment at all why not get rid of the whole thing, and set out the three things originally proposed, the original price of the land; the value of improvements and the present value of the land. I am going to make this suggestion, that those three items be given, and verified by affidavit.

Mr. BURY: Under the amendment proposed by the Solicitor General there must be a statutory declaration, and it cannot be done otherwise.

Mr. CANNON: I have no objection to striking out the last part of my amendment, that is,

> The names and addresses of any persons whom the settler proposes as witnesses to the present value.

The statutory declaration would then apply only to the other two points.

Paragraph (b) as amended agreed to.

On paragraph (c)—How depreciation shall be computed:

Mr. CLARK: I would like to ask the minister why the improvements are included. I understood that this was a revaluation of land, and I also understood that there had been a rebate allowed in respect of improvements. Why are the two linked together now?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend mean that there has already been a rebate for improvements?

Mr. CLARK: I am not sure whether there was really a rebate, but there was a bill before the House to that effect.

Mr. BURY: I take it that the improvements referred to would be part of the land. They are the fences, the wells, the breaking, the clearing and the houses, and when they are sold to the settler they are sold as part of the land. They are only distinguished from the land for the purposes of the land titles acts of some of the provinces. When you sell so many acres of land, with so much broken, so much cleared, so much fencing done, a well, a residence, a barn and so on, they become part of the land and are sold with it. Therefore if you leave out the words "and the improvements" you will cover everything.

Mr. CANNON: It means the improvements sold to the settler.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am given to understand that the old act makes that definition. I quite agree with my hon. friend that the improvements are included with the land, but apparently those words were inserted to meet an objection raised in committee. In one case we might have a man who, by his action, had reduced the value of the land, while on the other hand his neighbour, by industry, had improved the value of the land by adding permanent improvements. It was to meet that objection which was raised in committee that these words were inserted, so that the settler would receive consideration for the improvements made while he occupied the land.

Mr. BURY: Still I do not see the point, because when the soldier buys land he buys it with so much clearing, so much breaking, so much fencing, so many buldings and so on, and he buys it as land. For the sake of convenience a distinction was made between land and improvements, but he bought it as a farm, as land. If, when you come to revalue that, you take the difference between the value of the land you sold him, the price at which it was sold, and the present value of the land, you will get the same thing.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I may say that I argued in the same way, but I did not convince the committee that that man would be taken care of.

Mr. CLARK: I agree with the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) on the legal principle, but supposing a man buys unimproved land for $3,000. He then puts improvements on the land to the value of $1,500, and they become part of the land. They are called improvements, but they are really a part of the land, which makes a total value of $4,500. In other words, he has added $1,500 to the value of his property by his own effort. He is of opinion that the land has depreciated in value by fifty per cent. His land is therefore worth $1,500, but assuming that the improvements have not depreciated in value, the total value of his property will be to-day exactly what it was when he acquired it, namely, $3,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is exactly what we cover in this subsection.

Mr. CLARK: Is that man entitled to a revaluation? Is he entitled to any consideration for the depreciation in land value, apart from his improvements?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. CLARK: I confess that I cannot see at the moment just where that is provided for in this act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought we were providing for that contingency; we made it very clear in the former drafts that improvements made by the settler would be taken into consideration. This covers the point just raised by my hon. friend. In that case the idea would be to give the settler full credit for the improvements placed upon the land by himself; the valuation would be made quite apart from those improvements, and a reduction made in accordance with that valuation.

Mr. STIRLING: Does not the matter which I raised the other day, in connection with the orchard men, come under such amended wording as this? The point I was making was that two men might go on to two pieces of orchard land, in the beginning equal in value. Young trees are planted, or the trees are a year old when the men acquire the property. One man, by his industry and successful work, increases the value of his land, while his neighbour, by less excellent work, does not so increase the value of his land. If you compare the original purchase price with the price to-day, the man who did the better work will not get the benefit.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The amendment was introduced to cover exactly the cases cited by both hon. gentlemen, that is, where permanent improvements had been made, which, after all, apply to the land itself. I agree with my hon. friend that we had that covered, but in order to satisfy the committee we added those words, and every case of that kind will be considered on its merits. The value that was contributed to the property by the soldier himself will be given consideration and not be included in the reduction in valuation, if any, of the property.

Mr. BURY: I do not like to speak so often but this is an important matter. What I am going to suggest to the minister is this: There are apparently now to be considered two factors in valuing the property which the settler purchased—the factor of the raw land, and the factor of the improvements worked into or put upon that raw land. When you come to revalue, I think you will have to revalue those two factors separately. I think you will have to take into account this question: Has the value of raw land in this district gone down as raw land? If it has, the settler must be compensated or get a concession in respect of the reduction in the value of the raw land in that district. Then take the second factor, the improvements that he purchased at the time. He may have allowed those improvements to go down, or he may have added to them. For that reason I think you will have to keep these two factors separate—the factor of the raw land, and the factor of the improvement. In the revaluation you will have to ask yourself: what was the value of the raw land when that man purchased? One thousand dollars; the value of that raw land now is eight hundred dollars. Very well then; the farm in respect of that factor has depreciated two hundred dollars. Then take the other factor, the improvements. What was the value of the improvements at the time he purchased? One thousand or fifteen hundred dollars. What is the value of the improvements now? It has gone up.

Very well then, we need not bother in that case. The value has gone down; then we must take into account the depreciation of the improvements. I do not know whether I have made myself clear, but I do not think you will settle this question until you keep those two factors separate and have a revaluation of the two factors.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think it is quite unnecessary that we should go into that detail in the bill, but undoubtedly that would have to be the basis on which the revaluation would be made, because there are the two factors here. We wanted to make it perfectly clear that if the soldier by his own labour and industry had improved the value of the property, he should be given consideration for that improvement.

Mr. CLARK: But this section does not do that. As this section reads, if a man buys land and improvements through the Soldier Settlement Board, and adds to those improvements by building a barn or an addition to his house, he will not receive credit for those improvements under the section as drafted. They will be added to the present value of the land, and if the present value of the land with these improvements that have been made by the soldier himself equals the price which he paid for the farm originally, he will not be entitled to any revaluation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is hardly correct there. Take the concrete case he mentions, where the soldier adds a barn to the land and improvements that were sold to him at a fixed price, and he makes that improvement by his own industry or with money he has procured. Of necessity that improvement adds to the value of that particular farm. It may have depreciated from the day he built it, but the present day value of that improvement would be credited to him, and would not be taken into consideration in fixing the depreciation of the property. We are endeavouring to give credit for the improvements the settler puts in, for the improvements which were not made by the government, and which were not in existence when the settler took possession of the property. It is a little bit complicated, but that is the clear intention of what we are endeavouring to do here.

Mr. BOYS: I think we are all in accord as to what is desired here, but possibly there is some room for doubt as to whether that will be accomplished by the wording as it stands, and if there is any doubt, I would like to suggest to the minister that he add in the seventh line of subsection (c) after the word "board" the words:

> In determining the present market value of the land improvements made by the settler shall not be included.

I think we all agree that that is the intention, but reading the section there seems to be room for some little doubt. Why not place it beyond peradventure? If you insert those words, the arbitrators are bound by that.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Why "market" value?

Mr. BOYS: That is the language that appears here. I am right when I assume that that is the intention of the minister, and unless we are all agreed that there is no doubt about this section, by adding the words I have suggested, we can set the matter at rest, In other words, when the soldier got the land there was no barn on it; he has put up a barn, say, worth $500. Now in determining the present market value, it is not fair to value that barn because he never got it from the board; that is his own work. So I say the value of that improvement shall not be included.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is precisely what we thought we were doing.

Mr. BOYS: The minister has apparently not understood what I said at first. All I am saying is that if there is any room for doubt as to whether that intention is being accomplished by the present wording, we can set the matter at rest at once by adding the words I have suggested. Possibly it would be tautology; I do not say it would not. I am inclined to agree with the minister that the wording he has got perhaps does what he intends, but I do not think it is free from doubt, and we might just as well set it at rest.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Frankly I do not think it is required, but if you want to put it beyond any doubt, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. MURPHY: Improvements apply not only to the buildings but to the land itself. A farm would be improved if additional acreage had been brought under cultivation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, it would. Anything that was contributed by the settler himself to improving the property would be included. I accept the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON: I move:

That after the word "board" in line seven of subsection (c) there be added the words: in determining the present market value of the land improvements made by the settler shall not be included;

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph (c) as amended agreed to.

On paragraph (d)—Time for application.

Mr. BURY: I should like to move that the subsection be amended by adding these words:

Provided, however, that the time hereby limited for the submission of such application may be extended under the regulations made hereunder.

My reason for suggesting this amendment is that as the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has pointed out no regulations can change the clearly expressed language of the act itself. The regulations are only made to carry out the purpose of the act, they are only machinery for carrying out that purpose. The moment a regulation goes beyond the language of the act it becomes ultra vires of the Governor General in Council and is utterly useless. There is no use in saying that you are going to give a power to the minister or to the department to extend by regulations the time in the act where that time is expressly fixed.

Mr. FRASER: I want to point out the necessity of the minister having a more flexible provision than that contained in this particular subsection. In British Columbia there are districts far removed from any county court judge into which that judge makes but one trip a year. Therefore, soldier settlers in such districts might not be able to make their application to, or appear before, a judge before the first of October.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It may be that there are districts where such cases might arise but they would not occur in the territory to which my hon. friend refers. There are no settlers in that territory on purchased lands, they are all on crown lands. Perhaps, for the purposes of simplification, we might strike the subsection out altogether and leave it to the regulation of the board, or simply say that the final date for receiving applications will be fixed by the board.

Mr. BURY: The objection I see to that is that when you have a date fixed under an act it is a final notice to all the world that applications must be in by that date.

Mr. CANNON: Would my hon. friend not be satisfied if we were to add the words "or any further date fixed by the board by regulation?"

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. BURY: What I had in mind was not the regulation fixing the date but the provision that the board might, in the event of an application coming in after the first of October, accept it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): At their pleasure.

Mr. BURY: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I suggest that the point my hon. friend makes is covered here with very much less wording.

Mr. BURY: No, it is not covered. Under the statute an application must be in by October 1. Now, if one comes in on the 2nd of October and is accepted it is open to anybody to upset the revaluation made at that hearing because it was made without authority under the statute. It was made in respect of an application that did not conform to the requirements in the statute. There is no use laughing about legal technicalities, that is the law.

Sir EUGENE FISET: How would it do if you added the words:

Except as otherwise provided by regulations.

Mr. CANNON: I think the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Rimouski would meet the idea we all have in mind.

Mr. BURY: Except to this extent: It is better to have a definite date in the act because it is a warning to the soldier settler that the application must be in by that date.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What I suggest is the usual wording in such cases.

Amendment (Sir Eugene Fiset) agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

Paragraphs (e) and (f) agreed to.

On paragraph (g)—Expenditure.

Mr. CLARK: I think I pointed out the other day when this subsection was under review that no per diem allowance could be paid to the arbitrators except out-of-pocket expenses for the day. For instance, you might pay their expenses, but you could not pay them a salary or a per diem allowance by way of remuneration.

Mr. CANNON: Does my hon. friend not think this matter should be left to be settled by the Governor in Council by regulation, instead of putting it in the bill? I think the suggestion made by my hon. friend was very good, but it will be very hard to provide in the bill for every detail.

Mr. BOYS: Has the minister considered whether or not, in the event of the application being successful, any allowance is to be made to the soldier for the expense he has incurred? I do not want to say for one moment that the board should be given power to allow counsel fees to lawyers, but I wish to urge that where the settler makes an application in good faith and is successful, the board should have power to award him reasonable and actual disbursements for himself and his witnesses in establishing his case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have given some thought to that suggestion, and I feel that some assistance will have to be given to the settlers, whether they are successful or not. I doubt whether you can discriminate between the man who fails and the man who is given a reduction.

Mr. BOYS: Why not?

Mr. BURY: I think you can, if you give your arbitration committee the power, where a man has without justification applied for a revaluation, to penalize him by refusing to pay his costs. That is very often done.

Mr. BOYS: I feel very strongly on this point, and I cannot see any reason why a soldier who has a good case and establishes it should not get his disbursements. If you do not make such a provision you are depriving him of that much money. Suppose the award were $400, his disbursements might amount to $50, $75 or possibly $100. The distances are great. He will have probably five or six witnesses, and it does not take long to eat up $50. I suggest that the costs be confined to the man and his witnesses, with no allowance for counsel fees, the matter to be left to the discretion of the board. You can limit it if you like; you can provide that the amount in any individual case shall not exceed $75. I think you should give the board that discretion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have never thought otherwise than that some help would have to be given to the men.

Mr. BOYS: Why not insert the provision in the bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We will have to cover innumerable details in the regulations.

Mr. STEVENS: But this is a power which should be provided in the act.

Mr. BOYS: I do not argue that you should put a whole lot of procedure in the act in regard to the matter covered by subsection (j), but you have a distinct section reading as follows:

(g) Expenditures necessarily incurred by or in connection with any district arbitration committee shall be paid out of moneys appropriated from time to time by parliament to soldier land settlement.

Surely that could not be extended to give the right to award something to the soldier settler. That is expenditure incurred by the district arbitration committee; in other words, the per diem for the committee and their travelling expenses. It does not mean anything else. It does not refer to costs incurred by the soldier. If it did I would be quite satisfied, but I think a change is necessary if you wish to make it apply to the settler.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps we could meet that difficulty by striking out the words:

Expenditures necessarily incurred by or in connection with any district arbitration committee.

Mr. CANNON: Make it read "under this act."

Mr. BOYS: You get away then from what I think is so important, the question of discretion. I do not go so far as to say that the settler, whether successful or not, should be entitled to make a demand for any expenses he has been put to. It is well to have a check on the expenditure, so that if the settler has not a case which he feels sure he could win, he will not make application. But if he has a good case and wins, why should he not get expenses? The Solicitor General must appreciate that.

Mr. CANNON: I do appreciate that, but the point raised by my hon. friend was that under the clause as it reads, on 5 p.m. account of the words "or in connection with any district arbitration committee" the board would not have power to grant those costs.

Mr. BOYS: Quite so.

Mr. CANNON: But the clause might be amended to read:

Any expenditures incurred under this act shall be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament.

Then if regulations were made to meet the case my hon. friend puts, the board would have discretion. I think the Federal Appeal Board has such discretion.

Mr. BURY: If you make it read so as to cover expenditures in connection with or under this act, then the expenditure of a soldier applicant who fails are as much expenditures under the act as the expenditures of a soldier who succeeds, and there is no suggestion that you should go that length.

Mr. BOYS: If you add at the end of this clause words to this effect:

And in every case in which an applicant is successful the board may in its discretion award him a reasonable sum to cover his actual expenses, not including witness fees.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would very much prefer if we could do what my hon. friend suggests, but avoid putting it in the act, because immediately you make such a provision and the board grants even a moderate sum to a successful applicant, there is a precedent established at once.

Mr. BOYS: I do not understand what the minister means by establishing a precedent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): John Smith is successful and obtains a favourable decision. His sale price is reduced by $1,000. He has brought five witnesses and travelled perhaps thirty miles. His expenses are $35 or $40, and the board grants those expenses. At once a precedent is established.

Mr. BOYS: I am arguing that every successful settler should get such an allowance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That soldier is getting a consideration. He is getting a reduction of $1,000 which is a considerable sum to him. True, he had to go to a lot of trouble in getting an award, and it may be argued that he has suffered injury in that he should have got that allowance long ago. But he took upon himself the responsibility of purchasing the land in the first place; it was not forced upon him and now he is reimbursed his expenditures. On the other hand, another applicant is not successful, and we say to him, "We will do nothing for you." He may have been just as sincere in his application and may have spent just as much money; yet he discovers he is not getting a reduction, and he has to pay his own costs. None of us knows when we go into matters of this kind in all good faith and honesty of purpose what is going to happen, and I am afraid in this case there might be some trouble. We may safely be trusted to exercise reasonable judgment in dealing with the soldiers, not particularly in discrimination against the one who fails.

Mr. BOYS: There should be a distinction between the settler who has suffered and the one who has not. A man who is unsuccessful in his application to the board has not suffered, whereas the very fact that a soldier is successful in his claim proves the injury he has sustained. I am not suggesting for a moment that the minister is trying to deprive the settler of anything, but I do want to see that the settler gets his desserts. Fifty dollars would probably pay witness fees; certainly $75 would.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. CANNON: I move that the paragraph be amended to read:

Expenditures necessarily incurred by or in connection with the administration of this act shall be paid out of moneys appropriated from time to time by parliament to soldier land settlement, as may be provided by regulation.

As regards the suggestion of my hon. friend to fix a maximum of $50, it is absolutely impossible to embody every detail in an act; a good many things must be left to regulation. This is done in the case of the Federal Appeal Board.

Mr. BOYS: I am not sure, but I think in that case it will be found that the board has power in the matter of costs. There is, however, nothing in this section to provide for the payment of costs.

Mr. CANNON: That is why I propose the amendment.

Mr. BOYS: That is the difficulty. The Solicitor General is proposing to amend the section in regard to something that is not contemplated at all. The section contemplates the naming of a fund out of which the money is to be paid, whereas the proposition I make is totally different. I propose to give the board the power to pay certain expenses incurred by the settler. Apparently there is a desire on the part of the minister not to make this feature of the bill public lest it be abused.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is correct.

Mr. BOYS: That appeals to me to some extent, although I cannot see why if a man has been successful in his claim he should not get the relief to which he is entitled. You are giving the deserving man certain relief with one hand while you are taking away from him with the other a percentage thereof, which will be measured by the expenses to which he has been put. However, so long as I am assured that the minister will make the necessary regulation to cover the point I am satisfied. Certainly I do not want to see an arbitration committee given unlimited power in the making of awards in connection with expenses, without fees, and so on.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. BURY: As amended?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: The section as amended is not clearly worded. I suggest that it be made to read:

Expenditures necessarily incurred by or in connection with the administration of this act, as may be provided by regulation, shall be paid out of moneys appropriated from time to time by parliament to soldier land settlement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is satisfactory.

Mr. CANNON: I move that the paragraph as so amended be agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

Paragraphs (h) to (k) inclusive agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the preamble carry?

Mr. NEILL: We have not passed section 1 yet.

Mr. CANNON: It is all section 1.

Mr. NEILL: We have passed subsections (a), (b), and so on, but we have not passed section 1. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) raised the point.

The CHAIRMAN: It was the understanding that we would carry the subsections separately and then the whole section would be taken as carried.

Mr. STEVENS: Shall section 1 carry?

Section 1 as amended agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read the third time?

Mr. STEVENS: Next sitting of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, respecting old age pensions.

Mr. STEVENS: Is this bill printed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, this is unnecessarily rapid. I notice on the order paper the bill is not shown as printed at all, at least the letters "E.F."—English and French—are not noted.

Mr. SPEAKER: Quite so.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not desirous of obstructing the government's progress, but we are proceeding at a pretty rapid rate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I said "carried" because I understood the House was anxious to go into committee. I am informed that the bill was printed this morning and distributed.

Mr. STEVENS: I was guided in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by what I found in the orders of the day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. STEVENS: I notice the Yukon Territory is included in this section. I presume the Northwest Territories should also be included?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. My understanding was that in the drafting of the bill the Northwest Territories would be included. I think they should be.

Mr. STEVENS: They apparently are not included. Should you include them, another point would have to be considered. That is, there would be no provincial authority to contribute one-half the cost, so that the federal government in that case ought to bear all the cost. Consequently it would be scarcely proper to include either Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Chairman, although the minister informed me when the resolution was before the House that the bill would be drafted to apply to the Yukon territory, I cannot see by its terms how the bill can possibly apply. The mere statement in paragraph (d) of section 2 that the word "province" includes Yukon Territory does not make the bill workable by any means. For instance, section 3 provides that the Governor in Council may make an agreement with the lieutenant governor in council of any province. Suppose you read the word "territory" there, there is no such thing as a lieutenant governor in council in Yukon Territory.

Section 6 mentions the Northwest Territories and provides that as soon as agreements under this act have been made with two of the provinces adjoining the Northwest Territories, the commissioner of the said territories may submit to the Governor in Council for approval a scheme for the administration and payment of pensions therein. If you are going to treat Yukon Territory in the same way, you will find there are no two provinces that do adjoin that territory; it adjoins British Columbia only.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The proposal, I think, is that the northwest provinces or districts and Yukon Territory will be qualified under this legislation to make an agreement with the federal government in the matter of pensions.

Mr. STEVENS: But we want the minister to inform us how that is to be done; it does not appear in the act.

Mr. BOYS: It seems to me that what has been stated by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) has only to be heard to enable the minister to see at once that a change in the wording of this act is necessary. Let us just apply it for a moment, to see whether or not that is an exaggerated statement. I understand the intention is to cover, among other portions of Canada, the Yukon Territory, and that the minister seeks to make the act applicable to that territory by explaining the meaning of the word "province", which is supposed to include the Yukon Territory. With that before us, let us turn to section 3:

> The Governor in Council may make an agreement with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of any province—

There is no such person as the lieutenant governor of Yukon Territory, and therefore you could not make an agreement with the Yukon Territory.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They have a council, and I am not sure that you could not make an agreement; I think you could.

Mr. BURY: But surely the minister does not suggest that the council of the Yukon is the lieutenant governor?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. BURY: Or that the council could, by any process of reasoning or any stretching of words, be made to come within the meaning of the words "lieutenant governor"?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): There never has been a lieutenant governor of the Yukon. Formerly there was a commissioner but there is only a gold commissioner now, so the words are not at all applicable.

Mr. HEAPS: Could not this clause be amended so as to include a representative of the Yukon?

Mr. BOYS: It is not suggested that it cannot be amended, but it is not correct now. It may be said that we who happen to be of the legal profession make these suggestions for the sake of a bit of fun or as a means of obstruction or something of that sort. I think hon. gentlemen see, however, that there is more than that in our suggestions; we are endeavouring to make this act effective and applicable to the Yukon Territory. Unless there is a change made, in my humble opinion it will not so apply.

An hon. MEMBER: What change does my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. BOYS: I do not know that in ten seconds I could give the appropriate language, but all one has to do is read the present wording to see that it is not correct.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If what my hon. friend states is correct we will certainly consider the matter, because we want the act to apply to the Yukon Territory and the northwest provinces. If that has not been worked out, it will be looked after.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is quite apparent that the word "province" is intended to include the Yukon Territory; it is quite evident from section 6 that the Northwest Territories are not to be so included, and that agreement must be arranged separately. It is probable that after the words "the Governor in Council may make an agreement with the Lieutenant Governor in Council of any province" there should be inserted "or with the commissioner" or whatever the title of the head of the government of Yukon Territory may be. I suggest that some amendment to that effect be worked out.

Mr. BOYS: I absolutely agree with the minister.

Mr. BURY: If that is done the definition of the word province will have to be cut out, because the definition of province includes the Yukon Territory. Then it is proposed in section 3 to say "The Lieutenant Governor in Council of any province" which, by the definition, already includes the Yukon Territory, but by this proposed amendment you say it does not include the Yukon Territory.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It might be made to read "make an agreement with any province," and the word province includes the Yukon Territory.

Mr. BOYS: That would be a good deal better.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the government is dropping into a very slovenly and careless practice in regard to these bills. Surely there is some properly qualified official of the government to whom bills should be submitted before they come before this House. We had a bad example in the last bill, and now we have another. This bill is impossible in its present state, as anyone with a knowledge of bills can see. It seems to me that the government should submit this bill for redraughting to someone who knows something about that work.

Mr. CLARK: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Elliott) has suggested the substitution of the words "gold commissioner" for "Lieutenant Governor in Council." Would the gold commissioner have power to make an agreement, on behalf of the Yukon, to pay one-half of the moneys required for the carrying out of this act?

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing now with section 2, I suppose; why not strike out subsection (d) of section 2? We could then go ahead with section 3.

Mr. STEVENS: Why not make that motion?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): While the minister is considering the point in question, I would like to ask who undertook the drafting of this bill.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Colonel Biggar is the gentleman who draughted the act.

Mr. McQUARRIE: He had better try again.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He is a very good draughtsman.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Who tinkered with it afterwards?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was no tinkering afterwards, it is being tinkered with now.

Mr. BOYS: It is evident that the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Labour, and the Solicitor General, who would naturally speak with authority, all agree that this bill will not do as it is now.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is not clear.

Mr. BOYS: Some of these criticisms seem to be well founded. I know if I have to have my anatomy attended to I do not go to a farmer or a lawyer; I go to a doctor, who should know all about it. It does seem to me when it comes to a matter of this kind a lawyer perhaps should be given the opportunity of expressing his views. That is what we are trying to do. If this is to be considered at any length, would not time be saved by calling it six o'clock and the minister getting his legal officials to redraught this clause for submission at eight o'clock?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would it not be better to go through the other clauses first? We may find some other clauses that need redrafting.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I did not know that this bill would be taken up this afternoon or I would have had Colonel Biggar here. I would prefer to let this section stand for the present and go on with the bill.

Section 2 stands.

Section 3 stands.

On section 4—Term of agreements.

Mr. CLARK: The minister has said that we can go on and consider the agreement, but sections 2 and 3 lay the whole foundation for the act, and we cannot very well consider section 4, which deals with the agreement, when sections 2 and 3 stand.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In all probability the sections will require amending. We are only asking for time in order that the amendment may be drawn properly. There is no reason why, with that understanding, we cannot go on with the other sections.

Mr. CLARK: You cannot go on with section 4 until you settle sections 2 and 3.

Mr. CANNON: That is frequently done. We often postpone consideration of the preamble of a bill.

Mr. STEVENS: That is always done, but that is a different matter.

Mr. BOYS: Section 4 provides that the agreement made pursuant to the preceding sections shall continue in force, and so on, and my point is that you cannot very well consider that section until you have settled the main principle of the act. But if the minister insists upon going on with section 4—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We will let it stand.

Section 4 stands.

On section 5—Approval of administration scheme necessary.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the clause I spoke of last night, and I again desire to bring it to the attention of the committee and of the government. I will pass over the objection which has been raised by my colleague from Vancouver-Burrard, and which applies equally to this clause. Clause 5 reads:

Before any agreement made pursuant to this act comes into operation the Governor in Council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province, and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the Governor in Council.

I really want to impress on the government once again what to my mind is the hopelessness of this bill with the existence of that clause. Let me try to illustrate my point. We will assume that upon the passing of this legislation one of the provinces, British Columbia, if you like, at its session next year passes legislation formulated in harmony with the wish of this government, and that legislation receives the approval of this government. It becomes law, and British Columbia receives the benefit of this act. Then the government of Alberta, which made some very advanced suggestions in its letter to the committee last year, says: We want to come in too, but our legislation must be contributory. The legislation in British Columbia, we will suppose, provided for a non-contributory scheme, and then Alberta passes an act which is contributory. Is the Governor in Council going to approve of that second act, approve of a contributory scheme in one province and of a non-contributory scheme in another? I have merely to state the case, I think, to show how hopeless it is to have this legislation made applicable throughout the Dominion without a previous conference and understanding with the provinces on the general principles of the legislation that will be passed by the provinces. I want to be acquitted now of obstructing or opposing the principle of old age pensions, but I cannot allow this to pass without most emphatically protesting against proceeding in this way, and impressing upon the committee and upon the government the hopelessness of the legislation as at present draughted in the absence of an agreement with the provinces after conference.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think there could be a stronger argument in favour of this clause than the one that has just been made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. It is because of the very possibility he has stated that this clause is in the act. He suggests that British Columbia may have a non-contributory scheme and Alberta a contributory scheme. It is just because of that, that we have this clause in the act to get uniform legislation throughout the Dominion. If you are going to have half a dozen provinces each with a different act, the thing will be unworkable as between province and province

Mr. STEVENS: That is what I have been trying to tell my hon friend.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. HEAPS: And it is for that very reason that this clause is in the act, so as to get uniformity. If each province were allowed to choose its own act, I do not suppose there would be two acts alike. Suppose, to carry the argument of my hon. friend a little further, the province of Alberta decided to make certain exceptions in the act; suppose that instead of $20 a month they granted $15, and that British Columbia decided to make it $25. Right away you would have two different acts, one province providing for a pension of $25, and the other for a pension of $15 a month. Then one province might make the pension payable at 70 years of age, and another at 75. Unless you have some central authority with some form of control over the acts passed by the different provinces, the result will be a condition of chaos. This is one of the most important clauses of the bill, and the argument that has just been made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is one of the strongest arguments that could be made in its favour.

Mr. STEVENS: There would be much in what my hon. friend says if he was correct in this point. He uses the words: The provinces should not be allowed to do so and so. This parliament has nothing to do with the allowing or disallowing of a province's course. My point, which my hon. friend has utterly failed to appreciate, is this: The provinces are sovereign within their own jurisdiction in passing whatever legislation they desire, and we cannot impose our will on any province What is more, no province will allow us to impose our will on them, and that is why this legislation is going to fail. Suppose an agitation grows in some province for an old age pension. All the government of that province has to do is to say, yes, we will give you legislation, and then pass legislation that would be inconsistent perhaps with this act or inconsistent with the act of some other province.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Then they would not get the benefit of this act.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly, that is the very point. Immediately they escape the responsibility of providing effective legislation. I again emphasize—I may be unhappy in making myself clear, but certainly it is clear in my own mind—that to pass this legislation before bringing the provinces together and getting them into agreement on a uniform act, is simply passing an act that will be abortive and useless.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not agree with my hon. friend at all. Undoubtedly throughout this country there is the necessity and the need for an old age pension.

Mr. STEVENS: We are not disputing that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): May I remind my hon. friend that there has been an expression of opinion in favour of this legislation from all groups in the House. It must be remembered that at the present time those persons who have attained the age of seventy years and are unable to earn a living are being taken care of by the provincial governments and by the municipalities. The Dominion government, realizing the importance of having some uniform scheme that will provide for these people, have seen fit to introduce legislation under which the Dominion treasury will share in the cost of caring for these people to the extent of fifty per cent. If any province should say that it does not care for the legislation there is no obligation on its part to adopt it; it may stay out. But the adoption of uniform legislation throughout the Dominion in regard to this matter through the instrumentality of the federal government will do a great deal to solve this question in a proper and fitting manner, and many advantages will result from it. Unless I am mistaken it will be found that all the provinces will take up the scheme, and in that event there is no doubt that uniform legislation will go into effect throughout the Dominion. We know that in regard to other matters demands have come from various public bodies for uniform legislation. Here we have a bill in regard to old age pensions which is likely to bring about uniformity. It is quite true that the provinces cannot be forced into enacting legislation, but no one is trying to do that in connection with this matter. All we are doing here is passing an act which will be very advantageous to the people of Canada if it is adopted generally.

Mr. McQUARRIE: With respect to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Heaps) what objection could there be to any of the provinces making a larger contribution towards old age pensions than is provided for in this bill if they so desire? For example, British Columbia might consider that the allowance should be larger. There would be some argument in favour of that, because $20 a month will not even meet the cost of keeping an old person in one of the provincial old people's homes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there anything in the bill to prevent the amount being increased? There must be a certain minimum, but I do not think there is any provision against increasing the grant.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes, but the minister says he wants to have uniformity, in which case we must have the same allowance in every province.

Mr. HEENAN: It is quite true that the section we are discussing provides that no change be made in the scheme by a province without the consent of the Governor in Council. The bill is based on the understanding that the Dominion government will contribute $10 out of the $20 that goes to each pensioner, but I think the idea is that this amount shall be the minimum. There is nothing to prevent any provincial government, as I read the bill, from increasing the amount of its grant by $5 or $10. I hope some of the provinces will do so. The federal government would hardly raise any opposition to their taking that course.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Should any province desire to increase its contribution I do not think there is any question about the Dominion government agreeing to it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Then what the minister meant was a uniform minimum contribution? May I ask the minister what provinces have intimated that they agree with this legislation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As a matter of fact section 9 of the bill fixes $240 as the maximum. I do not think the question of the provinces contributing a larger amount has been considered. At any rate it is not dealt with in this legislation. At present we are engaged in drafting a bill which we hope will be acceptable to the provinces, and the question as to what should be done in the event of the provinces wanting to increase their contribution may properly be a subject of future discussion.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister did not answer my question; perhaps he did not hear it. I asked how many of the provinces have intimated that they will contribute towards this scheme.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I suggest that we would make better progress if we confined our discussion to the clause under consideration. I do not know whether my hon. friend was present yesterday, but the subject of the correspondence which had taken place with the various provincial governments came up and was fully discussed. If my hon. friend wants information on that subject he will find it in the report of the parliamentary committee. If he has not a copy at hand I will send one over to him.

Mr. BURY: On this section I wish to reiterate the position I took when the resolution on which this bill is founded was under discussion. This section shows quite clearly that it is foolish to try to force this bill through until an attempt has been made to get uniformity of action on the part of the provinces. We are all agreed as to the necessity of an old age pension scheme; any argument on that is merely wasting time. We are all agreed as to the necessity of uniformity of legislation, and any argument on that also is wasting time. It is entirely a question of how best to attain uniformity. I wish again to state my view that you will never get uniformity until you have got the provinces together and found out how far they are prepared to go. The very question of contribution or non-contribution lies at the whole root of the possibility of uniformity. The first thing the government ought to do is to call a conference of provincial representatives and ascertain whether they are willing to come in on the one scheme or the other, on a contributory scheme or on a non-contributory scheme. Let that be settled first. Until we get this expression of uniformity from the provinces we do not know where we are. Yesterday when this matter was being discussed, the Prime Minister said the reason why he wished this bill to go through was, that he might have something to submit to the premiers of the different provinces. Unless you have a concrete set of proposals to submit to the provinces when you call them together, it will be almost impossible to get anywhere. There is no reason in the world why the Prime Minister should not draft his scheme as he conceives it should be, submit a bill—this bill, if you like, as it now stands—to the representatives of the provinces, get them to discuss it, and as soon as they have discussed it come back to parliament and submit to parliament the bill as agreed on by the provinces. I say again that by adopting the present method you are inviting the provinces to make the retort that they should have been consulted in the first instance.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, respecting old age pensions,—Hon. Mr. King (Kootenay)—Mr. Duff in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose shortly before six o'clock, section 5 was under consideration. Shall the section carry?

Mr. STEVENS: The committee had discussed the section at some length, and I gathered that the minister hoped later on to enlighten us further on the question it involved. Is he in a position now to answer some of the questions brought to his attention?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I cannot agree with hon. gentlemen opposite who think that this legislation will be ineffective and will fail to make for uniformity. I believe that uniform legislation throughout Canada will follow the enactment of this bill.

Mr. MARCIL: I have not before spoken on the principle of the bill, having taken it for granted from the very outset that inasmuch as advanced legislation in the matter of old age pensions had been adopted in all of the leading countries in the world a similar measure if introduced in this parliament would meet with general approval. Some question has been raised by certain remarks made by the Premier of Quebec, but I am of the opinion that, when this bill goes through, not only the premier of that province but the legislature and the people of Quebec generally will be prepared to give it full consideration.

Considerable emphasis has been laid on the suggestion that this legislation is likely to be of most value in the cities in assisting the working classes. I dissent from that opinion; I think the provisions of the bill will be most beneficial in the outlying districts. In the province of Quebec we have large institutions in the cities to take care of the aged, while there are no such places in the outlying parts of the country, and it is in these places that this old age pension scheme will be most appreciated. I am satisfied that the bill when it passes will receive the careful consideration as well as the support of the province of Quebec, and for that reason among others I am glad that the government is persisting in putting it through the House.

Mr. ARTHURS: In this matter, as in several others which this government has undertaken, I believe we are beginning wrong. The government should have approached the various provinces and ascertained their views before introducing the legislation we are now considering, for it is manifest that the bill can be of no value unless advantage is taken of it in the provinces. For that reason the opinions of the various premiers should have been consulted. The hon. member (Mr. Marcil) believes that in the province of Quebec legislation of this kind would be most effective in rural communities. In Ontario, I may tell him, we have in a great majority of the counties homes for aged people kept at the expense of the province, and these homes, I fancy, will be more or less affected by this legislation. I think the legislation should have been preceded by a conference of the government with the provinces.

Mr. FISH: The object of this bill is dear to my heart, as it has always been, but the scheme in its details does not approach my ideal of an old age pensions law. In the older parts of Canada the provinces have always provided very well for those who are unable to support themselves. In my own province there is an estimable system of caring for the aged, and for the young as well when these are unable to take care of themselves. We have county homes there. Formerly they were called poor houses and the people who lived in them were known to the public as paupers. Happily the condition suggested by these names no longer exists; we are more enlightened to-day and we have very good institutions which are described by the less disagreeable name of county homes. The inmates are well treated and have a home where everything is provided for them. They are not obliged to work, but they can enjoy themselves at gardening and so forth, and the product of their labour is always at their disposal. While that may not be the intention of this bill, it is not to my mind doing very much better. Twenty dollars a month will not go very far in providing for an aged couple, for I gather that only the husband would be entitled to a pension. I may be wrong, I hope I am, but if only twenty dollars a month is available, how far will that provide the necessaries of decent living for a couple both over seventy years of age? In the institutions in my province with which I am acquainted it costs $5 to $5.50 a week to provide for each inmate, and this does not take into account anything for rent or shelter. That is one fault I have to find with the bill—the pension is insufficient.

A still greater defect in my opinion is that we are seeking to impose on the provinces something without knowing whether or not they are in favour of it. In fact, it seems to me to be an attempt to interfere with provincial rights. Above all else, it is of vital importance to cultivate a spirit of harmony in the relations between the federal government and the various provincial governments. If the bill was based on the mortuary tables and the contributory principle adopted to the extent of a half or a quarter of the amount of the pension, the government providing the balance, then I think we would have a scheme that the people would be proud of, and no one availing himself of its provisions would feel that he was being spoon-fed. The government might establish such a scheme on a fair basis by a vote of one or two hundred thousand dollars, or more if necessary. I would make the terms very lenient to those who might fall behind with their payments so that it would be possible for them to clear off their arrears as opportunity offered. But before we can be assured of any success with this bill we will have to secure the co-operation of the provincial governments. I have no authority officially to say so, but it seems to me—and my impressions, of course are gathered from the daily press—that it is not reasonable to suppose that the government of my province will be prepared to undertake new liabilities at the present time. Our province is just recovering from a splurge of bad government, so bad, indeed, that we are obliged to resort to direct taxation, something we never imagined would ever be necessary. I hope the federal government will hold their hand until such time as they have secured the co-operation of the provincial governments in this proposal.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, it is very gratifying to those who are interested in the welfare of humanity to find such splendid sentiments expressed here in regard to this bill It does seem to me, however, that there is a tendency to say to our less fortunate brothers, be warmed and fed, and yet not give them those things which are needed. In a scheme that has to be worked out by the Dominion in conjunction with the provinces, necessarily some difficulties are involved in making a start. Now, if we held a conference with the provinces we would probably find a great deal of difficulty in getting unanimity of opinion among them, and no start would be made. Here are two parties to the contract, the Dominion on the one hand and a group of provinces on the other. One party or the other has to make a start, and in my judgment the quickest way to secure unanimity of opinion in the matter is to pass this bill.

I do not think any province would fail to pass the necessary implementing legislation if this House clearly put itself on record as being in favour of the principle of the bill, and instead of merely giving utterance to a lot of pious wishes, translated those wishes into something concrete. I repeat, I am firmly convinced that the quickest way to secure action is for parliament to pass this bill.

Now, a good deal has been said somewhat wide of the mark respecting the relative merits of a contributory or a non-contributory scheme. I am heartily in sympathy with any move calculated to encourage thrift among our people, and I should like to see the provisions made for annuities brought more forcibly to their attention; but it seems to me that we will have simply to follow the course that has been followed in other countries. In England the pension scheme began in a non-contributory form. In my judgment it is the only way it can be introduced, and I fully anticipate that if this non-contributory scheme is launched, within a very short time we will find ourselves entering upon a contributory scheme. That is the natural evolution of any pension legislation; I do not see how it can be otherwise. We cannot take care of the immediate necessities by any contributory scheme that can be mentioned, but in course of time that can be built up, and in the meantime we will have a measure such as is now proposed that will be taking care of the immediate requirements of our aged poor. So I do not think we need be alarmed because some person points to England and says: They began in such-and-such a way, and they were compelled to do so-and-so at a later day. It seems to me that that is only what we may expect. Mr. Chairman, I feel thoroughly convinced that if we are to get action at all the only way is for that body which can act as a unit to put its concrete proposal before the provinces.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) is rather inconsistent, for in one breath he says we want something positive, and in the next he says we should put through this bill. There is nothing positive about this bill; on the contrary, it is very uncertain indeed and depends upon receiving the approval of the provincial legislatures. I submit that if there is a responsibility upon this House to do something positive, we should pass a bill to establish old age pensions. If we want to do that, but think the total obligation involved is too much for the country to shoulder at the present time, although it is very prosperous according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, then we might divide it up. We admit our responsibility of $10 a month; we are prepared to give that amount provided the provinces do likewise, but if the provinces do not contribute the old people will not receive anything at all. If we admit our responsibility for $10 a month should we not put through a positive bill and provide for the payment of at least that amount to the aged in any event? I submit that that should be taken into consideration, as well as the further question whether or not this parliament should undertake the whole responsibility of $20 a month.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word about this bill.

Mr. HEAPS: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; are we not considering clause 5 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Should we not confine ourselves to the actual clause under consideration, instead of going all through the bill?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to compel hon. members to speak exactly to the clause; they should keep as close to it as possible. I notice that those who have spoken have always come back to the question of the provinces contributing, so I will not ask the hon. member to stay too closely to the clause under discussion.

Mr. McGIBBON: I had not started when the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) presumed to take the lead of this House. In opening, I would like to put myself on record as being in favour of civilized countries looking after their aged poor, but I want to bring to the attention of the committee one or two points in connection with this matter. We are a young country; we have to-day resources greater than many other countries; we have the largest amount of agricultural land per capita; we have the greatest mines, the greatest forests, the greatest natural resources—and we have a population of about nine million people. Are we prepared at present to put everyone on the pay roll of the country? It seems to me that we are getting the habit in this parliament of going—I was going to say "mad"—in the way of legislation.

An hon. MEMBER: We have not passed any as yet.

Mr. McGIBBON: We have not passed any, but we have a certain clique, of which the hon. member is one, which desires to fasten every responsibility, whether municipal or provincial, on the Dominion treasury. This government should either have enough courage to say, "We are going to have an old age pension scheme, and we will take the responsibility of putting through the legislation and of bearing the financial burden," or else this bill should not have been introduced at all.

What is going to be the result? The government are trying to fasten this responsibility upon the provinces, without having consulted them. Presuming that this bill passes, what will be the result if the provinces do not agree to it? Supposing a province does agree for a few years and then, after getting a number of people on the pension list, sees fit to withdraw from the scheme; where is the responsibility to rest? What is this government going to do? I asked the Prime Minister last night if he was willing to take the responsibility of establishing a scheme of old age pensions, with the Dominion, bearing the financial responsibility, and he said no. Is this a scheme to assist the establishment of old age pensions or is it not? The Prime Minister has not as yet answered that question, a question which should be answered before proceeding with this legislation.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) read last night the answers received from every province, and without a single exception they did not agree to this legislation. I would like to ask the minister what he is going to do if the provinces continue to disagree. What then will be the object of this legislation?

Mr. ARTHURS: To secure the votes of a couple of members.

Mr. McGIBBON: I quite agree; it is a political scheme to get votes in this parliament, and nothing else. I ask the Prime Minister again whether he, as the head of this government, is willing to take the responsibility of introducing an old age pension scheme into this parliament and of bearing the financial responsibility for such a scheme. I ask the question, and pause for a reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has been done already, in this present bill.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Prime Minister says it is done already . I wish he would explain how he is taking the sole responsibility of the financial obligations under this bill. Will he now explain?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. McGIBBON: I asked the Prime Minister a question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have answered the question.

Mr. ARTHURS: At the risk of being tedious I again call the attention of the government to the fact enunciated by the hon. member for Fort William, namely, that none of the provinces have agreed to this legislation. I further call the attention of the Minister of Public Works, under whose direction this bill is introduced, to the fact that in many of the provinces, particularly in Ontario, we already have a scheme for the care of the aged. Apparently no effort has been made by this government to ascertain the opinion of Ontario, or that of any other province which has a similar scheme; or if any such attempt has been made the reply has not been in favour of the principle of this bill. As pointed out by the hon. member for Muskoka, even if a province did accept the principle of this bill for a time but withdrew from it later, the Dominion government would be in a quandary. I think we are perfectly right in stating that our position should be either yes or no. Are we in favour of old age pensions or are we not?

Mr. HEAPS: We are.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. member for North Winnipeg says we are; then we should assume the whole responsibility and the Dominion of Canada should be responsible for the entire financial burden. Why divide it up in this way; why pass a bill of this kind when we know that most of the provinces will not assent to it as it is now before parliament?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We do not know that; the hon. member is guessing.

Mr. ARTHURS: We know it by inference; the provinces have not accepted the principle so far, and the probability is that they will not accept it. Even if it is accepted, there is nothing which would compel them to continue in that acceptance. We are starting at the wrong end, as I said before. Let the government say, "We are prepared to put through a measure of old age pensions," or "We are trying to shove the responsibility on someone else."

Mr. HEENAN: It would be a mistake to shut off debate on this bill, because as the debate goes on members are appreciating more and more the importance of old age pensions, and we see that if in the future we have to introduce a scheme of this kind under which the Dominion government must take full responsibility, we will receive support from those whom we thought, at the beginning of the debate, were against such a measure. At the beginning of this debate I recall that there were some members on the other side of the House who took the position that the country could not stand this expenditure, but now they contend that we are not spending enough, and that we ought to give another twelve million dollars towards old age pensions. So I think the longer we discuss this subject the better we shall get along.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we are really sincere in trying to put an old age pension bill through, instead of arousing antagonism on the part of the provinces by speeches here to the effect that we are attempting to force something on them, if this bill is satisfactory in other respects—as to the amount of pension payable, and the conditions upon which it shall be granted—we ought to get together and pass it and leave it to the provinces either to accept or reject it. The provincial governments are composed of men of sound business ability, men who wish to do the right thing by their province, although I find that even the Premier of Ontario has been trying to make a little political capital in connection with this matter. Not so very long ago he was asked on the floor of the Ontario legislature if he was considering an old age pension scheme for Ontario, and he said yes: that is, Ontario was considering an old age pension scheme for that province. But after there had been a certain amount of debate on this scheme in this House and the Premier of Ontario saw that some members on the Conservative side were opposed to it, he made the statement to the effect that the old age pension for Ontario, if it was to be given in co-operation with the Dominion government according to the terms of this bill, would be too expensive. In other words, he was considering an old age pension plan for Ontario whereby Ontario would have borne the whole cost of an old age pension for that province; yet when the Dominion government proposed to pay fifty per cent of the cost, he said that this scheme would be too expensive.

I noticed in the Free Press the other day a quotation from the Vancouver Province, and the Free Press went on to say that here was the Dominion government introducing a bill that was nothing more than a sop.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: Sometimes I think hon. gentlemen who say, "hear, hear," are really not there, there, or they would not say "hear, hear." The paper went on to say that in Great Britain they had a much better bill. In one breath they said that this scheme before us would cost too much money, and in the next breath that the British scheme cost very much more and was ever so much better. They pointed out that in Australia the pension began at sixty-five years of age, instead of seventy as proposed here, and that Australia paid $26 per month as compared with our $20. So in one breath they said that we were spending too much money, and in the next breath that our scheme would not bear comparison with the schemes of other countries which were paying much more.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that a great many members misunderstand this bill. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said the other evening that the bill assumes that every man reaching the age of seventy was incapacitated for further employment or earning power. The bill does not assume anything of the sort. My friend who sat down a few moments ago asked if we were going to put everybody on the pay roll of the state in this country when they reached the age of seventy. The bill does not assume anything of the sort. It simply provides that anyone who cannot earn $365 a year at the age of seventy will be taken care of to the extent of $240 a year. I agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George that there are a great many men in this country who will be earning much more than that at seventy years of age.

The hon. member for Fort William last night, in his anxiety to make a little political capital out of this question, misquoted me. He said I had stated the other evening that the Conservatives had always been opposed to legislation of this kind. I had never made any such statement. The statement I made was this, that the Conservatives on the platform, especially around election time, had taken the position that they were foremost in all social legislation of this character, and I said that if that was correct I would like them on the floor of the House to act as they talked on the political platform. But in his anxiety to make a little political capital, the hon. member even gave the Conservatives in the Ontario legislature the credit for having introduced the mothers' allowance in Ontario. That legislation was not introduced by the Conservatives. A colleague sitting beside the hon. member corrected him and said that the Conservative party had got the legislation all ready, but that their successors in office put it into effect. I was a member of the Ontario legislature at that time, Mr. Chairman, and I remember well the same argument was made then as has been made in connection with this scheme, that the mothers' allowance was only a sop to the Labour men in order to induce them to support the Farmers in forming a government. In 1919 Sir Wiliam Hearst stated on the platform that if returned to power he would put into operation a mothers' allowance scheme. We were all satisfied with that, but when the Drury government actually put the scheme into effect, it was said that it was only a sop to the Labour men so that they would help the Farmers to form a government, but when they found that the mothers' allowance scheme was taking care of 5,000 mothers and 12,000 children and had become popular, they said it was a good thing, and that if they had been in power they would have put it into operation anyway. Surely, Mr. Chairman, there is some legislation that we can put through our parliaments without partisan strife. I am glad to see that so many Conservatives are supporting this measure, as I knew they would. I would like to see a lot of this political talk cut out.

Mr. ARTHURS: If the Ontario government, justly as the hon. member claims, and as I believe, put into force the mothers' allowance, why should they not take care of their aged in the same way? Or if the Dominion government is disposed to pay fifty per cent towards the cost of this pension for those of our population who are not able to sustain themselves after seventy, why should not the Dominion government also pay fifty per cent towards the cost of the mothers' allowance?

Mr. HEENAN: I am glad my hon. friend has asked that question, because I was coming to that. But let us look at this thing in a practical way, and not have any hypothetical questions or indulge in imaginations regarding it. Let us see how it will work out in practice. The provinces are now responsible for the maintenance of their aged people who are not able to take care of themselves,and how do they look after them? By putting them in houses of refuge or poorhouses, where in many cases an old couple will be separated from each other. Is that the proper way to look after our old people?

Mr. McGIBBON: They do not do it that way.

Mr. HEENAN: There are some people who do not know everything in this world, and I am speaking to one of them now. The Labour men of this country have been to the provincial government as well as to the federal government asking that an old age pension scheme be put into effect, and some of the provinces have said that it would be too great a burden upon them and they could not do it, that it was the Dominion's duty. In other words, we have been passing the buck for a great many years on this question. In former days when the Dominion government or the provincial government were asked to shoulder the responsibility for such legislation none of them wanted to do it.

Mr. ARTHURS: And this government does not want to do it now.

Mr. HEENAN: You do not know; you only think that. Now, the present Dominion government say this to the provinces: We know you have a burden on your shoulders at the present time in caring for these people. In order to bring about an old age pension we are going to lay down certain conditions and if you accept those conditions it will be possible for us to do something. I think the conditions laid down are fair because they have been investigated and recommended by a committee of this House, a committee composed of representatives of all parties. I am quite sure that the members of the provincial legislatures are just as reasonable as the members of this House, and they will be prepared to do what is right. The Labour people have discussed this matter and have made certain recommendations. The present bill, I think, carries out the recommendations of the parliamentary committee, almost to the letter. Very well; the Dominion government said to the provinces: We will provide machinery and we will contribute fifty per cent of the amount needed in order to help you to maintain aged people. As to the amount of pension, if an amendment were moved to increase the amount from $240 to $300 I would be willing to support something along that line, but if this House agrees upon the amount mentioned as reasonable, why not let us get together and put the law into effect? Instead of trying to suggest what the Senate may do with the bill, or to antagonize the provinces or to see who can get the most political prestige out of it, why not let us get together, make the very best arrangements we can, and then say "This is the very best we can give for the present and encourage the provinces to take advantage of it."

Mr. ARTHURS: Why does the hon. member say "this is the best we can give"? In saying that does he speak for the Minister of Labour, or for himself?

Mr. HEENAN: I was speaking of all of us as members of the House, including my hon. friend.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): It was not my intention to take part in this discussion, but the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) tempted me to get on my feet for a few moments. I heartily approve of the principle of this bill, and I think this measure is long overdue. Those of us who have had the opportunity on many occasions to meet old people in our professional work must surely recognize the fact that there are many cases of parents who have given sons and daughters in great number to this country but who, through some misfortune have found themselves in the latter years of their lives dependent upon charity. I am quite sure that my hon. friend (Mr. McGibbon) as well as the other medical men in this House, have met cases of that kind. That being so, why should any medical man oppose a bill which will bring relief and comfort to aged men and women who deserve so well of their country?

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member think for a moment that any man is going to get relief from this bill? I am opposing it because I know they will not.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): My hon. friend made an observation towards the close of his speech to the effect that this legislation was intended for political effect. That is what I take great exception to. I invite hon. gentlemen opposite to join for once the rest of the members of this House in putting through one bill of a humanitarian character. Let us unite in such a good work and if any political advantage is to be gained at all, let us all share in it.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask my hon. friend another question?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Certainly.

Mr. McGIBBON: I ask him as a gentleman, and I know he is one, to be accurate when he quotes me. I made no such statement.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Well, if the hon. gentleman did not mention "the political effect" of this bill, my ears deceived me. Certainly he said a moment ago that he does not think any man will get relief from the bill. I quite agree with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) that if we pass this bill and make a certain amount of money available for the desired purpose there will not be one province in Canada that will not take advantage of it. It will only be a very short time until all the provinces will be availing themselves of this legislation and then the aged people who come under its provisions will be getting some help in their declining years. It is a lamentable thing to see old men and women in receipt of charity. If this bill passes they will not be in receipt of charity; no such stigma will be attached to the enjoyment of the pension granted under this bill. If we pass this measure we shall all have occasion to feel proud of ourselves; for by the enactment of a bill based on such humanitarian principles this parliament will have done something greatly to its credit.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I was just going to call your attention to this fact: We have been waiting for an approach to a consideration of some of the sections of the bill because we have certain suggestions to make. My hon. friend opposite, and particularly the last two speakers, while professing to talk on the principle of the bill, have been introducing some rather sharp criticisms of our position. We certainly have suggestions to make with respect to this bill and we propose to make them; but I submit that the best way for the government to make progress with the measure is to ask their own supporters to keep within the bounds of specific clauses so that whatever discussion takes place may have some point and some effect. I am giving notice to the government now that with respect to some of the clauses we are approaching I have suggestions to make which I hope will be constructive and useful; but if we go on with a general, desultory discussion of this character for two or three hours it will not assist us to rush through all the sections without discussion at all. We may as well approach the real matter of these sections as carry on a discussion of the kind which has taken place for the last three-quarters of an hour. I make these statements as I do not wish to be charged later on in the evening with obstructing the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether the draughting of this bill is very important or not. It may be, but I question whether it is worth a very detailed examination. I do not apprehend that the bill is going to come into effect until we will have had a lot more opportunity to review it. But if it is, I must say that to me it is a masterpiece of draughting. Take this section, for example. The criticism I have to make here is not as serious as I think can be made with respect to some other features of the bill. The main feature of the bill from this point of view is that it is principally an authority to pass an act. It is not an act. If hon. gentlemen will look at section 19—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have not reached that section yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But in order to speak of the draughting I have to mention it. Look at the length of that section and the authority it gives to the Governor in Council as to regulations. The bill is going to be drafted under that section, some time, somewhere, by someone. The whole alphabet, or almost the whole alphabet, was exhausted in the mere enumeration of the sections which the Governor in Council uses for the purposes of draughting the bill, and the matters referred to there are the very sum and substance, the very life and fibre, of the whole thing. Nobody knows what in the world this bill is going to be. I suppose the government knows as little as anybody else, but it is going to be draughted under clause 19, if it is ever draughted at all. Section 5 says:

> Before any agreement made pursuant to this act comes into operation the Governor in Council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province, and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the Governor in Council.

In draughtsmanship, what is a "scheme" and especially a scheme for the administration of an act? I understand the purpose of the draughtsman is to make the provincial act subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. If that is the purpose it should say so, and not say "the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province." Who is going to tell what part of the act is included in this scheme for the administration of pensions? Is the provincial authority to decide, or is it the federal authority? I have an idea what the draughtsman wants to say, but he has not said it. In the next clause the same word comes in. I have never seen before in the phraseology of any statute a "scheme" to provide for the organization. It seems to me to be far simpler and better to say the provincial act shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Hon. members have said—and I was almost moved to tears by the eloquence of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) on this subject—that the great object of this movement is to relieve the aged and the distressed, to remove them from the shadow of the poorhouse, and to take care of them in their old age in a manner consistent with their dignity and in a way which comports with what old age really demands. I cannot see how anybody is going to come out of the poorhouse under this bill, if it ever goes into effect. Who can come out of the poorhouse on $240 a year? If I were arguing that we ought to set to work to get everybody out of the poorhouse, I would say we should have a bill that would do it. This bill will not do it. I am not arguing however, for that purpose; I am simply saying that those who think this is a plan to bring that about have only to read the clauses of the bill. If one looks ahead he will see that the Governor in Council is going to be able, under the regulations, to provide that the provinces pay their share to the workhouse. That is how they will do it. How else can they do it when they only pay half? There is no other way. All we are going to achieve by this bill is to help the provinces keep up the poorhouses, assuming the provinces come into the scheme. Is that an unfair statement of the result?

Mr. HEAPS: Is that the position in the other countries where old age pensions are in effect?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know. This is a federation, the other countries are not a federation.

Mr. HEAPS: Australia was somewhat in the same category.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; and anyway if we provided a larger amount—although I am not arguing for it—there would be some hope of taking the old people out of the poorhouse and putting them in their homes. But when we confine it to this proposition it is pure hypocrisy on our part to throw out the signal to the aged people of Canada that the shadow of the poorhouse is no more about them and that we are going to keep them comfortably in their homes. Can the hon. member for North Winnipeg suggest any way on earth by which an old person can live on $240 a year?

Miss MACPHAIL: If there are two old people will they not receive $40 a month? One old person would not care to live alone, and if they lived together, one perhaps as a paying guest, I think they could be taken care of on this amount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it was a case of man and wife they might, but I doubt if it would be possible even then; they would require to have their health and be able to look after themselves. But there is the difficulty with old age; old people cannot look after themselves, consequently it is the home that looks after them. If they have their health and are able to look after themselves, a man and his wife might live on $480 a year, but I do not know. From what I have seen of efforts to do it I would rather see them living in a comfortable home such as they have in Portage la Prairie.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Would my right hon. friend refuse to give them anything at all because he could not give them everything they want?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, that is not the point I am making at all. There may be places where the provinces and municipalities—and those are terms we can use synonymously here, for one is under the other—might be able to take care of them in some way and keep them comfortably. If there are, I do not know where to find them. I am not denying that there may be some, but I know it would not be in Manitoba. I know something about the home there. I do not say there is not something, of course, in the nature of humiliation in going to what we call a home, but it is not a penal institution. There are hundreds of men in these places, and no person could live more comfortably than they do there, though they might live more luxuriously; but the home is open to all. I venture to say that of all the occupants of that home there are very few who are man and wife. There might be some, but I never ran across such a case; they are nearly all old single people, old brothers, or something of that sort. You cannot for the sum of $240 maintain these people elsewhere with anything like the comfort by which they are surrounded there. It may be wise for us to come to the relief of the provinces—although I do not know that we have been asked to do so—in order to elevate the standard of these places. I do not think very many members of the House would feel reluctant about endorsing such a proposition. There may be places where the standard is not as high as that with which I am acquainted in Manitoba; it is probably lower in other places. I would like to see the standard raised everywhere, and I think the provinces can well afford it. But when we are talking in this committee about getting rid of the poorhouses, as we would like to get rid of the gaols, we are only raising a hope soon to be shattered, because we cannot do it by means of this measure.

The hon. member for Lisgar says we must go through the same process as others have done who were in the field earlier than we were. There have been other countries in the field earlier than we, but hon. gentlemen must remember that great industrial countries necessarily reach this stage sooner than a country like Canada or the United States. If they learn by experience, by what process of reasoning does it follow we must commit all their errors to get the same experience? I would like to hear the argument behind that contention. It is said that you have got to start without contribution. Why? Must we start without contribution because we cannot make those over seventy years of age contribute? Is that any reason why those under seventy need not do so? None whatever. In a word, if we are ever to start the contributory principle it is never going to be as easy to do it as it is now—certainly it never will be easier. Any difficulties in our way now will certainly be in our way when we think of commencing again. It is true you cannot start with those who are called pensioners under this act, but you can make a start with prospective pensioners, and give everybody the right to come in and earn; and you may have the system graded according to age. There would be no difficulty whatever, in carrying out such a proposal. These are simply suggestions I offer touching the details of the measure. My opinion on the measure in general was offered to the House last night for whatever it was worth.

Mr. HEAPS: I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Stevens) that we confine ourselves to the section under discussion; we are now considering section 5, which has nothing to do with a contributory scheme. That will come under another section and in my opinion consideration of it might very well be deferred.

Mr. FOSTER: Section 5 provides that before any agreement made pursuant to this legislation becomes operative the Governor General shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province. The first three words of this paragraph presuppose an agreement with a province or with provinces of the Dominion. Now, it is possible that some ideas which may occur to one in connection with this section might more properly have been stated when the resolution on which this bill was founded was under consideration, but I venture to think that the word "agreement" here will warrant the views I have to offer. At the present moment I can see no possibility of Nova Scotia entering into an agreement with the Dominion government on a fifty-fifty basis of contribution to a scheme of this kind. Even taking the sum mentioned of $240 a year and assuming the aggregate contribution to be evenly distributed over the provinces, it would call for practically one million dollars to meet the pensions required in Nova Scotia. So that if that province were forced to raise its share of $500,000 towards the provincial contribution it would mean that my own constituency, as one of the fourteen which would be taxed in the province, would have to provide something like $35,000 in addition to what we are already paying to take care of the poor people of Nova Scotia.

I want to assure the committee that the poor of the province are being reasonably well taken care of at present. If Nova Scotia does not participate in this scheme, and if only one province in the Dominion takes advantage of the act, then we in Nova Scotia must still pay our proportionate share to provide for the poor in that one province that does come in. That certainly seems an unfair proposition, to me at any rate. The deduction from this would appear to me to be that this government should assume the entire responsibility for a pension scheme. The government ought to be willing to go far enough to make it a national undertaking, relieving the provinces and the municipalities of the work which they are at present doing, and substituting therefor a better performance on the part of the national administration of Canada. Someone may ask me why I make that suggestion. Well, the suggestion may be justified on the ground that, according to the information which has been given us, this country is at present in a prosperous condition. If it is in a prosperous condition, and if we have been able to raise twenty-five or thirty million dollars more in the way of taxation than we were able to secure the year before, then on that hypothesis alone the government, it seems to me, ought to assume full responsibility in this matter.

The people of Nova Scotia are to-day fairly well taking care of their poor, particularly in my own constituency; and I rather fancy that the major good of this bill, if it passes and if some of the provinces adopt similar legislation, will be to provide for certain poor people in industrial centres where the indigent at present are not being cared for as well as they ought to be. With the desire to take care of these people I am in perfect accord. But unless the whole country is to bear the responsibility, unless the scheme is to be made Dominion-wide and a national undertaking, I certainly do not feel that we are justified in proceeding with it on the basis of one province or more being obliged to contribute whether or not they benefit. I think I am expressing in this the views held generally by the people of my constituency.

During the last five or six years we have had to shoulder in one part of my constituency $55,000 of extra taxation as a result of maladministration in that county alone, and in Nova Scotia generally we have exhausted practically all our sources of revenue. The outgoing government left the province in debt to the extent of $1,800,000 odd and the incoming administration, despite all its economies, is still unable to balance its budget. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that the municipalities themselves are bearing a heavy burden already, I do not feel like supporting another measure which will require them to contribute thirty-five or forty thousand dollars to such a scheme as this. I may have something later on to say with regard to changes which it may be desirable to make in some of the other clauses of the bill, but in what I have just stated in a general way I believe I am but representing the views held by the people of my constituency.

Mr. BARBER: There is probably one point on which we all agree, and that is that something is necessary in the way of old age pension legislation. Section 5, now under discussion, is of importance. It practically declares that this shall be a non-contributory scheme, and this is the one thing upon which there will no doubt be disagreement between the provinces. For this reason, I think, it would have been wise for the government to have consulted the representatives of the several provinces before draughting and introducing this legislation. It is questionable whether this is the wisest form of legislation for a young and growing country like Canada. Is it advisable, in a young country such as this, to create by means of an act of this kind the impression that individual provision for old age is unnecessary because the government will provide it? The principle, I think, is wrong; and this is the argument which I believe some of the provinces will put forward. In my opinion it would be better to seek a method of inducing people to provide from their earnings for protection of old age. In this regard I believe clause 5 will fall down. Had the provinces been called together in conference some system might have been adopted that would work satisfactorily; and in any case such a conference should have been called. Personally I am inclined to favour the scheme suggested by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) the other evening, that of adopting a scheme of old age pensions, and such a scheme instead of being separate might be made a part of the existing annuities system. Under this system a man can very easily set aside during the earning period of his life sufficient funds by small payments which at the age of seventy will provide for him an annuity equal to or much better than the pension proposed in this legislation. I think our Annuities Act should be studied by every member of the House. I must admit that until the hon. member for West Calgary drew it to my attention I was quite ignorant of all the benefits to be derived from its operation. I believe that probably seventy-five per cent of our people are not aware of the provisions of that act. If that system of annuities was better known I think it would be taken advantage of to a far greater extent, and in that way would help to relieve the very situation we are trying to provide for under this measure.

Now, at the present time we know that from all over the Dominion there is a call from many aged people for immediate relief, and I am of opinion that the source of that relief should be the federal government by working out a scheme of old age pensions in connection with out annuity system.

Let me point out wherein I think this proposed legislation falls down. I do not wish it to be understood that I am opposing the principle of old age pensions. I should like to get together with the other members and work out some scheme that would be in the interests of those people who require relief and at the same time keep in mind the interests of the country generally. Each of the provinces is expected to co-operate in carrying out this legislation, and after it is enacted the right hon. Prime Minister has stated that it will be submitted to the provinces in order that they may take it under consideration. If any province decides to pass the necessary complementary legislation naturally some delay will follow before the legislature takes action. So my first objection is that this scheme will bring no relief for at least two years. From what I know of public opinion in the several provinces respecting this proposal—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the whole of this principle was settled last night. Do we have to reply to the arguments that are being advanced to-night at such length and which have been reiterated again and again and again? In short, Sir, I rise to a point of order. Are we not on clause 5?

Mr. BARBER: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to clause 5 to show that I am perfectly in order.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any hon. member desire to speak to the point of order? I do not want to make a ruling at this stage, but I think the committee will agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that many hon. gentlemen are straying too far from the clause under discussion. I did not interrupt the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) because he is a new member. I must ask him from now on to keep within the four corners of clause 5.

Mr. BARBER: Clause 5, Mr. Chairman, provides:

> Before any agreement made pursuant to this act comes into operation the governor in council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province,—

I am referring to that part of the clause now. This is essentially a two-scheme proposal, and that is what is going to cause trouble, because I know some of the provinces are in favour of a contributory system. The clause continues:

> —and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the governor in council.

I do not think all the provinces will accept this proposal because they will not all agree to a non-contributory system. Therefore, as the scheme will not be general throughout the Dominion, it will be unfair to the taxpayers of those provinces not participating in it because they will be contributing towards pensions in the provinces that decide to co-operate with the federal authorities.

I came to this House, Mr. Chairman, with the full intention of supporting legislation in the nature of old age pensions, no matter where it originated, whether with one of the smaller groups or with the government. If this measure has been introduced at the demand of one of the smaller groups, I must compliment them on the influence they exert over the government, but I cannot compliment them on the scheme brought down, I feel I cannot go back to my people and say: I supported the enactment of a measure to provide old age pensions, and the whole thing is settled satisfactorily. The first question some of the old people who are looking for such relief would put to me would be: When are we going to get those pensions? I cannot tell them, and there is no man in this House can tell them when they are going to get relief under this bill.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Application of act in N.W.T.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, before we go to that section, although it does not make much difference which clause it is on, I should like to have some explanation of the phrase "scheme of administration." Who is going to tell what clauses of the provincial act are to be immutable because they are part of the scheme of administration, and what other clauses the provincial legislature can change if desired because they are not part of the scheme of administration? Which authority decides between the two classes of clauses?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my right hon. friend will see that a provincial government might pass an act that would leave entirely in the hands of the lieutenant governor in council the scheme to be worked out under regulations. The act would coincide with this act in the amount of payment and the period, but as to the scheme, that might not be in the provincial legislation at all; it might be left entirely with the lieutenant governor in council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the same thing.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, and their scheme must be approved by the governor in council. Surely that is simple and proper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not matter a fig whether the whole is passed by the legislature or whether the governor in council has authority to pass the balance by regulation; that does not affect my question in the least. My suggestion was, first of all, that instead of saying "the scheme of administration", they should say that the provincial act should be subject to approval. The draughtsman has chosen to say the scheme of administration shall be approved. Now, the scheme of administration will be either the whole provincial act, including the regulations passed under it, or only part. Who is going to say which of these clauses, whether of regulations or of the original act, are part of the scheme of administration which the provinces will not thereafter have the right to alter, and which are the clauses forming no part of the scheme of administration, which the provinces will have the right to alter? Who is the authority to decide? No one has that authority; consequently the phrase is loose, and is not a proper phrase at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the word "plan" suit my hon. friend better?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, that would not be better. Just say "provincial statute."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The provincial statute might not contain it at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has to contain it, either the act or the regulations.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would like to call attention to what seems to me the clear intention of the clause. Here is a statement contained in this act of what the Dominion is willing to do with each of the provinces; the provinces can avail themselves of that plan, and the proportion in which the Dominion will contribute is stated. It is left to the province to formulate its legislation, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has suggested, by giving to the lieutenant governor in council power to make an agreement which will be satisfactory, and the result of clause 6 is to enable—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Clause 5.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are dealing with clause 6 now, and it says clearly:

> As soon as agreements under this act have been made with two of the provinces adjoining the Northwest Territories, the Commissioner of the said territories may submit to the Governor in Council for approval a scheme for the administration and payment of pensions—

Here is a scheme by which we are willing to pay a certain amount; the commissioner of the Northwest Territories submits this scheme to the Governor in Council, and they arrive at an agreement. There is nothing hard and fast about it; it must give to the Governor in Council the power to make an agreement satisfactory to the Dominion. This is exactly the scheme worked out in nearly every case where one power is assisting some other power by way of contribution. We in Ontario are familiar with the assistance given in the building of highways. The province says to the county, "In the case of county roads we will pay you so much if they are built according to a plan or scheme approved by the engineer of the public works department." This is following exactly the same principle. There is a certain amount of elasticity in it; it enables a scheme satisfactory to the territories to be put into an agreement with the Governor in Council, before aid is given. If they cannot agree upon a scheme it does not take effect, but as soon as the scheme is agreed on between the two parties it goes into operation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister had kept his mind on the preceding clause he would have seen my point more clearly. I know that in the Highways Act the specifications for the highway must be approved by the federal government before the grant applies. There is no difficulty in telling what the specifications are; the specifications are made out each time with respect to each highway. There is no difficulty in telling where the specifications begin and where they end. But this is entirely different; this is a scheme of administration. A province passes an act; there are clauses numbering from one to thirty, then a clause saying that the Lieutenant Governor in Council may make regulations governing it, and the Lieutenant Governor in Council is authorized to make an agreement with the federal government. Then those regulations are made pursuant to that act and the whole becomes a statute. Within that there must somewhere be a scheme of administration, I suppose. It may be partly or entirely in the regulations, or it may be partly or entirely in the old act. Who is the authority to say which part of the complete act, regulations and sections, is the scheme of administration, and which part is not? That is very important.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Both parties must agree to it, and so long as they agree that is the scheme.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not say they must agree upon it at all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The agreement is the basis.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read clause 5:

Before any agreement made pursuant to this act comes into operation the Governor in Council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions—

When the Governor in Council approves the scheme for the administration of pensions, that scheme must be a portion of the original act passed by the province. That is its only place. This statute says that the province cannot change that act so far as it relates to the scheme of administration. Who is to say which portions of the act comprise the scheme of administration, and which do not? The province says, "We will alter this section, because it is not part of the scheme of administration", but the Dominion says, "No, you cannot alter it; we regard that section as part of the scheme of administration". Who is to decide? Why not put it, "the whole statute"?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The statute may be so rigid that it will not enable the local authority to come to an agreement with the federal authority. The agreement is the basis of it all. The scheme is proposed in the provincial legislature and it must be satisfactory to the federal representative before they can be compelled to pay any money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The scheme is in the provincial legislature?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will there be certain clauses entitled "scheme of administration"?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will be between the act and the regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will consider the manner in which pensions are dealt with by the federal government he will see what is intended by that clause. This government pays pensions in some cases to the civil servants, in some cases to ex-members of the militia, and there are the pensions of the men who served overseas. These pensions are administered in different ways. The pensions paid to the men who served overseas are administered by a board will full powers of its own without control by any department of the government. The pensions to ex-members of the militia are paid by the Department of National Defence, while the Department of Finance, I understand, has to do with the pensions of ex-civil servants. My hon. friend will recall that some provinces have departments of labour, while others have not. Provinces having departments of labour might have the pension scheme under that department, either administered by the head of the department or by a board appointed for that purpose. Other provinces would probably have the scheme under the provincial secretary, who has to do with the administration of charitable and eleemosynary institutions. It would be for each province to decide the particular scheme which would best suit its purposes. The only object is that the scheme adopted by any province should be submitted to the federal government for approval before contributions are made by the federal government. I think that is the reason the word "scheme" is used, and if it is understood in that sense it removes any difficulty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quite agree there has to be a scheme, and more than that, there has to be a whole method of administration; that is very clear. But what I want to get at is, who is going to decide what section of a provincial government statute, or of a regulation made under it, goes to administration and what does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The province itself will indicate that, and submit it to the federal government for approval.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is to say, the province will in some way say: Here is this clause—clause 2, clause 6, clause 10, and so on—which is part of the scheme of administration, and this clause we shall never change.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The province says: Here is our scheme in its essential features. Then if they should wish to change any of those features they ought to bring them to the attention of the federal government, because they might change a very material clause, a change which had it been suggested originally would not have been acceptable to the federal government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All I can say is I think it would be a whole lot better if you would say the act. It is not only the administration that has to be made satisfactory; it is the very purpose for which the pension is paid; it is the method of payment, and all the rest of it. It is not a matter of administration; it is a matter of the very principle of the act itself. The whole thing has to be agreed to by the federal government, and I do not see why that phrase should be used. I suggest that for clarity, for effect, and everything else, the provincial statute should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the life of me, outside the point I have raised, I do not know what clause 6 is going to lead to. It says:

As soon as agreements under this act have been made with two of the provinces adjoining the North-west Territories, the commissioner of the said territories may submit to the Governor in Council for approval a scheme for the administration and payment of pensions therein, and upon the approval of such scheme, the same shall stand, in all respects other than its duration, in the same position as an agreement with a province.

One would think the method of paying the pension was the only thing there would ever be any trouble about. In the territories, who is going to raise the money to pay the territories' share of the pension?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In the Territories the government would have to supplement the fifty per cent which is to be paid by the provinces by another fifty per cent, and make that payable through the commissioner, under a plan which he submits, and which is accepted by the government. In regard to duration, any province can if they wish come out from under the jurisdiction of the act by giving notice. Here, in the matter of duration, it is entirely within the control of the Dominion government as to whether this scheme shall contiue or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then we have got this far, that the Dominion pays the whole pension in the territories; none of it falls upon the local people at all. Is that going to be the case in the Yukon too?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then as a matter of draughtsmanship I just call attention to this: What the clause says is that the scheme—that is to say, some plan that is to be devised by the Governor in Council—shall stand. Surely it ought to go further and say that it shall be given effect to by payments. I do not think there is anything in this bill to authorize payment of a dollar in the territories. It says the scheme shall stand; it will not do much good by standing. I know what the intention is, of course—

Mr. ELLIOTT: Shall stand in the same position as an agreement with a province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it stands in that position, but the bill should say that the Governor in Council or somebody may pay out money according to that plan. I call attention also, although I do not suppose it amounts to much, to the fact that the Territories are not included in the original definition.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—When payments to provinces to be made.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the form of this clause:

All sums payable to any province in pursuance of any agreement made under this act shall be payable from time to time—

Now I call attention to what follows:

—on the certificate of the Treasury board out of any monies belonging to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada not otherwise appropriated, and the Governor in Council may borrow from time to time such sums as may be required for the purpose of making such payments.

There are two important objections, I think, to this clause. In the first place, the sums required are to be paid on the certificate of the treasury board out of any moneys belonging to the consolidated revenue fund, instead of out of moneys appropriated by parliament for that purpose, which is the usual method of handling expenditures of this kind. In the second place, I personally object to this provision that the Governor in Council may from time to time borrow such sums as may be required for the purpose of making such payments. The Governor in Council has the right to borrow, under its general powers, for the needs of the country. My submission is that this clause should be amended to make the payments subject to appropriations granted by parliament from year to year. That would enable parliament to keep at least some control over the situation, and that is the proper method. In the second place, I submit that there should be deleted from this clause the special borrowing powers conferred upon the Governor in Council. The government should not have any rights specifically granted under this act to borrow, but let them come to parliament in the usual way for an appropriation for these payments. I am not saying this with any criticism of the government as such, but I do not think it is desirable to change the general method of handling the financial obligations of the country in this bill, as distinct from any other obligations of the government, and I submit to the minister that this change should be made.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This section was placed in the bill at the request of the Finance department. As will be readily understood, it would be very difficult to estimate the amount that would be required and place an appropriation in the estimates. My hon. friend said this afternoon that no money at all would be required, because the act would not be workable.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not want the minister to get captious in his remarks. I am trying to offer constructive criticism, and I am not meeting him in a captious spirit at all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Quite right. In regard to borrowing money from time to time, this I think is the usual provision in statutes of this character. We have many statutes that permit of payments being made under the statute instead of in the ordinary way out of appropriations voted by the House.

Mr. STEVENS: That reply of the minister certainly does not satisfy me; in fact, I do not think it is a reply at all. Will the minister tell me what objection there is to submitting an appropriation to parliament?

Sir EUGENE FISET: What does my hon. friend suggest? If a vote were to be put in the estimates before it is known which provinces are going to agree to the scheme, you would have to put in an estimate for the total amount, $12,000,000. On the other hand if you have a Governor General's warrant as provided for in the section you can lay a statement on the table of the House every year; you know exactly what has been provided for. And if the scheme is adopted by one province at a time, parliament will know every year what amount has been spent under these warrants. In the absence of that, pending the approval of each province, you would have to provide for an estimated amount of $12,000,000 yearly. I see no difficulty in the provision.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend was long enough practically the head of a department to know that what he is saying now has not been in accordance with the practice.

Sir EUGENE FISET: We have to provide for an exceptional case, that is what I had in mind.

Mr. STEVENS: Every session estimates are brought before parliament of what may be required when the total payment may be ten times as much as the estimate. The government uses its wisdom and brings down what it estimates will be required; it may not be all required. Now then let me go a step further. My hon. friend says it is better to provide that the payments shall be met by a Governor General's warrant. But Governor General's warrants are open to the government any time they exceed the estimate. That is within their right.

Sir EUGENE FISET: But what estimates would you provide?

Mr. STEVENS: Bring in an estimate to parliament that a certain sum will be required next year. You may estimate any expenditure of say a million dollars, or two million dollars, or five million dollars, as the case may be—whatever the government is able to estimate, using the word in its broad sense, is required. Then if there is need to use a Governor General's warrant it is quite within the power of the government to issue one without the reference in the statute. But to say in the statute that the money shall be provided by Governor General's warrant, or whatever is the equivalent of it, is, I submit, contrary to the usual practice followed in this parliament.

Sir EUGENE FISET: But after all it is a specific payment. You know the sum which is paid to the individual, you know exactly what you are doing. I do not see what harm there is in doing that.

Mr. STEVENS: I will tell my hon. friend what harm there is. The voting of estimates is the one way by which the people's representatives have a hold or control of a government—and please dismiss from your mind that I have any special reference to this government. I am not now attacking this particular government. Any government submits estimates or appropriations to parliament and then we can, although not necessarily, criticize the amount or say to the government "Now then, what is being paid? How is your scheme working out?" My right hon. leader has just pointed out how the government are given power to provide for certain schemes. Well, when your appropriation is before parliament some hon. member may not be satisfied as to the way the government's scheme is working out. He or I or anyone else can then say to the government, "We want an accounting of this thing; we want an explanation of the scheme that has been adopted in British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Ontario," or anywhere else. And here on the floor of parliament we are able to review and discuss the action of the government. That is the reason I submit to the committee that in respect to this proposal an estimate, or an appropriation should be submitted to parliament in the usual way under the Appropriation Act.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I say what occurs to me with respect to the absolute necessity of having this provision as it is worded? My hon. friend's proposition, I think, would be correct if this were an ordinary grant. But in this case the money is to be paid under an agreement. Once the agreement is entered into between the province and the Dominion, the latter has no option about paying it; it is going to pay the money it agrees to pay. For that reason the draughtsman of this bill has made, I think very wisely, the provision we find here:

—the Governor in Council may borrow from time to time such sums as may be required for the purpose of making such payments.

For the reasons I have given I think that is the proper way to work the matter out.

Mr. STEVENS: Whether the minister leaves in or takes out the words "the Governor in Council may borrow" does not make any difference, because the government have that power now. I make very little reference to that. If the government have not enough money out of the appropriation they borrow. Whether it is for this or any other purpose, they have the power to act under a general statute. What I am complaining of is the principle that has been departed from of bringing before parliament an appropriation or estimate so that we may review year by year the progress made under this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must say I agree very largely with what my hon. friend has been saying. Personally I should like to see something added to the bill which would help to ensure the object that he has in view. Section 17 reads as follows:

On or before the thirtieth day of April in each year the Minister of Finance shall make a full report to parliament of the operation of the agreements made pursuant of this act and of the moneys of Canada paid to the provinces under each of the several agreements entered into pursuant hereto.

By presenting that report parliament will have a knowledge of what agreements have been made and what amounts shall be required for subsequent years. I think that wherever an agreement is made, it would be wise that the minister should be required to ask parliament for the grant of money that may be necessary year by year for the purpose; but until some agreement is arrived at I think it would be premature to ask the House to appropriate a sum which cannot possibly be estimated in advance. Take for example this year: were we to seek to make provision by an estimate we would be utterly at a loss. Between now and the next fiscal year it would be quite impossible to say what amount will be required; but once a province has come to us and asked us to make an agreement, and an agreement has been entered into then, I think, thereafter there ought to be some obligation on the government of the day to see that parliament has an opportunity of considering the necessary appropriations and unless there be good and sufficient reason to the contrary of voting them annually. I do not like the House to get away from the annual vote if that can be prevented.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me just suggest a change in the wording and then place my further argument. I would suggest a substitution—I am not moving this, Mr. Chairman, I am merely suggesting it—to this effect:

All sums payable to any province in pursuance of any agreement made under this act shall be paid out of moneys appropriated from time to time by parliament for that purpose.

That is following almost precisely the wording of a bill we passed this afternoon in regard to another matter. Now, there is no possibility of any demand being made this year. The legislatures of the provinces will not meet until next winter, or next fall, so that no act can be passed by them until just about the same time as this parliament will be again assembled in its next session. No province, therefore, need be worried about this year. But between now and next year the government, we will say, enters into some agreement with a province. Then it can come before parliament next year with an estimate. In the interim should a contingency arise where money is required, the power having already been given, the government can issue a Governor General's warrant for the necessary amount. I would not expect there would be any need whatever to do that between now and next session, but it is the principle that I am contending for. I know the same principle is quite dear to the heart of the Prime Minister, and I submit the point with good faith to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It might be well if this section were permitted to stand, to permit of a conference with respect to it with my hon. friends opposite. There are one or two points that probably have escaped my own notice in regard to the wisdom, from the point of view of the co-operation of the provinces in the matter, of not leaving any uncertainty with regard to what the federal government or this parliament will do as to voting sums from year to year. I think my hon. friend would wish that there should be no doubt in that regard.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed that that was the main reason why the section was draughted as it stands.

Mr. STEVENS: We yearly vote sums, what we call statutory amounts. I think the heading in the estimates is "Called for by statute."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, you can do that in some cases where the amount the federal government is expected to give is approximately known, but such is not likely to be the case with the old age pension scheme. For example, in the case of technical education, agricultural instruction, highways, and other schemes where the federal government has contributed, that is the way the money has been voted, but the government has had knowledge in advance of what in all probability was likely to be required. Until the several provinces come in under this act it is impossible to say what those amounts will likely be. But I would say, having regard to the point I have just mentioned as to the reason which actuated the draughtsman of the measure in this regard, that it is better to let that section stand for the present, with the hope of ultimately meeting the object hon. members on both sides have in view.

Section stands.

On section 8—What persons are pensionable.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The important feature of this clause is in regard to the age of the pensioners. In this connection I have received a letter from one of my lady constituents, and as the ladies are taking a good deal of interest in what is going on in this House, I am going to ask the privilege of quoting from it; I will not read the whole letter.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Leave out the personal part.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The letter reads:

> The terms of proposed old age pension are too hard. The age of pensioners should be sixty-five. Who that needs it can get work after sixty-five? And $20 is a very skimpy amount to live on in Canada, much less than the government could keep old folks in homes with a paid staff to attend them. As twenty years have passed since Ottawa named her first commission, it is to be hoped the members will have pluck enough to bring it to materialisation in 1926. Think of all the money wasted on commissions during said twenty years on friends of governments in lieu of the poor. To know that New Zealand has been paying old age pensions for nearly thirty years while Canada who can afford millions for graft is still talking about it, is, surely a disgrace to all politicians past and present. Before Premier King took his seat I wrote him asking to bring matter forward. Like his predecessors he would but forget the poor once he was in the saddle. During past sixteen years I have written about 250 letters on subject. Well, do your best during present session for the aged. It is comforting to know you are one of the very few who does some strenuous work at Ottawa.

There is something in the point that the age of seventy is perhaps unreasonable. If we are going to do anything, why not make it applicable, as suggested by this lady, at the age of sixty-five?

There is another matter which I think should be covered in this section. Something should be done in regard to returned men. It may be said, of course, that the returned men are taken care of by the soldiers' pension scheme, but we all know there are cases where men who served their country overseas are not receiving pensions—although they are more or less nothing better than human wrecks—because they cannot prove that their disability is due to their service overseas. There are men who served overseas who become aged before their time; they become old men at an earlier age than those who have not served overseas might be expected to do. In this connection I have a resolution which was passed by the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada at Victoria, British Columbia, and I wish to take this opportunity of placing it on Hansard. It reads as follows:

> Resolution passed by the Victoria command of the G.W.V.A., duly convened in general meeting; on this 18th day of March 1926.
> That whereas the federal government is now considering an old age pensions bill;
> And whereas it is common knowledge that many men who served in the late war have, by reason of hardships endured, become prematurely aged;
> And whereas the Ralston royal commission in its report recommended that some special provision should be made for such men;
> Be it therefore resolved that in the opinion of this branch of the Great War Veterans' Association provision be made in the Old Age Pension Act that the age limit for veterans be "fifty-five" years of age, instead of seventy years of age, further, that men who served their country during the war be considered as eligible regardless of time of residence in Canada prior to the war and that the act be also applicable to men receiving small pensions, without any interference with such service pension;

This Association moreover is of the opinion that if these provisions are embodied in the act will they go a long way towards solving many of the difficulties already considered by the Ralston report and other special Parliamentary committees and for the solution of which it has been advocated that the government should establish soldiers' homes.

Then I have another resolution from The Canadian Legion, Victoria Post, No. 1, which reads:

I have the honour, by direction, to forward to you the following resolution, passed at a general meeting of members of this association on Wednesday, March 17th.

"Whereas it has been published in the press throughout Canada, that an old age pension bill has been presented to parliament.

And whereas it is common knowledge that many ex-service men, on account of war service, have become prematurely aged.

Be it resolved that provision be made in the proposed old age pension scheme that certain preferences be extended to all ex-service men as follows:

(a) Preference as to age. Recommend that the age limit be 55.

(b) Preference as to length of residence in Canada. Recommend that all men who served their country in the late or other wars be considered eligible regardless of length of residence.

(c) Recommend that the act expressly state that no reduction be made in the old age pension for war disability pension."

It is felt that if the above recommendations are made effective it will go a long way towards the solution of many difficulties recognized by special parliamentary committees and the royal commission on pensions and re-establishment, for the solution of which recommendations have been made for the establishment of soldiers' homes in Canada.

There are matters referred to in these resolutions which should receive the consideration of this House. There are cases in which special treatment should be accorded the returned man, and that principle has been recognized by this parliament time and time again when preference has been given him, as for instance in the civil service. It may be that these resolutions go too far, although for my own part I do not say that. I certainly think that some concession should be granted returned men, at least in necessitous cases.

Mr. STEVENS: According to paragraph (d) provision is to be made for the payment of a pension to anyone who at the date of the proposed commencement of the pension——has resided in the province in which the application for pension is made for the five years immediately preceding the said date.

What useful purpose will this paragraph serve? Some province, in its wisdom, might consider it desirable to fix the period at ten years. The draughtsman admits the principle of a set time, the bill providing a period of residence in Canada for twenty years. That period is satisfactory to the federal government so far as residence in the Dominion is concerned, but why should not the province have the right to determine the period of residence within its own limits? The province, in order to protect its own revenues, might want to fix a period of ten, fifteen or twenty years even; but if it decided upon, say, ten years, its legislation would not conform to this bill. I do not see what purpose is served by including among the provisions of section 8 any reference at all to residence within the province. Why not leave that altogether to the province?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are later clauses relating to the migration of pensioners from one province to another.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely the province should have the right to determine what length of residence within its own limits shall be necessary to entitle a pensioner to the benefits of this scheme. I am as anxious as anyone else to have an old age pension scheme of some kind provided, but we must realize that we in this House cannot impose our will upon the provinces. We should therefore omit from the bill all such verbiage, if I may use the term without offence, as is not absolutely necessary to protect federal interests, giving to the province as great latitude as possible to determine its own conditions.

Mr. BROWN: Does the hon. member recognize the necessity for a uniform period in all the provinces?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not know that uniformity is absolutely essential. We are fixing in this paragraph a period of five years as the length of residence in the province necessary to entitle the pensioner to come under the scheme. That is a comparatively short time in a matter of this kind. If one, two or three provinces come into the scheme, there will naturally follow a gravitation of persons approaching old age to such provinces, where they will take up residence with a view to obtaining pensions after five years.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the hon. member read section 10?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not read it in conjunction with this one.

Mr. HEAPS: Section 10 covers the point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Sections 10 and 13 relate to transfer of residence and they cover the point which the hon. member is making.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not see any necessity for paragraph d). We are providing in paragraph (c) that before anyone may obtain a pension he shall have resided in Canada for the twenty years preceding the date at which the pension begins. Very well; that protects the interests of the Dominion. But why should we invade the provincial sphere and decide for the provinces the period of residence that shall be necessary? Why not leave that to the provinces themselves?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does not this provision refer to the administration of the act? When a pension is granted to anyone who has been only five years in the province, the other provinces in which he has lived are asked to contribute their share.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the provision in this paragraph.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You will find it in later paragraphs.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not see why (d) should fix a period of five years rather than ten or fifteen. The paragraph is not necessary.

Mr. HEAPS: Unless a man has been five years in the province he cannot file his application for a pension.

Mr. STEVENS: I say that the clause is wholly unnecessary and should be deleted.

Mr. HEAPS: Suppose, as the hon. member suggests, one province should come under the scheme and a large number of prospective pensioners began to gravitate to that province for the purpose of getting the pension: that province might decide to make the period of residence two years and there would be nothing in this bill to prevent it.

Mr. STEVENS: We may trust to the province to look after its own interest in that respect, and that is the very reason why I am arguing that we should leave it to the province to decide upon residence within its own boundaries. But suppose all the provinces were willing to fix the period at two years; why should the Dominion government worry?

Mr. HEAPS: Would you likely get uniformity if you left it to the provinces to decide the question themselves?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not know that you require uniformity in respect of the period of residence within the province. Let the provinces determine that. As long as this parliament cares for the main principle of a twenty year residence anywhere in Canada, I do not care where, that is all it is concerned in. We are going into partnership with the provinces; let each province, therefore, determine within its own borders what the residence shall be there.

Mr. BROWN: If it was decided that uniformity was not necessary, I would be prepared to agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, but I am yet unable to see how you can dispense with uniformity.

Mr. BAKER: Clause (c) provides:

(c) has resided in Canada for the twenty years immediately preceding the date aforesaid;

That is, he must have arrived in Canada twenty years before reaching the age of seventy. Is there not danger in that clause to the welfare of Canada? I presume the whole purpose of this legislation is to reward those who have worked for the welfare of Canada. I think we all agree that this is desirable. Unfortunately the working people of Europe by the time they have reached the age of fifty are pretty well broken down. I have seen hundreds of them and know what I am talking about. If they come here at the age of forty-nine years and eleven months, and are not in a physical condition to give any labour to Canada between that age and seventy, they might live to the age of ninety, and although owing them no reward the Dominion would be paying them a pension for that period. That is the only bad point I see.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Replying to the statement of my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) regarding the resolution he submitted from a returned soldiers' organization, I think it would be well not to complicate the bill by making special classes. If parliament is disposed to deal with returned men I am quite in sympathy with such action, but I think it would be a mistake to interfere with the uniformity of old age pensions under this bill. As to the time of residence, in Great Britain, the British Dominions and the United States, and I think in some of the South American countries and also the European countries twenty years residence is generally accepted as sufficient. If people broken down in health come to this country at the age of forty-nine or fifty, they probably would not live to be seventy anyway, and I doubt very much whether they would get by the Immigration authorities.

Mr. BAKER: I have known people to come to Canada after they have passed their fiftieth year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): So have I. But I think to extend the period of residence beyond twenty years would defeat the desire of those who are in favour of this legislation. Now, residence of five years in a province is a matter of degree.

Mr. BAKER: Are we not to pay pensions after five years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I repeat that five years' residence in a province is a matter of degree and judgment. In framing the bill it was thought there should be at least some period of residence required in a province, and it was decided that five years would be fair. To leave this to the provinces would not lead to uniformity. Provision is made in the bill that where, say, a person has resided for five years in Ontario, ten years in Alberta and finally five years in British Columbia, and there makes his application for a pension, the provinces concerned would each pay their proportion according to the term of residence within their boundaries—of course, provided that those provinces are in the scheme.

Mr. STEVENS: Suppose those provinces were not in the scheme, would not British Columbia in the case cited have to pay it all?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Fifty per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the point I am raising.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I quite agree with my hon. friend as to the desirability of a time limit, but it was felt that five years would be sufficient protection, because after all that would not prevent people gravitating from a province where the scheme is not in effect to one where it is.

Mr. BAKER: My suggestion would be to make clause (c) read:

(c) has resided in Canada since the age of twenty years.

This would ensure to Canada the benefit of the labour from the age of twenty to the age of seventy, when the person would be rewarded with a pension.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, two very important features of clause 8 have not yet been very much touched upon. I would first of all deal with paragraph (f):

(f) is not in receipt of an income of as much as $365 a year.

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that that would disqualify a person from receiving any old age pension if his total income, including pension amounted to $365. In other words, a pension would be allowed to anyone possessing an income of $125 a year. I think that is rather too low. There are many people paying into the funds of various organizations who later may be receiving a pension of $15 or $25 per month. Assuming a person was receiving a pension of $300 per year from an organization, his pension according to this legislation would amount to $65 per year. Now, in my opinion the income he is allowed is too low. I find that in Great Britain where old age pension legislation is in effect a pension of £26 is allowed to a person with an income not exceeding £26 per year. In other words, the pensioner is allowed to have an income of equal amount to that of his pension. In Australia where the pension payable is £39 per year, the pensioner is also entitled to have an income of the same amount before any deduction is made; and exactly the same thing applies in New Zealand. I do not see why we could not insert a similar provision in this bill. I think the $125, which is approximately $10 per month, is altogether too low. The allowance ought to be $240 per year; in other words, until the pensioner is receiving from other sources more than $20 per month, there should be no deduction from his pension.

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I ask my hon. friend if that is not a little larger than the British pension? He quoted £26 as the British pension, and a person would still be eligible to have an income of £26, which would make about $260 in our money, or a little more than the pension proposed here.

Mr. HEAPS: I am dealing with the amount which they are allowed to have as personal income outside of the amount of the pension. In Australia, considering the purchasing power of money, I think the pension is higher than that proposed by the present bill. A person is allowed £39 per year as income, which is equal to the pension received.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I was trying to point out that under the present system a person could have an income of $360 a year, whereas under the British system he could not have more than $260.

Mr. HEAPS: My hon. friend is quite correct, but I am pointing out that there a man is allowed to earn an amount equal to his pension. The same applies where the pension is considerably higher, as in Australia. In New Zealand I find that if there are two persons receiving pensions, husband and wife, they are entitled to a joint income of £130 per year. What are we going to do? It means that many people who may earn from $15 to $20 per month will probably be compelled to hide their earnings when making out their statements. I think we should follow the practice adopted by Great Britain,

New Zealand and Australia, and allow the pensioner to earn a higher amount than is here specified in paragraph (f). I would urge that upon the minister; I think it is a point worthy of consideration.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Considering that this is our first attempt at an old age pensions scheme I think we should advance carefully. We have made provision for $20 a month. That is not a large sum, but in the aggregate it will involve a large expenditure. To increase the allowance one might have from earnings or from income seems an easy thing to do, but I think at present we could very well afford to be careful and fairly conservative. After the scheme is in operation, if it is successful, and if from experience we find that it might be enlarged and that we might be more generous, then would be the time to consider the matter. At present I would prefer, and do suggest to the committee, that we should not depart from the provisions as set forth in the act.

Mr. BROWN: I would suggest that we take clause 8 section by section, and get somewhere.

Mr. DICKIE: With respect to subsection (d) it seems to me a difficulty might arise. In the event that Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta declined to come in under this scheme, every man approaching the age of sixty-five in these three prairie provinces would immediately migrate to British Columbia, which province would doubtless come into the scheme. Although we in British Columbia venerate age we do not want our province to become an old men's home. What would prevent all these old men approaching sixty-five years of age from coming to British Columbia?

Mr. BROWN: Suppose Manitoba adopts it and British Columbia does not?

Mr. DICKIE: Manitoba shows no intention of adopting it. Alberta shows no such intention nor does Saskatchewan, but British Columbia undoubtedly will come in.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In a case such as that mentioned by my hon. friend there is provision made in clause 10 for the distribution of the burden.

Mr. DICKIE: I quite understand that, but we have no senate in British Columbia; we do not want to make it an old man's home.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my hon. friend is unnecessarily alarmed. The class of individuals who will receive a pension under this act have not the means for transporting themselves.

Mr. DICKIE: Their friends would assist them.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Possibly, but it would be discovered shortly and an end put to that practice. The only difficulty would be with the province of Alberta, where they would simply have to step over the line, but the pension board would soon become familiar with a situation of that kind.

Mr. DICKIE: But we would have no redress.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If that occurred a means of redress would be found. The five-year period is, I think, sufficient to prevent such a thing. The delightful climate of British Columbia is attractive, I know, but I think the class who would come under the provisions of this bill will hardly be travelling very much at the age of sixty-five, in order to get located for this scheme.

Mr. NEILL: I think the objection of my hon. friend is fully met by section 11. If a man is getting near the age of sixty-five in Alberta, where there is no pension payable, and goes to British Columbia and stays five years his pension——shall be reduced by the same proportion as the duration of the pensioner's residence in such other province bears to twenty years.

The man would only get a proportionate pension, so no advantage would be gained by going to British Columbia except that of living in such a delightful province.

Mr. DICKIE: That would conflict with section 10, then, which provides that no matter what part of Canada the man has lived in, if he came to British Columbia the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta would have to pay a portion of this pension, but we would have the old gentleman with us.

Mr. NEILL: Section 10 deals with the case where the previous province pays a pension, while section 11 deals with the case where the previous province does not pay a pension.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is one class whose claims might be considered before passing this section; I refer to those who presented a petition the other day for the blind. I do not know whether it is possible to make provision in this act for them. We all recognize that people with such a disability are in need of an old age pension earlier than are other people, because it is much more difficult for them to obtain work. I do not know whether it would be possible to have an amendment to subsection (b) to provide that in the case of blindness the age might be reduced by five or ten years. In one or two of the other acts such provision is made. Ideal disability insurance should perhaps be dealt with by a special act, but in the case of blindness comparatively few would be affected, and the expense would not be very heavy. I would at least suggest to the minister that an amendment might be made to subsection (b), to make it read:

—has attained the age of seventy years or, in the case of the blind, the age of sixty years;

Or whatever age might be fixed.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I might suggest to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) that in such a case as he suggests it would not work such a hardship on British Columbia, because the prairie provinces would be paying their proportion of the Dominion tax. British Columbia, would be deriving some of the benefits, while the prairie provinces would have none. So that even in the extreme case mentioned, and I do not for a moment admit it would work out even in that case, British Columbia would be benefited.

Mr. DICKIE: I think the clause quoted by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni absolutely covers the point which I raised. I do not at all agree with the hon. member for Mackenzie. The sum of $20 a month is not going to support these old people, and we are not going to see them want if they come to British Columbia. But clause 11 absolutely covers the objection which I raised.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just going to say to my friend from Winnipeg North Centre in regard to the case of the blind, of whom he has spoken, that I imagine there is no class in the community for whom we would desire to do more than for those who are deprived of their sight, but I think the matter of blindness ought to be considered independently of the matter of old age. This is experimental legislation at this stage, and I am afraid that if we burden it unduly by adding to old age other features, we may have difficulty in getting the general support we would like to have for this legislation. I would be inclined to think that any suggestion of that kind had better be deferred until after the statute is enacted, and if the provinces wish to make that proposal themselves in their own legislation, there would always be the opportunity if it were deemed advisable, to have our legislation amended. There is the further fact that the federal government at the present time is appropriating some money, not a great deal, specifically for the blind. I have in my hand a copy of the estimates, and one item, under Miscellaneous, refers to a vote that we expect to get from parliament for the blind—Grant to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, $10,000. If I recollect aright, there was some other vote for the blind we did appropriate in a previous year. I think we had better not at present introduce a new feature in this legislation.

Mr. BAKER: Is there any clause here that would prevent a person of seventy who has a little capital from doing away with it for the purpose of getting a pension under this legislation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If he was discovered doing that, he would not be qualified for a pension.

Mr. BAKER: Does the bill say so?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. Paragraph (g) provides that if he has not made any voluntary assignment or transfer of property for the purpose of qualifying for a pension, he is eligible; if he has done so, he is not eligible.

Mr. BAKER: It would not be too difficult to prove, would it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think not.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Maximum pension $240.

Mr. STEVENS: Subsection 2 of section 9 refers to the transfer to the pension authority of the property or house in which the prospective pensioner may live. I cannot quite discover from a casual reading what becomes of the property after the death of the pensioner. Is it returned to his heirs less a certain amount retained for charges, or what becomes of the property?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If it is shown to the pension authority that his people have contributed a reasonable amount, the property may go to them. That is provided in subsection 3.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Distribution of pension burden among provinces.

Mr. DICKIE: Suppose Alberta and Saskatchewan do not come into this scheme; could the federal government force the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan to contribute the amount which is set forth here?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. STEVENS: The federal government could not force them under any circumstances. Section 11 covers the point my hon. friend raises.

Section agreed to.

Sections 11 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On section 19—Power to make regulations.

Mr. STEVENS: This is perhaps the main clause of the bill. Under this clause the regulations are to be made which will govern the agreement, and really the nature of the agreement. I think we are entitled so far as this clause is concerned to a pretty full explanation or interpretation of it from the minister in charge, having particular regard to this question: Is it intended that the agreement shall be strictly limited to the terms of this clause, or, as I apprehend is the case, are the powers of the government in draughting the agreement to be rather elastic and fairly broad? We ought to have some idea of how broad these powers are, and to what extent it is contemplated to go. I think the paragraphs of this section ought to be read one after the other so that we could follow them with some care. This is undoubtedly the main section of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, read the section paragraph by paragraph.

On section 19, paragraph (a)—Regulation as to the time preceding the attainment of pensionable age at which applications for pension may be made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I was not in when section 9 was under discussion. I do not want to discuss it, but I want to call the attention of the minister to the fact that under it a pensioner may leave his property to another pensioner and thereby escape all liability for reimbursing the government. Furthermore "pensioner" is described in the definition clause as "an applicant for a pension". The effect of that would be that if a man wants to defeat the purpose of the act, he can get his proposed legatee to apply for a pension whether he has any right to it or not, and then immediately leave his property to him. The fellow being an applicant is then a pensioner under the act and the government is done out of its money. The paragraph merely needs correction, and it should be corrected.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my right hon. friend is correct. We will return to that question before we go out of committee.

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask a question in regard to the effect of subsection (2) of section 8, which declares that pensioners are not to be disqualified from voting. Does this constitute a disqualification from voting at any provincial or municipal election?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is no disqualification under the Dominion law. There is in the laws of some of the provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Have we got the right to say who shall vote at a municipal election or who shall not? I do not see how we have that right.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are not taking the right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The subsection says the receipt of a pension shall not be a disqualification. Supposing the municipality says it shall? The subsection simply should not be there. We have nothing to say as to who is or is not qualified to vote at a municipal or provincial election. It is presumption on our part to say whether this is a qualification or disqualification. The municipalities or the province, as the case may be, have the full right to say what the provincial or municipal franchise shall be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we should have the right to say that these pensioners should have the right to vote at a provincial or municipal election, because we are contributing fifty per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have nothing to do with that. We cannot authorize a province or a municipality to grant the right to vote.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Suppose the provincial act provides that they shall be disqualified.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surely the minister does not intend to suggest that we will bring any pressure to bear on a province in that regard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why not? We want to recognize that a pensioner has certain rights and should retain his citizenship. I do not see why we should not put that as one of the stipulations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are we to say to the province "unless you are ready to let these people vote who are in receipt of this money you have got to be out of this thing altogether and stay out"?

Mr. NEILL: I am rather inclined to agree with the point raised by the leader of the opposition that this does interfere with the provincial franchise, and some of the provinces are very sensitive on that score. We claim that we have the right to regulate our own franchise, in fact that is our right under the British North America Act. The question comes home particularly to us in British Columbia because it indirectly relates to our right to exclude orientals from voting. Under this provision there is a possibility that we shall be setting at naught something to which the province attaches very great importance. I know the right hon. leader of the opposition laid down in the course of a debate some years ago that the provincial franchise was not to be interfered with by the Dominion. I recall that he said on that occasion that any disability under the provincial franchise would have to be translated into the Dominion federal franchise.

Mr. FRASER: Has there not been a decision by the Privy Council holding that the province of British Columbia has a right to prohibit the names of Chinese and Japanese from being placed on the voters' list?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Paragraph (a) agreed to.

On section 19, paragraph (b)—Time at which payment of pension shall commence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know how in the world you are going to fix the time for application, because there may be all sorts of inquiries. The provision does no harm, but is should be worded somewhat differently, perhaps. Just say "the time at which" and leave out the words "after application therefor".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The phraseology is copied from the British Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest that you leave out the words "after application therefor".

Paragraph (b) agreed to.

On section 19, paragraph (c)—Definition of residence.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Would that apply to the resolutions read to the House by the member for New Westminster yesterday, from the Soldiers' associations? Would the Governor in Council have power under this paragraph to make the regulations include the class of persons referred to by the hon. member?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Is it not desirable that they should be included?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I said a moment ago that I did not think it desirable to bring it in under this bill as a special clause. If it is necessary to give returned men special consideration, let it be done by special legislation, but do not bring them as a class under this bill. I think that would be a mistake.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister explain clause (c):

> The Governor in Council shall have power. . . to provide by regulation, for. . . the definition of residence and of the intervals of absence from Canada or a province by which residence therein shall not be deemed to have been interrupted.

We have already gone through several clauses dealing with the question of residence. I would take it that clause 19 gives an added power which may vary the provisions of the other clauses that have been already passed. Is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to all these sections, my hon. friends will realize that it is impossible to anticipate the hundred and one different matters that will come up, and all that has been attempted, by outlining the different matters specially mentioned, is to make it clear that it is desirable to note in advance as many as possible, but at the same time to leave room for additional phases of the question which may have to be the subject of regulation. In reference to a question asked as to residence, I can answer it by giving an illustration. Take the case of trade commissioners, who might have occasion to spend four years in Africa, Australia, or some country other than Canada. They would be absent from Canada for four years, and nobody is going to think of their case until the time arrives when the question of pension has to be settled. That would be one of the cases which would come under this provision. The Governor in Council would have power to provide by regulation for the definition of residence, and of the intervals of absence from Canada or from a province by which residence therein shall not be deemed to have been interrupted. The applicant is supposed to be five years in the province and twenty years in Canada. During that period he might be four years abroad on the business of the country, and under this clause regulations could be made to meet that case. I understand that all these paragraphs set out here are taken in large part from the British legislation, and they are included in order to anticipate matters of that kind which it is impossible to cover in a general clause.

Mr. CANNON: Clause 19 says that the Governor in Council shall have power to make regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of the act.

Paragraph (c) agreed to.

Paragraph (d) agreed to.

On section 19, paragraph (e)—Determination of income.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In view of the very complicated clauses we dealt with previously as to turning over the pensioner's house to the pension authorities, the renting of the house, its sale after the pensioner dies, and so forth, I think it would be much better to give the pension authority power to assess the annual value of any residence owned by the petitioner instead of having all these complicated provisions about taking it over. Surely we do not want to become the custodian of a lot of dwelling houses and pay the taxes on them. I would just take arbitrary authority to assess what the property is worth by way of rental. It would be infinitely simpler than this.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is exactly what is done in Ontario by the municipality in the case of any property owned by an occupant of the House of Refuge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is very simple. There is a legal provision in regard to it. We do not want to keep track of property all over the Dominion, keep the houses in repair and pay taxes. We do not want to assume that burden.

Paragraph (e) agreed to.

Paragraph (f) agreed to.

On section 19, paragraph (g)—Under treatment in public institutions.

Mr. STEVENS: During the previous discussion some hon. member, speaking with authority stated that it was the intention of the government under the provisions of this act to make an agreement with the province that would enable the federal authorities to pay this pension to the province on behalf, we will say, of institutions like poorhouses or old men's homes, such as we have in British Columbia. Is it the intention of the government to do that? Will the government disclose what it had in its mind when this clause was draughted?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This would probably cover cases where the pensioner required to go to the hospital for treatment, or to some public institution of that kind, in which case a portion of his pension would be payable to the institution. I think that is a matter that would have to be worked out pretty well by the pension authorities. The province might be able to maintain some of these pensioners at less cost and to greater advantage to the pensioner in an institution like an old men's home, in which case the pension could be partly used for his maintenance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the most important clause of the bill.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the clause that will really be operative if the bill ever becomes law. The provinces have these institutions; some of them are very fine ones, and the provinces are not going to scrap them and then assume the burden of helping to maintain these people.

Mr. BURY: Is it the intention of subsection (g) to provide for the payment of the pension or any part of it to the institution in which the beneficiary is placed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BURY: It does not say so in the clause. It says, "the circumstances in which pensions may be paid for the benefit of persons supported or under treatment in public institutions." If you are paying the money to the person himself, you are paying it for his benefit. The clause says, "supported or under treatment in public institutions." There is nothing in the clause to provide that the pension be paid to the institution.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is broad enough to cover everything, I should say.

Mr. BURY: Too broad. Surely the wording of the clause is consistent with payment to the person, and does not necessarily imply payment to the institution. You should expressly say in the clause that there is power to pay it to the institution.

11 p.m.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We pay over our money to the province. It may be that under certain circumstances the province will find it to the advantage of the pensioner, to the advantage of the province and of the whole scheme, to pay part of the pension to the public institution in which the pensioner is placed. It depends on the circumstances.

Mr. BURY: If the intention of the clause is to empower the federal government to pay either to the individual or to someone else, the language does not seem to convey that intention.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We pay only to the province.

Mr. BURY: That is a different matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there anything in this paragraph in conflict with section 16, which provides that no pension shall be subject to alienation or transfer by the pensioner or to seizure in satisfaction of any claim against him?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend may as well be clear on that point. As I read paragraph (g) the meaning is that the money will not go to the individual at all, but to the institution in which he happens to be living.

Mr. BURY: That is the very question I asked, and I was told that the money did not go to the institution at all, but that it rested with the province to say to whom it should go.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The federal government pays only to the province.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is not answering the question clearly; my hon. friend (Mr. Bury) gets one understanding and I another. The straight question is this: Is it the intention to provide in these regulations that the federal portion of the pension may be paid to the province on behalf of an institution just as well as on behalf of the individual?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I understand it, our share goes to the province, but the regulations will provide the circumstances under which the money shall be paid by the province to the institution rather than to the pensioner. I repeat, it is the most important clause in the whole act; it is the one which will really work if the act goes into operation. We shall be helping to keep the poor in the homes.

Mr. BURY: If it is intended to incorporate in the bill power on the part of the federal government to direct where the money shall go, whether to the beneficiary or to the institution, this intention is not being expressed clearly enough in the phrase "the circumstances in which pensions may be paid."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The pension may be paid by the province for the benefit of the individual.

Mr. BURY: When you pay the money to the province you are not paying it for the benefit of the individual if the province hands it over to the institution.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Dominion government pays the money directly to the province, and the province may decide under certain circumstances that it is to the advantage of the pensioner that the payment should be made to the institution for his keep.

Mr. BURY: Then what is the use of paragraph (g) at all if you pay the money to the province and allow the province to do as it likes with it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The scheme must be approved by the federal government before the agreement is entered into.

Paragraph (g) agreed to.

On section 19, paragraph (h)—The mode in which pensions are to be payable.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): What does this mean?

Mr. KING: Kootenay): This is a matter of regulation.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Does it mean that the pension may be payable by promissory note, by cheque or in cash?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We hope that the Post Office Department may be utilized in the payment of the moneys. The necessary arrangements will have to be worked out.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I take it, then, that it refers to the department of government through which the pensions will be paid?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It merely provides for the machinery through which payment will be made.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): So far as the Yukon and the Northwest go I have no hope at all that this act will apply to them, notwithstanding the assurance of the Minister of Public Works that it is the intention of the government that it shall. Certainly, as the bill is worded, there is no evidence that such is the intention.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It was intimated this afternoon that there would be an amendment to clear up any doubt my hon. friend might have in this regard. Before we go out of committee to-night we shall move an amendment for the purpose.

Paragraph (h) agreed to.

Section 19, paragraphs (i) to (m) inclusive, agreed to.

On section 19, paragraph (n)—Recovery of pension payments made by reason of nondisclosure of facts or innocent or false representations.

Mr. BURY: Is this not an encroachment upon provincial property rights? If you try to recover from a man in Alberta or Saskatchewan a pension wrongfully paid to him by reason of misrepresentation or concealment of facts, are you not thereby trenching on provincial rights? It seems to me that you are dealing with a question that lies purely within the purview of the provincial legislature, and you are doing so by order in council.

Mr. CANNON: The provinces will have to agree.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But there is the whole trouble with the very conception of this bill. The Governor in Council cannot make regulations to govern the recovery of pension payments, with or without interest, for the simple reason that, as pointed out by the hon. member (Mr. Bury), the government of Canada cannot recover. But the Governor in Council can take the stand that it must first be satisfied with the provincial statute. The suggestion I made first of all, therefore, should have have been accepted, that the provincial statute must be approved by the Governor in Council. Then the provincial statute will not be approved until it so provides. But you can never by regulation of the Governor in Council provide for something which only a provincial government can do. In a word, this is a conglomeration borrowed from a statute which cannot apply because we have a federal system, and they have not.

Mr. CANNON: The provinces can always delegate their powers to the federal government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are never going to do it.

Mr. CANNON: They might do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the Solicitor General imagine the provinces are going to authorize the federal government to come in and recover pensions that the provinces have paid?

Mr. CANNON: I do not say they would, but from the legal viewpoint they could.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose from the legal viewpoint they could authorize Mars to do it; but it is inconceivable. What is the sense of suggesting that the Governor in Council may make regulations for the recovery of money when only the province can recover it? The province can provide by its bill or by regulations under its bill, and those regulations should be approved by the Governor in Council here. That is a suggestion I made in reference to clause 5, but the ministry brushed it aside. If they had done that they could take a knife and slash out about two-thirds of the clauses under 19. As it is, there they are, just surplusage.

[Mr. Bury.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does it not strike my right hon. friend that the provisions are to be made by the Governor in Council as to the circumstnces under which these payments should be recovered? For instance, he says to the other party to this agreement: You shall recover from a certain pensioner payments made to him by reason of false representations. In other words, this government does not propose to allow the pensioner who obtains a pension under false representations to retain it, and under certain circumstances it shall be recovered. It is all part of the agreement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well, if it is part of the agreement how can it be a subject of regulation?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Governor in Council says by one of his regulations: This is the agreement you make, you must recover pensions that were obtained under false representations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The agreement is something signed between the two governments, and once it is signed no regulation has anything to do with it. I can see how that came to be put in there, and the minister ought to acknowledge it. It is in the British act. That act says that the King in Council can make regulations for the recovery of pensions which they paid. That is why it is there. But there is no place for it here because we cannot recover the pension. It is true we can say the provincial legislature must pass such and such a law. That is all provided for by section 5, or should be, by the simple assertion that a provincial statute and the regulations thereunder shall be satisfactory to the governor in council.

Paragraphs (n) to (r) agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no use making a suggestion. These most anomalous clauses indicate that the government never expect them to go into effect.

On section 20—When regulations come into effect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is harmless.

Section 20 agreed to.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Now the amendments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I suggest that whatever amendments the government have to offer might first be proposed, then we can adjourn and consider them.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The first amendment, I think, will not require very much discussion. It deals with the Yukon Territory. It is proposed to amend section 2 (d) by adding the words:

—in respect to which "commissioner" shall be read for "lieutenant governor in council".

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amendment is to bring that about?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, I think it covers that without any difficulty.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Chairman, the minister will have to go a great deal further than that to make this bill applicable to the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories; in fact, even to make it workable anywhere in Canada. Summed up, this bill simply means that the Dominion government pay back to the provinces fifty per cent of the amount they pay out on old age pensions to the persons enumerated. The Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories with their scattered population are not going to enact any legislation under which they will pay out old age pensions and come back to the federal government under this bill for fifty per cent of those payments.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Then they are not in the scheme.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): No. In the last campaign the government candidate in Yukon Territory, a personal friend of the Minister of Public Works, made a great point of saying to the electors: The government has in view an old age pension bill. Not an old age pension bill that would not apply to the Yukon, but a bill that would; and evidently the government did have that in mind. Formerly one of the main reasons why this old age pensions legislation could not get ahead was because the government of Canada could not get co-operation from the provinces. As regards the Yukon and the Northwest Territories they do not need any co-operation, because the federal government governs those territories regardless of any provincial governments, they are typically federal territories, and if this government is sincere in wishing to put into effect old age pensions there, why not go ahead and do it? Do not hamper any such scheme with the provisions wrapped around the provinces. The Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories are federal territories, not hampered by provincial governments. You either want to give them old age pensions or you do not. I say to the minister, if he wishes he can make this bill applicable to the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories and give them old age pensions. This bill will never apply there; it will be inoperative. It will not even catch any votes—it does not go that far.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Nobody is concerned about votes under this bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I think we have had a pretty prosperous evening; we have gone through this bill very carefully and have allowed several clauses to stand. I would suggest to the minister in charge of the bill and to the Prime Minister that the amendments which might clear up the misunderstandings in the first four or five clauses should be prepared carefully and presented at another sitting, when they can be dealt with.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.23 p.m.

Monday, April 19, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. ALFRED STORK (Skeena) moved that the annual report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the last fiscal year be referred to the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

THE OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT, 1923, AMENDMENT

Mr. DUGALD DONAGHY (North Vancouver) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22 to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1923, (Additional Punishment).

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the act stands today the punishment of whipping may be imposed by the judge only in the case of sales of narcotics to minors. The object of this bill is to extend that power so that the judge may impose the penalty of whipping in all cases of selling or peddling narcotic drugs.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is really an amendment to the Criminal Code, I presume.

Mr. DONAGHY: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, it is a quasi-criminal matter, and I suggest to the hon. member that if he has any thought of having the bill dealt with this session he should take it up with the government with a view to its incorporation in one of their bills. There is no chance of its being reached this session as a private member's bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION—BUFFALO AND PORT COLBORNE

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek):

1. How many bushels of Canadian grain were carried from Fort William and Port Arthur to Buffalo during the calendar year 1925?

[Mr. Donaghy.]

2. How many bushels to Port Colborne?
3. What was the average rate per bushel charged to (a) Buffalo, (b) to Colborne?
4. What would have been the saving if the Buffalo rate had been applied to the traffic to Colborne?
5. How much was carried from Fort William and Port Arthur to the bay ports in the calendar year 1925?
6. What was the rate?
7. What was the rate from Duluth to the bay ports?
8. What was the rate from Duluth to Buffalo (a) per bushel, (b) per ton mile?
9. What would have been the saving if that rate had been applied to all traffic in grain between Canadian ports?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: Stands as an order for return, which I now table.

Hon. Mr. STEVENS: Might I ask, Mr. Speaker, why this should not be put on Hansard? It is one of those important questions which many of us are interested in, and if it is laid on the table in the form of an order for return no one can get any advantage of it except by seeing the return.

Mr. ROBB: I have no objection if the House desires. It will pad Hansard considerably.

Mr. STEVENS: It is really a useful question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Answered.

The statement is as follows:

1.

	Bushels
Wheat	120,560,825

BRITISH EMPIRE EXHIBITION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government take up with the British government and the governments of the oversea dominions the holding of a British Empire exhibition annually in rotation in Great Britain, Canada, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand, following somewhat on the lines of the Wembley exhibition, as an agency for the development of inter-imperial trade and commerce, with an effort to draw Great Britain and her oversea dominions closer together so that trade may follow the flag and so promote the best interest of the empire and of Canada?

2. Will the government make any statement of what is or will be done in this connection, and if they will take this subject matter up at the next colonial conference, and see what can be done in the matter and to give effect to the same?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The matter herein referred to will receive the careful consideration of the government.

2. Answered by answer to No. 1.

MR. L. W. MINKLER

Mr. DAVIS:

1. Is L. W. Minkler still in the employ of the government experimental farm at Lacombe, Alberta?

2. If not, when did his employment cease, and for what reasons?

3. When did his said employment commence? What are or were his duties under it, and what is, or was, his salary or wages therefor?

4. What payments have been received from the government from the date of his first employment?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. February 23, 1925. General labourer employed particularly in special detail and record work. Thirty cents per hour.

4. $1,326.90.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD—GEORGE TARRANT

Mr. BROWN:

1. Did the Soldier Settlement Board purchase the west half of section 2-16-1 east in Manitoba on behalf of a returned soldier named George Tarrant? What was the date of purchase and what price did the board pay? Who sold the land to the board? When did the vendor acquire and what did he pay for the land?

2. Was the purchase the subject of investigation and was the land purchased contrary to the policy, rules and regulations of the board?

3. Were any employees of the board negligent in the performance of their duties in connection with the purchase of said land? If so, who were the employees? Was any employee dismissed for negligence? If so, who was the employee?

4. Who was the solicitor for the vendor when the above land was purchased by the board?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton).

1. (a) Yes. (b) Board agreed to purchase on May 6, 1920. (c) $5,120. (d) Colonel F. J. Murray. (e) Investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police showed that transfer from Margaret Gempel to Colonel F. J. Murray of this land was registered on May 17, 1920, the consideration named being $2,240. On the same day the land was transferred from Colonel Murray to the Soldier Settlement Board.

2. Yes.

3. (a) Yes. (b) J. A. Wolfe and D. W. Campbell. (c) Yes. (d) J. A. Wolfe and D. W. Campbell, in connection with this and other similar cases.

4. Anderson, Guy and Chappell.

INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS 1919 TO 1925

Mr. WHITE (London):

1. What gross amount was collected by the Dominion Income Taxation Department in each of the following years: 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925?
2. What refunds have been made from each year's collection?
3. What was the cost of collection for each year?
4. How many employees were there in the department in each year?
5. What amounts were collected by the office at London, Ontario, in each of the years mentioned?
6. How many employees were in the London office in each of the years mentioned?
7. What are the names of those who now act as assessors in the London office?

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: Stands as an order for return.

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) as respects No. 4 would apply here. The answer is exceedingly brief in each case. It may take some time to get it ready, but the question is so important that manifestly the answer should appear in Hansard.

Mr. BOIVIN: I have no objection if the right hon. leader of the opposition prefers the question may stand. It will be answered in due course.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: No. 20 stands as a question.

RURAL CREDITS—INTEREST LIMITATION

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil-Soulanges):

Will the government provide in the rural credits legislation, that borrowers, on the ten-year credit period, shall not pay more than 5 per cent interest on their loans and those borrowing for more than ten years not more than 4½ per cent interest?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

The government's intention with respect to rural credits legislation is set forth in the resolution which appears on the orders of the day in the name of the Minister of Finance. The details of the legislation will appear in the bill to be introduced as soon as the said resolution has been passed by the House of Commons.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil-Soulanges):

In as much as, under the proposed legislation concerning old age pensions, all the provinces must indirectly contribute their share of the amounts paid by the Dominion government to the provinces accepting the conditions of the act:

Will the government make provision therein to pay to those provinces, refusing to join in the old age pension scheme, a pro rata amount to be used by them for assistance to their hospitals and charitable institutions?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government's policy with respect to the old age pension scheme, referred to in the question, is set forth in full in the legislation now before parliament. In the opinion of the government it would be inadvisable to introduce any additional features to the legislation now before parliament.

SADDLE LAKE INDIAN RESERVE

Mr. BURY:

1. Has the Saddle Lake Indian reserve in the province of Alberta, or any part of it, been opened up for settlers? If so, when; how much; and by what authority was it opened up?
2. By what methods and on what date or dates were the allotments made of lands so opened up?
3. What qualifications or conditions were required of applicants in order to obtain any part of the said lands?
4. What were the conditions of sale or conditions of allotment drawn by the government to govern the said allotments?
5. Was or were any other condition or conditions of sale or allotment announced by the government agent in substitution for or in addition to any of those drawn by the government? If so, had such further or other conditions been previously submitted to and approved by the government?
6. How many applicants for the said lands were there?
7. How many of such applicants were in attendance to support their applications on the day of allotment?
8. What were the names and addresses of the successful allottees; and how many acres were allotted to each?
9. How many, and who, among the said successful allottees were, at the date of the said allotment, farmers actively engaged in farming operations in the district?
10. Have any of the said allotments been approved by the government? If so, which and when?
11. How many sections were there in the said reserve and how many of these have been opened up and allotted to farmers?
12. Is it the intention of the government to open for settlement any more of the said reserve? If so, when and how much?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Yes; 18,720 acres surrendered for sale by the Saddle Lake band on August 4, 1925. Surrender accepted by order of His Excellency the Governor General in Council of September 26, 1925.

2. A block comprising 8,960 acres was sold for cash, to the Soldier Settlement Board immediately following surrender. Balance, 9,760 acres, offered for sale by ballot and allotment on March 3, this year.

3. Department stipulated that only bona fide settlers of the immediate district should have right to purchase.

4. Conditions of sale one-tenth cash, balance in nine equal and consecutive annual instalments with interest at six per cent. Applicants given privilege of balloting for right to purchase. This procedure decided upon in order to eliminate speculation and to confine sales to residents of district.

5. None, so far as department is aware.
6. 169.
7. 119.
8. Final report not yet received from Indian agent.
9. Answered by 8.
10. Answered by 8.

Mr. MacNUTT:

1. What was the total cost of the wharf built at Portapique, Nova Scotia, in 1925?
2. Was it built by the Department of Public Works or by public tender?
3. If by the department, who was in charge of construction?
4. What amount per day was paid to the superintendent and sub-foreman, respectively?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. $3,645.80.
2. Built by Department of Public Works.
3. J. A. Urquhart, foreman, under general supervision of District Engineer Thos. J. Locke, at Halifax, N.S.
4. Foreman paid at rate of 50 cents per hour. No sub-foreman employed.

DOMESTIC FUEL

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South):

Is it the intention of the government to introduce at the present session the bill that was prepared last year, entitled: An Act to encourage the Production of Domestic Fuel from coal mined in Canada, or any other bill to the same effect?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not possible to indicate at the present time what further legislation will be introduced at present session.

BOARD OF AUDIT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Regarding chapter 30, 13 and 14, George V, who were appointed as accountants under section 7 of the act?
2. On what date were these auditors appointed?
3. What is the total amount of salaries paid to each since appointment?
4. What results have been obtained as the consequence of employing such auditors?
5. What activities have been displayed by the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Auditor General under this act in the following respects: (a) Enquiry into report on and recommendations as to the present system of audit as respects the public accounts of the various departments of the Dominion. (See section 8.) (b) Enquiry into and recommendation as to the systems of accounting employed by the Canadian National Railways and subsidiaries thereof. (See section 9.) (c) Enquiry into and recommendations as to the financial affairs of any commission or other public body, the operations of which are carried on by appropriations from the treasury of Canada, or which are aided by grants or loans from said treasury. (See section 10.)?
6. Have the powers of the board been extended to include enquiry into any other undertaking or service as provided for in section 11 of the said act?
7. Did the board engage skilled assistants to facilitate the work? If so, how many and at what salaries?
8. Has the board reported from time to time the result of the enquiry, and recommendation as provided for in section 15 of the act? If so, are these reports to be presented to the board?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Geo. Edwards, C. A., of Edwards, Morgan & Co., Toronto; W. Garth Thomson, C. A., of Marwick, Mitchel & Co., Montreal.
2. February 23, 1924.
3. $6,000.
4. During their term of office on the board they have investigated the following matters: Taxation branch (Dept. of Customs and Excise), salary schedules; postal service salary schedules; Quebec Harbour Commission; Vancover Harbour Commission; Canadian National Railways; Montreal Harbour Commission.
5. The Auditor General was Chairman of the board and the Deputy Minister of Finance, Vice-Chairman. The Auditor General presided at meetings of the board when the investigations were authorized and took part in directing and forwarding the activities of the board at its meetings and at such other times as required.
6. Yes.
7. Yes, 22: 12 at $30 per day, 5 at $20, and 5 at $15.
8. Yes.

CHIEF INSPECTOR OF BANKS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Who was appointed to the office of the Chief Inspector of Banks, under what authority, at what salary and how much has been paid to him to date?
2. How many assistants, if any, have been appointed and at what salaries?
3. Out of which vote have such salaries been paid?
4. Have any reports been received from the chief inspector as to the extent of his investigations, and are such reports available?
5. Did the Department of Finance furnish the chief inspector with a general direction as to the procedure to be pursued? If so, what were these directions?
6. Was the Bankers' Association consulted or advised as to the chief inspector in any of the following respects: (a) appointment; (b) salary; (c) duties; (d) method of procedure; (e) limitations?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. C. S. Tompkins, appointed under authority of section 56A (1) of the Bank Act, at $15,000 a year. Paid to date, $21,916.66.
2. Office assistant at $1,400 a year.
3. Vote No. 409—1924-5; No. 15—1925-6; No 8—1926-7.

4. The inspector has carried out the duties assigned to him by subsection 6, of section 56A of the Bank Act. His reports are not made public.

5. The inspector is directed by the statute.

6. No.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GRAIN COMMISSION

Mr. DAVIS:

1. What are the names of the members and officers, including secretary, employed in connection with the Grain Commission and the amount given to each for his services?

2. What was the expense account of each of the said members or officials paid by the government in connection with the said investigation?

3. What was the total amount paid to each counsel or solicitor for his services in connection with the said investigation?

4. What payments were made for (a) rents of premises, (b) wages of stenographers, (c) all expenses other than those referred to under the preceding three questions in connection with said investigation?

DUTIES COLLECTED ON WOOL, CATTLE, ETC.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford):

1. What was the total quantity, value, and amount of duty collected on the imports and exports of the following commodities during the four-year period ending March 31, 1925; wool, cattle and calf hides, meats, butter, eggs, apples?

2. What was the quantity, and value, and amount of duty collected on each of the articles or commodities mentioned in question 1, for the year ending March 31, 1926?

DUTIES COLLECTED 1921-25

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford):

1. What amount of customs duty was collected in each province of the Dominion during each of the years ending March 31, 1921, to 1925, inclusive?

2. What was the total duties collected in each province for the years mentioned in question one?

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—APPOINTMENTS

Mr. HOCKEN:

1. How many employees are engaged by the Civil Service Commission?

2. How many appointments have been made by the Civil Service Commission?

3. How many men were appointed?

4. How many women were appointed?

5. What is the total amount of the annual salaries payable to the new appointees?

COUNTY OF RUSSELL—POST OFFICES

Mr. GOULET:

1. How many post offices are there in the county of Russell?

2. What are the names of the persons in charge of these respective offices?

3. What is the date of appointment of each of the said persons?

4. In what localities is the revenue more than $200?

5. On what dates were the various contracts passed for the transport of postal matters, what is the name of each contractor, the nature of each contract and the dates of the expiration of said contracts?

6. How many vacancies exist for the position of postmaster?

7. What are the names of persons who have put in application to fill said vacancies?

8. What are the names of persons appointed since November 22, 1925, to fill said vacancies?

SOCIALIZATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES

WITHDRAWAL OF COAL MINES AND WATER POWERS FROM PRIVATE OWNERSHIP

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, measures should be taken to regain for the use of the people the coal mines and water-powers which are now being exploited in the interest of private corporations rather than for the needs of the people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion was made on Friday that some of the hon. members opposite would like to proceed with certain resolutions to-day, but we have no definite assurance that we will have another Monday, and I would not like to allow this opportunity to pass without presenting this important resolution to the House. I have every desire to meet the convenience of my hon. friends opposite, however, and while I cannot control the debate I shall be very well satisfied if it is adjourned before six o'clock, to give hon. gentlemen opposite an opportunity to proceed.

It is sometimes charged that resolutions of this character are academic. I might point out that they are academic simply because we have not as yet a sufficient number of people thinking along these lines to bring these policies into operation. I have not the slightest doubt that before very many years have passed these questions will come decidedly within the realm of practical politics. In this particular case, however, my resolution has a very topical interest because of the developments which have taken place in recent weeks in the district immediately adjacent to the capital city.

For once I find myself in sympathy with the Toronto Telegram, and I hope the Toronto Telegram will note that fact. In the issue of April 15 the Telegram calls attention to the fact that since Sir Adam Beck's death private interests have been gradually resuming their encroachments, particularly in northern Ontario. By means of an agreement announced recently, for a supply of 260,000 horse power from Quebec, they have secured, according to the Telegram, a foothold in eastern Ontario, and have even reached as far as Toronto. Let me quote a paragraph:

A thirty year contract for a supply of power from private interests in Quebec means the end of Sir

Adam's ambition to create for the people of Ontario a great publicly-owned development which he created at Queenston and Niagara and at Nipigon.

Instead of building up a power plant for public ownership and the people of the province out of the revenues of power sales, the present contract which Chairman Magrath has negotiated means that a privately owned plant will be built up in Quebec out of revenue secured from Ontario consumers of power and light.

International Paper Company will be able to finance its entire power development in Quebec from revenue derived from the public ownership province of Ontario.

A contract that reduces Ontario once more to the level of a vassal state with private power corporations holding the upper hand is all that the people of the province get out of the latest Magrath-Ferguson "triumph".

I do not know that anyone could speak in stronger terms than those used by the Telegram in deprecating the control of our power reserves by private corporations. After all, we need examine somewhat carefully what we mean when we speak of "our" natural resources. I submit that "our" natural resources do not amount to a great deal if they are under the control of private corporations which operate these for their own interest rather than for the public welfare. For example, I may own a house, but if that house is mortgaged my ownership may be a liability rather than an asset. A man may claim that legally a woman is his wife, but if someone has alienated her affections the individual may wish he had no wife. In this case I would urge that it may not matter a great deal to the ordinary people of Canada whether the private owners live on this side of the American boundary or on the other side. But the fact that these companies are coming in from the other side makes us understand more clearly than ever that private ownership may even mean control by those living in a foreign country.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that very few of us realize the great importance of the control of power in our modern civilization. In a very interesting book entitled America's Power Resources; the Economic Significance of Coal, Oil, and Water Power, Messrs. C. G. Gilbert and J. E. Pogue have worked out some very interesting figures. They estimate that it would require the labour of three billion hardworking slaves to accomplish the work done annually in the United States by energy resources, basing their calculations on the 150,000,000 horse-power now secured from boilers and turbines, multiplied by twenty man-power for each horse-power. The use of energy materials gives to each man, woman and child the equivalent of thirty servants. It would seem to me highly important that we should know who is to direct the labour of the thirty servants theoretically under the command of each man, woman and child. A recent article in the Locomotive Engineers' Journal of November, 1925 calls attention to the fact that there is on foot a nation wide and, in fact, a world wide movement to completely monopolize the power resources of the nation and of the world. The control of electric power means the control of the entire industrial life of the people, for with the rapid advance of electrical service it will not be long until every industry, every public utility, every farm and every home will be absolutely dependent upon electric power. If power is monopolized the nation is monopolized. In regard to our own power I would say that if our power resources are under the control of a foreign nation, then this nation of Canada is under the control of a foreign nation.

In a very interesting book entitled Giant Power, a report of the Survey Board of Pennsylvania to the general assembly, February, 1925, Governor Gifford Pinchot warns the country against the peril of this power monopoly. He says:

Nothing like this gigantic monopoly has ever appeared before in the history of the world.

Senator Norris of the United States has filled page after page of the Congressional Record with the facts about the power trust. He says:

I have been dumbfounded and amazed, and the country will be dumbfounded and amazed when it learns that practically everything in the electrical world is controlled either directly or indirectly by some part of this gigantic trust.

Over twenty millions of the 55,000,000 horsepower of potential hydro-electric resources of the United States are already owned or have been applied for by the companies.

Mr. Speaker, there are hon. members of this House who very frequently say that we ought to follow in the footsteps of Great Britain. A few months ago the Miners' Federation of Great Britain presented a memorandum to the Coal Commission as representing the viewpoint of labour on the important question of the nationalization of power. I should like to quote a few paragraphs:

This desirable transformation can best be accomplished by the transformation of the industry itself. From being a coal-extracting industry it should become increasingly a coal-utilizing industry.

It would seem, Mr. Chairman, that that is the point at which we are sticking in Canada at the present time. We are thinking of our industry as being entirely a coal-extracting industry, and we cannot make our coal mining pay on that basis. It is possible it might be altogether different if we could reorganize our industry into being a coal-utilizing industry. Let me go on:

> The introduction of, and improvements in, methods of generating, transmitting, and employing electricity as a motive power and a means of lighting and heating have revolutionized the power problem. Electric power is now recognized to be, in a well organized community, an increasingly efficient and economical source of power, light and heat for industrial and domestic purposes.
> The wide range of by-products obtained from the pretreatment of coal has also provided the basis for a number of highly important industries.
> The utilization of coal in the production of electricity, gas, coke, and by-products has not, generally speaking, been undertaken by the coal companies. It is true that many collieries generate electrical power, but in most cases this is entirely for their own use. It is also true that many collieries have as ancillary undertakings coke ovens and by-product works, but these are in the main the property of concerns having iron and steel interests for which a supply of metallurgical coke is required. Moreover, these ancillary undertakings have not been regarded by the owners as forming part of the coal industry, though the Miners' Federation have repeatedly pressed for their inclusion.

Again, attention is called to the development of low temperature processes:

> It appears that if and when low tempefature processes can be developed on a big scale the products it yields will be especially valuable, including as they do fuel oils, which could to a great extent, and perhaps entirely, serve as a substitute for oil now imported, lubricating oils, rich gas, other by-products, and a smokeless fuel which can be burnt in the ordinary grate, thus replacing the wasteful, dirty, and unhygienic practice of burning raw coal.

Again;

> In combination, as a great fuel mining recovery, utilizing and selling agency, the calculations given. . . would indicate the possibility of obtaining residual fuel for the power plant at a mere nominal cost, provided all the profits above fixed charges arising from the combination coal handling and treatment were considered as reducing the cost of the residual fuel.

Again:

> The generation and transmission of electric power on a large scale or in other words on the only efficient and economical scale, involves the conception of a pool of power from which the entire community may draw its supplies.

Let me repeat that:

> The generation and transmission of electric power on a large scale or, in other words, on the only efficient and economical scale, involves the conception of a pool of power from which the entire community may draw its supplies.
> Technical experts agree that such power zones are essential to efficiency and economy. It is clear that only a scheme of a national character can meet such a need. A multiplicity of small undertakings, as at present, necessarily means waste, inefficiency, high costs, and high prices, with consequent low power consumption and industrial stagnation.

And this is the conclusion, and I may add that this is the conclusion that within the next few weeks will be driven home upon the people of Great Britain;

> Labour suggests that the coal industry should become an organization for mining coal, manufacturing electrical power on a very large scale, making both coke and smokeless fuel, and producing, in addition, gas, fuel oils, ammonium compounds, chemical base materials from tars, and other by-products. This transformed industry should be nationally owned.

That is the point, I suppose, where a great many members of this House would differ from the conclusions of the labour people of Great Britain, and from the conclusions of the labour people of this country, but that is our policy, and since we are here to advocate that policy, we must take every opportunity of impressing it upon the public.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that in Canada the situation is somewhat complicated by the division of powers as between the provinces and the Dominion. Our natural resources, generally speaking, under the British North America Act belong to the provinces. I would however, point out that in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta they still come under the administration of the Dominion. Even the natural resources, however, that are under Dominion administration are taken care of in a rather haphazard, or at least in an ununified fashion; for example, while the natural resources in the provinces are under the control of the Minister of the Interior, we find that the water-powers on canals are under the control of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and there are certain water-powers on the Ottawa river, for instance, which belong to the Dominion, and which are under the control of the Minister of Public Works. Here, we see very clearly the need for a better co-ordination. Why should not all the water-powers be under one department, and not scattered through three different departments? But whilst, in a general way, the provinces have control of the natural resources, I would also point out that the British North America Act definitely makes provision for the control by the Dominion of certain public undertakings even although they are entirely situated within the bounds of any one province. Section 92, subsection 10 (c) of the British North America Act reads:

> Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

These may be definitely placed under the control of the Dominion. In a number of instances advantage has been taken of this section of the British North America Act. We had an illustration about two years age in connection with the levels of the lake of the Woods, where, although the power was entirely situated within the province of Ontario, the control was taken by the Dominion government on the ground that the works were for the general advantage of Canada. I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that in the future we ought to see the extension of the powers of the Dominion over works of this character. There is no reason, even under the British North America Act, why this should not be done.

But after all why should we forever be tied down by technicalities? I know there are a very large number of gentlemen in this House who have had a legal training, and I know that it is difficult for them to get away from the spell of precedent. But I submit that we cannot forever be held back by obsolete legislation. The whole of our power development in this country, in fact all over the world, has come within the last sixty years, in the electrical field largely within the last twenty-five years. If the British North America Act makes it difficult for us to organize our community life in this day and generation, surely it is time that we should revise that act. The fact is that with regard to electrical development you cannot arbitrarily follow provincial lines. For example, in the case I cited a few minutes ago, that of the lake of the Woods control, we have an interprovincial situation. Ontario is concerned and Manitoba also, even although the power is entirely in the former province. Further than that, not only are the two provinces concerned, but the United States is also concerned in this matter. So here we have an interprovincial interest and also an international interest. Therefore you cannot, as I say, arbitrarily follow the provincial lines, or even the national lines.

Let me give a simple illustration. We remember the old-fashioned dolls with which our sisters played when we were children. You could dismember the old-fashioned doll and put the head in one place, the arms in another place, and the legs in another place, and after all perhaps it did not injure the doll very much—the doll might lose a little sawdust and that was about all. Some people seem to consider this country as something like one of those old-fashioned dolls that you could dismember—one province being kept in a corner by itself, and another province in an entirely different corner, with no evil results. I submit that that may have been possible when industry and commerce were very much localized, but in these days, when intercommunication is so rapid and where industry, commerce and finance are so highly organized the country is not at all like that old-fashioned doll, but rather it resembles the human organism. We know if we attempt to dismember a man we get into difficulties. We cannot cut off his arm and say that is no concern of the rest of the body; our national life to-day is of the nature of a highly developed organism. And so I urge that we ought to look at such matters as this from the standpoint of the Dominion at large, and not merely from that of any one province.

I suggest further that we should not even consider the coal industry and the hydro-electric development separately. Let me give an illustration that, perhaps, brings this home, at least to those of us who live in the west. In my own city of Winnipeg we have a hydro-electric plant, and in connection therewith a central heating plant. I may say that about one hundred of our downtown blocks are now heated by means of this central heating plant. We found that on occasion of any accident to the transmission lines it was necessary to have a standby plant, and we also found that when we had developed more horse-power than we needed at all times there was an off-peak load that could be utilized for other purposes. So our engineers and city council conceived the idea of combining this off-peak load and the standby plant, allowing one to supplement the other. The result is that we now have this central heating plant, and when we have water running to waste we turn it into electricity to heat the city. When we need the power for lighting purposes or power purposes we turn off that power and turn on the steam heating, and in that way we are able to run our plant twenty-four hours in the day. I would point out that in this case for part of the day we use the power resources of Alberta because we burn Alberta coal, and for the other part of the day we use power from Ontario, our hydro-electric. I think, perhaps, this will sufficiently well illustrate my point that you must not deal with the coal industry by itself and then with the hydro-electric powers by themselves—that in any thorough-going scheme they ought to be considered together.

It is not my intention to-day to discuss at any length what I may term the academic objections to public ownership. The other day the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) introduced objections that I think we have heard before. He dealt with the inefficiency or the alleged inefficiency, of public ownership. Again if I may draw an illustration from my own city, a few years ago we were paying 10 cents per kilowatt hour for our domestic lighting. At one time we had been paying as high as 20 cents, but for some time it had been reduced to 10 cents. As soon as our own power plant was put in commission that figure was reduced to three cents, and the city hydro supplied the people with light at that figure. Then the private company's rates came down and it also supplied light at three cents. It seems to me that our hydro plant was as efficient as the privately-owned plant when for years they told us they could not supply it under 10 cents. We found we could supply it for ourselves at three cents, and my colleague (Mr. Heaps) reminds me that it has gone down to even less than that now. I think it was Senator La Follette in the United States who called attention to the advantages of public ownership. He had noticed that in crossing over Niagara bridge, from the American to the Canadian side, the same water running beneath the bridge, on the one side the structure was lighted by a private company and on the Canadian side by a public company, the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission. I have forgotten the exact figures but the charges of the private company were something like three times as high as the charges of the publicly-owned company. So much for efficiency.

The hon. member for Fort William also spoke of public ownership depriving men of the right of individual initiative. Now, I would submit that so far as the thousands of employees of a privately-owned company are concerned, in comparison with the thousands of employees of a publicly-owned utility, it does not make much difference. The companies are organized much along the same lines, so that there are only a few individuals in any case that are concerned when it comes to a matter of the development of private initiative. It may possibly be that Sir Herbert Holt may develop a higher initiative than could Sir Adam Beck, and yet I venture to say that fifty years from now Sir Adam Beck will be remembered; he will be remembered long after Sir Herbert Holt has been forgotten. Possibly however Sir Herbert Holt's schemes may prove the very surest way for the development of the public ownership of the power resources of the province of Quebec.

It is not my intention to go into the question of the coal resources of this country at any length. I would like to point out, however, that owing to the peculiar location of our coal mines, in 1924 the total consumption of coal in Canada in millions of tons was 29.5. The total Canadian coal consumed in millions of tons was 12.5. That is, the difference supplied by importations from the United States and Great Britain in millions of tons was 17. Canada is said to possess the second largest coal reserve of any country in the world. This is shown by the following table which I will put upon Hansard. The figures are taken from the Coal Reserve of the World by McInnes, Dowling and Leach, and show that we have coal reserves, to the extent of 1,358,165 millions of tons. The table is as follows:

Coal reserves Reserves in millions of short tons (2,000 lbs.)				Special analysis of Canadian reserves
Class	Canada	United States	Whole world	—	East	West	Total
Class "A"— Anthracite or allied coals....	2,380	21,692	547,524	Actual..... Probable... Total.....	....	745 1,635 2,380	2,380

United States possesses 52 per cent of the world reserves
Canada " 16 per cent of the world reserves
Of Canada's resources 77 per cent are in the form of sub-bituminous and lignite coals Class "D".

There is no lack of coal in this country.

Now, turning for a moment to the other side of our problem, that of the water resources of Canada, I should like to give a few figures as supplied by the Dominion Water Power and Reclamation service, in a bulletin issued January 1, 1926, as follows:

The year 1925 witnessed the unprecedented increase in Canada's hydraulic installation of 718,984 h.p. bringing the total installation for all purposes to the imposing total of 4,290,428 h.p. or 465 h.p. per 1,000 of population.

The known available water power in Canada, from all sources and within the limitations outlined, is 18,255,000 h.p. for conditions of ordinary minimum flow and 32,076,000 h.p. ordinarily available for six months of the year.

Applying this the figures quoted above, therefore, indicate that the present recorded water power resources of the Dominion will permit of a turbine installation of 41,700,000 h.p.

The total installation to date in waterwheels and turbines throughout the Dominion is 4,290,428 h.p. In other words the present turbine installation represents only 10½ per cent of the recorded water power resources.

The table is as follows:

Available and Developed Water-Power in Canada

January 1, 1926

Province	Available 24-hour power at 80% efficiency		Turbine installation h.p.
	At ordinary min. flow h.p.	At ordinary 6-months flow h.p.
1	2	3	4
British Columbia	1,931,142	5,103,460	414,702
Alberta	475,281	1,137,505	34,107
Saskatchewan	513,481	1,087,756	35
Manitoba	3,270,491	5,769,444	183,925
Ontario	4,950,300	6,808,190	1,784,842
Quebec	6,915,244	11,640,052	1,747,386
New Brunswick	50,406	120,807	44,631
Nova Scotia	20,751	128,264	65,327
Prince Edward Island	3,000	5,270	2,274
Yukon and Northwest Territories	125,220	275,250	13,199
Canada	18,255,316	32,075,998	4,290,428

The statement continues:

A study of the uses to which the water-power installation of Canada is put emphasizes the growing importance of central electric stations. The 4,290,428 h.p. at present installed throughout the Dominion is apportioned to the following uses: 3,466,422 h.p. or 80.8 per cent of the total in central electric stations for general distribution, for domestic, municipal and commercial lighting and power purposes; 481,971 h.p. or 11.2 per cent installed in pulp and paper mills. In addition pulp and paper mills purchase about 275,000 h.p. from central electric stations, making a total of nearly 757,000 h.p. used in the manufacture of pulp and paper. 342,035 h.p. or 8.0 per cent installed in industries other than central electric stations and pulp and paper mills.

The turbine installation in horse-power is commercial, 3,054,854; municipal, 1,235,574; total, 4,290,428. The table follows:

Developed Water-Power in Canada

Commercial and Municipal

Ottawa, January 1, 1926

Province	Turbine installation in h.p.
	Commercial	Municipal	Total
British Columbia	404,607	10,095	414,702
Alberta	33,147	960	34,107
Saskatchewan	35	.....	35
Manitoba	94,800	89,125	183,925
Ontario	706,801	1,078,041	1,784,842
Quebec	1,728,411	18,975	1,747,386
New Brunswick	32,721	11,910	44,631
Nova Scotia	38,859	26,468	65,327

Yukon and Northwest Territories	13,199	.....	13,199
	3,054,854	1,235,574	4,290,428

I might add that a conservative estimate of the capital invested in Canadian water-power amounts to $815,723,890.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the reason I present this question to the House to-day is that we are just at the beginning of a wonderful hydro-electrical development, and while only 10½ per cent of our water-power resources are as yet available, it seems high time that we organized a scheme by which the whole of this available power would come under public control. In his book, Superpower as an aid to Progress, Mr. Guy E. Tripp, the chairman of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, states frankly that as soon as possible there must be a single, nation-wide, super-power system and that it must be privately-owned. I think all members in this House agree that, owing to the peculiar character of hydro-electrical development, it is necessary that this development should be highly organized. I agree with Mr. Tripp that there must be inevitably a single nation-wide superpower system; in fact, I think that it will be not only nation-wide as Mr. Tripp expects in the United States, but it will cover the whole continent. I look forward to the time when the Americans will be seeking not merely developments along the St. Lawrence or up the Gatineau, but away up on the reaches of the Nelson river. Undoubtedly there must be a higly centralized organization, but when Mr. Tripp tells us that this must be privately-owned, there is where I take issue with him, and it is here that the battle must be fought out in this country in the next few years. We have to-day a Dominion Waterpower Act which establishes a statutory authority with the right to control, not only the power site, but all the land, works and operations necessary for developing and using the power. The difficulty is that our board which has charge of the administration of this act is content to secure information and in a general way to exercise supervisory control, but so far that board has never been instructed to go further than this. It is the practice of the Dominion government to lease power sites for thirty years and the claim is made that in this way we still have control over these water-powers. With the rapid development of electrical power that is taking place, thirty years is a very long time and long before the thirty year period is up we shall be glad ourselves to take control of these water-powers. I know there is provision in the act that this may be done, but we ought at this time to formulate our policies and consider whether it is well to continue to give leases for thirty years.

As regards the provinces that have control of their natural resources, the other day hon. members opposite were urging with regard to a matter of social legislation that it was time that the Dominion government called a conference of the provinces and that the Dominion and provincial authorities should work out a scheme together. If that is desirable in the case of a comparatively minor matter like old age pensions, it is surely highly desirable in the case of an important national affiair such as the control of our water-powers. I would urge upon the government that in the near future they take steps to call a conference of representatives of the provinces who would meet with the officials of the various departments of the Dominion government concerned, and that together they should seek to work out a centralized scheme for the establishment of a government super-power organization. I do not for a moment mean that the Dominion government would administer the whole of the development of these water-powers. The work is now being carried on in Ontario in a very satisfactory way and certain municipalities such as the city of Winnipeg are carrying on their own electrical power development very efficiently, but the whole field ought to be surveyed, and the possibilities fully developed. We ought to reverse our present policy of allowing private corporations to establish themselves by means of leasing our power sites, and we ought very definitely to outline a broad scheme by which the coal resources of this country could be developed in conjunction with our water-powers. Thus these wonderful resources which are now at our disposal would not pass into the hands of private corporations increasingly under the control of individuals resident outside of Canada. We have inherited wonderful potential wealth. I take it that the time has come when we should look not to the immediate, but rather to the more distant, future and conserve for succeeding generations these inherited resources.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I am very much impressed by the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I also regret the fact that the situation in Ontario is such that Ontario power interests have had to go outside of the province for a source of power for distribution within the province. I do not know where the blame ought to be laid, but I sympathize with the Toronto Telegram in its expression of dissent from what has taken place and that the province had been forced to go outside of the province for power when it might have been generated at home absolutely under the control and ownership of Ontario which has led the world in public-ownership development and distribution of power throughout the province. Still, there is some relief coming from a privately-owned company in Ottawa, and I cannot complain of that although there is a suspicion in Toronto and throughout the province that in some way privately-owned companies have been rather conspiring in that regard.

I want to say a word about the power situation in Great Britain. As a believer in public ownership I regret that Great Britain has not followed the example of Ontario and developed a great system of public ownership and distribution of power, generating the power in publicly-owned plants controlling batteries of steam boilers at the pit heads, and also owning the distributing plants which now run into millions, to cover a kingdom like Britain. Instead of that all that Mr. Baldwin's government has done is to say that they will encourage the generation of power by privately-owned companies and its distribution by privately-owned companies and lines, but under some kind of public control. That is a step in advance and I cannot blame them, but I regret that the scheme does not go further. England is in a situation today that she wants to avail herself of every opportunity and every resource she has in order to get back to normal.

Having said that about England, I come now to our own province of Nova Scotia. I read this morning a circular by the British Empire Steel Corporation of Nova Scotia, stating that they are imploring the government of Canada to subsidize the mines in that province in order to encourage the generation of coke and its byproducts and thus build up the mines and supply work for the people. Let me say to our friends from Nova Scotia that I will go so far as to endorse, as far as I can do it in this House by my vote, a subsidy from the Dominion to that province to take over not all the coal mines, but certain coal mines as publicly-owned propositions, to own and develop a steam plant for the generation of power from that coal for distribution throughout that province, and also a subsidy from the Dominion to the province for a large coking plant to produce all the byproducts of coal when being roasted for the production of coke. In that way a great industry can be built up. In order that it may be carried out as it ought to be carried out, I am not going to object to private enterprise going into it, but if we are to help I would favour that help coming from the Dominion to a publicly-owned enterprise in that province. Nova Scotia says that it is in a desperate state and wants to see its ports used. I am in favour of its ports being used, but if public help is to be given, it ought to be given to publicly-owned propositions.

The former speaker also referred to pooling interests. I am not going into the matter in detail to-day, but I hope to do so later on in this House. If you deal with the transportation problem, you must deal with it as a whole. It will not do to deal with railways and to neglect transportation now performed by waterways, nor the future transportation of goods by airways. In other words, if you want to deal with the transportation problem to-day, the world has moved so fast that you cannot solve it properly unless you deal with it from every angle. To build up our ports and railways you have to go further, you have to find out not only how you can improve transportation by dealing with your railways, but you must also deal with the three or four or more manifestations of transportation and pool them. To-day you must pool things if you want to succeed. It is only by employing them all that you can make any headway.

I had something to do with the dream of the Niagara power development. It was made fun of at the time and Adam Beck was almost called a lunatic and discouraged in every way; but our dream came true. Now, I have a dream similar to that described by the preceding speaker (Mr. Woodsworth). I agree with him that on the Hudson slope we have the greatest potential water powers in the world. The people of Canada own them, but there are men in the United States and elsewhere, men with vast financial resources at their back, ready to grab these great national assets. Long distance high tension transmission is coming very rapidly. We have these and other great potential resources of electric energy, some owned by the provinces and some by the Dominion, but as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, we must get the necessary legislation to enable us to handle them. Our constitution, drafted sixty years ago, is rather an old-fashioned instrument, and we have not the means in our own hands of amending it. It will be said by some hon. members: You are suggesting separation from England. I am suggesting nothing of the kind. But I want to see the parliament of Canada made so efficient that it can deal with this and other problems as they arise. These great national problems we are not able to deal with under our present constitution. Last week, for instance, we found we were hampered in dealing with old age pensions. The same incapacity handicaps us in dealing with our power problem. All these questions broaden as the years pass, and this parliament should be in a position to deal adequately with our national problems, especially those which, solved in the proper way, will make life more livable for every Canadian citizen. Our opponents want to monopolize these vital public services for their own financial benefit rather than for the advantage of the people.

I agree largely with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said in connection with this question, and I have thrown out a suggestion to my friends from Nova Scotia. As one member of this House, I am ready to back up Nova Scotia in a publicly-owned development of her coal mines and the distribution of power generated by steam plants at their pit heads, the generation and distribution to be undertaken by the province as a public ownership enterprise. I wish to see Nova Scotia given a chance to work out this great problem right at home. Many of those who want the Dominion to aid such enterprises desire the aid to go to private individuals. I am not in favour of that, but I am ready to back up Nova Scotia to-morrow if she will go ahead and solve this problem on a public ownership basis. I would also like to see her go into the coking business so as to produce coke in sufficient quantities to ship to Quebec and to Ontario, for as I see it the fuel market of the central provinces belongs to Nova Scotia. I would not like to see this developed as a means of private profit but rather in the direction of service to all the people, and for that reason I have trespassed on the time of the House for a few minutes in making these suggestions.

Capital is becoming so strongly entrenched that the legislatures of the country, whether provincial or Dominion, must take great care to protect the public domain. Fortunately no monopoly, however securely it may seem to be founded, is impregnable, for undoubtedly scientific development will eventually render many present types of machinery obsolete. The surprise of the world to-day is not what science is doing now but what it will be doing to-morrow, and what it will be doing to-morrow may be in the direction of scrapping the very things behind which capital has entrenched itself.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, this resolution proposes:

> That, in the opinion of this House, measures should be taken to regain for the use of the people the coal mines and water-powers which are now being exploited in the interest of private corporations rather than for the needs of the people.

I submit, Sir, that in so far as Canada is concerned the coal mines and water powers which are now being "exploited"—I prefer "operated"—are being operated for the use of the people. There is a clear distinction between the views of the people in the province of which I represent a constituency and those of the people of Ontario. In our province we believe in developing industry by individual initiative, individual enterprise, individual management, under public supervision and control. I do not wish to precipitate a contest of opinion as to the merits of the hydro-electric services of Ontario and the hydro-electric services of Quebec, but if there were time and opportunity I think I could vindicate before any independent tribunal the opinion which we in that province entertain, that our services are cheap, stable and well managed and serve the public interest to an extent that has not yet been achieved in the province of Ontario. So long as the people of the province of Quebec entertain that opinion, I think it is expedient that they should be allowed to proceed along their own lines, pursuing their own ideals and accomplishing the results which they have in view, and which are very necessary for the prosperity of the industries of that great province. Therefore perhaps it is that the Fathers of Confederation in framing the British North America Act left property and civil rights within the control of provincial legislatures, so that the legislature immediately responsible to the people of each province could be guided by the opinion of that province both with respect to industrial development and to such developments as coal mines and water powers.

The situation of Canada at the present time is that the development of hydro-electric power and energy for lighting and power purposes in each of the provinces is controlled and directed and supervised by commissions appointed by the governments of those several provinces. There you have a very effective control. It is true that we have vested in the crown, as represented by the Dominion government, large water powers in the territories which undoubtedly are soon to be vested in the several provincial legislatures, but I will say that I do not believe any department of the Dominion government is more honestly and more efficiently managed, supervised and controlled than is the Water Powers branch.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I quite agree.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think in any developments which have taken place under the direction and control of that branch there has been one single bit of jobbery. If such has happened I do not know of it, and I know most of the developments which have taken place. Therefore it is far better to leave this matter to the control of the local legislatures and the local governments who, under the constitution, have that right. It is far better, because it gives to each legislature the right to represent the mentality of the people of that province. It so far has satisfied the people of Ontario in developing the Hydro Electric Power Commission, which is a local government commission. But you could no more procure the people of the province of Quebec to accept governmental ownership as well as governmental control and supervision, than you could induce them to accept the prohibition principles which are accepted in other provinces of Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Or women's franchise!

Mr. CAHAN: Nor women's franchise. That is a fair suggestion by my hon. friend.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will my hon. friend pardon me?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has not the province of Quebec public ownership in the distribution and sale of liquor?

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly; it suits our circumstances, our conditions and our mentality, and we accept it. But simply because we have public ownership and direct control of the sale of liquors in the province of Quebec it does not mean that we should accept the Ontario idea as to hydro-electric ownership. Furthermore I will say to my hon. friend that I have lived in the province of Quebec for many years; I go back and forth from my home to my office, and I do not believe there is a city on this continent of similar size where there is less drunkenness and less evil results from the sale of liquor as it is sold than in the city of Montreal, where I reside.

I have an idea;—and I may say that I suggested it to my hon. friend who moved this resolution—one of those erratic ideas which may be perhaps peculiar to myself and a few others, but I have had some experience in hydro-electric development and the development of electrical energy by steam. Personally I am inclined to believe that in fifty years electric energy will be developed from some other sources than hydro-electric power, so cheaply as to make the investments of this country both private and public, in hydro-electric power almost completely worthless. We are on the eve of great developments in regard to the production of electrical energy. Look back, if you will; I was jotting a few notes with my pencil when my hon. friend was speaking. Up to 1855 on this American continent we used sperm oil for lighting purposes, and for certain heating purposes as well. At that time one might well have advocated government monopoly in the production and use of sperm oil. But in 1875 the use of gas for lighting purposes was introduced in the United States, and you might then have had exactly the same demand for a public monopoly of the production and use of gas for lighting purposes. In 1900 electric lighting was introduced, and since that time there has been in many districts municipal ownership of electric lighting plants. In other districts such plants are operated by private companies, but I venture to say that in the United States to-day, where private companies are operating under reasonably sound municipal or state supervision, you would not find the people adopting public ownership of lighting plants. Private ownership is more efficient and I believe it results in a cheaper service to the people all round. That is a matter which I do not wish to go into at length; it is an opinion which I have and which I could back up with ample statistics if there were time.

The development of these systems depends upon private initiative. The invention of the tungsten-film bulb saved the United States at least one hundred million dollars a year, and we would never have heard of that if there had been a public monopoly of lighting. The initiative of the individual has developed these lighting, heating and power services to an extent which never could have been attained under public ownership, I am sure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I recall to the hon. gentleman that we had a very fine type of wheat developed by a servant of the Dominion government.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, and as well might my hon. friend urge that the parliament of Canada make an appropriation to take over the entire wheat fields of the northwest, as to invite parliament to make an appropriation of $800,000,000 or $900,000,000 to take over the hydro-electric and steam power producing plants of this country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We in the west might not object to that.

Mr. CAHAN: While wheat is selling at present prices my hon. friend would undoubtedly claim a high price for his land.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No more than a private individual would.

Mr. CAHAN: But if the public is to purchase those lands, I would suggest a delay of six or eight years until Russia begins to produce wheat again. If my hon. friend is then producing wheat he will be glad to go into another kind of crop, and only produce wheat for consumption at home rather than for exportation to countries where the price is regulated by the local demand.

Taken as a whole, the lighting and power services of Ontario are no cheaper than those of Quebec.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the hon. gentleman give us the amount the ordinary consumer has to pay in the city of Montreal?

Mr. CAHAN: I have not the figures at hand, but I have seen them a dozen times, and if it were important I would go into it, because I am thoroughly convinced that I am right. Furthermore, some references were made to the president of Montreal Light, Heat & Power Consolidated. It must be remembered that Montreal Light, Heat & Power Consolidated—in which I have no personal interest whatsoever except in the consumption of a small amount of light and gas each month in my apartment—paid $650,000 a year in federal income tax to the treasury of this country, while in Ontario there is not one dollar paid by the Hydro Electric system to the federal treasury. Therefore, Montreal Light, Heat & Power, which I refer to simply because it is one of several power companies, pays in its municipal and other taxes an amount far greater than is paid by the Hydro Electric for similar public purposes to the municipalities or to the province of Ontario.

Again, talking about the taking over of coal mines! I understand the situation in England where, ever since electrical energy was developed by steam, they have maintained municipal lighting plants, and these municipal lighting plants are operated in every case by steam. I can understand why there should be advocated for England a national system, because no individual and no corporate company could now secure from the British parliament the rights which are necessary in order to consolidate those various plants, although individual initiative would do it far more efficiently and render a far cheaper service than could be obtained by governmental assistance or governmental promotion; there is no doubt about that. Therefore, it is now suggested in England that, near the mines, the refuse coal should be burnt up, producing thereby electrical energy for distribution throughout the length and breadth of that country in the zones in which these plants are operated, and that great work there can only be carried out by the government because it is impossible for a private company or a private individual to obtain the necessary legislation or to break down the municipal opposition which has been engendered to that scheme. But in this country we are in an entirely different position. I grant that the water-powers should be utilized for the uses of the people; I grant that coal should be utilized for the uses of the people; but they are being utilized for the people now, and as soon as the government of this country undertakes to take them over and develop them on the socialistic principle, and supply light and power throughout the length and breadth of this land by government agency, just so soon will you have that service characterized by a dishonesty and inefficiency which no longer prevails with respect to the local and private enterprise.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask if the coal mining industry has been efficient in either the eastern or the western part of this country?

Mr. CAHAN: I think that coal mining in Nova Scotia and in Alberta, about which I know something, is being done fairly efficiently. The great difficulty with coal mining in Canada to-day is that it is a seasonal occupation. I went through the strike in 1909 in Cape Breton; I was through it from beginning to end, and I came in contact with all the various opinions prevalent there. Last summer I had the opportunity of discussing that same problem with a number of very intelligent men from that province, and I believe—it is my individual opinion—that the difficulty in Cape Breton arises from the fact that the employment in the mines is not continuous and stable. I do not believe there is a miner in Cape Breton to-day but would accept a lower wage, and give a greater output per man, if he could be assured that, instead of being employed for only five or six months of the year in mining, he could be employed during the whole twelve months, save for an occasional holiday that might be necessary. That is the difficulty in Cape Breton, so far as coal mining is concerned. Change that from a seasonal occupation to a continuous occupation throughout the year, for which and during which the miners would be paid, a reasonable wage, and lower than they are being paid to-day, would be acceptable if the employment were continuous, and the difficulty would be largely solved.

But further—I am talking as an amateur who is interested in this subject, having jotted down some notes while my hon. friend was speaking—the chief difficulty does not arise out of the mining of coal; the difficulty arises out of the utilization of the coal after it is mined. What I mean in this: There is no more wasteful habit that could be possibly cultivated by the people of Canada than the burning of raw coals in their hearths, in their stoves, or for the production of steam power. If my memory is right, every ton of good bituminous coal sacrifices, when burnt in the oven, at the hearth or in the furnace, 11,000 cubic feet of gas, 9 gallons of tar, 25 pounds of ammonium sulphate, 2.08 gallons of pure benzol and .56 gallons of pure toluol, and if we could establish plants in this country for the production of coke, and use that coke for the production of heat and of steam, and utilize these by-products which are now wasted and sacrificed, the value of these by-products would cut down the price of coal for industrial purposes in this country to a point lower than it has been during the past twenty years.

There is the difficulty. It may be that, in order to utilize the coal, government assistance may be helpful along certain lines, but government acquisition and government management of the coal mines in the present political conditions of this country—I hardly know what word to use, but it is practically impossible to do it honestly and efficiently under governments and under political parties as they are now constituted in this country.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Does the hon. member say that in the administration of the Ontario Hydro Electric system there has been mismanagement or any kind of corruption? I say it is the best example in the world of the success of public ownership, and it has set the pace for all the private-owned companies in the world.

Mr. CAHAN: I was not talking of hydro-electric development, but of coal mines in Nova Scotia and Alberta. I am not casting any reflection upon the administration of the Hydro Electric in this province under the late management or under the present management, except to say that it is not so efficient and not so satisfactory in its results as we get from the operation and control by private companies in the province of Quebec. That is my opinion; my hon. friend is entitled to reserve his own. I was talking about the utilization of coal. Now there the government of the country might intervene and assist. Furthermore we are on the eve of still greater developments in the matter of fuel. There is enough fuel between Ottawa and Montreal, and I believe it will be developed within the next twenty-five or thirty years, in peat beds to permit of supplying at a much cheaper rate than is now being done the entire industrial needs of the western part of the province of Quebec and eastern Ontario. The fuel is there. It can be utilized and it will be utilized some day. It is not, I suggest, the duty of the government—especially the federal government which has no control of these matters of property and civil rights—to undertake the ownership and management of either water-powers or of coal. I suggest again, with regard to water-powers, that within fifty years we will develop electrical energy in such shape and form, and transmit it so cheaply and efficiently, as to render water-powers almost valueless. As to coal we should now attempt to utilize its by-products and save the millions that are going up in smoke every day in this country, save them as they are doing in the public interest in other countries, especially in Germany and in some parts of the United States. The time will come when private enterprise and individual initiative and invention will find some way of utilizing our peat so as to give us cheaper heat, cheaper power and cheaper light than we have at present through either of the other sources. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I certainly am opposed to this resolution because I see no need for it. It would be suicidal if parliament adopted it and carried it into effect.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member give us some idea of where we are going to get that cheap power in the future of which he speaks?

Mr. CAHAN: I gave my suggestion.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, but where are we going to get this power which is going to put water-power into the discard?

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I do not pretend to speak from a scientific standpoint but I will say this: If you had asked me five years ago whether we were going to have communication through the air by radio I could not have told you. I believe we are on the eve of developing electric energy from the air at a cheaper rate than electric energy has ever yet been developed. I believe that within twenty-five or thirty years at the most we will be able to utilize our peat beds to supply cheaper electric energy, if you will, but certainly cheaper heat which produces electric energy, than is now developed from the coal which we use.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that we are on the eve of very great and important changes in hydro-electric development. I quite expect to see, even within my own lifetime, some tremendous changes in that regard. I hope to see within the very near future—I fully expect to see it—the transmission of hydro-electric energy without the use of transmission wires. Experts are now getting very close to the point in their experiments where it will be possible to transmit electric energy for very long distances without the use of wires. When that comes about it will mean a tremendous revolution in hydro-electric development in all parts of the continent.

The previous speaker made one or two references which I cannot allow to pass unchallenged. He stated that under private ownership there is a certain amount of initiative which you are hardly likely to have under public ownership. I think I am quoting the hon. gentleman correctly. With that particular statement of his I am bound to take issue. I come from a city where we have quite a large hydro-electric undertaking which is entirely publicly owned and publicly controlled. There is no commission in charge of it, it is controlled by the city council of Winnipeg. Before Winnipeg went into its own hydro-electric development the people of that city were paying 20 cents per kilowatt hour. The moment it became mooted that the city was about to develop its own electric energy and supply it to the people the price came down to 10 cents per kilowatt hour. When the civic hydro-electric development became an actual fact the city council supplied the people with electricity at 3½ cents per kilowatt hour. In addition to that there was a 10 per cent discount. Now the average rate of hydro-electric energy to the domestic consumer in that city is just slightly over two cents per kilowatt hour. There is no privately-owned concern on the continent which can compare in the matter of initiative with the publicly-owned utility of the city of Winnipeg. I say that because for a number of years I had some connection with it, being a member of the Winnipeg city council. In fact so enterprising is the management of this utility that the opponents of public ownership are always on the alert and always on the move to try and check the initiative which it displays at various times.

Now what have we done with this publicly-owned utility? I wish to say that we are even ahead of the city of Toronto in that regard. What is the use of a publicly-owned utility unless it can give better service than one which is privately-owned? I say that these publicly-owned utilities can and do give better service than privately-owned concerns no matter in what part of the country they happen to be. If they were not doing that there would be no publicly-owned utilities. Now, our own public utility in Winnipeg, in addition to giving one of the lowest rates of any prevailing on the American continent, has introduced the very latest developments in hydro-electric enterprise into the homes of the people. Housewives, who at one time found their work a drudgery, have experienced great relief as a result of the enterprise which has been shown by our hydro-electric system. I think I am correct in stating that there are more electric appliances used in Winnipeg than are to be found in any other city of the same size in any part of the world. In the city of Winnipeg there are several places where these electric appliances may be bought on easy terms by the people. Each year private corporations in that city have complained because the civic hydro-electric management can sell at a lower rate and give better service than private corporations.

What else have we done in Winnipeg? In addition to bringing about a most important electrical development there we have done something which no other city in Canada has done as yet. As the result of our electrical development Winnipeg has the first publicly-owned central heating system in the Dominion. There are approximately one hundred of the large buildings in the centre of the city which are heated from the central heating system, and perhaps it would be of interest to hon. members to find out how that came about. A few years ago Winnipeg was troubled very much by the storms which blew down the transmission lines between Pointe du Bois, where we get our hydro-electric energy, and the city. Accordingly it was decided to establish a steam standby plant so that at any time when the wires were down the city should not be without a continuous hydro-electric service. Following the establishment of that standby plant we installed a central heating system so that the boilers necessary for the steam standby plant could also be used for the purposes of a central heating system. The consequence is, as I have already mentioned, that a very large portion of the centre of Winnipeg is now heated by the central heating plant. What is more important than that is the fact that as a result of our having that plant in Winnipeg there are certain times of the year when we do not use even one ounce of coal to heat a very large portion of the city. The heating of these buildings in the centre of Winnipeg is done by hydro-electric energy which comes a distance of 78 miles over transmission lines, and by the white fuel, as we term it. We heat a very large portion of the city at times by the utilization of off peak power, when it would otherwise be necessary to use coal. Now no private enterprise in this country has gone as far with this form of public utility as the city of Winnipeg. No other city in Canada has a central heating plant attached to its electrical development and can utilize the off peak power to heat buildings. Hon. members tell us that under public ownership there is less initiative than under private ownership. One fact mentioned by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) was that $650,000 was paid by the Montreal Light Heat and Power Company in income tax. I wonder where they got the $650,000? And when they paid that amount in income tax, I wonder how much their profits must have been for the year? If they had no profit, they would never have paid that money. But there is one thing, that where we have a publicly-owned utility, as we have in Winnipeg, or as they have in Ontario, if any profits are earned, those profits go to the consumer. In Montreal, if I remember my figures correctly—and I can be corrected if I am wrong—the cost to the consumer is about twice as much as it is in the city of Winnipeg. In Winnipeg, which is about one-fifth the size of Montreal, our total revenue from the sale of hydro-electric energy amounts to approximately $2,000,000 per annum, and, assuming that three times the quantity of electricity is sold in Montreal as in Winnipeg, it would amount to $6,000,000. Hon. members can easily figure out how much more the people of Montreal are paying for their light, heat and power, and can understand why the private corporation in Montreal is able to pay $650,000 income tax. I might give one other instance in regard to what we call initiative. I sometimes wonder what hon. members mean when they use that word. It is rather a difficult word to try to understand, and one would think from what we hear, that it was only in private ownership that there was an initiative. In other words, I would understand it to mean that a man shows initiative when he is working for a private corporation in order that he might make additional gain or profits. I think I am correct in that assertion. But, Mr. Speaker, there are to-day professions where people study, give their energy, give the best that is in them and give their very life, where there is not one cent of profit to them. There are men practising in the medical profession who come under that category. It is one of the traditions of the men and women who work in that profession, who give of their talents, their skill and their lives, that they shall not receive one cent of reward for anything they may discover as the result of their own private initiative.

Mr. CHABOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: The men of the medical profession have for years laboured hard, and when they discover something of benefit to humanity, they give it to the world without any reward, except perhaps the honour or glory that is bestowed on the man or woman who makes the particular discovery. In recent years people have recognized, even in this parliament, the work of men like Dr. Banting, who discovered the insulin treatment for diabetes, and yet Dr. Banting and those who were associated with him did not have any reward in view when they were labouring to make this discovery. But men of the medical profession have laboured because they thought they might render a service to mankind.

An hon. MEMBER: They are not business men.

Mr. HEAPS: No.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What about scientists such as Marconi?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, many men have worked for the benefit of humanity. It has been a time honoured custom with men of that class that when they have discovered something they have never attempted to commercialize it. We all know and recognize that fact. Then if it is possible in the medical profession it is possible in other lines of activity as well. When hon. members say that under public ownership there can be no initiative, I think they have not given sufficient study to the meaning of that word in relation to public and private enterprise.

No hon. member in this House who understands the development of public utilities in this country or any other country can rise in his place and defend private enterprise. Why it was private enterprise that gave us the Canadian National railway. It was the muddle and mess that private ownership made of that undertaking that compelled the government to take hold of it. If private enterprise is so beneficial to a country, why did they not make a success of it before it came into the hands of the government? And now that the road is in the hands of the Dominion of Canada, if the people of Canada will allow the management to operate the road free from interference by individual members of this House and free from politics, it will be a success, the same as other public utilities have been.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The resolution placed before the House by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, measures should be taken to regain for the use of the people the coal mines and water-powers which are now being exploited in the interest of private corporations rather than for the needs of the people.

I do not intend to detain the House more than a few moments, nor do I intend to espouse the cause of private or public ownership, but simply to point out some of the difficulties which we must meet in connection with a resolution of this kind. One of the first difficulties is that under the Act of Confederation those public utilities which are mentioned in the resolution remain under the control of the provincial government. But I agree with my hon. friends who have spoken that a great deal can be done to bring about uniformity in the mining of coal, for example, and uniformity in connection with the development of water-powers. The province of Ontario perhaps is the great, outstanding example of the utilization of electrical energy by public enterprise, and has given the lead in that direction. There are other provinces which have not followed in their footsteps up to the moment, but Ontario is the outstanding example of the development of this public utility under provincial government auspices. The federal government controls the natural resources of the three prairie provinces. In Alberta we have coal mines carried on to a very considerable extent and in the other provinces we have the development of water-powers. I intend to speak only of what the federal government has done in this connection. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, the federal government no longer sells our natural resources; it issues leases which carry very strict provisions for a certain number of years for the development of water-powers and the same thing prevails in connection with coal mines. The privately-owned coal mines in Alberta were disposed of years ago; none has been disposed of in that manner since 1907. The stage is all set, if needs be and if unanimity of opinion should prevail with the provinces for the development of coal mines, if you will, under public auspices. The same condition prevails in Nova Scotia where coal mines are owned by the provincial government and operated under private enterprise.

I want to speak for a moment of what we have been able to do in connection with the preservation of the forest wealth of the country. The same condition prevails. The provincial governments, with the exception of the three prairie provinces, own and control their forest wealth. In my attempt to get uniformity of action I found a great deal of suspicion abroad in the minds of the provincial authorities, and I admit that the feeling is sometimes too prevalent that there is a desire on the part of the federal authorities to interfere with provincial rights. The provincial authorities are always jealous and suspicious of their provincial rights and perhaps they have a right to be. But in the case of forestry we simply had to mention the fact that more forest wealth was being destroyed in Canada by fire and insect pests than we were manufacturing and selling in the finished state and we were bound to take some action hoping in some way to stem that devastation of our forest wealth. We began to approach the problem three or four years ago from the angle of inviting annually to conferences representatives of the provincial governments. We have accomplished a great deal in this way and we have learned a great deal from the provincial officials. But what we are aiming to do and will have done within a very short period is to have a uniform system of cutting from one end of Canada to the other. We have not accomplished as much as we would like to do, but we have made splendid progress in that direction and I think we are at the stage now where we can change our own system of forestry. In other words, we can take the control of cutting which formerly was under the Timber branch of the Department of the Interior and put it under the control of the Forestry branch. Let me mention one recent lease issued in Manitoba for cutting pulpwood. In that lease provision was made for reforestation of the area as it was cut. In other words, the cut will be over a period of twenty-five years under reforestation regulations which will renew the growth in twenty-five years so that you will have a perpetual forest for the maintenance of the mill. These are some of the things we have been able to accomplish by the simple expedient of getting representatives of the provinces to meet with the federal authorities and to agree on a uniform system of handling this great natural resource of Canada.

I believe a great deal could be accomplished in the same way for the coal mines. Very few of the provinces are selling their water-powers in toto to-day; they are nearly all leasing them, and probably the day will come when the provinces themselves will think it is good business to operate their water-powers and electrical systems as Ontario is doing and as the federal government is doing in a much larger way in the operation of the Canadian National Railways. The primary object behind anything I have been advocating or been able to accomplish in this connection is to conserve to the people who come after us this great natural wealth which we own in such abundance in this country. We know beyond question of doubt that coal is being mined to-day in a most extravagant manner and we are making examination into a better method of coal mining in order that that natural resource may not be dissipated at such a rate as it is going to-day.

Something has been said—and I think a great deal more may be said—upon the subject of investigation and study of better methods for the conservation of our natural resources and the manufacture of them. We have in the departments of the federal government—and the same thing is true of the provincial governments—a body of men who are zealously carrying on this work. More and more our attention is being directed towards it; more and more research work is being carried on, and while we spend a great deal of money for example in an endeavour to utilize low grade coals in the Saskatchewan area and have been criticized for that expenditure, much progress has been made in the solution of that problem.

The same thing may be said of peat which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) mentioned this afternoon. The government of Ontario and the government of Canada by joint action have developed machinery whereby peat can be manufactured economically and sold as a fuel in this part of the country. True, you cannot ship it any considerable distance, but we know how the work can be done. The company who undertook to finance this plan have encountered some difficulties, largely because of the unsympathetic attitude of the people with respect to the manufacture of this fuel, and naturally it has the antagonism of the coal men. All these factors tend to make the matter somewhat difficult, but if we have in mind all the difficulties that are in the way, I think the main function of the government in working towards this end that is so eminently desirable, is to carry on these investigations. We are carrying them on in a number of ways. One discovery that has been mentioned, the value of which nobody can estimate even in millions, is that of Marquis wheat. At the moment an investigation is being carried on for the purpose of discovering if possible how to eliminate the recurring seasons of rust that strikes the wheat crop of western Canada and indeed the wheat crop of eastern Canada. At least fifty or sixty important investigations are going on at the present moment, all with a view to the better utilization of our natural resources, to the prevention of disease, to the discovery of new methods of utilizing the natural products of the country, and at the same time you will have an enlightened and educated public opinion so that, after the demonstration of public administration of our National railways and public administration by the Hydro Electric of Ontario, you will not have any difficulty in persuading the various provinces to join hand in hand in bringing about public ownership of our water-powers and coal mines. That is my candid opinion and I rather welcome a discussion of this kind because it focuses public opinion upon what has been done and the possibilities for the future. The discussion will not have been in vain, but I do say that the success at Winnipeg, the success of the hydro development in Ontario, the success of the Canadian National Railways will all tend—

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And the Toronto street railway system.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If you will. Generally speaking, I am bound to say that public ownership has proven to be successful and in the best interests of the consumer; and after all, he is the patient, burden-bearing individual of this or any other country, and his interest is but too frequently lost sight of.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I fail to see how the House can very well divide upon this question without doing some damage to the very pleasant relations now existing between the provinces and the federal government with respect to these matters. As I have tried to point out, there is always the fear that we are encroaching upon the prerogatives of the provinces. I would be very glad indeed if my hon. friend would withdraw his motion, the discussion having served the purpose for which he introduced it. But if he presses it to a division, personally, while I am thoroughly in accord with public ownership, I do not want to get in the position of serving notice on the provinces that they must do certain things or this government will interfere with what are clearly provincial rights and provincial duties.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would not have risen but for the rather uncertain note in the last sentence of the Minister of the Interior's speech. He seems to think there is some special reason why the House should not divide on this motion, that it would be perhaps in the nature of an affront to provincial governments if we were to pass it. Well, I do not know whether that result would come or not; I do not see why it would. But whatever the consequences, the resolution has no terrors for me. I cannot see how anybody with any appreciation at all of the situation in Canada would dream of voting for the motion that this government, this parliament should take steps to become, I presume the owners,—we are going to regain them in some way or other—of the coal mines and water-powers of this Dominion so as to operate them for the use of the people. I do not know that we would require to discuss the general merits of public ownership as opposed to private ownership. I am in favour of both. Each has its sphere. But if the discussion would be appropriate on another occasion, it has no application here.

Whatever we are going to publicly own and operate, we are not going into the provinces to take provincial property and tell the provincial authorities that we intend to expropriate it from them and operate it ourselves. If we intend to extend the sphere of public ownership, surely we are not going to start first into property owned by the provinces, which they are quite at liberty to operate if they desire. It would be much better to start at something over which we have jurisdiction. There is a time and place for all things under the sun. There is a place for private ownership—a big place—and there is a place for public ownership; just where the line should be drawn is a question. It would be presumption, it would be folly, it would be madness for the parliament of Canada to indicate its intention to take over the coal mines of Nova Scotia, owned by the government of that province; to take over the coal mines of Alberta which are now, or are soon to be, I believe, the property of the government of that province. Whatever else we do we will surely not do that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wonder if the right hon. gentleman will permit me to say that I do not think he was present when I stated my idea of this resolution? Had he been, I do not think he would express himself as he has.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what is the hon. gentleman's idea of the resolution; I was speaking of my own idea of it, and I was gathering that idea from the wording of the resolution. How are we going to take measures "to regain for the use of the people" the coal mines of Nova Scotia? How could we regain them unless we took possession of them any more than they are regained to-day? The same would apply to the coal mines of Alberta; and likewise to all the water-powers. Our water-powers are pretty well understood to-day to be wholly within provincial jurisdiction. There has been some question as to certain of them—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is only—

Mr. MEIGHEN: In regard to canal development.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say that water-powers are well understood to be within provincial jurisdiction. If we are anxious, if we are pining, if we are really suffering from over-ambition to extend our public ownership activities at this time, there are many spheres into which we should step before we dictate to the provinces as to how they manage their own resources. Therefore without fear of offending anybody, without the slightest difficulty at all, I would vote against the resolution. The hon. member who moved it may have another interpretation, but I cannot conceive of any other interpretation consistent with what is the well understood division of rights and responsibilities in this country between the provincial and the federal authorities.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If no other hon. gentleman wishes to discuss the resolution the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the right to reply.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have anything to say in reply, and in deference to the suggestion of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), with the permission of the House I shall be very glad to withdraw the motion now that the discussion has taken place.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. gentleman leave to withdraw his motion?

Motion withdrawn.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY

MOTION TO REMOVE FREIGHT RATE DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST THE PORT OF QUEBEC

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie):

That, whereas, the Transcontinental railway was built for the purpose of providing the shortest possible route to the sea for prairie products as well as to develop the ports of Quebec and the Maritime provinces by facilitating the handling of those commodities by an all Canadian route; and

Whereas the fulfilment of this purpose has been prevented by the imposition of exorbitant and unjustifiable freight rates; and

Whereas the port of Quebec has exceptional advantages as a shipping point for export cattle, which advantages are lost to the grower owing to the impossibility of making up mixed cargoes in the absence of a steady supply of grain for export; and

Whereas it is desirable that the largest possible amount of this traffic should be diverted to Canadian ports, in order to maintain the purity of our grades in the interest of the producer as well as to develop our own seaports; and

Whereas appeals to the proper authorities, in this regard, have been in vain.

Therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of this House, freight rate discriminations against the port of Quebec should be removed and grain should be transported over this particular route on the same mileage basis as that applying from prairie points to the head of the Lakes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting the resolution which is now before the House I do so only because I feel that the time has now arrived when a question of such tremendous importance as the one involved should be settled once for all. In each of the sessions of the last parliament I brought the question of the rates over the Transcontinental railway to the attention of this House. In each instance the matter was received by the government so favourably and so sympathetically that I was encouraged in the hope that something would be done. But in spite of the pressure in this House and throughout the country, nothing whatever has been done to remove an injustice which is a serious handicap to the greatest of Canada's industries, and a fruitful source of discontent in important sections of this country.

To put the case succinctly, in 1903 the construction of the Transcontinental railway was undertaken by the Dominion government, the ostensible object being to provide the shortest possible route to the sea for prairie products, as well as to retain in Canada the movement of our grain and other products to Canadian ports. In spite of the fact that more than $170,000,000 has been invested in this project, it is not being used for the purpose for which it was constructed. The movement of grain to Quebec and the Maritime ports has been prevented by prohibitive rates.

By way of review of the circumstances connected with this matter I may perhaps repeat a good deal of what I said in this House on previous occasions. Older members will pardon me and will perhaps overlook the repetition, which is for the benefit of those who were not here during the last parliament. Armstrong is a point on the Transcontinental railway due north of Fort William and Port Arthur, and for the purpose of comparison in regard to rates it may be taken as the equivalent of these two points. The distance from Armstrong to Quebec is 959 miles, and the present rate on wheat between those two points is 20.7 cents per bushel. This rate is entirely out of line with the prevailing rates from prairie points to the head of the lakes. As an instance of this I may quote the Edmonton to Port Arthur rate of 15.6 cents per bushel, although the distance is 1,305 miles. On the basis of that rate the rate on wheat from Armstrong tc Quebec should be about 11 cents. I am quoting these figures only from Armstrong because the present rates on wheat to the head of the lakes apply to Armstrong, and consequently the discrimination applies only from there to the sea.

Under existing rates the only times grain goes forward through Quebec is after the close of navigation in the fall, or when there is a congestion at the head of the lakes. When grain is moved under these conditions the farmer receives about ten cents per bushel less for his wheat than the price to which he would otherwise be entitled. If this were the only grievance of the western farmer in this connection it would perhaps not be worthy of discussion here. The farmer's interests are prejudiced, however, during the whole season when grain is being moved by water from the head of the lakes. In explanation of that statement I may quote a few figures showing the cost of moving grain from the head of the lakes to Montreal by water. For the shipping season of 1921 the average cost of transportating wheat from the head of the lakes to Montreal, via Port Colborne, was 12.6 cents per bushel. In addition to that there was an insurance charge of 0.6 cents, or a total of 13.2 cents. The average for 1922 was 13.72 cents, plus 0.6 for insurance, making a total of 14.32. Had the 11 cent rate been in effect at that time it would have saved the farmers of the prairie provinces a very large amount of money. In 1921 our grain could have been delivered at Quebec by rail for 2⅕ cents per bushel less than it was moved by water, and in 1922 for 3⅓ cents less. Taking the amount of grain shipped from the head of the lakes in 1921 and 1922, an 11 cent rate would have saved the western farmers $7,273,000 in 1921 and $8,621,000 in 1922. In this case I am comparing Quebec and Montreal, taking the figures at which our grain could have been transported by rail to Quebec. The figures are hardly fair to my case, however, because Quebec is 180 miles further down the river than Montreal, and there should be, under normal conditions, a very much lower insurance rate from Quebec than from Montreal, because I am given to understand that a large percentage of the insurance rate from Montreal to Liverpool is based on the risks of the St. Lawrence river.

When we come to the succeeding years of 1923, 1924 and 1925, it is true that in those years the average cost of moving our grain from the head of the lakes by water to Montreal was less than this 11 cent rate. In 1923 the average was 10.91 cents; in 1924 it was 8.99 cents, and in 1925, 9.04 cents. In each of those years the grain was moved to Montreal at less than it could have been moved to Quebec by rail at the rate I have suggested. But I would like to point out that in each of those three years there were certain months during which the rates were considerably higher than the 11 cent rate. In May 1923, for instance, the average rate was 12.10 cents, and in October of the same year it was 12.61 cents. For the month of April, 1924, the average rate was 11.71 cents. During 1925, while the average rate was only 9.4 cents, we had a rate of 12 cents in the month of September, a time when navigation was open, when there was no ice and no extra insurance risks. Due to the scarcity of shipping and the fact that the shipping companies take advantage of such conditions, the rate went up to 12 cents per bushel. In the figures I have been quoting I have not included the grain ground in Canadian mills and shipped as flour. Neither have I taken into consideration grain moved by rail from the head of the lakes, so the actual loss to the farmer would be considerably more than the figures given.

I am not assuming, of course, that if this 11 cent rate were put into effect all the grain would move by rail to Quebec. But the assertion cannot be challenged that the imposition of such a rate would immediately create a maximum rate for lake and rail transportation, beyond which the rate on the lakes would never go. That statement, I am sure, will not be seriously challenged, and in presenting the case from the standpoint of the western farmer that is perhaps the most important aspect.

Again, with regard to the request that the rates be reduced to the prevailing rate to the head of the lakes, it can hardly be questioned that this is a fair rate, because the grades between Winnipeg and Quebec are very much more favourable; that is, the average tonnage one engine can handle, according to my figures, is 23 per cent greater than can be handled from Winnipeg to Port Arthur over the old main line. In other words, if the present rates for carrying wheat from Winnipeg to Port Arthur over the old main line are profitable to the railway, the profit should be 23 per cent more so in handling the grain over the Transcontinental railway, at the rates I have suggested.

It may not be necessary to deal with the question whether or not the present grain rates are profitable to the railways. That is sometimes brought into the discussion, but I think no one examining railway statistics will seriously contend that these rates do not allow both our railways a substantial profit. If one examines these railway statistics he will find that as soon as the grain begins to move in the fall the net operating surplus increases tremendously, and that it is reduced as soon as the grain-moving season is over. So I think the assertion that the railways are not making a profit at present rates cannot be defended. For the years 1921 to 1925, both inclusive, the amount of Canadian wheat shipped by water from the head of the lakes was 1,050,000,000 bushels, of which about one-half, or 556,000,000 bushels, went forward to United States ports. I maintain that with a fair grain rate over the Transcontinental railway, many millions of bushels of this wheat would have found its way forward to Quebec or Maritime province ports, leaving millions of dollars paid out in wages by our own railways, and, in addition, we would have maintained the purity of our grades, which are contaminated and seriously adulterated in the movement through United States ports.

There is another aspect of this question that affects us to a very considerable extent in western Canada, and that has to do with the cattle trade. I think it is generally taken for granted that no very considerable cattle trade can be built up at the present prevailing rates. It costs in the vicinity of $45 to transport a steer from Winnipeg to Liverpool to-day, and it is certain that we can never build up a very large cattle trade at such rates as that. There are exceptional facilities for handling cattle at the port of Quebec; we can handle them there much more conveniently, and save considerable money, than we can by shipping them to the port of Montreal. I might relate the case of a trial shipment made by the United Grain Growers of Winnipeg in 1923 to test out the facilities of the port of Quebec as compared with Montreal. It may be said of course that the distance from Winnipeg to Quebec over the Transcontinental is about 200 miles less than the regular route from Winnipeg to Montreal. In this particular case there was not only the saving of a great deal of time on the railway, but also a saving in feed and shrinkage, for when the cattle arrive at Quebec they are unloaded in the stockyards, which are situated right on the docks. This means a great deal to the shipper, because when the cattle are ready for the vessel they are driven directly aboard. At Montreal, on the other hand, the stockyards are about ten miles from the docks; the cattle have to be loaded up again in the cars, and as any cattle man knows, that is very hard on the cattle. The cattle have to be worried and abused, and it means a good deal of shrinkage.

Mr. MULLINS: I think the hon. member is wrong as to the distance of the stockyards from the docks in Montreal. I think it is no more than four or five miles, not ten.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understood that it was about ten miles, but it is immaterial whether it is four or forty miles. The point is the cattle have to be loaded up again in the cars, and I am sure my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins), who is a cattle man, will agree with me that that is a very serious matter, and means a good deal of extra shrinkage. The men in charge of this shipment of cattle told us that after they had delivered them there, they estimated the actual saving in feed and shrinkage would be not less than $5 per head. Now if we can save $5 per head by shipping through the port of Quebec, it will mean a great deal to the cattle industry we are trying to build up with Great Britain. In this particular case the United Grain Growers were obliged to make special arrangements with a steamship leaving Montreal, and to pay a bonus of $600 to get her to put into the port of Quebec and lift these cattle. In addition, they paid the full Montreal to Liverpool rate, so when you take into consideration that the full rate from Montreal to Liverpool was paid, and in addition a bonus of $600, and that they figure it nevertheless paid them to use the port of Quebec, you can understand what advantages would accrue to the cattle industry if we were able to ship our cattle regularly through the port of Quebec.

I wish to quote from a letter that I received last year from the Vice-President of the United Grain Growers, giving me some facts and figures in connection with this shipment. In part he says:

> The approximate difference in the running time to Montreal and Quebec last year was eighteen hours.

That is, the cattle were delivered at Quebec eighteen hours earlier than they could have been delivered at Montreal. He goes on:

> Naturally, the longer cattle are on the cars on a trip of this kind, the more they shrink. Further, it would be possible in a case of making trainload shipments to go through to Quebec with two feedings instead of one. This is not only a saving in feed, but a saving in shrinkage, as it is generally recognized that repeated loading and unloading is, within certain limits, of more injury to the cattle than benefit.

But I would point out that until we have a considerable amount of grain or other merchandise going forward to Quebec, we are not able to use that port for shipping our cattle, as it is necessary to make up mixed cargoes, and that is what is bothering us. If this rate were reduced to about 11 cents I believe that a certain amount of grain, not perhaps any tremendous volume, but a certain amount would finds its way down to Quebec at all seasons of the year. This would permit the making up of mixed cargoes, and we could then take advantage of the exceptional facilities of the port of Quebec for shipping our cattle.

I wish to quote very briefly from an editorial in the Manitoba Free Press to show the opinion of that paper with regard to this question. It says that the Transcontinental was built particularly so that we could use it for the movement of our grain in the winter months, but it points out that this has never been done. It says:

> Except for a brief period in 1916, when the line was taken over from the contractors, practically not a single bushel of grain has been hauled over it. For one very good reason. The line could haul grain at a low figure, and when it showed how low it could, the government put the rate up to a figure which put the line as a hauler of grain out of business. The rate was raised 400 per cent.

Then it asks the question:

> Why not put the line to the use for which it was built?
> Why not put in a rate which will enable the large carry-over of the western grain this season to go out through Canadian ports instead of by Buffalo in the spring?

It concludes as follows:

> The people in Canada would, we think, like to find out just whose sheltered interests are so needful of protection at the hands of the railway commission that faith has to be broken with the people of Canada, that Canadian ports have to be starved of their legitimate trade, that $170,000,000 has to lie neglected, and that the port of Buffalo has to be built up? It is indubitably time for a showdown.

In a later editorial, dated December 17, 1925, I find this:

> We would not under-rate for a moment the formidable advantages of the Buffalo-American channel for wheat shipments. It will always be largely used. Canadian shippers would not consent to any abridgment of their right to use it at will. By why to its natural advantages add artificial encouragement by penalizing the use of alternative Canadian channels? Canada has been doing this, or permitting it to be done, for many years;

Further on it says:

> For years past Canadian grain has always been able to get a rate to Buffalo from one-quarter to one-half a cent a bushel cheaper than the rate to Port Colborne and other lake ports. Not very much; but just enough to turn an ever-increasing volume of Canadian wheat into United States channels.

It goes on to say:

> Twenty years ago the Dominion of Canada, to check this outflow of Canadian grain through American channels, and for the purpose of giving our own ports in the Maritime provinces a chance to get at least some of this business, embarked upon a great national railway scheme. It spent 170 million dollars in building a railway from western Canada to Quebec and then onward to the Maritime provinces. This road was built to carry western grain to Canadian ports at a rate which would permit competition with the American route.
> When the route was completed the government of Canada put into effect a rate on wheat which was intended to prevent, and did most effectively prevent, wheat being shipped over it. This prohibitive rate being brought before the railway commission received the approval of that august body. The then chairman of the commission said in effect that while the Transcontinental railway had been built to carry grain cheaply it must not be allowed to do so as this would disturb vested transportation interests.

The editorial goes on to say:

> Nobody wants to put any obstacles in the way of the free flow of our export grain by the American route. But in the name of common sense let us give the alternative Canadian channels a chance to compete.

Most of the arguments I have used would possibly apply to the Maritime ports; I do not know. I have not studied the situation from that angle. I am presenting the case from the viewpoint of the western farmer, and I leave to my hon. friends from the Maritimes the presentation of their side of the case. But there is in a broader sense a national angle to this question. I think, therefore, the House should seriously consider this resolution, and I hope that it will be accepted.

Mr. CAHAN: Was not the basis of the rates to Fort William the subject of an agreement originally made between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the government?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Yes, what is known as the Crowsnest rates, but that does not alter the fact. We are in a position to prove that the railways are making money handling grain at those rates, and there is no justifiable reason why similar rates should not be granted over our own road to the port of Quebec.

Mr. CAHAN: Does that not mean that the Crowsnest pass rates should apply over the Transcontinental as far as Quebec?

Mr. CAMPBELL: That is the request the resolution makes.

Mr. CAHAN: Then could the hon. gentleman give us a reliable statement to offset the assertion contained in a return brought down by the government to this House last year to the effect that the Canadian National carried grain from the west to Port Arthur and Fort William at a loss of $6,000,000 per year; that they carried it at $6,000,000 less than cost in 1923 and in 1924. I have not that statement with me, but I made a clipping from a report of the proceedings before the railway commission a few days ago in which it was stated that evidence had been given before that tribunal to the same effect. I am not combating the hon. gentleman's contentions at all, but if he has any figures which would show that this statement made in a government return and the statement made by witnesses about ten days ago before the railway commission are not accurate, it would help us very much, I think, in coming to a decision with respect to this resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Perhaps the best answer I could give would be to quote the words of Sir Henry Thornton before a special committee of this House, I think two years ago. When he was asked about a certain rate and whether it was profitable or not, he said that any traffic officer could come and show quite correctly either a loss or a surplus in moving a certain commodity from one point to another point. That is, the showing all depended on how the figuring was done. I do not know how the figures to which my hon. friend refers were arrived at, but it is possible that they were reached by taking the interest on the whole of the capitalization of the Canadian National railway.

Mr. CAHAN: No, no, they were simply actual operating costs.

Mr. CAMPBELL: In figuring such costs consideration would have to be paid to the overhead. Let me say this: If the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, or any other hon. gentleman, takes the weekly earnings as they are published in the press by each of the railway companies and follows them in the fall when the grain begins to move and upward until they have reached the peak, and then downward until the movement of grain disappears, he cannot but be convinced that the railways make money on handling grain. The net earnings are very small in the winter and spring, but they mount tremendously during the grain-moving months. A study of those figures must convince anyone that the railways are making money out of the handling of grain. In 1922, the first year the Crowsnest rates were in effect, both the railways showed very much larger profits than they had shown the previous year, notwithstanding the fact that they had to take these low rates. Then if you compare the predictions made before the special committee on railways that investigated the questiion of these rates in 1922 by the traffic officials of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National with the actual facts, you will be convinced that the statements of these officials are not to be taken very seriously.

Mr. J. K. FLEMMING (Victoria-Carleton): The hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) has presented a question of very great importance with marked clearness from the standpoint of the western provinces. This question affects very materially the prosperity and well-being of the eastern provinces and of our Maritime ports. It vitally affects also the railways because it relates to their traffic, and the conditions under which that business is carried on will determine whether a profit or a loss will be made. The grain-growing interest in the west—and it is a great satisfaction to us from the east to observe that this interest has expanded in recent years and assumed such great proportions,—is handicapped by reason of the tremendously long haul by railway necessary to get to tidewater, and then the long ocean carriage involved in reaching the markets of the world. Hence the question of transportation is one of very great importance to this country. In my judgment it is one of national importance, and one that should be carefully studied by parliament with a view of arriving at a sound, sane Canadian national policy. Having concluded what that policy should be, we should press forward earnestly and determinedly in carrying it out.

It may not be inopportune to consider, even at some little length, the efforts that have been made during the years that have passed in connection with our transportation policy. We did not arrive at our transportation system as a result of one year or even ten years of effort. Fifty years ago and more we began the construction of a great transportation system in Canada when, by means of the Intercolonial railway the effort was made to bridge a gap of 500 miles of forest between the Maritime provinces and Quebec. That was the first step in the construction of a transportation system in Canada. We took a further step when, ambitious and courageous, if you like, we undertook years ago to finance the construction of a railway across the continent, to span the prairies, to cover the mountains, to reach the placid waters of the Pacific and to give us a Transcontinental railway when we had a population of less than 8,000,000. We went ahead with that project; in conjunction and co-operation with energetic, far-seeing men the work was carried out and the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed. We saw the vision of a great national system of transportation when we began the expenditure of millions of money for a canal system; up to the 31st of March, 1925, we had expended $224,000,000 on that work, and it is now part of our transportation system.

We went still further; in 1904 the government of the day in its wisdom thought it necessary that we should, in furtherance of that ambitious and courageous policy, construct another Transcontinental line to connect by the shortest possible route the plains, the place of great production on the prairies, with the eastern seaboard and the ports of Quebec and the Maritimes. We spent a great deal of money on the project. Some people questioned the wisdom of that policy, but we have now got past the point of its being a debatable question; we have made the expenditure, we have the railway, and we have to face conditions as they are.

We have gone on building up a great transportation system in the country, with one purpose in mind, seeing it from only one point of view, namely, transportation of the products of the west to the eastern seacoast, to give employment to our people, to make traffic for the railways, and to build up business, not only in the west, where they needed transportation, but in the east, as well as to improve conditions at the eastern ports. We continued that policy, and we are forced today, after fifty years, notwithstanding the fact that we have been so courageous as a young country in spending this money, to say that the condition is not satisfactory. Facts have been given to the House in regard to the amount of our shipments of grain through Canadian Atlantic ports, through American ports and through western ports, and the whole consensus of opinion, the whole force of the figures, compel the admission that at the present time the transportation of our products is not proceeding in a satisfactory way and that we are not realizing the vision of the men who started the building of this great transportation system. Instead of our traffic going, as it ought to go, through Canadian channels to Canadian ports for shipment to the markets of the world, it is being diverted or switched off at a tangent to other railways in another country, thereby increasing the traffic on foreign roads and helping to build up the business of a foreign country. There is no occasion to cavil about figures; a million or two bushels do not count one way or the other; but it is an established fact that a very large proportion of the products of the farms of Canada, particularly those of the western prairies, is not finding its way through Canadian channels to Canadian ports but is being diverted through American channels to American ports.

Some figures which I gave in the House some time ago on this subject were questioned, and perhaps I should apologize to the House; my figures were absolutely correct except that I used the word "grain" when I should have said wheat. I am sure you will admit, Mr. Speaker, that in the case of a new member on his feet for the first time in the House of Commons the mistake was a pardonable one. I made the mistake, however, and I do not quarrel with the reporter, because I probably used the word "grain" when I should have said "wheat." But my statement was entirely correct so far as it applied to Canadian wheat being shipped through Canadian ports and Canadian wheat being shipped through American ports; I was discussing nothing else and intended to discuss nothing else. I was making no reference to our shipments through Pacific Canadian ports. I always try and I always intend to try to be careful in any figures I give, and I was really concerned about it when my figures were questioned in this House. I knew I was on solid ground, because I had taken the figures from the report of the Royal Grain inquiry Commission; the exact figures will be found on pages 217, 203, and 204 of that report. The force of the argument, I say, remains unimpaired, because we were sending more than two bushels of our grain through American channels where one was sent through Canadian channels. That fact stands out in all its glaring intensity; we have to confront it, and we in this House should deal with it in some substantial way.

At six o'clock the Houses took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FLEMMING: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was referring to the great advance that had been made in in this country during the past fifty years in establishing and building up a vast system of transportation. I was trying to point out in my humble way the vision which the men who preceded us in parliament, the men who had to do with national movements in this country at the time of confederation, had of establishing in this land a great system of transportation which would run east and west and which would carry the ever increasing traffic of the western prairies along Canadian channels to Canadian ports in the east for shipment abroad. I said just before six o'clock that we had been disappointed in this transportation system that had been established at so great a cost, a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars; that it had failed largely to carry out the object for which the money was spent and the transportation provided.

In further evidence of that I want to give the percentages of shipments through United States and Canadian ports respectively for the years 1921, 1922 and 1923; and I am reading from the report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission the memorandum submitted by Mr. Scott at the request of the commission. He points out, giving the figures in bushels for the year 1921-22 and making a comparison between United States and Canadian seaports, that the exports of Canadian wheat in that year amounted to 74 per cent through United States ports and 26 per cent through Canadian ports. For the next year, the crop year of 1922-23, he gives the figures in bushels and I shall not trouble the House with them; but he again states the percentages: in that year we shipped 65 per cent of our grain products through United States ports and 35 per cent through Canadian ports. Coming down to the year ended 31st August, 1924, he gives the figures in bushels again, and shows that 66 per cent of our grain went through United States Atlantic ports and only 34 per cent through Canadian Atlantic ports. Those figures tell concisely the story of the failure of our great transportation systems to do the thing we had hoped they would do, its failure to accomplish for us the thing that would justify so tremendous an expenditure of public money in their construction.

The resolution presented this afternoon by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) deals with one particular part of the great transportation system, the Transcontinental railway. Nowhere else is the failure more absolute and complete than it is in connection with grain traffic on the Transcontinental railway system. The result is far from reaching the vision of that man of high ideals and noble purposes who conceived the idea of having the shortest possible railway route from the prairie provinces to Atlantic seaports, and it has failed entirely to justify the feeling that was held at that time, not only by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government but by this parliament and this country, that we would have at least one system of railway built to a high standard, with the best of grades, the best of curvatures, to carry successfully traffic from the west to the east. But it has failed, and I want to point out that there was no question in regard to the intention or the reason advaned for our making such a tremendous expenditure. Let us in this parliament consider that upon this one line of transportation, the Transcontinental railway, we expended over $165,000,000, and in addition to that we spent over $15,000,000 to build the Quebec bridge; in other words, more than $180,000,000 was spent out of the public treasury in establishing this line of communication. It was to do a great work, and that great work was set out clearly in the agreement made between the government of the day and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. I am going to read a paragraph dealing directly with the particular matter to which I refer, being part of chapter 71 of the act of the parliament of Canada, assented to on the 24th October, 1903, containing the contract as it was executed between the government of the day and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. This is the section:

It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government of Canada—

That is, the $165,000,000 was granted; for what?

—for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and the transportation of goods through Canadian channels.

Note the words "the express purpose." That ought to be clear enough; it is the express reason why the government granted the aid. This is what the company agreed to:

The company accepts the aid on these conditions, and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway, or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for points in Canada, be carried entirely on Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports.

The company further agrees that it shall not in any matter within its power directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall in all respects in good faith use its utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which the public aid is granted,—

Notice again that the company agrees in good faith to carry out the conditions upon which the public aid was granted,— —namely,—the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

The next paragraph also obliges the company to provide a steamship service in order that there shall not be advanced as a reason why they were unable to carry this grain through Canadian channels and Canadian ports to the markets of the world that there was no shipping available. They engaged to provide the necessary steamship service to supplement the land transportation.

Now, Sir, that agreement never went into effect. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company failed to take the railway over and operate it. But what happened? As a necessity the government of this country, this parliament if you like, had to take its own property and operate it, and to-day it is part of the Canadian National system. I want to make this point as clear and forcible as I possibly can, that there surely rests upon the government of this country, upon the Canadian National Railway management operating this railway, as binding and stringent an obligation as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company undertook when it signed that contract. There is surely no justification for saying that the Canadian National Railway management, operating that railway on behalf of the government and the people of this country, shall not carry out to the fullest extent the covenant which was entered into between the government of that day and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. If that is the case we must admit that there has been a most lamentable failure to do so, because the railway is not carrying a great grain traffic to the city of Montreal, to the city of Quebec and to the ports of the Maritime provinces. The reason is stated in the resolution of my hon. friend from Mackenzie, that the rates in force are "exorbitant and unjustifiable." Well, I always dislike being harsh and I am going to suggest to him that he strike out those words and insert the word "prohibitive." That word "prohibitive" exactly meets the case because the rates that have been applied are undoubtedly prohibitive. No traffic goes over the railway under those rates; no traffic ever will so long as they continue in force.

Rates have been established for the carrying of grain from the points of production in the west to Fort William for transportation by lake and rail or all water to Montreal or Buffalo, and at the latter port unfortunately a very considerable portion of the traffic finds its way out of this country. But the order in council which was passed in June, 1925, directs that the rates known as the Crowsnest pass rates shall be effective on wheat and wheat products. This is the paragraph of the order:

The committee are further of the opinion that as the production and export of grain and flour forms one of the chief assets of the Dominion, and in order to encourage the further development of the grain growing provinces of the west, on which development the future of Canada in large measure depends, it is desirable that the maximum cost of the transportation of these products shall be determined and known; and therefore the committee are of the opinion that the maximum established by the rates on grain and flour as at present in force under the Crowsnest pass agreement shall not be exceeded.

I am not going to quarrel with the government of the day because they put that paragraph in the order in council, but I am here to ask this parliament in the most solemn and serious manner: Is there any justification for drawing the line north and south through Fort William and saying that from the point of production to that point there shall be a certain rate upon grain, but east of that point the rate must be higher? I cannot bring myself to think there is any reasonable justification for any such arbitrary dividing line. I shall consider in a moment whether or not the statutory rate from the point of production to Fort William is too high, but before I give the House figures which I think are fairly conclusive on that point, I want to say that if that rate is too low, and if traffic cannot be carried with fair profit to the railways on that basis, then in all conscience the rate ought to be increased. But if it is high enough to give the railways a fair profit to Fort William, then the same rate ought to apply from that point east.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have some figures which I think will help to answer the questions asked by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) this afternoon in regard to the statement that grain was being carried to Fort William at a great loss to the railways. We have not access to the railways' books, and therefore in a sense we are not able absolutely to say whether or not that contention is incorrect, but we can get fairly good evidence that the rate does pay the railways, and the figures I now propose to present to the House will, I think, prove to be conclusive. I have taken the earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway for 1924 and 1925 and of the Canadian National Railways for the same years, and I have separated the net earnings into three periods, namely, January, February, March and April; May, June, July and August; and September, October, November and December. The figures of the net earnings for these two years are really illuminating. We will take first the Canadian National figures. They cover only the lines in Canada, so the totals will not correspond with the net earnings for the entire system, which of course include the United States lines.

The net earnings of the Canadian National Railways for the year 1924 were as follows: January, $16,989.91; February, a debit balance of $768,681.03; March, $1,400,289.18; April, $748,879.44, or a net earning in the first four months of $1,397,477.50. Then for the next four months: in May a debit balance of $433,-895.23; in June a debit balance of $974,131.38; in July a credit balance of $324,318.38; in August a credit balance of $252,882.25, or for the four months' period a debit balance of $830,825.98. Now we come to the last four months of the year: there was a credit balance in September of $1,515,058.46; in October, of $4,161,149.48; in November, of $3,367,164.60, and in December, of $2,154,065.17, or for the last four months a credit balance of $11,197,-437.71. Those four months were the grain carrying months of the year. Out of a total net earning for the year of $11,764,089.23, $11,-197,437.71 was earned in the last four months of the year. I think that is good evidence that the grain carrying business was not a failure.

Then we come to the year 1925. The first four months were as follows: January a debit balance of $126,982.08; February, $146,380.07; March, $960,186.09; April, $556,117.31, or for the four months a net earning of $1,535,701.39. Then in May there was a debit balance of $191,731.98; in June a debit balance of $991,-763.63; in July a credit balance of $1,317,362.95, and in August a credit balance of $1,901,816.37, or for the four months a net earning of $2,035,-683.71. Then the last four months of the year; September, $3,206,367.87; October $7,305,-836.34; November, $5,620,743, and December, $4,141,387.07, or a net profit for the last four months of $20,274,334.28, against a net profit for the whole year of $23,845,719.38. The last four months of the year, when the railways earned over twenty million dollars as compared with earnings of only about three million dollars for the rest of the year, were the great grain carrying months. The crop was heavy last year; the trains were numerous, and according to the figures it was a profitable business.

Now I will refer to the Canadian Pacific Railway, because it helps bring out the point I am trying to make. In 1924 the Canadian Pacific Railway net earnings for the first four months were $5,477,308.65; for the second four months, $9,712,074.46, and for the last four months $22,348,017.96. The same thing applies to the Canadian Pacific as applies to the Canadian National. The grain carrying months of the year were the big revenue producing months. For the first four months of 1925 the Canadian Pacific had a net profit of $4,980,859.20; for the second four months $10,412,262.31, and for the last four months a total net earning of $26,554,611.58. I do not say that that entire increase during the last four months of 1925 was because more grain was carried, but I do say that although it is not absolute evidence it is the best presumptive evidence that the grain carrying business was a profitable part of their work.

Look at the figures for the Canadian National Railways; in the month of October 1924—the biggest grain carrying month of the year—they had a net earning of $4,161,-149.48, or more than one third of their earnings for the entire year. In October 1925, when thousands of bushels of grain were moving every day, the Canadian National Railways had a net earning of $7,305,836, or almost one-third of the net earning for the whole year. I think that is fairly conclusive evidence that the carrying of grain is a pretty good business for both railways.

The complaint we have to make to-day is that the Transcontinental railway is not carrying any part of that profitable traffic; is not carrying grain at all. I should perhaps make an exception to that statement, to the extent that it may carry some grain from Winnipeg via Superior Junction to Fort William, but east of Fort William practically no grain is carried by the Transcontinental. I would like to point out one or two facts in connection with the earnings of the Transcontinental railway, because possibly it will surprise some members of this House, and certainly the people of this country, to learn the figures of its earnings and operating expenses. Mr. Scott in his memorandum dated Quebec, June 28, 1924, gives the figures, and to my knowledge they have never been questioned. He uses the term "last year." I am at a loss to know whether or not, he means the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924, but speaking of the Transcontinental, and of the fact that it was said to be going through a wilderness where there would be no local traffic, that all the traffic it could depend upon to make money for this country and justify its existence would be through traffic, he points out:

Its earnings were..	$14,139,136
Its expenses..	14,120,975
Surplus..	$ 18,161

And it did that without carrying grain traffic! I ask this House in view of the figures I have given, and which were largely the result of grain traffic, what would have been the result on the Transcontinental if it had been put to work and made to do the thing it was built to do, if it had carried millions of bushels of grain,—the express purpose for which it was constructed—in addition to the traffic which it did carry. The net result would have been that we would have had a railway showing a handsome surplus, able to help take care of some of the deficits on the railway west of Fort William. If my figures are correct, all that is required is to put the Transcontinental to work carrying grain at the statutory rates that are in force west of Fort William, and give it plenty of grain to carry, and then its earnings from that traffic, on top of its other earnings, will make it a splendid revenue-producing piece of property. Why should that road not be put to work doing the very thing for which it was built? Surely it is not because it starts from a point in Canada and carries traffic from the fertile prairies of the west over a splendid all-Canadian line of railway to Canadian ports, that this railway is not being used for the purpose for which it was constructed. Then what earthly reason is there why it is not being put to work for the express purpose for which it was built? I cannot conceive of the reason, Mr. Speaker.

We are told that if the statutory rates west of Fort William are made to apply east of Fort William, we shall have a rate war with the railways of the United States. I ask this parliament, in all seriousness: Are we to consider what action the United States railways may take when we are considering such a vital question as the transportation policy of this country? Are we to sacrifice the vision of the men who built this nation, of those who were here at its birth and laid the foundations better than they knew? Shall we sacrifice the vision of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party when they constructed the Transcontinental? I say no. Put the railway to work, to do the thing it was built to do.

I said that we should have in this country a sound Canadian transportation policy, a policy that will take our traffic from the west along Canadian channels to the east. That has been the vision of the great men of this country from confederation down to the present. We have heard a great deal during this session about the difficulties of the coal industry in Nova Scotia. Let me point out to the House that if you carry the grain and the cattle of the west by an all-Canadian route to Canadian ports on the Atlantic you will help greatly to remedy the coal situation in the Maritime provinces, and particularly the province of Nova Scotia. They have a market for their coal as long as they can ship it by water, but in the winter season, when shipment is no longer possible by the St. Lawrence, they cannot find a market for it, and that is the time of year when employment in the mines is lessened, when the mines run only two or three days a week, bringing hardship to the coal mining areas of that province. But if we would ship the products of the west to St. John and Halifax, vessels would be leaving our ports practically every day of the week carrying grain, and each vessel would require in her bunkers from one thousand to twelve hundred tons of coal. That would provide a local market for our coal—a market where there would be no question about transportation rates—with resulting great benefit to the coal industry of Nova Scotia.

I said that the carrying out of this sound Canadian policy would bring business to the east. The revival of business and the stimulus that would be given by this traffic would be very great, and it would be felt in many ways. Let me give you an illustration. The arteries in our body carry the life-sustaining, strength-producing blood to every part of the human system, and so, in a similar way, our railways and our canals are the great arteries through which should flow in undiminished, yea, in ever increasing quantities, the life-giving commerce of this great country. Going a step further with the simile, if one part of the human body fails to receive the life-sustaining, strength-producing blood, what will happen? That part of the body will become weak and unable to perform its proper function. It is exactly the same with our transportation, and that is just what has happened, Mr. Speaker. We take the increasing commerce of the west and carry it along Canadian channels up to a certain point, but at that point we allow it to be switched off to American railways, to be taken to American ports, to build up the business of American railways and American ports. The result is that the invigorating, life-giving commerce of this country, with its stimulating power on our whole business life, is lost to this country; it is switched off at a tangent and goes on foreign steel to foreign ports. Let us carry it to our own ports, and then the benefit of that life-giving stream will be felt in every part and parcel of eastern Canada, in every city and town of the Maritime provinces.

I do not want to detain the House at too great length. I have tried, Mr. Speaker, to show two or three things. I have tried to show that the railways are doing very well handling grain at the statutory rate that is in force west of Fort William. I have tried to point out, so far as the Transcontinental is concerned, which is the one line we are considering in this resolution to-day, that if that railway was given plenty of grain to carry at the statutory rate, its income would be substantial and it would be a profit-earning proposition for this country. I have tried to show that this traffic flowing steadily to the east, to the ports of the province of Quebec and the Maritime ports of Canada, would increase the business of the whole of eastern Canada, and would bring prosperity to parts of eastern Canada that now have great reason to complain. The vision of the men who founded confederation was that the ports of the Maritime provinces should be the great entrepot for the commerce of—what do you think?—for the commerce of half a continent. That has not materialized. We want to try to realize that vision to some extent by extending the carriage of traffic to the east as it ought to be extended. It is feasible; it is possible. The railway is there and the ports are there. It may be necessary to provide more elevator capacity and to have a little more wharfage accommodation at some of the ports, although Halifax and St. John are already equipped with some facilities and the port of Quebec is better off in these respects than either Halifax or St. John. But if proper accommodation were provided at all three ports, and if the traffic were allowed to go over the Transcontinental at the same rate that prevails west of Fort William, I believe a wonderful amount of business would be done on that railway; great advantage would follow to the line itself and much good would result to the people of Canada who own the railway. There would be undoubted advantage also to the Maritime provinces in that it would bring to their ports the traffic which will come over the railway.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): The resolution submitted by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) brings to the attention of parliament a familiar question which has been discussed here for the last twenty years or thereabouts. When the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada came to parliament in 1903 or 1904 and asked for power to extend its line of railway to the west, I had the honour of being a member of the Railway committee, and I heard all the discussions that took place at that time. The idea of having the Transcontinental railway arose out of the proposal made by the Grand Trunk. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had conceived the idea of having such a line which would bring the trade of the west down to the city of Quebec. The members representing the Maritime provinces insisted that if the Transcontinental was to reach the city of Quebec it ought naturally to be extended to the Maritime provinces. Then the old question arose that if the extension should take place what port should be chosen—would it be St. John or Halifax? Finally, after a lengthy discussion a compromise was arrived at by the selection of Moncton. The hope entertained at that time was to develop the northern territory of Quebec and the northern territory of its sister province of Ontario by means of the Transcontinental. That hope has been realized, although the extension of the line east from Armstrong to the city of Quebec met with a very strong opposition. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, however, had a strong belief in the future of Quebec and was strongly supported by his followers. He insisted on the contruction of that part of the line; the idea wa adopted by parliament, and when Sir Wilfrid's government went to the people on that occasion the undertaking was ratified by them.

The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) has read the pledge given by the Grand Trunk Railway at that time in regard to the routing of traffic. I do not know whether he noticed the old, familiar expression "when not otherwise routed by the shipper," but I remember it well. The routing of traffic was a bone of contention at the time of which I speak. It was held that if a shipper of grain in the northwest wished to route his grain via New York, provided he could get better terms there, there was nothing to compel him to ship his grain through Canadian ports. That was the first trouble we had to contend with. However, we hoped that when the road was built it would provide shorter and more direct communication with Quebec, that its undoubtedly great advantage as a natural port would be fully taken advantage of in the summer time, that St. John and Halifax would be the ports in winter time, and that ultimately the products of our west would be shipped through Canadian ports.

I think the resolution comes up at an opportune time. In his great budget speech a few days ago the Minister of Finance announced that after January 1 next all vessels with products from the Old Country would have to come to Canadian ports in order to enjoy the benefits of the British preference. At the time I speak of, over twenty years ago the former member for Cumberland, Mr. Logan, was an ardent advocate of the idea that imports of goods to enjoy the benefits of the British preference must come through the Canadian ports. The question now before us has long been agitated by the city of Quebec which has complained over and over again that it had not been fairly treated in this matter. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has made some reference to the stand taken in that regard by the city of Quebec, and I have under my hand some reports made by the Quebec Harbour Commission and letters written by Mr. Scott, a prominent resident of the city. The great contention was that the Transcontinental railway had been built at a cost of $170,000,000 for the definite purpose of bringing the trade of the northwest to Canadian ports. In 1922 it was stated that of grain from the northwest 64,000,000 bushels had gone to Buffalo, 7,000,000 to other United States lake ports, 80,000,000 to Georgian Bay ports and 4,000,000 to Montreal, a total of 152,000,000 bushels. This shows a great diversion of traffic which ought to come to Canadian ports. Have we been able to overcome that diversion? I think we have to some extent. I notice in the Commercial and Financial Review of the Montreal Gazette for the year 1925 an article by Mr. Robert W. Reford, a great authority on the Montreal harbour. He says there:

> The year 1924 had constituted a record for the number of ocean-going steamers sailing from the port of Montreal, but 1925 again topped the mark with 1,010, as against 988. This leads one to suppose an increase in the chief exports, and the returns show that 165,510,830 bushels of grain were shipped which is more than has ever been previously handled here. Excellent as are the present arrangements of the harbour commissioners, their foresight is even more commendable, and it is now only a question of two or three years when elevator No. 3 will have to be extended to its full storage capacity of 14,000,000 bushels to meet the steady growth of this trade.

If I remember rightly the port of Montreal was two years ago the first port in America for the exportation of grain. I hope we shall see a renewal of that satisfactory state of affairs and that it will be permanent. I am inclined to think that owing to its position Montreal will always remain the great summer port for eastern Canada. It is true that it is not without a rival. The port of Vancouver is becoming more and more important as regards our trade with the Orient and shipments through the Panama canal, but all authorities agree that Montreal will remain the first port of the province of Quebec and of Canada.

The hon. member for Mackenzie has complained that the farmers of the west do not enjoy the benefit of the Transcontinental for the carriage of either their grain or their cattle. Mr. Reford makes these remarks as regards the export of cattle last year:

> The number of head of cattle shipped this year from Montreal was 55,366, an increase of about 10,000 over last year, and the best showing since the embargo was lifted. Altogether there will have been about 110,000 head shipped from Canadian ports in 1925, which is a satisfactory though not particularly rapid growth in the trade.

He points out this fact:

> Shipowners have not been slow to recognize the growing requirements of this trade and this year the Donaldson line has put two more ships of the latest type on the service—the Carmia, which can carry over 1,000 head and the Diesel-engined Moveria, taking about 500 head. The White Star and Furness Withy and other St. Lawrence lines have also added to their cattle carrying capacity.

And he goes on to say that the cattle trade with England should be developed to a greater extent than it is at the present time. I think I have said all that I need say regarding Montreal.

I should like to read to the House the position taken on this question by the Senate committee which reported on the 9th of June, 1922. This is a non-partisan report, signed by Senator L'Esperance, and I should like to read it to the House, as giving a clear view of the situation. The report reads:

After careful consideration of all the evidence submitted, your committee is of opinion that there exists a most serious condition of affairs, with regard to the diversion of the western grain trade to New York and other United States seaports, for export. There seems to be no doubt that two-thirds, and probably four-fifths of that trade takes that route, and that we are paying many millions annually to United States railways, lake carriers and elevators, that would be earned by our own railways and train men, if it were possible to export this grain at Canadian seaports. Since this evidence was taken, and at the present writing, government statistics show that the diversion still continues, and that of the bountiful crop of 1921 no less than 99 million bushels of wheat went from Fort William to Buffalo.

After all the sacrifices that Canada has made in building three transcontinental railways, it is impossible that we should go on allowing our seaports to be deprived of their legitimate traffic, to obtain which our people have been and are being so heavily taxed. A persistence in this policy must inevitably lead to serious dissatisfaction not only in Quebec and in the Maritime provinces, but also amongst the farmers of the northwest, who will soon realize that these hostile railway tariffs are imposing a burden upon them which they are not called upon to bear.

It may be, as some of our railway witnesses have suggested, that a reduction in the rate upon grain to our seaports might lead to reprisals and corresponding reductions on the part of United States railways which have been handling so large a share of this traffic. But this cannot be injurious to our own railways, because it is an export traffic which, practically, they are not getting.

In any case, such reprisal would certainly benefit the western farmer, and your committee feel that it is their duty to report that they recommend that the petition of the Quebec Board of Trade as stated in the memorial of that board to the railway commission, dated 3rd February, 1921, hereto attached, be granted, and that the government be advised:

(1) To cause rates to be granted upon export grain over the Canadian National Railways to Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, St. John and Vancouver, such as would develop trade through the above ports.

(2) As a corollary to the recommendation in paragraph one, that necessary elevator accommodation should be provided by the Dominion at Canadian ports.

(3) To arrange with the marine underwriters or others in such a way that the marine insurance rates from Canadian seaports be as cheap as from United States seaports.

At a meeting of the Quebec city council held on the 17th of November, 1922, the following resolution was passed:

On motion of Ald. J. H. Bédard, seconded by all the other members the following resolution was passed:

Whereas it has been publicly stated to be the intention of the new board of directors of the Canadian National Railways to make the city of Montreal the operating headquarters of the government railway system, and furthermore to divide that system into zones or divisions, making Winnipeg the headquarters of the western division, Moncton the headquarters of the maritime division and Toronto the headquarters of the central division, the latter with control over all the government railways in the province of Quebec, as well as those in the province of Ontario;

Whereas the Toronto management of the railway mileage of the province of Quebec during the last few years has been very prejudicial to the interests of the city of Quebec, inasmuch as it has imposed very heavy freight rates upon the new industries which have come into operation on the railways to the north and northwest of this city, and has thus checked the progress of colonization, and also, by prohibitive freight rates, in spite of the repeated protests of our people, has prevented the grain traffic of the prairie provinces from coming over the Transcontinental Railway to Quebec, Montreal, Halifax and St. John, for export, and has thereby diverted that shipping trade to New York:

And then they go on to speak of the Quebec and Lake St. John, the Canadian Northern and the Transcontinental now forming part of the government railway system and furnishing a very large traffic to the government railways. They say that the city council of Quebec is of opinion that the city is entitled to some measure of control in the management of the railways.

The resolution was forwarded to Sir Henry Thornton, who acknowledged it, saying that he had not time to study the situation, but that he would look into it thoroughly.

I find that prior to the report made to Sir Henry Thornton and the present government a letter was written by the president of the Quebec Board of Trade, Mr. J. T. Ross, to Mr. D. B. Hanna, President of the Canadian National Railways, in reference to this question, and it summarizes the whole matter in a nutshell. It is dated November 10, 1919, and reads as follows:

Dear Sir,

I beg, on behalf of the council of the Quebec Board of Trade, to draw your attention to the following facts in connection with your railway and the ocean shipping business of the port of Quebec.

The construction by the government of the National Transcontinental Railway was undertaken with the distinct understanding in parliament that it would bring the export trade of the northwest to Canadian seaports for shipment, and the act of parliament provided that sufficient ocean tonnage for that purpose would always be available at those ports.

When the road was finished and the government took over its operation and its obligations, the government management made a special rate of freight upon export wheat from Armstrong to Quebec of six cents per bushel, in order to carry out this undertaking. This special rate was equivalent to about 11 cents from Winnipeg, and meant a saving of three cents per bushel as compared with the then lake and rail rate via Fort William to New York, or to Montreal.

The hon. the Minister of Railways declared in the House of Commons that the special rate, though low, was profitable to the railways.

It seemed to be justified, because this new railway saves 214 miles in distance between Quebec and Winnipeg, as compared with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and 256 miles, as compared with the Canadian Northern, and because the government engineer, Major Leonard, stated that on account of its easy grades its trains could haul nearly twice the tonnage of its competitors. And the people of Quebec became so impressed with the advantages offered, that the city gave the government nearly two million dollars' worth of valuable property for terminals of the railway, upon conditions which have not yet been fulfilled by the government. The effect of the granting of this special rate of freight was wonderful. The grain commenced to come in from the northwest, and within a short time no less than six large ocean steamers loaded full cargoes of wheat at Quebec.

Then, before the new route had a fair trial, the special rate was cancelled, and since that time not a bushel of western grain has come over the government railway for export. What grain has been exported from Quebec, this year and last, has, I understand, come over the Canadian Pacific, all rail.

When you took over the management of the government railway system, a few months ago, we felt sure that justice would be done to the port of Quebec, the advantages of which are so familiar to you, and that the Transcontinental railway would be fully worked for the grain trade of the northwest, as was promised the people; that the new government steamships would be run from here, in connection with this railway, as was promised us, and that a stop would at last be put to the diversion of our western grain trade to New York, which has become so alarming that, as stated in the Senate a few weeks ago, 80 per cent of it now goes that way. Unfortunately, we have been disappointed in that expectation. None of the grain of the prairie provinces has come here for export this year, and the government steamships, which we expected to see running in connection with the Transcontinental, are being operated to and from Montreal.

That should be sufficient to convince the House of the outstanding importance of this question not only for the grain growers of the west but for central Canadian interests in northern Ontario and northern Quebec, for eastern Quebec and for the Maritime provinces. It is an outstanding question which I am sure the new Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) will be glad to take up, and if he manages to solve it he will have made a reputation for himself. He will have carried out the dreams of those who built the Transcontinental railway for the purpose of connecting the waters of the Pacific with those of the Atlantic ocean and giving all parts of Canada railway communication over its own territory.

We were all anxious at that time, as we are anxious now and as we were axious in 1911, to be on friendly relations with the great country to the south; we wished to have freer trade with them and we are prepared at all times to enter into any reasonable arrangement for the interchange of commodities with them, but the first duty of this country is to ourselves and to our own people. I know the Minister of Railways, who comes from western Canada, will take up this matter seriously and in all earnestness and will find a solution. His hands are tied at the present time, I understand, by the fact that the question is now pending before the Board of Railway Commissioners. But it is one of those questions which I think parliament is authorized to take up and should take up, and if a solution is brought about, not only will the people of Quebec be satisfied, but we shall have gone a long way toward removing some of the grievances of the Maritime provinces dating back to the days of confederation.

I remember once reading an earnest, patriotic and eloquent speech by the late Sir Charles Tupper who prophesied in those days that the port of Halifax would become the new Liverpool of Canada. That dream has never been realized owing to want of communication with central Canada. One of the grievances which the people of the Maritime provinces have alleged in all their complaints is that St. John and Halifax in the winter time and Quebec and Montreal in the summer time have not had their fair share of the great products of the west. I was a boy reporting the speeches of Sir Charles Tupper at Queen's Hall in Montreal when he came there to explain the Canadian Pacific railway contract and it was with great difficulty that he secured a hearing. But after he had managed, with his charming voice, to make himself heard, he declared that the northwest was to be the granary of the world. That vision has been realized and to-day Canada is producing more grain than any other country in the world, although it has made but a beginning, only a small area of the west being under cultivation. This immense west is no doubt the better part of Canada as regards grain crops, but we must not forget eastern Canada which provided the money to build these railways, to open up this country, and most of the manhood to establish the west; because it must not be overlooked that not only is western Canada settled by people from Great Britain and other parts of the world, but some of its best settlers came from Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces. They have been the fore-runners and the connecting link between the west and the east, and, although in this present parliament we are pleased to be able to give western Canada some of the great things it has been advocating for a long time, the people of western Canada will realize—and this has been done in the motion of the hon. member for Mackenzie—that in advocating their own interests they are at the same time advocating the interests of eastern Canada. This all goes to prove that the whole of Canada is interested in a policy of this kind, a true national policy, and I know of no greater phase of that national policy than the success of our Canadian transportation system and our Canadian ports.

Mr. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure every hon. member will be glad if anything can be done to bring about a greater use of our railroads from coast to coast. I understand the question of railway rates has been submitted again to the Board of Railway Commissioners and I hope that commission will be able to bring in some recommendations or make some arrangements whereby the traffic of this country will flow more freely on our railways from the Pacific to the Atlantic and vice versa. I shall not at this time go into the question of railway rates in any detail because I am satisfied that the commission will have greater opportunity and better facilities for getting information than I can have.

One thing that strikes me in this debate is that no speaker yet that I have heard—I was not in the chamber all the afternoon—has discussed this question along the lines that it has been discussed outside of the House. Every speaker seems to want to offer some concrete suggestion so that our railroads may be able to carry freight at a reduced rate. That is a little different from that which we have heard during the past two years. We have had some gentlemen, more especially a few lawyers from Winnipeg, going around the country, and instead of offering concrete or useful suggestions the only thing they seemed to be able to do was to argue that railway rates cannot be reduced because the wages of the railway men were too high and were responsible for the high freight rates. I am glad we have reached the point of realizing that that is not the case and are now trying to find the real solution.

In the discussion of this railroad problem we must not forget that Canadian railroads are handicapped to a large extent as compared with United States railroads. It is, of course, always necessary to compare one organization with another in order to see how we are faring ourselves, and the only system that we can compare ours with is the United States railway system. The British system, the European systems, are equipped to carry light loads short distances, while United States railroads like our own are equipped to carry heavy loads long distances, so that if our railroads compare favourably with those of the United States in operation, efficiency and freight rates, we are at least not doing too badly. But even at that, Canadian railroads are handicapped, and one of the greatest handicaps is the fact that in Canada we have only about 221 people to each mile of railroad while in the United States they have about 450 people to each mile of railroad. This is a great factor because we have not density of traffic, and over the whole railroad system it lessens the average earning power. We have again of course severe climatic conditions to contend with. Throughout a great portion of the western country railroad operation has to be carried on with the temperature at from ten to sixty degrees below zero. This not only makes it much more difficult to carry on transportation during the winter season but involves greater cost than in the warmer climates of the United States. In 1924 it cost the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways about four and a half million dollars to clear snow off their tracks. A further handicap is that our railways have about $100,125,000 invested in rolling stock which is in use for only about three months in every year for the movement of the grain crop; during the remainder of the year it is stored on side tracks and is deteriorating more or less. All these are serious handicaps that our Canadian railways have to contend against as compared with the railways of the United States.

But notwithstanding these severe handicaps our freight rates, generally speaking are lower than those prevailing in the United States. This surely denotes efficient management and loyal co-operation of all branches of our railway employees. This is evidenced by the fact that according to statistics each Canadian railway employee moves approximately 12,000 tons of freight per mile more than his fellow worker on the United States roads. It will no doubt be interesting to hon. members to have these comparative figures: to move a ton of freight in Canada five employees are required; a similar number in the United States; twenty-three in Germany; twenty-four in Italy; thirty-one in Switzerland. This is further evidence of the efficient and loyal co-operation of our railway employees with their officers.

I am glad that during the discussion not one hon. member has suggested that the earning power of our railways should be decreased below the amount necessary to maintain a proper rate of wage. I do not think any hon. member would take such a stand, but it has been advocated outside the House. In this connection it must not be forgotten that for the past two years the wages of our railwaymen have been about five per cent below those paid in the United States. Therefore it is not to be expected that hon. members either in the House or outside should advocate a reduction of wages of railwaymen. Our men proved their loyalty in 1921 when they were promised that if they would accept a decrease in their wages the cost of living would come down proportionately, and they would thus be recouped. They took this course, which meant a saving to our railway companies of $45,000,000 annually, but there has as yet been no corresponding decrease in the cost of living.

Few hon. members realize the conditions under which many of our railwaymen have to carry on their very arduous and responsible duties. Usually when someone wishes to disseminate propaganda about the high wages of railwaymen he takes one or two cheques paid to men on some preferred run and probably earned during a rush of coal or wheat, involving working very long hours with very little rest. Suppose these cheques run about $300, they are exhibited to the country as typical of the average rate of wages paid our railwaymen. I suppose very few hon. members realize that over sixty per cent of our railwaymen do not work more than four months in every year; they are employed during the wheat rush and are then laid off, at a time, unfortunately, when other industries are cutting down their staff. Consequently there is no opportunity for the railwayman to get other employment, and he has to rely on his earnings during the rush season of three or four months to maintain himself and his family for the whole year. During the last two years about 25,000 fewer employees have been working on our railways, a reduction brought about by greater efficiency of operation and improved motive power, all tending to eliminate the human element. At the present time we have men with twenty-three years' standing as firemen and engineers and trainmen on western lines who cannot get a job even at wiping engines, and there is no prospect of their securing employment until the wheat starts again. Under these conditions it is only natural that our men should begin to think it is about time the railway companies took care of their reserve force. These men are necessary to handle our commerce during the peak periods, and therefore some means should be provided to give them steady employment the whole year round.

I just rose to give these few facts before the debate closed. I am sorry I was not in the House when the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution was speaking. I have a great deal of work to attend to in my office; unfortunately the Premier of Ontario has not seen fit to bring on a by-election to fill the vacancy created by my resignation in the Legislature, and consequently the people of New Ontario are writing to me about provincial affairs.

Mr. GOTT: There will be an election soon enough.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HEENAN: When that election comes on you will never know it happened. I want to protest against that situation, and this is my only opportunity of so doing. We have a new country up there, four times as large as old Ontario, with seven seats vacant since the last election; there has not been one by-election held since. I would ask the Conservatives in this House to try to induce the Conservative Premier of Ontario to bring on those by-elections, even if they return Conservatives; I would rather have Conservatives representing the district than no one at all. I saw not very long ago the Conservative members of the provincial legislature of Alberta were damning everyone and everything, especially the premier of that province, for calling a session of the legislature while there were six vacant seats. They had forgotten altogether that the Conservative Premier of Ontario called a session with seven vacant seats. It is a crying shame that a country such as we have in New Ontario, which we are trying to settle and develop, has no one to represent it simply because a few partisan politicians are trying to enhance their own political prestige by keeping the seats vacant.

Mr. ROBERT K. SMITH (Cumberland): It would appear from the resolutions introduced in this House, last week by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) and to-day by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), that the intentions in the building of some of the great Canadian railways have not been fulfilled. This refers particularly to the eastern part of Canada and to the old Intercolonial railway, which was supposed to have been built to convey the products of the Maritimes to central Canada, not as a commercial undertaking in any sense of the word but purely as a channel of economic advantage to the Maritime provinces. That contention as to the building of the Intercolonial railway applies also, I believe, in the same degree but in a wider scope to the building of the Transcontinental railway.

A great many reference have been made to the parliamentary commitments made in the years 1903 and 1904 with respect to the intention of parliament in the construction of this great transcontinental railroad, which would extend from one ocean to the other, which would go entirely through Canadian territory and which would feed the ports of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. I may say at the outset of my remarks that I am in hearty accord with the resolution as proposed. I believe that in its general application it has a most direct bearing on the Maritime provinces, so far as our ports are concerned. Before going into that matter in detail, I might add to what has already been said with respect to parliamentary commitments. Those to which I am about to refer were made in 1904, with respect to the purposes for which the Transcontinental was built. They are written into the statutes of 1904, as follows:

To secure the most direct and economical interchange of traffic between eastern Canada and the provinces and territories west of the Great Lakes; to open up and develop the northern zone of the Dominion; to promote the internal and foreign trade of Canada and to develop commerce through Canadian ports.

This further language also appears in the statutes, with relation to the Transcontinental:

The company shall arrange for and provide, either by purchase, charter or otherwise, shipping connections upon both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans sufficient in tonnage and in number of sailings to take care of and transport all its traffic, both inward and outward, at such ocean ports within Canada upon said line of railway, or upon the line of the Intercolonial Railway as may be agreed upon from time to time and the company shall not divert or so far as it can lawfully prevent, permit to be diverted to ports outside Canada any traffic which it can lawfully influence or control upon the ground that there is not a sufficient amount of shipping to transport such traffic from or to such Canadian ocean ports.

It has already been pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that in the face of such binding parliamentary commitments the real purpose in the construction of the Transcontinental railway has not been carried out. I have here a number of quotations taken from newspapers all over the Dominion of Canada, which I think prove quite conclusively that this statement is accurate. The first quotation I would like to read is from the Manitoba Free Press, dealing with the obligations of this country to put the Transcontinental to those purposes for which it was intended. The article says:

By putting the Transcontinental to work the government would only be keeping faith with the Canadian people who authorized an immense expenditure to have this line built up to a high standard for a particular purpose which has never been fulfilled.

In this connection the Toronto Globe states as follows:

It is a grotesque condition that a great railway system should be built through the Canadian hinterland to connect the grain fields with eastern Canadian ports —and its rails left to rust for lack of traffic which seeks other and too often foreign outlets.

The Manitoba Free Press further states:

It must not be forgotten that when the road was finally completed in 1916 for a few months a rate was established which permitted hauling grain to the seaboard at a figure which corresponded very closely to the lake and rail rate in the summer. This rate which was six cents per bushel was in effect only a very few months. It then jumped up about 400 per cent; at or about that point it has remained ever since and the amount hauled over this line since that day has been to all intents and purposes a mere fraction of the volume going through the United States.

Again the Free Press remarks:

The National Transcontinental was the main issue of the campaign of 1904. It was completed in 1916 and in 1921 the late Hon. Frank Carvell, then chairman of the railway commission, who originally supported its construction, declared that it was rightly conceived, so rightly that freight could be transported over it at a figure which would mean the absolute ruination of other railways in Canada.

I have also a statement with respect to the Transcontinental which is signed by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). He says:

That so small a percentage of Canadian export wheat is shipped via Canadian seaports, in spite of the recognized efficiency and superiority of Canadian transportation and harbour facilities, is a matter affecting Canada's most vital interests.

Commenting upon this aspect of our export business, the report of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, 1922, page 8, says:

"It thus appears that though Canadian capitalists and taxpayers have provided, within the bounds of their own country, large storage and ample transit facilities at every stage in the movement of the crop to market, yet the marketing, and thus the forwarding of more than three-fifths of the grain is controlled by agencies which see to it that tribute and toll are paid to transit systems competing with our own."

I have also a quotation from the Vancouver Province. Referring to the flow of grain through American ports, it says:

If Canada had a government that was really earnestly seeking a solution of this problem, the solution would be found—and it would probably be found in the National Transcontinental.

This statement in the Vancouver Province, goes on to say:

This road, the Province points out, "is not fulfilling its original purpose," and the Province advocates rates over the Transcontinental that would ensure traffic for Maritime rails and Maritime seaports.

There is another quotation:

Hamilton, Ontario, December 18.—"Use Canadian ports" is the demand of the Hamilton Spectator. That newspaper has joined in the campaign for justice for the Maritimes, and declares that "Canadian ports for Canadian products is a good slogan for Dominion-wide adoption." The editorial from the Spectator follows:

"The question of development of Canadian ports is one which is receiving increased attention at the present time, and deservedly so. The situation is far from satisfactory, and it is a matter of concern to everyone that it should be improved. The Maritimes are complaining, surely not without justice, of the neglect of their splendid seaports, while enormous volumes of business pass over to the United States. According to a press despatch just published, of the 24,095,814 bushels of Canadian wheat exported to Great Britain in the month of November, only 5,485,710 bushels were shipped via Canadian ports.

Then under the heading, "Halifax elevators lie idle as bulk of grain crop shipped via United States," the Montreal Herald says:

Not one bushel of the 24,095,814 bushels of Canadian wheat exported to Great Britain this year has arrived at one of empire's most important ports.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, from these quotations that it is clearly recognized all the way from Vancouver to Halifax that the Transcontinental railway is not being used for the purpose for which it was constructed. When we think of Canadian grain, Canada's largest basic product, flowing through American territory and building up American seaports to the detriment of our own Canadian seaports, it seems to me it is about time the Canadian people came to the full realization of the real intention in the construction of this great undertaking. The commercialized idea of turning the railroads into a profit-making undertaking, irrespective of the parliamentary commitments, seems to be the main idea of those who have charge of the National railways in this country to-day. While we are not advocating that the railways should carry our products free, we are advocating that, by carrying our products east and west, they should create an east and west policy by reduction in rates which will in the end build up a volume of trade that will more than offset any slight loss that may be incurred at the outset. The natural trend of trade in the Dominion of Canada is north and south. The north and south trade will develop itself, because that is the natural channel in which trade will flow in this country unless we direct it otherwise, but we must develop the east and west traffic, and the only way in which we can develop it is by allowing our products to seek outlets on the seaboards of this country, both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific and not in a foreign country. But if we continue the policy that has been followed for the past number of years, of allowing the great quantity of our largest basic product, the grain of this country, to flow through American ports, to the detriment of our own, then it seems to me that all the parliamentary commitments and all the statements of the legislators in 1903 and 1904 bearing on the building of the Transcontinental will have been violated, and we shall be violating the commercial interests of this country in a general sense unless this policy being advocated by the mover of the resolution is taken hold of and very ardently pushed forward to a successful application by the parliament of this Dominion.

I said the other day, when speaking to the resolution introduced by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black), that it would appear from the attitude of the railway authorities that there is only one body in the Dominion of Canada that is capable of dealing with the railway problem, so far as the general policy of keeping Canadian trade on Canadian railways is concerned, and that body is the parliament of Canada. It is true that the railways of this country have just had a splendid year, and we are all very happy in the knowledge of that fact; it is certainly a great incentive to the railways as a publicly-owned institution, and the showing that has been made is to be heartily commended. But, Mr. Speaker, there is still a deficit. As I understand the figures, the fixed charges of our National Railways amount to about $70,000,000, but I understand that we only have to pay out on account of fixed charges about $40,000,000, and that the real deficit in dollars and cents, outside of the book-keeping aspect of the matter, is between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000. Now if the deficits have been reduced to that figure, which is not very alarming in view of some of the former deficits on this road, it seems to me that the parliament of Canada will be very well advised to instruct those in authority in connection with the railways that further reductions should be made in the rates to promote this east and west traffic, so important to every portion of Canada and every interest in Canada. While some sacrifice may be necessary on the part of the whole Dominion to ensure this trade flowing the way it should flow, and at the rate at which it was intended to flow, in accordance with the commitments of parliament, and with the statements of those who brought the matter forward in 1903 and 1904, I am convinced that that sacrifice will be cheerfully made by all Canadians.

In closing I beg to repeat that I am in hearty accord with the resolution as proposed by the hon. member for Mackenzie in its general application.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I rise for a moment or two to speak to this resolution. I am not going to discuss the resolution as a whole or at length. I do desire, however, to bring to the attention of the House one or two features, and to move an amendment by way of addition which will not in any sense, I think, interfere with the resolution as it now stands but will add a clause to it.

I may remind the House that a year ago, or almost so, when a similar question was before it in the form of a bill fixing rates by statute, and on other occasions prior to that, I declared that so far as I was concerned I was opposed to parliament taking upon itself the responsibility of fixing rates. I think it is a bad principle. I have always thought so and I am still of that opinion. Furthermore, on that occasion I pointed out to the government that if, in the bill which was brought before the House last year, they insisted on fixing the rates it would undoubtedly be followed at future times with demands for fixing rates in other sections or upon other lines, and the resolution now before us is simply a fulfilment of that prophecy, if I may so term it. I still adhere to the principle that parliament should not fix rates but should determine the main principles upon which rates should be fixed, and then leave the actual determination of those rates to a competent body, a body such as the railway board. I still believe that is the right course to pursue. But the government having caused a bill to be passed last year, and parliament having accepted the duty of fixing rates in the bill so passed, and a claim having been put forward now by certain interests in the House—upon which I offer no reflection at all—for the fixation of rates through Quebec and the Maritime provinces, I feel it to be a duty to my own province to claim for it the right to have lower rates fixed by parliament. That is, if there is going to be a scramble in this House for lower rates, then let us all get into the band wagon and join in the scramble We may as well; it is the logical result of the legislation of last year.

For many years we in British Columbia have been suffering from very unfair and discriminatory rates. However, while I have realized that, I have consistently urged that our appeal ought to be to the railway board, the body properly constituted for the study and determination of this important question. But I confess that many of my fellow-citizens have been disappointed in the apparent slowness with which these matters have been dealt with, and they feel that something should be done to hasten the lowering of rates on various commodities moved to and from the Pacific coast. So I wish to propose that the resolution be amended by adding thereto the following words:

And that the same principle be applied in fixing rates on freights moving between prairie points and Pacific coast ports.

In other words, that we simply extend this principle to the movement of freight to the coast. And I wish to draw to the attention of the House the last clause of the resolution, the operative part of it, which reads as follows:

Therefore be it, resolved that, in the opinion of this House, freight rate discriminations against the port of Quebec should be removed—

Well, if there are discriminations undoubtedly they should be removed. I am wholly in accord with the removal of the discrimination, still reserving, however, as I said a moment ago, the principle that it should be done by the Board of Railway Commissioners. But if it is going to be done here, then I say let us also remove the discrimination in the rates on the movement of commodities to the coast. The resolution proceeds:

—and grain should be transported over this particular route on the same mileage basis as that applying from prairie points to the head of the lakes.

In other words this resolution asks that the same rates shall apply from prairie points over the Transcontinental to the port of Quebec and the Maritime ports as now apply to Fort William and Port Arthur. We ask for precisely the same thing. Give us similar rates, or rates on a similar basis, to the Pacific coast, and we shall have no complaint. I therefore beg to move that the following words be added to the said resolution:

—and that the same principle be applied in fixing rates on freights moving between prairie points and Pacific coast ports.

Mr. S. G. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): I will only take sufficient of the time of the House to put myself on record as supporting the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) and so ably supported by other hon. members. For many years the railway rate on grain shipped westward from the prairie provinces was prohibitive. Grain shipped westward had only to travel 700 miles to the Pacific ocean, while eastward it had to go two-thirds of the way accross the continent. This discrimination in rates complained of has been largely removed. The last speaker has said that he wanted the discrimination removed also as far as westward shipments were concerned, but as stated I think that has largely been done. The rates westward from the prairie provinces are now almost on the same mileage basis as the rates eastward to Fort William. From Alberta it costs 20 cents per hundred pounds to ship grain to Vancouver and 26 cents per hundred pounds to ship to Fort William, a distance of 1,350 miles. But upon reaching Fort William there is a change, and discrimination once more obtains. Although the rate from the prairies to Fort William is 26 cents per hundred, a distance of 1,350 miles, a rate of 34½ cents is charged from Fort William to Quebec, a distance of 1,000 miles. At any time the railway board or the government or someone in authority explains to us why that is so, I suppose these arguments will cease, but until it is shown why a railway that was built for the express purpose of carrying grain by the shortest route with the best grades to the Atlantic shore is not used for that purpose, I presume the arguments will continue in this House. If the grain will not go over that route when rates are fixed on the same mileage basis as in other parts of the country; if it goes southward through other ports, then we will have nothing to say; but so adjust the rates as to give the road a chance. There is no use in building a road for this trade and then making the rates prohibitive. Under present conditions the people of the Maritime provinces cannot expect the grain to go through their ports. I am sure all hon. members who have spoken desire that the rate should be fixed on the same mileage basis as in other parts of the Dominion. My argument is that wherever the grain is placed upon the train, at any station in the Dominion, the mileage rates should be the same. If that is done we shall have no complaint, because the grain will flow to the natural port.

We in western Canada know that all our grain will not go to the Pacific ocean. We do not expect it all to go there. At times it will go westward; at other times it will go eastward, and when it goes eastward we would like equal rates on the mileage basis, so that we would all get the benefit of it. I am sure this proposition will appeal to all parts of the Dominion; Nova Scotia, Quebec and all the other provinces will want it. I do not know what part of the country would oppose it. The railway board have the matter before them, but if the House will give attention to these questions it might be of some assistance. I do not think we are exceeding our privileges in debating this matter in the House.

I am fully convinced, as was stated by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) that the undertaking and purpose for which the road was built should be carried out, that the shortest route with the best grade should be adopted and the road given a fair chance to compete with other lines, thus giving us the benefit of real competition. If all these conditions were fulfilled and the road could not compete, then we would have nothing to say, because the people will have got what they asked for namely, the compensation of real competition. I wish to endorse the resolution so ably presented by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) and so well supported by all hon. members who have spoken.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the cattle trade is interested in this resolution. The resolution reads:

Whereas the fulfilment of this purpose has been prevented by the imposition of exorbitant and unjustifiable freight rates; and

[Mr. Tobin.]

Whereas the port of Quebec has exceptional advantages as a shipping point for export cattle, which advantages are lost to the grower owing to the impossibility of making up mixed cargoes in the absence of a steady supply of grain for export.

I am pleased that the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) was kind enough to include the cattle with the grain, because they should be associated. Having been in that trade for a number of years and having travelled over the Transcontinental, I may tell the House that it is an excellent road, that there are splendid facilities at Quebec for loading cattle, that there should be more cattle coming out of the western country over that road for export, and that cattle should be carried over the line as well as grain. I am glad the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is in his seat, because he has heard me before on this subject and I may tell him that it is impossible to bring cattle over that road to the seaboard and then pay a $20 rate on live stock to Great Britain. We have twenty-four ships of the merchant marine of 8,000 tons capacity, and, with a very little fitting these would be admirably suited for carrying live stock. But when the cattle get to the seaboard and have to face a $20 rate it is an absolute impossibility for the western men to raise cattle on that basis. The government must do something in regard to transportation by ocean before they deal with the Transcontinental rates.

In regard to the Transcontinental, I do not believe any of us are giving credit to that company and to the other railway companies for the service they are giving. We are getting magnificent service, far better than we ever got in the old days. In western Canada on one occasion I had five hundred cattle ready to ship, at Yorkton. The boat was held at Montreal or Quebec and I had to pay $100 a day demurrage. To-day there is no trouble to get cars; they are making wonderful running time over both these roads, they are giving wonderful service. But you cannot pay the freight rates by rail and ocean . The trade is dwindling in western Canada as the hon. Minister of Agriculture knows. Hon. members of this House will bear me out in that statement, because they know very well that the live stock industry has no chance to do business with the exorbitant charges that are made. The rate is now 85 cents a hundred, as compared with 60½ cents per hundred thirty-five years ago. After the road was completed in 1885 I had the honour of taking the first shipment over that road, it cost 60½ cents a hundred based on a Winnipeg rate. They asked at that time for fourteen cars for train lot. Now you have 72 cars leaving Winnipeg and the rate is 85 cents per hundred, and there are many different things in the way of charges added before the cattle reach shipboard, to say nothing about the $20 rate on the ocean. Before they reach shipboard dozens of things are charged against them now which were not charged in the old days. They charged 60½ cents a hundred with five of a crew drawing fourteen cars. To-day five men take 72 cars out of Winnipeg and as stated the rate is 85 cents—they say it is labour. Mr. Speaker, it is not labour, the increased tonnage helps to pay that. Labour was kind enough to concede 10 per cent of its wages towards giving us a reduction in the freight on live stock, and on other products going over the road. We never got that 10 per cent. It is no use trying to foster the cattle industry, which is mentioned in this resolution—and with that I am absolutely in accord—so long as present conditions exist. I appeal to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke)—I cannot see whether he is in his seat or not, but he could tell them in one minute whether or not there will be a $15 rate. He knows he is master of the situation, and if he is imbued with too much grain and cannot look after the cattle industry I hold him responsible. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite or to hon. gentlement on this side, whichever may have control, that we must have such a rate that this business will not be driven out of existence. The hon. gentleman, as I have stated is master of the situation and can and should demand such a rate in fairness and justice to the people of western Canada.

The port of Quebec is an admirable port to ship out of and I have used it many times as a shipping port; the Transcontinental is a good railway and gives good service; it is all we ask for; but the oppressive rates we cannot stand with regard to moving live stock to the markets of the world. I have been charged with being a monomaniac and also talking too much in Marquette on this transportation question, but it is the real question that is holding back the live stock business in Canada. Write down the capitalization, $2,000,000,000, of the Canadian National to equal that of the Canadian Pacific railway; spread the debt over the whole country; let us take our loss and let the man in charge operate it so that it can earn money. Then say to him: Effect economies and manage the railway in the same way as the Canadian Pacific is managed. In that manner we can have some redress.

I do not want to take up the time of the House. I have had my orders to speak briefly. My constituents have told me: Never read your speech; get up and say what you have to say in the House. On behalf of the live stock industry I say that something must be done in connection with rail and ocean transportation, also grain and other commodities.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). Many times in this House have the claims of British Columbia been urged in connection wth equalization of freight rates. From time immemorial we have been discriminated against by reason of our mountains; the mountain scale has operated against British Columbia. I think it was in 1920 that the mountain scale was reduced so that it stood one and one-quarter to one, and that is where it stands to-day, with the exception of rates on grain and flour moving from Alberta and Saskatchewan to the ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert.

In 1922 members from British Columbia in this party pleaded with the government to leave the whole question to the Board of Railway Commissioners and not to introduce statutory freight rates. The government refused and they introduced statutory freight rates on grain and flour moving from prairie points eastward to Fort William. It was at that point that the government got itself into a hopeless mess in regard to freight rates. In 1923 this question of statutory freight rates was again debated in the House and a plea was then made on behalf of British Columbia that the same treatment should be given to that province as had been given the year before to the prairie provinces. British Columbia was discriminated against in that year not only by the mountain scale but by rates on grain and flour, which meant that freight rates from prairie points to Vancouver were almost twice as great as freight rates for equal distances going eastward.

Later on, I think it was in 1924, the Crowsnest pass agreement came into complete effect, and in that year British Columbia was further discriminated against by reason of the fact that Ontario fruit farmers could ship their fruit from the Niagara district as far west as Calgary at as low a freight rate as the Okanagan fruit grower could ship his fruit from Vernon, British Columbia, to Calgary, about one-third or one-fourth the distance. In 1925, by a stroke of fortune, the Board of Railway Commissioners held the Crowsnest pass agreement to be practically a nullity and ultra vires of parliament, and parliament had its opportunity then to get rid of statutory freight rates once and for all. But no; this government once more introduced statutory freight rates on grain and flour eastward. When they introduced the bill the same rates were given on grain and flour from the prairie provinces westward to Vancouver, but when pressure was brought to bear on this government by the big interests, by the railway corporations, the government quickly removed its measure of justice to British Columbia and inserted in the measure a provision which denied those rights to that province.

Since that time the Board of Railway Commissioners has handed down a judicial decision which has given some measure of relief to British Columbia on grain and flour, but the discrimination is not completely ironed out, although I have no doubt the government would attempt to claim credit for the decision of a judicial body. It has been claimed that this government has attempted to dictate to that judicial body, and an explanation might well be forthcoming in parliament of the dictation of the government to that judicial body, something that is unpardonable on the part of any government in connection with judicial matters.

It may be thought by some members from the Maritime provinces and other parts of Canada who are not familiar with the situation in British Columbia, that because of these mountains there should be higher rates. Many years ago British Columbia guaranteed the bonds of the Canadian Northern railway from Edmonton to Vancouver on the express condition and agreement that, in consideration of that guarantee, British Columbia would have control of freight rates over that railway. Unfortunately the war came on and by an act of this parliament the Dominion Board of Railway Commissioners was given control of rates on the Canadian Northern railway and although we had guaranteed the bonds and our guarantee stands on those bonds, the right of control over freight rates on the Canadian Northern railway was taken away from us. Despite the fact that the Canadian Northern railway from Edmonton to Vancouver has a grade equal to grades in any part of the prairies and superior to grades in any part of eastern Canada, the term "mountain scale" is still applied to that railway in British Columbia and that province has been consistently discriminated against, notwithstanding the fact that that railway was built on the initiative and the guarantee of British Columbia and would not have been built had it not been for that guarantee.

It might also be pointed out that British Columbia was the only province in Canada to contribute a very large acreage of land towards the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway. It was one of the terms of union between British Columbia and the Dominion that the province should convey the railway belt, comprising twenty miles of land on each side of the Canadian Pacific railway, and a large area known as the Peace river belt, to the Dominion government in trust to be used in aid of the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway. When that railway was completed all of these lands had not been used. By their loud conversation I take it that members of the government are not interested and prefer to ignore the claims of British Columbia. Of course I suppose they think, "Well, it is only British Columbia." Such an attitude is natural on the part of a government of which Saskatchewan has three members and Ontario only one. The claims of British Columbia do not matter to the government. They have our lands and they will give statutory freight rates, no doubt whenever it suits their purpose, but will pay as little attention as they possibly can to those provinces that are not represented in the cabinet. But for the benefit of those private members who are interested in the case of British Columbia, I would point out that a previous government, the government of which my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) was the head, recognized the justice of our claims and in October, 1920, passed an order in council containing the following:

> The committee of the privy council therefore further recommend that as conditions have probably changed materially in recent years, tending more and more to make equalization practicable, an inquiry by the board be directed to be held at the earliest date with a view to the establishment of rates meeting to the utmost extent possible the above requirement as to equalization.

That recommendation, it is true, was directed to the Board of Railway Commissioners, but so far as members from British Columbia are concerned I am quite sure we have always been content to have the claims of our province considered by the judicial body which was constituted for that purpose. However, we do submit that we are entitled to receive the same treatment as the other provinces, and if they are given special statutory rates I claim that British Columbia is likewise entitled to such rates.

I submit that British Columbia more than any other province can offer the strongest possible case to parliament for consideration for it has contributed to a very large extent to the construction of these two railways, and is largely responsible to-day for the fact that the mountain obstacle no longer exists, at least on the Canadian National railways. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I second the motion offered by my colleague from Vancouver Centre.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as a representative of the district of Quebec and as a citizen of the city of Quebec, I am in full sympathy with the principle of this resolution and I wish to extend to its mover my very hearty thanks for having brought the matter before the House. I need not stress the very vital importance of this question in so far as the city of Quebec and our section of the country are concerned. I do not wish to discuss the technical aspects, I simply wish to say that the whole matter is now before a tribunal constituted to hear cases of this nature, and I have no doubt that full justice will be given by the railway commission to the parties interested. A short time ago the representatives of our various commercial and industrial bodies in the city and district of Quebec placed their case, as they understood it, fully before the commissioners.

This resolution mentions the construction of the Transcontinental railway and the main purpose of that undertaking. I remember listening to our late lamented leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier when, during the election of 1904, addressing his constituents in the city of Quebec, he expressed the hopes which he thought would be realized by the building of this line from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean. Circumstances which are well known to members of this House have so far prevented the full realization of those very high hopes, and I have no doubt that every hon. member, no matter to what party he may belong, will help to his utmost to realize the hopes which were entertained at the time the construction of the National Transcontinental was endorsed by the people of Canada. Nothing would please the people of Quebec so much as to see this great scheme of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the scheme that he thought would be the main achievement of his political career, carried to completion.

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, we will always be ready to co-operate with our western friends, and with our friends from any other section of Canada, to develop the shipping trade in the harbour of Quebec, for we think that by doing so we are not only performing a task which will help us locally, but which in the main will be of national importance, because the harbour of Quebec on account of its facilities and its situation is really a great national port in the fullest acceptance of the word.

Mr. C. H CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I wish to call attention to the fact to which I alluded in the question which I put to the mover of this resolution to-day, namely, that in the evidence given on or about March 25 last before the railway commission Mr. F. G. Watson of the Canadian National Railways stated that the Canadian National Railways lost $12,000,000 in 1923 and 1924—approximately $6,000,000 in each year—on the transportation of grain from western points to Fort William. Mr. E. P. Mallory of the Canadian National Railways also stated that the present cost of grain movement over the line was 6.28 mills per ton mile, allowing for the return of empty cars to Fort William. So far as the evidence is available, then, it would seem that the Canadian National Railways are losing about $6,000,000 each year in the carrying of grain to Fort William at less than the actual cost of that traffic.

This is a very important matter upon which parliament should have full information, and I would suggest to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) that this resolution might be referred to the standing committee on Railways and Canals in order that the officials of the National railway system might be examined, and that parliament, through the committee, might be fully informed as to these facts. If parliament in its wisdom has fixed by statute a rate to Fort William which entails a loss to the government of this country, under present conditions, of $6,000,000 a year, we should be informed of that fact before we are in a position to discuss whether or not a similar reduction should be made on freight rates to Quebec or to the Pacific coast. I would suggest that this is a matter to which the railway committee might devote a certain portion of its time, because from the statements made in this House it is clear that there is a division of opinion regarding certain allegations, which may be sustained or refuted by the evidence.

I would also like to refer to the fact that the freight carried on the railways of Canada is not wheat alone. Our western friends seem to think that the wheat traffic is the greater traffic of the railways of Canada, but I notice from the return for 1925 made by the railways that in a total freight of 96,239,379 tons carried last year, only 12,962,415 tons were of wheat loaded in Canada. Other freight offered by agriculture totalled more than the tonnage of wheat; for instance, animal products gave 3,378,516 tons; the mines gave us twice as much freight as wheat, namely, 29,894,003 tons; the forests gave us more than the wheat tonnage, namely 13,907,857 tons, and manufacturing gave us nearly twice the wheat tonnage, namely, 24,136,520 tons. So I can quite conceive that the statement made to the railway commission and the statement made in the report submitted by the government last year, that upon grain alone the Canadian National Railways lost $6,000,000 each year, may be perfectly true, although the freights showed an increase during the latter part of the year. We all know that in the latter months of the year, when the railways are carrying a heavy tonnage of grain, they are also carrying heavy tonnages of merchandise, of forest products and of mineral products, all rushing to market before the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence are closed for the winter. It would be very interesting indeed to examine the officials of the Canadian National Railways before that committee, in order to elucidate the real facts, which are sometimes covered up by the returns made by the company and the returns made to this government.

I would like to call attention to one further fact, that in his address before the Western Retail Lumbermen's Association in Winnipeg on January 28, Sir Henry Thornton—who in recent months has assumed to act as Minister of Railways, leader of the government and chief exponent of government policy on each and every platform throughout this country and the United States—stated, as reported, that he emphasized the fact that the Canadian National Railways were ready to support anything that would move the grain through Canadian ports, explaining that it was to its advantage, having no interest in Buffalo or any other United States port. Just before that another official of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. D. O. Wood, the foreign freight traffic manager of that line, gave evidence before the select committee of the United States Shipping Board at Washington, in which he said:

> The traffic which comes through the port of Portland is, I should say, without going into exact figures, possibly 80 or 90 per cent of Canadian origin. The port of Portland has been practically built up by the Grand Trunk Railway, and largely from Canadian traffic. There are other lines coming to Portland, of course, besides the White Star Dominion, but we > have no contract with them; they come there because we were instrumental in the early days in having them come here—to Portland—by trying to help them fill their ships as far as we could.

That disclosed for the first time, I think, to the Canadian public that the Canadian National Railways have a contract with the White Star-Dominion line for receiving transhipments of grain shipped over the Canadian National Railways through Portland. The suggestion was made—and I think it is clear—that the Canadian National Railways are under obligation to find tonnage for the White Star-Dominion line at Portland, because in his evidence as reported Mr. Wood says:

> If that service were not there, I do not know where it would be; most likely it would come to St. John, New Brunswick.

Then he added that the contract may be terminated on six months' notice, such notice to be given before March 1 of the calendar year. So that we find ourselves in this situation, that the Canadian National railway is carrying millions of bushels of grain to Portland to supply these White Star-Dominion liners with freight across the Atlantic according to contract in force between the steamship line and the railway company.

Now I would like to call attention to another fact. We have at Fort William and Port Arthur an elevator capacity of something like 63,500,000 bushels. We have at the bay ports, so-called, at Tiffin, Port McNicoll, Midland, Depot Harbour and Goderich, all in Ontario, an elevator capacity of some 16,550,000 bushels. Then we have the elevators at Port Colborne and Buffalo on Lake Erie, and elevators at Montreal and Quebec city on the St. Lawrence. I can well understand that the all-water route from the west from Port Arthur to Montreal or Quebec would be a cheaper route to operate during the summer months than the rail route to either of those ports, but when navigation is closed on the lakes and on the St. Lawrence, then the fact is, I am informed, that the same rate is given by rail from Fort William and the same rate is given by rail from the so-called bay ports in Ontario, to each of the Atlantic ports, including Halifax, St. John West or St. John City, Portland, New York, Norfolk, Virginia, or Baltimore, and that when the shipment of grain ceases by the water route, then, under the rates which now exist over the Canadian National lines, you have exactly the same rate to Halifax or St. John as you have to any of these other Atlantic ports; but as a matter of fact the grain finds its way to these Atlantic ports in the United States for shipment all during the winter months. While two or three years ago there was as much as five or six million bushels shipped via St. John, and I think as much as from one to two million bushels shipped via Halifax, the grain went by tens of millions of bushels to the American ports. Now the reason it went to American ports, it is suggested, is because shippers over the National railways preferred American ports to Canadian ports, although the freight rate over the railways was exactly the same. I would think it very interesting indeed for a committee of this House to have Sir Henry Thornton and these gentlemen before it, and to ascertain just what are the influences which direct grain from Fort William or from the bay ports over American lines and through American ports, when the same rate is open to them during the whole winter months to the Canadian ports of Halifax and St. John. That is a matter in which the Maritime provinces are very much interested indeed.

I am persuaded that if the Canadian National Railway management really desired to encourage trade east and west; if they really desired, as Sir Henry Thornton said, to build up trade through Canadian ports, that that company, without using any undue influences at all, could direct the greater part of that trade to the Canadian ports of Halifax and St. John during the winter months. I have made all sorts of inquiries, and I am not yet able to convince myself that the shipment of the bulk of that tonnage by American ports is not due to the fact that the Canadian National Railway and its officials are using all the influences which they can control to direct that trade to Portland and other American ports.

The insurance from Halifax over the Atlantic during the winter months is not more excessive than the insurance from New York, and if the tonnage were made available at Halifax by the railway during the winter months, you would find ample steamship facilities there for transhipment.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Is the hon. gentleman aware that the large Atlantic liners that come to New York very often carry a large quantity of wheat simply for ballast?

Mr. CAHAN: I have no doubt that is true, but my hon. friend will also know that at the port of Halifax there is ample steamship connection. The liners and passenger ships of several lines which leave New York call at Halifax for freight and passengers on their regular route. There are several steamship lines which during the winter make Halifax their sole port of call in Canada, and I am sure that ample steamship tonnage could be made available at that port if it were known that the Canadian National Railway would make the freight available.

Now as to the tonnage sent through the American ports—at the same rate, remember, at which it could be sent through the Canadian ports of Halifax and St. John,—I find that during the crop year of 1919-20 the quantity of Canadian grain shipped through American ports was only some 13,000,000 bushels; that rose to 54,000,000 bushels in 1920-21; to 100,000,000 bushels in 1921-22; to 130,000,000 bushels in 1922-23; to 141,000,000 bushels in 1923-24; and to 162,000,000 bushels in 1924-25. I am convinced personally that a large proportion of those increasing shipments through American ports could, if the officials of the National Railways were so inclined, be influenced to be shipped through the Canadian ports of Halifax and St. John. It is noticeable that this change—increasing shipment through American ports, decreasing shipments through Canadian ports—has been accentuated very considerably since Sir Henry Thorton took charge of the Canadian National Railway. Whether that is a coincidence, or whether his management has tended more and more to shipment through American ports, I do not know, but I do know that if you ask some railway men, perhaps not too favourable to Sir Henry Thornton, they will suggest to you that what the Canadian National Railways are losing in freight to the Maritimes is being gained by the West Maryland and Pennsylvania railroads for Boston, Baltimore and Philadelphia. I suggest to you that Sir Henry Thornton is better acquainted with the ways of securing traffic for the Pennsylvania and Baltimore lines than he is with the ways of securing traffic for the Canadian National railway in the Maritime provinces.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does that suggestion come from officials of the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. CAHAN: I have not had any contact or conversation with Canadian Pacific officials for I do not know how long, certainly not in recent years. But I do say it is mentioned in the press—I have seen it suggested there—that Sir Henry Thornton's management does, under exactly the same conditions, influence the grain trade over the Pennsylvania and Baltimore lines of railways. The fact is that it is increasing by millions of tons each year, and during the same time it is being cut off from the ports of Halifax and St. John, although the same rate from the head of the lakes and the same rate from the elevators at the bay ports is available to Halifax and St. John as to the American ports.

Mr. ROBB: Are we to understand from the hon. gentleman's statement that since Sir Henry Thornton became president of the Canadian National Railways their business has increased enormously in the carrying of grain? Is that the suggestion?

Mr. CAHAN: That since Sir Henry Thornton became manager of the Canadian National Railways the trade via American ports has increased? Is that what I am asked?

Mr. ROBB: No, I was trying to follow my hon. friend's conclusion. He seemed to be drawing the inference that in recent years the grain has moved to the Atlantic seaboard through the United States.

Mr. CAHAN: In increasing quantities.

Mr. ROBB: In increasing quantities, and my hon. friend was blaming the Canadian National Railways for that increased movement. What I want to arrive at is this: Are the Canadian National Railways now carrying more grain than they did prior to Sir Henry Thornton becoming president?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, they are carrying more grain to American ports than to Canadian.

Mr. DUNNING: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman has quoted figures of the movement of Canadian grain to American ports, but he does not distinguish between the Canadian Pacific movement and the Canadian National movement of that grain. He proceeds to argue that the president of the Canadian National Railways is responsible for the apparent increase in the whole quantity. Now, in order to be fair the hon. gentleman should give the figures separately.

Mr. CAHAN: It is quite possible that a very considerable part of that grain may have originated on the Canadian Pacific line in the west going out from the bay ports. I have no figures showing the difference in the tonnage of wheat carried by these two roads over the two routes, but to put it in another way—

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend permit me another question?

Mr. CAHAN: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to answer his other question first?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Let me put the matter in another way: The port of Halifax is a Canadian National railway port. No other railway except that owned by the Canadian National reaches Halifax from the interior of the country. The port of St. John is essentially a Canadian Pacific port because that company has its own elevators there. But the Canadian government also has an elevator of very large capacity at St. John, if I remember correctly, so that there is every facility for the Canadian National Railway shipping grain over its lines to St. John and putting it through the Canadian government elevator there. The statistics available—I am not making any insinuation at all as to the matter—clearly indicate to my mind that no effort is being made by the management of the Canadian National Railways to divert the present trade from American ports to the ports of St. John and Halifax, which are really Canadian National railway ports. Now I shall be very glad to hear your second question.

Mr. DUNNING: I followed my hon. friend's remarks very closely, and I think every hon. member gathered from those remarks that he intended to convey the impression that Sir Henry Thornton was untrue to his trust as president of the Canadian National Railways in that he influenced the carriage by certain American lines of grain which the Canadian National railways might have carried.

Mr. CAHAN: Are you making a speech or are you asking a question?

Mr. DUNNING: I am asking if that is what my hon. friend really meant, because I am reasonably certain that is the meaning drawn by the House from his remarks.

Mr. CAHAN: You can be assured that what I was stating is this: The statistics show clearly to my mind that the Canadian National Railways management is making no distinct effort to divert grain to Halifax and St. John, which are essentially Canadian National railway ports. Secondly, the very fact that the Canadian National Railways have made a contract with a steamship line by which, as stated before the American Senate committee, they undertake to supply grain freight at Portland to that line continuously, the contract only to be rescinded on six months' notice, is evidence that the Canadian National Railways management is using its influence to send grain over Canadian National railway lines to the port of Portland.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend named American roads. He named the Pennsylvania line, and the Baltimore and Maryland, neither of which are Canadian National railway lines.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so. I am dealing now with Portland, and I say further that the shipment of large quantities of grain, of millions of bushels, to ports farther south—I have a list of them here—Richmond, Norfolk, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York—the large quantity of grain going to these ports which originated on the Canadian National railway line, and which was transferred from bay ports and from Fort William by the Canadian National, is an indication that no consistent effort is being made by the management of the Canadian National Railways to divert that traffic from American ports to Canadian ports where it properly belongs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, well, the hon. Minister of Railways may laugh or attempt to ridicule such statements—

Mr. DUNNING: I am not laughing at my hon. friend but at his claque.

Mr. CAHAN: I would suggest to my hon. friend that these matters which I am bringing to his notice in a friendly and fair manner, without any desire to be unduly critical, are matters which demand, and will demand in the near future, his very earnest consideration.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): I do not wish to interfere with my hon. friend's argument, but will he permit me to ask him two questions? Is he aware that it was since Sir Henry Thornton became president of the Canadian National Railways that the rates to Halifax and St. John have been put on the same basis as the rates to Boston and Portland, whereas those Canadian ports were discriminated against before? Secondly, is he aware that there was no accommodation at Halifax through which grain could be shipped until the elevator was built there last year on the recommendation of Sir Henry Thornton.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know. I have lived in Halifax as long as my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough—I was going to say Pictou, but that would be a mistake. There have been elevators in Halifax from time to time capable of storing a considerable quantity of grain. I do not remember just when, but I believe one elevator was blown up by that explosion which occurred in Halifax harbour during the war, and it has recently been replaced. And although under Sir Henry Thornton's management it was replaced a year ago, I think on the eve of an election, no effort has been made by the Canadian National since the election to store grain.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): I do not think my hon. friend wishes to make a statement which is incorrect. I read a report in the Halifax Herald that a steamer took a cargo of 350,000 bushels of grain from Halifax.

Mr. CAHAN: If my hon. friend had read the rest of the paragraph, or if he had been quite as candid as he should have been with this House, he would have explained that that grain did not reach the port of Halifax over the Canadian National railways. A ship carrying grain on the Atlantic sprang a leak and put into Halifax. In order to be able to go into Halifax dry dock it had to put the grain in the elevator, and subsequently, after the ship had been repaired in the dry dock, it went to the elevator and took its shipment of grain again in order to proceed on its voyage. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, these matters to which I have called attention demand earnest consideration. Parliament wishes to be informed. Members of this House representing Quebec and those representing the Maritime provinces wish to be informed why it is that with the same rate prevailing, the grain does not, under present conditions, go over the Canadian National to Halifax and St. John, but invariably goes to American ports. That is a serious question, worthy of the investigation of parliament, and I humbly suggest to the Minister of Railways that it will be a perfectly proper proceeding to refer this resolution to the Railway committee where we might obtain facts sufficient to enable us to give a vote on the merits of the question.

Hon. C. A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker: to me, and I am sure to all members of the House who have listened to the debate this afternoon and evening, one thing is clear, and that is that all the members who have spoken from every part of the House are in favour of the principle of the resolution, the principle that every endeavour should be made by governing bodies in Canada, by this parliament and by the government, to see to it that Canadian ports are used to the greatest possible extent for the shipment of Canadian products and for the importation of goods into this country. That is the principle back of the resolution, and I am sure every hon. member of the House is in accord with it.

With regard to the manner in which this object should be brought about, a great deal of investigational work has been done during the past year. The resolution before the House suggests a course in relation to it. The amendment moved by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) seeks still further to widen the scope of the resolution. Then we have the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that the resolution might well be referred to the Railway committee of the House. I shall deal with that suggestion first, and I may say frankly that I have no intention, nor has the government any intention, of opposing the suggestion. I would point out, however, that we would then be in this position: the matter would be under investigation at one and the same time by the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada and by the Railway committee of the House of Commons of Canada. I do not know whether that would be a desirable thing. I do not know whether, when the railway commission is calling before it witnesses in regard to this matter, it would be very wise for a committee of this House to endeavour to secure the presence of the same witnesses, dealing with the same matters, in order to reach a conclusion upon the same general question as was under review by the Board of Railway Commissioners. If it is the will of the House that the Railway committee should deal with this matter, as suggested by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, there would be no objection on the part of the government. At the same time, as Minister of Railways I do not intend to suggest that it should be so referred, for the reasons I have just endeavoured to state. It may perhaps interest the House to know the circumstances under which the railway commission is investigating at the present time.

Under an order in council dated June 5, 1925, the Board of Railway Commissioners was instructed to make a thorough investigation of the rate structures generally, and so forth, with particular reference to the encouragement of movement of traffic through Canadian ports and the increased traffic westward and eastward through Pacific coast ports, owing to the expansion of trade with the Orient and transportation of products through the Panama canal. That was followed on January 7 last by a more specific order relating to the particular matter mentioned in the resolution. The order reads:

> The Board of Railway Commissioners was directed on the 7th January, 1926, as part of the general rate investigation above referred to, to inquire especially into the causes of Canadian grain being routed or diverted to other than Canadian ports and to take such effective action under the Railway Act, 1919, as the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada may deem necessary to ensure, as far as possible, the routing of Canadian grain and other products through Canadian ports.

On that specific instruction to take such effective action under the Railway Act as the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada may deem necessary to secure as far as possible the routing of Canadian products and Canadian grain through Canadian ports, the present proceeding is being taken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the same matter not also referred to the Duncan commission?

Mr. DUNNING: In general terms as affecting the Maritime provinces, yes. As affecting especially the Maritime provinces, the Duncan commission is not debarred from bringing under its purview this matter of routing Canadian products through Canadian ports. The order in council appointing the commission refers to all the complaints which have been made in regard to the Maritime provinces, and the operative part of it gives to the Duncan commission general powers to investigate all or any of the matters therein contained.

Mr. CAHAN: In view of the fact that the railway rates are the same from the bay ports and from Fort William to Halifax and St. John as to the American ports which I have mentioned, in what way would the reference to the railway commission, as just stated, or any finding of the commission, influence the action of the management of the Canadian National Railways so as to compel them to direct that traffic to Canadian ports instead of to American ports, the rates being the only thing coming before the railway commission?

Mr. DUNNING: I was intending to leave alone my hon. friend's insinuation in his address in regard to the motives of the Canadian National management, because I feel reasonably sure he would not desire the inference to be drawn from them that I am sure every hon. member of this House did draw.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no inference necessary. I stated openly and frankly what I meant, and no improper inferences can be drawn from what I said, I am simply dealing with facts.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend certainly quoted the opinions of railway men, and he left the impression that he believed that Sir Henry Thornton, President of the Canadian National Railway System, deliberately diverted to United States lines traffic which that system could and should handle.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member allow me, as a matter of privilege, to state that I did not quote and did not purport to quote railway men? I said that the suggestion had been made in the press, and it has been made and repeated in the press, that the Canadian National Railway has never used its influence as it properly could as a railway, to have that traffic go to Canadian ports instead of to United States ports.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought I heard clearly what my hon. friend said—

Mr. CAHAN: As a matter of fact I have not talked to a railway man in the last two or three years with regard to railway rates or anything of the sort.

Mr. DUNNING: I think we understand each other now. My hon. friend wishes this House to understand that he believes and desires this House to believe that the president of our National railway system deliberately diverted traffic, which might be carried by the system of which he is president, to competing railroads in other countries.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not said that at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but some honesty and consistency are necessary in a discussion of this character in this House. I said that he was not using his influence to divert traffic to Canadian ports. That is my accusation; that is what I said, and that is what I repeat. When the hon. gentleman seeks to convey the impression that I said he was active in doing the contrary, he is giving to my statement a sinister meaning which is not within the range of a fair inference from that statement.

Mr. DUNNING: I am willing to have all sorts of interruptions; but does my hon. friend not remember stating that Sir Henry Thornton was much more familiar with traffic routing procedure on the Pennsylvania railroad and the Boston railways than he was with the Canadian National Railways? I do not want to be unfair to my hon. friend, and personally I accept his statement that he is not inferring any wrongdoing on the part of Sir Henry Thornton. But certainly on listening to him earlier this evening I gathered the idea he was at least conveying the impression that Sir Henry Thornton was not true to the trust imposed in him as president of the Canadian National Railways. I am willing to accept my hon. friend's statement that he has no such intention.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not say that. May I interrupt again? I would like the hon gentleman to understand what I do say, and I repeat it so that it may percolate into his intelligence. I say the facts disclose that the Canadian National Railway management is not using the utmost of its influence and authority in order to divert that grain traffic to Canadian ports instead of to United States ports, and I suggested that the matter should be referred to a committee so that railway officials might be called before that committee to give such explanations as they can under the circumstances.

Mr. DUNNING: I understand that clearly. It has percolated my dull intelligence that that is part of what my hon. friend said, but he said a great deal more than that. We shall have an opportunity of reading his remarks in Hansard to-morrow morning and then probably this question of what was said or not said can be settled definitely.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. DUNNING: As to the last question that the Canadian National is not doing all it might do to divert traffic,—I think "divert" was the word used—through Canadian ports, I have some little familiarity with the business of shipping grain, and it is to the business of shipping grain that this resolution and my hon. friend's remarks particularly refer. I know that when an exporter is shipping grain from the head of the lakes he arranges his transportation over the railroad or down the lakes, or both as the case may be, in order to fit in with ocean transportation which he has probably also arranged for. The exporter arranges for his ocean tonnage, his ocean space; he buys it as a commodity the same as anything else is bought. He knows when it will be available and at what port. He buys it and the business of the railroad is to take the grain where it is ordered by the shipper to take it. This criticism, however, centres on the Canadian National; and let me say that I am both a Canadian Pacific and a Canadian National man.

Mr. CAHAN: Possibly more Canadian Pacific than Canadian National just now.

Mr. DUNNING: That is another unfair inference which my hon. friend will probably deny in a few moments. It has been my privilege as Minister of Railways of my province to co-operate with the managements of both these railways, and as Minister of Railways of Canada may I say that I intend to try to do the same thing here.

Mr. FOSTER: Did I understand the minister to intimate to the House that all traffic is routed by the shipper? Because if so, why does the Canadian National Railway itself maintain a staff in Chicago to bring vast quantities of shipments all the way up to Montreal and down to Portland as against using the New York Central or the Pennsylvania going directly by a route three hundred miles shorter?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course in Chicago the Canadian National as well as the Canadian Pacific are endeavouring to secure United States grain business for Canadian railroads, and both of them get a great deal of it. I will give the figures to my hon. friend when I get along a little further. It is rather hard on a new and green member of the House to be interrupted, but I welcome interruptions if I can get back to the thread of my subject a little later on. Naturally, in Chicago our railways are endeavouring to secure United States business over Canadian lines, but the shipper of that grain can choose his ocean port and he arranges his own ocean space. The Canadian National probably has in Chicago connections with several brokers who are selling space in ocean vessels calling at a number of Canadian and United States Atlantic ports; but in regard to the general practice in the grain business I can assure my hon. friend that the shipper buys his ocean space and lake space. That is a commodity that is dealt in at Winnipeg, Montreal and, I presume, other ports as well. But as a matter of fact in closing up an export transaction in grain in Winnipeg the shipper tries to tie together three things: the price of the grain in the bin at Fort William, what it will cost him to get it to the ocean ports, and the space on the ship. Those factors are settled so far as price and date are concerned before he can really close the export transaction for his grain.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Now, I should not like the House to get the impression that the railways cannot exert any influence whatever in connection with shipments. I think the moral influence of all our Canadian railways with their shippers should be exerted at all times in the direction of securing shipment for Canadian products—or American products, for that matter—over Canadian railways and through Canadian ports. That is good business for Canada. And with regard to the general question, may I say to my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St George that if as Minister of Railways I find any tendency on the part of that railway which is most closely connected with the government and with the parliament of Canada to influence shipments through American ports which from the point of view of the shipper might come just as readily through Canadian ports, all the influence which I have will be exerted against that practice. If my hon. friend can offer to me anything beyond the bald statements of bulk figures of Canadian grain which went via American ports—and which by the way include Canadian Pacific as well as Canadian National shipments—as evidence that Sir Henry Thornton—well, I will not go into what my hon. friend said, for there is some difference of opinion as to what he really did say.

With the general principle of the resolution, as I said at the outset, I have no doubt the House is pretty generally agreed. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), in moving his amendment put his finger on the difficulty—I am afraid his amendment increased the difficulty rather than reduced it—when he pointed out that there is a body specially provided by parliament to do this work now investigating this very matter, having at its disposal the services of experts to determine the value of the evidence submitted. This body is charged under the order in council which I read to take such effective action under the Railway Act as it may deem necessary to ensure as far as possible the routing of Canadian grain and other products through Canadian ports.

Much has been said regarding the use of the National Transcontinental for grain shipment. All-rail haulage of grain, judging from past experience, will not likely be a very important portion of the total movement of Canadian grain eastward. There again arises an interesting question on how the business itself is conducted. The desire of the grain shipper is always to get his grain east of the lakes as soon as possible before they freeze up. During the heavy shipping season grain naturally flows down the lakes to Montreal and other ports. That is the cheapest way. Some of it goes via Georgian bay ports on what is known as the lake-and-rail route at a special rate from bay ports to Montreal during that season of the year. If I remember rightly, the rate when I was in the business was five cents from bay ports to Montreal during the season of navigation on the lakes. Just before the lakes freeze over, the grain exporter makes every effort to get all the grain he possibly can east of the lakes. Why is that? To take care of his winter commitments in Europe and thereby save the extra cost of the all-rail haulage around the lakes or otherwise, whichever route is taken. The desire of the trade every year, a very natural desire, is to get sufficient stock stored in the terminal elevators and transfer houses, a list of which was read by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George, in order that being east of the lakes, nearer the sea, they are able to take their grain easily to the Canadian and American Atlantic ports rather than pay the extra cost of the all-rail haul, which everyone sees must be higher than the lake rates.

We have had an investigation recently by the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission touching this matter very closely. The report has been referred to on several occasions during the debate. In this connection I want to place on Hansard some figures which relate to another phase of the subject. Much has been made, and properly so, of the volume of Canadian grain which passes through American ports, but it is not generally known that there is a very large amount of American grain going through Canadian ports. I have here some figures from my department regarding the matter. I find that in the crop year of 1921-22, 89,573,000 bushels of American grain passed through Canadian ports.

Mr. CAHAN: Which ports?

Mr. DUNNING: Montreal, Quebec and St. John.

Mr. CAHAN: What amounts?

Mr. DUNNING: I will give my hon. friend detail figures. These refer to all grains, not to wheat alone. In that year 81,507,000 bushels of American grain passed through the port of Montreal, 3,243,000 bushels passed through the port of Quebec, and 4,822,000 bushels through the port of St. John. That was a heavy corn year in the United States. The following year the total figures of American grain passing through Canadian ports were 55,313,000 bushels, the following year again 28,717,000 bushels, and last season 31,767,000 bushels. The volume fluctuates of course in relation to the exportable surplus of United States grain. It must be so. In a heavy producing year in the United States, a year when the exportable surplus of that country is greater, the volume passing out through Canadian ports is also greater.

Mr. FOSTER: Will the hon. minister permit another question?

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER: What other reason is there, if any, for that grain coming through Canadian ports?

Mr. DUNNING: I am coming to that.

Mr. FOSTER: Is it not the fact that their own avenues of export are clogged up in the bottle neck of New England and they must export this way?

Mr. DUNNING: I will give my hon. friend the reasons on authority possibly better than my own. The Royal Grain Inquiry Commission looked into this matter, and I think its report is now regarded in the grain trade and in railway circles as a text book upon the subject of grain handling in Canada. The information contained in that report is generally regarded by growers and shippers as pretty authentic; there may be differences of opinion with regard to minor matters, but in general the report is the most complete compendium on the subject now extant. This is what the report says touching this matter, at page 145:

Canadian and American ports:

While shipments of grain from Montreal make it the leading grain port of the north Atlantic, it is well known that a large proportion of the grain shipped from there comes from the United States. On the other hand a large part of the Canadian export grain goes through the port of New York or other north Atlantic United States ports. There is a simple explanation to this apparently paradoxical situation. At all times grain will flow along the cheapest route to the Old World entrepots. It is very sensitive to variations in freight rates. The rates that must be considered are not merely the Atlantic freight and insurance rates but the total of rates from the western terminals on the Great Lakes to the ports of entry on the other side of the Atlantic.

That is exactly the point I was making a few moments ago.

When this is considered a net difference of a sixpence a ton in favour of one route over the other will attract the traffic.

Later on in the same report at page 146, dealing with the same matter, I find the following:

We are now in a position to point to certain conditions which govern the flow of grain during the course of the year to these ports. The American harvest matures several weeks earlier than the Canadian. As a result, the advantages of the St. Lawrence route attract heavy shipments from American lake terminals to Montreal. By the time the flow of Canadian grain begins to assume volume a large part of the American export of grain has been accomplished. On the other hand, on account of the lateness of the Canadian crop, the end of the grain shipping season is approaching on the St. Lawrence, before it does at the head of the lakes. This fact is of great significance as explaining partly why so much Canadian grain goes via New York and other American North Atlantic ports. When the flow of Canadian grain is still vigorous, navigation on the St. Lawrence ceases. Commonly it closes about two weeks earlier than navigation on the Great Lakes.

That is a very important factor in connection with this whole matter. The movement eastward over the Great Lakes is facilitated, but the grain is prevented from going out by the port of Montreal.

Mr. MacLAREN: May I ask a question?

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly.

Mr. MacLAREN: Does that apply also to Quebec? Is not the port of Quebec open for about two weeks longer than the port of Montreal?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid any answer to that question might possibly produce an argument among my hon. friends from the province of Quebec. There may be some difference between the relative availability of the two ports, but in general, as applying to St. Lawrence navigation, this statement is true. Taking the general average of movement down the Great Lakes and the movement out of St. Lawrence ports, what is stated here is true. I continue quoting:

Hence the flow of grain for this latter period is deflected towards Buffalo or the Georgian bay or lower lake ports from whence it will move to tide water by rail. The end of the season finds these bay, lower lake and Buffalo elevators filled with grain which will move out gradually during the winter. The grain carrying fleet on the Great Lakes takes a final cargo for winter storage and a large part of this fleet ties up at Buffalo for the winter. When spring comes, their grain is discharged and moves out chiefly via New York.

In the spring movement one additional factor is of importance. During the winter the bay port and Buffalo elevators have become emptied of their stock in store. The first movement of grain down the lakes in the spring is to these ports as the most expeditious route to tide water. It will thus be seen that the explanation for a large movement of American grain through the port of Montreal and a large movement of Canadian grain through New York and other United States Atlantic ports rests chiefly on seasonal changes affecting the St. Lawrence route.

It might reasonably be inquired why there is not a considerable movement of grain from the bay ports to St. John and Halifax.

This touches the very point especially emphasized by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

At present there is some movement in that direction, and at St. John this movement appears to be growing. The obstacles to a larger movement appear to be partly high freight rates and partly the absence of available cargo space offering at low rates at these seaports. As we have pointed out above, grain is an excellent basic cargo. As traffic grows at Halifax and St. John a large quantity of cargo space will offer regularly for the transport of grain. When this occurs more grain should move during the winter months through these ports. Lately Halifax has been put on the same insurance basis as New York.

That is an important advance.

This removes one factor which has militated against her in the past.

The situation at Quebec is virtually that of Montreal, with the additional advantage of a longer season.

That confirms what my hon. friend just asked.

There does not seem to be any reason why the port of Quebec should not share with Montreal a part of the advantages of the St. Lawrence route. Montreal has developed wide business connections in the grain trade so that the traffic is accustomed to move through this port. It is open to Quebec to do the same thing; no physical obstacles lie in the way of the inauguration of an extensive grain export trade. Indeed, as the capacity of the port of Montreal begins to be taxed at the peak of the movement, a part of the traffic might with advantage move to Quebec. Quebec also enjoys a more favourable insurance rate and is 180 miles nearer to Liverpool than is Montreal.

Then the commission goes into this very matter of freight rates, which of course touches every matter under investigation in connection with that part of Canada, or indeed in connection with the economics of any part of Canada. The freight rate situation has an important bearing upon our national life, and I presume there never has been a commission appointed to look into anything connected with the economics of Canadian business or national life which has not reported in some sense or dwelt, shortly or at some length, with the matter of freight rates. It is of very great importance, touching every subject as it does. Regarding freight rates, the commission has this to say:

Upon several occasions we were asked to recommend that rates be granted on export grain over the Canadian National Railways to Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and St. John, sufficiently low to deflect to them the traffic which now goes by rail to the Atlantic ports of the United States.

These suggestions were made to the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission.

The object sought to be attained is undoubtedly a most worthy one; the preservation of Canadian trade for Canadian ports and the expenditure in Canada of a large amount of money which is now earned annually by United States railways. The subject forms an important part of a still larger question which has engaged the attention of parliament in the past, and is still in the forefront of our national problems which await solution. In 1922, the Senate of Canada investigated the question of the export of Canadian grain and appointed a committee to examine expert witnesses on the subject. Evidence was given by railway officials, shippers, members of the grain trade and other business men.

In its report the committee emphasized the desirability of steps being taken in the national interest to divert this export grain traffic to Canadian ports, and recommended specifically (1) the lowering of rates on the Canadian National Railways, (2) the providing of greater elevator accommodation at Canadian ports, and (3) the making of an arrangement by the government whereby marine insurance rates from Canadian ports might be lowered to meet the rates prevailing from United States ports.

I would here call the attention of the House to the fact that real advances have been made in connection with the recommendations of that Senate committee. Marine insurance rates are now on the same basis from Canadian Atlantic ports as from American Atlantic ports; that has been accomplished. With regard to greater elevator accommodation an elevator has been provided at the port of Halifax. That is surely an advance. Then the commission goes on to deal with the evidence placed before it regarding this matter, and admits that it is not competent—I do not know that that is exactly the word used —to determine this question, but suggests that it is a proper matter to be investigated by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

I have one or two more points, Mr. Speaker, but I do not intend to keep the House at great length in this matter. The mover of the resolution appeared, quite fairly, to discuss the relationship of this matter to the regular rates prevailing down the lakes, and from Georgian bay ports, to Montreal. He pointed out that in at least two years the 11 cent rate which he was advocating would have proved a regulator of Canadian lake rates on grain. I am sure he would be the first to admit that the condition in question is not a normal one; that it is rather exceptional; that under normal circumstances we could not expect any of this grain to move by rail on an 11 cent rate while the Great Lakes were open. Lower rates would normally prevail by boat down the lakes, or by a lake and rail rate via Georgian bay ports.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If the minister will permit an interruption, that is precisely the argument I used.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, exactly. I am confirming the fairness of my hon. friend's argument in that regard; in fact, I think they are the only two years in recent history when the conditions which he used for an illustration would be exactly applicable. Considerable evidence has been placed before the Board of Railway Commissioners in regard to this whole matter, and I want to be very careful that I do not, as Minister of Railways, say anything that might be used to prejudice a case that is now before the Board of Railway Commissioners; in fact, I have been in some doubt all afternoon whether parliament should or should not be discussing a matter which is now sub judice, being under investigation by a judicial or semi-judicial tribunal. It is my duty at least, I take it, not to say anything in the way of expressing an official opinion as to what the commission should or should not do in their determination of a case upon which they are now taking evidence in various parts of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. minister will permit me, he will recognize that the case was also sub judice when it was referred by the government to the Duncan commission.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, it was not, in the sense my hon. friend puts it, referred to the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes, directly.

Mr. DUNNING: No, not in that sense.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In what sense was it referred to them?

Mr. DUNNING: We will not quarrel about that. At least we may say this, that whatever the government did by way of mentioning the matter as one of the Maritime province grievances in the preamble to the order in council, members from the Maritime provinces have given ample evidence here to-day that it is one of the Maritime province grievances, and when we were appointing a commission to look into the whole question raised by the Maritime problem it would have been regarded as impossible to eliminate the question of Canadian grain going through Canadian ports from the purview of the commission.

In relation to the resolution now before the House, may I suggest to my hon. friends on both sides who have spoken that largely the purpose of the mover of the resolution has been served by the discussion which has so far taken place or which may take place, and I think no good purpose can be served by passing a resolution which by its terms may readily be taken as a definite instruction to the railway commission from parliament in connection with a matter they are now investigating and taking evidence upon. Because this resolution not only affirms a principle with which I am sure the House would be in entire agreement, namely, that freight rate discriminations against the port of Quebec should be removed, but it goes further and says that:

—grain should be transported over this particular route on the same mileage basis as that applying from prairie points to the head of the lakes.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver Centre further complicates the situation by adding as an amendment that we should adopt the same principle and apply it, not only to grain, but to the moving of all freights from the prairies to the Pacific coast ports.

Mr. STEVENS: Between. Do not forget that between.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not catch my hon. friend's remark.

Mr. STEVENS: Between the prairies and Pacific coast ports.

Mr. DUNNING: My point was this. The original resolution deals only with grain, and it says that grain should move forward on the same mileage basis as that applying from prairie point to the head of the lakes. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre wants the same mileage basis as that applying to grain to apply to all freights.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the same principle.

Mr. DUNNING: The same principle to be applied to the moving of all freights.

Mr. STEVENS: To the fixation of rates of freights.

Mr. DUNNING: But applying the principle to the movement of all classes of freight, whereas the intention of the mover of the resolution was to deal only with grain. The amendment widens the whole scope of our discussion very, very materially, and I wonder if the House is prepared to pass such a sweeping resolution as that in the confused terms to which it has been reduced by the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. CLARK: Does the minister distinguish between wheat and other natural products?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not distinguishing between wheat and other natural products at all. I am merely stating—

Mr. CLARK: If the minister does not wish to answer my question—

Mr. DUNNING: I will give my hon. friend a reply if he will sit down and give me an opportunity to do so.

Mr. CLARK: Perhaps the minister would permit me to put my question again; I do not think he understood it. If he does not want to answer the question, of course, I am quite prepared to sit down. I wanted to know whether the minister sees any difference in principle in applying certain favourite rates to wheat and to other natural products, say lumber, or coal, or anything peculiar to the particular province.

Mr. DUNNING: The matter I was discussing was the application of the mileage rate on grain to all freights, and I think every member of the House knows what a wide question that would open up with respect, for instance, to the utilization of cars for different commodities of different weights and different bulk. I would like to see a common principle with respect to the shipment of all kinds of freight, but it would be a very wise man indeed who could lay down a principle for applying a common mileage basis to all classes of commodities regardless of their bulk and weight, and regardless of their relative bulk and weight combined. That is one of the most intricate problems of rate making, and I feel sure my hon. friend quite clearly understands how difficult it is to establish the common principle which he is endeavouring to get me to assent to.

Mr. CLARK: I quite clearly understand that my question has not been answered.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps by and by I shall attain that wonderful ability which would be required to give a categorical answer to a question of that kind. Some questions cannot be answered by a plain yes or no.

I do not think I have anything more to say on this question, Mr. Speaker. I did not intend to speak at such length, but the constant inquiries for information have kept me longer than I had intended. The position of the government is this: If the House desires to refer the matter to the Railway committee of the House, very well, but I do wish again to point out that we would then be in the position of having a committee of this House investigating a matter which is now under investigation by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, this is certainly a very important question which has been brought before the House, and there is no doubt that the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) has performed a national service in bringing this matter forward. Speaking as a representative from the province of Ontario, I think there is no section of the Dominion to which this whole question of railway transportation and freight rates is more vital. While in many parts of Ontario we do not ship grain to the same degree as other sections of the Dominion.

we ship the finished product in very large quantities. After the very interesting discussion which we have heard to-day, which has been participated in by members from almost every province, I am quite certain that it is the feeling of the House that so far as possible justice should be done to every province, and in view of the fact that this question is now before the Board of Railway Commissioners, a judicial body, I think it would be well for the present to leave it there, where in my opinion it will be thoroughly investigated. Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REARRANGEMENT OF DEPARTMENTS

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

He said: With the permission of the House I would like to make a brief statement I had intended to make had we reached the orders of the day to-day.

On March 15, replying to a question of the leader of the opposition, I stated that it was the intention to have the Department of the Secretary of State assigned to the Minister of Justice, and to have the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Department of Health assigned to a minister in charge of one of the other departments of the government, and of this I would make further announcement later.

I now desire to inform the House that the order in council assigning the Department of the Secretary of State to the hon. the Minister of Justice was approved by His Excellency on March 24, 1926, and that by order in council approved on the 16th instant the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Department of Health were assigned to the hon. the Minister of Labour.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the Prime Minister say whether there will be any budget modifications or emendations to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend may rely upon there not being any.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To-morrow?

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.43 p.m.

14011—166½

Tuesday, April 20, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT TABLED

First report of the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines—Mr. Cahill.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. C. A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table copies of the annual report of the Canadian National Railway system for the year ended December 31, 1925. This report is printed in English and French and copies are being supplied to the Senate and House of Commons post offices, to be placed in the post office box of every member of both houses.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, AMENDMENT

Mr. A. C. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

He said: The object of this bill is to do away with the discrimination which now exists between ships clearing from Montreal eastward and those clearing from points west of Montreal eastward with respect to pilotage dues, the latter class being obliged to pay such dues if they go east of Montreal whether they carry pilots or not, while in the case of the former class pilotage dues are not charged unless pilots are used.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REARRANGEMENT OF DEPARTMENTS

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, last evening the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced certain orders in council transferring departments. I observe no mention was made of the Post Office Department. What is the intention of the government in respect to this department?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Postmaster General, Hon. Mr. Murphy, as my right hon. friend knows, occupies a seat in the Senate. No change will be made in that regard during the present session of parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am asking what is the intention of the government. Is it the intention to make the change later?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give my right hon. friend further word on that point later.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Thursday, April 15, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the subject matter of my address I want to compliment the Minister of Finance upon the presentation of his budget. It was concise, well put together and expressed in clear, terse language. I like the human touch which he gave in the concluding paragraph of his businesslike address, a touch that we sometimes lack in this House, and I compliment him on his very able presentation of a difficult subject. With the subject matter I shall try to deal as concisely as I possibly can.

I do not pretend to be a financial critic at all, Mr. Speaker, and what remarks I have to make in connection with the financial statement will be very largely a repetition of what the Minister of Finance has already told us in his budget statement. However, just to make it plain to myself at all events, I am going to run over some of the figures that he gave us at the commencement of his address.

He told us that the total estimated revenues for the year ended March 31, 1926, amounted to $376,800,000; that the estimated expenditures chargeable to consolidated fund amounted to $321,800,000, leaving a surplus of revenue over ordinary expenditure of $55,000,000.

Capital expenditure for public works amounted to $4,930,000; for railways and canals, $12,005,000, of which the larger amount, he explained, was for the Welland canal. The total net capital expenditure for the year amounted to $16,935,000. Other expenditures, such as the adjustment of war claims and the refunding of maturing war loans, amounted to $4,155,000, making a total of $21,090,000. Deducting this amount from $55,000,000 leaves a surplus of $33,910,000.

The total expenditure for all government services was $342,890,000, and the estimated revenue receipts for the year, $376,800,000 leaving a surplus of $33,910,000, as I have already said.

Then there have been special receipts and expenditures not included in the year's business, one of which was the loan of $10,000,000 to the Canadian National Railway. There were other special expenditures, bringing the total excess of special expenditures over special revenues to $11,557,000. This deducted from the $33,910,000 leaves a surplus of $22,353,000, which amount can be deducted from the national debt.

The national debt for 1925 amounted to $2,417,437,685.59 After deducting $22,353,000 from this amount, we have the total national debt at $2,395,084,685.59. I have no criticism to offer, Mr. Speaker, in connection with these figures. We are glad to know that there has been some slight reduction in the national debt, and that there is a surplus of $22,000,000 odd in the year's budget.

Now in regard to the estimates for the coming year, the amount named in the main estimates is $345,771,351. To this must be added other expenses and something for supplementary estimates, bringing the total for these additional expenses up to about $36,000,000, making the total estimated expenditure for the year $381,871,351. Looking over that amount it seems to me there is not going to be much less spent this year than last, and I think the minister has been quite optimistic in making up his budget when he thinks we are likely to have the amount of revenue he estimates for the year. If things go well and the country prospers during the next year, and we have a good crop, perhaps we may have a balanced budget, but if it should be otherwise, I am afraid it is just possible we may have a deficit instead of a surplus next year; but I am not going to pour cold water on the minister's hopes, and trust that we shall have a prosperous year.

There has been a wonderful revival of trade during the past year. Our exports increased over those of last year by the sum of $249,000,000. Our imports increased by $130,000,000 and our exports exceeded our imports by the sum of $402,695,000. I am inclined to believe, Mr. Speaker, that this large increase in our exports over our imports is largely due to the magnificent crop we had last year in the Dominion of Canada, more especially in the western provinces. Of this increased trade, 90 per cent is accounted for by empire trade. This, I am inclined to believe, would be made up very largely of our exports of agricultural and other natural products that we exported to Great Britain and other countries during the past year.

One of the encouraging features of our export trade is the large growth that has taken place in our export of cattle. For the year 1923 we exported cattle to the number of 25,758, valued at $2,809,796, and three years later, in 1926, we exported cattle to the number of 106,200, valued at $11,283,007, or almost five times the value of our exports three years previous, in 1923. This is very encouraging, and emphasizes the necessity of adequate provision being made in regard to the shipment of our cattle across the Atlantic ocean, and that freight rates be brought down to a proper point so that this trade may be increased.

Reviewing the cattle trade for a moment, during the years from 1901 to 1911, those wonderful growing years for Canada, when immigration was pouring into the country and we were building railroads and spending vast sums of money, we had a good trade in cattle, and the demand was domestic. These immigrants were pouring in, and hundreds of thousands of men were employed as railroad labourers, and they consumed nearly all the meat that was raised in the Dominion of Canada at that time. Consequently we had a good market then for our cattle. But then there came a flattening out about the year 1913, when things became very dull in the cattle trade. The war broke out in 1914, and we know what happened then. Prices rose very rapidly, and a ready market was found at high prices for all the cattle that we could raise. During the war the United States was glad to buy our cattle at high prices. But when the war was over, what happened? Our friends to the south again put up the fence. We had let our export trade go to pieces, and had no arrangements made for shipping cattle to Great Britain, and consequently the whole cattle trade fell very flat, and as a great many people are aware, a good many people were ruined. They were really bad times so far as the cattle trade was concerned. Since then we have tried to rearrange our cattle export trade to Great Britain, and as I have already pointed out we have made a considerable advancement in the three years from 1923 to 1926, almost $12,000,000 being received for the cattle we exported to Great Britain in the year 1923. This, Mr. Speaker, I think should be a reason why the government should be alive to the fact that it is necessary to see that proper bottoms and adequate accommodation are provided for the export of our cattle, and that freight rates on the Atlantic be reduced to the lowest possible point. It was rather unfortunate that the attempt that was made last year to make some advance in this direction did not succeed, but I hope the government will not be disheartened and that something will be done to see that this trade is properly taken care of.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask hon. members not to indulge in conversation. I cannot hear the speaker.

Mr. FORKE: I want to say a few words in regard to our railway finances. The annual statement of the Canadian National Railways for the past year shows that the surplus of net earnings amounted to $33,000,000. This is very satisfactory indeed. The report goes on to say that the annual interest charges for the past year amounted to $71,800,000. In the hands of the public there are interest bearing bonds and other securities amounting to $40,400,000, leaving a balance of $31,400,000 that is a liability to the government for interest and so on. Now if we take the $40,400,000 of interest that is due the public and deduct the $33,000,000 surplus of net revenue we find there is a deficit of $7,400,000. I am sure that when the public learns the fact that the deficit on the Canadian National Railway amounts to only $7,400,000 there will be a sigh of relief throughout the country. The statement goes on to say that during the year just closed the financial assistance to the railways by the government amounted to $10,000,000. There were no government guarantees and no floating indebtedness has been incurred. An unspent balance from 1925 of $2,700,000 has been utilized. The advance of $10,000,000 has been charged to the net debt of the Dominion, the railway loans being treated as non-active assets. I am inclined to believe they will be non-active for a very long time indeed. However, that is by the way. The loan of $10,000,000 covers the loss of $7,400,000 already referred to, leaving a balance of $2,600,000 for capital purposes. The total loans and payments made by the government to the railways now amount to $601,000,000. This includes interest and capital cost of the government railways. The financial position of the railways has improved immensely during the last few years, and no patriotic Canadian can read the statement without feeling proud of the achievements of the management of the Canadian National railways. A splendid service has been given the country, and year by year the system has been advancing until we are almost within measurable distance of the time when there will be a balanced budget, and perhaps in the not very far distant future these railways will be an asset to this Dominion instead of a liability.

I do not like to pass from a consideration of the railway situation without saying a word in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Every patriotic Canadian wishes to see the Canadian National Railways flourish and become a profitable asset. At the same time he also wishes success to the Canadian Pacific Railway. There cannot be any other desire than that the Canadian Pacific should go on and prosper. It has done great things for Canada although, of course, many people think the country has done a great deal for the Canadian Pacific. Undoubtedly the interests of Canada and the Canadian Pacific are interwoven and when one flourishes the other must flourish also. Of course, we want our freight rates to be as low as they possibly can be. At the same time we can still carry on the battle and hold our end up. Our desire is that both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific should flourish and prosper.

This leads me to say a few words in regard to income tax reduction, and I am going to read an extract from the Manitoba Free Press in regard to that subject which will give hon. members an idea of what the opinion in Manitoba at least is with regard to income tax reduction. The Manitoba Free Press says:

> The cuts in taxation are all economically sound and politically judicious.

I hope my hon. friends to the right will notice the statement that what has been done is politically judicious anyway. The editorial goes on to say:

> The rate of taxation upon automobiles was a scandal; once it was directly attacked as it was both last year and this session by Progressives and Liberal members, it became evident that it could not stand; but there was still the doubt whether the government would have the courage to deal with the question directly. To have passed the difficulty to the tariff board, which the government was beseeched to do would have been a political blunder of the first order. The tariff on automobiles is still substantial—27½ per cent on cars costing over $1,200 and 20 per cent on cars below that figure. These rates, with a drawback of 25 per cent on raw material will still leave the automobile manufacturers in a strongly protected position, while the cuts will mean a substantial reduction in the price of cars. Those artless souls who think there is no connection between duties and prices are herewith advised to keep an eye for the next few weeks on the price of motors.

Mr. Speaker, to that last sentence I direct the attention of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River who argued in this House a few days ago that the higher the protection was, the lower the price on the article would be. So I want that hon. member just to keep his eye on the price of cars for the next few weeks and see if it works out exactly in the way he imagines.

Mr. GOTT: How does this reduction compare with the other reduction in Ford cars?

Mr. FORKE: I do not know what reduction the hon. member refers to.

Mr. GOTT: The last reduction, the reduction prior to this one?

[Mr. Forke.]

An hon. MEMBER: That staggers him.

Mr. FORKE: It does not stagger me because I do not know what the reduction was.

Mr. GOTT: Compare the prices.

Mr. FORKE: How can I compare them when I do not know what the reduction was?

Mr. GOTT: Look them up as other people do.

Mr. FORKE: I will if I have time. Perhaps the hon. member will come round and instruct me.

I want to say a few words in regard to the payment of the income tax. I notice that the cuts in income tax were received with a great deal of jubilation by the great mass of people in the Dominion of Canada. I notice also that in some of the eastern papers the statement is made that since time has been afforded to study the question a reaction has taken place. I do not know why there should be any such reaction because it seems to me it was perfectly evident on the face of it what the reductions actually accomplished. I think the cuts in income tax are something we can all indorse. I am very much in favour of reducing the tax on small incomes, that is to say on small salaries up to $4,000. I think that anyone who knows anything about the living conditions in cities, where a man has a family to educate and bring up on a small salary, will realize he cannot afford to pay income tax on a salary much less than $4,000. That feature of the budget I am well inclined to endorse. At the same time I am a believer in the income tax. A vigorous campaign has been carried on, I know it has been carried on in the lobbies of the House, against the income tax as a tax at all, but I am a believer in direct taxation.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): As long as they do not tax you, I guess?

Mr. FORKE: I pay my share of taxations anyway, at least I pay all that I am asked to pay. I have seen it stated that pain is a beneficent thing in the human body. It is a warning held out that something is wrong with the human system. We have sometimes been told that indirect taxation is a sort of painless extraction. It may be the same in the case of the body politic; there may be a painless extraction of taxes that may in the end prove fatal. I am inclined to think that the more we know of the taxes we are paying the better it will be from an individual and national point of view.

I was glad to hear the announcement of the Minister of Finance that there will be an estimated reduction of $25,000,000 in taxation.

I think every one of us is anxious to see a reduction in taxation. Perhaps I might deal with that at the present time, although I intended to do so later. We continually hear it said that business cannot be carried on with the amount of taxes being collected at the present time. I wonder how we are going to get out of paying high taxes for a number of years. I know that we want economy in government. Every party when in opposition talks about economy, and every opposition generally blames the government for being extravagant, but we have found from experience that all governments are about the same, so far as extravagance goes, and I am inclined to believe that any reduction in the expense of carrying on the government is not going to amount to much. What are the conditions in Canada? We are reminded that taxes are now coming down in the United States and it is asserted that Canada must reduce taxation to the same level. But the comparison between conditions in Canada and the United States is not fair or just. Canada went into the Great war, and made great sacrifices which never can be made up. As a result of the financial sacrifices entailed by the great struggle we have a war debt. We have also a large debt on account of the Canadian National Railways which must be taken care of no matter who is to blame for the building of the railways. The United States before going into the war made vast sums of money out of it, and instead of the war placing them in a difficult financial position, they passed from being a debtor nation to a large creditor nation. The conditions in Canada and in the United States are not parallel, and I claim that Canadians who grumble and complain because they cannot get their taxes down to the same level as in the United States are not patriotic.

The incidence of taxation is perhaps just as important as the amount of taxes that a man may pay, and the question as to who pays the taxes is perhaps a more difficult question than a great many people believe. It is not always the men who are complaining the most who pay the taxes, and it is very important sometimes just to find out who is paying the taxes. We find business men complaining about the taxes. Manufacturers cannot carry on, retailers and wholesalers cannot do business because they are paying too high taxes. How does a man conduct his business? What is the first thing he does? He finds out what his overhead will be, and what it costs him to produce a certain article, and his overhead is part of his expenses. If he cannot pay the taxes and carry on business he must go out of business. My hon. friend to my right asks who is going to pay the taxes, and if I am paying my share of them. I raise cattle and I raise wheat, and most of my products are sold in the markets of Great Britain and the world, and when I pay my taxes will hon. gentlemen tell me of any method by which I can add my taxes on to the price of the article which I have to sell. I want hon. members to think over it for a minute. Do you know any way by which a farmer who raises products which have to be sold in the markets of the world can add the amount of his taxes to the price of the article he has to sell? So that I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the farmer or the agriculturist is just as much interested in the question of taxation as any man in business who is paying a large tax bill.

I have a few words to say in relation to the reduction that has been made in the taxation on automobiles. As has been stated in an article from a newspaper which I have read to the House, the general tariff is now reduced to 27½ per cent and 20 per cent, and we find a tremendous wail going up from Canadian motor manufacturers over the reduction in taxation. I have great sympathy with our Canadian manufacturers, I want to see them prosper and do well in business, but, Mr. Speaker, if a business cannot be carried on with 27½ and 20 per cent protection, it seems to me there is something wrong with that business. If we have more protection than that I claim the people of the Dominion are paying too much for their whistle and the Dominion as a whole would perhaps be in as good a position without the industry. I am not saying for one moment that we are going to do without them, but I repeat that if they cannot carry on with 27½ per cent protection there is something wrong with the industry.

I picked up a newspaper the morning after the budget had been delivered in the House by the Finance Minister, and I saw what probably all hon. members of the House saw. We read the statement that a certain institution had closed its doors; it was a gloomy day, 3,000 people marched out in the morning to go to work, and found the door shut in their face. The whole situation was dramatic. The manager stated that they had to close their doors because they wished to look over the situation. Perhaps that was the reason, but I have seen a farmer's crop destroyed in ten minutes by a hail storm, his whole season's work gone, and the next morning he pulled out his team and plough and started to prepare for the next year.

Mr. McGIBBON: It was not destroyed by any government was it?

Mr. FORKE: This proposition which is before us is not altogether free trade—27½ and 20 per cent. I notice that the manager of the General Motors Limited over in the United States has taken a hand in this affair, and has made the statement that they can carry on on the Canadian side if they wish to do so, and that they are not very much hurt. I notice that the Ford concern is going to carry on, and perhaps we will see more flivvers on the market than ever before. I do not know much about the automobile trade, but I am going to make the prophecy that you will find most of the companies will go right ahead and will do as much business as in the past.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Not at all.

Mr. FORKE: I want to tell the House that the feeling was very wide spread that the motor car manufacturers had too much protection and that this reduction in the duties on motor cars is a very popular one in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the shoe business?

Mr. FORKE: I will say a few words about the boot and shoe business. I have an extract dealing with that business and I will read it to the House, because the hon. member cannot wait. We hear a great deal about the terrible condition of the boot and shoe industry, that it is going on the rocks and that the English trade is demoralizing the Canadian trade. I have here a prospectus which I am going to read to the House. It reads as follows:

8 Per Cent From a Well Secured Preferred Stock

We invite you to consider as an investment the 8 per cent preferred stock of the Humberstone Shoe Company.

This company makes "non-rip" children's shoes—600,000 pairs of them each year. It sells them "practically without effort" in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, West Indies and United States.

Its earnings for some years past have been approximately "three times the dividend requirements" of this issue. The management of the company is sound and progressive. The business for the current fiscal year is the largest in the company's history.

If you wish to place your money at 8 per cent, you cannot do better than give consideration to this stock. Write for full particulars.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Would the hon. member like to buy some of this stock?

Mr. FORKE: I clipped this out of a Toronto newspaper and it ought to be correct. There is in the budget some slight indication that the government has remembered the man on the street and the people at large. I have no intention of changing my position in regard to protection and I should like to say a few words regarding what is called adequate protection. The extract that I have just read is an advertisement from an industry that sometimes complains from lack of protection. A few minutes ago I said that it was not fair to be always comparing Canada with the United States. We are continually told that the United States have been prosperous because of their high protective walls, but conditions in the two countries are not parallel. In Canada we have a temperate climate from the Atlantic to the Pacific whereas in the United States they have every variety of climate. They can if they so wish be a self-contained country and produce everything that human beings require. In Canada under modern civilization we must, from the very necessity of things, import a large quantity of the products we consume daily, and that is one of the aspects of the case which we must take into consideration when we are comparing United States with Canada.

The United States, however, is not so self-contained as one would imagine and I will read just a short extract showing what that country is importing even with its high tariff. In 1925, the United States imported $1,818,000,000 worth of agricultural products, $1,000,000,000 worth of which were in direct competition with their own products. I should be glad to have any member tell me why the United States would import $1,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products that they could raise within their boundaries. I can tell hon. members the reason. It was because other countries could raise them so much cheaper than the United States could.

This is a short extract from a communication by Tom King from Washington. Mr. King said:

By a curious twist of circumstances, the price often goes down when the tariff goes up.

A funny thing.

This temporarily disconcerts the protectionist, though later on he will seriously argue that raising the tariff permanently lowers the price.

We know that. That argument has been made in this House.

It so happens that ever since President Coolidge announced that the future tariff on butter should be twelve cents instead of eight cents a pound, butter has been higher in Montreal than it has been in New York. Indeed, the American butter market is quite demoralized, and Canadian cream has gone up.

That shows that even with protection trade will follow the path of least resistance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FORKE: I do not see what is wrong with that. A proposition has been made by members on both sides to compensate western farmers for protection. I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) made the proposition at one time—if I am wrong, he will correct me—that something might be done in the way of bonusing the western farmer by means of lower freight rates to compensate them for the high prices he is charged on account of protection. I know if he did not make that proposition, the hon. member who sat in the last parliament for the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George proposed in the House that freight rates should be lowered for the western farmer to compensate him for the extra price he had to pay under protection. That was economically unsound and impracticable and I would not have anything to do with it. But I value a statement of that kind from the leader of the opposition and from Mr. Marler who sat in this House as a Liberal as showing that they admitted that the western farmer was handicapped and paid a tax because there were high protective duties in the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated was this, that I would give concessions in the way of freight reductions because of the fact that the western farmer did not secure as immediate and full results of the protective system as did the people in the east.

Mr. FORKE: I am going to pay the leader of the opposition a compliment. He stated my understanding of the matter in better language than I could. I do not think the average farmer in the Dominion has much to fear as regards being swamped by agricultural products coming in from the United States. I have a friend back in Manitoba whose family have been milking twenty-five cows all winter. They work hard; the women have to do their share, and this idea of protecting an industry has something very enticing about it. My friend does not pay very much attention to politics or economics, and I know if someone went to him and told him that if the government would put a duty of three cents on butter he would get a much better price for his cream, he would immediately say: Why do they not do so? That is exactly how the farmer is led astray in regard to the question of protecting his products. I am sure the dairy farmer of the Dominion of Canada has very little to fear from outside competition. No butter that crosses the Pacific from Australia will ever come into competition with fresh dairy-made butter in this country, and the only time that there will be any competition will be under normal conditions when we are suffering from a shortage of butter. I can remember when the oleomargarine debate took place in the House and terrible pictures were drawn of conditions in the cities because children would have to use oleomargarine instead of getting wholesome butter. When butter during the winter reaches such a high price that the poorer people in the cities are unable to pay it, the farmers of the Dominion will not want any protection that will compel these people to use oleomargarine or any other substitute.

This idea of protection is very enticing. I have been trying anxiously during the present session of parliament to find out just what the position of the leader of the opposition and some of the members who sit on that side is in regard to protection. I had an idea during election time that they were in favour of very high protection—brick for brick.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. FORKE: I am going to read a few extracts that I have in my hand and after I have read them perhaps we shall have a better idea of what protection means to my hon. friends to my right. I will read a few extracts from speeches delivered by the leader of the opposition during the election campaign. This is what the leader of the opposition said on September 9, at Wingham, Ont., according to a Canadian press despatch:

> We know that the only thing for us to do is to get up and stand on our feet, adopt the methods that have brought the United States where they are to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FORKE: Very well, that is endorsed. The Victoria Colonist's staff correspondent, writing under date October 7, reports the right hon. gentleman as saying:

> We have never stood on our own feet as we should have done, and we have never fought the United States policy with the same policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FORKE: The applause is not so loud this time. The staff correspondent of the Vancouver Province under date of October 8, quotes the right hon. gentleman as follows:

> What will we do when we take office? I will tell you. We will first address ourselves to framing a tariff policy. We will put our tariff wall right up to the level of the American tariff wall.

In view of all this, why is there so much objection to the brick for brick?

An hon. MEMBER: Not gold bricks.

Mr. FORKE: The only way to build a wall is to place brick on brick. The staff correspondent of the Toronto Globe writes on October 27:

> Mr. Meighen, explaining the Conservative party's tariff platform, said that the party advocated "a tariff comparable to the tariff of our competitor to the south."

The Port Arthur staff correspondent to the Toronto Mail and Empire says on September 29:

> The Conservative leader made a strong plea for a Canada first policy, brick for brick in the tariff wall with the United States.

This is a special despatch to the Mail and Empire.

An hon. MEMBER: That is correct.

Mr. FORKE: There does not seem to be any disagreement with these citations; the House is unanimous for once. The staff correspondent to the Calgary Albertan on October 10, reported him as saying:

> What Canada should do was to put up its tariff wall as high as the American tariff, then we would be in a position to barter.

Now, the leader of the opposition knows very well that in his place in this House during the present session he denied any intention of building a tariff wall brick for brick with the United States. If there is any doubt about this point I will quote from Hansard of last year, at page 3788, wherein the right hon. gentleman is reported:

> Tariffs, like everything else in this world, are relative; a tariff is high or is low arising out of facts in which the policy of other countries bears a very considerable proportion. Four years ago the United States of America had in force a protective tariff, substantially protective; but four years ago the Underwood tariff of the United States was relatively very small compared with the Fordney-McCumber tariff of to-day. . . . . What might have been a sufficient tariff five years ago is, even though uninterfered with, an insufficient tariff to-day.

I do not quote these sentences to reflect in any derogatory sense on the leader of the opposition; I have no doubt he believes in the policy he advocates. But it is desirable, I think, that hon. gentlemen should have firmly fixed in their minds just what the policy of the Conservative party is on the question of protection. That policy is to erect a protective barrier as high as the tariff wall of the United States.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. FORKE: Hon. gentlemen may say no, but I am quoting the views to which the Conservative party has committed itself. Now I may refer for a moment or two to some of my Manitoba friends who have been putting themselves on record during the present session. What have these gentlemen been saying? The hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers), who is a politician of long experience, is naturally guarded in his statements, and he says that what we want is a tariff that can be used for bartering. That is a very mild and cautious statement. But the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy), who is younger, is not quite so careful when he speaks on the tariff. What he wants is an adequate tariff. When you consider that the average tariff to-day is 22.9 per cent as compared with 20.6 per cent when the Conservative party went out of office, you will realize that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is no low tariff man, but rather is right in the middle of the road. And the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Hannesson) is an out and out protectionist. Now I am not making these statements and quoting the views of hon. gentlemen for the purpose of censuring them. I simply want to state the facts so that they may go on record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: I do not know what is the matter with my friends behind me; they keep on grumbling among themselves. I do not think they are having a pleasant time.

Mr. CAHAN: Which class behind him does the hon. member refer to?

Mr. FORKE: I read sometimes in the newspapers the suggestion that the western members are making selfish demands and I do not think that anyone will deny that those members are so accused.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FORKE: Well, I want to know what those selfish demands are. We have stated our position in relation to the tariff and perhaps I may state it again, although not definitely. I am not going to say just how low I want the tariff, but I want a tariff low enough at all times to permit of outside competition. Such a tariff is the only safeguard which the consumers will ever have: there must be outside competition with home industries. And that is about as definite as I will be at the present moment on the tariff. Is there anything selfish in that? It is a legitimate policy and one which we are prepared to stand by. We have nailed our colours to the mast so far as the tariff is concerned and I can see nothing blameworthy in the position we take.

Again, Manitoba and Saskatchewan are anxious to have the Hudson Bay railway completed just as, I suppose, a great many other parts of the country would like to see this undertaking an accomplished fact. Is there anything selfish in the desire to have that project carried through? I shall read an extract or two in regard to the Hudson Bay railway, so that the House may have all the facts clearly before it. Here is a report from a Winnipeg paper:

At the Meighen-Rogers meeting,—

Observe whose meeting it was.

—held in the Winnipeg rink last fall, a short time before the general election, said meeting being arranged by the Conservative Association of Winnipeg, numerous banners were hung on the walls. One of these, as those who were present will remember, was to the effect that the Conservative party had started and the Conservative party would finish the Hudson Bay railway.

This is very encouraging, for if the present government goes out, as we are frequently told it will, then the Conservatives evidently are just waiting for an opportunity to complete the Hudson Bay railway.

The report continues:

Are we to understand that this statement was not founded on fact? Did the Winnipeg Conservative Association try to pull the Winnipeg public's leg? Furthermore, Hon. Robert Rogers is reported by the Canadian Press as saying at his nomination convention in Winnipeg: Increased immigration and completion of the Hudson Bay railway were two of the needs of western Canada that the Conservative party would remedy.

Then there is the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen speaking at Regina on October 13:

Canada is too vigorous, too virile and too proud to see the Hudson Bay railway carried to within seventy or eighty miles of completion and leave it there a spectacle to the world.

I may just as well read the whole thing:

In view of these facts should not Mr. Meighen have jumped into West Middlesex and called off his dogs of war who were using the present government's willingness to put up money to build the line to the bay as a powerful reason why Mr. Elliott, the Minister of Labour, should have been defeated in the by-election?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: I hope my friends are enjoying themselves. The next selfish request we from the west have made is for the revaluation of soldier settlers' land. Is that a selfish request? I want to tell hon. members who were not in this House during the last four sessions that it was the Progressive group who continually kept this subject before parliament, and every soldier settler knows who were his friends in the last parliament. I get a sufficient number of communications to tell me that. Our soldier settlers throughout the Dominion know very well who have stood behind them in getting a revaluation of their lands. Again I ask, is there anything selfish in our support of this legislation?

Then there is the subject of rural credits. I do not think the right hon. leader of the opposition will for one moment deny that he has been in favour of some more adequate method of financing agriculture. Agriculture is carried on from the Atlantic to the Pacific, it is the basic industry of the Dominion. Is there anything selfish in seeking some method whereby that great industry will be made prosperous?

We have already discussed old age pensions. Is the operation of this scheme confined only to western Canada? Is it selfish to ask for legislation in this respect to look after our aged poor throughout the whole Dominion?

Now then, Mr. Speaker, having enumerated these various subjects that are before the House, I should like to know whether the western members have been selfish and sectional in the requests they have been making.

Mr. CLARK: What has the hon. member advocated for the workingmen of Canada?

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member has missed my point, because the whole battle I am carrying on is for the workingmen of Canada. Does not he think that the big interests are quite able to voice their own wants? If the workingmen of Canada do not find members in this House to voice their wants, they are not likely to be heard. When the delegation of motor manufacturers interview the government this week will they not be vocal? What about the great masses of the people all over the Dominion who are buying low-priced cars, will they be in a position to present their wants, their ideas and their claims to the government? They will not be in the same advantageous position as our manufacturers. I am not finding fault with the manufacturers of Canada in looking after their interests, but I want my hon. friend to understand that I at least am speaking here on behalf of the masses of the Dominion.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): You will put them out of employment and on the street.

Mr. FORKE: Some people take a very short view of economics. When 3,000 men found the doors of the motor car factory shut in their face, I know very well what their feelings were; naturally they were resentful that anything should be done to stop operations for a day; but, Mr. Speaker, that does not alter my ideas as to what is the true economic basis for the welfare of this Dominion. My sympathies are with the workingmen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: Well, they ought to be for I have been a workingman all my life and know something about work. Let me quote a few words by Sir John Willison in regard to the future of our manufacturing industries, and I do not think any of my hon. friends will question such an authority. Not very long ago he said that:

> Manufacturing industry in Canada would not be successful unless it was underpinned and supported by the energy, the ability and the enterprise of the Canadian people producing excellent goods at a reasonable price.

Could you get any better doctrine than that? If our manufacturers would keep that before their eyes and not think so much about protection, they would not be in the difficult position that they sometimes find themselves in. We talk about sectionalism and selfishness. Well, we are all human and all of us are bound to be a little selfish and a little sectional, no one can be in this House for four or five sessions without realizing that generally we are representing the problems of our own particular constituencies. That is quite natural. We cannot put forward the requirements of our own districts without to a certain extent being either sectional or selfish. At the same time let us take a broad view of the whole situation. I know the Progressives are being continually condemned by the press—and I want to speak quite moderately in this connection—by the eastern papers especially, as working only for our own interests. Well, the Progressives, like the members of every other party in the House, are looking after their sections of the Dominion, and it is quite possible to look after the best interests of your own locality and yet preserve a broad view and work for the interests of the whole Dominion. Last week Mr. Calder spoke in the Chateau Laurier on the subject of "A House Divided." I made a humble attempt the other day at Toronto to speak upon "Canadian Unity." I am prepared in this House and in the country, Mr. Speaker, to stand up for Canadian unity, for a united Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and I submit that those who are continually holding up certain members of the House as being selfish and sectional in their views are not doing what will tend to unity of sentiment and action throughout this country; on the contrary they are trying to split the east from the west. If I can do anything in public life I hope it will be to draw those two great sections of the Dominion closer together.

[Mr. Forke.]

During this session we have heard a great deal about Maritime rights. I can assure the House that when we came here at the beginning of the session no member of the Progressive party from western Canada was indifferent to the grievances of our Maritime friends, and every one of us was and is anxious to do everything possible to help them. Entertaining these sentiments, I was all the more sorry to hear members from the Maritimes now and then finding fault with what they called the sectional and narrow point of view that the western members were taking. I hope the people of the Maritimes will solve their difficulties in a very short time and that in the years to come that important and historic portion of Canada will be very prosperous.

What has made the present budget possible? What has enabled the Minister of Finance to tell us that he is able to reduce our taxation by $25,000,000? Do not all members believe that the tremendous crop we had last year is the main reason for the prosperity which we are now enjoying? We are continually attempting to develop the country from the wrong end. Our friends living in the cities and close to manufacturing concerns naturally imagine that we can be made prosperous by enlarging our industrial plants.

An hon. MEMBER: So we can.

Mr. FORKE: How can we do it? I claim it can be done only by making the primary industries prosperous, and then every other industry will be able to carry on under equally prosperous conditions. We are often told that the high cost of production makes Canadian manufacturers unable to compete with outside manufacturers. If this be so, if they cannot compete with their rivals at home, how can they compete with them in the markets of the world? The great problems before Canada at the present time are to increase our domestic market, to increase the purchasing power of the people, and reduce the cost of living. When you have done those three things, you will have done a great deal towards making industry much more prosperous than it is at the present time.

I have a few extracts here which, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall read:

> The three prairie provinces depend solely for transportation on railroads. No traffic moves in or out of this area by water. For this reason it has been comparatively simple to isolate the prairie section of the Dominion and to tabulate the incoming and outgoing shipments. With the co-operation of the railway companies this was done by the federal Bureau of Statistics, and their pamphlet gives as complete a return of prairie trade as could be given if it were a national unit, with frontiers to the east and west as well as to the south.

Below are the figures for 1923, the last for which statistics are available.

Net value of production	$645,493,271
Exports	270,000,000
Imports	145,000,000

An analysis of the figures shows that all three prairie provinces are still overwhelmingly agricultural. The following table shows the exports:—

Wheat	$208,000,000
Oats	10,000,000
Barley	5,000,000
Rye	2,800,000
Mixed grains	200,000
Flax	6,500,000
Flour (net value)	17,000,000
Mill products	5,500,000
Cattle	2,500,000
Forest products	1,750,000
Other live animals	500,000
Mine products	250,000
Dairy products	5,000,000
Poultry and eggs	2,000,000
Hides and leather	2,000,000
Manufacturers and miscellaneous	1,000,000
	$270,000,000

Our imports are:—

Apples, fruits and vegetables	$ 3,000,000
Coal and coke	6,800,000
Crude petroleum	1,400,000
Salt	500,000
Lumber, timber box shooks, etc	6,000,000
Ties	1,200,000
Logs, poles, posts and cordwood	800,000
Refined petroleum and products	5,400,000
Sugar	17,500,000
Iron—pig and bloom	400,000
Rails and fastenings	2,000,000
Bar and sheet iron, structural iron, etc	4,200,000
Castings, machinery and boilers	8,300,000
Agricultural implements and vehicles other than automobiles	28,500,000
Automobiles and auto trucks	15,000,000
Furniture	5,500,000
Liquors and beverages	700,000
Paper, printed matter and books	17,500,000
Canned meats	500,000
Canned goods	3,500,000
Miscellaneous manufactures	300,000
Other miscellaneous articles	5,000,000
	$132,000,000

These figures show that the prairie provinces imported last year, from eastern Canada, $132,000,000 worth of goods, and a business on the prairie provinces that amounts to $132,000,000 a year is very well worth cultivating, I think, and very well worth looking after.

Mr. CAHAN: On what basis does the hon. member estimate that business? By railway tonnage?

Mr. FORKE: I do not know just exactly what the basis is, but, of course, the figures are very easy to ascertain as all the imports and exports to and from the prairie provinces must go through a bottleneck.

We have had hard times in years gone by in Canada, but I am inclined to think that we have reached the top of the hill and that from now on the going will be easier. The west has produced a vast amount of wealth during the past year, amounting in the aggregate to a very large sum, over $900,000,000, as was stated very clearly by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), in the House a few days ago. That is a vast amount of money, but still there are people out there who have difficulty in making ends meet, and it is not very nice for them to read about the growing prosperity of our country. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, that times are going to improve, and that we are going to have better conditions, with better prices. I want to assure hon. members and those who read my speech, both manufacturers, business men and others, that there is no antagonism in western Canada towards industry as such, that any action we are taking is not a matter of antagonism, but simply a matter of self-preservation. We have difficulties in Canada, we have troubles, but notwithstanding hard times, I believe there is more individual happiness in this Dominion at the present time than there is in any other country in the world. We are still in the year 1926 trying to adjust ourselves to new world conditions, but I believe that we are going to be successful, and that we are going to have better times.

There are two words, Mr. Speaker, which I have heard mentioned in this House. I would not mention them to-day except that I want to make my opinions and my ideas plain. Those words are secession and annexation. Those are two words I do not want to have anything to do with, and I mention them now only to make my opinions plain to this House. We sometimes hear that this country is being invaded by a process of what we might call peaceful penetration, and I believe there is some truth in that statement. Last year Canada paid $4,500,000 for American newspapers and American magazines. I am not going to say anything against American publications other than this, that we have a few high-class magazines in the United States coming into Canada which I should be very sorry to see stopped from coming into this country, but the point I want to make is this: What is the influence of this tremendous amount of American literature that is being read by our Canadian people at the present time? I do not believe they are aware themselves just how much they are being influenced by what they read, but this is a fact I am calling to your attention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. member be in favour of a duty against them?

Mr. FORKE: I would not like to place myself on record at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: Playing politics.

Mr. FORKE: I would not play politics with this question; it is too serious a matter. It is not a matter of economics; it is a matter of—

Mr. CHABOT: Morality.

Mr. FORKE: That is the word I wanted. It is not a matter I would play politics with at all for one moment, and if I thought a duty on American magazines would be the right thing, I would tell the leader of the opposition so right away. But I do not know. There are two sides to the question, and it is a very difficult one to settle. I only mention this to show what is taking place.

There are some people who say that Canada would prosper much more quickly if we were part of the United States. I do not believe that for one moment. I read somewhere lately, I forget just where, that the state of Washington is no more prosperous than the province of British Columbia; it is not as prosperous or as progressive. Are the two Dakotas and Montana any more prosperous than the prairie provinces? They are not at the present time. The farmers and the rural population in those three states are not as prosperous as the people in our three prairie provinces, and when you come down to Ontario, this province is just as prosperous as the state of Wisconsin or some other states to the south. Would my good friends from the province of Quebec change places with any of the New England states? No, I am sure they would rather be Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: Then why are our people leaving for the United States?

Mr. FORKE: We find that the great wealth of the United States is being centered in certain places to the south, and that the northern tier of states is being left very much out in the cold. We are a still more northerly tier, and I am inclined to believe that were we joined with the United States. we would be worse off still. I say to my fellow Canadians: Stay with Canada. Canada is our country. I have mentioned in this House before that I am not a native-born Canadian, but Canada is my home, and every interest I have is in Canada, and I expect great things of this country. Mr. Speaker, Canada has a destiny of its own to fulfil. It can fill a place in the world's history. It can give something to increase the happiness and welfare of humanity if we will only follow the course we ought to pursue. I want to see Canadian national unity. I do not know just how to bring it about. On the one hand, we have the east wanting high protection, and on the other, the west wanting low tariff. We must find some common ground of agreement, some stopping place. However, in the meantime I hope all of us will pursue our daily vocations with industry and intelligence, trying to work out our own destiny and that of our nation.

I want to see Canada still retain her place within the British Empire. This is not the place to begin a discussion of Canada's status and her place among the nations of the world, but I want to see Canada a free nation, taking her place among the galaxy of nations. I know a whole lot of difficulties surround this question. You cannot exactly state in words the position we occupy to-day, but I should like to see our country in the years to come still a part of the great British Empire. I believe that our safety in the future, and for a great many years to come, will lie in the fact that we belong to the British Empire. Therefore I hope that we will not forget this idea.

In closing I want to quote a few words that I came across the other day. I do not know who the author is but this is his description of our Dominion:

> Canada a daughter of the empire, grown to be a potent factor; but equally strong in loyalty to the British commonwealth, clear visioned—sound in wind and limb, a great race in a great country, coveting nothing, shaping and working out for itself with high courage, energy and ability a great destiny.

As my last word I want to say that at this time, no matter in what quarter of the House we may sit, we will be Canadians, loyal to our country and believing in its future. Canada wants men with broad vision and with faith in themselves and in their country. Given these conditions, notwithstanding our political struggles and differences, I have no fear for the future of this great Dominion.

Mr. QUINN: The hon. member spoke of the sympathy of his party towards the Maritime provinces, but he touched the question of our difficulties very gingerly and lightly. May I ask him to make a declaration to this House that he is in favour of, and would advocate the shipment of western grain through the Atlantic ports of Canada in preference to the ports of the United States.

Mr. FORKE: I should like to see all Canadian grain go through Canadian ports.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FORKE: Let me finish. You cannot touch a question of that kind and interfere with economics—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: Very well, I cannot help it if some hon. members choose to deride this statement. Personally I would be willing to lose a cent or so, or something, on my grain in order to see it go through Canadian ports; but the people who are making one-half or one-quarter of a cent profit on a bushel of grain will continue to send that grain by the cheapest and easiest of routes to the markets of the world no matter what our sentiments of patriotism or our feeling towards Canada may be.

Mr. HOCKEN: I sympathize very much with the hon. member's sentiments but would he say that a native-born Canadian who could not get work in Winnipeg should go to Chicago and get a good job?

Mr. MILLAR: Be a Progressive.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) will forgive me if I do not go into the highways and the byways of his speech. And he will probably accept my statement as correct when I say that in endeavouring to answer all the government's arguments in favour of this budget I shall be at the same time endeavouring to answer his.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Because I have noticed that my hon. friend always takes a high and holy attitude of independence, and professes not to be looking at any of these questions from a partisan point of view. But I have also noticed that when the government are in a tight place they can count absolutely on the member for Brandon.

He did what has become quite a habit, and I suppose has been a habit with politicians for a long time, he put into my mouth words which I have never used. I took down the hon. gentleman's statement at the time it was made. He said that I had stated in this House that "the higher the tariff the lower the price." Well, of course, it is hardly necessary for me to say that I never made any such statement. What I did state here the other day, in a little dispute across the floor, was that the raising of the tariff does not necessarily mean an increase in the price. That is an altogether different matter. I pointed out that if you raise the tariff and give your home market to your own producers, those producers, because they produce on a larger scale, are prepared very frequently to lower prices and very often do, and before I get through my remarks I shall give a number of instances of that.

Then my hon. friend spoke of what he called contradictions in the tariff speeches of my right hon. leader. I might suggest to him that if he wants to look up contradictions—using the pawky Scotch humour of the hon. gentleman himself—let him read some of the speeches of the Prime Minister.

Mr. FORKE: I did not try to read any contradictions into the speeches of the right hon. leader of the opposition. I only wanted to place him where he belongs.

Mr. MANION: Well, I think my hon. friend in trying to place the right hon. leader of the opposition where he belongs ended up by placing himself where he belongs.

He went on to ask for a definition of what our tariff policy was. I will give him one definition of what the tariff policy of the Liberal Conservative party is and it is this: It is a tariff policy to build up Canada and not to build up the United States, or any other foreign country.

The hon. gentleman spent some time ridiculing the idea that any of these automobile industries will suffer because of the tariff which has been brought in, and he pointed out that they practically would not be injured at all. Well, I am going to read a statement made by the president of the United States General Motors, Mr. Sloan. He made a statement on the subject in New York the other day and this is what he said:

> There has not been sufficient time to analyse the effect of the Canadian tariff changes, but it is very evident that it means the transfer of Canadian plants to American factories, or, in other words, the elimination of a corresponding amount of Canadian labour. Due to the fact that production in Canada will be reduced it is only fair to assume that there will be correspondingly increased profits for American manufacturers.

That is the attitude of a New Yorker, the president of the United States General Motors, a man who is not interested in Canadian work, except in taking Canadian work from Canadian people.

And may I add this: That at the present time, and I do not think the statement can be contradicted, the tariff on automobiles coming into Canada is lower than the tariff on automobiles going into any country in the world that manufactures automobiles, and I do not except even England in this statement. The tariff of free trade England is 33⅓ per cent, while ours is from 20 to 27½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: What is the tariff on automobiles going to the United States?

Mr. MANION: I do not know—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I did not say that I knew the tariffs of all the countries of the world on automobiles. What I said was that the tariffs of other countries on automobiles are higher than the tariff on automobiles coming into Canada. I venture to make that statement and if the Minister of Finance can give any definite information to the contrary I invite him to do so now.

Mr. ROBB: The United States tariff is 25 per cent.

Mr. MANION: An hon. member who sits behind me and who is interested in automobiles says it is 50 per cent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MANION: I give the statement of an hon. member sitting behind me who deals in automobiles.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what it is.

Mr. MANION: I hope that I shall always be a loyal enough Canadian to rejoice with the Canadian people when conditions in this country have improved for them. I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance in being able to bring in a budget which shows an increase in revenue of something like $29,000,000. The Finance Minister also shows a better condition of the railways, as well as—and this I do not dispute—some taxation reductions with which I shall deal briefly as I pass on. In other words the Finance Minister points out that conditions are better in Canada to-day than they have been during the past four years. I do not dispute his conclusions in that respect, but also as a Canadian I make this statement, that after looking into the whole question as completely as I can, and laying aside also as completely as I can whatever partisanship I may feel, I am sure this better condition in Canada to-day is, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Brandon, as a matter of fact due to the good fortune of the Canadian people and not to the good management of this government. The reason I say that is because the tariff policy, the unwise tariff policy of this government, has in the past four years unsettled the business affairs of Canada, injured the industries of the country, lessened the work and wages of the people, and increased the exodus of Canadians to the United States.

And by the extravagances of which they have been guilty they have increased the taxes, or failed to permit the decrease of taxes, which should have taken place. With reference to the estimates which we have before us this year of the expenditures of the government, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), who is certainly not a friend of hon. members on this side of the House, pointed out that these estimates are a good deal higher than the estimates of last year. I was going to point out that last year's estimates were $351,000,000. This year's ordinary estimates are $345,000,000, or $6,000,000 less than last year, but the supplementary estimates have yet to be presented, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in his budget speech admitted that the supplementary estimates would increase the general estimates to such an extent as to make the year's estimates equal to the $351,000,000 in the estimates last year. But as was pointed out by the hon. member for Brandon, the old age pensions were not taken into account, the advances to the settlers act expenditure was not taken into account, nor was the expenditure for the Soldier Settlement Board. The Old Age Pension Act alone, if carried out by the people of this country in co-operation with the provinces, means another expenditure of $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 per annum, the land settlement act means another $1,000,000 and the relinquishment of the debts owing to the government under the Soldier Settlement Act many millions more. So that I submit, in agreement with the hon. member for Brandon, that this year's estimates are going to be very much higher than those of last year. In other words, this government goes on gaily spending the people's money, ignoring the fact that the burden of taxation presses very severely upon the shoulders of the people, and ignoring the opportunity to reduce that taxation.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that just as the best judge of a dinner is not the cook but the diner, so the best judge of this budget is not the Finance Minister who presented it, but the people of Canada, and after the budget is analyzed by this House and passes to the people of Canada, they will owe a great deal more of Christian forgiveness to the government than they will owe of gratitude.

Why did I make the statement that the improved conditions in Canada were due more to good fortune than to any good management on the part of the government? Because in the first place, so far as I can remember—I say it in all seriousness, and I am open to correction by speakers following me if I am wrong—I know of no act of this government in the four years it has been in power which improved or tended to improve conditions in Canada. I submit that a kind Providence has seen that the Canadian people have not suffered all the ill effects of the unwise tariff policy and unwarranted extravagance of the late government, and I intend to give figures very briefly showing where Providence has been kind to Canada. That the improvement is due to Providence is shown by the fact that in 1925 our agricultural production was $265,000,000 greater than in 1924. In mineral production the amount was $15,000,000 greater—I obtained these figures from the Department of Statistics—and in unmanufactured wood—these are exports; I could not get the production—a favourable balance of $5,000,000. There was an increased production in 1925 over that of 1924, to the extent of $285,000,000. That has been in no way the result of the efforts of the government; it has been the bounty of Providence. In other words, the government is not in any way responsible for that bounty to the people of Canada. The increase of $285,000,000—nearly $300,000,000—means that the people had a very much greater purchasing power than they had the year before; that the railways handled a very much greater traffic; and a consequent increase in government revenue. I admit that luck has been with this government; that Providence, by giving Canada these greater crops, has shown some favour to the present administration. But there is a Providence, they say, which looks after drunken men, and I presume the same Providence looks after governments who are drunken with the desire to hold power in spite of the wishes of the people.

Now I wish to deal very briefly with some of the alleged decreases in taxation dealt with by the Minister of Finance in his budget—though I shall leave the more thorough investigation of this matter to my good friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) whom we are glad to see back in the House—in relation to postage rates, receipt tax, income tax and, in a few minor respects, the sales tax. In regard to the sales tax, it was under our regime three per cent, but this government raised it to six per cent. Two years ago they lowered it to five per cent, where it still stands. The sales tax is a distinct tax upon all the people of Canada. It would be very much better to remove that tax than to remove the tariff on automobiles. I may say further that if we are to judge of the probable reduction in the prices of automobiles as is indicated by the figures published by the Ford people, the removal of the five per cent sales tax would have a greater effect in cutting the price of automobiles than the action taken by the Minister of Finance. It would not endanger the employment of thousands of workmen in Canada and raise the possibility of tens of thousands more of the Canadian people being forced to go to the most highly protected country in the world, the United States, to earn a living.

The receipt tax was not a tax of the old government, but was put on by this government. I am glad it is off. But a much more important tax, which should also be off, and which was increased by this government, is the cheque tax. It was two cents when the former government went out of power, and it was increased on cheques for larger amounts by this government. That is a more unjust tax than the receipt tax, because the man who puts the stamp on the cheque is the man who is paying the money, and the man who puts the stamp on the receipt is the man who is receiving the money. I submit both these taxes should be off, and if the government had done away with unnecessary extravagances it could have taken both off.

In regard to the income tax, I believe that while the reductions in some cases will be of assistance to the people of Canada, in other cases they will prove of no benefit; in fact in many cases they are no reduction at all but an increase. Take the case of a widow whose husband created an income of $5,000 in dividends, which she inherits. She would not have paid any tax in the past, but will have to pay under the new scheme. A retired gentleman of 72 or 73 years of age, with whom I sat at a meal the other day, receives, with his pension from the business he followed, an income of $2,800. His wife had the good fortune to inherit $2,000 per annum, so that this old couple, who were accustomed to living reasonably well on $4,800, were paying last year an income tax of four per cent on $800, each of them having an exemption of $2,000. He paid an income tax of 4 per cent on $800 which would be $32. But this old couple, in the autumn of their lives, are now going to pay more. They are allowed $1,500 exemption, so that he will pay two per cent on $1,300 or $26 as against $32 the year before, while in addition to that his wife will now be paying two per cent on $500 or $10, a total of $36. What is the object of this? In studying the new income tax schedules I was interested to note the variations in amounts payable. While this old couple have to pay increased taxation, those who for example make $14,000 a year have had a reduction of some $474.50 in their income tax. I do not wish to be unfair or unkind, but one might ask oneself whether those material reductions that have been made on the $14,000 salary have anything to do with the fact that members of the government receive $14,000 a year.

Is it fair that this old couple of seventy-two or seventy-three should have their taxes increased while those getting $14,000 a year get this marked decrease? I was thinking of a jocular statement made by Mr. Lloyd George at one time when he was speaking of another government and I felt I could in the same jocular way apply the statement to this government. His statement was:

> The members of this government will go down with their drawn salaries in their hands.

The postage rate has been reduced from three cents to two cents and everybody will be glad of that reduction. But this reduction could have been made long ago if the government had not given those unnecessary political bribes which were used throughout the country; for instance, millions of dollars spent for harbours which was not required to be spent, millions of dollars spent for public works, inaccessible elevators and other things such as the Union Club in London.

But after going all down these different reductions as mentioned by the Minister of Finance, I find myself wondering where the ordinary workingman who does not earn $3,000 a year, and the ordinary small farmer who does not happen to have an automobile, benefits by any of these reductions. I can find nothing with the exception that once in a while when he sends a letter to somebody away from home he saves one cent on his postage stamp. Where is the relief for the workingman who earns less than $3,000 a year unless it be that he is relieved of his job in some of those factories that are being closed on account of this budget? A very large percentage, I think much more than ninety per cent of the workingmen of Canada, will not benefit by these reductions. In other words, I found myself wondering if this budget was one entirely for the betterment of the rich and the well-to-do, because I discovered that the rich man by this budget gets his income tax reduced, his high-priced automobile at a lesser duty, and even his Angostura bitters cheaper for his cocktail. I presume the government is hoping that at election time he will drink his cocktails to their health.

There is little if anything, in this budget for the poor people. I think it was Abraham Lincoln who said: "God must love the poor because he made so many of them." If he was alive now, he could not say that about this government because they are making the poor poorer by taking away their jobs, and making the rich richer by taking away their income tax.

[Mr. Manion.]

I do not wish to spend any more time on these taxes; I wish to touch what is to me and, I think, to the people of Canada, the most important item in the whole budget and that is the cut in the duty on automobiles. That is the axle around which this whole budget is going to revolve, when the people have forgotten the superficial reductions in taxation mentioned by the Minister of Finance, when, in fact, the resulting relief mentioned by him is found to be a delusion and a snare, and when they realize also that this is another very severe assault upon the national policy of protection which has been in force in Canada since 1878. Once again the issue is clear-cut and well defined; the issue has come before the people as to whether we shall have protection in this country or whether we shall go down towards free trade.

Before dealing with the reduction in the tariff on automobiles I wish to say that I have no brief in any way for the automobile industry. In my riding there are no plants manufacturing automobiles or automobile parts. As a doctor practising medicine when I am at home, I have occasionally to buy an automobile and therefore I would probably stand to gain a little if prices are reduced because of this reduction in the tariff. But at the same time, as a Canadian, I am willing, if necessary, to pay a little more for my automobile or for any other line of goods in order to build up this great country of ours. Neither am I arguing from the point of view that the majority who cannot afford to buy automobiles of any kind will gain nothing by this reduction in the tariff on automobiles. An automobile being a luxury in many cases should, I think, be taxed more highly—I do not say in all cases. It is only right that luxuries should be taxed at a higher rate than necessaries of life and certain high-priced automobiles are luxuries. Neither do I point out the fact that in many cases people bring about less happiness to themselves by securing automobiles at the cost of a mortgage on their home or on their life insurance, at the cost of that thrift which we should all encourage as good citizens of Canada. Neither do I deny nor assert that this tariff cut is not bearable by the automobile industry of this country. Time alone will answer that question.

But I assert this, that in justice to the people, and to the automobile industry of Canada, the tariff board which was appointed just eight days before the delivery of the budget, should have been given an opportunity to look into this industry before these cuts in the tariff were made. If such had been the case and if the tariff board had reported that these automobile manufacturers were exploiting, were taking unfair profits from the people of Canada behind a tariff wall, then I say they should either bring down their prices or have their tariff removed to a certain extent to make them deal justly with the Canadian people. It is no part of the policy of the Conservative party to allow unfair prices to the people to be put into effect behind a tariff wall by manufacturers of automobiles or any other manufacturers. But there should have been an investigation, because we have had in Canada, I repeat, a policy of protection since 1878, and so far as I know on every occasion when the people have been given an opportunity to vote on that question, they have voted to carry on a policy of protection.

There are three outstanding dates: 1878, 1911 and 1925. I mention 1925 because it is plain that on October 29, 1925, the 116 members on our side of the House were elected on a protective policy, and it is also plain that on the other side there are many members, probably forty, if not fifty or sixty, who are out-and-out protectionists, just as much as the protectionists who sit on this side of the House. For example, would anybody question the fact that the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) is an out-and-out protectionist, or that the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), who is spoken of as being slated for the cabinet, is an out-and-out protectionist? Would anyone say that many hon. members from Quebec are anything but protectionists? The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) in this House not long ago in the debate on the Address said frankly and plainly that he believed in protection. Indeed, I am reminded by an hon. member that he said he was elected on that policy.

In other words, the election of October 29, no matter what else it did, certainly showed that the people of Canada, with the exception probably of those in the prairie provinces, believe in a policy of protection. It showed that this government is not in agreement with the people of Canada generally, and you may take it for granted as a political axiom that when a government differs from the people of a country, the people are right and the government is wrong.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): What about the 1921 election?

Mr. MANION: The people defeated us and we went out of power, but in 1925 they defeated this government and the government did not go out of power. That is the difference.

On what basis did this government make this reduction in the tariff on automobiles eight days after it had appointed a tariff board supposedly for the purpose of looking into industries such as this? They cast aside that tariff board like a sucked orange eight days after they appointed it and they cut down the tariff on automobiles. I will give the reasons of the Minister of Finance for cutting down the tariff on automobiles. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), at page 2450 of Hansard, made this statement:

> There is a pronounced sentiment throughout Canada that the automobile industry enjoys more protection than is needed to maintain it on a reasonably profitable basis, and in deference to that sentiment we propose a downward readjustment of automobile, motor truck and motor cycle duties.

"In deference to sentiment throughout Canada!" I wonder why it is that this government has become so suddenly deferential to the sentiment of the Canadian people. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not show any great desire to defer to the clearly indicated wish of the people of this country when on October 29 last, as a result of the general election held at that time, the Canadian electorate showed beyond any question that they no longer wanted this government in power. The government was defeated, whatever else the election may have revealed. But it is not that the Minister of Finance and the government, in making this reduction in the tariff, felt that there was a pronounced sentiment in the country in favour of it. The fact of the matter is that they believe there is a pronounced number of votes to be gained by this concession when the time comes. That explains why the tariff on automobiles has been reduced to the extent disclosed in the budget. The government does not care what irreparable injury is done to Canadian industry so long as it can remain in office. So far as our working population is concerned, every artisan may be driven out of Canada into the United States, provided the government can remain in power. Scientific knowledge and economic investigation, which should have been the duty of the tariff commission, are of course unnecessary to this government. What is necessary is the government's popularity: it is essential that hon. gentlemen opposite should obtain a sufficient number of votes to keep them in power. In short, our workingmen must be exiled in order to maintain the present administration in office.

We hear less about an exodus now than we heard in the past, and we read less of it in the press at the present time. The exodus, everyone admits, is not so marked to-day as it was formerly. I have in my hand, however, an extract from the Toronto Globe of a few days ago in which the statement appears that 53,000 Canadians left this country and went to the United States in the seven months ending January 31 last, or at the rate of nearly 100,000 per annum. In making this statement the Toronto Globe is quoting from the report of an investigating organization in the United States, and the statement is not denied. Now, if this budget does the harm which many people throughout Canada believe it will do, there will be more people going to the United States shortly than have left Canada in the past.

I can quite imagine that many of our workingmen in Canada must find themselves asking this question, "Why should we be made the sacrificial goats in order to keep this government in office?" In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the present Prime Minister of Canada through his tariff policy has been the greatest immigration agent the United States has ever had. What right has this government to make an unwarranted onslaught on the tariff policy which has been in force in this country since 1878, having been accepted and endorsed repeatedly from that time on? What right have hon. gentlemen to break the pledges which they have only recently given to this country. that no industry should be interfered with in the absence of a proper investigation? What right have they to disturb business conditions in Canada and to bring about such instability as we have witnessed during the past four years?—an instability by reason of which no industrial leader in Canada to-day dare invest his money in industry lest his own head be taken off and carried on a salver to the low tariff or free trade forces of the country who control the government.

So far as tariff matters are concerned, this government seems to live in a thick fog of confused ideas; it changes its economic mind so often that it is impossible for any sane man to follow it. The tariff history of the government would appear to me to be something for the government to forget and for everybody else in Canada to remember. But what other attitude could you expect from the government when you look around on its members and realize that there are three ministers from Saskatchewan, that free trade province, for which let me say, I have every respect. There are from that province three ministers in prominent positions—the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), the Prime Minister himself (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). And from the west we have also the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton), the author of that famous phrase about the deathknell of protection. When the Minister of Railways came into the House the newspapers declared that, like charity, he was expected to cover a multitude of sins for the government. Well, the Minister of Railways has taken a very frank stand on the tariff. There was passed in the legislative assembly of Saskatchewan, in the session of 1923, a resolution which practically proposes free trade for the Dominion of Canada. Perhaps I may be allowed to quote that part of the resolution bearing on this question. It proposed:

(1) An immediate and substantial all round reduction of the customs tariff.

(2) The reduction of the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half of the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual uniform reductions be made to the remaining tariff on British imports that will insure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada.

(3) That negotiations be entered into by the government of Canada with the government of the United States with a view of establishing a reciprocity agreement on lines similar to that of 1911.

(4) The placing upon the free list of all food stuffs, agricultural implements, farm and household machinery, vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, gasoline, illuminating fuel and lubricating oils, and all raw materials and machinery used in their manufacture.

The report concludes with the statement that, a debate arising the question was put and was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. DUNNING: Unanimously.

Mr. MANION: I am glad that the Minister of Railways admits that the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DUNNING: Even the Tories voted for it.

Mr. MANION: As far as I have been able to find out, due to my good friend's patented political machine oil, there are no Tories in Saskatchewan. However, I am not questioning the right of the Minister of Railways to take that attitude in relation to the tariff; that is his privilege. But that is one of the reasons why this government has been gradually pushing ahead towards the goal of free trade. I have another quotation to offer to show the views of the Minister of Railways on the subject. I shall read from:

The evidence of Hon. Charles Avery Dunning called, sworn and examined at 2.30 o'clock p.m. on Monday, August 6, 1923, at Regina, Saskatchewan, before the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission.

The following question and the answer thereto will be of interest to the House. It deals with coal.

Q. There is a rate of 6½ dollars a ton gone into effect to move a stated quantity, not a large quantity, merely as an experiment?

A. I think that is a case where the Ontario people should take a dose of their own medicine. . . . . The way to make Ontario people burn Alberta coal is to put a good steep prohibitive duty on American coal and then to let the Canadian National Railways charge the fair freight rate for hauling it to them. It is the first time in history that the eastern people have been in the position to take a dose of their own medicine, and I think they should be allowed to take it to the full.

I make the statement subject to correction, but if I mistake not what I have just quoted is exactly the same statement, condensed, as was quoted by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) the other day, and denied by the Minister of Railways.

Mr. DUNNING: The two statements are entirely different, and my hon. friend might at least do me the justice of reading the whole of my evidence from which he is quoting. The whole press of the country knew perfectly well that I was speaking in large part ironically with reference to that matter—

An hon. MEMBER: Under oath.

Mr. DUNNING: —as the further evidence very well reveals. However that may be, my hon. friends can take all the satisfaction out of it they wish. All I ask is that they quote me correctly, for my statement was not quoted correctly the other day.

Mr. MANION: I will read the quotation as given by the hon. member for South Wellington, and the House will judge for itself. Let me assure the Minister of Railways that I am not trying to do him the slightest injustice. But I must say—and I say it in all sincerity—that having read the statement as quoted by the hon. member for South Wellington, in conjunction with the evidence from which I have just quoted, the two seemed to me substantially identical. This is the statement as quoted by the hon. member for South Wellington, in which the Minister of Railways is represented as saying:

This is the first opportunity to make the people of the east suffer for what they have given the west for the last forty years.

Mr. DUNNING: And that statement is what I object to. I nowhere used the phrase "make the people suffer," nor can any words of mine be so interpreted. Let the hon. member read the evidence again. "Letting them take a dose of their own medicine" is different from "making them suffer."

Mr. MANION: I will do the Minister justice to this extent, I cannot find the word "suffer" in the sworn evidence, but I am going to read it again to see if the language he used can be interpreted differently. After mentioning about the prohibitive duties, he said:

It is the first time in history that the eastern people have been in a position to take a dose of their own medicine. I think they should be allowed to take it to the full.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend only reads the conclusion he will find it proves that I was speaking ironically.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is so particular about getting this absolutely correct that he brings to my mind an incident in the West Middlesex by-election of famous memory. To show how careful the Minister of Railways is to tell the facts, he went down to West Middlesex and made a speech, and I have provided myself with a copy of the Globe for fear he would deny what he then said. According to the Globe report he stated:

I told Dr. Manion, when I met him the other day, "You are licked now."

And then the report goes on to tell what he said to Dr. Manion. The extraordinary thing about this incident is that the Minister of Railways and Dr. Manion had at that time never spoken to each other in their lives. I must confess that I admired the hon. gentleman's courage in relating to the people of West Middlesex how he had "told me off."

An hon. MEMBER: Ironically.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I presume he was doing it then as he says now, ironically.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If I may interrupt my hon. friend, would it not be a good thing for the people of Ontario to get high tariff protection on their coal?

Mr. MANION: I am not dealing with coal at the moment, I am dealing with the Minister of Railways. However, I may say this about coal, I am in favour of any policy that will make us use Canadian instead of American coal on Canadian railways.

Mr. DUNNING: Why find fault with me?

Mr. MANION: I was not. I was just showing, Mr. Speaker, the very fine feeling of my good friend the Minister of Railways towards the east, and how coming into the government at the present time to the aid of the Prime Minister he is helping to bring about that national unity which the Prime Minister has been speaking about so much lately.

Unfortunately, Sir, this government in the breaking of its pledges is a good deal like an opium eater: their appetite grows on what they consume. The government used to have a habit, in common decency towards the people, of taking at least a few months, if not a year, before they broke their pledges to the country. For example, Mr. Fielding made a pledge to the people in 1923 in the course of his budget speech, and I think it is of sufficient importance to put on Hansard once again because we all respect Mr. Fielding's name. At that time he said:

> There is a thought which does not receive as much consideration as I think sometimes it should be given in public discussions, and that is the desirability of something like tariff stability. Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff.

Then a little lower down:

> Speaking broadly, it is possible to give the country a reasonable assurance of stability of tariff. Such assurances are very desirable, for no business man would care to enter upon enterprises which may be brought into peril by frequent tariff changes. The tariff as it will be when the changes proposed to-day come into effect will be a moderate tariff and probably as low as the country can afford to have under present conditions.

That was the opinion of this government in 1923 as voiced by the then Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding. A year later, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), who was then the acting minister, brought in a budget by which he cut down the tariff, but at any rate he had the decency to take a year before breaking the pledge given by Mr. Fielding to the business interests and the people of Canada. Unfortunately to-day this government breaks its pledges with all the facility of one who finds that practice makes perfect. Let me show what I mean by that. In the Speech from the Throne, of which I hold in my hand an authenticated copy as it appeared in the Canada Gazette, these words were put into the mouth of His Excellency at the beginning of this session, only three months ago:

> My ministers are of the opinion that a general increase in the customs tariff would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity and prejudicial to national unity.

A little further on I find the following:

> They believe that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes; that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A Tariff Advisory Board will accordingly be appointed forthwith.

[Mr. Manion.]

That tariff board, Mr. Speaker, was appointed by this government eight days before the budget was brought down. The budget was delivered on the 15th of this month, and the order in council appointing the tariff board was laid on the table on the 7th. So that this government have not only flouted the tariff board, they have broken their promise to the industrialists, and they have betrayed Canada as a whole, not because they considered that an investigation should not be made to the extent promised in the Speech from the Throne, but because the Minister of Finance said that in his opinion there is a pronounced sentiment in Canada favourable to cutting down the tariff on automobiles. In other words, the government are not governed by economic laws, they are not governed by a consideration of the country's interests, they are not governed by their political pledges; the only principle upon which they act is the principle of power at any price, even the price of Canada itself. Accordingly, the government work on the principle that political pledges are made to be broken, and business in Canada exists merely to be smashed.

Why should not Canada take an attitude favourable to protection within its boundaries? Every other country in the world to-day has raised its tariff since the war. Even free trade England has done so—and I will deal with that a little later—on a number of manufacturing lines. In fact every other country is barring out our goods, but we are allowing their goods to come in here to ruin our producers, to throw our workingmen into idleness, to force our artisans and our boys and girls to go to the most highly protected country in the world to earn a living because they cannot maintain themselves at home owing to the narrow policy of a selfish government. Since 1921 the people of Canada have been experiencing the evil effects of the unwise tariff policy of this government, they have seen idle factories and idle workmen; they have heard idle tales of a prosperity that did not exist. Instead of prosperity they have seen the appalling exodus of our unemployed to the United States. Why? Because our working people could not earn a decent living in Canada. Not one of them went because of the high cost of living in Canada, not one of them went across the line except to earn a living which the unwise fiscal policy of this government denied him in his native land. By the way, Mr. Speaker, did you hear that any of them went to free trade or low tariff England to earn a living? No. But we did open our doors to the products of the low priced labour of Europe, the entry of which was further facilitated by depreciated exchange, cheap labour, and low standards of living. As a consequence we find that practically all our industries have been in a difficult position during the last four years. Woollens and cottons, steel and iron, boots and shoes, starch and syrups, glass manufactures—and the automobile industry will now get the same dose—all these industries have been hit by cuts in the tariff made by this government. In 1921, for example, we imported woollens into this country to the value of $29,000,000; last year, in 1925, we imported $40,000,000 worth, an increase of over 35 per cent. The other day I was in the town of Weston, just outside Toronto, in company with my good friend the ex-Minister of Finance, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), and we were waited on there by a number of workmen who were engaged weaving carpets, and who had sent a petition to this government. They pointed out that because of the importations of cheap oriental and French carpets, and because of the fact that our tariff on these carpets was only from one-half to one-third the United States tariff on the same line of goods, our carpet weavers were working only sixty per cent of capacity, and I have here a letter from a gentleman in the province of Quebec from which I shall quote a few lines because I think they are worth putting on Hansard. This gentleman mentions that he happened to have heard me make a speech a year ago in Montreal on the tariff, and says:

> You mentioned last night that labour in China and Japan gets 7 cents a day. You will be sorry to hear the Japs imitated the habitant catalong made of rags.

My French-Canadian friends know that the catalong is a rag carpet made by the wives of the farmers in Quebec. He goes on:

> You can hardly tell the difference, and our nice Canadian habitant women will be left with their carpets. It would be an easy matter to apply the dumping clause, and protect our own people who do this work at home during their spare moments.

He points out that a friend of his who had driven to Montreal, and gone to Goodwin's with some catalong for sale, was told that they had an order coming in from Japan for $3,000 worth of these goods.

Mr. POULIOT: Does the letter come from Mr. Patenaude?

Mr. MANION: No, but I do say this, that a lot better things come from Mr. Patenaude than from my hon. friend, judging by some of the speeches he has delivered in this House.

Mr. POULIOT: I have heard his speeches, and my opponent was one of his supporters, and he was beaten.

Mr. MANION: I have listened to the speeches of my hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and if he ever deals constructively with anything, it is news to me. His speeches have been very little but abuse of this party.

There is another branch of industry which is hit in this country and which should be protected, and that is the industry of agriculture itself. We have in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec two million farmers who sell from 85 to 95 per cent of their production to the industrial centres in Ontario and Quebec, and yet our duties on these agricultural goods coming into this country from the United States are only from one-third to one-half as much as the United States duties on our agricultural productions going over there. Let me give a few instances:

Article	United States Duty	Canadian Duty
Hay	$4.00 per ton	$2.00 per ton
Eggs	.08 per doz.	.03 per doz.
Cheese	.05 per lb.	.03 per lb.
Oats	.15 per bu.	.10 per bu.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Go on with the list and quote beets, carrots, and other vegetables.

Mr. MANION: I am quoting sufficient for my purpose.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh!

Mr. MANION: My purpose is to show that the farmers of Ontario and Quebec are up against unfair competition from the United States. Of course, that does not worry the Minister of the Interior; he does not come from Ontario.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was simply asking my hon. friend to quote the whole list.

Mr. MANION: I have not it at hand, but I wish to point this out: Just the other day the tariff on our butter going into the United States was raised to three times our tariff on United States butter coming into Canada; before that the tariff was just double. Let me put this to any of our good farming friends in this House, and they are not all to my left or sitting opposite; there are quite a lot of them behind me in this party. Suppose they drive in to town with a load of butter or potatoes or some other farm production and go into a store in Toronto, say, or Montreal, and tell the storekeeper that they have a load of potatoes for sale. Suppose the storekeeper says, "I will not have anything to do with your potatoes. Get out of my shop. I will not handle your goods at any price,"—and that is what the Americans are saying to the Canadian agriculturist at the present time—what would the Canadian farmer reply to the storekeeper? Would he say, "You won't buy my goods, but I would like to buy some of yours?" No, he has too much red blood in him to say that. He would say to the storekeeper, "You do not need to buy my goods, and I do not need to buy yours. I will treat you as you treat me." And that should be our attitude towards the United States. Why should we have a tariff of only four cents a pound on United States butter coming into Canada, when they have a tariff of twelve cents a pound against our butter? As a consequence of the fact that our tariffs on agricultural products are so low as compared with the United States tariffs on the same goods, we imported last year $150,000,000 worth of agricultural products which could have been produced on the farms of Canada. Do not misunderstand me; I am not speaking of tropical fruits, or cotton, but simply of products that could have been produced on the farms of Canada, and if anybody denies it, I have the trade reports here to show that I am correct. The trade reports for 1925 show that we imported, largely from the United States, $149,201,000 of agricultural products which we could have produced on the farms of Canada, and we imported as well $236,000,000 of farm products, such as cotton, tropical fruits, bananas, pineapples, oranges and so forth, which we could not produce in Canada.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Would it not be fair to give as well the exports of agricultural products from this country?

Mr. MANION: As Canada is largely dependent upon her exports and as our manufacturing industries are being put out of business by this government, we are becoming more than ever dependent upon the export of our agricultural products. Our exports are large, particularly of grain, I admit, and other products too, but surely my hon. friend does not wish to kill every industry in Canada. This government are killing as fast as they can all the manufacturing industries in this country; I hope they will not kill all the agricultural industries too. I say, treat our farmers the same as our manufacturers; protect them, just as you should protect our manufacturers. I admit that we cannot protect the wheat farmer, but we can protect the truck farmer, the fruit farmer, and the dairy farmer.

What is there in the budget to cure these conditions? What is there to prevent these large importations of agricultural products that we could produce on our own farms? Who is being helped by this budget? The Americans, largely. I know of very little help that is being given to the Canadians by it. What we have had delivered to us here is simply another American budget. You all remember that there is a range of mountains between France and Spain called the Pyrenees, and that once, when a nephew of Louis XIV was placed on the throne of Spain, an ambassador said, "The Pyrenees no longer exist." If this government stays in power and goes on producing more budgets favouring the United States and injuring Canada, it will not be long before the international boundary line will no longer exist between these two countries.

Are we to learn nothing from the lessons of history? Are we to be only people in the world who will not learn that history teaches this—and I defy any man to show different—that every nation that has progressed and prospered from an industrial standpoint has been a nation which practised the policy of protection. I do not wish to go out of my way to speak of England, which is the only exception, and it is really not an exception because up to 1846, yes up to 1865, England was one of the most highly protected countries in the world, going even so far as to keep out the goods of her own colonies if they interfered with the production of the Motherland. She built up the foundations of her prosperity and success by protection, and then when she had swung all the other countries behind her in a producing way she adopted free trade, because men like Cobden said that if England adopted free trade all the rest of the world would follow suit within ten years. But none of them did, and now England is going back to the policy of protection. The only people that are not profiting by the lessons of history are the theoretical free traders in this House and in the country, and this anti-Canadian government with its anti-Canadian policy. These are the only people. I am going to quote a few things to show that England is profiting by this lesson and that Canada is not. We do not need to quote Canada particularly but we do need to quote England. The Old Country has realized that despite the fact that the French franc is very low in price, despite the fact that the French political situation is chaotic, France is a protected country and there is to-day no unemployment in the republic, whereas England has from 1,200,000 to 1,500,000 unemployed who receive a dole in that country.

I have a quotation here from an article in the Toronto Globe by a representative of that paper who went over and visited both countries and who gives the facts absolutely as he found them, and he points out the above facts. I do not wish to take up too much time because I wish to finish before six o'clock; therefore I shall not read the quotation in question. But I desire to quote one or two other things. Take for example the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Lloyd George in addressing a meeting in Oxford. He says that Britain imports nearly £340,000,000 of food, half of which the country could certainly produce for itself. He goes on to say:

"In 1871," continued Mr. Lloyd George, "the persons engaged in agriculture in the county of Oxford numbered 27,000 in round figures. In 1921 there were fewer than 17,000, though the population of this country has gone up by many millions."

A little further on he said:

This country has fewer people on the land in proportion to the total population than any other country at any time of the world's history.

We are more dependent on imported foodstuffs than any other country is, or has even been. We import nearly £340,000,000 worth of food half of which this country could certainly produce for itself.

And finally he says:

The labourer to-day is flying from this barren prospect of bondage to anything which looks like liberty, anywhere except the land of his own country.

Now, why is it that the land to-day is going out of use in England, and has been for fifty, sixty or seventy years? It is because free trade England removed all the tariff duties on corn and a lot of other farm products which put out of business the farmers of that country. Let me quote to my hon. friend across the way—the hon. gentleman shakes his head, but let me quote the statement of a man whose authority I would rather take than that of my hon. friend; I refer to Lord Rosebery, who is also a free trader. That statement is as follows:

Under a system of free trade every branch of industry does not prosper. I am interested in the land industry and I do not think that has prospered particularly under free trade. . . . . and it cannot be denied that under a system of free trade large tracts of land have been turned out of cultivation; that our food supply has been diminished; that the population which was once reared in the rural districts is reared there no longer.

I do not care whether my hon. friend shakes his head or not. The fact is that everybody who has looked into the question at all knows the reasons why the farmers in England have been driven off the land, driven out of the country or driven to seek employment in coal mines. The reason is because the products of the farms do not receive any protection.

Now I am going to make a further quotation from the National Review of January, 1926. The National Review is not a political journal, it is one of the well known reviews in England. The National Review says, at page 660 of its January issue:

We should not forget that in her wisdom France has refused to allow the national industries that provide the employment of her urban population and constitute a magnificent home market, to be sacrificed to finance as they are on this side of the channel. There are none of those heart-breaking French queues of able-bodied men seeking without finding work and reduced to the dole, such as are common and conspicuous in devasated England—

Further on it says:

With a solvent countryside, protected native industries, fully employed artisans and prospering trade, France can still afford to smile on her foreign detractors. There are worse things than a depreciating franc. "Deflation" is a crueller taskmaster than "inflation."

Then reading from another part of the article, at page 679, I find the following:

The only reason the oppositions are unable to capitalize the distress of industry for political purposes is that neither of them has so much as a palliative while both have been respectively committed by their Snowdens and their Asquiths to the two twin causes of unemployment, namely, free trade and the gold standard.

That is the opinion of the National Review.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Is the hon. gentleman opposed to the gold standard?

Mr. MANION: I am not discussing the gold standard, I am discussing protection. I am not going to get drawn into a discussion on the gold standard.

The Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin on January 27 made a speech in which he said that since the introduction of the silk duties in England fifty new industries had started in the British Isles for the production of silk.

Let me quote from a little work which was published last year entitled "The Call for Protection," by G. Graham Anderson. This book is to be found in the Library of Parliament if any hon. gentleman desires to consult it. I wish to make only two or three quotations from it, and very briefly, because I do not want to take up too much time. These quotations illustrate the fact that an increase of duties does not necessarily mean an increase in price, a point which I made at the beginning of my remarks. The first quotation I wish to make is the following:

The results of the McKenna duties furnish one of the most convincing object-lessons this country has had for many years in the national advantages of a protective policy.

In England the duties on automobiles were put at 33⅓ per cent. They were put on during the war not for protection but for the purpose of saving the industry for war purposes. But Sir William Joynson-Hicks, M.P., now Home Secretary, in a letter which appeared in The Times on May 12, 1925, says of the effect of those duties:

The average price to the public of selected British cars of different types shows an average reduction to-day of 50 per cent below the figures ruling in 1921, and these modern cars are fitted with more accessories and refinements than was the case in 1921.

Then again a man who signs himself "Free Trader" wrote a letter which appeared in the London Times of May 13, 1924 in which he says:

The most striking changes that 1923 showed over 1922 were the increases in the number of British cars made, exported, and purchased in this country; the reduction in their average price from £570 to £400; the sale of the same number of foreign cars as in the previous year, but at a reduced average price of £149, as compared with $£189; and the growth in the number of men employed.

Mr. HEAPS: That was at the time the duty was taken off.

Mr. MANION: This illustrates that when the motor industry had been built up by protection the prices came down.

Mr. HEAPS: The duties were reduced, more cars were bought, and as a result the prices came down.

Mr. MANION: The duties are higher to-day. I am giving these quotations for the purpose of showing the effects of protection on the motor industry of England.

Mr. HEAPS: What you are quoting shows exactly the opposite.

Mr. MANION: No, my hon. friend is wrong. Mr. John Bridge, General Manager of the Standard Motor Company, Coventry, says—and this will make the matter quite clear to my hon. friend—speaking of his own company:

Largely owing to the McKenna duties the company has been able to increase its output during the past few years by 500 per cent, and the number of men employed by our company is three and a half times the number employed in 1914. We have also been able to reduce prices to pre-war level, and to secure a footing in overseas markets. But for the duties very few British cars could or would have been exported from this country during the last five years.

That is sufficient to show that the motor duties in England not only increased production and gave more work to the people, but lowered the price.

Mr. DUNNING: Has the hon. gentleman the list of articles protected?

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: No, but there are many articles protected in England under the Safeguarding of Industries Act.

Mr. HEAPS: Not very many.

Mr. MANION: Quite a number. The industries protected are now producing on a larger scale and are flourishing while many other industries unprotected are in a dilapidated condition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are over 300.

Mr. MANION: Now in regard to the Dyestuffs Act, another important protective measure still in operation. The act was passed in 1920 by the coalition government of which Lloyd George was Prime Minister, and this is the statement which I find in this work with regard to it:

In 1913 Germany made 83 per cent of the world's total production of dyestuffs, and we took 90 per cent of our requirements from abroad. To-day, as a result of the war and of government action, we have a dyestuff industry which supplies 80 per cent of our needs. The dyes made are quite equal in fastness and brightness to German dyes.

Then they proceed in regard to the prices.

In June, 1921, it is stated, the average price of British dyestuffs was a little over 4s. 4d. per pound. In December of the same year it had fallen to 3s. 6d. per pound; in December, 1922, it was about 2s. 6d. per pound; and in 1923 the average was down to about 1s. per pound. These figures represent a reduction of more than 75 per cent in the price of dyestuffs within three years of the passing of the act.

Did the raising of the tariffs there increase the price of these goods? It lowered the price of them. Where is the tariff a tax? The Prime Minister on one occasion in this House stated that a tariff is always a tax. How is it always a tax, if in other countries it can be shown, as I have shown, that in many cases where you raise the tariff and keep the market for your own producers you lower the price of the article concerned?

I wish to make one more quotation from this book, because it contains a germ of truth which I would like to present to the House. It is a quotation from a speech of Daniel Webster, addressing the United States Senate in 1846. Mr. Webster stood very high in the estimation of the people in the United States; he was considered one of the immortals of the country. He says:

Where there is work for the hands of men, there will be work for their teeth. Where there is employment, there will be bread. It is a great blessing to the poor to have cheap food, but greater than that, prior to that, and of still higher value, is the blessing of being able to buy food, by honest and respectable employment. Employment feeds, and clothes, and instructs. Employment gives health, sobriety, and morals. Constant employment and well-paid labour produce, in a country like ours, general prosperity, content, and cheerfulness.

I again ask, are we to ignore the lessons of history because a minority of free traders and low tariff men in this country control the government at the present time? Even England has realized that trade is a battle for markets. She has realized that her imports are unlimited and that thus she is not a free trade country, because no country traded with her on the basis of her free trade policy. But by that principle of unlimited free imports she was throwing away her weapons, opening her gates to the enemy and discarding her negotiating power. She realized that the index of a nation's prosperity is not in external balance sheets, not in the reports of Finance ministers, but in the condition of the workingman's dinner table and his clothes line. Where in this budget is the workingman's dinner table or his clothes line improved? We do not find it has any place in the budget. What we need in Canada is large production, plenty of work and wages for the people; in other words, a policy of buying and selling among ourselves. It is not cheap goods that we need; it is work and wages for our people. Suppose the tariff reduction had lowered the price of automobiles by an average of $5 to $10 a year to the man who buys a car every four or five years, is it not worth $5 or $10 per annum to the citizens of the country to build a broad Canadian development on a solid foundation?

The budget proposes a reduction of the duty on tin plates, which I am informed will injure an industry just formed in Quebec. The tin plate industry in the United States is one of the best illustrations of what can be done under a tariff to build up an industry. In 1890 the United States produced 2,000,000 pounds of tin plates, which was a mere bagatelle because they imported about 1,000 million pounds. In 1913, twenty-three years later, they produced not two million but two billion pounds of tin plate—a thousand times as much—and the price had gone down.

Sir Gilbert Molesworth wrote a book on the tariff question advocating a tariff policy for England, pointing out that steel rails sold in the United States for $150 a ton in 1867 when they had no tariff, and in 1885, eighteen years later, when a tariff was placed on steel rails, the price had decreased from $150 a ton to $27 a ton. Before the war the price in the United States was $26 or $27 a ton, after they had imposed a high tariff and afforded protection for the producer in the United States. He gave a list of 214 other articles which, with increased protection, had gone down in price 25 per cent under the high tariff. Let us do likewise in this country. Let the people of Canada apply the Golden Rule of commerce to other countries—do unto other countries as they are doing unto us. Let us have a policy of Canada for the Canadians. Let Canadian industry, Canadian thrift and resourcefulness provide us with all that we need, instead of our promoting foreign industry and buying the products of foreign cheap production. The issue is clear for the Canadian people to decide and to make a final decision as to their destiny. It is up to the members of this House and the government of this country to abide by that decision. This in a nutshell is the issue before the people to-day: The people of Canada must decide whether, under the lower tariff or free trade policy which this country is following, we are to become a mere adjunct of the United States, allowing others to exploit us, to manufacture our raw materials, our asbestos, nickel, pulpwood and electricity, into the finished products, allowing them to take $5,000,000 of raw materials and convert it into $50,000,000 worth of finished production and thus get employment for their labourers and the manufacturers the profits. In other words, are we to permit ourselves to become the dumping ground for cheap producing countries? Are we to become the hewers of wood and drawers of water, the miners of minerals and growers of grain for other countries and the recruiting ground for their artisans? That is the effect of the low tariff policy.

Mr. EVANS: Is the hon. gentleman in favour of a tariff on the raw material?

Mr. MANION: I am in favour of any tariff which will build up the industries of Canada, whether they are manufacturing, farming or any other kind of industry.

Mr. EVANS: The hon. member said there might be many articles on which there should be a tariff. Does he approve of a tariff on raw material?

Mr. MANION: That is a very wide subject. There are thousands of kinds of raw material, and I am not going to give an answer offhand to any question which the hon. gentleman asked me, because probably he would throw the answer at me at some future time. I want to know the kind of raw material to which he refers. I do not want a blanket question of that sort, covering thousands of articles, and to be asked to give an answer immediately.

Mr. EVANS: I am sorry I did not ask the question earlier when the hon. member was discussing another matter. But does the hon. member mean to infer that England is going to raise that large quantity of foodstuffs now, by putting a tariff on those foodstuffs?

Mr. MANION: I was not trying to show she was going to try to raise it now. I was trying to show that she had ruined her farmers and agriculturists by taking the tariff off. If I were living in England I would advocate putting a duty on a lot of raw materials and raw products in order to build up agriculture in that country. But I am speaking for Canada and not for England; the people of England will have to decide that question for themselves. I was showing what will happen to Canada under free trade or under a low-tariff policy.

The people will have to decide whether or not they want a national policy of protection for all the different industries of this country, a policy of Canada for Canadians, which will develop our own natural resources instead of allowing others to develop them for us; which will keep our markets for our farmers of Ontario and Quebec and the other provinces; which will protect our workers against a system of low exchange, of cheap labour, and of the low standards of living of the Orient and Europe; which will give stability to the business of the country; which will open the factories which have been closed, which will give encouragement to the establishing of other factories; which will give traffic to our railways by giving them a chance to carry our raw materials and our finished product; which will give work to the workmen of our country; which will give opportunities to our boys and girls to stay at home and to indulge that noblest sentiment in the human breast, patriotism, instead of their being forced to go to the United States, the most highly protected country in the world, to earn a living—in a phrase, a policy which will give us a wide, universal development, which will lead Canada to become a happy, prosperous, and contented nation, which prosperity will bring back to our land the sons who have been exiled from it and will draw millions from other countries to fill our vacant spaces. To my mind the latter policy, the policy of protecting all the industries of Canada, agriculture, manufacturing, and all others, is the red-blooded courageous Canadian policy and that is the policy which the people of Canada should support.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, because of the attitude which I have taken, I intend to move the following amendment:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the late general election campaign assurances were repeatedly given by the Prime Minister and other ministers of the crown that before further tariff changes were made an opportunity would be given industries affected thereby to be heard before an advisory board.

That such assurances were officially incorporated by the government in the Speech from the Throne of the present session in the following words:

"Changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A tariff advisory board will accordingly be appointed forthwith."

That such tariff advisory board was accordingly appointed.

And this House regrets that in the case of drastic changes announced in the budget such assurances have not been fulfilled.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DUGALD DONAGHY (Vancouver North): I desire in the first place, Mr. Speaker, to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) upon the clear, concise and businesslike statement which he presented to the House a few days ago. An occasion of this kind has, though of course on a very much smaller scale, its counterpart in the annual meetings of the ratepayers of our municipal governments. The mayor and council meet the taxpayers at the end of the year and, to use the popular phrase, give an account of their stewardship. Similarly, each year the taxpayers of the Dominion await with considerable interest the statement of the Minister of Finance with reference to the financial condition of this country during the year immediately preceding. It is of interest on such occasions, in reviewing the past, to contemplate also the proposals for the ensuing twelve months, and the taxpayers are always eager to ascertain whether or not there is likely to be any lightening of the burden of taxation.

The country generally received with some surprise and with a great deal of satisfaction the minister's statement, which is now being considered, wherein he showed that not only had expenditures been kept within the limits of revenues during the year just past, but that those expenditures had been so carefully curtailed and the business of the country so economically administered by this government that the very handsome surplus of some $33,000,000 was achieved. This statement is gratifying indeed to the taxpayers of Canada. And following upon that the country received, probably with greater astonishment, the intimation that for the ensuing year there was to be a considerable diminution in the burden of taxation as disclosed by the resolution moved by the Minister of Finance. Perhaps the greatest and most outstanding act of administration since the days when the war clouds first loomed over Canada has been the much needed reduction in income tax which has been depressing business in this country for some years. The extent of the reduction in income taxes is striking, and in view of our present financial condition it would seem that we have gone as far as we can in that direction for the time being. For example, a man with a wife but no children and with an income of $3,000 per annum will pay no taxes whatever under the new schedule, while the same man, if he receives $3,500, will pay the trivial sum of $10 in taxes. Surely no one can complain of taxation assessed on that basis.

As regards the tax on incomes derived from dividends from shares held in corporations, a change has been made. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) this afternoon offered some criticism in this regard. Heretofore the income received from dividends paid to the individual as a holder of shares in a company was not taxable. Was that right? Was it fair that the income produced by toil and labour should be taxed while income so easily secured from capital should escape taxation?

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member mean to tell me that such dividends were not taxed?

Mr. DONAGHY: I am afraid the hon. gentleman was not carefully following my words. If he will consult Hansard he will see what I said.

Mr. McGIBBON: Answer the question.

Mr. DONAGHY: I do not like to repeat too often. If my hon. friend will listen carefully he will get the drift of my remarks and discover what the change is. The income tax upon the profits of corporations has also been reduced. Heretofore that tax has been ten and a half per cent over and above the first $2,000 of income and it has now been reduced to nine per cent, a reduction of approximately fifteen per cent. The income tax in the United States on the profits of corporations is higher than that; it is thirteen per cent. One of the great objections to this form of taxation is that it discourages investments in the industries of the country. I am glad to see that the government has borne this principle in mind in drafting the resolution. We stand to-day in a more favourable position for attracting capital than does the United States. Their income tax on the profits of corporations is, as I have said, thirteen per cent, and at the end of 1926 it will be increased to thirteen and a half per cent, while ours will remain at nine per cent. So that we shall be in an advantageous position as compared with our neighbours to the south. As I say, this budget resolution places us at an advantage because our taxation on income from investments is less than that of the United States, although ours on personal earnings is higher than theirs.

Another reduction in taxation which the country welcomes, and which probably was not expected this year, is the return to penny postage. The difference between paying three cents and two cents upon letters is of considerable importance to the population generally, especially to the poor. True, it is a small amount in itself, but in the aggregate it means a substantial saving to our people. Penny postage was made popular many years ago and after a great fight it became almost universal, but owing to war conditions it had to be abrogated. The return now to this popular rate of postage is another indication that financially Canada is fast moving out from under the clouds in which she has been enshrouded since the beginning of the war.

If there was one thing more than another that caused Canadians to look with some discouragement upon the future financial outlook of the country it was the annually recurring deficits on the operation of the Canadian National railway system. We have a similar problem to-day in British Columbia, where our provincial railway is being operated at a loss. It is a grave problem to my province. On a much more magnified scale the operating loss on our national system has been a source of much worry to those handling the finances of the Dominion for several years past. I do not think any of us were optimistic enough to expect that the serious operating deficits of from fifty to fifty-five million dollars annually, to which by their steady recurrence we were becoming accustomed, would so soon drop down to the comparatively small figure of a trifle over seven million dollars. The hope that even this deficit will soon be wiped out is, I am sure, shared by all members of this House, regardless of their political affiliations. It was particularly gratifying to hear the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) state last Thursday that this improved condition was a very encouraging sign, and I think he went so far as to say that there was every reason to expect the national railway system would be upon a paying basis within a very few years.

To a considerable extent discussions on the budget and on the Speech from the Throne invariably revolve around the tariff. It may be questioned whether too much importance is not attached to the annual debate upon tariff matters, and whether the two sides which battle so strenuously on this subject do so with any very deep sincerity. The history of our tariff legislation for the last twenty-five years shows practically no difference in the various tariff schedules, beyond a point or two, whether the administration was Liberal or Conservative. That bald fact has a tendency to make outsiders think that the range of debate in this controversy does not produce any very fruitful results. Let me say this: the discovery of Marquis wheat has resulted in the production of more wealth for Canada than all the discussions on the tariff that we have had since confederation. I might say the same with respect to the discovery of a new process for treating refractory ores. There are other things of importance besides the tariff worthy of consideration by this House. I welcome the announcement that a tariff board has been appointed. The tariff is too intricate and complex a subject for the people generally to understand and decide. I doubt even if many hon. members could pass a satisfactory examination on the tariff of this country. Some hon. gentlemen talk very learnedly of what the United States tariff is against our goods. This afternoon I heard an hon. gentleman on the other side state quite positively that the tariff on Canadian automobiles entering the United States was 50 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I never said so at all. I never mentioned Canada.

Mr. DONAGHY: I said an hon. gentleman so stated. I think we all heard it on this side. The statement was a striking illustration of what I have already said, that a great many members of this House would not pass anything like a satisfactory examination on tariff matters, either regarding the tariff of their own country or that of the adjoining republic, whose praises are so loudly sounded by hon. gentlemen on the other side. Unfortunately for the hon. member who made that remark, the tariff on Canadian automobiles entering the United States is exactly the same as the tariff on United States automobiles entering Canada.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The Finance Minister does not say so.

Mr. DONAGHY: The basis of the tariff on automobiles entering the United States is a duty of 25 per cent. Hon. members will find that in Vandegrift's United States Tariff, 1922, at page 70, paragraph 369. Let me read it:

> Automobiles, automobile bodies, automobile chassis, motor cycles, and parts of the foregoing, not including tires, all of the foregoing whether finished or unfinished, 25 per centum ad valorem.

Then a proviso is added to the effect that if any country raises its tariff against United States automobiles higher than that point, the United States tariff against such a country will be raised accordingly.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Why don't you read it?

Mr. DONAGHY: That supports the assertion I made a moment ago, and which some hon. gentlemen opposite challenged. Our duty on automobiles was 35 per cent, and automatically under the article I have just quoted the United States raised their tariff up to the same point, so until the resolution was brought down the other day, the tariffs of the two countries on automobiles was exactly the same, namely, 35 per cent.

Coming back to the question of the most scientific way of dealing with the tariff, I must say that the wisest course seems to have been adopted this year of appointing a tariff board to inquire into tariff matters. In my opinion this board should have been appointed twenty years ago. We would then have had the benefit of a board devoting its whole time to the study of this question in an expert manner, and figuring out the consequences that might result from raising or lowering any particular item. But instead of that, the question of the tariff had been thrown into the political arena at every election, and about four weeks of very florid oratory has been devoted in every election campaign to educating the people of this country on the subject of the tariff. At a time like that, when their minds are excited by the heat of political battle, no good results, no logical conclusion, can ever be looked for from such a proceeding.

In connection with the action that has been taken regarding the duty on automobiles, the criticism may be offered that this action is inconsistent with the general policy of referring tariff matters to a tariff board. It is quite true that the action that was taken could not be justified on any consistent principle, but nevertheless it may and will be justified by the exigencies of the circumstances and of the case.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DONAGHY: It is quite easy to conceive of one of these delicate infant industries that require the constant attendance of the sucking bottle to keep them alive growing so big and fat and prosperous that its profits and its wealth are such as to shock the public conscience of the people of Canada. That is quite conceivable, and we have had probably the most glaring example of that which it is possible to conceive of in any country in the Canadian Ford Company. Here is an industry protected to the extent of 35 per cent, the whole of which duty it milks and takes from the pockets of the taxpayers of this country, every dollar, and the company waxes so big and fat and pays such extravagant dividends, that the conscience of those who have not been so fortunate as to walk in these golden pathways is shocked at the necessity of keeping the milk bottle constantly at the mouth of this plutocrat. This had been probably the most glaring instance in Canada, and I am not astonished at all that public opinion has revolted and demanded that this condition be remedied by parliament, and remedied now, instead of a year from now. Every rule is proved by the exception, and the rule that a tariff board is the proper body to study and advise on tariff matters is proved by the exception in the case of the Canadian Ford Company.

Mr. ROBINSON: Is not the hon. gentleman aware that 49 per cent of the production of the Ford Motor Company at Ford is exported, and helps the balance of trade in favour of Canada by over a million dollars a year? That being the case, how can this company take out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this Dominion every dollar of the duty?

Mr. DONAGHY: That will not affect the export very much, then. The hon. gentleman has not made his point very clear.

Mr. CANTLEY: Answer the question.

Mr. DONAGHY: There are two other matters which probably enter more into the question of the industrial development of Canada than the question of the tariff. One of those matters is the necessity for a fair and equitable adjustment of the freight rate structure all over this Dominion. That adjustment is more important than the tariff. We have heard a good deal on this subject in parliament during the past two months. We have heard the members from the Maritime provinces complain that the coal of Nova Scotia cannot at present freight rates be hauled to central Canada. They also complain that the ports on the Atlantic coast are not being used to the extent to which they should be used for the handling of Canadian grain. We have heard the same complaint regarding the ports on the Pacific coast, and we have heard the complaint that owing to the high freight rates coal from Alberta cannot be shipped to central Canada. Canada being so vast in extent, comprising as it does so many thousands of miles from ocean to ocean, is an exceedingly difficult country to govern and govern justly in order that hardships may not be imposed upon one section of a country more than upon another. There is nothing which will help more greatly to equalize the conditions of the people and the industries in the various parts of the country than a fair and equitable adjustment of the freight rate structure throughout the whole of Canada. The grain growers of the prairies desire low freight rates on their grain so that they may get that grain to the ocean and to the world's markets on a competitive basis with grain from some other country. On the other hand those who live in the cities and ports on the seacoast desire to see Canadian grain go through those ports and to see merchandise imported into Canada come directly into those ports. It is a matter for gratification that the government has taken another step in the latter direction. As a result of that step we understand that after the end of the present year it will be necessary that imported goods, in order to enjoy the full British preferential tariff, shall enter direct through a Canadian port. This is a step in the right direction. We should encourage the shipping of both exports and imports through our own ports.

The government, in my opinion, has taken proper steps during the past six or eight months for the equalization of the freight rates and the solution of the great problem involved. We find that on June 5, 1925, it passed an order in council which in part reads as follows:

> The committee therefore advise that the board be directed to make a thorough investigation of the rate structures of railways and railway companies subject to the jurisdiction of parliament, with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rate structure, which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities, so as to permit of the freest possible interchange of commodities between the various provinces and territories of the Dominion and the expansion of its trade, both foreign and domestic, having due regard to the needs of its agricultural and other basic industries, and in particular to:
> (a) The claim asserted on behalf of the Maritime provinces that they are entitled to the restoration of the rate basis which they enjoyed prior to 1919;
> (b) The encouragement of the movement of traffic through Canadian ports;
> (c) The increased traffic westward and eastward through Pacific coast ports owing to the expansion of trade with the Orient and to the transportation of products through the Panama canal.

Subsequently, on January 7, of the present year, an order was passed by the government which reads as follows:

The committee of the Privy Council therefore recommends that the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada be directed, as a part of the general rate investigation above referred to, especially to inquire into the causes of Canadian grain and other products being routed or diverted to other than Canadian ports, and to take such effective action under the Railway Act, 1919, as the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada may deem necessary to ensure, as far as possible, the routing of Canadian grain and other products through Canadian ports.

Mr. QUINN: What is the date of that order?

Mr. DONAGHY: January 7, 1926. In my opinion the government in that order, for the present time at any rate, has gone as far as it possibly could. The fixing of these rates is now in the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners subject, of course, to an appeal to the Privy Council. In the order in question the government has directed the Board of Railway Commissioners as to the policy which should be pursued by them on general principles. The government has made known the general principles on which it thinks the board should act, leaving the board free to work out the scheme and the details.

Next in importance, probably, to the equitable and fair adjustment of the rate structure throughout Canada is the adoption of proper means for opening up new markets for the products and manufactures of this country. More can be done by the negotiation of favourable treaties for the development of Canadian industries and the employment of Canadian workingmen than can ever be accomplished by any debate upon tariff issues.

Mr. SPENCE: Name one such treaty.

Mr. DONAGHY: The Australian treaty, and I wish to give you a fairly good example of what it has accomplished.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Do not my hon. friends opposite like it?

Mr. DONAGHY: It is first of all desirable, so far as is practically possible, that the great stores of raw material which this country possesses in such vast degree should be manufactured in Canada; these resources should be worked up in Canada by Canadian workmen and give employment to our own people. In pursuance of that general principle and policy the government negotiated a very favourable commercial agreement with our sister dominion, Australia, under which the newsprint of Canada is admitted into Australia on favourable terms. We know that in the year 1920 Canada lost the Australian market for its paper products. In that year Australia gave Great Britain a preference of $15 per ton on British newsprint. That shut Canada out of the Australian market. Through the efforts of this government, however, in negotiating a commercial treaty with Australia, Canada has now been admitted to the markets of Australia on these specially favoured terms so that her paper enters free as against a duty of $15 per ton on the newsprint of other countries. The newsprint industry of Canada is only in its infancy, but it will not be many years before it will be one of the greatest industries in this Dominion. We probably have in Canada the greatest stand of timber in the world to-day. Is it not desirable that through the negotiation of treaties opening up markets we should be enabled to manufacture the products of our forests at home in Canada and give employment to our own workingmen? One of these manufacturing processes is the working up of the rough product of the forest into newsprint. But what is the use of doing that if you have not got markets for the product? The first step to take is to find a market. Having found a market, as we have for newsprint, the manufacturing of it at home by our own workmen naturally follows. We have a very good example of that in the province of British Columbia. About 100 miles north of Vancouver there is the town of Powell River, which is entirely a paper-manufacturing community of some 4,000 inhabitants. As a result of this treaty that company is now installing a new machine and doubling its capacity. Although that is an American concern, very few Americans are employed in it, and approximately 40 per cent of the workmen employed in that paper mill industry are veterans of the Great war, men who fought in France. What is the outlook in Canada for the future in the paper industry? The programme to-day of the Canadian paper industry is the installing of eighteen new additional machines. What is the programme of the world? For England the programme for the remainder of the year is the installing of one new machine, and for Finland one new machine. That is the world programme. Canada stands out preeminently over the other countries of the world in the programme she is outlining for the manufacture of newsprint. Shall we not go on and multiply treaties of this kind if possible, negotiate them wherever they can be negotiated on favourable terms, in order that the raw material of this country can be manufactured at home and industries built up in Canada on a sound commercial basis, utterly regardless of this wrangle we have every year in regard to protection?

We have this tariff with us; we have had it with us since we were children, and it will be with our grand-children. It is here to stay. History shows that. There is no use trying to deceive the public in regard to this matter. Notwithstanding the very heated and learned debates that we listen to between the various parties in this House, history still remains and the cold fact still stares us in the face that this good old tariff has never changed more than one or two points under any administration. The way to build up a country and its industries and to create employment is not by wasting time debating the question; it is by going out and negotiating commercial treaties and finding a market for our raw products manufactured in Canada. The treaty with the West Indies is another example of that, and I have no doubt, if the government uses good judgment and is industrious and energetic, we will be able to multiply the favourable treaties as the years go by. We cannot get them all in one year. It is particularly commendable to note that the treaties negotiated in recent years have been made with our sister dominions. That is a very favourable outlook. We may look forward in the near future to the circle being increased, and later on we may possibly take in with our treaties, all the dominions forming the great British Empire.

I know it is not usual for a member upon his first appearance in the House to take up a great deal of time, and I have spoken long enough. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of this House, for the courteous hearing you have given me.

Mr. D. M. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Donaghy) who has an acute legal mind which we have seen functioning in a fearful and wonderful manner at the customs probe, has given us a very good speech to-night; particularly did that legal mind come into play when he endeavoured to explain the exigencies of the situation which necessitated that the government should not direct the attention of the tariff board to the automobile industry. Apart from that, the hon. member made a very good protectionist speech, such as I am sure his protectionist constituents in Vancouver North will welcome.

I have understood that the discussion on the budget generally takes rather a wide range, and all sections of the country present their views in regard to matters which particularly affect them. This, I take it, is an exceedingly good thing, particularly for new members in the House, of whom we have a large number. It gives them a chance to widen their viewpoints and see what is going on in other parts of the country, and it also leads one to realize that this country must be governed by a policy in which there is a good deal of give and take. The hon. gentleman could not bring himself to one thing—he could not defend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) in the situation that was brought up in the House this afternoon, when we saw the spectacle of a minister of the crown endeavouring to change the meaning of what he said under oath out in the province of Saskatchewan. That is a thing that I do not think any minister has ever been known to do in this House before. There is also the spectacle of a minister being exposed, when it was clearly shown that he went up to the riding of West Middlesex and gave details of a conversation with another member of this House, which conversation never took place at all. We have heard a good deal from members on the other side of the House about stocks going up in this country since this government came into power. What has happened to-day certainly will send down the stocks of the hon. Minister of Railways in this country and in this House. I venture to say that had these facts been known to the government, even this government, brazen as it is, would not have asked him to sit in council with them.

I wish to continue what I was saying about the different parts of the country having different viewpoints. We have heard a good deal about the coal industry since we have been here, particularly from our friends from the Maritime provinces, and there is no doubt whatever that upon the proper solution of the coal problem depends a great deal that is very important to Canada as a whole. In the report of the provincial royal commission which was made last year, a former member of this House, Mr. Hume Cronyn, in an illuminating addendum to the report, sets out clearly what the rest of the country must do to solve or help to solve this fuel problem. He says that federal assistance towards the establishment of coking ovens must be given or, second, that there must be a substantial increase in the import duty on all bituminous and anthracite screened coal. In the budget that was delivered the other day no assistance was given to the coal miners of Nova Scotia, and the reason advanced was that the matter had been referred to a commission and therefore was under discussion and should not be dealt with by parliament. In spite of that the question of the tariff on automobiles is being dealt with in this House without being referred to a commission for investigation.

Another matter on which I wish to touch, because it enters very closely into the questions of the day, is the question of immigration. My views on immigration may differ from those held by many others. I believe in our present situation in Canada the cities should be built up ahead of the rural districts and our endeavours should be directed towards that end, because we would thus give more employment and a bigger market to the people in the rural districts. I realize that it would be folly to bring people to the cities unless we had work for them to do. The main problem, therefore, is to provide work in our cities, to bring the people in and to build up our urban population; that is what Canada needs far more than an increase in the number of farmers to settle on our land when our farmers now, according to some of them, are having hard work to make a living. The idea of bringing in more farmers is being advocated more by the farmers in this House than by others, and it is the only instance within my knowledge of an industry, which is complaining of hard times, urging and welcoming more competition for itself. That does not seem to me to be logical. In my opinion the cities should be built up first.

Another reason for my contention is this, that from year to year there is very little difference in the quantity of food products that are used throughout at least that part of the world that we have to do with. There is very little increase in population and, therefore, very little need for our farmers to produce more stuff. The situation in the cities is very different. More kinds of manufactures are coming to the fore every minute and there has been a tremendous development even in the last thirty years. The whole automobile industry, the phonograph industry, the radio industry and many other new kinds of manufactures are employing much more labour and that will be the case from now on. We shall therefore have more room for employment for the people in the cities as long as we have a proper fiscal policy that will provide work for them there.

A great deal has been said about the word "protection," or "safeguarding," as it is called in some countries. I am firmly of the opinion that on that system of protection depends to a great extent the prosperity of Canada. When I speak of protection I mean simply protection; it is something that does not need to be qualified by an adjective "high," "low," "moderate," or anything of that kind. If you protect an industry, protection is all it wants, and it is superfluous to say "high," "low" or anything else. It is simply protection this country needs; if it has that it will get along all right.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in his address laid a great deal of emphasis on the balance of trade as regards our dealings with the rest of the world, and he cited figures that were in a way very satisfactory. Our main dealings are with the United States, and according to the latest available figures, which take us up to the end of February of this year, we have a very large adverse balance in our dealings with the United States. In this year, 1926, we have imported from the United States $123,035,937 worth of stuff more than we exported, and in 1925 we imported $97,393,324 worth more than we exported. That shows that our adverse balance of trade with the United States is getting larger, in fact being more than $25,000,000 worse this year than last year. If this policy of cutting the protection from the automobile manufacturers goes into force and many of these cheaper cars are brought in from the United States, that adverse balance will be materially larger than it is now.

This budget as a whole is what might be termed a Saskatchewan budget. That statement deserves a little explanation. The general policies in Saskatchewan seem to be policies of annihilation and assassination rather than protection, and if those members from Saskatchewan who seem to favour those policies get any more power in the House than they have shown they have, there is going to be very serious trouble for this country. The reason why I attribute this to Saskatchewan is, as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) said this afternoon, because no reference was made in the Speech from the Throne to this reduction in the tariff on automobiles. I attribute this reduction more to Saskatchewan Liberals even than to our Progressive friends and I base this statement on part of a letter written by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) to his home paper about February 5, when he said:

9 p.m.

> The Speech from the Throne reassures the manufacturers by announcing that further changes in tariff duties are undesirable.

This shows that the caucus which has been carried on and the conferences which had been held between the Liberal government and the Progressive executive had not at that time discussed and decided upon this question. What happened between that time and the present? Only this, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was forced to leave Ontario and go to Saskatchewan for a seat and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) left Saskatchewan and came down to Ottawa to take a seat in the cabinet. Those two moves are the explanation of this tariff change. I do not think any reasonable person throughout Canada can bear out the stand of the government in this matter. I do not really think the Quebec Liberals, to a certain extent, bear out this stand, because I have noticed for the last two or three days that whenever there is any applause on the other side on account of the budget, the Liberal members applaud income tax reductions and the Saskatchewan members applaud reductions in the tariff on automobiles. That shows what the feeling of the House is on the matter.

During the debates that have been going on in this House almost since the beginning of the session we have heard a great deal from nearly every province as to its own particular question, Quebec being the only exception. Practically no one from the province of Quebec has risen in his place and told the House what are the main questions in which that part of the country is interested. There is a representation from Quebec of sixty-five members, sixty-one of whom are on the other side; yet we have heard practically not one word regarding the problems of that province.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is because we are satisfied and happy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): So that in the absence of any declaration on the part of the delegation representing that province in this House, we have only to take the words of people outside on the questions affecting the province of Quebec. After reading the speeches of influential men in that province I say unreservedly that Quebec is protectionist. Let me read first of all a letter written by the provincial Minister of Agriculture. This matter has been referred to before, but as it is important I shall discuss it again.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): Gentlemen opposite scoff at any mention of the Minister of Agriculture for Quebec. I do not know whether that gentleman is in good repute with this government or not.

An hon. MEMBER: Very good.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): In that case, then, my hon. friends will attach some weight to his opinions.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Let the hon. member read the explanation which the provincial Minister of Agriculture made at a public meeting in the province on the same subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): The statement I am about to read is set down in black and white and does not lend itself to any two constructions; its meaning is quite clear on the face of it. The letter has been mentioned before but it is so much to the point that I venture to read it again. In reply to a gentleman who had made certain inquiries of him the Minister of Agriculture in the local house wrote:

> I have your letter and also the accompanying resolution. I made further application to the federal authorities this year to obtain in favour of farmers a raising of the duties on agricultural products entering Canada from the United States so as to protect the Canadian farmer in the same degree as the American farmer is by the Fordney tariff. I regret not to have succeeded in my application, as the budget speech—

That is to say, the budget speech of last year.

> —makes no mention of any change in this part of the tariff. I always hope, however, that the federal authorities will accede to the numerous requests which have been made to them, and to my own repeated solicitations.

That letter comes from a responsible minister of the crown in the province of Quebec, who would not write in such terms unless the other members of the provincial cabinet were in sympathy with the view he takes. And remember, the provincial cabinet is Liberal; the people who voted for hon. gentlemen opposite voted also for Mr. Caron and his associates in that province. Does anyone mean to say that those people voted at one election for protection and at another election for something quite different? I make the statement again that rural Quebec, as indeed Quebec in general, is protectionist. More than that, the sixty-one representatives opposite from that province are undoubtedly, in my opinion, also protectionist in conviction, so that they are not really representing their constituents faithfully in parliament. So much for agricultural Quebec.

The present president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Mr. Fortier, comes from the province of Quebec, and on numerous occasions he has been in Ontario, having visited Hamilton last year. He spoke, too, at the opening of the Toronto fair, and on that occasion, just as he did at Hamilton, he made a strong protectionist speech. Now, here are two gentlemen representing different walks of life in Quebec province, and both speaking out in favour of protection. I understand, although I do not know it to be a fact, that in politics Mr. Fortier is a Liberal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): Anyway, he is in good standing in his province, a man of sufficiently good repute to be made president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. The fact may have struck others, as it has certainly struck me, that in some quarters in this House it is only necessary in order to provoke applause to make sneering references to the manufacturers. In certain parts of the chamber, notably in the section representing the province of Saskatchewan, there is immediately a tremendous clapping when such remarks are made touching the manufacturers. Is that right? I notice, however, that hon. gentlemen from Quebec never do that; they never applaud any sneering remarks made at the expense of the manufacturers. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there is noticeable a distinct line of demarcation between those who applaud the abuse of manufacturers and those who do not. The representatives from Saskatchewan always do; those from Quebec do not. And how these two elements, so utterly different, can get together solely for voting purposes, I do not know and cannot understand.

If one desires to state one's position clearly in this House or anywhere else, for that matter, it is essential to state just what his ideal is for Canada at the present time. Personally I am in favour of an all-round development in this country, embracing manufacturing, mining, farming and every other industry, so that we may become in time an important country, capable of maintaining our place in the empire. This is a subject in regard to which there is a difference of opinion in this House. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) have stood up and advocated what is tantamount to separation from the British Empire, and gentlemen from Saskatchewan as well as some others have applauded such sentiments. It is deplorable that gentlemen should advocate proposals of that kind and receive applause from any portion of the House. For my part I am absolutely in favour of our remaining within the empire; and war or no war, I am for the empire.

[Mr. D. M. Sutherland.]

Mr. McINTOSH: How does the hon. member stand on the question of preferential trade within the empire?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): That question presents no difficulty to me. I am in favour of preferential trade within the empire. I am absolutely for such trade and, I repeat, the question does not bother Conservatives. Every time we have a chance to buy something which cannot be made here I say, buy it from the United Kingdom or from any other part of the empire rather than from the United States or any other foreign country.

Now, I come to the subject which is of special importance to my own constituency, namely, farming. My riding is largely agricultural. We raise a lot of first class stock in the riding and any gentleman from Saskatchewan who has a black and white cow which he prizes, if he traces its ancestry back, will probably find that the original stock came from the county of Oxford. In milk and milk products we have played an important part in the country. In the county of Oxford the Toronto City Dairy has three large plants, Neilson's of Toronto have one large plant, as have the Canadian Milk Products Company and some other concerns, and there are as well a number of country butter and cheese factories. So anything that affects the dairy industry of the Dominion is very seriously felt in that riding. And the dairy industry in that county has been adversely affected by the Australian treaty, which the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Donaghy) lauded to the skies. In this connection I have a couple of resolutions from cheese and butter factories in my riding which I desire to place on Hansard. It will be realized that these resolutions reflect the opinion of a large number of milk producers who are the patrons of these cheese and butter factories. The first is from the Bright Cheese and Butter Manufacturing Company, Limited:

> That we patrons of Bright Cheese and Butter Manufacturing Company at our annual meeting do protest against the Australian treaty, in that it does not afford the dairy interests of the Dominion the protection enjoyed by other manufacturing concerns in Canada.
> Therefore we would ask a speedy repeal of this unfair measure; and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Minister of Agriculture, Ottawa.

The other resolution is from the East Zorra and Blandford Cheese Manufacturing Company, Limited:

> Resolution passed at the annual meeting, March 1, 1926.

Whereas the federal parliament has legislated, giving to Australia a preferential tariff on cheese and butter, and by order in council has extended the same preference to New Zealand;

And whereas this legislation is detrimental to the dairy industry of Canada;

Be it resolved that the patrons of the East Zorra and Blandford Cheese Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the county of Oxford, Ontario, records its disapproval of these concessions and respectfully requests immediate action to be taken to safeguard and advance the welfare of the dairy industry of Canada.

Now, there may be some Progressive members from Saskatchewan, who passed their early days in Oxford county and therefore are familiar with its political history. It has been for the most part very strongly Liberal, and consequently these resolutions from the rural parts of the county are conclusive evidence that the dairy farmers there are very acutely interested in this question, for it has been brought home to them very strongly that the Australian Trade treaty is already proving very detrimental to their interests.

With respect to the very important question of immigration, Sir Henry Thornton, speaking on the immigration policy of Canada, has expressed this opinion:

The whole future of Canada and of the railway systems in Canada depends upon increased population and upon the increased traffic which would result therefrom.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the government have not been doing what is necessary to secure the immigration to which Sir Henry Thornton refers. May I suggest that what I am about to read from the report of the Minister of Immigration for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1925, discloses a state of affairs that may account for the failure of whatever immigration policy the government may have? I find the following paragraph in that report:

The organization in the British Isles has been seriously handicapped by the promotion of office boys to the positions of senior clerks or of assistant agents. These anomalies are being adjusted in the process of reorganization by the department, and whenever possible employees are being transferred to positions where the work is within their knowledge and capacity.

Is not that an extraordinary statement to find in a government publication?

I had hoped that the Minister of Finance when presenting his budget would have announced changes with regard to the Australian treaty. I am yet hopeful that our friends from Saskatchewan and the other prairie provinces will aid the farmers in the other parts of the Dominion in securing some changes in that treaty. Our friends from the west must remember that the farmers on the prairies have already a good deal of protection which the farmers of the east do not enjoy, and I consider it is up to them to assist the dairy farmers in the east to secure a certain amount of protection as well, particularly in relation to the Australian treaty and against agricultural products from the United States. That is the great trouble of our dairy farmers, and it has been evidenced this spring especially in the egg business, enormous quantities having been brought in from the United States, thus destroying the winter market which our farmers are entitled to. I hope when this matter comes up again we shall have the united support of farmer representatives in other sections of the House in assisting us to get redress.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Sutherland, North Oxford) is somewhat concerned to know our views about the tariff, and I propose to deal with that question at the outset of my remarks. First, I do not believe you are sincere.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BALDWIN: You can hear me over there. We in Quebec have been misunderstood by other portions of this great Dominion. We in Quebec, the French and the English, the Catholic and the Protestant, have such respect for each other that we entertain no suspicions. For over forty years we had the advantage of our distinguished leader, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who during that time was the dominating figure in the public life of Canada. I remember during my first three sessions of parliament whenever I saw that great man rise in his seat to address the House I was reminded of two other distinguished men, William Ewart Gladstone and Abraham Lincoln. If we to-day will remember those illustrous men, Laurier, Lincoln and Gladstone, we will not go far amiss in doing our duty as public men.

In the province of Quebec we have a contented and happy people who believe in adequate protection—not in protection simply for protection's sake, to make a few people exceedingly rich at the expense of the masses. We believe that this great country with its diverse interests must be a country of give and take. In the last parliament there were as many free trade speeches from the extreme east as from the extreme west. We have the interests of the Maritimes at heart in this House. I have heard it said on the opposite side of the House that the last parliament had no exponents of Maritime rights, but we who sat in the last parliament know differently. We have also the great manufacturing interests, as well as the interests of the farmers and the toilers, of the great provinces of Quebec and Ontario at heart. All classes receive our consideration, and we do not want the few to grow rich at the expense of the masses. The great west has also its peculiar interests, and let us remember that more than two-thirds of this vast and amazing country lies west of the province of Ontario. Let us remember that the redistribution which follows the decennial census in this country will always result in an increasing number of members coming to this parliament from the great west. Let us try and build up in this country a great and united Canada. Let us be broad-minded and charitable one with the other. We have a country here that will be second to none on this earth.

With regard to the tariff, we need to do what this government is doing to-day, to promote trade within the empire, with all the colonies and dominions of this great empire. The United States, with all its wealth and greatness, would feel very small indeed if the British Empire, with over five hundred millions of population, were agreed upon a preferential tariff within the empire which might possibly lead at some future time to absolute free trade within the empire. Then we would have an empire that would be able to produce within itself every product known to the world, an empire that would be able to satisfy every need of humanity from within itself. That is why this government has initiated this policy, and it is for that reason that the government is being criticized by the opposition. An analogous case to this great empire trading within itself is that of the forty-eight states of America, each trading with the other with no trade barriers between them. With preferential trade agreements between the different parts of the British Empire, or with no trade barriers at all between its component parts, the British Empire would become the greatest that has ever been known on the face of the earth. It is the empire on which the sun never sets, and I hope it never will. In unity there is strength, and the government's policy is to increase trade within the empire.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) this afternoon in his whirlwind speech spoke so dolefully of the business of this country that I and a good many of us asked ourselves: Is there really a Canada, or is she lost forever? He followed the old tactics of "whispers of death," shouted blue ruin, and blamed this government for things of which they are not guilty. When this government came into power four years ago we followed the most extravagant government that Canada ever had, and an incompetent government. It was a government that had spent without a doubt more than a billion dollars unnecessarily in the great conflict of the world war, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite now claim that the country should have been relieved years ago of the burdens which they themselves imposed upon it. It was they who imposed these burdens on the country. The budget is reducing postage by fifty per cent. Some may think that a little thing, but there are thousands of concerns in this country that buy thousands of postage stamps at a time. The reduction of 2½ per cent in the sales tax is also a lessening of the burden on business. The Minister of Finance has also made substantial reductions in the income tax.

Then there is the reduction in the tax on automobiles. Personally I think we have ten automobiles in this country where we should have one. The automobile, the great embodiment of intricate machinery, for several years has been destroying one-quarter of a million people, and it has injured nearly half a million every year in accidents. In the province of Quebec we do not care very much for automobiles. We see enough of what it is doing in the United States. The automobile has brought more sorrow in this country than it has ever brought gladness. Nothing does more to degrade the young women of this country. I am taking the words of the people of the United States, who say there never was such an instrument to deprave the young women of the United States as the automobile. I go further: The houses of pollution in the great cities in the United States were closed by men like Rev. Charles A. Parkhurst of New York City, but the automobile took their place. In this city to-day men not worth $100 are riding around in $2,000 automobiles. They see a young lady standing on the curb, drive up and smile, and in fifty cases out of a hundred she goes for a ride, and after a while she gives him a slap in the face and she turns back. People are mortgaging their homes to buy automobiles all over the American continent. Down in Quebec, in this region here, and in New England the automobile has become an outrageous curse, because the farmer cannot run an automobile for more than six or seven months of the year; it has to stand idle during the winter, and he has to pay interest on it, and overhead is eating it up. It is necessary for him to keep his horses, sleighs, carriages and harness. It is quite different in the west, with its vast areas, and in California and the southern states, where the farmer can get his ploughing done with a tractor and says good-bye to the horse. But really there is no comparison between a horse and an automobile. Who would not take a ride in the phaeton of olden days over the hills, see things animate and inanimate, and hear the songs of the birds? The business of the automobile is to get there, and get there quick, and if you get in its road, there is no safety for you. This country would be hundreds of millions of dollars better off if the automobile had not been invented until after the war debt had been paid off and the highways had been made permanent. We people in the back country have the fun of paying the taxes. We build roads for these American cars to travel on and be smashed to pieces. Our roads are only available for automobiles during the summer months, which after all is a comparatively short period. When the season is too dry there is a cloud of dust and in wet weather there is too much mud. The farmer has to take the dust or the mud as it comes, and then submit to being cursed for not providing good roads. There are a whole lot of automobiles in use in Canada. In proof of that you have only got to take a walk through the streets of this city. If they continue to increase the streets will have to be widened. The streets are so congested with traffic that if you can get across a thoroughfare without being killed you render thanks to God.

The government is to be commended for the budget it has brought down, but if one were to judge by the comments on that budget which one has seen in the newspapers these last few days he would conclude that there was no real sincerity in anybody. Hon. gentlemen opposite have worked themselves into a fine state of enthusiasm championing the cause of the workingman and the labourer. In the province of Quebec during the last campaign they went up and down the country talking about everything and anything, and they called for more protection. They said "Down with the Australian treaty, down with the New Zealand treaty, and down with the West Indies treaty". They tried to scare the farmers to death, and now they are trying the same game with the workingmen. But let me tell my hon. friends that since the King government came into power not a soup kitchen has been opened in all Canada. The leader of the opposition may smile, but let me tell him that I have the best authority for that statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You are badly out.

Mr. BALDWIN: That is conclusive evidence that industry is not languishing in Canada, and that there is lots of work for everybody. Great industrial development is under way not only in the province of Quebec but in the province of Ontario. I was in the Niagara district a few weeks ago and a young man came to St. Catharines to answer an advertisement published by a certain industry. He said to the proprietor of the industry, "While I am coming to you for an engagement I have letters from four other industries that want me". Now that particular industry has 150 per cent more people on its pay roll than it had one year ago; it has orders ahead for six months, and other orders continue to come in regularly. Why, you would think to hear the hon. member for Fort William that devastation and everlasting ruin were facing us here. You would think that the waters would yield no more fish; that the gold mines would furnish no more gold; that the cows would give no more milk; that the silver mines had sunk to such depth that they could no longer be discovered. There was nothing but lamentations and dreariness in the hon. gentleman's treatment of the industrial situation in Canada. That is not a good thing for this country; it is not a good thing to appear in Hansard and to be read by outsiders. The whole thing is a bugaboo. We heard of factories being closed and men being thrown out of employment, but in less than twenty-four hours those factories had been re-opened. I understand a deputation is coming to interview the government in regard to the tariff. Well, a tariff is not something that cannot be changed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALDWIN: I have implicit confidence in the Minister of Finance, but we are all human and it is possible for us to err.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALDWIN: Do not be alarmed; the present Minister of Finance has not made any error, and I have not acknowledged that he has done so. I say we are human and it is possible to err—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALDWIN: —but there has not been any error made in this case. However, I recall the fact that the Minister of Finance in 1919 and 1920 changed his programme several times. His proposals were fought in committee, and several changes were made. The sales tax was changed, and other changes were brought about. My hon. friends opposite are making a great show about their desire to save the labourers and the toilers of the country, and describing the condition of Canada in most gloomy terms. It is absurd. The country is not going to the dogs as these hon. gentlemen would have us believe. Personally I am willing to go down into my pocket and help to establish industries that will give employment to our sons and daughters. I feel good pursuing that kind of life, and I am going to keep on living for a long while yet if I continue in that frame of mind. A gentleman from New York came to see me here regarding a business in which I was interested. He wanted to come to my room in order to give a little inventory.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALDWIN: Hon. gentlemen need not laugh, because I am going to indulge in a crack at the automobile. I said to this gentleman, "I will give you a cheque up to six figures." He replied "All right; I will get a taxi and come up and see you". I said to him, "If you get a taxi you cannot do business with me. You can walk to my room in less than three minutes and if you do so the cheque is yours". Think of a man wanting to ride in an automobile for such a short distance! That is an illustration of the absurd things people will do.

The hon. member for Southeast-Grey (Miss Macphail) was talking about old age pensions one day. Like myself she comes from a rural section, but while I was born in the fifties she was not. But she understands that a little money can be made to go a long way if you have a little brain and are accustomed to frugal living and right habits. The leader of the opposition belittled the pension of $20 a month. Why, $20 a month was too small! How could a poor man with a family of eight or ten children feed that family and clothe and educate them? Well, those of us who were born in the fifties were not very sparing of the soles of our shoes but we were sparing of the seats of our pants. But the leader of the opposition says that twenty dollars a month is a mere bagatelle and far from sufficient.

I take this opportunity of speaking to-night because in this budget we have a wide scope and a wide range of subjects to deal with. I fully agree that the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) was perfectly right in saying that $20 a month is sufficient to alleviate the wants of anyone who is sixty or seventy years of age. They would live frugally. Of course they say that necessity was the mother of invention in those days and people succeeded in living on a very small sum because they worked hard and lived frugally. I do not know what conditions will be like fifty years from now; probably $60 a month would not be an adequate allowance to live upon. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) asks why this sales tax was not taken off two or three years ago. I would remind him that this government assumed a tremendous burden when it came into power. Great deficits were accruing year after year Three years after the war they had not been able to stop the deficits. When this government came into power the Canadian National Railways were in the worst possible condition, and the Prime Minister, a student of the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose judgment he had imbibed into his being, searched the country for a man large enough to run the railway. He found Sir Henry Thornton, the greatest man available in the world for the job. Sir Henry was criticized in this House in 1921 and 1922, but not so very long ago opinion in regard to him began to change, and broad-minded men throughout Canada, who perhaps had formerly criticized Sir Henry came to realize that he was fully capable to assume charge of the road. Time has proven that Sir Henry Thornton is big enough and has a scope and breadth of mind sufficient to enable him to carry on the system. I expect that within two years he will be able to show a surplus on the Canadian National and if the railway is not able to pay dividends it will at least pay expenses and wipe out the deficit. Hon. members have criticized the government within the last few days because the burdens on the people were not being lifted, but the government is now taking action which will have the result of improving conditions and making business more prosperous.

I desire to tell hon. members what the government has done and to tell them why there is a third party in this House. The Progressive party was formed some years ago, with men of strong character who had a determined idea that the great west needed representation in this House—and they have procured it. If there is a third party in the House it is because the Union government were not sincere and would not make it fifty-fifty with the other side when that government was formed, but wished to keep the iron hand of Toryism over the administration; they would not stand for a fusion with the other side. The most able men in the Conservative party thrust out their clenched fist in denunciation of the Progressive party; they had no use for them and their ideas. In 1921 a large representation from the Progressive party was sent to parliament. They did not need to read their speeches when they got on their feet, although I do not think they had the training of some other men who come here and read speeches prepared by somebody else. I consider it a compliment to have the members of the Progressive group in this House.

What means I possess are all invested in industry in this country. I have an interest in the industrial world, and I would not make one change in the tariff to injure industries. I have heard the former member for Marquette, Mr. Crerar, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) and other Progressive members in this House state several times that they did not desire to injure one legitimate industry in this country. That is a meritorious attitude on their part, and that is the most that the people of Quebec want. We want a country where people can live cheaply, a country to which people can come and realize that they have a glorious place to live in. Some years ago, when a boy from New England and a boy from Canada would meet, they would discuss matters with each other. One would say to the other, "What did you pay for your hat?" The other would tell him, and it would be shown in those days that everything was in favour of the boy residing in the United States. The result was that that boy would persuade his brother to leave Canada and go there. We believe that with our great water-powers and our great industries in Canada that we can keep this country a good place to live in and educate our boys; and that is what we wish to do. But if the poor man and his wife cannot have a little butter on their bread, they will complain. It took two sessions to stop the importation of oleomargarine, which was sold in Canada in competition with the farmer's butter. Some years ago a bill on this subject was presented to parliament by the Minister of Agriculture, and only seven Tory members supported it. Last year people came into my constituency and said the Australian treaty was going to destroy the farmers. Of course it was not the farmers they were particularly solicitous about; they wanted to destroy the Liberal party, and particularly myself. They went to a creamery in the community, operated by a man of intelligence, and they tried to scare him. I heard a swashbuckling legerdemain fellow telling the farmer, "You will never sell your cows in this country; you had better get out." The farmer said, "What is the matter?" The fellow said, "Oh, it is the Australian treaty." I said to him: "You are in the civil service and perhaps it would be as well for you to keep quiet. One thing sure is that you never earn your daily bread; you are a loafer, a parasite on the public. Now you are trying to scare the farmers to death as regards something that will not materialize." What was the result? This butter maker said to that Tory: "This government has done more for the farmer by repealing the Oleomargarine Act than all you can do or say, and no butter will come six or seven thousand miles and be six or seven weeks in coming here." What was the result? Butter has advanced in price from thirty-eight cents a pound, and you could not buy a pound of butter until ten days ago in this city for less than fifty cents.

The hon. member for Fort William said this afternoon: All you want to do is to stick to power. It is a pretty good thing to stick to what you have. We are sticking here and we will not surrender the reins for four or five years at least. You tell us that we are usurpers. What would you do if you were over here? You are in the minority; you could not get anywhere. There is no foundation for the insinuation that this country is going to the dogs when one considers the condition it was in when we came into power. You found the treasury full of money in 1911 when you won this country by misrepresentation and flag-flapping. Then you started to dismiss all the Liberals that were in office throughout the length and breadth of this great Canada of ours and you proceeded to frame an act for the outside civil service to entrench your appointees so that they could not be dismissed. You spent large sums of money in building armories which are used as places of amusement and dance halls, and this government has had to keep caretakers in them, keep them roofed and painted, and have them locked and unlocked when amusements are being carried on. In my constituency my opponent used them as great auditoriums when he had Patenaude out there and no crowd. Patenaude was supposed to be a spell-binder but he did not do the Conservative party any particular good. By the skin of his teeth he managed to get seats here for three or four or perhaps half a dozen of his followers.

Then you wanted to maintain militarism. I am against militarism. If we had 400,000 men overseas, they were disciplined over there for several years and no annual drill should be necessary in this country. It is a shame to call out for annual drill these old soldiers who were in the trenches and who know as much about war as Stonewall Jackson did, and no one else knew more about war than he did. I hope the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) will be in the House when the militia estimates come up and will give us as good a speech as she gave last year. The world now wants peace. We do not want wars; we do not want to keep up a military machine, and with those 400,000 men who received military discipline overseas, we should have no need for annual drill for the next two or three decades because those men are in this country already disciplined and will be ready in time of war. But I hope there will be no such thing as war. We have in this wonderful country to the south the Monroe doctrine. I know some of the military men will laugh when I say that doctrine will keep aggressors out of this country. Looking at a map the other day I felt it was not such a bad thing that the United States had a strip of land west of the Yukon and half the length of British Columbia. They would have to fight in order to keep off any Asiatics or anybody else who wanted to come over, and while I do not wish to hide behind anybody else's wings, I do not object to go through a turnstile because somebody else turns it. If this country is safe under the Monroe doctrine, it is as safe under that doctrine as under any other, but we do not want money spent in this country to keep up a military machine and nonsensical camouflage.

Perhaps in two months from now money will be appropriated for annual drill, although I hope not, and the farmers will be sent to Petawawa when they should be on the farms, when the crops need the most attention and the weeds grow fastest. I know a man who had several horses and he took his sons and his horses to the camp. When he returned home he found that potato bugs had eaten up $200 worth of potatoes and he got enough of his medicine in taking his horses up there to earn some money. If they want to drill, let them drill in October. In my time the drilling was done in October and the boys had to hustle in order to keep warm. Militarism, I repeat, is something we do not want.

As the hon. member for Fort William was speaking this afternoon I wondered if there was any love of country in Canada. I wondered if there were nothing here to make us patriots. I wondered if our rivers were not long enough, broad enough, deep enough, rough enough or placid enough, to make us love our country. I wondered if our broad prairies with all their fertility were not enough to make us realize that we have a great country in which we should live in happiness. I wondered if the lofty mountains were not high enough to make one visualize the greatness of this country. I wondered if all our great mineral wealth, our great lakes and our fisheries were not enough to make us love our country and be patriotic. I wondered if there was not enough in the great topography of this country, the vast extent of 4,000 miles east and west and nearly 2,000 miles north and south, to make us love it and not sit in this House and cavil and fight for the old parties. I wondered, if all these things could not make us love our country, if we had not better take a walk around this great structure which has risen from the ashes of the great devastation of the last House. We should be proud of this great structure and proud because we have in Canada the institutions that we have. When we walk around this great structure we should look at some of the monuments of our forefathers, the statesmen of this country who have built and built well, who travelled the stormy seas when it took six to eight weeks to cross the Atlantic, in order to break the family compact that was ruling Quebec and Ontario at one time. After we walk around this building and visualize the statesmen who hewed out the destiny of this country and laid the foundation and laid it well, we should have some love of country. It would indeed be surprising if anyone could fail to take an enthusiastic interest in the progress of this young and growing country after carefully studying its traditions and its institutions—our churches, our educational establishments, our philanthropic organizations of one kind or another, our great and ever expanding industry. There is in Canada everything that can inspire one to the loftiest patriotism, and if Canadians will only appreciate their great heritage there is no reason why, remaining within the British Empire, this country should not become one of the greatest nations on earth.

As regards the budget, I gather from the headlines in the newspapers that gentlemen opposite intend to fight the thing to a finish until the dog days come. Let me assure the opposition that the people of Canada are absolutely in favour of the proposals of the Minister of Finance. Speaking for the thrifty people in the Eastern Townships from which I come, I can say that the income tax reductions have received a hearty welcome. Why should we not retain in Canada people who, being too old to continue in active work, have yet enough to retire upon? There is no sense in taxing such people and making it impossible for them to live in this country.

In connection with the reduction in the duties on automobiles, there is no doubt that the sentiment of the Canadian people is overwhelmingly in support of the government. I dislike the automobile probably as much as anybody else does, and I can quite understand the attitude of people in the country towards those who have made themselves wealthy out of this industry. They say, "We can go across the line and buy an automobile for one-third less than we can get it in Canada. We can get gasoline in the United States for one-third less, and we can obtain all the necessary accessories at a third of the price we have to pay in this country. Under the circumstances, why should we be compelled to pay exorbitant prices merely in order to provide profits for the manufacturers?"

The complaints of the manufacturers are not sincere; they are just so much camouflage. Surely they do not need so much protection in view of the profits they have made. In the past decade it has not been an uncommon thing to read in the obituary notices names familiar to everyone as descriptive of certain types of car—the names of men who have died worth tens of millions of dollars. Has anyone any deep sympathy with these people? There appears in the Montreal Herald to-day a cartoon which is really appropriate to the present situation. There is a ponderous gentleman with a corporation of extraordinary proportions and beside him there is a figure supposed to represent the Minister of Finance who proposes to reduce his avoirdupois. I for one think that Henry Ford should be made to disgorge some of the wealth which he has accumulated through the oppressive measures that have been adopted by his organizations representing his business. I have known more than twenty men who have been ruined through acting as agents for the Ford corporation. These men sign contracts with the company and when cars are shipped and delivery is not taken, the agents are obliged to pay the demurrage. The only garage man I know of who is worth a lot of money has worked from sixteen to twenty hours a day and he has never signed any agreement with any company to sell cars. He finds people who, having mortgaged their homes or their farms to get cars, are unable to meet their payments, and he buys those cars for a fraction of what they were worth originally. He holds them for a little while and then disposes of them at a profit. Invariably the automobile organization is heartless. I do not say that Henry Ford is aware of everything that goes on, but certainly the organization that represent him have been a curse to the country. There are thousands of vacant farm houses in the United States and Canada, the owners having failed to pay for the cars after mortgaging their places to get them. The trouble with people nowadays is that they are not satisfied unless they can make a great display. Long ago the farmer never thought of selling his buggy because it was old; he got it repainted or revarnished. To-day, on the contrary, when a man's car becomes a little shabby he immediately disposes of it and gets something more pretentious.

I notice that the hon. member for Fort William, as well as the leader of the opposition, has left the chamber. These gentlemen probably suspected that I had something to say to them, and so cleared out. The hon. member who spoke for the Conservative party this afternoon indulged in a good deal of adverse criticism of the government. But what are the facts? When this government came into power our dollar was worth only eighty-three to eighty-five cents, whereas it has been at a premium practically half the time during the past eight months. This is due to the fact that as a result of proper administration the trade of the country has expanded. With the favoured nation agreements which we have entered into with certain countries, our export trade has advanced by leaps and bounds, and the country has every reason to be gratified. In view of this fact, the criticism of the hon. member for Fort William this afternoon came, I thought, with very poor grace. I do not want to make any speech of the boomerang type. The Australian boomerang is said to return to the one who throws it, and in like manner unfair criticism is apt to recoil upon the critic. I am bound to say, however, that it is a matter for great satisfaction to the government that no one has been able to point to any scandal during its administration. There has been no black sheep in the family on this side, and the government is possessed of brains enough to run the business of this country to the satisfaction of the people. The Liberal party has never been governed by the crack of the whip. We are free thinkers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BALDWIN: That is right. That is the proper thing, so long as we think the administration of the country is what it should be. A party that servilely obeys the crack of its leader's whip is a party of slaves, and the Liberal party has never come within that category. Democracy will not tolerate it, and we will not tolerate it. For that reason, to-night I stand in defence of this budget. What has the merger done for Canada? The merger has gone out and bought up all the little factories, be they woollen mills, flour mills, iron foundries, or carriage factories, and amalgamated them into big organizations, but these have almost invariably failed because the merger did not take also the men of genius who had founded and directed all those little local concerns throughout rural sections. That is the trouble with the merger of a lot of our industries. The merger fails because those behind it try to run the organization with a man in an office surrounded by a staff of stenographers.

Let our manufacturers wake up when they get up and they will find themselves able to withstand a lowering of the tariff. Indeed, they will be better fitted to carry on their business. One of the worst features of this country is that we are apeing the habits of the United States. I hope my hon. friends opposite will take their medicine hereafter, whether bitter or sweet, with a smile. Let us do the business of this parliament without unnecessary delay and get out of here at least in the month of June.

Mr. J. A. MESSERVY (Queens): Mr. Speaker, being a new member, I wish to congratulate you, sir, upon the high office to which both sides of this House have unanimously appointed you. You are courteous and kind, possess the best possible judgment, and are absolutely fair and impartial in your decisions.

I have, sir, the honour to represent Queens county in the province of Prince Edward Island. As my time has been entirely devoted to business I am unaccustomed to public speaking, but on behalf of the Conservative party I will endeavour to contribute what I can to the discussion of the various matters that enter into the public affairs of our country.

Let us look at the map of Canada, Mr. Speaker. Our country is divided by natural barriers into four parts. First, British Columbia, separated from the prairie provinces by the Rocky mountains. Second, the prairie provinces separated from the settled parts of Ontario by a large tract of rocky country in New Ontario. Third, the central provinces, nearly cut off from the Maritimes by the northern part of the state of Maine; and fourth, the Maritimes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we may as well face the fact that there are certain difficulties in preserving the unity of all these parts, owing to long rail hauls through sparsely settled districts. The tendency, apart from nationalistic considerations, as has often been pointed out before, would be for each of these parts to trade with that portion of the United States directly south of it. And if we are to preserve Canada as a nation this tendency must be combated. It is no use complaining for instance, of railway deficits. We must of course run our National railway as economically as possible; but in doing this all services should be adjusted with the consideration first and foremost in our minds that Canadian ports, Canadian farms and Canadian industries are not to be suffered to languish, sicken and die, simply because, in the view of some shortsighted people, it is more economical to make use of United States ports, farm products or industries.

The unity of Canada is very ill served by starving one part into a state of discontent for paltry economic reasons. And, sir, this is the state of the Maritimes. In contrast with other parts of this Dominion they are actually losing in population. In view of this, it is nothing less than a disgrace that in winter and summer our grain is being shipped through Portland and other United States ports instead of through Halifax and St. John. Furthermore, there is need of considerable adjustment in the rates on coal between the Nova Scotia coal fields and central Canada. And we in Prince Edward Island would like to find a market for our potatoes in Ontario and Quebec. As it is, most of them go south even in the face of considerable duty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will consider in further detail these matters and other matters vitally affecting our welfare. I am much interested in the question of Maritime rights and stand shoulder to shoulder with my Maritime friends in advocating the rights of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The three have a combined area of less than 52,000 square miles and a population of about one million people. We have one forty-fifth of the area and one-ninth of the population of all Canada. We average twenty persons to the square mile, while the average of the other six provinces combined is four persons to the square mile. So, Sir, you can see that the Maritime provinces are an important unit in the Canadian confederation. The building up of a still greater Canada depends in a large measure on the development of the Maritime ports for commercial purposes.

Halifax has the best port in North America, and during the war it was used extensively for the moving of troops and exporting of foodstuffs to England. It has splendid docking facilities and a large grain elevator. It is a crime to pass this port for the shipping of grain for any port in the United States. It is the duty of the government to make it possible for shippers to use this port without loss to themselves. It is contended that the distance to Halifax is greater than to Portland, and other United States ports, and that freights are higher to Liverpool via Halifax than via United States ports. The Maritimes claim it as a right that all Canada should help to lighten this burden for the building up of an all-Canadian trade as well as to increase the prosperity of the Maritimes.

We have a splendid graded road of railway built on Canadian soil. The Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways have each a fleet of up-to-date steamers at their disposal. There is no valid reason why Halifax should not with St. John have a large wheat trade with Great Britain during the winter and summer.

Another matter that the Nova Scotia members should strive for is the making of Halifax a port of call for the largest and fastest steamers afloat, such as the Olympic and Mauretania, sailing between England and New York, and have them land, both on their inward and their outward voyages, passengers and mails during the winter and summer.

St. John is another port of great value to Canada. This port has the Canadian Pacific steamers calling during the winter months, and all the influence of the board of trade, the local government and city council, together with any other influence they can bring to bear, along with the influence of their members at Ottawa, should be used to get for the port of St. John her fair share of business. If the United States shipments of wheat were shut out, there would be sufficient quantities both in winter and summer to keep these ports busy as well as Montreal.

The coal company in Cape Breton is depending on increased sale of their coal in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of this House to the immediate necessity of the coal company erecting coal plants at Montreal, Toronto, Windsor, Fort William and other centres for the storage of coal, the installing of coke ovens, and, if necessary, the manufacture of by-products from the coal. During the summer months the coal company can rush large steamer cargoes of coal to Montreal. Smaller steamers and barges can carry cargoes of coal from Montreal as far west as Fort William. Large quantities of coal can be stored by the aid of cheap water rates, which will enable the coal company to compete and perhaps undersell the American companies to the manufacturing concerns in Canada, while the coke can be used for household purposes in Ontario and Quebec. To do this business, the coal company must have live, pushing, determined agents, and in this way I feel sure immense quantities of coal can be disposed of.

I would also urge, in connection with the operation of the West India treaty, the erection of a canning and preserving plant in the Maritime provinces, because the West Indies require large quantities of canned goods, such as fish, peas, beans, potatoes, in fact, all kinds of vegetables, as well as fruit, berries, meats, soups, condensed milk and all kinds of poultry, also pickles. The farmers and fishermen of Prince Edward Island would benefit from the establishment of such a plant for they could ship to it large quantities of vegetables and fruit. It would in that way open up a new avenue of trade for us and be a great boon to our Maritime provinces.

At the time when Prince Edward Island entered confederation in 1873, we borrowed from the Dominion government $3,400,000 to pay for the railway which we had built. Adding interest at five per cent to this amount brings the total cost of this railway to date to $5,610,000. I do not think that any other province has had to pay for its railway accommodation in this manner. All have been provided for out of the general fund, and it is evident that we are entitled to be reimbursed for this $5,610,000. As one representative of the province of Prince Edward Island, I ask the government and parliament now for a refund of this amount, and I feel sure that the justice of our claim will be recognized.

The exodus from Prince Edward Island during the past three decades has reduced its population by upwards of twenty thousand people. Many of the youth of the island have left their native province to locate in western Canada and the United States. Those who go to western Canada are assisting in building up our great Dominion, and we offer no regrets for their loss, but when they leave us to locate under a foreign flag we feel the loss keenly.

We also want another car ferry steamer, and it should be an oil burner. Forty years ago, and previously, all our imports and exports had to be handled within the six months of comparatively mild weather. This was a necessity which business well understood and accommodated itself to. For a period of thirty years we had a winter service by means of ice breaking steamers running between Georgetown and Pictou, whereby not only mails and passengers, but a certain amount of freight, were transported, and during the latter twenty years of this period there were two winter steamers on this route.

With the advent of the car ferry service at the Capes, the whole export and import trade of the island has taken on a radical change. The import trade is now carried on in the winter pretty much as in the summer. The retail merchants and coal dealers no longer find it necessary to lay in, in the summer and autumn, goods and supplies sufficient to do them till the following spring, for the car ferry steamer is kept busy all winter for almost six months in carrying the imports required for the business of the province. No coal or such kind of goods was ever imported on the winter steamers between Pictou and Georgetown. The export trade has also largely increased during the winter months, and will doubtless continue to increase with the coming years. The present service is of great advantage not only to business men, but to the farmers. While it enables the merchants to stock up with goods only as they require them, it also makes it possible for the farmers to export in the winter with almost as great a facility as in the summer. In this way both are benefited, the merchant in having less interest to pay than when he had to carry six months' supplies in goods, with the added advantage of being able to keep his store trim and attractive with supplies of fresh goods as needed, and the farmer in being able to sell his products in a strong market, thus the better enabling him not only to pay his bills to the merchant, but to buy more goods at his store. This is a state of things I wish to see continued, and not broken in upon by any want of attention on the part of this Parliament.

At present there is only one steamer available for service at the Capes. It is twelve years since she was built. Twelve years service has demonstrated improvements in construction which can be made in the building of a new steamer. The continuous and persistent fighting for years of heavy ice between the Capes must have done much to weaken and impair the present boat. If by any misfortune anything should happen to disable her during the winter season from performing the service for a fortnight, or even for a week the dislocation of business and the consequent loss, damage and inconvenience to a whole province would be difficult to estimate. Not only so, but to a people so dependent on imported coal it would entail great suffering, and it is therefore well to look ahead and take means to ensure against such a calamity.

Prince Edward Island is one of the most beautiful places in the world during the summer time. We have a splendid climate and lovely pastoral scenery. Once a tourist comes to Prince Edward Island he wants to come again, that is, if he is not scared away by the difficulties and discomforts of the trip. If he comes by train he must leave his Pullman car at Sackville, change trains there, change again to get on the ship and again on leaving her. Now all this is very inconvenient and unpleasant, especially for women with much luggage and possibly young children. In summer at least we are entitled to a through sleeping car operated from Boston or Montreal to Charlottetown, and the day coaches also should be taken over in the steamer, but as it seems that the steamer cannot handle these cars and at the same time bring over all the freight, this cannot be done at present. Our people are greatly interested in the great benefit to be derived from the cultivation and expansion of the tourist trade, and we have made substantial outlay in connection therewith. There is much in the construction and equipment of the present boat, and in the rail approaches thereto, to annoy and hamper that trade. Every motor car that goes to and from the island has to be loaded on a flat railway car and then hauled into the boat by means of an engine. If the driver of an automobile wishes to cross he must be at the station at Borden or Tormentine at least half an hour before the boat sails, and when he crosses he is kept in the boat usually for another half hour before the car can be hauled out in the same manner in which it came in. These restrictions are very annoying, and call for redress. A new boat so constructed as to permit autos to be driven by their own power on and off the vessel would be a great convenience, and would contribute powerfully to the success of the efforts of those of our people who are labouring so faithfully to interest tourists in our splendid climate, our charming scenery and our unsurpassed sea bathing. With great confidence I ask the government to place a sum in the supplementary estimates for the building of a new boat, which the other representative for Queens (Mr. Jenkins) has also asked for. Such a vessel is certainly needed. Furthermore, as all hon. members well know, it will provide efficient communication between the island and the mainland, which is one of the terms of union on which Prince Edward Island entered the Canadian confederation.

Now, as to the products of Prince Edward Island. Last year the "million acre farm" yielded well, and the province fully maintained its reputation in the matter of farm products owing to the very large export of potatoes, including not only the seed stock, for which we are becoming justly famed abroad, but also tubers for the table. It is estimated that about 1,500,000 bushels, valued at $1,875,000, were shipped, including 350,000 bushels shipped through the Potato Growers' Association. The railroad had all it could do to handle the immense crop. A large number of shipments were also made from Charlottetown by steamer. Fortunately the mild weather prevented any damage being done by frost. I have here a statement furnished by the Department of Agriculture which will be of interest as showing the acreage, yield and prices of the island's principal field crops. I will not take up time by reading the statement but with the permission of the House I should like to have it placed on Hansard. The statement is as follows:

Agricultural Products

—	Acreage	Yield	Price Bush.	Value
			$ cts.	$ cts.
Wheat	30,835	641,000 bush.	1 50	961,500 00
Oats	168,727	5,771,000 bush.	0 45	2,596,950 00
Barley	4,663	136,000 bush.	0 90	122,400 00
Buckwheat	2,496	68,000 bush.	1 00	68,000 00
Mixed grains	22,497	934,000 bush.	0 60	560,400 00
Potatoes	34,101	5,967,675 bush.	1 25	7,459,593 75
Turnips	9,692	5,815,200 bush.	0 15	872,280 00
Hay and clover	249,423	374,134 tons.	10 00	3,741,340 00
Total				16,382,463 75

Dairy Products and Eggs

			$ cts.
Cheese	2,000,000 lbs.	21c. lb.	420,000 00
Butter	1,800,000 lbs.	39c. lb.	702,000 00
Eggs	4,000,000 doz.	28c. doz.	1,250,000 00
Total			2,642,000 00

The above figures show that the total value of field crops, dairy products and eggs was $19,024,463.75. It was a good year for dairying, and a gratifying feature was the improvement in quality of the output, due in a large measure to the carrying out of grading regulations. The export of animals and animal products was also large, and the prices were higher than the previous year.

The value of the harvest of the sea was nearly $400,000 greater than that of 1924, as shown by a statement furnished by Fisheries Inspector Gallant. I should like this statement also to go on Hansard. It is as follows:

Quantity and Value of Fish caught in the Province of Prince Edward Island for the Year 1925

Kinds of Fish	Quantity	Value
Smelts	12,771 cwt.	114,939
Oysters	5,250 bbl.	52,250
Herring	51,506 cwt.	77,259
Mackerel	6,052 cwt.	24,808
Cod	58,445 cwt.	116,890

An industry that we pride ourselves upon, and one which was started in Prince Edward Island, is the silver fox industry. Now, if we send a pelt to the United States we are charged a duty of 50 per cent, which means in the case of a pelt worth $300 a duty of $150. The United States are also engaged in breeding foxes, but while they charge us a duty of 50 per cent they send pelts into our Canadian markets duty free. The inevitable result will be that they will surely capture those markets from us unless proper safeguards are adopted in Canada. At the Royal Winter Fair in Toronto foxes from Prince Edward Island, as usual, carried off all the prizes.

Now I come to deal with the question of freight rates. A great deal has been said about the unfair division of freight rates. I will give an illustration of how that works out. Oats and potatoes are among the chief articles raised in Prince Edward Island. If a shipper sends a carload of oats from Fort William to Sydney, a distance of 1,876 miles, he pays a freight rate of 62 cents per 100 pounds. To ship a carload of oats from Fort William to Halifax, a distance of 1,723 miles, costs 57 cents per 100 pounds. On the other hand the freight rate from Tignish, the most westerly point of Prince Edward Island, to Sydney, a distance of 436 miles, is 36½ cents per 100 pounds; and from Tignish to Halifax, a distance of 294 miles, the freight rate is 30 cents per 100 pounds. As to export rates, the following will serve as an illustration: A shipper at Fort William sending products to Halifax intended for Newfoundland, the West Indies or Great Britain, enjoys a rate of 34 cents per 100 pounds. On the other hand on a shipment from Tignish to Halifax a freight rate of 30 cents per 100 pounds is charged, a notable discrimination in favour of the Fort William shipper.

The House can see the disadvantage under which Prince Edward Island labours. It will be apparent to any person how unfairly we are treated. This freight rate question must be settled on a more satisfactory basis if the Maritime provinces are to receive that measure of fair play to which they are justly entitled. I may point out that at the annual meeting of the Charlottetown Board of Trade it was stated that after much agitation throughout the Maritime provinces on this matter, Mr. S. C. Cornell had been engaged by the three lower provinces to investigate freight rates and questions relating to Maritime interests. This gentleman has already unearthed a good many difficulties which militate against Maritime prosperity. For example, the discovery was made very recently of a freight charge on potatoes extending a more favourable charge to southwestern Ontario than to Prince Edward Island. A submission has been made in this regard which has resulted in a partial remedy of the trouble. I am not going to enter into figures, because figures cannot be retained in the mind and they are subject to change from day to day. Let me impress upon the House, however, that the question of freight rates is a vital one in the province from which I come.

Dealing with the question of transportation, the Charlottetown Board of Trade enumerates the following amongst the needs of Prince Edward Island:

1. The need of a second car ferry.
2. The need of a longer continuation of the double mail and passenger service from and to the mainland.
3. The need of a better local passenger service.
4. The need of more railway yard room to handle the increasing export freight, at the time of the heavy movement of crops in the autumn.
5. The need of a safe deep water terminus with better frost proof warehouse accommodation.
6. The need of complete widening of the gauge of the railway of Price Edward Island.
7. An improvement in the accommodation for transfer at Borden and Tormentine.

It is the conviction of many members of the board in question, particularly those who have been actively engaged on the time table and transportation committees, that the lately perfected Diesel electric passenger coaches would go a long way towards solving our local passenger difficulties. It would seem to be obvious that so long as much of our local service is given by mixed freight and passenger trains, no really satisfactory service can be looked for. The introduction of Diesel electric cars would make it possible to separate freight and passenger trains and for each to give better service.

Although I am opposed to the government yet I must say that the establishment of a disease-free area in Prince Edward Island has met with general approval, and will no doubt accomplish much good. It is estimated that we have about 100,000 cattle in Prince Edward Island. About 55,000 of these are milkers; the others are young and beef cattle. Naturally in view of the favourable condition in which we are now placed these figures will tend to show an increase in the years immediately to come. We are proud that in this matter, as in several others, our province leads the rest of the Dominion in having become throughout its entire extent a disease-free area. The result of this splendid movement has been, of course, to promote a greatly increased demand for cattle from this area, a demand which we are not yet able to meet. It is hoped that within a reasonable time our people will be able to realize on this demand and thus establish another permanent and splendid market for our products.

While referring to some of the many matters which are of particular interest to our people, and which I feel it my duty to place before this House, I would like to point out that some months ago an American syndicate commenced experimenting by boring for oil on Governor's Island, situated a short distance from the mouth of the harbour leading into Charlottetown. The borings on that island, which is about one mile long and three quarters wide, have reached a depth of about 1,300 feet or more. Already there has been an outlay of about $250,000 and it is estimated that a total of $300,000 will be expended. This provides employment for labour. It is quite a novelty in our province; and should the promoters strike oil there is no telling what a vast benefit there will be not only to Prince Edward Island but to the Maritimes provinces generally.

It will be of vital importance to the farming and fishing industry of Prince Edward Island, if one of our government merchant marines freight steamers with cold storage accommodation should make Charlottetown a port of call on the way to Great Britain. A splendid business could be worked up with sheep, cattle, butter, cheese, eggs, hay, oats, lobsters, bacon and live hogs for the British market. The steamers now pass outside of Prince Edward Island; by going around the west end of the island to Charlottetown they would not be more than thirty miles out of the course that they take to Great Britain.

I would also request that merchants be not asked to guarantee space, but that it be advertised that a steamer will call at this port for Great Britain, say every two weeks going and coming. Our merchants can then send their travellers through the British Isles and work up business. At first one steamer could go to Liverpool, the next trip could be to Glasgow and the next to London, which would give them the choice of these three large markets, Manchester might be one of the ports, which is a very large market. This service would be of immense value for the farmers of Prince Edward Island, as they cannot compete now with the railway freight rates by sending their goods to Halifax, St. John or Montreal for shipment to Great Britain. Charlottetown is the capital of the province, and is entitled to this direct service. With the steamship service to Pictou, Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, Newfoundland, Sydney and Halifax, and with a direct steamer for Great Britain and the West Indies, Charlottetown will become quite an important port.

The bringing of steamers to Charlottetown would enable our longshoremen, labourers and truckmen to find work, and they want it badly. We have a splendid body of men forming our longshoremen's associations or unions. They work night and day, rain or shine, and deserve every encouragement. There is a steamship line now operating between Charlottetown and Pictou, and this gives a very valuable connection between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. Large amounts of freight have been moved by this line. We also have another steamship coming from Pictou, calling at Charlottetown, Souris and the Magdalen Islands, and this service is an excellent one, I think the best that has ever been provided. A first class steamer is on this route and makes regular trips during the summer months. We would like another steamship connection between Gaspe, Charlottetown, Summerside, Souris, Magdalen Islands and the Sydneys. This would be a very valuable connection to us because the steamer could bring coal on her return trip landing either at Magdalen Islands, Charlottetown, Summerside or Gaspe. I think a very profitable business could be worked up, and I would especially call Mr. Speaker's attention to this new service because he represents Gaspe and Magdalen Islands,.

I wish to mention some improvements that I would suggest in connection with the railway on Prince Edward Island. The Diesel electric line should be built, starting from Charlottetown, connecting with Tracadie, running along the shore to Brackley Beach, thence to Rustico, thence to Malpecque and into Kensington, connecting with the main line there. This would give splendid accommodation to our farmers at the outlying districts, and be of immense value to our fishermen at Rustico and all along the north side of the island—and I must point out to you that Rustico is one of the most valuable fishing grounds in Prince Edward Island. It would assist our fishermen to ship their fish by express quickly to the large cities, and would help them to build up this industry. A railway running along the shores of Richmond Bay between Malpecque and Kensington would tap immensely rich deposits of the finest mussel mud, which is a splendid fertilizer and is always in great demand among our farmers. There would be a splendid freight traffic over this line and worked, as it would be, by the Diesel electric locomotives, the operating cost would be very small. The line could be further extended along the south shore of the island from Borden to Charlottetown, thus supplying the farmers in this district with excellent fertilizer and bringing a valuable freight traffic as well.

I would strongly urge that the new railway shops that it is proposed to build at Charlottetown should be larger than the present ones. We want to do more repair work on the cars—painting, woodwork, mechanical repairs and the like; we want more men employed there and fewer cars sent over to Moncton to be repaired. This work can be done as well as, if not better, at Charlottetown than anywhere else. We have the very best workmen there. In 1921 some of the Liberal candidates on the hustings promised that the railway shops would become a beehive of industry and would assist labour of all kinds, but the reverse has taken place. Our men have been discharged and work has been curtailed.

We also want our superintendent to have greater authority in purchasing and matters of that kind, and to be given full powers in every respect regarding the operation of the line from Sackville throughout the whole of Prince Edward Island. He has splendid ability and can do this as well as anyone. Moncton has entirely too much to say in the management of our Prince Edward Island railway.

I wish to urge the necessity of more yard room for docking and shipping facilities at the railway wharf in Charlottetown, and the enlargement of the frost-proof warehouse there; it is entirely too small. I understand the wharf has been condemned; steps should be taken at once to have it repaired. The road bed from Charlottetown to Souris and Georgetown, I understand, is ready for the widening of the gauge and this should be done the first thing in the spring, as our people are clamouring for the completion of the wide gauge railway on Prince Edward Island. Another important branch should have the gauge widened, namely, from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour. The present line goes through a splendid settlement, and it is only a narrow gauge railway.

In speaking of frost-proof warehouse accommodation at Charlottetown I would also recommend that you put a frost-proof warehouse at Souris, Georgetown, Borden and Summerside for this reason: in winter time, during the month of January, the whole of February and part of March, snow storms block the country roads and our railways for days, keeping our farmers from hauling their potatoes, especially in frosty weather. In the fall when they are taking potatoes from the ground they can store them in these frost-proof warehouses, so that refrigerator or heated cars can be despatched during the winter mouths. The price obtained would then give splendid profit, thereby benefiting the people of Prince Edward Island and furnishing freight for the road when times are dull. I would earnestly urge upon the railway authorities to have the road bed well ballasted all over the island railway.

Our fishing industry is good. We have taken out of the waters this year about $1,500,000 worth, and we could quite easily make it $5,000,000 worth. We must remember that the people on the south side of Nova Scotia living near Lunenburg and La Have operate in fishing schooners in the spring of the year around our island, and then later on the Grand Banks. We can do the same. We could get together a fleet of vessels, place our products on the markets of the Mediterranean and South America, and work up a splendid business. An increase of our fishing operations would be of immense value to Prince Edward Island, giving employment to every kind of labour in connection with the building and fitting of vessels, and the curing and shipping of fish.

It is necessary, in order that all the available ports in Prince Edward Island, may be utilized, to keep the harbours and rivers on the north and south shores of the island well dredged. The water accommodation thus provided would give lower freight rates for the shipment of produce and the receiving of coal and lumber, our small vessels being enabled to enter and leave these harbours and rivers without grounding. Small harbours can also be dredged for fishing boats so as to allow our fishermen to prosecute the fishing industry more successfully. I would urge the Public Works department to place one dredge on the north side and the other on the south side of the island so that this work can be done quickly.

I plead for lower freight rates for merchants along the line of railway who have to ship by cars all the year round from the several stations. Our ports are well located and we cannot complain about the water freight rates in summer, but for about five months of the year Prince Edward Island has very serious ground for complaint as to the high railway freight rates that prevail in the winter months, when we must ship and receive all goods by rail.

The United States tariff, in my opinion, operates against the farmers of Prince Edward Island. This has been fully discussed, and I need not say very much about it now. The following statement will show the comparative rates of duty on certain articles between the United States and Canada:

Articles	To the U.S. from Canada	To Canada from the U.S.
Eggs	8c. per doz.	3c. per doz.
Butter	12c. per lb.	4c. per lb.
Cheese	5c. per lb.	3c. per lb.
Wool	100%	27½%
Wheat	42c. per bush.	12c. per bush.
Flour in bbls	$2.04 per bbl.	50c. per bbl.
Potatoes	50c. per 100 lbs.	35c. per 100 lbs.
Hay	$4 per ton	$2 per ton
Fox pelts	50%	Free

I do hope that all hon. members on both sides of the House of Commons will treat the matter in a non-partisan light and charge the United States the same duties on the same kind of articles, especially farm products, as they exact from us. Is not this fair and equitable treatment from every angle and every point of view that you may argue?

I quote the following just to show the quick action of Canada in 1872. In 1872 Sir Francis Hincks, Minister of Finance in Canada, took off the 10 per cent duty on tea imported into Canada. In the same year the United States people put on a duty of 10 per cent on tea that was imported from countries west of the cape of Good Hope, and this 10 per cent special tea tax was charged on all tea exported by the way of Canada to the United States. Sir Francis Hincks immediately passed an act in the same session imposing a duty of 10 per cent on all tea coming from the United States. This act preserved to Canada its own tea trade and we enjoyed all its advantages. I understand that at the time the duty was fixed on eggs at three cents per dozen, the average price of eggs was fifteen cents per dozen which tax was figured at twenty per cent. But now that the price of eggs is forty cents per dozen, twenty per cent duty would be eight cents per dozen, which would be the same as the United States is charging us.

The West India treaty will be a good one for Canada and it should be given a fair trial. I have visited most of these islands several times and I know some of their requirements. The Maritime provinces should benefit by this treaty, especially Prince Edward Island, as many of our farm products and fish are wanted there. I want to impress upon the government the great necessity of having a steamer with cold storage accommodation call at Charlottetown going and coming from Montreal. There is a good market here for molasses from the West Indies, and we can give this steamer all kinds of produce: oats, potatoes, eggs, butter, cheese, cattle, horses and fish for the West Indies and Cuban market. Without the calling of this direct steamer the markets will be of very little use to us because railway freights are so high to Halifax, St. John and Montreal.

We all know that raw material is practically the advertisement for our vast Dominion to immigrants from abroad. An immense supply of timber, pulpwood, nickel, asbestos, minerals and such like draws the people here. We do not want our raw material to be shipped out of this Dominion, we want it here, and manufactured here. We want to feed the workers in the factories from the farms. Our raw material is a guarantee for our debt and bonds which we have afloat and so on no account should it be allowed to leave this country. It may take a little time for us to give sufficient notice to people who have been trading in raw material with the United States, but the only true way to save Canada and help to pay off her debt is to prohibit the export of our raw material and manufacture it here. Let United States people who wish to make use of our raw materials in manufacturing come over here, and employ our Canadiain workmen in their factories in Canada instead of manufacturing our raw material in the United States.

I remember in 1897 being in Great Britain, and to show hon. members how anxious the Canadian Pacific railway was in soliciting immigrants for Canada, I was met in Bristol, London and Liverpool and presented with advertising matter regarding Canada: "One of the greatest countries in the world; all it needed was men. Are you going there?" I told them I was living in Canada. I remember I was canvassed publicly in that way on the streets. We should be determined at all times to have our agents in Great Britain, France, Norway. Sweden, Holland and Denmark do this persistent kind of canvassing. We will never succeed unless we push it quickly and firmly; quick action is necessary. Certainly our own Canadian people are the best, and every effort should be made to keep them at home because they are educated to our conditions; next to them come immigrants from the British Isles and France, then the Danes, Hollanders, Swedes and Norwegians. We rely upon the fairness and justice of our immigration agent in Great Britain to send us our fair share of immigrants, farmers, fishermen and capitalists, suitable to Prince Edward Island.

With regard to protection as an aid to Canadian farmers, I will quote in part what President Coolidge says about protection as an aid to the United States farmers:

> Protection is a great benefit to agriculture as a whole. The $780,000,000 of agricultural produce imported last year had to pay $260,000,000 for the privilege of coming in to compete with our own farm production. Protection greatly aids diversification and so eliminates an unprofitable surplus. Any study of dairy products, flax, wool and many other commodities will demonstrate that it does.
> In aiding industry the present tariff helps agriculture because prosperity in our industries is of more value to the farmer than the whole export market for food stuffs.

I strongly support the policy of protection for farmers, manufacturers, merchants and fishermen. This was the clear-cut policy inaugurated in 1878 by Sir John A. Macdonald, and the principle remains the same. If we wish this great Canada of ours to be powerful and to get the large population she should have, we must adhere strictly to the policy of protection. Protection will bring immigrants to our shores and it will increase labour and instil confidence in our manufacturers.

We have many returned soldiers in Prince Edward Island and I wish now to speak for these as well as for the veterans in all parts of Canada. I ask hon. gentlemen to remember that while these men, our fellow Canadians, were suffering, bleeding, dying in the muddy fields of France and Flanders, the rest of us at home here were turning over inflated dividends or making big wages in war work, and every now and then we read of some veteran, too proud to beg and unable to get work. who has decided to end it all by putting a bullet through his head! A charming spectacle this, is it not? We will not employ battle-scarred veterans because they are lazy and dissolute; our Board of Pension Commissioners sees to it that no man gets more than can be helped. What a praiseworthy example of economy in the public service! What, think you, would be your annual tribute to Germany to-day if these men had not won the war for us? A little more, I venture to say, than those pensions meted out with the greatest precaution taken to see that every hero gets not a cent more than is coming to him.

Such practice in dealing with our returned soldiers should come to an end; in fact it never should have existed at all. If a man has been taken on the strength of a unit and served overseas, and it is found on discharge that through illness or incapacity his earning power is diminished, he should be in receipt of a pension. Furthermore, it is up to every employer to give returned men the preference every time and, if necessary, legislation should be put into effect to make sure that every returned veteran has employment suited to his ability.

As for the "shiftlessness" and "drunkenness" of some of these men who have fought and bled for us there are few indeed who have come through four years of hell without scars of the spirit as well as of the body. I demand then, Sir, in the name of those who have fought and bled, in the name of those who have fallen, and in the name of the honour and decency of this Dominion, that no returned soldier, his wife or his family shall ever hereafter be allowed on any pretext whatever to want for food, clothes or home, or any of the common necessities or decencies of life.

In concluding, then, I wish first to appeal to our hon. friends from the great west sitting on this side of the House with us. Their honesty and integrity are unquestioned by all, and I am sure that all their actions here are guided by the larger interest of Canada, as they see it. To these hon. gentlemen I would submit that we do not come from Prince Edward Island, the little sister of the Dominion, and from the other provinces by the sea, as beggars imploring favours, but as equals asking for our rights. I am sure the hon. gentlemen from the other provinces see that we in the Maritimes could, from the nature of the case, have no share in the apportionment of the crown lands and territories. These Sir, rich as they are in farm lands, lumber, pulpwood and minerals, are part of our heritage as well as theirs. Can they then grudge us the help we so sorely need? I feel sure they will not. And I appeal secondly to the hon. gentlemen opposite me, especially to our friends from Quebec. They have always stood out solidly for a vigorous Canadian nationalism. They know, Sir, that hurt to one of its members is an injury to the whole body. I am sure they would not wish to see the whole fabric of our country damaged by the neglect and starvation of its Maritime members. We depend upon the support and help of hon. members of the House of Commons.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your kind, courteous and considerate attention.

[Mr. Messervy.]

On motion of Mr. Marcil the debate was adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Mackenzie King moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: In view of recent rumours in the press, may I ask whether any changes will be announced to-morrow in the budget proposals?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That question is somewhat similar to one asked by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) last night. I am not aware of any changes, and I do not understand why the question should be asked.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Wednesday, April 21, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

First report of the select standing committee on Industrial and International Relations.—Mr. McIntosh.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

MOTION FOR RESCINDING CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, before the order of motions is disposed of, I beg to move:

That the resolution of the House carried on Tuesday, April 13, concurring in the first report of the select standing committee on Agriculture, be rescinded.

My reason for asking that this resolution be rescinded is simply that the report does not contain a correct copy of the proceedings before that committee. First I will read the resolution as presented to the House:

Mr. Kay, from the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization, presented the first report of the said committee, which is as follows:—

Your committee recommends that it be authorized to have its proceedings and such evidence as may be taken, printed from day to day for the use of the members of the committee and of the House, and that rule 74 as relating thereto be suspended.

Now what actually occurred in that committee I shall show by reading to the House from the proceedings of the committee as they appear on the records of the clerk of the committee, Mr. A. A. Fraser. Here is a copy of the motion taken from the proceedings of the committee on Agriculture and Colonization at its meeting on April 14, 1926:

On motion of Mr. Armstrong, seconded by Mr. Letellier, the chairman was instructed to report to the House recommending that the committee be authorized to have its proceedings and evidence printed from day to day, and also to have printed such addresses by government officials as may be presented and as it selects.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a very different statement from that which appears in the report that was accepted by this House. I need hardly say that we have had two meetings of that committee. The Deputy Minister of Agriculture attended the first meeting of the committee and spoke for about two hours, giving an address that should receive the widest possible publicity. At the next meeting of the committee, Mr. Archibald, director of experimental farms, gave a most excellent address, covering a period of nearly two hours, in which he dealt with matters pertaining to the different experimental farms and illustration stations throughout the country. Surely copies of these addresses should be available not only to the members of this House but for general distribution as well. That is my reason for asking that the resolution be rescinded and represented in the form in which it passed the committee.

W. F. KAY (Brome-Missisquoi): I think that my hon. friend the member for East Lambton has followed the wrong procedure in the motion which he has presented to-day. Had he done me the ordinary courtesy of speaking to me privately and telling me his troubles I think the matter could have been arranged most satisfactorily. However, I will make a statement of the circumstances touching this matter.

The motion which my hon. friend made in the committee on Agriculture and Colonization was not presented in writing as it should have been. The hon. gentleman moved a motion at the end of our meeting and the clerk of the committee took it down. I think the report which I presented to the House contains the gist of that motion which was a very short one. The motion, as far as I remember its tenor, was that I should be instructed to make a report to the House requesting that the committee should be empowered to have its proceedings printed from day to day for the use of members. The report presented to the House was drafted by the chief clerk of committees and he thought, after consulting with me as to what my hon. friend desired, that it would cover the hon. gentleman's idea. As chairman of the committee, my desire is to present a report which shall embody the substance of any motion which is passed by the committee. The report in question was presented on the 9th April and concurred in on the 13th. It gives the committee power to decide what number of copies of the addresses made before it shall be printed. That is, the committee can decide at the end of a meeting whether it wants 500, or 1,000 or 10,000 copies printed. There is no limit contained in the recommendation. I think the hon. member for East Lambton, in the few words he uttered at the last meeting of the committee, stated that 10,000 copies should be printed. Another member suggested 100,000 copies, and a third very enthusiastic member suggested that the number of copies printed should be a million. There is no question but that the addresses delivered before the committee so far have been very interesting and very instructive to members of the committee and the House alike. One was an address by Dr. Grisdale, describing in brief form the work of the Department of Agriculture, and the other was an address by Mr. E. S. Archibald dealing with the activities of the experimental farm system. Now, I submit to the House that while these addresses are very valuable to the members of the committee, they are not such as should be printed and distributed throughout the country to the extent of 100,000 or a million copies. The Department of Agriculture issues a number of concise and illustrative pamphlets which in reality contain all the information to be found in these addresses. I am not sure from what my hon. friend from East Lambton has said to-day what he really wishes to be done. He has moved that the report of the committee which was concurred in be rescinded. I submit that he can achieve the result which he desires by making a motion at the next meeting of the committee that 10,000, or 100,000 or 1,000,000 copies be printed. That could be done and would be in perfect conformity with the report in which the House has concurred. I may say that since the report was adopted by the House the committee on Agriculture has met once and my hon. friend made no motion on that occasion. I submit that the proper procedure for him to have followed was to have made a motion at the last meeting of the committee—

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I did.

Mr. KAY: —asking for the printing of whatever number of copies he desired. I submit that the motion presented by my hon. friend be not accepted, and that at the next meeting of the committee on Agriculture the hon. member should make such suggestion as he sees fit.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I have no desire—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If other hon. members wish to speak now is the appropriate time because the hon. member for East Lambton will close the debate.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have no advice to give as to the advisability of printing what the hon. member for East Lambton desires. But I really believe that it is difficult for those of us who are not members of the committee on Agriculture to decide to-day whether the report as concurred in by the House was or was not in conformity with the motion of my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman says it was not; the chairman of the committee says it was. As it is very easy to adjust this matter by the hon. member for East Lambton moving a further motion in the committee for the printing of the additional matter he wishes to have printed, I would suggest that this motion be referred back to the committee on Agriculture and Colonization so that the committee can settle the matter itself.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I happen to be a member of the committee on Agriculture and Colonization although I was not present when the report in question was agreed to. But it must be remembered that the statement made by the hon. member for East Lambton was that the report of the committee brought before the House is not in accordance with the motion passed in the committee itself. That is something which ought to be carefully investigated. Whether there should be additional copies printed or not is beside the question at the moment. I quite agree with the Minister of Justice, if my hon. friend from East Lambton will agree, that this matter should be taken up again in the committee—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Refer it back to committee.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: —that the motion be referred back to the committee, and then the hon. gentleman can see that the report to the House is in accordance with the motion as it passed the committee.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I do not intend to delay the House at all, I merely wish to say that the report as presented to the House is entirely different from that which the clerk of the committee handed to me as a correct copy of what he has on his books.

Mr. KAY: Did you write out a notice to the committee?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I did not write out a notice to present to the committee, but at the last meeting of the committee I rose at the close of the address made by Mr. Archibald and moved that 10,000 copies of that address be printed. The chairman called attention to the fact—and he knows it well—that such a number of copies could not be printed; that we could have only one copy for each member of the committee and one copy for each member of the House. He will not deny that, but to-day he is willing to allow this matter to be referred back to the committee for consideration. I am perfectly satisfied that that should be done, but I do not like to hear the chairman rise in this House and misquote me. At the last meeting of the committee I certainly moved that 10,000 copies be printed, and he gave the committee to understand that that number of copies could not be printed.

Mr. KAY: With the consent of the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

An hon. MEMBER: Dispense.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to withdraw his motion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Refer it to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: It cannot be referred to the committee, but the matter will come back to the House.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the name of Hon. J. C. Elliott be substituted for that of Mr. Prevost on the joint committee on Printing.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FREIGHT ORIGINATING IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

The government blue book on statistics of steam railways for 1923 shows—freight originating on Canadian railway lines 67,888,325 tons—freight received from United States railways 34,370,000 tons. Approximately what proportion of freight received from United States railroads represented (a) American products destined for consumption in Canada; (b) American products from one United States point to another through Canada (that is—as from Detroit to Buffalo); (c) American products moving overseas via Canadian railways?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Withdrawn.

Question withdrawn.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. BELL (St. John-Albert):

1. Who are the members on the harbour board commission of Montreal and of Quebec?
2. What remuneration is received by each of the commissioners?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal are: President Dr. Wilfrid L. McDougald, salary $7,000 per annum; Dr. Milton L. Hersey, salary $5,000 per annum; Mr. Emilien Daoust, salary $5,000 per annum.

The Quebec Harbour Commissioners are: President Hon. W. Gerard Power, salary $6,000 per annum; Jules Gauvin, salary $4,000 per annum; Joseph Boutin-Bourassa, salary $4,000 per annum.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

REMOVAL OF SAND AND FILLINGS FROM TORONTO BAY

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, permits, agreements, contracts, orders in council, reports of departmental officers, and all other correspondence regarding permits issued by the government for the removal of sand and fillings free out of Toronto bay from 1900 to 1918, including statement regarding results of legal action taken in the High Court of Justice of Ontario to cancel such permits; the value and amount of the sand and fillings so taken by private parties and companies, and what steps were taken to stop such operations.

EXPENSE ACCOUNTS OF T. W. FULLER AND R. C. WRIGHT

Mr. COTNAM:

For a copy of all vouchers covering expense accounts of Mr. R. C. Wright, chief architect, and Mr. T. W. Fuller, assistant chief architect, Department of Public Works, for the fiscal years 1918-19 to 1925-26, inclusive.

CARILLON POWER DEVELOPMENT

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (for Mr. Meighen):

For a copy of all applications for licenses, permits, or leases, or for approval of plans, filed with the government since June 20, 1925, affecting the Ottawa river at or in the neighbourhood of Carillon, and of all correspondence relating to such application, or of any order in council or memorandum expressive of any action taken respecting same.

RESTRICTED T. B. AREA IN FRASER VALLEY

Mr. BARBER:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents passing between the federal Department of Agriculture and the government of British Columbia or any officer thereof, in the matter of the establishment of a restricted T. B. area in the Fraser valley, British Columbia.

NIAGARA RIVER POWER DEVELOPMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Toronto East Centre): I wish to call the attention of the House to an article which appears in to-day's Gazette, headed "Settle with Chicago." It contains a statement with reference to myself and a statement which Mr. Magrath is reported to have made. It also indicates generally that Mr. Magrath and the commission were not backing up this motion. As far as I know, Mr. Magrath is personally backing up the motion which appears in my name. Then they want to know on whose behalf it is made. Well it is made on behalf of the province of Ontario, with the full knowledge, approval and co-operation of the premier of that province, who claims that one-half of the property at Niagara Falls affected by section 5 of this treaty, belongs, to the province of Ontario, and the other half to the state of New York. Objection is taken that we should not discuss this matter or deal with it, or speak to the people of the United States on it, so long as the Chicago matter is unsettled. When I make the motion I will take up this matter, but I wish to draw the attention of the House and the country to the fact that this motion is made with the approval of the Premier of Ontario and with his full knowledge and assistance.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 20, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I am glad of the opportunity which is furnished me to-day of congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the splendid budget which he has produced. It has been my privilege to hear some twenty-six or twenty-seven budget speeches in this House, and I think I am within the mark when I say that none of them was received with greater satisfaction by the House generally and the country at large. It has been appreciated to the fullest extent by both parties in this Dominion. I am glad that such is the case because three years ago the present Minister of Finance took up the work laid down by the great Minister of Finance from Nova Scotia. We have to go back to the days of Sir Alexander Galt and Sir Francis Hincks to find a time when the province of Quebec furnished Canada with a Minister of Finance. Since confederation that honour has devolved upon Nova Scotia with Mr. Fielding, on New Brunswick with Sir Leonard Tilley, and on Ontario with four of five ministers of finance, some of whom have gone while others are still with us. As a representative of the province of Quebec I am all the more pleased at the success which has crowned the efforts of the present Minister of Finance, because the task that he has fulfilled has been an exceptionally heavy one, succeeding as he does a man like the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding.

Last night in the course of the debate the question was put why Quebec was not heard from oftener and why Quebec voted as she did during the last election. When Quebec is able to find men of the calibre of the present Minister of Finance, who is a typical representative of the population of that province by the fact that he represents the dual constituency of Chateauguay—including the old historic Chateauguay, with an overwhelmning majority of French-Canadian electors, and Huntingdon, with an English speaking majority—and that he is able to speak in both languages to his electors, the people of that province, knowing that the finances of this country were to be entrusted to the present Minister of Finance, were well satisfied to permit him to carry on the work he had to perform. While we are glad at the success that has crowned his efforts, we are also glad that the artisan has been worthy of his work and we hope he will long be spared to continue to carry out the important duties he has undertaken.

The four main features of the budget before us at the present time are: first, reduced taxation, which is always welcome, not only in this country but throughout the world wherever the human race exists; increased trade, which is always a welcome thing, not only with Anglo-Saxons but with French-Canadians and with the population of this country at large; third, improvement in the finances of the Canadian National Railways, which is one of the great problems we have to deal with; and finally the return to penny postage.

The Minister of Finance in his budget speech, which I do not intend to discuss in detail, presented certain figures which I would like to mention, because they are really the sum and substance of his speech:

Reduction in taxation..	$ 25,000,000
Surplus applied to reduction of debt.. ..	22,353,000
Earnings of the Canadian National for the fiscal year ended March 31..	32,264,414
Favourable balance of trade..	402,000,000
Total trade..	2,258,000,000
Increase in imports..	130,000,000
Increase in exports..	249,000,000
Empire trade..	Increase of 90 per cent

Then there are the changes in the tariff which I will deal with later on, to conform with the West India treaty, and the reduction in the tariff on automobiles.

There is the return to penny postage which Canada was a pioneer in the person of its former great postmaster general, who, I am glad to see, still continues to fulfil a great duty in his native province of Ontario, being at present its Chief Justice. When Sir William Mulock introduced penny postage in this parliament he did so, I have no doubt, with many misgivings, but still he was hopeful of success. Dire predictions were made at the time that it would wreck the Post Office Department and ruin the finances of the country The Post Office Department had had a long succession of deficits, but as soon as penny postage was introduced the tide turned and it has been on the upward trend ever since. The penny postage has made Canada known throughout the world and it is a good thing that we should go back to it.

The abolition of the stamp tax on receipts means doing away with a nuisance, but those who have been in Europe know that the stamp tax on receipts is a firmly established institution in European countries. We are doing away with it because our people are not accustomed to it and we are glad to know that it is being discontinued.

The exemption in the income tax for married and single persons is one of the main features of the budget and I know it will be received with great popularity and satisfaction throughout the country. It has its many good features and I am sure the minister is to be congratulated for what he has done in that regard.

There is also a reduction in the income tax on private corporations and joint stock companies, an increase in a number of exemptions from the sales tax; and the British preference is extended via Canadian ports not only to the mother country but to all parts of the empire.

All this is put before the House in a very unassuming paragraph—it is well worth quoting—in which the Minister of Finance says, referring to the reduced taxation:

> This era of depression has been overcome; all statistical complications which mirror the year to year business of Canada prove it. Canada to day is steadily growing more prosperous; there is less unemployment; the influx of settlers is growing; and with a hopeful spirit manifesting itself throughout Canada from coast to coast, the year 1926 is full of promise.

The revenue for the present fiscal year is estimated at $376,800,000, which shows that the country is not in such dire straits as it is claimed to be. Notwithstanding all the stories which have been heard about smuggling—which no doubt exists, as it will exist as long as fiscal laws are in operation—our customs import duties amounted to $127,360,00, or an increase of $19,200,000.

Other increases are as follows:

	Increase
Excise duties	$4,300,000
Excise taxes	9,689.000
Post office	1,540,183
Other revenues	541,214

The decreases are:

	Decrease
Income tax, because of reductions made last year	$ 708,092
Delayed business profits tax	1,540,183
Interest on investments	3,062,328

Or a total increase in revenue of $29,965,520. The total revenue therefore which stood at $342,834,479 in 1925, has reached $376,800,000 in the present year. The estimated special war tax revenues for 1925-26 are placed at $154,580,000 as against $147,166,158 in the previous year. The principal expenditures attributable to the war are estimated for 1925-26 at $163,997,000 as against $167,281,587 in 1924-25.

The Minister of Finance in showing a splendid financial statement had to do some negotiating in connection with meeting loans that matured during the past year, and he informs us that three of those he had to deal with, namely, $24,000,000 in London, $8,000,000 in Canada and $9,000,000 in United States, were met, and, we are glad to know, met to great advantage. Some of them were transformed into tax-bearing bonds and the amount of liability held in New York has been reduced by $55,000,000. In a word, the public debt which, on 31st March, 1925, stood at $2,417,473,685, now stands, on 31 March, 1926, at $2,395,084,685, or a reduction of $22,389,000. I am glad to be able to give here a statement prepared by the Department of Finance, showing the operations of the present administration since it took office:

NOTE—Uncontrollable includes not only loans to railways but also all deficits and capital expenditures in connection with the Canadian Government railways.

I have stated enough, I think, to demonstrate to unprejudiced and fair thinking people that the financial operations of the present administration have been successful. This success may be attributed to Providence, as has been done in an eloquent speech which we have heard, but I am glad to know at any rate that in this case Providence is with the government. And so long as the government continues to administer the affairs of the country under such auspices we shall have no reason to complain.

I shall now refer for a moment, merely en passant, to the trade of Canada, giving the totals for the three years 1924-25-26. I shall not go further back:

	1924	1925	1926
Imports..	$ 898,338,916	$ 799,248,046	$ 911,107,055
Exports..	1,029,478,881	1,066,681,325	1,297,744,683
Total trade.. ..	$1,924,817,797	$1,865,929,361	$2,208,851,738

For the twelve months ended February, 1926, our imports for consumption from the United Kingdom amounted to $162,000,000 odd, while our imports from the United States in the same period amounted to $597,000,000. In the same period our exports to the United Kingdom amounted to $502,000,000, in round figures, and to the United States $473,000,000. The balance of trade is still against us with the United States but it is being diminished, while our trade with the empire is increasing.

I do not intend to go into the details of our present trade with the Mother Country but I may observe in passing that this trade is on the increase. This is true also of our trade with the empire as a whole. In 1924 our total imports from the British Empire amounted to $197,000,000; in 1925 it was $192,000,000 and in 1926 it increased to $205,000,000 in round figures. With the United States our trade was as follows during the past three years in round figures:

	1924	1925	1926
Imports..	$603,000,000	$515,000,000	$597,000,000
Exports..	426,000,000	418,000,000	473,000,000

We have made very substantial progress in our trade with a number of the leading countries, notably Germany, the most outstanding, Russia and the Argentine. I will not fatigue the House by giving a list of the others as they are available to hon. members.

We have heard considerable prophecy in this House and in the country generally regarding the ultimate result of the venture of Canada in state-owned railways. We have the largest state-owned railway in the world, with 22,191 miles, and when the Liberal party came into office in 1921 at the request of the Canadian people—in six of the provinces no opponent was elected—it stood face to face with this immense problem of managing so vast a railway system. The question was whether the Canadian National Railways should remain a state-owned utility or whether they should be converted into a private concern. Liberals were divided on that question, but they agreed to give the system a fair trial. The government was successful in laying its hand upon a man who evidently was well fitted for the job, and to-day Sir Henry Thornton in his report—tabled by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) yesterday—is able to show net earnings of $32,264,414 as against $17,244,000, last year, being an increase of $15,000,000. That is within $7,000,000 of what is necessary to meet interest obligations owing to the public.

Sir Henry Thornton in his report, which no doubt has been studied by the members of this House, makes some valuable suggestions, and somewhat similar suggestions have also been made by Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific railway. Both agree that if our railways are to be made a success and if Canada is to continue on the high road to prosperity, our main problem is to increase immigration. The success of the Laurier administration from 1896 to 1911 was largely due to the fact that one million settlers went into the western country. As a result two new provinces were formed there, Alberta and Saskatchewan. These settlers of course increased the consumption of manufactured goods, and the factories of the east were kept humming day and night until 1911. Then the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding and the late Hon. Mr. Paterson came back from Washington with a reciprocity treaty for the exchange of natural products with the United States. Conservative members declared it was better to leave well enough alone, that they were thoroughly satisfied with the prosperous condition of the country, and were opposed to entering into any such treaty with the United States because in a short time it would be extended to manufactured articles. Then, during Sir Wilfrid's absence at the coronation, was inaugurated, the campaign against reciprocity throughout the Dominion, with a side show in Quebec on the navy. The government was defeated and the Borden administration came into office. Sir Henry Thornton agrees with Mr. Beatty that something must be done to increase immigration, and I am glad to know the government has taken the matter up in co-operation with the British government, our two great railway systems and our provincial governments. Their united efforts should again make Canada what it used to be, the immigration magnet of the world. From 1904 or 1905 until 1911 immigrants came in at the rate of a thousand a day, or three hundred and sixty-

4 p.m. five thousand a year. Every steamer from Europe and every train from the United States brought in settlers because at that time Canada was a cheap country to live in and had plenty of homesteads to give away. Those who are interested in this matter will find in the parliamentary debates of those years that men of high standing in western Canada stated the time would come when the Dominion would need, not one, two or three transcontinental railways, but half a dozen.

Sir Henry Thornton in his report has mentioned another matter which we discussed in this House the other day regarding the utilization of certain portions of our railways which are not now utilized to the extent they should be, having probably in mind the Transcontinental, and he has suggested that the government should set aside a certain amount of money to deal with that particular problem. I know the Minister of Railways will give it full consideration, and I shall therefore leave it in his hands.

We have often heard, Mr. Speaker, that Canada for the last three or four years has been in the slough of despondency, that conditions have been going from bad to worse, that our people have been leaving for the United States by the thousand, most of them never to return, and that immigrants merely stay here for a short while and then go south. To show that these allegations are not well founded, I propose to quote from opinions expressed by reliable authorities as to the present prosperity of Canada. First, let me read an extract from an article by Mr. C. E. Neill, president of the Canadian Bankers' Association:

> Business in Canada is undoubtedly expanding once more. The factors underlying improvement have been evident for some time—a sound credit structure—better agricultural conditions—excellent and well distributed crops yielding satisfactory returns—increasing mineral production and larger outputs in many lines of industry. Disparity in purchasing power between the various groups on consumers has been gradually reduced and generally speaking, goods are being exchanged on a more profitable basis. Railway freight loadings are running at higher levels, both for merchandise shipments and in the aggregate. These loadings are concrete evidence of a larger current volume of trade and more active consumption.

In connection with this semi-financial statement, I wish to read a few lines from the Fnancial Times, which opened the year 1926 with the following statement, showing that Canada after all was not in such a bad condition three or four months ago:

> Eighty stocks advanced over 1,300 points during year 1925.
> Net declines in year established by only 20 issues—Smelters leads with 132 point gain—Canners second with 75 point gain, and Montreal Power third, up 65 points—Dominion Glass heaviest loser, being down 28 points.

And then is given a long list showing the prosperity of the various concerns.

Now let me refer briefly to another feature that is considered of great importance to-day. Our friends of the opposition in their amendment which is now before the House have not atacked the budget as a whole; they do not complain of the reduction of taxation except in respect to one or two items; they say nothing about the prosperous condition of the country; they direct their whole attack against the reduction in automobile duties. I have in my hand a copy of The Border Cities Star of April 17, 1926, published two days after the budget was brought down by the Minister of Finance, and in large red type across the top it contains this announcement:

> Ford will not close.

Then follows this statement:

> New Ford Prices
> The Ford Motor Company of Canada announced a general cut in prices this morning.

I am sure that announcement was well received by the buyers of automobiles throughout Canada.

The reductions vary from $15 on the runabout, without a self-starter, to $45 on the Tudor, Fordor and truck, with starter models. The complete price list compared with the old is as follows:

And then the list is given. I think that is a pretty good start. It shows the people are not at all displeased with that cut in the tariff. I am glad to be able to give an appendix to this statement in the form of an extract from an article written during the past year by Mr. R. S. McLaughlin, president of General Motors of Canada, Limited—who at the present time is very much in the public eye—entitled "Automobile Industry has Record Year." In this article he does not condemn any of the trade arrangements made by this government. He concludes with this statement:

Export business has shown a good margin of increase over the previous year, as well as domestic sales. The very timely action of the Baldwin administration in effecting the restoration of the McKenna duties in Great Britain has been of immediate benefit to the industry, as well as an encouraging factor in regard to future trading.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Do you take credit for that?

Mr. MARCIL: This is what Mr. McLaughlin says, the president of General Motors of Canada. He says that the automobile export trade in this country has been on the increase. We do not claim any credit for any action taken by the Baldwin government, but I think we may claim some credit for what follows:

The ratification of the Australian preferential agreement by the Canadian parliament is also taken by the industry as a good omen for the future of Canadian export business in the Antipodes, where markets have been expanding rapidly of late. Canadian automobile manufacturers should be enabled to strengthen their hold on the Australian market as a result of the preferential agreement, especially if Australia sees its way clear to modify the regulation which requires motor vehicles to be valued for duty purposes on the basis of price in the home market. The application of this rule at present works to the detriment of the Canadian manufacturer for the reason that it costs considerably more to build motor cars in Canada than in the United States, even after taking into consideration the customs drawback allowed on exported material, and in consequence, higher duties are collected on cars made in Canada, than on cars made in the United States, even though the price to the Australian consumer be the same.

The way the matter strikes me, and as I think it strikes the average man on the street who is not familiar with the ins and outs of the automobile trade, is this: Why should the same automobile sell cheaper in the United States than it sells in Canada? That is a point I have never been able to understand, and that is what catches the fancy, I believe, of the Canadian people. The nearer we get to the prices that prevail in the United States, the nearer we shall get to ensuring the prosperity of the automobile industry in this country, because it must not be forgotten that the more cars that are sold in Canada, the greater will be the prosperity of the automobile industry in this country. It was prophesied in the old days when tariff cuts were made on this article, on that and the other, that different industries would be ruined, but the very reverse has taken place, and these different businesses have gone on improving very satisfactorily.

I had intended to speak of the pulp and paper industry, but I shall leave that for another occasion, as well as many other extracts I had intended quoting, because I do not want to fatigue the House, and I know that our friends do not want to have this debate unduly prolonged.

Now I will go outside the House and quote a few lines from some of the leading newspapers of Canada, on both sides of the fence, to show how this budget was received the day after it was delivered, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall give these extracts as briefly as possible. Let us begin with the Morning Chronicle of Halifax, which says:

The budget, we believe, will be welcomed by the people of Canada as a great step forward in the fulfilment of the policy of progressive Liberalism and equally for the promise it offers that the government has set its face definitely in the direction of lightening the burdens of consumers and taxpayers and of freeing trade and business from hampering restrictions and burdensome exactions. The King government has given the country a real Liberal budget. It is of good augury for the future prosperity of the whole country.

The Sydney Record says:

Canada is winning through. This country, like all other countries, has had a hard time in recent years, though it is always rightly to be remembered that Canadians have been better off than the people of most countries. The pessimists have talked a great deal of the sore plight of the nation and have shaken their heads dubiously as to the future. Some politicians, for unworthy partisan reasons, have magnified the difficulties and exaggerated the facts. The truth is that Canada has been winning through in fine style. There has been gradual but steady progress. In the last year or two progress has become swifter. The country is now entering upon a period that promises to be a period of general prosperity. Trade is expanding, immigration is increasing, business is improving in the Dominion as a whole, and now federal taxation is coming down. Canada is a place for optimists and no place for pessimists. And Canadians should be standing up for their country each day and all the days.

Now I pass to the Island province and give a short extract from the Patriot of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island:

The note struck by the Finance minister in his budget speech will resound throughout Canada; it will inspire confidence, and enlarge hope. It relieves the people to a considerable extent of the burden of taxation. This in itself is a great achievement; but the greatest emphasis is to be placed upon the fact that the government has been enabled to accomplish this because of the increasing prosperity of the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Let me pass to St. John, New Brunswick. The St. John Telegraph-Journal says:

The budget speech is a surprise both financially and politically. It has several welcome features, and perhaps the best of these is that it not only lessens materially the general burden of taxation but gives the country at large a measure of encouragement which is particularly timely.

Now I will give a word from a French-Canadian newspaper published in Montreal, and edited by one of the members of this House, a paper that is generally regarded as independent in politics. Le Devoir says:

(Translation): From every angle, the Robb budget shows a marked improvement over those which preceded it. The budgets of Sir Thomas White, during the war, taxed more and more the rate-payers. Those during the period of demobilization, from Sir Henry Drayton's advent up to Mr. Fielding's time, further burdened the rate-payers. Mr. Fielding relieved but little the situation. For the first time since 1915, a Finance minister, instead of seeking from rate-payers more money, more taxes or advising them to be patient and wait, tells them: "The worst is over, the summit of the hill has been reached, we are now on the downward slope, breathe more freely, I have less need of you."

La Presse, of Montreal, says that the rubicon has been passed, that is, the rubicon between the days of heavy taxation, war nightmares and the other evils of the past and the present days of full sunshine and prosperity, the prosperity the Liberal party gave to this country in the old days. La Presse says:

(Translation) The Budget speech delivered yesterday by the hon. Mr. Robb is indeed an event of importance: in fact, it ends an epoch and opens up a new era in the history of Canada.

For the first time since too many long years, the Canadian rate-payer, in the habit of seeing new taxes grafted upon him each time the budget was introduced, witnesses, to his astonishment and great joy that, on the contrary, this year, the benefits by a reduction in taxes: a real and very substantial reduction.

Even the Montreal Star was unable on its first impression on the 16th of April to refrain from opening its editorial headed, "An Election Budget," as follows:

Canada is to be warmly congratulated on the changed conditions which have made Mr. Robb's optimistic budget possible. If nature had not been kind, if the inevitable and yet long-delayed recovery from the wounds of the war had not really begun, Mr. Robb would never have been able to delight his partisans and gratify the country with what is, perhaps, the best pre-election budget ever delivered in parliament.

That is a pretty good statement from that authority. The Recorder and Times, of Brockville, concludes its editorial of the 16th of April as follows:

The reduction in taxation has been made possible through the greatly improved state of the federal finances. Receipts have been increased and the national debt decreased. As these finances may be expected to grow even more satisfactory from year to year, still further reductions are in prospect. Gradually but surely Canada is overcoming the economic difficulties which followed in the wake of the war and returning to the very pleasant state of affairs which existed before 1914. Mr. Robb and the government of which he is a member are entitled to a cordial and unanimous vote of thanks. They have done well, even better than was expected.

The British Whig of Kingston, Ontario, makes the following statement:

The 1926 Robb budget will be hailed by business men and other workers all over the country as the best news from Ottawa since Armistice day.

The Mail and Empire begins an editorial in the following manner:

The very substantial reduction made in the burden of income taxation will not be the less welcome to thousands of Canadians because it is announced within a fortnight of the day when the care-wearing task of preparing the returns and finding the money for the first instalment must be completed.

The Toronto Globe has this to say:

In a budget, which proclaims the business renascence of Canada, emergence from long post-war depression, the Minister of Finance yesterday presented the country with $25,000,000 by way of annual relief from various imposts. Such extensive reductions were unexpected. Canada had become rather reconciled to the burden of war debt, seeing relief only in the future with increased population and greatly enlarged business. That the burden is being lifted in a substantial measure at this date brings the welcome conviction that we are definitely on the upward trend.

The Hamilton Herald says:

Whether or not Finance Minister Robb has done a wise thing in cutting down taxes and thus dispensing with many millions of revenue, it is certain that he has done a very popular thing. He has perhaps made it harder for the government; but he has made things easier for thousands of Canadian taxpayers. In the end, probably, it will be found that he has done a wise as well as a popular thing, for the measure of relief from taxation will act as a stimulus to some branches of industry and serve to allay widespread discontent.

The St. Thomas Times-Journal expresses itself as follows:

Evidently, Mr. Robb fully appreciated the responsibility of preparing his first individual budget, and was no less anxious to frame proposals that would prove widely acceptable and provoke as small a measure of dissent as humanly possible. That he made a careful study of the taxation system as it existed is plain, and in deciding what and where to change or modify, his aim has clearly been to do the greatest good to the greatest number, especially those whose moderate incomes and means make taxation, however limited, a relatively heavy burden.

I quote the following from the Border Cities Star:

Hon. J. A. Robb's budget, brought down in the House yesterday, is the most important since the war. And, in some aspects, it is the most encouraging. Details which were published in the Border Cities Star yesterday within the same hour as their delivery in the House, reveal a genuine effort to make a good showing. Surpluses are produced, revenue is shown higher than expenditures, taxes are reduced, and tariffs are changed with a rather sweeping motion.

The Border Cities Star goes on to comment in a favourable manner on the features of the budget, except as to the automobile duties which of course is a live issue in that particular locality. The Winnipeg Tribune has the following to say:

None of the reductions, apart from the cut in income taxes, will substantially affect the revenues of the government, and even in the case of the income tax the indirect benefits may shortly bring greater returns to the treasury. Next year the people will expect as many and as great slashes at taxation. With increasing prosperity, and the opportunity of reducing the national expenditures substantially, there are still possibilities of immense reductions in taxation.

The Winnipeg Free Press has an editorial under the caption "A People's Budget." In the editorial itself the following comment is made:

The budget brought down to parliament yesterday by the Minister of Finance will give widespread satisfaction. It shows the country to be in a soundly prosperous condition, with the certain prospect of further improvement; and it brings to the individual taxpayer not the promise, but the actuality of a substantial reduction in taxation that will be felt immediately in every household in the country.

I quote the following from the Morning Leader of Regina:

The budget presented yesterday by Hon. James A. Robb, Minister of Finance, is one that reflects prosperity and that will mean still more prosperity. It is a budget of the famous Fielding type; it tells of great strides in Canadian trade, and it spells action, also, in the very important tax reductions that have been announced.

I find the following in the Halifax Herald:

The taxpayers of Canada get long-delayed but none the less welcome relief under the proposals of the budget, opened at Ottawa by the Minister of Finance on Thursday afternoon.

And so on. I might quote opinions from many other newspapers, but I shall not further trespass upon the patience of the House. I think I have demonstrated beyond peradventure that, although nothing is perfect in this world—and a budget could not be perfect any more than any other human creation—this particular budget meets with the hearty approval of reasonably-minded men, and I am quite willing to defend it. It is an exhilarating budget as compared with some of the depressing financial statements presented during the days of trial and stress. Old Liberal members of this House will remember how we cheered the budgets brought down in pre-war days, and how we submitted from a strict sense of duty to the obligations imposed in budgets during the war period. Happily that period has passed, and I think it has passed forever. Canada is now on the highway to prosperity. We have in this country all the things required for the building up of a great nation, and we intend to remain Canadian first, last and all the time. Our differences at the present time relate to economic questions, but it is right and proper that we should differ because as the French say, du choc des idées jaillit la lumière. It is from such discussions that we will be able to solve our problems. Our problems are of an economic character, and as long as they remain within that realm there can be no doubt as to the future of Canada. The old idea that we had a western Canada and an eastern Canada is fast passing away: There must be but one United Canada. There used to be some years ago a French Canada and an English Canada. That era is also disappearing. We French Canadians of the province of Quebec are learning the English language, and I must say to their credit that some of the outstanding men who came to this parliament many years ago unable to speak a single word in the English tongue have mastered that language and deliver to-day some of the most eloquent speeches heard in this chamber. That is a good example which I hope our English speaking Canadians will imitate, because they know as well as I do the tremendous advantage it is for a man to be master of two and even three languages.

In this country we shall reach the solution of many of our difficulties if the people can only understand each other, if they can only meet together in mutual intercourse. Because our common aim is the same, that of building up on the North American continent the civilization of Great Britain and the civilization of France, to further the advance of humanity and of civilization in all its forms. The French Canadian has his merits, the Anglo Saxon has his; those who come from other countries have theirs also. Let us unite in seeking to realize one common aim, and we shall create on this North American continent a nation of which the British Empire will be proud for all time to come.

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): I have listened with great attention to the address of the last speaker and with many of his remarks, certainly with his concluding words, I thoroughly agree. I also agree with the hon. member that a certain degree of prosperity has come to Canada; but in all the extracts from newspaper editorials read by the hon. gentleman very little credit was given to the present government for that prosperity. That prosperity has come because Providence has been kind to us.

The hon. gentleman eulogized the Minister of Finance. I think we all agree as to the splendid personality and the ability of that gentleman. We are very glad indeed that we can compliment him upon being able to bring down such a favourable budget. With all the features of that budget, of course, we are not in agreement. It is not my intention to take up much of the time of the House on this occasion, but I will just deal with one or two of what I conceive to be errors, either of commission or omission, in the budget.

The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Donaghy) gave us an interesting address last night. It was his maiden speech and I compliment him upon it. He made a deliverance which rang true on the subject of the manufacturing of our raw materials in this country. He said nothing that would indicate that he had views along the lines of free trade for Canada.

With respect to the problem of the raw resources of Canada, this has been a tale thrice told by me in this House and I will not reiterate views I have already expressed. I think this problem is one of the most important factors in the economic life of Canada. Still we have no word from the government opposite in regard to any relief being granted or anything being done which will enable this country to retain more of her men. The hon. member who has just addressed the House (Mr. Marcil) spoke of the wonderful progress Canada was making. I fail to see where there is any congestion of passenger traffic due to Canadians coming back to Canada; in fact I know of very few of them coming back. With respect to the stock market, since the first of January stocks have been falling almost as much as they rose during the whole of last year. That is no indication of prosperity in Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): What about the New York stock markets?

Mr. DICKIE: I am speaking of that market. You know quite well, Mr. Speaker, that since the first of January stocks have dropped very greatly. Last year they rose until the 1st of January, and since then they have been going down, although lately there has been a slight recovery. Placing the Speech from the Throne and the budget side by side and comparing them, they reminded me of a speech of an American politician, at the conclusion of which he said: "Fellow citizens, them is my sentiments; if you do not agree with them, they may be changed." That appears to be pretty well the attitude of the government. In the Speech from the Throne they gave us to understand that the tariff would not be tinkered with until consideration was given to it by the commission qualified to deal with it. In the budget speech they come down like a thunderbolt with this change in the policy, making a reduction of the customs tariff on automobiles. We all know why it was. The government said, in effect, "Providence has been kind to us and has been kind to Canada. The province of Saskatchewan has been kind to us and therefore we must bow to their will. They stand like a Colossus astride the people of Quebec. They say, as Caesar said, "'Do this,' and 'tis accomplished." The government has given way to them, and has said in effect: "We will send more money and more of our men across the line to swell the population and prosperity of that country."

We expected that through the newly-created tariff board we would be educated as to the rights and wrongs of the automobile industry. Many of us feel quite strongly that we have been charged too much for automobiles, but we do not know; we are not quite sure in the absence of expert advice on the subject. I might, however, perhaps make an exception of the great Ford company; it appears that they have been making excessive profits. However, we were quite willing to await the report and did await the report of the tariff board with respect to that industry. This provision in the budget came, I say, like a thunderbolt, and automobile people were appalled. We do not know where we stand; we do not know next where the blow will fall, and this is all done in deference to our friends from Saskatchewan and the Progressive party. It is pitiful to think of the once great Liberal party getting down on its knees to the Progressive party and to the province of Saskatchewan at this time.

We must be an industrial country or we must fail. No country can succeed by agriculture alone. We must industrialize this country. We realize that, and the people of Quebec must realize it, just as do the people of British Columbia and of the other provinces. Many of these people are protectionists, still they are lining up with those interests which are advocating free trade—all in order that the government of the right hon. Prime Minister may have a further short lease of power. I have been a Conservative, Mr. Speaker, as long as I can remember, but if at any time my party should descend to any such truckling as we have witnessed, in order to remain in power, I would leave them at once. I believe in the dignity of party. I am dismayed and sorrowful indeed to see the once great Liberal party degenerate, as it has done. I am sorry to see our Canadian friends who believe in protection not sticking up for it. In effect they say, "Let our sons and daughters who were born in Canada, and whom we loved and educated, drift across the line—anything in order that the government of the Prime Minister may remain in power." What kind of Canadian sentiment is that, Mr. Speaker? I do not understand it, and I think few of us do.

This budget will undoubtedly have the effect of forcing more people to drift across the line. That indeed seems to be the emigration policy of the government. The United States government have spent millions to keep people from coming to their adequately protected country. We have spent millions in the endeavour to bring people from Europe and to use Canada as a training school to qualify for citizenship in the United States. We practically say, "Come, no matter whether you prefer the red flag to the Union Jack; we want you to come to Canada, we want conscientious objectors; we want anybody to come and we must have immigration to Canada, while at the same time the United States are keeping these people out." We have the conscientious objectors in British Columbia; in fact one man I was informed was so conscientious he would not split wood because of the scriptural injunction, "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." I am sorry indeed to see the once great party opposite adopt such tactics. They remind me of the sick man turning from side to side in his bed, weary, restless, impotent, unable to help himself, willing to even sacrifice a kingdom, if he had it, in order that he might recover; in other words, to fit the present case, in order that the government may live and remain in power. Such an attitude on the part of any party cannot help having an adverse effect on that party, even though for the time being they may seem to be deriving some slight benefit from it.

We have, as hon. gentlemen know, expected and wished for some relief for our small farmer in British Columbia as well as in Ontario and Quebec. In British Columbia we have not those vast domains which they have in the Northwest Territories. We have only small farms, and we specialize in dairying and poultry raising. I represent I believe more poultrymen than any other man in the Dominion of Canada. My district is ideal for that sort of thing. We have on the beautiful islands along the coast of Vancouver island, as well as on that island itself, extensive poultry industries upon which millions of dollars have been expended. They have brought the modern hen up to a degree of efficiency that never was dreamed of years ago. We have the modern hen developed so that it approximates a mechanical unit; all we have to do is to feed Alberta and Saskatchewan grain to the hens, and out comes the egg! The price of that grain is fixed by the world's market, and we are glad that is the case. Immediately a hen does not live up to past records the unit is discarded and replaced. In British Columbia we have the best poultry on the American continent. To-day we are sending breeds of our poultry to the Argentine, India, China and Australia. We specialize in poultry raising; with us it has become a scientific industry. But we find that we cannot compete with the United States people in this respect. I do not know a Leghorn from a Wyandotte, but I know ninety per cent of British Columbia poultrymen are returned soldiers and seventy per cent of them want nothing from this Dominion of Canada but an equal chance with their brothers across the line in the poultry business. These men came back from the war, doffed their uniforms and put on their working clothes, asking for nothing. They put their money into the poultry business; they have been struggling along and they are suffering under a handicap, no matter what the Minister of Finance may say about the prices of eggs and butter being fixed in the markets of the world. He can talk in that way until ice forms where ice has never formed before, but I know that when eggs and butter come from Seattle and Puget Sound cities into the British Columbia cities of Victoria and Vancouver, down goes the price of our eggs. We let eggs come in under a duty of three cents per dozen; but when conditions are reversed and we have a surplus of eggs which we want to send across the border because the market there is good, we are met with a hostile tariff of eight cents a dozen. Are we mice rather than men that we are going to stand for that sort of thing?

The Minister of Finance says that the price of butter is fixed in the world market. Every boy on the street, every woman in British Columbia knows that when a shipment of New Zealand butter comes on to the market in Vancouver or Victoria, down goes the price of butter. We know the United States policy with respect to these matters. Why not adopt a similar policy? I do not believe in copying anybody; I believe we are strong enough, vigorous enough, virile enough and sensible enough to adopt a policy that will be adequate for the protection of the farmers and manufacturers of Canada without respect to the policy any other nation may adopt. I care not what tariff the United States people may impose, I would impose a tariff adequate to protect this country, just as they are doing to protect theirs, and not necessarily an imitation of them. When we find their butter and eggs coming in to the detriment of our dairymen and poultrymen, and when we find their manufactured goods appearing on the shelves of our stores in competition with goods manufactured in Canada, I would impose a duty to prevent that. Where do you see on the United States side any of our goods exposed for sale? The moment any article manufactured in Canada goes over there, up goes their tariff. That is a wise, sensible policy, a policy that has been adopted by every country in the world with the exception of Canada.

Owing to the strong appeals from the people in the prairie provinces, who, I admit, would not benefit by a highly protective tariff, we are forced to acquiesce in their wishes that we should still travel along the line of a moderate tariff and allow goods manufactured in United States to enter Canada. I want this thing to be spread equally over Canada and I say, as our leader has said, that I would be willing to reimburse our brethren in the west to the extent of their losses in having to pay more for goods manufactured in Canada than they would have to pay if they bought in the United States. But we must buy in Canada. I have said this before and I say it again: We must keep more of our money in this country or we cannot succeed. We talk of prosperity in Canada. We have made some strides; but this wonderful Canada of ours, with its vast resources in timber, mines and agriculture, instead of simply increasing a little in prosperity from time to time should be one of the most prosperous countries in the world. We have the population,—fine up-standing, broad men. I have seen them by the thousand leaving Canada, men who could hold a cow up with one hand and milk her with the other. We want to keep those men in this country rather than allow them to drift away to the United States.

With respect to the automobile industry—and I speak for myself; I do not speak for my party—instead of reducing the duties I would give the automobile industry a fifty per cent protection. Then I would say to those manufacturers: We have given Canada for your field; prepare for and go ahead with your mass production; but we want cheaper automobiles. I know that one of the greatest automobile factories in Canada would be prepared to concede a ten per cent cut right now had that been done, and I have no doubt others would do the same thing. In time they could manufacture automobiles in such a way that the price could be reduced, and I would have the government say to those people: We will not stand for any illegitimate profiteering. In that way we would keep millions of our money and thousands of our men in Canada. That is the way in which I would build up this great country of ours.

With regard to our good friends from the west, for whose ideas I have every respect, although we have not in British Columbia perhaps the vast expanse of acreage that there is in the prairies, I think we have a broader national vision—and I say that in all kindness to my hon. friends. We have our grievances in British Columbia. We can buy the goods we require more cheaply in the United States than we can in Canada, but there is no desire on the part of our people to do that. We are willing to make little sacrifices in order that the whole of the Dominion may succeed. It makes me, I will not say impatient, but a little sorry to hear at times such remarks from my friends from the west. I do not think they mean them as badly as they sound. Two or three years ago the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) came here with five or six measly, almost rotten apples, in what seemed to some an effort to discredit the fruit growers and packers of British Columbia, at a time when they were spending and had lost millions in trying to build up the fruit industry of Canada. Another member from Saltcoats, an estimable gentleman who is not in the House now, said in this chamber: We will soon be able to grow rhubarb in the northwest so that we shall not require any British Columbia apples. We all know the free trade proclivities of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) who used to moan and groan when anything was said about enacting a dumping clause that would keep Washington apples out of British Columbia. Those are things, I say with all respect to all parts of the House, that are not conducive to that unity preached by the very sincere hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). I think that the prairie people should cultivate a broader vision which would enable them to help us to make Canada the country which it was designed to be by a beneficent Providence. Surely the winds that sweep across that great prairie country have not dried up all the milk of human kindness. Our poultrymen in British Columbia have to work every day in the year and during the last year they have lost many thousands of dollars because they cannot produce eggs at thirty cents a dozen. They buy goods from the merchants; the merchants buy from others, lumber is bought, and all that money is circulated. But when we send any of that money into the United States, it is gone. We want it circulating in Canada. That is the only sane policy to adopt. All other countries have adopted it; why do we hesitate for a purely political reason? Let us have a policy that will make Canada a great country because Canada is greater than all political parties.

Mr. CAMPBELL: In fairness to the hon. member for Macleod, who is not in the House at present, I might point out that on the occasion referred to by the hon. gentleman, what the hon. member for Macleod was complaining about was the system of grading. He showed some inferior apples which were graded Fancy Sweets, or something of that kind. I would assume that the fruit growers of British Columbia would be just as much interested in having a proper grading system as the consumers on the prairies. There was no attack whatever on the fruit growers of British Columbia.

Mr. DICKIE I did not say there was an attack on the part of the member for Macleod, but it led to very many things being said that we were sorry to hear, especially from the hon. member for Rosetown and others. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken knows how hard they fought against the dumping clause in order that they might get apples in from Wenatchee and other points south of the line. Perhaps their packing methods were not quite up to date but they were doing their best. We know that the orientals sometimes pack apples which are not shipped through the white packing associations of British Columbia and we know also that the people of that province have lost fortunes in the endeavour to build up an industry. I do not attribute badness of heart to our Progressive friends but things of this sort lead some people who perhaps are not given to looking for motives of generosity to think that the people of the prairies were opposed to the interests of British Columbia. Let me assure hon. gentlemen that our struggle is a hard one.

Mr. CAMPBELL: On the occasion in question the recriminations were mutual as they usually are under such circumstances.

Mr. DICKIE: The recriminations may have been mutual but I took no part in them. We in British Columbia, I say, are having a hard fight. We are, so to speak, shaking dice with the mountains, trying to wrest wealth from their tenacious grip. In the poultry and dairy businesses everybody is working hard to succeed and all we want is to be put on equal terms with other nations who have adopted the protective policy. As my good friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) observed yesterday, we do not see people going from Canada to reside in England, and England is as nearly a free trade country as one can find anywhere. Look at Australia. We are allowing their eggs to come into Canada to the detriment of our industry. I do not say that as a matter of fact their eggs will come in, but some doubtless will be imported. But the significant fact is that Australia with a duty of eighteen cents per dogen on eggs is given the opportunity to send her product into this country in competition with ours if she can manage it. Is there any sense in such a policy? Australia came out of the war torn, battered and bleeding, as we were, but years ago she was paying off her debt and reducing taxation so that two years ago she was prospering and is still prospering. Australia has a protective tariff to safeguard her manufacturers and all her producers. And in this regard she serves as an object lesson to us. Take the United States again: it is true they came out of the war in better shape than we did, and it is also true that they were more prosperous than we were before the war came, but we see our people going across the line from year to year, and all because there is a policy over there that makes for employment. We know that the moment we try to send anything into the United States, a tariff wall is erected to stop our progress. I do not say that we should build a tariff of brick for brick, but I do say that we should have an adequate tariff wall to keep out the manufactured products of other countries which have tariff policies hostile to us. Only in that way can we bring about that prosperity that will make for the unity which we all desire to see achieved in Canada.

I am sure every one of us wants to see Canada succeed, and this success can be attained if we are prepared to compromise a little here and there. I maintain, however, that Canada can never hope to make any real progress without a protective tariff. I am convinced of the soundness of that argument, everything tends to support it. Why should we arrogate to ourselves a knowledge superior to the wisdom of experience in every other part of the globe? Every country has a protective policy except poor Canada. We have some protection but what was adequate in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and in the days of Sir John A, Macdonald is inadequate at the present time. As mass production sprang up in other parts of the world, and new methods were put into practice, the tariff which we had in this country proved insufficient to protect us. We see the Americans putting up their tariff from time to time, while France is doing the same thing. France has a tariff of 100 per cent on some articles and generally she takes every possible means to keep her workingmen employed at home. That is a sort of policy we should have in Canada. We want to see this country united and we shall see this hope realized in time, I am sure, although it must be confessed that now and then one loses heart.

When the Roman Empire fell, two great nations came into prominence in Europe—England and France, representing the pinnacle of culture and civilization in the Old World. These two countries in the course of their history have alternately fought and caressed, and notwithstanding all their faults they stood out as the two greatest peoples of Europe. Then came those awful days of 1914 when they fought side by side in defence of a common ideal. It annoys me to hear disparaging remarks of the British Empire, but even if we admit, as I personally do not admit, that England went to the aid of France merely from motives of self-preservation, it seems to me that every intelligent man must concede that had not Great Britain entered the war when she did, and gone to the relief of France, la belle France would not be in existence to-day as an independent nation; she would have been wiped off the map. So that whatever injury Britain may have done to France at any time, she has paid her account in full.

We in Canada are descended on the one hand from the French and on the other from the English, and there is no reason why we should not stand side by side and make this a united and prosperous land. Let no barriers of race and creed stand in the way, but let us all work together to make this a nation of which we may be proud. I well remember in the early days of California that the best recommendation any man going into that country could have was the fact that he was a Canadian. His Canadian citizenship carried with it credentials which were at once accepted. He had been brought up in a place where the motto that honesty is the best policy had been constantly before him in the little schoolhouse and in his home. Canadians occupied very many of the responsible positions in California.

Just across from Victoria is the big city of Seattle, where a few years ago nine-tenths of the positions of responsibility were held by Canadians because they had been taught to be honest and had therefore qualities which appealed to the American people. That is one reason why we are allowed to go there to-day while other people are excluded.

Before I conclude I want to read the following resolution passed by the poultrymen in my district:

> That whereas, the present duty on eggs entering Canada is only three cents per dozen as compared with the duty of eight cents per dozen on eggs entering the U.S.A.;
> And whereas, the Canadian duty of three cents per dozen makes possible the import of U.S.A. eggs into Canada, particularly storage eggs and at some seasons of the year fresh eggs, thereby making it unprofitable for B.C. poultrymen to send their eggs to the prairie and eastern Canadian markets;
> And whereas, the duty of three cents per dozen is in the neighbourhood of approximately 12 per cent at present prices;
> And whereas, Canadian eggs are almost totally prevented from entering the U.S.A. by reason of the eight cent tariff;
> Be it therefore resolved:
> (a) That the federal government be requested, as an act of justice to Canadian poultrymen, to raise the tariff on U.S.A. eggs coming into Canada to an equality with the tariff imposed on Canadian eggs going into the U.S.A.
> (b) That the federal government be requested to make the Eggs Marks Act of B.C. applicable to the Dominion of Canada as a whole.
> And be it further resolved, that copies of this resolution be sent to Hon. W. R. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa, the Hon. E. D. Barrow, Minister of Agriculture for B.C., and to each of the federal members for B.C., also to various co-operative and poultry associations throughout Canada, and to all poultry journals circulating in the Dominion.

What is there unreasonable in that application? It comes from the centre of the poultry industry of Canada. I can assure the government that these people are justified in seeking some protection against competition from the United States. Surely it is not too much to ask, and I hope that this government will see its way clear to give that protection.

With the permission of the House, Mr. Speaker, I beg to put on Hansard two other resolutions of the same character as the one I have just read:

Whereas, under the Canadian-Australian treaty, eggs from Australia are allowed to enter Canada free of duty;

And whereas, under the Dominion of Canada grading regulations it is possible that eggs from Australia raised under summer conditions will be able to enter Canada as fresh eggs at a time when winter conditions prevail in Canada;

And whereas, this will increase the already serious competition which Canadian poultrymen have to meet from eggs from the U.S.A.;

Be it therefore resolved: that the federal government be requested to add to the present definition of the word "fresh" the length of time during which eggs intended for sale as "fresh" in Canada may be held when in transit at a temperature of 35 Fahrenheit, or less;

And be it further resolved, that copies of this resolution be sent to Hon. W. R. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa, the Hon. E. D. Barrow, Minister of Agriculture for B.C., and to each of the federal members for B.C., also to the various co-operative and poultry associations throughout Canada, and to all poultry journals circulating in the Dominion.

Whereas, there is reason to believe that an effort will shortly be made by certain produce dealers in the prairie provinces to secure the modification of the present egg grading regulations, which modification amounts practically to the abandonment of egg grading;

Be it resolved: that the federal government be requested to make no alteration in the present regulations beyond the amendment asked for in resolution No. 2.

And be it further resolved, that copies of this resolution be sent to Hon. W. R. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa, the Hon. E. D. Barrow, Minister of Agriculture for B.C., and to each of the federal members for B.C., also to the various co-operative and poultry associations throughout Canada, and to all poultry journals circulating in the Dominion.

Mr. GEORGE SPENCE (Maple Creek): I wish to add a few words of commendation to what has been said by previous speakers in congratulation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the splendid budget he has presented to parliament. I have briefly summarized the main features of that budget and I find that they consist of a reduction in the national debt of some $22,000,000; a reduction of $25,000,000 in taxation; substanial reductions in income tax, particularly in the lower grades; the abolition of the receipt tax; reductions and exemptions in the sales tax; automobile tariff cut to 20 per cent on cars of $1,200 and under, and to 27½ per cent on cars over that value; balance sheet showing $402,695,000 in our favour; British preference applicable to direct shipments through Canadian ports; and last, Mr. Speaker, but by no means least, the return on Dominion Day to penny postage. It is a budget for the common people. I shall refer to it more particularly in detail as I discuss certain questions which I now propose to bring before the House.

[Mr. Dickie.]

I feel like offering some apology, Sir, for engaging the attention of hon. members on matters of more or less local importance, but I would remind them that, not having spoken in the debate on the Address, this is perhaps the only opportunity I shall have this session of discussing these matters. I realize also that a private member has a responsibility to his constituency and that certain local problems affect the Dominion as a whole. Therefore I think it is his duty and privilege to bring his best judgment to bear on the solution of those problems.

I come, Sir, from a purely rural constituency in one of the oldest settlements of the province of Saskatchewan, the constituency of Maple Creek. At one time the greater part of my riding was open range, and the chief industry of the settlers was ranching. Following the inauguration of the great homestead policy there was a steady influx of settlers, which resulted in a large additional acreage of land being brought under cultivation. Now, like every other policy that is more or less of general application, mistakes were made under the homestead policy—mistakes by the government itself in the first place, and also by the settlers. The mistakes made by the government worked the greatest hardship, due to the attempt to apply the policy indiscriminately without regard to the varying conditions of soil and climate. This criticism applies not only to the particular constituency of Maple Creek, but also to the great bulk of southern Alberta. There are lands in my constituency, not very extensive, it is true, where farming has not been very much of a success. There is a small corner in the southwestern portion of Saskatchewan and a larger area in southern Alberta where the climate is rather inhospitable to the growing of spring grain, which is commonly understood to cover wheat, oats and flax.

For this and perhaps other reasons some of our settlers are in more or less financial difficulties. Quite frequently I get letters from settlers not only in the southwestern corner of my constituency but also from others in southern Alberta complaining that they are in arrears with the Dominion government on their pre-emptions, that their indebtedness is steadily growing, and that they are also behind with their payments on seed grain and other relief. There is no doubt that these people are a great asset to the Dominion. We are contemplating spending money on an empire settlement scheme and on other schemes to attract immigrants. We are also preparing to make a revaluation of the land held by returned men. All these activities will I hope help to draw attention to the particular condition which I am now bringing to the notice of the House.

5 p.m.

I am not prepared, Mr. Speaker, to state specifically what should be done, but undoubtedly this condition of affairs will have to be carefully inquired into and some action taken as early as possible. I have sometimes thought that a plan of amortization might be adopted, with provision to cancel payment of interest for a period of years. Perhaps something on those lines might be worked out. As I have said, we must do something to retain on the land these people who through misfortunes for which they are not responsible find it increasingly difficult to carry on. I am in hopes that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) will give this matter his favourable consideration. There is one thing I like about him: he is a practical man, he has been through the mill himself. Carlyle has said: Two men I honour, the horny handed son of toil, and the man who works for the moral uplift of his people. I feel like saying: One man I honour, the man who has been through the hard school of experience, the man who has been through the mill, the practical man. I have a great deal of confidence in the Minister of the Interior. He knows the problems peculiar to the west and the southwest portions of the prairie provinces, and he has worked with praiseworthy patience and diligence to solve not only the problem of soldiers' re-establishment, but also other perplexing questions which have engaged his attention since he entered the ministry.

There is another matter of importance to my section of the country. I am speaking more particularly now for the rancher, although what I am about to say applies to a lesser degree, but still to a very considerable degree, to the mixed farmer as well. As you know, Sir, we have a great asset in our natural grass. You can turn a steer or a cow out in the spring on the natural prairie grass and before the end of July that animal will be fit for the block. It is a wonderful national asset and adds a great deal to the wealth of the Dominion. Unfortunately, however, we are in what I might term a great inland empire, far from the markets of the world, and when we add the freight, the commission charges and the other tolls levied on that steer before it eventually reaches the markets of Europe, there is very little left for the producer. Therefore I say, Sir, the vital question with the live stock industry to-day is the question of markets. I am sure my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins) will bear me out in this. I have listened with a great deal of interest to his observations on this question, for I look on him as a practical man, one whose opinion I value, although I am afraid he is not actively engaged in the business at the present time, but is rather what I might say feeding steers by proxy. Be that as it may, I think something must be done to enlarge our market. I have on my desk an article which is the substance of an address which was delivered before the agricultural societies at their last annual convention, and which is reprinted by the Grain Growers Guide of December 23. I understand that Mr. Tom King has given this matter very careful consideration, and I am going to give the conclusions he has reached, and then make a few observations drawn from my experience in the cattle business. He says:

> In 1911 the congress of the United States passed a statute which remained in force for eleven years. That statute proposed reciprocal free trade in cattle, at a nominal tax of one-quarter of one cent a pound on beef. During those eleven years parliament did not see fit to accept the proposal, which had been definitely rejected in 1911 by a vote of the Canadian people.

He goes on:

> But there was a second offer of reciprocity. In 1913 congress passed the Underwood tariff bill placing cattle and beef on the free list. That law remained on the statute book for eight years, and during all that time Canadian cattle went freely into the United States. During that eight years Canada maintained against all American cattle a tariff of 25 per cent ad valorem, and against American beef a tax of 3 cents a pound.

He continues:

> I am told that when the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill was before the Senate finance committee a rancher of the northern range argued that it might be a good thing to have no tariff barrier between the two countries, because in times of drought American cattle could be driven across the Canadian border. Someone asked him at once whether Canada would be willing to take off her 25 per cent ad valorem duty if the United States put cattle on the free list. He could not answer, and no one could answer for him. It is certainly my impression that at the time of which I speak it was touch and go whether the tariff should be continued or allowed to drop, and the weight that cast the balance was the fact that Canada was maintaining, and for fourteen years had maintained, a tariff of 25 per cent ad valorem against the importation of American cattle.

Then he explains the difficulty which Mr. Taft had in getting the reciprocal trade agreement through congress. I shall read only the essential parts of his remarks on that phase. Mr. Taft was indebted to a great man, Mr. Underwood, for the help which enabled him to pass the measure. Mr. King says:

> Mr. Underwood was at the time chairman of the House committee dealing with the matter. He said to his Democratic colleagues that the people of Canada had really never rejected reciprocity. He explained that the reciprocity issue had been tangled up with party politics, and that much weight had been given the fact that a hard and fast bargain was provided for. Now, he said, we will give the Canadians all they would have gotten under reciprocity without demanding any price in advance, without asking for any bond, trusting to their commonsense to show some appreciation. Among other things he put upon the tentative free list for Canada to accept or reject wheat, flour, potatoes. He greatly lowered many duties on Canadian grains and dairy products, and when he came to cattle and beef he puts them on the free list absolutely. He was confident that the government of Canada could get for Canada all the benefits of reciprocity without losing their face. He expected that the Canadian duties against American products would be lowered to some extent. He took it for granted that cattle, at any rate, would be put on the free list. Yet in 1921 he told me that up to that time Canada had not shown the slightest appreciation of the very great benefit conferred upon her by the Underwood tariff law.

Mr. MULLINS: Would the hon. member permit American cattle to come into Canada provided the United States took their duty off and allowed our cattle to go over there?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Yes, I would, and I would fortify that statement with another one; I do not think very many of them would come into this country.

Mr. MULLINS: For the information of the hon. gentleman, may I say that foot and mouth disease and all sorts of other diseases are rampant among American cattle, and in my opinion they should not be permitted to come in here and mix with our healthy herds.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): The hon. gentleman may know quite a bit about cattle, but he evidently does not know very much about our health laws. We have quarantine stations all along the border. I happen to have the advantage of my hon. friend there, in that I live right on the boundary.

But Mr. Speaker, it is no use crying over spilt milk. The thing has been done. But it is just as well to look at this question from the United States point of view as well as our own. Though it is no use crying over spilt milk, something should be done about the matter now. According to Mr. Underwood, and according to Mr. King, and I have no doubt that he is a great authority on this question, it was just a matter of touch and go whether the United States would put on that duty or not, and had we had any representative in that country at that time representing our stockmen, it is altogether likely that the duty would not have gone on. I am not prepared to say—well, yes, I think I will—I will go so far as to say that I think we should be represented at Washington by an ambassador, or a commissioner, or someone who would represent our interests. We have commissioners in almost every important country of the world, and if there is one place that is more important than another, it is surely the nation lying right to the south of us, where we have our natural market.

There is another feature of our ranching industry that requires a little attention, and that is the horse industry. We have in Saskatchewan approximately one million horses. Altogether in western Canada we have, I believe, over three million horses, and of that number one million represents the surplus for export. Some of these horses are rather small, what is known as the range horse or the broncho. We have no trouble at all as regards our domestic horses weighing from twelve to fourteen or sixteen hundred pounds. But there is very little demand for the small horse in our own country. I understand that an experiment has been carried out by the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the matter of the disposal of surplus horses. A trial shipment has been made to Europe, but up to the present I am not aware except in a general way as to how the experiment has turned out. I for one would be very much interested in knowing exactly what the result of that shipment has been. I should be very glad, therefore, if the Minister of Agriculture will make the report to be prepared on this subject available to every hon. member of the House. I have had one or two conversations with officials who were identified with this experimental shipment, and am credibly informed that it has met with some success and that there is a market in Europe for perhaps from five thousand to ten thousand horses annually. Now that is a very important thing. To be able to make such shipments would afford very material assistance to the horse-breeding industry in western Canada, and I think this experiment should be followed up by further work on constructive lines. I am not much enamoured of the idea that the government should undertake everything which may be needed for the people. I think perhaps there has been a tendency to go too far in that direction in the past, and that we have erred a little in that respect. But there is a bona fide assistance that a government can give the people which is perfectly legitimate; for it is a fact that we can help people to help themselves. The responsibility devolves upon a government to explore every possible avenue of relief. Having made the necessary investigation and arrived at certain conclusions it is then incumbent upon the government to make those conclusions available to the people. I should like to see this particular matter followed up. I think that will be done in this case, having in mind the characteristics of the present Minister of Agriculture.

And here I must give the minister a word of commendation. I am glad he is in his seat, although if he were absent I should feel disposed to express my opinion more freely. I do not think that Canada has ever had a better Minister of Agriculture than the gentleman who now administers the department. I can say with perfect truth that the Minister of Agriculture enjoys the confidence of the organized stock-breeders of this country. He has championed and carried to a conclusion, since he assumed the administration of his department, some very important things. It was largely, in fact I may say almost entirely, through his efforts, that oleomargarine was excluded from Canada. It has been through his efforts that the grading system has been developed to its present state of perfection. A number of hon. gentlemen opposite have made some rather disparaging references to the Minister of Agriculture, but these do not reflect the sentiments of the Canadian people. The latter appreciate what the minister has done in their behalf, and I do not exaggerate when I say that in any future history of Canada the minister's name will occupy a prominent place.

Coming now to deal with the farm, particularly the grain farm, I may say that there are in my particular section some of the very largest grain farms in western Canada. I am sorry I cannot altogether agree with the hon. member for Marquette in the statement that he could see no good at all in wheat farming.

Mr. MULLINS: May I set the hon. gentleman right? I never made any such statement.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I am very glad to have the hon. gentleman's denial. Wheat growing is a stage of development in our great western country, it is the first stage of development. The pioneer goes and locates on the prairie. He builds his little sod shack. He is a man without capital; all he has is his muscle and a desire to win. He goes in there and he does what is quite natural; he follows the course of least resistance. He sows flax, or he sows wheat, and from the proceeds of that crop he establishes himself. But gradually, slowly—perhaps more slowly than some of us would like to see—the process of mixed farming is being adopted. Agriculture is being built up year by year on a more sound and permanent basis as the result of the keeping and feeding of live stock. In Saskatchewan we had 100,000 acres seeded to corn last year, a fact which may be rather a surprise to hon. gentlemen in this chamber. As I have said, field crops, particularly wheat, are a very important contribution to the prosperity of Canada. Now, we have in Saskatchewan an organization which, as a single unit, is perhaps one of the greatest organizations to be found anywhere in the world.

An hon. MEMBER: Political?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I will tell my hon. friend about that. We have a marketing organization known as the wheat pool. Affiliated with it are two other units, the Alberta pool and the Manitoba pool. The three are amalgamated in selling the wheat of the growers of western Canada through a central office. There are something like 100,000 growers in these organizations who will market this year 200,000,000 bushels of wheat. Just think of it! I am speaking of this because I wish to show that we have been leaving no stone unturned in the direction of putting our business of farming on a sound economical basis. We have organized ourselves in such a way that we have to a great extent eliminated much of the waste and inefficiency in distribution. Thanks to the services of our various activities, governmental and otherwise, we have been able to put our production on a very high plane indeed. It is only quite recently that we were able to follow that work up by putting our system of distribution on the same basis also. Now that work is going on, and to-day I do not know of a single farm commodity that is not marketed in that way. We have the wheat growers; the live stock men are organized; the poultry and egg producers; in fact, as I have already said, commodity organization is applicable to every farm commodity. We have been unremitting in our efforts to benefit our condition and have had marked success. Thanks to a beneficent Providence we have had for the last three or four years good crops which we have been able to market at good prices. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) saw fit recently to make an allusion in that regard and perhaps I may be permitted to read exactly what he said:

> I say that Providence has blessed Canada during the past season with a wheat yield in the western provinces unsurpassed both in quality and quantity, a yield which is to-day commanding a good price in the markets of the world and this fact constitutes the most important feature of our commercial success.

I am glad that the hon. member referred to that matter and stated that the crops, particularly wheat, and agriculture as a whole, gave the greatest contribution to our commercial success. When I come to the point, I wish to relate the great business of agriculture to the industries of manufacturing and mining. I think perhaps agriculture has not been brought forward in this House to such an extent as its importance demands. In my own province of Saskatchewan we have, roughly, $300,000,000 coming in from our wheat crop alone, and about one-half billion, in round figures, for all field crops. We have one billion and a half dollars coming into Canada as a whole from all agricultural products. An enormous amount of money comes pouring into the country in payment for the products of the land. We have three million people engaged in agriculture. We have the enormous amount, approximately, of three billion and a half dollars in actual money invested in the land in the western provinces. I am sometimes inclined to smile a little when I hear my hon. friends talking about industry and its importance. They speak of some shoe factory employing a few hundred men, or some automobile manufacturer employing a few thousand men, and turning out a few hundred thousand dollars worth of automobiles. It may not be common knowledge to hon. members of this House, but our dairy industry alone is worth more than the products of all the mines, gold and silver, and all the oil and gas wells in Canada. The amount of money received from dairy products exceeds the products of the mines and wells by a hundred million. The old brindle cow, chewing her cud on the farm in Saskatchewan, represents more wealth than all these other industries I have referred to.

Mr. MANION: Does the hon. member not mean the old brindle cow in Ontario?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I mean the brindle cow, no matter where she is. I have referred to the volume of business, and I wish to speak now in regard to its quality. I am proud to be able to tell this House that in fifteen international exhibitions we won eleven sweepstake prizes for our hard spring wheat. At the International show, in Chicago, we have won prizes with our cattle and horses, and I think our quality of production along some lines has been on a par with the quantity. To give the House an idea of the contribution our province has made to the wealth of the country, I may say that the proportion of registered wheat for all Canada was 49,000 bushels, and Saskatchewan's share in that registered hard wheat was 30,000 bushels. We have found a market for registered wheat in the distant Argentine. We sent 2,000 bushels to the United States notwithstanding a duty of 42 per cent. I would like to see a trade commissioner or an ambassador appointed to Washington, to represent the interests of the grower of high grade registered wheat as well as to look after the interest of the live stock man. There is a demand for high grade spring wheat in the United States, and the fact that we can sell two car loads in spite of that high duty clearly indicates that there is a demand for it.

This leads me to the point where I will briefly touch upon the fiscal policy of the Dominion of Canada. As a result of our great agricultural development coupled with the fine exhibits of Canadian products in other countries, 60 per cent of our exportable wealth is represented by agriculture. Someone says, "We are going to protect industry." The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has said—and I listened very carefully to what he said—"We will build agriculture into the protected structure of industry." That is a nice mouth filling phrase but that is about all it is. It simply cannot be done. Here you have a golden harvest of wheat pouring out during the marketing season, miles and miles of trains running day and night, employing hundreds of thousands of men, you have ships coming into the harbours of our principal sea ports to load with the wheat which is carried to Europe, and which is selling there in competition with the whole wide world. That source of revenue is equal to three-quarters of a billion of wealth in gold to this Dominion, and that gold, as a result of the production of that wheat, is coming into Canada. To make my point clear I will give the House a little illustration. I lived in the Yukon country, the Klondyke, for three years. Our banner year of production in gold was $24,000,000. Men were very anxious to go to the Klondyke, and if you are able to go over the trail to-day you will see bleaching on the hillside the bones of those who tried to get there and could not. Our banner production was $24,000,000 in one year, and it dwindled down to $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. In the section of Saskatchewan from which I come there is a line of railway 100 miles long, and during the last six years taking the average, we shipped a million and a half dollars worth of grain at every shipping point, these shipping points being only seven or eight miles apart. That meant that that amount of money was coming into that section of the country. That line goes through the constituency of the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) and my own constituency. I wonder where the money goes to. It is a veritable Klondyke; yet no one is rushing to get there. No one is leaving his bones bleaching on the prairie in an effort to get there. It is not a spectacular thing, but it goes on year after year, and we are not mining it all out at once; it is a potential source of wealth that appears to be inexhaustible. The fertility of our soil is a great natural resource and, I repeat, agriculture is the greatest central factor in Canada to-day and you cannot protect it. We hear talk about building agriculture into the protected structure of industry. Here we have this great arch, this great keystone, and hon. members are going to fit it into a little footbridge. "Brick for brick," our hon. friends of the opposition say: "brick for brick," the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) says, "brick for brick"! Not even as good a bricklayer as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie could build that kind of brick into the protected structure of industry. It is not a brick, it is the corner stone, and the stone that this builder—the right hon. leader of the opposition—has rejected is yet the head of the corner.

Our policy must be one for wider markets, for world markets. The domestic, the home market, means very little to us. The previous speaker referred to what we could do in the way of finishing products at home, but I have listened to that old chestnut before. How are we to finish our steers at home? We can picture ourselves with a row of sausage factories extending all the way from Calgary to Halifax! It would require a population of fifty million people to consume the cattle we are raising in this country at the present time.

I did not speak on the Address, and during all the debate that has taken place in the last two or three months, I have listened carefully, I might almost say with painful interest sometimes. I have come to the conclusion that we are being gradually forced into a false position. It has been stated that the government are doing certain things for certain people, particularly for western Canada; that they are building the Hudson Bay railway for western Canada; that they are lowering the tariff for western Canada and for Saskatchewan particularly. That assertion has been made. I want to offset it with this argument, that the only thing the farmer gets with which to buy the necessities and luxuries of life and to support himself on the land is his margin of profit between the cost of production and the price he ultimately gets in the markets of the world. Anything that will tend to lower that cost of production confers a benefit on agriculture, and anything that confers a benefit on agriculture confers a great benefit on Canada.

Let us not take things out of their proportion. Let us consider things in their order; let us put first things first. We are not asking for the Hudson Bay railway because we are going to get some particular thing out of it. That railway is going to be built because it will be a means towards cheapening our production. We want rural credits for the same reason. If we can get money a little cheaper, our cost of production will be lowered. If we can get our wheat on the markets of the world cheaper, our cost of production will certainly be lowered. If we can get our ploughs, harrows, wagons and other implements of production cheaper, our cost of production will be lowered and we shall have more for distribution, more with which to buy automobiles on which the tariff has been lowered, and more with which to buy necessities and some luxuries maybe. As I have said, it is this balance that affects prosperity in Canada, which makes the wheels of the factory go round, which keeps the bankruptcy sign out of the show windows of our places of business, which keeps the balance of trade on the right side of the ledger, which keeps the man on the land and which will attract other people to the land.

I have a great deal of material in connection with the period through which we have passed. Along with others, I was one of the victims of that howl of blue ruin that went to high heaven during the election campaign preceding October 29 last. I do not object to gentlemen propounding their doctrines, because that is what we are here for. I am here to convince hon. members if I can that the farmer must have his raw material at the lowest possible cost, and therefore I want duties lowered on farm implements and all other material that enter into the production of farm commodities. That is my philosophy. I have no particular objection to offer if hon. gentlemen differ with me in that; I am prepared to discuss the question with them without resorting to personal abuse.

Personal abuse is not argument. We have been called the "cubs"; one of us has been called the "crown prince"; we have been called "reds" and "annexationists," and the leader of the opposition called us the "Saskatchewan colony."

As regards our being Reds, it is only necessary to answer that argument by saying that we own property. Did you ever see a Red who owned property? I never have. As regards our being a colony, the leader of the opposition who made the remark was pretty much in a colony himself when there were six out of the nine provinces in which he did not have a single representative. If we are a colony, we are growing in size and importance and I am glad our hon. friends recognize that. I do not object to hon. members propounding their philosophy, but I object to the manner in which they do it—crying blue ruin, and then criticizing the government about not being able to bring people into this country. I have in my hand the trade returns of every important institution in Canada; I am not going to bother reading them to the House because a great deal of it has already been put on Hansard and the hour is getting late. But I can show that bankers' associations, great financial institutions, presidents of railway companies, all tell the same story that we are around the corner and getting along splendidly.

I have come to Ottawa to resist this policy of high protection and I am going to resist it with all the ability which I possess. I believe this country can grow and prosper only if agriculture is prosperous. As regards the effect on industry in general, when we have a bad crop in western Canada, it is well known how blue and pessimistic people in the east get. The great financial institutions of eastern Canada to-day have their foundations laid right on the western prairies.

There is another fault which I have to find with hon. gentlemen opposite who propound their philosophy of high protection. High protection establishes industry on the artificial basis of legislation, rather than on the basis of natural products which enter into the manufacture of commodities. Iron, coal and proximity to markets are the chief factors in industrial development. And when you introduce the element of protection you add something that is uncertain. Any industry that cannot stand on its feet merely because the tariff has been lowered to the small extent of seven and a half per cent does not deserve to exist.

Mr. MORAND Is the hon. member in favour of removing all tariffs on goods coming into Canada?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Not necessarily.

Mr. MORAND: How about shoes and clothing?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I am not at the moment discussing shoes and clothing, but farm machinery.

Mr. MORAND: Only farm machinery?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I am discussing the raw materials that enter into the finished product of the farm. The manufacturers want their raw materials free. Now, I will ask the hon. member when he addresses the House to define the term "raw material." Just what does he understand raw material to mean? What is one man's finished product is another man's raw material, so that the binders, ploughs, wagons and even motor trucks and motor vehicles which the farmer requires are to him only raw materials.

Mr. MORAND: Do not the farmers wear shoes and clothing?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Yes, some of them at any rate.

Now, coming back to the budget, I have this observation to make in regard to the reduction in the duty on automobiles. In the daily press I read headlines to the effect that this and that factory has suspended operations and that the workmen will be turned out on the street. This virtually amounts to a threat to the parliament and the people of Canada, and if that sort of thing continues I would suggest that we reduce the duty still further. I am not a lawyer and therefore do not know whether we have any power in the matter, but in my opinion we should have an investigation into the books of these gentlemen.

Mr. LADNER: Will the hon. member explain why the subject was not referred to the tariff commission which the government proposes to have investigate this matter?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): There are things which a child can understand. We two million people in western Canada are not all fools. Nor are the people fools in eastern Canada, and we all believe that the automobile manufacturers have been enjoying altogether too much protection. They have abused the privilege.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. member suggest that he understands the situation himself?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I do. Let me say for the information of my hon. friend that I believe in a tariff board.

An hon. MEMBER: What for?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Let me finish what I am saying. I look on the tariff a good deal as a medical man would look on a patient. The patient is exceedingly ill and the doctor upon examining him finds that his heart has almost stopped. He administers just a drop of brandy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): This apparently pleases hon. gentlemen. He administers a drop of brandy; the patient revives, and thereafter the proper remedies are applied. In time the patient gets well. This was a skilled physician who knew what to do. In the same way there are times when perhaps a little protection in tariff matters may nurse an industry over a difficult period. And that is perfectly all right. But suppose to take the illustration I have just given, the physician had been unskilled and had given the patient the bottle. What would have happened? Like our manufacturers of automobiles, he would have become totally intoxicated instead of recuperating into a healthy state.

Every article smuggled into Canada is more or less a protest against the protective tariff. We are having considerable difficulty in the matter of smuggling and this could easily be stopped by putting such articles as are smuggled on the free list. The trouble is that protection interferes with trade, and there is no kind of interference that I know of that does not interfere. If you interfere here you are bound to interfere there to equalize things. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) to whom I am almost afraid to refer seeing that he has been so often misquoted and misunderstood, has said that he would build a tariff on the principle of retaliation. If other countries put up a tariff against us he would do the same.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Someone says, hear, hear. Well, the principle, in my opinion, is quite false. To build a tariff on the principle of retaliation is to maintain a policy of war. If we are to have a tariff at all we must take into consideration the natural physical conditions of the country.

I have tried this afternoon, not very well, I fear, to emphasize the importance of the great agricultural industry of this country and have endeavoured to show that it is the keystone of the arch of our national success. The first thing that must be taken into account in estimating Canada's progress is the extent of her agricultural exports. It was manifestly stupid of us to maintain a tariff against American cattle while ours were free.

Mr. ROWE: In view of the fact that Saskatchewan is keenly interested in the dairy business, does the hon. gentleman think that a little retaliation in the fixing of duties on dairy products coming from the south would be beneficial to dairymen in the west?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Not a bit. Now, let me proceed. In Saskatchewan we have been doing things in a big way economically and politically. We have been accused of dominating the government, and it is said that we have a concentrated press. I do not know what is meant by this, but we certainly have a press that fairly well reflects the political philosophy of our people. If, however, my hon. friends opposite have any particular grudge against the existing press of Saskatchewan, that grudge will soon be removed, for their party is to have a paper of its own. I have here an advertisement with this announcement: "Conservatives, attention!" Then there appears the intimation, "New Conservative Daily Newspaper for Saskatchewan." I will subscribe for this prospective paper, and keep informed on the new "brick for brick" policy. It is always dangerous to be a prophet, and I am a little surprised that the right hon. leader of the opposition has fallen into that error. In one of his speeches he said that this government "dare not" reduce the tariff, that they would not have the courage to do so. Well, we see what has happened. I repeat, this is a budget for the common people, and perhaps never since confederation have so many concessions been made at one time to the man in the street and to the man in the field—in a word, to the working classes.

I have nothing to do with ancient traditions. I do not browse among the musty volumes of constitutional and political history. Nor do I wish to go to Rome to see what the Romans did. We are living in the palpitating present, we are interested in Canada and her problems, and we cannot solve those problems by theorizing on something that happened in the dark ages. We have on the front benches of this House a group of practical men, men who have been on the land and who understand the problems of the common people. To those men I look for a solution of many of our national problems because they are practical men. I have every confidence that we will be able to carry on in a spirit of co-operation and so help to build up and develop this great country.

From the other side of the House, Mr. Speaker, we and our friends of the Progressive party have been taunted with "bargain-making," and our Progressive friends have been accused of "selling" themselves to the government. Apparently our good Tory friends cannot understand the Liberals and Progressives co-operating to carry on the affairs of the country because we fought each other in the last election. Well, I confess I was not on kissing terms with my opponent in Maple Creek, and I was perhaps instrumental in his not being returned to represent this constituency, for I think he would have defeated the Tory candidate in a straight fight. But I do know that the Progressive party are supporting the government to-day because they believe in the same policies that we believe in, and while they may not love us for opposing them in many constituencies last October, yet they think more of their principles than of any petty differences occasioned during an election. In western Canada we had a kind of political civil war, and I do not think our friends of the Conservative party should be so critical, because undoubtedly many of their candidates were elected in the three-corner fights as a result of this war.

I am not particularly interested in making Canada black. I am chiefly interested in keeping it green, in seeing the great open spaces of the west dotted with the homes of happy, contented people living on the land, rather than in large industrial centres where influence and wealth are centralized. It is said that Canada is a difficult country to govern. It is not. We have no race problem, we have not a religious problem, we have no enemy camped on our doorstep. In my opinion Canada is an easy country to govern, but it will not be if you attempt to govern it from Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton. But Canada is a difficult country to develop because of its far-flung dimensions, because of its sparse population and, to a lesser extent, because of its rigorous climate. The problems of government cannot be made any more easy by prejudice or by abuse. We were sent down here to discuss in a statesmanlike way our great national problems, and I for one am willing to sit down to that discussion without prejudice and without malice and in a spirit of tolerance and co-operation, for I am convinced that it is only in such a frame of mind that we can reach a solution of those problems that will enure to the greatness of this Dominion.

Mr. BRISTOL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MANION: I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) before the House adjourns. I see by the papers there is some talk of changes in the tariff.

[Mr. George Spence.]

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I am no more responsible to-day for newspaper talk than I was prior to October 29.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those are Tory dreams.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, April 22, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

PENSION FUND SOCIETIES—CHANGE OF NAME

On the order:

First reading of Bill No. 24 (from the Senate), to provide for changing the names of certain pension fund societies.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Who is the promoter of this bill?

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Mercier (St. Henri).

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let him explain it.

Mr. ROBB: I think we should have some explanation of this.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): The bill provides for changing the names of certain pension societies, providing that at a special general meeting, or at any general meeting, a by-law or a resolution to effect the change has been passed by a majority of at least two-thirds of the vote cast at the meeting by the contributories to the funds or members of the society, including the parent corporation, the whole subject to the approval of the Secretary of State of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is it the hon. member's name does not appear on the order paper?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I was asked to be sponsor for the bill and so informed the Clerk of the House. The omission of my name must be due to some misunderstanding.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS BOARD

Mr. FOSTER:

1. What is the total amount of appropriations and expenditures by Historic Sites and Monuments Board to 31st of December, last?

2. How much was expended in (a) Ottawa, (b) New Brunswick, and (c) Nova Scotia?

3. Who is the government representative on the board?

4. Previous to his appointment, had he been a lecturer or author of history?

5. If not, what were his qualifications for a work that demanded intimate knowledge of the history of the eastern provinces?

6. Previous to commencing the work of erecting monuments in the Maritime provinces, did he consult with any of the descendants of the loyalists or the pre-loyalists, or any authorities in history of the Maritime provinces? If so, whom?

7. Has not the Nova Scotia Historical Society, the Grand Pre Historical Institute and the New Brunswick Historical Society condemned his procedure?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. The moneys available for historic sites form part of the general appropriation for the Canadian National Parks. The total expenditure from April 1, 1919, to December 31 last was $88,407.87. This was expended by the Department of the Interior. The Historic Sites and Monuments Board acts in an advisory capacity to the Department in respect to historic sites work.

[Mr. Mercier.]

2. Expenditure at Ottawa, $25,274.62. This includes salaries, travelling expenses of members of the board, printing annual reports, pamphlets, posters, etc., books, photographs and photograph supplies, subscriptions to publications, survey expenses, express, freight, making of design and models of the standard tablets, inspection of finished tablets, road indicators and such. Expenditure in Nova Scotia, $6,212.89; expenditure in New Brunswick, $5,557.24.

3. J. B. Harkin, Commissioner, Canadian National Parks, Ottawa, appointed in 1919.

4. No.

5. Answered by No. 3.

6. He consulted with the members of the board.

7. The Grand Pre Women's Institute have raised certain objections to the cairn design of memorial. The department has no information regarding the attitude of the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick historical societies concerning the procedure of the department in marking and preserving historic sites in the Maritime provinces.

EDMONTON ELEVATOR

Mr. GARDINER:

1. How many bushels of wheat of each grade was taken into the government elevator at Edmonton for the crop year 1924-25?

2. How many bushels of each grade was shipped out of the same elevator for the same crop year?

3. What was the total amount of overage of wheat (if any) at the government elevator at Edmonton for crop year 1924-25?

4. How many tons of screenings were sold and what was the amount of cash received for same?

SIX NATIONS INDIAN RESERVE

Mr. SENN:

1. When did the Department of Indian Affairs commence to use the interest money of the Six Nations Indians to build roads through that reservation?

2. What amount of money was spent in building these roads in 1924-25, in 1925-26?

3. How many miles of road have been completed?

4. Is this work under the supervision of the Six Nations council?

5. Is the work being done by contract or by day labour?

6. Are there any white men employed in this work? If so, how many?

7. Who engages the men and teams necessary?

8. Where is the building material obtained?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. For necessary roadwork in the reserve the interest funds of the Six Nations have always been available and utilized.

2. 1924-25—$2,228.48; 1925-26—$13,164.59.

3. 4¾ miles completed; 4½ additional miles ditched and graded.

4. No.

5. Day labour.

6. One—a supervising engineer.

7. The Indian superintendent in co-operation with the Indian foremen.

8. Gravel is obtained on the reserve when readily available; but elsewhere when more economical.

ONION LAKE OFFICIALS

Mr. DAVIS:

1. Was Wm. Robinson, of Paranteau poll Athabasca fame, recommended for the position of farm instructor at the Indian reserve at Onion Lake?

2. If so, who recommended him?

3. Has one T. J. Slater been appointed as farm instructor at Onion Lake agency?

4. If so, did he occupy this position on a previous occasion?

5. Was he discharged or compelled to resign? If so, why?

6. What is his age?

7. What are his qualifications?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. William Robertson (not Robinson) was an applicant for the position of farm instructor at the Indian reserve at Onion Lake.

2. Unknown.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. Resigned voluntarily.

6. Unknown.

7. Experience as farmer and previous experience as farm instructor.

CENTRAL EXPERIMENTAL FARM—DEATHS OF ANIMALS

Mr. DAVIS:

1. How many head of cattle, horses, sheep and swine died at the Central experimental farm, Ottawa, during the year ending March 31, 1926, and what was the nature of their ailments?

2. How many of these were registered animals?

3. What was their total value?

4. Was a qualified veterinarian called in attendance in the early stages of sickness in each case and given complete control?

5. If not, who treated the animals in those cases where no qualified veterinarian was called?

6. What qualifications does this man possess to enable him to prescribe intelligently for live stock in this condition?

7. Why was no veterinarian called in certain cases?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Cattle, nine: Mature cows, three; one, abscess in kidney; one, septicemia of udder; one, autointoxication, following parturition. Calves, 6: (Only one over a week old), one, pnuemonia; one pyemic arthritis; four, malpresentation and consequent flooding before delivery; (maximum number on hand during year, 295 head).

Horses, two: (Grade geldings twelve and ten years of age),one, ruptured stomach; one azoturia; (Maximum number on hand during year, 35 head).

Sheep, forty-three: Mature animals twelve; four, lightning on range; two, heat prostration; one, acute indigestion; five, general debility due to age. Lambs, thirty-one; eighteen, born dead or died within a few hours from goitre; thirteen, died of goitre and wool balls in stomach, caused by abnormal appetite, consequent on slight goitre infection. (Maximum number on hand during year, 370).

The foregoing losses in lambs was due to an outbreak of goitre in 1925, the first in the history of the flock. This trouble has been controlled in 1926 by potassium iodide treatment, there being no lambing losses in 1926.

2. Sixteen.

3. $2,080.

4. Yes, except still-born calves and goitred lambs; (1) qualified practising veterinarians or (2) veterinary pathologists of the Health of Animals branch.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. Answered by No. 4.

7. Answered by No. 4.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT LANDS PURCHASED

Mr. WARD:

1. What lands in township 17, range 9, west of the first meridian, and in townships 17, 18 and 19, range 10, west of the first meridian, were purchased by the Soldier Settlement Board?

2. What was the price paid for the lands?

3. Who were the vendors?

4. To whom were the warrants in payment for these lands made payable?

5. How many of the settlers concerned have abandoned their holdings?

IMPORTS OF AMERICAN EGGS

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. What quantity of eggs, in the shell, was imported from the United States during the year 1925?

2. What quantity of powdered eggs was imported from the United States during the same year?

3. What quantity of eggs, commonly known as galloned, was imported from the United States during the year 1925?

4. What was the total quantity of other forms of eggs imported from the United States during the year 1925?

Hon. Mr. ROBB (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce):

Imports of eggs into Canada from the United States during the calendar year 1925.

Eggs in the shell, dozen 2,577,400, $922,059; eggs, n.o.p., pounds 54,390, $15,333.

TELEPHONE OPERATOR AT BEAVER LODGE

Mr. DAVIS:

1. Is a man by the name of "Smith" employed as operator at the Dominion government telephone office at Beaver Lodge, Alberta?

2. If so, when was he engaged, and at what salary?

3. Upon whose recommendation was he engaged?

4. Are his duties that of operator or political organizer?

5. What salary does he receive?

6. What are his personal expenses, if any, and what is the office expense, including rental?

7. To whom is the rental paid?

8. What is the yearly revenue from the said office?

9. Is the government not aware of the fact that the provincial government of the province of Alberta has an adequate telephone system all through this district?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Yes, as an operator in the government telegraph office.

2 and 3 Engaged temporarily on July 25, 1919, at Grande Prairie, Alta., at $105 per month. Appointed permanently by the Civil Service Commission on July 23, 1920. Transferred to Beaver Lodge, Alta., by the general inspector, J. S. Macdonald, Edmonton, on March 4, 1921, at $130 per month.

4. Telegraph operator.

5. $130 per month.

6. (a) No information. (b) $351.

7. R. C. Lessing.

8. $294.35 (1925-26).

9. Beaver Lodge is a telegraph office on the main telegraph circuit Hudson's Hope, Edmonton. The fact of there being a local telephone service has no bearing on the existence of this office.

AUDIT OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is it the intention of the government to secure this year an independent audit of the various departments of the government service, and also of the government's various outside commissions, similar to the independent audits secured by many of the governments of the provinces to good results, and report the results to parliament?

2. If not, why not?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1 and 2. The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act provides for a continuous independent audit by the Auditor General who, since appointment, has reorganized his department and in his reports to parliament has touched upon various aspects of his work which have been receiving attention.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

BUFFALO KILLED AT WAINWRIGHT

Mr. DAVIS:

1. How many buffalo were killed at Wainwright, or in any other park in the province of Alberta, during the years 1920-1925, inclusive?

2. How many buffalo hides were disposed of during each of these years? To whom, and at what prices were they sold?

3. How many heads were mounted and sold during each of the said years? To whom, and at what price were they sold?

4. How many heads were sold unmounted during each of the said years, and to whom and at what price?

FRUIT JOBBER BROKER COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I would ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Elliott) whether in view of the representations made by the fruit and vegetable growers and also of the conviction recently obtained in the trial in Vancouver of the Nash officials, the government propose to prevent the operation of jobber owned brokerage houses?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Labour): The matter is under consideration. The finding of the courts had reference to the criminal liability of the parties accused. The decision is being appealed and will be opposed on behalf of the government. As regards the question of suppressing the practice that has been engaged in, the government is considering the situation at present and probably I shall be able to make a statement later.

CIVIL SERVANTS AND THE WINNIPEG STRIKE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): A report has been going around for some days that the government proposes to introduce legislation to grant some special rights to those who lost positions in the civil service in the Winnipeg strike. Has the government any such proposal under consideration? Or can it make a definite statement to the House?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I will communicate with the Postmaster General and inform my right hon. friend to-morrow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is in the Senate, I believe.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. I represent him in this House.

MINISTERIAL REPRESENTATION FOR ONTARIO

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I will ask about some ministers who are not in the Senate. Are we to be kept in the dark as to how long Ontario is to be represented in this House by but one minister? When is the new Minister of Trade and Commerce so long promised, to be appointed?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am rather surprised that my right hon. friend should ask that question. The government has shown its desire to have Ontario represented, but each time it has intimated the probability of another election my hon. friend has opposed the idea.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What election?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Any by-election to have another minister returned.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did I oppose any by-election?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend issued a statement to the press the other day to that effect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The mind of the government is in such confusion that it cannot distinguish between opposition to a man when he appeals for election and opposition to the election itself. If the government cannot make that distinction its position is beyond all redemption.

DELEGATION FROM PEMBROKE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. I. D. COTNAM (North Renfrew): I want to call the attention of the government to a report that appears in the Ottawa Morning Journal of Wednesday, April 21, to the following effect:

> Pembroke Approves
> A delegation from Pembroke—

Pembroke is the county town of North Renfrew.

> —headed by Mayor Duff and Daniel Jones, president of the board of trade, waited upon Hon. James A. Robb, Minister of Finance, yesterday. The spokesmen expressed approval of the budget and urged the minister to adhere to its provisions.

I wish to take exception to that article from which it would appear that these gentlemen came in the capacity of delegates representing the council of the town of Pembroke, and the Pembroke Board of Trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a question.

Mr. COTNAM: I should like to ask the minister if those gentlemen represented themselves to him in an official capacity or as private citizens of the town of Pembroke.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the statement which my hon. friend has just read from the Journal is practically correct so far as I know.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. de WITT FOSTER (Hants-Kings): May I ask the Minister of Justice if I may expect soon to have a return to the address voted on March 29, with reference to the Electric Machinery Manufacturing Company, of Minneapolis?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I will see that my hon. friend gets his return as soon as possible. Of course, the delay has been very short.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 21, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Toronto East Centre): Mr. Speaker, in common with the rest of the House I have a distinct feeling of friendship and admiration for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) but I am afraid it does not extend to his budget proposals. I am very glad, however, he has done one thing that I recommended a year ago—reduce the income tax on small incomes. It certainly will be gratifying to every working man and woman in this country, especially those with small incomes.

But on the question of tariff, I would have thought that the experience of the last four years would have been enough for even a Liberal administration, many of whose supporters I think are at heart ardent protectionists,—I would have thought it would have been enough for their feelings after contemplating the dire results of the small reductions they have made in the tariff in the last four years, to have left the tariff entirely to the advisory board which they have recently appointed. I would have thought they would have been satisfied, after losing from the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec approximately five hundred thousand of our young men and women to the United States during the last four years, not to add more to that quota. The province of Ontario has been the chief sufferer from this exodus. Presumably still more of our people will go to the United States now to secure the benefits of high protection which they find so advantageous to themselves. But when all is said and done it is really hard to understand why, having talked so much about the necessity of a tariff commission, the government did not trust this first article of tariff reform to that commission. However, after studying the situation carefully, and knowing the right hon. gentleman who is head of the newly formed Tariff Advisory Board, for whom both sides of the House have a high personal respect and admiration, I fancy the government did not think he would have enough strength of character to treat the tariff in this instance in a way that no supporter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in his day and generation had ever thought of doing. Accordingly the government felt they had to give one great example of what should be done in this regard, and then the tariff board could proceed to mutilate the rest of the tariff as they might see fit. Should they follow this course and reduce the tariff to a maximum of 27½ per cent, which the member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) says is sufficient for anyone, there would be practically no protection to our manufacturers and others under the existing conditions in this country.

Now, the peculiar reasoning of some people is that they seem to think we can maintain a low tariff alongside the United States, where they have followed consistently a policy of high protection. For instance, they give their automobile industry a protection ranging from 25 to 50 per cent according to the tariff imposed by other countries against American automobiles. But not only do the government of the United States protect their manufacturers and others with a high tariff, they have also a board sitting at Washington which apparently works night and day. Supposing we send into the United States any commodities which the tariff board think might better be produced in their own country, the importer is invited to bring his samples to Washington or some other place where they may be examined, and if they do not happen to meet with the approval of the board's examiners, and those examiners think that the goods would be bought in the States, the importer is impeded and prevented from making deliveries and from bringing in any further supplies. This action is taken practically overnight, and in one case the tariff board increased the duty from 50 to 90 per cent.

Modern business is modern warfare. In other words, you cannot fight the United States or any other country along modern business lines unless you use their own weapons. Naturally, we would prefer to keep our people here. Obviously we cannot do so unless they can earn as good wages as are offered them in the United States. Therefore we should protect our manufacturers and working people against the importation of competing products from the United States and the countries of Europe. It is perfectly obvious that we cannot become a great and prosperous country unless we give fair and reasonable protection to the manufacturing interests of Ontario and Quebec and the other provinces, but particularly to those two great provinces, where there is an investment of nearly three billion dollars in industrial plants.

There are two classes in every community that I think are especially entitled to the fullest consideration. The first class are the farmers. We cannot possibly have a great and prosperous country unless our farmers are fairly treated, unless they have every reasonable opportunity of getting fair returns from the soil. We have the Progressive party in this House, of course, who for the most part are opposed to protection, but I do not know of any government in the provinces, Liberal or Conservative, that has not done all it possibly could for the farmers. It is well recognized to-day that our farmers produce the real wealth of the country to start with, and after them come our manufacturing industries. Nor do I know of any federal government in this country that has not tried to treat our farmers in a fair and reasonable way. Of necessity this must always be done if our country is to be successful. But we have two classes of farmers. There is the western farmer growing his No. 1 hard wheat. He is as fine a farmer as you will find anywhere in the world, and he grows the finest wheat that can be produced in any country. If he had free trade he would have practically no taxes to pay. On the other hand you have the farmer of Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes who has to rely on other products of the farm, cheese, butter, eggs, and so on, which products have to meet competition the world over. There has been a failure on the part of the present government, and I regret to say of other governments also, to give the farmers of Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes that fair and reasonable protection to which they are certainly entitled.

But this is the worst phase of the situation. Ontario and Quebec, for instance, are great producing provinces, the farmers there are prosperous, but those provinces are losing their population, their young men and women. Now, we cannot become a great nation unless we get our people to stay in the country and unless we get new population. Above all things, it seems to me the first duty of every government is to take care of the people of Ontario and Quebec; it is so to protect the industrial interests that the working people will have plenty of employment at as good wages as they could earn across the line, and the local farmers will have good customers. The next step should be to get back our boys and girls from the United States. No one can argue for a moment that the best settlers are not our own people, and we should make the country so prosperous and attractive that our people who have left will return; that those who are here will stay here and that their number will be steadily added to by a constant flow of immigrants from the Old Country. But after four years of tariff reductions, resulting disastrously to the country, the government has decided apparently to put the finishing touch on their work, and thus drive a still greater number of our young people to the United States. Not only has the government seriously affected the automobile industry by this tariff reduction, but they have scared away capital. They are not doing anything, in other words, to retain our present population, yet new settlers are being brought into this country. We cannot go on with nine million people; with that population we cannot hope to keep paying our great debts and meeting our obligations and the expenses of government. We must have new population. We hear of schemes for bringing these people from England and other countries, but where are they to go? I suppose they will go to northern Ontario and chiefly to the west. I have not heard any particular outcry from those in the west that they want new settlement; in fact one of their leaders said that if they had no more farmers they could get on very well.

But I know that the spirit of fair play and the desire to do what is right exists in the west as well as anywhere else. When I put this position before my friends from the west I would like them to consider it well, because it means so much to Ontario and Quebec, as well as to the other provinces where manufacturing is carried on. People in any country have to pay taxes, of course; I think our western friends recognize that fact, and are willing to pay a fair share. It is better to keep the boys and girls in this country, employed in factories producing in Canada the goods which should be made here out of our own raw products, rather than allow goods to come in from the United States. That simply means that our money goes to the United States, and American labour makes a profit on what we buy. If you bring new settlers into Quebec certainly you will increase the home market, but the home market is not so important to the farmers of the west as is the world market. You have the best wheat in the world, and there is no trouble in disposing of it. But when you have the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec with their many farmers, that condition does not obtain.

If you shut down all these automobile factories, what will happen? First of all we will import a great many cars from the United States, with no proper tariff protection. One-half million of our young men went to the United States in four years, and you will send another hundred thousand across the border if this course is pursued; you will frighten industry. If you want to have an agricultural country only then go ahead, because by tariff reductions that condition will be brought about. We can, of course, manufacture lumber and paper, and we have great mineral wealth, but if you keep on with this policy there will be very little else. This country has great natural resources; I do not think a low tariff could ruin Canada but it can do a great deal towards reducing our population and our prosperity. If we do not accord the farmers of Ontario and Quebec fair treatment we are going to injure them and destroy the farming interests in these two great provinces.

If we keep shutting down our factories with this sort of tinkering, and worse, the manufacturing interests of Canada will be greatly decreased and the farmers will lose their local markets. We have nearly three and a half billions of dollars invested in the manufacturing interests of Canada, and I suppose about seven billions of dollars in the farming interests, but one thing is sure: we have to treat each other fairly and reasonably, and I say to my hon. friends from the west that it is worth considering carefully whether it is not much wiser to let this automobile industry prosper as it has prospered in the past. If you want a reduction go at it cautiously, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier did, and then study the result. Such a large reduction as has been made is very detrimental to the public interest; the manufacturers are not able to tell exactly what is going to happen, and the people are uncertain also.

I have said that the farmers are entitled to every consideration, but I again say that the working men and women are entitled to even more consideration. Why? The working men and women of the country go home at the end of the week and take their wages with them; that is all they have, unless there is a small garden around the house or something of that kind. If they lose their jobs, which has already happened to some automobile workers, and which may happen to others in the next two or three weeks, although they may have saved a little money they are up against a very serious proposition. They will have to consider whether or not they should leave Canada, or what they can possibly do. The farmer, on the other hand, is in a different position. If he has a bad crop—which is a very serious thing, of course—usually he has enough produce around his home, together with chickens, cows and farm animals of various kinds, to carry him through a winter even if he does no business at all. Of course, none of our farmers are in that position to-day; they are too skilful and too wise to put all their money into any one thing, even No. 1 northern wheat, and there is no doubt that the western farmer is progressing on broad lines. His is a wonderful country, and he will succeed. But the younger generation are entitled to every consideration from all of us, and I do not see why the working men and women of Canada should not be protected in this country, as is done in the United States. That country has a population of 120,000,000 people—

Mr. HOWARD: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BRISTOL: I would rather not; I am not trying to convince the hon. gentleman. We cannot hope to manufacture as cheaply as the United States, for obvious reasons. If you are making in a factory twelve times as much of the same article as another factory is making, obviously you can reduce your overhead to practically nothing, on large production, and your cost is very low. We have a tremendous opponent in manufacturing in our next door neighbours. They have vast wealth and are very fond of Canadians; they have certainly done everything possible to annex this country in a pleasant way. We are the only people in the world they are willing to admit without question, but when it comes to the articles manufactured in this country they put up a tariff wall and appoint an investigating committee, which shuts out everything which might compete with goods manufactured in the United States, and allows in only what they really need.

This is an easy country, Mr. Speaker, to make great and prosperous. We have a splendid population; I do not think there are any better people anywhere, any men, women, boys and girls more diligent or better behaved. We have the greatest natural resources of any country in the world; it is said that at least 85 per cent of this country possesses mineral wealth. There is no doubt that we have power to an extraordinary degree, and the province of Quebec is particularly fortunate in that regard. What we must do in order to prosper is to treat each other fairly and squarely. The Maritime provinces have their troubles; they are entitled to every consideration. The western farmer has received, in my humble judgment, every consideration; he does not get protection, but his wheat is shipped down to the seaboard for seven to nine cents a bushel less than American wheat is shipped over a similar distance. That is a big protection, when we consider our national railways and the amount of money we have expended in that connection. I would like to ask our western friends to consider the point of view of our manufacturing interests. It is far better to keep our young people in this country; to have our work done in Canada and to manufacture the raw products here, than to buy American products under any conditions. It may cost a little more, but the sacrifice will be a worthy one in the interest of Canada.

So far as we in Ontario are concerned, we are hard-working people with every respect for the rest of the people of Canada, and we have every desire to see prosperity all over this great Dominion. We have the friendliest feeling towards our next door neighbours in the province of Quebec. Some of us wonder occasionally why Quebec does not annex us, and then we would surely have a wonderful prosperity. I think that instead of trying to stay in office, whatever government it may be, we should look at the affairs of this country in the purely national way, not from a political point of view, and we should do the best according to our knowledge and ability to make our country great and prosperous.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, and the indulgence of the House, I should like to make a short contribution to the debate. First of all I must congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) upon the splendid programme which he has submitted. I think it is fair to say that the budget has been received with approval everywhere except by the automobile industries of Canada, and that it is on the whole pleasing to everybody. Of course it has not found favour with the industries to which I alluded and some hon. members opposite. The elimination of the receipt tax, the return to penny postage, the endeavour on the part of this government to route Canadian commerce through Canadian ports, the saving of $25,000,000 in taxes for the coming year, the conversion of an adverse trade balance of $29,000,000 into a favourable trade balance of $402,000,000 as a result of five years' administration, and the reduction of the national debt by some $22,000,000, are all matters for congratulation to the Canadian people. The budget has undoubtedly won compliments from the press of Canada, and in some instances the newspapers are loud in their praise of it. The one feature of the budget which has not met with an equally enthusiastic reception is the cut in the tariff, particularly on automobiles.

[Mr. Bristol.]

Now, notwithstanding the fact that prior to the last general election the Conservative party preached generally throughout the country a campaign of blue ruin, and pointed to Canada as being in a deplorable condition and on the verge of bankruptcy, very little credit is being given by hon. members opposite to this government for the splendid condition existing in this country to-day. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) congratulated the Canadian people on the prosperous condition in which they found themselves, but declared that prosperity was entirely due to a beneficent Providence, a bountiful crop, and a virile Canadian people. At the same time he stated that the government of Ontario had put that province in a firm financial position by its able management. He gave credit to the government of Ontario for what it had done but declined to give any credit to the federal government for the prevailing prosperity. He asserted that Canada was only getting her due, she was only getting what was coming to her, that such advancement as the country had made should have come some two, three or four years earlier, and that there had been no improvement in the country during the last four years. The last statement is not entirely correct nor is it entirely fair. Let me point out that during the ten years the Conservatives held office in Canada, namely from 1911 to 1921, there was added to the national debt of this country the entire cost of the war, the entire cost of demobilization, and $170,000,000 besides. We all remember, looking back to the period immediately after the war, the depressed condition in which Canada found herself. At that time commerce and finance were stagnant, agriculture and industry were paralyzed. We well remember the credit of Canada had become very much impaired, and that the Canadian dollar was only worth some 80 cents. We well remember that men and women were leaving Canada in hundreds and thousands, and even in greater numbers; that in the Dominion there was no money to be found, that this country had very little to sell, and that the price of such few products as she had to offer was not worth consideration. I had the novel experience, during that period of depreciation in the spring of 1918, of buying several hundred ewes at $25 apiece and selling them in the Winnipeg stockyards in the fall of 1921 for the paltry price of $2 each. That gives a pretty fair idea of the depression which prevailed in western Canada during that period. Mention was made in this House at the time of the condition in which Canada found herself, and when the government was appealed to for remedial measures it claimed that it could offer no remedy whatever. The Hon. Mr. Calder, speaking in the House on May 19, 1919, said:

I presume that the very large emigration from this country has been very largely due to the rapid expansion of trade, and commerce and industry of the United States in every direction, which has made opportunities for our young men to enter business there, and I dare say that condition will continue.

He went on to say that on returning to his native town in Ontario he found that the young men whom he had known in his early days had all disappeared. Mr. McDonald, the former member for Timiskaming, made the following remark:

Some hon. members say that there are many idle men in Canada. We have in this country to-day the sorry spectacle of some 500,000 people who are idle and together with their dependents they number probably a million and a half out of a population of perhaps ten millions. This is a sad spectacle indeed in this glorious land of ours which we profess to be so proud of. There are 500,000 men or thereabouts idle in Canada and we have bread lines in every centre of population in the country. Why the condition of affairs is staggering and the Dominion government is asked, if my information is correct, to contribute towards the sustenance of men in Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Montreal.

The Minister of Finance of the government of that day, speaking in the House said:

We in Canada have a great task before us. The world is sadly out of tune. Trust and confidence is sadly lacking. Class interests are advanced with selfish insistence. Unemployment is with us. Faith in our fellow men is weakened. Doubt of the future is voiced, and what is the trouble? The sun still shines, the rivers still sparkle and our lands are as fruitful as ever; our resources just as great.

This will give hon. members an idea of the condition of Canada at the time of which I speak. Now modesty is an ever-becoming virtue. I do not for a moment blame the government of that day for the condition in which Canada found itself. I do not suggest for a moment that the condition then could have been helped by the government of the time or by any government. The pendulum of fate ever swings, and at that particular time the odds were against Canada. I simply desire to point out that such was the condition which prevailed in this country subsequent to 1919 and up to the time the present government assumed office. Neither do I wish to give the Liberal government entire credit for the improvement which commenced to be apparent immediately after it entered upon its duties.

Now I will submit a few figures relevant to this matter, in order to show that a gradual improvement has taken place since the year 1921. When the present government came into office on March 31, 1922, the public debt of this country stood at $2,422,000,000 in round numbers. On March 31, 1923, it was $2,453,000,000 and on March 31, 1924, it had been reduced to $2,417,000,000. On March 31, 1925, it was again $2,417,000,000, but in 1926, at the time of the present budget, we find the national debt reduced to $2,395,000,000, this being some $25,000,000 less than in 1922 and a saving of $22,000,000 from the last year, after providing an amount of $10,000,000 to the National Railways, and advancing $2,500,000 to the Home Bank creditors relief fund. It has been claimed the government has been spending more money successively from year to year. The expenditures are as follows: in 1922, $464,000,000; in 1923, $434,000,000; a lessening of $30,000,000 from the year before. In 1924 it was $370,000,000.

Mr. CLARK: Do those figures include the railway expenditure, and if so do they include the railway guarantees?

Mr. HOWDEN: I have taken these figures from the statistical department. They have been given to me under request and I am not able to answer my hon. friend's question accurately, but the figures I have given were supplied me by that department.

The expenditures in 1925 amounted to $350,000,000, and in 1926 they had been reduced to $342,000,000, but this does not include an advance of $10,000,000 to the National Railways, or $2,500,000 to the Home Bank creditors fund. I should like to point out also that in the year 1920-21 the public debt was increased by $92,000,000. In 1921-22 there was again an increase of $81,000,000, and in 1922-23 another increase of $30,000,000. For the year 1923-24 there was a decrease of $35,000,000. At this time a cut of $26,000,000 was made in the general taxation. Notwithstanding this fact there was still a surplus of $5,000,000, or a decrease of $31,000,000 in all, from the preceding year. We all know that in 1926 there has been another decrease of $22,000,000.

With regard to the charges of extravagance that were made by hon. gentlemen opposite, since the present government came into power the services of some 5,000 people have been dispensed with and this has caused a yearly saving of $5,000,000. I might point to the balance of trade also, and just briefly mention the fact that in 1921 we had an adverse balance of trade of $29,000,000, and that the condition has improved since, so that in the present year we have a favourable balance of trade of $402,695,000. Now in the face of these figures, no one can consistently or honestly claim that there has been no improvement in Canada in the last four years. The hon. member for South Wellington, in making the statement that this government had been an extravagant one, said, at page 2459:

> I do say, however, that there are millions of dollars of suggested expenditures which might very well be deferred for some years to come without any inconvenience and with no ill effects on the Dominion.

Now, Sir, coming from Manitoba, this statement appears to have reference to the Hudson Bay railway. Without pausing to discuss that project at this time, I would like to say that the people of western Canada were looking for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway even before they were looking for the completion of the Canadian Pacific. Since the later seventies we have had the building of the Hudson Bay railway in mind. In the early eighties an appropriation was set aside for the building of the road. There has been some $50,000,000 worth of land sold and some $30,000,000 collected, but up to the present time only some $20,000,000 has been spent and we of western Canada feel that the balance of these moneys should be used for the completion of that railway. With regard to the feasibility of the grain route via Hudson bay, which has been seriously questioned, I might say there have in the last hundred years come into Hudson bay some 675 ships with the loss of only two. It it not a very large number, but it is about six ships a year, and the percentage of loss has been very small. Assuming the grain route to the Old Country via the Hudson bay never became useful, the Hudson Bay railway will find plenty of other commerce and industry to keep the route alive. I have been down the Nelson river some two hundred miles. There is a great deal of water-power all the way. I should imagine the country would be able to develop sufficient water-power to pay for the upkeep of the line. Not only is this the fact, but the whole country is saturated with minerals; there is no doubt about that at all, and there is no way of getting these minerals out at the present time. There are large areas of pulpwood too in that country, and that is a matter worthy of consideration. The bay itself contains a wealth of fish life, producing the best salt water fish in the world. Even supposing which I do not admit by any means, that the grain route to the Old Country would be impracticable, there is no reason why the Hudson Bay route should not become a paying proposition.

The main criticism of the hon. member from South Wellington, is with regard to the proposed reductions in the tariff. The hon. gentleman pointed to the fact that Ontario contains about one-third of the total population of the Dominion, and he stated that Ontario paid over one-half of the treasury receipts of the Dominion, that Ontario was the home of the automobile industry in Canada, that there were, in one way and another, engaged in that industry, some 20,000 men, and that they with their families made up possibly 100,000 souls. He pointed out that the proposed reduction in the tariff on automobiles would probably greatly hamper the industry and possibly throw these men out of work. Now the statement of the hon. member is probably correct, so far as Ontario is concerned, but I am by no means convinced that the proposed reduction in the tariff on automobiles is going to ruin the industry in Ontario and put these people out of employment. In support of that statement, I should like to read some of the remarks that were made by hon. members in the House to the effect that of the excess price paid by Canadians for cars, over the price paid on the same cars in the United States, less than half is paid for salaries and wages. The excess price of cars in Canada over cars in the United States is 40 per cent, more than one-third, and is it reasonable to suppose that the material going into the manufacture of these cars would cost the other two-thirds? I think not and for that reason I am disposed to believe that automobile dealers in this country reap fairly handsome profits from the manufacture and distribution of automobiles.

I should like also to put before the House some other statements that have been made by other hon. members. In ten different makes of cars manufactured both in Canada and in the United States, the Canadian price is from thirty-eight to forty-one per cent and in some cases nearly as much as fifty per cent higher than the United States price. Canadian made cars sell for a considerably lower price on the foreign market than they do in Canada. Cars of United States make assembled in Canada obtain a considerable drawback when exported and enjoy as well, under the British preference, a tariff of eleven per cent on the British market, but these manufacturers take advantage of all the tariff of thirty-five per cent will bear as regards the Canadian purchaser. Twenty million dollars in excess of United States prices on the same cars was paid by Canadian people to Canadian car-makers or assemblers in 1924. A Canadian firm which is well known to all, with an original capital of $125,000 paid average yearly dividends of $642,000, that is to say over 500 per cent for a period of twenty years, and at the end of that period the total investment together with the total dividends amounted to $43,978,000 or a profit in twenty years of $43,853,000 on an investment of $125,000; that is to say an average yearly growth of over 1,800 per cent.

Mr. GOTT: Where do those figures come from?

Mr. HOWDEN: Those figures were obtained by an hon. member of this House by direct interrogation of the managers of this particular automobile concern. Other firms are probably not quite so graciously favoured, but if an honest statement were made of their business as in the above case, it would doubless show that they too were making a very substantial return on their investment. Under the circumstances it does not seem to me that the automobile makers of this country are going to suffer very greatly by a reduction of fifteen per cent in the tariff on cheap cars.

The criticism, however, by hon. members opposite did not stop at the question of the tariff on automobiles; the tariff in general was mentioned. Since I have been interested in the political life of Canada I have heard continually of the necessity of raising the tariff on imported articles. That apparently is to be the cure-all for our ills in this country; but notwithstanding this fact, although the Conservatives were in power for ten years prior to the present government taking office, no effort was made by them to raise the tariff.

Comparisons are often made by our hon. friends opposite between Canada and the United States. The prosperity of the United States is pointed to by them and the fact that they have a high tariff is credited for being the reason for their prosperity. In Canada, although we are not quite so well off, we are rapidly regaining prosperity, and I believe the time is not very far distant when we shall have very little to complain of in that regard. Conditions in the two countries are very different. As was stated in this House last night, the United States entered the war some three years after the commencement of that great struggle and during those three years they were not only the storehouse but the merchant who supplied all the munitions of war and who lent the money. At the end of the war the United States of America found itself very rich as a result of that tremendous conflict. In Canada, on the other hand, we find a very different state of affairs. Canada was bled white of money, men and everything else; she was floundering under a stupendous load of debt for which no one can be blamed, and there was no sale for such products as she had for sale in those days for a simple reason. There had been over-production during the war and the world was practically overstocked with the necessaries of life, manufacturing and agricultural, so that there was no price forthcoming for what she had to sell.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the per capita difference in debt between Canada and the United States?

Mr. HOWDEN: I cannot say.

Mr. McGIBBON: Practically the same.

Mr. HOWDEN: I think hon. members will admit that conditions in the two countries were very different at the end of the Great war. There can be no question that the United States made a great deal of money as a result of the war and that Canada became practically bankrupt.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is not what hon. members opposite generally say.

Mr. HOWDEN: Yes, that is what I say. I am saying now that we are recovering and that is a very good thing. There is no question that we were in a very deplorable condition in this country at the end of the war. Apropos of this matter of the Canadian tariff I might point out that nearly fifty per cent of articles manufactured in Canada are exported and our manufactured exports have to compete in general with those of the United States, England and Germany on the world market. They receive no protection there and it is not probable that our manufacturers would export this material if they were going to lose money on it. How does this figure out? Our manufacturers take a chance on making what they can in the foreign market and they look to the people of Canada to protect them against any possibility of failure. That is to say, the tariff in this country is purely and simply a subsidy paid to Canadian manufacturers by the Canadian people through the medium of the Canadian parliament. Is this a very patriotic attitude? Does it seem to appeal to hon. members in this House or to the people throughout the country, that Canadian manufacturers should charge their own brothers greater prices for the commodities of life which they manufacture than they charge to the people to whom they sell abroad?

It is claimed by some hon. members that agriculture requires protection in the same manner as manufacturing industries. I am just wondering how you can protect the products of the western farmer. Is there any means by which you can put an export tax on our wheat or cattle and force the foreign buyers to pay us that extra money? Is it likely that if such an export tax were placed on raw materials we could get people to buy them from Canada? I do not think so. As a matter of fact we have to sell on the markets of the world whatever we produce and there we must take whatever price we can get, I do not see any good reason why the manufacturers should not do the same. The western agriculturist as an agriculturist has nothing whatever to gain from a tariff; it cannot help him in the least. We do not wish to take any selfish stand and we are willing, indeed we are anxious, to see Canada as a whole prosper. To this end we are ready to make some sacrifice, but we do insist that this sacrifice be reasonable.

There is some possible question about the necessity for protection in respect of such things as fruit and early vegetables. As I have stated in this House before, early fruit and green leaf vegetables from abroad come into Canada before the products of this country are ready to be placed on the market, and the fact cannot be emphasized too strongly that these commodities are of extreme importance to the Canadian people. I want to read some remarks made by Doctor Hastings, the medical health officer of Toronto, at a recent medical convention. Doctor Hastings emphatically denounced any move which would add to the price of fresh vegetables in Canada in winter. He said:

> I am absolutely opposed to it. My attitude is shown by the fact that I have been agitating for a complete removal of all duties from all citrus fruits. We should get our oranges, grapefruit and lemons duty free so that the price can be brought as near the poor man's ability to pay as possible. The leaf vegetables are of the greatest importance. Lettuce, spinach and cabbage would all come in duty free if I had my way in the matter.

At the same convention Miss Frances McNally director of the dietetics department of the Macdonald College, Guelph, had this to say:

> Why, to shut the door upon or cut down the supply of leaf vegetables in Canada in winter would be little short of tragedy. Millions of dollars have been spent in educating the public to this value in dietary. To raise the price would be to throw away the results of years of educational work along this line.

We medical men all know that one of the greatest safeguards we have against the great white plague as also against a great many other constitutional derangements is suitable diet, and there is no suitable diet for constitutional diseases which does not include green leaf vegetables and fresh fruit. I am inclined to believe, with Doctor Hastings of Toronto, that when fruit and early vegetables are available for Canada before the Canadian products are ready, even if these commodities come from the United States or from other places, they should be admitted free of duty. When we in Canada have our products ready for the market, then you can shut the other fellows out altogether so far as I am concerned; but I certainly think that until then the early fruit and vegetables should be allowed to come in free. This would redound to the benefit not only of the consumer but of the grower of fruit and green leaf vegetables in Canada as well.

I was interested to hear one hon. member from British Columbia state that he had seen wagonloads of apples taken to the dealers in towns throughout the fruit producing districts of that province, only to have them rejected, entailing the necessity of taking them back home, because there was no sale in view of cheaper American fruit being on the market. This is to me an astounding statement, especially when we know that to-day we have to pay five cents apiece for apples in any store in Ontario. When I was a little fellow in Winnipeg some forty years ago apples were at a premium; we thought when we were getting this fruit that we were getting a gold mine. But even at that time, as I remember, we could buy two or three apples for five cents as against one to-day. If therefore the fruit producers in this country are having to return home with wagonloads of apples because of the duty the condition of affairs is indeed strange.

I do not think it is necessary to refer to butter and eggs. A good deal has been said about butter in connection with the Australian treaty, which, it is said, is injurious to the trade in Canada. I am safe in saying, I believe, that there is not much butter manufactured in Canada in winter, the vast bulk of our product being made when the cows are in full milk in summer. The milk and cream offered for sale in Canada in the winter months goes directly to the dining tables of the land as such. The fact is that our butter is being made in summer when cream is plentiful and being stored by the creameries and the cold storage plants, if anyone suffers through the admission of Australian butter it cannot be the primary producer; it must be the operators of the cold storage plants and possibly the creameries. Pretty much the same thing holds in regard to eggs, for we know that the bulk of our eggs is produced in Canada between the first of March and the end of June. As a general rule the hens begin to moult in July, and they do not then lay for some six weeks or two months. There are therefore few eggs laid in the fall, and those few never leave the farm. The Canadian market is supplied with the production that takes place between the first of March and the last of June, and the cold storage houses also put away large quantities of this commodity during this period. I heard the statement made in this House recently that only one egg in ten used in Canada was of domestic production. This impelled me to secure certain statistics from the bureau, and after figuring the matter up I find that very much the opposite is the case: sixty Canadian eggs are used in this country for every one that is imported. The surplus Canadian eggs are held by the cold storage plants until the months of September, October and November, when they are put upon the market, those months being the season of the year in which eggs are scarce. We have very few eggs produced in Canada during fall and winter months, except those that come from the poultry farms and which are sold as newlaid eggs at prices beyond the reach of ordinary incomes. We have to depend upon the eggs that come in from the southern states. These are practically fresh eggs, and to shut them out by a high tariff would be to do an injury to the rank and file of the Canadian people.

In common with a great many others, I believe that we Canadians should bend our energies to the development of our basic industries, and encourage the manufacture only of such materials as are obviously Canadian in origin. What are our basic industries? There are many, but obviously agriculture is the leading one, and the chief feature of agriculture is the production of wheat and grain. There can be no question about it that agriculture is our chiefest basic industry, although we have others such as lumbering, mining and fishing. But since the wealth of any land must come from the soil it is clear that agriculture is and must be the most important basic activity of any people. There can be no question that agriculture is the most important basic industry of this country. Can we develop any industries in connection with agriculture? Well, we have some. Of course, we can mill our grain and make flour. There is a contention in the west that the flour ought to be milled where the wheat is grown. There are difficulties, however, in the way of this which make it almost impossible. In the first place it is stated there is no market for our flour abroad. This is hardly correct, for we sell quite a large amount of our best Canadian flour on foreign markets. But it is pointed out with a great deal of truth that England is a workshop, that they do not want our flour but want our grain, which they themselves will make into flour and distribute. That is only the half of the story. They not only want our wheat to mill, but they want it to mix with the wheat from the other great wheat-growing countries of the world, and thereby make a better grade of flour. So it looks as if we would have to be content with manufacturing flour for our own consumption. It is also pointed out that it is much cheaper to export whole wheat than flour and its by-products.

With respect to our mining industry, I heard it stated recently that Canada contains the only commercial nickel in the world, that Canada and South Africa have the only commercial deposits of asbestos in the world, and that in Canada are to be found deposits of lead and zinc superior to those in any other country. Unfortunately I am not sufficiently familiar with this industry to speak freely, but it seems to me reasonable enough to take the position that if the world is dependent on Canada for nickel, asbestos, lead and zinc it ought to come to Canada and get those products in their highest stage of manufacture. I do believe that a scheme ought to be worked out whereby our mines should be protected and the whole benefit of our mineral deposits accrue to the Canadian people.

As to our fishing industry, our export trade is considerable. We have a vast supply of fish in our rivers, in the inland lakes and in our seaboard waters, and this is an important form of our natural wealth.

With regard to our timber, I think that also ought to be very generally processed in this country before it is allowed to be exported.

There are other manufacturing industries which do not rely on any of our natural products. For instance, I understand that all the materials for the silk manufactured in this country have to be imported from Europe. I do not very well see how an industry of this kind can be expected to compete with the long-established and highly specialized silk industry of the Old Country.

The same remarks apply to the manufacture of paint. Not very long ago I visited a paint works in the city of Winnipeg and listened to a very instructive lecture by the superintendent in regard to the manufacture of paint, in the course of which he pointed out that they brought their materials from all over the world. Just how they can hope to compete with districts where the raw materials are very much more easily secured is not obvious to me.

I might point out to the House we have not very many industries in the prairie provinces. I think it would be rather a good scheme for our protectionist friends to try to infiltrate those provinces with a few industries. I have always wondered why there are so few industries established throughout the west. I have heard it suggested the probable reason is that we cannot get them financed. I think every hon. member will agree that the money-power of this Dominion is pretty well centered in eastern Canada around Toronto and Montreal. When a man in the west desires to go into an industry his bank manager says, "Very well, but I think you had better run down east and see the president of the bank." When the man gets there the president says, "What is the idea of manufacturing up in that wilderness? Why not bring your industry down here? Of course, we will finance you all right, but it will be very much easier to finance you here." The consequence is that pretty nearly all our industries are centered in eastern Canada. I am not at all sanguine of their success, but I would suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that if they want to change the minds of western Canadians on tariff matters they had better establish a few industries out there; then they may be able to make some of our people protectionists.

With regard to the amendment that has been offered by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), it gives no definite intimation as to the attitude of our friends opposite in relation to what they would like the government to do in the matter. A few days ago the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) stated that he was not in favour of taking the tariff out of the hands of parliament, and he read extracts in support of his view. He said that by all means the proper authority to deal with tariff questions was the parliament of the land. We on this side are wondering why hon. members opposite did not intimate what line they thought should be taken with regard to the budget alterations, or if any alterations at all should be allowed to take place. I am inclined to wonder if a good many hon. members on the other side are not actually in favour of a reduction in the tariff on automobiles, and if it is not a little bit difficult for them to come to a conclusion amongst themselves as to just what they actually want. If they had definitely intimated just what they would like done, we would be very much further ahead. As it is, they merely point out that they wish the whole tariff referred to the Tariff Advisory Board. This would hold up the budget for an indefinite period.

[Mr. Howden.]

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend will permit me, I can tell him in a second what we suggest. We suggest that before any tariff changes are made there should be an investigation by the tariff board appointed by this government.

Mr. CLARK:; In accordance with the government's pledge.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOWDEN: That does not change the situation at all. We are still quite at a loss to go ahead and meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen opposite.

I will only delay the House a few moments, to mention the Canadian National Railways. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) gave the entire credit for the Canadian National Railways to the right hon. leader of the opposition, which reminded me of a story my mother used to tell some years ago about an old Irishman who was never a great success in life himself but whose boys grew up and prospered. The old man used to take the credit for the successful career of the boys, and would interrogate the members of his family in this way, "Aren't yez proud of yer owld father, that can have such foine sons?" I was thinking that the right hon. leader of the opposition was being placed in precisely the same position.

With regard to the Canadian National Railways I would say, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's." Far be it from me to detract from any credit due to the right hon. leader of the opposition, for whom personally I have a very high regard. In the matter of the Canadian National Railways, not being very familiar with the facts, I am willing to admit that the scheme was perhaps conceived by hon. members opposite, led by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and a great deal of the programme put in action by them. It must be admitted, however, that at the time this government took office the Canadian National Railways was a white elephant. It was like the ugly duckling; no one wanted to father it at the time. Now that the system has been put on a paying basis through the efforts of this government in the appointment of Sir Henry Thornton and in other ways, we believe that a great deal of credit for this very excellent public utility should be given to this government.

In this connection I might quote some figures with which a good many hon. members are familiar, but I will just pause long enough to say that in the year 1921 the operation of the railway alone showed a deficit of $11,000,- 000. This deficit has disappeared and the position has been gradually improved, so that this year we have a surplus of $32,000,000 in the operation of that road.

I believe I have exhausted my material. I am not a very rank politician, and I believe that after all there is not such a tremendous difference between members of this House. I believe we are all perfectly honest, and that we are expressing our views, our sentiments, our beliefs and our convictions as we feel them. I think we are all working for the betterment of Canada and that Canada in no very distant future will be perhaps the favoured land of the world. We are still in the morning of our day; with our cousins to the south it is high noon, and in the 5 p.m. Old Country the day is perhaps well spent. But, Sir, I have enough faith in this country and in the Canadian people to believe that in the very near future we will build a great nation here; we will be the finest dominion on the face of the earth, and I trust that I shall not be damned for my temerity in so thinking.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Howden) will not expect me to review his address in detail. I may say that I enjoyed his remarks very much, but I fear we do not agree in many matters of policy affecting this Dominion. There are one or two observations I would like to make in connection with his remarks. I would draw his attention to the fact that if there was a bread line of 500,000 people in Canada when this government came into office, those people have not since found employment through any efforts of this government; they are now in the United States, enjoying employment there.

Mr. hon. friend quoted the expenditures of this government since it assumed office, in an effort to show that there had been some economy effected. I do not dispute the figures which my hon. friend quoted; they included the railway expenditures, but my hon. friend was not here when this government covered up the actual railway expenditures by guaranteed bond issues, which are not shown in the expenditures referred to. The only way my hon. friend can arrive at any idea of the expenditures of this government is by referring to the public accounts. I have the public accounts for 1925 under my hand, and I would draw attention to the fact that in only one year since this government assumed office was there any material reduction in the ordinary and capital expenditures, exclusive of railway expenditure. That was in the year 1923, when there was a reduction of $15,000,000, largely due to a reduction in war expenditures. There was a reduction in 1924 of $6,000,000 only; a reduction in 1925 of $4,000,000 only, and I draw attention to the fact that, according to the statement made by the Minister of Finance in this House on April 15, the 1926 expenditures show a very large increase over those of 1925. The expenditures shown for 1926 are $342,890,000, whereas the expenditures for the year previous were $339,902,775.94, a very substantial increase.

I would further call attention to the fact that while the estimates for 1926-27, as the minister pointed out, only show a drop of about $4,000,000, the minister admitted that these estimates do not include the supplementary estimates, which will ordinarily run from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000. These estimates do not include about $12,000,000 for old age pensions; they do not include the sum required to take care of the revaluation of soldier lands, nor do they include, unless I am mistaken, anything for the Empire land settlement scheme. Neither do they make provision for rural credits, which may require many more millions of dollars. Thus a very conservative estimate of the expenditures for the forthcoming year would be $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 in excess of the expenditures of the previous year.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Will any money be required for the old age pensions scheme, and most of the other schemes my hon. friend mentioned, this year, if they pass the House?

Mr. CLARK: In connection with the old age pension scheme it depends entirely whether the provinces accept the suggestions of the government. As to the other matters spoken of, it depends entirely on whether this House passes the measures. That remains to be seen.

I hope that my hon. friends from the Eastern Townships in the province of Quebec noted the last speaker's remark that he favours the complete removal of any customs duties upon green vegetables. I wonder if my hon. friends from the Eastern Townships also favour the removal of the duties on these products.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I correct the hon. gentleman? I stated I would be in favour of the entire removal of the duties on green vegetables and fruit up to the time the Canadian produce was ready.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: So that when the taste for strawberries has been satisfied our own strawberry growers will have the market. Is that my hon. friend's idea?

Mr. HOWDEN: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Would he want to throw obstacles in the way of the Canadian people getting the necessities of health—not of life but of health—by keeping out all these products in order to preserve the Canadian market?

Mr. CLARK: I tell my hon. friend that we produce plenty of vegetables good enough for the health of the people without the free importation of American products.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And at reasonable prices.

Mr. CLARK: Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want this interchange to develop into a debate between myself and the last speaker because there are several very vital matters I would like to touch upon.

I think the House will agree with me when I say that the two outstanding features of this budget are the so-called income tax reduction, and the reduction in the duties on automobiles. I propose to refer briefly to the income tax reduction. Undoubtedly there is a reduction on small incomes earned by salaried people who do not receive dividends from corporations. That is obvious. I was very much interested the other day when the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) spoke on this subject and joined in the general jubilation over the fact that the income tax had been drastically cut on incomes which equal the indemnity of a member of parliament. That was very interesting, particularly after the hon. member's speech in the early part of the session on the Address when he said emphatically that the government should go slow in the matter of any income tax reduction. Now, according to the Minister of Finance these reductions are very substantial. But no word of protest came from my hon. friend that the tax has been removed from that portion of the people who can pay, nor did I hear him raise his voice for the vast body of the common people, for whom he is so fond of talking, and protest against the fact that the sales tax in Canada raised by this government and resulting in an average annual increase since it assumed office of twenty-two and a half million dollars in taxation, is continued. That tax is paid by the common people, and that is the tax which will continue to be extracted from their pockets. I wonder what the common people of this country will say when they hear of that? I wonder what they will say when it really sinks into their minds what these reductions mean to them? Are the common people those who receive salaries of $3,000 and upward, or are they the people who are in receipt of salaries under that amount? If I am not mistaken the great bulk of the Canadian people receive salaries under $3,000, yet no relief is given to them. They are told that this extra twenty-two and a half million dollars of taxation imposed by this government will continue to be extracted hereafter. There you have the budget for the common people whose interests hon. gentlemen to my left so often profess to defend in this House. I wonder if the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) will approve of this cut in taxation in the interest of those who can pay, and will stand up and vote for the continuance of taxation on the common people, for the extraction of increased taxation to the amount of twenty-two and a half million dollars annually, imposed by this government and continued under this budget?

As to the question of the income tax reductions, may I say this? It is a matter of great surprise to me that the imposition of this income tax has never been legally contested by the corporations of Canada, because I know that although the reduction in income tax under the budget is held as a great thing for the people of the Dominion, yet out of collections amounting to $56,000,000 nearly $32,000,000 is paid by the corporations and an additional $14,000,000 is paid by the manufacturers, making $46,000,000 in all paid by the manufacturers and the corporations of Canada combined. To what extent are these two classes relieved by this budget? The income tax paid by the corporations is reduced, I think from 10½ per cent to nine per cent. That will not account for a reduction in excess of $3,000,000 unless, due to the acts of this government a number of these corporations go out of business this year, and I am inclined to expect that. But if business continues as it has continued during the past year these corporations may pay $3,000,000 less than they paid last year. On the other hand the manufacturers who are paying $14,000,000 will now pay in excess of that amount because they are taxed this year on their dividends, whereas last year their dividends were relieved from the normal tax although they paid the surtax. This year the particular class that pays the $14,000,000 will pay, I venture to say, in excess of what they paid last year. And when the Minister of Finance predicts that this is a reduction in the income tax I question it very much. There is a reduction, as I said before, of income tax in the case of such people as earn an amount equal to the indemnity of a member of parliament, but not in the case of the class that actually pays the great portion of the income tax in Canada.

I repeat, the two classes that pay are the corporations and the manufacturers. All but about $10,000,000 of the total income tax is paid by these two classes. I mentioned that I was surprised that the imposition of this tax had never been tested by any corporation. Note the ingenious manner in which the Minister of Finance referred to this feature in his speech the other day. He stated that the special war revenue taxes received during the fiscal year 1925-26 amounted to $154,580,000, and added:

> The total expenditures directly attributable to the war—and I desire to especially direct this to the attention of the House—will amount to some $163,997,000, or $9,417,000 more than the receipts from our special war revenues.

Now the minister knows better than I do that that statement is not in accord with the facts and not in accord with the public accounts of Canada. Some time ago I received a statement, in answer to a question, which showed an increase of $121,896,099 in the interest on the public debt since 1914, and the Minister of Finance attributes that whole increase to expenditures due to the war. Now that amount is nearly double the amount of interest on the public debt due to the war, as I see it. The Minister of Finance asks this House and the country to believe that practically the total national debt to-day is directly attributable to the war and that the debt has not been increased by cash advances of nearly $600,000,000 to the railways, for instance. The public accounts of Canada for 1925 show that the total cost not only of the war but of demobilization was $1,694,365,809.60. If that whole amount is charged up to or added to the national debt, it does not account for more than sixty per cent of the total interest which the Minister of Finance attributes to the increase on the debt due to the war. I wonder if the minister makes that statement in order that he may be on safe ground, in case the legality of the direct income tax for purposes other than the war is tested? Because I say emphatically that the special war taxes now collected by this country exceed by many millions the sum required to take care of war expenditure, and in so far as income tax is applied to purposes other than special war purposes it is ultra vires of the parliament of Canada, parliament having no power to impose direct taxation for anything other than war purposes.

I should like to give a concrete illustration of the effect of the present income tax proposals on a business that makes net profits of $55,000. That might be considered a comparatively small corporation. At nine per cent that corporation will pay a tax of practically $5,000, leaving for distribution about $50,000. Assuming there were ten equal shareholders in that company, each would receive in dividends $5,000. A year ago these shareholders would not have paid income tax on those dividends. I am not sure whether I am absolutely correct in that; I know I am correct up to $4,000. In any case none of it was subject to the normal tax of four per cent, and I do not think the surtax would come into operation on an income of $5,000. This year, on the other hand, those ten men, each one of whom would have paid $495 by way of income tax into the revenues of this country through the Corporation tax, will pay an additional sum greater than the member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) who is so jubilant because his income tax is being reduced, will pay on his $4,000 indemnity. That will be accentuated in the case where a shareholder of a corporation receives very large dividends. The Minister of Finance stated it was his desire that such moneys might find their way back into industry, but as a matter of fact there will be less available to go back into the industry this year than there was last year.

I turn now, Mr. Speaker, to the reduction of the tariff on automobiles. The only reason given therefor by the Minister of Finance or by his government, was that there was a pronounced sentiment in Canada that the automobile industry was receiving too much protection. Well, since when have governments brought down sentimental legislation? Why was some reference not made to the pre-election pledges of the Prime Minister in this connection? Why was no reference made to the solemn pledges that appeared in the Speech from the Throne? I think it might be well to refer to two or three utterances of the Prime Minister during the campaign, as to how he felt when he appealed to the voters of Canada for their support. I refer to a speech made at Kingston, reported in the London Advertiser of October 20, in which the Prime Minister is quoted as saying:

> "We realize that our industries here have to have safeguarding with respect to competition from other parts of the world, competition from the country to the south, competition from conditions as they are in Europe, and we think that is all the more reason why in these days of depreciated currencies and the like we should have the benefit of expert advice and information on all these great questions of the tariff.

This city of Kingston need have no fear from Liberal administration as to the well-being of its industries. The industries would be taken care of. The government had no desire to injure established industries, quite the contrary."

Speaking at Fort William on October 12th, the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

"We don't want to work injury to any industry." he urged, "we want to help, as far as possible, all industries. We hope to make such readjustments of the tariff as will develop the industrial life of our country from one end of the country to the other."

He referred to a Fort William starch factory. He had, he said, been asked if it would not be possible to give home industries more protection and get the industry started again.

"How in such a case," asked the Prime Minister, "would the tariff board proceed? We would," Mr. King continued, "expect the member of the division to go before the board and present the case of that industry. We would expect a deputation of persons interested; then we would expect the tariff board to make a careful study of the whole subject and say whether some readjustment of the tariff could not be made here and there.

If we were advised that a readjustment could be made of the tariff schedule that would serve to put the great industry on its feet again without undue injury to consumers the government would certainly be inclined to accept in a sympathetic way any suggestion of that sort. In revising the tariff there would be no intention of protecting special interest."

If inquiries of the board, however, might show that in some cases the tariff would have to be lowered, in some cases there might have to be readjustments here and there upwards. The aim would be to have a tariff suited to the needs of the country and to needs of the people.

I have many other utterances of the Prime Minister along similar lines, but these suffice to show that he gave his word to industry in this country that no industry would be affected by any adjustment of the tariff without a proper investigation by the tariff board. I would like to ask the Prime Minister why he has broken his word to the Canadian people? I would like to ask the government why they have broken their solemn pledges, given in the Speech from the Throne, that all industries would be investigated by the tariff board before any revision upwards or downwards took place. Apparently they are dumb. Attempts have been made to bolster up the position of the government by some of my friends to the left and some of my friends from Saskatchewan. The government could find no reason except that of sentiment. Their friends have been floundering around trying to find some reasons, all of which are just as ridiculous as the reason advanced by the government that they were doing this for sentimental reasons.

The hon. member for Brandon, in his efforts for the benefit of the common people, wants to get cheaper cars for them. I do not think the common people in this country are as much interested in getting cheap cars as they are in being relieved of the burden of taxation imposed by this government and also in finding employment and in retaining the employment which they now have.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) said: "The profits in this industry are too great." Is that not one reason why the tariff board was established, so that these questions might be referred to them for investigation in order that they might ascertain the profits and determine whether or not they were too great?

He made another suggestion, namely, that it would be more patriotic on the part of the Canadian people to buy United States cars and to pay the duty than to buy Canadian cars made by our own Canadian workmen. He supports that argument by certain figures. He states that if in 1924 we had imported all our cars, the Canadian government would have received $20,000,000 by way of customs revenue, whereas, he says, as a matter of fact they received only in the neighbourhood of $1,581,882. I will do my hon. friend this justice; I do not dispute these figures because I have not investigated them. But I have the corresponding figures for 1926 from the Customs department, and they show that if all cars sold in Canada last year had been imported the customs duty would have been about $17,000,000. They show that the net customs duties paid by automobile manufacturers, after drawbacks are deducted, are about $4,500,000. The automobile manufacturers themselves say that they paid net duties, after allowing for all drawbacks, amounting to $7,418,513. I take their statement without hesitation because I know they import many articles which are not classified as automobile parts. In addition to that about two hundred "parts" men have stated that they pay in duties $1,168,411, making a sum of $8,586,925 net payment to the Canadian customs for the year 1926. There is a considerable difference between $17,000,000 and $8,586,925, but the House should bear in mind that this industry paid also $2,000,000 in income taxes. A considerable sum paid by "parts" manufacturers is not reported and there is a certain amount of income tax paid by 22,000 men employed in this industry.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has just made a statement as to how much the industry paid in income taxes. Under the Income Tax Act no person is allowed to give out such information. Where did he get it?

Mr. CLARK: I do not think I am bound to answer my hon. friend. I have a statement from the Department of Finance showing, as I stated before, that corporations in Canada paid $32,000,000 of the $56,000,000 in income tax and that manufacturers paid an additional $14,000,000, making a total of about $46,000,000 paid by corporations and manufacturers. It is pretty safe to assume that the automobile industry paid $2,000,000. I took those figures from public statements made by the automobile industry.

Mr. ROBB: That is all right.

Mr. CLARK: I rely on them and I do not think my hon. friend will dispute them. I hope the Minister of Finance will not dispute the fact that these 22,000 employees in the automobile industry and subsidiary industries pay some income tax and that they also contribute a part of the enormous sales tax that is being collected in this country. The burden of the sales tax bears on those employees and they are subscribing very largely to it. I do not think the Minister of Finance will dispute the fact that their hundred thousand dependents pay a considerable amount into the Customs department of the $120,000,000 odd collected by that department, nor will he dispute the fact that they pay some stamp taxes. Let me say just here that this stamp tax has grown since this government came into office from, approximately $2,000,000 to about $9,000,000.

Mr. HOWARD: Prosperity.

Mr. CLARK: No, increased taxation. When this government came into office a two cent stamp had to be put on a cheque. Now it is more likely to be a dollar. Last year in my own very small office in Vancouver, I cannot give the exact figure, but I know the stamp taxes were much in excess of $250, so that my hon. friend can see how heavily this tax bears on the people of Canada. The Minister of Finance may well take off some of the income tax when he increases the stamp tax to $9,000,000, a tax that does not bear fairly on the Canadian people. It is the people who are paying out money or borrowing money for their needs who are taxed for that privilege.

Now, referring again to other contributions made to the revenue of the country by these individuals, I venture to say that their payments to the provincial and municipal governments are almost as great as to the federal revenue, and possibly greater. So that when hon. gentlemen have the hardihood to suggest that it is more patriotic to buy American cars than to maintain the Canadian industry by keeping on the duties, I say that any simpleton can sit down and figure out for himself just what this industry means to the treasury of the Dominion. The automobile industry and its employees pay probably 100 per cent more in taxes than would be paid in duties by the Canadian people if they imported all their cars from the United States. I think I am well within the mark when I say that they pay in taxes to the Dominion and to the provincial and municipal governments a sum not less than $30,000,000.

The hon. member who last spoke (Mr. Howden) implied that the wages paid to the employees in this industry were not great in comparison to the value of the finished product. I will do him the justice to admit that he was fair: he did say that a substantial sum was paid in wages, but he qualified the statement. I am sorry he is not here, because I would point out to him that in this industry considerably over sixty per cent of the value of the finished product consists of materials. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), in a speech he delivered in this House a few weeks ago made the statement that the total wages paid in the automobile industry were insignificant in comparison with the total value of its output. Once more let me say, the manufacturers of automobiles in Canada assert that they pay in salaries and wages the sum of $17,595,282, while the subsidiary industries which manufacture automobile parts declare that their payroll amounts to $14,036,668. My good friend from Macleod referred particularly to the Ford industry, stating that the wages paid amounted to about $7,000,000 as against a total production valued at something like $88,000,000. He had the Ford statements before him, and I am sure they cannot be controverted, for the Ford people would not risk giving false returns. Well, those returns show that their expenditures in materials in Canada during the last year amounted to approximately $20,000,000. These materials consisted of such things for example, as automobile wheels. Now surely it requires labour to produce automobile wheels, so that a great deal of that $20,000,000 would represent wages paid to labour.

And would it be suggested by anyone that of the $7,775,000 paid in freights by the automobile manufacturers and subsidiary corporations last year a considerable proportion does not represent employment to the Canadian people? What will be the effect upon Canadian railways if we import automobiles from the United States? I know what the effect will be in British Columbia: automobiles will be assembled in Seattle and will be shipped over the Great Northern railway into Vancouver instead of over the Canadian National railway from Toronto or Walkerville. They will come over American roads from New York and thence by way of the Great Northern into Vancouver, and into Winnipeg and other prairie points. Furthermore, when a commodity is manufactured in Canada it means that the railways move at least four carloads of freight to every one that is moved if the article is imported in the finished state, because there is the hauling of raw materials to the factory to be considered. I have no doubt every manufacturer will agree with me that at least four carloads of freight will move in the case of the article manufactured at home as against one when the finished product is imported.

Mr. HOWARD: Will the hon. member say whether or not he is in favour of putting the duty back to 35 per cent?

Mr. CLARK: I say yes, unhesitatingly. Let me ask the hon. gentleman a question in turn. Is there a silk manufacturing concern in his constituency?

Mr. HOWARD: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Is the hon. gentleman in favour of continuing the 35 per cent duty on silk?

Mr. HOWARD: I do not think it is in order to answer the question, but I should like to reply to the hon. member.

Mr. CLARK: Go ahead.

Mr. HOWARD: If the silk industry in Sherbrooke is taking advantage of the tariff to the detriment of the Canadian purchaser, I say take the duty off.

Mr. CLARK: How would the hon. member proceed to find out whether that industry was taking advantage of the tariff?

Mr. HOWARD: The prices will tell.

Mr. CLARK: I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that I have been franker with my hon. friend than he has been with me. I state unhesitatingly that I would put the duty back to 35 per cent and turn the tariff board loose on the industry. I am in accord with the policy announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his election pledges; I am in accord with the policy announced by the government in the solemn pledge given in the Speech from the Throne, that no industry would suffer without investigation. This government has broken its pledges; the Prime Minister has not kept his word to the people of Canada, and all that one needs to do to prove this is to read the statements I have quoted this afternoon.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The views the hon. member is expressing are not embodied in the amendment.

Mr. CLARK: They certainly are embodied in the amendment. I have not spoken to my leader, nor have I discussed this particular question with any member of the party on this side, but I am sure that the feeling of hon. gentlemen over here would be that the duty should be put back to 35 per cent, and the industry investigated by the tariff board.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like to see the Manitoba Tories vote for it.

Mr. CLARK: They will vote all right; the Minister of Agriculture need not worry.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not worrying at all.

Mr. CLARK: I come from a constituency in which neither automobiles nor automobile parts are manufactured, and there is just as much likelihood of the reduction being popular there as it will be on the prairies. But I am man enough to stand up and declare that I want to see justice done to the people of Canada, no matter where they may be located, whether in Ontario, in Saskatchewan or anywhere else. And I say that justice has not been done in this case. A grave injustice has been done, and the Minister of Agriculture is a party to it.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Has the hon. member seen the statement of Mr. Ford in this morning's papers?

Mr. CLARK: Yes. Would not Mr. Ford just love to see free trade in this country? Would it not have been a great thing for Mr. Ford if no tariff had ever been put on against the importation of American automobiles? Do you think Mr. Ford wanted to come to Canada to manufacture cars? Did any other American firm want to come here to manufacture for the Canadian market? Would they not have been delighted to supply the Canadian market from their United States factories? And would not Mr. Ford have made infinitely more money out of Canadians if there had been no tariff? Let me tell my hon. friend what happened. The Ford Company of Detroit was started with a capital of $28,000. To-day it has net profits in excess of $100,000,000 a year—profits largely in excess per car of the profits made by the Canadian Company. Now then, the Canadian Company commenced with a capital of $125,000.

An hon. MEMBER: How much cash?

Mr. CLARK: Last year the profits of that company were quoted by an hon. member at about $6,100,000. The stock valuation of the Ford Company in Detroit has grown to $6,000 per share; that of the Ford Company of Canada to $425 per share. But since the government announced its policy the stock has dropped 160 points.

An hon. MEMBER: Hit it again.

Mr. CLARK: I realize that that is the policy of my hon. friend from Saskatchewan. I am not here to defend the Ford Company or any other manufacturer. What affects me is this: there are very few automobile manufacturers that have not got their main plants in the United States, and they would just as soon go back there to-morrow and supply the Canadian market. But I do believe in some sense of justice, in some sense of fairness on the part of members from Saskatchewan towards those 22,000 workers and their 100,000 dependents who are located in one small part of Ontario—a province which, by the way, contributes 50 per cent of the total revenues of this country. I appeal for fairness to a province that is able to do that. It is not my province, but I do feel, no matter what province it may be, our object should be to keep good Canadian people here.

It might be well at this point for me to mention that the Ford Company of Canada, for instance, since 1913, has made price reductions of 41 per cent, while during that time all other commodities have increased in price, so that it takes to-day $155 to purchase what $100 would have purchased in 1913. That reduction, I believe, is due largely to two things: keen competition among the manufacturers of cheap cars, and the economies effected by the Ford Company at Ford, Ontario, through mass production.

Why does it cost more to manufacture automobiles in Canada? I have only to refer the government to its own returns for 1925, which show a drawback of customs duty on automobile parts amounting to $4,426,801.66, and an export value of automobiles totalling $26,030,389. The drawback was one-sixth of the total value, or slightly over 16 per cent. That increased cost of manufacturing a car in Canada is due to the imported parts that enter into its manufacture. I think that is of sufficient importance to repeat in another form. It is said on all sides, "Why cannot these Canadian manufacturers turn out cars as cheaply as they do in the United States"? Well, it is a comparatively new industry to this country; many of the component parts are not yet manufactured here, and the domestic market for automobiles has not yet warranted the erection of Canadian factories to manufacture those parts. The manufacture of parts is already a considerable industry in this country, but there are still many parts, particularly engines, that cannot be manufactured here. It will probably take some time before we can develop the automobile industry so that the whole manufacture is done in Canada. In the meantime the cost of production throughout the whole industry is increased by 16 per cent on cars for distribution in Canada by reason of the customs duties paid on imported parts. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance is smiling at my remarks or not, but let me tell him I am not now quoting figures supplied by the automobile manufacturers, I am quoting figures furnished by the Customs department. That one feature alone increases the cost of manufacture in this country tremendously.

Mr. ROBB: We are returning 25 per cent of the duty paid, and I should like to make it clear that that rebate goes to the manufacturer of parts as well as to the manufacturer of automobiles.

Mr. CLARK: I do not think the average Canadian manufacturer to-day is in a position to produce 50 per cent of the car.

Mr. ROBB: That is the milk in the cocoanut—that is what all the row is about.

Mr. CLARK: I think the minister will agree that our manufacturers have increased their percentage of manufacture tremendously in the last few years. Then again, the manufacturer will be put to so much trouble in applying for rebates on his parts that it will require an extra staff and the cost will be almost prohibitive. Further, I say that the manufacturer of parts in Canada is entitled to consideration by the tariff board.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the statement of the Minister of Finance that there will be a 25 per cent rebate of duties paid on parts imported for the further manufacture of motor cars, and I think I had given three reasons why that would not be of any material advantage to the industry. In order to take advantage of that rebate it will be necessary to manufacture fifty per cent of the car in Canada. Now that I admit is a very laudable ambition, it is one to which we all aspire. But the very effect of a reduction in the duties on parts will be to cause even less of the car to be manufactured in Canada than at present, because the manufacturers will be forced to buy the parts where they can buy them the cheapest; they will naturally import more parts from the United States where mass production is carried on and where the parts are cheaper. One instance of the effect of mass production is given by the Ford industry, the only automobile industry in Canada which has reached a high percentage of production in Canada. I understand that the figure is from 80 to 90 per cent. However, that industry, as we all know, is not one which is most affected by the cut in the tariff; it is the least affected although it is the industry which this government aimed at when it reduced the tariff. I think that other manufacturers of motor cars in Canada have hardly reached the fifty per cent basis. I doubt if many of them have got beyond forty per cent, although the percentage has undoubtedly increased in the last few years; it is on the increase to-day, and if the industry were given a fair chance that increase would in the very near future reach a figure well in excess of the fifty per cent.

May I point out to the Minister of Finance that the wages and the purchases of the automobile industry indicate the enormous value to Canada of that industry? First of all, the wages paid by the manufacturers themselves and their subsidiaries amount to $31,500,000. Then as to the very large purchases, two instances might be given. Ford purchases in Canada, $32,431,000 worth of goods, though he only sells to Canadians to the extent of $25,914,000, leaving for circulation in Canada the enormous sum of $6,716,840. Another instance might be given, the General Motors. They make purchases in Canada of Canadian materials amounting to $35,733,390, whereas they only sell to the Canadian people goods to the value of $34,044,048, leaving a balance for circulation in Canada of $1,689,342. And may I state, so far as Ford is concerned at any rate, that because he produces from 80 to 90 per cent in Canada, very little of the money received by that company goes out of this country. For instance last year I think the company declared in dividends a little over $1,000,000. I do not know what proportion of the stock is held in Canada; but dividends are paid in this country, so that a very small amount of money is going out of Canada by reason of the fact that a portion of the capital is supplied by citizens of the United States.

Now the minister proposes, by reducing the duty, to cut down these purchases which are now made in Canada, by making it easier for the manufacturers to buy from the United States. As shown by a ruling of the Department of Customs, the minister is going to cut the duties on 130 parts by 25 per cent if the manufacturers manufacture fifty per cent of the finished article in Canada. I point this out to the minister: that even though all these manufacturers qualify for that reduction the minister would still be charging the manufacturer who manufactures his car in Canada a higher duty on parts than he will exact from me if I purchased a car in the United States. Let me put it in this way; the minister says to me "Clark, if you buy a car made in Canada I will see that you pay from 25 per cent to 35 per cent on every part imported from the United States that goes into that car. If that manufacturer happens to make fifty per cent of your car in Canada I will give him a rebate of 25 per cent, but if you will buy a car that is fully manufactured in the United States, made by American workmen, with American capital, I will charge you only 20 per cent duty." Has there ever been an instance where this government has subsidized American manufacturers in preference to Canadian manufacturers? This is a case where the minister is subsidizing American manufacturers, encouraging Canadians to buy American cars, because if they do so they will pay less duty on parts than they will pay if they purchase Canadian cars. These are some of the reasons why the minister's suggestion of a rebate is of no value. I may point out that only four out of 134 articles will come into Canada at a 20 per cent duty, namely, the automobile cover, the body, the chassis and the wheels. There are 130 other parts which will come in at the old duty.

Before I was interrupted by the Minister of Finance I was giving some reasons why cars manufactured in Canada cost more than cars manufactured in the United States. Another reason is the high taxation in Canada. It has been generally admitted that about twenty-five cents out of every dollar of our net production goes into taxes, municipal, provincial or federal. There is an enormous tax on industry, and I showed quite clearly before the House took recess that that taxation largely falls upon corporations and manufacturers and the result is to increase materially the cost of manufacture in Canada.

Another reason is the cost of distribution. The minister knows that we have a wide area over which to distribute motor cars. Then we have the fact that the freight rates from Toronto to Vancouver are enormously high, compared to those paid in the state of New York by manufacturers there, or by the manufacturers in Detroit in the state of Michigan. Our large area and sparse population also accounts for the increased cost of selling a car in Canada as compared with the United States. I venture to say that on a car which costs $2,000 in Canada, at least $100 of the additional cost to the consumer is the extra cost due to the increased commission paid to dealers. Add to that the extra freight charges and you have an enormously increased percentage cost to the Canadian consumer of a Canadian car. Furthermore much of the misunderstanding which has arisen in connection with motor cars and their cost is due to the fact that the Canadian consumer must pay the five per cent sales tax, the five per cent luxury tax on cars under $1,200, the ten per cent luxury tax on cars over $1,200, making ten per cent on cars under $1,200 and fifteen per cent on cars over $1,200. We are inclined to compare the cost to us of a car delivered in the outlying parts of Canada with the price at which an American may buy his car in the state in which it is manufactured without any of the taxes, except the three per cent luxury tax. Nothing could be more unfair than that.

Another reason why the cost of manufacture in Canada is greater than in the United States is the mass production. For instance, twenty-five cars are produced by Ford in Detroit to every one produced in Ford, Ontario. If any of my hon. friends were manufacturing, for instance, binders, and had a factory which could produce only one binder a day, and I have a factory where I can produce twenty-five binders a day, in which factory do they think we would get the more efficiency and the cheaper binder? I venture to say it would be in my factory. With efficient management, if I were manufacturing twenty-five binders a day, and one of my Saskatchewan friends was producing one a day in his factory, I venture to say I could produce my binder anywhere from twenty per cent to twenty-five per cent cheaper than he could manufacture his.

Now Mr. Speaker, what protection is left to the automobile industry in Canada? I should like to take one practical illustration of a car which is manufactured in Canada. Take, for example, the Overland five-passenger touring car. Under the tariff as it now stands at 35 per cent, the duty on that car is $136; under the revised tariff it will pay $77.70. It so happens that the Overland Company import parts for the manufacture of that particular car on which they pay duties to the amount of $74. I hope my hon. friend will follow me.

Mr. ROBB: I am following the hon. member. I would like to know on what valuation he bases that $136?

Mr. CLARK: On the valuation on which the tariff is charged, which I think is the price to the wholesaler from the factory. Am I right?

Mr. ROBB: I want to know in dollars and cents what is the value of the car.

Mr. CLARK: I cannot give my hon. friend the exact value—somewhere around $400 or $420. But I do know—if my hon. friend will investigate he will ascertain the fact—that the duty now paid on an Overland five-passenger touring car is $136; that the duty on the same car when this tariff goes into effect, if it does go into effect, will be $77.70, and that the duty paid on parts which go into the manufacture of that car is $74. That leaves for the company a protection of exactly $3.70; in other words their protection is wiped out at one fell swoop by the drastic reduction of 42 per cent. I ask my hon. friend what is going to be the effect of this reduction upon the British investor—perhaps not the British investor because it does not come home to him so much, but the American investor—

Mr. ROBB: Before my hon. friend proceeds with the argument, in the $74 duty on the parts has he allowed the 25 per cent drawback?

Mr. CLARK: No I have not, because in this particular car I believe fifty per cent is not manufactured in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: Then I admit frankly that we intend that these companies shall manufacture fifty per cent in Canada. That is the idea.

Mr. CLARK: That is an arbitrary statement on the part of the minister irrespective of whether or not it is possible for companies to do that. I thought I had elaborated that portion of my argument, that some companies started out simply as assembling plants in which not more than ten per cent of the total value would be manufactured in Canada. That percentage is gradually being increased. In fact an increase is necessary in order to take advantage of the British preference which requires 25 per cent Canadian workmanship and material and which I understand will be increased in the near future. I also know and my hon. friend knows it is the ambition of every manufacturer to increase his percentage of production in Canada. For example, a company which three or four years ago had just installed itself in Canada and was doing say only ten per cent of the production here, and has to-day worked up to thirty per cent, a laudable increase—that company to-day, if it is in the position of the company to which I have just referred, has its protection absolutely wiped out by this budget. It is not even given an opportunity of increasing its production to fifty per cent.

Mr. ROBB: How can my hon. friend argue in favour of industries getting away with manufacturing only ten or twenty-five per cent in Canada and in the next breath condemn the British preference because we allow goods to come in with only twenty-five per cent being manufactured in England?

Mr. CLARK: I have not condemned the British preference. When did I condemn it?

Mr. ROBB: A party over there has.

Mr. CLARK: I will not get into an argument with the minister over the British preference.

Mr. ROBB: He had better not.

Mr. CLARK: That is a big subject. I do not fear for one moment debating that subject with the minister, but he is in a position now where he knows he has done an injustice to a certain industry and he is not willing to stick to that point.

Mr. ROBB: No, no.

Mr. CLARK: I propose to confine myself to it. As regards the British preference on this particular thing, I am willing to engage my hon. friend on it. I have shown distinctly, I think, that the Minister of Finance and his government have wiped out the protection for the average car manufactured in Canada. I have shown that by a concrete illustration which he cannot refute and which no member of his ministry can refute.

I am sorry the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) is not in the House to-day, because I was particularly interested in a remark which he let fall the other day when the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) was speaking on this matter. The hon. member for Fort William stated that this export trade with Great Britain was of great advantage to Canada. The hon. member for Brandon interrupted saying: That weakens your argument. I presume what he meant was this, that because we can export to England in competition with United States manufacturers, we should therefore be able to compete with them in Canada without protection, or with the protection we have, or with the protection which is proposed. I know quite well the hon. member for Brandon has not made a study of the question or he never would have made that observation.

In the British market under the British preference we have to-day an advantage over our United States competitors of 11½ per cent. I showed this afternoon by a reference to the drawback of customs given for parts imported from the United States on a Canadian car going into the British market, the cost of manufacture of a car in Canada for distribution to the Canadian people is increased by sixteen per cent. In other words, a Canadian manufacturer who gets a drawback on his parts for cars for export, gets sixteen per cent of the total cost of production of these cars for export refunded to him by the Customs department. That gives him another sixteen per cent protection in the British market as against the United States manufacturer, a protection of sixteen per cent that he does not get in the Canadian market on cars which he manufactures for Canadian trade. That makes in all a protection of 27½ per cent on those two features alone, which the Canadian manufacturer gets in the British market over his United States competitor. That is why the Canadian manufacturer is able to export cars to Great Britain and compete in that market with the United States manufacturer, and that is also why the Canadian manufacturer can sell his cars cheaper in the British market under the British preference than he can afford to sell them in the Canadian market.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Does the hon. member not think it is about time Canadian people were getting some consideration when the manufacturer has had this privilege of exporting and getting a drawback of twenty-five per cent? He has been reaping the advantage of that and the country which buys these cars has been getting the benefit. It is time for the Canadian people to have some benefit.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend did not really ask a question; he has made a speech. My hon. friend was not here this afternoon when I gave figures showing the advantage which Canadians are getting from this. I gave figures which showed that the General Motors spend annually considerably over one million dollars more in Canada than they take from the Canadians. By reason of this export business they leave in Canada considerably over one million dollars a year for circulation in this country. Ford leaves in Canada something like $6,700,000 for the same reason. Is that not something for the Canadian people? We pay less to these companies for the cars we buy from them than they pay to us for the things they buy from us. Supposing my hon. friend has a store and I buy from him annually $1,000 dollars worth of goods and he buys from me only $900 worth, would he try to put me out of business?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Not at all, unless I was paying too much for the privilege of keeping my hon. friend in business.

Mr. CLARK: I do not think my hon. friend would be sacrificing $1,000 worth of business from me when he was buying only $900 worth from me. That is the position of these automobile manufacturers in Canada. They are buying more from us than we are buying from them. Are the Canadian people getting anything? Is that of any advantage to them in addition to the fact that these manufacturers are employing more than 20,000 men and supporting more than 100,000 people directly as a result of this industry?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Just a moment to clear up the point. I would ask the hon. member if according to the statistics, the protection we are affording these industries is not costing the country about $5,000,000 more than the total wages paid to all employees—

Mr. CLARK: The hon. member unfortunately was not here this afternoon, when I showed clearly how much these companies are paying to Canadian workmen in salaries and wages. I will repeat for his benefit that in wages alone the automobile industry is paying to Canadian workmen $31,500,000, but I do not propose to go over my whole speech again. If the hon. gentleman will read Hansard he will find his question answered.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does that amount represent wages to labourers alone or does it include salaries paid to garage men?

Mr. CLARK: It is the amount of wages and salaries paid to employees engaged in the plants of manufacturers of automobiles and manufacturers of parts. It has nothing to do with garage men.

Mr. DONNELLY: Where does the hon. member get his figures?

Mr. CLARK: I told the Minister of Finance this afternoon where I got them. Apparently hon. gentlemen from Saskatchewan were absent, and if they like my good friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. MacLean) will read my speech they will see that the figures I have quoted are authentic. The Minister of Finance did not suggest for a moment that he could controvert them.

I do not advance these facts, Mr. Speaker, in justification of a tariff of 35 per cent, but I do state them as a reason why the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should have kept his word to industry as given in his pre-election speeches; I state them as a reason why the government should honour the pledge made in the Speech from the Throne, that no changes should be made in the tariff until there had been a fair opportunity to investigate the facts.

Mr. PARENT: What difference would that make so far as the soundness of the reduction is concerned?

Mr. CLARK: I do not intend to make my speech over again; I was cross-examined on that point this afternoon. In the light of the industry's experience since other reductions have been made we should not sacrifice any other industry of great importance without due investigation. When I recall the effect of reductions on other industries, such as the woollen and steel industries as well as industries in my own constituency, I am convinced that the government is taking a fatal step in making the present proposed reduction without investigation. I believe it was in 1923 that this government cut the tariff on saw-mill machinery. My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) made the statement in this House that because of that reduction many new mills had been built in British Columbia; I absolutely dispute that suggestion. Indeed, as a result of the reduction, several industries in Vancouver have been closed down. One firm which manufactured logging engines, with an output of two engines per month, was supplying the trade in British Columbia, and it was obliged to close down within six months of the tariff cut. That industry to-day employs only four men who are engaged in repairing logging engines imported from the United States, and the proprietor is acting as agent for an American manufacturer of the very article which he himself formerly turned out.

Take the steel industry also. This is undoubtedly a basic industry, if any is, and we find that far from there having been any progress there has been a retrograde movement in this case since the present government came into office. In the calendar year of 1912 Canada produced 821,000 gross tons of steel ingots; in 1913 this had increased to 1,066,000 tons. In 1923 the production in this industry had fallen off to 840,000 tons and in 1924 there was a further shrinkage to 625,000 tons.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What were the figures for 1921?

Mr. CLARK: I have not got them here but they were in excess of these.

Mr. PARENT: Is not that explained by the fact that less steel has been used because of a greater consumption of cement in the construction of bridges and other structures of that sort?

Mr. CLARK: The hon. gentleman knows that since this government reduced the duties in this industry the imports have increased. The government dealt a body blow to the industry, and if hon. gentlemen opposite want to realize the extent of the damage done they may look at the Maritime provinces. Let them consult the stock market for British Empire Steel. British Empire Steel first preferred has declined from the thirties until to-day it is around seventeen, while second preferred, which formerly stood at about ten, is to-day only in the neighbourhood of two. And so on. Algoma Steel is in pretty much the same condition; I do not know the state of the market for its stock but certainly it is not active. Now we all know that the steel industry is one of the basic activities of Canada. And that industry is dead, its death being attributable almost entirely to the action of the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The government never touched the steel industry.

Mr. CLARK: What did they do when Mr. Massey came down and requested that consideration be given in the matter of certain steel parts? The government put those parts on the free list and so crippled the industry.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Simply the parts entering into the manufacture of binders.

Mr. CLARK: In return for that concession Mr. Massey joined the Liberal cabinet. He stuck around the buildings here for a couple of weeks pleading his own selfish interests at the expense of other subsidiary manufacturers. The minister knows, however, that the automobile manufacturers to-day are not hanging around asking this government to help themselves by cutting the throats of the parts manufacturers.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): To what extent did the reduction in the duty on parts entering into the manufacture of farm implements affect the general steel situation?

Mr. CLARK: I do not need to go into that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Of course not; but if the hon. member will go into it he will find the answer to the question.

Mr. CLARK: The result of the reduction was that imports from the United States increased. And what has been going on in the steel industry in the United States at the same time? In fifteen years we find that while Canada has been standing still in the steel industry, the increase in United States production has been 75 per cent. It might be well at this point for me to refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) yesterday in claiming credit for the great advances in the stock market last year. Well, recently there has been a dreadful slump, and I am not sure that it is not equal to the advance of last year; it certainly is in those industries affected by this government's tariff policy. I am advised by authorities who should know that there is now in progress very heavy selling of Canadian securities, due to the new provision respecting income tax on Canadian investments. This action of the government will drive a large amount of capital out of Canada for investment in American securities, and the people who so invest will probably open American bank accounts and leave their money in the United States, thus escaping Canadian income tax on their American investments. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance in suggesting that he has done this to enable our capitalists to reinvest their money in Canadian securities must know that his suggestion is a joke; it cannot be done.

What is the situation in Canada to-day? We find our crops have been good. Does the government suggest that it was responsible for the increased production of the soil last year? We find the pulp and paper industry is thriving. Well, that industry will thrive until the natural resources on which it depends are exhausted. If my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior will examine the records in his own department, he will find his experts estimate that within our own time the available accessible supply of pulpwood in this country will be exhausted. We have a greater production also in the mining industry and in the fishing industry. Those are about the only industries in Canada that are making progress. But let me point out that they are all wasting industries. Take, for instance, the mining industry, we have Cobalt worked out and the industry receding into the Porcupine, and now into the Red Lake district. We have other examples in the Yukon and the Rossland mining camps. We have another example in the fishing industry on the Fraser river. A few years ago you could see from the train millions of fish in that river; to-day, Mr. Speaker, as you know from your own investigations that is no longer the case.

To-day my friends from Saskatchewan are jubilant because of their great wheat crop last year and because of their control of the world's market in that commodity; but I warn them that when Russia is reorganized she will be again a formidable competitor in the wheat market of the world, and that market is not likely to expand.

Bearing all these things in mind, Mr. Speaker, we should devote ourselves to a more diversified industrial development. With the example of exhausted natural resources in other countries, one would think Canadians would make it their first concern to manufacture their natural resources at home and make it possible for the country to support a larger population and produce greater wealth. Since this government came into office it has driven over 500,000 young Canadians, the very best of our stock, to the United States because it has preferred to encourage American industry at the expense of Canadian.

My friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) yesterday referred in jubilant tones to the fact that the income tax has been practically wiped out on incomes equal to a member of parliament's indemnity, and he added in great glee, "Keep your eye on the price of motor cars." My plea, Sir, is that the members of this House and the people of the Dominion keep their eye on the employees in those factories who are now being affected by the tariff reductions on motor cars; that they keep their eye on the unemployment that will result; that they keep their eye on the distress that will follow; and that they keep their eye on the exodus to the United States due to the closing of five industries in the city of Oshawa alone. My further plea is that they join with the Conservative party in a determined effort to enforce the fulfilment of the solemn pledge given by this government that no industry shall suffer a reduction of its tariff protection until a proper investigation has been made by the recently appointed Tariff Advisory Board. How long, Mr. Speaker, are protectionist constituencies such as North Waterloo, Joliette and North Vancouver going to send representatives to this House who, while they profess to be protectionists, help to install in office a Prime Minister who has no respect for his pledge, a Prime Minister who solemnly promises that Canadian industries shall get a fair deal and full opportunity to be heard before their tariff protection is taken away or diminished,—I say how long are those and other protectionist constituencies going to send members to this House to support such a Prime Minister,—members who protest when tariff reductions are made, but nevertheless render the reductions possible by remaining with a party which breaks its pledges?

Mr. A. F. TOTZKE (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to occupy very much time in this my first address, but there are a few things in connection with the budget that I feel I should discuss very briefly. Let me first of all congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) upon his very excellent budget.

I think I can safely say that this budget is very pleasing to at least ninety per cent of the people of Canada. Not only is the budget itself very welcome but the improved financial conditions which made this budget possible are very gratifying. More especially is that so, Mr. Speaker, after the blue ruin speeches which we heard throughout the length and breadth of the country during the recent election campaign, and even during this present session. We were told that the factories were being closed, that trade was falling off, and that the country generally was on the verge of ruin. So it is very gratifying that the Finance minister is able to bring down a budget making a reduction of some $25,000,000 in taxation. We know that revenues are required to carry on the business of this country, and it is gratifying indeed to note that business has already so improved, and that the prospects for business in the future are so bright, that the Minister of Finance has been able to make the reductions now proposed in the budget. Not only are the majority of the people pleased with the budget, but I am sure that if our friends opposite would only give candid expression to their opinions they would also admit satisfaction.

One of the items of the budget which to my mind is of importance to the constituency which I represent is the reduction in the income tax levied on the man with a small income. The chief occupation of the people in my constituency, as is the case with the majority of the people in the province from which I come, is that of farming. The farmer of the western prairies, with the conditions obtaining and the class of farming carried on, is in the position that one year he will have good crops and splendid returns and will have to pay a large income tax, then possibly for the next two or three years he has to operate his farm at a small profit or in some cases at a loss. So he may pay income tax one year and operate at a loss the following year, and there is no allowance made for this difference. I do not know that this could be remedied in any way, but I do know that the increase in exemptions will do much to alleviate this condition.

Some hon. members of the opposition have stated that the reductions in the income tax are only apparent; that while the reductions apply to the man with the small income the tax is increased when applied to incomes derived from dividends or other unearned sources. I submit that this is as it should be. It is the man with the small income, who is raising a family and trying to give his children a proper education which will fit them to become good and useful citizens—and these comprise by far the greater part of our population—who should be given every encouragement possible.

9 p.m.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) speaking on the budget the other day, said that this government could not be given the credit for the improved conditions existing in Canada, but that the credit should be given to a munificent Providence. I am ready to admit that Providence had a lot to do with the improved condition of affairs, but had conditions been worse the blame would certainly have been laid on this government, so why should they not receive some credit? There is a saying that the Lord helps those who help themselves, and I submit that the improved condition in which we find ourselves is due in large measure to the economical and careful administration of the government.

I would like to say just a few words in regard to the tariff proposals. This is a very important matter to us in western Canada, as indeed it is to all parts of our Dominion. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has on several occasions paid considerable attention to those sitting in this corner of the House; he has called us the Saskatchewan colony, and free traders. I do not know just what he means by "Saskatchewan colony"; I do not think he intends to be very complimentary, but I want to say that this Saskatchewan colony will keep on growing. Most important of all, there is absolute harmony amongst ourselves; we are all here with one purpose. That purpose is not to impose our will upon this government or upon the rest of Canada, but to secure fair treatment as we are willing to accord fair treatment to others. The right hon. gentleman has called us free traders. Perhaps our inclinations are for free trade, because we cannot see that protection can be of any benefit to us. Our main business is the production of wheat; we are gradually getting into mixed farming, and that class of farm work has already assumed considerable proportions, but the main thing is still the production of wheat. When we sell our wheat we must sell it on the open market, in competition with the rest of the world, so we cannot see any advantage to be gained by having protection. In that way perhaps the hon. gentleman is partially correct when he classes us as free traders. Our inclinations are for free trade, just as the inclinations of those in the industrial centres are for protection, because they believe protection is to their advantage. Let me say, however, that while our inclinations may be for free trade, we have not come here expecting to get free trade, nor do we expect to get any drastic cut in the tariff at present.

The voters in Saskatchewan demonstrated one thing last October, that is, that they do not desire any increase in these tariff duties. The leader of the Conservative party preached higher tariffs, and so far as the people of Saskatchewan are concerned he has his answer; not a Conservative member from that province is in this House. A great deal has been said during this session with regard to the popular vote cast last October; members of the opposition have gleefully counted the votes cast in opposition to the government candidates, and in so doing have counted the votes cast for Progressives. In my constituency we had a three-cornered fight, with Liberal, Progressive and Conservative candidates. The Conservative lost his deposit, and I venture to say that had the Progressive candidate not run, the Conservative would not have gained fifty votes. It seems to me the votes cast in Saskatchewan last October were not so much in favour of free trade as in favour of a reasonable tariff, and strongly in opposition to any increase in the tariff duties. We have no desire to injure the business of the manufacturers of this country. We want to see them prosper, and we hope some day to have them in our part of the Dominion. But we do object to having them make unreasonable profit at our expense.

Most of the time this afternoon was taken up with a discussion of the tariff reduction on automobiles. I do not intend to weary the House by going into a detailed consideration of the matter, but I wish to place on Hansard a statement attributed to Mr. Henry Ford which appeared in the press of to-day. It is a Canadian Press despatch dated Detroit, April 21st, and reads as follows:

> Henry Ford, Detroit industrial magnate, this afternoon stated his belief that the industry at Ford city would "run better if there were no tariff whatever." Mr. Ford declared himself to be a free trader. The magnate was interviewed on the Walkerville ferry as he was returning from an inspection trip of the Ford city plant. He would add nothing to the statement made by Mr. Wallace R. Campbell, general manager and treasurer of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, other than expressing the opinion that free trade would be best for the Canadian plant.

Mr. MORAND: Is the hon. gentleman aware that Mr. Ford owns only about twenty per cent of the Canadian stock, and the whole of the American stock; that they are two separate companies, and that he might be quite willing to have the Canadian plant closed?

Mr. TOTZKE: I do not wish to discuss the matter with the hon. gentleman at all except to say that the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon are answered, I think, by the statement in the despatch quoted that "free trade would be best for the Canadian plant".

The Saskatchewan members came down here to discuss matters with our eastern friends. We came animated by the spirit of give and take, and the sooner our eastern friends get away from the idea that we are looking for free trade the better it will be for all of us. We understand the conditions in eastern Canada perhaps better than easterners understand conditions in the west, for the reason that a good many of us were born and raised in the eastern part of the Dominion. I myself was born and brought up in Kitchener, which is one of the best industrial centres in this old province of Ontario. One of the members of the opposition made the suggestion some weeks ago that it might be a good thing for the members of this House to travel to various parts of Canada and become acquainted with the conditions in each locality. I believe that idea could be acted upon to advantage, and that it would result in a better understanding between the east and the west.

The improvement in the finances of the Canadian National Railways, as announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech is also very gratifying. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) when speaking the other day, expressed satisfaction with the improved conditions of the railway, but he did what our friends opposite usually do whenever this government does anything worth while: He tried to prove that in some way the credit is due to the party on that side of the House. The hon. gentleman said on the occasion referred to that while this road was in good shape and its condition was improving day by day, the credit for that really should be given to the right hon. leader of the opposition. Well, Mr. Speaker, we are not so much concerned as to who gets the credit for the improved condition of the railway as we are with the condition itself. While perhaps the right hon. leader of the opposition was the father of the road, the present conditions prove that sometimes a foster father is better able to care for a child than a natural father. From the way things were going on when this government came into power I am afraid that had the child been left with its father much longer it would have been in a pretty ragged and dilapidated condition, or perhaps would have been swallowed up altogether by the wolves.

To my mind the government made a happy selection when they secured the services of Sir Henry Thornton as general manager. He has been able to imbue the officials of the road with a different spirit, and those of us who patronize this road can testify to the courtesy and efficient service now given. Let me tell hon. members a little experience I had on my trip west during the last recess. I was going from Winnipeg to Saskatoon. Getting up in the morning I met the porter in the corridor and I said "Are we running on time this morning, porter?" His answer was "Yes, indeed, sir—the 'National way'." That is an illustration of the spirit that exists on this national railway to-day, and if it is all that Sir Henry Thornton has been able to do it has been well worth while; it makes all the difference between operating the line on a paying basis and on a non-paying basis.

The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean, who is perhaps the most consistent advocate of public ownership in this House, makes a plea for the amalgamation of the two roads, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. He claims that some $250,000,000 could be saved annually by removing duplication of the service. I am ready to support the hon. gentleman on the question of public ownership, but I cannot support the amalgamation of these two roads. I think the hon. gentleman would find that when he came to do away with the duplication of the two systems there would be such a howl of protest, such a storm of opposition, that to carry that suggestion into effect would be almost impossible. Perhaps in very few cases it could be done, but here is the situation you have to meet. In very many instances there are towns built along these lines. There are shipping facilities, elevators, and all that goes to make up the small towns of the western prairies. While these places are small they are very important and do a lot of business. So that I cannot agree with my hon. friend's scheme of doing away with the duplication of service. I will admit that there are instances where the passenger service on the lines, or something of that character, might be diminished, but the lines themselves could not be done away with.

Furthermore, there is the question of competition. Competition is the life of trade, and to us in the west of Canada competition means a lot, especially during the harvest time when our rush season is on and we require a great number of cars. Let me give an illustration of how the lack of competition sometimes works out to the detriment of the settlers. In one corner of my constituency there is a railroad grade that was built in 1912 and 1913. The grade is there for some twenty-five or thirty miles, but there is no steel on it and I will tell you why. The particular district this railway was supposed to serve has been settled ever since 1898 when the first batch of settlers went in there. They are good settlers, they have improved their farms, and they have done well. When they went in the Canadian Northern, as it was then, built the main line, known as the Winnipeg and Edmonton railway, just to the south of this district. The Canadian Northern also secured a lease of the Regina and Prince Albert branch, which was the old Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway. The Grand Trunk Pacific had the line from Young to Prince Albert. While this condition existed, the Canadian Northern with lines on two sides of the triangle, and the Grand Trunk Pacific on the other—or rather I should say this rectangle, because the Canadian Northern had another line on the north side of it—there was competition between these two roads. And the Canadian Northern constructed this grade with the purpose of securing the grain from that particular district. Since the amalgamation this particular section of the country is surrounded on four sides by one road, the Canadian National. There is no longer any need, so far as the railway is concerned, to construct that road, but the settlers need it. They have from twenty-five to thirty miles to haul their grain, and anyone living in the west knows it is not profitable to haul grain for more than ten or twelve miles. So that since the Canadian National have had these four lines this grade has been lying there idle, and I submit that if one of these lines had remained in competition with the Canadian National the condition would be much better. This particular branch line was included three sessions ago in the branch lines railway bill, but the proposal for its construction was thrown out by the Senate. I am in hopes that before long, with improved conditions in the country generally, and in our National railway operation in particular, it will not be long before they undertake the construction of that line.

Just a few words on the subject which was really the main issue in the campaign last October in my constituency, namely the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. I am not going fully into the matter of the completion of this road or the matter of its feasibility or cost, but I wish to make one or two references to the matter. As I said before, in our election campaign three candidates were seeking election, and the main plank in the platform of each one of them was the completion of the Hudson Bay road. I observe the right hon. leader of the opposition is not in his seat—I wanted to draw this particularly to his attention. I desire to read a statement from the platform of the Conservative candidate in that constituency. It will be taken for granted that the Progressive and the Liberal candidates would certainly be in favour of the immediate completion of that road, because that has been a plank in our platform; it has been our desire for years to have the line completed. The following advertisement appeared in the Bruno Leader of October 8, 1925:

> Mr. E. S. Wilson, the Conservative candidate for the federal constituency of Humboldt, stands for:
> 1. Immediate completion of the Hudson Bay railway.

But that is not the best of this particular article; there is a paragraph at the bottom of the article which reads:

> These are the policies laid down by the leader of the Conservative party and endorsed by the Conservative candidate for Humboldt.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am just introducing that to show my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition the feeling of the people in my constituency. I might say further that that is the feeling of the vast majority of the people of Saskatchewan, the province from which I come. If by any chance the candidate of the leader of the opposition in the constituency of Humboldt had been elected, he would have had at least one man sitting behind him who was pledged to support the immediate completion of the Hudson Bay railway. Indeed I believe he has several right now who are pledged to the completion of this road.

There is considerable opposition, Mr. Speaker, in eastern Canada to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. A lot of propaganda has been printed, and it might be interesting to know just where the money comes from to pay for that propaganda. It is feared by those in the eastern provinces that the completion of this road will perhaps mean the diversion of traffic from eastern ports and subsequent depreciation in value of the terminals and shipping facilities in those provinces. To my mind there is no occasion for eastern interests to be alarmed on that score. Even after the road is completed, we realize that we will not be able to ship our grain and cattle immediately. It will take some time to get the proper facilities, and by the time there is any big movement of grain out of that port our production will have increased to such an extent that it cannot all go through the Hudson Bay route, and we will need every avenue through which we can possibly export our produce. We are not only advocating the completion of this road for the transportation of our grain and cattle; we believe the natural resources in forests, minerals, fish and agriculture that will be developed will justify its completion. Let me read a clipping which will illustrate to some extent what I mean. I do not know whether to take this article at its face value, but I wish to read it to the House to show that it is not only the farmers in western Canada who think this road would be a beneficial proposition, but that others are of the same opinion. I have here a Canadian Press report dated January 27, which reads in this way:

> Toronto, Jan. 27.—"If I were out of work to-day, I would go straight to the Hudson's Bay district," said Professor A. Fitzpatrick of the Frontier College at the social service council convention here, to-day.
> "There is work and to spare for millions if they have the right clothing which would cost $100 a man."
>
> Professor Fitzpatrick predicted there would be half a dozen cities on the Hudson bay in the next decade or two, each one a quarter of the size of Toronto.
>
> "You will live to see half a dozen railways to Hudson bay. So soon as the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway is pushed on to Moose Factory the Canadian Pacific Railway and others will be forced to build connection too," he said.
> "The Hudson bay itself will easily support one million people."
> He proposed that the social service council should do something practical next year by putting 1,000 jobless men with sufficient clothing and equipment for the work which is always waiting for them in cutting pulpwood in the new northern country.

As I said before, we believe that this line when completed to the Hudson bay alone will support itself, whether or not it is a feasible road for our grain and cattle. We believe it is feasible, and we have abundant information in connection with that, but I do not intend to take up time discussing it. Perhaps we will have an opportunity later on to do so.

The right hon. leader of the opposition has told the Saskatchewan members in this corner of the House that we would find before we were here very long that we could not get what we want from the government. May I say in conclusion that we have got and are getting what we want from the government and our good friends from the eastern and other parts of this country. That is the consideration of our problems and the opportunity of discussing with them the problems of other parts of the Dominion with a view to assisting in finding some solution for them. We realize that we are not the only province in this Dominion, and it is only by co-operation and mutual concession and goodwill that our country will gain the great position amongst the nations of the world to which it is entitled.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, my principal object in rising to take part in this debate is to say a word on behalf of the labouring people and the farmers of this country. I regret very much that I cannot offer my congratulations to my good and amiable friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). Nothing would please me better, but my opinion of this budget would be almost in inverse ratio to my opinion of the minister. I do not for a minute think that anything I say or might not say will have the least effect in stopping this government from the mad and reckless course on which it has started. This budget, to my mind, is just another broken promise added to the long list which this government has had following in its wake ever since it came into office.

I remember quite distinctly away back in the election of 1921 when the Prime Minister took with him throughout the length and breadth of Canada the late Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding—who unfortunately to-day, we all regret, is ill—because he felt that his reputation in this House and in the country, a reputation of thirteen or fourteen years for tariff stability, would create the impression among the Canadian people that if the Liberal government obtained power they would not pursue the reckless course which they have been pursuing since obtaining office. After they obtained office more or less under false pretences, we find that from the very first session they began to break their promises to the people of this country. Their promises were broken in 1922 and 1923 to such an extent that the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, evidently thought it was incumbent upon him and his duty to the Canadian people from his place in this House to assure them that from henceforth we would have tariff stability. He has unfortunately passed off the scene.

We had similar promises during the last election. This government, I think I might say truthfully, obtained office upon the promise that in regard to the tariff the industries of this country would no longer be slaughtered as they had been before by this government without at least a fair hearing by some competent court. When we get that far, what happens? This parliament is called and in the very Speech from the Throne this promise is reiterated again only to be broken by the legislation which is now before the House, and it is to this legislation that I want to devote some little attention to-night.

The other day we saw the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) rise in his place and try to justify the action of the Minister of Finance by saying that the farmers in the west had many times been bailed out and that in the afternoon they had hitched up their horses to the plough and started again to make ready for the next year. The minister upon that occasion nearly broke the top of his desk in two applauding the hon. member for Brandon. We all know that such unfortunate incidents happen and we all regret them, but I would like to ask the hon. member for Brandon and the Minister of Finance to-night: Are failures anything new in the history of any business or any private individual in this country? Is it not the case that any man in any business may suffer disaster and misfortune at some time or another? That is to be regretted. What we complain about in regard to this budget is that the Minister of Finance has directly and deliberately taken out his pruning knife and slaughtered industries of the province of Ontario. This is a deliberate, premeditated act, delivered, as I believe—and I will refer to this in a few minutes—under compulsion.

This budget promises us practically four things: reduction in taxation, reduction in postage, reduction in debt, and reduction in the tariff on motor cars. The Minister of Finance claims that he has reduced the debt of this country by some $22,000,000. I intend before I sit down to show that that reduction is nothing more nor less than a paper reduction. But granting for the moment it is true that he has reduced the debt and is going to reduce taxation, does the government deserve credit for that act or does it not? Before we can answer that question satisfactorily, we must review the taxation of this country and see what amount of taxes has been taken out of the pockets of our people. I might here be permitted to read an extract from an address delivered by Sir Herbert Holt, in which he says:

> There is no question that too large a percentage of our national income is being absorbed in taxation. The total gross production of Canada, agricultural and industrial, for the last year for which official statistics are available was $4,485,487,785. The total net production was $2,728,906,285. During the same year, the total tax collected by the Dominion, provincial and municipal governments of Canada amounted to $627,-972,769, or almost one-quarter of the value of the net production.

Analyzing the national income and the taxation in relation to it, he gives us the following figures of the ratio of taxation to the national income in Great Britain, the United States and Canada:

Year	Great Britain	United States
1921-22..	27.5	16.7
1922-23..	26.8	12.1
1923-24..	22.9	11.6

During those same years what had this government been doing in Canada? The figures are as follows:

Year	Canada
1921-22..	19.8
1922-23..	19.9
1923-24..	19.7

That shows that this government did not reduce taxation one iota during its period of office. The Minister of Finance comes to us to-day and he says that he is going to reduce taxation by some $22,000,000, and he claims a surplus of some $33,000,000. But upon looking over the railway statement which was presented to us the other day, I find that the National railways have floated bonds to an amount of about $35,000,000. Of that, $17,000,000 was for refunding purposes, leaving a balance of $18,000,000 to be charged against the treasury. Granting that his so-called surplus was correct, he should have deducted that $18,000,000 of debt which was contracted by the National railways, and that would have reduced the surplus to $15,000,000 and the reduction in the debt to about $4,000,000.

I shall discuss briefly some forms of taxation in force in Canada to-day. The minister has introduced some changes in the income tax, and in part I want to give him credit for what he has done. I desire also to give him some credit for the reduction in the postage rate.

That, however, is about all I can credit him with. I am quite willing to concede both to the minister and to the government everything that is due them, but the Lord knows that there is not very much in this budget in regard to which one can make any great concession. I find in connection with the income tax that an income of $5,000 will enjoy a reduction of $86; one of $10,000 gets a reduction of $329; and the income of $15,000 will have a reduction of $501. Obviously the reductions are not in favour of the lower salaried men nearly so much as they are in favour of those who are fortunate enough to have larger incomes. To offset the advantage which he gives in this direction, the minister has proposed a system of double taxation. I must tell him emphatically that in my opinion he has made a grave mistake in this respect. I do not think that any government, whether in Canada or anywhere else, can at any time afford to break faith with the people. It has been the settled policy of all governments in this country ever since we have had an income tax to tax incomes once only. We have never had any method of duplicating taxation. As the minister proposes to reverse that policy, however, I would ask him to consider seriously the wisdom of the proposal. There are people who have invested their money in Canada in stocks and bonds in the assurance that the government would leave those investments alone. Now the government steps in and is going to tax such incomes, which in many cases will be severely hit. In view of the fact that both the Conservative and the Liberal parties have always refused to enforce the system of double taxation, I submit to the minister that in this matter he is not keeping faith with the people. I would point out to him that if he carries out his proposal he will be taxing some incomes not once, nor twice, but three times. Is that fair? The minister knows, as we all know, that certain corporations are amalgamated, and he is going to tax the parent company, then the subsidiary, and then the individual who derives his revenue from the concern in the shape of dividends. In other words, he is going to tax these incomes no fewer than three times. What will be the result? Those people who have invested their money in these concerns on the strength of the country's reputation will withdraw their investments from Canadian securities and from Canadian industry, which is badly in need of capital, and place their funds in New York where they will draw dividends not subject to taxation. It would be well for the minister to consider this point before pressing the system of taxation which he now proposes.

Let us look into the income tax a little further. A man has, say, an income of $10,000 of which $5,000 consists of dividends and $5,000 of moneys received from other sources. Formerly he paid $241 in taxation, and that has been increased now to $290. The man who had an income of $20,000 formerly paid $1,249; now he will pay $1,540. The man who formerly had an income of $20,000 derived exclusively from dividends paid $740, and now he will pay $1,500. In other words, his taxation is more than doubled, and it is doubled at a time when money is needed in the country. This is a breach of faith with the Canadian people, and, as I said before, no government whether in Canada, in the United States, in Great Britain or in any other civilized country, can afford to lose the confidence of the nation. The result of this tax if it is enforced will be a loss of revenue, while industries will lose capital which will drift from Canada to the United States.

Let me review the promised reductions in debt and taxation in relation to certain conditions that must be borne in mind. The government is claiming certain reductions, but I submit that we are really getting nothing. The minister possibly is taking off a little which the government put on in the way of taxation, but the taxes he is adding this year will more than wipe out the reductions. With the expenditure the minister is proposing the government will have a deficit next year and we shall have then either to impose further taxation or to go deeper into debt. I want the minister to consider seriously our position as compared with the United States; for it is a matter of vital importance, not only to this country but to every other nation, just what action is taken by our neighbours to the south in regard to their war debt in the next few years. The United States at the end of the war had a debt of $25,700,000,000, and in six years they had paid off nearly $5,000,000,000, reducing it to about $21,000,000,000.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): When did they enter the war?

Mr. McGIBBON: Is the hon. gentleman asking for information?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: I will refer him to the newspapers. The United States, I say, paid off $6,000,000,000 of their national debt in six years, and as the allies owe her $12,000,000,000 that leaves a net debt of $9,000,000,000 for the people of that republic to pay. They can discharge that debt in about ten years if they care to do so. Let me ask the Minister of Finance this question: How is Canada, or any other country for that matter, to compete with the United States in trade? This is something that must be considered in the near future. If the American republic desires to do so it can wipe out its war debt in ten years, and then with its vast population, its extensive home market, its enormous capacity for mass production, which necessarily is cheap, it will be in an advantageous position to capture trade. So that unless we in Canada retrench, unless we get into a similar position, we shall find it exceedingly difficult to compete with the United States. Consequently I ask the Minister of Finance: In view of the fact that our neighbours to the south have in six years reduced their national debt by $5,000,000,000, have we done anything by comparison? I submit, Sir, that the reduction in our national debt in the meantime has been infinitesimal.

What about their taxation? It has gone down in an almost similar ratio, from $54 to $27 per head. And let me say here, in answer to an hon. member who spoke a short time ago, if my figures are correct, the comparative debts of the United States and Canada at the close of the war were $253 and $256 per head respectively. Therefore this country, with its vast resources and a per capita debt virtually no greater than that of the United States, should to my mind have done a great deal better than the record shows. In a word, I say that in these reductions the government has done practically nothing. President Coolidge a few months ago signed a tax reduction measure for the United States representing a saving to the people of between $300,000,000 and $350,000,000. That has been going on every year since the war closed. Taxation in the republic to-day is one billion less than it was in 1919. How much less is it in Canada, Mr. Speaker? Why, we have been taking out of the pockets of the people every year since the close of the war from $375,000,000 to $400,000,000 to run the federal government alone. There has been practically no reduction in taxation. We are promised a slight reduction this year, for which we give the Minister of Finance credit; but I submit it would have been infinitely better for this country had the government cut expenditures to the bone and thus helped to reduce the national debt and taxation so we could hold up our end in trade with the other countries of the world.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Let us see what they are doing in Great Britain. I find the Imperial government since 1924 has reduced taxation by over £150,000,000—$750,000,000—a large sum of money; and from 1920 to date the debt reduction has been over $1,150,000,000. It will be equally interesting to see what some of our sister dominions are doing. I find that in 1921 New Zealand had a per capita taxation of $88.58; in 1925 that was reduced to $60, or a reduction of over $28 per head. That is an example which to my mind this country might well follow. Their net debt during the same time had also been reduced about $26 per head. I could also give figures for the other overseas dominions, but I think I have cited sufficient to indicate that this country has fallen behind nearly every other country that was engaged in the war in paying off its debt, reducing taxation, and getting into a better position to hold its balance of trade with the world.

Now, Sir, I come to the reduction of the duty on motor cars. The attitude of the government not only to-day but in the past puts me in mind of a school of medicine in the olden days which was known as the venesection school. When a patient had typhoid fever they bled him; when he had pneumonia they bled him; if he had empyema complicating pneumonia they bled him again, so that in the end, even if the patient was strong enough to survive the malady, he generally died at the hands of the surgeons from secondary anaemia. That is about the attitude of this government. When any industry gets into difficulty they reduce the tariff. They reduced the tariff on woollens. What was the result? Our woollen mills closed their doors. They subjected the shoe manufacturers and the tanners to the competition of European cheap labour and depreciated exchange, and those industries have gone out of business. They reduced the duty on agricultural implements, and if I am informed correctly, the Massey-Harris Company for the last year or so has been devoting its plant to making parts for motor cars. To-day the government have attacked the motor car industry, with the same idea, that there is only one cure for everything in this country, and that is: Reduce the tariff, bring in American made goods, and send our money to the United States to feed the American workmen and their families and thus turn our own workingmen out on the street.

Looking over Hansard I was interested to notice the reason given by the Minister of Finance for this tariff reduction. He diagnosed the cause of the illness of the motor car industry and said, "The people of this country have an idea that the automobile manufacturers enjoy too much protection." I submit, Mr. Speaker, that was a strange reason for him to give for such drastic action on his part. Here is an industry with a huge capital investment employing 20,000 hands, on whom in turn about 100,000 people are dependent. He puts the axe to the root of that tree, and his only explanation is: The people believe it is enjoying too much protection.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): If the hon. member will permit a question,—if his party were again in power would he be in favour of putting back the duty on automobiles to what it was before this reduction was made?

Mr. McGIBBON: I have heard the hon. member ask that question three or four times to-day. I was hoping he had something else in his repertoire. Why, sure, I would put the duty back until the Tariff Advisory Board appointed by the government had an opportunity to look fully into the question. I believe in giving every Canadian industry protection enough to carry on. We are giving protection to the western farmers in the way of freight rates, and I submit that the industries of Ontario have an equal right to live. This question, Sir, as the late leader of the Progressive party in this House once said, is elementary in its simplicity. Now, I ask the minister: Does he think with all his knowledge and experience that he is able, without any evidence, to render a verdict upon any issue of that kind Is it fair to himself, is it fair to the country, is it fair to any industry for him to just get up and say, "The people believe you are enjoying too much protection, and we are going to take the duty off, although we do not know whether you have got too much protection; we do not even know if you have got enough"? Why Mr. Speaker, such an attitude is ridiculous. The thing is ridiculous. To my mind it would have been much nearer the truth had he said that the Minister of Railways demanded it, and the government had to give it to him. We know that he, the Minister of Railways, and the members from Saskatchewan have come down here demanding not the head of Barabbas but the head of industrial Ontario, and there is more than a suspicion that this budget is an election budget, reflecting the feeling of this government towards the province of Ontario because of what happened on October 29 last. I ask the minister what reason he can give? Surely he can give some reason for jeopardizing the employment of 22,000 men and the living of 100,000 people without even a trial. Is not the thing absurd?

I do not wish to follow that line further, as it is getting late. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture is not in his place, because I had intended to give him some information whereby he could stir the dry bones of that department and make it of some use to the Canadian people. This government, by its action and inaction, has practically wiped out the protection of our farmers, and they have been left exposed to the cheap Australian and New Zealand butter which is ruining the market. Had the minister been here I would have read a clipping from the Toronto Globe under yesterday's date, in which it is stated that the western provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta are flooded with Australian butter; that the western Canadian butter is drifting down into Toronto, and that the price is down to 33 and 34 cents a pound. That is the result of legislation passed by this government.

Before going into that I would like to refer again to the Minister of Finance. He has stated that he does not know how to find out what protection these industries require, so I am going to tell him where to get some examples. I have in my hand the regulations under the Safeguarding of Industries Act of Great Britain, which I will read in order to give the minister some idea of how to proceed. When an industry applies for protection the evidence is to be heard and the verdict rendered on the following conditions:

(1) Whether the applicant industry is, by reason of the volume of employment engaged in the production of the goods to which the application relates, or by reason of the nature of the goods produced, an industry of substantial importance.

(2) Whether foreign goods of the class or description to which the application relates are being imported into and retained for consumption in the United Kingdom in abnormal quantities.

(3) Whether the foreign goods so imported are being sold or offered for sale in the United Kingdom at prices which are below the prices at which similar goods can be profitably manufactured or produced in the United Kingdom.

(4) Whether, by reason of the severity and extent of such competition, employment in the manufacture or production of such goods in the United Kingdom is being, or is likely to be, seriously affected.

(5) Whether such exceptional competition comes largely from countries where the conditions are so different from those in this country as to render the competition unfair.

Competition for the purpose of such inquiry is not to be deemed to be unfair unless it arises from one or more of the following causes:—

(a) Depreciation of currency operating so as to create an export bounty.

(b) Subsidies, bounties, or other artificial advantages.

(c) Inferior conditions of employment of labour. . .

I have here the report on the cutlery industry, which applied for protection, and we find the verdict as follows:

In all the circumstances, we consider that a duty of 33⅓ per cent ad valorem would be reasonably sufficient —and we recommend that such a duty should be imposed for a period of at least five years.

That is the way they find out in Great Britain whether or not an industry needs protection, what protection it needs, and for how long it is needed. I recommend that system to the Minister of Finance. I have also a report on the aluminium industry, and after hearing the evidence this is what they say:

10 p.m.

We are not in a position to state that the applicant industry has established a claim to a duty.

It works both ways, as you see. I have also a report on the wrapping paper industry, and I find that the verdict is as follows:

We recommend a duty of 17½ per cent—

In the glove industry I find a double verdict rendered. On the question of leather gloves they say:

We therefore recommend that a duty of 33⅓ per cent ad valorem should be imposed for at least five years.

On the question of fabric gloves, in the same verdict they say:

We do not recommend a duty on fabric gloves of silk and artificial silk.

I recommend to the minister that he get his information along these lines, and he will then be in a position to give this House the reasons for the reduction or increase in duty upon any article in a reasonable way, not in the unreasonable way which he followed this afternoon.

I want to deal now with the United States. I have the seventh annual report of the United States tariff commission and I want to read their instructions. Section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922 provides:

"In order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended," the President shall have power, upon investigation, to ascertain the differences in costs of production of domestic articles and of like or similar imported articles and to proclaim the changes in classification or increases or decreases in rates of duty which may be necessary to equalize the differences in costs thus ascertained.

Those instructions were given to the United States tariff commission, which President Harding called the greatest advance in tariff making in the last hundred years. What is the result? The president has power to either raise or decrease the duties or to alter the classification up to 50 per cent, but he cannot do that—and this is the point I want to impress upon the Minister of Finance—until an investigation has been held. That is the way these things are settled in Great Britain and the United States, and I recommend that procedure to the government of this country. If that course is adopted they can come to parliament and give reasons for their actions, and they will not slaughter an industry, as has been done in the case of the automobile industry, simply because they say the public believes it should be slaughtered. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that such reasons are beneath any man holding the position of finance minister of any country on God's earth.

For a few moments, Mr. Speaker, I want to take up something on behalf of the farmers of this country. I did want to show the Minister of Agriculture how he could do something for our farmers. I have carefully gone through the workings of the Fordney-McCumber tariff as it applies to the farmers of the United States, and when I am told in this House that farmers cannot be protected by tariff I want hon. members to read these figures, which I am going to ask leave to place on Hansard. Now that tariff came into force, as most hon. gentlemen know, on May 27, 1921. To be brief let me say this: I have gone through every branch of the farming industry in the United States from wheat to cotton, and with two exceptions—those were milk and cheese, where the duty had not been raised sufficiently—in every case the tariff raised the price of the farm products of the United States, and in many cases raised it by the amount of the duty.

Let me take the cattle industry. They put a duty of thirty per cent on cattle. The imports of cattle in 1920 were 48,000 head. In 1921 the imports had dropped to 28,000 head, and the price of cattle went up almost identically with the application of the new tariff. I have here comparative prices of stockers at Chicago and at Winnipeg, as follows:

(1) Steers, common choice. (2) Stockers, 450–800 pounds.

This statement shows that the tariff put the price of stockers up at once and kept it up to an amount equal with the duty.

The prices of fat steers show that in here also there was a similar result. The excess of the Chicago price over the Winnipeg price in each case is shown by the following table:

The excess shown here represents the amount of money that that tariff put into the pockets of the farmers in the United States.

I have also here comparative prices of feeders, which advanced to a similar degree, immediately after the application of the tariff. I am going to ask that these figures be placed on Hansard for the information of hon. members.

I have also gone into the price of beef and I find that the imports ran from 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 pounds per month. In 1921 the imports were reduced to half a million pounds, and the point is this: that the price went up accordingly, when the duty went on, almost as much as in the case of cattle. The results are shown in the following table:

[Mr. McGibbon.]

So we find that the price of beef almost doubled, and that the price started to advance almost as soon as the tariff was applied.

Now this is something that will probably interest my hon. friends from Saskatchewan. They have been asking what can be done in the case of wheat. I am going to state what the American tariff did for the American grower of wheat. I have here the price of No. 1 northern Manitoba, and the price of wheat at Chicago and Minneapolis—and I want them to take notice because under a condition of free trade the price of wheat normally would be greater in Winnipeg than it would be in Minneapolis. With the application of the duty that condition was reversed, and when the higher duty went on the price went still higher. Now let me give the figures showing the excess in Minneapolis. They are as follows:

January, 1921	.11
February	.06
March	.01
April	.03
May	.03
June	.01

Then they get the application of the tariff, and hon. gentlemen will note the advance:

July	.13
August	.08
September	.21
October	.27
November	.29
December	.26

That is the excess in the price at Minneapolis over the price in Winnipeg. I have also comparative prices as between Minneapolis, Winnipeg and Liverpool, which hon. members can read to-morrow if they wish. I will ask that the statement be placed on Hansard. The statement is as follows:

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): In respect to what year is my hon. friend quoting?

Mr. McGIBBON: I was quoting the prices in 1921 before the application of the Fordney-McCumber tariff. That tariff went into effect in May and I gave the prices which ruled afterwards. The prices in every case went up immediately after the duty was put on, so that the farmers of the United States are getting the benefit of the duty in dollars and cents.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): My hon. friend cannot quote the prices of one year ago?

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not know that I have them. They would not be applicable anyway. The point is this that you get certain prices; in May the tariff was put on, and then the prices go up immediately.

Now I will give the comparative prices for potatoes.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): If my hon. friend studied the grain prices for the past two years he will see that his argument breaks down entirely.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am not prepared to admit that for a moment. I am quoting from the report made by the tariff commission to the United States congress. That is a body of competent men, and they make the positive statement that the price of every one of these articles has gone up practically by the amount of the duty. Surely these men know their business; they do nothing else the year round. They made this report to congress and in it they worked out the operation of the Fordney-McCumber tariff. Now I have the price of potatoes here. Probably my hon. friend will dispute them, but I will give the prices in Montreal and in Boston. I want my hon. friend to pay attention to the excess price in Boston over Montreal. The figures are as follows:

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. gentleman has been quoting the price of wheat, beef and potatoes, three commodities of which the United States does not export a great deal. Will he quote the price of corn last fall?

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member says they do not export these products?

Mr. VALLANCE: Not to a great extent.

Mr. McGIBBON: Why, the United States grows 2,800 million bushels of corn, and exports about 300,000,000 bushels.

Mr. VALLANCE: Can you tell me what the corn crop of the United States was?

Mr. McGIBBON: I have got the figures of the corn crop here; I will give you anything you want. Now I am going to deal with the price of butter. I have the comparative prices of butter in London and New York. The commodity that makes the price fluctuate in these two markets is the Danish butter, is it not? If my hon. friends will study these figures to-morrow they will find that the price in London was in excess of the price in New York right up till the month of June. On May 27 the tariff on butter was applied, and immediately the balance fluctuates to the other column and the price at New York is ahead of the price at London. Do my hon. friends want anything more definite than that? The comparative prices of butter in detail are as follows:

Now I will give my hon. friends some information about corn. The duty on corn was raised to 15 cents a bushel. The United States is the greatest corn producing country in the world, producing three times more than any other country. They grow over there 2,800,000,000 bushels.

Mr. VALLANCE: What was last year's price?

Mr. McGIBBON: I have not got that.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does the hon. gentleman want to hear it?

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not know whether I want to hear it or not?

Mr. VALLANCE: What influence has corn on the price of wheat in the United States?

Mr. McGIBBON: The same influence as any other food has. Now then what happened? Imports before 1913 were less than 100,000 bushels a year. They made them free in that year, and the imports thereupon rose to 12,290,000, and from 1915 to 1920 they averaged 5,210,000 bushels. After the tariff went on, what happened? Only 91,000 bushels came in. And what was the the effect on the price? Before that, down in Buenos Aires, the other market for it, the price was 25 cents more than the price in Chicago, and after that the United States price went ahead of the price in Buenos Aires. That was the effect on corn—a difference of twenty-five cents a bushel.

Now I take up the question of cheese. The duty on cheese was not raised to any considerable extent. It was increased from 20 per cent to 23 per cent, but the change was not sufficient to have any effect on the price. We see practically the same result in regard to milk, because the duty was only two cents a gallon and it had no effect on the price. Now we come to beans. The duty on beans was raised from 25 cents a bushel to $1.20. In 1920, before the duty went on, the imports were 2,094,646 bushels. In 1921, after the duty was imposed, the imports dropped to 274,058 bushels, and the price rose from four to seven cents a pound. That is what the tariff did for the farmers in the United States in regard to beans. Then I come to wool, and I find that the raise in the tariff made an increase in price of 25 to 35 cents a pound. One of the greatest industries of the United States is cotton. The effect that the tariff had on cotton was to raise the price six or seven cents a pound. That is what it put into the pockets of the man who was growing cotton.

I have a good deal more information as to other articles, but I have given enough. The point is that the American republic, by reason of the fact that they have a scientific board which is working day and night studying these questions and applying scientifically the principles of their tariff policy, have increased the price of practically every farm product in that country and have put hundreds of millions of dollars in the pockets of their farmers. I wish the Minister of Agriculture were present to-night; I would like to get into his head the idea that the farmers of the country can be protected as much and more than any other class of people, and it is on their behalf I am speaking now. I have not used half the material I have here before me, but I think I have used enough to show this government that what it wants is a scientific tariff board to tell us when duties should go up and when they should come down, and that tariff board should apply not only to industry but also to the great farming population of this country.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Before entering upon my address proper, I would like to pay a little attention to the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. McGibbon). He has directed considerable of his attention to the growing of potatoes, wheat, corn and other products in the United States. I think I shall have time to touch only on the question of wheat. I found some difficulty in following his reasoning when he stated that the United States placed a duty on Canadian wheat at a time that wheat was lower in Winnipeg than it was in the United States.

Mr. McGIBBON: No, I did not say that. I said that normally under free trade it would be six or seven cents higher in Winnipeg than in Chicago or Minneapolis. That statement is accepted by everybody. I showed by an application of the tariff that, instead of it being higher in Winnipeg, it was much higher in Chicago.

Mr. MILLAR: About that time a duty was placed on Canadian wheat, in order to prevent it from going to the United States. I must take issue with my hon. friend right at the start when he says normally wheat is higher in Winnipeg than in the United States.

Mr. McGIBBON: Everybody accepts that.

Mr. MILLAR: It is exactly the opposite.

Mr. McGIBBON: I must insist that the hon. member quote me properly. This is the third time the hon. member has failed to do so. I said that under conditions of free trade everybody accepts the fact that it is higher in Winnipeg than in the United States.

Mr. MILLAR: My hon. friend said normally under free trade the price of wheat would be higher in Winnipeg than in the United States; therefore I must flatly contradict his statement, for the reason that the United States have a hundred million odd people to feed and in Canada we have only ten million. We have to sell our wheat on an export basis, we cannot get above it, while in the United States hard wheat is nearly always—in fact you may say always—above an export basis, at a premium. He has made the statement in reply to a question that the United States do export wheat. That is quite true, but it is not hard wheat. There is great demand for their hard wheat to mix with the soft wheat, and they pay a pretty high price for it. Hard wheat is always above the price in Winnipeg; what the Americans are exporting is soft wheat. My hon. friend has given figures in regard to the United States that are absolutely useless, for this reason: they do not take into account the premiums paid for protein. Nearly all the wheat in the United States is handled on a protein basis. The figures referred to what is called a standard price, and that is the standard price which is paid for wheat with about eleven per cent protein. Then they pay a premium of a few cents up to fifty cents a bushel. That is not taken into account; therefore the figures are entirely useless. If his figures are equally reliable in regard to corn, cheese and other commodities—

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has there been any change in the relation of protein content to the value of wheat before and after the going into effect of the Fordney-McCumber tariff?

Mr. MILLAR: I do not think there has been very much.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then what was it that increased the price?

Mr. MILLAR: I will come to that. The hon. gentleman spent a good deal of time trying to convince the House that when you place a duty on a commodity it usually raises the price. That is what we have been trying to convince our friends for a good many years; yet the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) stated last session or the session before that if we increased the duty on farm implements the price would not be affected, but would remain the same. I am pleased to find that the last speaker agrees with our view of what is sound economics, that under ordinary conditions when you protect an industry or commodity you are going to raise the price. He will not need to spend one minute to convince me that when the United States imposed a duty on Canadian wheat when Canadian wheat was lower in price than the American wheat, the effect was to increase the price to the American farmer. Certainly it was.

Mr. GOTT: The same would apply to butter.

Mr. MILLAR: Yes. Let me point out, though, that the ultimate effect to the United States farmers was quite different from what they expected. They gained something in price on the commodities protected; but the ultimate effect, when they took into consideration the extra price they had to pay for what they purchased, the protected implement, the protected clothing and other protected commodities that they had to buy, meant a net loss to them of $301,000,000. That is, they took the bait, believing that protection was going to help them, was going to enrich them. I suppose it was made very attractive by the manufacturing industries of the United States the same as it has been in Canada, and having taken the bait they expected that they were going to reap a great deal of benefit thereby. But when an accounting was made and they found they had suffered a net loss of $301,000,000, I find now that the farmer bloc in the United States have turned against the high tariff and they are crying out against it. I believe they are appealing to congress to make a change.

Mr. FOSTER: From what authority does this accounting the hon. member speaks of emanate?

Mr. MILLAR: The Farm Bureau of the United States.

Mr. FOSTER: Is that the American Farm Bureau?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes.

Mr. FOSTER: Located in Chicago?

Mr. MILLAR: I do not know where it is located, probably Washington, but I am not sure.

Mr. FOSTER: I am afraid my hon. friend's figures are away out, because I have the records in my office.

Mr. MILLAR: It is a confederation of farmers. It may be located in Chicago. I cannot say where it is located.

Mr. FOSTER: The figures are not in line with the figures published by the bureau. They may be from some newspaper.

Mr. MILLAR: They were printed, I believe, in the Grain Growers' Guide as being the official figures from this federation, and I give them as such.

A remark was made by the last speaker (Mr. McGibbon) regarding the flooding of the prairie provinces with butter from Australia, and I believe he said it was working eastward into Ontario. I would like to read an extract from a report of a statement made by a trade commissioner from Australia.

Australia is Canada's second best customer, ranking second only to Great Britain, declared Sir James Elder, K.B.E., Australian trade commissioner to the United States, addressing the Canadian Club here to-day.

This is by a representative from Australia to the United States just a few days ago:

"During 1925," said the speaker, "Australia imported $105,000,000 worth of goods from the Dominion,—

That is the Dominion of Canada.

—or an average of $3.60 per capita. And in that same period Canada only sold an average of $3.90 per capita in Great Britain."

Now let us get the comparison between Canada and Australia.

[Mr. Millar.]

But this trade balance has been all in favour of your country, Canada only importing $6,500,000 worth of Australian products or an average of fourteen cents per capita.

We heard a few minutes ago a statement as to the country being flooded with Australian butter, and we have heard a great deal of that of late. These are the figures of the trade commissioner of Australia himself, who states that Canada during the year imported fourteen cents' worth per capita, while Australia received of Canadian goods $3.60 per capita.

Mr. FOSTER: How many millions?

Mr. MILLAR: I gave the figures a moment ago. Australia imported $105,000,000 worth of goods from Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: That is an error. There is a tremendous disparity between the imports and exports and it is much in our favour, but I think it was $19,000,000, or $20,000,000, and not $105,000,000 worth, that we sold to Australia. There is an error there but the hon. member can take it that for say the last six or seven years the disparity has been at least ten to one in our favour. It does not alter the point.

Mr. MILLAR: If the hon. member is correct I am willing to accept his statement, but I would like to ask if those figures, that is, the $3.60 and the fourteen cents per capita, are also in error.

Mr. STEVENS: The comparison would be about correct.

Mr. MILLAR: That serves my purpose pretty well. In that case, why should we make such a tirade about this country being flooded with Australian butter? I believe this statement is sound, that if all the butter were available for sale at one point in Canada and competition were playing its part, not one pound of Canadian butter would be exported as long as the price in Canada was above an export basis. Who would be foolish enough to export his butter to Great Britain or anywhere else and receive thirty cents a pound when he could sell it right at his door at thirty-two cents a pound? I do not know of anybody who would do that. As long as the price is one cent above export basis, he would sell it at home and the price must come down to export basis before the export of butter would start. That would be the situation if all the butter were available in one place.

But Canada is a big country. There may be a lower price in some provinces, than in others; the price may be higher in one part of Canada and lower in another, or at a time when there is a shortage of production, when there is a possibility of cold storage plants cornering the commodity and raising the price, they may take advantage of the situation and export some butter in order to increase the price at home. At no other time is there an opening for Australian butter, because the market that is open to us for the export of our surplus is open also to Australia on equal terms. It is unreasonable to think that Australia would export butter to Canada when the price here is on an export basis, when the same market that is open to us is open to them.

But the provision that is included in the Australia treaty does affect the cold storage people, and they are the ones who are making the noise. I may add that they have been given considerable assistance by the politicians. In fact I wish the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) was in his seat. I was in Woodstock a short time ago and some people there were so unkind as to say that he was active in seeing that a little Australian butter was thrown on the market at Woodstock for sale. I do not know about that, but they were unkind enough to say so

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Was it any better than the cheese he gets in this House?

Mr. STEVENS: It is very easy to make reckless charges in the absence of a member.

Mr. MILLAR: Ditto. We must remember that the hon. member is not always absent. If he wants to make any reply he has an opportunity.

During the past four years we have heard so much about blue ruin and the dry rot that was eating into Canada, we have heard so much about the disaster that would follow in the wake of this government's policy, that we were led to believe that the country was going to the bow-wows: the people were all going to get out and, in short, national bankruptcy would ensue. Some people began to wonder seriously whether there was really anything in these "whispers of death". They knew that we had passed through strenuous times and that we had a considerable national debt as a result of the war, and they were naturally concerned about the financial condition of Canada. Well, the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) a few days ago has set these fears at rest. Even the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) —I hope I may refer to him in his absence— said he would take no objection to the statement of the Minister of Finance that the condition of Canada had improved in the past four years. From time to time statements have appeared in the press to the effect that our trade returns during that period were much better than they had been before: our post office returns were increasing, as were also the returns from our customs, even with the rotten conditions which have prevailed in that department during several years past, and which will be admitted now in every corner of the House. Even under those conditions the customs returns increased, as did also the clearing house returns. There was a better feeling throughout Canada, according to these reports, and now we have absolute proof that the conditions have improved. This has placed my friends to my immediate right in rather an awkward position. They do not like to admit that they were false prophets; they do not like to admit that the country did not go to the bow-wows. But I am willing to give them credit for being sufficiently Canadian and sufficiently patriotic to find some joy in the fact that the country has improved. How were they to get out of the difficulty? I must confess that I find a great deal of inconsistency in the reasoning of hon. gentlemen to my right. Every time anything bad has happened to Canada the government which has been in power during the past four years was to blame; the country, we were told, reacted at once to the policy put into effect. But if any good fortune fell to the lot of Canada it was because Providence was smilling upon us and the sun was shining; the government were not entitled to any credit. I cannot understand that. Surely if the policy of the government is effective at one time, if it is going to react upon the country, it will be effective and will react at another. I thought it rather unfair for hon. gentlemen to indulge in this sort of criticism. I know that the government can well defend themselves and I have no brief for them, but it struck me as rather inconsistent that the government should be blamed for everything that was bad while for anything creditable Providence was praised. Whenever there was prosperity it was because of Providence and the virility of the people. Surely when hon. gentlemen prophesied during the past four years they knew that the people were industrious. I can understand that they might go astray in their prophecies if there were many unknown factors to reckon with, but they should at least have known that the people were industrious. Now they seem to be surprised to find that this is so.

On page 2625 of Hansard the hon. member for Fort William said:

> But there is a Providence, they say, which looks after drunken men, and I presume the same Providence looks after governments who are drunken with the desire to hold power in spite of the wishes of the people.

If the hon. member had added, would-be governments, there might be some force in what he said. If desire is any guarantee of immunity from danger a number of gentlemen who sit on front benches to my right might climb to the top of the tower of this building and throw themselves over, without dashing their foot against a stone. They would be perfectly safe if desire had any protective charm.

The same hon. member goes on to ask what the workingman and the small farmer are to get out of the budget. It strikes me that this is a workingman's and a small farmer's budget. True, the small farmer may not have an automobile, but the reduction in the customs duty may place an automobile within his reach. That is where many of the small farmers will gain. Does it not ultimately benefit the small man, who has not an income of $3,000, that the man with this income will be relieved of taxation? Is it not well with the small salaried man if the man who employs him, the man with whom he has to deal, is prosperous? Is not the country going to react favourably to such a budget as this? As a matter of fact, is there not already a wave of confidence passing over Canada as a result of the budget proposals? Will not the budget help the man who has not an income of $3,000 and the small farmer who has not an auto? If there is prosperity with some classes, that prosperity will filter through to the small man and there are none who will not feel the effect in the long run. This, to my mind, is the poor man's budget.

The hon. member for Fort William mentioned two instances in which he said the income tax would have an undesirable effect. He referred in the first place to the widow who was receiving an income from dividends. Well, it may be that occasionally in the readjustment an individual may pay a little more now than formerly, but this will happen in very few cases. The fact, however, is that a great many wealthy men have been escaping income taxation in past years by investing their money in such a way as to draw non-taxable dividends. If that is the case the government did a wise thing to tax dividends. The other illustration the hon. member gave was rather amusing. It was that of an old couple who had reached the ages of seventy-three and seventy-four—I am speaking only from memory, of course,—and who, as I gathered from his remarks, were scraping along on an income of $4,800 a year. I think he said that these people were in the autumn of their days, and he lamented the fact that in the readjustment they would pay $4 more in income tax than they formerly did. Now, surely if dearth of grounds upon which to object is any proof of a good budget this is an excellent one. Just think of the old couple with an income of $4,800 having to pay $4 more than they paid before! Is that such a serious matter? There are thousands of couples of seventy-five years of age and over who have worked long and hard in the heat of the day and who have not a quarter of that to live upon.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. MILLAR: Because of the corporations to which you are so friendly. While my leader was speaking an hon. member said to him, referring to the income tax, "So long as you don't have to pay it." I thought that was a harsh remark. I have under my hand figures to show that the farmers of Canada do pay very little income tax. These figures are for 1921, but I suppose what was true then will be largely true now. These are the totals in round figures: employees, $11,000,000; manufacturers, $8,000,000; merchants, including wholesalers and retailers, $7,000,000; professional men, $2,000,000; farmers, $601,000. Although our farmers paid only this comparatively small amount in 1921 it is a considerable increase over what they paid in 1920. It has been thrown in our faces many times that the farmers are not paying income tax. I could pick out homes where the conditions are very sad, and I am sure were I to describe the poverty, the distress and the long hours of labour I would bring tears to your eyes, but I will refrain. There are thousands of our farmers in the east as well as in the west who are slaving long hours and have much less to live on than is enjoyed by the average citizen in a city like Ottawa. When adverse conditions overtook them after the war, particularly in western Canada, when the prices of the commodities they were selling dropped very low while the prices of the commodities they had to buy were still high, many farmers found themselves in straitened circumstances, and in some cases their children had to wear old bags for protection, their parents being too poor to buy them the necessary clothing. In one case a banker told me he went to see a farmer on business and found his wife, formerly a school teacher, out stooking, and she said, "I am helping my husband to stook in order to save money enough to buy coal for the winter." And yet because our farmers do not pay a large proportion of the income tax an hon. member says tauntingly, "As long as you don't have to pay it." The money of those farmers has gone in many cases to pay the exorbitant prices that the combines have been able to exact, and with that exaction they have been able to monopolize a great share of the actual wealth and comfort that should belong to all. And yet a few are not satisfied and would throw out such taunts. The farmers are not paying more income tax simply because they have not got the income on which to pay it, not because they are lazy, not because they are indifferent, not because they are inefficient, not because they are failing to do everything they should do to maintain their homes and raise their families. Many a farmer has been compelled frequently to make great personal sacrifices when his family required medical care. Members of the medical profession in this House know that, especially if they are practising in the country. It may be that members of the farmer's family required dental care, but had to do without it for lack of money. In a word, the farmer and his family have to make sacrifices that the average person in our urban centres seldom gives him credit for. After going through such painful experiences it is not a pleasant thing for them to be told they are shirking their duty.

The member for Fort William—perhaps he will read this in Hansard, so I will give him the benefit of it in his absence—made the statement that this government could have removed much more taxation if they had economized more. Well, I remember some three years ago when the hon. member made an excursion into this region of economy and attacked the expenditure involved in sending certain delegates to the Wembley exhibition. Thereupon the ex-whip of the Liberal party, who was interested in the matter, came back at him with some figures that showed apalling extravagance under a former Conservative regime, and, figuratively speaking, the doctor was carried to the hospital after his opponent got through with him. This government is guilty of extravagance, and I know of no government that has not been. This is partly the fault of the governments themselves and partly the fault of the people. What took place in this city not very long ago? Perhaps some of you may not like to hear it, but you are going to. This government discharged some four thousand civil servants during the last four years because of pressure being brought to bear that the departments had become very much overstaffed since the war. What was the result? I believe that action of the government was a large factor in their losing the two local seats in the last election.

I have heard it said many times that the civil servants almost as a bloc turned against the government. There is the difficulty. When the people reach the high standard that they will say, "We do not want anything for our constituency unless we have a right to it and it will be for the good of Canada as a whole," then we shall have cleaner government. I do not know that the Conservative party has any better record in regard to economy than the Liberal party; perhaps both parties are about equal. But there is one thing the Conservative party did which I have always given them credit for, in fact I have shouted it sometimes from the house tops. I refer to their cleaning up of the Printing Bureau. Every time any government does something that is really courageous in bringing about economy, every section of the House ought to give them credit for it here and in the country, and not take advantage of it at election time.

The hon. member for Fort William propounded a rather strange theory. He said that in some cases if you raised the duty you raised the price, and then if you lowered the duty you again raised the price. He tried to explain it in this way. He said, "You lower the duty"—I do not know whether he mentioned automobiles, but that will serve the purpose as well as any other commodity—you lower the duty on automobiles until you ruin the Canadian manufacturer, and immediately the foreign manufacturer will raise his price; so that while you have lowered the duty and destroyed your own industry you find you have to pay a higher price for the foreign made article. Let us analyse that statement. What is it that prevents the Canadian manufacturer of automobiles or of any other commodity charging a higher price now? Is it not the competition of the American manufacturer? If the latter were to raise his price without the duty changing, would not the Canadian manufacturer follow it up immediately? Does anyone believe he would not? If the American manufacturer were to say, "Never mind the duty; I will not sell my commodity in Canada except at an increased price of 10 per cent," do you suppose the Canadian manufacturer would still sell at the same old price? Of course not; he would raise his price at once. The remarks of the hon. member for Fort William may be true where one man has control or a virtual monopoly of a small community. What would prevent the American manufacturer from raising the price of his product in Canada as soon as the Canadian manufacturer was put out of business or crippled? Simply the competition among the United States manufacturers. A short time ago congress prevented an immense bread merger, so hon. gentlemen will see that if there is any combination in restraint of trade it is prevented by legislation. With so many industries and so many manufacturers in the United States it is not conceivable that a combine could exist to the extent of raising prices in Canada; competition would keep the prices down. There is nothing in the argument that in certain cases when you raise the duty you lower the price and when you lower the duty you sometimes raise the price. It is true that when you put on a duty you raise the price; if there is any importation of the article at all the effect is going to be to raise the price. We have known that for some time, and apparently some of our friends are coming to the conclusion that it is true, although for some time they thought the fact to be otherwise.

The hon. member for Fort William, speaking at page 2627 of Hansard, said:

> It is no part of the policy of the Conservative party to allow unfair prices to the people to be put into effect behind a tariff wall by manufacturers of automobiles or any other manufacturers.

I think I might also use his own words when he stated that that was a thing for the government to forget, but I would change the words to say, "That is a thing for the Conservative party to forget, and for the people to remember." When did the Conservative party, or any other party controlling the destinies of Canada, put through legislation to control effectively the combines of Canada? It has never been done.

What have the Conservatives said in regard to this matter of automobiles? They want to wait for another year and refer it to the tariff commission. That is exactly what the automobile manufacturers want. They have enjoyed enormous profits during the years they have had high protection, and I suppose they thought if they could get it put over for another year there might be another election, with the high protectionist party back in power, and they would be all right again. It was apparent to many in this House, however, that the protection was too great. Any matter requiring investigation will be thoroughly investigated before action is taken, but with the enormous profits enjoyed by these companies as shown by figures which I could quote, many of which are already on Hansard, there was no reason why we should wait and take the chance of being beaten out later on.

The hon. member for Fort William has said that on almost every occasion on which the people have had the opportunity of voting on the tariff they have voted for protection. I can quite understand that. Those who saw the deputations of manufacturers around the city during the last few weeks; those who know something of the influence brought to bear on parliaments in the past by those who tripped around the corridors, entertaining and lobbying, will understand. They were led astray at times, led to vote for protection; even the labourer was sometimes led to believe that it was in his interest, that it meant a full dinner pail. They are becoming wiser now, however, in regard to that question. The attitude of organized labour is expressed in these words, which appear in the Toronto Star:

11 p.m.

> If a tariff wall is built in order to protect special interests and special industries against competition from foreign manufacturers, certainly when manufacturers protected by such a tariff wall reduce the wages of their employees below the subsistence level, the government, in all fairness, should reduce the tariff schedules and tear down the tariff wall which has been so skilfully built. It is the purpose of the president of the American Federation of Labour to bring these facts to the attention of Congress, and to insist in the name of the working people of America that the textile manufacturers who have inaugurated and carried out a policy of wage-reductions shall be deprived of special privileges and special benefits which they have enjoyed from high-tariff protection.

Tariff protection is intended first of all to pay dividends; dividends are seldom if ever cut until wages are cut; if wages are not cut the shop is shut down to part time, or perhaps both. It is a delusion and a snare to believe that as soon as an industry has secured protection by legislation it is going to be generous enough to open its heart and pay the highest wages possible. They will pay as little as they can. We have plenty of evidence in this connection. The St. Louis Post-Despatch asks:

> If the tariff has failed to protect American wages and standards of living, but has inflated the costs of the workmen's clothing, why should it be continued?

We find among the labourers a doubt and a suspicion that what they have been told in the past of the benefits of protection is a delusion and a snare. Here is something rather interesting, to which those who believe in high protection might very well listen. I am sorry that I cannot give the name of the paper from which it is clipped, but I can assure the House that it is a clipping from a paper:

Canadian manufacturers do not, as a rule, oppose increases in the tariff. The following "Election Notice" posted in a large Toronto factory is, therefore, interesting because it is different:

"We have no desire to dictate to our employees how they shall vote in the coming election, but we want them to vote intelligently.

"The increase in the tariff will increase the cost of the materials used in our goods, and will compel us to raise our prices."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLAR: I do not hear any applause from the opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLAR: Thank you; I am glad you wakened up.

"This will restrict their sale and so reduce either the number of employees or their hours of labour, or both.

"Incease in the tariff is increase in taxation, and is followed by increase in cost of goods, increase in cost of labour, and in lower demand for labour.

"Will that make Canada prosper?"

Mr. PRICE: What proof has the hon. gentleman that the manufacturers of automobiles in Canada are making an undue profit? The government has appointed a commission to investigate these profits and the conditions surrounding the manufacture, but what proof has my hon. friend for the statement he makes? Will he kindly answer that question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MILLAR: I will certainly answer the question. First of all let me say that I do not know what meaning my hon. friend attaches to the term "undue profits." However. I will give an illustration of what I would call an undue profit.

Mr. PRICE: You do not know anything about the matter.

Mr. MILLAR: The original investment of the Canadian Ford Company in 1904 or 1905 was $62,500, and they gave a like amount to Mr. Ford for his goodwill and patents.

Mr. PRICE: Will the hon. gentleman kindly state what profits they are making?

Mr. MILLAR: Please sit down until I am through.

An hon. MEMBER: Take your medicine.

Mr. MILLAR: The present plant is now capitalized at $31,000,000, although the original investment was $125,000, or, to be accurate, $62,500 exclusive of the interest given to Mr. Ford. Now the company have made most of this $31,000,000, less $125,000, by charging from $150 to $250 above the American price for every car they sold in Canada. I would call that an undue profit.

Mr. PRICE: That is no answer at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PRICE: I should like the hon. gentleman to tell us now—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PRICE: —what he is talking about. I should like to know what profits they have made.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PRICE: If the hon. gentleman has any information on the matter I should like him to state it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Give the boy a chance.

Mr. MILLAR: As there seems to be a desire for further information I have no objection to the Speaker calling it 11 o'clock. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Friday, April 23, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford) moved that the first report of the select standing committee on Industrial and International Relations be concurred in.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): What is the subject matter? Is it simply a question of printing?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the name of Mr. Morin (Bagot) be substituted for that of Mr. Cardin on the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Motion agreed to.

INCORPORATION OF OIL COMPANIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): I desire to call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that in the province of Alberta there is a large number of companies whose applications for charters have been accepted, to whom promises of the issue of charters have been given and who acting on that undertaking have actually entered into contracts with drilling companies. I notified the Secretary of State that I intended to ask this question to-day, in order to ascertain what the government was prepared to do and why the charters were not issued.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Acting Secretary of State): I received the notification of my hon. friend that he was going to raise this question to-day. The number of people who are asking for incorporation of oil companies at the present time is simply appalling, and the matter has been engaging my attention for some time. It is a matter of very considerable importance. I expect to reach a decision to-morrow and will inform my hon. friend in regard to it, but those to whom intimation has been given, as has been suggested, that they would receive their charters, will receive them.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Will the hon. Minister of Justice inform us if the government has yet considered the report of the Civil Service Commission regarding the permanent revision of salaries of civil servants?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The matter has been submitted to a sub-committee of the Privy Council which is considering it at the present time.

POLICE ON DUTY AT PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (South Winnipeg): I ask the Prime Minister, why the necessity of such a large force of police as that on duty between half past eleven and half past one to-day?

Mr. CAHAN: To keep the members away.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I submit that my hon. friend should address his inquiry to Mr. Speaker, as His Honour is the custodian of the parliament buildings.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I may say to the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) that the Sergeant-at-Arms is the custodian of this building and the surroundings are under the surveillance of the federal police. This morning the usual number of police were on duty, and I may add that since one o'clock from all parties, in the Senate and in the Commons, I have received great commendation on the orderliness of the crowd of people assembled here. I take this opportunity of congratulating in the name of the House of Commons the Sergeant-at-Arms and his force, and of course, the people themselves.

CIVIL SERVANTS AND THE WINNIPEG STRIKE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Acting Postmaster General): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) made an inquiry yesterday and on behalf of the Postmaster General I desire to give him the information to-day. The memorandum I have is as follows:

> Representations have been made to the Post Office Department on behalf of the postal employees who were connected with the Winnipeg strike. These representations affect both the men who have been re-employed without regard to their seniority as well as the men who have not yet been re-employed. The matter is now under consideration and when a decision is reached legislation will be introduced in due course.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Then I may take it that legislation will be introduced.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The memorandum states:

> The matter is now under consideration and when a decision is reached—

Of course I do not know what the decision will be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Postmaster General says that when a decision is reached legislation will be introduced.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If necessary, of course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He does not say that.

WELSH MINERS FOR CANADA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to call the attention of the Acting Minister of Immigration to the following news item which appears in the Empire News of Manchester under date April 4, 1926:

> 10,000 miners for Canada.
> £11 a week wage and five years' agreement.
> Big scheme to develop new coal fields.

An Empire News representative cables from Canada news of a scheme to transport en bloc ten thousand experienced Welsh miners and their families to work certain coal measures for a group of British financiers.

It is proposed to pay the miners £11 a week, and group them in little "colonies," so that they will be in friendly and congenial circumstances. A five years' agreement is suggested.

Later on this statement is made:

Major Robbins told me he had just returned from England, having laid the proposition before the British industrial magnates, inviting them, along with their investigating engineers, to visit the mining area here.

He had also laid before the cabinet important data regarding Canada.

"Under the scheme," said Major Robbins, who is a native of Penarth, South Wales, "we propose by the aid of the experienced miners of the Welsh mining district to revolutionize coal mining in Canada and retain in the country millions of dollars that go over the border every year for this commodity."

Can the minister give us any light on this proposed immigration scheme? If it is so, will he kindly outline it a little more definitely? If not, in view of the unemployment in this country will the actual situation in Canada be given to the people in Great Britain?

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, April 22, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night at eleven o'clock I was being pressed to give information in regard to profits made by Canadian automobile manufacturers. Considering the action that I and others in this corner and other parts of the House have taken who voted some time ago for a resolution to reduce the customs tariff on automobiles, I think it is only fair to give such information as is asked for. It is our desire to get at the facts. If at any time we present what seems to us to be facts and they are proved to be otherwise, we are willing to yield.

I will give the profits in connection with the Canadian Ford automobile factory. In 1925, the earnings of this company amounted to $6,131,352 on an issued stock of $7,000,000 This is what was asked for. They earned in the year 1925 what would have been equal to a dividend, if paid, of 82.73 per cent. I understand that the full amount was not paid, but a dividend of 20 per cent was distributed. Now that the cut has taken place in the customs tariff on automobiles, provided that the company are not able to make any profits during the coming three years, this will still leave sufficient for them to pay a 20 per cent dividend for each of those three years and have 2.73 per cent left. Those figures may not be right, but they are taken from the Financial Post of February 12, 1926, which is, I believe, a very reliable paper.

In connection with that I wish to read from a clipping taken from a paper called Labour and this will close my remarks in regard to automobiles:

An investment company of Minneapolis, Minnesota, is urging its patrons to buy stock in the Ford Motor Company of Canada. This plant is located in Ontario, right across the river from Detroit.

The circular urging this investment points out that the Canadian Ford Company has paid $9,000 in cash dividends on every $100 originally invested; that for fifteen years it has paid an average of 32 per cent cash and 75 per cent stock dividends per year; and is all set to go ahead to still greater prosperity.

It happens that W. E. Raney, a distinguished citizen of Ontario,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLAR: (Reading):

—has analyzed and explained this extraordinary prosperity. What is not due to Mr. Ford's well known methods of massed production is due to the Canadian tariff of 35 per cent on automobiles. Mr. Raney summarizes the result:

"In a general way and roughly speaking, the Canadian purchaser of a Ford car of one type or another paid from $150 to $250 more than he would have paid if there had been no protection to Ford automobiles made in Canada."

What the Canadian tariff enables Mr. Ford to do in Canada, the tariff enables the textile trust and the aluminum trust and other trusts to do in America, and in the same way, by overcharging the consumer.

That is all that I wish to say in regard to automobiles except that I might refer in a few remarks to the delegation that is here to-day.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Would the hon. member be good enough to give the profits of the Overland, Dodge and Durant made in the same period? Hon. members always quote the Ford company.

Mr. MILLAR: I cannot be expected to carry all that in my head.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): You do not want to.

Mr. MILLAR: I suppose, if I had given the Dodge hon. gentlemen would have asked for the Ford.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Raney might have carried it in his head.

Mr. MILLAR: I believe that the company about which hon. gentlemen ask is part of General Motors, which is really an American concern. I take it that companies that are manufacturing under similar conditions and under the same tariff, if they are equally efficient and have the same mass production ought to make about the same profits. I have cited one instance and it is open to any hon. gentleman who speaks after me to prove that I am wrong.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): The Dodge and the Durant are independent companies.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MILLAR: The hon. member will have an opportunity to speak later; I would rather not be interrupted now. The delegation that is here from Oshawa is one of importance, and I desire to make a few remarks in reference to it. It is rather a formidable delegation and one which I have not the slightest wish to treat lightly; indeed, I believe that these people are sincere and are convinced that they have a grievance. What I saw on many of their banners led me to believe that they were taking the matter seriously. If I mistake not there appears on one ensign the declaration that they are fighting for their homes and families. Now there are very few members in this House who would willingly do anything to endanger the homes of Canadians in any part of the country. I am absolutely sure we are all anxious to do justice to every section of the community. In connection with this matter some of our members have made a very exhaustive study, having spent, not weeks but months on it; and during the discussion that took place recently on the automobile situation we have all of us, I believe, listened with the greatest care to the various views that have been put forward. We have weighed the matter very carefully, and we have not taken action before being thoroughly convinced.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Which one of you took the action? We thought it was the government that was taking action.

Mr. MILLAR: When I speak of taking action I am referring to the support we have given to the reduction which has been made in the tariff. I may remind the House that a resolution in favour of such a reduction was moved a short while ago by a member of this group, so that in one sense action was first taken in this corner.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLAR: Hon. gentlemen to my immediate right occasionally have an hilarious spell, but I noticed that during the presentation of the budget their faces were so long it would have cost some of them a dollar to get a shave. If I may proceed without further interruption, I want to say, speaking for myself alone, that the matter having been decided, the time for negotiation is past. If, however, it is found that a readjustment in small details in any respect will facilitate matters, I have no objection.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Is this an announcement of the government's now?

Mr. MILLAR: I do not need to have eyes in the back of my head to know where that "meow" came from. In reference to the delegation, I do not think there is a single member in this corner of the House who would willingly vote for the reduction that has been proposed if he believed that it would force Canadians out of the country. I am convinced that after the water has been squeezed out of the stock and the industry has been made efficient, as in many instances I fear it is not, it ought to operate successfully. Some of the companies, I know, are efficient but others have not perhaps been operated as economically as possible, because effect of too much protection is to lead to inefficiency. So that after all efforts have been made to promote efficiency I am sure that the motor industry can continue to operate without lowering the standard of living of its employees to a level which we should not like to see reached in this country, a level lower than that which obtains in other walks of life in which men are engaged in similar labour and under similar conditions. If in future, after a thorough investigation by the tariff board, it is found otherwise, then it will be time enough to take further action.

There were some engaged in the manufacturing of implements two years ago who believed that the reduction on farm machinery made at that time would injure their business, and while I do not propose to give any names, I know that some of these people have found that as a matter of fact they have been able to prosper to a greater degree than before. The reduction did not work out the way they expected. If, therefore, the people who are here to-day in this delegation will put their shoulders to the wheel, making up their minds to rise to the highest state of efficiency, they will find that they also can operate successfully. And, those who are buying automobiles among whom are many returned soldiers, just as there are in the delegation, will be able to get their cars at a lower price, while the feeling that now prevails in the country, that an industry has been receiving too much protection, will have been removed.

I want to refer briefly to a statement made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), that the western farmer is being given protection in the way of freight rates. That is a common fallacy. There are in the esat, I believe, many people who are under the impression that the west is being bonused, that our grain is being carried at a freight rate that represents a loss to the railways. An official of the Canadian National Railways recently made the statement that the western wheat crop was carried at a loss of $6,000,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Who would know better?

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MILLAR: When I have finished this. It is surely rather strange that the railways make their best net profits in the months when they are carrying our grain. If they are carrying that grain at a loss, how is it they make a greater profit at that time than at any other period of the year? Yet that is what they do. What does that statement mean? Does it mean they lost $6,000,000 by getting less than they would have got under the old rate? When he was asked to give the proof, he stated that he would do so, but later he changed his mind and, I understand, stated he would give the commission an opportunity of looking through the accounts. If any member of this House or any officials of the railways can prove that the freight rates in western Canada, not on wheat alone—we would like the figures on wheat to be separated and see where we are at on that traffic—but taking the freight rates with the express rates, are less than they are in eastern Canada, we will be quite willing to equalize them. It might be news to some people who say that the east is carrying the west in this way to find that the freight rates on other commodities are considerably higher in the west than they are in the east. Statements have been made that our railways are losing money because they are carrying freight at rates less than those prevailing in the United States. True, they are carrying grain for a less rate, but all the conditions must be taken into consideration. A railway official in United States when laying the difficulties that United States railways have to face before a rate tribunal in North Dakota made this statement:

> A large number of figures showing the amount of track operated by the two railroads, and comparisons on the rate of taxes per mile and per $100 revenue, were produced by the witness.

The two lines were the Great Northern and the Canadian Pacific.

> He declared that the Great Northern in 1924 paid taxes at the rate of $1,243 per mile, while the Canadian Pacific paid $311 per mile.

That in itself enables our Canadian railways, other things being equal, to carry commodities at a lower rate.

Mr. McGIBBON: Might I ask the question now?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does not the hon. member know that in a return prepared by the statistical department, and presented to the House by the Minister of Railways of this government which my hon. friend supports, it is stated that the operating ratio on wheat is $1.26?

Mr. MILLAR: I shall require a little further information before I answer that question.

Mr. McGIBBON: The explanation is that it cost the railway $1.26 to do a dollar's worth of business. In other words, that is the operating ratio.

Mr. MILLAR: Was that on wheat alone?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes.

Mr. MILLAR: Without further information I would not undertake to deal with that statement at the moment. Considerable effort was made by an hon. member last night to show that if our farm products were protected we would be better off—at least that was the implication. He stated that farm products in the United States were protected, and in every instance they rose in price. There is just one serious oversight there. If you have two lakes separated by a ridge of land, and you cut away that ridge, the direction of the flow of water will depend on which lake is higher. Now, it is quite understandable that in the United States, where the prices of those commodities are higher because of the larger population, protection is sure to raise those prices; but to jump at the conclusion that the effect would be the same in a sparsely settled country like Canada, where we are exporting all those commodities in large quantities, and where the prices are lower than on the other side of the international boundary, is to say the least rash; such an argument is fallacious. Can you imagine that a tariff against American wheat is going to raise the price of our commodity? Why, never! Suppose there were no tariff, would the Americans ship their wheat over here when they can get several cents a bushel more in their own country? It would only be practicable for them to ship to some corner of Canada inaccessible to our wheat supply and close to an American wheat field. There a certain quantity will pass backwards and forwards it is true, but you cannot protect by a customs tariff a commodity where the price is low against the similar commodity of a country where the price is high. It is useless to attempt it.

In conclusion let me say that we from the west will always strive for greater unity of thought and action throughout the Dominion. There are difficulties in the Maritime provinces, and I hope that something will be done to overcome them, to assist the people there to get back to a sound economic basis. Notwithstanding the great wilderness of a thousand miles between central Canada and western Canada, I hope there will be nothing but justice and fairness on the part of all. We ask no more. In the past I am afraid those outlying parts of the Dominion have not received that fair consideration to which they were entitled. One reason why it is difficult now to get back to a basis of fairness and justice is that errors were made in the past; too much protection in some cases and too much government assistance in others were given to certain favoured sections. We are striving only for the square deal. There is no thought on our part to injure the manufacturing or any other industry. There is no wish on the part of anyone in this quarter of the House, so far as I am aware, to get back at those who have accumulated large sums of money. They may have gained their wealth fairly, they may not, but if they are using it properly, if they are investing it to give work to other Canadians, we have no desire to injure them in any way. We would, I believe, readily take action to extinguish that class which has gained its money by means that are questionable, by exacting too high prices for the commodities it has sold, by securing from governments grants of natural resources in the way of timber limits and mines. We desire to prevent a recurrence of that state of affairs. But as a representative from the west, I can say that we want to pay our share of freight rates and everything else, we want to do justice by all the other parts of Canada. With the limited knowledge I possess, Sir, I am striving to understand our national problems so that I may vote intelligently with respect to their solution. In short, I desire to do justice by all and give favours to none.

Mr. PETTIT: In what respect have the Maritime provinces not been fairly dealt with?

Mr. FORKE: Leave that to the Maritime people themselves.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on the budget it is not my purpose to follow at any considerable length the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. There are just one or two things on which I would like to touch very briefly. The hon. gentleman referred to the statements issued by the railway companies in such a way as to lead one to believe that in his opinion at least, and in the opinion of those who think with him, the statements as to earnings and operating costs cannot be relied on; that when the Minister of Railways brings down a statement in this House to the effect that it costs more to earn a dollar than the dollar itself in handling grain in western Canada under the present freight rate, the statement is misleading, and the officials who prepared it are not making a correct statement.

Mr. MILLAR: I made no comment on that statement; I refused to comment on it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I submit that the only conclusion we can draw from the remarks of the hon. gentleman and from similar remarks made in regard to that question is that the hon. members are not prepared to accept as genuine the figures presented to parliament by the Minister of Railways. At the moment it is not my purpose to go into the transportation question at any length, because a time will come later when we may deal with that. In the meantime I might just put to my hon. friend and those who sit around him this question: Do they feel disposed to support a government that would wilfully issue false statements in order to deceive those who invested their money in the construction of what is now a portion of the Canadian National Railways? That is exactly what is being done, if the statements—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to ask if it is appropriate for the hon. member to say that the government wilfully issued false statements in regard to this matter. I noticed the right hon. leader of the opposition conferring with the hon. member; I hope this language does not emanate from him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The right hon. gentleman referred to me, and I have the right to make a reply. The language used by the hon. member was not given him by myself, but I support every word of it, and every member on this side of the House supports it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the Prime Minister feels it necessary for me to go around the House borrowing language, there is no one to whom I would rather go than the right hon. leader of the opposition. But let me repeat my statement. I simply asked my hon. friend whether or not he questions the reliability of the statements given to this House by the government as to what it costs to earn a dollar in the transportation of grain under the rates now existing in western Canada. My hon. friend implied that he was not disposed to accept these figures as genuine. The figures are given by the government; there is an issue of $25,000,000 of income bonds against the construction of the Canadian Northern Railway, the lines of which are to a very large extent in western Canada. These income bonds provide that interest will be paid to those who have put their money into the construction of that line, just as soon as that interest is earned. But no interest has been paid since 1910. Why? Because the government, which is in reality responsible for the payment of the interest, says that the freight rates in western Canada did not make it possible for the railway to earn the interest. Let me again ask my hon. friends; if they feel, as they say they do, that the statements are not correct and that the government or the servants of the government are issuing these statements for the purpose of deceiving these bondholders, do they consider that in supporting the government they are representing the feeling of the Canadian people? I submit, Sir, that if the Canadian Northern Railway, now a part of the Canadian National Railways, is earning the interest on that money, the people who purchased these bonds have a right to that interest, and it is for the government and my hon. friends to discuss now as to who is right and who is wrong.

Mr. FORKE: Would the hon. gentleman mind stating what he means when he speaks of the lines in western Canada?

Mr. NICHOLSON: All lines west of Port Arthur and Fort William. My hon. friend knows as well as I know that when anyone refers to the railway lines in western Canada and the special rates on grain in western Canada, he refers to those parts of the railway lines west of Port Arthur and Fort William.

Mr. FORKE: To Prince Rupert?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The special rates only apply from prairie points to Port Arthur and Fort William.

Mr. FORKE: Then let me remind my hon. friend that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway said that if Mackenzie and Mann had been content to build railway lines to Fort William they would have been the richest railway men in the world.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend finds a very easy way to beg the whole question. What the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway said with regard to Mackenzie and Mann has no bearing on this question. My hon. friends contend that the special rates applicable on grain from prairie points to Fort William and Port Arthur give an adequate return to the railway company for the traffic handled. I am not going to stop at the moment to dispute that contention, but I do say that the government supported by my hon. friends has given to this House and to the country a statement that these rates are not equitable, because the lines do not earn their operating costs in the handling of grain. My hon. friends can take one of two positions; if they support the statement of the government they deny their own statements; if they support the statements made by themselves, they charge the government with deceiving the people who put their money into these bonds. That is clearly the issue.

Referring to the delegation which waited on the government this morning, my hon. friend said that there were very few members of this House who would wilfully injure any class of people in this country. I think perhaps that is true, but the great difficulty is that this country is in such a position, in regard to its national government, that all that is required is two or three men desiring to do something, and the government gets down on its knees and yields.

Just one other point, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend said—and this is an additional warning to the delegation which arrived here this morning—that the time for negotiation had passed. When did the time for negotiation begin? When was there an opportunity given to the manufacturers of automobiles or to the representatives of the men who are engaged in this industry to come and lay their case either before the government or the tariff board which the government have appointed to deal with tariff matters?

Mr. MANION: Or before the Progressive party?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, or before the Progressive party? When did my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke), before he reached the decision to hold the gun to the ear of the Prime Minister, ask these men to come here and lay the facts of their case before him? When did he do that? When? But now that the axe has fallen—

Mr. MILLAR: Is there any reason why, at any time since the House met, a delegation from Oshawa could not have come here if they wished to present their views to the Progressive party?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if my hon. friend thinks that all those who are engaged in industry in this country are capable of reading the minds of my hon. friend and his friends to know just who is going to be singled out next? What reason had the automobile industry to expect that this attack would be made upon them? They had the definite declarations of the Prime Minister, made from one end of this country to the other, and made specifically in the Speech from the Throne delivered at the opening of this House, that the tariff would not be touched until an independent body had given the matter consideration. I am sorry he is not in his seat, but I wonder if my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) is worrying in his home town whether he should come down here and present his case to the government, and ascertain whether the duty is to be taken off furniture next.

The next point on which I would like to say a word is this: My hon. friend says: If, after investigation by the tariff board, conditions are found to be such that this industry cannot carry on, we will reconsider the matter. They will reconsider, not before the industry is closed, not before these workingmen are forced to leave Canada. No, but after they have gone to the United States to get work, then they are prepared to listen to any representations they may make as to whether there is any possibility of re-establishing themselves in this country.

My hon. friend referred to the implement industry, and to the fact that it was found that certain firms engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements could carry on notwithstanding the reductions made in the tariff. That is true. I believe some of them are carrying on, but let me from memory just give you the statement of Mr. Vincent Massey in relation to that. Speaking in the county of Durham, where he was a candidate for the House of Commons in the last election, he said: When the duty was taken off agricultural implements, there was very great concern in the agricultural implement industry, but we waited on the government. Who are we? Mr. Vincent Massey. Then what happened. He says: Concessions were made to us by taking the duty off steel and other products of allied industries which go into the manufacture of agricultural implements, with the result that we were able to carry on and make just as much money as before. But, Mr. Speaker, the steel industry went out of business.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Did Mr. Massey say that the steel industry of Canada went out of business?

Mr. NICHOLSON: It was not necessary for him to say that. I will come to that in a moment, and tell of conditions of which I have personal knowledge, to show what has taken place in the steel industry.

Passing from the remarks of my hon. friend, and before touching on what I really want to say in relation to the budget itself, I ask your permission, Mr. Speaker, to refer, as my hon. friend did, to the delegation that came to Ottawa from the industrial centres all over the province of Ontario and parts of Quebec to present their case to the government this morning.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Were there any people in that delegation from the province of Quebec, and if so, who were they?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I did not take a census of the delegates, but I had the privilege of listening to His Worship the Mayor of Ottawa, who introduced the delegation, and he definitely made the statement that there were present representatives of a large number of municipalities in the province of Ontario as well as some in the province of Quebec. If His Worship the Mayor of Ottawa made a statement that was not true, then I submit my hon. friend can discuss that matter with His Worship.

Mr. PARENT: Discuss it yourself. You are speaking now.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If my hon. friend does not like to have the province of Quebec linked up with the province of Ontario even in a matter of this kind, he can settle that matter also for himself. I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am confident that anyone who looked into the earnest faces of these workingmen and their wives, who paid their own transportation costs to come here and present their case, could not be otherwise than impressed, and very greatly impressed, with the seriousness of the situation that faced them when they would undertake to do what they did at very great expense and sacrifice to themselves. After all, Mr. Speaker, they are Canadian citizens. Many of them have demonstrated that very fully; I shall not refer to that at the moment. I take it that the tradition of the fitness of things in relation to a question of that character is this: That the first citizen of Canada, in the person of the Prime Minister, surrounded by his government, will be prepared to receive any delegation of Canadian citizens presenting their case, it matters not what it is; that he will be prepared to consider the justice or injustice of their claim; that he will receive them in the dignified manner in which the Prime Minister of Canada should receive them; and that he will hear their case and either give them a decision or advise them that he will take the matter under consideration and give them a decision later. That is what one would have expected from the Prime Minister to-day in connection with the delegation that waited on the government in the railway committee room. But what did we find?

First, the Prime Minister, accompanied by the Finance Minister, went to see these people where they had assembled in a downtown theatre, and there he made a speech to them, and what was the character of that speech? Just perhaps what one might have expected from him. He told them in his speech in the theatre that his government were prepared to hear what they had to say, to consider the representations made, and reach a decision; perhaps not exactly stating it, but at all events leaving the impression in the mind of anyone who listened to him that the government had an open mind on this question. But as I said, he was accompanied by the Finance Minister, more inclined perhaps than the Prime Minister seemed to be to state definitely and at once what was in his mind. He stated: "So far as I am concerned, I stand by my guns," thus administering a rebuke to the Prime Minister for side-stepping the issue in the first place. Then what followed? The Prime Minister met such of the delegation as could be accommodated in the committee room, but instead of meeting that delegation as he and the government should have done, what did we listen to? A political speech pure and simple. I venture the statement that never before in the history of this country have men been called upon to listen to a Prime Minister meet a delegation of Canadian citizens as the Prime Minister did this morning and listen to a statement such as that. What, after all, did it amount to? As I stated, it was purely and simply a political speech, and if it was not designed to deceive the delegation, then the words uttered had absolutely no meaning at all. The Prime Minister in the first place said: The government is in the hands of parliament. What does this involve? The government comes down with this legislation. Does the Prime Minister mean to say that parliament had anything to do with the preparation of the budget? I am perfectly aware of the fact that the budget was prepared under the dictation of my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke), without any question; but parliament had nothing to say in connection with it, it is the first time I submit, in the history of this country where a Prime Minister, in connection with the budget statement, comes before a body of Canadian citizens and says: In relation to our budget we take no responsibility. We wash our hands of the whole thing. If it suits parliament all right, and if it does not suit them they can do as they wish with it. That practically is the statement, but the Prime Minister went further, and let me say again, if his words were not designed to deceive that delegation and to make political capital out of what he said to the delegation, then they had no meaning at all. He undertakes to fasten on the opposition in this House, or members of parliament here assembled, responsibility for the position the government took in the matter. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) would have been entirely out of his place if he had even presumed to meet that delegation or to say anything to them. It was the government's business, but notwithstanding that fact the Prime Minister takes advantage of the opportunity, when no member opposed to him could with decency even interject a remark, to undertake to fasten on this side of the House the responsibility for what has taken place. And in doing so, what did the Prime Minister say? He stated that no member of parliament in this House had moved a resolution or taken one step to remove the grievances that these people were complaining of. It is true the Prime Minister did not use those exact words. He stated that no member of this House had taken any step or moved any resolution to restore the tariff. Has any member of the House, except the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), the right to submit a resolution to restore the tariff on an article which the Minister of Finance has taken off. Let us see what hon. members on this side of the House have done. On Tuesday April 20, my hon. friend from Fort William moved this amendment to the budget:

4 p.m.

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> In the late general election campaign assurances were repeatedly given by the Prime Minister and other ministers of the crown that before further tariff changes were made an opportunity would be given industries affected thereby to be heard before an advisory board.

After reciting the entire resolution this is the conclusion of it:

> And this House regrets that in the case of drastic changes announced in the budget such assurances have not been fulfilled.

The language of the memorandum presented to the government, placed in the hands of the Prime Minister by the delegation this afternoon, was practically identical with the language used by my hon. friend from Fort William in that resolution—the only language that could be used—the position taken being that the assurance was given by the Prime Minister during the election campaign, and assurance given in the Speech from the Throne that these matters would receive consideration, and that this whole question would be referred to the tariff commission appointed by the government. But the Prime Minister, endeavouring again to make political capital out of the tragic position in which these workingmen and women find themselves, makes the statement—let me repeat—which if it means anything, had for its purpose nothing more or less than the deceiving of this vast delegation of Canadian citizens: "that no member of this House had made any effort or moved any resolution to grant these people redress."

Passing from that and coming to the budget itself, I desire to deal only with three phases of it, first, the public debt; second, the changes that have been made in the taxation, and, finally, the tariff changes and their relation to the whole industrial and economic life of this country. Perhaps I might be pardoned for repeating from memory, if I can, what was said by the hon. gentleman from Brandon (Mr. Forke) in the introduction to his speech a few days ago, when he congratulated the Minister of Finance on the manner in which he performed his difficult task. Whether we disagree with the hon. member for Brandon on other things or not, we agree with him that the task which was put in the hands of the Minister of Finance by the hon. member for Brandon and those who support him, was indeed a difficult task for the Minister of Finance to perform, because those of us who know the Minister of Finance know that he realizes just as well as any man in this House and out of it the effect the budget will have on the industrial and economic life of this country and on Canadian citizens generally.

Coming now to the statement of the Minister of Finance in relation to the public debt, we had again the same profuse assurances with regard to the abundant revenues and reduction of expenditures and of the public debt; and as I listened to the statement of the minister, I could not help but feel, how long are the Canadian people going to submit to have an annual financial statement given to them by the Minister of Finance ,or by those who prepare the financial statement for the minister, which, if made by the president or directors of an incorporated company on which to secure a loan from the bank, would land them behind the bars. In reality that is the character of statement we have been receiving because of this fact, that the annual statement, and particularly this annual statement, does not disclose the actual conditions in relation to the public debt of this country. It does not disclose what our assets and liabilities in reality are. The minister says we have a surplus of revenue over expenditures, ignoring entirely $18,000,000 of bonds, referred to by my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) last evening, issued by the Canadian National, ignoring entirely $63,000,000, the amount which the Canadian National went into debt last year, and wiping out the so-called surplus, and making a deficit of $50,000,000 on these two items, ignoring entirely the bond issue of $5,000,000 guaranteed in December last, to what we termed in this House previously and may term again, the 1925 election campaign fund railway, which is being built up in northern Quebec. There in the aggregate, Mr. Speaker, is $85,000,000 in these three items entirely ignored, and that is the character of statement we have.

I do not intend to go any further into the general financial situation, because I know that, as soon as his health is sufficiently recovered, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) will deal with this question exhaustively.

Coming to the reductions in taxation, there is no question, Mr. Speaker, and everyone will agree, that it is time Canada put her house in order, and reached the point where there would be genuine reductions in taxation, and if I might digress for a moment again, I would say that if the government would give some consideration to the complete reorganization of the finances of the country, they could save $25,000,000 in interest on the national debt, a saving which could have been effected at any time during the years since 1922. Every country in the world with a debt as large as ours has done it. The United States did it, Great Britain did it, and France, notwithstanding all her difficulties, has done it. Germany is doing it and countries in southeastern Europe, the new states created out of the war, have undertaken to fund their debt, spreading it over a long period of time, but we have the government going back and forward, between Ottawa and New York, issuing treasury bills and bonds at six months or a year, and all that kind of thing, at the highest rates of interest, and with the expense of issuing and re-issuing the series of bonds that is involved.

As regards the question of taxation reductions, a reduction has been made by doing away with the stamp tax on receipts, a tax which was imposed by this government itself. There is a further reduction in postage from three cents to two cents, and then there are the changes in the income tax which have been heralded as a means by which the Canadian people are to be saved, perhaps, $20,000,000 to $22,000,000. But, Sir, if you will analyse the provisions of the new income tax law you will find that instead of a reduction in the income tax there has simply been a transference of the burden from one set of people to another It may be that the set of people to whom the income tax has been transferred are the people who should pay that tax; but when the Minister of Finance came forward to make his budget statement, he should have manfully said: I am going to relieve one class of people and impose the tax burden on the other. Instead of that he camouflaged the whole situation by saying: We are making a reduction in the income tax, whereas it will work out as I have stated in transferring the incidence of the tax from one class of people to the other and transferring it to that class of people where it will do more injury to the economic and industrial life of this country than any other kind of taxation that could be imposed.

If the Prime Minister, as he did during the 1924 budget debate, had gone down to New York and surrounded himself with Henry Ford, representatives of the International Harvester Company and representatives of the United States Steel Corporation and asked them to work out a plan by which the investment of money in Canadian industry could be completely discouraged, he could not have arrived at a better plan, because this is what has happened. A man who puts his money, if he has any, into United States securities, Brazilian securities or government bonds, is taxed once; but if he dare invest a dollar in Canadian industry, if he should undertake to do anything for the development of his country, he is immediately taxed twice.

Let us see how the new tax with its so-called reductions works out in relation to the old. On an income of $5,000 that is earned in a Canadian industry, under the old act the tax was $525. Under the new act, you pay a company tax of $450 and an individual tax of $160, making the tax $610 instead of $525.

On a $10,000 income earned in the same way, whereas you formerly paid $1,165, now you pay $1,460 or an increase of $295, because you invest your money in Canadian industry.

On an income of $20,000 secured in the same way, whereas you paid formerly $2,990, now you pay $3,340, or an increase of $350.

How does the new tax work out in relation to the man who invests his money in Canada and the man who invests it outside of Canada? A man who invests money outside of Canada or in non-productive bonds of some character where his money is not doing anything to develop this country, on an income of $5,000 pays a tax of $40. If he is the type of man who wants to assist in building up this country, he pays $490 on the same amount.

On a $10,000 income in the same way, the man who invests his money outside of Canada pays a tax of $290, whereas the man who puts his money into business or industry in Canada pays a tax of $1,190.

On an income of $20,000, the man who invests his money in foreign securities pays a tax of $1,540, whereas the man who invests his money in Canada pays a tax of $3,340 and so on.

The government is not satisfied with that double form of taxation and if a man happens to invest his money in a northern Ontario mine, for instance, he is still further taxed. I may say just at this point that if the government would give some attention to assisting in the development of the vast resources of this country and encourage the men who are willing to go out into the newer parts of Canada and spend their lives and money in building up this country, it would be doing something worth while for the Canadian people. Let us illustrate the matter in this way. A man invests his money in Canadian company A. Company A has a subsidiary company B and company B has a subsidiary company C. That is a common thing. That is the manner in which all these mining industries, water-power industries, lumbering industries and other industrial companies of every character are built up. Company C earns $10,000 and pays $900 tax, turning over $9,100 to company B. Company B pays in turn a tax of $819 turning over $8,281 to company A. Company A pays a tax of $745.29 on the $10,000 or 25 per cent in all. The tax does not stop there. The money is distributed to the individual shareholders and the individual pays a tax on top of that.

The worst feature and, to my mind, the most pernicious feature is this. There are companies organized by families, for instance a man and his sons or a man and his wife. These are what are termed family companies and they exist all over this country. What happens in their case? If in their business for a single year they have an income of $5,000 or $10,000 or whatever it may be, but that income is represented in goods on their shelves or material which they are going to manufacture or anything else, and they are in all probability carrying a heavy obligation at the bank in order to enable them to build up their business, what takes place? The government taxes this income whether it be distributed or not, compelling the man to go to the bank a second time, borrow additional money and pay further interest on it in order to pay income tax on money it was impossible for them to distribute.

In relation to this, as in relation to other aspects of the budget to which I will refer as I go on, if the government had deliberately set out, under the guidance of a group of experts, to devise a policy to discourage Canadians from doing anything to help build up their own country, they could not have done it more effectively than they have done it in this whole system. One is forced, as one looks at conditions that have prevailed and are prevailing in this country and the opportunities with which the country is confronted, to wonder at the stagnation that exists, but after all what can we expect? The two things we require in Canada in order that we can make out of this country what it is designed to be is, first, people and, second, capital, but this whole plan is devised to make it impossible for any man who has money to put it into Canadian industry because he is penalized the moment he does so whether he is a Canadian or not.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Passing on to the next phase of the budget, that is in relation to the attack that has been made on the protective system, in the first instance I am not going to argue that the import duty on automobiles was too high or too low because, frankly speaking, I do not know and at the moment I have no means of knowing. The government in making this attack has not furnished parliament with any information whatever as to the basis upon which it reaches its conclusions. All that we have is the general information which we are able to secure by such means as a private individual can take for himself. We do know, however, that those who are engaged in the business, and who I presume know that business just as well as any other class of people do, say that they cannot carry on. So that, unless there was a deliberate design on the part of the government to destroy the industry, the manufacturers of automobiles should have been given an opportunity of presenting their case and proving whether they could or could not carry on before the government proposed the reduction in duties. That is the first principle.

The total value of automobiles manufactured in Canada last year was $67,000,000. Perhaps I am repeating what is already on Hansard, but as I have not heard the whole situation discussed, and as the matter is of such vast importance, I shall venture to give these figures again. I say the total value of automobiles manufactured in this country during the past year amounted to $67,000,000. Had those automobiles been imported the duty paid upon them would have been $17,000,000, because the cars would have come in at a valuation not more than 75 per cent of the sales price in Canada. Now, the automobile industry itself pays a duty on parts and materials used in the construction of the cars amounting to $7,418,000, while the allied industries pay, on the parts and materials which they import, more than $2,500,000, or $10,000,000. In addition to that the automobile industry has been paying into the treasury of the country $2,000,000 in income tax. This makes a total of $12,000,000 which the industry pays in various forms of taxation. It will be seen, therefore, that the protection represented in that $17,000,000 is not as great as appears on the face of it inasmuch as, if this $12,000,000 is deducted, the actual duty would amount to $5,000,000, or 7½ per cent. And this has no reference whatever to the multitude of industries that are paying taxes in other directions, and which are affected by the reduction in the duty on automobiles.

Of what benefit to this country is the automobile industry? To answer that question it is necessary that I repeat figures that have already appeared in Hansard. The automobile industry empolys 22,000 men, representing a population of 100,000, while it distributes in wages some $32,000,000. But it does not stop there. It purchases materials to the value of $33,000,000 or $35,000,000, thus creating throughout the country industries that are staggering under the blow of this tariff reduction. In its general effect the present tariff reduction, if persisted in, will mean the complete industrial paralysis of a large part of Canada, because the automobile industry was the last rock in the foundation upon which industrial Canada has rested. The previous tariff onslaughts served to destroy a wide range of industries in Canada, such as the glass, woollen, the shoe and the steel manufacturers, and along with these the kindred industries that are necessary to their operation.

If the House will bear with me I will try to show the vicious circle that must be completed when any attack of this character is made upon any one substantial industry. Take the lumber in the provinces of New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario: some people will say superficially that an attack upon the automobile industry cannot react unfavourably upon lumbering. But what are the facts? Fifty million feet of New Brunswick, Quebec, and Ontario spruce and jackpine are used in the automobile industry for conversion into crates and boxes, and in addition to that some 15,000,000 feet are used in the allied industries. What does that mean? It means that another 3,000 men will be thrown out of employment. Hon. gentlemen opposite are smiling blandly; evidently they do not realize the gravity of the situation. Let me tell them that the lumbering industry in New Brunswick, Quebec and northern Ontario is employing in the present year, 1926, only 40 per cent of the number of men they employed between 1919 and 1923. What is the explanation of that? It is due to the fact that industrial Canada has been paralysed by the attacks made by this government upon the tariff. We frequently hear the suggestion that reductions in the tariff tend to make the implements of production cheap, and so encourage the natural industries of the country. Well, if there is any business in Canada that should profit as a result of the implements of production being cheapened that business is lumbering. It was said on the floor of the House a few days ago that, the duties on saw-mill and logging machinery in British Columbia having been reduced, these implements had been lowered in price. But my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Clark) effectively exploded that myth so far as British Columbia is concerned, for instead of such implements used in the lumbering industry having been reduced, they have been made more expensive. And the same thing applies throughout Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick. Prices are to-day 20 per cent higher than they were three years ago on everything you buy. There is this further fact to be remembered; when the lumberman buys a box of Indiana axes or a dozen saws made by the Diston company in Philadelphia, he buys in addition to these tools the box in which they come. That box is made in the United States out of United States lumber by United States workmen, or by Canadians who have been exiled from their own country through want of employment, and who are living in houses built by Americans and incidentally, our own country is depopulated to the extent that such people go over to the United States. So there we have the vicious circle complete.

To come back to the automobile industry. I want to refer particularly to the duty on automobiles going into England, and to comment on the question so frequently asked by my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) and other hon. gentlemen to my left, why it is that our manufacturers, if they can compete in the markets of Europe and in the English market especially, are unable to compete in Canada. Now, if the Canadian manufacturer ships an automobile into the British market he pays a duty of 33⅓ per cent based on the value of the car at point of landing. Including freight, ocean carriage, packing, insurance and everything else involved, his cost comes to 40 per cent, and as he is allowed a rebate of 33⅓ per cent he pays a net duty of approximately 27 per cent. On the other hand, if the English manufacturer ships his car to Canada under the preferential tariff, he pays a duty of 12½ per cent based on the invoice or manufacturing cost, without reference to carrying charges, insurance or packing. Furthermore, the imported car in England pays a license of £1 per horse-power, which in the case of a Chevrolet amounts to $107 and in the case of a Ford to $116.64, which must be added to the duty. France charges 45 per cent flat; Italy, 35 per cent, plus 43 per cent, or a total of 78 per cent; the United States, 30 per cent as the minimum, the duty ranging up to 50 per cent; and Australia 12½ per cent on the chassis. But note that the automobile complete, imported into Australia, pays a duty of $267.20. New Zealand charges 26 per cent on the invoice price, plus 10 per cent on labour, inland freight, ocean freight and so on.

Now with regard to export. The point so frequently stressed against the Canadian industrialist is that he can sell his goods in the world markets. On cars he exports the manufacturer gets a drawback of ninety-nine per cent of every cent of duty he pays on the materials entering into their manufacture. But in his home market he is at this disadvantage, that he must pay a sales tax of five per cent and an excise tax varying from five to ten per cent, according to the value of the car, or fifteen per cent in all. Now, if the desire of the government, as has been stated, was to give the Canadian people cheaper cars, and if the desire also was to give the industry a chance to live, why did not the government take off the sales tax or the excise tax? Instead, they preferred to take off the duty and leave those taxes as a bonus to the United States automobile manufacturers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, it is not my purpose to argue that the duty on automobiles is what it should be, but I do say that if we are to deal fairly with all classes of Canadian industry and all classes of our people, the automobile industry should have been given an opportunity to present their case before their protection was interfered with. If the government were serious in appointing the tariff board rather than simply taking this means of sidestepping their responsibilities and deceiving the people, as they have frequently done by appointing commissions of all kinds during the last four and a half years, why was this automobile industry not allowed to submit their case to the Tariff Advisory Board?

This morning I listened to the Prime Minister address the delegation of automobile employees in the Railway committee room, and I was amazed that he should make such statements to a lot of intelligent working-class Canadians. You will recall, Sir, that last year in Kingston, in Oshawa, and in a score of other places the Prime Minister stated definitely that no changes would be made in the tariff until expert advice had been secured and the whole question investigated. How are you going to investigate a question if one party to it is left out altogether? The Prime Minister stated to that delegation of workingmen and their wives that this whole matter had been under serious consideration during the last session of parliament and during the intervening period, and that the government had arrived at its conclusion only after the most careful investigation. Where did the government get their facts? Was anyone employed in the automobile industry given an opportunity to present the case of the workingmen? The great majority of these men are members of recognized bodies of organized labour, and they could have sent delegates to give the government expert information on the manufacture of automobiles. Where did the government get their expert advice? In the resolution presented to this House by my hon. friend who sits at this desk (Mr. Coote) and in the representations from those sitting around him. No one associated with the automobile industry had an opportunity to say a single word.

But if the Prime Minister was correct in what he said at Kingston, Oshawa and other places last fall, and if subsequent to that we are to assume that some investigation was made and the government reached that conclusion, why did they go further and undertake the deception of His Excellency the Governor General, of this parliament and of the country in the Speech from the Throne? Here is the language they put into His Excellency's mouth:

> We believe that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes; that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the Ministry with respect thereto. A Tariff Advisory Board will accordingly be appointed forthwith. This Board will be expected to make a careful study of the Customs Tariff, the revenue to be derived therefrom and the effect of the tariff and allied factors on industry and agriculture..

That was presented to parliament on January 7, a little more than three months ago. Speaking to the delegation this morning, the Prime Minister said: We have been giving the most careful consideration to this whole question. Then why this paragraph in the Speech from the Throne? I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the reduction in the automobile tariff not only affects that industry, you cannot name a single industry of any account whatsoever in this country that is not also affected by the reduction. When the duty on automobiles and trucks was reduced, I repeat, Sir, the last stone was taken from the foundation of the whole industrial structure of this country. Let me go back over this again:

> We believe that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes.

Does the uncertainty created by the tariff reductions in this budget tend to stability in our industrial life? You could not find anyone in Canada to-day or outside of it who knows anything about our conditions who would be fool enough to invest one single dollar in a Canadian industry in the face of this interference with the tariff, notwithstanding the undertaking given in the Speech from the Throne that no tariff changes would be made except on the advice of the Tariff Advisory Board which was there promised, and which has since been appointed by the government. Again I say, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was either deceiving His Excellency the Governor General and this House when he put those words into the Speech from the Throne, or he was deceiving the delegation in the speech he made to them this morning.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I remind the hon. gentleman that it is not parliamentary on his part to say that either the government or any member of the House has spoken or acted in a way to deceive anyone. I would refer him to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, where at page 63, paragraph 238, he will find the following:

> The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him, in his turn, of misrepresentation, charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind; all these are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference.

The language used by the hon. gentleman a little earlier in his speech was apparently somewhat involved, otherwise I would then have called him to order. Whether it be the government or a member of the House, as I said the other day, individually or collectively, neither can be accused of deceiving. Such language is not parliamentary. I would therefore call on the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling with very great pleasure, and I will say at once that not being able to understand the implications the Prime Minister was making in his remarks to the delegation this morning, nor the language used in the Speech from the Throne, he perhaps was not deceiving either the delegation or parliament.

Just in relation to that matter of stability in industry and the result of this instability, I wonder if the House would bear with me if I very briefly went back over the fiscal history of this country. Those who are old enough will remember the condition which prevailed before the introduction of the National Policy in 1878, and we know the conditions which prevailed thereafter. As soon as the National Policy was introduced the country began to prosper, and continued to prosper until an attack was made on that fiscal policy in 1889. That continued in three different specific phases until 1896—as commercial union, free trade, unrestricted reciprocity and so on. Hon. members will remember all the different phases of that controversy. Then the country became unsettled; those who had money to invest were afraid to invest it; industrial establishment did not expand and the country stood still. There were two political parties in the country, one a declared protectionist party and the other declaring that if and when it came into power it would destroy every vestige of protection.

Then what happened? In 1896 a general election took place; that so-called free trade or commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity party came into power, and the great leader of that party secured the Hon. W. S. Fielding, now Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, as Minister of Finance. There is no man in the public life of this country for whom Canadians have more respect, because of his steadfastness of purpose during the whole of his public career, than the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding. In 1897 Mr. Fielding introduced his first budget, and this is what he said:

> It would be folly not to remember that we are dealing not with the protected manufacturers only but that the interests of labour have to be considered as well as the interests of capital. . . . I hesitate not to say that if we should to-day, by some rash step, do that which some hon. gentlemen say we are bound to do. . . . we would not only break down the manufacturing interests of the country, but we would deal a blow to other interests of a wider and more serious character.

Then again, Mr. Fielding said:

> We submit that it is a wiser policy to wait and see what shall be the outcome of the present uncertainty in the United States. . . . We submit that pending such negotiations and pending the settlement of the American tariff question and a clear understanding of what will be the effect which their policy may have upon the affairs of Canada, it is the part of prudence that we should to-day hold our hands—

Further on Mr. Fielding said:

> I have to tell the House that it is not the intention of the governement. . . . to propose any great reduction in the tariff as applied to those countries which are not disposed to trade with us.

Then what followed? Will anyone disagree when I say that as soon as that statement was issued the Canadian people took heart and the country again went ahead under a protective policy maintained by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and by Mr. Fielding as Finance Minister, just as the country had prospered under the previous government?

The total changes made in the customs tariff, between 1896 and 1911, was less than six-tenths of one per cent, and in many items the tariff was increased. The country continued to progress until the outbreak of the Great war.

We need not go into the conditions prevailing during that period, but what followed? In 1919 Canada had the greatest opportunity that has ever come to a people of the same numbers in the history of the world. Europe was completely devastated; complete chaos followed the war, and millions of people were anxiously looking for some place to make homes for themselves. Canada has the greatest store of undeveloped natural wealth of all the countries of the world. If we had had the vision and the wisdom to maintain an economic and fiscal policy which would have made it possible for us to develop Canada we would have gone far, but again what happened? A political party, more anxious for office than for Canada, declared that if they came into power the tariff would again be attacked, joining with the United Grain Growers of western Canada in their declarations for the wiping out of every vestige of protection afforded Canadian industry.

That party came into power in 1922, with Mr. Fielding again Minister of Finance. In his first budget speech Mr. Fielding practically repeated what he had said in 1897, that we must have stability in fiscal matters. Following that statement there was a reheartening, to some degree at least, of the Canadian people, notwithstanding the fact that the clamour continued for the wiping out of protection to Canadian industry. At the end of 1923 Mr. Fielding's health broke down; he could no longer carry on and a new Finance minister came into office. I do not wish to say one harsh word against my hon. friend the present Minister of Finance, for whom I have the highest personal regard. I will say, however, that he did not have the strength of character to stand up and do what he knew should be done if this prosperity were to continue, so the tariff was again attacked. What was the result? In very much less time than Mr. Fielding anticipated, industrial stagnation has taken place all over this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Hon. members may laugh if they wish, but let me repeat this question, which I have asked in this House more than once. Will someone rise and tell any dozen of these workingmen who have come here from the city of Toronto, having lost their jobs through the closing down of the automobile factories, where they can go in Canada with a reasonable assurance of getting profitable employment? Will anyone answer that question? I say you cannot point out a single—

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Yes; let them come out west and we will give them employment.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will come to the west in a moment, if the hon. member will just have patience. Will anyone guarantee these men permanent, profitable employment in western Canada?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): In western Canada we do not guarantee things; but if a man goes out there he has to work and look out for himself. If any man comes out west and wants to work he will find employment which will give him a fair return for his labour.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about the 10,000 people who went west last year, paying their own transportation, who were unable to earn enough money to pay their fares back home? What has my hon. friend to say about that?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I would say to the hon. member that if that is true surely he should give us some chance, and make the implements of production a little cheaper.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let me tell the hon. member something. I happened to be in western Canada last fall on two occasions during that period, and I assisted men to come back from the west when they were unable to earn sufficient money to bring themselves back home. I will come to this question of cheaper implements of production and give my hon. friend some information if he will just possess his soul in patience for a few moments.

An hon. MEMBER: He farms the farmers.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There are a good many men in this country who are farming the farmers. Let me repeat: That condition has been created in this country, notwithstanding the fact that more than a half million Canadian citizens have been forced to leave Canada during the past four and a half years because they were unable to get employment at a living wage in their own country. I challenge any hon. member of this House to show me a single village, town or city from North Cape Breton to the west coast of Vancouver island to which a dozen of these men who have lost their jobs in Toronto, Oshawa, Windsor and St. Catharines could go, with a reasonable prospect of getting profitable employment. Will anyone undertake to answer that challenge?

Now I will come to my hon. friend's question. He suggests that the farmers of the west be given a chance through cheap implements. That is the theory of the free trader, of the man who wants to destroy Canadian industry: Give us cheap implements! Let me repeat, I know what it means to buy implements, and I say that implements of every variety have increased in price since the cuts were made in the tariff of this country. It is the same with everything else: just as soon as you put yourselves in the hands of the industrial corporations in the United States, the price immediately goes up.

In 1919 a committee of this House carried on an investigation, and they asked the grain growers of Saskatchewan to send here someone who was an expert on the production of wheat. The man who moved that resolution, as a matter of fact, was the then representative for the constituency of Mackenzie, Mr. Reid. Mr. Hugh Thompson, of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, was sent down here by the grain growers of Saskatchewan to give evidence. He went into complete detail in relation to the growing of wheat on 320 acres of land in Saskatchewan, and after he had given these full details to determine the value of machinery of every description he was asked the question: Assuming that the Canadian manufacturer adds the full duty, plus a reasonable profit, to the cost of manufacture, which every sane man who knows anything about the business knows he does not do—but assuming that he did, for the sake of the western free trader's argument, not mine—what effect would that have on the cost of production of wheat on a 320 acre farm in western Canada? Now remember, this man was under oath, and in reply to that question he gave his own figures: he said, six-tenths of one cent per bushel. That would be the effect based on the assumption, which is wholly fallacious, that the Canadian manufacturer added the full amount of the duty, plus a reasonable profit, to the cost of production.

Another witness was brought before that committee to give evidence, this time from the province of Ontario, sent here by the United Farmers of Ontario to give evidence as to the cost of producing foodstuffs on an Ontario farm. It was the Hon. E. C. Drury, the leader of the United Farmers of Ontario, the Progressive party in this province, the man who was going to usher in a new day in the province of Ontario, and who certainly did, but the kind of day the Canadian people never want to see again, and Mr. Drury's sworn testimony was this: If the manufacturer added the full amount of the duty, it had the effect on the cost of producing foodstuffs in the province of Ontario of less than 2½ per cent.

Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker, I know something about purchasing implements, and I know that the price of implements has gone up, and it goes up every time we place ourselves in the hands of the industrial corporations of the United States. May I, in passing, say just one word with regard to that? If there is any country that has given the whole world an example in industrial economics and one that we at all events would do well to follow, it is the United States. From 1866 right down to the present day, taking their whole tariff on the average, the United States has been the most highly protected country in the world, and what have they accomplished under that policy? They have multiplied their population three and one-half times during that period, they have multiplied their industrial wealth almost one hundred times, and with what result? They have raised the standard of living to the highest level known in any country in the world, and their standard of wages is the highest of any country in the world. Their production of implements and of everything else that they produce is the lowest in cost of any place in the world. They sell their steel products in free trade Manchester. Steel rails made by the United States Steel Corporation are laid on the streets of the city of Manchester for the street cars to run on. Hon. gentlemen all over this House have proclaimed that they can buy their goods cheaper in the United States than they can in Canada. Why? The United States is the most highly protected country in the world. They have mass production, and yet some say that we should subject ourselves, our industries and our workingmen, to the competition of that country. I have said a score of times in the last three or four years that unless Canada adopts a different course from the one she has been travelling along economic and industrial lines in the last few years, this generation will see Canada absorbed industrially into the United States. As a cold matter of fact, we are now vassals of the United States industrially and economically. I am going to take the liberty of quoting again an extract quoted by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in the speech he made in this budget debate. It is taken from the bulletin of the United States Department of Commerce, an official document presented to the President of the United States by an official board set up to inquire into all economic and industrial matters. It says:

> Economically and socially Canada may be considered as a northern extension of the United States, our trade with Canada being in many respects more like domestic trade than our foreign trade with other countries. The movement of industrial raw material from Canada into the United States and the return flow of a miscellaneous assortment of manufactured goods is not unlike a similar flow between the west and the south and the more industrialized eastern part of the United States.

Again, quoting from the same report, and if anyone desires to check this up they can do so by referring to page 265 of the bulletin of the United States Department of Commerce, dated November 3, 1924, they say this, in relation to what this government is doing:

> Against the set policy of the Conservative party of building up a thoroughly protective tariff to favour Canadian industries, has been operating the influence of the Liberal party who stand for a moderate level of import duties and a generous measure of preference to empire products.

Again:

> Each of the three budgets presented by the present government have carried changes in the Canadian import duties, and almost invariably downward.

Then here is the sting:

> United States manufacturers have been the principal suppliers to Canada of most of the classes of goods on which the duties into Canada have been reduced during the last three years.

In other words, United States manufacturers and United States citizens, instead of our own Canadian manufacturers and Canadian citizens are the beneficiaries of the policy of this government, and have been beneficiaries for the last four years.

I said a moment ago that we were, if not completely, rapidly becoming vassals of the United States, and that we cannot maintain our national identity if we continue in the course we have been travelling the past few years. Already 500,000 Canadians have gone to the United States in the past five years, and what class of people are they? Are they men and women who came here as immigrants, stayed with us only a short time and then left? Many of them are, no doubt. Last week I took occasion to go to the office of the registrar general for the province of Ontario, in the city of Toronto, and I learned that during 1924 and 1925 the registrar general of this province had issued duplicate birth certificates to native sons or native daughters of the province to the number of one hundred per day, to permit these young men and these young women to become permanent residents of the United States. Has the exodus stopped? During January, February and March of this year the average was something a little over seventy per day.

Last year the Hon. Senator Beaubien put on Hansard—I have not got it here—a statement showing what has taken place in our sister province of Quebec. How long, Mr. Speaker can we continue to export our native-born sons and daughters and maintain our national identity?

5 p.m.

What else? A return brought down in this House prepared by Mr. Grant MacNeill of the Great War Veterans' Association showed that some 100,000 of the men who put on uniform, and pledged their lives to save civilization during the Great war, have found conditions on coming back to Canada such that it was necessary for them to leave this country and go to the United States, and still this movement keeps on.

Let me now quote from the Manitoba Free Press of the 6th of October last: Mr. Johnson, registrar of aliens in the United States, speaking at Providence, Rhode Island, on October the 6th last said:

> A new deportation law and a more easily workable Naturalization Act were advocated by Chairman Johnson, of the House Immigration committee, in a prepared address to-night before the League of Women Voters of Rhode Island.
> Citing "the increasing percentage of arrivals from Cuba, Mexico, South American countries and Canada" Mr. Johnson said these arrivals would provide a basis for fixed quotas!

And so on. Mr. Johnson, the registrar of aliens in the United States, includes as aliens those coming from Canada and those coming from Cuba, Mexico and South American countries. The influx of these people has become so great, Mr. Johnson says, that steps will have to be taken to restrict the number of Canadians, Cubans, Mexicans and South Americans entering the United States. Still hon. gentlemen tell us this exodus is merely a myth. Go into any town, village or country place you like, in any part of Canada, gather twenty-five people together, and ask them if it is a myth. Ask the fathers and mothers of the boys who have gone if it is a myth. I have a letter from a Roman Catholic priest in my own riding pointing out that since October last seven families have left his parish and gone to the United States to find employment.

Hon. gentlemen opposite referred to the steel industry and the effect of the tariff on it. I will deal briefly with that matter, because my hon. friend from West Algoma (Mr. Simpson) will speak on that question later on. The industry to which I refer, the Algoma

Steel Company, is located in his riding. That company operating to capacity would employ 7,500 men, a potential population of 50,000 people. What has happened since 1922? It has not been working half time since that year, and never more than 2,000 men employed in it. I have somewhere under my hand the quantity of pig iron we import into Canada which I will give to the House. But the Algoma Steel Corporation, on account of pig iron being a heavy commodity, and transportation charges being very high, had worked up a business in northern Minnesota and Michigan for the small quantity of pig iron they could produce; they were doing this to give employment to their men, and the total amount exported in 1924 was 3,600 odd tons. The United States did not consider it necessary to raise their duty on pig iron, but the United States tariff board said, "We cannot afford to allow 3,600 pounds of Canadian pig iron to come into the United States. We will put a barrier against it, and not one single ounce of that pig iron will come into our country." This was done notwithstanding the fact that we are importing millions of dollars worth of the same commodity from the United States. I will give the House some figures of what we have imported. I have the latest bulletin issued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, under the signature of J. A. Robb, Minister of Finance, and these figures are extracted from this book. The figures are as follows:

Binder twine	$ 6,671,823
Fertilizers	2,831,411
Paints and Varnishes	3,853,853
Soap	1,128,154
Fire bricks	1,397,342
Cotton yarns	2,718,190
Cotton fabrics, bleached	1,724,189
Cotton fabrics, dyed	10,104,458
Cotton fabrics, printed	1,754,807
Wearing apparel	2,314,234
Miscellaneous glass	7,155,760
Window glass	1,248,712

And three window glass plants in Canada have been closed down as a result of that tariff, which has turned 2,500 Canadians out of employment. Window glass and glass of every description is 20 per cent higher than it was before the import duties were removed and we are now importing our glass from Belgium and the United States. The table continues:

Plate glass	$1,829,007
Hats and caps	2,951,753
Boots and shoes	1,670,054

That is the reason the men have already left their homes in Quebec.

Electrical apparatus	$15,501,301
Pig iron ingots, etc	1,551,783

And yet the Algoma Steel Company is forbidden to export 3,600 tons of pig iron from their plant in Canada to the United States:

Rolling mill products, general	$38,006,810
Tubes, pipes and fittings	3,142,701
Wire	2,648,403
Engines and boilers	11,603,174
Farm implements	11,234,839
Hardware and cutlery	3,369,937
Machinery	30,158,936

Now what has happened to the steel trade? The great majority of these things are the manufactures of iron. That is what has happened to our steel industry. The changes in the tariff have placed the industry at Sydney in a position where it is unable to operate and that is the reason every steel industry in the whole of this country is tied up. The man who will say that the steel industry in Canada has not been ruined knows nothing about the conditions. The table continues:

Miscellaneous tools	$ 1,912,204
Vehicles	36,416,906
Freight automobiles	1,693,369
Passenger automobiles	12,855,940
Automobile parts	20,690,989
Nuts and bolts	4,567,451
Oil cloth	729,273
Paper	9,142,177

They take our raw products to the States and send them back in the form of paper. The next item is:

Pneumatic tires	$ 492,473
Furniture	1,269,331

That is in spite of the tariff my hon. friend from North Bruce enjoys:

Dress goods of wool	$2,643,850

I want to turn to another phase of the matter. My hon. friends to the left say that they are anxious to improve the condition of the farmer in Canada. I heard an hon. member to my right say that it was a case of desiring to farm the farmer. Be that as it may, some of us would like to feel that we are living in a farming country and that we should, if we are going to develop this country, raise in our own country all the farm produce we require. If we destroyed all our industries and reverted to the stone age, surely we should be able to raise enough maize and grind it between two stones to enable us to live. Last year we imported the following:

Agricultural and vegetable products	$196,041,785
Animal products	45,703,203
Total	$241,744,988

If the House will permit, I will put the details on Hansard without reading them, but I wish to refer to one or two special items in connection with this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is it just the figures my hon. friend wishes to place on Hansard?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just the figures to make up the total.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If it is only figures I have no objection.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Those figures are taken from the document from which I have quoted. We imported $12,046,315 of books and printed matter. I had intended to say something about the advisability of placing a duty on American magazines coming into this country, because this item is made up to a considerable degree of American magazines.

Mr. BIRD: I thought my hon. friend was going to comment on that list of articles.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will. I believe one thing that tends to sap our national life is the fact that this country is flooded with United States magazines, and I commend to the government the desirability of taking some steps to encourage the production of Canadian magazines by putting Canadian magazine publishers on at least a basis of equality with United States magazine publishers who are shipping their magazines into this country.

One item in our imports and exports to which I wish to refer particularly is that of settlers' effects. We have been spending an average of $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 a year in an effort to induce people to come to Canada. To me, as a Canadian, it has always gone strongly against my grain to feel that with a country such as we have, it should be necessary to fine-comb the earth and to spend large sums of money in order to induce people to come here while our neighbours to the south of us are spending three or four times that amount of money in trying to keep people out. Notwithstanding that, we did succeed in getting people to come to Canada in 1925 and they brought with them $6,163,523 worth of settlers' effects. But during the same period we drove people out of this country by the policy that we are following and they took with them settlers' effects to the value of $7,540,201. Or, to put the matter in another way, after spending our money we were in settlers' effects $1,376,678 worse off than we were before.

The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) asked me to make some comment on this list of agricultural imports:

Article	Value
Cheese	$2,304,167
Live animals	2,408,507
Grain and grain products	15,409,018
Hides and skins raw	9,185,128

Take note of that. Cheap implements of production! My hon. friends in western Canada are breaking their farms with teams of horses with harness on them that is made out of hides taken off the backs of Argentine republic steers.

Raw wool	$6,545,476
Woollen yarns	2,797,645

Just note this woollen question, for instance. We have practically closed up eighty per cent of the woollen industry in this country, and in the time that we have been doing that we have reduced the number of sheep on Canadian farms by more than one million head. If every single head of sheep that is being raised and maintained on Canadian farms was herded into one flock you could pasture them on Manitoulin island in Georgian bay, and yet we call ourselves a farming country. The complete list of figures I wish to put upon Hansard is as follows:

Manufactured Products That We Could Produce
Binder twine	$ 6,671,823
Fertilizers	2,831,411
Paints and varnishes	3,853,853
Soap	1,128,154

My hon. friends referred to Saskatchewan and the west. I took the liberty of going through Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta two or three times in the last few years. In 1924 I motored 800 miles through Alberta; I met a large number of farmers, went to their homes and discussed their problems and my own. One afternoon I met a group of twenty-five or twenty-six farmers and their wives at a little gathering in a little town in Alberta and we discussed the common problems of Canada. I asked this question: Will you tell me, you men who have been in this country the time you have, what it is that is holding this wonderful province back? Why is it that you are literally standing still? Why was it necessary for the United Farmers of Alberta on one of the days that I was in that province, to hold a meeting, pass a resolution and send it to this government, pleading with them not to send any more men on to the land in western Canada until conditions changed? The answer came immediately: Because we have no markets. One man said: The only thing we can sell is wheat and we have to transport that across two continents practically in order to find a market for it. If one-half of the farmers are hailed out and the world supply is low and the price is high—we can make a living; but if there is a good crop throughout the world the price goes down until we cannot make a living. I will say this to my hon. friends as one of those raw easterners who are looked upon with such ignominy by my hon. friends: I have lived in the open spaces of this country for forty-two years; if the growing of wheat is the destiny of western Canada, then western Canada has achieved its destiny because you are growing all the wheat you can find a profitable market for. If there is a member in this House, either of the government or of any of these two groups that can show me or the House—and I say he cannot—where you can market an increase of fifty per cent in the wheat production of western Canada, I will apologize for everything I have said. But if you do make that increase you cannot find a market for it within the confines of the habitable globe.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. gentleman know that we grow the best wheat in the world in western Canada and does he know that there is always a market for the best products and that there is no danger of our running short of a market for the wheat we grow in western Canada?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I know that we grow the best wheat in Canada in western Canada.

Mr. HOWDEN: The best in the world.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, the best wheat in the world in western Canada, and no one is prouder of the fact that we can grow the best wheat in the world than I am. But I do not know that the rest of my hon. friend's statement is correct, because I do know there have been years when you could not market your crop profitably in western Canada because you had too much wheat. One of those years was 1923, not so very long ago, when the price of wheat in the world market went down to a point where the western wheat grower himself said that it was impossible to grow wheat profitably. I will repeat my statement that if you increase the volume of wheat in western Canada by fifty per cent you cannot find a market for it within the confines of the habitable globe.

Let me repeat what these Alberta farmers, real farmers, men who are endeavouring to develop that country, said to me. They said: If we had a market for our cattle, hogs, butter, cheese and our vegetable products, this would be the Garden of Eden for the farmer. I asked them: Why is it that while the two cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul have been adding half a million people to their population and furnishing a market for the people in the northern and northwestern states, the cities of Winnipeg, Brandon, Moose Jaw, Regina, Saskatoon, Prince Albert, Edmonton and Calgary have added less than 100,000 to their population? The answer is simply this, that Minneapolis and St. Paul constitute the industrial centre for the northwestern states and for a large part of northwestern Canada due to the fact that we are encouraging United States industry to the discouragement of Canadian industry. Is there any reason in the world why Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, with all the illimitable resources they have, should not be industrial centres just the same as the northwestern parts of the United States? None whatsoever. Until the people in all of Canada see that the policy that this country should follow is the development of Canadian industry of every single type on a fair and reasonable basis, Canada will continue to stand still or drift backwards. That is the condition.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): What was the position of the United States farmer just below the line at the same time?

Mr. NICHOLSON: He was getting more for his wheat.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Why?

Mr. NICHOLSON: If hon. gentlemen want to get the details they have only to consult Hansard, and if they do not want to accept the figures there given they may go to the Department of Trade and Commerce of the United States and have them confirmed.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. gentleman think we could get more for our wheat by having a protective duty?

Mr. NICHOLSON: This country would not import wheat anyway. I do not want to beg the question at all, and I will say that in my opinion we cannot enhance the price of wheat by a protective duty. But if wheat growing is to be the destiny of western Canada then I say that western Canada has reached its limit. I can tell my hon. friends what we might do—my hon. friend shakes his head. I will not argue the question further. If any hon. gentleman can submit any facts to disprove what I have said he is perfectly at liberty to do so, but I would ask my good friends to tell us where they could find a market for their wheat except such as they have at present. The world's market for wheat is limited; do not make any mistake about that. And let me assure hon. gentlemen that Russia and eastern Europe are not going to remain forever in the condition in which they have been recently.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. VALLANCE: Was Russia always in that position?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, and when Russia was in the world's market for wheat Canada was producing less than half the wheat she produced in 1924.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, and the United States was exporting more wheat then than she is now. Not only that; we had not at that time the oriental market which is being developed to-day.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does my hon. friend know that 1925 was the largest crop year we have ever had in the history of Canada?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have not the figures before me but I do not think my hon. friend is right. Now, western Canada must do the same as eastern Canada has done; she must create a market out there for agricultural products other than wheat. The western farmer must raise cattle, hogs, sheep and other products of this nature. I heard an hon. member make the statement in this House the other day that we raised enough cattle in the Dominion to supply 50,000,000 people. If that is evidence of the extent of the information hon. gentlemen have on subjects of this kind then I sympathize with them. Why, one industrial city the size of Hamilton consumes more beef cattle in a single year than the whole Dominion exported last year, and that was the greatest exporting year we have ever had.

Before I conclude I want to refer once more to the delegation that waited upon the government this afternoon. As one sat and looked into the faces of those men and listened to their plea, which was characterized by an entire absence of the slightest tinge of anything partisan, a plea for mere justice, a plea for hard-working Canadians to be allowed to live and labour in their own country, one could not help being impressed with their grievances. As I heard one grey-haired veteran relate the condition of the war veterans in the city of Oshawa, I recalled the experience I had some years ago when visiting the battlefields of France and Flanders. Going through that devastated area in 1920, I saw the trench systems, the dugouts, the shell craters, all bearing testimony to the heroism of our soldiers; and above all I saw what was literally a forest of crosses covering the whole area. As I looked upon this scene I asked myself why those 60,000 Canadians were lying there, and why they had made that sacrifice. Why did they leave their homes to lay down their bodies in a foreign country, and why was it that 450,000 other Canadians made the potential sacrifice?—for they were all, every one of them, just as ready to give up their lives. Why was it that these brave men went and fought over there, so many of them dying in the struggle? It has been said that it was done for France. Well, that is true; it was to save France and Belgium. But the sacrifice meant more than that.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the hon. member really believe that?

Mr. NICHOLSON: If I did not believe it I should be the most desolate man in the world.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is the hon. gentleman willing, then, not only to support, but if possible to strengthen, a policy that can only perpetuate international friction and discord?

Mr. NICHOLSON: We may disagree as to methods, but in relation to anything that can by any possibility prevent a recurrence of what took place between 1914 and 1918 there is not a man with a soul in his body who is not prepared to help to the utmost of his power. I am sure that every one of us would do everything under heaven to prevent a cataclysm of that kind ever occurring again. But I ask, what was it that caused these men to go over there and lay down their lives? It was to save France and Belgium, it was to save civilization, it is said. True; it was to save civilization. But it was to save Canada as well. These men made the sacrifice in order to protect the homes of Canadians so that the mothers and wives, the sisters and sweethearts, the women of this country whom my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) represents in this House, would never again be called upon to endure the tortures and to go through the hell of the experience which the women of northern France and Belgium could not escape in those years.

Miss MACPHAIL: Will the hon. member admit that what caused the late war causes all wars? Will he admit that the prime cause was an economic one, and that the protection of women and children was no part of it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will not admit anything of the kind. I will not be drawn into a discussion at the moment as to what the cause of the war was, but I do know, as we all know, that 60,000 of the best of our Canadian manhood went forward and willingly laid down their lives to save Canada in that war, while 450,000 made the same sacrifice potentially, having been willing to die if necessary. Those who were not killed have returned, and their representatives this afternoon appealed to this government for the right to earn their living in their own country. That is all they were doing; they asked nothing but justice. One hundred thousand of their number have already been forced to leave Canada, and as a result of the proposal this government brings down in the present budget thousands upon thousands more of them will be compelled to migrate from Canada to seek employment elsewhere. As I said at the outset, if the government had engaged a group of Wall Street experts to devise a policy that had for its object the transference of the whole industrial and economic life of this country to the United States, they could not have got a more complete plan than that which they themselves have suggested to parliament in the budget now under consideration.

Mr. J. GORDON ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, no section of the budget has aroused more interest than the lowering of the tariff on automobiles. The reason is clear. The man who owns one feels that he will some day buy another. He who does not possess a car always retains a hope. We live alongside the great American republic. Our people cross and recross the boundary line. We read Canadian and American publications. A motor car is a definite thing. We know what it is and we know that motor cars on the Canadian side of the line are approximately 35 per cent higher in price than on the American side. There is here no case for academic dispute.

Hon. gentlemen opposite love to tell us that tariffs lower prices. They try to tell us that if the tariff is applied long enough and high enough the price will come down. They imply, I presume, that the Canadian manufacturers' Association is an organization for lowering prices—they seem to suggest that the Oshawa delegation has constituted itself into a committee to lower the cost of living and that all they seek is a chance to bring down prices to the point that will permit the people to buy! No sane man holds such views. The case was plainly stated by the Hon. A. J. Balfour—now Lord Balfour—when he said:

> The object of a tariff is to raise prices—if it fails to raise prices, it fails in the accomplishment of its object.

I accept the definition of Lord Balfour.

Mr. BURY: Will the hon. gentleman tell us where that quotation is from?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): From a speech made by the Hon. A. J. Balfour during the Chamberlain high tariff campaign.

Mr. BURY: Cannot the hon. member give us the publication?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In that sense protection has not failed in Canada. I quote—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Will the hon. gentleman please give the name of the publication?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I will give it to my hon. friend if he will call at my office in the morning.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am asking for it now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. gentleman kindly give the name of the publication?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet said that I would permit the hon. member to ask me a question.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am merely asking the hon. gentleman a question.

Mr. BOIVIN: You have no right to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it not published in the Moose Jaw Times?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet permitted the right hon. gentleman to ask me a question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Or else he has been misquoted by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Like the Prime Minister.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I quote in this connection a few words from the Automobile Trade Journal. It is published by the MacLean Publishing Company.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Why not give the name of the other publication?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): A copy of the publication was sent to every member of this House. It was full of pleas for the retention of protection. They give the figures showing the increased cost of automobiles. Permit me to read briefly from their editorial:

> We have before us comparative prices upon one line. While the parent concern operates in Detroit there is an extensive Canadian plant, and in the "Canadian Automotive Trade" has been shown a comparison of the American list price and the Canadian list price. We will take one line in particular. In the touring model the increase in the Canadian list price is 36.87 per cent; in the roadster, 37.08 per cent; in the sedan, 37.19 per cent.
> In a higher priced line the increase of the Canadian list price over the American list price is as follows: in the phaeton, 33.33 per cent; the roadster, 39.69 per cent; the sedan 34.22 per cent; the brougham, 34.32 per cent; the coupe, 34.26 per cent; the coach 34.60 per cent.

Interesting, isn't it? The increase all round is a little over 35 per cent—strange numerical coincidence, the tariff also is 35 per cent. But I want to read further, and to stress this item. I hope that my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) who quoted with such fervour the statement in Molesworth's Fiscal Facts and Fallacies that tariffs did not raise prices, will take this message to heart. The editorial goes on to say:

> It is very clear that there is scant advantage of the Canadian protective duty taken here, and we have no doubt Canadian manufacturers generally can show equally forcible statistics.

Note the words, "equally forcible;" that is, equally capable of forcing 35 per cent additional out of the pockets of the Canadian people. We have now reached the point of frank admission by practical men that tariffs do increase prices. Against that may be set the remarks of a theorist like the hon. member for Fort William, who tells us the exact opposite. We may leave it at that, and the public and this House will judge rightly in regard to these contentions.

Now, I want to make myself perfectly clear upon one point. We on this side of the House are anxious to build up the industries of Canada. We are just as anxious—I will not say more anxious—than hon. gentlemen opposite to do so. We hold that these industries would be vastly expanded and enlarged, not by more tariff but by less. Sometimes we are challenged to state if we are absolute free traders. I will answer that question when hon. gentlemen opposite tell us if they are absolute exclusionists? We differ as to what constitutes "adequate protection."

In my humble judgment—and I intend to give reasons for the faith that is in me—the tariff upon automobiles is far too high, and industry generally, including the automobile industry, will profit, and profit greatly, from the lowering of the tariff on automobiles and the other reductions in the budget this year. Let me give a few examples. The tariff on automobiles is as you know 35 per cent. We imported into Canada of dutiable goods during the first nine months of the fiscal year $430,000,000, on which the duties collected were $106,000,000, or roughly 24 per cent. The tariff on agricultural implements runs from free to 20 per cent; on cottons it averages on all imports of dutiable goods 23 per cent; on woollens 23 per cent; on boots and shoes under the British preference 17½ per cent. Why should automobiles be favoured with 35 per cent? May I point out that there is justification for the argument that the duty on autos should be lower than on cottons and woollens? We import very few autos from France, Italy and Germany; in the main they come from the United States. Cottons and woollens do come from these protectionist low wage countries. We have heard the plea of low wages in other countries. It seems to me that automobile manufacturers, not having to compete with the low wage production of continental Europe but rather with the high wage rates existing in the United States, need less and not more protection than the textile industry.

But there is one thing that is supremely British about our manufacturers. It is not their courage—they are far from being courageous; it is not their faith in Canada—barring only the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the Tory party out of office. No single section of the community ever exhibits such evidence of the blues! But they have one British conception—what they have they hold. Give them a toe-hold and they will worm in their whole bodies. They are like cats; let their head but get into a rat-hole and their whole anatomy will follow. Give them the right to exclude some goods to their own aggrandizement and they would exclude all. Yes! What they have they hold, yet by the eternal they ask for more!

Was ever, in all the history of parliamentary institutions, such a spectacle presented as that which we have recently witnessed in this House? The net earnings of the Ford Motor Company of Canada last year were $6,131,352; the original cash investment on which that earning was built up was $63,500. Their "net" on a capital of $7,000,000—and that capital built up out of earnings—was 82.73 per cent. The people of Canada built the Ford Motor Company of Canada; they paid for it out of their own hard earnings, yet Ford owns it. The net gain to him from his investment in this Canadian enterprise was $21,000,000. Yet, their pockets bulging with wealth, their coffers crammed, scattering out melons right and left to their American shareholders, their representative comes suppliantly before this House, and asks that these things shall continue. Meanwhile Mr. Ford himself tells us the industry would profit even by absolute free trade. I want to tell you that lower tariffs will not hurt this giant industry. I want it to prosper, I want it to prosper as the agricultural implement industry has prospered under lower tariffs.

Hon. gentlemen opposite may differ from me in regard to this. For my part I am going to discuss realities; we members from the province of Saskatchewan have long since ceased to live in a land of dreams and nightmares. I am going to make particular reference to one item—binders. If my hon. friends are anxious to do so, we shall be delighted to follow them into further fields. The figures are:

Imports of binders, Fiscal year—
1914	3,770
1920	1,661
1921	3,485
1922	1,316
1923	1,606
1924	3,332
1925	1,091

I am trying to face these figures fairly. I have left out the war years and the post-war years as too much disturbed to indicate real conditions. What do we find under these conditions? In no single year since the Liberal tariff came into force have we imported as many binders into Canada as we did in the placid, peaceful pre-war year, 1914. "Oh," I hear you say, "this tariff has not been long in effect, wait and see." There is something tragic in Toryism, always looking forward to a day of gloom. I have cheering news for you. In the first nine months of this fiscal year we brought into this country—and they are nearly all imported in the first nine months of every fiscal year—only 1,865 binders. That is more than last year, but not much more than half the number imported in 1923 before the tariff was reduced.

May I mention mowers also. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) was alarmed about the imports of mowers. He told us of thousands leaving their native land because of the imports of mowers. Well, here are the figures—in each case they are for the first nine months of the fiscal year:

1923	531	nine months ending December
1924	390	nine months ending December
1925	286	nine months ending December

These are facts taken from our trade reports. I set them up against the dreams—nay more, the hopes—of hon. gentlemen opposite. They were anxious that imports might increase and an industry or two fail so as to give point to their arguments. We must realize the facts: tariffs do not keep goods out, tariffs only make goods dear.

Meanwhile, what has happened to the Massey-Harris Company, our largest manufacturer of farm implements? The figures are:

1921	Loss	$1,456,000
1922	"	643,000
1923	"	409,578
1924	Profit	87,000
1925	"	1,411,174

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. gentleman aware that much of our implement production now comes in in parts because of the reduction in the tariff? They are merely assembled here, which gives a profit to the manufacturer but takes away the jobs of the men.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I know that is done in the motor industry, but I do not know about the implement industry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And it will be done to a greater extent in the automobile industry under this budget.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It is facts like these—and the industrial history of Canada is full of them—which should cause hon. gentlemen opposite to change their ways. Why will they not recognize the facts? Why will they not now, at this late date, admit their error and say: "We have sinned; we have failed to recognize the industrial needs of this great country. It is not a tariff 'adequately high' that is needed for industrial development; it is one sufficiently low"? Will they do it? Well, listen to their wail when the tariff on agricultural implements was lowered. Here are the words of the right hon. leader of the opposition in his address on the budget in 1924:

> There never was a more violent assault on stability in the last thirty years than there is in this budget, nor has the effect of that assault ever been more immediate and more apparent.

That sounds rough, doesn't it? But that is nothing. Hon. gentlemen opposite have wept so copiously since October 29 that the source of their tears has all but dried up. The tears and wails of to-day sound like the sighing of the soft sea waves compared to the outburst when the British preference was first introduced in 1897. Listen to this from Sir Charles Tupper, the war horse of Cumberland—

Mr. ROBINSON: Will the hon. gentleman say who wrote his speech for him?

Mr. McMILLAN: Not the Tory treadmill upstairs, anyway.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Although I do not believe I have any very great ability, I am pleased to say that I am responsible for this speech.

Mr. MULLINS: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I will do as the hon. member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Bristol) did the other day; I do not want to be interrupted. Here are the words of Sir Charles Tupper, the war horse of Cumberland:

> I confess, Sir, that I listened with the most profound astonishment to the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

And to-day the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) patted Mr. Fielding on the back for that budget. But here is what Sir Charles Tupper had to say:

> I did not suppose it possible, whether in one section of the empire or another, for a great parliament such as that which the Dominion of Canada possess, to have presented for its consideration a bill of such entirely illegal and unconstitutional character. I have no hesitation in saying you will search the history of parliamentary government throughout the British Empire in vain to find any parallel for the position in which we find ourselves in relation to the budget speech of the hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Same language to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question, or does he still not hear? Is he not aware that that speech was made with reference to a budget which, finally, never went into effect?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, there is another leader of the opposition misquoted. Sir Charles Tupper went on to say:

> I listened to this most remarkable address with the most profound astonishment because it violated the most plain, clearly understood and well-known laws governing the parliament of Canada. It was in antagonism with the constitution of the country and in violation of everything that hon. gentlemen on either side of the House had a right to expect from the Minister of Finance.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was reading one of the wails of the protectionists in a speech of the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper in the budget debate of 1897: It is quite similar to the wails that we have heard in this House. I will continue it:

> Now, what is the result? The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence. While hon. members gloat, vindictively gloat, over the destruction of Canadian industries, I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal Gazette where one manufacturer after another declared that their industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

What happened is a matter of history not conjecture. No sooner had the government passed that budget than industry sprang into life. Canada went forward as never before. But the wail goes on, and the leader of the opposition kicked about every reduction. Then for a while the Liberals did not do much reducing of the tariff. What happened? The ramparts of gold speech from the right hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie! He was avid for tariff reduction then! My hon. friend kicks at everything. He reminds me of a remark made by a friend of mine in regard to the late Hon. Joseph Martin, a very able man and known to many in this House. He said of Mr. Martin:

> He kicks the living and the dead,
> He even kicks himself in bed.

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

One would think that my hon. friend would get weary, but he holds the courage of despair—despair of ever getting into office!

Now there is another matter to which I wish to refer. My hon. friend the member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) said the other day:

> Who is being helped by this budget? The Americans largely. I know very little help that is being given to Canadians by it. What we have delivered to us here is simply an American budget.

I shall not follow my hon. friend further in this quotation. At this point he brought in the Pyrenees. When these mountains come into the hon. gentleman's speech we may step out.

Well, what do we find? A delegation comes down to Ottawa and asks the government to put back the duty on motor cars to 35 per cent. Who comes? Who are the fiancial interests back of that delegation? Mr. Henry Ford will not be here; he is too big to go on his knees before even this government. Besides, he knows better. Mr. W. R. Campbell comes along and tries to tell us that he knows more than Ford. Listen, Mr. Speaker and hon. gentlemen of the House of Commons, to this petition:

> I am a maker of cars. You have by means of a high tariff given us a chance to make 82.73 per cent out of you last year. The Liberals are trying to change the rules of the game. Heretofore, I have been able to extract that amount for the benefit of myself and my American friends. Be good, please. Please put back the duty on motor cars to 35 per cent.

That is the plea of these American stockholders. But Ford says that increased production would cause even greater progress under free trade.

And what about General Motors, Limited? The entire stock of that corporation is owned by the General Motors Corporation of the United States. Canadians have no direct voice in its affairs. The American parent concern is one of the great industrial organizations in the United States. Its assets are given in Pool's Manual as over $592,000,000. Its net earnings amount to $71,802,000. It controls eight great manufacturing divisions; fifteen accessory groups; eleven affiliated industries; one hundred and thirteen sales divisions; six accessory sales divisions; eight export and overseas departments. This again is closely linked up with the Dupont powder interests who control also Canadian Explosives and Northern Giant Explosives, Limited. We are told now that the general manager of the United States General Motors, says:

> We will manufacture in the United States unless you amend this budget, which lessens by 15 per cent our power to exploit the Canadian people.

Well, I know my answer. I know too the answer of the hon. gentlemen in the front benches opposite. The Duponts and Morgans crack the whip, and the hinged knees of my hon. friends bend! My reply is different. Our ancestors kicked kings from their thrones; manned the tiny ships as the great armada bore down upon England; stood with the martyrs on the fields of death; fought tyrants as tyrants only can be fought—by risk of life and fortune. They would not bow down to the Duponts of New Jersey! I say to our manufacturers: Go back to your factories—devote to business the time now spent on lobbying. You have the capacity and ability for great national service. In Heaven's name do not waste it in seeking for government favours!

My hon. friend the member for Fort William, with all the capacity for mock heroics which fits so naturally on to his ample frame, tells us:

> It will not be long before the international boundary line will no longer exist between these two countries.

I yield not so much as the width of one blonde hair to my hon. friend in devotion to my native land, but I say calmly and deliberately and with a full sense of the meaning of the words: if this parliament is to form its budget under the dictation of the Duponts and the Morgans, then the sooner we obliterate that line the better.

One word more and I am through. Before the English occupied Egypt, when that country was under the domain of the Turk, the collection of taxes was "farmed" out to certain gentlemen throughout the country. These men gave the government a certain amount and they squeezed the hapless fellah or peasant of Egypt to the last drop that was in him. We have developed that custom here. We give to certain United States gentlemen the right to exploit the Canadian people by means of a high tariff. They come over here and build branch factories; they squeeze us to the full extent of the tariff protection we have given them, and they send their profits back to the land of their birth. And hon. gentlemen opposite applaud and cheer and say: Isn't it great? Long live Canadians so they may be exploited by their neighbours!" Well, the British came into Egypt. The exploiters were driven out, and they wailed as every protectionist wails. But the taxes came down; good government was established. "We made a man out of Pharaoh," and in that land of oppression prosperity came. We are going to do that in Canada. Liberalism is alive in Canada; it has found its soul. We have been living in the shadows. You have seen a tree grow up in the woods that way; the foliage is pale and the growth stunted. Then something happens to let in the light and the tree grows; the leaves take on a richer colour, and it reaches out into the sunlight. Above all the others, it stands sun-crowned, a monarch of the forest! Just so with Liberalism. It has had its shadows; there have been dark days when the road seemed hard and the task heavy, but the Liberal spirit has triumphed at last. Its sinews have strengthened; the mists have rolled away from before its eyes; the path before us is plain and straight, and in the light of that clearer vision, not only Liberalism but Canada goes forward to the achievement of a newer and a grander day.

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (South Waterloo): I rise with a good deal of hesitation and timidity after the remarks of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). Belonging as I do to that very much hated class, the Ontario manufacturers, perhaps I may take from the hon. gentleman some very good advice inasmuch as he has referred to those engaged in the manufacturing industry. The hon. member in speaking this afternoon about the wonderful strides which the agriculture implement industry had made during the past two or three years made the statement that in 1925 the profits of the Massey-Harris Company were something over $1,000,000. That, I believe, is quite correct, but he did not inform the House that whereas, under normal conditions, the company employ from four to five thousand men in Canada, to-day they are employing perhaps only fifteen hundred, although their production is larger and they make more money than formerly. The only explanation that can be given for this, in view of the tariff reduction, is the fact that in 1925 they imported on a very large scale from the United States. Instead of making agricultural implements in Toronto they got them from their factories in Batavia, New York. Last year there were brought into Canada a sufficient quantity of malleable iron castings for the agricultural implement trade to keep 150 men employed 300 days in the year. Surely that employment is worth something to Canada.

Something has been said about the amount of steel used in the manufacture of agricultural implements. It is perfectly true that not much steel is actually used in the implement, but I would remind the House that as our machinery makers have to tender with the branch factories of huge United States concerns, a protection of five per cent does not help them to any great extent. The American branches in Canada import their machines from the United States where owing to greater facilities and better equipment the production is cheaper, so that a tariff of five per cent affords our manufacturers little or no protection.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw referred rather slightingly, I thought, to the huge deputation that waited upon the government to-day, and I inferred from his remarks that he thought they were here at the instance of the manufacturers and who were financing their visit. He spoke particularly about the McLaughlin people. Now this is quite at variance with what I was given to understand this afternoon. In conversation with a number of men from Oshawa I learned that in very many cases where the men in the factories were asked to come to Ottawa they said that they could not afford the trip, but that they would contribute their bit to the expenses of anyone who could come. A collection was taken up and contributions ranging from fifty cents to $2 were made. This does not seem to be in keeping with the suggestion of the hon. gentleman that the whole thing was financed and really initiated by the manufacturers themselves. I think the hon. member will find out, as time goes on, and when it is discovered that a vast army of workmen have been thrown out of employment in Oshawa and elsewhere, that the present budget proposal will come home strongly to the government. It is a serious thing for a man to go to work in the morning and find the door locked; he must return to his family in a very depressed state of mind. Surely it is not the function of a government to contribute to such a situation.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. member think that the manufacturers were justified in closing their doors the day after the budget was delivered?

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): I am not justifying the manufacturers of motor cars, but I must point out to the hon. member that what really happened was this: the doors were closed until a readjustment could be made and the manufacturers could ascertain just where they stood. I know of one dealer who went to get cars and who was refused for the reason that the manufacturers could not fix the price, not having yet made the adjustment. Furthermore, the question of storage facilities had to be considered.

The outstanding feature of the present budget is, of course, the reduction in automobile duties, a reduction which was made regardless of the facts and, indeed, without any desire on the part of the government to ascertain those facts. It is entirely a measure of expediency submitted to under pressure from the western adjunct of the government, contrary to the pledges of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the country and also in contravention of the undertaking contained in the Speech from the Throne. I do not intend to quarrel with the amount of the reduction as such, nor do I intend to commend it. Frankly, I do not know what comment it calls for, and I am safe in saying that no hon. member in this House can tell whether or not the reduction in the tariff on automobiles can be justified. On the other hand, perhaps the government has not gone far enough in this regard; or perhaps it has gone too far. One thing is certain, however, no consideration was shown to the motor companies nor to the small stock holders interested in it, and there was an absolute disregard for the welfare of the working people in these concerns. As I understand it, those interested in the motor industry were ready and willing to put all their cards on the table. Therefore I contend that this matter should have been referred to the newly created tariff board, and the tariff lowered or raised, according to the findings of that board. If this was not a case for the tariff board, why was that board created? Surely it was created to be of service to the country, to deal with tariff questions affecting automobiles and other manufactured articles? Or was it simply intended to be a haven for derelict politicians? I would suggest that any industry which may be suspected of making unfair profits under its tariff protection should be brought before this board and investigated. If this were done, I am confident the continual howl that we hear from certain sections of the country would rapidly subside.

The industrial portions of Canada, Mr. Speaker, have been built up by a policy of protection, this policy having compelled large United States concerns to establish branch factories in the Dominion. Is this policy to be ditched now after hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested in plant and equipment and workingmen's homes? Or are we to have a sane policy that will give sufficient protection, and sufficient protection only, to all productive enterprises? In the city of Galt where I live there are five factories devoting part of their space to the manufacture of parts and accessories for motor cars. In some cases these factories have been established by foreign capital brought in under the policy advocated by our leading statesmen. After listening to these letters hon. members will be able to decide whether or not a slight reduction in the price of Ford cars is sufficient justification for curtailing these businesses and throwing thousands of people out of employment. These communications are in reply to letters I sent out. The first is a telegram:

Letter arrived yesterday, but was off sick, so just received to-day noon. Since changes in tariff we are only operating fifty per cent, also night shift discontinued, orders cancelled.

Elliott & Whitehall,
Machine Tool Company, Limited.

The next reply is from the Dominion Tack & Nail Company Limited:

Replying to your enquiry, quite a considerable portion of our business was from automobile makers. This has been cut off, and will undoubtedly result in a loss to our plant and the release of a number of employees.

Here is another letter:

Thanks for your favour of the 20th instant. Now, with reference to the effect the recent tariff reduction will have upon our output, it is at this moment hard to say other than that it will be of a very serious nature. Taking into account the screws and parts which we make, and which go directly into automobiles, and also screws and parts for automobile accessories, which will be indirectly affected, we would say it will affect about fifty per cent of our business.

The main difficulty with this whole matter is that in an endeavour to give automobile manufacturers some redress, there will be an attempt made to further reduce parts and other raw material, which in many cases is somebody else's finished product. In other words, our finished product is the raw material for the automobile and automobile accessory industries. Were we then in turn to seek some redress, we would have to go back at the steel men, such as the Canadian and Union Drawn Steel Companies of Hamilton, which would again in turn affect them. The thing is of such a far-reaching character that if it is at all possible to do so, some supreme endeavour should be made to have this matter referred to the tariff board, which if done would enable not only the automobile manufacturers but all other lines affected would have an opportunity to place their case before them.

This letter is signed by the Galt Machine & Screw Company Limited. I have still another letter which I wish to place before the House. It is from the Galt Art Metal Co., Limited, the managing director of which writes:

I am in receipt of yours of the 20th inst., and in reply would say that the change in the duty as proposed in the budget in connection with the automobile industry, will have the disastrous effect of closing that department of our factory.

We have been doing an annual business of around $100,000 in manufacturing automobile parts for various automobile factories, and last Saturday we received instructions to stop all work. Of course we had to let all the men in that department go, some of whom, I am told, have already gone to the United States.

During the dull times, which all business has experienced. during the past few years, we looked around for something additional which we could manufacture to advantage in order to increase and help out our business. We finally succeeded, after a lot of work and expense, in getting this line going. The result of the change of tariff means that all our labour and expense has been thrown away and we are afraid to go to the expense of taking up anything else, for we cannot tell what will be hit next. Making the change at this time of the year, just when the busy season was starting, has spoiled the business for this year.

That is the story of how our industries in Galt are affected by this reduction in the tariff on automobiles.

While reading the clause in the budget referring to the tariff on automobiles, the thought came to me as to what would have been done providing even one automobile factory were located east of the Ottawa river. It seemed to me that that would have put an entirely different slant on the situation. Something apparently must be done to chide the great industrial province of Ontario. I would suggest that the government have a care, as there is always the possibility of "killing the goose that lays the golden egg." It might not be out of place for me to give a few figures as to what Ontario actually pays into the treasury compared with the contributions from the other provinces. When I state that out of the 225,000 taxpayers contributing to the treasury over 100,000 are located in Ontario, it will give hon. members some idea of what that means in Dominion revenue. Quebec comes second with over 43,000. Following this line I am going to quote from a paper that by the wildest stretch of the imagination cannot be considered to be favourable to the Conservative party—the Toronto Star Weekly. The feature article of last Saturday's issue was on taxation. Before quoting a few extracts from that article, I might state that Ontario's 100,000 taxpayers pay $11,000,000 into the treasury, while Quebec's 43,000 pays $8,000,000, so their contributions are not so very wide apart. It may be suggested that the total for Quebec is accounted for to some extent by the enormous number of big incomes enjoyed by people in the city of Montreal. But that is not the fact. Last year Quebec and Ontario had exactly the same number of people, 355, enjoying incomes of over $30,000 a year. These 355 wealthy men in each province paid in taxes in Ontario $4,122,088, and in Quebec $4,034,776. Of incomes between $20,000 and $30,000 Quebec had 282 and Ontario 480. Let us see how they contribute, taking each province of Canada. In Ontario there are 99,597 taxpayers, paying $11,370,769; Quebec has 43,646 taxpayers, paying $8,352,203; Manitoba, 19,870 taxpayers paying $1,684,154; British Columbia, 19,630 taxpayers paying $1,468,565; Alberta, 14,641 taxpayers paying $730,510; Saskatchewan, the province we hear so much about, has 14,200 taxpayers paying $615,842; Nova Scotia, 7,134 taxpayers paying $446,085; New Brunswick, 5,743 taxpayers paying $415,126; Prince Edward Island, 479 taxpayers paying $26,914.

Included in this total of 225,000 taxpayers there are 3,061 farmers, who pay into our treasury $162,944 in income. I think hon. members will see that perhaps it is not the wisest thing in the interests of the country to destroy the profitable enterprises of Ontario and Quebec. It will be seen that the unfair position into which the province of Ontario is being forced will have a tendency to react adversely upon the country generally, a result which will not be in the best interests of Canada.

With reference to the income tax, I regret to note that the dividends received from corporations which are not now included in income returns, become taxable. These dividends are already taxed by the municipalities, and the proposal to tax them further will work a hardship on many people depending on income from these sources of revenue for their maintenance. As explained by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) in his speech on Tuesday last, the widow with an income of $5,000 made up of dividends will now have to pay a tax; under the old ruling she was exempt. She will also have to pay a tax to the municipality in which she resides. The reduction in sales tax, the return to penny postage and the abolition of the receipt tax are very welcome, and very long deferred.

During the speech of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) he quoted from speeches made at the Canadian National exhibition last year, and also from speeches made during the annual meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association at Hamilton. One of his quotations was from the speech of Mr. Fortier, of the city of Quebec. I happen to know Mr. Fortier very well personally, and any person who knows him—

Mr. SEGUIN: He is a Tory.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): He is now, but he was not before the last election. Mr. Fortier is a man respected by everyone who knows him, both in Quebec and in Ontario, where we know him very well and where we see a great deal of him. Mr. Fortier spoke at the Canadian National exhibition, and said:

"This brings us to the tariff question, a much discussed and misunderstood one in too many parts of this country. In the United States the people of all occupations are so keen on custom duties and tariff protection that they have convinced the two political parties which alternately govern that country. Public opinion has been educated to that problem with such success that the American people are highly protectionist.

Theoretically, I am not inclined myself to favour too much tariff protection, but practically, it seems to me that Canada cannot afford not to be protectionist, if the Canadian nation wants to live in comfort and freedom on the American continent. Even for those who incline to free trade, it seems to me that the commercial policy of our neighbours makes it obligatory for us to use the same tactics"

At a meeting some time earlier, Mr. T. H. Watson, chairman of the tariff committee of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, made these remarks regarding the attacks on industry which have become such a favourite pastime among people in certain sections of this country. He stated that every other country in the world appreciated the men or group of men who had the courage to invest their money in manufacturing. Continuing, he said:

"I sometimes think it would be wise for Canada to follow England's example and have the government guarantee the bonds of industries. If that were the case the government would be more likely to take more interest in our welfare.

Canadian manufacturers are not only struggling with inadequate protection but are harassed with taxation of various kinds. Protection to cover the actual difference in the cost of production in Canada, as compared with competing countries where low wages and inferior living conditions prevail, is absolutely essential, and to tell this fact to the electorate is the duty of every member of this association."

I would like to give a little illustration of how it works out when you come up against the American tariff. During the last election I heard on one or two occasions about an industry in Stratford which was exporting goods to Philadelphia. It was a rattan factory, which had received an order from the Wanamaker people in Philadelphia. They shipped one lot of goods through Port Huron; they received another order, and when it went through it was questioned. The third order was absolutely stopped—the tariff board of the United States functions for a definite purpose. I wrote to the manager of that factory asking if this was true, and he replied that it was. They did not consider it a very great hardship, but they complained of competition of Chinese labour, which is paid five cents and ten cents a day as against the labour of our Canadian workmen and our standards of living. I ask hon. members on the other side if that is a fair position in which to place industry in Canada.

I would like to say a word or two in regard to the British preference, and at the outset I might remark that my attitude on this subject is Canada first. Britain should come next, but whether it be Germany or whether it be Britain I do not care; if it interferes with our Canadian workmen, if it depreciates the value of our products, if it puts people out of employment, I am absolutely opposed to it. On this question I would like to take up three lines of business. I represent a riding which is highly industrialized, and first I would like to take up the iron trade. I know something of that business, in which I happen to be engaged, and I think the case is stated very clearly in an article in the Labour Leader of July 31, 1925, which I would like to read. This sets out in great detail the situation as regards the small hardware trade—by that I mean locks, and so forth:

"Canada, and Ontario in particular, pays a big price for the British preferential tariff. Fielding's last cut was "the straw that broke the camel's back" for many iron moulders and machinists that were formerly employed in the manufacturing plants of this Dominion.

In the production of builders' hardware, iron moulders, brass moulders and machinists are the three classes of skilled labour that predominate, and it is needless to add that these men are among the best paid in industrial establishments.

Factories that manufacture builders' hardware often make from 1,500 to 2,000 different varieties."

That will give hon. members some idea of the variety and large number of small articles manufactured in comparatively small quantities, as against mass production. It goes on to cite:

"In Ontario, firms like the Belleville Hardware and Lock Manufacturing Co., Limited; Taylor-Forbes Company, Limited, of Guelph; Peterborough Lock Manufacturing Company, Limited; Canada Foundries and Forgings, Limited, of Brockville, and many others, give employment annually to thousands of skilled mechanics and make hundreds of articles that are used in building construction.

These firms, to whom our mechanics look to for employment, under the British preferential tariff have a handicap that is most unfair, because the handicap was placed on them by our own government. The handicap not only burdens the firms mentioned, but places a burden on Ontario mechanics that is unbearable—unemployment.

Since the year 1920, all of these Canadian firms that manufacture builders' hardware have had their output reduced by not less than 30 per cent, owing to the unfair handicap placed on them by the famous Fielding preferential tariff. This 30 per cent reduction in output naturally reduced the number of employees that formerly found work in these plants.

Wages is the chief cause of the handicap. Moulders and machinists employed in these factories in Canada receive from $30 to $40 per week, according to the class of work they are on and the skill they must possess, while in England, similar men receive $14.50 to $16 per week for the same class of labour and the same hours."

That, Mr. Speaker, is what the Canadian workman is up against.

The next industry that I want to go into pretty thoroughly is the textile business. When I inform hon. gentlemen of the House that within the riding of South Waterloo we have employed in the textile business about 3,500 people—I do not mean including dependents, but those actually engaged in the industry—they will see that anything that interferes with the industry is of serious importance.

9 p.m.

When Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power in 1896 he found the duties on woollen and worsted cloths as arranged by his predecessors, the Conservative party, to be 30 per cent, as will be seen by the customs items in the 1894 tariff. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier went out of power in 1911, the duties on woollen and worsted cloth were again 30 per cent, but the experiment in lowering the duties between the dates mentioned proved so serious to the woollen industry of Canada that one would think the lessons of the experiment would not have been so soon forgotten. Nevertheless it is a fact that within very recent years the experiment has been foolishly repeated, and again the results have been most serious, as might have been anticipated.

Reverting to the first experiment, Sir Wilfrid Laurier had gone into power in 1896 upon the promise of adopting a free trade policy for Canada, just as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did five years ago. No one, perhaps, has a right to question the sincerity of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in his appeal to the electorate on the free trade issue, but with the lessons of Sir Wilfrid's experiment with free trade clearly in sight, it would seem a matter of considerable doubt whether the same sincerity and integrity of purpose characterized the appeal of the Liberal party when going to the country in 1921 on a similar policy of free trade.

By the year 1900 the reductions made in the woollen cloth tariff schedule by Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government did not affect the general tariff, but made the preferential schedule on woollen and worsted cloth coming from Great Britain 23⅓ per cent instead of the previous prevailing 30 per cent. This reduction in duty from 30 to 23⅓ per cent could make only an actual difference in cost on a whole suit of high quality woollen tweed or worsted cloth coming from England of less than 35 cents in the wholesale price. The actual difference per yard on a pure worsted heavy weight suiting such as was produced in an outstanding worsted mill in Waterloo county amounted to 6¼ cents; I am here speaking of a fine quality cloth. It is plainly to be seen from this that to the purchaser in Canada of woollen cloths at that time there was practically no saving, and it would not be unfair to say that the consumer here in Canada had no benefit whatever from this trifling reduction. But what was the sacrifice of the industry in Canada which was caused by this experiment? Let it not be overlooked that a difference of even one or two cents per yard in the price of an article turns the business from one channel to another, and it is no exaggeration to say that in many lines of staple high quality woollen and worsted cloths for men's suitings produced in Canada the margin to the manufacturer over actual costs is frequently less than this difference in the duty shown in the above example.

By the year 1904 two large woollen mills in Waterloo county were sacrificed. Both these mills had been very successful, and were steadily enlarging and employing more people, in fact, were operating day and night. I refer to the woollen mills in the town of Waterloo, and a still larger industry in the town of Hespeler; but these are only two out of a total of 88 woollen mills closed down as a result of the attempt to reduce tariff duties on the imported products which competed with the products of the Canadian mills. A booklet issued by the Trade and Commerce department of the Mackenzie King government in 1922, in reviewing, at pages 4 and 5, the history of the woollen industry of Canada, states that a total of 129 woollen cards and 559 woollen looms went completely out of operation as a result of this first experiment with lowering the tariff.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with the co-operation of his finance minister, did what any sensible group of men would have done under the circumstances—raised the duty again in 1904 to 30 per cent on cloth from England, and raised the general tariff on similar goods from other countries to 35 per cent, with the result that the industry once more got upon its feet, but of the 88 woollen mills which were destroyed by the experiment scarcely any were revived. The two large mills previously mentioned in Waterloo county were never reopened. One can readily picture the consternation and hardship which was wrought upon thousands of woollen mill employees in Canada by this unfortunate experiment, and not only among the employees and their families but among many others whose prosperity depended on the activity of those engaged in the woollen industry. The value of farm property within miles of these closed mills was affected, and it became almost impossible to dispose of farm lands which previous to the blasting effect of this unwise experiment had been valuable farms.

It is not a venturesome statement to make that if it were not for the experimenting with lower tariffs of the period referred to and the repeated attempts to reduce the tariff on woollen goods in recent years, many manufacturing centres throughout Canada would be to-day in a condition of vastly greater prosperity, to the benefit not only of the immediate industrial communities, but also the benefit of the farming communities surrounding them.

This brings us to the last series of experiments with the tariff on woollens. The government of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had obtained power, but not sufficient power properly to govern, on the promise in some sections of free trade, where that policy was acceptable; but in the industrial centres the promise that no industry would be detrimentally affected secured them certain support. There is no doubt in the minds of most observers that further experiments in free trade were as distasteful to the Liberal party as to the Conservatives, but with the life of the Liberal party depending as it did upon another element in parliament, it was forced to make a showing of bringing into effect promises of tariff reductions, which were in fact simply repetitions of the disastrous experiment of the Laurier government.

When those in the woollen industry heard of the contemplated lowering of duties on woollen goods, deputations at once waited upon the government to oppose the repetition of this harmful policy. When representations were made to ministers of the government showing that a vastly higher scale of wages was paid in Canada than in England for the same sort of work, and showing the high cost of fuel required by the industry in this country, including freight on a 500 mile haul compared with only a few miles of haulage in England, and showing other items in which Canadian costs were higher on account of our Canadian standard of living, and so forth—all of which raises the manufacturing costs in this country, and renders it absolutely necessary that the industry should have the small amount of protection which it had enjoyed in order to exist in Canada—the very sympathetic reply made by the finance minister of the day to representations presented by the deputations was "that if the woollen manufacturers could not produce goods as cheaply in Canada as they could in England why did they persist in trying to manufacture and why did they not resort to planting potatoes?" In the face of what the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) must have known from his previous experience, and the fact that he had sent a qualified investigator to England to ascertain the difference in the cost of manufacturing in the two countries, and, upon the reports of his own appointed expert had in the former instance restored the 30 per cent tariff on woollen cloth as an actual necessity to the woollen manufacturers of Canada, it is hard to understand the attitude displayed in the more recent circumstance. The only explanation must be that being harassed by misguided advocates of free trade upon whom the government absolutely depended for existence, he ventured to treat with contempt the smaller group which, while it represented a large industry in Canada, lacked the voting power of the free trade group. In the heat of the situation it would have been useless to tell the Minister of Finance from the Maritime provinces that it had been commonly reported that carloads of good Nova Scotia potatoes had been thrown into the Atlantic in order that the potato market might not absolutely collapse.

The details of the recent experiment are as follows: in June, 1922, a small cut was made in the woollen tariff; then in May, 1923, a further cut was made reducing the duty on British cloth to 24¾ per cent. In the same year, in September, a preference was also given France, so that the duty on French goods of certain makes was approximately as low as the preferential rate against England. The result is quite apparent. French woollen goods coming into Canada in the year ending March, 1922, amounted to $699,838. In the year ending March, 1923, the value was $1,020,122. In the year ending March, 1924, this had increased to $2,060,935 and in the year ending March, 1925, it had still further increased to $3,284,976. Meantime the imports from England of woollen and worsted cloth were also increasing. In the calandar year 1921, before the reduction in duty, the yardage imported from England was 13,095,400 square yards. In 1922, the first year of the change in duty, the yardage was 27,014,500 square yards. In the calendar year 1923 it had further increased to 28,834,700 square yards, and in the calendar year 1924 the yardage had still further increased to 30,154,200 square yards. These figures do not include blankets, furniture stuffs, flannels, carpets, hosiery, underwear, fancy knitted goods, and so forth. Let it be observed that these tremendous imports of woollen cloth, exceeding thirty million square yards from England alone, in one year, represents more than one suit of clothes for every individual in Canada. What can there be left for the Canadian mills to provide, and what other than the actual result which followed this repeated disastrous experiment could have been anticipated? Over fifty mills have closed up in the last few years—not all of them large mills, but many of them extensive mills and many of them practically the sole foundation of prosperity in the communities in which they were located.

The village of Rockwood in Ontario is only one of a large number of illustrations of the ruination brought to a thriving community by the senseless policy of vacillation which has meant the destruction of promising industry throughout Canada. The closing of the mills in Amherst, Chatham, Perth, Appleton, Lanark and elsewhere are only a few added illustrations of this shortsighted policy. In Kingsville, Ontario, may be seen the ruins of a mill, which, having been burnt three or four years ago, has not been rebuilt, for the very reason that the proprietors saw no prospect of getting a return on money reinvested in such an industry.

A few mills in Canada, it is true, have been able to survive, but how few of them are there which can show a balance sheet which indicates prosperity. How many of them on the contrary are there which are showing gradually diminishing assets and evidences of collapse? What is the effect of this on the large number of our citizens who have investments in these industries and also upon the hosts of others whose prosperity depends on the prosperity of such industries—merchants, agriculturists, and so on?

A quotation from a statement of the manager of the Standard Soap Company of Toronto briefly sums up the effect of inactivity in such an industry as woollen manufacturing in Canada:

> "It is not generally realized that prosperity in the woollen and knitting industry is immediately reflected in increased employment in the subsidiary industries producing soaps, paper boxes, oils, belting, electrical machinery and so forth. For example, this industry is the best customer of electrical machinery outside of government development schemes. On the other hand, depression in the industry causes lack of employment in the subsidiary industries and reduces the tonnage carried by our railways.
> Woollen mills take in on the average ten tons of raw material freight, including coal, for every ton of finished goods they put out. The great importance of this industry to subsidiary industries in Canada and the Canadian railways is therefore obvious.
> By comparing lists of customers of subsidiary manufacturers and supply houses it is found that 52 woollen and knitting mills are no longer buying because they have either closed down or gone out of business in the last three years. In addition to this there are many mills working part time. The condition in the industry affects thousands of employees who are not shown as being directly employed in the mills."

These statistics given above re French and British imports are taken from Canadian Trade and Commerce reports, and Bradford Board of Trade reports.

The building up and safeguarding of the woollen and knitting industry would therefore not only affect the actual workers engaged in the mills, and the workers engaged in the subsidiary industries, and the retailers and professional men and women supported by the workers, but also would affect our railway problem and the prosperity of the nation as a whole.

I would like to make a comparison of the weekly wages paid in Yorkshire with the weekly wages paid in Canada, in order to give some idea of the difficulties with which the woollen industry in this country has to contend. I had the privilege a few weeks ago of going into a mill employing some 800 odd hands and of checking these figures thoroughly, of going through the industry and checking their pay sheets. I will give the weekly wages in Yorkshire, including costs of living bonus, as shown by the Minister of Labour as at the end of 1924, exchange value computed at the same date. I will give the weekly wages in Canada as averaged from figures supplied by Canadian mills and compared as to hours of labour and sex of worker. The figures are as follows:

	Yorkshire	Canada
Winders	$5 92	$13-$15
Twisters	6 34	13- 15
Spinners	5 77	13- 15
Reelers	6 52	17- 20
Doffers	5 22	13- 15
Overlookers	17 03	35- 60
Warehousemen	12 06	19- 22
Blenders, carbonizers, labourers	12 06	18- 20
Mail help in grey rooms; stock room, packing department	12 30	19- 22
Firemen	13 89	30.00

It is only fair to say that these wages were compared as at the end of 1924. Since that time there has been a reduction of ten per cent in wages paid to Canadian workers. Wages in Canada are not too high; it is the wages abroad that are too low. There is frequently a confusion of mind over the effect of money wages paid in different countries on competitive prices for selling goods and the purchasing power of the wages. The money wages paid for labour at the exchange value give the true basis of comparison in order to show the advantage gained by United Kingdom manufacturers over Canadian manufacturers when selling goods in Canada. What the wages paid to the operatives will buy in the respective countries has nothing to do with the selling price of the goods; it relates only to the standard of living of the operatives. The average wages in gold paid to skilled textile workers in Germany is 11 cents per hour, or $5.72 for a 52 hour week.

Let me now give the House in detail the effect of this competition on the home market as regards imports into this country. These figures allow complete comparisons for the calendar years 1921 to 1925 both inclusive. If the House will permit me, I will hand the figures to Hansard. They are as follows:

Imports into Canada

(From Monthly Trade of Canada)

These figures show that the too heavy imports in the calendar year 1921, have been tremendously exceeded in all succeeding years.

The total imports of manufactured woollen and knit goods for these five years reached the tremendous total of $187,535,772.

It will be noted that there are slight reductions in the yardages of cloth imported in 1925 as compared with 1924, but this did not mean that Canadian mills got more business in 1925 than in 1924; in fact, they got even less. Owing to the decrease in the total purchases in Canada, due to general industrial depression and loss of population, the total market was greatly reduced, and consequently the import figures show that mills abroad actually obtained a greater share of the Canadian market than ever before.

Calendar Years	1921	1922	1923	1924	1925

Hon. members can see quite readily the great disparity notwithstanding the huge population of the United States as compared with ours.

I have just a little I should like to say about the shoe business, which has been mentioned so often. Upwards of 2,000 people are engaged in the shoe business in my riding. These statistics are gathered by the Shoe and Leather Journal of Toronto and other sources.

As a result of the reduction in the tariff on boots and shoes under the British preferential schedule, the duty on leather and felt footwear from the United Kingdom is now only 15¾ per cent—17½ per cent, less a rebate of one-tenth of the duty on direct shipments. This is the lowest rate since 1874. The above refers to tariff item 611a, which applies to most importations, small quantities of work boots enter under a British preferential tariff rate of 15 per cent tariff item 611.

The Canadian customs regulations permit British manufacturers to sell to customers in Canada at prices lower than their prices in their own home market to the extent of 5 per cent, before the Canadian anti-dumping clause is applied. In some cases at least, British firms have taken advantage of this provision, with the result that the protection to the Canadian factories is reduced to only 10¾ per cent.

British trade commissioners in Canada are actively engaged in helping the representatives of British shoe manufacturers, even to the extent of making appointments with leading retailers.

In the calendar year 1925, boots and shoes from the United Kingdom, exclusive of rubber footwear, were imported into Canada to the value of $1,132,850. The value of English footwear imported into Canada in 1922 was only $456,073. The number of pairs imported in 1925 was 805,201, as compared with 652,925 in 1924 and 341,814 in 1923.

While there has been some falling off during recent months in importations of certain classes of British footwear, the Canadian factories making high-grade shoes for men and the felt footwear factories in Canada still are suffering severely from the competition of British footwear, imported under the low rates of the British preferential schedule. The Canadian business, which is lost to the Canadian shoe factories as a result of the British preference in turn means a loss of business to many other industries supplying materials to the shoe manufacturers and a reduction in the earnings and purchasing power of the shoe workers in Canada.

The total value of Canadian shoe business is limited and there is no way in which the Canadian factories can make up for the business which is now going abroad unnecessarily. South Africa has withdrawn its preference to Canadian footwear and, as practically every country in the world has a well developed footwear industry of its own, it has been found impossible for the Canadian shoe factories to develop any considerable export trade.

Export of Canadian footwear have fallen from $5,679,720 in the fiscal year 1919-20 to $285,634 for the twelve months ended February, 1926.

Canada's total production of machine-made boots and shoes—leather and felt—last year was approximately 15,500,000 pairs or about 1,500,000 pairs less than in 1912 and 4,500,000 less than in 1916.

If the shoe business now going abroad unnecessarily were retained in Canada the Canadian factories could handle it without any increase in plant or equipment and would be able to operate more efficiently and more economically by reason of the larger volume.

The keen competition amongst the shoe factories in Canada ensures that the manufacturers' selling prices at all times will be exceedingly close to production costs in the most efficient factory and that any economy resulting from increased production will be passed on to the public in the form of lower prices. The Canadian shoe manufacturers require additional protection against importations of English footwear, not in order that they may charge higher prices, but that they may enlarge their volume of production.

More than 100 shoe manufacturing firms in Canada have failed or obtained compromises or extensions since 1920. While many causes have contributed to this heavy mortality, the principal cause has been that there has not been enough business available for all. This situation has been made worse by the British preference, which has permitted British shoe manufacturing firms to cut into the Canadian business and take out of the country orders which have been much needed by the factories here.

The wages paid by the shoe manufacturers in England are much lower than those paid in Canada, machinery costs in England also are lower, and the British manufacturers have important advantages in respect of cheap water freights to the Pacific coast via the Panama canal. The British manufacturers get all their equipment, materials, supplies, etc., duty free, while some of the equipment, materials, supplies, etc., required by the Canadian shoe manufacturers have to be imported, mostly from the United States, and are dutiable at rates ranging up to 30 per cent. These items still further offset the very meagre duty on boots and shoes imported into Canada under the British preferential schedule.

I come now to a consideration of the rates of customs duty on boots and shoes from the United Kingdom imported into the British dominions. New Zealand charges an import duty on British boots and shoes of 25 per cent of the value for duty, which comprises the invoice value plus ten per cent for freight and insurance, and a primage duty of one per cent. This represents a total ad valorem import duty of 28⅜ per cent. New Zealand also requires that for British shoes to enter under this rate, which is lower than the general tariff, the proportion of British materials and British labour must not be less than 50 per cent. Australia charges an import duty on British boots and shoes of 35 per cent of the value for duty, which comprises the invoice value plus 10 per cent for freight and insurance. This represents a total import duty of 38½ per cent. English shoes will not be admitted to Australia, under the above preferential tariff rate, unless the proportion of British materials and British labour is not less than 75 per cent. Newfoundland gives no tariff preference to British boots and shoes, but charges a duty of 40 per cent, plus a surtax of 5 per cent on invoice cost, freight and duty. This represents a total import duty of more than 45 per cent. South Africa gives no tariff preference now to British boots and shoes, but charges on most classes of British footwear an import duty of 30 per cent. Canada admits British boots and shoes under a British preferential tariff rate of 17½ per cent, less a rebate of one-tenth of the duty on all direct importations, which rebate reduces the import duty to only 15¾ per cent.

Under the present British preference, goods manufactured in countries with depreciated currencies are imported into Canada as British goods at the expense of British and Canadian labour. This is altogether absurd, unsound, anti-national and un-British, and it is a condition which ought to be removed without further delay. So much for the boot and shoe business.

Now I come to the Canadian National Railways. The country during the year which has just passed was abundantly blessed by Providence with a splendid crop, not alone in the western country, but also in eastern Canada, and as a national result our financial position is considerably improved. This in turn is reflected in the statement of the Canadian National Railways, a report which I am certain will be received with a great deal of enthusiasm throughout the country. In our National railway system we are experimenting with the greatest public ownership scheme ever attempted; and upon the handling of this vast enterprise, upon the fairness shown the management, upon the total absence of governmental and other interference, coupled, of course, with capable management, the success or failure of the enterprise depends.

We in Ontario know something of that great municipally owned enterprise, the hydro-electric, but we are also well aware of the fact that the success of that great undertaking was accomplished by the indomitable perseverance of the founders, coupled with the outstanding ability of its management and the determination at all times to keep it clear of politics and all outside interference. It may interest the House to know that the birthplace of the great hydro-electric enterprise was in the good county of Waterloo, which I have the honour to represent in this House jointly with my good friend the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). The birthplace of that great Canadian through whose efforts much of the success of the enterprise was accomplished is also in my riding, the village of Baden in South Waterloo. I refer, of course, to the late Sir Adam Beck.

The people in all parts of the country from coast to coast are watching with a great deal of anxiety, and I may say with no little uncertainty, the efforts of the management to make the National railways a real asset to the Dominion of Canada, and if there is one point in this connection which I wish to emphasize more than another it is that no handicaps be placed on this great undertaking, that it should be given a square deal, and that no outside interference should be tolerated.

We listened recently in the House to a presentation of what appeared to be a very serious condition of affairs in the province of Nova Scotia, particularly in the Cape Breton section of that province. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and his government should be congratulated on assisting to relieve the situation in at least a temporary way.

This brings me to the coal situation in general, upon which I wish to say a few words in the hope that whoever has the framing of a policy with regard to this great question will approach it in a broad way, having in mind a policy that will be of real service to the entire Dominion. Too long we have confessed a dependency upon the United States for our fuel supply. Owing to constantly recurring strikes there, the prospect is that in the no great distant future—as time is counted in the life of a nation—we shall be faced, as in fact we are faced at the present time, with the necessity of framing legislation that will adjust this great question. In this connection may I assure the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Cardin) that I am in accord with the sentiments expressed by him in the House recently, when he stated that owing to geographical difficulties some concession would have to be made by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in order that difficulties that now appear great indeed may be surmounted.

Between the western province of Alberta and the eastern province of Nova Scotia, coal sufficient to supply the necessities of all Canada for hundreds of years can be obtained, and we shall be recreant to our duty if we allow minor difficulties to stand in the way of the development of our great coal areas. The opportunity in this regard cannot be overestimated, and when we consider the fact that we are at present purchasing from the United States yearly over one hundred million dollars' worth of coal, sending the money to a foreign country, assisting to keep a foreign population employed, to the detriment of our Canadian citizens, it seems to me that this is one of the most pressing problems before the House to-day. In fact I am at a loss to understand—perhaps some hon. member can enlighten me—the reason or reasons why this question was not settled long ago. If we in the central provinces stop for a minute to consider what the immense purchasing power of the hundred millions spent east and west would mean to the industrial sections, surely our united interests lie in this direction. Great purchasing power, coal moving from the west and from the east, giving greater business to our railways, and carrying the manufactured goods from central Canada to these coal producing provinces, would very materially assist in relieving our transportation difficulties. If it is necessary to increase the duty slightly on this commodity, I trust the Minister of the Interior will not stick literally to his "death knell of protection" utterances.

In the constituency of South Waterloo, which I have the honour to represent in this House, we have the happy combination of the agriculture and industrial, a most striking example of what a home market really means. When I tell you that about 95 per cent of the products of the farms of Waterloo county are consumed in that county, some idea can be had of what it means to have the industrial section of the community fully employed. During the past four years this unfortunately has not been the case, and many hundreds of our finest mechanics and young men graduating from our schools and workshops have been forced to go to the United States to secure employment. They do not want to go, neither do they want to become United States citizens. They are all loyal Canadians desirous of living their lives under the Union Jack, but they are forced to migrate in order that they may obtain employment. But just so long as we pursue a policy of exporting our raw materials either wholly or partly unmanufactured, and giving insufficient protection to our productive enterprises to enable them to produce their goods in competition with mass production in the United States, low wages in mid-European countries, and depreciated foreign currencies, just so long will this condition of affairs exist.

Earlier in the session the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. McClenaghan) referred at some length to the great business done by the mail order houses of the Dominion. I was greatly interested in the case which he so ably put forward as it applied to our retail merchants, and he convinced me that the mail order house competition is most unfair. The countries of the world are scoured by the purchasing agents of these concerns. To have the products of foreign sweatshops and child labour distributed in this country, largely through these mail order houses, is bad enough; but when we consider that the ordinary retailer throughout the Dominion is forced to pay a stiff tax in his community, while these great octopuses are practically free of this tax, it will be seen that he suffers from a handicap that is very serious indeed. As a result, the small rural village is rapidly disappearing, which is to be regretted, as these centres have assisted in no small degree to make rural life more desirable. In fact, Sir, I think I would be justified in saying that one of the chief causes of the trek from the farms to the bright lights of the cities and towns is largely due to the gradual wiping out of these small centres. This condition of affairs, I submit, is largely due to the inroads of the mail order competition under the unfair circumstances I have related. I hope the senior member for Ottawa will introduce legislation that will give us an opportunity of investigating the matter further this session.

With reference to the immigration problem, I quite realize that in order to do more business we have to have more people. I am in hearty accord with an immigration policy that will bring in selected immigrants to increase production by the cultivation of the vast untilled lands not only of our western prairies, but also of hundreds of thousands of idle acres in the other provinces. But care should be taken not to bring in industrial workers until such time as our industries are fully employed and our citizens—who through the paralyzing policy of the government during the past four years have been compelled to leave their native country to secure employment in the great republic to the south—have been permitted to return to their homes.

I wish to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of the House for the very patient hearing which has been accorded me.

Mr. ARTHUR BETTEZ (Three Rivers-St. Maurice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as a new member in this House, I think I would not be fulfilling my duty, should I not mingle my voice with those who have preceded and will follow me in this debate, so as to appreciate to the best of my ability the budget which our Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has just brought down. Rest assured, Sir, that it is not without a certain apprehension that I rise to discuss, in the most moderate way possible this budget, being content with emphasizing the important points and leaving to hon. gentlemen better qualified than myself the task of scrutinizing them more carefully. This budget, I state without fear, has been received by all classes of society with the greatest satisfaction, and has very much alarmed many of our opponents who never expected such important reductions. I am aware that, as in all wordly matters, some details which are not perfect may be found; however, as perfection does not inhabit this world, there can be no reason to worry, for we are free to fill the wants in the next budget, knowing that the Liberal party dislikes to leave a task unfinished.

I wish to point out a few of the many reforms carried out. First, there is the total disappearance of the receipt stamp, a rather annoying and expensive formality to our business men. Secondly, there is the reduction from three to two cents on postage stamps, a measure which will be a blessing to everybody on and after July 1. Thirdly, the wiping out, I might say, for the small wage earner, of the income tax and in a reasonable proportion a tax decrease for others, a measure which I advocated in my first speech in this House on February 1, last; a measure which will give to the wage earners more comfort and will help them to provide for the dull days of old age, and, it will leave to others a larger portion of their profits to apply to the development of their trade. Finally we come to this most discussed question of the reduction of customs duty on automobiles, a duty which has been lowered from 35 to 20 per cent on automobiles of less than $1,200, and from 35 to 27½ per cent on automobiles of luxury, from $1,200 up.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that under the circumstances, all conscientious manufacturers who do not want to make political capital with this question, will be more than compensated of this decrease in the tariff by the reduction of 25 per cent on all parts imported which enter into the manufacture of automobiles, providing that 50 per cent of said parts is manufactured in Canada. Is that not an incentive afforded to our Canadian manufacturers to the detriment of foreign manufacturers? Is that not, I ask you, a truly national measure which will be beneficial to the Canadian workman who has as much need of protection as the foreign workman? A manufacturer who cannot carry on with a tariff in his favour of 20 to 27½ per cent, moreover, with the appreciable margin which gives him the freight charges over his foreign competitor, is of very little use to his fellow countrymen.

Do you think, Sir, that we must everlastingly provide such a high rate of protection to that industry which, it is true, employs a great number of people, though, in much smaller numbers, after all, than the citizens which it exploits by means of such a high tariff?

As a mere suggestion, and as a way out, may I point out the desirability of reducing for this year the tariff on motor trucks only, with the understanding that the reductions mentioned in the budget will but take effect next January 1, on the other automobiles, in order that we may not be taxed with having taken these industries by surprise, and also in order to allow time for those who have large stocks of automobiles on hand to sell them without too great a loss.

As to the tax on dividends, is it not more equitable to impose a tax on those who are in receipt of dividends than on those who have but their daily wages and have no other revenue bearing assets? The policy of our opponents has always been that of favouring solely the large interests to the detriment of the small wage earners and those deprived of wealth. They would prefer, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) stated yesterday, to see the tax paid by a widow possessing absolutely nothing than by a widow drawing dividends. How logical!

One thing which will always reflect shame on the Conservative party, and that the public will not forget for a long time to come, is the exemption from taxation which they granted on the victory bonds, most of which were purchased by friends, war profiteers, of the Conservative government of that day, when it is these same people who should have paid the bill instead of the small industries and wage earners. If the Conservatives had not acted in this manner, the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) would not have had to deplore, yesterday, the fate of the widows forced to pay a tax on their dividends.

As I am neither a free trader nor an extreme protectionist like our Conservative friends, but rather a moderate protectionist wishing to give fair play to the consumer and the honest manufacturer, I want, on behalf of my county, to congratulate the government on the appointment of a tariff commission which I feel sure, will be able to give us a just and well considered tariff, studying on the spot and separately the numerous questions on tariff affecting our various industries and applying to each of them a tariff in keeping with the needs of the times, in order not only to assure their existence but especially in order to further their expansion.

Mr. Speaker, I am not a follower of those who believe that, alone, a high tariff can ensure our success, but I am one among many who believe in a moderate tariff affording us an oportunity to make treaties with other countries. Such as the treaty with Australia that has been so much criticised since I have been in this House, but which, to my mind, has been most profitable to our country, inasmuch as it has thrown open to us a vast market for the sale of our paper, in quantities such as we have never known before, giving employment to hundreds of thousands of Canadians. In fact, what do we witness since the ratification of these treaties? An ever increasing number of paper mills employing thousands of people. You have quite close to here, at Chelsea and at East Templeton, a company which is going to spend between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000 for the development of that industry, creating a large city of 20,000 to 25,000 of a population, bringing prosperity not only to the citizens of that town but to all those in the neighbourhood, and spreading affluence everywhere in the district. There are, at present, towns like Shawinigan Falls with a population of 14,000, Grand'-Mère with a population of 9,000, Cap-de-la-Madeline with 8,000 people, La Tuque with 5,000 of a population, Chicoutimi which has nearly 10,000 of a population, Kenogami, Jonquières, and many other towns which are centres of paper mills. If we had not those treaties, we would not have such an increase in the number of manufacturers. I must tell you, Sir, that this industry not only supports hundreds of thousands of people, not only does it bring happiness to those employed there, but also to all the farmers in the vicinities of said places where a market is at hand to sell their products among the workmen of the lumber yards; and moreover the farmers can both in winter and summer send their sons to work in the lumber camps. I find evidence of the good results secured through the beneficial policy of the government in my native city itself, in Three Rivers. A few years ago, our municipal valuation was but $14,000,000; to-day it has reached $42,000,000. I must further add, Sir, that the population has increased from 12,000 to 34,000, and this thanks to the beneficial policy of the present government.

Since 1921, American, English and Canadian companies have erected paper mills at a cost of $45,000,000. These mills have an annual output amounting to $25,000,000, and it will reach the figures of $37,000,000 next year. These companies to-day have a payroll amounting to $10,000,000 yearly, and these figures will probably increase to $15,000,000 by next year, as they are at present putting in additional plants. This money is expended within a radius of 100 miles from my home town. Do you not think, Sir, that the farmer, within said radius, gets his share of the profits accruing from such development, since in a great many cases, he works during the winter, with his sons in the lumber camps, and moreover he easily finds a ready market for his products? Do you not think, Sir, that in return he is willing to allow a small portion of the Australian products to enter Canada, such as, for instance, butter, cheese and eggs, in order that the paper manufacturers who are the mainspring of his livelihood the year around, and who are responsible for his prosperity, may for these considerations be allowed to sell their paper to Australia and other countries?

I have no hesitation in saying that before long Canada shall control the paper industry in America. Are not these advantages granted to Australia and to other countries on their exports of certain farm products to our country more than compensated by the exports to these countries of our manufactured goods? For, after all, the prosperity of our young country will only rest on a sound basis inasmuch as we shall know how to take advantage of our treaties with other nations and mutual concessions shall be made by the various classes inhabiting our Dominion. Even admitting as a fact that the Australian treaty might be a little to the detriment of our farmers, do they not themselves also find it profitable to sell, at better prices, to our workmen their eggs, butter and other products of the farm?

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the benefit of the Liberal policy is felt a little everywhere. Look, for instance, at the phenomenal development which is taking place in the lake St. John district, where at present an aluminum industry is taking root, and expending from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 for their plants, this will found large towns in localities which yesterday were practically unknown.

There are other signs of the benefit resulting from the carrying out of the Liberal policy; such as a very marked decrease in the operating ratio of the National railways which gives us hope that before long these railways, which were so to speak in bankruptcy when we assumed power, will soon pay their way and contribute to a large extent to the progress and expansion of Canada, thanks to the wise and enlightened policy of our government who have entrusted the management of our railways to very competent men.

A further undeniable proof of the benefit conferred by the Liberal policy, is the marked increase of our exports over our imports, an increase never heard of, up to this day, and which figures out in the $400,000,000.

A number of members on the opposition side have stated that Quebec favours protection. It is so, my county comprising especially the cities of Three Rivers and Shawingan Falls is more in favour of a policy of moderate protection than of one of profiteering as understood by the opposition, and that is the policy I advocate.

The conscientious manufacturers of my county are in favour of a moderate tariff, giving equally fair play to the consumers. And that is the reason why these two large towns, Three Rivers and Shawinigan Falls, have approved of the Liberal party's policy by a majority of 5,000 votes. And note, it is as a candidate of King that I came forward and not under false colours. The large majority of people in my county are aware that it is not under a high tariff that we shall have prosperity, but under a moderate tariff and especially one which is well thought out, in conjunction with new treaties, such as that of Australia.

Were we to listen to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), Providence alone is responsible for the good work accomplished by the Liberal government.

Other members of the opposition will propound that the Progressives alone are to be thanked for certain changes in the tariff.

I wonder if these people are in earnest and what they think of the mass of the people whom we represent in this House! For, after all, are not the Progressives the representatives of the people to the same extent as any other member and what can be the superiority of other parties over them? Was it not the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who made the most alluring overtures so as to rally their party to them?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. BETTEZ (Translation): Our friends the Conservatives have kept on speechifying during two long months, this session, simply to express their disgust in finding themselves in the opposition and to try and persuade the community as a whole that the Liberal policy is not the one which should predominate in this House. Are they not to blame for this loss of time which has cost the country, according to my estimation, millions of dollars?

No, Sir, it is not through such tactics that they will win back the public's trust and that they will again become the great party as in former days. They had better try something else, let them drop their futile recriminations and accept as true Canadians the medicine that the majority of the country has administered to them, at the last general elections.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. BETTEZ (Translation): In regard to the Old Age Pensions Act, I would ask that this measure which is most humanitarian, be simply a Dominion Act without taking into consideration the provinces. In my first speech in this House, in February last, I advocated such a measure. This very day, I was reading a pamphlet which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Elliott) has just published. I noticed with much pleasure that a great number of countries have adopted an old age pensions measure. I think the time has come, in Canada, to look after our old people in stringent circumstances who, by a whole life of labour, have largely contributed to the prosperity of our country. They are not to blame if they have not had the chance to succeed as well as many others. To my mind, it is an additional reason to look after them. Knowing the spirit of equity and progress of my leaders, I feel convinced that they will have this excellent legislation adopted.

As regards the rural credit measure, there is no necessity of adding anything further, for everybody knows that agriculture is the prime industry in this country and that the government must neglect nothing to help the toilers of the land.

Before I take my seat, I deem it my duty to congratulate the government on its programme in connection with the Hudson Bay railway, and I trust they shall have sufficient money left to carry out the urgent improvements required in the eastern provinces.

I also wish to sincerely congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on his masterly statement on the budget, this year, and I cherish the hope that next year's budget will bring forth new and appreciable reforms which will contribute, in a large measure, to the expansion and progress of this beautiful Dominion.

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): Owing to the incidents of to-day, Mr. Speaker, I was requested at a late hour to say a few words on the budget. On account of the limited time at my disposal for the preparation of anything in the form of an address I hope the House will bear with me while I endeavour to say something upon this occasion.

I would like to refer in particular to an important question before this House and before the country generally, that of what we are to do with the automobile industry. It has been argued that the automobile has become what is termed a necessity. That may be true, but I wish to refer to a statement which seems to have gripped the minds of the Progressive element especially in this House. It has been argued that any industry which cannot stand upon its own feet with a 35 per cent protection should go down, and starting with that premise, I would like to submit a few facts. I ask hon. members whether knives and forks are a necessity; they are protected to the extent of 30 per cent. Railway locomotives have a protection of 35 per cent; fire engines, 35 per cent; sewing machines, 30 per cent; tools of all kinds, 30 per cent; window shades, 35 per cent; all the fabrics of cotton, 32½ per cent. Are blankets a necessity in this country? They have a 35 per cent duty; wall paper, 35 per cent; envelopes, 35 per cent; soap—I wonder if that is a necessity—32½ per cent. Writing ink has a duty of 25 per cent; drain pipes, which we use in order that our homes may be made sanitary, have a duty of 35 per cent; marble for fire-places 35 per cent; furniture for the homes of this country, 30 per cent; spectacles—I wonder if they are a necessity, I know they are to me—30 per cent; sterling silverware, 35 per cent; clocks and watches, 30 per cent; springs and axles for cars, 35 per cent; screws—I wonder if they are a necessity—35 per cent; bath tubs—I wonder if that is a necessity in this country; it all depends, I suppose—

An hon. MEMBER: Not for the Progressive party.

Mr. KAISER: If the Progressives want a bath they must pay a duty of 35 per cent, or go without.

An hon. MEMBER: They won't pay it.

Mr. KAISER: My point is this: When you look over the list of articles that are now paying a duty of 35 per cent or thereabouts, why should our automobile industry be singled out from all the rest and have this drastic cut made? I think that is a fair question to ask.

We had a delegation of workingmen and returned soldiers come here to-day from the city I represent in order that they might express their opposition to this cut in the duty on automobiles. There is no question that in their minds and hearts there is a feeling of protest against the action of this government. For the last three weeks there has been a feeling of unrest in the city of Oshawa and in the county I represent, because information had gone out from the capital of this country that something might be done in connection with the tariff on automobiles. The people of our city were disturbed by this report. They came to me as their representative and I said to them: "Do not be afraid." The reason I told them not to be afraid was that we had as Minister of Finance a Scotchman and a fair-minded man, and in order that I might back up my opinion I took my old Hansard and I read to them the words the Minister of Finance used one year ago when he pointed out that this country needed the revenue from the automobile tariff, when he said there were too many automobiles in this country, and when he told the House and the country he was not prepared to vote for the amendment offered on that occasion by a representative from one of the western constituencies. I argued that this man would never stand up in the House and say that this industry should be shot. I expected that he would defend us because of his past record, and because of the faith we had in his common sense. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the outraged feelings in my mind and the widespread disappointment in the city I represent when these men read in the press that the Finance Minister stood up in this House and without warning, without giving our industries a chance to explain their case, reduced the tariff to such an extent that it threatened the very existence not only of our industries but of the city I represent? I stated, when I went home, that I was amazed and alarmed at the situation; that the only satisfaction I had was that as I listened to the Minister of Finance when he announced this cut in the tariff on automobiles, I observed that he said it with a lump in his throat. We are amazed; we wonder at the situation; we ask ourselves how came this about? Why this change of mind? It drives us back to the original conclusion that the one thing that is wrong is the effort of this government to hold power at any cost, and at the dictation of a few men whom they would otherwise expect to vote against them.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that this government was absolutely defeated on the 29th of October last. We believe that the people of this country pronounced against them, and pronounced against their policy, but we never dreamt that in order to hold on to power they would think of destroying an industry of the size to which the automobile industry in this country has grown, and further, that they would not for one moment contemplate the destruction of one of the youngest cities in the Dominion of Canada. I have read modern and ancient history to see if I could dig up a parallel, and only one case comes to my mind. When I read the budget resolutions this year and those of last year and the statements made, I am reminded of the ancient story told in Plutarch's Lives where old Cato came to the Senate every day with his little bunch of figs and stated that "Carthage must be destroyed." Carthage in this case is the city of Oshawa.

Some hon. gentlemen sitting opposite say that we are unduly alarmed. They tell us that our captains of industry do not know what they are talking about. They tell us that if we take this reduction, and consider the present attitude of this government, if our men should go to work and our industries try to continue, the industries will go forward and do better than ever. Yet the men who are at the head of these industries told the government and this country to-day that it was utterly impossible for them to go on under existing circumstances. Is it possible that the government and those who support the government to-day imagine that these men do not know what they are talking about?

I pass on, not to deal with the economics of the question but to try to bring home the situation as I see it and as I know it. The people at the head of General Motors have never deceived the city of Oshawa. Thirty-five years I have lived among 10 p.m. them; thirty-five years I have observed their struggle and progress; for that length of time we have listened to their statements regarding their industry and their relations to the city, and during all those thirty-five years they have always taken us into their confidence and told us the truth and what the actual situation was. Do hon. gentlemen suppose that this is one time that they do not know what they are talking about, or that they are trying to deceive the city and deceive the people of this country?

Lest I forget, I desire to pay tribute to the kindly remarks of the Speaker of this House when he paid the delegation that came to this city to-day the compliment of saying that it was the most orderly and respectable delegation that he had ever had the pleasure of seeing come to this city and the House of Commons.

Let me point out to this House that in the city of Oshawa, which employs a larger percentage of people in proportion to its population than any other city in the Dominion of Canada, among these men who work in our factories within the limits of that city, there has never been a crime of the first order committed—never in the history of the city. There has never been an execution there—never a trial for the more felonious and heinous crimes—and why? There are two reasons. In the first place, the people who work in our factory come from the townships in the counties surrounding Oshawa, and in the second place they are so busy, so thoroughly employed, that they have neither the time nor the inclination to commit offences of that kind. I will admit of course that in recent years they have turned into the coffers of our country tremendous sums in respect to a little thirsty difficulty that we in the province of Ontario understand quite well.

The people who formed that procession to-day were almost entirely labouring men; they were not representatives of capital, they were not representatives of the factory management. It included, however, hundreds of women workers in that factory who, in their innocence, imagined they had one representative in this House who might sympathize with them in their struggle. Sorry am I to know that this representative told them that they were sent here at the expense of the General Motors Corporation. I stand here to deny the truth of that statement; they came here at their own expense. The expenses of those who were unable to pay were defrayed by other workmen in the city. They were here representing nobody but the owners of three or four thousand little homes in that city.

We had in that procession 784 returned soldiers. The Prime Minister to-day intimated that those ex-soldiers may be working for the automobile trade, but that there were hundreds of other soldiers who might require to buy an automobile. That may be so, but let the hon. Prime Minister remember that in 1918-19, when the soldiers returned from the front, the automobile business was growing and expanding; labour and assistance was required in the factory at Oshawa, and they took on, I may say, a greater percentage of the returned soldiers than any other industry in the Dominion of Canada. Those soldiers reclaimed their jobs and to-day a returned soldier in Oshawa is given a preference over any other applicant for a job. We sent from our city to the front between 1,600 and 1,700 soldiers to fight the battle of civilization and of Christendom. Of this number 132 never came back; they fell in France. During the last few years we at home endeavoured to have our city represent our ideas in stone, and we erected a monument to the memory of those who fell in France. We did not erect a monument to glorify war. We placed upon that monument a statute of a retured soldier in his garden home, and we called it "The Garden of the Unforgotten." We hoped and trusted—and our hope was realized—that the people of our city, when they passed that monument, would remember that they owed something to the returned soldier.

I should like to say something about that little monument, which is probably one of the most unique monuments of its kind in the British Empire. Our aim was to build a symbolic monument, one that would carry also to the memories of the allied countries which joined with England in that struggle the fact that this British Empire passed through that terrific struggle and came out triumphant. We tried to bring to the minds of Canadians the battlefields upon which the great struggle took place, and the way we did it was this: we asked every allied country to send us a stone to put in this monument. We asked every part of the British Empire to send us an Empire stone. From some of the great men of the war we received stone from the very battlefields where Canadians fought and fell. And what is the result? We have in that monument a stone from the ruins of Louvain, a stone from Loos, a stone from Passchendaele, a stone from Cambrai, a stone from Mons, the Governor General of Canada sent us a stone from Vimy Ridge. We asked various cities of Europe to send us, if possible a stone that might have some little historic value. Let me read a letter we received from one of the cities where Canadians fought and fell. This letter was directed to me, and it reads:

DEAR SIR:

The city of Cambrai considers it a duty to respond to your desire and to send you the souvenir stone which you ask, for your memorial to the Canadians who fell in the war, 1914-1918. May it, by the name of Cambrai, which we have had engraved on it, recall to those who see it in your city that our city testifies to the bravery and self-denial of your men who fell here in the cause of liberty.

You have asked that this stone come from an edifice destroyed by the war: we thought we could not do better than take it from the ruins of our city hall to which so many memories are attached. You will have thus a symbol not only of the recent war but also of our struggles prior to this time, and for the same object.

The period 1914-1918, in fact, is not the first in which we have had to submit to the heavy yoke of the German empire, the tyranny of its governors and the brutality of its soldiers. Almost 1,000 years ago our ancestors have had to live in the same difficult days and, as deliverance was slow in coming, they wished to get free from the bonds that were heavy upon them.

One day in the year 956 united together in the "Peace Hall" they took a community oath to unite their efforts to get back their independence, and the most bloody atrocities did not make them renounce it.

Mr. POULIOT: Were all those atrocities committed by the kaiser?

Mr. KAISER: What does the hon. member mean by that question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Go on.

Mr. KAISER: I would like the hon. gentleman who interrupted to answer that question. Right well I know the object of his reference. Let me answer it. Mine is an Anglo Saxon name; my family has carried it for five hundred years. The kaiser of Germany was not known before 1871. My ancestors were not Germans; I want that clearly known. On my father's side they were United Empire Loyalists; they fought on behalf of the British cause in the revolutionary wars of 1776. My grandfather on my father's side fought at Queenston Heights and at Lundy's Lane in 1812 and 1814 to preserve this country for the British crown. In 1837 he stood for ordered government in Ontario and he opposed the grandfather of the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King). In 1866 likewise my uncles assisted in bringing about order in Ontario. Twenty-six of my close relatives were on the line in the Great war of 1914. On my mother's side my grandfather belonged to the 79th Highlanders and helped to make the famous charge at Waterloo. As a Canadian I do not think I need stand for any insult from the hon. member or from any other man in the Dominion of Canada. It is because I am a Canadian and a Canadian first that I wish to have this House listen for a moment while I finish this letter and when I have finished hon. members should all feel prouder that they are Canadians:

On the day of triumph, in 1070, the "Peace Hall" was taken over as the seat of government: to-day it is our "City Hall", still devotedly preserved in the same spot, as a witness.

For the same reason, our city hall has been made precious to us, because it has had to submit to the enemy's outrage, as when it was ordered to be destroyed under Emperor Henry in 1095 and under Emperor Frederick in 1226, and again when it was burnt down under Emperor William in 1918. Each time we built it again and this time, too, we propose once more to raise it from its ruins, because it united in its structure the sufferings and the glories of our thousand year struggle for liberty, for our own liberty, and the liberty of France. We are proud to remember that the German invasions of 1792 and of 1870 have come to its steps and then expired without being able to go beyond it, and that in 1914 even, if the invading tide has overwhelmed it, that tide has scarcely been able to reach further.

We remember also that when in October, 1918, the privilege was given to the few scattered inhabitants remaining in the city of thanking those who had delivered them, in the very first rank was your General Loomis and it was in the ruins of our city hall that they thanked him.

This last remembrance would have been sufficient in itself alone to fix our choice in providing the stone that you desire. Other remembrances are added to it, however, since they will make you feel that having often suffered we know how to understand and appreciate sacrifice. Now, no sacrifice is so entire as the sacrifice of one's life, and numerous are your dead on our soil. We do not forget here—and I will cite only this example—that it was the Canadian battalion that on October 9th, 1918 forced the passage of the bridge at Cantimore in the west suburb of Cambrai; the battalion lost 380 men out of a force of 640, i.e. two-thirds. We do not forget either that it was to the efforts of the survivors that we owe the stopping of the fire by which the enemy had hoped to reduce our city to ashes.

So, believe us, we are heartily with you in the homage you wish to show to the fighting-men of 1918.

Kindly accept, sir, the assurance of our best and highest feelings.

The Mayor of Cambrai.

Mr. Speaker, my object in mentioning this is to show you the spirit of the returned men of the city which I represent. It is on account of what they have done, on account of the fact that most of them are married men and that most of them relied upon the pledges given to them in 1921 in the armoury at Oshawa when the Prime Minister of Canada stood up in their midst and assured them that if he were elected no industry in that city would suffer. Nevertheless, in two years' time, through their juggling with the tariff, this government destroyed one of the greatest industries we ever had in Oshawa, namely, the malleable iron industry.

During the last election a similar visit was paid to our city by the same Prime Minister of our country, and there he gave the same kind of promise. Our soldiers and our workmen returned to their little homes resting assured that no injury would be done. I know from personal contact with them that there are to-day in that city representatives of three or four thousand little homes with a few hundred dollars paid upon them, and these men are endeavouring to pay the balance in monthly instalments. It is little wonder that they feel alarmed over this situation; that they feel that they have a grievance in their hearts and that they are going home to-night dissatisfied with the answers and assurances that they have received. The answers given by the Prime Minister were evasions of a strange character. He told these people that in the House of Commons no amendment was made to the budget, and then he split hairs by saying that the automobile itself was not mentioned in any amendment, that no pointed effort was being made by members of the House to save the automobile industry, although he knew that the amendment of the Conservative party pointed to that as directly as the compass points to the north pole. The Conservatives are in the minority in this House as regards voting strength, but it is my belief that the great body of Conservatives and two-thirds of the Liberals of this House sympathize with the efforts we are putting forth to save the industrial fabric of the province of Ontario. We fear not only for the automobile industry itself, but for the people of Ontario who have spent $200,000,000 in developing the water-powers of that province, which depend for their success upon the continued operation of our industries. The greatest customer the hydro-electric enterprise of Ontario has east of Toronto at the present time is the General Motors Company of Oshawa, and the representatives in this House from western Canada, it seems, are going to destroy or very seriously impair that concern along with all the others throughout the province, curtailing in consequence the operations of the hydro. When this happens, how are the people of Ontario going to bear the tremendous burden of debt that will follow the collapse of industrialism in the province? Is it not clear that the farmers of the province will have to carry it? Cannot the farmers of the west realize that there are other people besides themselves engaged in agriculture in Canada? And do those farmers imagine that they can go on forever selling anywhere from four hundred to five hundred millions of bushels of wheat a year? Do they think the soil of western Canada can indefinitely yield such a crop? Why, science has demonstrated that this cannot be done, for it is imperative that the soil be replenished with some portion of the fertility that is taken from it. Let hon. gentlemen from the west study the history of China, where some of the fertile valleys are just as productive to-day as they were two thousand years ago. Why is this? The reason is that even the Chinese know better than to produce to the limit without putting back something of the fertility they take from the soil. I agree with those who say that Canadian producers should grind all their wheat at home and export it in the form of flour, because this country needs the offal in order to replenish the soil.

Some of the theories that are being preached in Canada to-day will ruin the country if they are carried very far into practice, with the result that Canada in the end will find herself in an inextricable mess. Look at what has happened to the sheep industry as a result of our free trade tendencies. In 1870, fifty years ago, we had in Ontario 3,500,000 sheep, whereas to-day we have only 2,500,000. I have letters on this subject, from some of the leading agriculturists of our country, and of the Dominion for that matter, all going to show what an advantage it would be to Canada to develop the sheep industry. The sheep is the best scavenger that is known in any country. You will not find a dirty farm where there are sheep in any large numbers, but in Ontario many sections are growing wild with weeds, and the same is true of Manitoba and the west. This country, in my opinion, should have at least 30,000,000 sheep, which would represent an asset of some $300,000,000, but we cannot hope for any development of the industry without protection. Protect the industry and you will have woollen mills throughout the country affording employment to our people.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does the hon. member imply that those who are engaged in agriculture know less about it than he does?

Mr. KAISER: I have the authority of William Dryden and Robert Miller, gentlemen who are known throughout the Dominion as among our greatest agriculturists, and I am prepared to take their opinion in preference to that of my hon. friend. I am not giving the hon. gentleman my views; I am simply quoting the views of those who are in a position to speak authoritatively, having made their names famous in agriculture in Canada. I come from a county which is perhaps the Mecca of Canada so far as good stock is concerned, and I know what the possibilities are if the people are given a chance.

As regards the proposed reduction in the duty on automobiles, I am convinced that this whole Dominion expects the government to heed the voice of the delegation which visited the capital to-day. I know what the result of this attack on the tariff will be to thousands of our workingmen. Now, these people are making a reasonable request of the government. All they ask is that this question be referred to a tariff board of experts for careful consideration, and that everyone concerned be given an opportunity to state his case clearly. This is what the people of Oshawa want and they are prepared to stand by the verdict of such an investigation. I am pleading with the government to-day simply to honour the pledge which the Prime Minister himself gave to the country, and the pledge which the government put into the mouth of the sovereign's representative when he read the Speech from the Throne. Can the government solemnly give an undertaking in that speech and then in a quiet moment repudiate it, especially when, as we know on the authority of men who are well versed in the matter, this breach of faith will bring about the destruction of thousands of homes in Canada? I have lived among these people. As a doctor I helped to bring into the world many of the boys and girls who will be affected by this action of the government, and I have seen them grow up from infancy. I know the kind of people they are, and I am sure it would be with feelings of deepest regret that they would leave Canada to find employment elsewhere. But this is what they will have to do if the government persists in its present intention. The situation is unparalleled in our history, and all we ask is that the government and the Prime Minister carry out the solemn pledge they gave to the people and which they put into the mouth of the Governor General of Canada.

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): We have listened to a very able defence of the action of the people of Oshawa, but it is difficult for us to believe that these people are always consistent, and we question whether they were consistent in their visit to-day. I have here a copy of Hansard of last year in which I find that Mr. Clifford, the Liberal member for what was then the constituency of South Ontario. which included, the city of Oshawa, voted against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) to reduce the duty on automobiles. The Coote amendment of last session read:

> That in the opinion of this House a substantial reduction should be made in the customs tariff on automobiles and motor trucks.

We find that the then member for South Ontario, Mr. Clifford, a supporter of the government, voted against that resolution, but at the general election the people of Oshawa rejected him. I learn further that on that division six Conservatives who are still members of this House voted in favour of the resolution, namely, the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross), the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Doucet) and two others whose constituencies I do not recall.

Now, we are told that the government is going to destroy the automobile industry. To me, Mr. Speaker, that is an old chestnut; we have been hearing it for a great many years. I well remember reading years ago the same story whenever the tariff was reduced. I am not a particularly old man yet, but in my younger days I followed the occupation of a veterinary surgeon. I found a few years ago that the horse industry, which meant my livelihood, was largely ruined—I say, ruined—in the same measure as that word is now applied to the automobile industry. Therefore it is just putting the shoe on the other foot. The horse industry has been hurt to a certain extent by the automobile industry,—more, I believe, than the automobile industry will be hurt by this reduction of fifteen per cent in the tariff, yet no one ever suggested a government subsidy to horse breeders.

Before I proceed with the general trend of my remarks with reference to the budget, I desire heartily to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the clear, comprehensive and concise manner in which he presented his budget to this House and the country last week. For a number of years now it has been my duty to prepare at certain stated periods financial statements for organizations with which I am connected. Of course these statements are on a much smaller scale than the budget, but what I have done in a small way enables me to appreciate how the Minister of Finance must have felt when he was able to present such a favourable report on the financial condition of the country. It was always a source of satisfaction to me when I was able to bring in a financial statement showing a financial improvement in the organizations with which I was connected, and I am sure the hon. minister must have been deeply gratified to be able to record such a substantial improvement in the affairs of this Dominion.

For a number of years past I have studied the budgets—to a limited extent it is true—and when I listened to the Minister of Finance last week the thought struck me most forcibly that this was the best financial statement that had ever been presented to this House. I was particularly pleased a day or two afterwards when no less an authority than the veteran member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) stated that it had been his privilege to sit in the House of Commons and hear twenty-five or more budget speeches, and he believed this was the best. I think this warrants my saying that the minister has probably presented us with one of the best budgets since confederation, in that it contains, at least when coupled with the legislative programme of this session, something that appeals to our people in all walks of life. For instance, the reduction in the national debt by $22,000,000 is a welcome piece of news to every Canadian. We believe and hope that this is only the beginning of a number of similar reductions and that before many years we shall be relieved of the great menace of our enormous debt, thus getting back to the conditions which prevailed before the war. We are all pleased to note the increased trade, and the resultant increased revenue approximating $30,000,000. This, coupled with the decrease in expenditures leaving a surplus of revenue over expenditures of some $55,000,000, is indeed very gratifying in comparison with the conditions which prevailed when the government took office in 1922. The reductions in taxation also appeal to all classes of people. The reduction in the income tax will probably appeal more to some than to others. But we have the reduction in postage and the abolition of the receipt tax, and altogether it is estimated that there will be a general reduction in taxes amounting to some $25,000,000. This does not apply to any particular section of the country or to any one class, but everyone will benefit in some measure.

In connection with the finances of the Canadian National Railways we are gratified to find a more satisfactory condition. There has been a gradual improvement since the coming into force of the present system of operation, and during the election campaign I stressed this point particularly. If there is one thing more than another for which this government deserves credit I believe it is the improvement shown in the Canadian National Railways. When this government took office the condition of affairs was very unsatisfactory. There is no use in enumerating the conditions which then existed, but we find now, after some four or five years of operation, a surplus over all operating expense of some $32,000,000, almost double that of 1924. It has been stated—and I am not sure of the truth of the statement—that certain items which are considered as assets and included in the capital account of the Canadian National Railways do not represent real value. If that is the case I would suggest a revaluation of the assets in order that the railway may receive encouragement, and the management be given a proper opportunity of making an earlier success than would otherwise be obtained.

Returning again to the budget, I believe it is one which will be accepted with almost universal satisfaction. A day or two after the presentation of the budget I was interested in reading the comments of the daily press. It was very noticeable that, irrespective of the political leanings of individual papers, almost every one had some favourable comment to make with regard to this budget. These things must be far from consoling to some hon. members of this House, and to some of the people who went on platforms in every part of Canada picturing dire calamity and prophesying certain ruin unless the King government were defeated and a Conservative government elected. On October 29 last the electors of Canada did not elect a Conservative government; the King government is still in power, and desolation and ruin have not yet overtaken us. That the country has on the contrary made remarkable strides and shown great vitality is exemplified by the fact that in this budget it has been possible to reduce the taxation as I have already indicated. Moreover, we learn that the export trade of the country in the last year showed a favourable balance of some $381,000,000, as compared with an unfavourable balance of $29,000,000 in 1921. Is it any wonder that the people do not want a Conservative government in power?

In connection with these prophecies of financial ruin and dire distress we cannot help observing the reports brought in by our banks, insurance companies and financial institutions generally during the last few months. Almost without exception they have shown increases in business, and managers and directors have expressed confidence in the future. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if there were any evidence of the dire distress predicted by our Conservative friends it would be reflected in these financial statements. A number of manufacturing concerns also, some in the central part of Ontario, have reported the year 1925 very good in a business way. These statements can hardly be said to be issued for political purposes, because our financial institutions do not enter into politics to any great extent.

We have heard a great deal about conditions in the Maritimes. I do not know very much about that question, but a few days ago I received through the mail a paper called The Evening News, of New Glasgow, Nova Scotia. Page 2 was marked, and in turning to that page I found an item which, although not truthful, at least shows that this paper is not favourable to the King government. It went on to say that the government is holding office by theft, and a few other things of that kind, but on the front page appears the following heading:

> Business Conditions Improving in New Glasgow.

It goes on to say:

> Merchants look with confidence to the future. Volume of business better than last year.

Then the remarks of several business men are given, and the conclusion is as follows:

> The foregoing are some of the opinions expressed by a number of merchants taken at random throughout the town. Others added comment along the same line. The general consensus of opinion seems to be that there is a noticeable improvement, and that the summer should be appreciably better than last year.

If there is an improvement in conditions throughout this country, however, some of our Conservative friends are not prepared to give the government any credit for it. They say it is due to Providence, to crop conditions and that sort of thing; but, on the other hand, every ill that befalls the country is in their estimation the fault of the government. I was pleased the other day to hear the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) make, perhaps unwittingly, a remark that I should like to have appear again on Hansard, because it is something that we people from the west believe with him to be the truth. Speaking on the 15th day of April he said—Hansard page 2458:

> I believe I am within the mark when I say that Providence has blessed Canada during the past season with a wheat yield in the western provinces unsurpassed both in quality and quantity, a yield which is to-day commanding a good price in the markets of the world and this fact constitutes the most important feature of our commercial success. I do not believe I am far wrong in making that statement. But fortunately it is not only in the prairie provinces of the west that Providence has blessed us. Ontario, this great central province of Canada, has also been blessed with a wonderful harvest. So far as Providence has seen fit to act in the matter, He has poured out on this country an abundance which we have not enjoyed for many years past and we are to-day reaping the benefits.

Mr. Speaker, we in the west believe with the hon. member for South Wellington, as recorded there, that the crop conditions of the west have been largely responsible for the progress that has been made. We believe that it is a great factor, and that the improvement of conditions in the west will do more than anything else to bring about the prosperity that we want in this country. We believe that if the farming industry of our prairie provinces is properly nursed, and if we are given the proper opportunity in that country, we can bring back again something approximating the conditions of the early years of this century when there was a certain amount of prosperity all over Canada. And let it be noted that while there was a great development taking place on those western plains, the cities of Ontario were being built up and there was very little unemployment in these central provinces during that period. The cities of Ontario and eastern Canada generally developed and prospered, which development and which prosperity was largely due to the great market which was opened up in the west for all classes of goods produced here in eastern Canada. They had a market for all the lumber, all the machinery, all the household furniture, clothing and other products that it was possible for them to produce, and as time went on they kept increasing the number of their factories because of the great market that was opened up on the western plains. We in the west, then, are convinced that it is impossible to bring about the improved conditions we are looking forward to by increasing tariffs, and we are not going to be led away from the principle of lower tariff by any suggestion of protection for the farmer's products. In that connection may I be permitted to read just a few extracts taken from an editorial in the Manitoba Free Press of January 20, 1926. Dealing with the Fordney-McCumber tariff of the United States, it shows just how the farmers there are faring by the protection of their products, and says:

> The Fordney-McCumber tariff wall is being battered and hammered from so many sides and by so many interests that some of the bricks will soon be in the scrap heap, and many others replaced by brick of different dimensions. The farmers of the American west are losing faith in the tariff duty on wheat. The president of the National Council of Co-operatives told the council at Washington the other day that the Canadian farmers were getting a better price for wheat than their American competitors. At the recent meeting of the People's Reconstruction League it was announced that "the American farmer gets a 42½ cents tariff duty, but the Canadian gets 20 cents more for his wheat."

It goes on:

> No one as yet has been silly enough to suggest that a tariff on cotton would do any good.

Further on it says:

> The Canadian tariff should be a matter for a Canadian decision based on the Canadian situation. A nation of nine million people that depends largely for its existence on its export trade of the products of its farms is a vastly different proposition from a nation of a hundred and fifteen millions that is consuming the bulk of what it is producing, and which has a much more diversified production of natural products. It is a purely superficial view that the tariff of one should correspond to the tariff of the other. Likewise it is quite possible that the Canadian tariff might suffer from the fiscal policy of the British Isles, where the existence of a large section of the population is bound up with ability of its manufacturing plants to find world markets for fully manufactured goods. Great Britain is a workshop; Canada is mainly a dealer in natural products. What might be good for one might be ruinous to the other.

In that connection let me say that I have never yet learned of any farmers' organization in this country that ever placed itself on record as asking for a tariff on farm products, and it is a significant thing that the suggestion of protection for the products of the farm should come from the party which in 1911 rejected reciprocity.

Coming as I do from a constituency which is largely agricultural—the only other industry carried on in that constituency to any great extent is lignite coal mining, about which I hope to be able to say something to this House later on—I want to make just a few observations at this time relative to some of the remarks that have been made with reference to the farming industry of Saskatchewan. The impression has been given that we out there are what some hon. gentleman has called land robbers; in other words, that we are growing nothing but wheat. The province of Saskatchewan occupies to-day an enviable position in the raising of live stock. This has been demonstrated at various times by the standing attained by Saskatchewan breeders of live stock, particularly horses, at both national and international fairs. They have carried off a great many prizes at these fairs, and there is no better country in the world than those western plains for the grazing of cattle. There were in the province of Saskatchewan at the last census something over 1,000,000 horses: they had something over half a million milch cows and over a million other young cattle besides sheep and swine. They produce approximately $700,000,000 worth of grain. In addition to this, there are by-products, such as dairy products, poultry and its products, the products of the garden; wool, game and furs, and so forth, amounting to approximately $35,000,000. All this wealth—these millions in grains; all this stock, the beef and mutton which is shipped out, in addition to the $35,000,000 worth of by-products—is produced by a population of just a little over 800,000 people. My reason for mentioning this is the fact that there is not, so far as I am aware any other country where there is such a large per capita production as these figures show for Saskatchewan. But in spite of the production of those 800,000 people, in spite of all the wealth they are producing we find that our people are not as prosperous as they should be; in fact a great many of our farmers to-day are in dire financial circumstances, which proves they are not getting value for what they produce. But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding all the adverse conditions that our farmers have encountered in the last few years; notwithstanding the fact that they have crop failures and other adverse conditions, there is in that country, a new outlook for the future. Our people are optimistic. They have faith in the future of their country, and I believe they will be encouraged by the fact that the government has shown some sympathy in the budget that has been presented and in the legislative programme of this session; it will bring fresh confidence to our people and will tend to further development. I believe that no one thing will do more to make Canada as a whole prosperous than the development of agriculture in western Canada. But the people of western Canada cannot see how this can be accomplished by raising the tariff on implements of production needed to produce the crop which tends to make the rest of Canada prosperous. To my mind the crux of the whole tariff controversy is the extent to which the tariff upon an article enters into its cost to the purchaser. That was very well illustrated in the debate which took place here a few weeks ago in connection with the automobile tariff, where I believe it was amply demonstrated that the automobile industry was taking the full benefit of that tariff protection. We have heard the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) give his views in that connection, but I should like to read to the House the opinion of another man, who, I believe, is at least as capable of sizing up the situation with respect to the automobile industry as the hon. member for Ontario. This is a copyrighted article by Charles Vining, published in the Ottawa Evening Citizen, stating the views of no less a person than Henry Ford. It reads as follows:

Dearborn, Mich., April 23—If Henry Ford became prime minister of Canada, Robert Forke could qualify as a good Conservative and the Robb budget of 1926 would be about as exciting as luke warm lemonade.

Mr. Ford would not merely reduce the tariff on certain classes of automobiles, he would wipe out the tariff. He would establish free trade, absolute and unequivocal. As a manufacturer of automobiles in Canada he believes the tariff to be a hindrance and stupidity.

Mr. Ford surprised people with something of this opinion in a brief remark after visiting his great Canadian plant on Wednesday. This afternoon he enlarged on the subject, confirmed his statement that free trade would benefit industry, gave his reasons and explained their application to the manufacture of Ford cars in Canada.

From the conversation came voluntary statements of pertinence and encouragement to Canadians, that it is possible to manufacture as cheaply in Canada as in the United States, that Ford cars in Canada have been selling at a higher price than necessary because of the tariff, that the tariff encourages industrial indolence and tends to permit prices based on what the market will pay rather than on proper costs of production, that the Ford Company of Canada, and presumably other Canadian companies will develop greater efficiency and economy of manufacture as a result of the proposed tariff reductions.

Supplementing discussion of the tariff came a picture broadly sketched of industry twenty years from now, a thing of gigantic forces and stupendous organizations compared with which the great corporation of to-day is a "peanut."

I introduced the subject of my visit. Had he said that free trade would be a good thing for his Canadian company. Did he, the largest manufacturer of automobiles in Canada, agree with the proposed tariff reductions? Would he offer an opinion which might be useful to Canadians who are perplexed?

"You people are just waking up," said Mr. Ford in reply. "You ought to rub the other eye now, too, and clean out the tariff."

"Would it be a good thing for your company in Canada?"

"Certainly."

"The tariff is a hindrance to trade. I would have free trade. I believe in free trade everywhere."

"Do you mean by that that you can manufacture a Ford car as cheaply in Canada as you can here?"

"I can. Give me that plant at Ford City and I'll compete with the plant here at Highland Park any day. Why shouldn't I? Our unit in Canada can buy as cheaply as we can here. We make every part of the car in the Canadian plant and ninety-five per cent, over eighty-five anyway, of the raw material is supplied right in Canada. We get our steel from Algoma, lumber, everything we need."

"The usual answer," I suggested, "would be that large scale production makes the difference. Many Canadian manufacturers believe that they cannot compete with American manufacturers because the latter have advantages in mass production."

"I don't see that," said Mr. Ford, "What do you mean by mass production? I think we've got large scale production in our Canadian unit. They're turning out six hundred cars a day."

"How many are you making here?"

"Oh, we're doing between seven and eight thousand a day, but I don't think that's any advantage after a certain point."

"Do you mean that large scale production ceases to be an advantage when it grows beyond a certain degree?"

"Yes," said Mr. Ford, and explained that costs of manufacturing are almost equally divided between labour and raw materials. In both of these items, he argued, the Ford Company of Canada is as favourably situated as the American plants.

"In fact," he added. "you have a better class of workman in Canada than we have here, more intelligent, more vigorous. I like to look at their faces. They're mostly Anglo-Saxon."

"If it is true then," I said, "that the Ford car can be made as cheaply in Canada as here, why have we had to pay a much higher price for it all this time?"

"The old story," replied Mr. Ford, with a twist of his shoulders, "Because they have been able to get the price, that's all."

"Because the tariff has made the higher price possible?"

"Yes, certainly they've been able to get a higher price in Canada, naturally they've taken it."

"It is quite evident that the consumer will benefit from tariff reduction by lower prices," I said, "but you say that the automobile manufacturer will benefit also. Can you explain in what way?"

"Why, yes," replied Mr. Ford in some surprise, "It's quite simple. Lower prices mean more buyers, more buyers mean more business, more business means growth for the manufacturer. I would cut out the tariff," he repeated, "and have free trade. Free competition brings healthy business. I can tell you that those fellows over in our Canadian unit are going to manufacture more efficiently now. They'll have to, it's going to be a better plant over there, better organization. That's another reason why it's a good thing for the manufacturer."

"You believe then," I asked, "that to help the manufacturer one must first help the consumer, and if the consumer benefits the manufacturer is bound to benefit?"

"I don't know any other way," replied Mr. Ford briefly.

"Some people," I explained, "believe in the reverse process. They say that tariff reduction will kill manufacturing in Canada, that there will be unemployment and no wages, and therefore no money for the consumer to spend, that you must first help the manufacturer in order to help the consumer."

"That's all wrong," said Mr. Ford.

It seems to me that after that it is unnecessary that I should say anything further with reference to that phase of the tariff question.

We have heard a great deal in this House about the tariff question, and I should be glad if the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) were in his seat now, while I say just a word in regard to my constituency. I was not a candidate in the election of 1921 in the constituency which I represent, but in the election of 1921 as well as in 1925, Conservatives, speaking on a good many platforms, stated that if the people of my constituency or the people of Canada wanted reductions in the tariff they would have to elect a Conservative government because Conservative governments had in the past reduced tariffs more than the Liberal party had. If the leader of the opposition were in his seat I would ask him whether he would own or disown that statement of his lieutenants out there. I would like him to tell this House what reductions have been made in the tariff by the Conservative party, and to state his attitude with regard to the tariff on agricultural implements.

Mr. ARTHURS: What about the tariff on furniture?

Mr. McPHEE: Does the hon. member want to buy a casket for the party?

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) the other day was inclined to condemn the Liberal party because it had not lived up to its policy as enunciated even as far back as 1879, and particularly in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I believe that as conditions change in this country it is necessary for any political party to change its policy to a certain extent in order to meet changed conditions. To my mind, one reason why the Conservative party is as unpopular as it is at the present time in western Canada is because it is trying to stick to the old policy of 1879 and from then on, forgetting entirely that since that time there have located out on those western plains more than two million people who that party ignores. We people out there have a right to be considered, not only because we represent more than one-quarter of the population of this country, but, as I have stated, because those western plains are responsible for the vast majority of our agricultural production.

We have heard a great deal about unemployment in Canada. That there is unemployment I am well aware, but it is no new thing; it is not a matter that is confined to the last three or four years. There has been unemployment in this country for many years and probably the chief reason why there has been more of it in the last few years than formerly is due to war conditions, the aftermath of the war. But to my mind the remedy is for us to set ourselves to make farm life so attractive that many of the unemployed from our cities will go on to the land where they will find employment the year round, for it is in that way that the situation in our cities will be relieved.

On motion of Mr. Stirling the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. King (Kootenay) the House adjourned at 11.27 p.m.

Monday, April 26, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

SEALRIGHT COMPANY INCORPORATED

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): moved:

That the petition of the Sealright Company, Inc., presented this day, praying for an act respecting a certain patent of the said company and the report of the Clerk of Petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on Standing Orders pursuant to the provisions of rule 88.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 91 to amend the Immigration Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This bill has been on the order paper for some time. There is nothing new in it except that it involves some amendments to the Criminal Code that will come later. This amendment is merely the amendment that has been submitted on two former occasions, except that on this occasion we are striking out section 41 and substituting a new section 41 which after all is nothing more or less than a provision to simplify our inspectional work and to deal particularly with the discrimination against British-born in the present act and deportation for political offences which may take place without conviction and only on a hearing before a board of inquiry. This will remove the two objections because in the bill we recognize the residence of the British-born and provide that deportation for political offences shall take place only after conviction. That is all that is involved in the bill. The officials of the Department of Immigration are foregoing the right of deportation under the provisions of section 41 which was enacted during the war period.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Will the minister explain why he describes that as discrimination against the British-born?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps my words were not very well chosen. British-born have no more rights in Canada than any other individuals coming to Canada. There is however the short term of residence in which they have to qualify and during which we can deport them for offences under section 41.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CARILLON POWER DEVELOPMENT

Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. What is the name of the company or companies, person or persons, referred to by the Prime Minister on the orders of the day of April 16, 1926, as having made application for certain leases, licenses, or permits, affecting the Ottawa river in the neighbourhood of Carillon?

2. What, briefly, does the application ask for?

3. When was it filed, and what action has been taken with regard thereto?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

Department of Railways and Canals.
Office of the Chief Engineer,
Ottawa, April 21, 1926.

Memorandum:

Re Carillon Development

Under lease No. 24414, dated December 1, 1921, to the National Hydro Electric Co., Ltd., the company is given the right to construct a dam in the vicinity of the present Carillon dam on the Ottawa river which would raise the water level to elevation 120, and to develop the full flow of the river at this point, exclusive of the amount required for navigation. Since the granting of this lease, the company have submitted draft leases for the consideration of the department which involve raising the level provided for above the proposed dam and the export of a portion of the power developed. The draft leases have not been approved and lease 24414 is still extant.

In December, 1924, the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, in accordance with the provisions contained in their charter, granted in 1894 and at various times amended and extended, submitted for approval a plan showing the location of their proposed works in the section of the river extending from Grenville to Carillon. In December, 1925, the company submitted for approval an alternative location of their proposed works in this section. Neither scheme has been approved, and because the construction of a new canal with the works incidental thereto in this section will affect the existing Carillon and Grenville canal under this department's jurisdiction, the company's representatives have been verbally advised, that their plans will have to be submitted in more detail before consideration will be given to their proposals.

A. E. Dubuc,
Chief Engineer.

Department of Public Works.

1. The Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

2. The approval of plan of a canal and works from Hawkesbury to Pointe Fortune.

3. Filed on December 18, 1924, under the company's charter granted under act of parliament, 57-58 Victoria (1894) and amendments. Matter under consideration.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BRANCH LINE

Mr. FISH:

1. Was a numerously signed petition from the residents of the county of Northumberland, New Brunswick, presented to the government, or some department thereof, during the last session of parliament, praying for the construction of a branch line of railway from a point at or near Newcastle, New Brunswick, on the main line of the Canadian National Railway, to connect with the Caraquet branch railway at Tracadie?

2. Was a promise made by the Prime Minister or by any member of the government in 1925 that at the next session of parliament, provision would be made to build fifteen miles of this branch?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes; to Department of Railways and Canals.

2. No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TIES AND BALLAST

Mr. PRICE:

1. What number of railway ties did trackmasters estimate would be necessary on Atlantic region of the Canadian National Railways between Campbellton and Truro, and what numbers were supplied the various sectional divisions for placement during 1925?

2. Of the number supplied, how many were placed under track and what number were left unused as a result of extra section gangs being laid off before the work was completed?

3. On what sections between Campbellton and Truro was ballast asked for, and what quantity was supplied each section?

4. How much was placed and footed in the road-bed, and on what sections?

5. Was a proper track gauge machine trailed over the Atlantic region during the year 1925, and with what result?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

1. (a) 211,582; (b) 211,582.

2. (a) 141,814, including 27,437 treated hard wood ties; (b) 69,768.

3. (a) Harcourt subdivision between Newcastle and Moncton, 10,300 cubic yards; (b) Harcourt subdivision, 7,280 cubic yards.

4. 7,280 cubic yards Harcourt subdivision mile post 0 to 3.50 west of Moncton.

5. Use of track gauge machine not considered necessary during 1925.

LACOMBE EXPERIMENTAL FARM

Mr. DAVIS:

1. Does the government rent or lease any lands from A. W. Sharpe of Lacombe?

2. If so, what are the terms of lease or rental?

3. Who has the use of the buildings on the said land?

4. What improvements, if any, have been made on said land by the government in the way of new buildings, fences, breaking and seeding down of grass, during the terms of said lease or rental?

5. What is the total cost of said improvements during the terms of occupancy of said lands?

6. Are said lands under lease now?

7. Are any other lands leased or rented and used in connection with the Lacombe experimental farm?

8. If so, what lands, from whom and what are the terms of said lease or rental?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

4. No improvements were made. Seeding done in 1923 was entirely for our own use.

5. Nil.

6. No.

7. Yes.

8. 110 acres owned jointly by the town of Lacombe and municipal district of Crown No. 399; rental $300 per annum; 116 acres owned by Emma Staack; rental $400 per annum.

GOVERNMENT INSURANCE OF LIVE STOCK

Mr. DAVIS:

1. Does the government regulate the insurance on live stock in the different stock yards in Canada?

2. Is the insurance of one half of one per cent, which is deducted from shippers of live stock, permitted under the government regulations?

3. To whom is this insurance paid, or in other words, who receives the benefit of this insurance?

4. What is the insurance for?

5. What percentage of cattle, hogs and sheep to which this insurance applies is condemned in the province of Alberta?

6. What is the total amount deducted during the years 1920 to 1926, inclusive, in Alberta?

7. What is the total amount collected from the shippers under this requirement in the province of Alberta?

8. Are commission charges regulated by the government at all stock yards?

9. Are feed charges regulated by the government at all stock yards?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. This insurance on hogs and cattle is an unofficial charge, not legally enforceable under the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act but allowed by tacit consent of the parties concerned. The government takes no responsibility for the charge under the act.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The persons buying the stock for slaughter.

4. It is insurance against condemnation for disease.

5. The percentage of condemnations in inspected establishments in Alberta is as follows: Cattle .76 per cent; hogs, .27 per cent; sheep, 1.12 per cent. No information as to whether or not insurance applies to these condemnations.

6. No information.

7. No information.

8. Yes.

9. Yes.

REFORESTATION OF INDIAN RESERVES

Mr. SMOKE:

1. Has the government adopted any reforestation policy in connection with lands set aside as Indian reserves throughout Canada?

2. If so, what is the policy so adopted?

3. What acreage, if any, has been set aside for this purpose in each of the Indian reserves?

4. If the government has not such a policy will it frame a reforestation scheme which will take care of the future welfare of the Indian people in this regard, and announce such policy at an early date?

5. What disposition is made of the proceeds of sale of timber on Indian reserves?

6. Are such proceeds placed in capital or revenue account?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. No.

2. Answered by 1.

3. Answered by 1.

4. Question will receive consideration.

5. Proceeds of sale are credited to funds of band owning the reserve from which the timber is sold.

6. Sale moneys are credited to capital account; ground rentals and fees to interest account.

INVERNESS HARBOUR DREDGING

Mr. MACDOUGALL:

1. How much did the government pay, during 1925, to a local dredging company in Inverness town, Nova Scotia, for dredging done by that company in connection with the Inverness harbour?
2. How much work was done by this local company?
3. What was the contract price paid for doing this work?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay): A quantity of 6,982.6 cubic yards, place measurement, was removed by small suction dredge belonging to R. E. McLeod, of Port Hastings, N.S., and work consisted in the removal of a sand bar between the entrance channel and the inner harbour at Inverness. This dredging was paid at the rate of 30 cents per cubic yard, place measurement, the total amount paid being $2,094.78.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

IMMIGRATION

Mr. HUBBS:

For a copy of the agreement between the government and the railway companies regarding immigration, referred to in the Speech from the Throne at the beginning of the present session.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT

Mr. BROWN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, and other documents in the Departments of Justice and Immigration, relative to the case of the King vs. Douglas Stuart or Stewart, in connection with the Migratory Birds Convention Act, taken up in the year 1924, tried by Police Magistrate W. G. Scott and brought before the Manitoba Court of Appeal.

NOVA SCOTIA SENATE VACANCY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): There has been a Nova Scotia vacancy in the Senate for some time. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to fill the position without further delay.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter is under consideration. I might inquire of my hon. friend if he would care to be an applicant.

KINGSVILLE HARBOUR

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): I should like to inquire of the Minister of Public Works whether he is aware of the fact or whether the department has been advised that the steamer Pelee could not leave Kingsville harbour on the 16th April on account of the low water. Has any dredging been done at Kingsville this year, or can we expect any to be done? I drew this matter to the attention of the department on the 20th March.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): In regard to water levels at Kingsville they are, I expect, very much the same as at other points on the lake shores. The water has been receding. As regards dredging at Kingsville this year we have not yet voted supply and the matter is under consideration.

Mr. GOTT: When may we expect some action on the matter?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A little later.

TREATY BETWEEN GERMANY AND RUSSIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of our imperial relationships I should like to know whether the Prime Minister has had any information from London with regard to the effect on the British Empire of the signing of the recent treaty between Germany and Russia.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The answer is no.

LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.): Might I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if a change has been made in the lobster fishing season for the northern section of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and if so, what date has been set?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The third of next month.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, April 23, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I take this opportunity of congratulating you upon your appointment to the honourable office which you now hold. I quite appreciate the fact that you have always been an ardent supporter of this government, but at the same time I am sure that with your parliamentary experience you will live up to the high traditions of the office.

This budget reminds me of a story which I heard at a Kiwanis luncheon, when I was in my home town during the Easter recess. The story told, by a gentleman from the other side of the line, related to a coloured man named Mose residing in one of the western states. Mose worked on a farm near a small town, where he was considered something of a character. He was remarkable more than anything else for a team which he used. He drove into town on all occasions when there was a celebration and people were struck with this team, which consisted of a steer and a mule. Mose was very proud of the team and he took in good part all the fun which people were in the habit of poking at his outfit. On one occasion a spectator walked up to Mose and asked him how he came to hit upon such an unusual combination. Mose replied: "This am no unusual combination; this am the best team in the world. This team will go where no other team will go. You see, it's this way: that old steer am stone blind and he can't see where he's going; and that mule—well he don't give a darn." It seems to me that the team of this story typifies very well the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Metaphorically speaking, the leader of the Progressive party is blind; he cannot see where he is being driven. He does not appreciate the fact that by the course he is taking he is doing an injury to Canada while at the same time he is being driven out of public life. And the Prime Minister does not "give a darn" so long as he can remain in office.

Mr. BROWN: Will the hon. gentleman apply the rest of the story—that it is the best team in the world.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I suppose my hon. friend may be regarded as Mose. Now, the leader of the Progressive party has many sterling qualities which endear him to the members of this House. He is no doubt conscientious to a degree; he is goodnatured and always comes back smiling no matter how hard he may be hit. He is industrious and constant in his attendance while the House is in session. However, he is undoubtedly having his troubles and his position as leader of the third party in the House must be an unenviable one. We are all aware of the difficulty he experienced in maintaining the leadership of his party in the last parliament. Anyone desiring particulars in this regard may refer to the Canadian Annual Review of 1924-25 where, at page 205, he will find a full record of the whole matter. He encountered his main difficulty with some of his supporters who were afterwards known as the Ginger Group, and who objected to the fact that he was always supporting the government, through thick and thin. Well, he is still doing so; he always has been a Liberal, and we may be sure that he will always support the government. Indeed, I fail to understand why he does not cross the floor of the House, like his former chief whip the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Johnston), and sit where he belongs. The subterfuge is so obvious that no one is deceived. I notice also that one of his former supporters, Mr. Shaw, who represented one of the Calgary seats in the last House, has gone back to his old allegiance, having been appointed leader of the Liberal party in the province of Alberta. There are in this House, however, some members of the Progressive party who I think are really entitled to be in a third party, because I do not believe they will follow their leader in every course he may pursue. I think we have some hope in this House that some members of the Progressive party will during the course of this session, on some occasions at least, exercise their good judgment.

The other day the leader of the Progressive party said that he had nailed his colours to the mast of his prairie schooner. May I ask him what those colours were? Perhaps I can answer that question myself by saying—Liberal, Liberal, Liberal every time. His remarks on the budget were, as he himself admitted, largely a repetition of the statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb); he supports the whole thing, lock, stock and barrel. Sometimes, of course, he is inconsistent, but that does not matter For example, he says that he approves of income tax as being direct taxation, and at the same time he glories in the income tax reductions which are provided for in the budget. He declares he is desirous of assisting the automobile manufacturers; nevertheless he approves of the course taken by the government in depriving those manufacturers of a part of the protection which they think necessary to enable them to continue in business in this country. Again, he praises the government for reducing taxation by approximately $25,000,000, but he says that it is unpatriotic for Canadians to grumble and complain because they cannot get their taxes down to the same level as in the United States. I pause to say that I am one of those who hope to see the day when our taxation will be as low as it is in the country to the south of us, for it is my opinion that if we wish to build up the population of Canada we must have a taxation which will compare favourably with the taxation levied in the United States.

Does the leader of the Progressive party really think that by assisting the government to retain office he is doing Canada a service? I can inform him that this is not the general impression. I have in my hand an editorial from the Vancouver Daily Province dated January 12, 1926. In passing, I might remark that the Vancouver Daily Province is owned and controlled by the same company which owns and controls the Ottawa Citizen. I hope the leader of the Progressives will take to heart this part of the editorial:

> The despatches from Ottawa make it quite plain that the Progressives have no intention of being anything more than a crutch for the King ministry, if, indeed, they will offer that much assistance. They may help the government to limp along for a month or two, possibly until the end of the session. But they are giving no assurance and are making no promises that are in any way negotiable. The government is to be, in a very real sense, a government in custody. It is to be more than that. It is to be a government hobbled and shackled, and with one leg lopped off. If it wishes to march at all, it must march slowly and circumspectly with one eye on the course it is following, and one—a careful one—on its Progressive crutch, which may jump from under the crippled ministry's arm at any moment and precipitate the Premier and his colleagues in the ditch.
> This may be very well from the Progressive point of view. But it is rather hard on the country, which emphatically needs at this moment a government possessed of all its limbs and all its faculties and able to lead the country out of the slough of pessimism in which it has been floundering and on to the heights of prosperity. The thing Canada requires is a government which can run and keep its balance, not one which must falter and creep. It is therefore doubtful if the Progressives will be confering any boon on the Dominion by bolstering up the Liberal party.

I notice that the leader of the Progressives in his speech last week took credit to his party for the revaluation of the soldier settlers land which is proposed in a bill before the House. One might almost think that he and his party were the only ones who advocated this measure. But that is not correct. Members on this side of the House were just as ardent in support of the revaluation of soldier settlers land as any members of the Progressive group, and I myself on several occasions took the opportunity of supporting this policy on the floor of the House, as will be seen by reference to Hansard.

As to the leader of the Progressive group, it is quite true that he is in control of the government, but he is without responsibility, neither does he receive the emoluments of office. As he is Scotch, it seems to me that he might improve his position by stepping across the floor of the House and occupying a seat among the members of the government So much for one member of the famous team. Now what about the other? From time immemorial it has been the custom for history to assign nicknames to monarchs, and in good old England, always very conservative, that custom has been followed even from Saxon days. We find for example, in English history the following familiar titles: Ethelbert the Unready, Edward the Confessor, William the Conqueror, William Rufus, Richard Coeur de Lion, William of Orange, and so on. Now, if the Prime Minister were a king in fact, as well as in name, I believe history would assign him a nickname. I pause for suggestions from hon. members as to what that nickname should be. I have thought of one which to me seems very appropriate—William the Wobbler. I think that nickname would be justified. He has wobbled ever since he became Prime Minister. He is always wobbling. The year before the last election he made a tour of Canada and wobbled all the way, more particularly in his statement of his relations with the Progressive party. It will go down in history—in fact it is already written. I have this history before me and I am going to crave the indulgence of the House while I read a portion of it. It is contained in the Canadian Annual Review. The publication has an advisory editorial committee, and the first name on the list is that of the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, the Speaker of this House. So this history cannot be considered to be Tory propaganda. In describing the trip which the Prime Minister took in 1924, the Review, at page 207, says:

> Probably the most interesting of all the Prime Minister's expressions of opinion during this tour, and the one that brought him into the most direct connection with western politics, was his handling of the relations between the Progressives and the government as representative of the Liberal party.
>
> It was noticeable that at first Mr. Mackenzie King was disposed to recognize the Progressives as a separate party, working in fairly close sympathy with the Liberal party. Later, however, he diverged strongly from this division, and argues, rather, that there was no need for a separate group, such as the Progressives, but that all sections of the west at variance with "Toryism" and in sympathy with the main policy of the Liberal party, particularly on tariff questions, should unite under the government leadership.
> This change of position can readily be illustrated from extracts of speeches by the Prime Minister in several centres visited. At Winnipeg he warned his audience against the creation of factions in the ranks of those "opposed to Toryism." What Canada needed for her development, he declared, was a progressive Liberal policy, and the greatest misfortune that could overtake the country would be to let the "reactionary forces of Toryism," again get control, simply because those opposed to them were divided. He added: I believe it would be much better for Canada if we made the Liberal and Progressive forces as one, and if the causes they have in common were advocated from one end of Canada to the other."

At Brandon, Manitoba, he made it clear that the government had not acted "through the pressure of the Progressives of western Canada." "That statement is not true," he said. "We have done what we have done because it was part of our platform, because we said we would do it, if we were returned to power." He went on to refer to a pledge made by Mr. Crerar, and afterwards by Mr. Forke, that the Progressives would give honourable support to the Liberal party where the policies of the two were the same. This pledge had been honourably observed. He proceeded: "My task would have been easier had the Progressives in the House been Liberals instead of Progressives." He referred again to his proposal, made at Winnipeg, that the time had come, in the interests of western Canada and the whole Dominion, when the Progressives and the Liberals should seek out a common ground on which to stand in opposition to Toryism. Mr. King still seemed to hold out the idea of a combination of the two parties, declaring that he wanted to emphasize that "if the Liberals and Progressives are united from the Atlantic to the Pacific, there is going to be a long regime of Liberal-Progressive legislation in this country which will help to advance the interests of not only western Canada, but of the whole Dominion. . . . . It is going to be a poor consolation to the Progressives and a poor consolation to the Liberals to sit together for the next ten or fifteen years and see Mr. Meighen and his high protection group change the fiscal policy of this country—that is what would happen if we are divided."

By the time he had reached Saskatoon, however, two days later, he appeared rather inclined to set forth the idea of the west rallying to the support of the Liberals as a party, rather than having a type of working agreement with each operating as a separate organization. He intimated that such an arrangement would not be as effective as if one party alone represented western feeling. At his Saskatoon meeting he declared that the administration of the country and the passing of suitable legislation would be greatly facilitated by a Dominion-wide organization of right-thinking Liberal-minded persons, in place of factions striving for the same ends in different directions. "At present", the Premier declared," only three westerners hold porfolios. Should the west unite and rally to the standard of Liberalism, it would be possible to secure a greater measure of support and a greater measure of success in securing the fulfilment of demands." He referred pointedly to there being only one Liberal member from Saskatchewan, with the other fifteen seats "solidly Progressive, and, as such, outside the councils of the administration", and urged the people of Saskatchewan to think well of the situation before they went to the polls. Mr. King again maintained that the concessions made to the west in tariffs, the Crowsnest agreement, and branch lines, had not been brought about nor forced on the government in any sense by the Progressive party.

The Prime Minister also made another speech at Saskatoon, to which I would like to refer. This extract is taken from a Canadian Press despatch dated October 7, 1925:

Appealing then for Progressive support, Mr. King said that when at the last election, there was a possibility of either of the three parties forming an administration, Progressives were right in supporting the candidates who best represented their ideas. But if they wished those ideas to be given expression in the present contest, it was of no use voting for Progressives.

Progressives had no hope of forming an administration. "If," he added, "you support a party confined to one part of the country, you immediately help to put that part of the country, so to speak, in opposition to the rest of the country."

Mr. King held that the attitude of Progressives in the last session, instead of helping the administration, had hampered it in a hundred and one ways. "We have had co-operation, very helpful co-operation, in some cases," said the Premier. "I can tell you as Prime Minister that every time the government was face to face with some western problem, we had to face the false charge that we were acting as we were because we were living in the grace of the Progressives or because we wanted their support—which made it very difficult for us to do many of the things we would have liked to do.

I quote again from the Canadian Annual Review:

At Prince Albert, the following day, the Premier came back again to the subject, and declared that "it was most unfortunate that we should have been separated into two parties, when our policies were the same. There is no use in being divided into two groups on policies where we should be united against the forces opposing us .. . . What about the Progressives? It doesn't make my task any easier with respect to the Hudson Bay railway that they are outside the Liberal party. No group of men can threaten the present government that they will put them out of office because they will not do this or that. But the statement that these things the Liberal government has been doing is to get Progressive support has made it very difficult to get millions more for western Canada when the people of eastern Canada can't get the things they need."

It was at Vegreville, Alberta, on the following day, that the Prime Minister suggested that the Progressive party should come to an end. With the record of the present administration before the western people, he declared, he felt there were no further grounds for "Progressivism or any other third party" in Canadian politics.

If that is not wobbling I do not know what wobbling is. Then we have the famous Richmond Hill speech. I am not going into that in detail, but when you compare the position held by the Prime Minister to-day with the statements made during that speech I think you will agree that he has wobbled. We heard him the other day addressing a delegation in front of the parliament buildings. It was a splendid delegation; no one could look into the faces of those people, who conducted themselves in the most creditable and orderly manner, and come to any other conclusion than that they were in earnest and that they considered the situation very serious indeed. What did they get from the Prime Minister? He came out to address them, and it was announced that he would bring his cabinet ministers with him, but they were not there. A great many announcements were made to that delegation for the purpose of keeping it there until the Prime Minister could come out from his conference with representatives of the delegation. The very capable man in charge made announcements from time to time, one of which I remember that the conference was over and the Prime Minister was going out—going out from the conference and coming outside. Someone in the crowd called out, "Going out of office?" which question seemed to call forth a good deal of applause. The man in charge answered, "I am not a prophet." When the Prime Minister came outside he told them it was a nice day; he was glad it was a nice day, and he hoped they would enjoy their visit to Ottawa. He said, "You know, we have been getting information from your representatives; we have been told things we did not know before; we have been finding that this is going to have a very important effect on the automobile industry and on a great many people. It is a strange thing that no member of parliament has moved a resolution condemning the government for the reductions made in the automobile tariff. Any member of parliament can rise in his place and move an amendment."

Is that statement correct? If I understand parliamentary procedure, Mr. Speaker, only one amendment can be moved to the budget. You will correct me if I am wrong, but the Prime Minister certainly gave these people to understand that it was open to any member of this House to move an amendment. In that respect I contend that he misled those people. But what else did he tell them? He told them the matter would receive consideration, and gave them to understand that the fault was not altogether with the government, the inference being that it was largely with the Conservative party, because Conservative members of this House had not given him the necessary information on the subject. The exact contrary is what we are claiming here; we claim that the Conservative members had given him information, and that further information will no doubt be given in a clear and concise way, to show how these reductions will affect the automobile industry, and the country as a whole. As far as I am concerned I think that the amendment which has been submitted by the hon. member for Fort William, covers the situation completely, and brings the whole matter before this House in a very clear and definite way. I shall not take the time of the House to read the amendment that is now before the Chair.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), on the other hand, I believe, told the delegation that so far as he was concerned the government was going to stand to their guns, that is that no change would be made. So I take it that the Prime Minister will have to do a little more wobbling if he is going to retain his Minister of Finance and at the same time make any changes in the budget. Members who were in the last parliament will remember the famous Petersen contract. They will remember how the Prime Minister stood up in this House and stated that the government would stand or fall by the Petersen contract. They also know that the Prime Minister instructed his majority on the special committee which dealt with the Petersen contract to sidetrack the contract for another year at least, to throw it out of the House, and they know that as a consequence poor old Sir William Petersen died after hearing the result. Gentlemen may laugh, but it is not a laughing matter. It is one of the most tragic incidents that ever happend in this city. There was the Prime Minister wobbling again.

Then we were to have Senate reform. You know what the Prime Minister said on the hustings about Senate reform; you know what he said in this House when the Senate did something that he did not highly approve of. He said: We will reform the Senate. But have you heard of any Senate reform taking place this year? Not a word about it. The Prime Minister had various plans for reforming the Senate, but now he has come to the conclusion that the proper way to reform it is to allow Nature to take its course. On the public platform at various places he has called attention to the fact that a number of the old senators are dying off, and that as he has an opportunity, he will appoint to the Senate his own supporters who will see that the Senate is reformed.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and give you many illustrations of how the Prime Minister has wobbled, and is still wobbling, and I think that if he is christened William the Wobbler, it will be most appropriate. Not only does the Prime Minister wobble, but his supporters wobble also. His supporters wobbled during the last election in many constituencies. I, for instance, was opposed by a Liberal candidate who openly advocated protection. Can you believe that? He openly advocated protection. I have here a collection of clippings from newspapers which I have put together, and which tell a very interesting story. I have here, for instance, a number of paid advertisements which my Liberal opponent inserted in the newspapers in my town. He, like other Liberal candidates out there in British Columbia, cannot be charged with any undue modesty because he adopted as a slogan for himself The Man of Destiny—and the Hour for New Westminster, and goes on to say:

A. Wells Gray, Liberal Candidate for New Westminster, Federal Election October 29, 1925. Born in New Westminster, October 6, 1876, he is a "native son" of whom New Westminster may well be proud. His activities in many fields of endeavour have been marked by ability far above the ordinary, and have reflected fame and honour upon his native city.

I would like to read now a little item from one of his paid advertisements, and, as I said, there were many of them:

In voting for Wells Gray for New Westminster the electors are voting for a safe and sane policy of moderate and reasonable tariffs which will foster and encourage trade and industry throughout the Dominion, will strengthen and encourage our foreign trade, and will continually open new markets for our produce. The issue is not between high protection on one hand and free trade on the other. The issue is between a policy of restrictive and prohibitive high tariffs which might benefit a few special interests and a safe system of moderate tariffs successfully promoted and applied by the Mackenzie King. government—a policy which inflicts no hardships, reduces the cost of living to the wage-earner, fosters and encourages industry and commerce, and protects where protection is necessary.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): You might read that over again for the benefit of the Saskatchewan bunch.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And emphasize the word 'moderate'—not 'high' tariffs.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Instead of doing that I shall read from another advertisement of my Liberal opponent:

The Liberal policy of reasonable tariffs protects the farmer wherever protection is necessary, and protects not only the farmer—but the whole mass of workers in the Dominion against an artificial and unnecessary increase in the cost of living. Do you know that there are almost forty articles of farm produce on the present customs tariff in force in Canada? The Canadian farmer is protected by Mackenzie King and if the necessity arises at any time these tariffs could be amended to suit the occasion.

Here is another one:

Fair and reasonable tariff rates which will promote trade and commerce and open the markets of the world to our products—adequate protection for producer and consumer alike, without increasing the cost of living.

I do not know how the Liberal candidates were in other places, but my opponent, Mr. Gray, seemed to find it necessary to come out for protection, and he made a very close run of it too; I think his statements in regard to protection helped him considerably.

There is another little thing in connection with the election in New Westminster that I might mention. They had a very convenient arrangement there when they were making up the voters' lists, because next door to the registration office where the officials were making up the lists was another office which served as the Liberal campaign committee room. Outside the office where the voters were being registered was the official proclamation, but the next office had no sign on it at all. People thought that the whole thing together was the registration office, and some would go into the Liberal committee room thinking that was the place to register. They would then be escorted by the people in charge of the committee room into the next office where the registrations were taking place. As soon as registration was over, the Liberal committee rooms were enlarged by taking in the office where the registration had been taking place. Now that kind of an arrangement, it seems to me, is not very decent, to say the least.

Something has been said by the leader of the Progressives in regard to the income tax changes. That subject is necessarily involved in a discussion of the budget. Personally, I am not altogether satisfied with the changes which have been made. I do not say that I am not in favour of reducing the income tax —not at all; I should like to see it reduced still further—but I do say that the changes made will not have the effect that some people in this country imagine they will have. Comparatively speaking, there are very few people in Canada who will be affected by the extension of the exemption. There are very few people in this country who have to pay any income tax at all, because they are not making enough money. Consequently, the great majority of the Canadian people will not be affected by the increased exemption. On the other hand there are people who are going to be adversely affected, people who have been thrifty enough to accumulate a little money, and to invest it in a safe, sane and conservative manner. Those people are going to be adversely affected. It seems to me the result of that will be to discourage the investment of money because individual investors will be taxed to the full extent, although corporations have their tax reduced by one and a half per cent. This will discourage the investment of surplus funds in Canadian industry where it is so much required. A communication dealing with this phase of the subject appears in the Monetary Times of the 23rd instant, and is worth reading.

Mr. BROWN: We have all read it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I hope you have taken it to heart. There is a point that appeals to me, and that is in regard to the exemption for children. We now have an exemption of $500 for children up to the age of eighteen years. I think that age should be increased to at least twenty-one years because, those who have to educate their children, particularly if they are trying to give them a higher education which is desired where possible, know that the cost of maintenance, instead of decreasing after eighteen, really increases up to the age of twenty-one years or more. I would suggest therefore that an exemption be granted for children up to the age of twenty-one years. I think also that there should be exemption for life insurance premiums. At present income tax is paid on these premiums. Now, I think it is advisable to encourage the people of this country to take out life insurance. I am not in the life insurance business, by the way, but I carry some life insurance; and in most of the provinces, and in a great many other countries, life insurance premiums are exempt. Then there is the provincial income tax. At the present time we are paying income tax to the Dominion on the amount that we pay to the provincial government for income tax. Then I think also the exemption for municipal taxes should be restored. You may not have noticed it, Mr. Speaker, but if you will refer to the ways and means resolutions you will find:

That the carrying charges or expenses of unproductive property or assets not acquired for the purposes of a trade, business or calling or of a liability not incurred in connection with a trade, business or calling shall not be allowed as a deduction in determining income.

This means that on all unproductive property we will now have to pay income tax on taxes which we pay to municipalities. I would suggest another thing, and that is that the assessment should be made by the income tax department, and not by the taxpayer himself. It is very difficult for most of us to make out our income tax statement, but it is still more difficult for us to know how much taxation we should pay, and if we do not pay a sufficient amount, we are fined.

Now in regard to income tax, and referring more particularly to the remarks of the leader of the Progressive party on this subject and his support of income tax, I would point out that in some other dominions the income tax is being very rapidly diminished, and it is the intention of the governments of those dominions to abolish it altogether. That is the case in Australia.

4 p.m.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there not an income tax in most of the states?

Mr. McQUARRIE: In Australia?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am not referring to that, I am referring to the federal income tax in Australia.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. gentleman just referred to the fact that the Australian government was considering abolition of the income tax.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Is not Australia considering the abolition of the income tax because the states have their own income tax?

Mr. McQUARRIE: If you want me to go into that I will have to read an article I have here. I did not intend to read it, I do not wish to take up too much time, but the matter is discussed in an article which is a reprint from Industrial Canada, of April, 1926. If I could put this on Hansard without reading it I would gladly do so, but I do not suppose the House would consent. The article says:

In four years Australia has reduced its income tax by forty-seven per cent, calculated on a per capita basis. In 1921-22 it derived £16,720,862 ($81,602,714), from this source; in 1924-25, £11,136,344 ($54,122,631); and in 1925-26 the estimated revenue is £9,650,000 ($46,890,000). Eventually it is proposed to eliminate this tax altogether.

The article continues:

How is the revenue replaced that has been lost by the reductions in this direct form of taxation? The following figures will show.

I ask the permission of the House to put the figures on Hansard without reading them:

Australia's Customs Revenue

1921-22..	17,328,310	(84,215,586)
1922-23..	22,597,306	(109,822,907)
1923-24..	25,177,882	(122,364,506)
1924-25..	26,405,161	(128,329,082)
1925-26 (estimated) ..	26,500,000	(128,790,000)

Further, the article states:

While in 1921-22 the income tax yield was almost equal to the customs revenue; on 1925-26, the estimate for income tax is only a trifle more than one-third of the estimated customs revenue. Or, to quote the Sydney Daily Telegraph: "Whilst the federal income tax, which was first imposed to meet war expenditure is steadily diminishing the customs revenue has been steadily growing, and the latter fact has been mainly responsible for the large surpluses which have been obtained during recent years.

The article goes on to speak about a record revenue, and then refers to tax reduction:

At the close of the last financial year (1924-25), Doctor Earl Page, the Commonwealth treasurer, was able to provide for a twelve and a half per cent reduction in income tax, and for other taxation remissions amounting to £2,500,000 ($12,150,000) annually; for an increase in invalid and old age pensions from 17s. 6d. ($4.27) to £1 ($4.86) per week, and for debt redemption of £1,500,000 ($7,290,000):

How was this brought about? It was brought about by changes in the tariff, by increased tariff duties. The article goes on to state:

It is stated that the changes made last August in the Australian customs tariff have already had a profound effect in stimulating local manufacture, while they have certainly tended to increase revenues. In introducing the new tariff schedule, which gave substantial increases of duty on more than fifty items, Mr. Pratten, Minister for Trade and Customs, stated that within two years from 25,000 to 30,000 additional employees would be required for industrial development resulting from the new duties. Assuming that five persons were directly and indirectly dependent upon each wage-earner, from 100,000 to 150,000 persons would be advantaged. The new schedule reflected the desire of the Commonwealth government to assist industries which could be developed in Australia.

Meanwhile, the position of the primary producers of Australia is being steadily improved, not through tariff reductions which would be detrimental to industry, but through the introduction of better and more efficient marketing methods which tend to stabilize prices on a profitable basis. A federal department of markets—

And so it continues about the department of markets. It goes on:

The number of factories in the commonwealth in the fiscal year 1923-24 was 20,189; the number of hands employed, 429,990; total value of equipment, £182,114,600; value of materials used, £197,038,726; and the total value of output, £348,577,583. The total number of persons employed in manufacturing is nearly equal to that of those employed in rural occupations and in both New South Wales and Victoria it actually exceeds the numbers so employed. In Victoria, for instance, rural occupations show 105,933 males, 46,218 females, while in manufacturing there are employed 107,578 males and 48,584 females.

This is the way in which their tariff policy works out in Australia. The article goes on to say that the tariff increases industry. We start to reduce our tariffs in this country when they are increasing them in Australia and also in other countries. I have in my hand an extract from the Vancouver Province of the 20th February of this year which states:

A general revision of Japanese customs tariff is now being considered by the Diet. The measure provides for a general upward revision of import duties, with an increase of 50 per cent to 100 per cent or more over present rates on many kinds of machinery and electrical goods.

It would be better for us if instead of decreasing our tariff in many instances, we were to increase it. That, of course, should be done in a proper, scientific manner. I do not believe in any industry being singled out; I do not believe, for instance, in picking out the automobile trade and cutting the tariff on automobiles. If we are going to revise our tariff, that should be done in a scientific way by a properly qualified board. I wonder what the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) would say if this government had done the same thing in regard to the furniture business. I do not think he would approve if instead of reducing the tariff on automobiles they had reduced the tariff in connection with the furniture business. I have in my hand a letter from a man in Vancouver who, in quite a large way, is engaged in the same kind of business as the hon. member for North Bruce. He says:

[Mr McQuarrie.]

My policy would be as follows:—

Providing it could be arranged, I would suggest, a high tariff put on goods coming into Canada for a period of 25 years, to protect the interests of the manufacturer, the farmer, the worker, and anyone who has any money interest in Canada.

I believe that this policy would at once bring manufacturers into Canada, and by increasing your manufacturers, you would automatically increase your farmers, as these people would have to be fed. This would mean that instead of having two million people working in United States to make goods to ship into Canada, these people would move over into Canada to manufacture the goods, and thus avoid the high tariff. This would mean the automatic development of our country.

Suggestion No. 2:

I would appoint a tariff commission, similar to the Canadian Freight Association, so that they could raise or lower a tariff at once, where necessary. They could visit the different factories and manufacturers in Canada, and find out the different causes why the articles could not be manufactured in this country, then if it was necessary that the tariff should be raised on that article, the tariff commission could immediately do so. In the same way, if anyone was taking advantage of the business in Canada, the tariff commission could lower that tariff and make him come up to scratch.

Suggestion No. 3:

I would suggest also to have an excess profit tax, controlled solely by the tariff commission, and if a company is taking advantage of the tariff for excess profits, I would put a certain levy, as a maximum of profit—say 12 per cent—and if that company make a profit on their year's business of 20 per cent I would allow them 12 per cent and possibly 2 per cent for surplus, and have the 6 per cent handed over to the government to help the development of the whole country.

Our tariffs, in my estimation, should be about 25 per cent greater than the tariffs levied by the United States on goods coming into their country from foreign lands. If that was done we would immediately start to develop manufacturing industries in Canada and get production. We would be able to ship any surplus to China and Japan and I feel absolutely convinced that if our government studied the conditions of the country, we could easily increase our population, and make Canada a great country.

That gentleman was a life-long Liberal prior to the last election. In the last election he supported me and I think he will support me next time if I am a candidate. If the government really wish to bring down the cost of automobiles if they consider that prices in Canada are too high as compared with prices in the United States, they should repeal the sales tax and the luxury tax. That would be a good way of doing it, and it would save money to the people who purchase automobiles. The sales tax, the luxury tax and other charges paid to the government amount to a considerable sum in respect of automobiles alone. I have here an advertisement published by the automotive industries of Canada in this morning's Journal, in which it is shown that last year the Canadian manufacturers of motor vehicles and parts paid to the government, in customs duties on parts and materials, some $10,000,000, while in sales, excise, and stamp duties they paid $7,400,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): How much of that would be rebated to the companies?

Mr. McQUARRIE: None at all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Are you sure?

Mr. McQUARRIE: None of this would be rebated.

An hon. MEMBER: How much was collected in luxury tax?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have not the details; someone else will give that. It seems to me that something such as I have suggested might be done, and certainly it would be more effective than the proposal the government now makes, if it is the intention of the government to help the people. It has always been the policy of the present administration to reduce the cost of living although they have never succeeded in doing so. But if, as I suggest, they would take off the sales and luxury taxes then everyone would be relieved.

I am not going to enter into any exhaustive discussion of the reduction in automobile duties. That is something which no doubt will be handled by someone much more competent than myself. My only point—and I want to make it perfectly clear—is that the automobile industry has been very unfairly treated. As stated in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), we had a distinct promise on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the hustings, and a definite promise made in the Speech from the Throne, that any tariff changes that might be introduced would be made only after proper consideration of such industries as might be affected. For this purpose we were told that a tariff board would be appointed, as in fact it has been. We had that statement in the Speech from the Throne, and we actually had the tariff board constituted. Yet, a few days afterwards, the budget was brought down with a very substantial reduction in the duties on automobiles. I say, the automobile manufacturers have been badly treated. They were just as much entitled as anyone else to lay their side of the story before the tariff board, and they had a right to fair consideration. I do not say that possibly there should not be some reduction in automobile duties; I am not saying that at all. I do not pretend to be an authority on the subject, nor do I think that the members of the government are qualified to decide the question. It may be, however, that they have no confidence in their own tariff board. Certainly it is strange that this reduction should have been made so soon after the board was appointed.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the tariff board was a member of the cabinet in the last parliament. He was a very prominent member of the government and one who was thought a great deal of in this House. He had wearied of his job and did not wish to continue in public life; as a matter of fact, he is not in the very best condition to live a strenuous life. He therefore declined to carry on in the cabinet. No one can say that the government could not have found him a seat somewhere. It might have been difficult for him to get elected in Ontario, but he might have gone to Quebec or Saskatchewan. However, after hesitating a long time, and after, as I have no doubt, a great deal of pressure had been brought to bear upon him to continue in the government, he decided that he was not equal to the task. Yet the government appoints him to the position of chairman of the tariff board! Surely that will be an arduous life for him, and I cannot see how under the circumstances we can expect him to be anything more than a tool of the administration. He will not be any different in that position than if he were a member of the present government.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is hardly fair for the hon. member to suggest that the chairman of the board will be but a tool of the government. We all know him for what he was in this House, and he is known throughout the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I suggest that if the minister wishes to make a speech he will have an opportunity.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have no intention whatever to be disrespectful; indeed, Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest admiration for the chairman of the tariff board. But what I want to know is why this government, suddenly and without any warning whatever, took this important matter away from the board. Why should they have done so if they had confidence in the board? I want to see a tariff board which will be above and outside of politics, a board which can be relied upon to give a square deal to everyone. In any event, I say that the automobile industry was entitled to a chance to place its case before the board even though the government were not in favour of these manufacturers.

We are interested in certain tariff matters in British Columbia, and I regret to say that some questions in this regard the government have not seen fit to consider. I do not know whether they will be referred to the tariff board or not. Time after time in the last parliament, members on this side of the House brought to the attention of the government the unfair situation which the farmers of the country had to face under the tariff, particularly in relation to eggs and butter. I remember that on one occasion, when the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) were under consideration, I called his attention directly to the fact, and the only reply he volunteered was this. He said, "I am more interested in pulling down duties than in raising them." Two members from British Columbia, the former member for Fraser Valley, Mr. Munro, and the former member for Cariboo, Mr. McBride, stood up in their places and belittled the statements I had made in emphasizing the seriousness of the situation. Right here I want to remind the government that those two gentlemen were defeated at the last election; when they went back to their constituents they received their reward for the stand they had taken in this House on that question.

Now, what is the tariff in this particular? I am going to put on Hansard, with the permission of the House, the tariffs of Canada, Australia and the United States respectively on certain commodities. For the moment I will refer to two,—eggs and butter. The United States tariff on eggs is eight cents per dozen as against our tariff of three cents, while their tariff on butter is twelve cents, having been increased recently from eight cents. The Canadian tariff is four cents.

In regard to the United States tariff, I think it is a crime that we should place our farmers at such a disadvantage with relation to their American competitors; our tariff at least should be equalized with that of the United States. My constituency borders on the United States, I represent quite a large number of farmers, and they have probably some of the best farms in Canada. It is a crime that when they wish to send their eggs over to the United States they have to pay a duty of eight cents a dozen, whereas farmers in the United States can send eggs into this country at three cents a dozen. If our farmers want to send butter across the line they have to pay twelve cents a pound duty, while we allow American butter to come in under a duty of only four cents a pound. I have contended all the way through that our tariff should be equalized with that of our neighbours. The government might have fixed this with respect to butter and eggs without reference to any tariff board, because they know the present condition of affairs is an absolute injustice to our farmers.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend proposes putting the contents of that pamphlet on Hansard?

Mr. McQUARRIE: No, just the statement as to the tariff on certain items. I will send it over to the minister if he wishes.

In regard to Australia and our other sister dominions, I am absolutely in favour of increasing our trade and of doing anything reasonable to encourage inter-empire trade; but I believe that any trade agreement negotiated with our sister dominions should be fair to Canada. But what do we find? In relation to butter, the Australian tariff is six cents a pound; our tariff is only one cent a pound. On eggs the Australian tariff is eighteen cents a dozen; our tariff allows in Australian eggs duty free. What is the reason for this discrimination against our dairymen and poultrymen? We have been told it is because we wanted to get from Australia concessions for other Canadian industries. All right. I have had telegrams from pulp mills and other concerns in British Columbia that feared we desired to abrogate the Australian treaty. I am not in favour of abrogating the treaty at all, but I am in favour of so amending it as to remove any discrimination against our own producers. We are told: Yes, but there will be no butter or eggs coming to Canada from Australia or New Zealand—of course the House is aware that the government extended the Australian treaty provisions to New Zealand—and none of our butter and eggs will ever go to those sister dominions. Why not? Any one who is familiar with the facts knows that the ocean rates from Vancouver to Sydney, Australia, are no higher than the rail rates from Calgary to Vancouver; and of course the ocean rates to New Zealand are lower. It is all right for members of the government to say to our farmers: There is nothing for you to worry about, there is not going to be any business in these commodities. If so, I want to know why these items were put in the tariff at all. I repeat, Sir, the tariff on our butter and eggs going into Australia should be at the same rate as our tariff on similar Australian commodities entering this country. I take it that our farmers know more about their business than even members of this government assume to know. What do we find these farmers are doing? Are they worrying about this situation, or are they not? Well, they have been holding mass meetings of their institutes and associations and have been protesting most vehemently against the unfairness of the present situation. Why? Do you suppose they do not know their own business? Do you suppose they do not know whether there is any danger to their prosperity? Do you not realize that those men are aware of the real significance of the present state of affairs? I say that when the government finds them protesting so emphatically it should pay some attention to their protests. I have before me a number of resolutions, but I am not going to take the time of the House to read them all, I will merely enumerate a few. I have a resolution passed at a mass meeting of poultrymen held at New Westminster January 26, at which were represented many thousands of poultry producers of the mainland of British Columbia. In my constituency and in other constituencies there are a great many returned men who were encouraged to go into the poultry industry and who have done their best to make it a success, but now they are being slapped in the face by this government. I have also a resolution of the Surrey Farmers Institute, passed at Cloverdale, B.C., January 12, 1926; a resolution passed at a mass meeting of poultrymen held at Duncan, B.C., January 5, 1926, representing the poultrymen of Vancouver island; resolutions passed by the Strawberry Hill Poultry Association December 1, 1925, and January 25, 1926; a resolution passed by the Courtney Comox Board of Trade November 13, 1925; a resolution passed by the Comox Creamery Association November 12, 1925, and a resolution passed by the Harmsworth District Farmers' Association November 19, 1925, as to grading. All those resolutions referred to eggs. Then I have a resolution passed by the British Columbia Dairymen's Association at meetings held at New Westminster January 21 and 22, 1926, in regard to butter.

Now, the same subject is of concern to the farmers of Quebec, for I hold in my hand this despatch from Three Rivers, Quebec, dated February 26, 1926:

> A plea for adequate protection for Canadian butter against foreign competition was made this evening by Frank Byrne, of Charlesbourg, first vice-president of the General Breeders' Association of Quebec, at the closing meeting of its thirty-fourth convention. "If we could produce 15,000,000 pounds of butter more annually," said Mr. Byrne, "we could sell them, but a difficulty arises in the way of success. Other countries threaten to send their butter here. We ought to hit foreign butter as hard as foreign countries hit our butter. Duties as high as those established by foreign countries ought to be imposed here, and I hope the government will see to it."

I desire to place on record one of the resolutions regarding eggs, to which I have already referred. This resolution was passed at a mass meeting of poultrymen held at New Westminster, British Columbia, on January 12, 1926:

Resolution No. 1:

Whereas, eggs coming into Canada from United States points under a tariff of 3 cents per dozen, are making it unprofitable for British Columbia poultrymen to send their eggs to the prairie and eastern Canadian markets;

Be it therefore resolved:

(a) That the federal government be requested as an act of justice to Canadian poultrymen to raise the tariff on United States eggs coming into Canada to 8 cents per dozen, which is the tariff imposed on Canadian eggs going into the United States.

(b) That the federal government be requested to make the Eggs Marks Act of British Columbia applicable to the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

And be it further resolved that copies of this resolution be sent to Hon. W. R. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa, Hon. E. D. Barrow, Minister of Agriculture for British Columbia and to each of the federal members for British Columbia.

Resolution No. 2:

Whereas, under the Australian-Canadian treaty eggs from Australia are allowed to enter Canada free of duty;

And whereas under the Dominion of Canada egg grading regulations it is possible that eggs from Australia, raised under summer conditions, will be able to enter Canada as fresh eggs at a time when winter conditions prevail in Canada;

And whereas this will increase the already serious competition which Canadian poultrymen have to meet from eggs from the United States;

Be it therefore resolved:

That the federal government be requested to add to the present definition of the word "fresh" the length of time during which eggs intended for sale as "fresh" in Canada may be held when in transit at a temperature of 35 degrees Fahrenheit or less.

And be it further resolved that copies of this resolution—

And so forth.

Resolution No. 3:

Whereas there is reason to believe that an effort will shortly be made by certain produce dealers in the prairie provinces to secure the modification of the present egg grading regulations, which modification amounts practically to the abandonment of egg grading;

Be it resolved:

That the federal government be requested to make no alteration in the present regulations—

You will notice that this resolution does not specifically call for the increase in the Canadian duty against Australian eggs to equal the Australian duty, but that is covered by some of the other resolutions. I wish now to read the resolution passed by the British Columbia Dairymen's Association:

I beg to advise you that at the annual convention of the British Columbia Dairymen's Association, held on January 21 and 22 last at New Westminster, the following resolution was passed:

Resolved that whereas, at the close of its last session the federal parliament rushed through legislation giving to Australia a preferential tariff on cheese and butter;

And whereas this legislation is likely to discourage the production of cream during the winter months in this country, owing to the maintenance of low prices to meet the competition of Australian products moving to our ports by low ocean rates against our high railway rates;

Be it resolved that this convention goes on record by voicing its disapproval of this concession, and that such action be taken as may be deemed necessary for the protection of our dairy industry.

I have here a return tabled on a motion made by myself, showing the importation of eggs from the United States and other places. With the permission of the House I will place these tables on Hansard:

Countries from which Imported	Fiscal Year ended March 31, 1924		Fiscal Year ended March 31, 1925		Month of December, 1925
	Quantity	Value	Quantity	Value	Quantity	Value

Australia	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
China	.....	.....	560,257	89,545	157,616	25,395

All I ask, and all any reasonable person could ask, is that we be placed on a business-like basis in our relations with the other dominions. Give our farmers a fair chance and they are prepared to compete with the world, but under present conditions they are at a very great disadvantage.

I would like now, Mr. Speaker, to refer for a moment to the question of immigration. I am not going to discuss at any length the question of oriental immigration; I have referred to that on a number of occasions, and any hon. member who is interested may look up Hansard and read my remarks. Other hon. members are prepared to deal with this subject, I believe. I wish to say, however, that the people of British Columbia are not satisfied with what is being done by this government in the way of effective restriction. The resolution which I moved in 1922 providing for exclusion was defeated, because the government promised effective restriction and the then leader of the Progressive party, Mr. Crerar, stated that he was prepared to give the government a chance. All the hon. members from British Columbia are a unit, I believe, in demanding that there be exclusion, but on that occasion my resolution was defeated, because the government said, "We will give you effective restriction of such a nature that it will practically amount to exclusion, although the word exclusion is not used and therefore will not give offence to Japan."

The people of British Columbia are not satisfied with the way that promise is being carried out. I have a great mass of material which has been sent to me during the present session, particularly from the Oriental Exclusion League of Victoria, covering this question. That league, which is very active, has proposed that a royal commission be appointed to investigate the whole question of oriental immigration, as well as that of orientals already in Canada, and on that royal commission they believe British Columbia should have the majority representation. That is a matter for consideration. The league also suggests that an effort be made to get orientals already in Canada to go back to their own countries. It is said that thousands of Chinese would go back to China providing they were assisted by the return of a portion of the head tax already paid. In South Africa a policy has been adopted under which bonuses are given East Indians to help them back to India; that policy has not worked out in such a way as to get rid of all the East Indians, but some of them have taken advantage of the opportunity. I am given to understand by the secretary of the Oriental Exclusion League of Victoria that a great many—he says "thousands"—of Chinese would go back to China if some such policy were adopted. They would be glad to go back, because they came to this country under the false impression that they were needed here and would be welcomed. They were brought here more or less under false pretences, for which the transportation companies are responsible; they find conditions here not as represented, and they would go back if the government would bonus them to the extent of their steamship fares. If that is so, it might be a good thing to do.

I have referred, Mr. Speaker, to the policy of the Liberal party, announced many, many times on the hustings and in this House and in their platform, that the cost of living would be brought down if they were returned to power. Well, I think that has not turned out to be the case, but rather that the cost of living has gone up, and has been going up practically all the time since this government came into power. In this connection let me refer to the Labour Gazette, a government publication, of February, 1926, where at page 93, I find this:

> Retail food prices were again somewhat higher, the cost per week of a list of twenty-nine staple foods for an average family of five, in terms of the average retail prices in some sixty cities was $11.63 at the beginning of January, 1926, as compared with $11.56 for December, 1925; $10.77 for January, 1925; $10.78 for January, 1924; $10.52 for January, 1923; $11.03 for January, 1922; $14.48 for January, 1921; $16.92 for June, 1920 (the peak); $15.30 for January, 1920; $12.42 for January, 1918; and $7.73 for January, 1914.

I am afraid, therefore, that this government has not been successful in carrying out that plank of its platform, and I submit that there must be something wrong. I submit that the government's policy is responsible for this increase, and that the government's policy as announced in the budget this year will be responsible for a still further increase in the cost of living.

Now I come to another matter. This government takes credit for a lot of things. I wonder if it will admit that it is responsible for the state of affairs to which I am now going to refer, namely that the birth rate in Canada has decreased steadily since October of 1921.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The whisper of death is responsible for that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Has the policy of this government anything to do with that decline in the birth rate? Whether it has or not the fact remains that it is absolutely true; the birth rate in Canada has decreased steadily since October, 1921. I quote from a recent press despatch:

> The birth rate continues to fall. In October, 1925, the last month of record, returns from all the provinces except Quebec show a total of 11,887 births in Canada, compared with 12,768 in October, 1924. The equivalent annual birth rate per thousand of population in the eight provinces was 20.5, having decreased steadily since October, 1921, when it was 25.3. Vital statistics for Quebec are not available.

The above figures are living births. In October last 416 infants were born dead. There were 129 pairs of twins. Sixty mothers died in childbirth. Infant mortality also was slightly higher; 1,075 infants under one year old died in October.

There must be a reason for this decrease in the birth rate. Does it mean that our population also has decreased? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if this government pursues the policy which has been enunciated in the budget, we shall have a still further decrease in our birth rate, because Canada will not have even the population that it now has.

Another matter I wish to refer to in this connection is this: In British Columbia, along the coast and in the outlying districts, a very serious condition exists. A great many children come into this world without a doctor or a nurse being available.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Too many doctors here; that is why.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The situation is very serious, and a similar condition might exist in other provinces. It may be responsible for the high infant mortality, but I would suggest to the government a way in which they can help. I submit that this government is doing very little in the way of assisting in this very important matter now, but we have an organization in this country that is doing splendid work, so far as its funds will permit, and that is the Victorian Order of Nurses.

Mr. CHABOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I submit also that that order is not receiving a decent grant from this government. This government is not giving as much assistance to this organization as some municipalities are subscribing; it grants only $10,000 a year, whch is a disgrace to Canada. I submit that the grant should be very largely increased, and that we should give at least $50,000. If we are as prosperous as the Minister of Finance would give us to understand, surely we can afford to give at least $50,000 to assist the Victorian Order of Nurses. Such a grant would enable them to enlarge their work, and I am sure they would then be able to attend to some of the outlying districts where no assistance is at present being given.

The government is doing very little for the farmers, and there is one branch of farming that is being overlooked entirely, namely, the raising of sheep. No encouragement is being given to our farmers to raise sheep, although I believe conditions in this country are suitable for sheep raising. When I was in South Africa I had the pleasure of meeting one of the greatest wool experts in the world, the man who wrote the article on Sheep and wool in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, Senator Guthrie, of Australia. He told me that he was surprised we produced so few sheep in Canada. He said that the climate, the soil and the conditions generally were suitable to the large production of sheep in this country. I have in my hand a pamphlet which deals with this subject, and I shall make a short quotation from it:

Canada is a fine sheep country and the raising of sheep is a tremendous factor in successful farming. Yet we keep only 2,500,000 sheep while the size, climate and feed conditions would permit keeping 25,000,000, to grow wool and mutton for home consumption and export. Our farmers should have the profit of growing 50,000,000 of the 70,000,000,000 pounds of wool consumed annually by the people of Canada, instead of growing only 15,000,000 pounds, of which a large quantity is exported.

There are no more sheep in Canada to-day than there were in 1897, because Canada then reduced its duties of woolen goods from Great Britain, which resulted in closing down eighty-eight mills, which reacted on the sheep raising industry.

The government should put a proper duty on and give the sheep producers of this country a chance.

Mr. FORKE: Take the duty off woven wire.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have in my hand a resolution which was passed in February of this year by the advisory board of the British Columbia Farmers Institute, which I believe has been presented to the government, and one of the matters therein referred to is the initiation of a policy designed to stimulate sheep-raising and agriculture generally.

I am sorry to notice also that our trade with South Africa has decreased. That trade, of course, is one-sided even now, but I am happy to see that South Africa has decided to send a trade representative to Canada. Perhaps he will be of service in developing a larger trade. I think we should buy more from South Africa. I pointed that out in a speech which I made last session. I find that our trade with South Africa has decreased very materially in the last year or so. I would refer anyone interested in the question to the Commercial Intelligence Journal, a government publication, of February 27, 1926, where tables are given and where the matter is discussed. Something is wrong in our dealings with South Africa. This government is not attending to business as it should; it is not doing anything to encourage trade between that dominion and Canada.

Earlier in the session a resolution was introduced by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) which called for better treatment for inmates of the penitentiaries and the payment of an allowance to them for work which they perform. It seems to me that before contemplating anything of that kind the government might take into consideration the wages paid to the guards in the penitentiaries which are altogether too low. The current report of the Auditor General shows that nine industrial guards employed at the New Westminster penitentiary drew during the year in salary and bonus, a total of $8,388, which would be $932 per man. The four keepers drew $6,003, or $1,501 per man, and the forty-seven plain guards drew $42,973, which averages $915 per man. These guards at the penitentiary are not employed on an eight-hour day or six-day week basis at all; they are engaged in continuous service. The government does not pretend that these sums adequately pay these men, but it rests on the plea of the necessity for economy. I understood the Minister of Justice to say that he was in favour of paying the convicts in the penitentiaries for the work they did. I would say to him: Before you do that look into the matter of the wages paid to the guards in the penitentiaries, and give them a fair deal. They are not getting the standard rate of wages. We have in British Columbia, as in other provinces a standard rate of wages which must be paid in connection with all contracts awarded by municipalities, and other public bodies.

5 p.m.

Mr. FAFARD: What were the salaries paid in 1920?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have not got those figures here. We find from the record of contracts for works awarded in the vicinity of the penitentiary in British Columbia that contractors are required to pay 45 cents per hour which means $3.60 for an eight-hour day. This in turn represents $21.60 per week and $93.60 per month, or $1,123.20 per year. The penitentiary guards are entitled to a wage at least equal to that and I think the government should do something on their behalf.

I have here a protest and an appeal from the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada dated 20th of March, 1926. I am not going to read it because all hon. members have received a copy of the document. I must say that I believe the complaint set out in the protest is well founded, and that these men have not received proper consideration from the government. In June, 1923, a parliamentary committee, which inquired into the operation of the Civil Service Act, recommended that immediately after reorganization and reclassification had taken place salary revision and adjustments should be proceeded with without delay, and that pending this revision the bonus should be continued. The protest goes on to say:

> At the commencement of the 1924 fiscal year no provision was made for the revision of salaries; and the bonus, admittedly a necessity under the existing low salary ranges, instead of continuing, as recommended, was reduced 33 per cent, creating considerable agitation among civil servants generally. The government responded by requesting the Civil Service Commission to revise salaries commencing with the Post Office Department. On the completion of such revision it was found that instead of removing the cause of the agitation (loss of remuneration) it increased the loss; in other words, the revision in numerous instances allowed even less remuneration than after the original bonus reduction was in operation.

The government have made various promises to the civil service, but the latter have been compelled to wait unduly long for an adjustment of their claims. A finality should be reached in this matter. The civil servants are entitled to know where they stand in regard to their salary, and some permanent arrangement should be made which will be fair to them. My contention is that the civil servants are entitled to a fair and reasonable wage. I do not believe in cutting down wages. If there is a lot of deadwood in the various departments cut it out. We were told that was going to be done, that the new Auditor General would deal satisfactorily with that feature, but so far as I am aware the Auditor General has done practically nothing in that direction. I repeat, if there is deadwood, cut it out, paying those who are retained in the service a fair and reasonable wage.

Before concluding, I want to refer to a more or less local matter affecting my constituency. We are pleased to see by the financial statement of the Canadian National Railways that a very encouraging advance has been made towards meeting the annual expenditures of that road out of revenue. It seems to me that if that railway is in as splendid a position as has been stated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and Sir Henry Thornton, it should be in a position to fulfil its obligations to the city of New Westminster.

Prior to the government taking over this line, when it was being operated by the Canadian Northern and when the road was being extended to the coast, an arrangement was made with New Westminster. The Canadian Northern officials came to that city and requested that New Westminster should provide a right-of-way for the Canadian Northern through the city so that it could get on its own tracks to Vancouver. They promised certain things to New Westminster and in consideration of those promises the city expended a sum of $500,000 in widening the street adjoining the river for the purpose of giving this railway a right-of-way. The railway acquired at that time about $1,000,000 worth of property in New Westminster, property which was to be used for the purposes covered by its agreement with that city. Some of that property has been leased, but the most valuable portion of it has been lying idle ever since although some good use should be made of it.

The city of New Westminster is entitled to expect the Canadian National, as being the successor of the Canadian Northern, to carry out the agreement made by the Canadian Northern, as has been done in other cases, for instance in connection with the city of Vancouver. What we ask is that the Canadian National do at New Westminster or on the Fraser river something which at the same time will assist the Canadian National. Of course we think the Canadian National should go on its own tracks to Vancouver. It runs over the Great Northern tracks now, and if you will believe it, Mr. Speaker, at the present time the station at New Westminster used by the Canadian National is in charge of officials of the Great Northern Railway Company, a United States concern. If you call up and ask for the Canadian National Railway station in New Westminster, you will be answered at the other end "Great Northern." Surely if we are in such a splendid financial position, the Canadian National should have its own agents in New Westminster as in other places.

What we suggest is that the government as being synonymous with the railway should build a government grain elevator at New Westminster. I know, in making this appeal, I have the support of many Progressives because they stood up in the last House and strongly supported the construction of a government grain elevator on the Fraser river. There are certain advantages there and all those advantages apply more particularly to the Canadian National. For instance, if there were a government elevator near New Westminster on the Fraser river, say at Port Mann where the railway already owns a suitable site, and if grain were taken off the cars at Port Mann instead of the cars being routed over to Burrard inlet at Vancouver, there would be a direct saving to the Canadian National Railways of $13 a car.

Hon. members, more particularly those who come from the west, know how much of their grain is going to go out by Pacific ports and how much is going to be carried by the Canadian National Railways. I say to them: On every car of grain carried by the Canadian National Railways to the Pacific coast, if there is a government elevator at Port Mann there will be a saving of $13 a car. It may be said that that is not a saving to the producers, but I submit it will come back to the producers because they have to pay their share of that $13 a car now and equally so will they derive a benefit from a saving of $13 a car.

Another matter is the time involved in taking these cars over to Vancouver. They have to be switched to the bridge, go across the bridge, then be switched to the Great Northern tracks, taken over to Vancouver, switched to the Canadian Pacific tracks, taken down towards the inlet and then switched to another track and taken to the elevators. All that switching would be done away with and a great deal of time would be saved. Another consideration is that the cost of construction on the Fraser river is very much less than on the salt water. On the Fraser river you can use a pile foundation which will last for fifty years or more. On Burrard inlet the construction has to be concrete because of the teredo which is not found in the fresh water. Sites are already available owned by the Canadian National Railways, namely, site at New Westminster, a site at Port Mann and a site at Woodward's landing a little lower down the river. Any one of these sites would be suitable and Mr. Howe, one of the greatest elevator engineers in Canada, has reported as to the suitability of these sites.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake) : How does it come about that no elevators have been built there? There has been a good deal of building in Vancouver in the last number of years.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That brings me to what I was going to say. I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked the question because it will give me an excuse for continuing longer. I was just about to conclude my remarks. I wanted to say something about the Fraser river and I am sorry the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) is not in his seat. The Fraser river is one of the greatest rivers in Canada and for a great part of the distance the channel is deep. In most places it has a depth of fifty feet or more, but in one or two places down at the mouth of the river the depth is not there yet. Although some dredging has been done—and I give the government credit for that—no effective work has been done to complete the job. A programme has no doubt been decided upon, but the government does not finish it. Therefore, although shipping in the port of New Westminster has increased very largely in the last few years and although at present many ocean-going ships come into New Westminster including Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships which do a big business, there are ships which cannot even now get into the Fraser river. The matter is just one of having the channel completed and then we shall have private elevators. There is no doubt that the Grain Growers would have built an elevator at New Westminster if they had had positive assurance that the channel would be completed immediately. I know they had options on property there and that they were satisfied with the property. The only question was as to the channel of the river, and the matter is a very simple one from an engineering standpoint. True enough, it means the expenditure of some money; it will involve the completion of the jetty out on the sandheads. Prior to the war the jetty was constructed for half or perhaps three-quarters of the distance, and it requires but a couple of miles more to complete it. This should be done, as well as some other permanent work, and if the government would go ahead and complete the undertaking they would find that private elevators would be established there. The matter is in the hands of the government of course, and I can only assure them that upon completion of the channel these ships will come in. I admit that the draught of the ships in the grain carrying trade has increased, and I am also aware that it is necessary to accommodate vessels drawing twenty-eight or twenty-nine feet, whereas we can at the present time provide for a draught of about twenty-six feet only. It must be remembered, however, that a ship of that draught is fairly large.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is annual dredging necessary?

Mr. McQUARRIE: The channel has to be kept dredged. We have two dredges, one of which I think should be scrapped altogether. It is not doing any effective work although it is costing the country a large sum annually. It is a suction dredge that takes the sand up into its hold and carries it for deposit in the gulf of Georgia. That is a poor system; all the dredge can do is dig holes. It digs two or three holes, carries the sand out to sea, and then attempts to dig more holes adjoining those already made. That is not at all effective, and such a method will never complete the work. I have repeatedly advocated the obtaining of a modern dredge of the King Edward type. I repeat, a certain amount of work will have to be done; but if the engineers are right—and we have had one of the best river engineers in America report upon the river—then, upon the completion of this permanent work, there will be little for the dredges to do. At present we have on the river such business as will warrant the expenditure. It is, I know, of considerable proportions, but if necessary I can give the figures to show the amount of business that is done on the Fraser river. I say therefore that we are entitled to have the channel made sufficiently deep to allow us to get our products out to the markets of the world.

I do not expect in this connection to receive any assistance from the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Donaghy). That hon. gentleman is not going to support me in my suggestion so far as Port Mann is concerned. In fact, in the last campaign he advocated that the Canadian National shops at Port Mann should be moved to the city of North Vancouver. In a pamphlet issued at his instance there appears the following:

> The future development of the north shore. What will it be? By Dugald Donaghy.
> Our interests are opposed to the policy announced by the leader of the opposition, that not another dollar shall be spent in railway extensions. Such a policy will hold back the development of this port. We want to see the Canadian National Railway extended from Port Mann to the city of North Vancouver; we want to see its railway shops and yards constructed on the great tideflat areas on the north shore, and we expect to see many grain elevators constructed along our water front.

That would mean a greater expenditure; it would mean adding to the $13 a car inasmuch as they would have to go on other tracks and be taken over another bridge. There would be a lot more switching, involving an additional expense. This country owes something to Port Mann, in view of the fact that the Canadian National is a successor to the Canadian Northern. Port Mann was advertised as the terminus of the Canadian Northern railway and as the site for the car shops and terminal buildings of that system, and a great many people throughout Canada and in other countries as well, purchased land in Port Mann on the strength of the representations which were made at the time of its establishment. I say therefore that in all fairness this government and the Canadian National Railways, instead of taking the car shops away from Port Mann should add to the industries already in operation there. They should encourage the further development of industry in that town.

I must thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen for having listened to me so patiently. I have taken up some time to-day, but it will be admitted that during the previous part of the session I said very little. We are all, I take it, anxious to promote the interests of our own constituencies, but at the same time it is our desire to help the rest of Canada. In my part of the country we do not manufacture automobiles, but we are willing just the same to see that the industry and those employed in it shall have adequate protection. Similarly, although we do not grow grain to any extent, we are interested in the grain growing business. We wish to see the grain growers and other farmers of the prairies prosperous, because we know that their prosperity will be reflected immediately in our province. When there is a good season on the prairies we have also a good season in British Columbia. We are with the prairie provinces; our interests are identical and we desire to see everything reasonable done to assist those provinces. We desire also to help other parts of Canada. We want to see the Dominion as a whole make progress and become prosperous, and I have no doubt that if we have a good Conservative government in power and if we all work together and in harmony, with the welfare of Canada constantly in view, we shall in a comparatively short time see the vacant spaces in this country fill up with the right kind of population and Canada achieve that position to which she is entitled.

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Long Lake): In rising to make a few observations on the budget and the proposed amendment, I desire first of all to follow so many of those who have preceded me in the debate in offering my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the splendid statement he has submitted to parliament at this time. I am sure he must have had the full co-operation of his colleagues in the government to have been able to present such a financial statement to the House and the country, and I believe that we in Canada are fortunate, particularly at a time like this, in having as Minister of Finance a man in whose integrity, high sense of duty and sound business judgment the great masses of the people have every reason to have confidence.

It is not my intention to follow my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) throughout the whole of his remarks, but at the outset he read an editorial from the Vancouver Daily Province to this effect:

> What Canada needs is a government that can run and is not dependent on the Progressive crutch.

I would ask my hon. friend and those of his party if at the beginning of this session—or even at the present time—they were given control, are they in a position to run?

Mr. McGIBBON: Might I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I have put a question to my hon. friend's colleague.

Mr. McGIBBON: Did the hon. member find the Progressive crutch very useful in the past?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): My hon. friend has not answered my question. Even if given control of the government now, are he and his party in a position to run—to administer the affairs of state?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I should say not. The only place they could run would be to the country. How does that gibe with the direct bid which was made to the Progressives by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) at the opening of this session? The rules do not permit me to quote the hon. gentleman's speech, but if I remember correctly, his language was something like this, and he stated he was making his bid in the presence and with full knowledge of his leader: That if the Progressives in this House would join hands in supporting the Conservative party, that party would carry on from session to session until the full parliamentary term was exhausted.

Mr. McGIBBON: If they had the confidence of the House.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Certainly; no government can carry on without the confidence of the House. That is what this government is doing and has done since the opening of the session.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does my hon. friend say that is a bribe then?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Well, I do not know what else you would call it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then you admit that you are bribing them.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Certainly not. Then my hon. friend from New Westminster referred to the Prime Minister as a wobbler. Well, let me ask my hon. friend if his leader did not wobble from his previous stand in connection with Canada's participation in the empire's wars in his Hamilton speech. I want to know if the hon. member for New Westminster, or even the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon), agrees with his leader in his Hamilton speech. They are not so ready with an answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would the hon. member state exactly what speech he is referring to?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): The speech of my hon. friend's leader in Hamilton.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What did he say?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I would have thought my hon. friend knew very well what his hon. leader said on that occasion.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Quote it to us.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I have not the speech before me.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have heard a great many versions of what my right hon. leader—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Wait a minute.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order:

An hon. MEMBER: You had all the afternoon.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have not yet heard from the leader of the opposition what he did say on that occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McQUARRIE: You asked me a question and now you will not let me answer.

An hon. MEMBER: No speech.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Before I can answer that question I must know definitely what my leader did say. But I have never yet known him to make any statement that I did not entirely agree with.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When wrong they are misquoted.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I do not wish to misquote my hon. friend's leader. I think I shall do him no injustice when I say this is the gist of his words in Hamilton: that if the empire was embroiled in another war, and he were prime minister of this country, before he would plunge Canada into that war he would not only call parliament together but he would appeal to the people. Does my hon. friend subscribe to that doctrine?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am not prepared to take the hon. gentleman's guess of any statement made by my hon. leader.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Well, so much for the remarks of my hon. friend for New Westminster about wobbling. I notice that he criticized the treaty with Australia and wanted the duty raised on butter and eggs. Well, I think I can show my hon friend that so far that treaty has not worked to the detriment of the dairy industry of this country. I have before me the wholesale and retail prices of butter in the city of Ottawa for the winter months during the past three years, and I think they pretty well indicate whether or not Australian butter entering Canada during the past winter has injured our dairy industry. These are the figures:

	Wholesale	Retail
December, 1923..	42	45
January, 1924..	42	45
February, 1924..	42	45
March, 1924..	42	45
	37	40
December, 1924..	38	42
January, 1925..	38	42
	37	40
February, 1925..	37	40
	34	37
March, 1925..	34	37
	37	40
December, 1925..	45	48
	47	50
January, 1926..	47	50
	45	48
February, 1926..	45	48
	47	50
March, 1926..	47	50

Now, if the hon. gentleman will analyse those figures he will find that the price of butter in this city, both wholesale and retail, for March, 1926, was exactly ten cents a pound more than it was in March, 1925.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the financial statement which the Minister of Finance has presented to parliament, gives great encouragement to the Canadian people. We have a favourable balance of trade amounting to over $400,000,000. The proposed reduction in taxation of $25,000,000 will be a welcome relief to our people who have been so heavily taxed since the war. This, coupled with a revenue sufficient to meet all our expenditures and provide $22,000,000 in reduction of the national debt, will, I am sure, give fresh hope and courage to all Canadians from coast to coast. The reduction in the income tax, the doing away with the stamp tax, and the decision to revert to penny postage on Dominion day, all go to prove that better times have returned.

My hon. friend from New Westminster referred to the finances of the Canadian National Railways in, I thought, a rather critical manner. Well, I think the returns on operating account will bear investigation. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), speaking in this debate, was not ready to give this government credit for any of the improved conditions apparent in Canada. In 1920 we had an operating deficit of thirty-two million dollars in connection with the Canadian National Railways. In 1921, the last year my hon. friends were in office, this deficit had been reduced to eleven and a half million dollars. In 1922, when the present administration had been in office but a few months, the operating surplus amounted to two and three quarter millions. In 1923 this had grown to twenty and a half millions. In 1924, on account of a short crop year in western Canada, this surplus was reduced to seventeen and a half millions, while for the past year it amounted to thirty millions—thirty millions of a surplus in 1925 as against a deficit of thirty-two millions in 1920 or a difference of sixty-two million dollars. After this government came into office there was a change in management, and I am ready to give some credit to the government for making that change. I do not think we would have had such a statement before parliament and before the country to-day had the old management carried on.

Speaking of railway rates some hon. gentlemen opposite seem to believe that western Canada has received a special favour with respect to railway rates; that because the old Crowsnest rates have been made statutory, other parts of Canada are being made to suffer. I am not going into this matter exhaustively, but I wish to point out, particularly to my hon. friends from Ontario, that to carry a ton of coal from Edmonton to the central parts of Ontario costs $12.70; to carry a ton of wheat from Edmonton to central points in Ontario costs $13. I think this is enough to show hon. gentlemen that the grain producers of western Canada are paying a rate sufficiently high; at all events it more than equals the rate on coal. But it is said that these rates are so low that the railways cannot make any money. Last year I took occasion to put on Hansard certain figures setting out the net return by months of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the year 1924. I am sorry I have not the figures for 1925, but I think at this time it is worth while repeating the figures for 1924. These figures are the net returns, and I want to show that during the months when grain is being moved the receipts are far beyond those of the other months of the year—the grain-carrying months must of necessity be those in which both railways make their money.

Months	Receipts
January	$ 709,011
February	938,618
March	2 332 071
April	1,497,607
May	1,629,361
June	2 462,880
July	2,339,116
August	3,280,706
September	4,581,103
October	7,090,615
November	6,122,251
December	4,554,047

That makes a total of $37,537,386. If we analyse these figures and take the four months during which grain is moved—September, October, November and December—we find that they give a greater net return by $7,158,646 than do the other eight months of the year, so I think it is useless for hon. members to suggest that the hauling of grain in western Canada is not profitable.

Mr. McGIBBON: Might I ask a question? Does the hon. member seriously suggest to this House that he is a greater authority than the statistical branch of the Department of Railways, which absolutely contradicts him?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that figures do not lie but that statistics may be made to say anything. The figures I have given are the net returns of the Canadian Pacific Railway month by month and it is up to my hon. friend to refute them.

The hon. member for New Westminster gave some quotations from letters, advertisements and so on. I am going to read one or two. I have a letter from a friend in western Canada under date of April 19, which is so directly opposite to that read by my hon. friend that I think it should go on Hansard. It goes on to say:

> It is far and away the most popular thing the government has done since it came into office, not only because of the reductions in income tax and automobile duties but because it will give the impression that the government is showing capacity to deal with the pressing problem of taxation. The reductions in the latter, amounting to $25,000,000 are, I think, more than anyone expected. It was a bold stroke but one which I think will be justified by events. Undoubtedly the country is swinging into a much better condition of prosperity than it has enjoyed for years. The result of this will be to swell the revenues from practically all sources and it is therefore reasonable to expect that our revenues for the present year will still be sufficient and probably more than sufficient to meet our expenditures. But there is another aspect of the matter too. Governments, like individuals, are always tempted to spend freely when the cash is available. The mere fact that $25,000,000 of taxes has been swept away will impress upon the government in even greater degree the need for all the economy that can be practised by the administration, so that the net result of the budget will be not only to give a much needed relief in taxation but to promote as well a better attitude of mind in the government and in parliament to expenditures.

The reduction in duty on automobiles will also be popular. I notice that some of the automobile people in Ontario have raised a row and threaten to close their factories and do all sorts of things. As an illustration, a friend of mine here was negotiating for a car a few days before the budget was brought down. He was informed this morning that the price, as a result of the budget, will be reduced $155. This means that everyone in Canada that buys a car to-day will buy it cheaper because the duty has been reduced, and since there are a great many people buying cars they will naturally be pleased that they can buy them more cheaply. In other words, the budget has put money in their pockets in this respect and for that reason will be popular.

The opinion expressed in that letter is, I am sure, generally held throughout western Canada. I have here an editorial from the Saskatoon Star, headed "Good Advertisement," which says:

The national budget of this country interests others besides Canadians. It interests those in the United States and overseas who are considering migration to Canada or investment in Canada. British capitalists especially, when thinking of investment abroad, pay particular attention to the national finances of the country they have in mind. Deficits, additions to debt and tax increases impress them unfavourably. Surpluses, reductions of debt and taxation have the opposite effect.

The budget just brought down at Ottawa by Hon. J. A. Robb will therefore be an excellent advertisement of Canada beyond the boundaries of the Dominion. It showed a surplus of revenue over expenditure for the last fiscal year, of $55,000,000. That will be taken to reflect a return of prosperity and a gain in financial strength. It showed a cut in the national debt, which will be interpreted in the same way. It provided for tax reductions and that, of course, will enhance the attractiveness of Canada for intending immigrants as well as for investors.

One hopes that the preachers of blue ruin will not spoil the picture. They have already worked great harm to Canada by misrepresenting conditions.

It is to be hoped, Mr. Speaker, that we have heard the last of the whispers of death and calamity howling by our Conservative friends in this country, which we have been so accustomed to hear in the last four years. But even with a financial statement such as is now before parliament it is hard for our Conservative friends to stop decrying conditions in this country.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), speaking in this debate, said—Hansard, page 2459:

We on this side of the House congratulate the people of Canada on the improved condition which has recently arisen as compared with the unfortunate state of affairs that has prevailed during the past four years. Now, if we are not inclined to bestow much of the credit for this improvement on the government of the day, no one can complain. This country has improved to some extent, not on account of any effort of the government but in spite of the government. For if the prosperity of a country was ever hindered or delayed by an organization of human beings this country has been so hndered and delayed through the administration of the King government.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the trade figures are a pretty good index as to conditions in this country, and I am going to give the trade returns for the fiscal years from 1922 up to the present time. If these figures are looked into it will be seen that year after year since our Conservative friends went out of office there has been a steady expansion in our trade. In 1921, the last year that the Conservatives held sway in this country, our imports exceeded our exports by $29,000,000 The figures for the succeeding years are as follows:

Fiscal year ending March 31st, 1922—
Imports	$ 747,804 332
Exports	753,927,009
Total trade	$1,501,731,341
Favorable balance	6,122.677
Fiscal year ending March 31st, 1923—
Imports	$ 802,579,244
Exports	945,295,837
Total trade	$1,747.875,081
Favorable balance	142,716,593
Fiscal year ending March 31st, 1924—
Imports	$ 893,366.867
Exports	1,058,763,297
Total trade	$1,952,130,164
Favorable balance	165,396,430
Fiscal year ending March 31st, 1925—
Imports	$ 796,932,537
Exports	1,081,361,643
Total trade	$1,878,294,180
Favorable balance	284,429,106
Fiscal year ending March 31st, 1926—
Imports	$ 927,000,000
Exports	1,330,000,000
Total trade	$2,258,534 000
Favourable balance	402,695,000

If those figures mean anything, they certainly mean a great expansion in the trade of this country since the year 1922, and if Providence, as some hon. member suggested the other evening, has had everything to do with this showing, I think it would be a good and a wise thing for the people of this country to keep in power a government that seems to be in line with Providence.

My hon. friend from South Wellington would give no credit at all to the government. He says that during the past four years this country has been anything but looked after by the King government. Well, Mr. Speaker, back in 1896 we had a general election in this country which resulted in a change of government. It took the new government that came in about four years to get the ship of state in order, but everybody in this country knows, the years from 1900 up until 1911 were Canada's greatest growing time. Then in 1921 the present administration came into office. Many good acts have been put on the statute book since they came into power, but the full result of their work and careful financing has not been seen until the budget was brought down this year. The reduction in taxation proposed by this budget, I am sorry to say, does not appeal so much to Conservatives in this House as it does to Conservatives outside, who are more free to speak. I have here a Canadian press despatch from Toronto headed "Former Finance Minister Praises Budget Brought Down by Mr. Robb," and reading as follows:

Toronto, April 19th.—The reduction in income taxes announced in Hon. J. A. Robb's budget speech on April 15th was hailed as a step in the right direction by Sir Thomas White, former Canadian Minister of Finance, in addressing the Canadian Club to-day on Canada's problems. "Let us hope that the next step will be a longer one in the same direction," Sir Thomas said: "The burden of our direct taxation is still very heavy and places us at a great disadvantage as compared with our keenest competitor, the United States."

One-quarter of the net annual production of Canadians was paid out in taxes, Sir Thomas estimated. This was a drag on business and enterprise. The problem was to pay interest charges on the national debt, and reduce it, without unduly heavy taxation.

Taxes invoked to pay war expenses should not remain a day longer than necessary, the speaker said. Sir Thomas declared that if the special war taxation was greatly reduced the necessary extra revenue would come from the great improvement in business which would surely result from the tax reduction.

One is glad to hear these words even from the gentleman who, in my opinion, is more responsible than any other individual in Canada for the heavy load of taxation which the Canadian people are bearing to-day. Sir Thomas White, as Minister of Finance during the war period, had opportunities, when money was freer in this country, to levy taxation so that the people would not have felt it. He had a chance to do that and to get the necessary money for this purpose, but he did not grasp the opportunity. During the war, when Sir Thomas White was floating his war loans, his own friends, Conservatives from one end of the Dominion to the other, tried to persuade him to make the income from those loans taxable, but he continued to float loan after loan by means of the issue of tax-free bonds. His reason given for not making these bonds taxable was that if he did so he could not get the money. But what happened after his retirement? The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) became Minister of Finance, and within three months after assuming office he floated a loan and by means of taxable bonds obtained more money than Sir Thomas White ever did through the medium of tax-free bonds, showing that the latter's statement that the Canadian people were not patriotic enough to lend the government money in its hour of need was ill-founded. So we are suffering to-day from heavy taxation, much of it, in my opinion, needlessly imposed on the country, because it involved amounts which could have been paid off during the war period.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was directing the attention of hon. members to some statements made by the hon. member for South Wellington in his speech in this debate. I now wish to draw attention to another of the hon. gentleman's statements which will be found on page 2460 of Hansard:

I say, Sir, that if the government had properly administered the various departments of state millions and millions, yes, perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars of taxation could have been taken off one, two, or three years ago. If the administration of the customs department had been what it should have been there would have been an increase of revenue from customs and excise duties sufficient to have allowed large reductions in taxation.

It will be noticed that my hon. friend was not careful in his use of words. It mattered little to him whether it was one million, tens of millions or hundreds of millions—a lot of money could have been saved one year ago, two years ago or three years ago. He stopped there because had he gone back four years he would have been getting a little close to the danger line, the year when his friends were in office—those who, to my mind, are responsible, as I stated before dinner, to a very large extent at least for the heavy debt that is on this country at the present time. The hon. member criticizes the government for their proposed reduction in the duties on automobiles.

Mr. McGIBBON: Did the hon. member not vote for a great deal of that debt?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Doubtless I did as a member of this House, but I was not one of those having the administration of the affairs of this country in hand as was the hon. member for South Wellington and my hon. friend's leader.

The hon. member for South Wellington has no faith in the personnel of the advisory board on tariffs and taxation. While he pays a tribute to the Right Hon. George P. Graham, he has no faith in Mr. Graham's ability as chairman of this board. I should like to ask my hon. friend whether the fact that the Right Hon. Mr. Graham has served this country well and capable in another capacity for the past thirty years has totally unfitted him for serving Canada in another sphere. I do not think my hon. friend or any other hon. gentleman opposite thinks so. These things are said in order to create suspicion in the public mind and to make it more difficult for this board to function efficiently.

But just why did not this government and this parliament have a perfect right to reduce the duties on automobiles or any other commodity at this time if they saw fit so to do? If I understand the matter correctly, this board is an advisory board and if at any time the government and parliament decide that duties are too high on any commodity, we as the representatives of the people have a perfect right to reduce those duties. Now that the board is constituted and with a personnel that I feel sure the people of this country have confidence in and will learn to have more and more confidence in as time goes on, I believe action of this kind will not be necessary; but to say that the government and parliament did not have the right to reduce the duties on automobiles is to my mind beside the question.

I wish to draw attention to a statement made by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) who, I am sorry, is not in his seat. As reported on page 2644 of Hansard my hon. friend used this language:

> The fact may have struck others, as it has certainly struck me, that in some quarters in this House it is only necessary in order to provoke applause to make sneering references to the manufacturers.

I pause here to ask the hon. member who used these words or any other hon. gentleman opposite to point to any one instance where members from western Canada jeered at the manufacturers of this country.

Mr. McGIBBON: Go and read Hansard. It is full of them.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I have read Hansard and I give my hon. friend an opportunity right now to point to a case of any individual member of this House having jeered when the name "manufacturer" was used in this chamber.

> In certain parts of the chamber, notably in the section representing the province of Saskatchewan, there is immediately a tremendous clapping when such remarks are made touching the manufacturers. Is that right? I notice, however—

And this is the reason of the statement. It is not hard to see:

> I notice, however, that hon. gentlemen from Quebec never do that; they never applaud any sneering remarks made at the expense of the manufacturers. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there is noticeable a distinct line of demarcation between those who applaud the abuse of manufacturers and those who do not. The representatives from Saskatchewan always do; those from Quebec do not. And how these two elements, so utterly different, can get together solely for voting purposes, I do not know and cannot understand.

The hon. gentleman sets up a straw man in order that he may knock him over; he puts up an argument in order that he may draw a line between hon. members from Quebec and hon. members from Saskatchewan on this side of the House. The understanding between members of this House from these two provinces is too firmly grounded to be broken by any such tactics. Those of us from Saskatchewan have come to know our friends from Quebec as reasonable men, men who are always ready to sit around the table and discuss our problems and grievances and help us as far as possible to solve them, and I will say to hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly from Ontario, that if they would cultivate a little more the acquaintance of members from Saskatchewan they would find them willing to support such policies as are beneficial to Canada as a whole. Many of us from Saskatchewan first saw the light of day in the old province of Ontario. We have nothing but kind thoughts for the people of this province, and I submit that statements like those made by the hon. member for North Oxford do not become a member of the House, while they tend to create dissension and sectional differences, of which we have had altogether too much in this country in past years.

My hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) the other day put certain figures on Hansard in regard to manufactured products which he said we could make in this country. He gave a considerable list, including binder twine, fertilizers, paints, varnishes, soap, firebricks, cotton yarns and fabrics, dyes, and so forth. Certainly we could produce a whole lot of these things, but the question is, would it pay Canada to produce them? Would it be economically sound for us to attempt to manufacture these things? There is no doubt in the world, of course, that we could produce them; for that matter we could produce strawberries in January if we cared to. I do not know whether it would be profitable for Canada to produce these articles, nor does my hon. friend himself know. It is very easy to say that we can manufacture this, that and the other thing, but let us first make sure whether or not we can manufacture them at a profit, and to the advantage of Canada. Take cotton textiles, for instance. We do not produce one ounce of the raw material in this country. We have to import it, and then we put up a tariff wall protecting the manufactured article. Now it is a grave question whether this is paying Canada.

Mr. McGIBBON: How much rubber is produced in the United States, and how much raw cotton is grown in Great Britain?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): If the hon. gentleman wants information as to how much rubber is produced in the United States he can go there and get it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well, do they not make rubber goods there?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I am speaking of cotton, not rubber.

Mr. McGIBBON: How much cotton is grown in Great Britain?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): The hon. member for East Algoma has another item on his list—rolling-mill products. This is a product which is in an entirely different class from cotton, for we have the iron ore and we have the coal. It might therefore be economically sound for Canada to give some little protection to that industry to get it under way, and this is one of the questions for the tariff board to decide upon. It is for this reason that I support the appointment of that board.

Mr. McGIBBON: Why not automobiles?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): The automobile business has been well looked into by hon. gentlemen in this House, and I have no doubt my hon. friend did the best he could to bolster up the case against the action of the government. However, I am not dealing with that question at the moment.

As I observed before, history repeats itself, and I now want for a few moments to take the House back some considerable distance in the history of this country to show that the Conservative party is attempting to-day just what the Conservative party attempted in 1878. If that party had its way to-day the same result would follow as ensued at that time. In the year 1878 Sir John A. Macdonald moved in the House of Commons by way of amendment to the budget a resolution to which I would ask the patient attention of the House:

That the Speaker do not now leave the chair, but that this House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of national policy, which by a judicious readjustment of the tariff will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion: that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen who now are obliged to expatriate themselves in search of employment denied them at home;

Is not that what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has been doing for years? All through the last campaign we heard the same sort of propaganda. The very same thing which the right hon. gentleman has been predicting was hoped for by Sir John A. Macdonald.

—will restore prosperity of our struggling industry now so badly depressed; will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market; will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade—

I commend the next few words to hon. gentlemen from the Maritime provinces.

—and, moving as it ought to do, in the direction of reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will gradually tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade.

These were the hopes and aspirations of the Conservative party in 1878, echoed by the leader of the opposition during the last few years, and the battle cry during the recent campaign. Give industry more protection, we have been told, and we shall not only hold our people in Canada but attract outsiders as well. What is there in all that for the Maritime provinces?

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton): That was the period of our greatest prosperity in the Maritime provinces.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Let us see how that policy worked out. In 1878 our Conservative friends came into office, and in 1879 adopted a new tariff. They raised the general tariff on all imports, dutiable and otherwise, to 19.1, or five points. You will notice in the resolution that Sir John A. Macdonald declared that if such an increase were made in the tariff there would be an addition to our population in this country. Well, we had in 1881 a population of 4,324,810. During the decade up to 1891, if we had held our natural increase we should have had, with immigration, a population of 5,859,508. But the statistics show that the population in that year was only 4,833,239. This means that during that period, with a substantial increase in customs duties, more protection for industry and with the national policy on trial for three years, we had lost 1,026,000 people. But our Conservative friends say, "Forget all that. Do not review past history; take our word for it. Give us more protection and all will be well." In 1896 we had another general election, and a change of government. In that year only 16,000 people entered Canada, so that things were not very prosperous; the conditions were not such as to attract many immigrants to our shores. The general rate of duty on all goods coming into Canada, dutiable or otherwise, stood then at 19.2 and our total trade amounted to $231,000,000. During the few years following, though the reductions in customs duties were slight, there was a corresponding increase in trade. As I have said, in 1896 the general rate of duty was 19.2 and our total trade amounted to $231,000,000, and in 1897 there was a slight reduction bringing the duty to 18.7. What was our total trade then? It had risen to $249,000,000. In 1898 there was another reduction in the duty to 17.5 and the trade in the meantime had increased to $294,000,000, while in 1911, that fateful year for Canada, the general rate of duty was 16.2, the trade having mounted up to $759,000,000. And what about population? Everyone will agree that the decade between 1901 and 1911 was Canada's growing period. In 1901 we had a population of 5,371,315, and when the Liberals went out of office in 1911 we had 7,296,643. In other words, there had been an increase of 1,835,328. It would seem that lower duties had something to do with the increase in trade, and an increase in trade and prosperity means an increase in population.

Mr. FOSTER: Does my hon. friend not think that railway construction between 1900 and 1911 had a great deal to do with the increase in population?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I am ready to admit that, but the railway construction in that period was due to the fact that as a result of a large immigration we needed transportation facilities. In that year we had a general election. That was the year we were to have no more truck or trade with the Yankees. Did voting against reciprocity in 1911 stop our trade with our American cousins? Not at all. In 1923 our total trade reached $1,733,000,000; of this $918,000,000 was with the United States and $520,000,000 with the United Kingdom. In 1924 our trade with the United States had risen to $943,000,000, and for the last fiscal year it reached the huge total of $1,081,000,000. So voting against reciprocity in 1911 did not stop Canadians trading with the Yankees. I think these figures prove that high protection for industry has not made Canada prosperous, and that the policy Sir John A. Macdonald inaugurated in 1878 did not accomplish what he hoped and foretold it would do—keep our people at home and materially increase our population.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What was the policy of Mr. Fielding between 1896 and 1911?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It certainly was not high protection.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It was just as high as it had been before.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): My hon. friend has not been following the figures I have been giving. He asked what the policy of Mr. Fielding was between 1896 and 1911.

Mr. HOCKEN: Stability.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Stability with a downward trend.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Fielding did not say that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): The figures prove it. In 1896 the general customs rate stood at 19.2. There were gradual reductions in the next four years until in 1911 it stood at 16.2—three full points down.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is the hon. gentleman able to inform the House that the trend of duties will be still lower?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I am hopeful.

Mr. HOCKEN: You are hoping right, anyway.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): To my mind, Mr. Speaker, this is a people's budget. It is such a budget as will give Canadians new heart.

Mr. HOCKEN: And lose their jobs.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What will it do for the people in the United States?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Why, Mr. Speaker, will my Conservative friends be so pessimistic? Let some person lose his job before we start whining. Why, if the manager of General Motors, Oshawa, instead of giving to the press the statement he did, had said to the people of this country, "We do not know what this reduction in automobile duties is going to do to our plant, but we are going to put the Canadian people to the test. We are manufacturing a good article. We will probably have to cut out a few lines. Are the people of Canada going to support us and purchase the lines that we continue to manufacture, to such an extent that we can employ all the people we now have in our factories?" If Mr. McLaughlin had said something like that the Canadian people would probably have risen to the occasion. So much for the budget.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the government's legislative programme strikes me as being one of real progress. There is an amount in the estimates for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is aware of the fact that the official of the Ontario government who has to do with such matters has issued a statement that in the month of March last over 5,000 native born Canadians applied for certificates to enter the United States?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I do not know what that has to do with automobile duties or the budget.

Mr. FORKE: It was before the budget was brought down.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Probably 4,999 of those people applied for their certificates before the budget was brought down. Does my hon. friend know?

Mr. HOCKEN: It was before the budget was brought down; but that is the number for one month from the province of Ontario alone.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I was speaking about the legislative programme of the government.

Mr. McGIBBON: Get away from the last point to safety.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I have no desire to get away from this reduction of duties on automobiles. I think I see some hon. gentlemen opposite who voted for the resolution last year to reduce the automobile duties. I am not so sure but what my hon. friend who has been putting questions to me voted that way.

Mr. HOCKEN: No, I never voted that way.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Well, other hon. gentlemen did, particularly from the Maritime provinces. I wonder what they will do this time.

An hon. MEMBER: Wait and see.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Yes, we will wait and see.

[Mr. J. F. Johnston.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman voted for a speech from the throne favouring examination first. What is he going to do this time?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): My right hon. friend is adept at drawing a fine line. He is blessed with better sight than most of us; he can split a hair four ways and still have some left.

Mr. McGIBBON: Might I remark that the hon. member is adept at changing his politics? He has been in three parliaments and has supported three parties.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): My hon. friend is absolutely wrong, but even if that were so I have only gone one better than my hon. friend. Party names and shibboleths, Mr. Speaker, mean very little to me, but I submit that my right hon. friend, or the right hon. leader of the opposition, who seems to be deriving a certain amount of enjoyment out of all this—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): —cannot point to one vote since I came to this parliament ten sessions ago in which I have left the principles which I upheld when I was first nominated in 1914.

I was saying that the legislative programme of the government appealed to me. The vote in the estimates for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway is, I think, very well timed. I am not prepared to say now that the project is feasible as a grain carrying route, but we have put $20,000,000 into the enterprise; every political party has pledged itself to the completion of the road, and having spent that money it seems to me there is only one thing to do in view of all the conflicting reports, pro and con. We should go ahead and prove this thing out, and the way to do that is to get the rails laid to the bay. For that reason I say the government are to be congratulated for putting an amount in the estimates to provide for the completion of this road. Then there are the other matters of rural credits, revaluation of soldier lands, old age pensions, and so on. I am sure this programme is such as to commend itself to all Liberals with a progressive outlook.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) who has just left the chamber, was somewhat disturbed as to my position in this House. For his information I am going to read a resolution passed by the executive of the Long Lake Progressive Association:

The executive of the Long Lake Progressive Association, having carefully considered the present political situation at Ottawa and particularly the following phases of the situation, that is:

1. The official declaration on the floor of parliament that the Conservative party is determined on a higher tariff.

2. The outline of proposed legislation by the King government contained in the Speech from the Throne bearing on western conditions, particularly rural credits, Hudson Bay railway, branch lines and the attitude on the tariff question.

3. The general attitude of the Liberal party at Ottawa on Canadian affairs.

Be it resolved that the member for Long Lake, J. Fred Johnston, should co-operate with and support the Liberal administration of Mr. King to the fullest extent to the end that the legislative programme outlined in the Speech from the Throne may be carried into effect.

And we believe that such action by Mr. J. Fred Johnston will bring great benefit not only to Saskatchewan but to the whole of Canada.

We believe that if Canada is to be saved from disunion and disintegration and stagnation the Conservative party must be kept in opposition, and to accomplish this all those holding low tariff views must unite.

Carried.

Dated at Regina in the province of Saskatchewan this 13th day of March, 1926.

I hope that will set my hon. friend right.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) referred this afternoon to something which happened during the campaign. In this connection I would like to pay my respects to the right hon. leader of the opposition. He has a habit, when coming west, of visiting the constituency which I have the honour to represent; he paid us a visit in 1921 and again during the last campaign. There is a little town called Bethune in my constituency, which has been quite consistently Tory and with one exception has always given Tory majorities. The faithful there thought it would be a fine thing to have the right hon. gentleman run out and visit them when he was at Regina, which he did; his special car was dropped off at Bethune, and there was great rejoicing among the clan. There were many visitors to the car; a meeting was held in the afternoon, a banquet was tendered to the right hon. gentleman, and my friends were feeling rather blue. My right hon. friend always makes an impression.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Wait until I finish, and probably my hon. friends will not clap so much. The right hon. gentleman always makes an impression, but whether or not it lasts is another thing. He did so on that occasion; he was well received, and he had my friends in the dumps, so to speak. But when election day rolled around that consistently Tory poll gave a majority to the present member for Long Lake over his two opponents.

Mr. HOCKEN: Was Baldy Robb down there?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I think I was the baldest man there, with the possible exception of my right hon. friend.

Mr. HOCKEN: Does not my hon. friend remember Baldy Robb?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Really, Mr. Speaker, I believe my hon. friend is referring to a notorious character who has received some notoriety of late through the newspapers, in connection with some election scandals in the province of Alberta. I have never met the gentleman, but I see a smile of satisfaction on the face of the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken), which would lead one to think Mr. Robb a very close friend of his.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is far fetched. We had a Baldy Robb ourselves.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): We did not have Mr. Robb or any of his ilk in Long Lake, but we got away with a majority despite the fact that my right hon. friend was there. The message I wished to convey to him, if I had not been interrupted, was an invitation to come again during the next election campaign. He can come just as often as he wishes.

Mr. McGIBBON: What colours will my hon. friend be running under next time?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): The same old colours. I would like to set at rest once and for all the mind of my hon. friend the gallant member for Muskoka, who is so noisy over there and who seems perturbed as to my political colour. There is one thing he can be absolutely sure of, and that is that for all time to come I shall be anti-Tory.

I want to close my remarks, Mr. Speaker, with an old Greek proverb,—ton kalon kateko —hold fast that which is good. St. Paul used that proverb and enlarged upon it in his Epistle to the Thessalonians when he said: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." That was good philosophy in the days of Plato and Socrates, it was good gospel in the days of St. Paul, and it is mighty good politics to-day. My advice to the people of this country, Mr. Speaker, is to stay close with the present government, for there is nothing else offering that is nearly as good.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say at the outset that the budget seems to me to be a very pleasing kind of document, not so much for what it specifically contains as for what it indicates and foretells concerning the prosperity of our country. I notice that our Conservative friends have been very industrious in trying to divest the government of any credit whatsoever for this prosperity. I think they could afford to be more generous. Personally I find it a very easy matter to accord to the government at least the negative merit of having done nothing to prevent this prosperity. Whatever they have done or have not done, they have evidently kept out of the way of Providence while Providence has been working its beneficent aims. Many generations ago it was said of one government that the foolishness of men had made the goodness of God of none effect. Evidently the Liberals have not managed to make the goodness of God of none effect. In spite of all that the government may have done or left undone, in spite of all the forebodings of the opposition, Providence has gone on its way and has brought to us a measure of prosperity. A saying of the poet comes to me:

> There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
> Rough-hew them how we will.

I think the same Providence shapes our political ends. From the Conservative point of view it has saved the government, and from the government point of view it has saved the opposition; that is, it has helped the opposition to explain away their doleful prophecies of October last. I wonder what the opposition would have done if they had all been atheists and had not believed in Providence? They would have had to hand the palm to the government; there is no alternative so far as I can see.

What is this wonderful Providence that has brought Canada back to this Prosperity? It is merely the co-operation of the brawn and brain of western farmers with the soil and the showers and the sun; that is what Providence is, and it is very pleasing to the Progressives to hear the very thing they have been contending for for five years now proved up to the very hilt, namely, that agriculture in this country is at the bottom of all our prosperity. For five years we have been trying to prove to this House that if you could make agriculture prosperous you would solve all our problems.

The course of this debate has been considerably influenced by the provision for a reduction in the duties on automobiles. Our Conservative friends deprecate this action without investigation first having been made.

Now if it had been anything else but automobiles one might have had a measure of agreement with their contention, but it seems to me that this House and the country know sufficient about the automobile industry without having to invoke any tariff commission. As I have been listening to the protestations of our friends to the right, I have been wondering what has become of their guarantee that in case they were called to power and had to maintain or increase our tariffs, they would see to it that there would be no profiteering; and if, over the automobile industry and this slight reduction in the tariff, our protectionist friends can work up so much excitement, produce so much sentiment, and shed so many tears, what would they do about less favoured industries? It seems to me that if we cannot lower the tariff on the automobile industry, there is not an industry in Canada on which we can lower the tariff. If they will do these things in the green tree, what will they do in the dry?

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), to whose very able speech I listened with interest, worked himself up into such a state of elevation about the automobile industry that he actually seemed to visualize the prosperity of Canada standing like an inverted pyramid on the top of a Ford car. The Ford car has been the butt of a million jokes, but I think that is the best one yet—that any hon. member should seriously consider for a moment that the prosperity and progress of this great country rests on that agglomeration of rattles and squeaks known as the Ford car.

Now, I was a very interested spectator of the delegation which thronged the doors of this parliament the other day. I think they were very sincere; I think they really felt that something was about to happen to them. But after all, what does an argument of that kind amount to? I think any one of us can visualize another kind of crowd that could just as easily have been assembled and would have held diametrically opposed views; people just as hard-working, just as honest, just as loyally Canadian with homes to be anxious about, with wives and children; the same kind of crowd, a Canadian crowd, quite as big and quite as vociferous. Mr. Speaker, what is going to happen if legislation or policy in this House is to be influenced by the biggest crowd which can gather round the front doors of this building? I noticed some of the legends which the delegation bore. One of them was very significant; I can hardly believe that it would originate in the mind of a workingman. That legend was: "On to Ottawa". Now that phrase, adapted in that form, is a very sinister phrase to me.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. gentleman think the ordinary workingman is incapable of originating anything like that.

Mr. BIRD: Yes; when I have explained it I think you will agree with me that he is.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think it is an insult to every workingman in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BIRD: The hon. gentleman is quite an authority on insulting people. But the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) speaking the other day, reminded us of an ancient Italian who said "Destroy Carthage" so many times that they actually did destroy it. I want to remind him and the House that there is a certain modern Italian who said "On to Rome", and he said it so many times that he came very near destroying the freedom of the Italian people. That is where the phrase comes from; it savours of the black shirt. I want to tell the House and the country there are too many people in whose minds there are simmering thoughts of force which is associated with the black shirt and all that it means. Our parliamentary system is the people's way. The representatives of the people are privileged to meet and discuss their problems in a deliberative spirit, and it is not in consonance with the dignity of parliament that our Prime Minister and our ministers should be compelled at the bidding of the mob to declare what their policy is.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does my hon. friend seriously suggest that the representatives of these workingmen were a mob?

Mr. BIRD: No, I do not.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well, that is what you called them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BIRD: The representatives of any class in this country have a right to bring their case before this government, but they have no right in the name of democracy to bring it in this manner. I know that some years ago a similar delegation came from the west. We probably started the movement, but that does not make the proceeding right; and much as I sympathize with these people I do not think that it is in the interests of parliament that that thing should recur, because if the people of Oshawa have the right to do it, the people in every part of Canada have a similar right, and we might just as well have a mob here every day. Whether they are farmers or workingmen they have no right to mob parliament in that way.

9 p.m.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mob parliament!

Mr. BIRD: I do not want by anything that I say to convert this debate into a kind of lachrymose competition as to who shall get the suffrages of the returned soldiers. That has seemed to me in some moments what it was going to become—that one member should proclaim himself the champion of the returned soldiers as against all other members. I do not intend to take a share in such a proceeding as that.

The returned soldiers have not been treated very well by our economic system. They came back to this country to find conditions very harsh, and of all the elements in our economic system the protectionist element hit the returned soldier the hardest; because in a time when work was scarce, and when prices were high, the cost of living soared out of his reach. When our protectionist friends express their sentiments for the returned soldier it reminds me of what Alice said about the walrus, "it shed more tears but ate more oysters." I think it is too late in the day for politicians to make the returned soldier a stalking-horse for their own bad policies.

My hon. friend at the desk immediately behind me told us about a monument that his community erected to the returned soldiers. Well, it reminded me that in almost every community of two hundred people or over in western Canada there is some such pathetic memorial to our soldiers, and I daresay it is the same all over Canada. One of these monuments is prominent always in my memory, and it carries these words: "The only wealth is life." I have never seen or heard of a more appropriate inscription on a soldier's memorial than that. I also grant that the idea behind the monument at Oshawa was equally fine—that idea of bringing a stone from each of certain European countries and building those stones into a permanent monument for Canadian soldiers. What kind of cement did they use to bind the stones together? If there is one thing that is going to keep the European countries apart, is going to lead them into another war, it is protection.

The spirit that controls Oshawa, if that is the spirit, is never going to bind these countries together. Let me read a short quotation from the London Spectator of March 13, 1906. It says:

> It surely must be conceded that the present network of tariffs in Europe is inimical to the prosperity not only of Germany, but of all its other states, great and small, including our own. For the tariff has been metamorphosed in recent years, and has become not so much an aid to home industries, as a symbol of national pride, a sort of economic flag, an evidence of sovereign independence, a warning to all and sundry that within these holy boundaries there is a sufficiency of everything. The idea of exchange—the basis of trade, and the first article of the true economist's creed—has been forgotten amidst the racial animosities and raw ambitions of the new Europe. When a tariff becomes a means not so much of benefiting oneself as of hurting one's neighbour in the sacred cause of a newly-formed national exclusiveness, the most rigid protectionist must surely admit that things are going a trifle too far.

In conclusion the writer says:

> Exclusiveness carried too far in social life inflicts in the end more harm on those who practise it than on those against whom it is practised, and the same also applies to the world of exchange and barter. Tariff architects cannot remove mountains and alter river valleys; they cannot even modify to any great extent railway tracks and steamship courses. In the end nature is too strong for them. And Germany, pondering on the loss of markets, and the tariff walls which now divide the former dual monarchy, is apparently taking to heart those venerable truths.

According to this article the whole structure of peace in Europe, so carefully and assiduously built up in recent years, is actually at the present moment being endangered by this very spirit.

Protection with its profession of patriotism and nationality is, after all, the most parochial of beliefs that the human mind can entertain. It proceeds on all occasions to look at the national good through the narrow vista of its own particular local self-interest. It is the easiest thing in the world to prove the virtues and benefits of protection if you remain within the sphere of the particular and the local; but when you branch out and try to look at your personal good from the good of the whole, the logic of the protectionist is not quite so formidable as it seems at first. I have often listened to debates in this House, especially from the wonderfully precise, logical mind of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and I have come to the conclusion that with the premises he assumes his logical structure is unassailable. And so it is, if you look at Canada through the eyes of Toronto or Oshawa.

It is a very easy thing to prove that lowering the tariff, for instance, on any particular commodity will likely cause an adjustment in that industry with possibly a diminution for the time being of employment. That must be conceded. As regards industries that are more or less inefficient, that have been living too lackadaisically up to the standard of the tariff, industries more or less exotic, it is easy to prove that lowering the tariff will for the time being cause a loss of employment. But if you look at the same problem from a national standpoint, it is just as easy, indeed it is easier to prove that the continuance of that industry with its inefficiency, with its exotic character, is a constant drain upon industries that are more indigenous, more natural to the country.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) the other day preached to us the loyalist doctrine of sacrificing yourself for other people's good. He said: "I use a car at home, but if I have to pay forty dollars more for a car, that will not worry me; I will be glad to do it in order to keep the people of Oshawa at work." It is all right for a doctor to say that he can do that because he can pass that on to the first old lady who thinks she is sick.

Mr. MANION: Not when he is down here.

Mr. BIRD: I said, it was possible for him to do it; I did not say he would do it. His geniality of character belies any such suggestion. He can readily see how it is for professional men to do that, but the great majority of people in Canada are not in that happy position. If that forty dollars is put on to the price of a car, they have to grin and pay it; they have to take it out of something else that is perhaps more necessary. The hon. gentleman also made a peculiar argument about the necessity of discouraging people from buying cars. He argued that it was a good thing to have a tariff on cars in order to discourage people from buying them because if they buy them they will only put mortgages on their houses with which to buy cars. He forgets that people will buy cars in any case, and after this reduction is made in the tariff they will have about forty dollars less on the mortgage.

Another very interesting argument is to be found in the speech of the hon. member for East Algoma, who said: "After all, the tariff does not cut very deeply into the resources of the farmer." He had heard some agricultural expert say that it cost only six-tenths of one cent on a bushel of wheat to pay the present or the then tariff on agricultural implements. That seems a very infinitesimal amount; but when you calculate how much it means for a quarter section—probably from fifteen to twenty dollars—it is a different matter. The House may have no conception of what life means on the average quarter section in Canada where a man is living away out with his wife and family. Fifteen to twenty dollars may seem a very contemptible sum to my hon. friend, but it does not seem such to a working farmer on the prairies. It may seem an immense sum if his wife happens to ask for a new hat or a new dress in the spring.

A great deal has been said about the Progressives and the part they have played in securing this reduction in the duty on cars. I never asked the government to reduce the duty on cars, although I am glad they did so. But our Conservative friends, for want of a better argument, always fall into their habit of chiding the Progressives for supporting the Liberals. I was very much amused by the simile used by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) before dinner when he said that the Progressives were like the steer and the Liberals like the mule, yoked together. I want to tell the House that we had not very much choice; it was a case of choosing the mule or the mule's father so far as we were concerned. I do not wish to charge that kind of tactics upon the whole of the Conservative group; it is only some of the younger and more inexperienced members that do it. I want to say to those Conservative freshmen that the transactions and negotiations that have gone to make this House what it is at the moment have been more honourable on all sides than they imagine. I would no more think of charging the leader of the opposition with base motives than I would my own leader (Mr. Forke) or the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King). In my opinion these gentlemen found themselves in a difficult situation and acted as honourable men in the circumstances. That is what I believe to the bottom of my heart. I know there is a lot of petty dickering amongst individuals on all sides, as there naturally would be amongst human beings who might think they saw immense possibilities in such a situation. But I do not think it will go down in history that the leader of any party in the House acted otherwise than as a leader should. I say that in all sincerity.

The hon. member for Fort William is very fond of referring to Great Britain. He asked us with anticipate triumph evident on his genial countenance, what free trade had done to the farmer in Great Britain. Well, I think we might with more propriety ask him what protection has done to the farmer in the United States.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is no more prosperous farmer in the world.

Mr. BIRD: My hon. friend is making one of his usual wild and reckless statements. According to the logic of the protectionist, the farmers of the United States ought to be in the most enviable position, but from all the channels of information that are open to us we know that it has been exactly the opposite in recent years. The officials of the United States government have written about it; the farmers' organization themselves have investigated the matter and discussed it; and the newspapers, the various organs of opinion and information in that country, have looked into the whole subject. And they are all agreed on this point, that for very many years the United States farmer has been worse off than the Canadian farmer, whether he was a grain grower, a cotton grower or a corn grower.

Mr. BRISTOL: Is not that explained by the fact that the farm lands of the northern portion of the United States have been rather more worked than our western lands?

Mr. BIRD: I want to be frank with my hon. friend. I am not by any means attributing the condition of the United States farmer entirely to protection, but I do say that protection has been a big factor in bringing him to his present state. What do we see in the United States to-day? The farmers of the northwest are approaching the government with the request to take over their surplus production, having come to the conclusion that under their protective system the agriculturist is the victim. He has to sell his surplus produce at world prices while he must buy his necessities at protective prices. He has therefore decided, as I said a session or two ago, to put his feet into the trough. He himself is coming to realize his political power, and he is asking the government, to the extent of many millions of dollars, to take charge of his surplus produce so that he may get from what he sells at home enough for him and his family to live upon in decency in the land of the free.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the hon. member: Does he not know that the imposition of the Fordney-McCumber tariff raised the prices of practically every article the farmer has to sell in the United States, and raised them over world prices?

Mr. BROWN: What about wheat?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, wheat is one.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a wild statement.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The wildest of all.

Mr. BIRD: I thought I had the data under my hand, but I am sorry I have not. I will go so far with my hon. friend as to agree that in certain seasons the United States farmer who grows spring wheat derives an increase of price by reason of the Fordney-McCumber tariff; but that increase is microscopic compared with the increase in the cost of living and of transportation in the United States. My friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) the other night quoted from the United States Farm Bureau of Statistics that in a single year after the imposition of the Fordney-McCumber tariff the farmers of the United States had made a net loss of $301,000,000—even after allowing for the gain on spring wheat and some other commodities. Now, I wonder what our protectionist friends in Toronto, Montreal and Hamilton will think of the western farmers when they come here and ask those protectionists to take over at $20.000,000 or more their surplus product to dispose of in the world's markets as they think best and leave the farmers at home to sell their wheat to the domestic consumer at a price that will give them a living on a parity with their friends in the cities. I wonder what parliament will say when the farmers of Canada come to that state. They have come to it already in the United States.

I listened to some of our British Columbia friends talking about the necessity for a tariff on eggs. This is just by the way. One gentleman said: We in British Columbia have carried the poultry industry to quite a high stage of scientific development, and we feed the poultry on grain that we get from the prairies; we are very glad we can get it at world prices, for it helps us considerably. But what would my hon. friend think if the farmer of the prairies, carrying out his own logic, came to this House to ask for permission to put up the price of that grain to a point where it would bring to them a decent Canadian standard of living? Where would the poultry business be then? That shows the absurdity of the protectionist argument through and through.

There is one argument still more absurd, and it was put forward by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie). He grew very sad about the declining birth rate, but at the same time he read a letter from a friend of his, which he approved of, asking for an increase in the price of furniture. He wants an increase in the birth rate, and yet he wants to put an embargo on the home. These protectionists want to swell the population, but they would put a tariff on the cradle, the cot and the high chair—on all the paraphernalia that make an increase in the population possible. I listened to a very eloquent sermon last night deprecating the economic impossibility of our young people to set up homes; and yet our protectionist friends want to put a tax on the homes!

But we are getting away from Great Britain. We might have asked: What has protection done for Germany? I read in a paper the other day—I am sorry I did not take a note of it—that a representative of German agriculture was in Winnipeg the other day consulting the wheat pool, and he told his interviewer that agriculture in Germany was in a very bad way and that there was not much profit in it. That is in protectionist Germany. Now let us come to Great Britain. I will admit, Mr. Speaker, that agricultural conditions in Great Britain have been bad for some years, the same as they have been in Canada. But those conditions are not due to free trade, as my hon. friend would leave the impression on this House; they are due to the aftermath of the war. Farmers in Great Britain, like farmers in Canada and the United States, were encouraged to branch out into new productive lines, and when the slump came they were caught, and there has been depression ever since. I know there are a number of British agriculturists—a very restricted number, though—who would like protection. For instance the wheat growers, I think, would like a certain degree of protection. But I want to remind my hon. friend and this House that not all British farmers by a long way want protection. They would be very unpatriotic people if they did. I am reading this from a paper that comes to me every week from the north of England, quoting a speech of Lord Ernle, a recent Minister of Agriculture in the British government, which shows beyond peradventure that the agriculturists of Great Britain are not looking to protection for a solution of their problems. He says:

> If prices could be stabilized on a higher scale by the action of the government, the level of farming could be maintained. To many arable farmers, and indeed to the National Farmers' Union, this is the obvious remedy. By means of a subsidy or a duty, British corn-growers should be assisted to meet the brunt of foreign competition. It is, however, a mistake to suppose that all farmers want a duty on corn. Agriculture is not one industry but several industries, and the interests of agriculturists are not always identical, but are sometimes antagonistic. A pasture farmer wants cheap feeding stuffs and does not care, so long as they are cheap, whether they are home grown or imported. But even if it is assumed that British farmers are unanimously agreed in asking for some form of protection, is such a remedy politically practicable? The answer, in my opinion, must be an unhesitating no.

Continuing Lord Ernle states:

If any such assistance were given the cost would fall on the taxpayers and consumers, and for one voter whose direct interest is that wheat should fetch better prices, there are a hundred voters to whom a cheap loaf and a reduction in taxation are necessities.

Lord Ernle, not only a former Minister of Agriculture but a practical farmer and an authority on this subject, in this place and in others has disabused the minds of British farmers as to protection.

Now, Mr. Speaker, going back to the eighties and nineties of last century, I agree with my hon. friend that the British agriculturist suffered some depression because of the opening up of the prairies of America. It was not only the British farmer who suffered, but also every farmer east of the prairies, because it is impossible for any farmer in the world to compete against free land and virgin soil.

Mr. MANION: As a matter of information might I ask my hon. friend: How does he explain the fact that there are fewer farmers per thousand of population in Great Britain than in any other country in Europe, or perhaps in the world for that matter?

Mr. BIRD: There has been a decline in the population of rural England in recent years, as there has been in all agricultural countries, owing to the enormous advance in invention, and also to a certain extent in the adjustment as between grain farming and cattle farming. It is no doubt true that there has been a great exodus from rural England to the cities; but it is equally true of the United States.

Mr. MANION: But is it not the fact that in England there is a markedly lower percentage of agriculturists than there is in any other European country or the United States either? That is my reason for arguing that free trade put English agricultural land out of business.

Mr. BIRD: I think it is to be frankly admitted that England is behind the European countries in establishing her rural industries. Due to something inherent in the character of the British farmer, he has not been able to adapt himself to modern demands in agricultural production; but he is doing it now, and doing it very speedily.

An hon. MEMBER: He went in for quantity rather than quality.

Mr. BIRD: Not only that, but he will have to become a co-operator just as the Danish farmer has. With a little political assistance such as Lloyd George has been offering, or something similar, I have no doubt that rural England will be again a hive of industry as it was in former times. I think I may very generously concede that in the eighties and nineties the English farmer suffered, as farmers all over the world including those in Ontario and the eastern states of the United States, suffered, due to the opening up of our virgin prairies. But that was only a temporary phase in the development of world agriculture. I always feel sorry and sad to think that the economics of the world should necessitate an adjustment in any industry entailing harm to any individual. I think it is a sign that we are more backward in our civilization than we sometimes think we are when the necessary progressive changes in industry cause suffering to any class or any individual. And I speak very feelingly of the eighties and nineties because of the bitterness of the time which entered into my own soul.

Now we go back to the wonderful period of the abolition of the corn laws, to the seventies, to the period I have been speaking of. According to the logic of my hon. friend, that ought to have been the blackest period in the history of English agriculture; on the contrary, it has been called the "golden age" of British agriculture. The abolition of protection to the farmer, with other factors it is true, stimulated his latent ability and turned his energies into new and more profitable directions. I think all will concede that the glorious boast of the British character is just that spirit of self-dependence and self-help which when seemingly obstructed in one direction will forge forward in another to greater and greater success. That was true of British agriculture in these wonderful years of advancement which brought the British farmer to the very peak of his profession. I do not want to take the necessary time, but I could prove that the same spirit has operated in the manufacturing industries as well as in farming in the Old Land. The history of the tin plate industry, which my hon. friend mentioned the other day, during the latter part of the nineteenth century proves that the innate independence and ability of the Anglo-Saxon can surmount even artificial restrictions to his industry; even when put out of business by the McKinley tariff he came back stronger than ever and sent his products into all the neutral markets of the world.

Now let us come to the period just before the abolition of the corn laws. According to the logic of my hon. friends that should have been a paradise to the British farmer.

Mr. SINCLAIR: May I ask my hon. friend a question? What established the tin plate industry in the United States, a country with none of the natural product?

Mr. BIRD: I will be quite frank and admit that the industry in the United States dates from the McKinley tariff. I think we are willing to admit that if we protect an industry, before it becomes spoiled it is given an opportunity to meet its competitors.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BIRD: Yes, but at the expense of every other industry in the country. The consumers and producers of the United States paid the bill when the tin plate industry got on its feet there. It was only a year or two until the tariff was lowered again, which showed the inherent vitality of that form of industry in the United States.

Let us come to the pre-corn law period in England. I have a book here which is well known as an English classic of the nineteenth century, Rural Rides, by William Cobbett. This was written just before the abolition of the corn laws; in fact the part I am quoting from was written on January 3, 1822. He gives here the notes of a speech made by himself to a group of farmers in Battle, in which he says:

> I am decidedly of opinion, gentlemen, that a corn bill of no description, no matter what its principles or provisions, can do either tenant or landlord any good; and I am not less decidedly of opinion, that though prices are now low, they must, all the present train of public measures continuing, be yet lower, and continue lower upon an average of years and of seasons.—As to a corn bill; a law to prohibit or check the importation of human food is a perfect novelty in our history,— > —and ought, therefore, independent of the reason, and the recent experience of the case, to be received and entertained with great suspicion.

They did not have it before; it was only a short period before the abolition that England had the corn laws.

I will not trouble the House by reading more of this very interesting account of a ride on horseback through rural England in 1822. I will guarantee that neither my hon. friend nor any of his associates, who dream their dreams of a protectionist paradise to come, have either read or heard of such an account of human misery as is contained in these documents which come from corn law England in the early quarter of the last century. About ten years later the author was travelling in the county of Lincoln, and he tells of the abject misery into which farmers, farm labourers and artisans had sunk in that period, and how, in disgust with protectionist England, they had gone in hundreds and thousands to the United States.

I do not think I need adduce any more proof, Mr. Speaker; I feel sure everyone knows that the years prior to free trade in England were among the blackest in all her annals; when the standard of living had sunk to its very lowest ebb; when the Merrie England of over a century before had absolutely vanished and a miserable, industry-ridden England had taken its place.

Now let me read an excerpt from Labour and Protection, by George Jacob Holyoake, who actually saw these things with his own eyes. Holyoake, one of the apostles of co-operation, says:

> In the days of protection, as I knew them, the industrial world was a dead world. There was neither animation nor hope in it. As in the inquisition the intervals between the times of torture were days of "alarmed repose," so with workmen under protection. Few knew one week what their wages would be the next. Precariousness, privation, and depression were the characteristics of industry in those times. They live in my memory like an evil thing, and I should not recall the experience of that malign period did not the editor of this series ask me to do so.

I would not have gone to the trouble of surveying the history of the British farmer to such an extent had not my hon. friend in a moment of forgetfulness, attempted to travesty the facts of history in order to bolster up the mistaken policies of his party in this respect.

The hon. member also referred to the Safeguarding of Industries Act, and said that act was a sign that protection is coming in England. A protectionist looking for such a sign reminds me of a group of picnickers on a cloudy morning trying to persuade themselves that it will be a fine day. They are willing to let their optimism get out of bounds at the least favourable indication. I want to tell my hon. friend that Premier Baldwin and Winston Churchill would not thank him for that remark, because they have sworn to the public of England by all that is holy that there is no such thing about it. You know, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Baldwin fought the last election on no such issue; he had no mandate whatsoever, and he told the people that that was the one thing he was going to avoid. The last election was not fought on the fiscal question at all, but on the question of respectability versus—

An hon. MEMBER: Blackguardism.

Mr. BIRD: Yes, blackguardism, or Philistinism versus barbarianism, and all the Philistines and all the respectable people—it did not matter whether they were protectionists or free traders, churchmen or non-conformists, brewers or prohibitionists—were huddled into the same fold by Mr. Baldwin. He had no sooner got this flock of sheep into his fold than the powerful lobby of necessitous British industries came along and persuaded him that they had a scheme by which they could be protected, and by which he at the same time could retain the integrity of his conscience, and the outcome was this wonderful Safeguarding of Industries Act, one of the slickest bits of political trickery that was ever put over a confiding public. They dare not bring it in by the front door, they dare not bring it in by the back door, and so they dug a tunnel and brought it in.

Mr. MANION: Does that change the fact that it is protection?

Mr. BIRD: I will admit that it does not. It only needs a very superficial examination of this act to show how easy it was for Mr. Baldwin, with his genial and able mind, to persuade himself that he was not doing any wrong. The industry concerned has to make out a preliminary case before the president of the board of trade, who happens to be a protectionist; then it has to come before a committee whom he appoints, a committee of protectionists; and when the industry has been asked a few superficial questions by the committee it goes before the cabinet, and there is no difficulty there, of course, because they originated the whole scheme. That is the scheme. It reminds me of a fish net with meshes just so big that the little fish can get through, but not the big ones; but in this case the meshes are so constructed that they can be enlarged according to the taste of the political fisherman who happens to be manipulating the net. It reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of what we may expect from a tariff commission.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just what effect has the Safeguarding of Industries Act had on the labour situation in every industry to which it has been applied?

Mr. BIRD: I would answer, like the proverbial Scotchman, by asking another question: What effect has it had on all the other industries? You cannot bolster up one industry by a bonus without hurting every other industry that has to stand on its own feet.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It has reduced unemployment in the industries concerned by 350,000.

Mr. BIRD: Yes, and I will guarantee that it has created just as much, and more, unemployment in the other industries. I understand the first industry that came before this committee was the lace and embroidery industry. It appears that the ladies of England have quit wearing lace and embroidery, and the industry has got depressed. Lace and embroidery apparently is not used any more except by young members of parliament when they are making their first speeches. But this industry is not abashed at all by the fact that nobody wants lace. They are convinced that they ought to make lace whether anybody wants it or not, and therefore they have found a rich aunt in Mr. Baldwin who has very conveniently provided a shelter for all the lame and mangy dogs in British industry where they can come and be fed and find shelter and escape the lethal chamber just a little longer.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does Mr. Baldwin buy all the lace?

Mr. BIRD: I would not be surprised if he buys some of it; it would only be logical. Like my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) why should he not pay $40 more than he needed to pay for something just in order to help industry? Mr. Baldwin may have the same type of mind and buy his wife all kinds of lace, believing that it is better to wear lace these days than nothing at all.

Before I close, I want to discuss for a moment the cut in the income tax. This is one item in the budget that I was strongly inclined to criticize, but our friends to the right have saved me the trouble because they tell me that it is not a reduction, but simply a transference. I was afraid myself that it was a reduction, but I am satisfied if it is only a transference, and I am still more satisfied if it is transferred from those who are less capable to pay to those who are more capable. I believe that there will be some little suffering, as in all adjustments, but I would ask the hon. member for Fort William not to be too gloomy about his hypothetical widow, because, after all, she will not starve anyway; there are a good many widows in the land and there is a multitude of widows whom this will benefit.

There is this thing to be considered, that it is a blessing the income tax was not reduced if it meant that other taxes had to be increased. What would the widows have done then? What would they have done if you had taken the tax from the wealthy people and had put it on the poor people? That is the gentle art of giving more cakes and ale to Dives and less crumbs to Lazarus. I do not intend while I am in this House to support any attempt to reduce the income tax so long as our sales tax and our customs duties remain where they are at present. We are yet in the grip of war taxation, and the annoying thing is this, that half of our annual revenue is going every year to pay interest on our war debt. That is the irritating thing, that after our country should have sacrificed its blood and its substance, it should find itself now these many years after the war still paying by the hundreds of millions interest upon that war debt. That is bad enough, but what would it be if our friends to the right got their way and succeeded in the next few years in foisting that burden on to the backs of the consumers and working people of this country?

I have noticed that during the last few years —I do not think it is the result of conscious action on the part of the government—that the ratio of direct taxation to indirect taxation has gradually swung over. In 1922, 67 per cent of our revenue came from consumers' taxes and only 33 per cent from direct taxation. Last year those figures had come to be 80 per cent from consumers' taxes and 20 per cent from direct taxation. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, there is a civilized country in the world where such conditions obtain, where so much of the burden of running our country and of meeting our war debts is put on the shoulders of the people who are least able to bear it. And the ironical thing is that a considerable portion of the burden-bearers includes the returned soldiers. That is the place to work up a little sentiment. Now our hon. friends say: These humanitarian considerations are all right, but you are going to deplete savings, you are going to retard the accumulation of capital. I should like one of my hon. friends to show me how the extracting of a tax from income and paying it over in the interest to the bondholders is going to reduce the capital of this country: It simply means that you are taking money out of one pocket and putting it into the other. So long as we have a national debt of its present size all our revenue from income tax will be handed over immediately by the government to exactly the same people who have paid it, and thus in this transaction a great national obligation will have been fulfilled and at the same time a large measure of distributive justice achieved. I do not think that my reasoning is exactly watertight—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BIRD: —and I do not think my hon. friend sees where it is not. I suppose some hon. member will say: If you put the tax on consumption you would have not only the tax but the interest too for capital. Well, that seems fair, but I want to say this: If this government or any government could relieve the consumption in Canada from some of the taxes it is unjustly bearing now they will immediately increase the purchasing power of the people to such an extent that the wheels of industry will hum as never before. And that is the time when capital is created—when everybody is busy. It creates itself overnight, like Jonah's gourd. You often hear the doctrine that it is the savings of the wealthy that creates capital. It is no such thing: it is the hard work of the people, it is the consumer and producer that create capital. It is time that fallacy was knocked on the head, because there is nothing so misleading. What we call capital, and what our wealthy friends complacently call their savings, is after all the surplus production which is left after we have all done our best in the course of a year. A lot of those who pride themselves on being in possession of it ought not to be in possession of it. They have got into the possession of it through no merits of their own, they have simply sat at the toll gate, and they would make it still harder for the consumer and the producer by unloading the burden of taxation on them.

Now, what are these captains of industry we hear so much about, these super-Canadians who think that every other Canadian has been created to pay tribute to them? I do not think they are so important in the body politic as they think they are, by a long way.

10 p.m.

I know they are important. I know that the ability to organize the multifarious factors of modern industry is a very necessary function, and a very remunerative one too. But the other factors are a thousand times more important. I chanced to be reading a work on economics, and I came across a delightful description of a modern captain of industry. I do not think it applies to any hon. members in this House, because they would not be here if they were not a little bit above the average. This is what it says: that the captain of industry is—

"—the type of intellect that leads unerringly to great business success—a mind moving in one dimension, without depth or breadth, but incredibly flexible and adaptable to the needs of the hour." The financier's "reputation for profundity arose from his unexpected resourcefulness; and this, in turn, was a product of a makeshift intellect. He had no definite plans, and no far-reaching vision, but he knew how to surmount obstacles as they arose. In his essential relations to life he was like a peddler on a country road, meeting people who came by, and getting the better of them."

Again, his "career illustrates clearly the fixity of purpose which is the first law of great financial success. It is a career for the single track mind, blind to wide horizons, and bent solely on material acquisition." . . . "They have deals, . . . but their ideals are usually naive, incredibly childish, and guided with a meritricious gaudiness. Through the control of power they are able to impose these mediocre ideals upon civilization, and thus set a standard of achievement which is unworthy of the human spirit."

That may be an overdrawn picture, but I think it is very largely true. We have gone a long way from the time when the biggest biceps marked the superior man in society to the time of the man who happens to have some peculiar gift of cunning in his grey matter and a good nose for profit. But we have gone that distance and we have not gone very far because there is not very much to choose between the two; the principle is the same—

> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can.

And it is very easy for them to keep it, because until recent years they have had the assistance of the parliaments of the country. And even at the present time these same gentlemen—not all of them, but one or two of them—think that men in this House who represent the common people and who are sent here at their expense are no more or less than intruders. One hon. gentleman stood up in his place the other day and referred to them as ignorant trash or something of that kind. That is something very significant. I have been surprised at the new note that has been struck in this parliament by a certain member from Montreal. I do not recollect that ever in this House we have heard the hectoring, dictatorial tones that that gentleman sometimes sees fit to adopt towards the group in this corner of the House. I do not know, but I think that hon. gentleman sometimes thinks he has been sent here in the fulness of time to discipline these insurgent groups that have come here for the first time in the history of this country to voice the needs of the producers of Canada. I do not know whether that gentleman has any proclivities of the Mussolinic kind, but it seems to me sometimes that he is thinking that way. I do not think that in these days our manufacturers and captains of industry can command the old-time subservient worship that they did. I do not think they can get away with those manipulations of legislation so that the producer and the consumer has to pay the expense every time. I do not think they can; I am very much mistaken if they can do it any more.

One of the supreme duties of a government in these times is to get out of the old idea that the functions of a government are to preserve life and property. We have outlived that conception of government, or at any rate we must enlarge our conception of life. We must read into that conception of our duty as a parliament a certain standard of living that every born Canadian has a right to, and we must consider it our prime duty to see that that standard of living shall be maintained, no matter who has to be sacrificed for it, because the necessities of the people should always be the first charge upon the surplus production of revenue of our country. It is the business of government so to adjust themselves that that will become their end and aim. I do not think we have reached the stage yet where there is a sufficient consensus of opinion to make that the legend on our political banners.

I do not know how true it is, but I will take it for what it is worth that this budget is not decreasing the income tax. I sincerely hope that no Liberal, no Progressive, will ever lend his support in any movement of that kind, to take off the burden of these profiteers, these men who sit at the receipt of custom, wear fine linen and fare sumptuously every day, and unload it on to our hard-working and toiling multitudes in the cities and on the prairies of this country. They will not get my support for one moment in any movement of that kind.

I want to say just a word as to my private and personal view of the attitude of western farmers as to tariff and other issues that we have to face in this House, because I think in some sections it is badly misunderstood. The pivotal fact in the attitude of mind of the western farmer towards the tariff, for instance, is the surplus that he has to market outside of this country every year. The western farmer at last has acquired a sufficient knowledge of elementary economics to know that that fact is fundamental; that that is the basis of his whole position as a producer; that he cannot add one cent to the price of his produce by taking thought or by any effort; and as a corollary, that every cent that you put on to him by way of taxation, by way of freights, transportation, by way of interest, must of necessity come not out of his profits or his dividends, because he does not know anything about that, but out of his living. He knows that it means that he must degrade his standard of living; that he must ask his wife to work harder; that he must deprive his children of some of the elementary rights of Canadians. That is what it means in plain terms; that is the incontrovertible fact concerning the farmer of this country. Knowing that fundamental fact as he does, I wonder sometimes that he has not gone to greater extremes than he has when he has witnessed constant attempts to unload on to him extra costs so that by little and little his living has been reduced and his hardships and privations have been multiplied. I think the farmer of Canada—and I have known him intimately for fifteen years or more—of all classes in the community takes the most moderate, the most conciliatory attitude towards all other classes in the community. That is what I think about him in spite of all that has been said about him to the contrary.

I will tell you why the farmer, notwithstanding his stark economic position, is what he is—a law-abiding, enthusiastic Canadian. In the first place it is because he is a Canadian who will bear comparison with any other individual in the nation. Most of the farmers in my constituency are the sons of Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces. Many of them are getting old now, but many years ago when conditions in the east compelled them to go out from their homes, instead of going south as the sons of the east are doing now, they went west and they laid deep and true in the west the foundations of what some day will be Canada. Those men, as I know them, have nothing but the most loyal sentiments towards their countrymen, in spite of all that has been said to the contrary. I believe, perhaps in contradistinction to the opinions of some of my colleagues, that the average western farmer does not dream and never has dreamed that protection in Canada can be wiped off the slate in a moment, or perhaps in a generation, or perhaps ever. The western farmer knows his country well enough to know that protection during a generation or two has become so embedded in our social, commercial and economic structure that it might be disastrous to take any radical and sweeping action with regard to it. In all my experience with farmers I have never heard them talk nearly so widely about free trade as I have heard hon. gentlemen in this House talk about protection. The farmers have a right to talk wildly about free trade, not only from their basic economic position, but because it has been the traditional policy of their native country for many generations.

Mr. GOTT: What is the hon. member's native country?

[Mr. Bird.]

Mr. BIRD: I am not ashamed of my native country.

Mr. GOTT: What is it?

Mr. BIRD: No native of the country to which I belong ever needs to say which country he belongs to. I was proceeding to say that the Canadian farmer during all his organized history, as I have known him, has talked moderately about the fiscal question. He wants stability just as much as my hon. friends wants it, only he wants it at a somewhat lower level than they want it. The farmers want it at a sufficiently low level to enable them to live in decency with their families in their native country. That is all they want; they are not the wild-eyed fanatics that my hon. friends think they are. It takes a fanatic to see fanaticism in others.

Now, the fiscal question in Canada is not a purely economic one at all; it is a political question, having been associated with party politics for a generation or more. For two generations now it has been a football in the politics of Canada. Parties—to change the simile—have see-sawed upon this question until the farmers have become sick of parties and have shown a disposition to be done with them. The farmers do not criticize the parties for not having gone very far in fiscal matters, and I do not think that this is what precipitated the agrarian movement in Canada. In my opinion it was something wider than that. I believe the farmers felt that so long as this game was going on, so long as the old parties were prepared to engage in this sham battle every few years to the exclusion of everything else, the interests of agriculture would not derive very much benefit from governments. Nor have they done so. The old parties in this parliament for two generations have played this miserable game and, what is worse still, they have not played it sincerely. In fact, they have been shockingly insincere, and the manner in which they have treated the whole question is a black mark against our political history. Unfortunately, during all these years, the people chiefly concerned have not been here to put an end to the game. While the parties have been engaging in this futile business, such problems as transportation, interest rates and other matters even more vital to the farmer than the tariff have been held in contempt. And why? Simply because the old parties—I am not speaking now about parties as presently constituted—accepting their election funds as they did, from our banks, our transportation companies and such institutions, could not do otherwise, in relation to the producers of the country, than to neglect them altogether. That is one of the reasons why the farmers of Canada are not so fanatically intent upon the tariff to-day; they have come to see that there are many other things that are vital to their interests.

There is one more point, which I have left to the last in view of its importance. In recent years the farmer has lost interest in the fiscal question because he has caught the vision of a great co-operative effort. From one end of Canada to the other, especially in the west, the farmer for the first time in his history has glimpsed the mighty potentialities of co-operation. As one who has been keenly interested, in a more or less detached way, in the prosperity of the farmers of western Canada I may say that it came to me, as it came to others, as a thrill of satisfaction and hope when we discovered one fine morning that the farmers had at last awakened to the fact that in co-operative effort there lay the solution of a great many of their problems. I believe that in the co-operative movement of the farmers at the present time there lies the germ of a new order of things in Canada. The farmers in a marvelous way have blended two elements which sometimes it has seemed impossible to reconcile—a purely visionary thing and a very practical idea. And this co-operative movement in the west, which to-day markets between 70 and 80 per cent of the staple products of that part of the country, is going to make itself felt in the history of Canada as nothing else has done since confederation. I am making no vain boast; it is plain to be seen by anyone who cares to recognize it. The producers of Canada for the first time in their history find themselves to-day, without the help of governments, capable of organizing their economic power and able boldly to confront other organizations which so long have exploited them. That is something which every sincere Canadian must sooner or later take notice of. I am not much concerned about the fate of parties. It would not have worried me much if at the last election the Progressive party had sunk into oblivion.

An hon. MEMBER: It will the next time.

Mr. BIRD: It may, and so may the Conservative party, as it nearly did in 1921. Political fortunes are not certain at all. But I do not care whether this happens or not. There is something more vital, more far-reaching, more dynamic in the life and thought of Canadian farmers to-day than ever there was in any party in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. BIRD: An hon. gentleman behind me—I do not know who it is—prefers cachinnation to argument, but I wish he would be courteous enough to allow me to proceed.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Order.

M. BIRD: The hon. member should admonish his own colleagues; I do not think that he himself would indulge in such childish antics. I was proceeding to tell the House my personal belief regarding the future of Canadian farmers, who are only beginning to realize their economic power. And what difference is there in the long run between economic power and political power? Let me warn the House that however contemptuously parliament may have treated the vanguard of this new movement it will not be able so contemptuously to treat the main body when it arrives here.

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Go ahead.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is only twenty minutes after ten.

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Johnston) who spoke this evening. I followed his discussion of the various governments that have held power during the last ten years. He has had peculiarly good opportunities of judging the merits of those governments, as I understand he gave valuable support to them all, and I have reached the conclusion that his judgment of the word "'wobbler" should be taken without question.

I must congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on giving the country a very attractive programme. In fact I might almost term it a very fine piece of election propaganda. Still it looks as if the minister himself had forgotten a very important point —that the Maritime provinces are still in existence. One would imagine that after all the discussion which has taken place in this House on Maritime rights he would at least have remembered the name, for I am sure it must be familiar to the ear of every hon. member. I certainly thought, Sir, the government would have done something for the only two stable products we have in Nova Scotia, namely, coal and steel, to the continued existence of which adequate tariff protection is vital. These are two of our greatest industries, and because all things are not equal in competition where these industries are concerned, they being subject to conditions over which this country has no control, they must be protected if they are to live and prosper. Therefore it was a disappointment to us in the Maritimes that the government failed to correct the mistake made last year when the duty on bituminous coal was lowered three cents instead of being raised; failed to make anthracite screenings dutiable at the same rate as soft coal with which it competes, and failed also to adjust the duties on iron and steel.

I notice in the Speech from the Throne that mention was made of the prosperity this country was enjoying. I fail to see how prosperity could exist in one part of the country while destitution is prevalent in another, factories closed, our people leaving by the hundreds, a depleted population, and our country robbed of its best blood. Now, Sir, why is this? Why in a country which contains everything that goes to make up a prosperous and contented nation should such things exist? There is only one answer: something must be wrong with the government of the country. And who is responsible for the mismanagement? The government that rules the country. The policy of the government must be wrong and the personnel of that government is incapable of appreciating the wants of the people.

Three things to my mind are necessary: Stop the stream of our raw materials going into other countries and allow such imports to come into Canada as can be used by our own people in increasing industries and the manufacture of the finished articles. That is the only way to keep our people at home—put a duty on all foreign goods that come into Canada to compete with our own natural products, our industries and our manufactures. Now, why should we allow our raw materials to go into other lands, in many instances to be returned to us as the finished article, the labourers often being our own people, perhaps the sons and daughters of the men who helped to send the material out of the country. I could refer in this connection to pulpwood, minerals, and so on; why not use those products at home?

The flow of emigration must be prevented, and the best immigration policy that I know of is protection. We are exporting the best asset that Canada can produce—our sons and daughters—educated at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer, giving their brains and brawn to a foreign country. How can we stop this flow of emigration? By simply making our country more attractive to our own people, passing legislation that will in many instances appeal to our young people, establishing industries and manufacturing centres, thus giving them work and building Canada up.

We have got within our own borders everything to work with. A bountiful Providence has dealt well with us in giving us a beautiful country and endowing us with an immense natural wealth, much of which has not yet been developed. But to take full advantage of this great heritage we need government help and encouragement. Think of the rich mineral deposits of all kinds not yet touched by the hands of man. Now, Sir, we want the government to understand that Canada is not entirely dependent upon other nations. England was until recently the greatest cotton manufacturer in the world but she grows no cotton; the greatest woollen manufacturer, but she imports most of her wool. Ireland imports most of her flax, and yet it is a great linen manufacturing country. The United States manufactures 70 per cent of all silks in the world, but she grows no raw silk; she is the greatest rubber manufacturer, but grows no rubber; the greatest manufacturer of asbestos, nickel and sugar, but all the asbestos and nickel come from Canada and all the sugar from Cuba. She lets this raw material in free and places a duty on the finished article. She can dictate her own ways and means because she does so behind a high tariff wall. All the articles mentioned are just as available to Canada's factories and consumers; all we have to do is to allow them in free and protect the finished article. In that way we could have large industrial centres which would give work to our young men. Then agricultural conditions would improve, and our farmers would have a large market for their produce. I know in Cape Breton we have a beautiful farming district entirely dependent upon our coal and steel industry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, what we want to do is to have a strong government, with a solid, stable policy, a government that the people of Canada would have confidence in, not such a government as this, with a different policy for each province, but a government under the leadership of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), who has so definitely laid his policy on the table. There is no use in fighting 110,000,000 people with 9,000,000 unless we have something to fight with; and that something, Mr. Speaker, is a strong protective policy. Every country in the world, with few exceptions, is for protection. Even England, the great free trade nation, is talking protection. The United States was built up under it. I am a protectionist by conviction. I well remember the first political speech I ever heard; it was on protection, in the year 1878, when Sir Charles Tupper—then Dr. Tupper—first formulated the great National Policy. I think I am safe in saying it was his first speech on the subject. He spoke in the town of Sydney—now the city of Sydney. At that time there was great destitution in Cape Breton. Hon. Alexander Mackenzie's government was in power. My hon. friend from Long Lake (Mr. Johnston) this afternoon stated that history did repeat itself. Let me remind him that on this occasion it did not. The people appealed to the government, and the government sent down food, a great deal of it being corn meal. To this day the old people there speak of that government as the "corn meal" government. But, Sir, in 1925 when the same class of people asked this government for relief they were turned down. Sir Charles Tupper in 1878 spoke from a platform in a field, part of an uncultivated farm, with very few houses in the district. There was only a wooden pier extending into the harbour, with a few fishing vessels at anchor. Sir Charles Tupper predicted the time would come when instead of one wooden pier there would be six steel piers; when instead of wooden vessels there would be iron and steel steamships made of steel manufactured in our own country. At that time there were no mines working on the southern side and only one on the northern part of the island. Sir Charles Tupper lived to see his prophecy fulfilled: steel piers, steel ships, important steel and coal industries, and flourishing towns. In a word, the district became prosperous.

The duty on all coal in 1879, regardless of size or quality, was 50 cents per ton, but a year later it was raised on bituminous coal to 60 cents per ton. In 1887 anthracite, which is not produced in Canada in any great quantity and which is essentially a household coal, was put on the free list. It was not until 1897 that soft coal was rated at 53 cents, and I am sorry to say that it was a Nova Scotian—a gentleman who is held in the greatest respect by the whole country—who first made the change and reduction.

I believe in protection—I do not mean high protection all round, but I do mean a protection that will prevent Canada from becoming the dumping ground for foreign goods. I want, Mr. Speaker, a national policy all over Canada so that the east can do business with the west; and all Canada should unite together in working for one common cause, namely the uplifting and building up of our country, taking her out of the rut into which she has fallen.

I believe immigration is the principal question to-day; the greater the number of people who go away the harder it is to keep our country up. Look at our closed industries, our vacant farms, the amount of head money spent in the last number of years, and it seems little surprising to me, Mr. Speaker, to find that although there is said to be great unemployment in the United States, our men and women always find something to do. Of course, brains and education will tell, and our American friends readily appreciate our skilled labour, no matter where it comes from. Our Canadians are not afraid of work, and when they cannot get it at home they have to go abroad for it. But, Sir, does it not mean something that there should be this great gathering of our best brains and muscle in another country? I do certainly think that the government are not taking this matter seriously enough; they seem to shut their eyes to the fact of immigration. It is time, Sir, to sit up and think; the leaders of our country should take this problem seriously into consideration and in some way try to solve it.

I wonder what would happen if such a thing as secession took a start? I hope that such a thing will never be seriously considered, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that it has been freely spoken of. We must remember that there is hardly a family in Nova Scotia —and I am speaking of that province alone just now—that has not one or more sons or daughters in the United States, and if a vote were taken to-day, or ten years hence, would it not have a bearing on the question? The fact that so many of our race are over there might be the means of blending the family together; even to-day I know of several instances where young men and women have sent for their parents to join them on the other side. Mr. Speaker, this whole problem of immigration should be well considered; surely there are men in Canada who can solve it and save our country before it is too late.

I am sorry the government did not go into the protection question a little more; it may be that they left it to the tariff commission to deal with. We in our province want more protection on coal and steel. The transportation difficulty should also be rectified. Our coal mines down by the sea have the right of way in the summer through the St. Lawrence, but our navigation closes about December 1. Then our mines must be idle, because the rates on the people's railway are prohibitive and no work of any kind takes place, the result in many cases being misery and destitution for six months. Surely, Sir, we in the east are entitled to fair play at the hands of the railway people. Our steel should be protected, because when the steel works are running we have a market for our coal, but now foreign steel products are coming into Canada cheaper than they can be made in Sydney or landed in Montreal. With our steel works protected and working full time, and our mines doing the same, just think what a change would take place. The farmers would have a market; they would be encouraged; business would look up, and the effect would be felt all over the province. Then why, Mr. Speaker, should we not have these things? We are part of Canada; why deny us our rights? At present we use about 80 per cent of our own farm products. If we shut out the United States farm products, as they have done to ours, and promote our own industrial products, we could consume at home the other 20 per cent of our own farm products; we could sell at Canadian prices instead of at the world's prices, and put our farmers on a better basis. Exporting our products forces us to low prices.

Agriculture is one of our mainstays. The American tariff is prohibitive except as concerns raw materials, which Canada would be wiser to keep, or ship out in the finished state. Our farmers and fishermen have been turned out of the American market and our industries were never allowed in. On the other hand, American farm products, fishermen, industries and minerals are welcomed with almost open arms.

On the question of protection I would like to repeat what the president of the Steel Company of Canada said at the annual meeting of that company:

> Canadian products show an increase of less than 1½ per cent in fifteen years, while in the United States the increase has been 75 per cent. Canada's imports in recent years have almost equalled the tonnage of the Canadian output. We can never hold up Canada and pay Canadian wages by buying our requirements from foreign factories. We can only develop Canada by developing our Canadian industries.

[Mr. L. W. Johnstone.]

When the United States was buying her steel in Great Britain, Lincoln said:

> If we buy steel in a foreign country, you get the steel and the foreign country gets the money, but if you buy steel at home, you have in your own country both steel and money.

I would like now, Mr. Speaker, to quote from Haliburton on Intercolonial Trade; Our Only Safeguard Against Disunion. This was written in 1867; it is ancient history but very interesting, and I would like to show the similarity between affairs as they existed then and those existing to-day. He says:

> Nova Scotia having already become familiar with this foreign trade, Halifax must become the entrepôt for the outlet of our productions, which must be sent by the St. Lawrence via Pictou to Halifax during the summer, and in winter by the Intercolonial Railway. But to make the trade profitable, we must reduce freights to the lowest possible point, and this can only be effected by providing a remunerative return freight. The only return freight which can be sent is coal, and even if the price of fuel were increased by the imposition of a similar duty to that imposed by the United States, it would be amply repaid by its reducing freights, and hence enhancing the value of the flour and other products and manufactures of the west. It is necessary, if for no other purpose, in order to create a large trade without delay, and to get us into a new groove. It is necessary for the cheap transport of the productions of Canada to the seaboard, which will have to be as low as possible in order to enable them to compete abroad with the cheaply carried products of the United States. It is necessary in order to render the Dominion independent of the United States in the all important matters of fuel, and to prevent the serious consequences which the sudden stoppage of our supply in the autumn might entail upon us. It is necessary, in order that Ontario and Quebec, instead of strengthening the hands of those who are endeavouring to crush the coal interests of the Dominion, may teach them some of the fruits of their own policy, and convert them into advocates of more rational measures. It is necessary, to prevent the Americans from starving the Nova Scotians into annexation. It is necessary, to promote intercolonial trade; but above all it is necessary, in order to unite the people of the Dominion by the only bond that can endure—that of common interests and commercial sympathy.
> In addition to these considerations, there are others which are, at the present juncture, of equal moment to us. I have hitherto avoided dealing with this subject in a sectional or local point of view, but knowing as I do the serious disaffection which exists in Nova Scotia, I believe that the imposition of a duty on American coals, similar to that which is levied on ours, will cut the ground from under the feet of agitators, who represent the Dominion government as indifferent to our maritime and mining interests, and watchful only of the welfare of the two great provinces that hold the reins of power in their hands. That prompt action in this matter, and a desire to sacrifice everything for the general interests of the Dominion, will in time soothe the alarm that has been excited in Nova Scotia, and the prejudices that have been aroused, we cannot doubt. Looking at the matter from their point of view, we cannot be surprised at their indignation, nor should we condemn that spirit of independence which they have exhibited, without which no people are fit for self-government. The day will yet come, we must hope, when they will contend with equal vigour and earnestness for the permanence and perpetuity of the New Dominion. As matters now stand, assuming their views to be correct, the fate of Nova Scotia has no parallel except that of afflicted Job. She has had her coal trade and her market for her fish and other products cut off, and her wordly possessions depreciated. Political Sabaeans have robbed her of her birthright, and the cup of affliction is filled up by the conduct of ungrateful friends. It is possible also that the parallel may go a little further and that the evils have been aggravated by the temptations of an agitator, who exaggerates her calamities, and endeavours to make patience an impossibility.

I have read that, Mr. Speaker, because I thought it had a bearing on the case.

In conclusion, I would ask the government to consider these matters either after or before they have the tariff commission's report. There are three ways to improve the situation in the Maritimes: First, by an increased duty on coal and steel so that our people can be kept at home; secondly, by the establishment of coke ovens to take our coal, encouraging, by also imposing a duty, the use of coke to take the place of the outside anthracite that is coming into Canada. I firmly believe that our people can be educated to the use of coke instead of anthracite —I am speaking on the authority of those who have used both—and in that way we would be helping each other and working for a common cause, namely, the building up of Canada for Canadians. The third point is transportation. As I said before, we should have cheaper rates on our railways so that our coal could be shipped in the winter months and our mines be kept working, instead of lying idle for several months. We should work shoulder to shoulder in these things, so that Canada may take the place the Fathers of Confederation intended she should take, that of the brightest gem in the crown of that great empire upon whose flag the sun never sets.

Mr. C. E. FISH (Northumberland, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, the budget which is now before us opens up a field for very wide discussion; at least, I judge so from what I have heard since its presentation to the House. I cannot say, in fact the House would not expect me to say, that I entirely acquiesce in all the proposals contained therein. I am not so sure that even hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, if they were to make an investigation as to our country's ability to stand the reductions now proposed, would find that the country could afford these reductions. In view of our enormous debt and the very little we have done towards reducing our war debt since the conclusion of the war, we can hardly make the reductions now proposed without a need for additional taxation cropping up somewhere else.

I also want to state that I am not one of those who believe in these special taxes. I like to see them thrown out. I believe the source from which we should obtain most of our taxes, in fact, practically all of them, is the revenue tariff. I believe that is the most equitable method of taxation, because it gives every man a fair chance. The man who wants to be economical can go without certain classes of goods that are taxable; he need not buy them, and then he does not have to pay any revenue in that way, and as for those who can afford to buy these goods, they get good value for their money. That is why I believe the tariff is the proper source of raising taxation. The tariff, if it is put on for the purpose of raising revenue, is not protection, according to my idea. Protection is the protecting of an industry against the inroads being made upon it from outside countries. You protect it so that it may survive, and I believe industry is entitled to protection for a certain length of time. My ideas of protection run back a very long way. It was my fortune to be sitting in this House in 1878. When Sir Charles Tupper introduced the National Policy I was sitting in the Speaker's gallery, and from that day down to the present I have been a consistent protectionist.

I remember very well the time before confederation when we had a reciprocity treaty with the United States. Older Canada enjoyed the privilege of reciprocity with the United States for a period of ten years. During that time the Americans unfortunately were engaged in a civil war, and due to protection and the extra money that was in circulation at that period, we had most excellent times in older Canada. That, of course, was to be expected. We can always account for good times by one of two causes; either some great expenditure is being made, or we have good crops. That has been the rule, according to my observation, as far back as I can remember.

Prior to confederation we in the Maritime provinces had to depend almost entirely on the United States as a market, and for reasons with which most hon. members are familiar, we were quite intimate with the Americans in those days, practically our whole trade being with the New England states. But at the close of the American civil war that reciprocity treaty was annulled by the American government. Two reasons were given for that. One was that the Americans had discovered that we were too intimate with the Mother Country; but that reason was disputed. The other reason, and I believe the true one, was that the Americans had discovered that in the ten years during which the reciprocity treaty was in force we in Canada had escaped paying them somewhere in the neighbourhood of forty-five or fifty million dollars, and they decided that that would be quite a good sum to help them in their difficulties and in paying off their debt. The treaty, therefore, was cancelled. Then came dire times for us in the Maritimes, and that was equally true I think of older Canada. At any rate, we set out to get a market for ourselves, and while we were exploring in that direction confederation came on the horizon. Just as we were on the eve of arriving at a conclusion with regard to securing a market for ourselves, the older provinces came down to us and induced us to enter confederation.

I remember very well the election that took place after that. The slogan was: The great Quebec scheme—because it originated, I believe, in the convention that was held in Quebec. When we accepted that proposal offers were made to us that I do not think have been carried out. I will not touch further on the subject—it will come up later in the session—but it brought us to the position where we had to abandon a great deal of our trade and our methods of doing business down there. At that time about five thousand of our seagoing vessels were registered in the Maritime provinces, and we had some twenty-five thousand seagoing men. To-day we have neither. At any rate the seagoing vessels are very few, and the number of sailors is almost nil. I merely mention these facts to illustrate the sacrifice we made when we abandoned our trade channels and went into confederation.

Reference has been made to the word "secession" a number of times during this session. Now, down in the Maritime provinces the majority of the people are not aware what the word used in that sense, signifies. It does not and never did mean disloyalty to the British flag; it means we thought there were other ways in which we could improve our trade than by hanging on to confederation. That was all that secession meant in the Maritime provinces.

When confederation was inaugurated the Conservative party were in power. For sixty per cent of the time which has since elasped they have held the reins of power, the Liberals having been in office the remaining forty per cent. The Conservative party may regard with disdain the imputations cast at them across the floor of the House, because their record is to be found in the history of Canada and it is one of progress and achievement. From the beginning of confederation the Conservative party took hold of the development of our railways. They built the Intercolonial, they bought out the Hudson's Bay Company, they constructed the Canadian Pacific. Some trouble then occurred and the Liberals came into power, and Canada had four or five years of the bluest time the country ever experienced; there never was any experience equal to it either before or since. Once more the Conservatives were returned to power, and the National Policy was adopted, which policy has been in force to a greater or lesser degree ever since. Although the Liberals under Sir Wilfrid Laurier governed Canada for fifteen years they never interfered with the National Policy. I do not think they improved it very much; whenever they acted they departed from its principles. I believe that if the policy of the Conservative party had been strictly adhered to the country would have been farther on the road to prosperity than it is to-day.

May I be permitted to say that the Conservative party have no idea of introducing legislation that would strangle or injure any branch of industry? The idea that anything of the kind is contemplated is a great mistake. They do believe, however, that if an industry can be improved by granting it protection that course should be followed. Other countries believe in the policy of protection after trying it out—the United States for example. In the country to the south they do not take very long to decide what is best to do in regard to any industry. Whenever an industry is found to be in need of protection they extend protection immediately. That is what the Conservatives propose to do in this country. Of recent years a new element, the Progressives, have entered the public life of Canada. Their idea seems to be that the farming interests shall be exempt from taxation of all kinds. I do not know where the revenue would be obtained if such a policy were carried into effect. Putting selfishness altogether to one side, I do not think they have very much to complain of. I wonder what our Progressive friends would do if they were in the same position as the original settlers of the Maritime provinces. Those people did not ride in Pullman cars into a land flowing with milk and honey; they came to the promised land by water, and they were obliged to locate upon the banks of streams. At first they could not go inland because there were no roads and no way of getting them. They had to settle down where they landed, and go to work. None of the blessings of paternalism were available for them; they had to stick there and work hard. It was a case of "root hog or die"; nothing else for them to do but win or lose. The farmers in the west have not had to meet the hard conditions such as the old pioneers in the lower provinces had to overcome. They have a fertile soil and they have had much encouragement in carrying on their occupation. I do not for the life of me see why they want to interfere with the manufacturing industries of the country. We cannot get along without manufacturing, and the farmers themselves would be very much better off if manufacturing in Canada were carried on to a greater extent than it is. Take the woollen industry for example. What do our farmers get out of wool? They go to all the trouble of raising sheep, and doing all the hard work incidental thereto and they receive thirty-five or forty cents a pound for the wool of a pelt. Altogether they probably benefit to the extent of $2; they put this in their pocket and go home and think they have done well out of the transaction. On the other hand if the conditions were such that that wool could be manufactured in this country, instead of their getting only $2 the country would probably benefit to the extent of $12 to $14. It reminds me very much of a contractor I once knew whose occupation was sawing wood. His plant consisted of a woodhorse and a crosscut saw, and two men working for him. He took a contract to saw a pile of wood for $11. The men's wages amounted to $10.40 and when he was paid off he only received sixty cents for himself. He asked if that was all that was coming to him and received a reply in the affirmative. When receiving that information he said that it didn't matter, that he had bossed the job anyway. If you go into a store and purchase a blanket you have to pay $8 or $9 for it. For the wool used in the manufacture of the blanket the farmer only receives $2.80. Would it not be much better for him if the $8 or $9 which that blanket costs represented money spent on its manufacture in this country? To manufacture a ton of wool would mean employment for 60 men for about a month. Surely it would be much better in the interests of all concerned that that wool should be manufactured in Canada than that it should be shipped to some other country and manufactured. And the same argument applies to many of our natural products.

The farmer is always complaining about the price he gets for his wheat, setting up the claim that agriculture is the basis of production. Well, wheat is a commodity that can take care of itself. It is a pretty sure crop provided the weather conditions are all right. When we try to export our wheat to the United States we are up against a duty of 42 cents a bushel. There is no question but that the Yankees are enterprising; and I have to admire them for that quality. They import our wheat, mill it and their government refunds 41 cents. I do not believe the United States can increase their output of wheat much more than they have been doing during the last few years, and their population is increasing so rapidly that I believe they will be one of our best customers in a very short time. There is no need to worry about our wheat; all our farmers need to do is to grow more and more of it and they will find a market for it. I think the same thing may be said in regard to all our agricultural products.

We must however try not to let our people be imposed upon. Our farmers are being imposed upon now in regard to the idea of letting Australian butter come into this country, and they cannot see it. Last winter our farmers in the Maritime provinces got as much as sixty cents a pound for their butter, but this year the buyers are very independent and the price does not come within fifteen cents of that. The buyers say: We will not give any more; there is plenty of butter in Canada. These importations of Australian butter have made our market a big one; we have our own butter and the Australian butter together, and this influences the buyers so that they are quite independent and do not care whether they buy from our farmers or not. Notwithstanding all the quotations about the price of butter in Montreal and Ottawa where, in my opinion, it ought to be cheaper than anywhere else in the Dominion, in the Maritime provinces last year we were getting from sixty to sixty-five cents a pound for butter and to-day we cannot get more than forty to forty-five cents. That is the effect that the importation of Australian butter has had upon us.

Our friends the farmers would do better if they would give up the idea of free trade. It was played out long ago; it is moth eaten, and the proof of that can be seen just by looking around. England is the mother and home of free trade and there are reasons why she is so. Situated as she is with her marine, she can go all over the world, gather the raw products everywhere, bring them home and manufacture them. But she is now having a hard time to continue doing that and within a very few years she will be protectionist as much as any other country. In fact she is that now. When the Labour government came into power in England automobiles were entering that country under a preferential tariff, but our friends the Labour government over there immediately cancelled that. We continued sending automobiles to England and were doing a good business, but when the present government took office they restored the tariff and what has been the result? To-day in England they are manufacturing cars better and cheaper than we can make them, and although Mr. Ford's car had the call on their market at that time, he does not have it now. When the present government in England put a tariff on automobiles and protected that industry, the automobile manufacturers there went to work and produced a better car and they are selling a cheaper car there to-day than we can manufacture.

Of course, the great question is protection, and until that is finally settled in Canada I do not know that we shall ever get any further ahead than we are. Looking back over the time since I first began to pay attention to politics—which is as far back as I can remember, because I have practically always taken an interest in public affairs,—I think something must be done in order that this country may progress as rapidly as it should. Why is it that with the unlimited natural resources we have we are practically marking time? I am not prepared to lay down a policy for the country, but from the success that other countries have won through protection I think we also ought to be able to gain something by it.

This meddling with the tariff will never get us anywhere. The delegation that came to Ottawa the other day is only one instance of what might come from several other sources under similar conditions. Those people who came here were really more than simply a crowd of people coming and going away again. They did not buy tickets to come down here merely for the sake of making a show; there was something more than that at the bottom of their visit. They must have seen that the wolf was at their heels, or was likely to be there, and I think far more attention should have been given to their case than was given. The proposed reduction in the tariff on automobiles certainly means that many of these people will be deprived of a living. We are always preaching in this country about the necessity for a good, decent living, about our advancing civilization, and so on, but when such a stab is given to this industry as this House has given or will give, it is time for us to sit up and see what we are doing. The automobile industry was going along very quietly and nicely; large numbers of fine, respectable men and women were employed in it, living in contentment; and without any warning whatever consternation is thrown into their camp. What do we find? We had an exhibition of what the result was in their coming to Ottawa to see us. When that industry was going along as it was, why should we not have let it continue and have a chance to breathe?

These reductions are being made simply because somebody wants to get an automobile cheaply. I am not in the automobile class and I do not expect I ever shall be; indeed, I think there are already too many automobiles in the country. A very respectable old gentleman and a very wealthy farmer was here last fall and I said to him: "Where is your automobile?" He said: "I sold it; I had to sell either the automobile or the farm. It took all the money the wife could make in butter, milk and eggs to pay for gas and tires. Worse than that, last year I lost about half my crop through gadding around the country, and the best thing I could do was to sell either the farm or the automobile, so I sold the automobile." I think we are better off without these automobiles, with people joy-riding and running around the country morning, noon and night, and dear knows what is going on. The automobile is really a luxury; no one can prove to me that it is a necessity. People can get around in some other way than by owning an automobile, which is a very expensive toy. These automobiles were bringing a fine revenue to the country, and we should let gentlemen who can afford to buy them either pay for them, or stay at home, or go on foot.

As regards the hydro developments in our province, we have a proposition that I think hon. members from Quebec and Ontario ought to be familiar with so that they will understand that they have not the prospects of any greater power than we shall have down there. It is proposed to harness the bay of Fundy tides. This is something new in the way of developing power, and I think later on this question may come up in the House when we shall have an opportunity of discussing it. In the meantime I want to remind hon. members that there is a possibility of developing a power there that will far exceed anything in Ontario and Quebec, not excepting the Niagara falls. It is a power which may be depended on at all times irrespective of rainfall or snow; it goes on continuously with the rise and fall of the tide.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the patient attention with which you have followed my remarks, though I have not said all that I should like to have said.

On motion of Mr. King (Kootenay) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Tuesday, April 27, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House has substituted the name of Mr. Elliott for that of Mr. Prevost on the joint committee of both houses on the Printing of Parliament, and that the Clerk of the House do carry the said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

LORD DURHAM

BUST PRESENTED TO CANADA BY MR. STRACHEY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a bust of Lord Durham has been presented to the Dominion of Canada by Mr. John St. Loe Strachey, of London, England, and has been received in Ottawa to-day. It will be installed somewhere in the House of Commons this afternoon.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In connection with the announcement which Your Honour has just made, I am sure I voice the feeling of hon. members of this House when I say that we all deeply appreciate the generous gift which has been made by Mr. Strachey and should be glad if Your Honour would express to him the thanks of this House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The fact of the gift has been brought to my attention only in the words of Your Honour. I have no hesitation whatever in adding my request to that of the Prime Minister although I should like to have been favoured with more information regarding the gift itself and whatever letter or communication may have accompanied it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall convey the thanks of the House to Mr. Strachey and at the next sitting give the information asked for by the leader of the opposition.

ELECTION OFFICIALS IN ATHABASCA

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Chief Electoral Officer copies of correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents between the Chief Electoral Officer and any other person or persons relating to the payment of election officials in the constituency of Athabasca.

THE GOVERNOR GENERALSHIP

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Before the orders of the day are called I desire to direct the attention of the government to a newspaper report and to ask a couple of simple questions in connection therewith. The matter is of such public importance and urgent interest at the present moment that I almost feel tempted to move the adjournment of the House in order that it may be debated, but it can be dealt with in this manner. The report to which I have reference appears in the Montreal Gazette of Saturday last. It discusses the prospective Governors General whose names are being mooted, and appears to have all the earmarks of authenticity. The article is:

Special from the Gazette's resident staff correspondent by wireless registered in accordance with Copyright Act.

I shall not read the whole of it but the following three or four lines are decidedly of interest:

Meighen's name curiously enough was among those recently mentioned in two London newspapers as a likely successor of Lord Byng.

I want to ask two questions: Is the Meighen there referred to the right hon. gentleman who so ably fills the office of leader of the opposition? Secondly, if there is any truth in that rumour will it have the sympathetic support of the government, and, if not, why not?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am quite sure that the name mentioned must refer to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen). I had always understood that he had other aspirations, but if he has not and is really seriously considering the position it will be a pleasure for the government to confer with him on the subject.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know what may be the prevalent opinion in the country from which the despatch comes, but this country spoke its mind on October 29 last and assigned to me another task.

CLEMENCY FOR PRINCE ALBERT PRISONERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Two or three days ago I directed the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to a petition which had been presented to the Department of Justice, signed by 3,500 persons, asking for clemency in the case of two prisoners now in Prince Albert, Cecil Terriss and Lewis MacDonald, who were convicted as a result of the strike that occurred last year. Has the Minister of Justice considered the petition and, if so, what possible action may be expected in the matter?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have received the petition and I may assure my hon. friend that it will be given due consideration.

PETITION FROM SUMAS LANDOWNERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I desire to ask the Minister of Justice a question based upon the following article which appears in the Vancouver Daily Province of April 21:

> Sumas landowners have forwarded a petition to Ottawa asking that certain provincial legislation be disallowed. The act to which they object is one passed at the last session of the legislature which validates all actions of the dyking commissioners and stipulates that the assessment roll "shall not be quashed or set aside or the validity thereof otherwise questioned on any ground whatsoever."
>
> Numerous property owners affected by the reclamation work are reported to have signed the petition. They attacked the assessment roll last year, asked for the accounting and alleged that the Land Settlement Board, as dyking commissioners, "illegally, negligently, recklessly, wrongfully and without authority and in breach of their duties as commissioners spent large sums of money in constructing works within the Sumas dyking district."
> Their action in petitioning Ottawa goes back to Magna Charta for precedent, it being a principle of the British constitution that any subject may approach the king. Provincial legislation, it is claimed, removed any right of Sumas property owners affected by reclamation works to redress in the courts. It is upon this that they are asking for the disallowance of the legislation, claiming that the legislation complained of is ultra vires.

I would ask the Minister of Justice if this petition has been received; if so, will he have the correspondence laid on the table, and has he reached any decision in the matter?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that no decision has been reached. I will make the necessary inquiry and give him information to-morrow as to whether the petition has been received. If it is for the disallowance of an act of the legislature, of course it will have to be considered by the Governor in Council, and I do not know whether these documents could be tabled before such action is taken on them. However, I will make the necessary inquiry.

Mr. STEVENS: Just following what my hon. friend has said, unless there is some constitutional objection, may we expect these documents to be laid on the table?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Certainly.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, April 26, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is with no small degree of pleasure that we on this side of the House are supporting the budget presented by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) a few days ago. It will be accepted with great appreciation by the people of Canada, for it shows a surplus of $55,000,000 over ordinary expenditures, and if the expenditures pertaining to railways and capital account are included there is still a surplus of $22,000,000.

We support this budget with more than ordinary pleasure because of the fact that it totally refutes and discredits the arguments of the Conservative opposition in this House and of the Conservative press throughout the country during the late election. There is no question, Mr. Speaker, that every Canadian citizen who goes back over the events of a few months ago will come to the conclusion that the party led by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) did not fairly place before the electorate the true condition of our national affairs. I think it is only right that we on this side of the House should at least try to dispel the gloom that exists in the ranks of our opponents opposite. During the last three or four years they have made it their business to detract from the efforts of the people of Canada, they have gone into the highways and byways and have stated from the public platform that we as a nation were on the verge of bankruptcy. That gloomy prediction is effectually discounted by the statement presented by the Minister of Finance, and I believe that throughout the Dominion to-day there is a feeling that we are on the road to prosperity. In fact this is so abundantly clear that it has not been questioned by our friends opposite who have so far taken part in this debate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it is only fair that I should review our national trade, and for this purpose I have taken the ten year period from 1914 to 1924. In 1914 our total trade amounted to $1,074,631,000; in 1924, to $1,952,130,000. In 1914, our exports per capita amounted to $56.10; in 1924, to $112.60. In 1914, our imports per capita amounted to $80.49; in 1924, to $96.22. Our total imports in 1914 amounted to $619,193,000; in 1924, to $893,366,000. Our total exports in 1914 amounted to $455,437,000; in 1924, to $1,058,763,000. In 1914, the balance of trade was against us to the extent of $163,756,000; but in 1924 it had shifted in our favour to the tune of $165,396,000. This improvement, as the Minister of Finance pointed out in his budget speech, has continued so that this year the balance of trade in our favour will be $402,695,000.

Laying aside our party quarrels, no Canadian can say that Canada is going backward or is bankrupt; on the contrary, he must congratulate himself and his country on the fact that we are going ahead at such a rapid rate. Indeed, per capita, we are the second largest exporting nation in the world. Of course, we hear the argument from the other side of the House that it is not a healthy state of affairs for us to be exporting more than we import, but that argument cannot be substantiated. To-day, by reason of our immense export business, the balance of trade is in our favour to the extent I have already mentioned, and this has resulted, quite naturally of course, in placing the Canadian dollar at a premium in New York.

Mr. MANION: May I ask my hon. friend, who on this side ever argued that it is bad to have an excess of exports over imports?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have heard that argument advanced on several occasions by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MANION: Never.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Just wait a moment. I have heard it argued by my hon. friends opposite that we should not sell our raw materials.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We will get to that later.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Get to it now.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Certainly we are selling raw materials. What nation does not? We are selling our wheat and our flour in the markets of the world. The United States sells her cotton and her oil in the markets of the world; and certainly crude oil is a raw product. So we are doing what every other nation is doing, we are exporting the excess of our raw materials that cannot be manufactured and sold at home; and no one will question the wisdom of that policy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the minister tell us what proportion of our exports is raw material, and what proportion of United States exports is raw material?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It would not be difficult to find that information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have it. That would be very appropriate to give the House now.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): You can do it at the proper time, but not just now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In following my argument, Mr. Speaker, I wish to be very brief. When one hears the statement that Canada is being flooded with foreign goods, it would seem well to consider the trade between Canada and the various countries of the world, to see how our trade has progressed during the last ten years. In 1914 our imports from Great Britain amounted to $132,070,406; in 1924, they totalled $153,586,690. Our exports in 1914 were $222,322,292 and in 1924, $361,160,802. I do not propose to deal with all the various nations, but I do wish to consider the trade between Canada and the United States. In 1914 we imported from the United States $396,302,138 worth of goods; in 1924, our imports amounted to $601,256,447. In 1914 we exported to the United States goods to the value of $176,948,299; in 1924, our exports amounted to $441,642,909. We have heard a great deal about the unfavourable trade balance with the United States. If hon. gentlemen opposite look at these figures they will see that during the last few years there has been an equalization in that trade. I have given the figures for 1924, and the figures for 1925, if given, would show an even more favourable condition.

We have heard a great deal regarding our trade with France; hon. members opposite have criticized from time to time the trade treaty entered into by Canada and France. Let us look at trade conditions as they existed in 1914 between France and Canada, and then consider them in 1924. In 1914 our imports from France amounted to $14,276,535; in 1924 our imports totalled $15,767,851. In 1914 we exported to France goods to the value of $3,632,444, and in 1924 our exports amounted to $18,879,097. In 1914 there was a balance of a million dollars against us, but in 1924 the balance of trade was some $15,000,000 in our favour.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the minister please tell us when the change took place?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is taking place every day. We are selling to France more than ever.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Has the change been gradual, or has it come within the last two or three years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend will understand that I am taking these two periods, the year before the war and some years after. I am not complicating these statistics with war periods, because I do not think that would be fair or proper. We are now some seven or eight years away from the war, and we can make a comparison of conditions as they are now with those existing before the war.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the minister give us the figures for the period just before the treaty was negotiated, and for the period immediately afterwards?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That will be shown later; it has been shown in this House on a number of occasions, and I am not dealing with it to-day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Would the minister give us the balance of trade for the year before the treaty went into effect and for the last year, which would be a fair comparison?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think my hon. friend could have heard me. I stated that I kept the accounting to the year before the war and to 1924, some years following the war. I do not wish to prolong the discussion; I am trying to show that during that ten year period, following a time of great stress during which this country acquired new obligations, we emerged with a favourable trade balance which was not enjoyed in 1914.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Might I ask the minister if it would not be more fair to give the year immediately before the treaty went into effect, and the last year?

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think that is necessary for the purposes of my argument. My hon. friend has discussed the French treaty from time to time, not always on the basis of the treaty; he has placed his own interpretation on it. These figures are chosen for the purposes of this argument, which I hope will be of some benefit to my hon. friends opposite, who from time to time during the last three or four years have made it their business to go up and down this country informing the people that our business was not improving; that conditions were not healthy, and that Canada was on the verge of bankruptcy. I hope to dispel that feeling not only in this House but throughout the country. If the figures I have, which are reliable, are known to the Canadian people, I am satisfied that all sign of despair will disappear and that the optimism with which the budget has been received will be considerably strengthened.

Japan is a country with which we have a considerable trade. In 1914 our imports from Japan amounted to $2,604,216; in 1924 they amounted to $6,298,201. Our exports in 1914 totalled $1,587,467, while in 1924 they amounted to $26,991,860. The same thing applies to China; the trade balance has changed in our favour.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Might I ask a question? What did those exports consist of?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Many articles made in Canada. Our Canadian manufacturers are entering the Japanese field. Wheat played a very large part in this favourable balance, but our merchants and our cattle producers in western Canada are also shipping their products into the Japanese market with marked success.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Of that total, what proportion is composed of manufactured goods?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not an encyclopaedia. The information requested by my hon. friend can be easily secured; if I were to speak to-morrow I would secure that information for him. We do know that during the last ten years our trade with Japan has expanded until now, instead of the unfavourable balance which existed in 1914, we have a very favourable balance as shown by the figures I have just given.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Our exports consisted largely of raw materials.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Rot.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is that so, or is it not?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, of course it is not.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As I told my hon. friend, a large amount of wheat has been exported to Japan, which might be called raw material. Possibly it would be advantageous to the Canadian people to make that wheat into flour, but it is no more raw material than is cotton in the United States.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would my hon. friend consider logs in the same way?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not talking about logs. I think my hon. friend would like to do some log rolling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I suggest to hon. members on both sides of the House that they do not interrupt the speakers.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not object, Mr. Speaker, to interruptions along the line of the argument that I am trying to place before the House, but I do object to being drawn aside, and I will not be drawn aside, from the argument which I propose to make.

We were led to believe that in Canada the manufacturing industries were declining, that our railways were suffering from lack of tonnage owing to this decline, that conditions were precarious throughout Canada, and that unless the policy suggested by our friends opposite of an increase of tariff brick for brick with that of the United States was adopted, there would be ruination throughout Canada. I have in my hand here a statement made by the Financial Times of Montreal in its issue of April 9, 1926, which I think is most interesting, and one that should have publicity throughout Canada. It says:

> Railway traffic figures for 1925 show great increase in productivity of the Dominion.

It goes on:

> Coal showed a heavy decrease and so did other bulky commodities—increase in agriculture not great, but includes a heavy shift from the less valuable products to wheat—the total increase results almost wholly from growth in the traffic in manufactured goods.

It goes on:

> A gain of 2½ million tons is shown in the freight loaded by Canadian railways during 1925 as compared with 1924. This gain took place almost entirely in the class named "Manufactures and Miscellaneous," which includes over 25 per cent of the total traffic, and which increased in 1925 by 2,333,068 tons. Almost every item in manufactures showed an increase, but the chief gain was contributed by automobiles, wood pulp, iron products, refined petroleum, paper, agricultural implements, while unclassified manufactures and merchandise increased 533,000 tons.

The article is an extended one and I shall not continue, but it is an article that each member of the House would be well advised to read and digest. It is not published by the party press, not by a paper favourable to the Liberal party at all events, but by the Financial Times of Montreal. I have no doubt that they have secured this information from the Statistical department and that their figures are correct. If so, surely the position taken by our friends opposite has been entirely wrong and the manufacturing industries of this country are not doing badly at this present time.

We in western Canada are not given to pessimism, and it is surprising to me that after hon. gentlemen representing the far west had journeyed to Ottawa this year and spent two or three months here, and had obtained a clear knowledge of conditions in this country, that we should find them, when they returned to Vancouver and to western Canada, trying to instil in the minds of our western people the idea that things are not right in Canada. I take strong exception to the statement made by my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) on his return to Vancouver. He is reported as saying, on March 11, at a meeting where he and his friends in the Conservative party were in conference:

> I found it very disheartening to come back to Vancouver and find so many people complaining of terrible conditions here. I believe things were never so disheartening as now.

Mr. CLARK: As I have been quoted, Mr. Speaker, may I rise to a question of privilege? The day following that report I made the statement in the presence of the press, representing three newspapers, that there was not one tittle of truth in the statement which my hon. friend is reading. I made no such statement as has been quoted.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Nothing could give me greater pleasure than to hear that statement from my hon. friend. He was generally reported throughout the press in British Columbia as having made a statement of that character, and knowing the gloomy attitude which he takes of things as they exist in Canada to-day, one could very well assume that that statement represented his attitude.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Public Works accepts, as he is bound to do, the word of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I not only accepted it, but said that it gave me great pleasure to accept it.

Mr. CLARK: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Minister of Public Works is commenting on a statement attributed to me in the public press, which statement I have denied. Now I want to state, Mr. Speaker, that the statement I did make was this—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, and I will retain the floor till I am through. My hon. friend has already spoken in this debate.

Mr. CLARK: May I say—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CLARK: I am rising—

Mr. SPEAKER: Sit down, please. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard rose to deny the statement attributed to him in the press despatch which the hon. Minister of Public Works was reading. The hon. Minister of Public Works then rose and did accept the hon. member's statement immediately, but he was proceeding to make an explanation when the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard rose again to make another denial. The hon. member has already denied in toto the statement attributed to him in the press, and the hon. Minister of Public Works, as every member of the House must do, has accepted his word.

Mr. CLARK: May I state, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Not unless it is another point of order.

Mr. CLARK: I am just asking a question, Mr. Speaker. May I state, as a matter of privilege, what I did say on that occasion?

Mr. SPEAKER: No, because it would be against the rules.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As I have said, I am delighted to have my hon. friend deny that statement. No one more readily accepts his denial than myself because I could not believe, in fact, I know that the conditions in British Columbia do not warrant that statement. I hold in my hand a statement that was published in the Vancouver Province, a paper not a supporter of this government, but an excellent paper that tries to present and does give to the people of British Columbia in a general way the news of the day. In its issue of April 11, 1926, it says:

> $5,000,000 building outlay for first quarter, 1926: $7,250,000 locally subscribed for British Columbia Electric loan. British Columbia Electric spending $30,000,000 in development. $160,000,000 British Columbia Electric payroll.

If I may be allowed an interjection here, it is with some satisfaction that I note our present industrial payroll in British Columbia is $160,000,000, because on looking back to the year 1922, I find that the industrial payroll of British Columbia was then $120,000,000. It goes on:

> Vancouver regular port of call for 42 steamship lines. 916 ships entered Vancouver harbour in 1925.

That is an inspiring statement, one that will do much to inspire the people of British Columbia, and I believe that if the people of eastern Canada would take advantage of conditions as they exist to-day and set fairly before the people of Canada those conditions, there would be more optimism and less pessimism than we have to-day, and it would be to the advantage of Canada as a whole.

When the Minister of Finance brought down his budget the other day the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), owing to the illness of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), replied on behalf of the opposition. I think we all admired the ease with which the hon. gentleman spoke, and the manner in which he developed his reply. He accepted the good things in the budget, the reductions in taxation, as being all right. Then he placed on Hansard certain figures, but those figures—whether due to lack of time in preparation or lack of opportunity for verification on his part—will stand examination and should be examined and discussed here. The hon. gentleman caused it to be inferred that this government had by means of the reduction in the British preference placed the woollen industry in a precarious condition in Canada. This is what he said:

> In the first year two and a half per cent was taken off the duty on woollen goods. The Laurier-Fielding tariff had served the country, so well, that had kept the mills so busy, was tinkered with in the first year and reduced to 27½ per cent. In the following year there was another cut of ten per cent in the British preferential bringing the tariff on woollens down from 27½ per cent to 24.8 per cent net, and what was the result? All over Canada woollen mills began to close; men lost their jobs, the exodus started to the United States and woollen men would not invest more money. I say to the Minister of Finance: Look at your imports of woollens for those years. See them gradually rising in this country until last year, according to the government's trade returns of which I have a copy in my hand, we brought in $20,000,000 worth of woollen goods from Great Britain, all of which we could have made in Canadian mills if the Prime Minister had had resolution and courage enough to stand by the tariff which he helped to make in 1907.

Now, let us look at the woollen industry and see what has happened. In 1921 our total importation of dutiable woollen goods from Great Britain amounted to $45,795,573. In 1922 we imported $22,895,016 worth; in 1923, $31,298,216 worth; in 1924, $30,447,895 worth; and in 1925, $30,283,675 worth. Now it may be that the importation of $20,000,000 to which the hon. gentleman referred had reference only to certain woollens. The figures I have given, however, cover the total importations of woollen goods from Great Britain. It will be noted that in 1921, owing to conditions that existed in Canada after the war—I wish to be fair—and before any tariff changes had taken place we imported $45,795,000 worth of woollen goods. In 1925, the importation had dropped to $30,283,000 worth. However, I wish to go on and follow the matter a little further. We have a great woollen industry in Canada known as Penman's Limited. This firm manufactures woollen garments and is a really great organization. We find that in 1921 they manufactured woollen goods to the extent of $4,789,053. In 1925, the amount had risen to $6,431,153. Apparently the Penman's are enjoying to-day a larger amount of business, at least their sales are greater, than in 1921 by almost $2,000,000. Now, if you go back and take the importation of $45,000,000 odd in 1921 as against $30,000,000 odd in 1925 you must go beyond the tariff changes to find the explanation for the diminution. The explanation must be found in some other cause because we find a decline in the sale of woollens in the United States. In that country, which our Conservative friends would lead the people to believe is not only the most highly protected but the most prosperous country in the world, no industry, they say, goes out of business because the government immediately comes to its rescue. Now, what do we find in the United States? In 1923 the average monthly consumption of woollens amounted to 53,467,000 pounds, whereas in 1925 it had dropped to 43,857,000 pounds. What is the reason for that? It is not because there was not a tariff. We know, every man knows that in his own home to-day, woollen goods are not being used to the extent that they were used years ago: They are being replaced by goods that are made from a mixture of wool, cotton, silk, and artificial silk. The result is that to-day the woollen industry, not only in Canada but throughout the world, is obliged to adjust itself to new conditions.

But I should like to deal for a moment with a further statement made by my hon. friend, as follows:

"I am willing to stand by my statement. Cultivators in the days of the Laurier-Fielding tariff, when the present Prime Minister was a member of the government of that day and supported the tariff in that government, enjoyed a duty of 17½ per cent. This government has cut the duty down now to 7½ per cent. No wonder that the trade has been almost abandoned in this country and our farmers are very largely being supplied with goods from the United States."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend that that statement does not correctly represent the condition as far as the manufacturer of agricultural implements in this country is concerned. We find that in 1922 the people of Canada imported binders amounting to $319,807 in value. In 1925 they imported $216,427 worth. The hon. member for South Wellington did not refer to reapers, but I shall give the figures for that branch of the industry also. In 1922 we imported 6,805 reapers, and in 1925 reapers to the number of 198. In 1922 we bought $36,143 worth of mowers, and in 1925 mowers amounting in value to $27,936. We will now see what the export business by the manufacturers of agricultural implements amounted to in those years. In 1922 we exported $449,013 worth of binders. In 1925 the export amounted to $1,220,000 worth. In 1922, we exported reapers to a total amount of $12,901 worth, and in 1925 the value of the export of reapers was $105,893 worth. Of mowers in 1922 we exported $369,762 worth, and in 1925, a value of $957,695, showing that during that period the agricultural implement men had improved their position in the matter of export and had conserved the home market to a greater extent. Now as to the plow industry which was said to be ruined: In 1922, we imported $554,846 worth of plows, and in 1925, plows to the amount of $613,998. In 1922, the export of plows amounted to $1,465,919 worth, and in 1925 we exported $1,630,908 worth, showing a favourable condition as regards exports and also as regards the home market.

Now let us take the total trade in agricultural implements. The total importations in 1921 amounted to $24,317,190 worth, and the exports to $12,527,000. In 1925 we imported only $6,428,000 worth. We sold $11,342,000 worth. There is no question with regard to the manufacture of agricultural implements. We were told in 1924 the reduction the government then made would destroy that industry. We know that to-day the Massey-Harris stock is selling for more than it was previous to that date. We know that many of the factories in this country are enjoying great prosperity, and we know from the trade returns that the change has not seriously affected the agricultural implement industry.

I have stated that this budget is appreciated by the Canadian people. It is a budget that goes into every home in this country. My hon. friend the former Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie), complained the other day that the government's budget was two or three years too late. He overlooked the fact that in 1924 this government had a surplus of many millions of dollars, and at that time, brought about by reduction in customs duties and sales taxes, the government contributed some $20,000,000 odd to the relief of the Canadian taxpayer. That should not be overlooked, and when my hon. friend claims that the delay had been too great he did not give consideration to the fact that this government in 1924 did make reductions in taxation amounting to something over $20,000,000 or $25,000,000. A reduction in sales taxes will always be acceptable to the Canadian people, and it is the desire of the government, and I think of the people of Canada, that we be relieved of that burden as early as possible. It is true that the sales tax is a convenient way of raising revenue. We are told that this government had increased the sales tax from two and a half to six per cent, but if hon. members will go back to the period of 1923 and 1924, and read Mr. Fielding's statement on the sales tax, they will realize that the sales tax as administered by the late government did not bring revenue, because it was not collectable, and where it was collected it had pyramided itself. It has been found that the amendments made by Mr. Fielding have been effective in securing revenue, and it has been the policy of this government, when conditions permitted in the country, to reduce that tax on these commodities that would first give relief to the people in the homes of this country.

The reduction in postage will certainly not be criticized. I think the Canadian people are to be congratulated that we are to go back to the day of penny postage, and as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) said the other day, the Canadian people being the first to introduce penny postage, would come back again to that period with great gratification and pleasure.

The abolition of the receipt tax will give to the merchant and to the individual who is buying or selling relief from what has been termed a nuisance. It was not a large revenue producer, and the government, as the minister has said, considered it wise to abolish that tax. I am satisfied that the change will be acceptable to the people of Canada. The reduction in income tax has given general satisfaction to those who have been paying the tax.

I have listened for the last week to discussion on the budget as occasion permitted me, and generally speaking from the opposite side of the House the argument has not been greatly against the budget as introduced by the minister. Exception however has been taken to the reduction in the automobile tax and it was on that score that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) moved his amendment a few days ago, stating that the government should not have made the reduction in the automobile tax without referring this matter to the tariff board. One would think, after hearing hon. gentlemen opposite, that this was a new thing in the public mind of Canada. I cannot conceive that members who were in the last parliament who heard the debate and witnessed the vote in that parliament could have been deceived as to the minds of the Canadian public representatives in this parliament in the matter of automobile taxation, because last year, when the resolution was introduced by the hon. member for Macleod, (Mr. Coote), we found members from every group in the House supporting the proposed reduction. The government would have been remiss if, after that debate and that vote, they had not given very careful and thorough consideration to the question of reduction of duties on automobiles. It may be convenient for hon. members opposite to say that this question should not have been dealt with by parliament but should have been referred to the tariff commission, but that course would not have satisfied the majority in parliament or the majority of the people of Canada, because conditions had arrived in connection with the manufacture of automobiles that required adjustment. I claim that the government have acted wisely and properly in the matter. It is true that some men will, as the ostrich does, place their heads in the sand so that they will not see what is coming, but any business man engaged in the industry of manufacturing automobiles, after hearing the debate in this House, should have realized that, in the public mind throughout Canada, there was a feeling that the day had arrived when there should be an adjustment in the duties on automobiles. So that we cannot, Mr. Speaker, take too seriously our hon. friends opposite. I have heard only one hon. member—and this my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Clark) will not deny—on the Conservative side state in his place that if his party were returned to power he would vote for and see that there was a return to the former duty.

4 p.m.

Mr. CLARK: What else?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is the statement my hon. friend made. If he wishes to add to it he can do so now or later.

Mr. CLARK: He did add to it and said that he would "refer it to the tariff commission."

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I know that, but as far as he was concerned he was prepared to see that the duties were restored to the former basis.

Mr. CLARK: Yes, and the pledge carried out.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Let us for a moment or two go a little further into this matter of tariff. It is true that in 1924 this government did reduce the tariff on agricultural implements. It was considered a very large reduction. We were told that the industry would be destroyed. It has not been destroyed, but for the purpose of this occasion and argument, I have tried to familiarize myself with what occurred when a similar condition arose in this parliament. In 1911 the leader of the opposition was returned to parliament and at that time he moved as an amendment to the budget:

> That in the opinion of this House, a substantial reduction in the import duties on agricultural implements is now due the agriculturists of Canada, and is in just accord with the true ends of a protective tariff.

It is interesting to read the remarks of the right hon. gentleman made at that time, when although he was much younger than he is now he had the same faculty for acute reasoning and getting at his point. His argument on that occasion was that, the agricultural implement industry having pretty well secured the home market in Canada and having ventured into foreign fields, the time had come when there should be substantial reductions in duty. It is rather a remarkable coincidence that the agricultural implement industry at that time enjoyed a duty of 35 per cent, and the leader of the opposition evidently came to the same conclusion then as this government has arrived at in respect of the automobile industry. The reduction then was from 35 to 20 per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the minister say that the duty on agricultural implements in 1911 was 35 per cent?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I understand so.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The minister is absolutely wrong.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Probably it had been reduced, but the leader of the opposition was referring to the period preceding 1896. The duty on agricultural implements had been 35 per cent and the Liberal party were asking for a reduction. To substantiate his case the leader of the opposition quoted Sir George Foster, who at that time was Minister of Finance:

> The reduction in agricultural implements from 35 per cent to 20 per cent is one under which it would tax the ingenuity of the manufacturers to keep the field against what is now keen competition especially in the northwest.

Commenting on that quotation he said:

> Thus did he postulate that the test by which these duties were to be judged, the guide by which he was to be governed, was such a duty as, at the narrowest point, would test the ingenuity of the manufacturers to keep the field against foreign competition.

He quoted Sir George Foster further:

> Our industries have not yet overtaken the home consumption of the people, but are gradually growing up to the point of meeting the consumptive demand of the country.

Later on, in order to lay down another guiding principle, he quoted the Hon. John Haggart as stating:

> That they believe that our people can compete with less protection than formerly and to prove that it can be pointed out that we are now sending agricultural implements to many portions of the world.

The right hon. gentleman continued:

> Now, sir, what are the manufacturers of agricultural implements enabled to do They are able under this tariff to exact a higher price than they could exact if the tariff were lower. I do not say that a reduction will to any very enormous extent affect the price; I believe it will materially, and I think it will render some relief to particularly the farmers of the west. It will afford some relief to them and I believe it is the bounden duty of the government to so afford it

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The duty on agricultural implements in 1911 was 17½ per cent and it was reduced in 1914 to 12½ per cent.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I corrected myself. As I said, the leader of the opposition was quoting arguments that had been used by Sir George Foster when he was Minister of Finance, Sir George having pointed out that prior to 1896 there had been a reduction from 35 to 20 per cent. The leader of the opposition in the debate to which I refer enunciated certain guiding principles. He laid down three basic principles: First, that a duty must never be higher than is sufficient at the narrowest point to test the ingenuity of the manufacturers to meet the keenest possible competition. That is good reasoning, and it was advanced by the right hon. gentleman at that time as an argument in favour of his proposed reduction in duties. Secondly, that the duty must be maintained not until the Canadian industry has overtaken the whole consumption, but only until the industry is gradually growing up to the point of meeting the consumption demand of the country.

He was not suggesting that the industry should saturate the home market before the duty was reduced but that it should only partially cover the market. Thirdly, that the moment the home industry is able to export its products into foreign markets, that moment the duty should be taken off or at least materially decreased.

In view of the foregoing arguments surely we have arrived in Canada at the point where substantial reductions in the duties on automobiles should be made, especially when we know that last year the manufacturers exported from 40 to 42 per cent of their output. I do not think therefore that we need be disturbed by the activity of some motor dealers and manufacturers in this country, who on the day the budget came down closeted themselves in their offices and without notifying their employees had notices prepared and posted on their doors next morning informing the public and employees that their plant had been closed until they could ascertain just what the budget meant. Now that meant no expense to the manufacturers, but the two or three days during which the plant was closed down the employees suffered in the matter of loss of their wages. If the General Motors concern had been dealing with a rising market and were going to charge from $150 to $200 more for their cars I could understand that they might close their doors and advise their customers of the increase. But that was not the situation. They were readjusting prices to meet the new duty arrangements, and it meant a lowering of cost to the consumer. No one can tell me that a firm who had so much business as obliged them to move their output daily from their plant would find it necessary to deprive their employees of two or three days' work in order that they might revise their prices. No, Mr. Speaker. It was merely a demonstration against the government in this country, and as such it was both unwise and unfair.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Against a government.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It would have been the same if my hon. friends had been over on this side; they would have had to reduce the duties. These people, in closing their doors merely because there was an adjustment of the tariff which the people of the country through their government considered proper, have not acted in the best interests either of their industry or of the Dominion.

Now we hear a good deal about increasing the manufacture of Canadian products. Well, there are many automobile parts that we do not manufacture, but there are many parts that we have the raw material for. Therefore the Minister of Finance said in his budget: It is in the interests of our people that there should be a greater development in the Canadian manufacture of those parts; that is, if the so-called Canadian manufacturers of automobiles are to have the benefit of the rebates in duty, at least fifty per cent of the product must represent Canadian labour and material. Every member of this House should endorse that statement.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): May I ask the minister a question? A minute ago he said there were many parts of cars that were not manufactured in Canada. Would he enumerate a few of them just by way of example?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, Mr. Speaker, I am going on.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Why,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend will have time to dilate on that when he is addressing the House. I know that we have most of the raw materials to make the parts that go into the manufacture of an automobile.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): And every part is being made here.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I know my hon friends opposite are telling the people of this country that we should not export our raw materials. Now here is an opportunity for them to endorse the policy of the government. We have said to the manufacturers: If you wish to enjoy the advantages which our tariff gives you of getting into the British Empire market, then produce in Canada fifty per cent of your car with Canadian labour from Canadian products. If that policy is not endorsed by the Canadian people, then I misjudge their viewpoint. I believe that hon gentlemen opposite will, on further reflection, endorse that policy, and I believe it will also be accepted by those who are engaged in the manufacture of automobiles to their own advantage as well as to the advantage of the country generally.

Throughout Canada propaganda has been circulated that due to tariff changes made by the government there has been a lamentable migration of our people to the United States Well, Sir, I think with your long parliamentary experience you will agree with me that that migration was in operation even before Confederation. It is true that during the last few years it had assumed serious proportions, but surely my hon. friends across the way do not really claim that the reductions we made in the tariff in 1924 were responsible for that migration. Certainly, statistics are decisively against them. The American government's figures show that in June 1924 over 200,000 Canadians entered the United States; but similar figures in June 1925 show that that migration had been reduced by fifty per cent; and we know to-day that our departmental returns disclose that many thousands of our people are returning. Let my hon friends opposite be fair. In 1920, 1921 and 1922 thousands of Canadians were going to the United States. But is that exodus to be checked by a policy such as the opposition proclaim? I have had occasion to go back to 1884, when the National Policy was in full swing—this policy which was to build up manufacturing in this country and make Canada a great place to live in. It is only necessary to read Hansard to realize that the statements then made by Sir Richard Cartwright in criticism of the government of the day are very similar to the statements which we hear so frequently now from our hon. friends opposite. All through the eighties up till 1896, as is well known to hon. members, there was a large volume of migration from this country to the United States. I think we are doing harm to Canada and to our young people in talking so much about this so-called exodus to the United States. Many of our young men and women will go across the line, for the means of transport are convenient and there is scarcely a Canadian family that has not friends in the republic, which of itself is a lodestone to our young people. I think there is an opportunity of diverting that migration to western Canada, to the advantage of eastern Canada and of the whole Dominion. I am not going to read Sir Richard Cartwright's criticisms, for they can be found in Hansard by anyone who is desirous of getting the viewpoint of that day and observing how closely his views resemble those now expressed by some of our hon. friends on the other side. The comparison is interesting and will show conclusively that the migration of our people across the line has been going on for many years.

Now, Sir, I believe that, irrespective of party, we all realize the great opportunities and the great advantages that this country offers, and I believe also that we are all confident that with the continued improvement of conditions Canada will enjoy an era of prosperity equalling, if not excelling, that which preceded 1914.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) will excuse me if I do not follow him through the specially assembled figures he has presented to the House—figures which will not convince any man in Canada without a job that the country is as prosperous as it should be when we consider its great natural resources. But my hon. friend gave some figures regarding the French treaty, and during the latter part of his remarks I took the trouble to check them. He pointed out that the government had done a great thing for the country by negotiating that treaty, and he gave certain figures of our trade with France before the war and after the war. I happen to have under my hand figures for the years during which this treaty has been in force. I find that in 1923 our imports from France were $12,204,000, and our exports $14,118,000; in 1924 our exports were $15,767,000, and our imports $18,887,000; 1925, imports $18,460,000, exports $10,290,000. In other words, during those treaty years—because half of 1923 was under this treaty—we have had a decrease in our exports to France of $3,828,000 and an increase of our imports from that country of $6,255,000. To put the matter in another way, before this treaty came into effect we had a favourable balance of trade with France of $1,913,000, whereas in the last fiscal year that has been converted into an unfavourable balance amounting to $8,170,000. This, I might say, would apply in almost equal degree to our treaty with Italy, and I believe also to the other treaties which have been negotiated by this government.

The minister also went on to quote certain figures regarding the woollen industry, figures largely from the United States, and concerning one particular company in Canada. No amount of figures can explain away the fact that from 70 per cent to 75 per cent of our woollen mills many of which had been in existence for from forty to sixty years, are now closed owing to the uncertain or adverse actions of the present government during the past four years. The minister also recited certain alleged facts regarding the reduction in taxation last year. He was only quoting what the Minister of Finance said, and he stated that there would be a reduction of aproximately $20,000,000 in our taxation. I would like to point out to the House, Sir, that this reduction has not materialized. This year we have paid very much more in duties and a much larger amount in sales and other taxes.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not in percentages, though.

Mr. ARTHURS: The percentage was not changed; certain articles were only last year removed from the sales tax. The sales tax was changed during the previous year. I am not a pessimist, Mr. Speaker, I have always been an optimist and I believe the Conservative party of Canada are not pessimists. But I would point out that great credit is sought for this government on the ground that during the past year we had a period of prosperity in Canada. While I believe that, owing to acts of Providence, certain benefits have been received especially by our farming communities, we know that in the great majority of cases conditions to-day are no better than they were twelve or twenty-four months ago. We have simply struck a favourable tide for the time being, owing to certain circumstances over which this government has no control. It is very easy for a boat to drift with the wind, but if you drift with the wind only it will very often change and the boat will get nowhere. It is absolutely necessary to do something in order to reach the shore. In regard to our circumstances during the past year I might read the Speech from the Throne in that regard, which says:

> I congratulate you on the growing prosperity of this favoured land. The products of our agricultural and other basic industries have greatly increased. Our export trade shows remarkable expansions. Our manufacturing and related industries throughout the Dominion have experienced a development not enjoyed in many years.

I would like to ask the ministry, who put these words into the mouth of His Excellency, where they found the information to justify that statement. I am quite sure that in the part of Canada with which I am familiar hundreds of factories have closed; no new factories have been built, and thousands of men are to-day without proper employment. As I said before, there is a reason for our apparent prosperity. We have had a good crop year in most provinces, and we have enjoyed a period of great prosperity in our mining industry. This industry, fortunately, is not under the control of the Dominion government, but looks for its prosperity to the various provincial governments. Speaking for the province in which I live and which I represent to a greater or less degree, we have to thank the present provincial government and Minister of Mines for the vast increase in capital which is to-day going into northern Ontario. I would also point out that a part of our prosperity is due to the greatly increasing tourist traffic in Canada. This tourist traffic within a few years, I believe, will be one of the greatest industries in Canada. We have at present millions of dollars invested in taking care of these tourists, and millions more are being invested every day. It is an occupation which requires neither tariff nor free trade; it simply exists, and I think the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) would be well advised in doing a certain amount of advertising in order to assist this industry. If he would simply show the various points of interest to those who desire to come to Canada he would be doing a good work. Many of these men who come from other countries become permanent residents of Canada, and in the meantime they invest a large amount of money in this country.

I was going to show that the proposition of the government regarding the prosperity of Canada was not altogether in accordance with the facts. I have in my hand a copy of the Public Accounts, and I see that during each of the years from 1920 to 1925 there has been a decrease in the note circulation of this country. That, I think, is a fair indication of the prosperity of the people. The total of our one dollar and two dollar bills in circulation in 1920 was $29,789,653; to-day it is $27,911,606.50, a decrease of over $2,000,000, or 8 per cent. In the total circulation of Dominion notes we find that there was $311,932,791.92 in 1920 and $206,712,088.46 in the last fiscal year, a decrease of $105,000,000, or 34 per cent. If we take the notes issued by the various chartered banks, we find that in 1920 the total circulation amounted to $225,769,628, while to-day it amounts to $157,888,900, showing a decrease of $68,000,000, or 30 per cent. These decreases are most interesting, because they give a real picture of the circumstances of our people.

I might also point out that our commercial failures are not decreasing. I have in my hand an extract from the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday last, giving the commercial failures in Canada for the previous week, as reported by R. G. Dun & Company:

> During the past week failures totalled fifty-five, in comparison with twenty-one in the corresponding week a year ago.

This is the condition under which the government claims prosperity.

A fourth industry which has been prosperous is our paper industry, which has been going ahead by leaps and bounds in spite of any action the government may have taken. This is one of the principal reasons for such prosperity as we have. I would also point out that in our cities, regardless of their situation, there is very little building as compared with that of a few years ago. We find thousands of houses left in the hands of the builders, for which they can secure no purchasers. If we contrast that condition with the state of affairs under which this government took office five years ago, a great difference will be seen. It was necessary for this parliament at that time to vote twenty or twenty-five million dollars for a housing scheme in an effort to keep abreast of the demand for houses. To-day the exact opposite is the fact with the exception of one or two cities in Canada, and I might point out that these are the very cities which have enjoyed apparent prosperity during the last two or three years, and they are the very ones which are being hit by the government in this budget.

The industrial population of Canada is very large, and they are to-day in a position which, to say the least, is not envious. They are working part time, hanging on under conditions which are very, very unsettled. They are waiting for one thing; they are waiting for some government to come into power which will give adequate protection to Canadian trade. I do not think there is in Canada to-day a city or town that has not had idle factories or idle men or men who are working part time. Thousands of factories have closed, and many of them have failed during the regime of this government. I hold under my hand Hansard of last year, which shows that in a debate on April 14, 1925, the then Minister of Labour placed on Hansard certain figures which have been disputed from time to time, but, as I say, they were placed there by a then member of the government, and he points out that during the fiscal year of 1922 there were 857 manufacturing failures in Canada; in 1923, 792; and in 1924, 625. These were all manufacturing industries which had failed during those three years, and their liabilities were as follows: In 1922, $39,000,000; 1923, $31,000,000; 1924, $36,000,000. In other words, more than 2,200 manufacturing firms failed in business in Canada during the regime of the present government. Outside of the few exceptions that I have mentioned, namely, factories concerned with lumbering or the pulp industry, it is a fact that we have no new factories in Canada to-day, nor is there any encouragement in the present budget to induce capital to invest in this country.

But the most unsatisfactory feature of the whole situation is the uncertainty that prevails throughout the country. It is not the action of the government so much as the threats which the government have from time to time made against the people of Canada. The government themselves apparently knew that, for they placed in the mouth of His Excellency in the Speech from the Throne words that would indicate that they desired to quell public unrest, and they assured the people of Canada that no tariff changes would be made without careful investigation. I know that these words have been placed on Hansard before, but in order to complete my remarks I shall read them again:

> They—

That is, His Majesty's government.

> —believe that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes; that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the Ministry with respect thereto.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this country is in a perfectly healthy state, ordinarily speaking. We have great natural resources, and we have public spirited men who are perfectly willing to go on and develop these resources under proper conditions, but the principal drawback is the fact that we have to-day a government which has condemned itself. The Prime Minister has stated that this government is, and has been, in no condition to make any forward movement in Canada. Take his own words at Richmond Hill. Speaking of the government's continuing in office, he said that if continued in power:

> At the most we would be reduced to marking time. This is not a moment in our country's affairs at which to mark time. It is a time to march forward.

Further on, dealing with the majority which he then had, or did not have, in parliament, he said:

> I would say further, I do not believe that any one of the four can be dealt with effectively by a government which is not supported by a substantial majority in the House of Commons. Group government and minority government may be inevitable in transitional phases of our political history, but neither is the kind of government wherewith to achieve great reforms.

I was going to say this government reminds me of a story I heard many years ago of a young lady who made up her mind that she was averse to marrying certain kinds of men. In the first place, she said she would not marry a red-headed man under any condition. Nor would she marry a cripple or any man who was deformed. She would not marry a widower, and she certainly would not marry an old man. But as the days went on, she decided to strike the red-headed man off her list of ineligibles, and decided that she would accept him, if necessary. After a while, as there were so many crippled men after the war, she decided that a slight disability would not make any difference. Time went on, and she decided that perhaps a widower, if he was a young man, would be all right. But he did not come along, and then she decided that she would take practically any man that came along, and she finally married an old, red-headed widower, with six children and a wooden leg. That has been practically the fate of this government. The right hon. leader of this government said that he could not and would not continue in office under certain conditions which at that time were certainly more favourable than the conditions under which he is attempting to govern at the present time. He further said that certain reforms could not be made without a sufficient majority, that without such a majority no important legislation could be put through the House, and yet to-day he is trying to make the people believe that he is giving them something like good when he has no majority at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where is the red hair?

Mr. ARTHURS: The government reminds me of an automobile with a slipping clutch. They use just as much gasoline as if they were doing something, but cannot get anywhere except downhill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is better.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is a breakdown.

Mr. ARTHURS: Yes, and it has a brake, but the brake might slip too, and then they would go down faster than ever.

Now, I desire to say a few words regarding the budget itself. The country will undoubtedly welcome the decrease in the income tax, a decrease which should have been made at least two years ago in exactly the same degree. Even according to the statement of the preceding speaker, the hon. Minister of Public Works, it would have been far better for this government to have reduced the income tax as they pretend to be doing than to have made a fake change in the tariff two years ago, and it would have been better for business in every way. The United States have decreased their income tax twice since it was first instituted. It was never as high as the tax in Canada. I do not know that I need go into the figures; they have been placed on Hansard, I think, before, but I will cite a few of them. The rate for married men earning $3,000 in United States, under the act of 1924, was $7.50. In Canada it was $40 and it remained at this figure until the present budget. On a $4,000 income in the United States the tax in 1921 was $60, and in 1924 $22.50, but at present it it is only $5.63. The Canadian rate during all this time has been $80. And so I might go on, all down the list. It is easy to prove to any reasonable man that a reduction in this income tax has long been due in Canada. We find that in Great Britain there have been two reductions in income tax amounting on the whole to upwards of thirty-three per cent. Australia has reduced her direct taxation, and I believe another reduction is due. Up to 1925 the tax had been reduced from $19.44 per head to $11.32 per head, a reduction of $8.12 per head of population. If we applied these figures to the population of Canada it would represent a reduction of approximately $70,000,000 to our people, and this reduction, as I said before, would have assisted in keeping capital in Canada and aiding business throughout the country. New Zealand has also reduced her taxation twice, and the reduction is far greater in amount than that now proposed by the Canadian government. I repeat that had this reduction taken place long ago, as it did in other countries, we might have retained more working capital in Canada.

The same arguments would apply to the reduction in the postal charges, with this addition: We found that when penny postage was first inaugurated in this country instead of the government losing money by the change they made money; the receipts of the Post Office Department were greater after the reduction than they were before. Personally I have no doubt that approximately the same result will follow the present reduction.

The tax on receipts was mentioned by the Minister of Public Works. I do not know that I need to go into details on the question. To begin with it was a stillborn child of this government. Nobody ever had any use for the tax, and the government simply took off one that was put on by themselves.

Now, let me deal for a few moments with the matter of the sales tax. As has been pointed out, the sales tax, previous to this government coming into power, was approximately three per cent—rather less in some cases. In 1922 the government raised the tax to four and a half per cent, and in 1923 they raised it to six per cent. In 1924, experiencing a great change of heart, they brought the tax down to five per cent and then claimed a reduction in taxation; but whereas the tax was three per cent under the Conservative government the present rate is five per cent. The collections under this tax amounted to $66,707,390 in 1924-25, or $7.50 for every man, woman and child in Canada. The collection for the last fiscal year, that is to say 1925-26, amounted to $71,900,000, or $8 per capita. This only includes the amount received by the government, and those of us who are business men know that before this tax reaches the ultimate consumer it is increased fifty per cent over that figure as a profit on the amount paid for the tax. The people of Canada are labouring under a very severe burden in respect of this sales tax. The government are getting after everything. I find in my own constituency that where a poor settler, starting to make a home for himself on a bush farm, cuts a few logs and takes them to a mill to make lumber in order to build a house, he is charged the sales tax upon the sawing of that lumber. It would be just as reasonable to charge a sales tax upon the threshing of wheat or the milling of grain for a farmer's own use. However, this is the condition as we find it to-day, and I hope the Minister of Finance will look into the matter fully when he comes to read Hansard, and provide an adequate remedy.

There is one good thing about the sales tax, though. This time the government have seen fit to reduce it upon certain specified articles, and we learn that we are to have the tax entirely removed upon pot barley, pearl barley and split peas. Surely the government does not think that soup is going to become absolutely necessary for the welfare of the people of this country. Yet these three items named in the resolution are the only three upon which the sales tax has been removed.

Before leaving the subject of taxation I wish to say a few words as to the statements made by the Minister of Finance regarding taxation, and the new divisions which he has made—that is to say, the taxation for war purposes and the receipts derived from war revenue. I have no very great exception to take to the classification he makes, but I should like to point out that he has charged as a war expenditure the difference between the amount of interest upon the public debt as of 1914 and the amount as at the present time. It is quite apparent to anyone who thinks of the matter for a moment that in any event the debt would be larger in 1926 than it would be in 1914. It will also be apparent to anyone who knows the conditions and the amount of advances to our railways that the debt would be considerably more than it was in 1914. Taking the ordinary average increase for the preceding ten or twelve years—I have taken a ten-year period—not allowing for special conditions and advances and loans to railways, I find that a most unfair charge of $6,575,000 has been made against war expenditure. We find that payments in connection with the Soldier Settlement Board have been so charged. I might point out that the great business of this board at the present time is building up farms for incoming settlers from foreign countries, principally from Great Britain of course—farms that have been thrown up by the soldier occupants, and they are expending upon them large sums of money in order to put them in better condition for intended settlers. Certainly there is no reason why that money should be charged against war expenditure. When we have regard to the amount of the public debt—because after all that is the primary and greatest charge against our income—I point out that the government have given no attention to special receipts arising out of the war. They have received from Great Britain over $60,000,000 in adjustment of war expenditure. They have also received large sums from Belgium, France, Greece and Roumania. But there is no corresponding credit given, and if those matters were properly adjusted we would find we were receiving more under the so-called war taxes than we have expended or are expending.

I come now to the tax proposals of the government. In the first place, only one of the tariff proposals made, is attracting attention in the country to-day; I refer to the reduction in the duty on automobiles. I have no brief for the automobile industry. There are no automobile factories in my county or in its vicinity, nor I believe are any accessories sold there. But I would point out to the government that we do not know whether or not the automobile manufacturer or the manufacturer of the accessories has been taking excessive advantage of the tariff in the past. The duty on these things had been the same for many years past until this budget was introduced. We all know, as was pointed out by the Minister of Public Works a few minutes ago, that there was an attempt last year in the form of a resolution introduced in this House, to lower the duty on automobiles. That resolution was voted down, and I note that every member of the government who was present at that time voted against it. Ten hon. members who were then or are now ministers of the crown were here when that question came up, and the speech made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) was directly opposed to any reduction of the duty. Furthermore, there is a duty just as high or higher upon many other articles which are at least as necessary as automobiles. If the government have decided that low priced cars are a necessity or that they are an implement of production, why not remove the excise and sales tax?—because the excise tax is purely and simply a luxury tax. We have also been told that the sales tax should be removed from every article of production. If that were done, the reduction by the amount of the sales tax and the excise tax would mean that the price of a car would be cut far more than it will be reduced under the provisions of the present budget, and in the meantime the position of these factories, and the employment of those thousands of men and their fellow workers whom we saw in Ottawa a few days ago, would not have been jeopardized.

I do not know anything about the automobile industry. I do not know whether they have been taking advantage of the 35 per cent duty accorded them in the past, and I am quite frank in saying that I do not believe any member of the government knows more than I do about the matter. They have no means of knowing, yet they are going ahead—for what purpose I do not know, although I rather suspect it. The government argue that the automobile manufacturers have made too much money under the 35 per cent tariff If that is so, why not give the House a list of the companies, a memorandum of their earnings or of their profits and losses?—because there has been loss in many cases. Let them give us the amount of business done by each company and the income tax collected from each. This would be a simple matter and would show that the government know something about it. I am quite safe in saying that the Minister of Finance has not such a statement under his hand, and that he, like the others, is simply going blindly forward. If we had a statement of that kind; if government officials are competent and honest—and I have no reason to believe they are not—it would show the true state of the automobile manufacturing industry in Canada, and the same would apply to the accessories.

In the meantime all we are asking the government to do is simply to fulfil the direct pledge which was given that there would be no change in the tariff without strict investigation. I have already presented that pledge to the House in another connection. We as a party, or I personally at least, only ask the government to stay their hand until the investigation which they themselves have promised—a procedure which at least is fair and honest—has been made. Every member of the then government or of the present government who was here last year voted against the motion for a similar reduction or a reduction of any kind. Why this sudden change? Why this utter disregard of the loss of employment and other injury which may result to industry? There is only one answer. The first reason is that they need the vote of the western members, who were the instigators of the movement in the first instance. In the second place we have to-day Conservative members representing those centres, which are most vitally interested, whereas a year ago the members representing those constituencies were Liberals. In the third place there is a certain section of this House, I believe—and I am saying that in no invidious sense—which is willing to support anything which will punish Ontario. They do not expect to carry Ontario at the coming election and they are prepared to let that province go to the wall so long as it does not hurt their own interests.

The other night an hon. member read at great length a speech delivered by Henry Ford. I do not know that that has anything to do with the matter. If I were in Henry Ford's place I would do exactly what he is trying to do. I would advocate the same doctrines he is advocating to-day, the same doctrines Mr. Carnegie advocated after he had got the United States Steel Trust in the position in which he placed it. He was quite willing then to be a free trader, and so is Henry Ford when he has practically a monopoly of the market in automobiles. We are not asking the support of men of that kind. We as a party are asking that we should have a tariff that will build up our trade, or that will do the very things in a greater or less degree along the lines which have made Mr. Ford and others a success. We want to build up our own factories and keep our own people here, not drive them away. The Minister of Public Works said something about the exodus from Canada—it is just matters like this which are driving our young men to the United States. I gave the figures last year with reference to the emigration of native born Canadians to the United States, showing that in the preceding three years 540,000 young people had left this country for the other side. I think the hon. member for Huron at that time showed from the same source that in the ten years preceding some 700,000 Canadians had gone to the United States. That may be true, but the period included years when some Canadians went to the United States for a purpose that did not reflect any credit on themselves. But during the same years mentioned by that gentleman 265,000 men returned to Canada, according to the certificate of the United States government, or an average of 26,500 per annum, whereas during the last five years there have returned an average of less than 2,500 per annum. Our Canadian officials may of course give figures different from these, but it must be remembered that they take into account men, women and children who are returning to Canada temporarily to spend a month or two in the summer. I know that as a matter of fact for some of my own relations have been so treated in the statistics: they have been entered as returning to Canada although they are permanently resident in the United States. We should take our figures from one authority, and the statistics given in the annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States I would commend to the House. Hon. gentlemen can get the book in the library and if they will look up the figures they will find that they are indeed alarming.

Now I come to another branch of the tariff as it affects the farmers of Canada. A large percentage of Canadians who have been looking forward to some relief from the budget have been disappointed. These people do not ask a reduction but, on the contrary, an increase in the tariff in order to protect themselves. Since this government came into power four and a half years ago great changes have taken place in tariff matters throughout the world. Every country of which I have any knowledge has increased its tariff in that time, and this is particularly true of our friends to the south. The one in particular I want to discuss now is the Fordney tariff, in which a very material increase was made in the duties on farm products entering the United States. The United States duty on such products is in some cases many times higher than our own, while others are absolutely prohibitive. I shall not put these figures on Hansard, seeing that they were very ably discussed yesterday by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie). Besides, they are familiar to hon. members. Strong representations have been made to the government that the Canadian agriculturist, the mixed farmer at least, should be accorded a fair tariff which will preserve the home market in view of the fact that he is debarred from the United States. Many of our Progressive friends sneer at the idea of a home market; they claim that their product depends entirely upon the foreign market. The prices for the things they produce, whether wheat or anything else, are controlled altogether by conditions abroad, and therefore they see no benefit in the home market. It seems to me that many of the arguments they advance and some of the figures they quote must have been prepared by someone who either had not made a close study of the subject or had had a brainstorm. The member for Maple Creek (Mr. Spence) made certain statements, as will be found at page 2680 of Hansard of April 21, 1926. He said:

> In my own province of Saskatchewan we have, roughly, $500,000,000 coming in from our wheat crop alone, and about three-quarters of a billion, in round figures, for all field crops. We have one billion and a half dollars coming into Canada as a whole from all agricultural products.

Then to show his appreciation of the industrial element of Canada he says:

> We have three million people engaged in agriculture. I am sometimes inclined to smile a little when I hear my hon. friends talking about industry and its importance. They speak of some shoe factory employing a few hundred men, or some automobile manufacturer employing a few thousand men, and turning out a few hundred thousand dollars' worth of automobiles.

This shows how carefully some gentlemen consider the conditions in Canada. Speaking from his own point of view the hon. gentleman declared that our dairy industry alone was worth more than the products of all the mines and all the oil and gas wells in Canada. Had he taken the trouble to look up the statistics he would have discovered how wide of the mark he was in many respects. The statement that we receive in Canada one and a half billions from agricultural products strikes me as absurd on the face of it, and I do not believe anyone who has looked into the matter believes that. I have here a return giving, article by article, the exports from Canada of agricultural products during the past calendar year, and showing where they went, whether to Great Britain, to the United States or elsewhere. A few of these things give evidence of the adverse effect of the Fordney tariff on the farmer of Canada. We exported last year $5,990,000 worth of apples, of which only $150,000 worth went to the United States. Of barley we exported $24,000,000 worth, the United States taking only $10,000. Our exports of oats amounted to $23,000,000 and of this sum the United States took only one-quarter of one million dollars worth. One of the few exceptions to this long list of adverse trade relations with the United States in these commodities is wheat, of which the United States took from us $12,219,000 worth. This commodity did not pay the forty-two cents American duty, and that is why it went into the United States. They imported this wheat to raise the grade of their own flour so that it might successfully compete against the Canadian miller in Canada. In other words, they imported this wheat entirely in the interests of the American manufacturer.

Mr. HOWDEN: The hon. member might give the entire wheat exports of Canada.

Mr. ARTHURS: I shall in due course. Of wheat flour we exported $74,000,000 worth, sending only $67,000 worth to the United States—not one dollar in one hundred thousand. The same thing is seen in cereals. The total exports of farm products from Canada during the last calendar year amounted to $667,185,568, of which $402,442,681 worth were to the United Kingdom, $102,367,815 to the United States, and $167,375,072 to other countries. This total includes products of the farm under three headings: first, field crops, raw materials; second, field crops, partly manufactured; third, field crops, chiefly or fully manufactured. The second table relates to animal husbandry, and the figures are under the same headings—raw, partly manufactured and fully manufactured. I pointed out that the hon. member for Maple Creek was a long way wrong when he said we received a billion and a half dollars for the products of the farm. These figures, as I said before, show that we received less than $700,000,000. Let me point out to the House some of the items composing the total. For instance, among "farm products" we find the following exported to the United States: ale, $5,042,806; gin, $56,361; whiskey, $10,772,988; other potable spirits, $107,382; wines, $77,262; or in all, agricultural products, partly manufactured, $16,056,797—every dollar of which went to the United States according to these statistics.

Mr. McMILLAN: May I correct the hon. gentleman? The hon. member for Maple Creek did not say that the farmers of Canada received $1,500,000,000; he said that the value of the agricultural products of Canada was $1,500,000,000.

Mr. ARTHURS: Mr. Speaker, I think I can understand the English language just as well as the hon. member for South Huron. I will read again what the hon. member for Maple Creek said:

> We have a billion and a half dollars coming into Canada as a whole from all agricultural products.

No words can be more distinct, and those are the words I repeated. It is no use for my hon. friend from South Huron to try to lead me to think I made a mistake. I am pointing out that to-day even those agricultural products which were exported were composed of goods, especially those going to the United States, which, to say the least, were very doubtful farm products. The figures I gave regarding the export of ales, spirits, and similar commodities were exclusively for the United States. The total figures of such farm product exports were very much higher; for instance, the total for whiskey alone is $13,334,092.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does that include smuggled whiskey?

Mr. ARTHURS: I have nothing to do with smuggling; the hon. gentleman may know. I would also point out other items which are peculiar so far as farm products are concerned. For instance, linen and jute manufactures, $41,152; oil cloths, $69,787; wool carpets, $11,799; wool fabrics, $23,578; wool underwear—they make use of Australian wool at that—$74,876; wool clothing, $309,982; other woollens, $185,618. I am using these figures principally to show that some of the statements made by our friends to the left are, to say the least, wide of the mark.

The assertion was made the other night—I think by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar)—that our exports to Australia last year were $105,000,000. Although that figure was repeated twice by the hon. gentleman, I felt satisfied there must be something wrong. On looking up the exports to Australia I find that in 1924 we sent to that country goods to the value of $19,000,000—not $105,000,000. In 1925 that value dropped to $12,000,000—under the Australian treaty. So the hon. gentleman was overstating the exact amount by almost ten times!

I have already remarked, Mr. Speaker, that sometimes the arguments advanced by our friends to the left are not exactly fair to those of us in this part of the House, nor are they exactly fair to the eastern provinces. We find the impression is sought to be conveyed by certain hon. gentlemen that the eastern provinces, especially Ontario and Quebec, are endeavouring for their own profit to take everything they possibly can out of the western provinces. This has been the stock argument of our Liberal friends in the western provinces for some time. I do not think it would do any harm to point out that this is not always the case. I have before me the official figures for last year and the year before of the various federal duties and taxes collected, and I am quite within the mark when I say that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec together have for years paid over eighty per cent of our total federal taxation; that next comes British Columbia; and that during the last two years at least there has been collected from the three prairie provinces only eight per cent of the total Dominion taxation.

Mr. McKENZIE: How does the hon member arrive at the amounts received from Alberta and so on?

Mr. ARTHURS: I am using the government's own figures, as brought down last year in answer to a question by Mr. McCrea.

Mr. McKENZIE: The taxes are collected at the ports in British Columbia and so on, but there is no such thing in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. ARTHURS: I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. I am willing to admit that so far as customs duties are concerned there is a considerable amount of goods taken out in bond in cities like Toronto and Montreal and then reshipped, but that is not invariably the case. The importer in Winnipeg takes his goods out of bond in Winnipeg, and it is only in the case of small dealers that the goods are reshipped from larger points. But that has nothing to do with the figures I gave. They are not only for the customs duties but also cover the excise tax, sundry collections, income tax and business profits tax. These are all included in the items I gave, which are substantially correct.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does not the hon. member think a great deal of the taxes paid by Ontario manufacturers is eventually refunded to them by the consumers in the west?

Mr. ARTHURS: The great bulk of it is paid by the manufacturing concerns of the east. If my hon. friend thinks the western consumers pay too much, the remedy I would suggest is to get the manufacturers in the west. If you put the proper party in power and send us over to the other side of the House we will soon have a policy which will enable you to have manufacturers in the west.

Mr. DONNELLY: Would the hon. gentleman tell us what manufacturers he thinks could start in the west?

Mr. ARTHURS: There are plenty who could start in the west, as they have started in the western part of the United States. They could get along very well if they had the capital and the necessary protection.

Mr. HOWDEN: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman why he did not start any manufacturing concerns there when he was in power.

Mr. ARTHURS: I did not have enough money and I do not belong to that part of the country. When this party was in power there were more important matters to be settled than the starting of manufacturing in any part of Canada.

I do not know that it is necessary to place it on Hansard, but I have in my hand a return of the Canadian National Railways showing the amounts received in various sections of the country, which goes to prove that the great central portion of Canada from Montreal to Port Arthur has shown a decided profit for the railway, whereas the central western portion of the road and the extreme eastern portion have shown deficits.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Let us have the figures.

Mr. ARTHURS: Very well. These figures are for 1924: Revenues over Atlantic division, $7,721,399.54. I am not going to give the operating figures, but the net deficit was $3,545,005.24. Central region: receipts, $117,160,048.47, profit, $15,950,871.91. Does the hon. gentleman want the figures for the west?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. ARTHURS: Western division: receipts, $68,114,750, deficit, $872,283.96.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does that western division include the section through the mountains?

Mr. ARTHURS: I presume it does, because I do not see any other division indicated. I would also point out to our western friends that among the privileges they enjoy are extremely favourable freight rates upon commodities which they ship in that part of the country. I do not think it will be disputed by any western man that there is a difference of from 7 cents to 9 cents a bushel between the price charged the American farmer and the price charged the Canadian farmer for shipment over an equal distance west of the Great Lakes, under the Crowsnest pass agreement.

Mr. HOWDEN: Would the hon. gentleman explain why, in the four fall months during which wheat is being shipped, the National railway shows a surplus?

Mr. McGIBBON: That is the time they lose money.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. gentleman is confusing two things, I think. Certain figures were given the House the other day concerning the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I think he has those in mind. I would also point out that during the months previous to the movement of grain the railway companies are under great expense in providing the necessary rolling stock, which is naturally charged up to those months, thus reducing the profit. We all know that thousands of cars must be moved west in order that they may be available during the rush season. I quite see, as a practical man, that that is an additional reason for expense, and no receipts would be shown in those months, to balance the extra expense.

Mr. DONNELLY: Would the hon. gentleman explain how it is that the railways, where there is a meeting point, compete for the grain which is to be moved? If there is no profit, why should there be competition?

Mr. ARTHURS: Each company wants to have that money passing through its hands; each company is anxious to get the business. I may say frankly that if the railways can do enough business they can afford to reduce rates. There is a certain amount chargeable for overhead; a certain amount chargeable for keeping up tracks; interest must be met, and certainly if they get more business they can do it at a lower rate and make a profit.

An hon. MEMBER: Then they are anxious to do more business in order to lose more money?

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. gentleman is wide of the mark. In order to show the benefit the farmer has received I will quote an eminent authority. If the hon. member thinks the farmers are receiving no benefit from the Crowsnest pass agreement, I would refer him to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) for information. I have in my hand a Canadian Press despatch of a speech made by the hon. member for Brandon at Elkhorn just previous to the last election, in which he is reported to have said that had there been no Progressives at Ottawa there would have been no Crowsnest pass rates. He is also reported to have said that these rates were worth $20,000,000 a year to the central western provinces. There can be no doubt of that authority.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I will detain the House longer. Most of these subjects will come up at another time and I shall be pleased to discuss them when they are again before the House. In closing I might point out that there is nothing in this budget which will help the people of Canada. There is no relief for the farmers, who are suffering by reason of an adverse tariff; there is nothing giving an extra day's work to our factories; there is nothing to induce new factories to come to Canada and nothing to induce the re-opening of those factories which are idle; there is nothing to indicate a policy designed to have our raw materials further manufactured in Canada for the benefit of Canadians—simply the same old course as that pursued by this government during the past four years. The idea of this government is to hang on to power, and to drift. It may be easier than pulling against the stream, but I want to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that you will never get any higher if you are content to drift down with the current.

[Mr. Arthurs.]

Mr. S. G. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the address to which we have just listened from the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs): It was a moderate speech, and although I do not agree with his deductions, I believe he was entirely sincere, as indeed I believe all hon. members are in the speeches they make in this House. I shall not enter into any of his arguments at the present time, but shall touch on certain points as I go along.

I want to join, first of all, in the chorus of congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and the government on the budget brought down. The many tributes that have been paid to the government from different quarters of the House and by all sections of the country are, I believe, well justified. The budget itself is in plain phraseology. Everything is shown in clear detail. There is no camouflage; there are no hidden mysteries. It lays bare the facts in a way that all may read and understand. The plain facts are good enough; they do not need to be coloured or concealed. The Finance minister's presentation was couched in good, clear Anglo-Saxon, from a people's government to the people themselves. In its genuine modesty it reflects its author. I believe the budget will appeal to the people in all walks of life in this country. The Finance minister did not find it necessary to make comparisons between this period and other periods or between this government and previous governments, for as someone has said, it is a budget that speaks for itself.

As I listened to the different speakers, a saying of Lord Macaulay came to my mind. That is the best government, he said, which desires to make the people happy and knows how to make them happy. It was Bright or Cobden who said that a government whose legislation does not give relief to every humble cottager in the land has not solved the problem of government. These sayings come back to my mind as I read the budget and couple it with the Speech from the Throne; for the two together make up a programme that I believe will bring relief to all the people of this land.

I do not intend to go to any very great length or to any very great depth in dealing with matters to which reference may be made in the debate on the budget. I think of the first speech Mrs. Nellie McClung, delivered in the Alberta legislature, of which she is still a member. She tried to show her position as a new member and to state her idea of how she should speak as such. She compared her position with that of a curler. When the curlers go on the ice, she said, they slide down a number of rocks to get the run of the ice, and I am going to get the run of the ice, she said, before I venture very far afield. I have made up my mind, Mr. Speaker, that I do not want to venture too far in this House before I get the run of the ice, and I would like to suggest in the most friendly way to some of the new members opposite that if they would first get the run of the ice they would probably do better in the long run, and there would not be so many speeches made that the authors would afterwards like to have deleted from the records.

Coming to the budget itself, I find that the expenditures for the year have been kept below the estimated figures and that the estimated revenues have been exceeded. The national debt has been reduced, and the National railway has progressed beyond our fondest hopes. It is to-day reaching to the goal where it will require no more funds from the national treasury. That is made plain in the budget, and the showing of the railway alone would be a credit to and an achievement for any government in this Dominion.

The people are going to be asked to dip into their pockets for $25,000,000 less of taxation this year than last. Now that may seem a small amount to some people, but I think it shows the trend of affairs when taxation is being reduced to the extent of $25,000,000.

The return to penny postage will simplify things very much. Three will not divide exactly into five, ten, twenty-five, fifty or a hundred, and when I go to the post office to buy stamps I always have to figure how many stamps I should get for a certain sum and how much change I ought to have. But that difficulty is now solved.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How do you manage when you buy two-cent stamps with a quarter?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): You can figure that more easily. I am glad to see that the receipt tax has been done away with. I have received a great many letters from my constituency expressing the hope that this tax would be abolished. You can put your stamp on a cheque, and if you have not the necessary stamp you can make the cheque out for two cents extra. But in the case of the receipt stamp, somebody may want to pay you money he owes when you are on the train or out in the woods, where no stamp is available. You naturally want to get the money, and I am glad that the government has seen fit to remove this tax.

I am sure that the reduction in the duty on automobiles meets with the approval of all the western provinces, and I think of the eastern provinces as well. I have read the newspapers on both sides of politics, including the Edmonton Journal, the Calgary Herald and the Vancouver Province, and all seem to agree that the right thing has been done. The people want automobiles, and want to get them as cheaply as they can. There is one phase of this question that I should like to put before the House. I think the difference in the price of the same make of automobile here and in the United States has had a bad effect on immigration. People will compare the price of an automobile here with the price of the same car in the United States, and finding a big spread between the two they naturaly conclude that if there is this difference between the price of automobiles in the two countries, the same difference applies in other lines of goods. They cannot make such a comparison in the case of other articles, hats, for instance, or clothing, because they may not be the same kind of article. But the Ford or the Dodge car is the same here as it is in the United States, and people notice the large spread in price between the two countries. That, I think, has done a lot of harm.

The same is true of the income tax. People can figure out exactly what they have to pay in this country and what they would have to pay in the United States. We are still paying a higher income tax than they are across the line, but we are now approaching equality, and I am glad that this is so. The income tax as changed affects particularly the man with a small salary. The man who enjoys a salary of $3,000 used to pay $40 income tax; to-day he pays nothing. A man in receipt of an income of $3,500 formerly paid $60; to-day he pays only $10. The man with a salary of $4,000 formerly paid $80; to-day his tax amounts to only $20. I think this is a move in the right direction.

Now, the splendid achievements of the past fiscal year and the promising outlook for the coming year are not the results of chance or accident. Shakespeare has said that men are sometimes masters of their fate. He might just as well have said that governments are sometimes the masters of their fate. These achievements have been brought about because the present government when they assumed office in 1921 took hold of the administration of public affairs with the determination, as the ordinary man says, "to make it go." The gratifying improvement that has come about is due to the business ability of the present government and their bullheaded determination to win. When they took office in 1921 they had faith in themselves, in Canada and in the Canadian people. I unhesitatingly affirm that no government that ever assumed office in Canada was faced by such difficulties and handicaps as those which confronted the King government in 1921. The previous administration, if we are to judge by the admissions made by some of its members, had apparently lost hope in themselves and hope in the country. In what other light are we to read the last budget speech of Sir Thomas White in which he expressed himself as follows:

> The world is sadly out of tune. Trust and confidence is sadly lacking. Class interests are advanced with selfish insistence. Unemployment is with us. Faith in our fellow men is weakened. Doubt of the future is voiced, and what is the trouble? The sun still shines, the rivers still sparkle and our lands are as fruitful as ever; our resources just as great.

Having painted the desolate picture that he did, the then Minister of Finance exhorted parliament to remember that the sun was still shining and the fields were still fruitful, and Providence in this case was asked to come to the assistance of a Conservative government. Well, Providence did come to their assistance and relieved them of office and put the present government in power. To-day the opposition say that everything good that has happened in the country is due to a kind Providence. If that be true, when hon. gentlemen opposite had a heavier burden than they could carry it was Providence who relieved them of that burden and placed it on the shoulders of the present government.

I have already said that the present government replaced an administration which seemed to have fallen into a state of despair. The country suffered from an adverse trade balance. During the last two years of the last government the national debt was increased by $174,000,000. It kept piling up at a tremendous rate, and the cost of government kept pace with it. The adverse trade balance was most marked during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, amounting in the aggregate to $736,000,000, perhaps the greatest adverse trade balance in the history of the country. And in the years which followed, agriculture fell into a deplorable condition, business was depressed, the Canadian dollar fell below par—and the value of the dollar reflects the financial status of a country; upon it outside financiers and other countries base their opinion of the credit and the solvency of a country. Not only was the Canadian dollar at a considerable discount at that time, but Canadian securities and bonds were falling in value, and the people were greatly disheartened and discouraged. The national debt rose to $2,422,000,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): In what year?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): In 1921. My hon. friend seems to dispute that. Well, that is according to my best information. The King government assumed office under all these handicaps: an enormous adverse trade balance, the cost of government increasing, and the national debt mounting at a tremendous rate. When the Liberal party were in power previously the national debt amounted to only $350,000,000, but when they once more assumed the administration of public affairs in 1921 it had advanced to $2,400,000,000, in round figures. Under those conditions it was a herculean proposition for them to attempt to carry on the government of the country. It took men of vision and courage to grapple with the situation. The task could only have been undertaken by men animated by a grim determination to bring back order out of a state almost of chaos.

How was the task accomplished? The new government, as the saying is, put their house in order. First of all they devoted their attention to effecting retrenchment in the governmental expenditure. I believe that in the budget speech of last year it was shown that the cost of government had been reduced by twenty-five per cent. The ratio of governmental expenditure then stood as three to four; that is to say, the new government spent only $3 to every $4 which had been spent by the previous administration. Then a reduction was brought about in the tariff in order to encourage the basic industries. Hon. gentlemen will remember the great reduction which took place in the duty on farm implements in 1924, and the prediction made by the opposition at the time that the concerns engaged in that industry would go out of business, and that Canada would be ruined. The results have been just the reverse. To-day the Massey-Harris Company, the Cockshutt Company and the different other concerns engaged in that business, are doing well.

The next matter to which the government gave their attention was the expansion of trade by the arrangement of commercial treaties with other countries. A great deal has been done in that direction, and more will be done in the future along the same lines. In future if we go to the West Indies we shall be able to see the product of our flour mills, our smoked hams and bacon, our biscuits, our hay feed and other products, being unloaded at different ports in those islands. When the present government came into power they realized that the home market was not at all sufficient for a great producing country like the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): I knew the hon. gentleman would do so sooner or later. Go ahead.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member approve taking the duty off sugar to hurt the Canadian farmer, and putting a duty on bananas to help the niggers from the West Indies?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): I did not catch the question very well. Did the hon. member say taking the duty off sugar?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Yes, we want our sugar kept at a reasonable price.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member want to hurt the Canadian farmer?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): He is not producing nearly enough sugar to-day. We would have to go with very little sugar to-day if we used only Canadian sugar.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. TOBIN: (Wetaskiwin): When the House rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to show the conditions that obtained in Canada when the present government took office in 1921. I had referred to the trade of the country, the growing cost of government, the outlook for the agriculturist, the depression in business, the falling value of the Canadian dollar and of Canadian securities and bonds, the distressed condition of the Canadian people, and the immensity of the national debt. I was then going to show what methods the government had taken to restore order and prosperity in Canada, and in this connection I mentioned governmental retrenchment, reductions in tariff duties and the extension of trade by means of commercial treaties. One other subject of vast importance to Canada remains to be dealt with, namely, the problem of transportation.

In reference to automobiles I should like with the permission of the House to put on record in Hansard a statement which, although it has already appeared, is of such moment as to warrant repetition. Henry Ford, as we all know, is one of the best recognized businessmen on the American continent. Not only has he made a colossal success of his business in the United States, but he owns a large proportion of the stock of the Canadian Ford Company. The article in question has a very important bearing on the present situation, and without reading it I will ask to have it published in Hansard. It was an interview by Mr. Ford in which he confirmed a previous interview and added to it. He said:

As a manufacturer of automobiles in Canada he believes the tariff to be a hindrance and stupidity.

Mr. Ford surprised people with something of this opinion in a brief remark after visiting his great Canadian plant on Wednesday. This afternoon he enlarged on the subject, confirmed his statement that free trade would benefit industry, gave his reasons and explained their application to the manufacture of Ford cars in Canada.

From the conversation came voluntary statements of pertinence and encouragement to Canadians, that it is possible to manufacture as cheaply in Canada as in the United States, that Ford cars in Canada have been selling at a higher price than necessary because of the tariff, that the tariff encourages industrial indolence and tends to permit prices based on what the market will pay rather than on proper costs of production, that the Ford Company of Canada, and presumably other Canadian companies will develop greater efficiency and economy of manufacture as a result of the proposed tariff reductions. Would he offer an opinion which might be useful to Canadians who are perplexed?

"You people are just waking up," said Mr. Ford in reply. "You ought to rub the other eye now, too, and clean out the tariff."

"Would it be a good thing for your company in Canada?"

"Certainly."

"The tariff is a hindrance to trade. I would have free trade. I believe in free trade everywhere."

"Do you mean by that that you can manufacture a Ford car as cheaply in Canada as you can here?"

"I can. Give me that plant at Ford City and I'll compete with the plant here at Highland Park any day. Why shouldn't I? Our unit in Canada can buy as cheaply as we can here. We make every part of the car in the Canadian plant and ninety-five per cent, over eighty-five anyway, of the raw material is supplied right in Canada. We get our steel from Algoma, lumber, everything we need."

"The usual answer," I suggested, "would be that large scale production makes the difference. Many Canadian manufacturers believe that they cannot compete with American manufacturers because the latter have advantages in mass production."

"I don't see that," said Mr. Ford, "What do you mean by mass production? I think we've got large scale production in our Canadian unit. They're turning out six hundred cars a day."

"How many are you making here?"

"Oh, we're doing between seven and eight thousand a day, but I don't think that's any advantage after a certain point."

"Do you mean that large scale production ceases to be an advantage when it grows beyond a certain degree?"

"Yes," said Mr. Ford, and explained that costs of manufacturing are almost equally divided between labour and raw materials. In both of these items, he argued, the Ford Company of Canada is as favourably situated as the American plants.

"In fact," he added, "you have a better class of workman in Canada than we have here, more intelligent, more vigorous. I like to look at their faces. They're mostly Anglo-Saxon."

"If it is true then," I said, "that the Ford car can be made as cheaply in Canada as here, why have we had to pay a much higher price for it all this time?"

"The old story," replied Mr. Ford, with a twist of his shoulders, "Because they have been able to get the price, that's all."

"Because the tariff has made the higher price possible?"

"Yes, certainly they've been able to get a higher price in Canada, naturally they've taken it."

"It is quite evident that the consumer will benefit from tariff reduction by lower prices," I said, "but you say that the automobile manufacturer will benefit also. Can you explain in what way?"

"Why, yes," replied Mr. Ford in some surprise, "It's quite simple. Lower prices mean more buyers, more buyers mean more business, more business means growth for the manufacturer. I would cut out the tariff," he repeated, "and have free trade. Free competition brings healthy business. I can tell you that those fellows over in our Canadian unit are going to manufacture more efficiently now. They'll have to it's going to be a better plant over there, better organization. That's another reason why it's a good thing for the manufacturer."

"You believe then," I asked, "that to help the manufacturer one must first help the consumer, and if the consumer benefits the manufacturer is bound to benefit?"

"I don't know any other way," replied Mr. Ford briefly.

"Some people," I explained, "believe in the reverse process. They say that tariff reduction will kill manufacturing in Canada, that there will be unemployment, and no wages, and therefore no money for the consumer to spend, that you must first help the manufacturer in order to help the consumer."

"That's all wrong," said Mr. Ford.

In the matter of transportation the present government, we are all pleased to know, has placed the Canadian National railway system on a strictly business basis. This system was in bad shape in 1921 and the government, having looked the globe over for a man with a sufficient knowledge of the transportation business, at length discovered one—large in avoirdupois, large in business ability, and large in optimism. The result the Canadian people know. To-day the Canadian National railway system is not only one of the best transportation concerns in Canada and in the North American continent, but it has been so equipped and built up as to measure up in efficiency with and offer real competition to the best transportation system in the world, the Canadian Pacific Railway. The efforts of the government in this and other reforms have led to the following conditions: We have a favourable trade balance of over $400,000,000, a balance which is steadily increasing, while business in all commercial and financial circles to-day is recognized as sound. You have only to read the financial newspapers, the reports of banks and insurance companies and of commercial enterprises generally, to confirm this statement. Business in the country is on a sound basis and is increasing. These results have been achieved since the present government came into power. Now we have a balanced and more than balanced budget, accompanied by a reduction in the cost of living as well as in the cost of government. Furthermore, our dollar has its full purchasing power, so that financial institutions in this and other countries look upon the solvency of Canada to-day in a different light as compared with the condition of 1921. Our National railway system is a pronounced success, as I said a moment ago, and our bonds are buoyant, being sought after by all buyers of securities. The present state of affairs shows, therefore, a very marked improvement over the period preceding 1921. In this phenomenal improvement our good friends opposite—and I am sincere when I refer to them in this way—can only see and believe that the hand of Providence has been partial to the Liberal party. If that is so, I would advise the government to continue to work hand in hand with Providence.

The condition of affairs as shown by the budget will stand out in all the greater relief by reason of the fact that so many have been giving us such dismal pictures of the country during a number of years past. We have heard "the whisper of death," and blue ruin has been preached with wearisome persistence. We all remember the election campaign of October last. You will remember the blue ruin stories that were circulated throughout the country. What will the people who heard those stories, and in a measure believed them, think now? Then in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne the House will remember some of the blue ruin speeches with which members of the opposition favoured us. I hope I will get the ear of the government for the suggestion I am now going to offer them. I think it is the duty of the government to see that every elector be sent a copy of this budget together with some excerpts from the speeches of our hon. friends opposite condemning all things in this country and prophesying national disaster. In my opinion the electorate are entitled to this information so they may contrast the prosperous condition of the Dominion to-day with the gloomy forebodings of our friends opposite during the years they have been in opposition.

Mr. McGIBBON: The people won't forget it.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): No. The Minister of Finance referred to this in his budget speech, which will be found at page 2451 of Hansard. He said:

> I have the greater reason for mentioning this because of my belief that the Canadian people in coping with the era of depression which followed the collapse of the post-war boom, have been unnecessarily hampered by a plague of gloom which shrouded the thoughts and utterances of too many Canadians, and but for which the prosperity of the moment would be even greater than it is to-day my privilege to record.

Now, I was in opposition for a long time in the Alberta legislature, and I have as much respect for the functions of the opposition as for the government itself under our parliamentary system. I always envy the private member in opposition, for he has liberties there that he cannot expect to have on the government side, and consequently he has better opportunity to develop. In my view every government needs constructive criticism, it is good both for the government itself and for the country at large, and if we would maintain our present parliamentary system the opposition as much as the government must help to maintain the respect of the people for our system of government. But when the people listen to our discussions here or read about them in the newspapers and find the opposition condemning every proposition advanced by the government whether it be good or bad, their respect for our parliamentary system is likely to be weakened. In Alberta we had an opposition party. A member of that party is now in this House, a good friend of mine, and another member was the hon. gentleman now representing West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) who is not in his seat. But that opposition was too strenuous and worked itself out of business. The Conservative party in the Alberta legislature dwindled and dwindled until it became extinct; but I believe that if its members had been fair and had criticized the government fairly, they would have succeeded better. I say this in all kindness and seriousness to my friends opposite and by way of giving them good advice.

Mr. DAVIS: How many Liberals were left in that government of which the hon. member speaks so highly?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): That is not the point. There are a dozen left. But the opposition, had it given the right kind of service, might have been ready to take office at some time.

An hon. MEMBER: How many Conservatives are there?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): There are none. That is the point I am trying to make. If the opposition had adopted a proper attitude towards the party in power there was at least the possibility of their eventually attaining office. As an example of my conception of the functions of an opposition let me cite a trust company. We employ auditors to audit the accounts of such a company, although we do not question the honesty of its management, but we want to be sure of its honesty. Now that is the duty of an opposition, to see that the government is doing the right thing. When the government puts forward policies that are commendable, I think the opposition should help to push them along. That is what the country wants. Let me say to the House that I am giving this as a friendly bit of advice to the new members, of whom I am one myself.

Now, of the speeches I have heard since I entered this House I would make this criticism, and again I am doing so with the best of motives. When a member of the opposition side makes a certain statement, we do not have to refute it, because some member on that side is certain to save us the trouble. For instance one of our friends opposite will tell us that the tariff lowers prices, and another member near him will say that this is not so, that the tariff raises prices. Then again, an hon. member opposite will tell our good Progressive friends that the west does not want immigration, while another member of the opposition will follow this with an absolute contradiction, and state that he cannot understand why the people of the west are so foolish as to invite competition. Only yesterday one of our opposition friends said that the people of the west are of no particular benefit to the country, anyhow, for they are hard up, they are broke; another hon. gentleman from the same side was kind enough to tell them that they are rich and greedy and want the earth. Then we are advised by our friends opposite that we should adopt a policy of retaliation towards the states in fiscal matters—what they tersely term a "brick for brick" policy of protection; and other members of the opposition offer somewhat different counsel and advise the country to take no heed of what our neighbours do in tariff matters, but to follow an entirely independent line. I recall another instance of these contradictory statements. An hon. member on the other side told the leader of the Progressive party: "You are the one really in control of the government;" but yesterday another follower of the right hon. leader of the opposition told us that the Prime Minister was leading the hon. member for Brandon blindly, and that the latter really had no say in government policy. In short, these contradictions are frequent from our friends opposite and save us a lot of trouble.

The first member to take up the debate on the budget was the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), and in the course of his speech he stated, in effect, that hundreds of millions of dollars of agricultural products are coming into Canada annually from the United States. I would say to him in reply that trade is barter; we cannot sell unless we buy. In this connection I have carefully prepared an annotated table from figures supplied by the department, covering imports from and exports to the United States for the calendar year 1925 of a few outstanding farm products. The table is as follows:

Imports from and Exports to the United States for the Calendar Year 1925, of a few Outstanding Farm Products

	Exports to United States from Canada	Imports from United States to Canada
Potatoes	$ 2,675,196	$ 568,192
Butter	1,770,930	13,300
Cheese	2,693,705	389,389
Bacon	384,129	179,549
Hay and other fodder	3,314,509	164,303
Live animals	8,253,843	2,063,944
Beef, mutton, pork, poultry (fresh)	3,681,815	1,565,621
Leather	6,195,465	2,356 244
Clover seed	2,989,634	257,450
Wheat	12,675,176	680,125
Flax	13,166,137	None
Bran and mill feed	4,408,993	6,389
	$62,209,532	$8,244,529

The exports of the above commodities were 750 per cent greater than the imports. I would like hon. gentlemen to look at these figures in Hansard to-morrow, if I have not made myself clear. The figures are exact, and draw a wonderful picture. These fourteen commodities comprise nearly half the total trade between the two countries, showing the great importance of these products. I did not pick out these articles for the purpose of showing contrasts, but took the ordinary, every day articles of trade between the two countries. The hon. member said there were hundreds of thousands of dollars in agricultural products imported into Canada from the United States; there are no hundreds of thousands in the whole trade. We only imported from the United States animal and agricultural products to the total value of $52,351,672, and we exported to that country a total of $102 367,072.

Now let us take the matter of potatoes. Potatoes come into Canada under a duty of 35 cents per hundred pounds, and the United States duty is 50 cents per hundred pounds. It is argued that we should raise our duty to equal that of the United States. Will we take a chance on losing a trade amounting to nearly $3,000,000 for the sake of $500,000? Let us take butter; the United States duty is twelve cents per pound, as against the Canadian duty of two cents. Hon. gentlemen argue that we should raise our duty, regardless of which way the trade flows.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the United States duty?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): It is 12 cents now; I am glad my hon. friend reminded me of that fact. The United States duty is 12 cents and the Canadian duty only 4 cents, but we export nearly $2,000,000 worth of butter to the United States, as against our imports which amount to about $13,000. Will we run the risk of losing all our trade by tampering with that duty? We might raise the duty until there would be no trade at all; would that be good business?

I might go on, but it is not necessary to labour this question. The same applies to wheat and to fresh meats. I now want to examine further in a concise form where agriculture stands, and I have the figures arranged in the way I would like them to appear in Hansard. They are as follows:

Imported into Canada for Twelve Months ending December, 1925, from all Countries

Agriculture and vegetable products	$196,041,785
Animal and animal products	45,703,203	$241,744,988

Exported from Canada for Twelve Months ending December, 1925, to all Countries

Agriculture and vegetable products..	$562,449,287
Animal and animal products.	194,022,331	$756,471,618
Excess of exports over imports.		515,726,630
Total exports of all commodities to all countries.. .. .	$1,270,986,854
Farm products..	756,471,618
All other exports..	$ 514,515,236

I would like to examine that for a moment, in order that the House may understand clearly that this country exports $515,726,630 worth of agricultural and animal products more than it imports. If we did nothing else in Canada but carry on agriculture we would have a favourable trade balance of over $515,000,000.

Let us go further. The total exports of all commodities to all countries from Canada in 1925 amounted to $1,270,986,854. Of this total farm products, as stated above, amounted to $756,471,618, leaving a balance of $514,515,-236. That is to say, the agricultural and animal products exported from Canada annually amount to $241,856,372 more than all the other commodities exported by this country. That would take in all the products of our forests, our fisheries and mines, and all the products of our great factories from the east to the west. We exported $241,000,000 more of agricultural and animal products than of all these other products combined. It is a picture that almost astounded me when I looked at it.

I should like to show the trend of our imports and exports by giving the figures for three years:

Year	Exports	Imports
1923..	$1,014,944,274	$903,030,515
1924..	1,058,057,898	$808,144,573
1925..	1,270,986,851	890,267,348

You will observe that there has been an increase in our exports each year, and that there has been a decrease each year in our imports, or the latter have been practically standing still. These, I think, are convincing figures that our trade is sound and increasing in the right direction. Then, if you look at our exports to the United States and our imports from that country, you will see that in that case also the spread is increasing in the right direction. These figures surely show that agriculture holds the premier position and is the dominating factor in our national progress.

One hon. gentleman opposite states that wheat has practically reached its limit, that wheat prices will not stand any greater production. All I can say is that prices may come down, and the farmers must face that situation. All they can do is to do what they are trying to do to-day. They must have greater efficiency in transportation, diversification and new varieties in their production, better methods, and lower rates of interest. We in the farming community in the west understand that we must compete with the world; there is no protection from that. When the farmer raises his bushel of wheat, he knows he must compete with the world at large; there is no give or take. He cannot carry on as the business man does. The business man can simply add any extra expense to the price of his product. Any extra tax or duty he can put under the head of overhead and pass it on to the consumer, but the farmer cannot do that; he must raise his wheat and then take chances with the world. So you can understand why the farmers are in favour of more efficient transportation and lower money rates to help them in their competition with the world. I am not posing as a farmer, but I have lived amongst farmers all my life and know their ways; and their difficulties. I know how they look at their position. The farmer cannot pass his expenses on to the consumer. If you go to Alberta you will see the great golden fields of grain, but if you go to the farmer's house you will find that he is not living very well at the present time, and when you ask him why he has not made any better progress, he will tell you it is because the profits are small. He cannot hire labour as other lines of business can do, and add the cost to the price of his product. That is good business, but the farmer cannot do it. He can only hire labour in the rush season, for he is competing against the world and his product cannot stand the pressure. It does not seem right that the business should not be of sufficient productiveness as to enable those engaged in it to hire the labour they require, but it is only the advanced farmers, or those who have large capital to start with, who can hire all the labour they require.

I wish to quote another peculiar passage in Hansard, and I do it again merely to show things as I see them. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), speaking in this debate on April 20, said—Hansard page 2642:

> My views on immigration may differ from those held by many others. I believe in our present situation in Canada the cities should be built up ahead of the rural districts and our endeavours should be directed towards that end, because we would thus give more employment and a bigger market to the people in the rural districts. I realize that it would be folly to bring people to the cities unless we had work for them to do. The main problem therefore, is to provide work in our cities, to bring the people in and to build up our urban population; that is what Canada needs far more than an increase in the number of farmers to settle on our land when our farmers now, according to some of them, are having hard work to make a living. The idea of bringing in more farmers is being advocated more by the farmers in this House than by others, and it is the only instance within my knowledge of an industry, which is complaining of hard times, urging and welcoming more competition for itself. That does not seem to me to be logical. In my opinion the cities should be built up first.

Mr. SMOKE: The hon. gentleman is reading from the report of a speech made in this House this year. Is that in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): I am quoting from a speech made in the present debate; it is all right. To continue the quotation:

Another reason for my contention is this, that from year to year there is very little difference in the quantity of food products that are used throughout at least that part of the world that we have to do with. There is very little increase in population and, therefore, very little need for our farmers to produce more stuff.

The situation in the cities is very different. More kinds of manufactures are coming to the fore every minute and there has been a tremendous development even in the last thirty years. The whole automobile industry, the phonograph industry, the radio industry and many other new kinds of manufactures are employing much more labour and that will be the case from now on. We shall therefore have more room for employment for the people in the cities as long as we have a proper fiscal policy that will provide work for them there.

I will not comment on this argument to any great extent, but here is a novel line of reasoning. We are going to turn the urban centres into places for the manufacture of phonographs and radios, and the farming interests can go by the board. It was so stated by the hon. gentleman. Let us build the cities first, he says, and the farmers will come. Very well, but who is going to give them protection when he starts his city? There will be no one here to do that. Hon. gentlemen opposite had better consider this peculiar reasoning for themselves and see how much it is worth.

To me the present misunderstanding between the east and the west is a most unfortunate thing. I do not believe this has been brought about by politics; it is a real misunderstanding. You hear people say that the west is selfish. I wish hon. gentlemen would go out and visit the west; they will then wonder why it has not made greater progress. Less than four years ago—and I am not now talking politics, although hon. gentlemen opposite may think I am—there was no traffic moved from Alberta to the Pacific coast, and none of our grain was shipped there. An elevator was built there in 1914, but it stood idle.

Now, if hon. gentlemen will look at the map they will observe that Alberta is 750 miles from the Pacific ocean. They will find that the Canadian National railway pass through the mountains is one of the finest in the world and the transportation system one of the best. Vancouver has a harbour that is unexcelled, and right there is the Pacific ocean ready to carry our products to the world's markets. The Panama canal was completed many years ago, and it provides cheap transportation by water. The effect of that is seen to be striking when I mention that lumber from the Pacific by this route can be brought into the Ottawa district in successful competition with local lumber. Would you not wonder therefore why it was that with a good harbour on the Pacific coast, open all the year round, and connected by water with the world's markets, wheat raised in Alberta was shipped two-thirds of the way across the continent to the ports of the Atlantic? Does that not seem strange? To what was this condition due? To the fact that freight rates to and from the Pacific coast were so high that commodities raised on the prairies could not and did not flow that way. But in 1922 there was a cut of twenty per cent in the freight rates from the prairies, and a movement of traffic started westward. In 1923 there was another cut, and even greater quantities moved to the Pacific. This year I am glad to say there has been a further equalization of rates, and this year we are shipping about forty-five million bushels to the Pacific coast. We do not expect to ship all our wheat to the Pacific coast. We are not selfish; we should like the equalization of rates to apply to the east as well as to the west. We should like the people of the Maritime provinces to get proper rates on the Transcontinental from the Great Lakes to Atlantic ports. We will work for that just as heartily and just as enthusiastically as we are doing in the case of the equalization of rates to the Pacific coast.

I have pictured these conditions in order to show what we in the west have had to contend with. A man who raises a bushel of wheat in Alberta is sixteen cents worse off than the man who raises a bushel of wheat in Ontario, because the former has to pay sixteen cents a bushel to move that wheat to the east this far. The rate for the carriage of a bushel of oats is twelve cents a bushel, and there is very little profit in it because the price the grower receives for that bushel is so low. That will enable you to understand why there is such a demand in the west for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway in order to provide a cheaper outlet for at least a portion of the products of the west. In this way that outlet will be in the interests of the whole of Canada, and not merely for the advantage of the western provinces alone. It will be greatly to the benefit of the entire Dominion to have the west developed as it should be developed.

Some hon. member said this afternoon that we in the west were gainers in the matter of freight rates because we were enjoying lower rates. May I say that at the present time we are only trying to get an equalization of the rates on grain? The freight rates on other commodities are a great deal higher for us. If you ship by express from Vernon, British Columbia, to Alberta, a distance of 350 miles, it will cost just about one hundred per cent more than the express rate for a similar distance in the east, say from Grimsby to Montreal. If you ship sugar from Vancouver to Winnipeg, a distance of 1,400 miles and more, the cost will be $1.60 per hundred pounds. But the shipment of the same product from Halifax to the prairies, an even greater distance, will cost only $1.14. We are not dwelling unduly on these smaller commodities just now; we are merely trying to show the conditions as they exist. May I say in closing this part of my subject that I believe there is a great future for our Pacific ocean ports?

I want to read—if I am not tiring anybody and I presume I am not; I seem to be getting very good attention at the present moment—

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I would not stop if I were you.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Thank you. I want to read the opinion of a well-known Canadian journalist on the prospects of the Pacific trade. Mr. John Nelson, speaking in Toronto on November 12 last, said:

> "Treat the Pacific as our forefathers treated the Atlantic. Be Drakes and Frobishers, explorers undismayed by foreign lands and foreign tongues, so you will create a new Elizabethan age and grow rich with the art and culture no less than the economic wealth of Cathay."
>
> This was the advice which John Nelson, well-known Canadian journalist, left with the members of the Empire Club when he addressed them at luncheon to-day on the problems of the Pacific as they affect Canada. The address was based on observations he had made this summer in Honolulu at a conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations, a gathering of 120 delegates representing nine countries.
>
> Canada's orientation in foreign affairs should be "occidentation," said Mr. Nelson. The Occident was calling to Canadian statesmen as well as to Canadian merchants, and the future of the country was on the Pacific even more than on the Atlantic.
>
> "Premier Mackenzie King," said Mr. Nelson, "has declared that our prosperity is bound up with our export trade. Where will we find greater opportunities for new markets than in Japan and China."
> He was impressed by Canadian ignorance of the Pacific which equalled the whole land area of the Globe. Canadians knew the Mediterranean. It was the cradle of their culture. They knew the Atlantic, it had been the main highway of their commerce, but they were still unaware of the importance of the Pacific. Even the United States was unaware of it until the Spanish war, the acquisition of Pacific territory and the foresight of Roosevelt, had drawn attention to the fact that Asia meant more than Europe to the future of this continent.

I read Mr. Nelson's opinion merely to show you what great possibilities there are for Canada in connection with trade over the Pacific. This year Canada exported 14,000,000 bushels of wheat to the Orient. Two years ago there was no export to that part of the world, and the western provinces were in a bad position with regard to the shipment of wheat. We found that other countries had to ship only a distance of 400 or 500 miles to the seaboard, but we had to take it across the continent. To-day we find as China and Japan are learning to use wheat the western provinces of this country are going to be in an enviable position—one of the best positions—in regard to the shipment of wheat, because they will be able to ship a large part of it straight across the ocean to the Orient. So that things are changed in western Canada, I hope for the good and welfare of all the Dominion.

The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) this afternoon advocated a tariff for the farmers. I hope that the agriculturists of this country will never fall for such a proposition, because it would be the undoing not only of the farmer but of the whole country. The United States might just as well say that it is the greatest free trade country in the world, as the hon. member says it is the greatest high tariff country. You find the coal fields in one part of the United States, the cotton belt in another part, the sugar cane and fruit in another district and the iron in another. The states are almost self-contained; they trade among themselves. We are not so situated. We have no cotton, sugar or oranges. The experiment which they are trying in the United States is proving expensive for the farmers. The farmers may be slow to learn, but they will learn that that policy is against their interests, and I hope the agriculturists of this country will never listen to protectionist arguments. I admit that the right hon. leader of the opposition, by his power of debate and his great ability, may make some inroads among the people with his line of argument; there is no doubt about that. But we must gain our experience from that of the United States, and it is a good thing for this country that their policy is going to fail before there is a possibility of its being adopted in Canada. That fact will save us if nothing else will.

The prosperity and success of all interests in the east, both commercial and financial, depend first upon the western crop, second upon transportation and markets, and third upon the price paid for the various manufactured goods received in exchange for those products. Those who do not understand the position should come out west and see the needs of that country. The pioneer farmer of the west, will start probably with an axe, —not much more—later on he will have a walking plough, then a riding plough and eventually he may reach the stage of gasoline power. His demands are never complete. If you allow the farmers of the west to become prosperous, I can assure hon. members listening to me to-night that there need be no fear of the rest of the Dominion, because they must trade; they are great buyers. They have put all their profits, up to the present at least, into some other commodity. If the west produces hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of products the people there do not deposit that money in the bank; they spend it and will continue to spend it for many years to come. Upon the prosperity of western Canada, therefore, largely depends the prosperity of all the other parts of Canada.

The enacting of the legislation promised in the Speech from the Throne means encouragement and inspiration to all parts of Canada. Some of this legislation has reached the stage where there can be little doubt that it will be passed by this House, and I desire briefly to refer to it. I mention first the revaluation of soldier settler lands. In the district I represent there are many soldier settlers and they have wanted this legislation for a number of years. Some of them have left the land, but others have carried on manfully and are doing well under the difficulties of their present position. They will not expect every detail to be made right at once; it cannot be done. I think the attitude of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), who presented the bill for the soldier settlers, must be looked upon favourably by hon. members of this House in that he tried to make changes suggested by the opposition and showed a desire to make the measure conform with the wishes of all parties, as he himself stated in this House. He wanted to satisfy all the people in the country by this soldier settler bill. I cannot see that the bill has been improved very much by the changes, but the minister has shown the right disposition. I am glad that there is to be a revaluation of the soldier settler land. I was pleased that during the debate no one took any position adverse to the measure; nobody said to the opposition, "This is all your doing, the trouble was caused by you." I am sure the soldier settlers will be glad to see this bill become law.

The old age pension bill is the highest type of legislation and will be welcomed by all fairminded people. It is our moral duty to see that it becomes law.

Then we have the amendment to the Penitentiaries Act, under which all inmates of penitentiaries are to be allowed to do useful work, apart of the proceeds of that work, I understand, to go to the dependents of the inmate, if he has any; otherwise to be kept in trust for himself. This move by the government is a wise one. When inmates of a penitentiary are permitted to do useful work which agrees with them mentally, work that they know something about, they will not have time to reflect on their misdoings; they will not feel that the world is trying to take vengeance on them, and in many cases they will become reformed. There is some good in all people, and this reform will mean much. It is humanitarian and it is right. I am glad that this matter has been brought before the House, and the hon. member (Miss Macphail) deserves to be congratulated on her move in this direction.

I wish to make a few brief references to my own province and to conditions prevailing there. I suppose I need not tell the House that at the present time there is an oil boom in Alberta. While we do not want unreasonable booms, I believe there are good prospects of finding petroleum in that province in large paying quantities, and I suggest to the government that they should take a part in helping to bring about a realization of our hopes in this respect. Every year large tolls are paid by Alberta to the Dominion in permit fees. In order to give you an idea of the amount of those fees I will place them on record: The total fees for the last current year were $454,911. In April last it was $2,944; in May $6,000 odd; in June $1,000. and for March this year the figure stood at $64,000.

9 p.m.

I would suggest to the government that they do one of two things: either give bonuses for the production of oil, say for one or more producing wells in the north of the province and one or more in the south, or themselves drill wells in these sections. There is always a suspicion, when strangers drill for oil, that the intention is not to market the product immediately but to hold it for speculative purposes. In my opinion the government could stimulate oil production in Alberta and it would mean a good deal to the Dominion at large. We firmly believe that there is oil in the province and I hope that the minister will act on the suggestion I have made.

As regards the cattle situation in Alberta, there is some complaint on the ground of duplication of fees. The cattle market is not very attractive to-day, as the prices are low and the farmer has altogether too many tolls to pay to get any profit out of the business. In the first place he must of course meet transportation charges, and besides this he has to pay feed and auction bills. He complains that at the first town into which he takes his cattle he must pay a veterinary surgeon to examine the stock, and if he ships them through to Winnipeg they must be examined a second time at Calgary or Edmonton. Very frequently there is only one veterinary to be found especially in a small town, a good deal of trouble being entailed hunting him up. Then there is the condemnation insurance, as I believe it is termed. When the farmer sells his cattle at the stockyard he pays fifty cents per $100 by way of insurance, the argument being that though the animals may be in good condition at the time of sale they may afterwards be found to be diseased. I do not see why the farmer should be expected to comply with a condition of this kind which does not obtain in any other business. When you buy an article from a merchant he does not give you a fee by way of guarantee that you will find nothing wrong with your purchase when you have taken it home. In my opinion this condemnation insurance should be abandoned. The people do not know whether the government is running the thing or whether the stockyards are in control of it. I understand that the entire fee is used for administrative purposes, but this notwithstanding, I contend that it should not be charged at all. It may be said, I know, that if the fee were not paid the farmer would possibly receive a lower price for his cattle, but I do not think that this contention is sound. At all events it is an unwarrantable impost.

I come now to a subject which is of considerable importance to the province of Alberta, namely, fox farming. In Alberta the people are finding it necessary to engage in other things besides the growing of wheat. They are going in for gardening and they have made a success of the raising of bush fruits. It has been demonstrated at the experimental stations in the province that such things as currants, gooseberries and raspberries may be grown in Alberta just as well as anywhere else. The people are learning too, to beautify their homes horticulturally and in many other ways. In the raising of foxes they have an industry that holds out considerable promise for the future, but there is one anomaly to which I would call the attention of the government. When the fox farmers of Alberta want an inspector to examine their foundation stock they are obliged in most cases to send to Prince Edward Island, which is a considerable distance away. That is one of their chief complaints. It may be of interest to the House to know how many inspectors there are in the fox industry throughout the Dominion. The inspectors, who I may observe in passing are obliged to put in a week's special training in Ottawa, are allocated to the provinces respectively as follows: British Columbia one, Saskatchewan one, Manitoba, one, Ontario, four; Quebec, one; New Brunswick, four; Nova Scotia, one; and Prince Edward Island, thirteen. It will be observed that Alberta has not even one. This may seem a trivial matter, but when it is remembered that an inspector has to come, as is usually the case, all the way from Prince Edward Island to examine foxes in Alberta it will be seen that an injustice is done that province. Last year about 1,310 foxes were examined in the province. The fox ranchers are therefore anxious to have inspectors located right on the ground. I may mention that the fox that brought the most money in Canada in any year was one that had been raised in Alberta. The value of foxes raised in the province last year for breeding purposes and pelts amounted to something like $6,000,000. The bulk of the product went to the United States, although a good deal of it is shipped to Europe. I understand that the fox industry yields the largest revenue of any in Prince Edward Island.

Another matter of importance I want to refer to before concluding. We have in the province of Alberta some beautiful lakes, many of them being attractive resorts with hundreds of cottages all around. I might mention Gull lake for instance. I think the Dominion government might very well supply suitable fish for propagation in these lakes, so as to produce fish, as well as provide good sport at these points. Pigeon, Conjuring and Gull lakes in my district are particularly interesting and something should certainly be done in this regard to improve them as resorts and to make them attractive to fishermen.

I come now to the question of rural mail delivery, and in this connection I am happy to be able to say that Ontario is not overlooked. Let me give the number of mail routes in each province together with figures showing the cost. In 1924, according to the report issued on January 1, 1925, there were 176 rural mail deliveries in Prince Edward Island at a total cost of $95,172; in Nova Scotia, 165 at a cost of $107,348; in New Brunswick, 279 at a cost of $154,534; in Manitoba, 98 at a cost of $60,122; in Saskatchewan, 80 at a cost of $44,436; in Alberta, 98 at a cost of $53,405; in Ontario, 1,990 at a cost of $1,584,433.

Mr. NEILL. Have you the figures for British Columbia?

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Yes, 67 deliveries at a cost of $53,405. Now, if you want to encourage immigration to the west and retain the people already there, give them some of the things that make rural life worth while. Certainly these rural mail deliveries are essential. In Ontario the towns are close together and there are in addition in many parts, mail carriers. In the west our towns are far apart, and we have not that convenience. Surely there should be a fair ratio between the west and the east in the number of rural mail deliveries. I think we should have rural mail deliveries in Alberta, Saskatchewan and the other provinces on at least an equal basis. There are more rural mail deliveries and at a greater cost in Ontario than in all the other provinces combined. Is that because the parliament buildings are in Ontario? Is that because deputations such as we saw here last week protesting against any reduction in the automobile duties come here during the session? If this is the centre of propaganda such as that, it seems to me that these buildings should be placed out in the prairies where the air is clear.

An hon. MEMBER: Winnipeg.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Someone suggests Winnipeg. I think somewhere in Alberta would be much better. I say again—and I am looking at the Minister of Public Works, who I think will carry what I am saying to the right place; he generally does—we want more rural mail deliveries in Alberta. I give the House notice that I shall push this matter further at the right time and place.

There is one other thing I wish to call to the attention of the House. I refer to the permit system on grain moving westward. You know, Mr. Speaker, that when we succeeded in getting a large measure of equalization of freight rates the transportation companies put on what they call a "permit" system, under which a farmer could not ship his grain westward unless he had bottoms at the coast to take his grain. Therefore, the grain dealers bought his grain at the Fort William price and naturally where it is to their advantage, they get the lower freight rate and any premium at Vancouver. That has taken place again this year. There was a partial reason for it in that a large amount of our grain was damp. I hope I can get the eye of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), for I know he will take an interest in this matter and back me up. I want his support.

Mr. STEVENS: I agree entirely with my hon. friend.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): I am glad to hear that, for if I can get the other side to agree with me I am succeeding. A reference to the statistics will show that in the last week of March this year the premium on grain westward was 2-4/5 cents a bushel, and a spread in the freight rates was nearly 3 cents. But some of the grain was damp, the permit system was re-introduced, this held up the movement, and therefore the farmer lost this spread because the grain dealers bought the grain at the Fort William price and naturally when it is to their advantage shipped it westward, thus getting the premium themselves. It is not right. It looks very much to the farmer like a swindle, to use a sinister word. The farmer to-day wants the privilege of taking his grain to the elevator, asking the price at Fort William or Vancouver, and then directing that his grain be sent either east or west according as the trade is in his favour. Why not give him this privilege. If the drying facilities are not sufficient, they should be supplied.

Then again, Sir, a reference to the statistics which I have already quoted will show that the price of screenings this year varied from $9 to $12 a ton at Vancouver, and only from $3 to $5 a ton at Fort William. I wish to call the attention of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre to this also. That is what the farmer is losing, and somebody is the gainer. I want the eye and ear of the Progressive party with respect to this. A spread of a cent a bushel in price is big, but a spread of two cents or more is tremendous. In addition, the farmer also loses the difference in freight.

Any man representing Alberta should be proud of his province. It is a vast rolling prairie, with forests in certain parts, well watered with streams and lakes, possessing a rich soil, and shielded and sheltered by the great Rocky mountains. Nature has endowed the province with gas and coal and we do not know what other minerals, and in all we have about the best climate of the whole Dominion.

Mr. NEILL: Question.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Let me give some further particulars of Alberta. The province has an area of 161,872,000 acres. Of this, 97,123,000 acres represents arable land, and we have under cultivation 29,293,053 acres, leaving unoccupied arable land of an acreage of 67,829,947. In a word, we have the greatest acreage of unoccupied arable land of any province, and we are proud to think that this will some day be brought under cultivation and benefit the whole Dominion. Recently our local paper in Wetaskiwin reprinted an article from the Toronto Globe, entitled, "A Province to be Envied," and I will read it for the benefit of hon. members:

With the transfer from Dominion authority to Alberta of the natural resources of that province, the country will observe with particular interest the progress made in development. Alberta coal has already made a reputation, but probably few people realize that it represents 14 per cent of the estimated coal reserves of the world, 72 per cent of those of the British Empire and that Alberta coal mines represent an investment of more than $50,000,000. Something is known of the existence of petroleum fields, and interest is re-awakened by recent publication of a report made by Dr. Hume of the geological survey. When it is considered that besides the coal deposits, 80,000 square miles of the province have petroleum possibilities, and that, besides, Alberta leads the Dominion in the production of natural gas, it is evident that the wealth of this young province passes far beyond the sphere of agriculture.

Even the most ambitious province should be satisfied with 72,000,000 acres of land capable of agricultural development, an area large enough to contain the population of the British Isles, but with varied and rich natural resources it has within itself the potentialities of a cosmopolitan nation. Behind the prairies, it is estimated, are 60,000 square miles of merchantable timber. For scores of miles along the Athabasca river are bituminous sands suitable for paving the streets of future cities. Extensive shale and clay deposits lie in the southeast. It has building stone, salt and bentonite. Its fisheries are worth hundreds of thousands of dollars per year. And what may be beneath the surface in addition to the known resources may offer almost untold possibilities for development.

An inland empire of such vastness, yet with a population of only 600,000, Alberta is in an enviable position to make its imprint dominant on the future map of Canada.

In conclusion, Sir, I wish to thank you and the House for the courtesy and attention which you have accorded me. I had no intention of occupying the time of the House at any great length, but the subject I have been dealing with must be my excuse.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Tobin) informed us that the farmers of the west wanted windmills. I can at least appreciate the fact that there was a considerable reduction in the visible supply of those articles in Wetaskiwin when the hon. gentleman came to Ottawa. That, with the addition of the gas which he says exists in that province and which has no doubt permeated his system, will probably account for the length of his remarks and the variety of the subjects which he touched upon. I noted one remark of his in which he credited the government with bulldog determination. The bulldog has never been recognized as an animal remarkable for its intelligence, but it has always been credited with a disposition to hang on; consequently I suppose that is the reason for the reference. The hon. gentleman quoted Cobden as saying that a government fails which does not give relief to the humble. I suppose he had in mind the relief afforded by this government to the thousands of people who have left Canada to find work in the United States.
